Rather predictably, there is a climatic showdown of sorts between Hicks and Antheil and his goons near the end of the film. Indeed, in what proves to be a psychedelic battle that vaguely anticipates the more viscerally hallucinatory elements of Apocalypse Now (1979), Hicks guns down Antheil's degenerates as a light show and Canadian country singer Hank Snow's 1950 single "The Golden Rocket" provides a certain absurdist ambience to the situation as if the counterculture movement and the war it opposed are depicted in a symbolic struggle. While Hicks efforts lead to him being able to rescue his friend Converse and reunited him with his wife Marge, the friends decide to temporarily separate since the antihero wants to provide cover for his comrades. Although the friends agree to meet the next day near some desert train tracks, Hicks is severely wounded after being shot by Danskin, who he subsequently kills only seconds later. When Converse and Marge eventually arrive the next morning, they are distressed to discover Hicks' recently deceased corpse near the tracks in a scenario that was inspired by Beat figure Neal Cassady's somewhat mysterious death in 1968 (notably, Nolte would subsequently portray Cassady in John Byrum's somewhat underrated film Heart Beat (1980)). Indeed, Marge immediately cries, "No, no, no, no, Ray! Ray! No, he's not dead." When Converse replies, "Marge, I've got to bury him," she demonstrates her hysterical degree of denial by senselessly hitting him while yelling, "No. You're not going to bury him. Don't you touch him. Don't you dare touch him. Get out of here. Get away." After Marge eventually calms down, Converse buries Hicks' corpse and then, upon finding the heroin in his dead pal's bag, pours the dope in the sand in what is ultimately one of the most infuriating gestures of passive-nihilism ever committed to celluloid. In the end, Converse says to Marge, "Move over, Marge. If we stay here and grieve, we'll be just as dead as he is" and then the two drive away into a white desert devoid to a decidedly dubious future. Needless to say, the film would probably have had a slightly happier ending if Converse had died and Hicks became Marge's new lover. Of course, with the alpha-male dead and the less than happily married couple comprised of a neurotic junky and self-destructive beta-male introvert driving off into what visually seems like oblivion, the film's conclusion can certainly be symbolic of the white America's forsaken future.

There is no question that Who'll Stop the Rain and the novel it was adapted from were both influenced by Nietzschean philosophy, which is arguably most obviously personified by the two very different male leads. Indeed, while John Converse is an expression of the sort of 'passive nihilism' that Nietzsche bemoaned as expressed by his obnoxious 'will to nothingness' and overall absurd ascetic weakness that he tries in vain to transcend with his idiotic drug smuggling scheme, Ray Hicks—a proud 'Zen Warrior' and archetypal man-of-action—embodies 'active nihilism' as a muscular mensch of strength that seeks to destroy the world and recreate it in his own image, so it is only fitting that he, not unlike the revolutionary counterculture movement he was part of, dies in the end. Notably, in his book Karel Reisz (2006), Colin Gardner would argue, "...it would be a mistake to say that the film condones the characters' misguided existentialism [...] Reisz undercuts the subjective indulgence of both Converse and Hicks to draw attention to the dangers of an immoral individualism by portraying both the war and its seeming antidote, the escapism of the drug culture, as twin jaws of the same trap. Both men turn to Nietzsche's amor fati from a helpless sense of the absurdity of war, but they apply its tenets in very different ways." In his (pseudo)autobiography Ecce Homo (1908), Nietzsche wrote, "My formula for greatness in a human being is amor fati: that one wants nothing to be different, not forward, not backward, not in all eternity. Not merely bear what is necessary, still less conceal it—all idealism is mendacity in the face of what is necessary—but love it." While the two characters have undoubtedly accepted their fates, it is doubtful that they 'love it' and would embrace the Nietzschean idea of 'eternal recurrence' in that they are so content with life that they would relive every second of the same exact life over and over again for eternity. While his wartime experiences have turned Converse into such an emotional cripple that he can barely even remember reading Nietzsche, Hicks' battle scares have influenced him to be able to live life 'beyond good and evil.' As Gardner noted, "Like Converse, Hicks' existentialism in the novel is born of a traumatic episode in Vietnam [...] Since then Hicks has adopted Nietzsche's idea of will-to-power through a Zen-like faith in the Samurai code (a poster for Akira Kurosawa's YO-JIMBO hangs by the door of his Topanga Canyon hut) [...] This allows him to see events less in terms of right and wrong, but like Nietzsche [...] as a question of pure Machiavellian power. The heroin for Hicks, as he explains to Marge, is simply another object, which belongs to whoever controls it, and he follows its trail logically and unquestionably to the bitter end."

WHO'LL STOP THE RAIN

Needless to say, judging by Who'll Stop the Rain, one can only assume that Reisz thought very little of Nietzsche's philosophies and the characters of Hicks, but as Carl Jung once wrote, "The Jewish race as a whole – possesses an unconscious which can be compared with the 'Aryan' only with reserve. Creative individuals apart, the average Jew is far too conscious and differentiated to go about pregnant with the tensions of unborn futures. The 'Aryan' unconscious has a higher potential than the Jewish; that is both the advantage and disadvantage of a youthfulness not yet fully weaned from barbarism." Indeed, the same 'barbaric' Aryan spirit, which is totally alien to the Jew, that led to the conquering of North America and creation of the United States is also the same healthy 'barbarian' spirit that leads to Hicks' demise. While the more Jew-like character Converse (and his half-Jewish wife) survives, he achieved none of the glory of his dead friend and is plagued to live the rest of his days as the same miserable banal fellow that he always was. Had Who'll Stop the Rain been directed by an Aryan like Sam Peckinpah or even a self-described "Zen Fascist" Jew like John Milius, it probably would have had a much more overt and nuanced Nietzschean edge. On the other hand, one of the most interesting aspects of the film is the director Reisz's critical approach to the subject matter, which is certainly more nuanced than Alfred Hitchcock's critique of the idea of the Nietzschean Übermensch in his Leopold and Loeb inspired psychological-thriller Rope (1948).

While it would take the so-called 'acid fascism' of Charles Manson to put the final nail in the already-corroded coffin of the counterculture movement, Michelangelo Antonioni seemed to cinematically prophesize such a forsaken fate for the subculture with Blow-up (1966), which he unequivocally confirmed with the bizarre surrealist ending of Zabriskie Point (1970). In the Maysles brothers doc Gimme Shelter (1970), Mick Jagger is arguably even depicted coming to the realization that the movement is dead in real time as he watches himself performing "Under My Thumb" while a 18-year-old negro named Meredith Hunter is being stabbed to death by a Hells Angel at the 1969 Altamont Free Concert. In the little-seen (non)cult film The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart (1970) starring a very young and then-unknown Don Johnson, it is demonstrated the counterculture is dead and that even the coolest and most intelligent of hippies sometimes commit suicide as the movement is a soul-destroying spiritual dead-end. In Ivan Passer's masterpiece Cutter's Way (1981), it is revealed that over a decade after the end of the Vietnam War and death of the counterculture movement, the wounds of war and drug addiction are still very fresh, thereupon underscoring the distinctly deleterious long-term effects of hippie hedonism and the shallow anti-authority (pseudo)ethos that accompanied it. I could go on and on, but I think it is safe to say that Who'll Stop the Rain features the most nuanced depiction of the seemingly perennial dark clouds that followed the so-called 'Summer of Love' and how these things contributed to the death of white America. If one sees the final scene of the film where Converse and his wife are driving away in a seemingly endless desert as an allegorical depiction of the aimless road to nowhere that white America has taken since the late-1960s, then one can only imagine that, after four decades, that very same road would now be full of infernal potholes and beat-up cars full of drunken illegal aliens and that the once-barren landscape is now increasingly flooded with every and any sort of forsaken brown person from around the world.

Notably, in his text The Dispossessed Majority (1972), which was written nearly half a century ago, American racialist writer Wilmot Robertson noted that American cinema no longer represented the character of the country's white majority population, or as he explained, "The ban on displays of Majority ethnocentrism in art—a ban written in stone in present-day American culture—also reaches back to the Majority cultural past. Chaucer and Shakespeare have been cut and blue-penciled and some of their work put on the minority index. The motion picture of Charles Dickens's OLIVER TWIST had a hard time being released in the United States because of the recognizably Jewish traits of Fagin. The masterpiece of American silent films, THE BIRTH OF A NATION, can no longer be shown publicly without the threat of picket lines, while Jewish-produced black 'sexploitation' films like MANDINGO (1975), replete with the crudest racial slurs against whites, are shown everywhere.” Of course, in a world where a mundanely minimalistic coming-of-age film about a gay negro dope dealer like Barry Jenkins’ Moonlight (2016) wins countless highly coveted awards, including the Academy Award for Best Picture, it is quite clear that things have gotten much more aesthetically and racially degenerate and that the white majority has seemingly given up on making its own true organic cinema, but such is the predictable fate of a nation where a subversive culture-distorting racial minority owns and/or runs all the major film studios despite only making up about 2% of the population (though one can certainly argue that lame independent movements like Mumblecore represents a genuine white movement, albeit of the spiritually neutered and largely racially deracinated post-bourgeois sort).

WHO'LL STOP THE RAIN

Undoubtedly, the only reason a somewhat ‘illiberal’ film like Who’ll Stop the Rain even exists is because it covertly (and, largely, seemingly unintentionally) depicts white American’s decline (also, it probably does not hurt that it was directed by a British Jew). Despite being a Jewish leftist, auteur Reisz was always dubious of leftists movements, at least starting with his commie family comedy Morgan – A Suitable Case for Treatment (1966), or as Gardner explained, “However, while Reisz’s skeptical indictment of Morgan’s madcap, symbolic lip-service to Marxist icons seemed both prescient and justified in 1966, when the British New Left were mired knee-deep in theoretical debate, DOG SOLDIERS seems to be fighting a rearguard action in a factional war that has already been lost. If there were any doubt, then EVERYBODY WINS, Reisz’s final entry into the political stakes (in which Nick Nolte once again plays a compromised seeker of truth), is clear proof that only an absurdist cynicism can prevail when conventional moral values have lost all meaning.” Of course, only an extremely self-destructive absurdist cynicism can prevail in a country where minorities—whether they be racial, sexual, social, etc.—are pampered at the great expense of the majority, hence the real implicit appeal of ‘Donald Trump’s Make America Great Again’ campaign. If America is to survive, at least in any healthy organic form, I think one should remember Ray Hicks’s rather simple yet poignant words, “All my life I’ve been taking shit from inferior people. No more.” After all, the United States is a nation sown in rebellion by Eurypid rebels. While it is easy to write-off Who’ll Stop the Rain antihero Hicks as a sociopath, I would argue that he largely personifies everything that once made America great as a fearless and heroic rebel that is willing to risk death out of loyalty his friends, which can hardly be said of the many boomer dopers of his era. After all, as Evola noted in his insightful 1968 essay Youth, Beats, and Right-Wing Anarchists featured in his late book The Bow and the Club (1968), “...I agree with the claim made by some Beats that—contrary to what psychiatrists, psychoanalysts and ‘social workers’ believe—in a society and civilization such as ours, and especially the American one, it is generally in the rebel, the misfit and the antisocial person that the healthy man is to be found. In an abnormal world, all values are inverted: it is precisely the one who appears abnormal in relation to the existing milieu who is most likely to be 'normal' and to preserve some vital energy. I cannot agree at all with those who would like to 'rehabilitate' such individuals, whom they regard as sick, and to 'readapt' them to 'society.' One psychoanalyst, Robert Lindner, had the courage to state this explicitly." Indeed, in a world where 'diversity is our strength' is the most common corporate/government mantra, people with two digit IQs are considered equal to people with three digit IQs, autogynephiles are considered sane enough to read books to elementary school children, miscegenation is a fad, disability is a virtue, Hebraics are lauded as world history's greatest humanists, killing ones unborn baby is regarded the most imperative 'female right,' and an overall slave-morality reigns, it is hard to imagine why anyone would want to be considered normal. In that sense, smuggling heroin as a sort of Nietzschean thrill seems sane by comparison; or, as Ernst Jünger once remarked, "better a criminal than a bourgeois," especially when the current bourgeoisie is largely comprised of box-wine and Xanax addicted feminists and soy-soaked sods, fanboys, and ethno-masochists.

-Ty E

THE MAFU CAGE
THE MAFU CAGE

Karen Arthur (1978)

In past centuries during the good old European colonial days, it was no uncommon for degenerate European artists, especially those of the deracinated and sexually introverted sort, to seek exile in exotic foreign lands. Indeed, after giving upon poetry for good before even turning 21, Symbolist poet and scandalous libertine prick Arthur Rimbaud lived everywhere from the Dutch East Indies (now Indonesia) to Harar, Ethiopia (in fact, he was apparently the third European to have ever set foot in the city) before having to return to his native France upon abruptly acquiring bone cancer, having his leg amputated, and soon dying on November 10, 1891 at the premature age of 37. Additionally, frog commie cocksucker André Gide's writings were oftentimes inspired by his dubious travels and sexual escapades in places ranging from Arab Algiers to the decidedly dark Congo. Of course, alpha-Beat William S. Burroughs' writings were inspired by similar experiences as a perennial wanderer who lusted after the young boys he met while living abroad in third world hellholes like the South African Amazon and Morocco. Naturally, one of the reasons certain artists and left-wingers in general support so-called multiculturalism is that it allows them the opportunity to easily fulfill their fetishes for melanin-privileged people without even having to leave their homelands. In rather bizarre and inexplicable 'mainstream arthouse' horror-melodrama hybrid The Mafu Cage (1978) aka Don't Ring the Doorbell aka Deviation aka The Cage aka My Sister, My Love directed by Karen Arthur (The Jacksons: An American Dream, True Women) is intriguing in that takes the stereotype of the degenerate white xenophile and takes it to ungodly extremes in a somewhat anomalous and surely aberrant film that belongs to the unofficial psychotic woman subgenre. Adapted from the play Toi et les nuages aka You and Your Clouds by fairly unknown French playwright Éric Wesphal, Arthur's curious cult enigma depicts a crazed and pathologically 'Afrocentric' chick whose glaring lack of sanity seems to be, at least partially, the result of the fact that she grew up running around with negro tribesmen because her father was some sort of kooky cultural anthropologist who had an undying fetish for living among savages. Indeed, in Arthur's fairly forgotten film, racial schizophrenia and general psychopathy are closely intertwined in a work about a rich white girl who grew up in various Africa jungles that will stop at nothing to pretend that she is still living in said African jungles.

Starring exceedingly eccentric squeaky-voiced blonde Jewess Carol Kane (Hester Street, Annie Hall) in what is unequivocally the most patently perverse and perturbing performance of her eclectically quirky career as a decided deranged dame of the quasi-autistic/psychotic sort whose less than conventional upbringing living among Pygmies and other African negro tribesmen has inspired her to live in a highly hermetic fantasy realm of her own making involving African tribal masks and artifacts, real living and breathing orangutans that she murders when she gets tired of them, and one-person avant-garde blackface performance art performances, among other things, The Mafu Cage is a strikingly strange and ultimately tragic tale of quasi-incestuous sisterly co-dependence about a crazed cunt and the unwavering negligence of her anally retentive enabler sister-cum-caretaker. The second of only three features directed by Ms. Arthur following her rarely-seen psycho-bitch arthouse debut Legacy (1975) and preceding the dreamlike thriller Lady Beware (1987) starring Diane Lane, the film demonstrate that the auteuress actually has a distinct vision that was almost surely mispent in the bottomless pit known as the television world where she would direct almost fifty different TV movies and TV series during her 40+ year career. Like Robert Aldrich's What Ever Happened to Baby Jane? (1962) meets Fassbinder's The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972) meets the Maysles brothers' Grey Gardens (1975) as seemingly directed by an Afrocentric feminist dyke with a very personal disdain for the white bourgeoisie, The Mafu Cage—a work that features the intriguing aesthetic theme of 'Africa vs. The Victoria era'—is a film that some will love and most will probably hate but surely something that no one will ever forget. After all, Ms. Kane was probably the first Hebrew to sport blackface since the days of Al Jolson when Israelites became sort of proto-wiggers by playing and promoting degenerate jazz.

Before he kicked the bucket, an eccentric African primatologist/anthropologist told his eldest daughter Ellen (Lee Grant of Norman Jewison's In the Heat of the Night (1967) and David Lynch's Mulholland Drive (2001)) regarding her younger sister, "Give Cissy freedom to create her own familiar environment [...] for civilized institutions have no understanding of the soul of a wild thing." Apparently, the anthropologist was one of those liberal quacks that did not know how to discipline his kids so he lied to himself and everyone else by regularly proclaiming that, "All brilliant children are eccentric," as an excuse to pretend that his clearly mentally damaged daughter was fine and did not need any help, even though she tends to randomly get murderously violent. Indeed, little Cissy (Carol Kane) is a conspicuously crazed cunt of the absurdly Afrocentric sort who is watched over by her sister in a large old mansion filled with primitive negro artifacts that were left to them by their dear daddy. Cissy is totally obsessed with owning and playing with monkeys that she lovingly calls "Mafu," but she always ends up killing these poor primates during her various mental breaks. While Cissy is rather bestially visceral and artistically-inclined as a gal that goes somewhat grotesque sketches of monkeys and unclad women, her sister Ellen is the complete opposite as a fiercely frigid and ultra logical astrologist with next to nil visible emotions aside from the occasional melancholy stare. At the beginning of the film, Ellen comes home from work and finds her sister Cissy gardening with no clothes on aside from a goofy hat, so she tells her little sis to get dressed, stating, "I mean decently covered, like the young lady mother and I tried to raise you to be. I think sometimes you'd rather be back in Africa running naked with your nasty little playmates," to which her sassy sibling replies, "They were not nasty. They were the best friends I ever had... Besides you and daddy, of course." One might assume Cissy is mentally disturbed as a result of running around naked with negroes as a child, but her particularly penetrating psychosis is clearly much deeper than that and seems to be something she was born with. In fact, Cissy's hardcore negrophilia seems to be the only thing keeping her from going completely insane, as she cannot stand the real world and real people and has created pseudo-jungle in her living room as a safe space where she can act like a moron in peace and comfort.

THE MAFU CAGE

A perennial woman-child who has an extravagant shrine to her deceased daddy that she regularly prays to and who says things like, "I hope I do die. I hope I do... then I could talk to daddy again. I try and talk to him now... It's very difficult. I don't know how to talk to people – living or dead," Cissy is indubitably a girl that lives in a fantasy world of her own making. Aside from her eccentric Eleetra complex and tendency to wear only colorful and flamboyant African clothes that make her seem like a culturally schizophrenic hippie jackass, Cissy also has an irrational fear of men and has maintained what seems like a lifelong lesbian relationship with her sister Ellen, who would like to have a male lover and start a family but has already promised to dedicate her life to taking care of her less than sane sibling. When Cissy murders her latest 'Mafu' (aka monkey) during a fit of rage and then bathes in it's blood, she absurdly immediately begs her sister to get her a new pet primate by stating childish things like, "My daddy understands. I know my daddy understands that he wants me to have a new Mafu," but Ellen will not budge as reflected in her remark "not impressed by childish blackmail," so the cracked chick decides to use suicidal emotional blackmail as a rather desperate last ditch effort to get what she wants. Indeed, Cissy threatens to kill herself and then slits her wrist to coerce her sister into getting a new Mafu, so Ellen gives in and calls her father's friend 'Zom' (Will Greer of John Frankenheimer's Seconds (1966) and the popular TV show The Waltons (1971–1981)) to get a new monkey. Although Zom is well aware that Cissy has murdered all the previous Mafus, he reluctantly agrees to "loan" an orangutan to the wicked wild child. Zom also give Cissy an scarecrow that was used by Pygmies to scare away idol-worshiping Bantu tribesmen from destroying what the old man describes as the, "oldest living example of primitive man on earth." Of course, Zom makes a major mistake by lending the orangutan to Cissy.

Aside from being an enabler who allows her mentally sick sister to literally get away with murder, Ellen also uses Cissy as an excuse as to why she has no boyfriend or personal life, as she seems to be afraid of such emotional things even though she desperately longs for male love and affection. Naturally, Cissy is jealous of Ellen's interest in men and accuses of her "wanting to get married and have children,” adding, “You think a woman who hasn’t had children isn’t a real woman.” Of course, as an innately sexually and emotionally immature little lady who literally goes crazy and suffers a major mental meltdown if a man simply taps her on the shoulder, Cissy seems ashamed of the fact that she will never be a real and full woman and rather resents the fact that her sister actually desires such things. Ellen’s coworker David (James Olson of The Andromeda Strain (1971) and Commando (1985)) is deeply in love with her and she more or less feels the same way about him, but she is too terribly afraid to act on her feelings because she is inexperienced and knows that her wack-job sister will be consumed with violent rage and jealousy if she starts a serious relationship with a man. It is more than implied throughout the film that Ellen has an incestuous lesbo relationship with Cissy, who states to herself while giving her an overtly erotic body massage, “I just love making you feel so good. Your skin feels so smooth...it’s just like velvet [...] It’s like I’m touching you and myself at the same time...like we’re the same person. Is that what love is? Not just sacrificing to make someone else happy but being that happiness, that person.” In another creepy pseudo-intimate ‘love’ scene, Cissy states to Ellen while lying naked with her in bed, “You used to be so beautiful. You still are sometimes when you’re naked with me. It’s been a longtime since anyone but me stroked your breasts...Made you gush.” When Cissy ends up brutally murder the orangutan by beating it to death with its own chains, Zom attempts to convince Ellen that she must get a personal life and have her sister institutionalized if her mental health does not get any better. Ultimately, Ellen decides to leave Cissy behind and go on a work trip while promising to David that she will finally proceed with their romance. Unfortunately for Ellen, David makes the unwittingly foolish mistake of deciding to go by his lover’s home while she is away on business and Cissy ultimately decides to make the poor scientist her latest involuntary Mafu, thereupon have completely deleterious consequences.

When David enters Ellen and Cissy’s mansion, the only thing he can say is “Jesus Christ” upon seeing a large monkey cage, which is certainly the ‘centerpiece’ of the large home, and hundreds upon hundreds of ancient primitive African artifacts. Needless to say, David is quite delighted when Cissy tells him that Ellen has described him as “warm and wonderful” and that she sincerely wants to be with him. Ultimately, David makes the mistake of agreeing to get drunk on wine with Cissy and engaging in African tribal dances with her. During one of these goofy dances, David causes Cissy to suffer a mental breakdown merely by touching her in a completely harmless. After coercing David into allowing her to put shackles on him and complaining about how her last orangutan would get erections (she seems completely ignorant about heterosexual sex and the male gender), Cissy makes him her new Mafu, though it does not last long as the deranged dame has a hard time handling the verbal aggression of her latest monkey, who does not take too kindly to being locked up in a cage like an animal. Indeed, after David dares to scream for help and attempts to attack his kidnapper when she tries to get him to drink some water, Cissy decides to sport blackface and pseudo-ritualistically murder the scientist by bludgeoning him to death with some sort of African club. After maliciously murdering David in a freakishly cold and detached fashion that totally exemplifies her complete and utter lack of empathy for other human beings, Cissy bathes in the man's blood as if it gives her a great sense of solace that borders on a totally transcendental spiritual experience. When Ellen finally gets back from her seemingly fruitful trip, she is quite delighted to see that Cissy seems uncharacteristically mentally balanced and in good spirits, but when she eventually notices David's car outside her home, she assumes the worst and completely loses it after her greatest fears are confirmed upon discovering a sketch that her sister drew of her boyfriend as a monkey. In a sort of role reversal of their sick 'symbiotic relationship' of incestuous co-dependence, Ellen becomes the 'caged animal' and is chained in the Mafu cage by her sister. With her sole male suitor dead and her sister reaching a place of no return in terms of totally malevolent mental derangement, Ellen decides to commit passive self-slaughter by refusing to eat and going on a suicidal hunger strike of sorts (which is notably and not coincidentally something that Cissy threatened to do at the beginning of the film). After Ellen finally croaks, Cissy creates a large sicko Sapphic mural in tribute to her dead sister inside in the Mafu cage where she ultimately locks herself inside so that she can reunite with her sister via death by starvation.

THE MAFU CAGE

Admittedly, I decided to watch The Mafu Cage after reading about it in the book House of Psychotic Women: An Autobiographical Topography of Female Neurosis in Horror and Exploitation Films (2012) where Canadian author Kier-La Janisse makes comparisons between her own lifelong female hysteria and neuroticism and that of characters in classic cult, horror, and exploitation films. Though Arthur's film is certainly somewhat kitschy, it also dares to authentically depict the bizarre behavior of some of the less mentally stable members of the fairer sex. While ostensibly an exotic Sapphic horror-thriller featuring the striking novelty of both Afrocentric and Art Deco aesthetics, Karen Arthur's film is really a sort of psycho-sexual crypto-arthouse chamber piece disguised as debauched celluloid trash that features a dichotomous depiction of the two complimentary extreme of female psychosis in the form of two extremely different but more or less equally unhinged sisters who suffer from a foreboding form of codependence that ultimately pushes both of them over the edge and into a personal pandemonium of no return that reaches its climax in self-obliteration. Undoubtedly The Mafu Cage also superficially follows in the tradition of the classic 'Grande Dame Guignol' exploitation subgenre, but what makes it notably different is that it stars two relatively young and up-and-coming beauties instead of washed-up old hags and was directed by an actual woman as opposed to old queens like Curtis Harrington (What's the Matter with Helen?, Whoever Slew Auntie Roo?) or Silvio Narizzano (Fanatic aka Die! Die! My Darling!). Unquestionably, another interesting and unforgettable aspect of the film is its strangely addictive harpsichord musical score by Roger Kellaway (Evilspeak, The Silent Scream), which somewhat resembles the one featured in the avant-garde counterculture short The Bed (1968) directed by James Broughton. Indeed, in terms of its various seemingly contradictory idiosyncratic aesthetic ingredients, you probably will not find a more bizarre and preternatural quasi-mainstream film of its time than The Mafu Cage, which is certainly a work that was doomed to obscurity right from the get go but is surely deserving of the small cult following that it has acquired over the nearly four decades since it was originally released.

While The Mafu Cage had the honor of being the opening film at the tenth anniversary of Directors' Fortnight at the Cannes Film Festival where auteur Arthur got to hold hands simultaneously with Jean-Luc Godard and François Truffaut, the film was naturally a box office flop that certainly did nothing to help the director's career, hence why she would only direct one more feature film and spend the rest of her career as a relatively success 'TV auteur' that was responsible for made-for-TV agitprop like the venomous feminazi flick The Rape of Richard Beck (1985) and the putrid Zionist propaganda piece Evil in Clear River (1988). Indeed, while The Rape of Richard Beck depicts archetypal tough guy Richard Crenna as a pigheaded cop who believes rape victims "bring it upon themselves" and ultimately learns the error of his misogynistic ways after being raped himself, Evil in Clear River stars Randy Quaid in a role based on real-life 'heretic' James Keegstra about a respected high school teacher who becomes the first Canadian convicted of the bogus crime of 'hate speech' due to the less than Semantically correct things that he says about the Jews. It should be noted that Arthur really went to great extremes to get The Mafu Cage made, so it does not surprise me that she would eventually settle for the fairly safe and reliable world of television. Indeed, as she explained in the featurette Visions of Clouds that was featured as a special feature on the 2010 Scorpion Releasing DVD release of the film, Arthur not only visited mental institutions to find inspiration for the character and artwork of Cissy and traveled to Paris to meet with playwright Éric Wesphal so that she could secure the rights to his play, but she also plied screenwriter Don Chaſtain with sex and food, among other things, so that he would finish the screenplay for the film in a relatively timely fashion. Notably, according to Arthur herself, she was the first female film director to become a member of the Directors Guild of America (DGA) since film noir auteur Ida Lupino (The Bigamist, The Hitch-Hiker), so it is kind of sad and pathetic that should had to dedicate most of career to directing insipid TV agitprop when The Mafu Cage clearly demonstrates that she had some real talent and was a rare filmmaker—be it male or female—that dared to take an uniquely unflattering look at female psychosis. Indeed, certainly no contemporary female filmmaker would dare to direct a work featuring a Sapphic psycho of the incestuous and psycho-autistic sort who has an uncontrollable compulsion towards killing men and monkeys. Of course, regardless of time periods, it is absolutely amazing that a film like The Mafu Cage even exists, which is more than enough reason why it should be seen by any semi-serious cinephile and/or trash cinema junkie, not to mention the fact that it has the added bonus of making xenophilia seem like the product of a sort of psychosis that is suffered by people with serious identity issues.

THE MAFU CAGE

-Ty E

THE DEAD GIRL

Karen Moncrieff (2006)

The Dead Girl is another "indie" drama that I've recently seen. Where else to go but in the led direction? With this review, I will also delve into yet another "indie" film starring the genre darling Ellen Page, The Tracey Fragments. The Dead Girl managed to take the same aesthetic that 11:14 had acquired through vigorous character tales that had interwoven to create a very linear plot that had ended with fantastical results. In my area of cinematic expertise, 11:14 reigns as the superior film but The Dead Girl doesn't leave without a fight. To begin, allow me to state the obvious on Brittany Murphy's career. We can all agree that she is a stunning, stunning woman. But the scintillating revelation unveils itself as the persona of the character that indeed harnesses the energy of her attraction. Brittany Murphy would be nothing with her portrayal of junkies, hookers & other beasts that prowl the night streets in search of money, security, and a seedy sexual environment. This is her fate in The Dead Girl all in fact that she is the dead girl of which the title speaks. Her role is one littered with deeply affecting tragedy. The one thing I can't shake my mind from is how these new-wave "indie" dramas with their esteemed recycled actors steal so much from an existing film that is so much better than the uninspired reimagined film at hand. Several characters explore an odyssey of many virtues that all systematically revolve around a "dead girl". There's the sister, the wife, the stranger, the mother, and the dead girl. Each narrative fleshes out related characters and the "small world" we live in. If anything, The Dead Girl is thought-provoking on a level that causes me to stop and ponder thoughts reenacting possible fates for everyone that I've interacted with recently. While The Dead Girl is an overused and overexploited mosaic narrative, the ideas are fresh and cunning which boosts it from rental fodder to a film that is worthy to own. 11:14 is a film that can be called a dark comedy when terms become placed freely. Although the film does feature sparse drama, the collective piece is generally kooky and a case inimitable fun. The Dead Girl, on the other hand, is a collective of narrative tragedies. Plot holes are left in purposely to pose a threat of anonymity to the film. It works to a degree but upon second guessing, it becomes annoying to leave fates unexplained. The Dead Girl is one of the perfected recipes of character-woven films. From Giovanni Ribisi to Josh Brolin, The Dead Girl is all star talent packed with a stellar script. I highly recommend this over bull shit like Juno, Nick & Norah's Infinite Playlist, and other Wes Anderson films save for Rushmore and The Life Aquatic.

-mAQ

SUBCONSCIOUS CRUELTY
SUBCONSCIOUS CRUELTY

Karim Hussain (2001)

For most viewers, the experimental horror film Subconscious Cruelty directed by Karim Hussain will be a blatant exercise in the director's conscious cruelty, as the work treats sadistic sacrilege in a most viciously visceral yet artistically sound light that is surely unconventional for such an exceedingly depraved work. Packed with ultra-bloody-flesh-shredding-anti-sex that was assembled with a precision that is comparable to the human-meat-mutilating surgical skills of Jack the Ripper, most audiences will feel unconsciously guilty for finding the bodily dismemberment featured throughout the film to be of an aesthetically pleasing persuasion. Simply put, Subconscious Cruelty is a minor masterpiece of the macabre that will never be rightfully recognized as a work of cinematic art by your typical taste-challenged arthouse film snob. To be fair, Subconscious Cruelty has its fair share of flaws, but they can be easily overlooked and forgiven due to the film's uncanny aesthetic prowess. Although influenced by auteur master filmmakers like Alejandro Jodorowsky, Luis Buñuel, and Dušan Makavejev, Subconscious Cruelty lacks the thematic depth and subtle symbolism associated with its influences. While dreaming up his phantasmagorical nightmare, director Karim Hussain was mainly inspired by the unpleasant plague of heroin addiction and nihilism that was vogue among art subcultures during the mid-1990s. Of course, Subconscious Cruelty is a potent film due to its stark imagery and ambient atmosphere and not due to the intellectual pretensions Hussain had while creating the film. After all, most viewers will be too startled to notice the passé philosophical nature of the film after seeing a scene where a woman's sacred meat curtain is ripped to shreds via nightmarish childbirth. I am willing to bet that most people who own a copy of Subconscious Cruelty also own works by Jörg Buttgerit and Nacho Cerdà but it is unlikely these same individuals own any films directed by Jean-Luc Godard. In fact, it will probably be no surprise to most viewers of Subconsciously Cruelty that Karim Hussain co-wrote the script for Cerdà's The Abandoned (2006). I was certainly not surprised to learn that Hussain also provided his cinematographer skills to Hobo with a Shotgun (2011); a film that owes a lot of its distinct character to its kaleidoscope of killer colors.

Like all truly audacious works of art, Subconscious Cruelty was plagued by production setbacks and trouble with the law. While coming home from a business trip in the United States, Hussain was stopped by Canadian custom agents who viewed parts of Subconscious Cruelty and confiscated it as illegally obscene material. With a name like Hussain's, I wouldn't be surprised if the custom agents were under the suspicion that the filmmaker was a terrorist, as Subconscious Cruelty is undoubtedly a delightful work of aesthetic terrorism that cinematically vomits on the medieval morality of American evangelical Christians.

I have a feeling that if Hussain were to have created Subconscious Cruelty in a country like Iran, his life would have reached its climax in a rainstorm of peasant pelted middle eastern stones. If I were to lump the film into a category all of its own, I would describe Subconscious Cruelty as an arthouse porn flick for misogynistic serial killers of the more culturally refined kind. Bodily fluids are some of the most imperative components of life as semen is the seed from where all human life begins and blood keeps life sustainable but in Subconscious Cruelty, these precious fluids are demoted to a level that falls below toxic fecal matter. Of course, Subconscious Cruelty is a film that will have its viewers chanting Long Live Death, for few films have made bloodbaths so soothing and depravedly delectable.

With Subconscious Cruelty, Hussain admirably achieved the seemingly impossible; constructing a work of libertine cinematic art as sadistically powerful as Nacho Cerda's short Aftermath but in the form of a perfectly paced feature-length film. Naturally, I assume many viewers will find themselves ejecting Subconscious Cruelty from their dvd player after the first five minutes of viewing it, but for those rare and initiated lovers of blood drenched cinematic bliss, the film makes for a truly rewarding and liberating experience that has next to no worthy rivals. After watching uncountable horror films over the pass year that are typically nothing more than a mediocre celluloid (but more often digital) mess covered with repulsive schlocky blood, I certainly found myself invigorated after watching Subconscious Cruelty; a distinctly flavorful flick where blood is beautiful and genital mutilation is as serenely scenic as a sunset on a beach during the summertime. I just wouldn't recommend watching Subconscious Cruelty if you're pregnant, unless you're hoping to have a painful miscarriage. Despite its bodacious message of remorseless blasphemy, the film certainly puts the fantastic story of Jesus' birth from the womb of a virginal mother in perspective. I, for one, cannot think of another film like Subconscious Cruelty where the tall tale of immaculate conception is immaculately murdered in a most tasteful manner that is bound to stain most viewer's souls.

-Ty E

THE LAST BATH
THE LAST BATH

Karl Krogstad (1975)

Maybe it is just pure wishful thinking on my part, but I like to think that stochastically sardonic writer, satirist, and small-time American Civil War hero Ambrose “Bitter Bierce” Bierce (“The Damned Thing”, The Devil’s Dictionary) would have gotten a kick out of the idea of someone adapting one of his works into pornography. On the other hand, I am not sure he would have been too keen on some high ass hippie college student degenerates creating a hedonistic “head” flick featuring out of one of his most classic works. Indeed, some seemingly dope-addled debauchees did just that for the psychedelic quasi-avant-garde blue movie, The Last Bath (1975) aka Dark Dreams, which seems to be a rather ‘loose’ and uncredited reworking of Bierce’s fierce classic 1890 short story “An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge” aka “A Dead Man’s Dream”, which has been cinematically adapted countless times, including by French auteur Robert Enrico under the title La Rivière du Hibou (1962) aka The Owl River aka An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge (notably, this classic Academy Award winning short was later released in America as an episode of The Twilight Zone in 1964) and by British auteur Rupert Wyatt under the title The Escapist (2008). Additionally, the story has been referenced in everything from songs by the The Doobie Brothers (the 1975 song “I Cheat the Hangman”) to episodes of The Simpsons (season 25, episode 6, “The Kid Is All Right”), but unquestionably The Last Bath has to be the most idiosyncratic, surreal, and surely ‘salacious’ nod to Bierce’s beautifully brutal short story as an experimental hardcore flick of the somewhat esoteric and incoherent sort that reminds one why filmmaking and hallucinogens do not always make a sensible combo.

Not be confused with the inferior occult-themed vintage porno piece of the same alternate name Dark Dreams (1971) aka Inner Circle directed by Roger Guermantes, The Last Bath was assumed lost for about 25 years but unearthed a couple years back and subsequently released by the vintage smut label After Hours Cinema, though the surviving film print that was released on DVD looks like it was raped by a film projector with a bad case of vagina dentate, thus adding to its already glaring hypnotic sleaze appeal. The story of a young, well hung, and handsome pornographic still photographer who finds himself to be prey in a psychosexual psychedelic nightmare involving two bisexual nurses—a less than homely honkey slag and her no less unattractive quasi-bull-dyke negress friend—and recurring dreams of a bridge-based suicide, this little known hardcore flick is anything but banal, but if you’re looking for a cheap masturbation aid, look elsewhere as the film is barely hardcore and mostly features close-up shots of sloppy blowjobs juxtaposed with kaleidoscopic psychedelic imagery. Owing blatant influence to the cine-magic works of meta-queer Crowleyite Kenneth Anger (Fireworks, Scorpio Rising), Maya Deren’s avant-garde micro magnum opus Meshes of the Afternoon (1943), and Donald Cammell and Nicolas Roeg's counter-culture classic Performance (1970), as well as similarly esoteric erotic works like the Amero Brothers' esoteric hardcore horror filmic fever dream Bacchanale (1971), The Last Bath is certainly a 'lost classic' of sorts, at least where obscure vintage porn is concerned. Somewhat shockingly directed by self-proclaimed "Seattle avant-garde independent filmmaker" Karl Krogstad (under the pseudonym 'Charles Straumer,' which the director used in tribute to the cinematographer of the 1959-1963 TV series The Untouchables of the same name)—a rather unknown auteur who made a couple forgotten low-budget thrillers during the 1980s like Catharsis (1982) and Strings (1985) and is arguably best known outside of Seattle for being a friend of Hollywood homo auteur Gus van Sant—The Last Bath, not unlike the nihilistic pornographic works of Roger Watkins aka 'Richard Mahler' (Her Name Was Lisa, Midnight Heat), is the sort of fuck flick that was clearly directed by a man who had no interest in actually making a fuck flick, as an oneiric celluloid non-orgy of orgasmic imagery where the male protagonist is prettier than the female performers and where the psychedelic special effects easily trumps the pornographic imagery, though they do manage to mix well together.

In an alluring opening sequence that is clearly a rip-off of Kenneth Anger's 3-minute Ford Foundation-produced short Kustom Kar Kommandos (1965), a bronze-colored Jaguar E-Type is depicted in a flagrantly fetishistic fashion. From there, hippie-like protagonist David (Templeton Blaine) is depicted running away from two prostitutes in a rather goofy way, as if he is too high or drunk to out chase two horny little girls. When the two vaguely attractive hookers catch David, they slam the back of his head against the wall and proceed to perform fellatio on him in a somewhat violent fashion, with a rather aggressive ebony she-bitch taking the biggest chomps out of the boy's cock. After the involuntary oral sex ends, David has otherworldly visions of a bridge and awakens in his rather quaint beach house. After getting dressed, David bangs his blonde babe girlfriend, but soon wakes up again, thus revealing he is trapped inside a dream-within-a-dream, or as he mumbles to himself in a somewhat strange monotone fashion that makes him sound like a disgruntled middle-aged man, "I dreamt I was in a bridge in between dreams...maybe I'm still dreaming...or wide awake. I must get up in time to go down...to go down to work in the dark." The "dark" that David speaks of is his dark room where he develops porn photos. When not dreaming of sex, David dreams of committing suicide by jumping off a bridge. Of course, after beginning a nightmarish ménage à trios with two rather unattractive cabin-dwelling miscegenating nurses, David will eventually realize that suicide might offer him the sense of solace that he has been looking for.

While hitchhiking, the film's too-cool-for-school protagonist David is picked up in a convertible by a high yellow black chick with a micro-afro named 'Husky' and her sub-homely honky homegirl Donna. Despite being wine-chugging pill-poppers of the carpet-muncher sort, both women work as nurses and they plan to give poor David a full physical. Being witchy and bitchy nympho nurses that live in a old secluded cabin in the woods, Husky and Donna are also into the occult, but that does not interest David because he just wants to fuck. When David complains, “sooner or later I gotta take a bath” while eating dinner with the girls at their cabin, Husky runs a bath for the boy in the hope that he will bone her, but he does not seem to like dark meat, as he coerces Donna to take a “bath” with him instead. In between fuck sessions with Donna that are largely comprised of close-up shots of the protagonist getting his pole smoked, David catches up on his “work” by taking nude photos of both girls. When the image of one of the photos begins moving, it becomes clear that David is either having a bad acid trip or that he is dead (considering how incoherent the film is, one never really knows for sure). Hoping to finally get humped by cracker boy David and his swollen white snake, Husky coerces David into going on a trip with her to the beach and on the way they pick up some bananas in a not-so-politically-correct scene associating the negress with monkeys (and of course cocks and bananas). After David fucks Husky in a field, the two screw next to a beach and during mid-coitus, the seemingly unhinged negress flips out and kicks the white boy and he falls into the water. After some psychedelic special effects, it becomes rather clear that David is dead (and has been dead the entire time) and the film concludes with the two naughty nurses having sex with one another in a bathtub and the protagonist running into some sort of never-ending acid-addled psychedelic abyss.

THE LAST BATH

As a film with a title that is in reference to the protagonist’s pre-death segregation-based bath with an ugly white wench who he chooses to defile over the similarly ugly jigaboo chick that kindly ran the bath for him, The Last Bath is, quite thankfully, a conspicuously politically incorrect porn piece that is just as racially insensitive as it is compulsively ‘avant-garde.’ Indeed, the protagonist of the film is somewhat vocal about his disinterest in bedding butch negress Husky (who later molests him when he is asleep!) and when he actually does allow himself to commence coitus with the creepy colored girl, it results in him hitting a literal, as well as figurative, ‘rock bottom’ on a beach and subsequently entering a sort of perennial psychedelic pandemonium of no return. Featuring a plot-hole or two, absolutely horrendous dubbing, undeniably unattractive chicks with unimpressive tits (among other things), and an innately incoherent structure, Krogstad’s piece of exceedingly eccentric experimental erotica may scream of abject artistic failure and decadent dilettantism, but it also makes for a reasonably entertaining celluloid trip that is more psychedelic than it is pornographic. Considered assumed “lost” until a surviving print was magically discovered a couple years back, The Last Bath apparently stars “a member of one of the oldest and wealthiest families in the city [Seattle]” (notably, assumedly pseudonymous lead “Templeton Blaine' never stared in a single other film and some have speculated that his family members bought and destroyed every print of the work that they could find, hence its 'lost' status for quite some time), thus making it a work that will probably be of more interest to Seattle locals than the average eccentric pornophile, though both groups will probably find something to like about it.

Of course, for those looking to see what an erotic reworking of Bierce's "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge" might be like it were it directed by the LSD-addled heterosexual brother of Kenneth Anger, The Last Bath makes for a curious celluloid oddity that demonstrates that sometimes there is not a very fine line between art and pornography, as well as avant-gardism and fetishism. Once advertised in a newspaper alongside an ad for a rival screening of Orson Welles' Citizen Kane (1941), the film was created during a seemingly unfathomable time when the aesthetic potential and artistic integrity of pornography seemed unlimited, hence why the era is rightfully dubbed the 'Golden Age of Porn.' Being a work created by a group of film students at the University of Washington in Seattle, The Last Bath certainly permeates a certain youthful spirit and energetic freedom of expression that few other pornographic works can boast. Indeed, it may be a hardcore fuck flick featuring suicide, interracial sex and belligerent drug use involving red pills being chugged down with wine as a chaser, but The Last Bath certainly has a sense of innocence and naivety about it that makes it strangely charming and even unforgettable.

-Ty E

THE LOVELESS
THE LOVELESS

Kathryn Bigelow (1981)

When it comes to topnotch renegade motorcycle gang films, it seems like only the world of independent film has contributed notable works to the highly neglected leather-bound genre. Sure, Hollywood gave us the iconic biker gang flick The Wild One starring Marlon Brando, but unfortunately the film has aged in a less than a graceful manner. With his masterwork of risqué biker art Scorpio Rising, Crowleyite auteur Kenneth Anger gave us a film that exposes the most esoteric of desires, which only an artistic individual with an instinctive knack for psychoanalysis could have visually dreamed up. For their dark and gritty biker film The Loveless (1982), co-directors Kathryn Bigelow and Monty Montgomery re-invented The Wild One in a most culturally subversive manner, thus creating what I have come to believe is the definitive motorcycle gang film. After having seen Bigelow's subsequent psycho-sexual vampire film Near Dark (1987) many times in my life, I can say with the utmost certainty that the female filmmaker's fetishistic auteur signatures also vividly resonate in her first feature-length picture The Loveless. Although Bigelow's directorial stamp is obvious in The Loveless, co-director Monty Montgomery's contribution to the film must also be noted. After watching The Loveless, it will be no surprise to the viewer when realizing that Montgomery was also responsible for co-producing David Lynch's TV series Twin Peaks, Hotel Room (TV Miniseries) and Wild at Heart. Like the surly Americana works of David Lynch, The Loveless is a picturesque joyride through a cryptic-subculture left virtually forgotten by Hollywood filmmakers.

Kathryn Bigelow

Although Willem Dafoe is certainly no Marlon Brando, he does a wonderful job portraying the main protagonist Vance in The Loveless. Despite being a novice actor while acting in the film, Dafoe radiates such a high potency of suaveness that it becomes totally believable when he effortlessly manhandles every lady that passes his predatory gaze in The Loveless. During the beginning of the film, Vance nonchalantly gropes an older woman he calls "Mom." Vance, a young man that makes no lie of the fact that he disdains work, more resembles Marlon Brando's character Valentine from The Fugitive Kind (1959) than Johnny from The Wild One. And just like the anti-heroes from The Fugitive Kind and The Wild One, Vance comes under attack from a group of townie red-necks that don't take kindly to strangers who wear stylin' jackets. In a manner comparable to David Lynch's Wild at Heart, the reverb-laced soundtrack of The Loveless - which includes a complimentary mix of blues, rock, and rockabilly tunes - accentuates the overall wildly audacious aesthetic of the film. Robert Gordon, who is a rockabilly musicians in real-life, plays the vehement biker Davis in the film. Unsurprisingly, Gordon also composed most of the music for The Loveless. Eddy Dixon, who composed the anthem "Relentless" for The Loveless, would also go on to play the character Rex in David Lynch's Wild at Heart. As someone who has always had an affinity rebel greasers and rockabilly/psychobilly music, I regard The Loveless as a motorcycle gang masterpiece worthy of the leatherjacket sporting gods of rockabilly heaven.

I am not exaggerating when I say that The Loveless concludes in a manner comparable to a holocaust of bikers. Like most decent films, The Loveless guides the viewer into an unrelenting climax that will stay with you until your life ends. I credit Kathryn Bigelow's female touch as giving The Loveless the distinct sensuality and wild sexuality the film so naturally reverberates upon the viewer. The Loveless is no small effort when you consider that it was originally created as Bigelow's film school thesis. It will be apparent to the viewer that Ms. Bigelow fell in love (as you will too) with characters that she created for The Loveless. This seems especially true for the character of Elena; Vance's tragic love interest. Unlike Brando's love interest in The Wild One, Elena is a multifaceted lady, whose life of misfortune finally erupts at the conclusion of The Loveless in a way that will shock even the most desensitized of film fanatics. Before watching The Loveless, I always wondered how much of Kathryn Bigelow's auteur signature was discernible in her films. After watching the film, I know that Bigelow has been using many of the same themes throughout (from The Loveless to The Hurt Locker) her notable directing career. I can say with sheer sincerity that Kathryn Bigelow is now one of my favorite female film directors, only second to Leni Riefenstahl. If you fancy aesthetically pleasing nihilistic rebellion, you will certainly love The Loveless.

-Ty E

NEAR DARK
NEAR DARK

Kathryn Bigelow (1987)

Long before she became arguably the most overrated female filmmaker in cinema history, Kathryn Bigelow (The Hurt Locker, Zero Dark Thirty) directed a couple of cult flicks that did not get their due upon their releases and made the future of her career seem dubious at best. While her considerably overlooked debut work The Loveless (1981)—a nihilistic reworking of the Marlon Brando vehicle The Wild One (1953) co-directed by David Lynch producer Monty Montgomery (Twin Peaks, Wild at Heart, Hotel Room) and starring a then unknown Willem Dafoe—is still pretty much unknown except among certain types of cinephiles, Bigelow's genre-bending 'vampire western' Near Dark (1987) has developed a sizable cult following over the decades. Admittedly, when I first saw Near Dark as a kid, I was fairly disappointed, as I expected a modernist too-cool-for-school vampire flick that was even 'cooler' than the similarly leather-clad and genre-twisting bloodsucker blockbuster The Lost Boys (1987), but ultimately discovered a redneck cowboy vampire flick that was big on atmosphere, low on comic relief, and as stoic as a rampantly heterosexual hillbilly on black market steroids. Of course, when I first saw the film, I did not realize it was originally intended as a western by director Bigelow, who only decided to make it a cross-genre undead cowboy flick after she and her co-writer Eric Red (who previously penned The Hitcher starring Rutger Hauer and who would later co-pen the 1996 TV movie Undertow with Bigelow) realized it was impossible to find funding for old west style celluloid dung during the Reaganite 1980s. Indeed, vamp flicks were quite vogue at the time as demonstrated by the commercial success and/or popularity of bloodsucker flicks as varied as The Hunger (1983), Fright Night (1985), and Once Bitten (1985). Unfortunately, Near Dark was released only three months after the highly successful vampire classic The Lost Boys (which grossed over $32 million)—a work that had a lot of advertising muscle behind it as a Warner Brothers produced picture—and was thus seen as a poor rip-off and failed miserably at the box office, though serious film critics ranging from Jonathan Rosenbaum to David J. Skal were more perceptive regarding the work and realized its somewhat singular aesthetic value. Apparently the third vampire-western film ever made following the mostly worthless works Curse of the Undead (1959) and Billy the Kid vs. Dracula (1966), Near Dark is more than just a genre-hybrid flick as a work that also owes credit to Bonnie and Clyde (1967) due to its outlaws-on-the-road theme and even Wim Wenders' Paris, Texas (1984) due to its postcard perfect cinematography of scorching American deserts and ethereal open plains. Borrowing a good portions of the cast of Aliens (1986) directed by James Cameron (who knew and later married Bigelow and even has a cameo role in the film 'flipping the bird' to Paxton's character), including Lance Henriksen, Bill Paxton, and Jenette Goldstein, the film certainly has memorable performances and standout characters, but owes most of its potency to its poetic cinematography by Adam Greenberg (a Polish Jew that previously shot Once Bitten and The Terminator), strangely soothing yet foreboding atmosphere, eloquent pacing, and visceral eroticism. Indeed, if it were not for the film's Hollywood style one-liners, (anti)genre conventions, and big explosions scenes, the film would almost qualify as a rare semi-mainstream art-house 'horror' film. The more rebellious yet more mature and stoic little brother of The Lost Boys, Near Dark is also a rare example of where the largely European vampire subgenre has been seamlessly and appropriately Americanized to accommodate the ostensibly fearless and feral-like frontier spirit of the Yanks, who ultimately drained the North American continent dry. Indeed, for better or worse, if it were not for Bigelow's undead redneck rebel flick there would be no True Blood.

Young dirty blond twink cowboy Caleb Colton (played by Adrian Pasdar, who is of ½ Iranian/ ½ German ancestry) is a young horny buck looking for a cowgirl and while hanging out with his immature cowboy comrades, he spots a blonde 'heroin chic' white trash beauty named Mae (Jenny Wright) that looks like she could be his twin sister. Caleb and Mae hit it off instantly as if they were born for one another, though the latter sometimes acts strange as if she is not telling her new beau something important. When it gets close to sunrise, Mae becomes increasingly strange and abruptly tells Caleb she has to leave, but before she can, the cowboy demands a kiss, but he ultimately gets more than a mere juicy peck as the naughty nymph-like beauty bites him on the neck and runs away. Of course, Caleb begins chasing Mae just as the sun rises and becomes startled by the fact that his flesh is burning. Unbeknownst to Caleb, Mae has given him a sweet kiss of death that has transformed him into a member of the bloodsucking undead. Before Caleb knows it, he is scooped up off the road and pulled inside a blackened 'Winnebago from Hell' (as Bigelow has described it) by Mae's outlaw 'family' of cool-as-a-corpse confederate bloodsuckers, including charismatic yet seemingly half-crazed leader Jesse Hooker (Lance Henriksen), butch pseudo-blonde bitch Diamondback (Jenette Goldstein), neurotic and equally nasty child-vampire Homer (played by Joshua John Miller, who previously played the deranged kid in Tim Hunter's underrated 1986 masterpiece River's Edge), and psychopathic Lizard King wannabe Severen (played Bill Paxton, who would once describe regarding his role, "I guess I was kind of living my Jim Morrison fantasy"), who wants to kill the hopelessly naive cowboy. Unfortunately for sick Severen, Mae has turned Caleb into a bloodsucker so instead of draining him of his vital fluids, the van of vamps decide to give the novice vampire a trial period to prove whether or not he has what it takes to be one of them. As Mae tells Caleb regarding their potentially perennial future together as vampire lovers, he and she can do, "anything we want...until the end of time...but you have to learn to kill" because, after all, "the night has its price." Unfortunately, Caleb is a pussy poser cowboy who does not have what it takes to kill. Meanwhile, Caleb's former father Loy (Tim Thomerson) and little sister Sarah (Marcie Leeds) begin traveling the open road looking for their loved one and naturally they seem like no match for a pernicious pack of bloodsucking predators of the country fried sort.

NEAR DARK

Since Caleb is hopelessly shy when it comes to slaughtering and draining blood from humans, his lover Mae does the murdering and even feeds him like a baby, with a nice negro truck driver being the first victim of their peculiar feeding arrangement. To the vampire family's credit, they mostly kill and feed on subhuman scum, including carjackers, cheap cowboy-riding sluts, dickheaded rednecks, and other rabble that will hardly be missed by the general populous. When the vampires take Caleb to a bar as a last test to see if he will kill, the undead pseudo-family ultimately slaughters virtually every patron in building, including the bartender. Of course, coward Caleb pussies out in regard to killing a young man that is about his age, so the vamps decide he is too weak and plan to exterminate him. Ironically, Caleb falls into favor with the family the next morning after saving the day when the same young man he let go the previous night calls the cops, who raid a seedy motel where the vamps are staying. Indeed, after putting his life on the line during a Bonnie and Clyde style police raid, Caleb buys himself some time, but it does not last long, as his father and sister end up staying at the same hotel that night by happenstance. When Homer—a rather old child-vampire who is quite self-conscious of his pathetic prepubescent body and is pissed that the newcomer has stolen Mae from him (apparently, Homer was the one responsible for 'turning' Mae)—spots Caleb's Sarah, he decides he wants to make her his baby vampire bride. Of course, Caleb is not happy with this and begs bloodsucker boss Jesse to leave his family alone. Ultimately, Caleb manages to escape with his family when the sun comes up. In a scenario that defies all vampire film logic, Caleb is transformed back into a human after being given a blood transfusion. Seeking revenge and knowing that the Colton family can reveal their undead identities, the vampires decide to wage war. While using Mae to distract Caleb, the vampires steal Sarah, who Homer still wants to make his mate. Riding on horseback because the vampires have slit his car tires, Caleb goes looking for his sister and first encounters sarcastic psychopathic sicko Severen, who he gets in a long battle with using a tractor-trailer that ultimately leaves the bad ass bloodsucker in pieces after the twink cowboy jackknifes the big rig, which almost instantly magically explodes into seemingly millions of pieces. Of course, Jesse, Homer, Diamondback, and Mae go after Caleb, but the two girls help the young man escape. Somewhat absurdly (or maybe not so if one considers how rough some rednecks live their lives), the vampires begin chasing Caleb at daybreak in an automobile with blackened windows that they have covered with spray paint. Quite selflessly, Mae helps save Sarah by breaking through the back window with the little girl in her arms. Of course, Homer, who still wants his virginal child bride, follows them, but he is burned up by the sun. In a last ditch effort to takeout Caleb, Jesse and Diamondback attempt to run over the cowboy and his little sister, but they and their car explode due to exposure from the light. In the end, Caleb manages to reverse Mae's transformation by giving her the same sort of barnyard blood transfusion he had, thus enabling them to live a short banal life together as boring everyday human beings.

As far as I know, Near Dark is the sole worthwhile hick bloodsucker flick, as well as the greatest vampire-western ever made, though fanboys seem to like conspicuously contrived works like Sundown: The Vampire in Retreat (1989) starring Bruce Campbell David Carradine and Robert Rodriguez's From Dusk Till Dawn (1996). Of course, Near Dark is the only one of these three films that has any true class and plays everything straight and does not wallow in being tediously tongue-in-cheek, as a work that thankfully lacks the putrid postmodern irony of the two other mentioned works. The rather bizarre film Billy the Kid and the Green Baize Vampire (1987) directed by British far-left filmmaker Alan Clarke (Baal, Made in Britain) may seem like a vampire-western upon a superficial glance as the title hints, but it is actually a goofy semi-absurdist comedy-musical about the 'cue sport' snooker. Featuring a highly complementary musical score by Teutonic electronic music maestros Tangerine Dream, as well as a cover of the song "Fever" by punk proto-psychobilly group The Cramps (who also contributed music to other 1980s horror classics like The Return of the Living Dead and The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2), Near Dark is undoubtedly an all-around aesthetically agreeable work that ultimately proves that there is still some room to rework the vampire subgenre without resorting to the predictable cynicism and irony that plagues so many similarly themed flicks nowadays. In fact, Bigelow's film does not even feature the use of the word 'vampire' a single time as if the human characters in the flick are completely unaware of the fact such supernatural beings exist, thus adding to the mystique of an already mystifying film where the bloodsucker is the ultimate outlaw and where holy objects, roses, garlic, holy water, and mirrors never come into the equation, thus enabling the viewer to fantasize about the possibilities of the largely unexplained mythology.

A remake of Near Dark co-written by Bigelow and Canadian actor Matt Craven (no relation to Wes) and starring Bill Paxton and Heather Langenkamp of A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984) fame began shooting in 2007, but the studio apparently did not like the dailies and the production was apparently aborted (even though apparently over a 1/3 of the film had already been shot), though as of November 2011, another remake was in development. Of course, the last thing the world needs in another super shitty horror remake that rapes and defiles everything that was great about the original film. Largely erotic in the sort of way a budding trailer park beauty is before she has had one too many beer bottles and dirty dicks in her mouth, Near Dark manages to give the whole cowboy outlaw way of life some much needed legitimacy that has not been seen in cinema since the nihilistic revisionist westerns of Sam Peckinpah. Indeed, the film also demonstrates that Bigelow has more of a poetic vision than her mostly banal and obscenely overrated political thrillers indicate. Interestingly, in the featurette Living in Darkness (2002), cold and cool Nordic American man man's Lance Henriksen stated regarding the experience of working with Bigelow on the film, "She made me think a matriarchal situation in filmmaking is really wonderful." Indeed, despite featuring nocturnal homicidal hicks and redneck 'rebel flag' renegade bloodsucking (Henriksen's character claims to have fought for the Confederate Navy during the American Civil War and even has the stars-and-bars flag from his ship stitched inside his trench coat), Near Dark certainly has the sort of nicely nuanced eroticism and subtle yet perversely potent sensuality that only a feminine touch could have been capable of, thus acting as a rare example where lacking testicular fortitude can be beneficial to a filmmaker.

NEAR DARK

-Ty E

NOTHING BAD CAN HAPPEN

Katrin Gebbe (2013)

As the nation that produced arguably cinema history's greatest and most ambitious female filmmaker, Leni Riefenstahl (Triumph of the Will, Tiefland), as well as numerous eclectic female art house and avant-garde auteur directors, including pioneering animator Lotte Reiniger (The Adventures of Prince Achmed, The Magic Flute), proto-feminist Ula Stöckl (Neun Leben hat die Katze aka The Cat Has Nine Lives, Geschichten vom Kübelkind aka Tales Of The Dumpster Kid), Sapphic surrealist and adventurer ethnologist Ulrike Ottinger (Freak Orlando, Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press), and subversive feminist Helma Sanders-Brahms (Heinrich, Germany, Pale Mother), among countless others, Germany (as well as its Germanic brother nation Austria, which produced aberrant auteuress Valie Export and cyber-dyke director A. Hans Scheirl, and Bulgarian-born iconoclastic avant-gardist Mara Mattuschka), the Teutonic Fatherland is incontestably the greatest producer of notable filmmakers of the 'fairer sex,' so I typically tend to be less dismissive when approaching flicks directed by kraut chicks as opposed to their American counterparts. Of course, considering the relatively sorry state of German cinema today, I am hesitant to watch any Teutonic films, let alone those directed by women, yet after hearing good things about 30-year-old Fräulein filmmaker Katrin Gebbe's award winning debut feature Tore tanzt (2013) aka Nothing Bad Can Happen, I figured what the hell and learned soon after watching the flick that the Fatherland still has some of the most ferocious film directors in the entire world. A seemingly pathologically paced passion piece about a gawky young Christian punk cult member (or "Jesus Freak") who goes on a decidedly deleterious Christ-like journey of the truly transcendental sort after becoming the unofficial member of an 'evil' untermenschen white trash family who, in the most vulgar and despicable ways imaginable, tests his faith and determination to living the way Jesus did by "turning the other cheek," no matter what the consequences, Gebbe's paradoxically dejecting yet somewhat uplifting debut was apparently inspired by "true events," as well as by the "purely positive" titular character of Fyodor Dostoyevsky's classic novel The Idiot (1869).

A work that seems more influenced by the transgressive arthouse works of directors associated with the so-called 'New French Extremity' like Philippe Grandrieux (Sombre, Un Lac) and Bruno Dumont (Twentynine Palms, Hors Satan), the Dogme 95 period works of Lars von Trier, and the proletarian-perpetrated horror of films like James Watkins' Eden Lake (2008) and Justin Kurzel's Snowtown (2011) than those associated with contemporary kraut film movements like the mostly banal 'Berlin School' (aka 'Berliner Schule') and the bombastic and pageantry-plagued films of so-called 'neo-romantic' filmmakers like Tom Tykwer, Nothing Bad Can Happen is certainly a fresh change of pace for German cinema, as an audacious low-budget work with a conflicted yet potent spirit that, despite its seemingly foreign influences, says a great deal about modern Germany and its post-WWII Volksgeist. Indeed, while largely a work about testing one's faith in the face of the ultimate evil, the flick also tackles the oftentimes tragic Teutonic tradition of unwavering idealism which led to, among other things, the Protestant Reformation, the National Socialist revolution, the birth of New German Cinema (as outlined in the Oberhausen Manifesto of 1962), and the far-left terrorism of the Baader-Meinhof Gang. Of course, like the four above mentioned phenomena, Nothing Bad Can Happen also ends with death. A devastating depiction of a sort of patently pacifistic Christian (anti)Faustian man who sacrifices himself and finds a sort of redemption in the end, Gebbe's three chapter modernist metaphysical horror show reminds the viewer why 'arthouse' is not always a synonym for banality, pretense, or asininity.

NOTHING BAD CAN HAPPEN

Tore (novice actor Julius Feldmeier in his first feature film) is a tall, blond, and blue-eyed Hallstatt Nordic Jesus addict (with unusually curly hair who somewhat resembles Martin Gore of Depeche Mode) who suffers from epilepsy and belongs to a Hamburg-based chapter of the punk rock Christian group the "Jesus Freaks" and he takes his recent baptism rather seriously and seems totally incapable of negative thoughts and emotions, though one assumes that, like his fellow cult members, he comes from a broken home. Tore is best friends with a seemingly delinquent and destitute but equally Christ-crazed young man named 'Owl' aka 'Eule' (Daniel Michel of Florian Eichinger's Nordstrand (2013)), who converted him to "Christcore" because Tore enjoys singing hardcore punk songs with lyrics like, "There's only one way you can be saved. You must overcome your fear, and trust in god. Jesus, show me the way. I believe in you, and have no fear. What can man do to me?" and who, in typically Christ-like fashion, enjoys helping anyone that he can. One day, Tore and Owl attempt to help a family whose car has broken down by praying to Jesus to fix the folks' truck and somewhat magically, the Lord answers their prayers. Despite having seen a miracle of sorts performed on his GMC redneck truck engine, the patriarch of the family, Benno (Sascha Alexander Gersak of the popular German TV series Tatort)—a small, swarthy, and stocky man with serious anger issues—doubts the power of "the Captain of the Universe", but he takes up Tore's offer to come by the local Jesus Freak bar/venue to hear the latest Christ-phile punk rock sermon. When Tore sees Benno at the Jesus Freak show while moshing like a spastic toddler to a holy punk band 'Magic Messiah', he suffers a seizure, so the patriarch picks him up, puts him in the back of his truck, and brings him back to the dilapidated trailer/shack of the lowbred sadomasochistic white trash family for which he will ultimately become a saintly Aryan yet avowedly masochistic sacrifice.

Although initially a seemingly caring and friendly fellow who sometimes likes to use playful sarcasm to poke fun at Christ and Christianity, Benno soon begins showing his true, rather demonic self, especially after he becomes jealous of Tore's totally harmless relationship with his 15-year-old tomboy stepdaughter Sanny (German pop/soul singer Swantje Kohlhof). Indeed, although Benno has two children, melancholy teen Sanny and a prepubescent boy named Dennis (Til-Niklas Theinert), neither of them are biologically his as they are from his wife Astrid's (Annika Kuhl of Leander Haußmann's Lehmann (2003) and Uli Edel's The Baader Meinhof Complex (2008)) previous relationship, thus he feels he has the right to rape his stepdaughter. When Tore shows up Benno upon giving Sanny a better present on her birthday (the Jesus Freak gives her an iPod and Benno gives her a giant stuffed kangaroo and a couple of bucks!), the pernicious patriarch decides to punch the Christian in the face in front of all the partygoers. On top of that, Benno also makes Tore his personal slave, coercing him into handing over his welfare debit card and forcing him to do all his lazy wife's domestic chores. The archetypal worthless whore mother in many ways, Astrid's only objection to her husband raping her daughter is that she is jealous that he finds her progeny more attractive. As blatant (sub)human garbage who more or less squat in a Hamburg allotment garden (the family seems to be borderline homeless), Benno and Astrid soon begin resenting Tore due to his pure and untainted character and deep faith and employ various sadistic and craven methods in an attempt to break his faith. When Benno self-righteously states, "people always pray when they're scared shitless" and Tore replies "courage is when you trust god," the pernicious patriarch becomes so enraged he begins beating the Jesus Freak, who suffers a seizure as a result. While Tore attempts to go back to his Jesus Freak commune after suffering Benno's psychopathic brutality, he discovers that the Hamburg branch of the cult has been closed and while his friend Owl offers to take him to Berlin, the warrior of Christ ultimately comes to the conclusion that he must go back to the untermensch family as a test from god, even proclaiming while praying to the Lord, "Jesus, I know Benno is my test." Of course, judging by what Tore ultimately endures at the savage hands of Benno and his wife, one might assume that Christ was a scheming psychopath who got a kick out of completely destroying people for his own sadistic pleasure.

When Tore goes back to Benno's less than humble abode, he is treated as if he is a non-person and someone that does not even exist. Indeed, on top of no longer being allowed to eat at the dinner table, Tore is no longer allowed to eat period, as Benno has his wife lock up all the food in cabinets in the shitty shack, so the Jesus Freak must resort to eating crumbs he finds around the house and digging through the trash. On top of that, Benno has his stepson Dennis regularly piss on Tore's tent in the yard (indeed, even when the Jesus addict was in favor with the family, he was still forced to sleep outside). Only Sanny, who unsurprisingly unsuccessfully attempts to consummate coitus with the Jesus Freak (who is naturally "saving himself" until he is "married"), treats Tore with any respect, though she finds his pacifism and religious faith to be somewhat maddening. Of course, as Tore states to Sanny when she mocks religion, “If I don’t believe, I have nothing.” When Astrid discovers that Tore has “stolen” a rotten baked chicken carcass out of their trash which is now covered in maggots, Benno demands that his wife come up with a punishment for the near-starving Jesus junky, so she recommends that they force him to eat the rancid fowl corpse. Benno and Astrid restrain Tore and literally shove the rotten chicken meat down his throat while the patriarch fiendishly sings the children’s prayer, “god is great and god is good. And we thank him for our food” in a malevolently and maniacally mocking fashion, thus causing the Jesus Freak to become terribly ill to the point of being on the brink of death. Luckily, Sanny manages to sneak Tore out of her family’s dilapidated home and calls an ambulance after dropping him off at a train station. While Sanny tells Tore never to return, the Jesus Freak does just the opposite after recuperating in the hospital. While in the hospital, Tore hallucinates seeing a small Christ on a crucifix transforming into the real full-size J.C.—hemorrhaging hands and all—so he sees it as a sign that he must carry out his mission and return to bastard Benno for more tests of his selflessness and faith. Indeed, all of these brutal experiences have only reinforced his faith and he seems to realize that going back to Benno will be a mission of no return, but he has a girl to save and a god to satisfy.

NOTHING BAD CAN HAPPEN

When Tore returns to Benno’s home after his extended stay in the hospital, the patriarch gives him food and even lets him eat with the family again, but of course, the scheming little sadist has big plans for the hopelessly naive Jesus Freak. Indeed, one night Benno drives Tore to a homo whorehouse and sells the virgin’s untouched bughole to a nearly elderly ponytailed creep named Dieter (Uwe Dag Berlin of Oskar Roehler’s Quellen des Lebens (2013) aka Sources of Life and Anton Corbijn’s A Most Wanted Man (2014)), who brutally buggers the boy to the point where blood drips down his leg and goes down the drain when he takes a shower after being anally pillaged. Despite being regularly defiled by a truly dirty old man, Tore handles his beyond hellish circumstances like an ‘impenetrable’ champ and even seems to get comfortable with his most unfortunate circumstances. Of course, Tore’s stoicism towards being a slave to sadistic sodomy only all the more infuriates Benno, as he cannot seem to put even a small dent in the boy wonder’s faith. Determined to break Tore’s faith by allowing him the opportunity to get revenge, Benno forces the boy to sit on his stomach and smother his face with a pillow, but the Jesus Freak just cannot find it in himself to truly attempt to rightfully murder his perennial tormentor. When Sanny walks in on Tore feebly attempting to suffocate Benno with the pillow, she joins in and begins ruthlessly killing her stepfather with a sort of bestial passion of a slave who has finally gotten the opportunity to get back at their master. Determined not to allow her to fall into the forsaken existence of being a sinful murderer, Tore stops Sanny right before Benno is about to take his last gasp. Of course, Benno is enraged when he realizes that his stepdaughter/sex slave has tried to kill him, so he takes the girl's beloved electric keyboard and nearly beats Tore to death with it. After that, Benno demands that his wife Astrid "deal" with Tore, so she and her equally bottom-feeding ghetto whore friend Cora (Nadine Boske) pull down his pants, put out their cheap cigarettes on his head, and begin spitting all over his face like they are sadistic toddlers. From there, Astrid begins crushing Tore's genitals with a pair of stilettos she is wearing and utters the very real threat, "we can cut something off." Needless to say, Tore meets a grizzly end, but in his own way, he carried out his Christ-like mission, with Sanny and her kid brother receiving another chance at life. As for Benno, he is even more hateful and resentful in the end, as a man who beat, raped, tortured, and starved the truly pure and innocent Jesus Freak, but never destroyed his spirit.

While one film critic has gone so far as to describe Nothing Bad Can Happen as being, "reminiscent of Lars von Trier at his most pessimistic," Gebbe's film ultimately has a much more hopeful message as the flick may portray the protagonist as a hopeless naive slave of Christ, but his Christ-like sacrifice not only enables him to obtain transcendence but also save the lives of two previously accursed children who would have never had any chance in life otherwise. Indeed, somewhat ironically, Tore—the slave-morality-ridden Christ fag fanboy who seems to suffer from both schizophrenia and Asperger syndrome—more or less fully implements a more metaphysical take on Nietzsche's concept of the Will to Power by realizing his full potential in regard to his faith and majorly masochistic determination to "turn the other cheek." Interestingly, Gebbe did not conceive of the religious angle of the film until later while writing the screenplay and she was not really aiming to make a film that critiques Christianity or wallows in callous von Trier-esque cynicism as most reviewers seem to believe, or as the auteur stated herself in a summer 2014 interview with The Moveable Feast: "I didn't want to have answers to everything, but I felt it could be really interesting to put on one side a lot of darkness and have a really beautiful, super-perfect protagonist who's very moral as a contrast. He would forgive everything, he would allow everything. He would be like a modern Jesus Christ or as we were also discussing it, a modern Gandhi or something like this, but I felt the Christian religion is something a lot of people know about." Christianity aside, I think Gebbe's 'true believer' brand of faith is quite typical in Germany and the rest of the Occident, albeit in a more 'modern' post-Christian humanist form. Indeed, the cultural marxist and multiculturalist true believers who insist on flooding their nations with largely hostile aliens from the third world despite the fact that multi(cult)uralism has proven to be an abject failure as indicated by the fact foreigners commit the vast majority of murders, rapes, and violent crimes in Europe and virtually all live on welfare demonstrates that these exceedingly ethnomasochistic Europeans subscribe to a sort of nihilistic post-Christian faith. After all, how else does one explain a feminist blaming white racism for the fact that she was raped by an African negro or the fact a white European can receive more jail time for ostensibly 'denying' the holocaust than a gang of Arab teens would receive for gang-raping a white girl (not to mention the fact it was recently exposed that the British government tried to cover up that Pakistanis were running a massive 1,400-victim slavery ring mostly comprised of white girls ages 12-15). Indeed, when Tore states, "If I don't believe, I have nothing," it is a virtual metaphor for the post-counterculture Western/Central European mindset. Like Tore of Nothing Bad Can Happen, it seems these faithful ethno-masochists, which comprise the bulk of modern Europeans, will only be happy when they are raped, beaten, tortured, and bred out of existence and/or left for dead, for only then will their 'post-racial' utopia be fully realized.

NOTHING BAD CAN HAPPEN

Interestingly, the three chapters of Nothing Bad Can Happen—'Faith', 'Love', and 'Hope'—also are the names of the films in Austrian auteur Ulrich Seidl's recent "Paradise" (aka Paradies) trilogy, but as director Gebbe stated in the interview with The Moveable Feast, it was a mere coincidence, or as she explained: "It was not that we saw the films and thought, 'Oh, he had a good idea.'" [laughs] Later on, I heard about this trilogy and then I thought "Ack, this sucks." But I wouldn't change it because of Ulrich Seidl. He didn't invent it. [laughs]." Although Gebbe's film has some superficial aesthetic resemblances to Seidl's work, Nothing Bad Can Happen owes more to the darkly transcendent films of French auteur filmmakers like Philippe Grandrieux and Bruno Dumont. A work that could have degenerated into a tedious torture-porn flick or a plodding Petzold-esque 'arthouse' turd if put in the wrong hands, the film demonstrates that Gebbe is a restrained yet empathetic filmmaker who knows how to horrify and deject without resorting to mindless shock gimmicks, as a rare modern day German filmmaker who is not afraid of emotion and does not bow down to political correctness. I am sure if misandristic feminist hack Margarethe von Trotta saw Nothing Bad Can Happen—a film where the white trash wife of the antagonist is just as bad, if nothing worse than her husband—she would denounce it as misogynistic. Indeed, one can only hope that Gebbe has started a new post-feminist trend in German filmmaking where a female director is judged by her actual artistic talent as opposed to feminist polemics, pathological misandry, and artistic posturing. Unlike brazenly banal filmmakers associated with the Berlin School, Gebbe not only hopes to bring life, passion, and spirit back to Teutonic cinema, but also hopes that her countrymen stop masochistically dwelling on the past and, in turn, sacrificing their artistic potential out of irrational fear and creating more pointless beaten-to-death Vergangenheitsbewältigung garbage (sometimes I seriously wonder if German children are forced to recite kosher commie Adorno's 1949 dictum "To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric" each night before they go to bed), or as she stated herself in an interview with Peter Krausz: "In my mind, Germany is still a country which fears the past because of its history. I guess nobody wants to do something wrong.

Everybody tries to fit in this sort of scheme. But the new challenge is about trying to experiment a little bit more. A new movement is developing. I'm sure that there is potential out there and I hope that we get the chance to see a lot of great work in the future." While Gebbe will probably never become the next Leni Riefenstahl, she has already proved that she has more testicular fortitude than 99% of her kraut male counterparts as a sort of female Matthias Glasner, albeit slightly less nihilistic. I might be being a tad bit optimistic, but Nothing Bad Can Happen almost gives me the 'faith' that Germany will soon have its next great cinema Renaissance since the New German Cinema era, with the assumedly not-too-faraway deaths of the von Trottas, Schlöndorffs, and the rest of the old leftist fart filmmakers being a most auspicious time for it to commence.

-Ty E

FUNKY FOREST: THE FIRST CONTACT
FUNKY FOREST: THE FIRST CONTACT

Katsuhito Ishii (2005) Funky Forest is a 2 and a half hour mash-up compilation from the directors of various Japanese cinema. One of the more popular examples is Kasuhito Ishii (Director of Shark Skin Man and Peach Hip Girl). The film follows a non-linear structure and is a frequent barrage of various dream-like states; sort of like a dumbed-down hipster space version of Waking Life. The segments incorporate mainly physics as space is shattered and balls of matter are being controlled by loli's in latex. While this may appeal to a numerous amount of viewers, there is nothing to feed off of. Many scenes will have you applauding the variety of these three directors, while many will leave you running in fear of ever viewing that again. Many scenes will take influence over better directors. Inspirations such as Cronenberg can be spotted, but these scenes are childish when mixed with the childish mind of these Japanese directors. Many of the highlighting characters are thrown at each other to create nonsensical conversation and discuss dreams. Linklater did it better. If i had to choose from these scenes, my favorite had to be the alien - naval scene. Funky Forest is a box of delicious cereal that contains both stale and fresh combinations. It all depends on the person if you would enjoy this. If you enjoy things rapid-fire with no sense to them, then you might like this film more than i did, but i prefer a story to the least, not a mash-up of music video clips.

-Maq

ALL NIGHT LONG

Katsuya Matsumura (1992)

All Night Long: Volume One is the theatrically released upbringing of a classic series. All Night Long had the benefit of a doubt towards being an utter piece of shock garbage but barely managed to raise above expectations to deliver a thrilling experience more in the vein of Dean Koontz's The Voice of the Night rather than a psycho-sexual tale of revenge. Adolescence is a danger to the malleable mind, says Matsumura. After watching so many of Matsumura's films, I do consider myself a fan of his work, which is an honor (Excuse my lack of modesty). The first All Night Long film is a relatively dull and dreary film until the climatic conclusion that leaves you nearly second-guessing. If you'll allow me to express a certain disdain for the film, I found myself jumping through Asian after Asian so fast that the faces melded together in a yellow-skinned mosaic, both of the physical impression and character traits. I couldn't differentiate friend from foe and many random incidents occurred leaving me in a daze. Three young adults meet in various ways and all have one thing in common; humility. Whether it's the local gangs or cherished women, these boys cannot catch a break. They range from sweet and condensed to man-child and irritating to the bookworm stereotype. All three of these very different persona's clash in the end for a blood bath similar to the likes of Battle Royale or 2LDK, sans any political or science fiction undertones. The end is the culminated arrival of what the series is known for but as the old saying goes "Too little, too late". To further fit to the wise scheme of needless sensationalism, the Japanese obsession with Nazis is displayed mind-numbingly well. As our trio of mistakable heroes enters the den of an "evil" gang of bullies, you will notice a swastika banner sticking out on the far back wall. This is a dead end philosophy of the characters whose life span is thankfully shorter than yours. Just as shown and demonstrated in Beautiful Girl Hunter, it seems there's more members to the National Socialist Japanese Workers and Welfare Party than meets the eye. The original All Night Long is an entry needed to experiment with the audiences on the level of sadism and torture. Had Matsumura throttled all out on his first assignment, what could have been would have most likely been cluttered and polluted with inane situations, much like his Concrete-Encased High School Girl Murder Case. Considering the idea of him directing a sequel, I'm sure it would have been a vast improvement, maybe even transcending into territory of "marvelous". All Night Long is essential, but due to the series having non-connected story lines, I'd start with the second and work my way up. I kid you not.

-mAQ

ALL NIGHT LONG 2: ATROCITY
ALL NIGHT LONG 2: ATROCITY

Katsuya Matsumura (1995)

This is the second volume of an original series of 5 films, each carrying the same misanthropic tone and view. This is one of the more disturbing films of the series by far seeing as how the first is a portrait (although clumsy) of madness. Katsuya Matsumura shows that he is capable of making you (Average viewers) see humanity as garbage, especially women. Women are cattle herded for sexual pleasure. They exist only as a luxury, blissfully demonstrated by most Japanese directors. The plot is best described as familiar, just never shown with such a bold yet degrading look. The first one was released theatrically but the rest were denied due to the subject matter concerning these visionary tales of depravity. You meet Shunichi, an awkward otaku-obsessed computer geek who lives in his room. He enjoys painting anime models, caressing them, and rubbing his lips all over them. It's easy to tell through Masashi Endô that Shunichi could snap at any time. He is constantly bullied to extreme lengths by a gang of cold-blooded could-be killers. This includes various tortures, both physically and emotionally. All this for 100,000 yen. Eventually he gets a strange message on his computer from a deus ex machina whom is never explained known only by GOOD.MAN. Much of the plot is a surprise so I mustn't spoil it for you. We meet some very sweet characters along the way and we have some interesting practical effects. The kicker about these films is the lack of happiness in them. It's as if some psycho-slug with an affinity for pride, happiness, and glee comes around and absorbs it all leaving only carnage and harshness in its slime trail. The eventful breakdown should be glamorized because few have had the insanity as this one had - Of course, not since the brutal NC-17 film Bad Lieutenant starring Harvey Keitel. The second installment in the All Night Long series has symbolism, foreshadowing, blowtorch to the mouth, and enough heroin-laced rapes to please the average seeker of disturbing material. Filmed with hardly any music, it shows that a soundtrack is sometimes only extra icing on the cake and is not always necessary. It's a film that shows the difference between the eventual revenge or just plain insanity. The past and future All Night Long films attempt to perfect the routine but this one strikes gold. Becoming a murderous tornado, killing and destroying anything in its path. Expect some black humor and wonderful hamsters. Overall, a great film that blends horrible emotions and a bloodbath together. It's satisfying to see it done successfully. This film hypothetically shows the dangers of homosexuality.

-mAQ

CONCRETE-ENCASED HIGH SCHOOL GIRL MURDER CASE

Katsuya Matsumura (1995)

Concrete-Encased High School Girl Murder Case is a sexploitation piece of "disturbing" Japanese filth slowly bathing in its notoriety. Based on a true case of what the title implies, the truth and case details most likely vary from the real incident. With a fragile tale as this teamed with a horrible actress who was hired cause she will take her clothes off, the result would be similar to watching Open Water but with underwater shark boxing scenes and jet ski chases. From the director of the All Night Long series, Katsuya Matsumura has a stylized filmography of directorial efforts. In fact, all of them have to do with the subject of rape and sexual torture. It's no myth that the Japanese are the main staple in the line of extreme fetishism. With this film, you are given a slight factual depiction of the events that transpired but focused more on the eroticism than the sadism, but you of course already knew this as soon as you see the film was released under HOT Entertainment. On January 4th 1989, Junko Furuta was bludgeoned, beaten with an iron barbell, sodomized with an iron rod, forced to drink her own urine and fed cockroaches, had fireworks inserted into her anus, forced to masturbate, had her nipple cut, and ultimately died from immolation. She died soon thereafter from shock and had her body stuffed in an oil drum filled with cement, hence the stretched title explaining its plot seamlessly. Rape is an authoritative fetish no matter which morals or virtues are present. In context, rape may seem perverse, disgusting, and inhuman but the fact of dominance and sexual prowess/power being a general turn on for humanity is conclusive. Just like making "whoopie" in public might make you feel like an outlaw, the same could be said for rape. Perhaps it's the adrenaline rather than the forced copulation. I don't condone said task but I will not deny the existent titillation of the act of rape (simulated or not). Separated at birth? The Japanese are known for practicing many fetishes before our western counterparts. For example, the inquisitive and arousing schoolgirl. One would think that a reformed collective of education-seeking peers could produce a cleverly deceptive female capable of intelligent thought or adhering character, but according to Matsumura, all females are made to star in a rape-exploitation film. A piece of stringy cattle; fuck meat, if you will. Many fans of the exploitation genre have lost their way. Rather than appreciating the sleaze product for political tones, super stock, artful cinematography, or non-PC plot devices, it seems only to entertain with a reciprocating violence factor - the endless urge to kill, maim, and rape for brutality's sake. While I admit of having my own guilty pleasures, I found my way past this and such an occurrence has given me a critical eye of gore horror. For an accurate and disturbing re-enactment of the events in form of a translated manga - download the RapidShare here. The manga works where the film does not. The comic creates a soul for the girl; one who enjoys games and school. Matsumura has created another generally displeasing depiction of cruelty, however lacking any of the atrocities or extreme situations presented in his classic All Night Long trilogy (Before 4 and R). At the epicentre of the film, what you are aware of is that Concrete Murder Case is just fluff surrounded with a tangible plot.

CONCRETE-ENCASED HIGH SCHOOL GIRL MURDER CASE

-mAQ

THE YOUTH KILLER

Kazuhiko Hasegawa (1976)

Kazuhiko Hasegawa has been hailed as an unsung hero of Japanese cinema since directing 2 motion pictures: The Youth Killer and The Man Who Stole the Sun. Both of these films feature the central idea of rebellion and the oft-anarchic nature of youth. The Youth Killer was introduced to me with very esteemed remarks towards the burgeoning guilt of our cocky lead, Jun. After Jun visits his parents to discuss their son's employment and relationship with free-spirit Keiko, things turn bloody twisted as Jun finds himself standing over his father's corpse, a bloody knife in his hand. Jun's father had hired an investigator to dig into Keiko's past, resulting in most of what Jun had thought to be the truth to be lies from the harlot's mouth. This "trigger" results in the slaying of his father and eventually his mother. This slow-burn effect of losing grip on sanity could have been relatively shortened. These events that I've highlighted make up the first hour of film. One hour of slipping in and out of hysteria. That's enough to drive anyone crazy, especially with the camera assigned to "realistic" tendencies. Jun and his mother switch psychosis and attempt to clean up the body, looking somber at the corpse while loudly recalling past instances.

I had previously attempted to watch The Youth Killer quite a few months back but lost interest and opted to do something else, resulting in me forgetting the entire experience. The second time around wasn't so much the charm as it took dead set determination to finish. Starting off and succeeding in making it as far as I could remember, the pacing didn't seem to get any better. I felt sluggish and tired. This modest look at patricide and rebellion in youth can be seen as an important film due to the current state of youth in Japan. The past several decades have seen Japanese youth reach new peaks of extremity to break free of social norms. Much of the impact of The Youth Killer is fumbled onto the trail it glides on. The predetermined fate of the characters is set in stone and could bestow enormous and powerful social commentary but siphons all efforts with ludicrous scenes which only boil my dissent. One scene in particular is the passing of Jun's mother. Both Jun and the mother swap roles of grieving and headstrong. This doesn't last because soon Jun's mother begins to sense Jun's reluctance to leave the tramp, Keiko. Realizing just the gravity of the situation, she wraps a knife to her hand with a towel and begins furiously stabbing at Jun, leading to her being pinned to the ground in a sheet. She begs "Thrust it gently" and wishes for her lovely Jun to take her life. Eventually succumbing, Jun stabs his mother only to be shocked by her screams - "It hurts!".

One scene caught my eye and forced me to finally break silence about the plight of technology. As Jun walks down the street during the opening of the film, a large delivery truck passes through a puddle, dousing Jun from head to toe. In this age of rampant technology, this seemingly innocent incident would render the victim several hundred dollars behind in debt. Think about the accessories an average puppet to the digital age carries: iPod, mobile phone, PDA, Bluetooth. Sure this is irrelevant to the film but it's this antiquity of culture that really has me scratching my chin and thinking of a better time, a time in which everything isn't run by a processor of some sort. This crime of passion soon turns Jun from a guiltless punk into a suicidal clown who waxes poetic much too often. Godiego provided the unfitting soundtrack for The Youth Killer. They're the folks responsible for the soundtrack to Hausu, whose kooky demeanor benefits from the soul jams Godiego has to offer. The Youth Killer's blatant drama does not support the cheery tunes whatsoever. While The Youth Killer is hailed as a brilliant mark in Hasegawa's tiny span as a director, I found it lame and overly sensitive to life. Watching several characters bumble around threatening and attempting to kill themselves grows tiring, the same as what one would suffer from reading poetry on Livejournal written by 13 year old angst princesses.

THE YOUTH KILLER

The strongest portion of The Youth Killer is Keiko's revealing of Jun's father telling the truth. At first the blame is laid on Keiko as she should have never kept the secret of rape from her significant other but soon Jun slips into his shell and broods about the mistake of killing the kindest man in his life. This is touched on quite beautifully as Jun and his father sumo wrestle on the construction site of their future bar. This scene of bonding that's featured is powerfully moving. It's scenes of fatherhood like this that really make me regret not having anything in common with my own dad. The only other scene of worth is the party hallucination near the finale of the film. All the characters in the film are wining and dining, laughing and taking photographs. The iconoclast essence of Jun is teased with this daydream sequence. It's such a shame that Hasegawa had such technique in characterization but didn't pleasure us with its company. The two withstanding themes of The Youth Killer lies within Keiko's discussing how she enjoyed being raped by her mother's lover and that truth kills. These two facets saves The Youth Killer from being entirely unwatchable garbage. Even though I sat frustrated and unsatisfied by the closure, The Youth Killer is still a film I greatly respect but will never endorse.

-mAQ

THE MAN WHO STOLE THE SUN

Kazuhiko Hasegawa (1979)

Earlier on in the year I reviewed a film entitled The Youth Killer, a Japanese coming-of-age film that could be accurately labeled a "snoozefest". Past the infantile antithesis, The Youth Killer is remembered as one of two films from Kazuhiko Hasegawa, a director who disappeared from the scene as early as he arrived. It is as if Hasegawa picked up a camera for a short period of time just to perform a ritual similar to the act of trepanning - alleviating pressure allowing for a permanent "high". Hasegawa's other film, which garnered skepticism upon finishing The Youth Killer, is an award-winning Japanese satire called The Man Who Stole the Sun. Going in with the promise of excellence, The Man Who Stole the Sun not only kept me enthralled but actually managed to inspire, impress, and polarize me on the battlefield of criticism towards his few works. Was I being unfair in my review of The Youth Killer? This is a question that I asked myself after watching The Man Who Stole the Sun. Nevertheless, only time and an additional viewing can cement my position on the lower-half of Hasegawa's "career".

Born in Hiroshima on the January of 1946, Hasegawa managed to be given life under the most dynamic of post-war scenarios - directly following the detonation of "Little Boy". These dire straits of which he was sheltered through no doubt influenced his greater good and lent much to the creation of The Man Who Stole the Sun. The plot follows a renegade science teacher who short-circuits under the pressure of a hostage situation and the tedious nature of Japanese youth and decides to create a personal atomic bomb. These are assumptions without much physical evidence, though. In all honesty, I'm really unsure of the definite reason behind our lead character, Makoto Kido's, lapse in violence. Surviving the hostage situation with the help of a police inspector named Yamashita, Kido makes ample usage of his new lease on life and burgles a power plant for a large amount of plutonium (of which is shot in a manner that reflects the groovy nature of Danger: Diabolik). Shown in incredible detail, Kido then creates his atomic bomb and then proceeds to hold Tokyo hostage. Unsure of what he wants, Kido assumes the identity of "Nine" and goads a bubble-headed disc jockey named "Zero" into helping him decide his demands - which includes bringing The Rolling Stones to Tokyo.

Sadly, The Man Who Stole the Sun has fallen into the long list of films that precede discussion with "...the Japanese answer to Taxi Driver", which couldn't be farther from the truth. Other than wielding a handgun and displaying general misanthropy, Makoto Kido isn't the Japanese Travis Bickle and never will be. One might be able to substitute the role of Jodie Foster's for the atomic bomb as both are similarly idolized as a token of peace and a guiding light for both reign of terrors. In fact, the relationship between Makoto Kido and his nuclear weapon borders obsession. He sleeps at night cradling the plutonium in its raw compound and even spoons with the finished armament. As the plot progresses the hinting of plutonium poisoning is dropped like an anchor when Zero pulls out a clump of Kido's hair. Even when Kido finds out, he refuses to leave the beauty alone, lest he becomes as powerless as he was prior. Hasegawa spits in the face of the preconceived notion of refusing false idols with this visual memorandum of his. The atomic bomb is the center of our story and is given much more depth into its creation and purpose than Kido's driving force for terror. Another incredible aspect of Kido's character is the two-toned behavior patterns he exhibits. During chase scenes and the many confrontations that await him with Inspector Yamashita, Kido demonstrates a remove of a villainous archetype. Yet, when with Zero and his weapon, he battles his demons either by seducing Zero then tossing her into a river or displaying bouts of happiness mixed with melancholy. Makoto Kido is surely a conflicted character of interest.

THE MAN WHO STOLE THE SUN

The Man Who Stole the Sun is nowhere near a perfect film; essentially, it bathes in pop culture, giving the events a certain familiar weight, but unfortunately over-complicating elements of the plot. Hasegawa has certainly created his masterpiece - an often humorous, often thrilling, and often frightening experience in pulp cinema. Armed with the finest elements in post-war terror, action, and occasional caper material, The Man Who Stole the Sun is an entry in personal filmmaking that is widely accessible to all. Its blend of biting satire with allusions to genocide are rather sobering in contrast with the nonstop hi-jinx of the film. For instance, the scene in which Kido fantasizes about dumping the shreds of spare plutonium in the pool, killing women and children, is a punch to the gut that disagrees with the tonally challenged happenings of the first hour (did this really take place?). Most importantly, Hasegawa is, himself, a part of the history behind an atomic bomb which makes this superior project fitting in a historically important sense. Tyrannical spirits the world over can find something to love in the better half of Hasegawa's body of work. When it comes down to it, The Man Who Stole the Sun actually gives me better memories and insight of his previous film The Youth Killer. This is what it is - total, senseless anarchy and a kaleidoscopic mishmash of Japanese culture served fondly with an ending that will leave you staring blankly at your television set. How did it get to this point?

-mAQ

KARATE BEAR FIGHTER

Kazuhiko Yamaguchi (1975)

Karate Bear Fighter is the second film in the Masutatsu Oyama trilogy preceded by the aforementioned Karate Bull Fighter. In this pulp martial arts biography, Sonny Chiba plays the legendary Oyama who has killed man & beast at separate points of his life. His fists are lightning fast and his apathy for human life knows no bounds. This is but a continuation of the first film. Intended for timeline viewers only. Oyama continues his quest for personal enlightenment and ultimately becomes the most bad ass zen guy around. He trains under raging waterfalls to heighten his tolerance and to discover what a wise man said to him about a presence of a circle. Oyama is portrayed fluently by Shinichi Chiba. Sonny Chiba's height of 5'9 attacks Asian height standards in film allowing Chiba to stand tall over any fighter giving a visual menacing advantage. The portions of these films are divided in a spiritual pie graph. Each film in this trilogy features amazing martial arts action and violence that is gratifying and flammable. As soon as the "one man against a mob" scenes are over, switch to a touching side story of how Oyama has deceived someone in some way and temporarily sets out to touch a human's life in some way. This film is deeply engrossing in more than one manner. Alcoholic. Hausu was another Japanese masterpiece and in no way is connected to this film, but the choice of bright settings links them together. Although Hausu had pastel horizons, Karate Bear Fighter gave a foreboding shallowness to the country of Japan. Kill or be killed; Chiba's universal tagline of revenge and brutality is no stranger to these pulp biographies. Now for the role of exploitation and foreshadowing, One could guess that Chiba gets in a fight with a bear and this is true. In no way as remarkable or graphic as the makeshift matador scene in the prior film, this time around, the animal cruelty is limited to Chiba punching the creature into a cyclops. I preferred the bull battle to be honest. Karate Bear Fighter is the middle man of a trilogy. With one more to go, I continually find more and more appreciation for the man that was named Oyama. I noticed his counterpart is heavily glamorized as Chiba was to play an overweight role. Nonetheless, If you've seen Karate Bull Fighter, watch this sequel for a direct continuation. If you haven't seen any of them, drop what you are doing and pick up copies now.

-mAQ

KARATE BULL FIGHTER
KARATE BULL FIGHTER

Kazuhiko Yamaguchi (1975)

A dream come true. A film to rival how bad ass Sonny Chiba's The Street Fighter was. Karate Bull Fighter is just the first entry in a trilogy where Chiba plays Karate legend Masutatsu Oyama. He was the man who invented Kyokushin Karate (The first full contact Karate) which is now practiced by over 12 million martial arts enthusiasts. The legends and myths surrounding this martial artist including him wrestling and killing live bulls which later became the glowing point of a film based on his life. Sonny Chiba was the perfect casting choice for due to the small fact of him being trained by the real life Oyama for 5 years. He delivers the same action that we've grown to love over the course of his Street Fighter trilogy plus he really surprises with an incredible ability to act as soon as the drama begins. I have had a sweet tooth for all his films ranging from Kill Bill to the wacky Samurai Resurrection. The choice of settings really flow freely with the cultural bonanza to which we acquaint with over the runtime of our beautiful film. The violence is almost off the charts for a Chiba film. While not featuring as extreme violence as the kind committed by Terry Tsuguri, we have many surprising shots of facial impalements as well as a bulls horn getting ripped out. As usual with any Sonny Chiba film, the choreography isn't really much, just Chiba flying around with a voracious appetite for destruction but that is just his own unique style. One cannot call fault on his behalf because he does his job and he does it extremely well. If the mental image of Sonny Chiba karate chopping a bulls horn off doesn't appeal to you and excite every male gene in your body, then you are a lost cause. Karate Bull Fighter acts as an extraordinary action film laced with these delicate scenes of earnest emotion delivered by our Japanese muse himself. Karate Bull Fighter is one of Chiba's bloodiest and most brilliant.

-mAQ

KARATE WARRIORS

Kazuhiko Yamaguchi (1976)

Japan's lethal "fists for hire" Sonny Chiba wasn't decorated with such a label with no just cause. Within the first ten minutes of Karate Warriors, the volatile scoundrel (Chiba) finds him self in one of the most astoundingly shot fight sequences I've seen come out of a oriental classic. While taking the scarce technique of slow-motion (as time would have) and combining it with a quick speed-up upon point of impact, the result is electrifying and an experience that traversed the very nerves on my spine rendering me hapless as this Yojimbo-inspired clone of several clones assaulted its way into my very neural databanks. It isn't even up to the sting of high-velocity Chiba impact to woo me over with this tragically named unheard of classic, Karate Warriors blends a spice of charitable virility crossed with Lone Wolf and Cub and with this the result is a film that you can find yourself playing over and over again, have you the capacity for Chiba's fecund charisma and wrathful throat noises.

In Karate Warriors, (roughly translated into Killing Fist with Child) Sonny Chiba plays knight-errant to a young boy whose father is Chiba's rival. As I already mentioned, Karate Warriors is a loose remake of Yojimbo borrowing the rival gangs device and recycling the deceitfulness of our story's hero as he plays both sides in an effort to get rich quick. The motivation of brotherly love turned sour? Heroin. In this film which is often labeled a prequel of sorts to The Street Fighter, Sonny Chiba displays his convictions with incredible fortitude. Sure, he's a ragtag karate warrior who steals rice cakes from little Asian boys but that didn't stop him from murdering some 20-30 people with only his fists and a samurai sword in a beach bloodbath that will forever resound as one of the most engaging no-rules brawls this side of Chinatown. That, and he did it for a hollow love that is unknown to our hero. Karate Warriors excels in all categories because it is heartfelt and ruthless in one sitting; a breezy sexploitation with much violence and enlightenment - equally.

As of recent I've been on a huge Sonny Chiba kick, indulging in such classics as The Bodyguard, Virus, Golgo 13 (again), G.I. Samurai, and the currently presented Karate Warriors. The problem with most of these films are the American releases are littered with terrible English dubs over the original, authentic Japanese audio track. These leaves terrible room for humiliating interpretation as Sonny Chiba's American counterparts always sound ridiculous and gaudy. The majesty of Chiba is his incredible dexterity and flexibility. His roundhouse kicks bring about this illicit form of fluid contact that is just something you can't explain with the limitations of language. If there ever was a martial arts physical performer, Sonny Chiba would be the headliner; top billing and all. When you level the field of Chiba within eye sight it's hard to sift the classics through the heap of supporting roles he portrayed. While I enjoy any helping of Chiba and I'm hardly picky, I demand a certain amount of screen time to be interested. Karate Warriors is one of his best films never seen by the commercial viewers eye, which is a shame. I've rarely seen a martial arts classic like this that braves the profitable sex nature of Japan while appealing to the Chiba enthusiast. Knowing Japan and its sexual proclivities, I'd be hard pressed to deny that Karate Warriors is one of the most true-to-form and gutsiest martial arts films without treading into Shaw Brothers territory. If you enjoy Sonny Chiba as much as the next bargain-bin dweller then Karate Warriors is an absolute necessity. It's only fair to me that my two favorite action stars, Bruce Willis and Sonny Chiba, act in both the same film. Viva Chiba!

KARATE WARRIORS

-mAQ

KARATE FOR LIFE

Kazuhiko Yamaguchi (1977)

Bringing the series to a close, Oyama got the film treatment he deserved. Karate for Life contains the same ingredients as the other films; epic battles and touching moments of humanity. Karate for Life opens up with a humongous bang. Sonny Chiba walks into a dojo and challenges the sensei to a duel to showcase his full-contact brand of karate. He then defeats over 100 warriors even after they cheat and manages to stab the sensei's eye out with his index finger. Karate for Life is the closing chapter that Oyama needs, but the ending still leaves many possibilities. The films never chronicled the rise of his fighting style or the other events that occurred. The film transpires over a small amount of time when Oyama was a thug and bodyguard stretching to his moments with children. Oyama is a great father figure and I myself wouldn't mind getting my ass handed to me by him for a righteous discipline. Oyama engages in a ridiculous and often humorous job of professional wrestling. He is part of a team that points jests towards the Japanese. Due to Oyama's fighting spirit, he cannot fix a match and gets over his head with mobsters and sharks. The scenes of professional wrestling fixate on the American military in the crowd hollering a fierce chant warranting death. Surely the Japs think little of us, but portraying us as rabid animals is taking it a bit far. From what I've written on the previous films, not much changes. The film plots stay perfectly linear and the director doesn't like to sample change. I can't say much more than I've previously written but the Oyama trilogy is one of the best martial arts series' ever made. It's unfortunate that his saga wasn't continued past three films and that Sonny Chiba has aged past his prime.

-mAQ

SONIC THE HEDGEHOG
SONIC THE HEDGEHOG

Kazuho Ikegami (1996)

Not to be confused with the herd of other Sonic related animated works. This one is entirely in its own league. Originally two OVA's fused together in Japan, this outflows both the horrid Sonic X television show and any "Adventures of" series that features useless and dramatized critters with spunk. Sonic is definitely a fragile franchise, as seen by his slow demise thanks to the plethora of Sonic games released by Nintendo/Sega that are rotting to the core. Sonic the Hedgehog is an intense and sentimental relic of my childhood. Being a child born without a silver spoon in my mouth, I had no way of ever hoping for a video game system, seeing as how the economy was back in those times. My father's friend gave me, out of the blue, his Sega Genesis with Sonic the Hedgehog. I was instantly addicted to the world of the silent hero. Migraines had never been so sweet and homework was never so useless. Who needs education when going the speed of fictitious sound? Then the unthinkable happened - Chairmen decided Sonic was lacking a personality, so they took Keanu Reeves' role in Point Break as an inspiration to give him "spunk". Ruined my childhood as well. The appointed film starts off with Sonic being totally nihilistic whilst tanning. This allows for you to witness first hand that Sonic doesn't care about anything, let alone his friends. They took the Tails-falling-behind mechanic too seriously. Representing the English dubbing, the verdict is guilty for an almost-unbearable dubbing. The only one they managed to nail on the head was Dr. Robotnik (I refuse to call him Eggman). The Japanese touch is present while viewing this film. Constant references to sexual humor and assault are noticeable. Sonic stares at the stunning Sara's camel toe as well as many cut scenes including breast-grabbing, middle finger flicking, and Knuckles screaming "SHIT!". What works so well is the flawless port of the action included in the award winning franchise. Sonic indeed speeds, rolls into the light speed ball, springs up, and homing attacks caterpillar baddies. It's almost invigorating to view a fight worthy of fame against Metal Sonic. Had this been Sonic slaying fat Robotnik in various machines, this would have been an absolute disaster. But thanks to the menacing presence of Metal Sonic, the film has that "Ultimate Showdown" scenario that creates a motion picture mood. The Japanese pop used in the film's soundtrack might be an elusive "of what's to come" in the disappointingly underrated game Sonic R. Most of Sonic's classics are sadly not appreciated as much as should be, leaving the ripe trash to be picked by fanboys who know nothing of a good video game. Dr. Wiley may have created the greatest robot designs by Robotnik's Metal Sonic encompasses the soul of a villain - merciless, cold, intimidating, and incredibly powerful. Sonic the Hedgehog: The Movie is a film worthy of the title of the bad to the bone Hedgehog. Entertaining, fun, and calculated - this is definitely worth a viewing.

-mAQ

GODZILLA VS. BIOLLANTE
GODZILLA VS. BIOLLANTE

Kazuki Ōmori (1989)

Of all the Kaiju films I've laid my eyes upon, of all the monster mashes I've been subjected to, none has been as story driven as Godzilla vs. Biollante. Following up the events that transpired at the end of The Return of Godzilla, we find that Godzilla is still sealed in the volcano and while scientists excavate what's left of Tokyo, they find a sample of Godzilla's ultra-radiated hide. This sparks a battle between corporations and mercenaries which will stretch across 5 years time making this a Godzilla epic. When the dust settles, a scientist has eventually combined the DNA of both rose and Godzilla. This seems like a great idea so the scientist is a little bit surprised when the plant eventually turns into an aggressive plant that escapes into the ocean and develops a "large" problem. That being said, Biollante is possessed with the spirit of the Doctor's dead daughter, Erika. Soon the Godzilla genes take over and Biollante challenges Godzilla to a brawl. Being a tentacled acid-spitting evolutionary beast of burden, Godzilla has some trouble in this one and even becomes scarred by the excreted venom. The Biollante is a creature of applaud. A dentist won a contest hosted by Toho and created a storyline featuring a plant creature. This venture proves to be a breath of fresh air from dinosaurs and other lizards. At least Rampage and Primal Rage had giant apes. Godzilla vs. Biollante features an infamous versus set up or match/rematch. While many films have the similar pattern, none explore the possibilities of setting up the rest of the film without a confronting obstacle. Just when you mistakingly convince yourself that Biollante is in fact dead, the creature exacts its own instincts and archaic survival methods, thus resulting in a pseudo-photosynthesis allowing the creature to reach 100% final form and becoming more monster than plant. This battle becomes more thrilling than the last and becomes one of the greater destructive forces in the Godzilla library. Being the eighteenth film in a franchise is no easy task. Godzilla is truly its country's mascot. Being able to still be able to sell well over a million tickets way past his prime, but there's the beauty; there is no prime for Godzilla. Godzilla is eternal. If Uwe Boll were to make a Godzilla film, I'd gladly watch it and enjoy it. While some entries aren't needed, they aren't necessarily horrible. Then again, I haven't gotten to Godzilla vs. Megalon as of this moment. The definition of a popcorn flick should officially altered to read "Godzilla". Plain and simple. Godzilla vs. Biollante is much more than a destruction derby with rubber suits - it's a thriving character drama that almost focuses more on the stars than our lovable lizard and various cohorts. While many of the exploits of the tiny people of Tokyo border on creeping slow and bland, it's more than most Godzilla films can say. That being, them incorporating mysterious tiny Island representatives, faeries, and the like. Godzilla vs. Biollante features a psychic but I'm not letting it get to me too much. Godzilla vs. Biollante isn't much of a departure from the original sequel formula, but contains enough zest and creativity to mold an unexplored environment for you. There's no fancy space gizmo's and gadgets in this film. Although, Biollante's spores form the soon coming villain, SpaceGodzilla. Hrm...

-mAQ

I'M GONNA GIT YOU SUCKA
I'M GONNA GIT YOU SUCKA

Keenen Ivory Wayans (1988)

The Wayans brother/brothers have created another parody classic in the guise of a blaxploitation spoof. I'm Gonna Git You Sucka is essentially a post-blaxploitation flick. But not in such familiar territory that Master P. once tried to dominate with his horrible film aptly titled Black Supaman. Exhibit A: Notice the Supaman. Surely these ebonic syllables must be a dramatic representation of the urban roots. With the words "Git" and "Sucka", The Wayans Brothers have already snagged half of the black population in as a potential audiences. To first dissect the blaxploitation genre is your first step. One must realize that blaxploitation is a mongrelized stab at film noir aimed towards the Negro kind. If some sort of dramatized action/female empowerment attempt were to be made cinematically to lure in the young black kids, it would be an exercised notion to expunge all the nihilistic attitude in the black actors. The same femme-fatale with guns shtick still stands, but prostitution and black widowing are on two sides of the female spectrum. Blaxploitation manages to parody not only the film noir genre, but also its own niche. It's purely race entertainment. One might even become "more white" while watching these films. Same to say as most of Wu-Tang Clan's demographic has suddenly turned paler. The Wayans Brothers successfully make a mockery of black entertainment in this endeavor. This is definitely a film which humor requires preemptive training. Shaft, Superfly, and Black Caesar are but a few of the films ruthlessly spoofed in this prequel of sorts to Don't Be a Menace to South Central While Drinking Your Juice in the Hood. After all is said and done, what is created is a successful comedy but lacking a gross appreciation for the genre itself. I'm Gonna Git You Sucka can be seen as a hateful film. I'm Gonna Git You Sucka can be dubbed a racial Rorschach. Depending on which precise films you've seen or examined, each joke can be seen in an incredibly different insight. Your expectations are still practically mince meat for the horde of slapstick jokes that line up one after another. When I first heard of this film, I couldn't believe my eyes. What I expected was a classic and smooth action film, but as soon as I say the Wayans name, I knew some sacred things were soon to be crushed. I'm Gonna Git You Sucka is a fresh comedy but to some it might be stale. Please take the time to also notice a toned down Truck character from Isaac Hayes.

-mAQ

THE CHOCOLATE WAR

Keith Gordon (1988)

While I was attending an American public High school, students were required to read a couple books over the summer. Of course, it seemed very few people actually did this. After all Tyrone and Dervon could never even get close to reading a mere page, let alone a full-length novel. Most of the honkies could finish a book if they wanted, but that would require much more effort than reading text message slang and whatnot. Literacy is just too Eurocentric and should be looked at as crypto-racism. It would be against America's dire commitment to equality if white students were actually pushed to their full potential and forced to read the great works of "dead white men." It is much more important to read the fantastic works of half-literate Negress Zora Neale Hurston as it makes whites realize the true quality of Negro Kultur. Me, being the naughty bigot that I am, found most of the Negro Novels to be completely and utterly unintentionally hilarious. Despite not being Catholic, I decided to read the book The Chocolate War, a novel about the inter-politics of an elite Catholic Boys school. Sure, maybe I could not relate to the Catholic school system, but I could at least relate to a group of white boyz who know how to use big words like "education" and "institution." With the novel The Chocolate War, I also decided to watch the 1988 film based on the book.

How many Negroes attend the Catholic school in The Chocolate War?! ZERO! How could a film be called The "Chocolate" War without a B-Balling brotha' or a blunt blazin' blackie? The film is about as white as they come featuring a group of well dressed gentlemen who display self-control and can use complex words beyond two syllables. I was surprised for such a book to make the reading list in High School, but because of the obvious message against the "system" of the Catholic School makes it appropriate subtle Cultural Marxist propaganda for those committed culture-distorters out there. Still, with all the corruptness of the Catholic school, I found much more quality in the school than say a public multicultural sewer (AKA American public school). After all, as the good Brother Leon says in The Chocolate War, "Boys will be Boys" and the boys in the film have a little conspiratorial fun not for destruction, but just for a little wholehearted power play-action. In The Chocolate War, one realizes there is a big difference between in-group games and out-group alien subversion such as that which has been plagued American public schools since the late 1960s. The Chocolate War was directed by Keith Gordon, the fellow that played the automotive-obsessed nerd in the cinematic adaptation of Stephen King's Christine. Due to the low-budget of The Chocolate War and Gordon's keen business sense, the director was able to have virtual free reign over the creative process. Mr. Gordon cites auteur Nicholas Roeg as one of his main influences for the film and it shows. The Chocolate War has some interesting editing techniques that add to the film's fluidity and it does not get as masturbatory as Roeg's films sometimes do. With the unique and sleek editing of the film also comes an 1980s synthesized soundtrack that puts the works of John Hughes to shame. In fact, The Chocolate War is kind of like a John Hughes film had the recently deceased director taken his cinema a little more seriously. The Chocolate War lacks all the silly melodrama that made many of the dramatic scenes in The Breakfast Club embarrassingly unwatchable. Being an experienced actor, Keith Gordon was able to cast the right actors for the main roles in The Chocolate War. Lead protagonist and High School Freshman Jerry Renault was played excellently by Weird Science star Ian Mitchell-Smith. Renault's mother has just died and now he has a Catholic school student "secret society" known as The Vigils request him to do the dirty deed of not selling chocolates for a school fundraiser. The sinisterly suave leader of the Vigils, Archie, is played brilliantly by Wallace Langham. Despite Archie being the man of Renault's torment, the two characters rarely communicate with one another in the film. Director Keith Gordon was able to quite nicely direct the lead characters of The Chocolate War and their relative worlds. Jerry Renault maybe a Freshmen nobody, but Mr. Gordon was able to get a performance out of the character that fully resonates the characters introverted world. Although "enemies," both Jerry Renault and Archie are not the most different people in the world, quite the contrary actually. Their differences mainly comes from the system and hierarchy of the school more than anything with the Catholic system being the most dangerous element in the film, certainly much bigger than any one person. The Chocolate War is a film that makes one realize how big of a joke American public schools are. Yeah, maybe the Catholic school system might have an "evil" power contained within it, but it is certainly no joke like the American public school zoo. I would have much preferred wearing a uniform in a serious private school instead of attending an American public school full of people who should have never been in school in the first place. There is a reason that less than half of students in America's third world cities are graduating from High School. Even with all the low and pathetic standards of your typical American public school curriculum, the dullards aren't passing anything but the crack pipe and scabies. I would not have minded partaking in a Chocolate war, but I would never have tolerated being part of an American public school urban Guerrilla war.

THE CHOCOLATE WAR

-Ty E

CENTIPEDE HORROR

Keith Li (1982)

Wai Lun is in a deep supernatural conspiracy. After getting bugged by his sister to let her go to S.E Asia and ignore her late grandfathers plea's, he finally collapses and lets her go. ONLY, if she agrees to where a magic amulet that protects her from evil. Of course, her being a naive little twat, she takes it off to go to a vendor. The vendor instantly recognizes said amulet and using a lost article of hers induces a venomous spell. She then passes out in the forest covered with disgusting, foot-long centipedes. Her brother then flies to S.E Asia and begins investigated her death. Might i add it was gruesome, including wounds that birth baby centipedes. That scene truly made me squirm. While investigating, he locates a man called "The Centipede King" and brings him to her bed. He looks in fear and pushes them to go see his uncle. Wai Lun begins hearing very disturbing sounds everywhere only to find centipedes. Truly a devil's creation, these insects have been added to my list of phobias. After this incident, it is shown that his grandfather had done a horrible thing which resulted in a village being burnt to the ground and had a curse put on his entire family. This film was directed by Keith Li and is known for it's incredible acting. I am not talking about Oscar acting. I am talking about vomiting up live centipedes and scorpions. That by itself isn't all too squeamish. Christian Bale himself ate maggots for Herzog's new film "Rescue Dawn" but you need to keep in mind these are giant, venomous centipedes. They can kill you. The commitment alone is enough to shout encore. This film fits nicely with the other CAT III films released in the 80's such as The Untold Story or Dr. Lamb. Truly disgusting, and i understand why Sam Raimi said this was the most disgusting film he has ever seen. In all my years of living i have learned one thing. Do not fuck with Voodoo. Let alone Chinese Voodoo. The vomit is disgusting and this film has some incredible scenes. With ghost chickens and flaming fireballs chasing sorcerers, this film is an amazing supernatural film. One thing i hold high about this film is it's exorcism scene. This woman has a scorpion curse and has a bizarre rock stomach which reminds me of Nacho Cerda's Genesis. It involves blood stamps and bones clacking. They truly had the myth of magic in mind behind the scenes of this film. It also has a twist ending. Kick starting the trend since '88. The film has no unique style or anything identifiable in his later works. The acting could be more believable and the costumes could show more effort, but regardless of these minor flaws, this is an excellent piece.

-Maq

THE DEVILS
THE DEVILS

Ken Russell (1971)

Ken Russell (Lisztomania, Salome's Last Dance) is certainly a filmmaker whose oeuvre I haven't completely made up my mind about, namely because the idea of a rampantly heterosexual camp auteur seems patently preposterous to me, which is certainly reflected in some of the director's more obscenely outlandish works, but I cannot help but like the man. Indeed, if there ever was a filmmaker who ever brought a flagrantly unfaggy flavor to camp, it was the ridiculously shamelessly rampantly heterosexual Russell, whose entire oeuvre contradicts virtually every single stereotype regarding the British, which is certainly something in the filmmaker's favor. Notably, Russell seemed to be perplexed by his own camp sensibility as demonstrated by his humorous response when a close friend accused him of being a latent homosexual, "Fine, maybe I am, who knows, I don't think anyone knows themselves. We can all pretend, but I have no idea what I am, I'm me!" in what is one of his many classic quotes. Of course, Russell sometimes had help from homos in regard to his audacious camp aesthetic, arguably most notably with his masterpiece The Devils (1971) aka The Devils of Loudun aka Ken Russell's Film of The Devils aka Die Teufel, with queer avant-garde auteur Derek Jarman (The Angelic Conversation, The Last of England) working as the production designer on the film before becoming a notable filmmaker in his own right (it should be noted that in Russell's audio commentary for the BFI DVD release of the film, he credits Jarman for the look of the film, as a rare period piece with a truly modernist look). Based on the nonfiction novel The Devils of Loudun (1952) by Aldous Huxley as well as the 1960 play The Devils by John Whiting, Russell's film is a wholly idiosyncratic work set in a foreboding Fellini-esque 17th-century frog hell-on-earth of Catholic cruelty and bloodthirsty blueblood brutality of the spiritually apocalyptic high-camp sort where witch-hunters derive sadistic glee by performing ostensible exorcisms via primitive enemas and queer monarchs perform Schroeter-esque drag shows in between shooting protestants dressed up like black birds for sport. A film well known for being raped by its aesthetically retarded American backers at Warner Bros who to this day refuse to release the film in its completely uncut and undefiled form, The Devils is a rare work that straddles a healthy medium between Nunsplotation, pastoral 'folk horror,' Buñuel-esque arthouse surrealism of the sensually sacrilegious sort, and dichotomous Catholic and anti-Catholic sentiments and imagery that certainly reflects the filmmaker's remark regarding his own works, "I always start out thinking that I am going to make a pastoral film but the darker side eventually creeps in. All of my films are moral, or immoral, depending on your point of view." The surely sordid and oftentimes darkly humorous story of a pimp-like progressive Jesuit priest who has all the nuns begging at his knees for sins of the flesh and righteously fights to keep his pluralistic multi-religion town from being taken over by a scheming cunt of a queenish Catholic cardinal who wants to take complete control of France by destroying every single town and village, The Devils is arguably the most eccentrically yet elegantly bawdy tale of religious martyrdom ever committed to celluloid. Indeed, created in a country that has a history of producing so many wretched and brutally banal period pieces, Russell's film was surely a cinematic revelation of sorts.

Opening with grotesquely effete monarch King Louis XIII (Graham Armitage) giving a drag show inspired by Sandro Botticelli's classic 1486 painting The Birth of Venus for a nauseatingly nerdy power-hungry Catholic leader named Cardinal Richelieu (Christopher Logue), The Devils immediately establishes a tone of wayward mockery for the Catholic Church and French monarchy, or at least for certain elements of the two. A seemingly sexless fellow who lives such a decadent and less than Christ-like life of leisure that he has people wheel him around on a cart instead of walk like a normal person, Richelieu humors Louis XIII's truly aristocratic sense of narcissism so that he can con the king into allowing him to consolidate power over all of France via a universalist nationalist revolution by destroying every single town and village. The problem is that Louis XIII has agreed to keep one town, Loudun, intact as a promise to its recently deceased governor Georges de Sainte Marthe, who just succumbed to the plague. Before dying, de Sainte Marthe gave the much beloved yet superlatively sinful priest Urbain Grandier (Oliver Reed) reign over Loudun until the next election. As a man that loves women and their bodies just as much as he hates Catholic bureaucracy and greed, preternatural priest Grandier will ultimately prove to a thorn in Richelieu's side. The problem is that Grandier cannot keep his cock in his pants and after impregnating an ditzy young aristocrat named Philippe Trincant (Georgina Hale) who was sent to him for Latin lessons, the priest must face the wrath of the girl's father Magistrate Trincant (John Woodvine), who will do anything to get his revenge against the Jesuit priest for defiling his little girl and bequeathing her with the grand dishonor of giving birth to the bastard brood of a sinful holy man. Unbeknownst to Grandier, the Mother Superior Sister of the Ursuline convent in Loudun, Sister Jeanne (Vanessa Redgrave)—a hyper cynical and hyper horny old spinster who less than flatteringly states of her fellow sisters, "Most of the nuns here are noble women who have embraced the monastic life because there was not enough money at home to provide them with dowries. Or they were unmarriageable because ugly, a burden to the family. Communities which ought to be furnaces where souls are forever on fire with the love of God are merely dead with the grey ashes of convenience"—is deeply infatuated with him and sees him and his cock as being quite Christ-like as depicted in various nightmarish hallucinations she suffers, but being a self-loathing hunchback who engages in self-flagellation after masturbating while thinking of her Catholic crush, she would never dare confess her undying love to the super pimp padre, who does not even know she exists.

THE DEVILS

While Grandier has both holy and unholy women of all ages throwing themselves at him left and right, he ultimately falls in love with a more simple and mostly morally supreme girl named Madeline De Brou (Gemma Jones), who has been ordered by Sister Jeanne to read a book by Ursuline convent foundress Angela Merici. After telling Madeline that Merici's book is "sanctimonious claptrap," Grandier discusses marriage with the little lady and the two decide to get married. When Sister Jeanne learns of Grandier's marriage after a group of nuns do a mock drag reenactment of the marriage at the convent where one of the nuns dresses like the priest, she goes completely insane. After all, Sister Jeanne is a woman who hallucinates seeing Grandier as a Christ-like figure who can walk on water and who gets off the cross so that she can lick his Christly wounds with the utmost satisfaction, so after learning that her crush has given his heart to another woman, she completely loses it and ultimately unwittingly unleashes a micro-crusade as a result of her loony lovelorn hysteria. Meanwhile, Cardinal Richelieu sends a fellow named Baron Jean de Laubardemont (Dudley Sutton) who plans to use an army of protestant slaves to level Loudun to the ground, but Grandier temporarily stops him with the armed threat, "if one more stone be torn from our city walls, you will be dead before it touches the ground." The Baron has been brainwashed to think that Loudun is "a nest of dangerous Huguenots" and he goes back to Cardinal Richelieu to scheme a way to obtain the power to demolish the city. Meanwhile, Grandier heads to see King Louis to ensure that nothing happens to Loudun. Luckily for Cardinal Richelieu, Laubardemont, and the rest of the conspirators, Sister Jeanne, who wants her crush to pay for ostensibly betraying her, tells new convent priest, Father Mignon (Murray Melvin), that Grandier is not only a lecherous lady's who has gone against church rules by getting married to a young woman, but also makes up the absurd fabrication that the priest practices witchcraft and has 'possessed' her. Needless to say, Father Mignon tells Magistrate Trincant, who in turn tells Baron de Laubardemont, and the three plot together to use this information to destroy Grandier. Ultimately, they decide to bring in a "professional witch-hunter" named Father Pierre Barre (Michael Gothard)—a patent fraud and hateful bigot who does not even speak Latin and thus is incapable of even properly doing his job as a character that director Ken Russell intentionally made look like a hippie to show he is a "false messiah" and charlatan—to 'prove' that Sister Jeanne is possessed, the nuns of Ursuline convent are practicing witchcraft, and Grandier has made a pact with the devil and is the black magician behind all of this sinister behavior.

When carny-like witch-hunter Father Barre arrives in Loudun, he decides to perform an 'exorcism' on Sister Jeanne by giving her a brutal enema with some sort of archaic device that looks like it would be more than a little bit painful, even for a power bottom, in front of everyone in town. Needless to say, Sister

Jeanne had no idea that her malicious lies regarding Grandier would backfire against her in such an absolutely hellish fashion and she even screams, “unhand me you Christ-loving runts” at Barre and his comrades when they go to perform an enema on her, thus making it seem as if she is indeed possessed by Satan. Determined to get all the ‘evidence’ and testimony against Grandier that he needs, Father Barre has all the young Ursuline nuns brought to the woods by a group of soldiers and threatens to brutally kill every single one of them if they do not confess to being devout devil worshipers. Indeed, Barre is such a shameless and maliciously manipulative little liar that he actually tells the nuns how they should act while pretending to be possessed, stating like some sort of third-rate theater director, “The evil spirit of Grandier has taken possession of your souls. Now you resist him, but soon he will have his way! You will scream. You will blaspheme. You will no longer be responsible for your actions. Denounce your devilish master Grandier! And we will save you!” while the sisters grab onto him in a sensual fashion to demonstrate their relief that they will not be executed. The nuns immediately take advantage of the “possessed by the devil” sham by stripping completely naked and carrying out every single hedonistic fantasy they have ever dreamed of, including lesbo orgies, giving handjobs to holy candles, molesting priests and other holy men, and destroying everything in sight in a scenario that culminates in the (in)famous ‘Rape of Christ’ scene where the sinisterly sensual sisters take down a gigantic life-size crucifix from the high altar of the church and savagely molest and destroy it. During the middle of the unholy orgy, King Louis XIII shows up at the church barely disguised as a fellow named Duke Henri de Condé with an entourage of makeup-adorned little boys à la Federico Fellini’s Satyricon (1969) and wallows in the waywardly wanton degeneracy, thus indicating that he could truly care less about Catholicism and has only joined up with the Catholic Church for purely political reasons. To play a prank on Father Barre, King Louis/Duke de Condé pulls out a supposed golden holy relic containing the ostensible blood of Jesus and asks the witch-hunter to use it on the pseudo-possessed nuns in an attempt to free them of demonic possession. Somewhat humorously, when Barre uses the holy relic on the nuns and they immediately claim to be cured, King Louis reveals there was nothing inside the golden case, thus exposing the witch-hunter for the showman carny fraud he is.

When Grandier finally gets back to Loudun after his pilgrimage to see the king and walks in on the chaotic nun orgy going on at this church, he loudly declares, “You have turned the house of the lord into a circus. And its servants into clowns” and adamantly denies engaging in witchcraft, but lovelorn lunatic Sister Jeanne self-righteously contradicts him, so he and his new wife Madeleine are immediately arrested under the bogus charge of “heresy” at the order of Baron de Laubardemont. From there, Grandier is forced to undergo a series of absurdly pointless torture scenarios to prove he is a member of Satan’s legion.

THE DEVILS

After Laubardemont has everything in Grandier's home searched through and destroyed in a Gestapo-esque fashion, the persecuted priest is given a preposterous Soviet style show trial that is presided over by a group KKK-esque dudes in white cloaks. Of course, the only real 'evidence' that they have against Grandier is love letters from his various sexual conquests, thus making it seem like he would indeed defile an entire convent of young nuns. Of course, Grandier is ultimately found guilty and sentenced to be burned at the stake in front of the entire population of Loudun. Before he is executed, Grandier suffers the public shame of having the priestly mop on his head shaved and is tortured with various bone-crushing blows to his legs by Father Barre, who tries in vain to get the priest to admit his guilt. Meanwhile, Sister Jeanne attempts suicide via hanging and even recants her claims regarding Grandier due to her overwhelming guilt, but of course professional bullshitter Barre blames her actions on demonic possession and then proceeds to rape some sense into her. Even when offered the opportunity to go free and become an active player in the increasingly powerful Catholic Church, Grandier refuses to give in and continues to maintain his innocence, which eventually convinces Mignon he is innocent, for no man would pointlessly endure such pain and torture unless they were innocent and actually believed what they were saying. While initially supporting him, the entire populous provides credence to Gustave Le Bon's theory of mass psychology and herd behavior by actively supporting and even eagerly awaiting Grandier's execution by throwing a huge festival, not realizing that his death will also result in the death and complete destruction of Loudun. While the executioner promises to strangle Grandier just before he is burned alive, Mignon nonsensically ties the rope in a knot after becoming consumed with guilt over the priest's innocence. As Grandier burns alive, the bastard baby spawned from his affair with high-class harlot Philippe Trincant is forced to watch the execution while some perverted old rich geezer says to the child, "lucky little bastard, it's not every day that baby sees daddy burn to death." Immediately after Grandier is burned alive, Baron de Laubardemont orders the demolition of Loudun and the entire place is reduced to rubble. After the priest's execution and martyrdom, Baron de Laubardemont visits Sister Jeanne and reveals that Father Mignon has been institutionalized for being 'demented' due to his claims that Grandier was innocent. Before leaving, the Baron hands Sister Jeanne Grandier's charred femur bone as a "souvenir" and she subsequently diddles herself with it. In the final scene, Grandier's young widowed wife Madeline climbs through the rubble of ruined Loudun and leaves the town for good.

In its strangely 'feel-good' and mirthful approach to depicting religious and political corruption, mass hysteria, heresy, religious hatred, sexual perversion, mental illness, the plague, medieval style torture, enemas, and exorcisms, among other things, The Devils ultimately demonstrates Ken Russell's greatest talent as a filmmaker as a man so charming that he could make coprophagia seem like an absolutely delectable experience. Indeed, in its highly addictive compulsively carnivalesque approach to everything from human atrocities to religious martyrdom, Russell's film is like the artsploitation equivalent of a 'popcorn movie,' as a classic work with seemingly infinite replay value that can be enjoyed by even the most prideful of philistines, though the film might offend more anally repressive types as Roger Ebert, who was himself a lapsed Catholic, and seems to have suffered a yeast infection after watching the work and gave it a notoriously scathing review. Notably, considerably cunty kosher film critic Pauline Kael also once wrote regarding Russell, "What Sen. Joe McCarthy did to people's reputations is nothing to what Ken Russell does...he is the chief defiler of celebrities of the past and present," yet I doubt any man or woman could get through The Devils without thinking that Urbain Grandier is the ultimate charismatic pimp, player, and man's man, which cannot be said of many priests, be they fictional or nonfictional. Russell's film is also notable for bringing celluloid life to ancient paintings ranging from Botticelli's The Birth of Venus to the work of Flemish Renaissance painter Pieter Bruegel the Elder, especially his 1562 oil panel painting The Triumph of Death. Of course, the film's production designer, Derek Jarman, should be largely credited for the film's overall look. Unquestionably, the influence of The Devils on Jarman's oeuvre can be seen everywhere from the sadistic queenish Emperor Diocletian (who has more than a couple of things in common with Louis XIII) of his debut feature Sebastiane (1976) to the allegorical religious imagery of his highly autobiographical arthouse work The Garden (1990). Of course, with its emphasis on hairy cunts over flaccid cocks, Russell's film demonstrates a singularly rampantly heterosexual camp sensibility that is second to none. Not surprisingly, Russell's work is not the only film inspired by the Loudun possessions of 1634, as the event also influenced the Polish film Mother Joan of the Angels (1961) aka Matka Joanna od Aniołów aka The Devil and the Nun directed by Jerzy Kawalerowicz and the West German TV opera Die Teufel von Loudun (1969) aka The Devils of Loudun directed by Rolf Liebermann (who also adapted his version from Huxley's novel and Penderecki's play). Although more overtly serious and thus more brutal than The Devils as a work featuring a far from campy portrayal of Sister Jeanne receiving a holy water enema, Liebermann's The Devils of Loudun seems to have too many similarities for Russell to have not seen it and been influenced by the work. Interestingly, William Friedkin also used part of the score from The Devils of Loudun for The Exorcist (1973), which is another work that blurs the line between Catholic celluloid and pure heresy. While it is true that Russell converted to Roman Catholicism in the 1950s, the circumstances of the filmmaker's conversion seem somewhat dubious as reflected in his remark in the audio commentary track for the BFI DVD release of The Devils, "I was brought to the faith by intimate intercourse with a nun in the Poor Clares." Personally, I see the character of Urbain Grandier as a sort of alter-ego for Russell, as a sort of proud sinner who truly believes, albeit in his own highly idiosyncratic sort of way, with The Devils not only being the director's final word on religion, but also authority in general, the aristocracy, politics, and the masses as well as a work that more or less encompasses his entire weltanschauung, thus making it the perfect introductory work for novices of the singularly eccentric English auteur.

THE DEVILS

-Ty E

ALTERED STATES

Ken Russell (1980)

With my recent reexamination of the director's darkly humorously heretical yet strangely spiritual alpha-nunsplotation masterpiece The Devils (1971), I decided it was about time that I re-watch English auteur Ken Russell's most 'Hollywood' effort Altered States (1980), which is notable for being both the filmmaker's first American film, as well his first and only excursion into science fiction. Indeed, a sort of metaphysical and psyche-philosophical horror-sci-fi-cum-romance hybrid that one might describe as Russell's own equivalent to Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) and Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972), the film hardly seems like it could be a typical personal auteur piece for the director upon looking at its troubled production history. Based on the only novel ever written by three-time Academy Award winning screenwriter/playwright Paddy Chayefsky (The Hospital, Network) that was inspired by neuroscientist/psychonaut/philosopher John C. Lilly's sensory deprivation research conducted in isolation tanks while under the influence of counterculture psychoactive favorites like ketamine and LSD, Altered States was originally slated to be directed by kosher counterculture auteur Arthur Penn (Bonnie and Clyde, Little Big Man) and according to director Russell he was Warner Brothers' 27th choice for director after the previous 26 directors had declined, thus making the work what might be described as the most personalized and idiosyncratic for-hire 'hack' piece ever made, as a phantasmagoric Faustian trip that is like a chaotic marriage between a Hollywood sci-fi blockbuster, the then-trendy prehistoric man flicks of the 1980s like Jean-Jacques Annaud's La guerre du feu (1981) aka Quest for Fire, and the more psychedelic-oriented films of the American avant-garde like Jack Smith's Normal Love (1963), Ron Rice's Chumlum (1964), Ira Cohen's The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda (1968), James Broughton's Dreamwood (1971), and Herr Anger's oeuvre. Of course, considering writer Chayefsky, who was apparently barred from the film set after trying to have Russell fired, later had his name taken off of the film and special effects man John Dykstra resigned from his duties, I think it quite obvious who was in control of Altered States, which with its allegorical religious imagery (snakes and all!) and daunting depiction of a deleteriously fanatical madman of the quasis-megalomaniacal sort whose obsessiveness ultimately gets him in serious trouble, is a pure and unadulterated Russellian work to the core, even if it lacks the auteur's characteristic campiness. While critics have described Altered States as everything from a modernist reworking of the Orpheus and Eurydice myth to an aberrant adaptation of The Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde, I think source writer Chayefsky was most accurate when he described the work in an interview as a love story. Indeed, despite its hysterical hodgepodge of largely horrific hallucinatory imagery of the apocalyptic sorts, the film is ultimately the tale of a fanatical scientist with intimacy problems and the woman that is rather reluctantly hopelessly in love with him and will stand by her mensch no matter what, even when he transforms himself into a rather revolting mass of primordial matter and almost kills her, himself, and their friends in the process. A rare special-effects-heavy sci-fi flick that does not seem like it was specially tailored for impotent, virginal, and/or asexual fanboys who prefer seeing imaginary exotic alien planets to real-life pussies, Altered States may bring up quasi-existentialist questions about the origin of mankind, the Book of Revelations, pain and suffering, and the Faustian nature of Occidental man, but these themes are merely more or less window dressings for an idiosyncratic romance featuring the fairer sex at its most strangely empathetic and respectable, which is surely no small accomplishment.

ALTERED STATES

Edward Jessup (William Hurt in his very first feature film role) is a Harvard University professor of abnormal psychology that is so obsessed with his work and research in such a deleterious way that he has no personal life and seems to suffer from Asperger syndrome, but luckily he is a tall, blond, handsome, and charming chap who doesn't seem to have a hard time getting hot tail like most socially retarded academic types do. In between practicing sensory deprivation in a floatation tank with the help of his dorky Jewish pal Arthur Rosenberg (played by real-life Hebraic nerd Bob Balaban) where he hallucinates like a "son of a bitch" and experiences "a lot of religious allegory, mostly out of Revelation," Edward meets a hot and equally Nordic-looking 24-year-old physical anthropology student working on her doctrinal thesis named Emily (Blair Brown) and they screw the same day that they meet each other, though he suffers hallucinations of "God. Jesus, crucifixions" during mid-coitus that make it fairly clear that the two will have a somewhat troubled relationship. As Edward explains to Emily after they fuck for the first time, he started hallucinating images of Christ when he was a young child even though his parents were pretentious atheistic scientists and it was only when his father succumbed to a "protracted and painful death from cancer" when he was 16 that he started to stop hallucinating and believing in Christ. From there, Ed warns Emily "what kind of nut" she is getting mixed up with if she decides to keep dating him and she replies that he is a "fascinating bastard," thus demonstrating her early devotion to him. Since most of the research into alternate states of consciousness is basically "radical-hip stuff, drug-culture apologias," Edward hopes to prove via his floatation tank trips that "our other states of consciousness are as real as our waking states" and he is more than willing to destroy his mind and body in the process. When Edward suffers nefarious visions of his father on his death bed and Baphomet on the cross, as well as images of people suffering in hell and various other apocalyptic visions, even that still does not stop him from continuing his dubious studies. Meanwhile, even though she thinks he is an "unmitigated madman" and complains to him, "Even sex is a mystical experience for you. You carry on like a flagellant, which can be very nice...but I sometimes wonder if it's me that's being made love to. I feel like I'm being harpooned by some raging monk in the act of receiving God," Emily makes a somewhat strange marriage proposal to Edward, which he accepts, but not before rambling on about administering dimethyltryptamine aka DMT to a schizophrenic girl, thus reflecting his pathological preoccupation with his work. Indeed, at best, Emily is of secondary concern to Edward, as nothing gets in between him and his research.

While Edward and Emily ultimately get married in a seemingly immaculate romantic union that produces two cute little girls (one of the Jessup girls is played by Drew Barrymore in her debut film role), the Asperger-ridden scientist cannot handle devoting himself to a family and thus asks his wife for a divorce even though she is still deeply in love with him. When his friend Arthur finds out about the divorce and states to his friend, "My God, if anybody has it made, you have" in reference to the fact that he has a totally beautiful wife that is completely devoted to him despite his glaring peculiarities, Edward, who rarely expresses any emotions aside from a disturbing mania for his scientific research, coldly replies that if he doesn't get a divorce, he will "go out of my fucking mind." As Edward adds while sounding like some drop-out hippie moron who has devoured too much Timothy Leary twaddle, he is determined to search for his "true self" and he is "going to find that fucker," even if it means hanging out in caves and getting stoned with fossilized third world savages. Indeed, Edward plans to "find that fucker" by tripping on psychedelic mushrooms with a tribe of ancient Mexican Indians. Before tripping with the old Injuns, the head Indian chief cuts Edward's palm and mixes his blood with the psychedelic soup. Ultimately, Edward has such a nightmarish trip with the Indians that he hallucinates seeing a large lizard morphing into Emily, among other unsettling visions that might further scare him away from his wife. After the somewhat ominous ordeal, Edward learns that he brutally slaughtered a large lizard while he was tripping, but he is in denial about his actions, complaining to his mestizo translator/tour guide, "And this whole hideous business is just a joke...the Indians have played on me to make the gringo look like a fool!" Despite his intolerable gringo arrogance, the Indians give Edward a tincture from psychedelic mushrooms to take back with him to the United States so that he can trip while in his isolation tank, thereupon heightening the entire experience and potentially throwing him into a truly altered state of consciousness. Around the same time, Edward begins to face major criticism from his comrade Mason Parrish (Charles Haid), who begins secretly telling his estranged wife Emily about his eccentric and increasingly dangerous experiments. When one of Edward's isolation tank trips results in him being covered in blood and growing a sack inside his throat, the half-deranged scientist concludes, "I obviously regressed to some quasi-simian creature," but perennial skeptic Mason does not believe it for a second and concludes that his strange friend is losing his sanity and has contracted cancer due to all the drugs he has taken.

ALTERED STATES

With his friend Mason adamantly refusing to help him with anymore of his experiments, Edward makes the mistake of going on one of his isolation tank trips all by himself without supervision and in the process he suffers from a form of biological devolution where he degenerates into a hairy feral monkey man. Upon morphing into a true untermensch, Edward almost beats a security guard to death, fights a pack of wild dogs, and eventually ends up in a zoo where he savagely hunts and devours a deer. The next day, a cop arrests Edward after finding him naked near the dead deer that he devoured the previous night. Naturally, Edward is bailed out of prison by his beloved wife Emily and instead of being fearful as a result of his experiences, he describes transforming into a simian as being the “most supremely satisfying night of my life,” which is certainly not the sort of thing a normal man says to his wife. Somewhat preposterously, Edward convinces Mason, Arthur, and his wife Emily to accompany him to his next isolation tank trip where he ultimately transforms into a grotesque globule of primordial matter that somewhat resembles Belial from Frank Henenlotter’s Basket Case trilogy. Demonstrating her undying devotion to Edward, Emily risks her life to bring back her husband by pulling him out of a foggy abyss and ultimately preventing him from being lost in some sort of alternate reality as an unconscious and non-physical pile of primordial puke. While Edward rests after almost being lost in oblivion, Emily begins suffering a hysterical episode and complains to Mason, “Of all the goddamn men in this world, why do I have to love this one? I can’t get him out of me. Do you know how many men I tried to fall in love with this past year? But it won’t work no matter who I’m in bed with, I have to imagine it’s him or nothing happens...No matter who I’m eating with or walking with...there’s always this pain because it isn’t him. I’m possessed by him.” The next day, Edward begins to suffer a spontaneous attack of temporary partial devolution and when Emily grabs his hand to help him, she also begins to degenerate into some sort of glowing primordial being of the hardly human sort. Proving ‘love conquers all,’ Edward manages to use mind over matter and saves his wife and himself from transforming into worthless genetic garbage. Upon transforming back into normal humans, Edward says to his beloved for the first time ever, “I love you, Emily,” thus reflecting the fact he has finally accepted his humanity and is determined to devote himself to the one who loves him the most, or as he states before his last transformation, “The final truth of all things is that there is no final truth. Truth is what’s transitory. It’s human life that is real.” Notably, Altered States ultimately concludes in the best way any aesthetically pleasing film can with a shot of a rather ample sized female derriere.

While not exactly an immaculate work by any means, Altered States is easily one of the most strikingly romantic sci-fi flicks I have ever seen, which I guess does not say much considering the autistic nature of the genre and the sort of sexless and socially defective people it attracts, but knowing that it is a Ken Russell flick, one can certainly expect that it is the sort of work that features a singular rebel's love affair with no vomit-inducing clichés. As a fanatical man and filmmaker who was more than a little bit obsessed with his own work and who was married no less than four times during the course of his life, Russell certainly had reason to be attracted to Paddy Chayefsky's source novel. Indeed, I certainly cannot think of one single girlfriend I ever had that was not jealous of my interests or artistic projects, as if it was another woman competing with them. Of course, Altered States protagonist Edward's wife Emily is like the ultimate dream woman, as she even stays devoted to him after he divorces her so that he can spend all his time figuratively jerking off in an isolation tank while tripping on Injun shrooms. Like a Salvador Dalí landscape painting come to life as molested by Russell's curious obsession with Catholic religious iconography, the film attempts to visually depict the living hell of being, especially if you're a deracinated and emotionally retarded intellectual like the protagonist, in a fashion that romanticizes yet ultimately rejects the obsession with retrogression. Indeed, in his obsession with coming into contact with his primitive side, Edward is no different from the many ethno-masochistic bourgeois whites that listen to rap music and absurdly parrot the sub-literate slang and repugnant mannerisms of poor negroes in a pathetic attempt to feel more in tune with nature and the visceral side of life, as if it will make them feel any more soulless. As for self-loathing intellectuals who take psychedelic drugs in a desperate attempt to have some semblance of human emotion and spirituality, I personally know of one fellow who took one too many trips and was ultimately institutionalized after declaring he was some sort of messiah and attempted to murder his girlfriend with his bare hands. Like the protagonist of Altered States, this certain individual had a complete and utter incapacity for love and empathy, but unlike Edward, he was also apparently more or less sexually impotent, which seems to be common among scientifically-minded individuals. While I could never see the sort of protagonist featured in Russell's film ever reaching an epiphany about the gift of his humanity, let alone the ability to reciprocate love, even after he is turned into primordial waste, Altered States was an enthralling enough cinematic experience for me to the point where I was able to temporarily suspend my disbelief and consider that human touch and emotional affection might be able to destroy the Asperger-like traits in certain individuals.

-Ty E

CRIMES OF PASSION
CRIMES OF PASSION

Ken Russell (1984)

There is probably no other filmmaker that my opinion of has changed so drastically in the past decade or so than English auteur Ken Russell (Women in Love, The Devils), whose films I used to regard as mostly obnoxiously bombastic hagiographic celluloid swill and/or asininely aesthetically decadent quasi-pornography. Undoubtedly, out of all of Russell's films that I had originally seen during my first attempt to tackle the auteur's oeuvre, the one I found to be the most innately worthless and just plain unwatchable was Crimes of Passion (1984) aka China Blue, which I could not even bear to finish when I attempted to watch it about a decade ago or so. As a result of my newfound affinity for Russell's films, I naturally decided to give the film a second chance, which I am glad I did as I now regard it as one of the most underrated films of the 1980s and easily one of the director's most innately subversive and seedy cinematic works. Indeed, forget black Brit Steve McQueen's Shame (2011), Russell's film makes the Michael Fassbender vehicle seem like a shallow exercise in sterile decadence in terms of its deceptively sleazy yet ultimately rather intricate and nuanced examination in regard to the perils of sexual addiction (or what might be better described as 'sexual nihilism') and issues relating to fears of intimacy and monogamy. While the film might feature hilariously perverse things like Anthony 'Psycho' Perkins menacingly wielding a deadly silver dildo named 'Superman,' the bloody slaughter of a blowup doll (!) by Perkins, and a corrupt cop being sodomized with his own baton while stiletto heels are simultaneously penetrating his flesh, among numerous other equally darkly erotically eccentric examples of cinematic alchemy where trashy scenarios and imagery are executed in an inordinately elegantly stylized fashion, Crimes of Passion is indubitably, for better or worse, one of the most sophisticated films ever made about the stark contrast between soulless sex and genuine sexual intimacy and how many people that regularly engage in the former lack the emotional capacity for the latter. Indeed, in Russell's wayward celluloid realm of transcendental sleaze, a smart and beautiful fashion designer is more afraid of love and commitment than violently shoving long inanimate objects up men's asses while wildly riding their cocks. Crimes of Passion is also probably the only film ever made where a ghetto reverend manages to find the ultimate form of redemption by being murdered with a dildo while dressed in extra kitschy drag.

Adapted from a screenplay by a fairly unknown homo Hebrew named Barry Sandler, who is arguably best known otherwise for penning the gay love triangle piece Making Love (1982) directed by fellow Israelite Arthur Hiller, Russell's film also features a bizarre love triangle, albeit of a considerably seedier and more sexually depraved sort that does not involve sodomy. Not unlike Sander with his screenplay for Making Love being bastardized for mainstream consumption, Russell had bad experiences with Hollywood studios butchering or otherwise manipulating his two previous American efforts Valentino (1977) and Altered States (1980), so the two made for perfect partners for a cinematic collaboration, or as the auteur better explained himself in Altered States: The Autobiography of Ken Russell (1991), “Recently some of the most popular evangelists on TV were exposed for the scum they are, but at the time I was asked to direct my first truly original American screenplay their mask of sanctity was yet to be torn away. Yes, my agent had at last landed me a job—a real job, not a development deal but a definite offer to make CRIMES OF PASSION. It was a package deal. The writer, Barry Sandler, was handled by the same agency. Barry was something of a maverick, though not as far out of the Hollywood mainstream as myself. He was, however, equally disillusioned. Having written an adult screenplay for Fox about a married couple who turn into a ménage à trios when the husband comes out of the closet with his boyfriend, Barry had the painful experience of seeing his creation castrated for being too ballsy. He hoped for better things from New World, who didn’t have such a high moral profile to uphold. So did I. They were known for their cheap exploitation movies and, because no one else seemed to want us, they got us cheap too—with Kathleen Turner into the bargain [...] The screenplay dealt with identities, split personalities and the masks those in the rat race for the American Dream feel compelled to wear if they’re out to win. Sometimes the mask becomes more real than the face underneath, especially if it’s a public face. And then we’re in trouble.”

Arguably what might be best described as the most cultivated, nuanced, and sophisticated exploitation film ever made, Russell’s devilishly dark and satirical anti-romcom neo-noir is indubitably a cinematic work of Elephantiasis level testicular fortitude where two very different people—a young and naive yet kind-hearted family man and a socially alienated workaholic fashion designer that moonlights as a pimp-free ghetto hooker—that hide behind masks learn to be themselves and embrace reality after unexpectedly falling in love with one another. Also featuring a morally depraved ghetto reverend portrayed by Anthony Perkins who completes the bizarre love triangle that attempts to ‘save’ the hooker from her lonely life of self-destructive lechery due to his belief that they are same due to their pathological longing for self-destructive sexual debasement, Crimes of Passion is like Andy Milligan’s Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1973) meets Andy Warhol’s Chelsea Girls (1966) meets Werner Schroeter’s Malina (1991) with shades of Alfred Hitchcock’s Psycho (1960). In short, there is nothing quite like Russell’s darkly romantic romp of Reagan era raunchiness, yet, despite its glaring degeneracy, the film ultimately contains a surprisingly positive and important message about emotional alienation in the age of porn, big hair, and rampant materialism.

In a morally inverted and exceedingly emasculated (post)feminist world where many young woman waste their most fertile years working as virtual corporate prostitutes doing abstract paper-shuffling in offices and ultimately end up unhappy unmarried old maids and where young white men have become disillusioned with starting a family and even sometimes give up on women altogether as reflected in dubious online communities like MGTOW, Crimes of Passion is arguably more important now than when it was first released in terms of diagnosing what is wrong with modern couples and society in general. Of course, as a fetish-fueled man that was married no less than four times during his rather eventful life, director Russell certainly had some special insights in regard to the problem between the sexes and the importance of sex in a healthy relationship. As the film demonstrates, genuine organic intimacy is an imperative ingredient in terms of maintaining a healthy relationship, especially as far as the male partner is concerned (as the film hints, women are better suited to live sexually unsatisfying lives, especially if it is to their material benefit). Likewise, as the hooker portrayed by Kathleen Turner demonstrates, sexually promiscuity is innately soulless and typical of a damaged and most likely morally bankrupt individual that is either afraid of and/or lacks the capacity for true sexual intimacy, hence the tendency of so-called 'sex workers' (e.g. prostitutes, strippers, porn stars, etc.) to be the unfortunate products of child molestation and/or a single mother. While the male protagonist of the film portrayed by John Laughlin lies to himself about the fact that his marriage is a sham and that his fiercely frigid wife is sexually repulsed by him, the female protagonist has created an entire phony prostitute persona that allows herself to feel strong and in control when, in reality, she is a terribly lonely emotional cripple that is afraid of devotion, intimacy, and love, hence her need to live a double life as the city's most brazenly sensually eccentric pussy-peddler. Luckily, in Russell's film, opposites attract and the young married businessman and bourgeois prostitute are able to shed their masks and embrace reality after falling in love with one another. Of course, the film would not be complete without Mr. Perkins' performance as psychotic pervert reverend that partly acts as the chic hooker's unlikely savior. A piece of meticulously stylized high-camp trash-with-class with the sort of strange hermetic melodrama that you would expect from a classic 1960s George Kuchar flick like Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966) or Eclipse Of The Sun Virgin (1967), including lavishly stylized silhouette sex scenes, Crimes of Passion is a rare cinematic work that manages to communicate an important message without succumbing to cheap sentimentality or heavy-handed art fag pretentiousness. In fact, as a result of using exaggerated fetishistic imagery and kinky quasi-pornographic scenarios, Russell ultimately tricks the viewer into devouring what is, thematically speaking, a relatively wholesome film that says more about love than any Woody Allen or Wes Anderson film could.

CRIMES OF PASSION

The film begins awkwardly yet hilariously enough with all-American male protagonist Bobby Grady (John Laughlin)—an unhappily marriage middleclass electronics store owner with two kids—sitting in on a sex group therapy session while he listens to men and women expression their hatred for the opposite sex (for instance, one fine chap makes a joke about vaginas smelling like fish). While Bobby claims that he is only there to support his homey Donny Hopper (Bruce Davison), he loses his cool when an unseen misandriſtic bitch singles him out for verbal venom and absurdly accuses him of being a “lousy lay” despite knowing literally nothing about him. As a poor horny fellow that juſt wants a little bit of sex yet is married to a fiercely frigid bitch that will not even give him a meager peck on the lips, Bobby takes offense to the woman’s completely fabricated accusation and retorts in an impassioned fashion that reveals he has serious marriage problems, “I’m not the one who complains how tired I am every night. Getting her to make love . . . It’s like asking her to run the Boſton Marathon. And then those times when we actually do go through with it, I don’t know whether to embrace her or embalm her. So don’t tell me that I’m a lousy lay.” Needless to say, Bobby then proceeds to walkout of the group therapy session, but that does not ſtop him from obsessing over the fact that his wife refuses to fuck him. Despite the fact that he is a handsome man with an athletic build and a great provider for his family, Bobby’s preternaturally prudish wife Amy (Annie Potts)—an oftentimes cuntſy ſtay-at-home-mom that seems more offended by the mere idea of sex than the average Catholic prieſt—refuses to have sexual contact of any kind with her fairly loving hubby. Needless to say, when Bobby comes into contact with a ſophiſticated fashion designer named Joanna Crane (Kathleen Turner) that moonlights as fetish oriented ſtreetwalker with the pseudonym ‘China Blue,’ he cannot help but cheat on his wife and reconsider his marriage altogether. When the viewer firſt ſees China Blue, she is doing a ſort of bad performance art routine where she pretends to give an acceptance ſpeech for “Miss Liberty 1984” while ſome random sleaze-bag chows down on her meat-curtain. As an emotionally damaged divorcee and workaholic that is absolutely afraid of intimacy and commitment, Joanna uses her ‘China Blue’ routine to give herſelf a false ſense of control and sexual power, but it is obvious that she is morbidly lonely and ſecretly longs for ſomething more than juſt cheap carnal thrills. Needless to say, Bobby eventually shatters Joanna’s delusions of sexual grandeur when he pays for her ſervices and she cums with extra creamy glee. After all, as a certain character ſtated in David Mamet’s Homicide in regard to the wiſe worlds of an old whore, “When you ſtart cumin’ with the customers, it’s time to quit.” While virtually all of her customers act like white knights after fucking her by acting as if they want to ſave her, only Bobby is actually ſerious about it, though the female protagonist does have unexpected help from an uniquely unholy holy man.

Before she ever meets Bobby boy, Joanna is haraſſed by a quasi-psychotic ſtreet preacher named Reverend Peter Shayne (Anthony Perkins in arguably the moſt overlooked role of his career), who regularly inhales poppers (aka alkyl nitrites) in peepshows while guys maſturbate beſide him in a ſort of pay-to-play communal circle-jerk and who regularly carries around a black leather doctor bag containing an eclectic collection aberrosexual sex toys (notably, Perkins designed and/or obtained these toys himself). Upon first encountering Joanna while she is roaming the streets as 'China Blue,' the Reverend immediately decides that he and she are the "same" person and that he will be her "holy messenger" and save her from a miserable and lonely life of sin and self-destructive sexual degradation. Indeed, as the Reverend eventually tells Joanna, "All you need to know about me is that I intend to save you. And all you need to do is . . . be there. Stay with me, China Blue. Trust me. I'll free you." While he is indubitably a lecherous lunatic of the psychosexually murderous sort that seems like he would rape a rotting corpse if he inhaled enough poppers, the good Reverend genuinely wants to save Joanna from herself and he is willing to sacrifice himself to achieve that goal, even if he does not waste an opportunity to verbally degrade and berate her in the process. As a hyper hypercritical religious man that seems to see his own life as a lost cause, the Reverend believes that saving Joanna will be his final act of redemption lest he be regulated to hell like all the other sinners in the 1980s neo-Sodom where he dwells.

CRIMES OF PASSION

Aside from owning a modest electronics store where he is beloved by his handful employees, Bobby also moonlights doing semi-sleazy surveillance work and it is as a result of being hired to spy on Joanna that he learns about her and her secret double-life as a flamboyantly dressed gutter grade whore. Indeed, Bobby is hired by Joanna's stingy Jewish boss Lou Bateman (Norman Burton) to spy on her for somewhat dubious reasons. In fact, Bateman has no problem telling Bobby, "I want you to nail her lily white ass" because he believes Joanna is secretly selling unreleased patterns and designs from his clothing company to rival brands, even though he has no real evidence to support his claim aside from his general disinterest of her due to her strong work ethic, seeming disgust of penis, and seemingly nonexistent personal life. Of course, Bobby literally nails Joanna's ass, but not in the way that Mr. Bateman hoped. When Bobby first sees Joanna while she is working at her day job, he states to Mr. Bateman, "How could someone that looks like that be a criminal?," but he ultimately learns later that night that she is the kinkiest little hard-working white whore in town. At first, Bobby merely spies on Joanna and films some of her nocturnal excursions, but after having a vicious fight with his wife Alice he eventually gets the gall to follow both his heart and hard-on and procure her sensual services. When Bobby first goes to see Joanna, he reveals his inordinate sensitivity by warning her "Go slow. I'm just a Boy Scout" and then attempts to ask her who she really is, but she merely replies "It's not a prom date, sweetie. I'm a hooker, you're a trick. Why ruin a perfect relationship?" and hands him a Quaalude so that he can "fly" while fucking. To her most pleasant yet perplexing surprise, Joanna really gets into being sensitively banged by Bobby in a variety of positions and cannot believe that she is sharing a seemingly immaculate sex session that involves real visceral feelings and deep intimacy. As demonstrated by the fact that she passionately sucks his toes and massages his entire body with the utmost sensitivity during foreplay, Joanna seems to have a special affection for Bobby before he even demonstrates that he has a talent for pleasuring her pussy with his pulsating prick. In what is undoubtedly one of the most unforgettable and aesthetically pleasing sex scenes in cinema history, Russell highlights the orgasmic majesty of Bobby and Joanna's first sexual encounter via kaleidoscopic silhouettes.

As a woman that has a serious problem with intimacy, Joanna almost immediately starts a fight with Bobby after they have otherworldly sex as a sort of defense mechanism, so he passionately states to her, "Why are we acting like this? I thought fucking was supposed to bring people closer together, not drive them apart." When Bobby emotionally states, "What we did today . . . You felt it too, didn't you? You weren't just acting. You felt what I did. Tell me, please. I have to know," Joanna cannot deny it, so she changes the subject by asking him if he wants to see her again, but he somberly replies, "Yes . . . but I can't" and then leaves. Needless to say, when the Reverend shows up right after Bobby leaves and immediately begins berating her, Joanna is more than a little bit pissed and wastes no time in berating the bat-shit crazy holy man, though she is not as tough as usual and is more vulnerable to his venomous attacks. Indeed, as a result of being made to feel vulnerable by Bobby, Joanna almost completely breaks down when the Reverend declares that he has written her a poem and then recites with a sort of sadistically smug hateful glee that you would expect from a half-psychotic white bourgeois social justice warrior, "Behold this wicked woman. She falls, she mends, she crawls, she bends. She sucks it, fucks it, picks it up and licks it. You can whip her, beat her, maul her, mistreat her. Anything you want as long as you don't touch her. Show her affection, she turns to stone." Additionally, Joanna can hardly argue with the Reverend when he screams in her face, "Do you know what you are? DO YOU KNOW WHAT YOU ARE? A cheap painted slut who makes a fortune selling illusions yet still ends up broke." As a highly secretive and all but completely emotionally impenetrable S&M oriented hooker with a phony persona that is in stark contrast to her real personality, Joanna naturally never expected that her less than legal profession would lead to her being consumed in the most absurd of bizarre love triangles, but luckily for her both men will ultimately inspire her to reassess her life and inevitably embrace true love over soulless fleeting lust.

In between his regular ghetto soapbox sermons where he proselytizes with venom with hilariously bastardized pieces of scripture like, "Their blood have they shed like water round Jerusalem. Like, like, like . . . They fuck and they piss and they shit like the fucking scum they are," the renegade Reverend regularly spies on Johanna via a fancy makeshift peephole. Indeed, the Reverend is so obsessed with Joanna that he rents out a motel room right next to her China White blue pad that he fills with bizarre pornographic collages that seem like the were inspired by the artistic works of English outsider artist and filmmaker Jeff Keen (Mad Love, The Dreams and Past Crimes of the Archduke). A psychosexually schizophrenic sermonizing sicko that is hopelessly torn between his degenerate sexual fetish(es) and religious faith, the Reverend becomes increasingly mentally unstable after meeting Joanna and it soon becomes obvious that he will soon explode in full-blown insanity and commit a most horrific act of the strangely spiritually transcendental sort. Meanwhile, Bobby becomes increasingly annoyed with his snooty sexless wife Amy, especially after she gets a considerably bitchy attitude at a cookout party where the male protagonist does a totally tasteless yet nonetheless humorous “human penis” routine where he acts like an ejaculating cock by spitting tons of milk out of his mouth. In fact, that night, Bobby gets so angry at Amy’s insufferable passive-aggressive bullshit that he yells at her until she finally opens up and meekly confesses that she never enjoyed sex with him and would even fake orgasms to make him happy. At this point, Bobby becomes even angrier and yells in an impassioned fashion to his wife, “What do you think I am. Some kind of machine? That I just need a hole to cum in? I mean, what do you think makes me cum? [...] I’ll tell you. I thought it was being inside the woman that I love. And giving her as much pleasure as she was giving to me. You know, the two of us, together.” Of course, Joanna makes Bobby cum in exactly that perfect way that he describes to his wife, so naturally he cannot help but proceed to pursue her in real-life as an actual and person instead of mere cheap whore and fantasy, especially after finally accepting the fact that his marriage with Amy is a lost cause.

CRIMES OF PASSION

Needless to say, when Bobby randomly shows up to her apartment and reveals that he knows her true identity, Joanna is more than a tad bit taken aback and acts if she is going to suffer a major panic attack. Luckily, Bobby has a way with words and somewhat lightens her up by stating, “You remind me of this hamster I had when I was a kid. He ran away whenever you tried to touch him. So I wanted to show him there’s nothing to be afraid of. So one day, I just picked him up real fast and I held him [...] he shit in my hand.” When Bobby soon leaves in just as an awkward manner as he first arrived, it obvious by the express on Joanna’s face that she is glad he came and wishes that he stayed longer. Not surprisingly, when Joanna later engages in sex with a young cop and penetrates him in the ass with his nightstick and his skin with her stilettos, she seems to realize the soullessness of such a fleeting fetishistic encounter, especially after the perverted policeman hatefully spits in her face when she tells him a goofy joke regarding ivory soap being “99 and 44/100% pure” that Bobby once told to her. Likewise, when she attempts to engage in a threesome in a limousine with an uptight middle-aged yuppie couple that complains about their daughter’s Jewish boyfriend not being able to go to their country club, she becomes so agitated that she swiftly aborts the mobile ménage a trio before it even gets past the foreplay stage. Ultimately, it is not until an old woman picks her up off the streets to have sex with her terminally ill husband Ben (Gerald S. O'Loughlin) that Joanna truly realizes the morally bankruptcy and soullessness of her carnal trade and decides to give up her sensually counterfeit China Blue persona for good. Indeed, when Ben demonstrates his love for his wife by stating things like, "I didn't want her to do this. I haven't been with another woman in 28 years. But she insisted" and ultimately refusing to have sex with her because he cannot bear to be unfaithful to his beloved, Joanna is so deeply moved by the dying old fart's untainted love and devotion toward his spouse that she takes off her silly platinum blonde wig and tells the old man that her real name is "Joanna," thereupon symbolically shedding her prostitute persona.

After deciding to leave his wife, Bobby heads over to Joanna's apartment and tells her, "The first time Amy and I made love, she asked me if I still respected her. Hell, I thought that's the reason we did it. Well, it's all over," but she is clearly still scared of intimacy and commitment and replies, "It's so hard, Bobby. No man's ever given me that kind of faith before, that kind of respect. But that hotel is the safest place in the world. I can do anything there, I can be anything I can dream of because it's not me. Don't you see? I'd only end up disappointing you." After Bobby swears to Joanna that he is totally "tough" and can handle anything, especially after being in a sexless marriage for over a decade, the two more or less decide to become an official monogamous couple. Unfortunately, Bobby's wife Amy, who is the virtual stereotype of a pathetically helpless woman, is not used to not having a man around to do everything for her and thus makes a desperate and highly insincere attempt to get her hubby back. When Amy finally comes to the bitter realization that Bobby is seeing another woman, she naturally becomes extremely jealous and bitchily asks him if his lover has "the morals of a bitch in heat," but he makes her seem like an infantile puritanical idiot by smoothly retorting, "It may come as a shock to you but sex is one hell of a way to show what you feel." While Amy tries in vain to demonstrate that she still loves him by making him dinner and giving him a nostalgic symbolic present in the quite literally priceless form of his old high school varsity football jersey (apparently, said jersey used to turn-on Amy when they were high school sweethearts), she cannot deny her sexual apathy for Bobby and eventually literally runs away like a scared little girl. Of course, that is the last straw for Bobby, who decides to completely dedicate himself to Joanna. Unfortunately, the Reverend has big plans for Joanna that involve killer cross-dressing and quite deadly phallic weapons.

Before Bobby can go and officially declare his complete and utter devotion to Joanna, the Reverend arrives at her apartment to perform "last rites" and to "save her for once and for all." Of course, considering the fact that he soon hands her a deadly silver dildo named 'Superman' and demands, "Kill me Joanna. Give my life value. Give me something to die for! Same me! You are me. One of us has to die so that the other can live," the Reverend seems to be merely projecting his own desires when it comes to exorcising (or possibly exercising) his demons. Hoping to experience death-by-dildo, the Reverend then gets on his knees and attempts to egg Joanna into killing him by shouting, "Kill my you worthless cunt. I'm all the men who have ever hurt you, who made you feel like shit. Who stole your self-respect and turned you into China Blue. Kill me! Release the rage. Get it out. Get even." While Joanna seems like she might kill the Reverend, she takes too long, so the Reverend eventually gets up and coldly demands, "Strip, bitch." When Bobby finally gets back to the apartment, he is disconcerted to discover that the door his locked and Joanna is screaming like a banshee, so he breaks said door down and discovers what looks like a brutal murder scene sans blood. When Bobby sees who he assumes is Joanna cowering on the ground in her iconic China Blue outfit, he gets quite the surprise when his little lady leaps out of nowhere from behind him in holy drag and plunges the dildo into the Reverend's back during a moment of bittersweet transsexual sacrifice. In a successful attempt to bait Joanna into killing him, the Reverend acted as if he was going to stab Bobby with a pair of scissors. Before succumbing to his wounds, the Reverend reveals that his holy work is done and that he is quite satisfied with the results by lovingly stating to the female protagonist, "Goodbye, China Blue." In the end in a sassy conclusion that, at the very least, rivals the final words of Kubrick's swansong Eyes Wide Shut, the film comes full circle with a moving monologue from Bobby at the sex group therapy session where he states, "I'm here tonight . . . because I wanted to finally start telling the truth. My wife and I, we've split up for good. That's right. Me, the boy scout. I just never had the guts to admit the truth, that Amy and I had just stopped loving each other. There's nobody to blame. That's just what happened. Then . . . I met this woman, Joanna. She saved my life. We're together now. I'm not sure if it's gonna work out. We don't have a whole hell of a lot in common other than the fact that . . . we both need help and each other. The thing, you see, that scared me the most during my marriage was just admitting that I was scared, and letting Amy down. Well, I can't pretend anymore. I was scares shitless to come back here. I told Joanna. And she took me in her arms and she said, 'It's OK to be scared.' I felt . . . stronger. And freer. And more like a man than I've ever felt before in my life. Then we fucked our brains out."

CRIMES OF PASSION

Despite being a cinematic work that, aesthetically speaking, shamelessly epitomizes the 1980s, it is still hard to fathom that Crimes of Passion was released during the Reagan years when Tinseltown had regressed to such a pathetic level that they were virtually mimicking the worst of the Hollywood Golden Age in terms of morality and lack of innovation of any sort. Indeed, Russell's film is indubitably the antidote to phony 1980s bourgeois melodramas like Robert Redford's patently pathetic philosemitic joke Ordinary People (1980), as well as extra lame proto-neocon propaganda like Tony Scott's Top Gun (1986) and John Milius' Red Dawn (1984). In terms of sheer debauchery and both sexual and aesthetic idiosyncrasy, there really aren't that many 1980s films that Russell's flick can really be compared to aside from the random celluloid oddity like Nicholas Roeg's Bad Timing (1980), Insignificance (1985), and Track 29 (1988) and David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986). Of course, next to Russell's film, Roeg's somewhat uneven chamber piece Insignificance seems like a piece of pedantry as created by someone that is more interested in talking about sex than actually engaging in it (of course, the idea of Marilyn Monroe flirting with Albert Einstein is just plain repugnant and surely a hopelessly cucked white liberal's degree, but I digress).

Notably, when a gay friend-cum-fan once accused Russell of being a "latent homosexual," the auteur humorously replied, "Fine, maybe I am, who knows. I don't think anyone knows themselves. We can all pretend, but I have an idea what I am. I'm me!" so it is interesting that Crimes of Passion manages to be one of the oh-so-rare cinematic works that can unequivocally be described as rampantly heterosexual high-camp in the best sort of way. Of course, one cannot deny the film's crypto-queer influence in the form of screenwriter Barry Sandler and star Anthony Perkins, who both acted as sort of secondary auteurs to the film. Indeed, aside from portraying an unforgettable unhinged character that is like a rock-bottom version of his titular character from Psycho, Perkins designed his own insanely idiosyncratic set pieces, got high in real-life inhaling poppers like the stereotypical degenerate promiscuous faggot, and even became a 'real' Reverend after sending $10 and an application to the so-called Universal Life Church (in fact, when Russell got married to his second wife Vivian Jolly, Perkins was responsible for blessing the union). Needless to say, it is a sad irony that Perkins ultimately died of an illness that was caused by the same reckless sexual debauchery that plagued both his character and the film's female protagonist, but then again knowing this fact only makes for an all the more potently perverse cinematic experience. Undoubtedly, there is no doubt to the viewer while watching the flick that Perkins is having so much fun playing, as if it is his dream role. As revealed in the fairly mundane Sandler penned movie Making Love (1982), monogamy is not really a gay virtue, thus making it all the more seemingly inexplicable that Crimes of Passion—a rather pro-monogamy/pro-intimacy film that makes a clear distinction between true sexual intimacy and soulless fucking—was written by a gay man (somewhat strangely, Sandler's most recent effort was writing the negro horror-comedy Knock 'em Dead (2014) directed by David DeCoteau).

Thankfully, Sandler revealed his inspiration for the screenplay in an interview with Queerty, stating, "I started writing it at the tail end of the '70s and we were living in an age of rampant sex, particularly in the gay community. This was before AIDS so everybody was fucking around and having sex everywhere you looked. You'd stop at a red light to cruise the guy next to you and you'd end up back at his place. Yet I was thinking there was a story there about how people use sex to avoid intimacy and replace having to work at a relationship. It was so out there and so accessible. I thought that if I could take that theme and concept and weave it into a story — not a gay story, because I'd just done MAKING LOVE. I wanted to do something that would speak to gay people but would speak beyond that as well. I used whatever utensils I had as a writer to come up with the story, as twisted as it may be. It wasn't based on any one person. It sort of evolved in a strange way. It was initially a two-character piece with China Blue and the reverend, who was originally a shrink. It's probably the script of mine that took the longest to evolve. A lot of that had to do with studios who were afraid to touch it. Beyond that I just kept going back to it and add certain layers."

CRIMES OF PASSION

Rather sadly but not surprisingly, Crimes of Passion is, in many ways, more relevant today than when it was first released over three decades ago. Indeed, in an era where many young women have taken countless cocks and thus will probably never have a successful marriage (despite what the feminists say, there is indeed a direct correlation between how many sexual partners a woman has had and her chances of having a successful marriage) and young men are no longer interested in marriage due to the lack of real incentives (after all, you no longer need to marry a girl to fuck her nowadays) and fears regarding divorce court, Russell's film seems like a rare unlikely voice of sanity in a slimy sea of celluloid swill, but of course its message will probably be lost on most viewers who are probably more interested in obsessing over Über-bitch diva Kathleen Turner sporting a super trashy platinum blonde wig while riding a cop's cock and Anthony Perkins wielding a bloody dildo of death. Of course, the genius of the film is that it manages to use shock humor and sexual debauchery to disseminate a relatively wholesome message about the virtues of monogamy and the perils developing of a phony persona in a manner that can be understood and appreciated by even the most sexually intemperate of degenerates and perverts. After all, it is not often that one encounters a morally sound satirical neo-noir featuring artwork by Art Nouveau illustrator Aubrey Beardsley and Pre-Raphaelite painter Sir John Everett Millais (I must confess that "Ophelia" is a personal favorite of mine), a narcotizing synthesizer-heavy score by Rick Wakeman that is based entirely on Antonín Dvořák's New World Symphony (1893), and Anthony Perkins more or less parodying his legendary killer tranny character Norman Bates. In his relatively popular film reference book The New Biographical Dictionary of Film (2004), David Thomson complains, "The overall need to sensationalize artists and to reduce them to comic-book Freud and TV commercial glamour is justified by Russell as a means to making them more popular." Of course, Thomson makes a valid criticism, which is especially apparent upon watching Altered States and Crimes of Passion since neither of these films, quite unlike much of Russell's earlier films, are plagued by these flaws. Indeed, I would even go so far as to argue that, aside from possibly his magnum opus The Devils (1971), Crimes of Passion is Russell's most immaculately assembled film. I certainly cannot think of another film where the whole 'hooker with a heart of gold' motif is actually used in genuinely intriguing fashion and is not used as a pathetic attempt at cheap humanist sentimentalism or Marxist agitprop. As a successful and sophisticated fashion designer that treasures art and is more geared toward love and sexual compatibility than succumbing to the cold female instinct of hypergamy, Kathleen Turner's character is, quite ironically, the virtual ideal woman, which would explain her sense of isolation; while the male protagonist's sexless wife is the total opposite as a seemingly soulless woman that married solely for material reasons in a film that, somewhat inadvertently, clearly demonstrates why many modern men avoid marriage lest they become cuckolds of divorce court. As to how a beautiful and cultivated woman could turn into a prostitute, Georges Bataille offered a good idea when he wrote, "Not every woman is a potential prostitute, but prostitution is the logical consequence of the feminine attitude. In so far as she is attractive, a woman is a prey to men's desire. Unless she refuses completely because she is determined to remain chaste, the question is at what price and under what circumstances will she yield. But if the conditions are fulfilled she always offers herself as an object. Prostitution proper only brings in a commercial element. By the care she lavishes on her toilet, by the concern she has for her beauty set off by her adornment, a woman regards herself as an object always trying to attract men's attention. Similarly if she strips naked she reveals the object of a man's desire, an individual and particular object to be prized."

-Ty E

GARY'S TOUCH
GARY'S TOUCH

Ken Takahashi (2006)

Who's to say my mind isn't twisted? Gary's a relating character...relatively speaking. I used to have questions towards insemination and female restrooms and I don't blame adolescence for such a bizarre inquest. Gary's Touch is a rather...quirky examination of a disturbed psyche. Where to say the film goes, no one really knows. But what is known is that Tom McSorley's quote reading "some of the most awkward and decidedly twisted sex in all of Canadian cinema." is entirely accurate. Gary's Touch not only touched me in naughty places, but also disgusted me. The obsession of procreating himself is lent effectiveness by Gary's brutish primitive facial features. The most noticeable of all is his protruding caveman lower facial area. I'm not too keen on medical terminologies but needless to say and easy to point out is that his "snout" is sickening. Add Madonna to the mix, an Asian (?) retarded old street lady, and what you got is glorious sexual gold although tipping the scale on absurdities, disgusting uses of ejaculation, and down right uncomfortable scenes of subterranean sex. After the short film is over, you will be tainted with the cinema equivalent with filth. I can't recall a short film other than Douglas Buck's Trilogy of America that made me feel the immediate need to bathe, hoping that the scalding water would wash the sin from my eyes. Gary's Touch is also the first film in a long while that almost made me regurgitate whatever delicacies I had dined upon earlier, I cannot recall. Upon the indulging on defrosted lump semen, Gary's cock finally reaches erection status so he may fuck her but no, he presses on to fulfill his wildest urges with his own discharge. Gary's Touch isn't powerful by any means, just crude and vulgar. It speaks a language that of which fetishists speak of. Who's to judge a fetish anyways? I've encountered the weird of the weird such as people who get off by zipper trouble and tickling. Procreation is definitely not as obscure as others I've seen but none of which have been presented in such an artful manner as this. This film makes Canadian culture seem a tad more standstill on terms with other cultures. After I saw this film, I felt disgusted, violated, and changed. Gary's Touch is certainly not for the light-hearted and upon further studies, I can't really judge who this film would be for. An overall twisted experience, this film comes highly recommended regardless. Gary's Touch gets the SS stamp of approval.

-mAQ

NIGHT OF THE OCCULTIST

Kenneth Andrews (1973)

Although very few of his fans seem to realize this, avant-garde cine-magician and devout Thelemite Kenneth Anger's (Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome, Kustom Kar Kommandos) imperative influence on early 'porn chic' era gay hardcore flicks is unquestionable. Indeed, starting with his first major work Fireworks (1947), which resulted in the director being arrested on obscenity charges in a case that went all the way to the Supreme Court of California, to the homoerotic sadomasochism of Scorpio Rising (1953), which also went to the California Supreme Court and was protested by Yankee Führer George Lincoln Rockwell's American Nazi Party for purportedly disgracing the National Socialist party swastika flag, Anger's oneiric and oftentimes orgasmic oeuvre more or less acted as both the aesthetic and thematic prototype for some of the best fag fuck flicks ever made. As belated exploitation cinema expert and historian Bill Landis wrote in his Anger angerring work Anger: The Unauthorized Biography of Kenneth Anger (1995)—a rather incriminating and wholly worthwhile book that offended the American underground auteur so much that he put a curse on the author (interestingly, Landis died unexpectedly from a heart attack in 2008 at the premature age of 49, so maybe the curse actually worked)—regarding the cinematic trend that was pioneered by the celluloid semen demon: "In a less academic realm, the homosexual pornographic cinema Anger had given birth to was flourishing. Many filmmakers were now using the segmented format Anger had established with SCORPIO RISING—Wakefield Poole in BOYS IN THE SAND and Toby Ross in REFLECTIONS OF YOUTH and BOYS OF THE SLUMS. The most unusual and publicly visible of these directors was Fred Halsted, a heavy user of Tuinals and acid who had been around the L.A. leather scene since 1960." More recently, Anger experimented with full-blown pornography for his decidedly disappointing digital video effort I'll Be Watching You (2007), which the director described in an interview with the UK magazine Electric Sheep as a, "tribute to my late friend Michael Powell and his 1960 film PEEPING TOM." Of course, it should be no surprise that someone would actually direct a not-so-inconspicuous gay hardcore homage to Anger and his films. Indeed, Night of the Occultist (1973) directed and produced by pseudonymous auteur 'Kenneth Andrews' (indeed, the mysterious auteur could not have used a more blatant tributary pen name) is more or less a Kenneth Anger fanboy fuck flick that is so bad at parroting the seemingly half-crazed Crowleyite cine-magician that it almost seems like a perverse parody piece gone terribly wrong, albeit in a strangely charming way that is nothing short of unforgettable.

Initially, Night of the Occultist starts rather stereotypically for a gay porn flick with an ostensibly heterosexual man reminiscing over a fight he had with his wife over the dubious future of their deteriorating marriage while rolling around his bed restlessly with his balls hanging out of his tighty whities in a rather unflattering fashion. Indeed, proto-preppie protagonist Chuck Paxton (played by Qwave Dalton aka Quave Dahon, who later appeared in Roger Earl's brutal classic 1975 S&M flick Born to Raise Hell) remembers how while being "inside" his wife Mary, he was thinking about any and everyone but her. After four years of marriage, the tall blond Nordic-like protagonist moved out the home that he lived in with his wife and now lives on his own and is constantly haunted by the ghosts of his less than sexually satisfying past as an unhappily married man with a sexually starved spouse. A sort of pseudo-playboy that lives in his own lurid one-man fantasy world of banal bourgeois luxury, Chuck spends his days working a terribly prosaic job at a bank, but when he comes home at night he becomes the master of his own domain. Indeed, after putting on an obscenely ostentatious silk robe that screams "gay," Chuck reads a newspaper, listens to some generic champagne music, and masturbates on his sofa as if narcissistically wallowing in his own self-loving glory. Of course, Chuck's domestic lifestyle will change drastically after looking through a newspaper with the glaring headline "SEX SOLUTIONS THIS WEEK" and reading an ad for an "Egyptian sexologist" who he thinks may be able to help him regarding his lack of sensual interest in his wife. Not seeing the warning signs that sexologist might be a Svengali-like individual with ulterior motives (for starters, "666" is part of his phone number), Chuck the limp fuck calls the eroticism specialist and soon makes his way to crypto-magician's scantily furnished office.

NIGHT OF THE OCCULTIST

Not surprisingly considering the doctor's dubious profession, Chuck is immediately repelled upon meeting the so-called 'Sexologist' aka 'Occultist' (Gareth Burton), whose flamingly flamboyant button-up shirt, goofy LaVey-esque facial hair, propensity to talk pseudo-sophisticated esoteric mumbo jumbo, and preposterously pretentious persona reeks of carny-like charlatanism. Of course, it is also a little odd that the Sexologist claims to be descended from ancient Egyptian royalty despite the fact that he looks like a little Irishman. Chuck manages to take the Sexologist slightly more serious when he mentions that he is a "descendent of the royal priest of ancient Egypt" and a "graduate of the University of Cairo" and explains that he wear the flamboyant "getup" to appeal to the "average man." Before Chuck knows it, the Sexologist absurdly attempts to coerce him into dabbling in homosexuality as a patently preposterous potential cure for his spouse-based impotency. Indeed, after Chuck confesses that he no longer can have sex with his wife Mary after four years of an initially sexually satisfactory marriage, the Occultist posing as a sexologist begins channeling Crowley and describes an ancient ritual in his country called the "Sacrifice to Osiris" where, "an adolescent boy is sodomized by four priests in the shadow of the great pyramid." From there, the film cuts to an expressionistic scene of the "Sacrifice to Osiris" ritual, though the "adolescent boy" is really a 30-something-year-old man with a goofy goatee and the so-called priests look like a bunch of rejects from sort of third rate Mexican amateur wrestling organization as they sport silly cardboard costumes that seem like they were made by a couple autistic teenagers who read one-too-many Harry Potter books. Before breaking out into a fierce fog-fueled fivesome of the four-on-one sort, the ersatz-adolescent sucks off all the priests to initiate the rather ridiculous ritual. Needless to say, the bearded boy is more than a little sticky and shaky after being manhandled by four men in majorly moronic masks.

Ultimately, the Occultist convinces Mr. Paxton to devote his free time to hooking up with local homosexuals, but first he must “get to know them” and “investigate” before diving into full-on shit-stabbing. To find real live fags, Paxton first goes to a gay bar called “Go Go Bar” that advertises “Nude Boys” and features two rather effeminate go-go surfer boys with long pseudo-blonde hair and swarthy black pubes dancing exceedingly gaily on stage. Chuck also later checks out a porn theater where they have a new 3-hour hardcore show every Thursday. At the theater, Paxton finds himself giving his own ‘one man show’ in the shadows while watching a rather crude vintage boy-on-boy blue movie that makes Night of the Occultist seem like a lavish erotic epic. For whatever reason, Chuck also develops a somewhat peculiar predilection towards doing the five-finger-shuffle while driving around in his fancy convertible. Upon stopping into a nondescript handyman shop/garage to get his trusty lighter fixed, Chuck is initiated into the wild and wanton world of sacrilegious sodomy after the store clerk—a greaser with a greasy pompadour—takes him aside and aggressively smokes his pole like the most masculine of lumpenproles. Indeed, being a bourgeois bank boy, it is only natural that Chuck learns to fuck from a real working-class mensch. After Chuck busts his load and the greaser once again takes his member in his mouth, Night of the Occultist abruptly cuts to a full-blown 6(66)-man S&M sodomite orgy set in some sort of dark and fiery homo Hades featuring whips, big dicks, bondage, and mischievous men whose skin has taken on a red demonic tone. During the final shot of the film, which is certainly the most Scorpio Rising-esque scene of the entire flick, a close-up of the words “The End” written on the bare bum of Chuck, who is hogtied and sporting a leather-jacket, is juxtaposed with the Occultist narrating, “And so this orgiastic ritual continues into the night and tomorrow the participants shall resume their respective roles in conventional society,” thus reflecting the literally occult-like nature of homosexuality during the 1970s. Indeed, by using black magic in the LaVeyan sense (“the change in situations or events in accordance with one’s will, which would, using normally accepted methods, be unchangeable”), the Occultist/Egyptian sexologist has managed to convert heterosexual protagonist Chuck Paxton into a hyper horny hedonistic homo who has learned to have one hell of a time hanging out in hemorrhoid hitman hell.

It should be noted that Night of the Occultist was one of the three big “hits” of the now-defunct gay porn studio Jaguar Studios, which is probably best known for their “serious” male-on-male melodramas The Light from the Second Story Window (1973) directed by David Allen and Stu Drexyl and The Experiment (1973) penned and directed by Gorton Hall. Clearly, Night of the Occultist was the studio’s most idiosyncratic production as an aberrant-garde flick featuring the lo-fi aesthetic of Mike Kuchar’s underground cult classic Sins of the Fleshapoids (1965), the heretical hermetic mysticism and bike boy fetishism of Kenneth Anger, the uniquely unhinged underworld counter-culture cocksucking of Steven Arnold’s sensual surrealist masterpiece Luminous Procuress (1971), and the gritty, raw, and mostly macho ritualistic sadomasochism of Fred Halsted. Indeed, if you’re planning to watch the film with the intention of using it as some sort of preternatural masturbation aid, you will surely be disappointed, as the work features nothing new in terms of blue movie buggery and will mainly only interest the more discerning sin-ophile who thrives on uncovering dirty little forgotten gems of celluloid excess. Indeed, with its horrendous yet strangely hypnotic audio (much of the dialogue is completely inaudible and features far too much reverb), no-budget neo-expressionistic set-design (aside from the naked dudes, the set of the “Sacrifice to Osiris” scene seems like it could have been designed by some of the same people that worked on The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari), untalented yet unforgettable acting performances, and preposterous pretense towards being serious ‘erotic art,’ Night of the Occultist is nothing short of a lost cocksucker cult classic that reminds libertine cinephiles why they are obsessed with obscure cinema in the first place. While best known for influencing MTV music videos and inspiring Martin Scorsese’s obsessive implementation of pop music, Kenneth Anger is probably personally more proud of the fact that he influenced more ‘sinister’ and underground cinematic forms and this is nowhere more obvious than in Night of the Occultist, which may not be up to par with Wakefield Poole’s Bijou (1972), Fred Halsted’s LA Plays Itself (1972), or even Jacques Scandelari’s New York City Inferno (1978), but it is certainly one of the most endearingly (pseudo)evil erotic fag fuck flicks ever made.

NIGHT OF THE OCCULTIST

-Ty E

FIREWORKS

Kenneth Anger° (1947)

Fireworks was occultist filmmaker Kenneth Anger's first masterpiece. The film features sadistic sailors, phallogentric fireworks, and what seems to be a nightmare gay bashing. I can only assume that Fireworks is both Anger's greatest fantasy and nightmare. Anger was one of the first very honest filmmakers. Fireworks was such a spectacle when it was released in 1947, that Anger was arrested on obscenity charges. French filmmaker and poet Jean Cocteau was a fan of Fireworks and with good reason. Kenneth Anger follows in the footsteps of Cocteau's cinematic masterpiece The Blood of a Poet(1930). Like The Blood of a Poet, Fireworks is a surrealist journey of an individual in pain that can only be expressed through the avant-garde film medium. Of course, with Fireworks Anger shows that he also has a very humorous side.

"A dissatisfied dreamer awakes, goes out in the night seeking a 'light' and is drawn through the needle's eye. A dream of a dream, he returns to bed less empty than before."-Kenneth Anger

Was Kenneth Anger's ultimate fantasy a 17 year old to be beaten and sodomized by a group of muscle sailors? I can only imagine the response that the general American public would have had during this time if they had seen Fireworks. After all, America had just won itself a war and no one wanted to see patriotic sailors as gay sado-masochists. Things get so bad that Anger's intestines even get ripped out. Fireworks is the American art film at it's finest. At the end of the film, a sailor reveals a roman candle in his pants that makes you think of a nice American fourth of July. Not that I care much for "end" titles, but Anger even managed to get quite creative with that. It is a tragedy that very few American filmmakers have been influenced by the works of Kenneth Anger.

-Ty E

INAUGURATION OF THE PLEASURE DOME
INAUGURATION OF THE PLEASURE DOME

Kenneth Anger° (1954)

In many ways, Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954) is the most arcane, thematically and aesthetically intricate, and innately impenetrable work that American cine-magician Kenneth Anger (Scorpio Rising, Lucifer Rising) has ever directed. Not surprisingly, it also happens to be longest film Anger ever made (unless, of course, you count Don't Smoke That Cigarette! (2000), which would be a mistake since there was not much actual directing involved with that 'recycled' film). Loaded with Thelemite, Crowleyite, and kabalistic themes/symbols/iconography and starring real-life occultists and witches, Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome is also the pathologically private auteur filmmaker's most spiritual cinematic experiment, yet it is also a piece of pure cinema that pays seamless tribute to everything from Italian silent epics to German expressionism to classic Hollywood musicals, with Anger's biographer Bill Landis even describing the work as the director's, "version of a glittering MGM musical." A proto-psychedelic work (it has been described as a one of the first 'head movies' and reached the height of its popularity a decade later in the 1960s) that has been released in a number of different cuts (including a 1966 version entitled the 'Sacred Mushroom Edition' featuring a complete performance of Glagolitic Mass by Czech composer Leoš Janáček, as well as a third version made in the late-1970s featuring most of the 1974 Electric Light Orchestra album Eldorado), Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome is a keenly kaleidoscopic celluloid ritual of the decidedly decadent and fetishiistically transcendental bacchanalian sort that reminds one why Anger once stated, "I've always considered movies evil; the day that cinema was invented was a black day for mankind." Based on a masquerade party-like group ritual created by Anger's unholy hero Aleister Crowley's where members of a cult take on the identity of a god or goddess for All Sabbath's Eve, Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome stars a number of real-life virtual artistic gods and icons, including Anger himself, erotic novelist Anaïs Nin, avant-garde/cult auteur Curtis Harrington (Night Tide, The Killing Kind), artist/occultist Marjorie Cameron (the crazed widow of the equally crazed rocket scientist/Thelemite Jack Parson, who blew himself up), and reclusive Hollywood actor Samson de Brier (real name Arthur Jasmine), who, among other things, starred in Alla Nazimova's Beardsley-esque Wilde adaptation Salomé (1923) and whose house the film is set in. Equipped with aesthetic nods to the Yellow Nineties and Hieronymus Bosch and featuring Nin wearing a birdcage over her little round head (apparently, it was not the first time, as the film was largely inspired by a "Come as your Madness" Halloween party that both she and Anger attended), a very young Harrington portraying somnambulist Cesare from Robert Wiene's German expressionist masterpiece The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) with a certain foreboding Teutonic swag, and Scarlet Woman Cameron smoking ganja in tribute to The Great Beast 666, Anger's phantasmagorical celluloid ritual is nothing short of an immaculate piece of exceedingly elegant high-camp evil of the cinematically aristocratic sort that proves the director was able to synthesize the best elements of European master cine-magicians like F.W. Murnau and Jean Cocteau.

Opening with Aubrey Beardsley style inter-titles (painted by handsome blonde beast Paul Mathison, who also played Pan), Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome then cuts to exceedingly effete master magician/Master of Ceremonies (Samson De Brier)—a man who will take on the persona of Lord Shiva, Hindu deity and the Supreme God within the Hindu sect Shaivism, among countless other identities—playing with jewelry, putting on a series of fancy rings, swallowing some jewels, slowly arising from his bed, picking up a pair of scissors, and heading to a bright red room where he stares at a dual mirror (with one of the mirrors featuring the reflection of a pentacle) intently, and paints his face like a decadent dandy with a tinge of pancake makeup. Meanwhile, the redhaired Scarlet Woman (Marjorie Cameron), Whore of Heaven, offers a small figurine of a horned devil to a creepily colorful character named the Great Beast (also De Brier), who uses his tentacle-like fingernails to communicate, but the small statue instantly bursts into flame as soon as the ominous entity touches it. Immediately after, the Scarlet Woman lifts up a fat joint and the kaleidoscopic devil lights it, with a blue image of Aleister Crowley smoking a pipe in Arab garb being juxtaposed in the background. In the next scene, a rather beateous Lilith (played by Renate Druks, who would later direct the obscure short film Space Boy (1973) starring Florence Marly)—the kabalistic goddess of destruction—arrives from an endless void of nothingness and attempts to offer Emperor Nero (also De Brier) a golden apple, but he seems rather disinterested in the gift. From there, a fag hag-like Isis (Katy Kadell), who looks more like Cleopatra on crack, attempts to catch the interest of her corpse/reptile-like brother-husband Osiris (once again, De Brier), but he is disinterested, though he is flattered by the Great Beast's attention. While Nero was less than intrigued by Lilith's offering, Count Alessandro Cagliostro (De Brier again)—the great hypnotist and enemy of the Catholic Church who Crowley celebrated in a Gnostic Mass—gladly accepts and swallows the ruby jewel she has to offer him, which she takes out of a pretty pentagram-shaped box. Meanwhile, De Brier as Lord Shiva is offered grapes by an almost albino-like Pan (Paul Mathison). As Pan begins to walk slowly in a pair of blood red leather boots, Isis dances for the entertainment of Osiris, Lord Shiva and Lilith toast each other, and Cagliostro is presented with a large pendant, the ritual begins to get underway.

Undoubtedly, Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome begins to pick up speed when Astarte (Anaïs Nin)—the goddess of the moon—appears with a bluish moon-shaped object superimposed over her head (which is covered with a bird-cage) like a halo and Pan seems to be becoming rather sexually aroused by her angelic pulchritude. After Astarte disrobes (Nin is virtually naked), she catches a silver sphere from the sky and hands it to all-powerful pothead god Shiva. In Shiva's hands, the sphere shrinks and when it finally gets small enough, he eats it, thus causing him to grow fairy-like wings and become a very happy boy. After the Scarlet Woman gestures to the Great Beast for another light for her magic joint, Germanic somnambulist Cesare (Curtis Harrington) magically appears. The Somnambulist is under the sinister command of the Great Beast, who forces the sleepwalker to enter a labyrinth with a image of a witch with a pentagram on her forehead and a classic Baphomet pentagram. Ultimately, the Somnambulist enters a white room where he is handed an urn containing the hallucinogenic wormwood brew 'yage' by Hecate (Kenneth Anger), who looks like an Arab drag queen headed to a gothic funeral. A silent servant of the Great Beast, the Somnambulist serves the yage to all the gods and goddesses. The exotic elixir causes Shiva's face to turn green and he begins to suffer paranoia, among other things. Everyone else seems more or less happy and ecstatic, with Pan even accidentally spilling the bittersweet brew on himself in a playful manner. While Pan is admiring Lilith's stunning beauty, scheming trickster Lord Shiva drops a dubious substance in blond beast's drink, thus causing him to suffer a series of nightmarish hallucinations, including confusing visions of a number of the party members taking off various masks (i.e. Lilith takes off two identical masks before revealing a skull-like face with a huge mouth inspired by Crowley's sketch "High Priestess of Voodoo"). Pan's hellish hallucination is a triple-layered superimposition where Anger incorporated scenes from his 6-minute short Puce Moment (1949), which was shot by Curtis Harrington. From there, an all-out orgy ensues, with Pan—the only masculine man at the entire masquerade—acting as the 'prize,' especially for the lecherous goddesses, who claw him like rabid pussycats. Indeed, the gals strip, scratch, and torment Pan while supreme queen Hecate gets off to the entire scenario by performing what seems like a spastic belly dance. Eventually, the Goddess Kali (Marjorie Cameron) appears as blood-red-tinted-scenes from Giuseppe de Liguoro silent masterpiece L'Inferno (1911) are superimposed in the background. Kali manages to strike fear into the Great Beast, but the pernicious party keeps going, with the Somnambulist even sneaking in a smile. As Anger stated at the end of an audio commentary for Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome, "So the ultimate feeling is one of spirituality."

INAUGURATION OF THE PLEASURE DOME

In describing the 'pleasure dome' of Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome in an audio commentary for the film, Anger stated as follows, "The pleasure dome that is being inaugurated is actually a prison...it's something you can't escape from once you're in it, and I wanted to create that feeling of claustrophobia, like you can't escape these people or this place." Indeed, Anger's film is certainly one where the viewer is trapped in an almost demonic dance of metaphysical decadence, thus making it the next best thing to going to some sort of real-life

Crowley Mass (which would probably make for a less pleasurable experience, not to mention the fact that it would probably be comprised of far less attractive people). I have to admit my interest in Crowley/Thelema is about next to nil, yet Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome makes such spiritual degeneracy seem nothing short of ethereal and delightfully divine. For Curtis Harrington, starring in the film was apparently nothing short of an (un)holy experience, or as he wrote in his autobiography Nice Guys Don't Work in Hollywood: The Adventures of an Aesthete in the Movie Business (2013): "For me, it was a dream come true to play Cesare the somnambulist from THE CABINET OF DR. CALIGARI. Cameron, a painter and occultist, played the sorceress and was extraordinary in a mantilla and Spanish shawl. Anaïs was her counterpoint in a blue cocoon and golden mesh. Samson, who played the host to these personages, appeared in many guises, all of them magical. It was a vibrant gallery of portraits, each transformed by the film itself." America's once-foremost cineaste Amos Vogel was so impressed with the "wicked film" that he paid a great compliment to Anger, describing the auteur as, "one of the true subversive iconoclasts of the cinema." Indeed, while I hesitate to describe Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome as my favorite Anger film, it is most certainly the filmmaker's most accomplished work as both a filmmaker and as an occultist, as an innately penetrating piece that celebrates the evil essence of cinema as an artistic medium of ritual and manipulation. With that being said, it almost seems unimaginable that Anger never really faced a strong backlash from religious types, especially when one considers when the film was made. A devout tribute to the so-called "wickedest man in the world," Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome ultimately reminds undying agnostics like myself that magic takes its most potent and influential form in celluloid.

-Ty E

SCORPIO RISING
SCORPIO RISING

Kenneth Anger° (1963)

Kenneth Anger's experimental short Scorpio Rising is a camp masterpiece that was a hit on the underground film circuit. Anger proved that cultureless America was also capable of art at a time when degenerate hippies were about to start spreading around America like cancer. Scorpio Rising is also a real camp film, a film full of homoerotic ambiguity (or not so) that brings the viewer into a confusingly powerful world. Now the word "camp" is thrown around by ignoramuses that think anything silly is worthy of the word. As Jean Cocteau said of camp, "it is the lie that tells the truth." Scorpio Rising begins with a biker massaging his motorcycle parts like they are sensitive human parts. The bikers featured in Scorpio Rising seem to worship their bikes just as much as Kenneth Anger worships the bikers. With Scorpio Rising, it becomes apparent why he's a fan of Marlon Brando in the rebel biker gang classic The Wild One. Kenneth Anger obviously feels that the motorcycle reflects male sexual potency, power, and indestructible horsepower energy. Anger made sure that his name and the film's title were plastered on the back of a biker's leather jacket for a reason. Kenneth Anger, like the greatest of filmmakers, is a shameless voyeur using the film medium as an outlet for his deepest of obsessions. Scorpio is a biker with a cramped room surrounded by his many obsessions. Above his bed is an old school SS totenkopf flag. Scorpio also makes sure to have pictures of James Dean plastered around his cat friendly room. On his TV screen, The Wild One is unsurprisingly playing. Not only does Scorpio have a picture of James Dean riding a motorcycle, but he is also a member of the James Dean memorial foundation. Kenneth Anger dedicated a not so flattering chapter to Dean in his controversial book Hollywood Babylon II. Scorpio is an Aryan blond beast that casually lights up cigarettes as a display of phallic power. He also happens to sport Nazi regalia and the swastika can also be seen throughout Scorpio Rising. After all, the swastika is the ultimate symbol of white (Aryan to be exact) aesthetic domination. Kenneth Anger sees the Nazis as a group that proclaimed "we are the best because we look the best." Hitler also makes an appearance as he was probably the most powerful homosexual ever. Lothar Machtan's book The Hidden Hitler makes a great case for the fuhrer's questionable sexuality. Jesus is also featured cut in with footage of Scorpio strutting down the street. It is apparent that Scorpio has much more flare than the rebellious 'King of the Jews.' Scorpio Rising is one of the greatest cinematic art pieces of American film history. That being said, if the general public saw it, it would also be one of the most hated. Scorpio Rising is full of so many powerful taboos that I am sure Mr. Crispin Hellion Glover took notes from it during his preparation for the making of What is it? Kenneth Anger effortlessly proves that cinematic power lies not in how much money is pumped into the film, but the mastermind behind the art. If only Scorpio (or Zombie Scorpio) had his only feature length film. Maybe the elderly Kenneth Anger is still up for it?

-Ty E

KUSTOM KAR KOMMANDOS
KUSTOM KAR KOMMANDOS

Kenneth Anger° (1965)

Coming of age, I never could understand the infatuation other guys had for swooning over automobiles. Of course, I loved the freedom and convenience of driving but unlike other guys, I never had the desire to put thousands of dollars into a car that was probably worth less than my CD collection at the time. It has been over a decade now since I originally obtained my license and I still consider putting money into a car to be one of the most worthless investments a person could ever make. In the 3-minute long Kenneth Anger short Kustom Kar Kommandos, we watch as a Nordic Northern American Superman engages in foreplay with his stylistically audacious automobile. Despite my overall repugnance towards car worship, I found the short to be another example of Kenneth Anger's commitment to creating the most striking and sumptuous Mise-en-scène. Also, it does not hurt that the short was shot in 1965, a time when cars seemed to more resemble custom automotive art as opposed to the tacky jalopy four-wheelers that now flood American streets.

AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Unable to execute JavaScript.

The soothing pop song "Dream Lover" by The Paris Sisters is played while the unnamed young man in Kustom Kar Kommandos buffs his shimmering automobile. Kenneth Anger makes the automobile symbolic of the young man's genitals and the revving of the engine acts as a auditory state of arousal. Of course, I am persuaded that Kenneth Anger wishes he was the car in the film so that he could be buffered by the young dream lover. Unlike most other films directed by Kenneth Anger, Kustom Kar Kommandos disguises the director's homoerotic scopophilia by making the car the main subject instead of the young rebel. Irish dandy Oscar Wilde once wrote, "Yet each man kills the thing he loves" but I prefer subscribing to the inverse of that piece of wild exiled wisdom. After all, was it not James Dean's beloved Porsche 550 Spyder that led him into a time-pausing fate of infinite cinematic youth? It is also one of the oldest stories in the world that man has always been willing to risk his life or even lose it to stay in favor of the woman that exploits his heart. Kustom Kar Kommandos ends climatically simply with the young man finally driving off. Upon first viewing the short, I anticipated seeing the young man mutilated in an accident but instead Kenneth Anger leaves the fate of the subject to the viewer's imagination.

Kustom Kar Kommandos was originally supposed to be a much more ambitious feature-film about young males with car fetishes but Anger's grant money of $10,000.00 from The Ford foundation ran out quite swiftly. It is a depressing thought to realize that revolutionary experimental filmmaker Kenneth Anger has never directed a feature-length film. Not since Aryan auteur F.W. Murnau (one of Anger's greatest influences) has there been a director like Kenneth Anger whose Mise-en-scène even strikes the jaundiced eyes of those that see cinema without artistic merit. Kustom Kar Kommandos is just a meager taste of what could have been a cinematic masterpiece yet is still highly notable in the aborted state that it is in. Luckily, the short caught the Sicilian eyes of Martin Scorsese as seen in the various extravagant car scenes featured in Taxi Driver and his various mafia films like Goodfellas. After all, a couple minutes from a Kenneth Anger film usually contains more Occult power and aesthetic magick than your typical Hollywood film director's entire filmography. Anyone can direct a film if they have the monetary advantage to do so but few have the gift of the all-seeing artistic eye and an enchanting organic vision that Kenneth Anger was blessed with.

-Ty E

INVOCATION OF MY DEMON BROTHER
INVOCATION OF MY DEMON BROTHER

Kenneth Anger° (1969)

Invocation of My Demon Brother seems to be Kenneth Anger's most glossed over film. I find the short to be one that I keep coming back to. I just can't get enough of real-life convicted killer Bobby Beausoleil and his suave top hat. Beausoleil would later go on to kill a worthless hippy-wannabe-Buddhist drug dealer. One would be a liar if they didn't admit that Bobby Beausoleil's acting and actions are certainly a contribution to this dying world. I also enjoyed seeing Anton LaVey when he was in his prime and still dressing up as a sort of carny Satan. I just find it kind of odd to see LaVey in Kenneth Anger's world of Aleister Crowley and Thelema. Rolling Stones mouthpiece Mick Jagger also deserves praise for the synthesizer score he created for Invocation of My Demon Brother. Sympathy for the Devil, indeed.

Invocation of My Demon Brother opens with a young albino man that seems to have problems with his eyes. It is probably all the naked homos in the shadows that have haunted him. This young albino is a very aesthetically unappealing individual that looks like the bastard hate child of a Germanic barbarian warrior and a degenerate Mongolian thief. Maybe this fellow has eye trouble because he looked too closely at himself in Kenneth Anger's mirror. I wouldn't be surprised if this fellow is one of Kenneth Anger's ex-boyfriends who Anger would later put one of his infamous spells on. Either way, this blond haired untermensch is surely a creep.

Kenneth Anger certainly embarrassed himself in Invocation of My Demon Brother with his undeniably flaming gay performance in a sparkle covered red robe. Anger flaunts a magic wand with a sort of flamboyance that would put Richard Simmons to shame. Kenneth Anger also waves around a swastika flag which I found interesting considering Anger (Anglemyer)'s dubious ancestral background. Despite Kenneth Anger being the black magician lead of the short, Anton LaVey steals the show just by hovering over a skull and some candles. Invocation of My Demon Brother is as close to a marriage as there will be between The Church of Satan and Aleister Crowley's Thelema.

Despite his sympathy for the devil, Mick Jagger's concert performance footage brings a "heavenly" feel to the world of Invocation of My Demon Brother. Mick is probably the most innocent of these black artists and also the most famous. I wouldn't be surprised if Mick Jagger's attraction to the work of Kenneth Anger was primarily fueled by his strong thirst for vice. I must say that I am happy that Beausoleil, LaVey, Anger, and Jagger got together and made a short film like no other. Invocation of My Demon Brother certainly invoked a celebration of the demon in myself.

-Ty E

LUCIFER RISING

Kenneth Anger° (1974)

As far as Crowleyite/Thelemite films are concerned, Kenneth Anger's perennially unfinished work Lucifer Rising (1972) is the greatest celluloid expression of the hedonistic English Occultist's prophecy of the Aeon of Horus as depicted in his central sacred text The Book of the Law (aka Liber AL vel Legis). Crowley described the third Aeon as a time of self-realization and self-actualization controlled by a child god (as symbolized by the solar god Horus) where, ". . . the crowned and conquering child, who dieth not, nor is reborn, but goeth radiant ever upon His Way. Even so goeth the Sun: for as it is now known that night is but the shadow of the Earth, so Death is but the shadow of the Body, that veileth his Light from its bearer" (Heart of the Master). The version of Lucifer Rising that exists today is Anger's second attempt at directing the film. After having a dubious falling out with his innately heterosexual Luciferian Don Juan Bobby "Cupid" Beausoleil that resulted in the disappearance of most of the footage (which Beausoleil denies was ever stolen/ever existed) of his initial attempt at directing Lucifer Rising that began production sometime around 1966, Anger abandoned the project and would not reattempt to direct the film until a number of years later. In one pompous drama-queen scheme inspired by his severed relationship with boy Cupid, Anger even went so far as putting out a full-age ad in The Village Voice newspaper with the text, "In Memoriam Kenneth Anger 1947-1967" inscribed over the image over a gravestone, henceforth setting sail to Europa. As indicated by Anger's brilliant short Invocation of My Demon Brother (1969) – a work assembled from the surviving footage of Anger's first attempt at Lucifer Rising with Beausoleil playing the leading role (described as "A fragment made in fury... the last blast of Haight consciousness" in a 1975 interview with Anger) – the Crowleyite auteur filmmaker's ideas and aesthetic developed quite drastically from his original attempt at the film. Although Beausoleil would only go on to play himself in the mediocre mondo flick Mondo Hollywood (1967) and as an Injun in the C-grade/X-rated western Ramrod (1969) and never get to star as Lucifer in the released version of Lucifer Rising due to his imprisonment for murdering hippie drug dealer Gary Hinman while hanging out with Charles Manson and the family, he would go on to replace a rock star as famous as Jimmy Page (Anger was quite dissatisfied with his opium-inspired melodies) and compose a potent psychedelic score for the film while in prison, thus still lending his suave Svengali metaphysical influences in a most hypnotic, memorable, and enduring way. Anger stated of the entire melodramatic incident with Beausoleil, "but the fallen angel and I had a falling out. Well, it almost worked out." While missing the irreplaceable carnal and charismatic Cupid in the starring role, Lucifer Rising turned out much better than expected under the circumstances. Featuring vivacious special effects created by Wally Veevers (Lawrence of Arabia, 2001: A Space Odyssey) and extrinsic transmundane footage from an erupting volcano in Iceland, the iconic ruins of Luxor, Egypt, Stonehenge, England and the Externsteine rock formation of Ostwestfalen-Lippe, Germany – a spot some argue is an ancient Teutonic solar temple – among various other famous/infamous occult hotspots, Lucifer Rising is a true work of awe-inspiring world cinema with nil contemporaries.

LUCIFER RISING

Kenneth Anger's Lucifer (largely inspired by Crowley's poem Hymn to Lucifer) is not the devil portrayed by Christianity, but a rebellious god of beauty and light similar to the one depicted by the tragic German medievalist-writer-turned-disloyal-SS-Obersturmführer Otto Rahn (Crusade Against the Grail, Lucifer's Court). In a totally fitting manner, Anger casted Scottish cult auteur Donald Cammell (Performance, White of the Eye) as Osiris – the lord of death – which is no surprise considering the morbid, death-obsessed filmmaker grew up with Aleister Crowley as a neighbor and would later take his own life in a manner not unlike that of the lead character in his legendary debut feature-length film. Apparently, Cammell was so preoccupied with quietus that he asked for a mirror to watch his worldly demise shortly after fatally wounding himself, thus making his performance in Lucifer Rising seem all the more pertinent and penetrating. Osiris is summoned in the beginning of Lucifer Rising by Isis – the ancient Egyptian Goddess that was worshipped as the ideal mother/wife and the patron of nature and magic – played by Myriam Gibril; a topless tanned beauty who perfectly personifies the role. In ancient Egyptian cosmology, unlike within Christianity, there are no false dichotomies (e.g. good vs. evil), but a balance between life and death as the characters of Osiris and Isis ultimately symbolize. Junky singer Marianne Faithfull played the role of Lilith; a powerful demoness that emblemizes female discontent, as expressed so vividly by the grayish/bluish tones of her costumes and make-up, due to her emotionally-crippling rejection by Lucifer. Throughout the production of Lucifer Rising, Ms. Faithfull faithfully snorted heroin that was conveniently located inside her make-up compact; an act that according to Anger, could have gotten the whole crew of the film executed by way of firing squad in Egypt had she been caught. Anger felt she was unerring for the role due to her overwhelming melancholy at the time, as expressed by various botched suicide attempts that even occurred during the production of Lucifer Rising, thus bestowing an ensured psychodramatic authenticity to her performance. Considering blonde-haired Marianne Faithfull, a spoiled lady of Jewish ancestry, walks through the Externsteine – a SS holy site that the National Socialists built a bridge for (as seen in the film) and the spot where the Hitler-Jugend leader Baldur von Schirach gave the Hitler Youth boys their first daggers – Lucifer Rising often has a certain depraved irony that Aleister Crowley would have undoubtedly appreciated. Due to their torn relationship and Beausoleil's imprisonment, Anger casted Leslie Huggins – a relatively unknown English-steel-mill-worker-turned-French-farmer who the auteur described as, “a real Lucifer” and “an authentic demon in human form” due to his mysterious disappearances throughout the production of Lucifer Rising – for the iconic role of Lucifer. Chris Jagger, brother of Mick, was originally casted as the high priest in the film but only one scene of the inquisitive young lad was used in the final cut of Lucifer Rising due to his constant pestering of Kenneth Anger in regard to the meaning of the Thelemite symbols and archetypes featured throughout the work. As a non-initiate and someone that previously had little interest in Thelema, I can honestly say that like Mick’s lesser known brother, Lucifer Rising has inspired me to want to dig a little deeper into The Great Beast 666’s hyper-hedonistic pseudo-religion.

In a 1995 interview with Austrian ‘neofolk’ musician Gerhard Hallstatt aka Kadmon (Allerseelen), Kenneth Anger revealed regarding Lucifer Rising, “I have filmed another part – the two parts together are one hour long. But I only have the work print for the second part and I need some additional money for the special effects after the printing.” Considering it has been nearly two decades since the interview and the aged auteur is well into his mid-80s, one can only wonder whether or not Anger will release the definitive cut of Lucifer Rising. By itself, the 29-minute short is a masterpiece of cine-magick and arguably the homophile auteur filmmaker’s celluloid magnum opus, so the prospective of an extended version of Lucifer Rising sounds like it could either be a beautiful blessing or a cinematic travesty as testified by Francis Ford Coppola’s butchered 2001 Redux of Apocalypse Now (1979), but then again, Kenneth Anger is not one known for making artistic compromises, hence the relatively small number of films that make up his masterly Magick Lantern Cycle. Not unsurprisingly, Lucifer Rising has gone on to inspire a number of artists and musicians from generations both old and new. In 1971, Donald Cammell began the production of the short film The Argument (1999); a once-lost work that was released posthumously nearly 30 years later starring his Lucifer Rising costar/lover Myriam Gibril in a mystical performance (as ‘Aisha, the witch’) very similar (and also topless), if more comical, to her role in Anger’s film. Lucifer Rising has also been very influential on various musicians, especially among the European neofolk/martial industrial/post-industrial movement. On their classic album Swaſtikas for Noddy (1988), neofolk group Current 93 featured a song entitled “Beausoleil” featuring various references to the films of Kenneth Anger, Thelema, and Aleister Crowley. In 1999, the French record label Athanor released a Lucifer Rising tribute album featuring songs composed by Allerseelen, Ain Soph, Blood Axis, Changes, Der Blutharsch, and even Bobby Beausoleil himself. Led Zeppelin guitarist Jimmy Page also released an album featuring his unused musical score for Lucifer Rising entitled Lucifer Rising and Other Sound Tracks in 2012. In 1999, Church of Satan priest Gavin Baddely released a book titled Lucifer Rising: A Book of Sin, Devil Worship and Rock ’n’ Roll about the influence of Satanism on modern culture/counter-culture featuring interviews with everyone from Kenneth Anger himself to New Zealand-based 'far-right' writer Kerry Bolton (Artists of the Right: Resisting Decadence, Revolution from Above). Needless to say, Lucifer Rising's influence has been quite wide and vast and of a sonorous quasi-sacerdotal nature; and I don't see it desisting anytime soon with sociocultural tools like the internet making Kenneth Anger's work all the more accessible.

LUCIFER RISING

Undoubtedly, even before the release of Lucifer Rising, the Aeon of Horus had already been in full swing via Crowley's semi-thaumaturgic influence on popular British musicians ranging from The Beatles to Led Zeppelin. In an era where 'free love' is pretty much the norm, homosexuality is vogue, mass drug consumption is a rite of passage for many western youths, and where Christianity is assuredly on its last gasp, a film like Lucifer Rising has even more socio-political and spiritual relevance today than when it was first released. Some fans of the film have even argued that the surprise explosion of the Lucifer Mark IV cake (which actually turns out to be a bomb) towards the conclusion of Lucifer Rising is a symbolic prediction of the September 11 attacks; a claim which Anger himself gaudily replied, "and perhaps it is." Socio-political significance or not, Lucifer Rising is very much Kenneth Anger's most singularized, intrepid and unprecedented work. Shedding the iconic pop music and Murnau-esque mise-en-scènes that originally gained him a prestigious reputation among both cinephiles and avant-garde filmmakers alike, Lucifer Rising is a monolithic metaphysical masterpiece of cine-magick that literally goes as far as being 'out of this world.' In fact, Kenneth Anger still insists to this day that he saw real-life flying-saucers at the ancient Egyptians ruins, stating in a 1995 interview, "I saw such a saucer when I was in the temple of Luxor – a real one!...Traces of the saucers go back to ancient myths." Combining eternal spiritual wisdom with puissant aesthetic ingredients; both old and new, Lucifer Rising transcends the mere typical cinematic experience and thus can be best described as a devilishly divine work of high-class Elysian decadence that better reflects our age than Mel Gibson's anachronistic The Passion of the Christ (2004) ever could.

-Ty E

ICH WILL!

Kenneth Anger° (2000)

Despite narcissistically putting out a full-page ad in 1969 to announce his retirement from cinema (he would also go into retirement again in the early 1980s, not making another film for around 20 years), Kenneth Anger still continues to make films despite being in his golden years. Although being known as a magnificent magician of mise-en-scène, Anger's newer films lack the extensive labor of love that were obviously put into his earlier films. Unfortunately, like David Lynch, Anger has decided to give up using film and has committed himself to using digital video. In the digital short Anger Sees Red directed by Kenneth Anger, the film reaches its climax when Anger literally sees a young muscular man named Red; surely a disappointing film that looks like it was made in a couple hours. Unsurprisingly, not all of Kenneth Anger's recent films are total disappointments, his tribute to the Hitler Youth Ich Will! being a perfect example of the Crowleyite director's (still somewhat seemingly intact) cinematic brilliance. For Ich Will!, Anger compiled together Nazi propaganda footage, news reels, and stock footage of Uncle Adolf's heroic, yet ultimately damned - youth.

Ich Will! starts in the tomb of teenage Nazi martyr Hans Mallon, a young man that was killed by Communists in 1931. On the tomb reads "The Fame of the Dead Lives Forever," a motto stressing the Nazi value of giving one's life for the collective good of Germany. The rest of Ich Will! features everything from members of the Hitler Youth kayaking to parades taking place around various German towns. Kenneth Anger tinted the short with the color red, most likely to stress the "Satanic" Nazi religion of blood and ancestor worship, not to mention the "blood" these German youth would have permanently embedded on their hands after the German defeat at the conclusion of World War II. I must admit that I have seen my fair share of Nazi footage and none of the footage in Ich Will! seems like recycled material like you find on the History Channel, where it feels like they play the same three clips of Adolf Hitler over-and-over again. Of course, Kenneth Anger is no fan (only a fetishist) of the Third Reich as he made clear in his sadomasochistic Nazi leather-fest Scorpio Rising. Like Scorpio Rising, Ich Will! stresses the homoerotic undertones in male camaraderie and hero (Hitler) worship.

Ich Will! ends just as ritualistically as it starts, concluding with a gigantic flame-lit Nazi rally which gives off an atmosphere that feels like German army is preparing for a holy war after making a Faustian pact with the devil himself. Despite having most of his works banned and his assets/property seized by the German government in 1934, I am sure German writer and occultist Hanns Heinz Ewers would be still proud of his contribution to the Third Reich (he wrote a biography of Nazi Martyr Horst Wessel) had he personally seen the Nazi Hellfire rally featured at the conclusion of Ich Will!. Although the short is essentially various Nazi-era footage woven together, Ich Will! is a powerful film (Dr. Goebbels would have no doubt approved) certainly worth watching alongside Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will.. Nowadays, your typical American youth looks up to a mulatto messiah and krappy kosher klowns like Jonah Hill. Knowing that, the values of heroism, athleticism, and comradeship as featured in Ich Will! don't seem half bad.

ICH WILL!

-Ty E

MY SURFING LUCIFER

Kenneth Anger° (2007)

Being a loyal patron of Occult Auteur Kenneth Anger's Faustian cinematic visions; I feel the need to cover the filmmaker's lesser known works. In 2009, Kenneth Anger released My Surfing Lucifer - a short tribute to his millionaire German-American surfer pal Adolph Bunker Spreckels III - a true "prince of Bel Air" that the independent film director described as "Surfing's divine prince of decadence." On top of being a surfing legend, Adolph Spreckels was also the stepson of legendary Hollywood actor Clark Gable. In My Surfing Lucifer, supreme libertine surfer Spreckels carves oceanic waves in a fluid laid-back manner that compliments his luxurious, yet consequently tragic life. Of course, despite his monetary prosperity, Spreckels is prone to flesh splitting wipe-outs as shown at the end of the short. Despite inheriting fifty million dollars at age 21, Herr Spreckels' life was ultimately cut short, thus in tribute Mr. Anger has created this micro-epic-bio-pic-surfing-Tour-de-force My Surfing Lucifer with 8mm "found footage." After too much sex, drugs, and rock & roll; Spreckels passed away due to heart failure at the premature age of 27, but enough with the sad talk. As one can expect from the cinematic works of Kenneth Anger; My Surfing Lucifer is equipped with a complimentary soundtrack featuring the song "Good Vibrations" by the pseudo-surfer pop group The Beach Boys. Kenneth Anger has a distant connection to The Beach Boys through his longtime collaborator Bobby Beausoleil. Like Beausoleil, Dennis Wilson (the drummer of The Beach Boys) was at one point an associate of The Manson Family. Of course, everyone knows: Charlie don't surf. It is doubtful that Dennis Wilson would have made for a decent surfer, as his life wiped-out in a drunken drowning accident. Like Charles Manson, Kenneth Anger has always displayed a certain disgust with Hollywood types; albeit in a less murderous fashion.

LA-based sneaker store UNDFTD collaborated with Kenneth Anger to spotlight the original 2009 premiere of his film tribute to Bunker Spreckels: My Surfing Lucifer.

When compared to Kenneth Anger's earlier more laborious efforts, My Surfing Lucifer doesn't seem like much, yet it has a serene atmosphere that gives one "good vibrations." Additionally, the short is a labor-of-love, concocted by Anger using mere vintage "found footage." Personally, now that I live on the beach, my appreciation for the organic, chaotic nature of waves has reached its peak. I spent many years sidewalk surfing (skateboarding), yet I have never had the opportunity to carve a wave - which is certainly something my body now craves. Most of the surfers I have personally known were beach-tanned-dead-head Aryans - whose eclectic and all-encompassing ignorance - I never could stand. As a hero of Kenneth Anger, I would hope that Herr Adolf Bunker Spreckels III intellectual capacity was a bit grander than the everyday beach bum surfer, but it is most likely that the Crowleyite auteur admired the surfing legend for his uncompromising decadence (combined with his daredevil surfing), and that alone. Although I am no expert on surfing - Lucifer Spreckels seems to be able to ride a hellish wave - even if he ends his surf session slightly scathed. In My Surfing Lucifer, the rich devil has already risen and is engaged in a joyous battle against mother nature's celestial oceanic crest; certainly a spectacular, yet momentary vision from the diabolical auteur Mr. Anger. For those viewers that found themselves reveling in the bestial flames of Lucifer Rising, you will certainly find yourself momentarily basking in the luxuriating waves of My Surfing Lucifer.

MY SURFING LUCIFER

Note: A feature-length film on the life of Bunker Spreckels is also in the works.

-Ty E

MISSONI

Kenneth Anger° (2010)

Although I thought Kenneth Anger had given up on creating the kind of extravagant and boldly colorful surrealist works that were typical of his past films for more minimalistic and less labor extensive works, he has thankfully astonished me with his 2 ½ minute short Missoni (2010). Aesthetically, the short echoes back to the dreamy decor featured in Anger's Puce Moment (1949) and the psychedelic kaleidoscope of colors prominent throughout Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954). Luckily, the prestigious Italian fashion house Missoni hired Anger to direct this short as a fresh and stupendous way to advertise their 2010 collection. It seems that as of lately, Anger has been landing many of his filmmaking jobs from advertisers as the director also created the 42 second short Death (2008) for the vodka brand 42BELOW as part of their One-DreamRush film compilation; a cinematic anthology that also includes works by fellow subversive filmmakers like David Lynch, Harmony Korine, Larry Clark and Gaspar Noé. Naturally, Missoni is more intoxicating than any vodka drink could ever be and one will fail to receive a killer hangover after watching the lucid and colorful short. As one would expect from the artistically audacious Italian fashion house; eleven members of the Missoni family modeled their own creations for Missoni. I wouldn't be the least bit surprised if the Missoni designer clothing featured in the short was in one way or another inspired by those wardrobes featured in past films directed by Kenneth Anger. As is typical of an Anger film, Missoni features an equally hypnotic and complimentary soundtrack that is sure to draw the viewer in; whether they want to be under the spell of the Luciferian filmmaker or not. Missoni's score – which was composed by the French group Koudlam – sounds like an ambient neo-darkwave track. After initially viewing the short, I had no idea what it was supposed to be about (but I was still completely enamored by it) and I certainly did not suspect that it was part of a marketing campaign. For those (myself included) that were under the terrible impression that Kenneth Anger may have lost his moviemaking magick, Missoni makes for a soothing and ecstatic awakening.

AN ERROR OCCURRED.
AN ERROR OCCURRED.

Try watching this video on www.youtube.com, or enable JavaScript if it is disabled in your browser.

Despite being an advertisement, it seems that Kenneth Anger has equipped Missoni with occult symbolism. Considering that I am far from a Crowleyite, I have no idea what the esoteric message contained within the short means, but I am sure that it is clever. With Missoni, Kenneth Anger once again proves why he is one of the few modern filmmakers who can be compared to such pioneering directors as F.W. Murnau and Carl Th. Dreyer; as the short's mise-en-scène is as intricately and expressively assembled as one would expect from the canvas of a master painter's work. Indeed, Missoni is a hallucinatory collection of sinister, yet spectacular holograms that were designed with the utmost precision by an auteur with an irreplaceable vision. The fact that Missoni was created in Italy only makes it all the more fascinating. After all, Anger's spiritual father and metaphysical guru guide Aleister Crowley was expelled from Italy by Il Duce Benito Mussolini, yet the American themelike auteur was welcomed to the country as a serious artistic celebrity. Instead of fascist propaganda, modern rich Italians with disposable incomes now have the honor of being subconsciously brainwashed into buying overpriced wardrobes via the cine-magick talents of svengali auteur Kenneth Anger. If anyone doubts Anger's authentic talents as a magician with an otherworldly vision, one just has to blissfully bask in the minute phantasmagoric motion-picture dream Missoni; a film that proves not all advertising and subliminal messages are bad. It is undoubtedly a sad time in cinema history when a 2 ½ minute fashion advertisement directed by an elderly man (albeit a cinematic genius old man) has more artistry than the majority of independent films that have been released since the new millennium. I just hope that Kenneth Anger has the opportunity to direct more shorts like Missoni in the future for if he were cease to concoct such majestic works, I would indubitably suffer from a long-drawn-out case of cinephile torture.

-Ty E

TAKE AN EASY RIDE

Kenneth F. Rowles (1976) I had viewed Take an Easy Ride several days prior to this review. Upon finishing it, I was stirred but not shaken. The idea of combing the experience for particular nuggets of truth seemed not worth the effort, that is, until I had a very similar experience the same night that touched base. Coming out of the liquor store, I was accosted by a ogre-like feminine creature that had the finesse of a cricket suffocating in semen. Begging for a ride and not taking no for an answer, I simply had to walk away while she scurried from car to car in the background. This is but an example of the odd little things that come your way during any given period and after watching Take an Easy Ride, I not only feel uneasy about the situation but I feel inclined to finally put to rest these hitchhiking demons vibrating in my skull.

Take an Easy Ride was originally programmed to be a public information film, the sort of which have made rounds about the Internet as we poke fun at its terribly dated and contrived material. This dream of educational celluloid squalor went sour though as Rowles was approached by legendary producer and peddler of smut, David Grant. Taking the ideas of public interest and intertwining this with vintage smut seemed innocent enough but the end result is a strange one. Take an Easy Ride begins with several interviewees on the street conducting short Q&As with the young English gents asking for thoughts on hitch-hiking. Of course, to thin the context of the future events, they speak of spooky happenstance, the connection of rape, murder, and hitching rides. After this segment, the triptych tale of feminine motorway terror begins. The first instance of young girls hitchhiking finds two females "taking an easy ride" off a trucker. After some time though, the blonde hikes up her skirt as if to situate her supple figure, but her veil is wafer thin. This is a classic example of an instinctual act of manipulation, if the woman realizes it or not. On several sites regarding this film, I've witnessed reviewers and "genre fans" writing off this trucker character for being "perverted" or "sleazy", which infuriates me to no end.

Another of the side-plots involves two girls hitchhiking to a rock and roll concert. Despite one receiving fare from her father, the elder hippie decides for whatever reason, whether to save money for drugs or plot progression, to hitch a ride. The fellow who picks them up was previously outlined in a short sketch showing the dashboard of his car and disembodied hands digging through the glove-box in order to flip through a crusty nudie mag; ergo, this man is a devilish victim of persuasion. All comparisons between Take an Easy Ride and Last House on the Left are sourced from this subplot in particular as these young girls are violated, raped, and murdered in the woods. The parents are the victims here, same as the laughable peers in Craven's Last House on the Left. Leave it to daddy's little girl to bring more trouble than their pitiful existence wrapped around boys is already worth. Intertwined with these scenes is two more "examples" of the dangers hitchhikers face. A staged street introduction leads to an impromptu interview that begins with a cherry disposition that then turns its ugly head on the carelessness of women, especially when inebriated off of wine. A young girl is presumably sheltered from the hazardous asphalt from the kindness of a strange couple. Later relaxing in a bath, the hitchhiker is surprised in the bathtub by the "girlfriend" and is led into acting out her suppressed desires on the bed. During this foreplay feigned rape, the chubby male snaps shots of the lesbian interaction. Immediately preceding the warm-up exercise, the male removes his clothes and climbs atop the wriggling mass of lady flesh; yet, we're led to believe the hitchhiker is the victim in this story. A victim of her own carnal ineptitude, perhaps.

TAKE AN EASY RIDE

The shortest, and in my opinion, weakest of the short interactions between victim and prey swap sides to present the driver as the victim. In this scenario, a gentleman offers a ride to two women who, unbeknownst to him, rob a gas station while his back is turned. This later escalates in him getting stabbed repeatedly by the vixens. This ends the short saga of Take an Easy Ride; a wonderfully distorted campaign of safety. Rowles' determination to take on public safety is repeatedly undermined by the perversity of David Grant. While the assertion that Take an Easy Ride is similar to that of Last House on the Left is credible there's not much else besides the single skit that could lead to this conclusion. Sure, Take an Easy Ride features a scene of rape and murder. This, in turn, draws sympathy from the reaction of the parents. But no other strand of evidence exists to suggest this claim other than the "gentle" scene of rape within Take an Easy Ride. Nevertheless, Rowles' cinematic contribution excels in the art of sleaze and under the ever watchful eye of David Grant, Take an Easy Ride becomes something so strange, esoteric, yet, utterly creative. It's my guess that these abrasive forms of public interest are making a comeback with the inclusion of "shocking" accident commercials, obviously led by forerunners Take an Easy Ride and Forklift Driver Klaus. It seems the media mavens have finally realized brute force is the most effective method of persuasion.

-mAQ

YO-YO GIRL COP

Kenta Fukasaku (2006)

A title like this is destined for greatness. A film like this should have been written in stone. Yo-Yo Girl Cop is a flat monotone action film stealing the subplot of Suicide Club and converting it to the "Kawaii" American crowd. Kenta Fukasaku (Director of Battle Royale II) took the reigns on a film that should have played it safely. Instead, we're treated to a decomposing mess that loses all coherency and plausibility only mere minutes in. Before you rip at the notion that this is an adaptation and this is supposed to be oddball entertainment, watch the film. You'll forgive me soon enough. As for the plot, I can only spare pieces that were legible to me at the time. A rogue feminist bad ass is Escape from New York'd into joining a special task force armed with a mission of stopping some suicidal judgment day from happening. Many geeky Asians are strapped with bombs throughout the film and blown to CGI smithereens. I can't tell what got the shit end of this stick in this one; the cast or the characters? Get used to the fact that things in this film will happen for no reason. Characters will be introduced in a rush only for them to be evicted from the script. Enemies will become apparent and lack any motive. You can't use insanity or misanthropy for these 2D baddies. Asian action cinema normally has a look derived from cases of Red Bull and cinematographers over the edge. Calling films like Tube and Killzone "sleek" is undermining the film. Those are but two examples of fine Asian action. Fukasaku should count his losses and release this under the title of "How to butcher an Asian action film". To give credit where credit is due, the idea of a school girl fighting crime with a hi-tech yo-yo is exciting, but this film lacks any compassion towards weaponry. The last battle with the villain was a sparkle to what should have been an explosive brawl. He on one hand, used his weapon well. I cherish the idea of weaponry being used as an extension to carry out nefarious plans. Good guys using weapons doesn't have that menace behind it. They carry an arsenal to protect themselves. The enemies armor up for an approaching protagonist holocaust. Yo-Yo Girl Cop is a film that no one will understand. You can pass it off to feel better about yourself for, let's say, appreciating this film, but too much is left undiscussed. The end product is fishy, slimy, and inedible. I don't buy anything this film had to offer. I see Yo-Yo Girl Cop as a tragedy. The first ten minutes were good and the last ten minutes were painfully average; the middle is all shit. Sad to say that Aya Matsuura isn't as ravishing as she tries to be, kicking her way through eunuchs. If you read manga and eat Pocky, then this is the film for you. But if you enjoy engaging action cinema, stay far away from this one.

-mAQ

ALL ABOUT THE BENJAMINS
ALL ABOUT THE BENJAMINS

Kevin Bray (2002)

It all started out as a joke. "Soiled Sinema is all about the Benjamin's!" - Which we are. This drove me to purchase a film that most every generation X youth had already seen save for me. Starring the glorified action star Ice Cube and pathetic funnyman Mike Epps (whose pathetic career has involved him in various colorful situations where he flaunts an annoying persona), All About the Benjamins features rampant glamorized displays of idiosyncratic greed and ethnic superiority as the two positive Black leads trump the "underlings." Poor, poor Francesco. May our memories go out to him. He's in a better place now. Ice Cube has dug himself in a safe zone with his collaborating rap efforts of N.W.A., Westside Connection, and even his solo projects. For this, I bare nary foul feelings for the man; the legend. After his comedic enterprises flourished with the subsequent hit release of Friday, Cube Vision formed with the motive of creating Ice Cube starred comedies and such which spawned 3 Friday sequels and other black cultured comedies revolving around barbershop hi-jinx that bored white audiences around the world. With the eventual release of All About the Benjamins, the probable theory of "big" action stars was born. I say this because after watching a chunky Negro run around the set of XXX: State of the Union, I can swear that the action genre has never been the same. Ice Cube's film credits have always had an edgy racial context to them. Despite he himself being an inspiration to many black people, he creates films showing black people as disgusting citizens who shit constantly while twitching and cooking meals out of "fried chikin" and collared greens. All About the Benjamins strays from normal African stereotypes and focuses on greed in many forms. A self-gaining sort and an oblivious form. In this film, Ice Cube's searching for diamonds to produce his own P.I. firm while Mike Epps is attempting to recover his $60 million dollar winning lottery ticket to which he shouts daydreams of spending it all on "bling". The idea itself is insulting to the current state of our economy. This wasn't as bad of an idea as the creation of Confessions of a Shopaholic. The action sequences are decently shot and don't suffer too much from jump-cuts and obnoxious editing techniques. Just when the getting is good, Mike Epps saves the day by bumbling around, dropping weapons in water and just generally fucking everything up. The final product is highly entertaining but irritating in seasoned retrospect. It seems that Ice Cube has a habit with pairing up with the most annoying actors in existence, a stooge if you will, as if to make himself look cool by comparison; but hey, it works wonders for his large ego. All About the Benjamins is a bit of a blunder baring subversive sociological elements but in the end makes the project contrived, nevertheless amusing on a high level. In a way, Soiled Sinema is all about the Benjamin's.

-mAQ

WHERE EVIL DWELLS

Kevin Connor (1982)

With the exception of a handful of Nick Zedd flicks, the proudly amateurish aberrant-garde filmmakers of the so-called Cinema of Transgression movement were hardly responsible for producing any actual notable feature-length films, so it is somewhat ironic that one of the few features associated with the NYC underground scene, Where Evil Dwells (1985) co-directed by the seemingly mismatched duo of marginal underground auteur Tommy Turner (Simonland, The Black Knights of the Skillman) and queer anti-Renaissance man David Wojnarowicz (A Fire in My Belly, Fear of Disclosure: Psycho-Social Implications of HIV Revelation) was, somewhat fittingly destroyed in a fire, especially considering its decidedly destructive quasi-Satanic message and wickedly wayward essence, before it was ever completed (according to Wojnarowicz, about 3/4 of the film was completed before he called it quits, left the project entirely in Turner's seemingly careless hands, and went on to work on more personal projects). Luckily, a 28-minute 'preview' cut of the decidedly D.I.Y. art-punk-trash slasher (which was originally titled Satan Teens) that was screened at the 1985 Downtown New York Film Festival has survived and, judging by this sort of trailer on steroids, which certainly feels complete in an abstract avant-garde sort of way (indeed, the film has a beginning, end, and tons of things in between), I would not be surprised if this butchered cut is more effective than the original proposed feature-length version (which was apparently around 120 minutes in length) would have been. Indeed, seeming like the abortive celluloid miscreation of the sub-literate punk gorehound progeny of Luis Buñuel and Frans Zwartjes, the film was originally intended as a Super-8 feature with sync sound and a linear plot but now exists as a sort of sadistically spastic montage-driven (anti)tribute to slasher cinema that even features the NYC art fag equivalent of masked retardards like 'Leatherface' of Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) and Jason Voorhees of the dreaded Friday the 13th franchise. A sort of celluloid anti-exorcism against the mainstream media and carny-esque televangelists, the film is based on the particularly pathetic true crime story of drug-addled self-stylized teenage Satanist Ricky 'The Acid King' Kasso, who committed the singularly senseless act of murdering his 17-year-old friend Gary Lauwers by stabbing him in the neck and head somewhere between 17 and 36 times (on top of gouging out his eyes and burning his body) during a bonfire in Long Island in June 1984 merely because the young man allegedly stole 10 bags of cheap PCP from him. Naturally, after foolishly bragging to teens that he had murdered Lauwers in tribute to Satan and even taking unbelieving friends to the site of the decaying mutilated corpse in a fashion not unlike in River's Edge (1986) directed by Tim Hunter, Kasso was soon arrested and he apparently found jail so unpleasant that he opted to commit suicide by hanging himself in his cell only a mere two days after he was detained, thus demonstrating that the cartoon Satan hardly empowered the moronic metalheads that mindlessly worshiped him. Divided into four main segments, including a lengthy introduction, a montage depicting the murder, Kasso's failed attempt to enter heaven and eventually the teen's successful attempt to enter hell, Where Evil Dwells is ultimately a bad celluloid trip where mainstream Christian America and pop culture are heretically defiled by hopelessly amateurish subversive sod art of the largely obnoxiously unholy, superficially iconoclastic, and oftentimes absurdly fetishistic sort. Indeed, Turner and Wojnarowicz's film is more or less as politically retarded and morally bankrupt as most of the films associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement, but luckily it at least features striking and sometimes allegorical imagery, a largely oneiric structure and atmosphere, and a fairly tolerable soundtrack that certainly sounds like the kind of music that some teenage degenerates from the 1980s would listen to while sadistically slaughtering their friend while high on acid in retaliation for stolen angel dust.

WHERE EVIL DWELLS

While Where Evil Dwells is considered a sort of landmark work of the Cinema of Transgression movement, co-auteur David Wojnarowicz—the only filmmaker associated with the scene that was already an established artist of some notability (in fact, he funded the film with money that he had made off of some of his paintings)—certainly was not completely playing by Nick Zedd's megalomaniacal rules, or as he once stated himself, "I think maybe it's just philosophically or something, but I thought I was pretty peripheral to that whole film scene. I participated in some of it...I always felt like I was watching from or witnessing it from the side." Indeed, while horribly hokey and awkwardly amateurish in parts, the film oftentimes has a genuine hellishly foreboding quality about it that almost seems to mock the all-too-self-conscious crap celluloid kitsch of Mr. Zedd. As his spoken word sessions and poetry certainly demonstrate, Wojnarowicz was a perennially pissed off fag with a genuine hatred of the mainstream American evangelical right, which he would ultimately blame for his death via AIDS. Notably, both directors could relate to quasi-archetypal alienated teen Kasso, but neither could relate to his heinous crimes nor the seemingly hypocritical authoritarian structure of his (pseudo)Satanic social circle, or as Wojnarowicz once wrote as revealed in an interview featured in the book Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant, "We were using the script to talk about relationships of power: how the leader was given power by the other kids and even though he was kind of stupid, the other kids' adulation and respect kept him propped up there in control. It's kind of like Ronald Reagan." Somewhat curiously, Where Evil Dwells features a quasi-narrator in the form of a creepy old Howdy Doody ventriloquist doll with a sadistically sardonic attitude that seems to reflect not only the murderous yet childish behavior of upper-middleclass loser Kasso and his Guido metalhead comrades, but also the contrived morality of the American Pie 1950s and the death of suburbia and, in turn, the so-called American dream. At the beginning of the film, the doll is rather fittingly held by Wojnarowicz, who is seemingly dead as demonstrated by the fact that his eyes are hanging out of his eye sockets and he is covered in Buttgerit-esque guts and gore. When the doll jokes, "Hey, checkout this girl. She hung around the wrong crowd," the film cuts to a delightfully morbid shot of a chick hanging by her neck from a noose in a post-industrial hellhole in a sardonic scene featuring girly 1950s romance music. Eventually, the film cuts to a shot of Wojnarowicz, who was also a noted street artist that would tag quotes by William S. Burroughs onto the side of buildings, spray-painting "Where Evil Dwells" over a suburban neighborhood juxtaposed with the distortion-and-drums heavy eponymous 'theme song' by J. G. Thirlwell's electronic noise-rock project Wiseblood in a scene that less than subtly ultimately accuses suburbia of being the true source of all-things-sinister. From there, a nihilistic montage begins featuring an old Volkswagen on fire, Kasso and his degenerate buddies destroying buses by beating them with metal rods, and various other examples of decidedly dumb teenage delinquency. To go with the film's potent theme of moronic teenage delinquency and Kasso's own personal taste in music, the popular song "Hell Bells" by AC/DC is blasted on the soundtrack (notably, Kasso was arrested while wearing an AC/DC shirt).

The second unofficial segment of the film focuses on the crimes of the main subject and fittingly begins with a vaguely dream-like scene where a priestly Devil (charismatically portrayed by lowbrow pop surrealist artist Joe Coleman, who was incidentally raised the Irish-Catholic tradition) initiates Kasso into the hermetic spiritual realm of the Dark Arts by sharing with him some blood from a goblet as a fairly poorly made inverted cross humorously hangs on the wall in the background. In his first act in tribute to Satan, Kasso goes graverobbing with some of his long-haired burnout buddies and senselessly attempts to destroy a skeleton that he has just dug up by trying in vain to decapitate it with the same shovel he used to dig it up. Of course, fiddling with a decayed corpse is nothing compared to transforming a living human-being into worm meat, or so Kasso will eventually learn on his quest to satisfy Satan's unquenchable thirst for all-things-evil. When the film cuts back to Howdy Doody, co-director Turner appears, knocks over Wojnarowicz with a machete, and takes over his co-director's place as the ventriloquist. Ultimately, Howdy explains to Turner regarding the supposed objective of Where Evil Dwells that, "It explores the constructions of evil in contemporary America." When Turner naively asks the doll "What's evil?," Mr. Doody states "I'll show you" and then proceeds to repeatedly stab the filmmaker in the chest with a knife while expressing a sense of savagely sadistic glee that will ultimately characterize Kasso when he kills his comrade. While playfully succumbing to his wounds, Turner cries, "the devil got me," in a line of dialogue that is clearly meant to mock the tendency of the mainstream media and Christian Evangelists to blame murder and various other crimes on evil forces, especially Satan, instead of the actual criminal.

WHERE EVIL DWELLS

After the dummy wastes Turner, Kasso and his comrades up the ante in terms of their crimes by dropping a fully dressed skeleton dummy off of a bridge on the Long Island Expressway, which smashes into pieces upon being hit by a car driven by a unsuspecting motorist played by Wojnarowicz (indeed, it seems David W. had the most eclectic 'roles' in the film). In what is arguably the most intricate and abstract segment of the film in a nearly 10-minute-long abstract montage that intersects a scene of a first-person-perspective rollercoaster ride (this scene recalls the ending of the No Wave 'classic' She Had Her Gun All Ready (1978) directed by Vivienne Dick), shots of the devil hanging out at an abandoned railroad station and eventually self-combusting (as his performance in the film Mondo New York (1988) demonstrates, Coleman used to do a performance art routine under the persona of 'Dr. Momboozoo' where he would shock audiences by randomly setting off fireworks that were hidden under his clothing), nighttime shots of a wooded bonfire where Kasso violently murders boyish blond Gary Lauwers by repeatedly stabbing him the eyes with a knife, and daytime shots of the location of the crime where natural violence is depicted in the form of hundreds upon hundreds of maggots feeding on the corpse of a dead dog and a wounded bird succumbing to its wounds, among other things. After the death of Lauwers, Howdy Doody makes his final appearance in a scene where he is dragged away while screaming after showing off the bloody knife he just used to kill Turner in a scene that seems to symbolize 'dummy' Kasso's 'fall from grace' as a moron that mindlessly killed a friend in ostensible tribute to Satan who now has to face the less than comfortable consequences of his nonsensical actions. Somewhat unfortunately, Kasso's untimely post-arrest suicide is not depicted in the film, thus leading the viewer to suspect that the scene was destroyed in Turner's apartment fire.

In the third and shortest segment of the film, killer Kasso, who has clearly already committed self-slaughter in his jail cell, attempts to enter 'heaven,' which is in the form of a decrepit and dimly lit restaurant featuring only a handful of occupants where a decidedly degenerate Jesus Christ (played by Sid Vicious' one-time drug dealer, guido junky Rockets Redglare of Jim Jarmusch's Stranger Than Paradise (1984) and Down By Law (1986)) voraciously eats greasy chicken legs and chugs down cans of cheap beer like a gluttonous pig. Not exactly the flashiest of dressers, Kasso attempts to enter heaven while sporting nothing but a pair of jeans and is denied entry by a sort of suavely dressed blond angelic bodyguard, who does not exactly seem particularly impressed with the young killer's pleas for perennial paradise. Notably, the scenes of the debauched Jesus taking drags of cigarettes and belligerently spitting out bits of his food are juxtaposed with degenerate jazz and audio clips of a televangelist proselytizing and stating unintentionally humorous things like, "What kind of preacher do you think Jesus was? Some of you picture him as some little sissy holding a little billy goat in his hands.” Ultimately, the heaven segment concludes with Jesus flinging his food synced with the carny Christian preacher declaring, “Why do you think the Apostle Paul had his head chopped off? They laid him on a tree and killed him. They killed him because he looked the Pharisees right in the eye. I haven’t been that brave yet. I do it through a television camera.” Clearly, Wojnarowicz and Turner find nothing brave in what the preacher does, but I suspect they feel like they are brave for creating a film like Where Evil Dwells.

Undoubtedly, the fourth and final segment of the film is pure post-industrial apocalyptic anarchy and depicts Kasso’s chaotic descent into hell, which is rather fittingly set to the less than soothing apocalyptic sounds of Diamanda Galás. Shot at a warehouse in lower Manhattan containing a train locomotive that the directors took full advantage of, the segment seems like what might have happened if a couple beauty-hating punks decided to remake Derek Jarman’s classic kaleidoscopic surrealist short Art of Mirrors (1973) in tribute to their favorite slasher killers and S&M bondage flicks. Completely chaotic in direction, framing, narrative, editing, and even wardrobe, the hell segment mainly seems to be a platform for the directors to depict certain sexual fetishes and fantasies they might have had at the time, hence the abundance of unclad men and women in chains and general BDSM-esque imagery that involves supposed demons punishing the damned in a variety of sexually degrading ways that ultimately seem rather tame and goofy in comparison to the torture scenes featured in Pasolini’s swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975). In its depiction of one half-naked demon sporting both a Freddy Krueger glove and Jason Voorhees face and another half-naked masked demon resembling the more hedonistic yet less homicidal little brother of Leatherface, the segment ultimately has a sort of conspicuously kitschy low-camp character to it that makes it more than clear that the filmmakers do not believe in hell and have seen one-too-many shitty slasher flicks. In a scene that seems like Kenneth Anger’s Scorpio Rising (1964) meets Mad Max Beyond Thunderdome (1985), a hot leather-clad blonde and two leather-fag-esque male friends sit on a large motorcycle together while joyously whipping a prisoner in bondage while Leatherface stands close by and jumps around like a jubilant retard. Baphomet also makes an appearance in the form of a man with a large goat-skull perching on a wall as if he is a bird of prey that is waiting to bite Kasso on his candy ass. Arguably, the most creepy ‘character’ featured in the segment and film in general is a sort of post-apocalyptic tribal negro with a horn on his forehead who is wearing nothing but a straw skirt and chains and who crawls across the top of the train locomotive like a gay ape that is looking for somebody or some thing to rape. Indeed, as demonstrated by a scene where a demon takes a look down the booty shorts of a slightly muscular blond twink that is lifting weights, sodomy is wholly permitted in Wojnarowicz and Turner’s wayward vision of hell. As for Kasso, he is almost wholly irrelevant to the segment and only makes fleeting appearances as a sort of cipher who has already served his purpose for the film as a whole. If there is any star of the hell segment, it is certainly Coleman as the Devil, who is depicted at one point biting off the heads of live rats that have been served to him on a silver platter by a fairly unsavory Satanic butler that is clearly modeled after Alfred Hitchcock. In a scene that is obviously one of Coleman's self-combustion performances ran in reverse, the devil manages to suck an ominous cloud of smoke and sparks back into his body, thus marking the end of the film and the beginning of Kasso's eternal internment in the hyper-hedonistic pleasure-dome known as hell.

WHERE EVIL DWELLS

If there is any film that seems to manage to depict the collective unconscious of too-stupid-to-be-tragic suicidal killer Ricky Kasso and his similarly infantile metalhead comrades, it is indubitably Where Evil Dwells, which ultimately feels like the most intricate, idiosyncratic, and aesthetically ambitious homemade horror flick ever made as a sort of crack-addled 1980s equivalent to the classic cult horror flick Equinox (1970). In fact, I would argue that the two similarly primitive horror films make for a greatly insightful double-feature, as comparing the flicks will really help the viewer to understand how drastically the morality and spirituality of American's youth has changed over the course of a mere two decade period (while released in 1970, Equinox was actually shot in 1967). While Equinox features a fairly traditional depiction of good and evil and was obviously heavily influenced by the writings of H.P. Lovecraft, Where Evil Dwells depicts the suburbs as a sort of figurative hell and contains a curious moral compass that is almost as broken as that of its subject Ricky Kasso and the mediocre mainstream heavy metal bands that the killer listened to. Notably, exploitation auteur Jim Van Bebber's undeniably hilarious short My Sweet Satan (1994) is almost as morally retarded as Wojnarowicz and Turner's flick in terms of its cynical depiction of Kasso's crimes, but at least it does not feature a sort of glaringly superficial pseudo-(meta)political subtext about the supposed sinister character of the suburbs. In terms of films presenting a less artsy fartsy approach to the Kasso case, Matthew Carnahan's Black Circle Boys (1997) features a fictionalized account of the story and it is not much more than an eclectically mediocre coming-of-age melodrama that was made to wet the panties of preteen girls as demonstrated by the fact that it stars intellectually vacant pretty boys like Donnie Wahlberg, Scott Bairdow, and Eric Mabius portraying teenage Goth druggie degenerates. While certainly superior to Black Circle Boys, the unreleased feature Ricky 6 (2000) directed by Hollywood screenwriter Peter Filardi (Flatliners, The Craft) and starring Vincent Kartheiser as a fictional character based on Kasso can hardly be described as a masterpiece. Incidentally, at the end of the somewhat generic but informative Kasso documentary Satan in the Suburbs (2000), narrator Will Lyman's final three last words are, "...where evil dwells." Of course, judging simply by the doc's grating docudrama reenactment scenes, I doubt the makers ever bothered to watch Turner and Wojnarowicz's bizarrely kitschy Kasso piece.

In many ways, Where Evil Dwells is strikingly different from Wojnarowicz's other films, namely in that it is almost completely devoid of homosexual content and reductionist orientated accusations against Christianity, Ronald Reagan, and the U.S. Government for supposedly being directly responsible for the fact that armies of tearoom homos were kicking the bucket as a result of gay cancer. Of course, the film is also in many ways typical of the filmmaker's oeuvre due to its aberrant allegorical imagery and in that it features overtly hateful one-dimensional agitprop style assaults against Christianity and suburbia, thereupon oftentimes making the film seem like the lurid yet somewhat botched wet dream of some bitterly enraged and innately irrational punk rock poser who dropped out of high school and wants to take out all of his anger on his parents for not understanding him. Judging by Turner's short Simonland (1984)—a mind-numbingly dumb and remarkably technically inept film about mind-control that, according to Nick Zedd in his work Bleed, was not surprisingly shot while all the actors and crew members were "high on dope"—one can probably assume that the more goofy and philistine oriented aspects of Where Evil Dwells can be credited to him and not Wojnarowicz, whose avant-garde queer works like Fear of Disclosure: Psycho-Social Implications of HIV Revelation (1989) co-directed Phil Zwickler and ITSOFOMO: In the Shadow of Forward Motion (1991) co-directed by Ben Neill are completely devoid of narratives and hardly feature the sort of less than half-baked stoner humor that is typical of his comrade. Indeed, the film might be not much more than a 'glorified trailer' that was directed by two serious fuck ups, but Where Evil Dwells is certainly one of the more idiosyncratic and inventive films of the Cinema of Transgression movement and one could fairly safely argue that this is largely the result of Wojnarowicz's angst-ridden Weltanschauung, which was clearly more cultivated than that of one-note wonders like Zedd and Richard Kern.

Notably, it seems that Wojnarowicz, who funded Where Evil Dwells with money that he made from selling his paintings, decided to give up on the film before it was finished due to problems Turner and his drug addiction (it is rumored that he shot part of the film's budget into his arm), or as he said in a 1991 interview with Jeri Cain Rossi, "I mean, it just kept going and going and going [...] It was fun. But it just got too scattered because of the addiction and stuff, and so finally I just said 'Look, I've got to stop. I can't go any further.' And we shot at least three quarters of the film. I think there are still a handful of scenes. We wanted to get down but we never had a chance." Of course, as a sometimes filmmaker who is probably better known for everything else he did aside from filmmaking (though his film work made posthumous headlines in November 2010 when his work A Fire in My Belly was removed from the Smithsonian Institution as a result of pressure from a Catholic group that felt it contained 'hate speech' due to a silly scene where ants crawl on a crucifix), it should be no surprise that most of Wojnarowicz's cinematic works remain unfinished and largely exists in fragmented excerpt forms. As a man that is largely (in)famous for going on heated performance art rants where it seems like his head is going to explode (notably, in the Rosa von Praunheim doc Silence = Death (1990), he states regarding his belief that the U.S. Government is responsible for homos dying of AIDS, "It's not my sucking dick that is responsible for my death, or my getting fucked in the ass, or any of these things. These people, at this point, are responsible for my death because their inactivity and their total gesture of silence after eight years of this"), Wojnarowicz seems like a perennial angry teenage boy and Where Evil Dwells is certainly nothing if not a surprisingly potent yet pathetic piece of visceral youthful celluloid rage. Indeed, as a sometimes reluctant supporter of the auteur theory, I tend to believe that most good films can only have one god and the film certainly suffers from the masturbatory fantasies of a resentful queer in a sort of internal personal hell who hates Christianity more than homo-hating Evangelicals hate gay agitators like himself. Undoubtedly, the best compliment I can pay Where Evil Dwells is that it almost has a mystifying essence about it to the point where one could almost believe that it was made by a cult of murderous Kasso fanboys who dug up the teenage junky killer's grave and placed the film inside his casket, only for it to be unearthed a decade or so later by another group of morbidly misguided Kasso fanboys and unleashed onto the world without warning. Of course, I also like to think that Kasso would have loved and worshiped the film more than he purported to love and worship the devil.

WHERE EVIL DWELLS

-Ty E

THE LAST KING OF SCOTLAND

Kevin Macdonald* (2006)

The Zionists that run Hollywood certainly have a keen talent for producing fictional works (presented ambiguously as fact) demonizing their enemies and influencing Americans to hate these notorious Anti-Zionist figures. Virtually every American has an irrational hatred of the Austrian painter with the Charlie Chaplin mustache from a lifelong bombardment of propaganda via Judaic Hollywood but not as many people are familiar with a charismatic dictator from Uganda known as Idi Amin. Who better than master Uncle Tom actor Forest Whitaker to grossly caricature Idi Amin in the Hollywood Zio-Bio-Pic The Last King of Scotland? After all, Whitaker proved his affinity for playing peculiar Negro perverts when he acted as a British soldier who enjoyed the company of a racially/sexually ambiguous tranny in the film The Crying Game. In The Last King of Scotland, Hollywood goes all out parodying one of the greatest independent leaders that Africa has ever known.

Nelson Mandela and Lithuanian Jewish Communist Joe Slovo giving the clenched fist salute in front of a Bolshevik Hammer and Sickle flag.

Everyone knows that one is supposed to glorify former president of South Africa Nelson Mandela as a sterling example of humanism and peace. After all, he won The Noble Peace Prize in 1993. Of course, Hollywood loves Mandela, especially since the Terrorist organization African National Congress (ANC) that he was part of was masterminded by two Communist Jews, Albie Sachs and Yossel Mashel Slovo, the kind of anti-Nationalist leaders that the vaudevillian swindlers that run Hollywood adore. On top of giving the clenched fist salute to the iron and sickle flag of bolshevism, Mandela blew up white South African civilians by utilizing (with his Jewish buddies) his talent for terrorist bombings. After all, if you are anti-European/anti-white and pro-Jewish, you fit in perfectly with the peace-loving humanists that run Hollywood. On the other hand, if you're black and promote black self-determination (without Jewish handlers), you're surely an enemy of Zion as was Idi Amin.

Idi Amin's greatest achievement as president and military leader of Uganda was his ability to completely nationalize Uganda and destroy foreign influence from the East/West. Of course, Jews being the ancient rootless cosmopolitans that they are, hate any nation that does not allow them to take over their monetary system. Out of interest for an independent Uganda and the country's financial welfare, Idi Amin decided to expel Israeli military advisers from his country and even had plans to wage war against Israel. In fact, in the documentary General Idi Amin Dada: A Self Portrait directed by Barbet Schroeder, Idi Amin explains that he had to kick the Israelis out of his nation as they were attempting to bankrupt him. Of course, in the Hollywood film The Last King of Scotland, Idi Amin's nationalizing of Uganda is presented as an act of irrational and despicable racism. For all the condemning of racism Hollywood does, it surely does not want the black man to stand on his own two feet but to cripple him and “pick him up” with special Kosher blessed crutches (at the cost of the evil European/Euro-American, of course).

THE LAST KING OF SCOTLAND

In the film The Last King of Scotland (based on a novel written by English author Giles Foden), Idi Amin finds his top adviser in the form of a young Scottish doctor in his early twenties. After all, what better way to discredit a true Black Nationalist leader than having a fictional second-rate Brit (a Scotsman, not an Englishman) acting as the true brains behind Idi Amin’s militaristic regime. The Idi Amin featured in The Last King of Scotland is such a buffoon baboon that he thinks that he is dying as a result of drinking too many beers and popping too many aspirin. Naturally, The Scottish doctor soon realizes that Idi Amin’s pain will soon be expelled via a bomb of flatulence. I do not think Hollywood has even gone as far as presenting Adolf Hitler in such an impotent and pathetic scenario as Idi Amin is in whilst passing bad gas in The Last King of Scotland. Maybe the quasi-bolshevik filmmakers behind the film were thinking about Uncle Adolf when they were making The Last King of Scotland as the Austrian Wagnerite did have a problem with flatulence in real-life.

Not only does the Scottish doctor advise Idi Amin on the most imperative issues surrounding Uganda but he also enjoys coitus with one of the dictator’s many wives, surely the ultimate insult to the super pimp of Uganda. When Idi Amin finds out one of his many Negress wives bedded a white devil, he has her body so mutilated that the scene could be best described as The African Chainsaw Massacre. Of course, just as the Zionist media has portrayed Idi Amin as a cannibal with no evidence whatsoever, they have also portrayed him as a wife mutilator in The Last King of Scotland. Unlike the rumors regarding Idi Amin’s love for dark meat, it has been factually proven that the Israelis have engaged in organ harvesting, international sex slavery, and the intentional radiation poisoning of their own children (or at least the “second-rate” Sephardi Jews). Quite fittingly, The Last King of Scotland concludes with the incident at Entebbe airport where Idi Amin allowed a Palestinian hijacked airplane to land. Like all Hollywood films regarding World War II, The Last King of Scotland lets the audience know that Jews are special victims when Idi Amin gives freedom to all hostages except the Israelis. The film closes with the Zionist Braggart text: “Forty-eight hours later, Israeli forces stormed Entebbe and liberated all but one of the hostages. International public opinion turned against Amin for good.”

The Real Idi Amin and his feelings on World Jewry Despite being a film that is supposed to carry an anti-racist message, The Last King of Scotland is surely a film that attempts to exploit racial feelings, especially in white males. The viewer is supposed to identify with the fictional Scottish protagonist as he progressively experiences Idi Amin’s sadistic Negro barbarism. The real Idi Amin made no lie of his racial chauvinism but unlike Red Saint Nelson Mandela, Idi Amin was never canonized as a fighter for peace and tolerance. Despite blowing up white people left and right, Nelson Mandela has been glorified for helping to end apartheid. Of course, Idi Amin attempted to end apartheid as well, only it was the one that the Zionists have been running murderously against the Palestinians (who, according to Zionists, don't exist) ever since they started occupying Palestine. If Hollywood only had the opportunity teach gentiles one lesson, it is this: European/White Institutions = Evil/Must be destroyed. Jewish supremacist/Anti-Nationalist Globalist institutions = Good/Peace. Idi Amin stood up against Zionist supremacy/global homogeneity and despite his regime collapsing long ago, his enemies have concocted a cinematic trophy in the name of his defeat. Personally, I will always think of Idi Amin as the Negro Hermann Göring, a charismatic man with valuable principles flawed by his own eccentricity.

-Ty E

BLOOD IN THE FACE
BLOOD IN THE FACE

Kevin Rafferty (1991)

It has been sometime since I originally saw Anne Bohlen's Blood in the Face documentary on Neo-Nazis and Christian Ku Klux Klaners. After just watching it for the second time, I must admit that the documentary is an embarrassment to the white race. No matter how much people hate the original National Socialists from Germany, they at least have to admit they were a powerful force to be reckoned with. The most power these "subjects" have in Blood in the Face is controlling an audience of 30 or so Christian anti-intellectual followers. Although most documentaries and films on Neo-Nazis are obviously biased, Blood in the Face is pretty fair in the treatment of its subjects. The documentary for the most part just features Aryan wannabes incriminating themselves as a pathetic fringe of the white race. The Neo-"Nazis" obsession with white power is the final resort in these miserable people's dead end lives.

The Elite American SS Ironically, many of the "Aryans" in Blood in the Face seem to have some type of nonwhite blood admixture. One of the first speakers in the documentary has a certain kosher charisma that you could only find in a vaudeville performance. When this goofy fellow in fatigues and a beret has "shabbos goy stooges" roll off his lips it seems a little too natural. One also cannot forget the far from Nordic elderly man who declares he hates all "mud people." I wouldn't be surprised if this man had some type of Negro blood somewhere in his mutated family tree. Church burner and best friend killer Varg Kikernes had something profound to say when he mentioned why purely Aryan type whites generally don't gravitate towards Neo-Nazism. Varg stated in the fun book Lords of Chaos, "The people who really could claim the Nordic heritage, they don't bother. They don't really think about it because it's so obvious to them...when they look in the mirror they see a true Norseman. They don't see mixture. It's not so easy for them to become aware of it." Hail Victory!!...or something My favorite segment of Blood in the Face is the footage of the first American Neo-Nazi George Lincoln Rockwell. Unlike virtually all Neo-Nazis, Rockwell was fairly intelligent, charismatic, a natural salesman, and a comedian. In fact, I would even go as far as saying that Rockwell was one of the greatest American comedians of the past century. George Lincoln Rockwell's father Doc was a fairly successful vaudevillian comedian and friends with famous Jewish comedian Groucho Marx. Even when not joking George Lincoln Rockwell warrants laughing out loud humor. For example, when a news reporter asks how many American Jews are traitors, Rockwell responds with something along the lines of, "my guess with no type of scientific evidence to back it up is that 80% of Jews are traitors and will have to be gassed." Aside from Rockwell, most of the other people in Blood in the Face make me want to vomit. Unfortunately, the boyish looking and extremely nice David Duke is only featured in Blood in the Face for a minute or two. I assume this is because he is one of the few legitimate and successful of pro-white politicians who had the good common sense to take off the Ku Klux Klown mask and put on a suave suit.

Excerpt of George Lincoln Rockwell in Blood in the Face

Many of the geniuses featured in Blood in the Face are huge fans of Jew Jesus Christ. All these supposed anti-Semites consider the greatest man ever to live to be megalomaniac Jew Jesus. A fellow named Pastor Butler brings out a crucifix with a swastika on it. The title of the documentary "Blood in the Face" also comes from Adam in the bible who showed his big red cheeks. One of the Christian Neo-Nazis also brings up how only the humble white man can show red in the cheeks. The real Nazis, although presenting themselves as Christians of sorts, were for the most part hostile to Christianity. Nazi philosopher Alfred "Rosenberg" promoted "positive" Christianity in his philosophical masterpiece The Myth of the Twentieth Century. About a ¼ of the book is dedicated to promoting the Anti-Christ philosophies of German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche. The Neo-Nazis in Blood in the Face would obviously never make it anywhere with their beliefs as they have the slave mentality of Christianity. Is this gnome a future white leader and white revolutionary? Blood in the Face is a depressing documentary for any people that care about white culture. The only chance of any type of "white revolution" is if whites are finally backed into a corner far enough that they are forced into fighting. There are surely many more Michael Moores (who is surprisingly slimmer in the documentary) than there are "pro-white" activists. Any white person that watches Blood in the Face will no doubt have blood in their face showing out of embarrassment after watching it. At the very least, the viewer will have blood in the face from laughter.

-Ty E

RED STATE
RED STATE

Kevin Smith (2011)

I have always made no lie of my irrevocable repulsion towards fatty fanboy filmmaker Kevin Smith and his fecal-fuming films. I don't know about most people but I find Smith's adolescent cinematic contemplations on romance-gone-wrong and prepubescent sex jokes to be nothing more than symbiotic of the white-man-child epidemic that has plagued America for the past two decades or so. After all, if any film director (and I use this word loosely for the mere convenience) epitomizes the thoroughly emasculated American white male, it is Kevin Smith; the pudgy comic book super-nerd-nerd-enabler whose generous sized bitch tits would undoubtedly put prematurely deceased Baltimorean Divine's man-mammary-glands to shame. When I found out that Smith directed a horror movie, I couldn't think of a more appalling prospect for a film. After all, it is no secret that most horror films suffer from poorly written dialogue but a horror flick with dialogue dreamed up by Kevin Smith could only bring further shame to the seemingly shameless genre. Smith's horror film is entitled Red State and as one would expect from the title, it is also of a blatantly political nature. Indeed, just by knowing the synopsis of the film and the mental-eunuch man behind it, one can assume that Red State is arguably one of the worst ideas for a film ever. After his recent fallout with brothers Weinstein and a number of cinematic abortions over the past decade or so, one can only assume that Red State is a work of desperation created by a one-trick pussy filmmaker whose artistic impotence and lack of passionate vision is only rivaled by his lack of testosterone. Unsurprisingly, I found Red State to be not only the worst film I have seen all year but also Smith's most lackluster attempt at assembling something resembling a feature-length film.

Despite Kevin Smith's assurance that Red State would feature nil of the preschool-potty-mouth humor that permeates throughout his work; the plot of the film is essentially a propaganda piece for such repugnant and sexually immature themes and unsurprisingly features them as well. In the film, a trio of toddler-like teenage turdlings travel to a stereotypically bigoted rural county so they can gang-bang a milf that one of the boys met on a sex website. Of course, the three friends travel under a false pretense and fall prey to a militant Judeo-Christian family church modeled after real-life pastor Fred "I hate fags" Phelps's infamous church. Todd McCarthy of the Hollywood Reporter described Red States as, "A potent cinematic hand grenade tossed to bigots everywhere" yet the film itself is a flaccid work of atheistic intolerance with anti-Southern and anti-Christian stereotypes that are so predictable that it is essentially an unintentional parody of typical liberal Hollywood parodies. I don't know whether or not God hates fags but he most certainly hates bovine fanboy filmmakers as the mediocrity of Red State attests to. Ironically and hypocritically, Kevin Smith modeled his self-distribution of Red State after Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ (2004). Unlike Gibson's film, Red State lacks brutal carnality and an apt atmosphere; two imperative ingredients one expects from quality horror films. Instead, Red State seems to be merely an outlet for Kevin Smith's seething hatred and fear of rural America, the Second Amendment, masculinity, tradition, Christianity, and any other individual or institution that upholds conservative values. Of course, if Smith had substituted the white Christian fundamentalists with Jewish or Islamic fundamentalists of a similar nature; he would have been branded a bigoted spreader of hate and thrown his career into an abyss much deeper than where it has already fallen.

Indeed, not even the wonderfully obnoxious charisma of celebrated character actor John Goodman could save the genre-confused and half-inseminated cinematic conception that is Red State. Various supporting cast members of the surprisingly entertaining TV series Breaking Bad are also completely wasted in the film. Michael Angarano (Lords of Dogtown, Black Irish), who played the lead protagonist in Red State, was also unable to give anything resembling a memorable acting performance; no doubt due to Kevin Smith's incompetence as a writer and director who has yet to graduate onto the maturity of a young adult. Of course, childish fantasies can make for brilliant films (e.g. the early works of Terry Gilliam and Tim Burton) yet Smith's fantasies, at best, seem to be wholly and soullessly contrived and merely an outlet for his stereotypically Hollywood liberal political agenda. If it weren't for the popular political views preached by schoolyard antichrist Kevin Smith, it would be hard for anyone to be able to revere Red State as anything more than an uninspired work of postmodern trash that falls miles below the films of Tarantino, Rob Zombie, and every other obscenely overrated fanboy would-be-auteur filmmaker. Red State is so thematically and aesthetically redundant and clinically cliché in its political agenda that it is the kind of work that will most likely make even the most faithful of libertine atheists and agnostics question the self-righteous dehumanization of the Christian "other." Suffice to say, Red State has more liberal dogma than Smith's earlier effort Dogma (1999) and less genuine horror than Chasing Amy (1997). If one can learn anything by watching Red State, it is that the mainstream left is more intellectually bankrupt than the most inbred of Southern Baptist preachers. Maybe if Kevin Smith were to have studied the work of Luis Buñuel instead of jerking off to overpriced comic books, he would have learned a couple tricks in regard to nuance and subtlety in his execution of Red State. As a film, Red State has nothing to offer to even the least demanding of horror fans. I hate to say it but maybe Kevin Smith might want to consider giving his tiresome soul back to the Weinstein bros. because at least then he would be able to make the sort of whiny beta-male garbage that made him the holy patron saint of feeble and rotund white male virgins.

-Ty E

SHEITAN
SHEITAN

Kim Chapiron (2006)

Due to my fanboy-ism of multi-cultural actor Vincent Cassel, there was no way I would miss out on our film driven by his acting. In this outing of film, Cassel plays a lunatic satanic Shepard who attracts a bunch of club hopping French youth whose main pastimes include French underground rap and unorthodox drugs with fine women. While many of us can relate to these flesh-like temptations, I don't think anyone would agree that they would deserve a fate such as the one in store for them. This film succeeds where most films similarly fail. Sheitan is the shining light, the bringer of justice, for films that have a problem of being over-edited. The film incorporates flashy visuals and brightly contrasted colors, as not seen by most French films. When you view most of their outgoing cinema, it seems they produce a film in black & white and slap the art label on it. Sheitan is a work of the similar "You have sex, you die. You do drugs, you die" but with a religious spin that involves a creepy fucking doll. The film is entirely star driven. Cassel found this lost script so intriguing, that he funded most of the film out of his bottomless pockets. If there is one thing I loved, it was Cassel's racism in the film. I have never seen any one mustachioed man call a Negro out using crude vulgarities and still maintain his sly grin as if nothing of temperament was handled. Despite the black racism, there is also hate for other colors. The film is top-notch, sans a couple of scenes that it could have been without. Sheitan delivers on a top-notch entertainment level. Vincent Cassel not only shines, but he illuminates the entire film. If I had to use only one word to describe Cassel in this film, it would be sinister. You will cheer him back on screen, only to be horrified by him, and demand that he leave. Sheitan is fierce, fast, and unmerciful. Satan would be proud.

-Maq

SQUALOR MOTEL

Kim Christy (1985)

Forget Gregory Dark's (in)famous hardcore crossover hit New Wave Hookers (1985), Squalor Motel (1985) directed by Kim Christy (Dream Lovers, She-Male Sanitarium), which was released the same year, is the ultimate punk/new wave/new romanticist fuck flick. Indeed, like Slava Tsukerman's dystopian cult classic Liquid Sky (1982) minus the sci-fi meets Mark L. Lester's Class of 1984 (1982) minus the crime elements meets the old school video game Maniac Mansion (1987) on Viagra as directed by the tranny and Yazoo obsessed grandnephew of Norman Bates, Christy's preternaturally lecherous celluloid labyrinth is unquestionably one of the most idiosyncratic, bizarre, and memorable hardcore flicks of the late porn chic era. Featuring an eclectic freak show of perverted motel dwellers with a new wave/new romanticist fashion sense, a multicultural transvestite punk band, an original synthesizer-driven musical score, and a sensual surrealist mise-en-scène that seems like that result of kraut cult auteur Eckhart Schmidt attempting to mimic everything from Jean Cocteau to Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920), Squalor Motel is celluloid sleaze with style that is as just as fetishistic in its set design, wardrobe, and music as it is sexually. Set in a patently politically incorrect pervert pandemonium of pleasure that is inhabited by a lady-licking bald bastard with a rather repellant French art fag mustache, a deranged blowjob-demanding doorman as portrayed by Jamie Gillis (Through the Looking Glass, Water Power), a Hitler-like physician of the Nazi mad scientist sort portrayed by Hebraic porn star Herschel Savage (Debbie Does Dallas, Blonde Ambition) that attempts to cure a Jewess of her frigidity by giving her an extensive gynecological exam with his tongue and member, and an impotent redneck with a seemingly supernatural collection of blowup dolls, Christy's extra curious post-punk porno will certainly appeal to fans of both the oeuvre of avant-garde pornographer 'Rinse Dream' aka Stephen Sayadian (Nightdreams trilogy, Café Flesh, Dr. Caligari) and Liquid Sky, as a delightfully deranged and decadent dream-within-a-dream where nothing is as it seems, especially during sex. Indeed, New Wave Hookers might be good unclean fun featuring Judaic Jamie Gillis and a little negro fantasizing about "white bitches" that get horny from listening to new wave music, but Squalor Motel is a shockingly stylish and nicely nuanced proto-alt-porn piece that features an entire unhinged universe that reminds the viewer that there was indeed once a time when the degenerates in the porn industry cared about creating salaciously stylish and creative celluloid art. Either that or cult porn auteur Kim Christy, who is a transvestite that specialized in tranny porn, was more interested in set-design than heterosexual sex.

Miss Clark (played by Colleen Brennan, who previously appeared in popular exploitation works like Jack Hill's Foxy Brown, Russ Meyer's Supervixens and Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS) works at the front desk of a sleazy yet stylish new wave themed motel and she constantly reads extra-erotic novels with delightful little titles like “Bound Pig Fuckers” and dreams about all sorts of meta-sexual debauchery, so sometimes she has a hard time separating reality from fantasy, especially when it comes to sensual matters. Miss Clark works for a sleazy, swarthy, and considerably repulsive Hebrew-like fellow named Manny (Nick Random), who she incessantly cock-teases by saying super sassy things like, “Too bad you don’t have any class. You know, if you were half the man...some nights I might let you lick my ass. You would like that, would you Manny...running your tongue between the cheeks of my butt.” Not unlike Norman Bates, Manny loves cross-dressing and spying on his guests via peepholes that he has assembled in all of the rooms of his truly offbeat motel from hedonistic hell. While a certified scumbag of the patently pathetic sort, Manny is not greedy, as he allows Miss Clark to join him while looking at guests engaging in carnal games via peepholes. Indeed, through a secret peephole in a ‘hip’ and ‘edgy’ lounge segment of motel called ‘The Reptile Room’—a seemingly perennially changing pleasure-dome that is frequented by a dominatrix that wears an SS officer hat and parades around a gimp on a leash—Manny and Miss Clark get off to spying on a seemingly faggy fellow with a French art fag mustache and pancake makeup who quite shockingly exerts his rampant heterosexuality by bending over a babe on a pseudo-classical sculpture of a little girl. Of course, this sex scenario is rather tame compared to what Miss Clark while voyeuristically gaze at during the rest of the night at the maniac motel.

SQUALOR MOTEL

When a young blonde babe named Nancy (Desiree Lane) who has just married a nerdy Guido shows up to the motel to wait for her husband so they can prepare for their upcoming honeymoon in Hawaii, she has no idea that she is about to be extensively defiled by the guests and employees of the somewhat esoteric establishment. Indeed, after being forced to devour the dick of a demented doorman (Jamie Gillis) who wears a trenchcoat full of black market items ranging from Preparation H to K-Y jelly, Nancy enters the Reptile Room where a multicultural tranny new wave group is playing for an eclectic collection of erotic eccentrics, including a chain-smoking new romanticist babe who is giving a handjob to an unseen gentleman whose cock is poking out of a gloryhole. When the tranny band stops playing, all the guests of the Reptile Room stare at and mock Nancy, but luckily Miss Clark, who has a thing for the naïve and seemingly virginal newlywed as demonstrated by a long cunt-chomping dream-sequence, comes to her rescue and salaciously states, “I know just how to relax that muscular tension.” After sending Nancy somewhere so that she can ‘calm down,’ Miss Clark begins peeping inside various rooms at the hotel as a proud voyeur who admits regarding her vice, “Oh, I love to watch. Watching is almost as good as doing it.” In a sea-themed room, a stupid surfer-like dude is carnally serviced by a high yellow negress on a bed in the shape of a ship. In another bizarrely-themed room, an impotent redneck finally manages to ‘rise to the occasion’ after one of his many blowup dolls transforms into a real flesh-and-blood woman. Meanwhile, pedophile-like motel owner Manny, who is sporting nothing but a Miss Piggy mask, tiny pink bikini, and a little girl’s ballet tutu, masturbates to the bro with the magical blowup doll.

Unquestionably, one of the most sickest and shocking segments of Squalor Motel is a scene where a fellow named Dr. Thumbs (Herschel Savage)—a Svengali-like medical physician with an Uncle Adolf mustache who speaks with a horrendous pseudo-German accent and sports a bloody lab coat—‘successfully’ attempts to make a frigid Jewess named Mrs. Shipowitz (played by Tantala Ray, who previously appeared in Stephen Sayadian’s Café Flesh), who sits with her legs spread open on an operating table, sexually aroused. After Dr. Thumbs cures Mrs. Shipowitz of being a frigid sexless bitch, he tells his nurse to schedule a follow-up session, stating, “12 months or 12,000 fucks... whatever comes sooner.” In easily one of the most artfully phantasmagoric fuck scenes of cinema history, Miss Clark engages in a shadowy quasi-expressionistic threesome with a male guest whose face make-up somewhat resembles that of David Bowie’s from the cover art of the post-Ziggy Stardust album Aladdin Sane (1973) and his corpse-like lover. In the end, Nancy’s husband finally arrives, only to discover his sweetheart masturbating furiously in a closet while queen bitch Miss Clark laughs manically.

On top of being an aberrantly aesthetically pleasing experience that makes Liquid Sky seem like sentimental celluloid child’s play, Squalor Motel is a genuinely humorous cinematic affair, albeit in an innately immoral fashion that makes the literary satire of Ambrose Bierce seem quite puritanical by comparison. Indeed, one has to wonder about a porn production where Judaic porn star Herschel Savage—a man who developed his stage name with his kosher comrade Jamie Gillis (who was incidentally born on the same day as Hitler) by combining a stereotypically ‘nerdy Jewish identity’ with that of a stud—devours an ambiguously Jewish character’s cunt while donning an Uncle Adolf mustache. In other words, Squalor Motel is what one might expect in a sort of campy celluloid new wave hell. Indeed, aside from Teutonic auteur Eckhart Schmidt’s art-horror flicks like Der Fan (1982) and especially Das Gold der Liebe (1983) aka The Gold of Love, as well as Austrian cult auteur Niki Liš’s sardonic comedy Malaria (1982), Christy’s rather underrated fuck flick is probably the only film that adds an element of danger and darkness to the new wave and new romanticist subcultures. Indeed, new wave is like punk with a better fashion sense sans the visceral potency. Luckily, Squalor Motel manages to be simultaneously strong, raw, and stylish, even if it does feature ebony tranny rockers and hysterical Hebraic Hitler-wannabees.

-Ty E

A BITTERSWEET LIFE
A BITTERSWEET LIFE

Kim Jee-woon (2005)

I've heard nothing but solemn praise towards this Korean film. Regarding my preliminary viewing, I refused to accept a summary of the film. Like with all my Korean cinema, I prefer to have the entire experience to be fresh and immaculate. At the end of the day, A Bittersweet Life is plentifully engaging and another prime example of the superiority of the Koreans crafted art. Stylish, cunning, and with mastered formulas, Korean films are the best of the lot. They do what we do even better. As with the "sad hitman/bodyguard/enforcer" lifestyle, this film not only manages to breathe life into an archetype that is populated with persona clones (Bangkok Dangerous, No Mercy for the Rude, The Professional, Another Lonely Hitman). While some of these films may fare exceptionally well or even be masterpieces, A Bittersweet Life really does something fresh. One of which that A Bittersweet Life does better is the outstanding direction of the "Action" scenes. I quote action there to illustrate that the idea of action isn't an idea that is focused upon. The philosophy of combat and explosions, thrilling tense environments, are nowhere to be found. What is presented are series of brutality, plain and simple. A Bittersweet Life excels in delivering the facets of a powerful melodrama even in the midst of a final shoot out that gives Hard-Boiled a run for it's money. Many of the theory's of set art follow from Korea's earlier Oldboy. Much of the key thoughts are provoked here save for a certain twist at the end of Oldboy. Much of A Bittersweet Life revolves around subtext, as you will. The theme of revenge is tossed around quite a bit, shaking up loyalties and providing a code of the Korean mob. During a dialogue-driven scene, a line in particular will sum up the life philosophy of this film - "No one can ever see what's coming next." This provides a set-up for the ultraviolent extended climax that caps off the glorious pride/honor drama that A Bittersweet Life accompanies. In the final moments of the film, you see Sunwoo demonstrating two moments of happiness and we're not talking about his effort to normalize with several cans of Guinness. We watch behind glass as Sunwoo cracks a smile while watching Heesoo play the cello and also, his flashback to shadowboxing in the reflection of a glass window over the comforting metropolitan skyline. You might sense familiarity with Lee Byung-hun's face etched in the back of your mind. His performance in Three Extremes' Cut guaranteed the set of three films at least a bit of commercial success as how the other two films did nothing for me, really. If you haven't seen any of his work, you most certainly will with the release of G.I. Joe: Rise of Cobra come this summer/fall. A Bittersweet Life is filled with "bittersweet" moments such as his encounter with a gun for near the first documented time. Soon thereafter, he must "race" putting a gun back together in order to deliver the finishing blow on a humorous character. Such an action could not be complete with a horrible consequence. A Bittersweet Life is something to marvel at. It's organic and structured similar to a double helix strand. One could shower Taxi Driver with acclaim for introducing an incredibly violent character whose only weakness remains love, but the timeline stretches farther over Scorsese's head than realized. He only commercialized the nihilistic tone of violence and the beauty of vengeance. With symphony-like composed scenes of murder placed delicately over a light classical jingle, you can not go further. His initial entrance into the hotel marks a scene that makes relatively cheerful music something to once again fear. Films rarely get better than this. Well, maybe the Bollywood remake entitled Awarapan will capture something this missed, but I doubt it.

-mAQ

I SAW THE DEVIL
I SAW THE DEVIL

Kim Jee-woon (2010)

I've been picking my brain raw in consideration of a review on Kim Ji-woon's latest effort in the form of vigilante nihilism. Every social construct or approved branch of justice is at its mercy in I Saw the Devil. The characters understand the game at hand so flawlessly that mistakes and repercussions are merely shrugged off as the witty cat-and-mouse exploits have created a form of rivalry so potent that agony itself is suppressed from both of the leading men. The scale of inert mayhem reaches the point of becoming a staggering rendition of what The Chaser could have been had rape and brutal violence been introduced to the mix. Not to inhibit The Chaser's universal appeal to even those who aren't wary of the wonders of foreign cinema, but I Saw the Devil has more things going for it and maintains a steady pace at all time with The Chaser. In the end, both of these films seem to be likely companion pieces to each other, leaving I Saw the Devil with administrative rights over The Chaser's toned foundation. Too bad I Saw the Devil didn't introduce yet another anti-social butterfly to weed out the whores and scum - children or not.

Lee Byung-hun follows the universal-piece-of-shit G.I. Joe: Rise of Cobra with a reuniting of Kim Je-woon, director of The Good, the Bad, the Weird. Along for the ride is Choi Min-sik who most of you know as the sociopathic lead of the gateway Korean film, Oldboy. After losing his fiancée to a serial rapist/murderer, Lee Byung-hun utilizes his skills from being an NIS agent to capture and tease the killer with bludgeonings and many unanswered questions. As detailed in the script, I Saw the Devil is essentially a twisted hunt, "Catch and release..." is the only way Byung-hun can fulfill the promise he made to inflict 1000 times the amount of pain his beautiful broad suffered at the hands of this killer. But on a positive note, it is noted that Min-sik "always gives pleasure before pain." What follows is a series of cringe-worthy torture scenes, brief however, and stellar performances by both of the starring monsters. Taking in Min-sik's role of Oh Dae-su, it was still hard to imagine him stooping so low to scrape the bottom of the barrel for what might be the most twisted and ambiguous profile of a killer in Korean cinema yet.

A strange renaissance has occurred recently. It seems that the sometimes-banal horror community has started to flock and mingle about this film's release. Had there been no severing of an Achilles tendon or multiple decapitations, one must wonder if the pimply Krueger fans would have ever been wary of I Saw the Devil's existence. But even with the content remaining, wiping the drool left from "respectable" communities who pride slaughter over sympathy, I Saw the Devil is being shown in an edited form, lacking over seven minutes of runtime to keep from getting a +19 which is the strictest rating in South Korea. I Saw the Devil does have a soul, however. It isn't a film about the mercy of love, rather, revenge. The tragic incident unfolds through the first 5 minutes of the film in order to jump start the intensity and chronicle the heartbreak rather than the romance, which seems to be a South Korean standard in film. A fun fact is Yeonpyeong Island, home to Choi Min-Sik's ruthless character, was fired upon with artillery by North Korea not too long ago, tying film fact and fiction to current events.

This film eventually boils over with the excess torture and extreme misogyny/degradation, which is a miracle in my book. Before this reaches into the realm of error though, Ji-woon finally releases the leash to allow the once slow-burning baggage to rain down in glorious last-minute hysterics, rendering the odyssey itself an artifice. Truly one of S.Korea's more versatile and extinguished actors, Lee Byung-hun proves himself to be a game changer and with the closure of this tale, a huge sigh of relief escapes me. I've been widdling away at the most anticipated releases of the past two years. Worse off is the fact that the list just keeps building itself back up to an intimidating length. Next up, Mr. Oizo's Rubber. Chalk that up to bad cinephile behavior. To wrap my thoughts up in a decorative piece, I Saw the Devil isn't exactly S.Korea's best foray into criminal minds. With Memories of Murder, No Mercy, The Chaser, and the many others flooding the theaters faster than they can make them, I Saw the Devil merges quite fittingly into the latter. The script-writing is razor-sharp and the production is as lively as it is maddening. All in all, definitely worth the wait.

-mAQ

HAUNTERS HAUNTERS

Kim Min-seok (2010)

More prominently referred to as Psychic, I've decided to settle for the more inventive title, Haunters, for South Korea's latest superhero opus starring Secret Reunion's Kang Dong-wo. Applying directly, the Unbreakable mantra, Haunters is the modern day fable of a dangerous psychic and the "simple" man blessed with immunity to his terrifying power. Haunters does indeed hold the torch of "grittiness" in favor of a nontraditional, now traditional, comic book-esque film. The result is something wildly inventive but still flawed beyond all control. I personally blame the inclusion of multiculturalism to Kim Min-suk's debut feature, fresh off co-writing the epic western The Good, The Bad, The Weird. Bubba and Al are the lead character's (morally grounded) best and only friends. It seems possible that Kim Min-suk has taken inspiration from Mathieu Kassovitz's politically charged La Haine as they share the inclusion of a Tracy Morgan lookalike and an Arab. Normally this sort of cultural interruption upon cinema wouldn't bother me but it is frequently visited upon in such a joking manner that it becomes irritating. Their existence is nothing but to broaden the appeal of what could be Korea's answer to Unbreakable; although different in creation, still retains a similar texture.

The film opens with the subtle brooding of a boy with bandages over his eyes being escorted down the street. The hesitation permeates through the sweat dripping down his mother's face as she catches her son in the act of removing the bandages. She explains to him woefully that they aren't to be removed for he hasn't healed yet. Soon after, the abusive boyfriend of his mother returns home and in an aggressive stupor, beats the woman senseless. The boy, driven to rage by his mother's screams, removes the bandages and walks towards the male, fists clenched. The man drops his guard and slowly backs up, mimicking the steps taken by the child. Walking into the middle of a busy street, the man then grabs his own head and twists his neck 180 degrees, obviously killing himself. This backdrop sets the tone quite fittingly for Haunters as I was unsure if what the child committed was considered an evil deed. You'd find it hard for me to lie in regards to rooting for the fate of this womanizer. His form was tasteless and tact. The boyfriend obviously needed proper instructing on how to tastefully hit a woman to release that forbidden carnal geyser dormant in every woman. Following this scene is the introduction to the heroic figure of the story. Im Gyoo-nam is an introverted junkyard worker who slacks about with his two friends, the aforementioned Bubba and Al. After getting comically bulldozed by a speeding car, Im is found unemployed and motivated, leading to him getting a job at a pawn shop run by The Host's Byeon Hee-bong.

This leads up to the pivotal reunion of the two, who, by all reason, shouldn't have met and this is even repeated in the film's tagline. These opposing spirits shouldn't have met but for some twisted reason, did. This recalls echoes of Shyamalan's Unbreakable, undoubtedly one of the greatest superhero films of its time. Whereas Unbreakable had its roots firmly planted in comic books and the chaotic side's obsession with them, Haunters does the opposite and exists in a universe that such deploring titles as superheroes are nonexistent. Something is amok, that's for sure, but our characters never admit it especially with pop culture twinkling in their eyes. Another aspect I favored about Haunters is the lead character who is referred to throughout as Representative Im. The man becomes a magnet for extreme and sadistic pain. The situations in which he is grievously harmed are somewhat shocking in a sense, even for the jaded viewers. Haunters is a classic case of banality overcoming the extraordinary. Yet, Representative Im isn't exactly normal. No, Haunters houses a secret from itself. After initially getting wrecked by the car, Im sees his cast off later in the day. No wound, a minor limp, but that's the only identifying mark of a once injury. This is repeated over and over as Im is shattered beyond belief but recovers with incredible speed. Haunters fails to reveal that our "average cho" is, in fact, super in his own regard. Color me surprised when Haunters capped the experience of a Western-influenced action/thriller with a weighted ending, a definite tailspin from the playfully dark habitat into stranger waters.

Haunters is not a sigh of relief from the barrage of always-excellent Korean detective thrillers but instead a worthy placeholder. It doesn't break ground with a new, conspiring definition of entertainment but Haunters is an excellent way to waste 2 hours. Simply from the disregard of human life as arranged by our psychotic psychic with mommy issues is Haunters pushed into a nihilistic atmosphere all its own. Watching bodies drop in unison in the lobby of a sterile apartment complex is jarring enough without the light-hearted buddy adventure hidden in the very core of this film. Like I said, Haunters is no award winner but a grab at attention with enough eye candy to satiate even the hardest Western film snob. Kang Dong-wo's performance is enough to warrant a view for any fan of South Korean film. Consider me thoughtful and open to the remainder of Kim Min-suk's career, however bedridden it may end up with the inflation of Korean crime dramas. As enjoyable as Haunters might be, I still cannot shake the inclusion of the two radically racial characters in an otherwise chameleon Korean film. What a waste of cultural exclusivity.

-mAQ

SAMURAI REINCARNATION
SAMURAI REINCARNATION

Kinji Fukasaku (1981)

Samurai Reincarnation is a film I had bought a while ago during a vacation in Philadelphia. I purchased it solely based on the tag line which excited my over-active imagination "When a Samurai seeks Revenge, It's HELL!". Similar to Michele Soavi's The Church, the film opens with the brutal slaughtering of thousands of good Christian people. These spirits, full of hatred, are led by a single evil entity to revolt against their oppressors and humanity as a whole. Sonny Chiba sort of stars in this action fantasy film directed by Kinji Fukasaku (The man behind Battle Royale and its sequel before his death caused by Terminal Cancer). From what I've seen of his films, Samurai Reincarnation really shows in its old age. This film is under-produced, under-directed, and features some of the worst action choreography I've ever seen for a Samurai film. It's nice to see an original Samurai vision that isn't an explicit cultural gang bang like the inconsequentially long collection of Kurosawa films. Each little film getting an approved Criterion release that no one should bother with. Justly my opinion, I find Criterion to be ass-grabbing with Kurosawa on such an extreme plane that I find it revolting. It's a problem when you have an accomplished action star and a worthy actor only to use him for child's play. Sonny Chiba maybe has 3 battle scenes. Each run under a minute in length and are extremely laughable. If our past ancestors were such horrible combatants, surely such a thing as world peace would be existent. This is Sonny Chiba's worst performance and for no fault of his own. The plot is entirely jumbled populated only by characters that never stand for their own introduction. Random important historical figures appear with no exposition only to maim and kill. It's verily galling to imagine a film from the director of Battle Royale to be so repellent. Not even the graceful presence of "JJ" Chiba could fore fend this film from the own hell it dares to mention. From featuring homosexual Christian samurai's and bouncing-talking heads, I cannot fathom what vile creation Fukasaku had in mind, but whatever it was, the outcome will always be Samurai Reincarnation.

-mAQ

I AM NOT A FREAK

Kirby Dick (1987)

From what I can gather, I Am Not a Freak is a made-for-TV documentary directed by Kirby Dick. If you've heard his name, it's from one or two sources most likely. One being the recent This Film is Not Yet Rated (The documentary which made way to expose to MPAA) and the 1997 cult documentary SICK: The Life & Death of Bob Flanagan, Supermasochist. This prior outing is a small yet sweet little appetizer of freak show nostalgia. The process of this film's ascension into maximum runtime is built upon 6 deformed humans. Humans being the key word, this doc. describes scenarios and tries to dissolve hate and confusion by humanizing such people; Men and Women who fit the title of "Creature" We have an Elephant Man, a Progeria victim, an extremely obese woman, a dwarf of an extreme nature, and the story of an Asian villager whose dead twin's head was visible on the right side of his face. This film reminds me of a book I had found in my mother's closet as a child. The dust flap was missing, leaving a flat engraving of a siamese pair. The pictures promptly horrified me. I blame this book and the collected series of Man, Myth & Magic for my corruption. The film opens up with stories of the old times where people went to freak shows to be horrified. It stated how attractions would rake in thousands of dollars a week. From story to story, their success and careers began to bloom. One acted in a film and another is a regular motion picture actor. I did notice one thing about this film, and it is that the film is mildly hypocritical. It seemed to shun the effects of freak shows but then applauded the usage of "freaks" in Hollywood films, playing aliens and what not. The film led me to believe that Mickey Hays (Progeria) had acquired the role in The Aurora Encounter out of his sheer looks (A wrinkled raisin) but I later found out he had begged the Make A Wish foundation for a role in a major motion picture. Too bad it was a negatively received pile of family filth. Starring in a film due to your extremely disgusting looks is more or less the same role in society that ye ole' freak shows. When we watch horror films, Do you expect us to not gawk at the tiny man with three mouths? Equality with conditions such as these is a hard goal to aim for with such hatred spreading. I myself, find it hard to not stare crudely at someone with a deformity.

-mAQ

BOTCHED
BOTCHED

Kit Ryan (2007)

Botched is a crime thriller that is in a league of its own. Never before have I seen the fusion of such absurdities encountered in this film with a swift brand of suspense. Botched carries the feel of a Guy Ritchie film with 100% more blood, dismemberment's, and romance. Surprisingly, this film hasn't been marketed at all towards the gorehound public. Richie Donovan is a down-on-his-luck small time crook who is in a world of trouble from his boss after failing the previous heist. In a final attempt to settle the debt, he plans to steal an ancient cross from a penthouse suite in Moscow. His luck goes from bad to worse as the elevator stops on the abandoned 13th floor which is shelter for twin serial killers. Botched doesn't deserve all the negative opinions that seems to plague this little film. Just like films of a similar caliber like Hot Fuzz, Botched is an incredibly witty film that is directed by someone who understands pure, unbridled entertainment. This is a film that spends the first half-an-hour immersing you in the story of an interesting character, and suddenly throws a dinner of death at your doorstep; much like From Dusk Till Dawn. The central hostages that were taken by Donovan's crew make up a diverse and dysfunctional bunch. The most memorable of the crew is security guard Boris. Ex-spetsnaz, Combat veteran, and master trap setter, Boris is the show stealer here. Not much is known about him or his character. In fact, judging by his kooky antics throughout the film, all of those claims undoubtedly could be lies. Behind the comedy-horror veil is a wonderful love story occupied by two people caught in a hellish scenario. The chemistry between the two leads flourishes even though Stephen Dorff comes off as a supreme douche bag in every role he plays. The violence is over the top and the villains of the film are evil and religious. In a horror scenario, those are two things that you never want to mix. Instead of separating church and state, they should separate church and horror films. Botched is a madcap good time. From all the filth that has been released in the past few years, Horror really is rusting up. But from the ashes of this dying genre, new life can be given. That life is Botched. A film that doesn't really know what it wants to be, but it just does it. Botched is what I'd like to see come out in theaters, maybe even a wide release. It's this small-handful of good releases that makes me have faith in "splatter horror".

-mAQ

OROZCO EL EMBALSAMADOR

Kiyotaka Tsurisaki (2001)

Orozco The Embalmer is a film unlike no other. Do not get this one confused with a mondo film. On the outer shell, It is a bizarre shockumentary that features grotesque embalming, foul treatment of the dead, and a fucked environment, but at its core, it is a commentary on many things, including both spectrum's of life and death. The genre of shockumentary is plagued with generic grindcore based outings of simulated and non-simulated death footage. The result is wholly shallow and unapologetic. The guideline of the film is following the legendary Orozco. He is perhaps the worlds greatest embalmer who resides in Colombia. Each day he wakes up and embalms anywhere from 5 to 10 corpses a day, leaving him at a number over 50,000 that he has embalmed throughout his life. The very parallel idea of being able to sleep peacefully with the blood of thousands on your hands perplexes me. Orozco is a man of legend. Tsurisaki Kiyotaka is a reporter turned corpse photographer who gets his kicks by photographing the dead and compiling it into films that mainly exploit the fear of death. See his film Junk Films for a collection of shorts. The original plan was to just document a short on him but the society claimed otherwise. The area in which he documents is of the worst social order. People get murdered in the streets in front of the innocent eyes of children. No taboo is left intact throughout this film. Babies are mishandled and disturbing samba music just ups the mood to a level of extreme unfelt in modern documentaries. The reason for Kiyotaka's prolonged stay was due to the fact that Orozco could mourn everyday of his life. Such an intimate connection between man and death, perhaps the most personal ever documented.

To this degree, it seems to contradict itself. Orozco violently tugs on his victim's obese flesh, laughing at dead children, posing with them, and manages to not have the slightest expression change. Orozco the Embalmer can be considered a vast exercise in anti-art. The violence is graphic and in your face. You will not leave this experience without being marked. This film does something that none other has; made me fear death in it's entirety. I never really pondered the effects of death. The nothingness. What does it do? These thoughts have sent me into mild panic attacks, and to think all this because of a documentary? Does death really boil down to being assaulted by a disgustingly over-age Colombian? Orozco The Embalmer is a gripping documentary capturing the horrid quality of life that goes on, and what we should really fear about death.

-mAQ

48 HOURS TO ACAPULCO
48 HOURS TO ACAPULCO

Klaus Lemke (1967)

While he is nearly forgotten today despite the fact he has been directing films for nearly half a century and virtually totally unknown outside his Teutonic homeland, German auteur Klaus Lemke (Arabian Nights, Die Ratte) was a major early influence on the filmmakers of German New Cinema, especially a very young Rainer Werner Fassbinder, whose early avant-garde gangster trilogy—Love is Colder than Death (1969), Gods of the Plague (1970), and The American Soldier (1970)—was heavily influenced by his countryman's gangster flicks, namely his super stylish cult hit 48 Stunden bis Acapulco (1967) aka 48 Hours to Acapulco aka Time for Action. Indeed, aside from naming Lemke's 48 Hours to Acapulco as a film he would have liked to have directed in an interview featured in the April 1978 issue of the German version of Playboy, the auteur once stated regarding his appreciation for the film: "The heroes behave like gangsters, but at the same time as they imagine gangsters would behave. The Hollywood stereotype comes through: but Lemke has attempted not to imitate them." In Fassbinder's debut feature Love is Colder than Death—a work where the characters are more or less crude parodies of their favorite characters from old Hollywood movies—the quasi-poser gangster played by Ulli Lommel stylizes himself after Alain Delon's character from Jean-Pierre Melville's Le Samourai (1967), thus demonstrating Lemke's meta-cinematic influence on the figurative heart of German New Cinema. Of course, Lemke was not a figure of GNC, but the lesser known movement called the New Munich Group ('Neue Münchner Gruppe'), which also included similarly anti-intellectual, film noir-obsessed auteur filmmakers like Eckhart Schmidt, Rudolf Thome, and Roger Fritz. Made before Lemke fully developed his gritty realist cinéma vérité-like aesthetic with his Hamburg-based nihilistic crime masterpieces like Rocker (1972) and Paul (1974), 48 Hours to Acapulco is a blatantly genre-conscious black-and-white noir pastiche piece featuring jet-set aesthetic influences and a then-'hip' soundtrack featuring Cher, Johnny Rivers, The Ventures, and a degenerate jazz cover of "Hey Joe" in a German film that seems as deracinated as they come, yet the work's post-WWII Weltschmerz does not betray its obvious Germanic origins. Although sometimes similarly ironic like Lemke's comrade Rudolf Thome's absurdist pomo-noir piece Detektive (1969), 48 Hours to Acapulco does not merely utilize cynicism and offbeat humor to obfuscate its innate pain and apathy towards life. Shot by auteur Niklaus Schilling (Nachtschatten aka Nightshade, Rheingold), who was also the cinematographer for Detektive and would go on to become one of the most unjustly forgotten filmmakers of German cinema, Lemke's early minor masterpiece is an exotic international kraut film noir that trades in shadows and urban turf for the sun and surf as a work partly set in Rome and Acapulco, Mexico, yet it is also as metaphysically tortured and hopeless as crime flicks come, as an allegorical work where a Bavarian gangster attempts to play industrial espionage and finds himself in a losing battle with an American industrialist.

Gangster Frank Murnau (played by German actor/producer Dieter Geissler, who later produced blockbuster works like The NeverEnding Story (1984) and Tim Burton's Sleepy Hollow (1999)) has been hired by his boss Gruner (Alexander Kerst) to deliver 500,000 marks to a fellow named Cameron (Roland Carey) in Rome for some dubious documents, but having that much cold hard cash gives the career criminal some bad ideas. While Frank is sent with his boss' reasonably attractive daughter Laura (played by Christiane Krüger, the daughter of popular German movie star Hardy Krüger), who he is carrying on a sexual affair with, his true love is a femme fatale named Monika (Monika Zinnenberg), who ultimately cons the con into changing his plans with her conniving cunt. Indeed, the first thing Frank does upon checking out a hotel with Laura is call Monika, who knows an American industrialist that wants to buy the documents he is supposed to give Cameron for $500,000. The night before heading to meet with Cameron in Rome, Frank makes passionate love to Laura, but he makes the major mistake of calling her "Monika" during sex. When the two arrive at Cameron's scenic beachside flat, Laura has sex with the buyer on the beach after the half-assed conman falls asleep on an outside patio. When Cameron finally asks the Munich criminal for the money, Frank says he does not have it and an anticlimactic fight breaks out where the latter is beaten like a bitch. Of course, Frank came to the exchange ready with a handgun and shoots and kills Cameron while laying on the ground while all beaten up and bloody. After killing Cameron and robbing him of the documents, Frank confesses to Laura that he loves Monika and that he is flying out to Acapulco to be with her. Despite being betrayed by Frank, Laura lies and tells her father that "everything's ok" regarding what happened with the disastrous transaction.

As Laura's unwavering loyalty readily demonstrates, Frank probably should have stayed with his boss's daughter, as Monika ultimately proves to be a true fatal female. Upon arriving in Acapulco, Frank is picked up by a fat, bold American gangster thug who remarks, "Soon you can't spend your money nowhere anymore. Nothing against communism but if everybody can afford everything...Where's the deeper meaning?" The obscenely ugly bald man takes Frank to the home of an elderly man named Mr. Wayne (played by real-life playboy/musician/night club owner Teddy Stauffer), who is the American industrialist that wants to buy the documents. Instead of the $500,000 Monika said he promised, Mr. Wayne only offers Frank $50,000 for the documents, so the German gangster makes the ultimatum, "$500,000...Do what you want to do?" and leaves. Upon leaving Mr. Wayne's less than humble beachside abode, Frank drives away in ecstasy while loudly singing, "California, California, California!" as if he plans to start a new life on the American west coast, but he eventually stops at a Mexican bar, buys an entire bottle of Johnny Walker, and gets thoroughly inebriated. Upon meeting up with Monika, Frank confesses that he killed Cameron and when she asks him why he did such a foolish thing, he simply responds with, "because I love you." Of course, Monika does not say "I love you," but instead warns Frank, "Wayne is dangerous, take the money. I booked a seat for you on the next plane." Of course, Frank refuses the insulting offer. When Frank and Monika are driving on a secluded desert road that night, a group of Mr. Wayne's men run their car off the road. Of course, Monika has betrayed him. Ultimately, Frank is shot dead on a beach, though he pushes Monika away when she attempts to console him just before he receives a deadly bullet.

48 HOURS TO ACAPULCO

Interestingly, in the film Baader (2002) directed by Christopher Roth, West German far-left terrorist and Red Army Faction leader Andreas Baader is depicted as a gangster poser who was enamored with film noir/crime flicks and who took his girlfriend/collaborator Gudrun Ensslin to see Lemke's 48 Hours to Acapulco on their first date together. Indeed, the antihero of Lemke's film also certainly seems like a delusional moron who saw one too many gangster flicks that went way over his head, hence his rather predictable death in the end. As German film historian Thomas Elsaesser wrote in his book New German Cinema: A History (1989): "The reasons which made Fassbinder or Wenders approach traditional American genres are several [...] For example, Lemke's 48 HOURS TO ACAPULCO (1967) was an influence on Fassbinder, not so much in its subject (that of a small-time Munich crook caught up in an affair too big for him to handle), but because Lemke's attitude to his characters was to become typical of Fassbinder's. The secret was to take seriously the image the characters have of themselves, because the director is willing to recognize as 'reality' [...] and an inner truth, what are merely the characters' fantasies." Of course, by making the characters of their films wannabe gangsters, Lemke and Fassbinder were revealing that they were fully aware that they could never be American and had no interest in fully appropriating an alien 'culture.' While 48 Hours to Acapulco was a cult hit and won the auteur a Bambi award, Lemke decided to take the hard road and instead of capitalizing on his newfound success, he moved to Hamburg to hang out with real-life criminals, including pimps, prostitutes, drug dealers, and bikers, thus inspiring the complete transformation of the director's entire aesthetic for the better and spawning realistic cult masterpieces like Rocker and Paul, which largely star real-life criminals and non-actors. Indeed, whereas 48 Hours to Acapulco is the product of a sort of proto-Tarantino fanboy in his semi-formative years, albeit less autistic, Lemke's Hamburg era works are the strikingly sincere expressions of a true guerilla auteur who has attempted to make next to no distinction between the real world and the cinematic world.

-Ty E

ROCKER

Klaus Lemke (1972)

Forget Easy Rider (1969) and the popular multicultural-friendly popular FX TV series Sons of Anarchy (2008-present), those crazy krauts did it better with mediocre medium of mere German television with Rocker (1972); a biker flick with actual brazen balls and a brutal body without the cowardly cop-out of a bullshit hippie message. Directed by agile Aryan auteur Klaus Lemke (Paul, Finale) – a self-proclaimed ‘anti-intellectual’ filmmaker known for his sometimes offensive personal opinions – whose debut feature-length film 48 Stunden bis Acapulco (1967) aka 48 Hours to Acapulco was described by German New cinema König Rainer Werner Fassbinder as one of the “most important” German films of its time, Rocker is no less an important film, even if it was made for the idiosyncratic social and culture climate of early 1970s Hamburg, Germany where long-haired blockheads in scratched leather jackets and fueled by deep visceral hate, active nihilism, and unhinged hedonism roamed the streets on their motorcycles and blessed the crooked concrete city with blood, piss, and liquor. If anyone wonders where Austrian martial music musician Albin Julius – a man with an identity crisis who went from being a pseudo-Goth to a ersatz fascist to a retro retard – copied his latest look from, look no farther than Rocker; the indisputable real deal when it comes to masculine men with mut-tonchops, motorcycles, merry misanthropy and murderous Männerbünde. The sons of German soldiers who were the first to display Schutzstaffel (SS) insignia on their totally killer choppers, the raging and riotous renegades of Rocker are dedicated to blood and honor, even if not in the same manner as their fierce forefathers, but among an urban ghetto of daring delinquent friends. Utilizing amateur actors and real bikers, including “Die Bloody Devils” motorcycle gang, Rocker lends itself to a certain gritty realism that most films of a similar persuasion lack, which director Klaus Lemke utilized in his later film Die Ratte (1993). For those who have to have their biker flicks featuring classic rock ‘n’ roll tunes, Rocker also features an iconic soundtrack, including hits by Led Zeppelin, Santana, Them, The Rolling Stones, Van Morrison and a couple others that put the soundtrack to Easy Rider to shame, but just like any other decent cinematic work, Lemke did not need the gimmick of popular counter-culture music to make a classic cult film. In a rich and reckless Teutonic tradition of stark street trash cinema that was followed by Supermarkt (1974) directed by Roland Klick and The End of the Rainbow (1979) aka Das Ende des Regenbogens directed by Uwe Frießner, Rocker shits on high kraut kultur and does a splendid job doing so, but it was only reflecting a degenerate zeitgeist that plagued the Fatherland during the post-WWII years.

Things were looking up for charismatic street criminal ‘Rocker’ Gerd (Gerd Kruskopf) after getting out of jail and being warmly welcomed back by his biker buddies, but a lot has changed since his life-idling imprisonment, including his girlfriend, who went from being a biker babe to a would-be-bourgeois bitch now working in a dapper department store. Somewhere else in town is a degenerate car thief named Uli (Paul Lys) with a certain seedy scumbag swag and misleading boyish good-looks, sort of resembling a German Jim Morrison except minus a marvelous way with words that allows him to trash talk random girls into allowing him to prod their meat curtains. One day, Uli gets mixed up with the wrong kraut pimp with a fucked up pseudo-chic bleach blond hairdo and is beaten to death one night while in a drunken stupor in front of his impressionable yet intrepid 15-year-old brother Mark (played by Hans-Jürgen Modschiedler who also starred in Lemke's 1975 TV movie Teenagerliebe). Naturally, Mark, although a wee lad that could easily be mistaken for girl, vows revenge against the flesh-peddling mensch who killed his bro and he eventually meets up with rough Rocker Gerd to help him carry it out. Given grief by his blue collar father because of his noisy rock music and eventually having his house burned down by phantom rival gang members as he is beaten senseless while tied to a tree, barely escaping with his life, Gerd basically loses everything he has left, so he humors the young boy Mark when he comes to his local bar, teasing the boy for his pronounced "purity" and ignorance towards the more wanton and reckless ways of the world. Although neither realizes it at first, Mark's brother Uli was a friend of Gerd's ex-girlfriend, thus the union between the bodacious biker and the young buck seems to be the result of a rather romantic yet certainly sleazy storybook fate in a cinematic work that has more in common aesthetically with Cinéma vérité works than some sort of fantasy knight tale. After Gerd casually cons some American drug dealers into buying a suitcase that they assume is full of drugs but is instead full of junk and not the sort you shoot into your arm, he buys a new motorcycle with his sweetly swindled deutschmarks and hits the road with little Mark. On the way, they face some misfortune, including the destruction of the newly accorded motorcycle by a disgruntled, morbidly obese trucker that Gerd heckles, but ultimately the two down-and-out misfits have a showdown with the prick of a pimp and his homo-like hoods who was responsible for brother Uli's premature death.

ROCKER

A gorgeously gritty and exceedingly exciting piece of anti-rational German proletarian neo-romanticism, Rocker – a rough and tough cinematic work that is far from immaculate in terms of technical direction and having a clandestine plot, but never settles for anything less than aesthetically abrasive imagery and lovely lowbrow entertainment – is a film that deserves more recognition than the cult status it has in the marginal Teutonic ghetto of Hamburg. Not settling for the 'victim mentality' that Easy Rider wallows in, especially during the conclusion nor pathetic political propaganda of the quasi-hippie sort, Rocker presents the timeless story of "us versus them" without resorting to pathetic moralistic preaching nor promoting acceptance of the wild 'other' as just fine with the obscurity of his blood brotherhood. Innately influenced by a Hollywood-contrived foreign culture that they seem to only understand superficially as demonstrated by Gerd's poster of Marlon Brando from the iconic rebel motorcycle gang flick The Wild One (1953), the brassy blockhead bike boys of Rocker have fashioned a sinful and subversive subculture all of their own that demands loyalty before death and death before loyalty. Rocker ends with the face of teenage troublemaker Mark, who just got involved with his first gang fight, staring into the distance of a future that may be less than fruitful in terms of monetary gain and social prestige, but he can now sleep in safety knowing that his ill-fated brother has been avenged and that he will be regularly devouring the fruit that made man wise with fierce fast-fucks and moonlight motorcycle rides, even if he has an old lady heckling in the background to get a job at the local convenience store.

-Ty E

RUSSIAN ARK
RUSSIAN ARK

Knut Elstermann (2003)

Alexander Sokurov's Russian Ark brings nationalism back to Russian cinema. The film was done in one Steadicam shot. This cinematic tool works in complete opposition to the Bolshevik obsession with Soviet montage and editing. The Bolshevik filmmakers strove for mind control and international revolution. Russian Ark destroys all those Bolshevik conventions while at the same time emphasizing Russian history. Sokurov's earlier films were quite often banned by the Soviet authorities. Now he is one of the most innovative directors to come out of Russia (and the world). Russian Ark was filmed in the Winter Palace. This building was considered the official milestone of Bolshevik attacks during the "October Revolution." Alexander Sokurov shatters that "revolutionary milestone" with a tour through Russian history and culture. Leon Trotsky is probably crying about this in hell and calling for a second "revolution."

A narrator and companion guide Russian Ark through different periods of Russian history. The guide reminded me of Italian journalist Mr. Orlando from Fellini's And the Ship Sails On. Both comedic characters guide each respective film through forgotten parts of history. I prefer Russian history to be told by a Russian as opposed to one of Steven Spielberg's associates. Russian Ark is no doubt a great introduction to Russian culture.

Alfred Hitchcock's Rope pretends to be filmed in one single shot. Rope was actually filmed in 10 different shots (color film reels had a maximum length of 10 minutes during this period). Russian Ark is a nice follow-up to Hitchcock's revolutionary experiment. Sokurov succeeds in his groundbreaking cinematic experiment. It makes me wonder if Russian Ark's artistic success will start a new movement of single shot feature length films.

Russian Ark was an aesthetically pleasing experience for me. The film presents a beautiful world of historical wealth. Russian Ark made me fantasize about being transported through Russian history and all the treasures it has to offer. Alexander Sokurov is a director to look out for in the future.

-Ty E

EX DRUMMER

Koen Mortier (2007)

The minute this film began, as soon as i heard the glorious song 2 Morro Morro Land from none other than Lightning Bolt, i knew that this track would be a metaphor for the entire film. Just like the song, it starts off with a slow bang, then eases it's way into the chaos that you come to expect. As soon as the repetition sticks with you and you think it won't pick up anymore, it does. So there i was, watching this film thinking it couldn't get anymore screwed up. I love surprises. As savage as this film is, It's impossible to not notice its poetic moments. Ex Drummer is a Belgian film directed by Koen Mortier. From the rock n' roll aspects of the film and it's use of unsimulated sex, I guess you could call this the bastard love-child of John Cameron Mitchell's films, except with artistic integrity. Some of Mortier's situations and set-pieces can be called a travesty of Gondry's work, but all the more effective. For a direct example, we meet a guy named "Big Dick", who as you might have guessed, has a big dick. We see him here explaining how big it is. This film has a big heart and it's full of hate. We have extreme misogyny, extreme homophobia, hate crimes, and a band called Six Million Jews. Needless to say, nobody cares about Six Million Jews, and we never hear them play, which is a hilarious move for the director. The plot involves several gutter punks who are missing a drummer for their band. Each of the members go to a local celebrity looking for a drummer. He accepts and is told that every member needs a handicap. Dries states that he cannot play the drums. Koen de Geyter is the skinhead rapist of the group. He lives in his apartment on the ceiling; upside down. Expect some interesting effects and crazy aggression scenes played out backwards. Everyday he brings another woman home and paints his walls with her blood during the rape. Jan is the homosexual who has a stiff arm and an extremely fucked up family. Ivan is the dope fiend who has a disgusting wife and a child. Together, this group of assholes form The Feminists. The comical situations in this film are the highlights, and to be frank, this film is very graphic, vulgar, obscene, and highly offensive. Several of the situations called attention to similarities in Ken Park and Bad Boy Bobby. Ex Drummer is a smash bang film with some notorious bloodshed and a very moral behind it. It won't be long before this reaches cult status. Some could even say these characters have hearts of beasts.

-mAQ

THE GIRLS REBEL FORCE OF COMPETITIVE SWIMMERS
THE GIRLS REBEL FORCE OF COMPETITIVE SWIMMERS

Kôji Kawano (2007)

I don't intend on droning on concerning the depth of a film when it is as shallow as this one. With all H2O puns aside, TGRFCS is just another lackluster Asian splatter film that throws in cheesy arterial sprays and soft-core lesbian scenes to make up for the lack of plot and/or acting performances, so expect a short 'to the point' review. The plot is a standard zombie romp but this time it spreads through a school. When they or I say school, we actually mean a swim team. This is a closed off virus that seems to affect only horny school girls or their horny teachers. What seems like it would be a marvel companion piece to the marvelous film- The Machine Girl, is actually just another horrid Japanese film that attempts to cash in on the zaniness of such films as Stacy or Marrionier, and I'm not saying these films are good either. The production values on this film present them as worse as they possibly can. Competitive Swimmers looks as if it was shot on Digital Video and had a classroom retard design the special effects and gore for this film. Just when something "saucy" would be happening, the camera creates some angle or trick that could save them money but not showing said injury. After a few very soft-core lesbian scenes which climaxes "sexplode" with the most obnoxious, high-pitched orgasms I have heard in a motion picture, the film returns to scenes of the coach whipping the females and then the females cry and then they turn into zombies and then they kill each other and cry. That is the plot. What an awful, awful film. No type of B-expectations could have prepared you for this.

-mAQ

PERFECT RED

Kōji Wakamatsu (2004) Making a good short film isn't necessarily a difficult chore, but an original idea that is unlike anything, that is where the challenge resides. PERFECT RED is an above-average short film about a tortured artist (Go figure) who is having a mental block finishing her painting. Along come a group of criminals who break into her house and become pawns of the "twist" ending. Being a 13 minute long short doesn't guarantee any depth to the film, but it generates as much as it needs. The entire film runs along the twist ending, sort of like the love-hate film Haute Tension. Perfect Red goes without saying that it is an interesting twist to a certain genre which i cannot name, otherwise i would ruin the film for you. It features some interesting effects and some mundane "girl talk" but if given the chance, it's hard to look at a film of such a low running time with scornful eyes. Just to mention, the soundtrack was great and very effective. The only thing that could have strengthened this short would be some much-needed length and more depth.

-Maq

WHITE ROSE CAMPUS: THEN EVERYBODY GETS RAPED
WHITE ROSE CAMPUS: THEN EVERYBODY GETS RAPED

Kôyû Ohara (1982)

Beauty has certainly proven to be more curse than gift. From crashing conflict to physical desecration, attraction handles disasters like a magnet, flooding with shit until you're immobilized. This hex of social-accepted beauty and the veins leading to such lands a bus full of giddy high school ladies prepping to be hijacked by three crazed rapists. But the pipe dream of eternal pussy isn't clear of ulterior motives as there is a conflict of physical interest amok. In short, to be beautiful never seems to be worth it other than possessive desires. Clocking in at only 66 minutes is this 80s pink film coming from the reigning Nikkatsu corporation. To be honest, this was a hard sell at first. I tried enjoying the tearing of shirts and the rough foreplay but White Rose Campus just wasn't quite doing anything for me or the genre. I gradually grew tired of the lard whose fetish is apparently menstruation. His crowning of comedic vessel seemed all too abrupt, this molestation slapstick had wore thin once it started and it seemed to be a hopeless situation, enjoying the film.

Utilizing the optical blurring, Then Everybody Gets Raped is one of the few pinku eiga films that I can recall the blurring. It's been common to degrade and violate but rare seems full penetration. Then again, I've been out of the Roman porno phase for several months now, returning on a whim and promise of an exploitive journey of over-the-top sodomy. While the women were selected for future endeavors, the lard makes the effort to halt the bus and forcibly remove any girls deemed "ugly", many of which were among the prettier of the ladyfolk. This twist of conventional rape thrusts a setting other than the bus unto us and provides quite a great deal of relief. It's not claustrophobia, it's just derivative. Once a pair of fashionable truck drivers collect the stranded girls, they're then told news of the hijacking and offer to kick their ass. Thus begins the chase between the uglies and the pretties. An added subplot involves the spoiling of the teacher whom turned down the romantic offer of her boyfriend to elope. Look where her selfishness got her, not that she or it matters though. All these characters, correction, women, have a mindset built for rape. It's not a defensive instinct but more of an offensive.

The problem I suffered with Then Everybody Gets Raped is my expectations of this particular genre got caught in a cycle which forced me to expect the poetic textures of Hasebe or Wakamatsu. These two artists molded the rapescape for me, turned violence into beauty and altered not only my cinematic tastes, but the way I handle sensuality and the successful relationship I am currently in. Early in the film, I was convinced that Then Everybody Gets Raped was one of the worst offenders of violent pinku that I had seen in recent memory. As the film played out, what was once juvenile became genuine and what was three males vying to get off became a plot of depth, no matter how utilized the device has been in past. I didn't anticipate cinematic prose but as the film blossomed, I noticed that while it isn't artistic, it is groundbreaking in the sense of masculine injustice. For an added bonus, the final rape of Yoko unearths the deep psychology of sex and spites the possibility of an instinctual affair existing after all. As a completed package, Then Everybody Gets Raped toggles from inane to brilliant. Such authoritative power lies in the attitudes and reactions of the women, who start their journey with fear and end it with lust. The concluding twist of the truck drivers seals this pinku eiga film and its perilous adventure as an undoubted classic of the genre. There's no last house on any street, Nikkatsu brings the sodomy in a loaded bus.

-mAQ

THE ISLAND OF THE BLOODY PLANTATION
THE ISLAND OF THE BLOODY PLANTATION

Kurt Raab (1983)

While many fans of German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's cinematic oeuvre find it quite baffling that Ulli Lommel – the star of the filmmaker's first film Love is Colder than Death (1969) aka Liebe ist kälter als der Tod and director of the Fassbinder-produced homo-cidal serial killer flick The Tenderness of the Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe – would go on to haphazardly and half-assedly direct some of the worst digital diarrhea works, including Daniel - Der Zauberer (2004), which was once voted the worst film ever made on imdb.com, as well as countless sub-schlock and similarly titled direct-to-dvd serial killers flicks like Zodiac Killer (2005), B.T.K. Killer (2005), and Green River Killer (2005), the most embarrassing Fass-bande-related work is indubitably The Island of the Bloody Plantation (1983) aka Die Insel der blutigen Plantage aka Escape from Blood Plantation aka Prison Camp Girls, Jailed for Love directed by Kurt Raab (although it is often contended that Peter Kern was either the director or co-directed) and produced by Peter Kern. Although the star of such Fassbinder classics as Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1971) aka Warum läuft Herr R. Amok?, Satan's Brew (1976) aka Satansbraten, and The Stationmaster's Wife (1977) aka Bolwieser, as well as the star/writer of The Tenderness of the Wolves and production designer for virtually every single Fassbinder film leading up to 1977, Kurt Raab, for whatever reason (but most likely a tasteless attempt at hoping to earn a relatively hefty monetary return on a shallowly contrived cinematic work that relies on its exotic location and people as its sole appeal), decided to direct a Women in Prison (or WiP) film; a totally trashy and thoroughly tacky subgenre of exploitation cinema oftentimes containing lurid and crudely contrived lesbian action between braindead scream queens and scenes of softcore quasi-pornography and intrinsically idiotic gore scenes. Not unsurprisingly, Kurt Raab – a flamboyant homosexual who inevitably died of AIDS and whose death was chronicled in the documentary Yearning for Sodom (TV 1989) aka Sehnsucht nach Sodom, which he also co-directed – did not feel the need to include too many bare-skinned buxom blonde and brown beauties in his WiP flick The Island of the Bloody Plantation, but instead, countless scenes of homo-hustler-turned-actor Udo Kier in compromised, unclad and oftentimes shirtless situations and a couple shots of small yet perky Filipino tits. An absurdly asinine celluloid abortion from whatever angle you look at it, even as a work from the innately idiotic and aesthetically competent subgenre of WiP, The Island of the Bloody Plantation – a would-be-wild-and-wanton work that also features Fass Superstar and blonde beastess Barbara Valentin in a radically ridiculous role as a comrade-raping neo-nazi she-bitch who has packed on a couple pounds since her days as an astute attendant at Auschwitz; a place with a great starvation diet – is not only fuming filmic feces on Fassbinder's grave, but also further proof that without the fallen filmmaker as their all-powerful Führer and father-figure, his incestuous film family, aside from a couple exceptions, was nothing more than a group of misguided moneymakers.

Like Island of Lost Souls (1932) meets Apocalypse Now (1979) meets Iron Sky (2012) as if directed by Jess Franco's half-retarded, gay kraut bastard brother, The Island of the Bloody Plantation is set on a secluded yet heavily guarded tropical island (like many cheap exploitation films of its time, it was shot in the Philippines) ruled by a terribly debauched nazi doctor named Otto Globocnik (played by boxer-turned-actor Karl-Otto Alberty and clearly named after Slovenian-Austrian SS leader Odilo Globocnik) in what is a maniac neo-nazi microcosm that includes countless Filipino islander slaves, especially of the female persuasion but also some mutant man-loving 'house Fligga' midgets, and a handful of traitorous Flip men, including Hartman (Udio Kier); a race traitor who has fallen with a wily eye half-caste native named Cora (Karen Lopez). On top of committing the unholy sin of racial treason, Hartman – a heartfelt hero with a bleeding heart for exotic primitives – is loved by the queen nazi bitch of the island, Olga (Barbara Valentin) aka "Bloody Olga" (her nickname during his early days as a concentration camp guard). Naturally things are not as glorious as during the golden age of the Third Reich, as the fallen Führer, who used to be called "white stallion" during his illustrious and murderous years as a super suave SS officer, likes to have sex with his brown slaves, which enrages Olga as demonstrated by her rather brazen rhetorical question to him, "What kind of example are you setting for your men...messing around with subhumans?" Of course, good ol' Globocnik is not the only one with a feverish fetish as Olga is in love with handsome Hartman, so much so that she rapes him at gunpoint and makes his naked native girlfriend Cora watch. A bodacious butch yet clearly once-beauteous blonde and salacious sadomasochist who is quite proud of her old moniker "Bloody Olga" from her old Jew-gassing days, Olga states to Hartman, "I love it when you hate me...it puts fire in me," while he reluctantly ravages her puss. Needless to say, the unhinged and fetishistic fascists of The Island of the Bloody Plantation are so extreme that they are a virtual parody of the "Authoritarian Personality" as described by Jewish Marxists of the Frankfurt school like Erich Fromm and Theodor W. Adorno. Some of the Nazi guards, including Bevney (director Kurt Raab somewhat playing himself as a perverted pederast who loves quoting bible verses) and some fat kraut, force some of the natives to fornicate in front of them so as to obtain optimum scopiphiliac pleasure. Naturally, things go awry for the island of aberrant authoritarian Aryans when Hartman helps the islanders to run an untermensch revolt in the spirit of the Haitian Revolution where the Asiatic islanders exterminate the white leaders (minus Hartman and Olga's 'secret' and innocent daughter). With a little help from primitive magic from one of the flip girls and a poisonous spider, the Filipinos prove that the Germans are not the only masters of genocide, but, of course, they need race traitor Hartman to help them pull it off.

THE ISLAND OF THE BLOODY PLANTATION

With its particularly poorly dubbed English dialogue, curiously corny and poorly aged theme song, mindless worship of the nubile "noble savage," lackluster direction and use of generic genre conventions, farcical treatment of Fassbinder Superstars, lunatic left-wing social message, crude low-camp comedy, and cheap softcore sensuality, The Island of the Bloody Plantation is, at best, a dedicatedly disgraceful but surely symbolic celluloid artifact for the forsaken future of German cinema after Fassbinder's death (it should be noted that the film was released only a year after R.W. overdosed on cocaine) that features a handful of entrancing scenic beach shots and, at worst, something that borders on the equivalent of a celluloid lobotomy. Featuring a boorish brigade of blond and debauched nazi nihilists who seem to openly welcome their own demise, especially Olga (who inexplicably allows the natives to run their revolution due to her hard-on for Hartman), The Island of the Bloody Plantation also makes for a vaguely eccentric yet rarely entertaining work of erratic ethno-masochistic exploitation cinema. On a personal level, I did enjoy Barbara Valentin's particularly peculiar and rather against-type performance as Olga to some degree because instead of playing her typical role as a blonde bimbo, she plays a passionate psychopath who will do anything for her man and daughter, even if it results in her inevitable self-destruction, despite being a genocidal cunt and whatnot. Of course, unlike The Tenderness of the Wolves, The Island of the Bloody Plantation offers no psychological insight for the self-loathing of its oftentimes vainglorious villains aside from their nostalgia for Nazism under Hitler, thus backing Wagnerian-Brechtian auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's argument that modern German art is, "filthy and sick... in praise of cowardice and treason, of criminals, whores, of hate, ugliness, of lies and crimes and all that is unnatural." Indeed, while The Island of the Bloody Plantation tries to play off its overwhelming hatefulness and degeneracy as merely sardonic like the typical Hollywood quasi-commie comedy, it is quite obvious that the film wallows in wantonness and was made to make a quick buck under Fassbinder's legacy and as a way for the ex-Fass-bande actors to spend a nice tropical vacation. If Kurt Raab is in hell, which some more superstitious individuals might believe since he was denied Christian burial at the Catholic cemetery near where he grew up in Bavaria due to prejudices against his perverse passing via gay cancer, I am sure Fassbinder has penetrated his poofer poop-chute with a pitchfork for directing The Island of the Bloody Plantation, but, for some reason, I am sure he likes it hot in his marvelously mangled man-hole.

-Ty E

YEARNING FOR SODOM

Kurt Raab (1989)

Unquestionably, German actor, screenwriter, playwright, and production designer Kurt Raab was one of the most important and talented members of German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's incestuous circle as a man who collaborated on no less than 31 films with the filmmaker between 1969 and 1977 until the kraut comrades had an nasty 'break up.' Among other things, Fassbinder converted Raab to homosexuality in 1970 and would later get his friend hooked on cocaine while the two were working on their last film together, Bolwieser (1977) aka The Stationmaster's Wife. Like Fassbinder, Raab would also die prematurely as a result of his vices in 1988 at the age of 46 as a result of AIDS related complications. In the posthumously released and sensationally titled documentary Sehnsucht nach Sodom (1989) aka Yearning For Sodom aka Yearning for Sodom or Projections in Front of an Empty Screen on a Dazzling Futile Wonderful and Wasted Life with a Thankless Medium co-directed by Raab, the viewer gets an uncomfortably close look at the actor as he stoically stares death in the face whilst succumbing to AIDS in rather inhuman quarantine conditions after facing abject rejection from scared family members. Not long before he died, Raab was commissioned by the West German government to write a book on German New Cinema, but later decided to shelve the book idea and create a video art doc on the same subject with Hanno Baethe. Co-directed by Baethe and fellow Fassbinder superstar Hans Hirschmüller (The Merchant of Four Seasons, Eight Hours are Not a Day), Yearning for Sodom was originally intended as a documentary directed solely by Raab about German New Cinema, Fassbinder, and his life's work, but after discovering he had AIDS after only creating 6 of the 33 sketches he dreamed up, the actor decided to make a sort of poetic video art obituary where it seems as if the dead man is speaking from the grave while confined to a sterile Hamburg hospital bed. Neither a pathetic pity party nor a superficially sentimental self-tribute, Yearning for Sodom is nothing short of a macabre window into the deteriorating yet still sharp mind of a charismatic yet sometimes creepy man who in the past portrayed cannibalistic cocksucking serial killers and heterosexual Stefan George wannabes, but has taken on the morbid non-identity of a virtual corpse who literally takes a wheelchair ride in the very same cemetery that he will be buried in only months later. Indeed, the man responsible for the mystifying Bavarian Catholic iconography and rooms of mirrors that make Fassbinder's films from 1969-1977 so memorable, Raab was no less a flamboyant production designer when it came to his own funeral, even choosing his coffin to the last detail as depicted in Yearning for Sodom.

In his essay book on all-things-sodom, The Book of Sodom (1995), author Paul Hallam wrote, "A small room off the main Sodom season should house a video monitor for viewing the 1988 Sehnsucht nach Sodom (A Yearning for Sodom), a record of the dying days of the German actor Kurt Raab. This fierce and moving video demands viewing intimacy. Though it is short, the pace is slow, the rhythm dictated by the restrictions of Raab's illness. The actor remembers a melancholic all-night drinking bout in Berlin/Sodom, long before his HIV diagnosis, and smiles as he remarks, 'the sun shining into a gay bar is something terrible.' The dawn was, however, to bring a lover." That lover, a young twink that was no less than two decades the actor's junior, would end his own life 'poetically' (or at least that is how he apparently described suicide) by taking an overdose of sleeping pills and drowning in a bathtub, but not before assumedly giving Raab the death sentence known as 'gay cancer,' thus demonstrating that Fassbinder was on to something when he decided to title his first feature 'Love is Colder Than Death.' Beginning the documentary eerily singing, "Yearning... Yearning for Sodom. Yearning... Yearning for Sodom" and less fondly remarking, "Who will be next? To fade away in the twilight? Our beloved friends are dying. Dying like flies. I shed fervent tears for I know...Gone. Forgotten. Over. Thanks," the almost zombie-like Kurt Raab featured in Yearning for Sodom certainly does not resemble the hysterical incestuous homo brother he played in The American Soldier (1970), nor the cuckolded civil servant of The Stationmaster's Wife, as his face is emaciated to the point where it resembles a weary skull and his corpse-like body is covered in Kaposi's sarcoma spots. As to how Raab copes with the fact that he is about to have a date with the Grim Reaper, he remarks, "We were making films almost all the time. I made 31 with Fassbinder between 1969 and 1977, the year I broke up with him. That was very hard for me. It was my best, wildest, most chaotic and most creative time ever. So when this illness gets me down, I say: 'Who has been so lucky as to work with a Fassbinder? Who is world famous, and whose films are still seen?...And that for 10 or 11 years. You've always been lucky, despite some bad times. You always had work. So it's not as if I never lived when I die here of Aids because I have lived my life,'" thus appreciating the fact he has lived a fuller life than most.

YEARNING FOR SODOM

To help his friend live the last couple months of his life in as comfortable a manner as possible considering his clearly terminal condition, German actor Hans Hirschmüller has become Raab's own nurse, stating upon taking on the thankless job, "I was reluctant to get involved with Kurt and his illness. I knew: one hospital visit and there'd be no turning back. We've been acting together for 20 years. Our last engagement was at the Deutsche Schauspielhaus, where I had to take over Kurt's role." Hirschmüller, who is heterosexual, also goes on to detail the dirty job that is wiping a AIDS-addled sodomite's ass, confessing regarding the entire experience, "I was far less involved in my mother's death, with the process of dying. I'd never have nursed my mother. Or changed my kid's diapers. I did Kurt Raab's. I caught up on some things that I was silly enough to miss out on. But I have caught up. Then something happens to you. No disgust. Nothing.

Not even sympathy. I was even cruel to him. I wanted to help him. Please him.” Unfortunately, Raab’s little sister is nowhere near as empathetic as she not only denies her dying brother a room in her home (thus forcing him to stay in a prison-like atmosphere in the hospital) because apparently local peasants think he is possessed by the devil, but also a plot in the family cemetery, claiming that there is not enough space for a despicable diseased fag corpse. During a more merry moment of the documentary, Raab reminisces about how he was once engaged to a woman, stating to Hirschmüller after he questions how a gay man can make love to a woman, “Homosexuals have horny cocks too...No. I really loved her.” After being carted around in a wheelchair at the somber graveyard in which his corpse is to be interred in a mere couple months, Raab disappears and Hirschmüller reads the actor’s specified plans for his funeral. Needless to say, Raab opts for a lavish old school German style casket, so as to leave this cruel world in classic style. Yearning for Sodom concludes with Fassbinder’s ex-wife Ingrid Caven singing a song in tribute to Raab, which fades to a shot of the actor’s Kaposi’s sarcoma spots dissolving into stars.

Aside from co-directing Yearning for Sodom, Raab previously directed one other film, the rather redundant and bizarrely anti-erotic ‘women in prison’ (WiP) flick The Island of the Bloody Plantation (1983) aka Die Insel der blutigen Plantage starring Udo Kier and Barbara Valentin. Needless to say, while I can only recommend Island of the Bloody Plantation to Fassbinder completists and the most wayward of WiPhiles, Yearning for Sodom is mandatory viewing for Fassbinder fanatics and German New Cinema fans alike as a sort of entry from the historical necrology of German New Cinema. Indeed, in one of the sketches that appears in Yearning for Sodom that Raab made before contracting AIDS and totally changing the entire objective of the documentary, he hysterically shouts while sporting women’s lingerie, “Realism. Naturalism. Surrealism. Expressionism. Futurism. The German silent movie. The German talkie. Cinema in the Weimar era. Cinema in the Nazi era. The German film. The pan-Germanic film. The sex education film. The Reich propaganda film. The Reich film. The public enlightenment film. The war film. The post-war film. The German homeland film. The German film of fortune. The German tear-jerker. The German box-office draw. Grandpa’s cinema is dead. Daddy’s cinema is dead. Long live baby’s cinema. The New German Cinema. The young German cinema is dead,” thus giving an entire terminology-based history of Teutonic cinema in a matter of a minute or two thus ultimately reflecting the death of kraut cinema in general. While I would be lying if I did not admit that Yearning for Sodom is a daunting downer of a documentary, it also features Kurt Raab as his typically darkly humorous self, suckling on blut like he did in the serial killer masterpiece he penned and starred in, Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe (1973) aka The Tenderness of Wolves, as well as channeling William S. Burroughs in a self-denigrating scene where he plays his doctor and tells someone on the phone, “In my opinion,

YEARNING FOR SODOM

Mr. Raab is no longer completely sound of mind," thereupon demonstrating his ability to keep his tongue placed firmly in cheek whilst physically and mentally deteriorating in a rather grotesque way. Despite his rather pitiable fate, there is no ignoring the fact that he gave some of the most memorable and idiosyncratic lead performances of cinema history in such masterpieces as Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1971), The Tenderness of Wolves, Satan's Brew (1976), and The Stationmaster's Wife (1977), not to mention his similarly memorable supporting roles in The American Soldier, The Niklashausen Journey (1970), Beware of a Holy Whore (1971), World on a Wire (1973), and Adolf and Marlene (1977). Indeed, rather than look back on Raab as a socially scorned victim of gay cancer, I will always remember him as the crazed bourgeois cuckold who run amok in sterile technocratic Deutschland, as well as the sodomite serial killer who was truly looking for Sodom, but instead opted for bugging and butchering young boys and feeding them to his charming kraut friends.

-Ty E

LOLA AND BILLY THE KID

Kutluğ Ataman (1999)

Turbulent Turkish trannies, raging cock-sucking skinheads, homophobic Turk leather-fags, brother-raping fagola family men, dapper ass-bandit Aryan aristocrats, and Turk tonk twinkles just make some of the more sexually and socially confused characters of the culturally and racially mongrelized German film Lola and Billy the Kid (1999) aka Lola und Bilidikid directed by queer Turkish auteur Kutluğ Ataman (Karanlık Sular, 2 Girls); a work that wonderfully, wildly, wantonly depicts the trouble German-born Turks face in the Fatherland that is not their own father's. A uniquely unhealthy yet undeniably provocative convergence of seedy and sometimes superficial melodrama and skin-deep sodo-mania, an astute study on fag-on-fag fag-bashing, mischievously macabre ultra-low-camp carnal comedy, ridiculous yet relevant race hate, and an endearing ending fit for a sentimental eunuch, Lola and Billy the Kid is the sort of flick one would expect was directed by a cosmopolitan yet racially-conscious foreigner who was at some point in his life deeply influenced by Rainer Werner Fassbinder's In a Year of 13 Moons (1978), the films of Pedro Almodóvar, personal political science, and the most deleteriously debauched drag shows in little Turkey, Berlin. In terms of engrossing entertainment, Lola and Billy the Kid is a near Memetis mud-packer masterpiece, but as a work of stoically serious celluloid art, one might say that the film leads one to conclude that director Ataman does not deserve to lick crusty kraut queer auteur Rosa von Praunheim's pretty pink shoes, although it is a work that will surely appeal to fanatical fans of New German cinema, if only for the fact that there has been a void in Teutonic cinema for a number of decades now, so it is ironic that a foreigner would fill it to some extent. Although featuring a number of standout characters and an engaging plot and subplots that could be easily followed by the typical pedestrian American filmgoer, Lola and Billy the Kid – a work featuring politically incorrect puffs and a celluloid call to castration anxiety – is not exactly the sort of film that will appeal to mainstream audiences, let alone entire families, despite the fact that perturbing family matters are an innate characteristic of the plot. Although I certainly cannot vouch for them, I seriously doubt the average Turk would be a fan of Lola and Billy the Kid as it makes it seem like every Turkish man is a turbulent self-loathing turdburglar or tormented masochistic shemale and that every Turkish mother is a fervent fag-enabler. Needless to say, these Turk Teutons are not in Istanbul anymore, but a nation that trashed their own culture and customs after losing two cataclysmic World Wars and replaced it with a degenerate dedication to hyperhedonism, senseless self-indulgence, and any human weakness for pleasure that would could imagine of.

Seventeen-year-old street-rat Murat (Baki Davrak) has one warped Turkish sodomite family as it is full of incestuous semen demon secrets that would even shock kraut queen von Praunheim, if not influence to stalk gay bars on Turkish ghetto section of Berlin. For starters, Murat's older brother Osman (Hasan Ali Mete) – who is apparently a lapsed limp-wrister himself despite now having a family of his own – wants to set his young bro straight by various methods, including treating him to strippers and statuesque German prostitutes, which he firmly turns down as he rather takes his chances giving away tricks in tearoom toilet stalls located at the Berlin Olympiastadion (Olympic Stadium; site of the 1936 'Nazi' summer Olympics) while on school field-trips, even if his male suitor – a novice neo-nazi in training – is compelled to smear the queer at the insistence of his Turk-terrorizing friends. Unbeknownst to Murat, he has another brother named Lola (Gandi Mukli) who was disowned by his family because he is an unrepentant member of the prissy pink team who once showed up in his Islamic homestead wearing a female neon red wig, thereupon resulting in his permanent banishment (with Murat being as a result of his father's need to 'replace' his exiled son). Lola's boyfriend Bilidikid aka Billy (Erdal Yildiz) – a homo-hating, ultra-masculine iron hoof poofter who earns his living by allowing guys to blow him in bathroom stalls with semen stains covering the wall – wants his buttercup boi toy to cut his cock off so the two can go back to Turkey and form a 'proper family' as man and wife and not live a openly gay life like "German fags." Meanwhile, a degenerate German aristocrat named Friedrich von Schmidt (Michael Gerber) begins a relationship that starts with a bought blow-job in a public park with Turk hustler Iskender (Murat Yilmaz), who also happens to be a colon-choking compatriot of reluctant bent boy Bilidikid. An anachronistic aged aristocrat who is in denial about her less prestigious position in society, Friedrich's mother Ute (Inge Keller) cannot get down with her son's brown beau. On top of dealing with insanely inflamed flaming inter-gay Turkish relations, the ripped rectum realm of the Turkish ghetto is stalked by a group of hostile and, in some cases, homosexual, German skinheads who especially have a desire to smash and gay bash Lola while s/he is dressed in drag. Beginning with absurd but highly hilarious incendiary verbal insults like "camel fucker" and "go back to Bagdad" at the Turkish sods, it is only a matter of time before the two had a shadow that makes for some sort of hyper-degenerate postmodern globalist West Side Story from multicultural hell.

LOLA AND BILLY THE KID

Despite being directed by a Turk, Lola and Billy the Kid makes no attempt to portray his people in a pristinely positive light nor does he layer the film with pathetic politically correct puffery as is typical of similar racial 'outsider' films in ethno-masochistic Europa. After all, I doubt any sane person would find it normal to see a nearly elderly Turkish peasant woman giving her son a bath in an archaic washtub. Indeed, while portraying Turks and Teutons as fatally flawed individuals trying to retain their dignity in a state of impenetrable racial and cultural chaos. While a whole family of Turks has produced a family of all flaming fairies who would have otherwise lived rather conventional lives had they grown up in their homeland, even if buggering adolescent boys on the side, the everyday blue-collar Germans – fed up with a nation that has nothing to offer them yet harbors mostly illegal ‘refugees’ – takes out their hatred on the foreign other; individuals, who when especially dressed in flamboyant drag, stick out like sore brown thumbs. Somewhat nihilistic in its message, Lola and Billy the Kid is certainly not the kind of liberal feel-good sentimentalist drama that left activists would praise as artistic evidence of the oxymoronic statement that “diversity is our strength.” Directed with a distinctly Turkish and queer persuasion, Lola and Billy the Kid reveals that auteur Kutluğ Ataman has seriously studied the kultur of the nation he depicts, most obviously with references to morbid melodramas of New German cinema Über-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder, especially Katzelmacher (1969), In a Year of 13 Moons (1978) and Lola (1981) without assembling an inept gross accidental parody of these films. For an enthralling if not overly ambitious look at multicultural Germany after Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) and Fassbinder from a positively personal and peculiar perspective, Lola and Billy the Kid makes for an audacious cinematic affair with the culturally, socially, and sexually abstracted ausländer that might make one think twice about visiting bathrooms in the Turkish sector of town.

-Ty E

FRIEND
FRIEND

Kwak Kyung-taek (2001) During my descent into my favoritism of Korean films, it is obvious they have a knack for cinematography and amazing character development. It's a matter of fact, not opinion. If you don't believe me, you can just check out The Host, Memories of Murder, Save the Green Planet!, or Tae Guk Gi! My personal favorite Korean film is also my favorite gangster film. FRIEND shows the upcoming of life-long friends from the roots of many various families. Some stay straight, some go crooked, and some become sociopaths. The film opens up similarly to City Of God with godly cinematography and also takes the reigns of being a self-autobiographical film of a rough childhood with bold decisions thrust at our youth at a tender age. Friend is a peg holding the gangster film bar up waiting for films to spread the weight. The only one even worth mentioning in this review would be The Departed. With the words of Coffin Joe echoing in my mind "There's the most perfect creation of nature: children! Pity that they grow up to become idiots. In search of nothing. Lost in a Labyrinth of egoism... and dominated by a non-existent force: the faith in the immortality of the spirit.", Friend has new meaning. The situations these perfect creations face of that of unspeakable atrocities. Classroom violence, gang wars, rivaling schools, disastrous love, and having nonsupporting parents are only a few of the obstacles this group of four friends face. Each of the four main leads brings a distinguished charisma to their roles. Emotions ranging from goofy, yet hiding his sorrow, to the "bad ass" troublemaker who is victim to his own persecutions. These are just a few of the quirks of these personalities. Friend on the entertainment level is monstrous. It also features one of the most epic fight scenes ever. This one doesn't use slow-motion digitally captured effects, just a couple teenage gangsters against an entire school. Friend is a film to redefine film. That is me putting it simply. You must do everything in your power to view this film. At all costs.

-Maq

TRUCK

Kwon Hyung-Jin (2008)

John Q sympathy plot. How far would you go? scenario but not as effective in parts as to blame the horrendous butchering of the Korean language committed by Yoo Hae-jin. The only compassion this film plays towards us, the wonderful cultured audience, are the many twists & turns along the way. A battle of social identities scourge throughout the film broadening the canals of thriller films accepting an upkeep of suspense. Korean films always look good, this fact is present and accounted for. While looking like a trapper keeper, few Korean films lose their way amongst hits such as A Bittersweet Life, Save the Green Planet!, and Friend. Truck acquires a target audience with a momentous build-up and a depressing lack-luster ending. A blue-collar truck driver's daughter is dying of the same heart condition that took the life of her mother. In order to raise $60,000, he agrees to drive a truck bed full of corpses to dump them. Doing this sounds like an easy enough job, that is until he picks up a wounded police officer chasing after a demented serial killer. Come to find out, the cop is actually the killer and the two archetypes representing certain alignments escalates to a superbly crafted tale of mind games. Then of course, the ending pretty much sacrifices all integrity for a Pan-Asian staple in dramas by including a final shot of a family on the beach. Those tricky bastards. Truck has a cheerful disposition towards violence, more concerning a dormant expressive type, aided by the sight of persuasive corpses. Serial slaughterer Kim's furious rusty blade slices arteries in his own quest for an extension of life. The overall film feels like John Q meets Michael Mann's Collateral but the finalized product isn't as dramatic and sensationalized as these American contemporary dramas. The viewpoint of violence is of a rather noble one. Cheol-min becomes of which he is disgusted by due to a slight malfunction in defense. After accidentally killing a young male, he turns into some what of a beast as scoped in Straw Dogs. Truck merely exists as a bland thriller for some quick box office success and would do starkly well in the land of opportunity if it decided to be optioned for an American remake. Truck is a rather disappointing film that starts off promising. The beginning is the precise definition of a suspense film with remarkably shot footage of human humility. In search of something a bit more, Truck loses its way to serial killer norms and spades of clichés. The death of a film is something to sympathize over but Truck still manages to be an obscure experiment in the deterioration of a film from within. So far, Truck is near impossible to find out information on and doesn't even have an IMDb page. Perhaps that's for the best. This would be worth a rental if it happens to pick up a distributor. I can envision Magnet picking this one up.

-mAQ

Doggy Poo
Doggy Poo

Kwon Oh-sung (2003) SPOILERS Doggy Poo is exactly what you'd think it would be, plus more. What Doggy Poo essentially starts out as, seems like a Christmas story or even a story about a lone "thing" trying to make his keep in the world but this film morphs slowly into a film which seems to force religion onto the viewer by asking ourselves "Why has God put me on earth?" The tactics it uses are that of manipulating sorrow and harnessing it into a cocktail of emotions. Doggy Poo is like Milo & Otis, It is a children's story from Asia, dubbed over with over-dramatic voice acting. It is the claymation story of a lone piece of shit dropped by a dog that cries every couple of scenes cause God made him as a waste of space. At the end of this half an hour story of a turd crying, he copulates, more or less, with a weed, creating a dandelion. The scene of fusion between the poo and the weed is quite beautiful for being an absent-minded Korean animation film. It's hard to take the film serious for it's intense subject matter dealing with a talking turd. South Park has a more believable atmosphere surrounding it's poo hero. Many of the scenes are well constructed and are plausible. Many situations are comical and try too hard at making the viewer cry. All these, are in vain. Doggy Poo is a highly absurd film regarding shit. Not one directed by Spielberg, mind you. But rather one about trying to find a purpose in life, but falls short when it reveals it's sinister nature by spreading a message which states God loves shit.

-Maq

THE AMERICAN DREAMER

L.M. Kit Carson (1971)

I don't really give a shit about actors, especially Hollywood ones, yet actor turned auteur Dennis Hopper—a man with a totally singular acting career who appeared in two films starring James Dean (who was personal friend and mentor), played his first lead role in the Poe-esque gothic cult flick Night Tide (1961) directed by Curtis Harrington (who taught Hopper you did not need to work in the studio system to make a movie), directed and costarred in a little film entitled Easy Rider (1969) that started nothing short of a cultural and cinematic revolution in the United States, totally destroyed his career with his second feature The Last Movie (1971) and lived in drug-addled exile from Hollywood for about a decade, and ultimately made an unlikely comeback in iconic performances in masterful films like Apocalypse Now (1979), Out of the Blue (1980), and especially David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986)—is someone I have always respected, even before knowing his actual name and seeing his performance as the one-legged maniac acting 'Feck' in Tim Hunter's cult masterpiece River's Edge (1986) when I was a young kid. Indeed, as an innately impassioned actor who starred in films by filmmakers ranging from Nicholas Ray to Roland Klick, an auteur filmmaker who directed only seven feature films but at least two masterpieces, a professional photographer who snapped shots of everyone from Martin Luther King, Jr. to Andy Warhol, a part-time painter/poet/art collector, and a sort of American counter-culture Casanova and (in)famous lecherous ladyman/hippie hedonist, Hopper was a postmodern Renaissance man of sorts who, in his own way via acting, directing, and his personal life, reflected everything that was good and bad about America, so it is only fitting that he once played the subject of a rarely-seen and wholly worthwhile documentary entitled The American Dreamer (1971) co-directed by L.M. Kit Carson (who, on top of penning the script for Paris, Texas (1984), would associate produce and pen The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 (1986) starring Hopper) and photo journalist Lawrence Schiller (whose claim to fame is he was the last person to take nude photos of Marilyn Monroe, but is now a TV hack who has directed films with titles like 'JonBenet: Anatomy of a Cold Case' (2006)), who were both personally invited by the Easy Rider director to spend 18 days filming him and his girls. Made when Hopper fled to from Hollywood to Taos, Texas with the stolen master print of his second feature The Last Movie—a work that the actor/auteur was given $1 million to make by Universal Studios in the hope that they would receive a major monetary return like they did on Easy Rider, but were ultimately disappointed with the director's edit—The American Dreamer is an unintentionally darkly hilarious yet sometimes depressing depiction of a filmmaker at the height of his success, but, as he would prophetically predict in the doc itself, would ultimately lose it all. Featuring a nihilistic hippie hedonist pseudo-guru

THE AMERICAN DREAMER

Hopper who looks (and kind of acts) like a cross between Jim Morrison and Charles Manson (who he would visit in prison), The American Dreamer is a virtual catalog of the societal ills that would lead to the early demise of so-called 'New Hollywood.' An innately incriminating and undeniably unflattering portrait of Hopper rolling joints and smoking dope, engaging in orgies, describing himself as a lesbian who would "rather give head to a beautiful woman than fuck her," shooting rifles in deserts with gigantic crucifixes, describing his ex-wife Michelle Phillips of The Mamas & the Papas as the person he is most afraid of, and detailing how he looks to turn innocent virgins into wanton whores (his ideal woman is a 'virgin-whore'), and pseudo-philosophizing about things for which he has no clue about what is he talking about, The American Dream is also, quite arguably, if not unintentionally so, one of the best anti-drug films ever made.

It seems Herr Hopper has smoked too much Mary Jane by the time The American Dreamer began production, as he certainly is a man who has lost inhibitions as demonstrated by the fact that he begins the documentary answering his door wearing nothing but a towel, which he soon takes off to finish the bath he was in the middle of, thereupon baring his boney hippie ass to the viewer. Hopper regularly smokes grass, drops acid, and engages in orgies and as far as he is concerned, "whoever hates me for that...terrific and whoever loves me for it...terrific." While people seem to think that his hit film Easy Rider is some sort of pro-counter-culture/pro-hippie/pro-drug agitprop meant to rile up the youthful against old school conservative America, Hopper declares that the film was influenced by his belief that America is a society that "glorifies criminals and glorifies the outlaw," adding regarding his film, "The people at the end of EASY RIDER that kill us and shoot us off the bikes... What's the difference between the two on the bikes and the two in the truck?," thus demonstrating that he is not exactly in solidarity with those kosher clowns of Hollywood who think rural America is populated by demonic redneck savages, but instead thought all groups and subcultures of America were innately tainted and prone toward a sort of barbaric criminality. When asked what he sees as happening to him if The Last Movie fails, Hopper envisions a sorry fate similar to Orson Welles, stating, "What's gonna to happen to me? Nothing's going to happen to me because...like you know...I was sleeping on a mattress when I edited Easy Rider and I can sleep on a mattress again. I have friends...THE LAST MOVIE is going to be acceptable...It's going to be accepted...It's going to be much better than EASY RIDER and if it's nothing more than like THE MAGNIFICENT AMBERSONS, which was like Orson Welles' second film and CITIZEN KANE was his first...made no money and THE MAGNIFICENT AMBERSONS made no money, probably a very happy man because, like, it will be that good." After describing Welles as a "poor bastard," Hooper goes on to bash the complete structure of the Hollywood studio system, stating, "If they can't build up Orson Welles...make up a movie for half a million dollars and show it in the universities then fuck 'em. And fuck the universities and fuck everybody, man...because like, you know, then there's no audience...it's only a lot of frivolous, cheerleaders." Indeed, now a sort of megalomaniac auteur, Hopper clearly has an uncompromising benevolent view of the Hollywood studio system, but he also seems to suspect the days of the 'soup du jour' Tinseltown are about to end.

During multiple segments of The American Dreamer, it seems that Hopper is quite annoyed by the filmmakers. On top of complaining, "you sure are nosey" to a cameraman who is filming him rolling a joint, Hopper also berates the directors for what he sees as them not being able to direct a subject in the proper context. Of course, Hopper wastes no time displaying his various exotic concubines, including a young Asian chick that the actor/auteur admits upon first seeing her, "I immediately attempted to take that virginity and turn her into a whore." Naturally, when a young 'actress' approaches Hopper on the street, he tells her he is the easiest person to talk to in the world and then he proceeds to sweet talk her so as to presumably get in her panties. When Hopper is asked by one of the filmmakers what kind of girl he looks for in terms of marriage material, he gives the following confused response: "I had the classic American concept... I wanted the virgin that I married, that had my children and stayed at home...then when I discovered that I was a whore, I decided that I wanted the whore, you know, who could understand me and we could understand each other. So, I don't know really, I'm caught between two worlds...like I think that everyone wants the virgin and wants the whore, but I'm just hoping someday I will find the...virgin whore." Despite Hopper's harem of hyper hedonistic hippie sexpots, he ultimately seems like a rather lonely fellow, which he pretty much admits when he remarks, "I don't believe I can relate to one person anymore and give my trust to one person anymore." After Hopper absurdly proclaims, "I'd rather give head to a beautiful woman than fuck her really" and then nonsensically adds, "Basically, I think like a lesbian," one of his chicks has enough sense to bring him back to reality and remind him that he is a man. Indeed, despite Hopper's fruity pseudo-philosophical musings about his inner-lesbo, he is no pansy pacifist as testified by his remarks, "I believe that a man that doesn't protect himself is really a fool. You have to protect yourself" and "I believe in love and hate," not to mention his seemingly pathological proclivity for shooting off rifles in the desert, as if he is a born-again Mansonite preparing some sort of societal collapse of the apocalyptic sort. In a sort of shockingly senseless anti-bourgeois revolutionary act, Hopper strips all his clothes in a Los Alamos suburb (what he describes as 'scientific suburbia') and declares of his pseudo-Aktionist action on retrospect, "that was really far-out symbolically...I was really self-conscious." In terms of metapolitics, Hopper declares in all seriousness, "It is very difficult at times...if you believe in evolution, not to believe in revolution." As for plans for the future, Hopper gives the classic response, "I would like to make movies on the moon...I like to put people on. Hahaha.”

THE AMERICAN DREAMER

While Dennis Hopper babbles on about a lot of brain-dead bullshit in The American Dreamer he says a lot of insightful, if not sometimes obvious, things about the film industry and the art of cinema in general. In terms of cinema's power to brainwash the mentally feeble (as well as the not so mentally feeble), Hopper, referencing one of the rare occasions when a Bolshevik revolutionary was right, states, “The camera doesn't remind me of a gun but it does remind me of a weapon...and Lenin believed that the revolution would be fought with the camera...with films...and at a certain point guns would be unfeasible...and that minds would be won in the theater rather than on a battlefield.” Indeed, Hopper's own film Easy Rider would start a cultural revolution of sorts that changed the way people looked at the cinema as an art form, the American landscape and its 'eclectic' populous. Ironically, Hopper would more or less give a scathing criticism of the counter-culture zeitgeist with his third feature Out of the Blue, which makes Easy Rider seem like a work of highly idealistic youth naivety of the shamelessly sensational and retardedly romantic sort. To fully respect Out of the Blue and much of Hopper's post-dope/post-cocaine acting, including in Lynch's Blue Velvet (despite playing a deranged rapist killer in the film, Hopper would tell Lynch regarding why he wanted to play the role, “I have to play Frank because I am Frank”) and Hunter's River's Edge, The American Dreamer is mandatory viewing as it demonstrates that the somewhat unhinged actor/director wised up, got his shit together, and dropped most of the false nihilistic non-values that so many other people of his degenerate generation bought into it, screwing up their lives as a result. As Peter L. Winkler reveals in his Hopper biography Dennis Hopper: The Wild Ride of a Hollywood Rebel (2011) as to why the documentary would ultimately become a lost film: “At the beginning of THE AMERICAN DREAMER, Hopper says that he welcomes the opportunity to lay his life bare in the film, whether people love him or hate him as a result. After early screenings of the film, he changed his mind. Lois Rudnick wrote that he blocked the film's distribution, though a soundtrack album was issued.” Undoubtedly, The American Dreamer makes for the perfect double feature with the Dutch documentary Dennis Hopper: The Decisive Moments (2002) directed by Thom Hoffman, which is also unfortunately rather hard to find. Of course, Hopper makes no mention of The American Dreamer in The Decisive Moments but he does demonstrate that his mind is no longer clouded by drugs and self-destructive tendencies. The Good, the Bad and the Ugly of longhaired and high as hell hippie era Dennis Hopper, The American Dreamer is a celluloid train wreck about a true 'survivor' who managed to survive the crash. Ultimately, The American Dreamer proves without a doubt that Hopper was a more interesting and complex fellow than the one-note wonder character he played in Easy Rider, which one certainly cannot say about most stars in Hollywood. Indeed, Hopper is probably the only actor in the history of the studio system whose public actions and behavior where more juicy than the dubious rumors cine-magician Kenneth Anger wrote about in his Hollywood Babylon books.

-Ty E

HER VENGEANCE
HER VENGEANCE

Lam Ngai Kai (1988)

I thought I had seen it all, that is until I peeped this CAT III (or II, depending on the release) Chinese rape-revenge exploitation piece with gratuitous violence and wheelchair kung-fu. It all starts with Pauline Wong working in a night club. This fateful night sees her shoo away a gang of drunken hooligans who regroup outside and assault her leading to a scenario of gang rape and the shocking aftermath. Truth be told, It's quite evident that this is a piece of trash art from the director of Riki-Oh: The Story of Ricky. Upon inspection from a doctor, he humorously starts screaming that she has AIDS and that her vagina's going to start spewing green funk. Putting it lightly seems out of the question. Upon the degradation that she suffered, a beam of hope flutters to the spotlight. She seeks what any female exploitation star desires - a painful revenge. Along the way, she expresses absolutely no strength resulting in a pathetic message of anti-violence but the film finds support weight from the crippled co-star that plays her father. The wheelchair bound, ex-Triad, and full-time dad (Ching-Ying Lam, friend of the legendary Sammo Hung) who resembles an Asiatic Neil Patrick Harris steals all the attention turning this trash piece into a glamorous CAT III ordeal. Decency is a rare find in exploitation. Most films spill guts hollowly with out fearing repercussion. Seen in I Spit On Your Grave, Keaton slays all of her rapists with very little consequence other than the prior elongated rape. In this film, our beloved infected Pauline stumbles around the city plotting her revenge. In what could have been a feminist CAT III classic by definition, we're given a film tainted with the very idea that females are the weaker gender. She eventually relies on her dad's enthusiastic Home Alone approach to his bar. The result is a blood bath that will forever be memorable over such trap infested cinema as Raiders of the Lost Ark. Two existing versions of the film have been released. Depending on which label you purchased (or downloaded) yours from, you will either get the longer CAT II release which features not-as-graphic depictions of violence or you could get the shorter CAT III film with more inserted brutality for all your gorehound needs. Her Vengeance is a special kind of film though, one that doesn't depend on the violence, rather the crippled antics and black humor to propel it into safe territory. Her Vengeance is a rare breed of trashy Chinese aesthetics. It brings light to a possible madcap sophistication within its doomed genre. Blood. Sex. Mayhem. Repeat. This is the doctrine from which many exploitation film makers pry their designs from. Her Vengeance is something to cherish. Easily one of the top 10 CAT III films I've seen. I couldn't recommend this enough, even if for just the wheelchair antics.

DVD/VCD Comparisons

-mAQ

RIKI-OH: THE STORY OF RICKY

Lam Ngai Kai (1991)

This is one film that doesn't need any sort of introduction but I'll relay one for those folks unfortunate enough to have not seen this splatter classic. The Story of Ricky is an unusual tale of a psychotic behind bars who quickly establishes himself as somewhat of an anti-hero. Where he had reason to murder the gangster responsible for his girlfriend's death, this reason does him no good behind bars in a maximum security prison ran by a sadistic warden and a gang of four villains, each with their own specific eccentricities and styles. Like most prison films but lacking in the department of male rape. With a wacky disposition of murder and subpar kung-fu, Riki-Oh is comic adrenaline concentrate. The film has enough sense to embrace a comedic aspect of the violence. Had it not, this film would have sunk with the low-budget German splatter trash pouring out of their country by way of big boys with little dreams.

Advancing on a tier-type ladder is what leads Ricky to triumph. The standard progression of "boss battles" bridges the gap of narrative and flashbacks to create something animated with quirk. Lam Nai-choi has done his homework indeed. Basing off of what is the Westerner's approach to action films with unbelievable bad asses, the quota is met with both the ingredients of a protagonist that bleeds and the invincible hero trope. This is on display during the fight with Oscar, but one of the Gang of Four, when Ricky's tendon is severed with a blade. Standing statuesque, he slowly raises his arms and proceeds to pull his tendons out to tie them together, successfully giving him mobility in his arm again. With the simple formula of "best of both worlds", there is simply nothing to not love in this minimal epic. Being adapted straight from a manga of the same name, Riki-Oh is an excellent adaptation worthy of every meter of notoriety earned.

Interestingly enough, Riki-Oh was the first film to receive the CATIII rating for its violence, and not sex. The world of exploitation over in the East is strictly dominated by perversion and not dismemberment, as us Westerners advocate. To see a nipple is obscene, but for ruthless bloodshed, enjoyment will be had. This hypocrisy is why I normally traverse to indulge in film. I am one of the few who prefer complex eroticism and lewd fetishism to the beheadings and bludgeoning. Riki-Oh, of course, is the exception. Being completely void of any sexuality, Riki-Oh manages to entertain and amass enormous respect from me for the grossly nostalgic effect it has on all. Even to strangers of cinema is Riki-Oh endearing and charming, in that gross syrupy way. Simply, The Story of Ricky is short and sweet. The pacing is quite efficient as well as to never skip into the plane of mundane. If you're reading this, most likely you've seen this gem. If you haven't, I recommend doing so immediately as you'd be hard pressed to enjoy any other such lunacy as much as this.

-mAQ

THE TORTURER
THE TORTURER

Lamberto Bava (2005)

Lamberto Bava's The Torturer is a picky little film. It is a soft core porn and a ultra-bloody stylistic slasher film. It seems too much like the underrated erotica films entitled FANTOM KILER. A slew of attractive women accidentally pull off their blouses and get sexually mutilated until they are no longer desirable. While flashy, the plot is water thin and leaves a lot of confusion. It follows a mysterious killer who tortures young, busty actresses in very inventive ways. Doesn't really pave too much room for any kind of feeling in the film at all. We have the suave yet shady theater director who auditions stunning sluts forcing them to do ludicrous acts. He then promises them the world. After that, some villain whose identity is cleverly hidden with darkness much like the Wizard of Oz, proceeds to torture these women in many different forms. All the torture scenes even open with the same guitar power chord which builds up nicely, but seeing as it plays about 30+ times during the film, it gets very repetitive and stale quick. We then meet the heroine leading lady who finds an earring of her friends on the audition stage. She puts two and two together and realizes she is missing. So she begins a classy search for her friend while beginning a love story with the director. Cue the entering of his madness. He has some sort of psychological problem resulting in him hallucinating a red toy car and a creepy Carrie-esque loop of a child saying something. While being a mundane film, it does have great effects. Gore that makes you slightly queasy from showing you new forms of methods. Most gore nowadays are all very similar. Dismemberments and such plague our horror film. We don't see anything new and wondrous to "ew" at. In this one, we are given a cheek mutilation and nipples ripped off. Spikes embedded in women's tender flesh and a soldering iron torture scene. Oh, did I forget the vagina ripping/melting? That scene caused me to shudder. The film has a very inane story with very naive characters with some great effects. What really made me like this film in the least bit is the editing and look. It's glossy, stylish, and very pretty to look at. Too bad so much had to be sacrificed for this look. Don't expect A Blade in the Dark with this classic director's newer film. You'll be sorely disappointed. Loaded with a shitty twist ending, a horrible last-minute plot device, it's visibly an attempt to make it sleazy with a brief scene explaining the filthy traits of women, and the worse acting/dub seen in an Italian giallo film, The Torturer is nothing special but has enough to prevent it from being recommendable. Italians should teach American directors a thing or two about well placed misogyny.

-mAQ

LIPSTICK

Lamont Johnson (1976)

With my recent re-watching of the erotic artsploitation thriller Tattoo (1981) directed by Bob Brooks, I felt it was about time that I re-watch the somewhat similarly themed mainstream 'rape and revenge' flick Lipstick (1976) directed by TV hack Lamont Johnson (Naked City, The Twilight Zone) and starring sisters Mariel and Margaux Hemingway in both their debut film roles. Indeed, like Tattoo, Lipstick features a quasi-artist with a serious inferiority complex who becomes fanatically obsessed with a naïve model way out of his league and decides to force himself upon her. Of course, the main difference between the two is that, while Tattoo is a politically correct work that has been accused of being misogynistic and was protested against by frigid feminists upon its release, Lipstick is a pathetic piece of sub-erotica disguised as a sincere (pseudo)feminist agitprop, as well as a sleazy courtroom melodrama. Indeed, before junky McGuido auteur Abel Ferrara's suavely stylized gynocentric celluloid sleaze masterpiece Ms. 45 (1981), Lipstick appeared and demonstrated that the Hemingway sisters make for rather annoying rape victims and autistic avant-garde musicians make for exceedingly pathetic rapists. A project originally offered to Michael 'Death Wish' Winner, who turned it down, by Italian producer Dino De Laurentiis, Lipstick has the look of an exploitation film on retrograde 1970s Hollywood steroids as if it was directed for the Lifetime channel and thus should be approached as such so as not to make the viewer squirm in total disgust due to its due to philistine brand of feminism. Such a decidedly degenerate work that the director tricked Mariel Hemingway, who was only 15 at the time of shooting, into doing a rape scene without her knowledge, Lipstick is respectable in one sense in that it is seemingly unbelievable that unhollywood had the gall to produce a work that combines gratuitous nudity and rape scenes with an anti-rape message pleading with lawmakers to take a greater stand against male vaginal (and in Lipstick's case, anal) pillagers. Of course, one must also give credits to the producers for attempting to cash in on both prospective rapists and feminists. The ostensibly titillating tale of a failed musical composer turned Catholic school teacher who rapes a self-absorbed model with an affinity for BDSM and gets away with it, so he also rapes said self-absorbed model's underage little sis, Lipstick is also a paradoxically politically correct yet politically incorrect work that also rather absurdly makes it seem like well educated white males are the foremost champions of forced anal entry.

Catholic school preteen Kathy McCormick (Mariel Hemingway) has a "classic 13-year-old crush" on her music teacher Gordon Stuart (Chris Sarandon), so she introduces him to her top model big sister Chris (real-life model Margaux Hemingway, who was the first person of her trade to sign a one-million-dollar contract) under the pretense that the dilettante musician can show off his original musical compositions. Kathy and Gordon meet Chris at the beach for one of her photo shoots, but the model is too busy flashing off her tits for the photographer to hear the teacher's pretentious twaddle. After seeing Chris' breasts on the beach, Gordon becomes instantly infatuated with the model, so when he is given the opportunity to swing by her apartment to show off his music, he naturally obliges. Rather unfortunately, Chris forgets the little musical play date, so when Gordon arrives, she is barely dressed and has little time to give the somewhat effeminate and rather bitchy musician attention. Indeed, Gordon does get the chance to show off his music, but it is cut short after the phone rings and Chris goes elsewhere to talk to her lover Steve Edison (Perry King). Enraged by the model's disinterest in his compositions and jealous of her numerous photographs of masculine males, including Paul Newman, hanging on the wall, Gordon hatefully confronts Chris, asking her, "You fuck priests, too?" while holding a picture of her priest brother Martin (John Bennett Perry), and proceeds to brutally beat and eventually sodomize the little lady after tying her to her own bed, with darling little Kathy walking in to witness the bloody aftermath.

LIPSTICK

Needless to say, when Gordon makes his escape, Chris calls the cops and the musician is arrested later that night. Chris gets herself a nice no bullshit Italian-American feminist lawyer Carla Bondi (Anne Bancroft), who tells her client only a small fraction of rapes are reported to the place and even less result in the victimizer being jailed. When the case goes to trial, autistic psychopath Gordon pretends he was merely the victim of Chris' sadomasochistic fantasies, which she ostensibly forced him to carry out, including the destruction of her apartment. Undoubtedly, Gordon's sleazy lawyer, who namedrops the classic French BDSM novel Story of O (1954), is of the archetypal immoral Hebraic sort and even attempts to coerce Kathy into believing her big sis is a masochist. While being cross-examined, Chris makes the mistake of admitting she gets off to S&M and thinks about cunnilingus while attempting to look seductive for her photo shoots, which sways the opinion of the jurors. In between trial dates, Gordon sinisterly taunts Chris by calling her and playing his discordant synthesizer music while he stands naked in his apartment like a true mad man with a sadistic psychosexual affliction. Of course, Gordon is found not guilty and Chris finds it hard to adjust to her post-rape life, which costs her a number of photo jobs. One day not long after the trial, Chris takes Kathy to one of her photo shoots and when the latter wanders around the large and partially unfinished building where the photo shoot is taking place, she runs into Gordon, who is now involved with playing pretentious dissonant synth music for some preposterous dance performance art involving preteen girls. Needless to say, Gordon rapes Kathy and when Chris finds out, she goes berserk. Armed with a large shotgun she recently bought to protect herself from any more prospective rapists, Chris hunts down Gordon, who is making his getaway in his car, and kills him in cold blood. In the end, despite quite literally blowing away Gordon's balls in broad daylight, Chris is found not guilty in court, thus demonstrating the new feminist flavor of the court system in the post-counter-culture era and the need for feminist-brainwashed rape victims to get their 'own phallus' by buying a gun and unloading bullets on their rapists.

Probably more empowering to an old pervert's libido than America's female majority population, Lipstick is certainly a curious piece of failed Hollywood agitprop in that even the court scenes are intrinsically eroticized, not to mention the fact that an underage female victim is given dubious 'sex appeal.' Of course, in its depiction of a bimbo top model morphing into a stoic vigilante of the ostensibly morally righteous sort, Lipstick almost degenerates into a dystopian sci-fi work by the time it is over, though that is quite admittedly one of the film's greatest appeals. In its vapid and tasteless tacked-on concluding depiction of feminazi ordained male-murdering retribution (including close-ups of the rapist being 'castrated' in what is undoubtedly the ultimate scene of closeted penis envy), Lipstick proves it is the sort of senseless estrogen-charged work that is meant to appeal to the sort of people who support Pussy Riot and the sanctimonious bourgeois sluts of SlutWalk and/or women who think prostitution and pornography are forms of female empowerment. Indeed, it is no coincidence that the 'anti-hero' of Lipstick is a not all that likeable chick who peddles her flesh for a living, as the film seems like it could have been actually penned by one of the various intellectual heavyweights of the SlutWalk movement. A rather vain vigilante flick for chicks with less than moist vaginas that is surely the favorite masturbation aid of certain rapist fetishists (be they male or female and/or misogynist or feminist), Lipstick is so bad that it actually managed to inspire not one but two Bollywood remakes (!), Insaaf Ka Tarazu (1980) and Edi Nyayam Edi Dharam (1982). An anti-Catholic film that depicts Catholic schoolgirls as dumb little sluts and nuns as stuck up hypocrites who support rapists, not to mention a work that depicts avant-garde musicians (and underground/experimental artists in general) as socially retarded rapists who suffer from acute megalomania (admittedly, I have known a number of so-called 'power electronic musicians' who fetishize rape and suffer from delusions of grandeur and whatnot), Lipstick is ultimately a singular low even for the slave-morality-minded culture-distorters of Hollywood, but then again it was produced by an Italian.

-Ty E

HELL RIDE
HELL RIDE

Larry Bishop* (2008) "Quentin Tarantino Presents..." isn't as boastful as it might come off. Tarantino, for once, did the inspiring as he told pal Larry Bishop it was his calling to write and direct his own motorcycle "exploitation" film. The end result was dubbed Hell Ride, which is a fitting name for this shallow romp through the desert with several bike gangs including over-the-top nudity and satanic biker gangs. The film comes off as childish and completely unnecessary. Every segment is separated by some form of biker party as aging Larry Bishop seduces some American whore in the sack. Belligerent and uninspired, Bishop is just another director trying to imitate classic exploitation cinema, failing in the process. I admit that I saw potential in this film with its cast and impressive cover art, but yet again, looks can be deceiving. The technical aspects of the film are the only things to really admire, when you're not staring at sand and listening to Madsen perform a monologue on dust. Bishop allocates a psychedelic freak-out scene to confuse the audience into thinking there's some shadowed depth behind the badass main character. The hidden son plot reminded me of a violent Indiana Jones film. I was waiting for Short Round to pop up at any time. The plot is strung together like stringy raw chicken. Minutes cannot cleverly pass without a flashback crudely thrown in your face, leaving you to decipher some ambiguous riddle that has a dud payoff. While I was watching this "Biker revenge film", it felt like I was watching a cutscene from a Grand Theft Auto game. Imagine if you will, a film that steals from Tarantino and Rodriguez and splices it together. What you get is a rehash of several rehashes. It's as stale as it sounds. The only "real" talent in this film is Eric Balfour who plays Comanche; a cold-hearted kid who packs a mean punch. This is just another one of those Hollywood films that tries to make you feel cool for buying it. This isn't a grindhouse Easy Rider, no matter how much Dennis Hopper is in it. This is a self-indulgent stew of pretentious ingredients, boiling to an unsatisfactory climax. Nothing about this film really shined at all. It's just best to stay away.

-mAQ

BULLY

Larry Clark (2001)

Larry Clark has been heralded time and time again for his stunning and raw teenage characters chasing drugs, punk rock, and lust. Through his career, he has presented us with unflinching portraits of teenage rebellion and sexual freedom, such as KIDS, Ken Park, and Tulsa. With the recent untimely death of Brad Renfro, I have decided to dig Bully out of the garbage for a review. Bully is one of those films based on "factual" events but presents them in such a preposterous way which is far from the real details. Instead of casting appropriate choices, Clark decided to cast hunky white males who love to take their shirts off as the lead, and to repay the audience for making Bobby a skinny white prick. The real Lisa Connelly was actually a fat chick, not skinny and sexy as we were lead to believe. Not to mention, the real Bobby was Iranian and was a muscular man, not a teeny-bopper boy who resides as a sidekick to Freddie Prinze Jr. Nothing alike. His "descent into teen sub-culture" is a failed one at that. All the characters were given these quirks to give them depth but backfire and make them seem inept. From Bobby's fascination with gay porn to Ali's fetishes, these have no effect on even the most vulnerable viewer and should be over-looked. Michael Pitt's character was, arguably, the most well-acted, albeit "fucking retarded." Pitt's character is comparable to a ten year old boy on a sugar high, but then again, knowing Larry Clark, that is probably what he was aiming for. The plot of this film involves Bobby and Marty. Marty is a loser and bends up Bobby's car so Bobby punches him in the face. Marty gets pissed off and cries about this. This leads to deep psychological damage due to his "abuse." Bobby then, "rapes" Bijou Phillips, which leads to the groups set-up of his murder. When I put rape in quotations, I mean that the rape was about as consensual as the rape in Straw Dogs. Larry Clark's tag line for the film "Where were the parents?" is a boisterous claim, especially coming from arthouse's sweetheart pedophile himself. The parents were probably preventing their children from watching this stagnant piece of filth. Tell me, why does Larry Clark have pointless shots zooming into a woman's crotch for no apparent reason? I'll admit, nudity is pretty awesome and so is violence, but this is past the point of ridiculous. Larry Clark has always been known for his amazing realist factors to his film. Who knew that all evidence of this would be to vanish after KIDS and suddenly reappear with the release of Ken Park? Without Harmony Korine, Larry Clark is nothing. He might be capable of filming disgusting Mexicans with their shirts off or take still pictures, but with video, he's not so good. Perhaps the strongest thing going for Bully, was the performance by Leo Fitzpatrick. Too bad he is so rare to see nowadays. Thank god I watch My Name is Earl. For his guest appearances, It makes that show that much worth it.

-mAQ

MARFA GIRL
MARFA GIRL

Larry Clark (2012)

Picking up where he left off with Wassup Rockers (2005) – a relatively light-hearted work considering the director's previous, more nihilistic efforts Kids (1995), Bully (2001), and Ken Park (2002) – quasi-pornographer and arthouse auteur finally releases a new feature-length work after a 7 year hiatus entitled Marfa Girl (2012) that once again focuses on the sexuality of Hispanic skaters and the white haters they face. Fed up with certain business aspects of film-making, Clark has decided to take a different and unconventional approach to film distribution when he released Marfa Girl exclusively on larryclark.com – his "first and only website" – on Tuesday, November 20th, 2012 and claims the film will never be released in theatres or on DVD, stating this way he can "cut out the crooked Hollywood distributors," which is undoubtedly a noble sentiment and certainly – whether one wants to admit it or not – the way of the future, as I for one cannot remember the last time I went the movies, nor can I recall a time when I was able to catch a Larry Clark film in the theaters. Although somewhat disillusioned with his work for the past decade or so, I make sure that I watch any film Larry Clark puts out, as his debut work Kids had a huge influence on me during my adolescent years, both as a budding cinephile who – being a preteen, I had only seen a handful of so-called 'independent' films – and as a skateboarder that for the first time was about to see a relatively realistic depiction of skaters in all their inglorious glory, thusly he will always remain a 'distinguished' filmmaker in my mind, even if he has yet to learn any new tricks over the years. The same can certainly be said of his newest effort Marfa Girl, a film that, like Clark's positively partially pornographic work Ken Park – which has yet to be officially released in the U.S. since its completion due to copyright issues (the producer neglected to get music rights) – features explicit and some would say gratuitous sexual imagery (erect penises, candid beaver shots), albeit to a lesser degree. Like Kids, Ken Park, and Wassup Rockers, Marfa Girl focuses on a shirtless teenage skater and his youthful experiences with sordid sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll. In the spirit of Wassup Rockers, Clark's newest film also laments over the implied racial discrimination of a young Latino (or in this case "1/2 Latino") by law enforcement, but instead of the concrete jungles of South Central Los Angeles, Marfa Girl is set in the desert wasteland of a quiet yet quaint West Texas town on the Mexico–United States border. Like a loose and lurid remake and cultural update of the underrated film The Border (1982) directed by Tony Richardson and starring Jack Nicholson, Marfa Girl is most provocative in its portrayal of white-brown relations and the corruption of certain members of the border control.

A lot of things have changed in American since the release of Richardson's The Border some three decades ago, which is depicted most glaringly in Marfa Girl by the fact that two of the three border control officers depicted in the film are Hispanic, as is the lead protagonist and virtually every other male character in the film. Of course, the brown border control bros are referred to as "coconuts" (brown on the outside and white on the inside), as prudishly insinuated by a rather pretentious and pompous bourgeois-born 'artiste' otherwise known as the "Marfa Girl" (Drake Burnette); a gross gal who flashes her pussy at teenage Tex-Mex boys, most notably the film's lead protagonist Adam. Somewhat inexplicably, virtually every single white woman is with a mezito man as if the film is a work of science fiction depicting a sort of dystopian (or in Clark's case, 'delightful') parallel universe. Indeed, I realize that miscegenation mania is now in vogue throughout the Occident and its bastard brother the United States, but I certainly cannot remember the last time I saw 5 foot 2 Mexican and a 5 foot 8 Europid walking hand-in-hand down the street, but then again, although almost always of a rather intrinsically 'realist' persuasion, Larry Clark's photography and filmmaking has always been more about his self-indulgent idiosyncratic fetishes than an ostensibly objective portrait of wild boys and girls as a sort of contra Paul Morrissey of the far-left and advocate of adolescent flesh of the gangly, gawky, and particularly pedomorphic sort. Generally of a fiercely and fiendishly Freudian-kitsch persuasion, Clark's films scream sexual pathology, but like Italian communist auteur Bernardo Bertolucci (The Conformist, Last Tango in Paris) before him, the voyeuristic American filmmaker passes the blame of perversion to the easy and equally clichéd target of the fascistic 'authoritarian personality,' and Marfa Girl is certainly no exception to this role to the point where one does not need a lot of speculation as to how the patently played-out plot in the film will play out. Centering on the purposeless yet promiscuous daily life of 16-year-old Latino libertine Adam (Adam Mediano) – the bastard son of an blonde Anglo woman named Mary (played by Mary Farley) and an absent and unmentioned Mexican father – who on his birthday receives some greatly gratifying fetishistic corporal punishment from his young pregnant teacher and Caucasian flesh from slutty girls (including his neighbor; an aspiring stripping/single mother of a 1/2 brown boy and the less than mystifying "Marfa Girl") aside from his Latina girlfriend, the young man's fun is ultimately hampered by a hysterical and significantly sadomasochistic white border control agent who resembles a "human pitbull" in both his physique and character named Tom (Jeremy St. James), who stalks the boy, his mother, and his 16-year-old girlfriend Inez (Mercedes Maxwell). Constantly stalking 'Mother Mary' in a variety of curiously creepy and pathetically perverted ways, including knocking on her door and showing her pictures of diseased female genitals, peeping Tom is a menacing man of the law whose foreboding presence erupts in the final minutes of Marfa Girl; a work of 'skin-deep' Mexicacaphilia and miscegenation monumentalization masquerading as high cinematic art.

Recycling one of the most spuriously shocking oral sex scenes from Ken Park

MARFA GIRL

and borrowing a beginners guide to the 'Frankfurt school of filmmaking,' Marfa Girl is surely an exemplary example of Larry Clark at his most artistically tasteless and vapid and personally cuckold-ish. As an apparently white man, Clark seems to get off to the idea of scrawny skateboarding Miguels filling the greasy ghetto tacos of whorish white women with their sour cream, not to mention the fact that the sole Anglo featured in Marfa Girl is a senselessly sick bisexual sado-masochistic who literally gets offs to the thought of his own father (and anyone and everyone else) beating the shit out of him. Indeed, if any semi-mainstream filmmaker epitomizes the earnestly ethno-masochistic and emasculated white (non-Semitic) white man, it is Larry Clark; an unflinching and uninhibited purveyor of teenage flesh galore. To his minor credit, Clark is one of very few filmmakers to take a marginal segment of Hispanic youth in America serious and giving a voice to the voiceless, if not in an emphatically eroticized manner not unbecoming of William S. Burroughs, except to a notably less esoteric degree. Like William E. Jones' documentary Is It Really So Strange? (2004) – a work about the particularly peculiar phenomenon of Latino Morrissey/The Smiths fans – Clark's Wassup Rockers and Marfa Girl only give a cursory glance at a customarily clandestine subculture, thereupon making these films somewhat spirited and spicy, if not sometimes dubious, cinematic voyages in voyeurism of the visibly vicarious sort by a filmmaker with a paradoxical and perennial case of Peter Pan syndrome.

-Ty E

THE SMELL OF US

Larry Clark (2014)

If you are an American ‘artiste’ that has some degenerate sensational garbage you want to peddle and pass off as legitimate art, your best bet is probably to go to France where artistic alchemy is the norm and worthless shit is oftentimes highly revered as provocative cutting edge art. Indeed, from the film critics turned filmmakers of the Cahiers du Cinéma like Jean-Luc Godard and François Truffaut that re-evaluated Hollywood trash and declared it high cinematic art of the auteur oriented sort to the frog love of obscenely obnoxious American kosher comedian Jerry Lewis (who some regard as “Akin to Godard”), the French have a curious appreciation for lowbrow yank trash that even most ‘cultivated’ Americans do not even seem understand, as if they are attempting to rationalize the fact that they have been culturally colonized by an inferior mongrel (anti)culture. Needless to say, I thought it was a match made in heaven (or hell) when I discovered that debauched American photographer turned cinematic auteur Larry Clark (Kids, Wassup Rockers) directed his most recent film in France for a French production company using a seemingly completely French cast and crew (incidentally, his previous and most pornographic flick, Ken Park (2002) written by Harmony Korine and co-directed by cinematographer Edward Lachman, was a American-French-Dutch coproduction). Of course, considering that France is currently at the forefront of producing pornographic arthouse films with oftentimes unsimulated sex as reflected by cinematic works by Catherine Breillat, Leos Carax, Virginie Despentes and Coralie Trinh Thi, Patrice Chéreau, Alain Guiraudie, Gaspar Noé, Laurent Bouhnik, and Jean-Claude Brisseau, among various others, there is no question that Clark picked the perfect place to make a film featuring incessant sleazy sex scenes featuring scrawny and oftentimes racially ambiguous teenage skater boys that seem just as excited about trying out a new dick as they do a new skateboard deck. In fact, not only is The Smell of Us (2014)—the director’s last film since his somewhat mediocre racially-charged Mestizo twink fest Marfa Girl (2012)—arguably Clark’s most decidedly debasing and just all around sexually deranged film to date, but it is indubitably his most flagrantly faggy, as if the auteur felt he could only get away with achieving his dream of making a full-homo flick if he created it in France. If his trademark motif of shirtless armpit-scratching and ball-grabbing skater boys in his previous films was not evidence enough of Clark’s affinity for fresh young cock, the filmmaker’s latest film unequivocally demonstrates that he is hot for sweaty skater twink twat. While somewhat aimless and devoid of a storyline like most of Clark’s films, the film’s most prominent subplot involves a doomed love affair between an emotionally detached and exceedingly epicene skater boy with serious mommy issues and his gawky Quadroon-like comrade who is emotionally tortured by the fact that his best friend sells his bunghole to dirty old men but refuses to be his lover or even have sex with him. Part skater crypto-porno and part hysterical homo romantic tragedy, The Smell of Us is, for better or worse, the sort of joyously debasing and rudely in-your-face art-porn trainwreck film that only a dirty old man like Clark could have assembled.

THE SMELL OF US

Notably, French right-wing theorist Guillaume Faye—a controversial politically incorrect thinker who, as a man that briefly worked in the porn industry, can hardly be described as a prude—describes in his book Sexe et Dévoisement (2011) aka Sex and Deviance how he believes that his forsaken nation and its media are plagued by what he describes as “general sexual obsession.” Undoubtedly a superlatively sick sort of “general sexual obsession” certainly plagues the fiercely fucked frog purgatory of Clark’s film where a group of teenage skaters become collectively involved in both straight and gay-for-pay prostitution after two of their friends happen upon an escort website while watching internet porn. Featuring an extremely pedomorphic male quasi-lead who is so irreparably psychologically damaged that, despite being more or less a child, is incapable of initiating a real emotional relationship with the best friend he loves despite the fact that he allows dirty old man to brutally sodomize him for quick cash, The Smell of Us—a unwaveringly sleazy piece of fairly literally titled sinema that is unmistakably a Clark product—is arguably the director’s darkest and most disturbing and damning film yet as the sort of film that John Wayne Gacy would have loved to stroke his wrinkly old choad to. Indeed, while there might be no mention of a teenage AIDS epidemic like in Kids (1995) or a brutal drug-addled orgy of braindead murder and mayhem like in Bully (2001), the forsaken post-Reichian Parisian youth of Clark’s latest film have not even the slightest chance of hope or redemption and the worst part is that they do not even seem to realize it as they are too concerned with ordering the latest new skate deck or surfing porn sites to ever consider that there might be more to life than skating and fucking. Somehow both decidedly dejected and enthralling, the film is probably the best example of Clark’s expertise when it comes to both exploiting and exposing the forlorn fates of a group of supremely shortsighted and oversexualized frog fuck-ups whose self-destructive sexual promiscuity seems to be their only true reason to live. Also, somewhat ironically, despite being an arthouse flick where the American auteur demonstrates his ostensible artistic cred by making a film in France, the flick confirms the vaguely misguided American belief that all Frenchman are faggots and all frog broads are lecherous and cuntty whores, as The Smell of Us ultimately reveals Clark to be the stereotypical American philistine. Listed as one of the Top Ten films of 2015 in Cahiers du Cinéma and beloved by none other than John ‘Pope of Trash’ Waters, Clark’s film might even be described as underrated in the sense that it more or less remains unreleased in the United States and is more interesting and entertaining than the majority of critically acclaimed films that have been defecated out of Hollywood over the past couple years.

Rather fittingly considering the course of the director's filmmaking career as cinema history's foremost skater boy fetishist with a somewhat sexually aberrant form of Peter Pan syndrome, The Smell of Us begins playfully enough with footage of Clark, who portrays a largely inanimate wino weasel named 'Rocker,' lying in the middle of a Paris city center while a dozen or so skaters ollie over his beat-up elderly body. Even though he rarely speaks or does much of anything aside from vomit and mumble incoherent gibberish, the skaters seem to consider 'Rocker' to be a sort of respected mascot for their crew, as if they subconsciously realize that they too will one day reach such a patently pathetic and tragic state if they happen to have the honor of living long enough. Acting as a sort of vaguely enigmatic Greek chorus to the film, Michael Pitt, who previously starred in Clark's Bully as a borderline mentally retarded teenage sex beast, portrays a dirty unnamed street musician whose all-but-totally-insufferable blues guitar and singing playing provides a strangely fitting soundtrack to the loser lives of the skaters depicted in the film as indicated by his lyrics like "Streetwalking zombie." Undoubtedly the central character of the film is a boyish twink with blond curls named 'Math' (Lukas Ionesco) who spends the beginning of the film closely inhaling the sexual fumes of a male friend while he fucks a lecherous high yellow negress named Céline (Eva Menis-Mercier) during a party. When Math goes to a large rave later that night, he allows his cock to be freely groped by a creepy bearded fat man and then, as if aroused as a result of being briefly molested, proceeds to smell the river of sweaty male bodies that surround him. Despite the fact that he is clearly a latent cocksucker that loves taking in the youthful BO of his fellow skater boys, Math is in denial of the fact that he has the hots for his best friend JP (Hugo Behar-Thinières)—a rather racially ambiguous chap with a strange phenotype that hints that he has an unfortunate combination of European, negro, and Arab blood—who is rather upfront and forthright about his undying homoerotic feelings. Instead of giving into his fairly obvious gay feelings for JP, Math opts to follow the lead of some of his non-white comrades and makes the ultimately psychologically catastrophic mistake of beginning to peddle his little man-pussy to largely creepy and physically grotesque old homos that clearly have a predilection towards young and relatively despoiled adolescent meat. Indeed, while there is no indication that he is hurting for money or has some deep dark daddy complex, Math decides to become a gigolo that, unlike most of his friends, sells his flesh to old men instead of old women.

Considering there is really only one girl in their group, the skater crew in the film is what one might described as a real 'sausage fest,' though none of these young men would have trouble getting pussy from their little female friend if they actually wanted it. Indeed, despite being a hot sassy little frogette bitch with sensual lips, fairly nice tits, and wildly lecherous eyes that practically beg to be buggered, virtually none of the skaters boys seem interested in sexually ravaging skater slut Maria (Diane Rouxel), who dumps her asshole boyfriend 'Pacman' (Théo Cholbi)—a sadistic bully who beats and robs his 'friends'—at the beginning of the film and then begins looking for new dick. Aside from the fact that they are afraid that her (ex)boyfriend Pacman will beat their asses, the skater boys do not seem to be interesting in sexually servicing Maria because they seem more interested in fucking each other when they are not being fucked by less than youthful paying customers. Like all her friends, Maria loves smoking fat blunts and is prone to seduce her friends while stoned, including gay boy JP, who she coerces into fucking her after getting him to dance with her naked while Math gets lost in a videogame. As Maria tells Toff (Terin Maxime)—a young skater that films everything his friends do, including skating, sleazy sexual encounters, and various pretty crimes they commit—regarding the asexual nature of young French boys in a line of dialogue that seems to say a lot about writer/director Clark, "...it is 2013. All the guys are gay." While Toff naturally denies he is a homo, that does not stop him from later filming Math being violently sodomized by an agitated bald john that slaps him in the face while screaming "wake up." Indeed, as JP states of his friend to Maria in regard to Math's tendency to fall into a quasi-comatose state at the strangest of times, "Sometimes he disappears," to which she replies, "It's like talking to a retard." Of course, the more Math allows himself to be anally pillaged by predatory perverts, the more he succumbs to a sort of impenetrable catatonic state that especially disturbs loverboy JP. Naturally, Math's psychological deterioration is not just the result of him being a self-loathing homo, or so the film eventually reveals.

THE SMELL OF US

While she might be a dangerously lecherous little lady with an insatiable thirst for cock who complains regarding her mostly seemingly gay male friends, "I'm tired of the stereotypical skaters who believe they have swag," Maria eventually becomes quite concerned with the fact that her male cohorts are selling their cornholes for cash and attempts to intervene. Indeed, when Maria follows Math one night and discovers that he is about to peddle his flesh to an exceedingly effeminate and nearly elderly frog pervert with similarly curly hair that looks like he could be his grandfather, she calls JP in the hope that he will come to the rescue of their mutual friend. When JP arrives at the old john's apartment, he discovers that Math, who is clearly not concerned with the health or mortality of his clients, has caused the pervert to pass out by giving him an overdose of wine, Viagra, and various other drugs. When JP attempts to proclaim his love to Math by telling him that he will "follow him anymore" and kissing him, the mentally damaged teenage gigolo punches him in the face and then shouts in a less than believable fashion, "I'm just gay for the bucks! Just for the money." Naturally hurt that his love has been so rudely and crudely rebuffed, JP yells at Math, "you're damn toxic. You're shit" and then declares he is heading "south" to the assumed homeland of his maternal racial kinsmen (while JP's father is revealed to be white, it is quite clear that his mother, who is not in the picture, is not). After JP leaves, Math has a large party at the unconscious John's lavish apartment, which is completely destroyed by the young skaters. Naturally, when the John wakes up the next day and discovers that his flat has been completely wrecked, most of his possessions have been either destroyed or stolen, and someone has driven a large piece of glass into his flesh, he is more than a little bit irked, but he is unable to do anything about it since virtually all of the culprits are already long gone.

When lovelorn loverboy JP makes one last ditch effort to simultaneously save Math from his own self-destruction and declare his love for him, he is disturbed to find his friend being more or less molested by his own mother (Dominique Frot of Alexandre Bustillo and Julien Maury's À l'intérieur (2007) aka Inside), who both looks and acts like a sexually sadistic witch as she rants and raves in a raunchy fashion about the innate selfishness and sex appeal of her son while the large pulsating veins on her chest and neck seem like they could explode at any second. Naturally, after describing her own son as sexually "irresistible" and doubting his self-proclaimed love for him, JP becomes rather disturbed by Math's mother's behavior and eventually leaves while in great emotional distress, thus leaving his exceedingly emotionally forlorn friend a victim to a most disturbing scene of mother-son incest that ultimately reveals the central source as to why the male protagonist is incapable of love and is so emotionally and sexually disturbed. As a troubled young man that is heartbroken that his one true love will not reciprocate his love and instead sells himself to dirty old men that clearly have nothing to offer to him in terms of love and sexual satisfaction, JP throws in the towel on life and opts to commit suicide by passively jumping off a large ledge in a pretentious art gallery where his much hated white stepmother (Valérie Maes)—notably the only parent in the entire film that seems concerned with their children's self-destructive behavior, even though she is not his actual biological progenitor—works. In the end, the surviving skaters sans Math demonstrate their nihilistic spirit has not died despite JP's suicide by collectively taking part in a display of mindless destruction by destroying and setting a car on fire, which perennial cameraman Tuff dutifully films. Somewhat bizarrely, the closing shot of the film looks almost exactly the same as the final shot of the late great Christoph Schlingensiefel's satirical horror-comedy Das deutsche Kettensägenmassaker (1990) aka The German Chainsaw-Massacre aka Blackest Heart, but somehow I doubt Clark has ever seen that film.

Featuring boys rubbing their sweaty balls with their hands and then wiping them across their friend's face, a young skater selling a used cum-filled condom to a bearded old bear, a girl pissing in a bucket in public as urine drips off her meaty labia, an elderly pervert sucking the toes of a teenage boy and then using said toes to violently fuck his own nostrils with glee, a boy licking his computer screen as he watches another boy masturbate on webcam, and various other largely ugly and fetishistic displays of aberrant sexual dysfunction that probably give perennially lascivious Larry Clark a giant Viagra-induced hard-on, The Smells Of Us ultimately unwittingly reveals a number of obvious reasons as to why Muslims hate France and why the French have become so pathetically passive, inept, and otherwise incapacitated when it comes fighting the Islamic terrorists that freely lurk around the no-go-zone areas of Paris. Indeed, if Clark's film has anything to do with reality when it comes to French society and especially French youth, one can only assume that Frogland is on the brink of both a racial and sexual apocalypse that is only being sped up by primitive jihadist degenerates that should not be anywhere near the country in the first place. Featuring a cast that covers all of the colors of the mostly dark racial rainbow, including mongrel actors that defy any discernible racial type, the film also unwittingly celebrates the surrealist racial nightmare that is postcolonial France where the degenerate descendants of the colonized are now engaging in what one might describe as reverse colonization that can only end badly for all parties involved.

THE SMELL OF US

Like with many of his films, Clark attempts to spread the patently absurd idea in The Smell of Us that all males are bisexual and that every man has an inner faggot, but as Guillaume Faye noted in his book Sex and Deviance regarding this sick and outrageously libelous propagandistic lie and its relation to other big leftist lies, "One of the basic ideas of the whole homosexual lobby and homophile ideology is that everybody is bisexual by birth and that homosexuality is a lifestyle choice like any other, purely cultural and not indicative of any inherent difference. This idea is not merely false but pernicious. Such a mental perversion is a symptom of the most extreme development of egalitarian dogma, that is to say, the negation of natural differences between humans. Not only do races not exist but, taking things to their logical conclusion, neither do the sexes or sexual attraction. It is the androgynous reign of homogeneity and undifferentiated uniformity. Those who serve up these hallucinations do not believe them for a second, but it is of the very character of totalitarian language to not believe what one says." Of course, what makes Clark's different from the Hollywood and mainstream media homophile propagandists is that he seems to actually genuinely believe that all people are sexually malleable and that every teenage boy dreams of being buggered by their best friend, or so one would assume after watching his fiercely foul smelling yet nonetheless fairly entertaining frog skater flick. While Clark has children, one might naturally assume he was a flaming faggot simply by watching his films, especially when one considers Faye's remark, "Heterosexuals do not put their own sexuality at the centre of their personality or their works; homosexuals do. It is the very definition of obsession: one is a homosexual before one is oneself. The homosexual's sexuality governs him, precisely because it is pathological and non-reproductive."

To Clark's credit, The Smell of Us make great use of ancient French architecture and sculptures, which seems somewhat absurd when contrasted with the teenage sexual savages that loiter around such classic artistic works that were clearly made in saner times when French leaders still sought world domination instead of flooding their nation with culturally corrosive, low IQ aliens from the third world that do not take too kindly to fag, dykes, and other sexual degenerates. Undoubtedly, Clark's incorporation of various ruined angel and child statues also gives the film a surprisingly eerily tragic feel, as if these ancient works of art are looking down in sadness at what has become of France and especially French youth. Additionally, Clark included a number of shots of vintage bourgeois family photos of elegantly dressed individuals as if to provide rather obvious yet effective stark contrast to the dysfunctional non-families that exist in France today (indeed, it is no coincidence that only one of the character has anything resembling a traditional family, albeit with a stepmother as opposed to a real biological mother). One could certainly argue that Math's mother—a seemingly senile yet somehow sexually savage bitch of a witch of the unabashedly incestuous son-sucking-and-fucking sort—is symbolic of France as a whole as a once powerful empire that has degenerated into the apocalyptic dementia-ridden and sexually dysfunctional motherland that it is today that welcomes all the bastards and rabble of the world. Indeed, instead of great cocksuckers like Cocteau, who was fairly restrained when it came to his gay pederastic tendencies, France now has the luxury of ugly Americans creating pornography disguised as art featuring lurid interracial twink action, but then again I am sure André Gide, who had a weakness for underage brown boys, would have loved Clark's film. Then again, there is probably more truth in two seconds of one of Clark's gratuitous crotch shots than in all 180-minutes of Tunisian turd Abdellatif Kechiche's patently preposterous lily-licker fantasy La Vie d'Adèle – Chapitres 1 & 2 (2013) aka Blue Is the Warmest Colour. In terms of classic frog flicks about prostitution, The Smell of Us undoubtedly makes Godard's classic Vivre sa vie: Film en douze tableaux (1962) aka My Life to Live seem like an archaic Lifetime movie by comparison in terms of sheer energy and audacity (though, to Godard's credit, he also played the dual role of the director-pimp when he directed his then-wife Anna Karina in that film). Indeed, Clark may be an odious sexual deviant of sorts that has made a living out of exploiting mostly screwed-up and oftentimes drug-addled adolescents during their most vulnerable and unflattering moments, but I cannot think of a more able filmmaker when it comes to capturing the volatility, spontaneity, sexual goofiness, and raw energy of youth. Additionally, for all the film's ugliness, it manages to capture the beautiful spirit of youth, which is something that I think that most people can admire, even if they do not want to admit it. Notably, the great reluctant fascist turned meta-nihilist philosopher Emil Cioran once described his adopted hometown of Paris as an "apocalyptic garage," which is indubitably both a literally and figuratively immaculate way to describe the foredoomed urban pandemonium of perversity depicted in Clark's film. Slightly more than just an all the more debauched frog Kids, The Smell of Us is an unsentimental look at some of the youngest and most irredeemable members of a dying nation as seen from the somewhat cockeyed perception of an American Vietnam War vet who sure loves his shirtless boys, even if they are not exactly worthy of love, let alone sympathy. In the end, for various reasons that relate to both the film and my own skateboardcentric youth in relation to said film (incidentally, I initially discovered Clark and Korine due to my juvenile love of skateboarding and not because of cinephilia, which came much later), I cannot help but recall French Symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud's words, "Idle youth, enslaved to everything; by being too sensitive I have wasted my life."

THE SMELL OF US

-Ty E

BONE

Larry Cohen (1972)

Out of all the films that can be described as being even vaguely belonging to the Blaxploitation subgenre, Bone (1972) aka Dial Rat for Terror aka Dial Rat aka Beverly Hills Nightmare aka Bone: A Bad Day in Beverly Hills aka Housewife directed by kosher cult filmmaker and perennial screenwriter Larry Cohen (It's Alive, The Stuff) is probably the most iconoclastic, idiosyncratic, and overtly anti-Anglo. Indeed, as Cohen's directorial debut, Bone is a sort of satirical Blaxploitation take on Pier Paolo Pasolini's Teorema (1969) of the more anti-WASP than anti-bourgeois type meets Joe Orton's Off-Broadway play Entertaining Mr Sloane (1964) as a post-counter-culture flick that follows a gigantic jolly yet mischievous negro as he robs and terrorizes an ostensibly wealthy used car salesman and his younger blonde trophy wife in a work that acts as a sort of allegory for the decline of white male heterosexual power, as a result of various slave-morality-ridden social movements of the late-1960s, including Civil Rights, feminism, sexual liberation, and various other counter-culture groups/movements. Indeed, Bone is, if nothing else, a sick Semitic fantasy flick where the director seems to vent his rage over the fact that WASPs were once so terribly mean that they would not have allowed his family to enter their banal country club. As a superlatively spiteful hate piece that depicts Nordic males as spineless bullshitters and psychopaths who steal money from their wives and also depicts blonde women as half-braindead gold-digging whores that secretly long to be brutally raped by big black bucks, Cohen's work reveals the sort of contemptible lows that certain Hebrews are willing to go to undermine Aryan manhood, perfectly exemplifying the sort of subversive Semitic behavior that led to actions like Kristallnacht and Bergen-Belsen. Arguably Cohen's most intricate, anarchic, and artistically merited effort to date, the film is like the closest thing to a Jean-Luc Godard's Weekend (1967) of Blaxploitation cinema, though it would probably be more accurate to describe it as a WASPploitation work directed by a member of the post-WWII Judaic plutocracy. A work where a rat acts as a catalyst to all the events that transpire, Bone gives the viewer the impression that Cohen may have watched Fritz Hippler's Der ewige Jude (1940) aka The Eternal Jew and took the Nazi propaganda film's decidedly degrading comparison between the Judaic tribe and packs of disease-carrying rodents to heart.

As noted in a prologue at the beginning of the film: "The year is 1970. The most powerful nation on earth wages war against one of the poorest countries—which it finds impossible to defeat. And in this great and affluent nation exists its smallest richest city...and it is called Beverly Hills." Opening with a surrealist Arrabal-esque scene of a pseudo-commercial of (anti)protagonist Bill (Andrew Duggan) attempting to advertise totaled cars containing the bloody and mangled corpses of young hippies inside, one gets the impression that the Anglo-Saxon car salesman is a figurative dealer of death and destruction (Cohen's website describes the character as a symbol of, "The Establishment, the oblivious leader of a dying regime that can't see the protest for the pleas"). Bill lives with his much younger blonde sub-MILF wife Bernadette (Joyce Van Patten) in a fancy house in Beverly Hills that was built in 1929 by the family of William Randolph Hearst and was once owned by Hollywood's first Western megastar, Tom Mix (apparently, the house, which was then owned by director Cohen himself, was indeed built by the Hearst family and lived in by cult director Samuel Fuller around the time he directed 1951 anti-Korean War flick Steel Helmet). Later that day, Bill dives into his swimming pool and has his and wifey's entire day more or less ruined upon finding a rat floating in the drain. Luckily, a gigantic negro in a jumpsuit named Bone (played by black Israelite Yaphet Kotto of Paul Schrader's Blue Collar (1978) and Ridley Scott's Alien (1979)) randomly appears out of nowhere like a genie in a bottle and fishes the rat out of the pool. While Bill and Bernadette offer the initially seemingly servile negro a tip, Bone really has a bone to pick with the rich white folks and wants to rob them of their wealth and possibly rob the white woman of her pussy. While going through the car salesman's papers and documents, Bone discovers, to the dismay of Bernadette, that Bill is not only on his third mortgage (which he forged his wife's signature to get) and has no real physical cash on tap, but also that he has a secret bank account containing $5000 that he has hidden from his discernibly moronic wife. After declaring his intention of raping Bernadette if he fails to do what he tells him to, Bone demands that Bill pick up the five grand from the bank within the next hour while he holds Bernadette hostage at the home. If Bill does not come back in time, Bone claims he will cut Bernadette's throat with a gold letter opener. Of course, since he really does not give a shit about his trophy wife, Bill decides to take his sweet time on the bank trip, especially after meeting two very generous, if not exceedingly eccentric, women. As is quite apparent, Bill is contemplating whether or not to let his wife die.

BONE

After going to the bank and meeting a hippie broad played by Jeannie Berlin who he will later bone, Bill goes to a bar and is approached by an eccentric old broad named 'X-Ray Lady' (Brett Somers), who compliments him on the sleazy TV commercials he makes for his used car business. When the X-Ray Lady remarks her love of the mascot German Shepherd featured in the commercials, Bill demonstrates his deep-seated hatred of heebs by coldheartedly stating, "Every time I looked at that mutt all I could think of was his grandfather chasing across the yard of some concentration camp biting some Jewish ass. Ad agency nightmare." After going on a bizarre rant regarding a conspiracy involving dentists taking x-rays of her late beloved's teeth that may or may not have resulted in his premature death, the X-Ray Lady saves Bill from shame by paying for his bar tab after he dubiously claims he left his wallet in the car. After Bill's rendezvous with X-Ray Lady, Bill hangs out with a lecherous flower child/hustling hoe named 'The Girl' (played by archetypical 'Jewish American Princess' Jeannie Berlin of the Heartbreak Kid and Sheila Levine Is Dead and Living in New York), who has used the concept of 'free love' as a way to swindle men out of their money so she can support her lazy hippie loser lifestyle. Despite fantasizing that Bill is the same smelly old man that molested her as a little girl, 'The Girl' has sex with the malodorous used car salesman, though he fantasizes about making love to a used car while humping the young and rather sexually aggressive hippie. Aside from doing the seemingly unthinkable by humping a hippie, Bill, who hates peaceniks and bohemians, also has a flower child son who pulled a Midnight Express and is now serving a six year sentence in prison in Spain for smuggling dope out of Tangiers. Of course, Bill and Bernadette lie and tell Bone that their prodigal son is a hero who is overseas killing gooks in the Vietnam War.

Since Bill is late with the money due to the fact he decided to waste so much time banging the beatnik broad, Bone decides to rape Bernadette and while ripping her clothes off, he states, "I'm just a big black buck that is doing what is expected of him." Ironically, the big boisterous black buck Bone cannot 'rise to the occasion' while attempting to sexually pillage the hysterical cracker cunt, which largely has to do with the fact that the 'The Nigga Mystique' has died in America due to Civil Rights and the rise of the black bourgeoisie and release of horrendous Hollywood movies like Guess Who's Coming to Dinner (1967). Indeed, Bone is a walking and talking anachronism who is nothing more than an outmoded sexual fantasy for Bernadette, who is quite upset when the nefarious chuckling negro fails to force himself upon her. Indeed, despite his lack of negro sexual prowess, Bernadette, who has now developed a sort of fucked feminist mentality, decides to be Bone's whore and plots to kill her hubby. As Bernadette explains to Bill after hunting him down with the help of Bone, she plans to kill him and use the insurance money to fund her miscegenation-based future with the black buck. While Bill agrees to be a cuckold who will fund Bernadette and Bone's raunchy relationship, they prefer to have the insurance money. Unfortunately, after Bernadette joyously murders Bill by burying his head in the sand, black brotha Bone, who like most homeboys who get what they are after from a cracker chick, disappears, thus destroying the bourgeois housewife turned mariticide feminist's fantasy illusions.

A film where a dumb blonde bourgeois slut housewife longs for being raped by a savage negro, a sleazy used car salesman with 'anti-Semitic tendencies' dreams of defiling a car while being defiled by a jaded Jewish American hippie princess, and an impotent buck negro cons a dumb white rich bitch into killing her hubby and running away with the insurance money, Bone is a work where virtually every character is some other character's fantasy figure, but ultimately it is really auteur Larry Cohen's fucked fantasy and big kosher wet dream of a post-white-gentile-male-ruled America where even the negro untermensch can kill whitey, rape his wife, and not feel afraid to do so. Of course, as the rape statistics for the United States and Europe demonstrates, black-on-white rape has only become all the more vogue since the film's release, but I digress. Hebraic anti-Aryan sentiment aside, Bone is unquestionably Cohen's most ambitious, experimental, and artsy fartsy work to date, which is certainly something the director himself agrees with. Indeed, in the Blue Underground DVD release of the film, Cohen confesses in the audio commentary regarding the film: "This was truly the kind of movie I wanted to make and if this picture had gotten the acceptance that I dreamed of it getting, it would have changed my whole career around. I mean, this is the kind of pictures I would have done...these very eccentric, individualistic stories." Of course, the film was not a success and Cohen had to whore himself to the generic Blaxploitation genre with the much more conventional effort Black Caesar (1972), which proved to be a big enough success that it spawned the predictably inferior sequel Hell Up in Harlem (1973) and the rest was history, with the director churning out a couple more worthwhile efforts, though he has spent most of his career penning screenplays. Unquestionably, next to similarly themed works like Fight for Your Life (1977) and Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff (1979), Bone is certainly the best of the hate-fueled and Hebrew-concocted 'hate whitey' exploitation pieces.

BONE

-Ty E

SPECIAL EFFECTS

Larry Cohen (1984)

The sleazy B-movies of indie horror auteur Larry Cohen have always intrigued me, but I have always found myself equally repelled by them in one way or another. From the venomous anti-Anglo hatred that permeates throughout his pseudo-blaxploitation (it is really an Aryan-ploitation work) flick Bone (1972) to the mind-numbingly blatant satiric anti-consumerism message of The Stuff (1985), Larry Cohen's pretensions towards making quasi-intellectual cult masterpieces is – to say the least – quite silly. The other night I had the opportunity to watch one of Cohen's less well known works – Special Effects (1984) – an erotic psychological thriller that wishes it was Hitchcockian in nature, but instead, it seems more like a rip-off of a rip-off, as if some totally mediocre filmmaker attempted to create a low-budget Brian De Palma clone. Despite the less than spectacular quality and special effects of Special Effects, I can say without straining my honesty that it is now my favorite Larry Cohen film. At the most superficial level, I enjoyed Special Effects because it features my favorite junky renaissance woman Zoe Lund. After first seeing Lund's performance in Abel Ferrara's Ms. 45 (1981), it didn't take me long to realize that she was the most beautiful woman to have ever grace the torn screens of gritty grindhouse theaters. After all, most exploitation actresses are a dime a dozen with acting talents that fall below that of your average porn star (albeit, many were actual porn stars). Of course, I found Special Effects interesting for other reasons; namely the way in which Cohen seems to glorify the film's villain; a filmmaker – who like himself – exploits the most archaic instincts of the viewer just to make an extra buck.

During the beginning of Special Effects, the viewer is introduced to psychopathic filmmaker Christopher Neville – a man who cites Abraham Zapruder – the man that accidentally documented the assassination of JFK with his handy 8mm camera – as his greatest influence as a filmmaker. Saint Christopher describes Zapruder as “honest Abe”, but the filmmaker is not so honest himself. Neville – a man whose filmmaking career is on the steady decline – decides that killing a girl from the country (who he certainly sees as disposable white trash) and making a borderline Cinéma vérité film about the murder (replacing the girl's husband as the killer) will reboot his plummeting filmmaking career. Neville kind of reminds me of John Landis, as he also put people's lives in jeopardy for the sake of making sensational smut. During the filming of Twilight Zone (1982), horror/comedy hack Landis caused the death of Vic Morrow (Jennifer Jason Leigh's father) and two small Asian children due to his negligence while directing the film. Of course, in Larry Cohen's Special Effects – the murderous filmmaker is fictional, yet it is quite apparent that Larry Cohen seems to sympathize with his anti-hero, as if he is living through his invented character. After all, Cohen surely does not identify with the intellectually handicapped female protagonist nor her idiotic (yet well meaning) Southern husband. Like Larry Cohen, the killer film director featured in Special Effects is also of the Jewish persuasion. In fact, Cohen equipped the film with insider Judaic dialogue. For example, the deadly director states at one point of the film (out of nowhere) to one of his film actresses, "Tell them you went to Israel to work in a Kibbutz or something." Although Jerusalem is technically the Judaic capital of the world; the setting of Special Effects – New York City – is no doubt the unofficial Jewish capital of the world. The film also features a variety of Jewish stereotypes that would put most Nazi propaganda to shame. Filmmaker Christopher Neville demoralizes and enslaves every person that has the misfortune of crossing his conspiring path. Neville believes that the "glorification of a nobody" is what is hot in Hollywood and he plans to capitalize off of that trend. Neville also does not shy away from saying "murder, madness; that is what stars are made of nowadays." As you learn in the film, Neville not only murders an ambitious actress, but he also frames the victim's husband – a good ol' southern goy boy – into inheriting the blame.

SPECIAL EFFECTS

Despite being a sub-par horror work, Special Effects – a film with a somewhat misleading title – still manages to titillate and invigorate the viewer. Thankfully, Special Effects lacks the intellectual pretensions that are so commonly associated with conman Cohen's work. It is not often that one gets to see a film where Hollywood hack filmmakers are portrayed as parasitic pimps and enthusiastic murderers, thus, Special Effects makes for a fairly therapeutic and equally liberating work. In fact, Special Effects features a story worthy of Kenneth Anger's Hollywood Babylon. Although Larry Cohen never obtained the real-life prestige that fictional psychopath filmmaker Christopher Neville acquired; he at least got the opportunity to live through that character via Special Effects. Unfortunately, Bone does not pay a visit to Christopher Neville, but, of course, he is a fellow defiler of white women, thus a man after his own heart. If you're looking to watch a smashing and equally trashy kind of horror film, Special Effects will provide one with a special (albeit incriminating) experience for those that still doubt that lack of nobility that is the norm in Hollywood.

-Ty E

THE LAST WINTER

Larry Fessenden (2006)

Spoilers An unknown friend mentioned this Weinstein produced Blockbuster exclusive and the idea of this seemed so familiar. I do remember hearing about this film; all the hype, all the positive reviews. The Last Winter is the latest eco-horror film. After attempting to enjoy the abysmal The Happening, I was welcoming a change of scenery with open arms. The Last Winter was what I actually wanted out of horror. The setting was bleak and a glistening white. The tundra really does make for an environment perfect for crafting true horror. We all know what lies in the dark, but what hides in the open is worse. Just like [REC] before it, one scene managed to scare the hell out of me. This is a remarkable achievement which immediately made me swoon with affection towards this film. The presence was bold and the mood was a grave reminder of the terrors to come further down the road. What really worked was taking the "Global Warming scare" and using it as a pawn to escalate the realism that works so well in the screenplay. That is, until the last half-an-hour. Things only go downhill from here. The mysterious force that plagues the crew makes a startling and horrifying debut. You're shocked to find out that no one seems to realize what you're seeing, but that's the idea. You have to "believe" in order to see them, or be infected. Or any of the thousand other theories that could explain this otherworldly event. My point is, nothing is explained. If you are seeking enlightenment on the plot, tread elsewhere. The plot device used is as vast and empty as the filming location itself. The Last Winter is relatable to The Thing. This in its own right is an amazing accomplishment. However, the ending is too open-ended. Forgive me for sounding like I'm close minded, but when the plot involves -Ghost Zombie Eskimo Moose- I'd like a bit of information to assure me that what I'm witnessing is sincere. That, and the director completely ripped off 28 Days Later for the ending. What starts off as an amazing thriller with many moments that have brought shivers to my spine and a surplus orchestral score that is nothing but hair raising, I expected a bigger payoff. What I got was cheated and scammed. I don't care if The Last Winter is an eco issue or Native American spiritual propaganda, I still feel horrible for having to hate this movie due to the last 30 minutes. In all honesty though, The first half comes highly recommended.

-mAQ

HITLER'S JEWISH SOLDIERS
HITLER'S JEWISH SOLDIERS

Larry Price* (2006)

Hitler's Jewish Soldiers is a documentary based on a book of the same name. The film (or digital video) features a variety of interviews with a variety of Germans of Jewish descent who fought for Germany in World War II. These men were classified as Mischling by the German government. Over 150,000 men of Jewish descent fought in Hitler's army (compare that to the 600,000 full Jews who lived in Germany before Hitler's rise to power). Germans that had two Jewish Grandparents were considered Mischling in the first degree and those with one Jewish grandparent were labeled Mischling in the second degree. Virtually all Mischling were Roman Catholic as the majority of Jews that converted to Christianity decided the pope was their fuehrer of choice. The majority of ethnic Germans were of the Protestant faith (obviously). The fact that the majority of Jewish to Christian converts were Roman Catholics is interesting as virtually all of the main Nazi leaders (including Adolf Hitler) came from Roman Catholic backgrounds. The faith of many international crypto-Jews such as the Spanish Sephardic Marrano's also decided to outwardly practice Roman Catholicism (although practicing Judaism in secret). 1/2 Jewish Aryan poster boy Werner Goldberg

1/2 Jew Horst Geitner was awarded both the Iron Cross Second Class and the Silver Wound Badge

Hitler's Jewish Soldiers features interviews with various elderly Mischling and their own experiences with being Jews in Hitler's Army. Many of these individuals still consider themselves Jewish today. One of these men has even become a Zionist extremist who spouts the Jewish hate slur Goyim (meaning cattle in reference to all gentiles). None of these men seem reluctant in telling their own stories and experiences in the German Wehrmacht. The documentary also takes a look at German generals and other prominent military leaders of Jewish descent. German field Marshall Erhard Milch (who was half Jewish) is even exposed as someone that used Jewish slave labor.

Of course, you can expect a very politically correct angle taken in Hitler's Jewish Soldiers as not to offend certain individuals. The documentary even mentions how Hitler would have probably killed all the Mischling after the war if Germany had won the war, although the film offers no evidence to back up those claims. This would be highly unlikely as many people in the German government and military with prominent positions were of Jewish descent. The fact of the matter is that Jewish and German relations in Nazi Germany were much more complicated than Steven Spielberg or Eli Wiesel would want to admit.

1/2 Jewish Nazi Field Marshal Erhard Milch

Hitler's Jewish Soldiers has a fairly simple and almost amateur construction. The real wealth of the documentary is in it's exceptional interviews and stories.

The documentary is more of a companion piece to the book written by American military historian Bryan Mark Rigg. Do yourself a favor and dilute the propaganda you learned at the unscholarly American public school you attend. Hitler's Jewish Soldiers is a testament to the complexity of history. There is no such thing as objective history so it's up to the individual to do their own research and develop their own interpretations.

-Ty E

CARNY TALK
CARNY TALK

Larry Wessel* (1995)

As a child, one of my favorite pastimes was tooling around on rides at various amusement parks and traveling carnivals. At some point in my early childhood, I began to take notice of the carnys who slavishly and grudgingly operated the rides. I was somewhat surprised that these individuals were in stark contrast to rides themselves, as they seemed hopelessly misanthropic, bitter, and – in some cases – quite violently vulgar. I also vaguely remember one incident as a child where an extremely obnoxious carny yelled at me and all the other kids who were walking through a room of distorted mirrors to “hurry up” as if we were a pack of feral dogs. By the time I was in high school, the mystical and fantastic appeal of amusement parks had worn thin, but I still attended them out of a sense of obligation to family tradition. During a summer vacation when I was in my late teens, a friend and I decided to ride a popular haunted house ride on an ocean-front boardwalk. While cruising through the moderately dilapidated haunted house, a gigantic plastic bat dropped from the ceiling and my curious friend innocently touched it. Before we knew what happened, a thoroughly exacerbated carny startled us by jumping out from amongst the dark shadows and said to my friend with an almost indecipherable slur, “how would you like it if I HIT YOU on the head!?” Naturally, my friend and I thought the carny was a humorless sub-literate prick, but looking back on that event, it was indubitably a hilarious affair. Due to my countless carnival memories, I was reasonably delighted to receive a copy of Carny Talk: And Other Amazing Anecdotes starring Robert Williams and directed by Avant-garde documentary filmmaker Larry Wessel. In the documentary, ex-carny Robert Williams gives the viewer a one-man show where the cryptic-world of carnys is luridly and intimately exposed in a manner never seen before.

Immediately upon watching Carny Talk, I noticed that ex-carny Robert Williams somewhat spoke and looked like he could be the long lost brother of Jimmy Stewart. Of course, while Jimmy Stewart is regarded as one of Hollywood's greatest icons and a charmer loved by multiple generations of moviegoers, Robert Williams represents the darker and seedier side of lowbrow American entertainment that has been given next to nil credit by its patronizing patrons. In Carny Talk, Robert Williams gives the ultimate inside story on his escapades as a carny libertine who adventurously lived life in the moment. Had I read Williams' anecdotes in a mere book, I would have probably found such stories mildly entertaining at best, as the main appeal of Carny Talk is Williams' unconventional brand of dirty barroom storytelling. If I saw Robert Williams randomly loitering on a city street, I would assume he is the kind of guy that picks up muscular shemale prostitutes on the weekends and spills his seed on the floors of adult movie theaters. Williams seems like one of those rare individuals who can concoft an elaborate fictional story and have the listener believe it without question. Carny Talk was shot on gritty video (I assume Hi8), a dead format that I am quite comfortable with due to growing up on skateboard videos of the mid and late 1990s. Although some might be repelled by the gritty aesthetic qualities of Carny Talk, I found that the visuals accentuated Robert Williams' surly and sordid stories. Over the past couple of days, I have been watching a number of Larry Wessel's documentaries and I must admit that he has a keen eye for capturing unconventionally charismatic subjects. Wessel undoubtedly has a talent for documenting subjects that would even scare Bavarian auteur Werner Herzog. After all, Robert Williams is the kind of guy that would be interesting to share a dialogue with at a gas station, but not the kind of person that you would feel comfortable having in your home.

If you're the type of person that finds natural disasters appealing and receives solace in societal declension, Carny Talk is a film that you will most certainly fancy. While watching the documentary, the viewer becomes a voyeur in a forgotten world that is probably best left forgotten. Of course, after watching Carny Talk, one is not likely to forget Robert Williams' candid carny tales, as his wickedly alluring personal stories are told with such a distinct swindler charm that the viewer can't help but to like the man. After all, one can't help but to respect a man who owns up to dropping dozens of stillborn fetuses on the doorsteps of homes in a prissy bourgeois neighborhood. Unlike a lot of folks of his time, Williams did not shy away from subversive sex and criminal perverts, although he does seem rather repulsed by lesbian couples. After watching the film, I found myself contemplating about how many other real-life characters like Robert Williams have never had the opportunity to tell their stranger-than-fiction stories, thus one must commend the director for documenting an individual that Hollywood wouldn't even hire to clean their studio toilets. If you ever wanted to know what it feels like to be an active voyeur without the burden of having to serve jail time, Carny Talk will provide you with such a degrading yet extremely enthralling experience from the luxury of your own home. For more info on Carny Talk, check out Larry Wessel's official website: Wesselmania.net

-Ty E

ULTRAMEGALOPOLIS
ULTRAMEGALOPOLIS

Larry Wessel* (1995)

H.L. Mencken, one of America's greatest critics and commentators, once wrote, "A home is not a mere transient shelter: its essence lies in the personalities of the people who live in it." To add to what Mencken said, I think that different regions and cities also personify the spirit of those human beings living within them. In Larry Wessel's voyeuristic epic documentary Ultramegalopolis (1995), one is exposed to the various subcultures of conflict in the director's home city of Los Angeles, California; a world where sexual perversion is the norm, cults of collectively schizophrenic Negroes think they are the true ancient Israelites, white proletarian bastards are brought up by father-less father figures like Charles Manson, Hispanic taggers are the most genuine of artists, and where 1960s ideals of peace and love have mutated into a malignant metaphysical cancer that has completely consumed the souls of its inhabitants. Charles Manson and his estranged pseudo-family may have been imprisoned for over 40 years, but their legacy of magical bloodlust lives on in the hearts of every Los Angeles native. If you're one of those dangerously optimistic individuals that happens to be a tad bit dubious of America's cultural and economical decline, just insert a copy of Larry Wessel's Ultramegalopolis into your dvd player and your mind will be made up within 2 minutes time, as the documentary reveals the most hidden cavities of L.A. in a somewhat pornographic manner. Thankfully, unlike a lot of documentaries, Ultramegalopolis is a fairly objective work that does not wallow in philistine sentimentalism and sickening social commentary.

Essentially, Ultramegalopolis is a comprehensive collection of cultural case studies that were assembled in an audacious and unabashedly politically incorrect manner by Satanic documentarian Larry Wessel. Indeed, I would even go as far as saying that Wessel is the Jean Rouch of Satanists due to his seemingly instinctive knack for documenting quasi-anthropological ethnographies in a most daring and hands-on manner. Ultramegalopolis might be a cinéma-vérité film created for and by sinners, yet the subjects of documentary are certainly more depraved than the most wacky and weird of Satanists. The documentary features a miserable microcosm where all respective natives featured in the film have something socially muculent and malevolent seeping through their glaringly tainted auras. In the maniacal metropolis, Christianity is at best dead and pimping itself out via porn shop parking lots while the devil cryptically leads the city's citizens into a world of self-destructive vice and crime that often pays. During the beginning of Ultramegalopolis, the viewer is introduced to a convicted felon named Andrew who shared a prison cell with Charles Manson. This individual – who is quite sympathetic towards his messianic ex-cell-mate – had the distinct pleasure of witnessing Manson's hair in flames after a rival prisoner poured paint thinner on his head and sadistically set it ablaze. On the post-industrial wasteland streets of Los Angeles, illiterate schizoids and self-appointed messiahs of the vagrant variety unashamedly ramble on endlessly in hopes of attracting hopelessly apathetic pedestrians. Also featured on the streets of L.A. are crude pseudo-carny freak performers and musicians that provide ordinary citizens with unwanted soundtrack for their bitter end of days. In fact, these street performers fittingly act as the unhinged score for Ultramegalopolis. If you're one of those individuals that feels art is the product of a certain race's/culture's collective unconsciousness, you will be thoroughly alarmed after witnessing the schlock street art featured in Ultramegalopolis. As featured in the documentary, loco Latino's use the concrete ruins of urban decay as their choice medium for creating poetic graffiti. If a person were to have watched Ultramegalopolis when it was first released in 1995, it would be no surprise to them that California has been virtually reconquered by mestizo Amerindians. Los Angeles, California may contain Hollywood, the land of manufactured dreams, but in the real L.A., phantasms are of the nightmarish variety. After watching Ultramegalopolis, I couldn't help but wonder why there haven't been a plague of killings in the tradition of Helter Skelter or the hedonistic derangement featured in the early hidden Hollywood of Kenneth Anger's Hollywood Babylon. Whatever the future has in store for L.A., I wouldn't be surprised if resembled the collective mass chaos and destruction featured in Zombieland (2009), except with real starving cannibalistic humans in a state of indefinite bloodlust instead of comedic undead zombies that were invented by a hack screenwriter. Ultramegalopolis is just another example as to why I wouldn't be surprised if Charles Manson were to live long enough to see his prophecy of an apocalyptic race war fully realized.

If you have an interest in viewing a real-life Spenglerian pandemonium, Ultramegalopolis makes for an engrossing daydream document of delirium-inducing audio-visual derangement. Even those rare individuals that tend to be repelled by a pessimistic spirit will find themselves debauched and morally neutered after watching the film. After viewing Ultramegalopolis, I felt even more disconnected from the thought of ever visiting Los Angeles. I don't think it would be a stretch to say that the documentary is like a virtual prequel to the apocalyptic neo-nazi pulp novel The Turner Diaries, but, unfortunately, Ultramegalopolis is an authentic documentary of gritty and mainstream media ignored truths. For all the derogatory and disdainful portrayals of rural America in Hollywood films, they seem like childish pranks compared to the undeniable third worldization of Los Angeles. I think that director Larry Wessel might want to consider creating a sequel to Ultramegalopolis as the moral and cultural fiber of L.A. has only furthered deluged with unsettling debasement and all-encompassing decadence since he originally released the daunting yet strangely delightful documentary. Although the decline of America (especially American cities) is out in the open for virtually everyone in the world to see, very few people are willing and perceptive enough to confront such a less than ideal reality. With Ultramegalopolis,

ULTRAMEGALOPOLIS

Larry Wessel gives the viewer a window into a manmade world on the break chaos and inevitable destruction. On top of everything else, Ultramegalopolis is jocular work of exceedingly eccentric entertainment. For more info on the film, checkout Larry Wessel's official: www.wesselmania.net/

-Ty E

SEX, DEATH /& THE HOLLYWOOD MYSTIQUE

Larry Wessel* (1999)

When it comes to the history of Hollywood, the behind-the-scenes antics of its participants and stars has always intrigued me more than the actual films they produce. Sure, Rudolph Valentino may have been the first male heartthrob in cinema history, but the facts regarding his magical rise and rather pathetic fall have always interested me more than his actual movie roles. Even German expressionist director F.W. Murnau – who is arguably the greatest filmmaker to have ever worked in Hollywood – had quite an interesting personal life whilst working in the foreign world of Tinseltown, as not many people can say they died as a result of an unruly mix including an underage quasi-slave Filipino boy, a blowjob mishap, and a moving motor vehicle. Of course, some of these purported historical facts are somewhat dubious yet the libertine mystique of Hollywood and its past live on. In Satanic documentarian auteur Larry Wessel's Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique, a number of forgotten Hollywood entertainers and suave pseudo-historians give you the inside dirt on Sunset Boulevard's most depraved, perverted, and downright degenerate stars and its equally unethical business practices. During the early days of Hollywood, actors/actresses were essentially the prostitutes of the pimp-like producers and sexually barbaric businessmen who virtually owned them. Although Austrian born Hollywood director Billy Wilder exposed some of the ostentatious oddities of Hollywood (in the form of an ungracefully aged silent screen queen) with his masterpiece Sunset Boulevard and absurdo auteur David Lynch would later make films of a similar nature (albeit, in a more ambiguous, ambitious, stark, gritty, and exceedingly grotesque manner), few films have seriously examined the creepy cryptic history of the L.A. worldwide entertainment epicenter, especially from a strictly fact-based (or as close to fact as one can get for such a mysterious underbelly of sin masquerading as a saintly promoter of moral and ethical progress) and documentarian perspective. Thus, those who have found themselves more addicted to Kenneth Anger's Hollywood Babylon than internet porn will find Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique to be a lucid piece of uncensored film history gold of the most glimmering and rewarding kind. It also doesn't hurt that the documentary features a complimentary video aesthetic that echoes back to porn flicks of the 1980s, as Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique makes such sex flicks seem like wholesome and banal Sunday morning programming.

One aspect of Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique that especially intrigued me was when I found out that John Gilmore – a man who has made a career out of exposing controversial Hollywood based crimes and serial killers – is one of the main subjects of the documentary. As someone who has read many of his books for the mere pleasure, I knew that Gilmore would provide a certain charisma to the documentary that is quite rare and underappreciated nowadays. After all, no other true crime author has been able to uncover such odd and obsessive facts like Bobby Beausoleil's pre-murderer interest in American Neo-Splengarian philosopher and political activist Francis Parker Yockey's tome Imperium. In Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique, Gilmore reveals the cunning criminal tactics of semen-slurping Hollywood pimp-producers and the revolting facts behind his friend James Dean's painful rise to post-life stardom. According to Gilmore, Dean became the sex slave of various Hollywood producers before making his way to the silver screen. Knowing that Dean subjected himself to sexual torture yet never got to reap its rewards just makes his life seem all the more tragic. In early Hollywood, it was not uncommon for up-and-coming actors of both genders (but especially males) to use and abuse their body as a rite of passage in Tinseltown. Apparently, James Dean was sub-literate but he had a keen knack getting what he wanted via his sometimes charming antics and his ability to perfectly mimic other people's behavior. As John Gilmore explains in Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique, very few people in Hollywood gave Dean the time of day before his godlike and quasi-mythical success, but when he died, these disingenuous individuals (including Maila Nurmi aka Ms. Vampira) claimed to be his best friend. Naturally, the documentary also covers a variety of iconic L.A.-based serial killers and murderers, including Charles "The Pied Piper of Tucson" Schmid, the Manson Family, and the unsolved Black Dahlia murder. As someone who has read various books on these subjects/individuals, I must admit that Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique does an excellent job in "cutting the fat" in regard to providing only the most unconventional and naked facts about the murderers and their victims, and not merely regurgitating the same kind of cheat-sheet and beat-to-death yellow journalism facts you find on television programs like 60 Minutes or in books written by Vincent Bugliosi.

SEX, DEATH /& THE HOLLYWOOD MYSTIQUE

Personally, I see it as no sort of revelation that Hollywood has a genocide worth of skeletons in its many closets as the contrived and artificial nature of its films gives evidence that its owners have something to hide; or, at the very least, they do not want to reveal the true nature of their characters. After all, it is no mere coincidence that some of Hollywood's best films, including Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard and David Lynch's Mulholland Drive, have been set in the fey and cryptic criminal underworld of Tinsletown. To my knowledge there is not another documentary like Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique; where the devil's warehouse of showbiz is showcased in a most pleasantly uncensored way. Of course, the documentary is undoubtedly a continuation of its star John Gilmore's lifelong work, as well as Kenneth Anger's Hollywood Babylon series, but Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique is much easier to digest for those that loathe literature (myself, not included). For me, the documentary was like revisiting Gilmore and Anger's work, minus hours of reading. If you're a friend, foe, or fan of Hollywood, you will certainly find Sex, Death & The Hollywood

Mystique to be a stimulating affair where the seedy sex, exploding stars, and sinister business of Hollywood is displayed on a sparkling dimestore platter. For more info on this film, checkout: www.wesselmania.net

-Ty E

ICONOCLAST
ICONOCLAST

Larry Wessel* (2010)

I have been following the work of so called "Occult Fascist" Boyd Rice for many years now yet I wouldn't call myself a true fan. Quite honestly, Rice's antics annoy me more than anything. When I first discovered his work years ago, I felt as if I had finally found a modern artist with testicular fortitude, but I soon realized that I was sorely mistaken. Although Rice is a man who has no problem butchering sacred cows nor violently stirring politically incorrect controversy, his lack of genuine idealism and inconsistent belief system(s) just goes to show that he is first and foremost a conman who reinvents himself anytime his routine begins to be boring and no longer alluring. During his unconventional career, Rice has played the role of a Satanist, pseudo-fascist, Mansonite, satirical social Darwinist, artsy fartsy noise musician, promoter of Tiki Bar Kultur, and many more other controversial roles, yet he has neglected to stay truly committed to anything aside from his Carney and contrarian nature. Had Mr. Rice lived in a time when fascism was vogue, he would have most promoted the Marxist or anarchist line, but, instead, he grew up in an era where racial elitism (of the Aryan persuasion) is purely taboo, hence his ambiguous attraction and flirtation with it. Of course, anyone that knows anything about Boyd Rice is aware that the self-proclaimed iconoclast developed many of his greatest friendships over the years with Jews and people of Jewish descent, thus those that think he is an antisemite of sorts know next to nil about the subversive showboat showman. Despite his lifelong aversion to Christianity, Boyd Rice has also spent sometime attempting to prove he is a descendent of Jesus Christ himself. In the 4 hour long "tour de force" documentary Iconoclast directed by Larry Wessel (I will leave it up to the reader to figure out this filmmaker's racial character), Rice's life story is unraveled in a sentimental manner worthy of a Joseph Goebbels' style propaganda flick on a modest budget. Despite his self-proclaimed elitist philosophy, Rice is a proud high school dropout who stated of his rather successful but marginally notable artistic career that it, "is a testament to the idea that you can achieve whatever the hell you want if you possess a modicum of creativity, and a certain amount of naivete concerning what is and isn't possible in this world. I've had one man shows of my paintings in New York, but I'm not a painter. I've authored several books, but I'm not a writer. I've made a living as a recording artist for the last 30 years, but I can't read a note of music or play an instrument. I've somehow managed to make a career out of doing a great number of things I'm in no way qualified to do."

After watching Iconoclast, I have to admit that the documentary neither fell short nor exceeded my relatively apathetic expectations. After all, I see Boyd Rice's body of work as nothing more than a dubious but sometimes entertaining collection of novelties. By his own admittance, Rice has shown pride in his lack of skill in each artistic medium he has dabbled in, like a dilettante who is oddly more interested in monetary success than the artistic outcome of his experiments. In my opinion, the individuals that Boyd Rice has had the honor of collaborating with over the years have always tended to be much more talented and equally more dedicated than he is. For example, Boyd Rice has collaborated with Douglas P. of alpha-Neofolk group Death in June on a number of occasions. In my opinion, all of the Death in June albums Rice worked on are infinitely more interesting and enjoyable than anything NON (Rice's main musical project) has ever produced. Michael Moynihan - the humble protégé of Boyd Rice - has also completely outdone his former teacher. Although Rice has bitterly stated some not so nice things about Moynihan's Neofolk/Post-industrial musical group Blood Axis in the book Art That Kills: A Panoramic Portrait of Aesthetic Terrorism 1984-2001; the project certainly puts the non-musical nature of NON to shame. Moynihan has also shown that he is a far more literate and serious writer than Rice; producing translations of works by aristocratic Sicilian philosopher Julius Evola, an excellent occidental pagan kultur journal (Tyr: Myth—Culture—Tradition), and various other notable works (Lords of Chaos). Although Boyd Rice wrote some interesting pieces for RE/Search Publications on forgotten/bizarre films and pranks during his early career, his writing skills have never really advanced since then. A couple years ago, Rice released his noticeably thin book "NO"; a collection of essays and personal insights. Although NO is a clever book that is certainly worth checking out, the work can be quite annoying in parts, especially when Rice (who is now a middle-aged man) belittles his own father in a totally petty and immature manner. In my opinion, NO is quite symbolic of Boyd Rice in general, as it is a work that shows evidence of a witty fellow who seems to be somewhat lazy due to his obsessive misanthropy, hence his less than serious body of work. Accordingly, in the documentary Iconoclast, Boyd Rice makes it perfectly clear that he is a lifelong jokester and prankster with an incapacity to take anything too seriously, thus it should go without saying that one shouldn't take the iconoclast himself too seriously.

During his lifetime, Boyd Rice has had friendships with some of the most hated men in the United States of America. Rice was friends with Church of Satan founder and High Priest Anton Szandor LaVey until the good Doktor's death in 1997. During Iconoclast, Rice joyfully recollects his personal experiences with LaVey. Rice also discusses his quasi-friendship with Charles Manson; a brief relationship that eventually turned bitter. The only segment of Iconoclast that offers any criticism of Boyd Rice is from Manson who describes his former friend as a poser rock star that likes to play dress up in military uniforms but is incapable of following orders nor respecting others. I have to admit that Manson's criticism of Rice was quite hilarious and undeniably true. For whatever reason, Rice neglects to mention his only son Wolf; a boy that apparently suffers from some type of debilitating physical disorder (so much for Rice's top-notch Christ-like genetics). Instead, it seems that Rice's only real family are his carefully selected friends and followers. I must admit that I was quite happy to see footage of Rozz Williams (lead vocalist of Christian Death and Shadow Project) featured in Iconoclast that was taken right before his suicide on April Fool's day. According to Boyd, Rozz Williams used to pathologically stalk Rice around Los Angeles. Unsurprisingly, Rice also inspired Marilyn Manson and his pseudo-fascistic Carney cabaret routines. Out of all the friendships Rice has developed over the years, his cordial relationship with Christian Televangelist Bob Larson (which spans over two decades) seems to be the strangest. Of course, Rice and Larson are not total opposites as they are both talented showman who have an knack for spellbinding lesser beings. Anyways, if you expect Iconoclast to be in anyway an objective portrayal of Boyd Rice and his unconventional life, you're probably looking for a film that will never be made. At the most fundamental level, Iconoclast is a celebration of Boyd Rice's life with the subject as the somewhat unreliable narrator. Boyd Rice is a man that most people either love or love to hate, although I find myself fitting into neither of those groups. That being said, Iconoclast is the kind of film that the viewer will either love or hate, but it is doubtful that anyone will find it to be forgettable.

ICONOCLAST

As mentioned in Iconoclast, Boyd Rice once created a painting of a primitive looking skull using the vaginal blood of a thirteen year old virgin girl. During the last hour of Iconoclast, Rice proudly admits that he learned from such mentors as Anton LaVey and Charles Manson that one must "break-in" a girl (like a pimp) before another man gets the chance to do so. Call me a puritanical prude, but I found Rice's interest in virtual preteens to be, to say the least, quite deplorable. Of course, that is just one of the many things that I found to be repellent regarding Boyd Rice's life and philosophy. Personally, when I hear the word "iconoclast", I think of people like German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche and German-American sage journalist H.L. Mencken, as both men left a penetrating, highly influential, and an ultimately erudite body of work. I would certainly never put someone like Boyd Rice in the same league as a Nietzsche nor a Mencken, but, instead, in a category with nihilistic punk rock frontmen like Darby Crash of The Germs or subversive filmmakers like Bruce LaBruce. Of course, we live in an era where the general public is increasingly less literate and gravitates towards the primitive and highly sensual, thus keen literacy and complex creations are not as important in the present day. As Rice has freely stated in a totally braggart manner, he is quite proud of his limited artistic skills and less than minimalistic creations. After all, most American's easily fall prey to gimmicks and scams; two things that Boyd Rice indubitably has a (albeit, unconventional) talent for. Although I am far from flabbergasted by the fact that Rice cites Ray Kroc's Grinding It Out: The Making of McDonald's as one of his favorite books, I do find it extremely odd that he also referenced National Socialist philosopher Alfred Rosenberg's tome The Myth of the Twentieth Cen- ture and Francis Parker Yockey's magnum opus Imperium as major influences, as both works seem to fall out of line with the aesthetic terrorist's mostly materialistic weltanschauung. Indeed, Larry Wessel's Iconoclast is the most "epic" exposé of Boyd Rice's career, therefore, if you're looking to learn about the non-man; the documentary will provide you with a comprehensive portrait of his seemingly incomprehensible life. If you're already familiar with Boyd Rice and his career, you will find Iconoclast to be at least somewhat entertaining, yet it is doubtful the documentary will provide you with any new revelations regarding the film's subject. The most unusual aspect of the documentary is that it is an atypically sentimentalist look at an emotionally cold "Occult Fascist" musician, thus — more than anything — Iconoclast is a tribute to Boyd Rice and his loyal fans/supporters. Iconoclast is a testament to the fact that even Occult Fascists have feelings. For more info on Iconoclast, checkout Larry Wessel's official ICONOCLAST MOVIE website.

-Ty E

LOVE
LOVE

Larry Wessel* (2014)

If there is a common thread that ties together all the work of Satanic documentarian Larry Wessel (Taurobolium, Ultramegalopolis) aside from his pathological voyeurism and seeming love of the medium of video, it is his obsession with the artist, most specifically the subversive and much maligned artist on the fringes of society. Indeed, from the aberrant carny anecdotes of Ed “Big Daddy” Roth protégé Robert “The King of Lowbrow Art” Williams in Carny Talk (1995) to the life story of noise pioneer and (in)famous ‘occult fascist’ Boyd Rice of NON in the epic three-part documentary Iconoclast (2010), Wessel has demonstrated that he wants to know every detail about an artist and their influences, no matter how random and irrelevant, and in my humble opinion, that is one of his greatest merits as a filmmaker as a sort of satanist Jean Rouch. With his latest debauched doc Love (2014), Wessel takes his most literal approach to documenting an artist and their work, as it is a conspicuously candid doc where a somewhat marginal yet nonetheless semi-successful cult painter describes the origin and influences of all her major paintings while oftentimes in the company of a mentor. Of course, considering the artist, New Mexico-based painter Beth Moore-Love, has done paintings of southern belles masturbating to the sickening sight of naked lynched negroes, daughters gang-banging up on and raping their elderly fathers, a blonde preteen angel reading ‘outsider artist’ Henry Darger’s 15, 145-page work In the Realms of the Unreal to a pale little Aryan boy corpse that suffered a grotesque gunshot wound to the face in bed, an Elizabeth Taylor-esque little girl holding a platter with a bald bearded fellow’s decapitated head while a naked woman is being tortured by three gringo amigos in the background, a farm mother savagely slaughtering her own infant daughter and subsequently slitting her own throat, and a sadistically cynical work featuring the frozen corpses of the ill-fated British Captain Sir Franklin’s lost Arctic expedition to the last uncharted section of the Northwest Passage, Ms. Moore-Love is not exactly a pedantic or even pleasant subject, but no one would dare say she is uninteresting. Despite being a petite and rather thin woman that likes wearing vintage Shirley Temple-esque dresses, Moore-Love is certainly no lady, at least not in any conventional sense, as demonstrated by her glaring seething hatred for modesty and humility, daintiness, old school white patriarchy, pre-Civil Rights era American history, and colonialism in a variety of ‘idiosyncratic’ fashions throughout the documentary. Of course, as a chick with a Vietnam War veteran for a father who likes shooting assault rifles and bow and arrows in dresses and seems to have an innate aversion to political correctness, even if her sentiments are more or less of the ostensibly humanistic left, the painter is not some putridly pompous feminist or art school trust fund dyke and thus her art seems totally genuine and not the product of pathetic pretense and repugnant postmodern artistic trends. Technically, it is not the first time that Moore-Love, who was once not surprisingly associated with Boyd Rice and Brian M. Clark's avant-garde UNPOP art movement, is collaborating with auteur Wessel, as he used her black-and-white 1995 painting "Starlet" of Elizabeth "The Black Dahlia" Short standing in front of her dismembered corpse as the poster art for his Hollywood Babylon-inspired documentary Sex, Death & The Hollywood Mystique (1999). Shot on location in Albuquerque, New Mexico, Berlin, Germany, and Los Angeles over an 8-year period spanning from 2005 to 2013, Wessel's long in the making love letter to Love ultimately more than demonstrates what the eponymous subject meant when she proudly declared that, "My 'artwork' has always been very cynical and ANGRY," as a delightfully debasing doc that does many things but thankfully it does not make any attempts to separate the seemingly aberrant artist from her undeniably aberrant art.

Born in 1964 in Des Moines, Iowa to a Vietnam War army recruiter named Tom Moore who oftentimes saw the young men that he helped to recruit come home in body bags, Beth Moore-Love certainly seems to have death on the brain and I would not be surprised if it is at least partially rooted in the wartime experiences of her father, who she initially did not recognize as a little girl when he came back from the war. Feeling bad that he allowed his little girl to be married away at the mere age of 19, Papa Moore took up an offer from artist Dale Caudill aka 'Bo' to properly train his daughter to "hone her skills" and develop an admirable body of work so long as the old man footed the bill for a year. Despite describing her as the "laziest woman I had ever met" (in fact, the painter even states of herself, "I've always been lazy"), Bo managed to whip his seemingly plain Jane protegee, who previously was commissioned to do banal amateurish paintings of horses and cats, into shape and helped her establish a respectable oeuvre largely revolving around 'neo-American Gothic' paintings featuring dead and/or mutilated children and the dismembered corpses of adults that, aesthetically and thematically speaking, seem to fall somewhere in between the work of Midwestern painter Grant Wood, American lowbrow pop surrealist Joe Coleman, controversial American artist Stud Mead (who is a personal friend of the artist), 'Naïve painter' and writer Henry Darger, and obscure controversial kraut painter Herbert Smagon. For example, her early painting "Dwarf Toss" features a dark apocalyptic landscape featuring a naked legless girl in the foreground 'fingering' the bloody gore around the area where her leg was ripped off while two wolves collectively devour said leg and buildings burn in the background. Using pictures of vintage mannequins as the main influence for the discernibly loony little girl subjects of these paintings, Moore-Love managed to create a foreboding body of work that makes it seem like that she is haunted by a perennial state of lost childhood, as if something horrendous happened to her as a little girl that she just cannot exorcise from her seemingly forsaken soul. For her self-portrait, which was used as the poster art of Love, she painted an image of herself on a rat-infested pirate ship (the artist claims she has pirate ancestry) as a half-topless figurehead with angel wings that is being pointed at by a crazed prepubescent child carrying a decapitated head while her assumed mother's corpse is being torn to shreds by a vulture in the background.

LOVE

Unquestionably, Moore-Love's greatest artistic obsession seems to be figuratively shitting on America and the colonial white world's past (it should be noted that feces does appear in much of her work), which probably takes its most mean-spirited, nightmarish, and iconoclastic form in her painting "Southern Comfort", which features a group of southern belles, including one with her dress hiked up and masturbating, standing around the dangling unclad corpse of a lynched negro and which the artist described as follows: "This was the nightmare of Southern manhood that their wives were in to it, you know, in the middle of the night furiously masturbating thinking about black cock. This is one of my favorite paintings that I have ever done," thus demonstrating the painter's seeming innate hatred and resentment towards white men. Her painting "The Franklin Expedition", which was inspired by the doomed 1845 voyage of British Captain Sir John Franklin and 138 officers, depicts the frozen corpse of a British officer who Moore-Love only has the utmost contempt for as demonstrated by her remark, "They were far too arrogant to imagine that maybe there were people already living in that region that could help them [...] they were never found again, except by Eskimos, but that didn't count." Of course, a little research proves that most of the British officers probably died from other causes like starvation (there is evidence that the men actually resorted to cannibalism), lead poisoning and diseases including scurvy, tuberculosis, and pneumonia than from hypothermia. Unquestionably, one of the artist's most revealing paintings is from 1996 and entitled "A Closer Walk", which features an apocalyptic farm landscape showing a mother, who has just butchered her infant, committing suicide by slitting her own throat while the family home burns down in the background. In regard to her influences for "A Closer Walk" and what it means to her, Moore-Love remarks, "...After I read the WISCONSIN DEATH TRIP, I just realized there was a lot of that stuff going on at that time and at that place...and it doesn't surprise me, being, you know, I wouldn't have liked to be a woman living in that era. Some of the paintings seemed nostalgic but I'm not nostalgic at all for the old days, unless we're talking about, you know, the stone age when things were probably a little bit simpler." As one would suspect, Moore-Love has no children.

For "immigration reasons" and the "possibility of living in Europe and America", Moore-Love, who had already divorced her first husband (though, not unlike Tina Turner, she opted to keep the catchy surname), married Berlin-based experimental musician, artist, and writer Ghazi Barakat of Boy From Brazil in 1997 in Albuquerque, New Mexico. Barakat paid tribute to his then-wife in his essay "The Late Great Aesthetic Taboos", which was featured in the 2000 book Apocalypse Culture 2, which was edited and published by director Wessel's comrade Adam Parfrey via his publishing company Feral House. In the essay, Barakat wrote, "The work of [UNPOP Artist] Beth Love of New Mexico expands on an "innocent" Victorian aesthetic by integrating sick-minded contemporary horror beneath her primary subjects, and within the background. The stowing away of such dread renders the id-forms all the more astonishing." Naturally, while living in Berlin, Moore-Love found new influences as demonstrated by her painting "A View of The Hinterhoff", a rare commissioned work (the artist typically refuses to do commissioned art), which depicts the Teutonic metropolis as a "very insectoid" Kafka-esque post-industrial rat maze where the sun never shines. While in Berlin, Moore-Love also contributed work to an art exhibit called "When Love Turns To Poison" that also included works by artists like Stu Mead, Mathias Seidel, Skip Hunter & Ella Verparajugs, Thomas Hauser, and Frank Gaard that caused a huge scandal in Germany where the artists were "accused of peddling kiddy porn." Rather humorously, a large and morbidly obese Christian extremist showed up at the exhibit and began destroying the art. Moore-Love also goes on to describe how she was elated that an Aryan woman called a painting she did of a naked prepubescent girl in a forest "rubbish" in a German newspaper, stating that for her, it "was the equivalent of an Academy Award because every artist worth their salt in the history of art has had people call their work rubbish or worse."

While I find some of her work interesting and even aesthetically pleasing, Beth Moore-Love is certainly not an artist I like, but I suspect that her ultimate goal is not to be liked as indicated by her 'artist's statement': "I read a quote once, I don't remember who said it, something about the purpose of art being to soothe the spirit after a hard day of 'reality'. What does that mean? I once saw a two-page advertisement for some stupid car, on one side of the fold-out was a photo of Monument Valley, morphing into the skyline of Manhattan. On the other page, over Monument Valley was written, 'The Dream', over Manhattan was written, "The Reality". And I saw right away that this was completely backwards. So my purpose as an artist is to soothe these people who turn our world upside-down for profit? These people who feel spiritually bereft after a hard day of raping and pillaging? Fuck that. I will NOT. I'm going to sneak it on the wall, and slap the shit out of them with the truth of it. Is there ugliness and horror in my work? Absolutely. Do you think that my work is distasteful? You are correct!" Indeed, Moore-Love is certainly someone who finds a perverse sense of pulchritude in things including her own cat as a dead roast for a feast, infanticide, apocalyptic catastrophe, prepubescent female nudity, white heterosexual male misery, feces and scatological scenarios involving cute little girls, anti-maternal gestures like women breastfeeding poisonous Gila monsters and mothers and daughters savagely butchering one another (it should be no surprise that she has described her paintings as her "children"), so no one could call her a hack, even if they wanted to. One thing that Moore-Love certainly makes clear during the documentary, even if she does not say it outright, is that she uses her art as a sort of therapy, with her work "Cloacina Russula" being made to get out of a long depression and her work "Our Mother of Compassion" created out of anger and rage. Moore-Love once stated, "I paint for a society that's dysfunctional. I don't paint to make things better for people; I paint a mirror of this society," but as I watched Wessel's doc, I came to the natural conclusion that the art is more of a product of her own dysfunction than a mirror of society, which I think can be said of any decent and authentic artist. Arguably, most importantly, I respect that Moore-Love has a sense of humor regarding her work, even stating in the doc, "I think a lot of these paintings are funny." I know I certainly had a smirk on my face while seeing a number of them, especially her "self portrait."

LOVE

Arguably Big Larry's most intimate and professional documentary to date and certainly his most polished and evenly paced, Love reveals Wessel to be a man with a deep respect and almost childlike enthusiasm for the artist, which is quite rare for artist-based documentaries of any sort, which typically resemble insufferably banal virtual tours of art galleries or hokey and/pedantic hagiographies. Indeed, featuring shockingly breathtaking aerial shots of the deserts, mesas, mountains of New Mexico and shot on two different continents, the doc certainly demonstrates that Big Larry has come a long way since the days when he went by the name 'Laurence Von Wessel' and shot and assisted directed campy kitsch pieces for 'outsider auteur' and aesthetic terrorist extraordinaire John Aes-Nihil like the Tennessee Williams adaptation The Drift (1989) starring the crippled tranny Goddess Bunny (who would become the central subject of his 1995 L.A. drag queen doc Sugar & Spice) on consumer grade camcorders. While not Wessel's longest and most 'epic' work to date, Love is certainly his most immaculate and revealing work, which largely has to do with the subject Moore-Love who, unlike say Boyd Rice of Iconoclast, is fairly self-deprecating, honest to a fault (much like her art), and does not attempt to hide behind a bloated and puffery-plagued persona. For better or worse, Moore-Love's art does offer a window into the modern world that seems like it might shatter at any moment, but so does the artist who I could imagine would be the next Lorena Bobbitt or Gesche Gottfried were she not a painter and did not have a serious therapeutic outlet for her pain and hatred.

-Ty E

HOMEBOODIES

Larry YuSt (1974)

I cannot even remember when, but I certainly learned at a very, very young age that being old sucks. Naturally, having a crippled devout Christian grandmother who always complained about how she wished she was “in heaven” with my grandfather when I was a young kid probably played a large part in forming my opinion of what life is like as a senior citizen, but it is also hard for me to think of a single old person I have ever met that did not seem defeated, senile, and/or otherwise miserable. Of course, who wants to live long enough to see your loved ones and everyone you knew drop dead until you’re the only one left. Additionally, if a person has not given up on their life by middle-age like most people do, they almost certainly have by the time they have reached their glorious so-called ‘golden years.’ Naturally, considering my particularly pessimistic outlook old on age, I could not help but be excited by the prospect of a film about a gang of old farts that decide that to defend their homes and, in turn, their honor and dignity, by killing people so that they don’t get kicked out of their own apartment which is set to be demolished to make way for a new apartment complex for bourgeois bastards. Indeed, in the darkly comedic ‘horror’ flick Homebodies (1974) directed by Larry YuSt and co-penned by Mel Brooks’ cousin Howard Kaminsky, an eccentric sextet of elderly pensioners played by veteran actors decide it is no more Mr. Nice Guy and begin tragicomedically liquidating construction workers, enterprising business men, and bitchy young blonde bureaucrats who have brought great discomfort to their lives and dignity by demanding that they leave an apartment building that some have been living at an upwards of four decades. Although virtually unknown today, YuSt is probably best remembered for his short 20-minute Shirley Jackson adaptation The Lottery (1969)—a work produced for the “Short Story Showcase” series by Encyclopædia Britannica (of which director YuSt’s father Walter M. YuSt was the American editor-in-chief of from 1938 to 1960) that has been ranked by the Academic Film Archive as “one of the two bestselling educational films ever”—as well as his quasi-Blaxploitation flick Trick Baby (1972) starring Kiel Martin as a super high yellow mulatto who is able to pass himself off as white. For better or worse, Homebodies is indubitably YuSt’s magnum opus, as an idiosyncratic cult flick that is still sweetly sick, cynical, and shocking after over four decades since its original release. Indeed, the film might be somewhat slow-paced and directed with the uniquely uncultivated elegance of a for-hire TV hack, but it is a truly one of a kind work that manages to pay rare tribute to the plights of geriatric folks yet is simultaneously absurdly amoral in a fashion that will just downright disgust many people. Like a Hagsploitation reworking of Grumpy Old Men (1993) with a sadistic shade of Weekend at Bernie’s (1989) as directed by a less campy nephew of Curtis Harrington and Paul Bartel, Homebodies is unequivocally one of the most fucked 'feel good' films ever made.

HOMEODIES

While walking by a construction site near her dilapidated apartment complex in Cincinnati, Ohio, quasi-antihero Mattie Spencer (played by Paula Trueman, who was nearly blind at the time of shooting the film and had to do chin-ups during her audition to prove she was fit enough for the role) a young Guido construction worker asks her, "Hey, you got something for me granny?" so she gives him a prune, thus demonstrating she eats stereotypical old people food. Less than a minute after Mattie gives him the prune, the less than polite goombah laborer falls to his death upon foolishly riding on a steel beam that is being lifted to the top of the building. While one would assume most elderly women would be traumatized after seeing a young and vibrant wisecracking wop fall to his death a moment after talking to her, Mattie is given a somewhat strange idea as to how she and her neighbors can avoid being evicted from their apartment. After witnessing the somewhat hilarious death, Mattie goes by the apartment of her neighbor and best friend Miss Emily (Frances Fuller of One Sunday Afternoon (1933) starring Gary Cooper and Fay Wray), who suffers from such bad agoraphobia that she has not left her apartment in two decades. Surely, Miss Emily is a melancholy reminder of how much can change over a relatively short time as she is the barren, post-debutante daughter of a wealthy man that used to own fourteen different apartment buildings, including the one she lives in, in the area yet she can barely afford to pay for the rent at the antiquated apartment she lives in and now spends most of her time talking to her long dead daddy and nostalgically reflecting how great things were in the good old days, stating things like, "This is only one of fourteen buildings my father owned in this neighborhood. He wouldn't let something like this happen. That was a long time ago, of course. Things were very different back then. People respected us. We were very elegant here." While talking about the dead Guido, Mattie and Miss Emily both agree that it is nice and quiet outside since the construction workers stopped working as a result of the freak accident. Needless to say, it does not take Mattie—a half-crazed crypto-cunt with a discernible spark of malefic mischief in her world weary eyes—long to come to the epiphany that she and her geriatric comrades do not have to vacate their apartment complex as demanded by their landlord, as murder always complicates things and will certainly postpone their inevitable eviction if the right people kick the bucket.

When a fiercely phony and pigheaded attractive blonde relocation official named Miss Pollack (Linda Marsh of Elia Kazan's America America (1963)) is brought in to kick the old folks out, it only adds insult to injury, as she thinks she can tell the senior citizens to do whatever she wants since she is attractive and in good shape. Of course, the irony is that Miss Pollack never expected a single one of the old farts to outlive her, but every single one ultimately does. Widower Mr. Sandy (William Hansen of Willard (1971) and 1776 (1972)) refuses to leave because his apartment is cluttered with stacks upon stacks of research he has done for a memoir he wants to finish in tribute his long dead wife, who he was married to for 55 years. Apartment superintendant Mr. Loomis (Ian Wolfe of Rebel Without a Cause (1955) and THX 1138 (1971)) is in the process of painting the outside of the entire building and neither he or his beloved wife (Ruth McDevitt of The Parent Trap (1961) and Hitchcock's Birds (1963)) have any interest in leaving where they have spent the last forty years of their lives. Stoic old blind man Mr. Blakely (Peter Brocco of Dalton Trumbo's Johnny Got His Gun (1971) and Milos Forman's One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1975)) might not be able to see but he is certainly not looking for a change of scenery. When cold hearted cunt Pollack shows up at the apartment, the old people eventually talk her out of leaving the building and blind Blakely even shows her the courtesy of walking her out the door, but she is not going to back down without a fight as reflected in her spitefully spoken words, "We've moved out thousands of old people like you. What makes you think you're any different?" When the police come back the next day, all of the old folks aside from Mattie and Miss Emily are escorted to their new apartment which is a cold and clinical building flooded with elderly lost souls that resembles a giant mental hospital. When Miss Pollack goes looking for Mattie and Miss Emily around the almost haunted house-like apartment building, she gets the shock of a lifetime when the latter pops out of the closet and stabs her in the gut and kills her almost instantly. Of course, the rest of the old folks come back after Miss Pollack is liquidated and proceed to live life like nothing has happened, at least at the beginning. Rather humorously, the old-timers wheel around Miss Pollack's corpse in a wheelchair and eventually dump it off of a bridge and onto a train where it will not be found anytime soon.

On top of killing Miss Pollack, the old gang liquidates three construction workers who were 'mysteriously' killed and "fried like bacon" via electrocution at the site of another new, nearby apartment complex that is being built, thus temporarily halting construction. The next person to meet death is a rich and pernicious prick of a building owner named Mr. Crawford (Douglas Fowley of Singin' in the Rain (1952)) who is not much younger than the people he wants to evict yet he mocks them due their age and is certainly not going to allow his $50 million dollar project go down the drain so a couple whiny old farts can live their remaining years in relative comfort. In a fitting way to immortalize the man in his own monstrous creation, the geriatric gang put Mr. Crawford inside a structure at the new apartment complex and drop cement on him while he is still alive. Unfortunately, a piece of Mr. Crawford's foot is sticking outside of his new concrete coffin, so Mr. Loomis chops the pesky appendage off and puts it in his pocket. While Loomis is quite the trooper when it comes to exterminating his enemies, his wife is much more sensitive and even attempts to turn her herself into a cop, but Mattie stops her and later threatens her and everyone else by stating, "There are six people dead and there will be more if someone gets in the way. Do you understand me?" Of course, Mattie eventually decides Mrs.

HOMEODIES

Loomis has to go when she sees her walking to the police, so she throws an urn carrying Miss Emily's father's ashes from an upstairs window and knocks her out. While Mrs. Loomis does not die immediately, she does drop dead not long after as her comrades refuse to take her to the hospital due to their precarious situation. Meanwhile, Mattie decides to bludgeon Mr. Sandy to death for seemingly no reason at all, thus depriving the man the opportunity to honor his deceased wife by finishing his memoir. Indeed, it seems that, unlike her neighbors, who just want to be left in peace and maintain some dignity, Mattie is a psychopathic old wench who will use any excuse she can think to kill someone, as she rather enjoys it.

When Miss Emily confronts Mattie about killing her friends by soundly stating, "It doesn't make any sense if we start killing each other," and she replies, "You be careful! I killed the old man too. I kill any of you if you don't let me alone," it becomes quite clear that the old lady is more than a little bit off her rocker and needs to be stopped before she kills everyone or gets the entire group busted. The last straw for the old folks is when Mattie chases Miss Emily up to the top floor of the new apartment construction site and attempts to throw her off the building. Luckily, the old men and a security guard stop Mattie before Miss Emily's brains are splattered on the asphalt. After chasing Mattie around town in a variety of situations that one might describe as 'senior citizen slapstick,' Mr. Loomis, Mr. Blakely, and Ms. Emily end up collectively drowning the miserable old bitch after chasing her down in small rented rowboats. Unfortunately, when the mature murderers get back to their apartment, they discover their building is in the process of being demolished, so they grab whatever they can and start looking for a new apartment complex. When they reach an apartment complex that looks cozy enough, the equally elderly superintendent informs them that their building is set to be demolished to make way for apartments for rich people, but Mr. Blakely replies with a knowing smirk, "I think we'll move in for a bit, anyhow" and Miss Emily adds, "Maybe we can help." In a bizarre and seemingly inexplicable twist, as the group is talking to the superintendent, assumedly dead Mattie appears and jovially states, "It's me...Mattie."

While more darkly humorous than chilling, Homebodies is guaranteed to petrify or unnerve certain people because many individuals have a sort of unconscious fear of the elderly as they are a dejecting and less than aesthetically pleasing reminder of where their future is heading. Considering the guilt so many people probably feel due to how they end up putting their elderly loved ones in so-called 'retirement homes' and in general treat old people like retarded children, the idea of a group of mischievously murderous grandpas and grandmas seems like a frightening prospect as their actions would almost seem warranted as a sort of revenge for what most non-elderly people would probably consider abuse or neglect, among other things. Notably, the scenario depicted in Homebodies cannot be all that uncommon, as one-time Warhol superstar Taylor

Mead—an exceedingly effete fellow who not only appeared in Factory films like Taylor Mead's Ass (1965) and Lonesome Cowboys (1968), but also important and/or otherwise notable works like Gregory J. Markopoulos' The Iliac Passion (1967), Michel Auder's Cleopatra (1970), Eric Mitchell's Underground U.S.A. (1980), and Jim Jarmusch's Coffee and Cigarettes (2003)—spent about a decade attempting to stop his eviction from his Lower East Side apartment by a relatively young and enterprising Jewish real-estate mogul Ben Shaoul, only to be evicted in 2013 at the age of 88 and die a mere month later after relocating to Denver to live with his niece. Considering Mead was a rather respected individual among certain art fags and Warhol whores, one can only imagine what the average experience is like for your everyday elderly person. More recently, when the negroes carried out their senseless destruction of Baltimore city a couple weeks back over the death of a degenerate drug dealer who infected his own community with dope, they totally destroyed two brand new buildings that were made for poor elderly black old folks. Of course, like old people in general, these are issues that people rather ignore, which is easy to do since senior citizens have no real voices.

Aside from its bizarre combination of absurdist amorality and old farts' rights message, Homebodies is also notable for being shot around Cincinnati's Over-the-Rhine neighborhood which, as its name hints, was German before being taken over by poor negroes and thus features discernibly Teutonic architecture, thus exposing another tragic element of urbanization and inner-city redevelopment schemes. Indeed, with all the vulgar and just plain ugly and stupid architecture in American cities, the last thing these areas need is to lose what little examples of real European-like culture and cultivation they have, but then again there is probably no one left in the area that could appreciate Gothic Revival spires, or as Oswald Spengler once wrote: "One day the last portrait of Rembrandt and the last bar of Mozart will have ceased to be — though possibly a colored canvas and a sheet of notes will remain — because the last eye and the last ear accessible to their message will have gone." Apparently one of the first films ever to be screened on HBO, Homebodies will too reach a Spenglerian fate before Mozart is forgotten, which is rather unfortunate as it one of only a handful of films and probably the only 'horror' flick that gives old folks their due as a deadly force to be reckoned with. Indeed, with the film's incessant, vaguely intimidating low-angle shots of the eponymous elderly folks and goofy yet strangely ominous yet old time style theme song "Sassafras Sundays" featuring the lyrics like, "Days of let's pretend...John Philip Sousa and Parfait tunes ...phosphate and needlepoint afternoons...sassafras Sundays with all your friends...Horses and carriages coming soon...guests in the parlor this afternoon," Yuft's film dares to make senior citizens look dangerous, which certainly beats looking weak and feeble-minded. Indeed, aside from a rare elderly person like 87-year-old Ursula Haverbeck who dares to face serious prison time in Germany by questioning the official holocaust narrative in a country that has made certain beliefs a major criminal offense, the only place you will find old farts with tenacity, drive, and rebelliousness is in a fictional film like Homebodies.

HOMEODIES

-Ty E

BEFRIELESBILLEDER

Lars von Trier (1982)

While we are constantly beat over the head virtually at birth with tired tales of shoah survivors and victims of Nazi persecution that resemble something out of some bad melodrama (or, worse, a Spielberg movie), we rarely ever hear about the forlorn fates of the other side, especially those that made the less than auspicious decision to fight for Europa against communism via the Third Reich as so many foreign recruits believed they were doing (as the post-WWII enslavement of half of Europe by the Soviet Union demonstrates, that is certainly what they were doing). Indeed, it cannot be a good feeling to be on the losing side in what was probably the most disastrous and nightmarish war in human history while so many criminals and killers on the (so-called) 'resistance' side would be regarded as heroes and be free to execute bloodthirsty Judaic eye-for-an-eye vengeance on the 'guilty' and—sometimes—not at all guilty. While SS-Oberführer Oskar Dirlewanger probably deserved his (suspected) grisly fate, one has to really question the motives behind the recent craven and inordinately petty harassment of virtually zombified 90+-year-old retirees (John Demjanjuk being probably the most well known example and Bruno Dey the most recent) being persecuted by conspicuously corrupt western courts under the suspicion of being concentration camp guards when they were young and dumb (while, rather notably, Israel is infamous for refusing to extradite its savagely sadistic genocidal mass murderers like Salomon Morel). While my Dutch grandfather was involved in the resistance and his family even hid teenage Jewesses inside their home, he had cousins in the Waffen-SS and apparently they spent the rest of their lives in exile in Germany after WWII lest they succumb to prosecution and very potential execution in some Nuremberg-esque show trial where Judaic justice reigns. While it was always very clear to me that my grandfather suffered immensely as a result of WWII as the trauma it caused has acted as a virtual inter-generational family curse of sorts, I could not help but wonder about the lives of his black sheep Waffen-SS cousins. Needless to say, not many films exist on the subject of a relatively sympathetic portrayal of the misery of ex-German soldiers in a post-WWII Americanized world aside from a couple notable examples like Belgian master auteur André Delvaux's surely underrated Een vrouw tussen hond en wolf (1979) aka Woman in a Twilight Garden starring Rutger Hauer as a terminally dejected Flemish (ex)Waffen-SS officer and Danish director Martin Zandvliet's rather mid-brow Land of Mine (2015). Undoubtedly, Jan Troell's Knut Hamsun biopic Hamsun (1996) does a good job depicting the patent absurdity of how the Norwegian Nobel-Prize-winning writer was robbed and persecuted in his old age by the post-WWII government, but it is not a particularly aesthetically alluring cinematic work like the auteur's previous films. Arguably, the most subversive and certainly most experimental of these films is Danish auteur Lars von Trier's little-seen fiercely fucked and forsaken celluloid fever dream Befrielsesbilleder (1982) aka Images of a Relief aka Liberation Pictures—an ostensible war film that defies classification yet also undeniably demonstrates the auteur learned a thing or two from Tarkovsky, Bergman, and Dreyer.

BEFRIELESBILLEDER

Although von Trier would eventually discover in 1989 that his biological father was a WWII resistance fighter of German goy extraction by the name of Fritz Michael Hartmann, he believed at the time that he made Befrielsesbilleder that he was Jewish via the pseudo-father he was named after, thereupon making the film, which practically bleeds Wehrmacht blut, seem all the more subversive and insanely idiosyncratic in terms of post-Auschwitz sentiment. After all, von Trier himself portrayed a creepy Jewish artist named Victor Marse in his previous film Orchidégartneren (1977) aka The Orchid Gardener that not only curiously dresses in both Nazi cosplay and drag, but also concludes the film by molesting a little girl pushing a baby doll carriage. Right before discovering he was actually Aryan as opposed to a chosenite, von Trier appeared as a character simply credited as 'Jew' in his classic film Europa (1991) in a curious director cameo comparable to Fassbinder's kosher character in Lili Marleen (1981). As Jack Stevenson noted in his worthwhile text Lars von Trier (2002), von Trier, who grew up in a degenerate hippie nudist far-leftist household, had even contrived a false Jewish identity of sorts as exemplified by the filmmaker's words, "I am very taken with my Jewish background. Jewishness has something to do with both suffering and historical consciousness which I miss so much in modern art. People have left their roots, their religion behind." Notably, in Befrielsesbilleder, not only does von Trier conjure pangs of suffering and preternatural historical consciousness, but he also unwittingly gets in contact with his Teutonic roots in both a historical and deeply atavistic fashion as if he had been possessed by the spirit of Hermann Löns after attending a Hans-Jürgen Syberberg film retrospective. Indeed, the Danish auteur that added the German nobiliary particle 'von' to his name in tribute to great Judaic filmmakers with phony aristocratic titles like Erich von Stroheim and Josef von Sternberg arguably reveals with Befrielsesbilleder that sometimes the Volksgeist can appear deeply on a subconscious artist level as surely no true blue Hebrew has ever directed a film that is even remotely similar both in terms of aesthetic and subject matter, but I digress.

Despite the fact that probably virtually no one would suspect so much upon viewing it, Befrielsesbilleder—a sort of mid-length feature at just under 60-minutes in length—was actually made by von Trier as his film school graduate project (for a similar example of an enterprising young auteur, checkout Aryan Kaganof's aberrant-garde Bataille adaptation The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man (1994)). Of course, to even mention such a perversely poetic cinematic work was created in film school is an unfortunate fact that surely undermines it, but facts are facts and von Trier is—for better or worse—not your typical filmmaker but a born-artist from an Aryan family with a long artistic legacy

(in fact, von Trier's communist mother attempted to defend her cuckolding of her kosher husband by telling the filmmaker that she wanted to bless him with "artistic genes"). Aside from revealing an unbelievably mature degree of aesthetic and technical refinement, the film also demonstrates von Trier's unconventional dedication to the historical documentary record as the auteur dared to dig up unseen documentary footage of resistance fighters tormenting supposed Nazi collaborators in the city of Copenhagen in the wake of the liberation of Denmark in early May 1945. Undoubtedly, in its shockingly seamless combination of vintage documentary footage and almost surreally stylized footage directed by von Trier, the film anticipates the auteur's later utilization of different sorts of stock footage and film and digital formats in works like NYMPH()MANIAC (2013). Ultimately, the entire film feels if it is set in some purgatorial post-Hitler hell where a limbless human-torso Dirlewanger is being double-penetrated by the devil with a big black razor-sharp dildo for eternity, though the Nazi (anti)hero does curiously ascend to heaven in the end in what is indubitably one of the most shockingly transcendent moments in all of von Trier's work.

Although he has a very Jewish-sounding name, Leo Mendel (Edward Fleming)—a four-eyed nerd that radiates a certain pathological pitifulness and deep-seated despondency—is an officer in the Wehrmacht and his prestigious position has now turned him into a virtual dead man walking as he is caged in a nightmarish POW prison in Copenhagen after the liberation of Copenhagen in May 1945. Like his kraut comrades, Leo plans to blow his brains out and prepares for the big event by writing his lover Esther (Kirsten Olesen) a rather brief 'goodbye letter' of sorts that reads: "Darling, Esther. This frightful war, which brought us together, has now separated us again. It is terrible to write that we shall never meet again. But so it must be. Don't forget that what you do for love stands above good and evil. Forever yours, Leo." Unluckily for him, Leo does meet Esther again after he escapes from prison upon failing to successfully commit self-slaughter after his gun malfunctions and gets somewhat of a dark surprise. Surely, Leo's incapacity to even kill himself really underscores his loser status, though things only get much worse from there. Rather unfortunately, while lurking in the shadows in preparation for reuniting with his lover, Leo gets the sickening shock of a lifetime under already less than ideal circumstances when Esther eventually shows up in the arms of an American buck negro GI in a scene that recalls a similar scenario of interracial romantic disharmony in Rainer Werner Fassbinder's hit film The Marriage of Maria Braun (1978). While the jigaboo liberator kisses and sensually embraces Esther, she pushes him away by complaining "Can we do something else?" while looking clearly dejected as if she is painfully cognizant of the fact that she is nothing more than an involuntary spoil of war and that she probably much preferred being a Nazi slut.

While one might initially suspect that Esther would be eternally grateful to see her assumed-dead lover, she is more or less a total bitch in the sort of way a woman get when they still love a man but realizes that the relationship is completely doomed. Indeed, after bitching to Leo, “What do you want? You promised, didn’t you?” Esther momentarily complains about lanterns blowing away and then accuses Leo of being culpable for war crimes, stating, “Everybody’s talking about what you did. The partisan boy you took last week. You ruined his eyes!” Leo seems to believe he is equipped with plausible deniability by coldly retorting “SS—they were from the SS,” but Esther—being an intuitive bitch that knows bullshit when she hears it—replies, “I know you were there. Don’t you see that you have a responsibility too? You’re so brilliant. You don’t care what you see. You can be used. What sort of morality is that? But you store it up. At some time a reaction will come. When will you scream?” Ultimately, Esther provides the answer to her own question the next day by causing Leo to unleash a deathly scream after playing the femme fatale, luring him into an insidious trap, and betraying him in the most cravenly personalized sort of fashion; or, a one-sided sort of Liebestod.

BEFRIELESBILLEDER

While it is hard to tell considering he is a marked man and officer in the most hated military in the world and thus probably not completely mentally sound, Leo has a rather flat affect as if he is an autist of sorts and Esther hints at this by complaining to him, “I could never see my reflection in your eyes.” Indeed, one gets the sense that if Leo was less cold and mechanical and offered more of himself, Esther might not betray him. Leo seems to sense this—or at least the impossibility of satisfying a uniquely unhappy woman—when he remarks “For a woman it’s always something different” after Esther complains, “It’s different now” in regard to their current less than ideal predicament. Undoubtedly, things are different and Leo is so ludicrously low that he can only go up; or so he does after reaching the lowest of lows in terms of abject desperation and infernal isolation. While he should probably know better, especially after seeing Esther with the yank spade stud, Leo agrees to meet her the next day at a secluded place in the woods in what ultimately proves to be an almost quintessentially Teutonic fairy-tale setting where the protagonist actually manages to briefly break out of his seemingly impenetrable shell and embrace life and nature just before he dies. Indeed, while Esther stands with her back to him while dressed like some sort of drag king Gestapo agent, Leo declares with the utmost conviction and sincerity, “Something happened to me yesterday—which disturbed me. All at once I found myself thinking of the world of my childhood. The forests—and the birds. It’s never happened to me before. To have images coming back. When I was a boy I could talk to the birds. When I was a boy I could talk to the birds. And they would answer me.” While Leo attempts his childhood talent for talking to the birds at Esther’s dubious recommendation in what ultimately proves to be a trap, American soldiers and their Danish comrades begin encircling the protagonist. After a soldier ties Leo to a tree, Esther declares “Those eyes. They don’t love. They don’t despise” and then personally blinds him in a brutally primitive fashion by stabbing him in each of his eyes with a sharpened branch in a literal/figurative 'eye-for-an-eye' scenario that concludes with the protagonist literally ascending to heaven during sunrise while his treacherous yet nonetheless clearly guilt-ridden beloved sobs in his car. In the end, the film is not just the paradoxically uplifting yet dispiriting story of an autistic Aryan Christ, but also the timeless (yet transcendental) tale of a woman betraying a mensch she loves because he did not make her 'feel' the right way at the right time; or, the real perennial war of the sexes.

Despite the fact that Befrielsesbilleder is, in many ways, a more aesthetically alluring and arcane cinematic work than many of his later films ranging from the Dogme 95 retard-a-thon The Idiots (1998) to his latest serial killer effort The House That Jack Built (2018), apparently the auteur had a somewhat trollish mindset when he conceived of it, or as Jack Stevenson explained, "Von Trier later claimed that many viewers fainted during the 18 June screening at the Film School, 'because', as he put it, 'I quite on purpose gave no release for the excitement which had been built up. ... I purposely increased the excitement by setting the characters in extreme situations.'" Of course, anyone that has seen the film's co-writer and cinematographer Tom Elling's own directorial efforts like Perfect World (1990) will know that he clearly had a strong aesthetic and technical influence on the overall quality of the film, yet it is still assuredly Trier-ian in its provocatively and preternaturally haunting essence. As with von Trier's greatest films, the auteur reveals his innate disdain for the Hollywood model by refraining from making insufferable moral judgments against his characters—whether it be the Nazi officer or the Danish whore who betrays him, which says a lot considering he was under the impression that he was an Israelite at the time. Of course, as a man that regards Liliana Cavani's vaguely esoteric exercise in SS sadomasochism The Night Porter (1974) as one of his favorite films, one should not expect anything less from von Trier. Naturally, despite depicting a naughty Nazi in a sympathetic light, von Trier was not trying to express any sort of pro-Hitlerite message with the film as revealed by his words, "I have not taken the side of the German officer because he is a Nazi but because he is the loser. ... I permit myself to be fascinated by that which has always fascinated people, among other things, death. War is always a good subject." Not surprisingly in our ultra-PC Zio-authoritarian times, such a rare open-minded mentality would get von Trier in deep trouble during a now-infamous press conference for his film Melancholia (2011) at the 2011 Cannes Film Festival where he joked about how he "understands" and "sympathizes" with Hitler and expressed some negative sentiments regarding Israel and the horrendous Hebraic hack Susanne Bier (After the Wedding, Bird Box). Of course, as a subversive European 'artiste' with a deep interest in politics and history, especially WWII, it is only natural that von Trier would try to understand Uncle Adolf and his undeniable influence and the auteur's early films like The Orchid Gardener, Befrielsesbilleder, and Europa cer- tainly proves that. After all, artists are oftentimes interested in politics because, not unlike art, it gives them the opportunity to create their own world, which is something that, despite his eventual failure and defeat in the end, Hitler fully achieved, hence his special interest in architects like Albert Speer and sculptors like Arno Breker.

BEFRIELESBILLEDER

Despite winning the 'Special Award' at the European Film School Festival in Munich in 1982 and receiving some positive reviews, Befrielsesbilleder was naturally met with much controversy and attacks, namely due to its unflattering depiction of the Danish resistance, or as Stevenson explained, "Liberation Day in Denmark had really been Judgment Day: passive collaborators and fence-sitters became patriots overnight – old scores were settled and accusations, true and false, were leveled. Five years of pent-up emotions boiled to the surface in a blind frenzy of anger, joy, patriotism and lust for revenge. While today public debate about the sensitive issue of the Occupation in Denmark is wide ranging, in 1982 perception of this complicated time conformed to a much more 'official' line: Germans were bad, Danes were good, and the Resistance had been heroic and widespread. Von Trier's attempts, however perhaps half-formed, to investigate the ambiguous nature of good and evil and guilt and innocence within the sensitive context of the War, was sure to offend many, particularly his elders." Undoubtedly, aside from the rare exception like the somewhat esoteric Death In June song "C'est Un Rêve," there are not many similarly fearless examples of European art comparable to von Trier's film where an artist dares to confront the cold black hypocritical heart that inspired some of the harsher actions of the 'freedom fighters.' Of course, as the film hints, not unlike Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun did before it, the outcome of WWII becomes more than a little bit dubious when it involves American negro 'liberators' taking native European women as whores and neighbors killing neighbors after the war had already ended. Also, certainly no common sense or humanity was applied when pioneering French film theorist Robert Brasillach—one of the first Western critics to seriously study great Japanese auteur filmmakers like Yasujiro Ozu and Kenji Mizoguchi—was executed for his pro-fascist journalism after Charles de Gaulle refused to grant him a pardon. After all, until the Third Reich began losing the war and yanks and Brits invaded the continent, the German occupation of fellow Germanic countries like the Netherlands and Denmark was relatively peaceful. One certainly cannot say the same of the many countries that the United States have occupied since then and Europe has hardly benefited from the Americanization of the continent as its moral and spiritual degeneration, cultural retardation, dwindling populations and perpetual invasion by hostile so-called 'refugees' from the global south clearly reveals. In that sense, it is somewhat of a surprise that a filmmaker as great, revolutionary, and relatively young as von Trier even exists today in modern-day Europe, but then again, he still seems like a childish dilettante compared to his fellow Dane and cinematic hero Carl Theodor Dreyer

(surely not coincidentally, Medea (1988), which is based on Dreyer's unused screenplay adaptation of Euripides' classic play, is among von Trier's maturest and most metaphysical works).

When the great film critic André Bazin wrote, "If there is a cinema of cruelty today, Stroheim invented it," he certainly could not have predicted von Trier or his singular talent for bringing immense poetic pulchritude to such striking cinematic cruelty as is fully apparent in Befrielsesbilleder—a film that is quite probably the auteur's most underrated cinematic effort to date in the sense that virtually no one has seen it despite the fact that it was directed by one of the most important and iconoclastic filmmakers working today. A film that begs for interpretation due to its hyper hermetic symbolism and ominously oneiric atmosphere, I cannot help but interpret it as a (probably largely unintentional) eulogy for Europa. Indeed, in a scene where a pocket watch burns in a fire while German soldiers—the last defenders of Europe against communism and other innately anti-Occidental alien forces—commit suicide in rather brutal fashions that really highlights the almost otherworldly desperation of their situation, one cannot help but be reminded that time has run out and the so-called West is dead, or, at the very least, on its last gasp. Additionally, it goes without saying that the Nuremberg trials—a craven charade that involved the torture and lynching of men like philosopher Alfred Rosenberg for writing philosophy and propagandist Julius Streicher for writing sleazy yellow press propaganda, among other patent absurdities—were, as the late great Francis Parker Yockey noted while working as a lawyer there, a fiendish farce guided by a Judaic sense of justice and, in that sense, it is only fitting that a white European woman commits brutal literal/figurative eye-for-an-eye justice against her lover in von Trier's film. As General George S. Patton—a truly honorable military man that, rather conveniently, died under beyond dubious circumstances after wisely criticizing America's nonsensical stance on the Soviet Union and support of so-called denazification processes—once wrote regarding the Nuremberg Show Trials, "I am frankly opposed to this war criminal stuff. It is not cricket and is semitic." After all, as Nietzsche once wrote, "Sin, as it is at present felt wherever Christianity prevails or has prevailed, is a Jewish feeling and a Jewish invention; and in respect to this background of all Christian morality, Christianity has in fact aimed at 'Judaizing' the whole world." In short, for better or worse, Befrielsesbilleder—a rather original film with a sometimes primeval paganistic spirit directed by a virtual novice with the flare of a master—deserves a special place in cinema history as a rare expression of a sort of 'cruel humanism' and almost transcendental pathos that dares to confront the harsh reality of the post-WWII German plight and go beyond good and evil whilst ironically flirting with Christian symbolism. Undoubtedly, von Trier would master this approach while tackling the woman question in Antichrist (2009) where feminine irrationalism and betrayal also leads to a nasty time for a dude in the forest.

BEFRIESESBILDER

-Ty E

DANCER IN THE DARK

Lars von Trier (2000)

Film director Lars von Trier was the product of a deranged childhood. Poor Lars was brought up as both a communist and nudist. Because of his "liberal" childhood, he hates the United States and makes films about his hatred of it. Dancer in the Dark is a film directed by Lars von Trier attacking evil American things such as money, the death penalty, and guns!

Lars von Trier has admitted that he is basically afraid of everything. He is afraid to visit the United States because he's afraid to fly on a plane. On his fears von Trier has stated, "Basically, I'm afraid of everything in life, except film-making." Sadly, Lars seems to even be afraid of filmmaking. As a member of the Dogme 95 collective, Lars prefers shooting films in a similar way that home videos are made. Dancer in the Dark, although not officially a Dogme 95 film, features home video style digital quality. It also features a wealth of childlike "zoom-in" and "zoom-outs" that would make the youngest child in a family feel proud.

The alien-like Björk stars in Dancer in the Dark as Czech immigrant named Selma who comes to the United States to obtain a better life. Her arrogant boss questions her about being a communist but shows her strength by acting with a certain peasant stoicism that bourgeoisie commies like Lars von Trier wish they had. Selma is close to being completely blind and wants to save her son from a similar burden. Selma seems to have a problem with daydreaming to the point of singing and dancing. She truly is a dancer in the very dark United States of the 1960s. With the peculiar facial expressions of Björk, it is no surprise that her character Selma seems to be a borderline schizophrenic.

Dancer in the Dark tackles all the type of things weakling liberal cosmopolitan college students claim to be fighting against. The film features crooked cops, fascist (and unjust) courts, guns that kill, male dominance, rural areas, and a complete lack of ever so wonderful multiculturalism. Seeing as the film takes place during the earlier half of the 1960s, so-called civil rights activists hadn't started burning down cities yet. Talk about injustice.

Dancer in the Dark, to be fair has it's moments. Björk's final song at the end of the film is about as climatic as films can get. Although the film is full of many banal moments and sometimes dubious fruitiness, Dancer in the Dark demands the attention of the viewer even if they don't want to give it. If one looks past Lars von Trier's predictable politics and sometimes half-ass filmmaking, Dancer in the Dark has it's artistic merits.

-Ty E

DOOMSDAY
DOOMSDAY

Lauren Montgomery (2007)

Neil Marshall is a name in horror that i trust. His iconic British werewolf film Dog Soldiers was all kinds of awesome. Next, The Descent, was a feminist film that i could actually tolerate and had a brilliant multi-layer ending. With Doomsday on the way, i was excited for it, no matter how bad the trailers looked. I was actually forced in submission to screen Doomsday for any print errors. I had no idea i would be in the most cinematic pain i had ever been forced to behold. The film starts off with a climax of sorts. The containment of Britain due to the "Reaper Virus." This leads to complications and the mass killing of civilians. They seal off the country with a huge China-esque Great Wall. It starts off with 28 Weeks Later, moves to Aeon Flux, goes into Escape from New York, switches to The Road Warrior, then mixes with Gladiator or First Knight. Doomsday is a complete piece of trash. The only thing i can really admire about the film is the make-up and costumes of the neo-punk mutants. The acting on their part was equally admired but had too much screaming. Class Of Nuke'Em High did it better. It got all too bland, all too quickly. Marshall thought it would be surprising to mix a Medieval setting in the mix; a clashing of era's. This only digs the hole deeper.

These dystopian films that have been churning out lately are some sort of propagandist subliminal message. Films like I Am Legend, Independence Day, 28 Days and Weeks, and Cloverfield all lend a hand in delivering this end-of-the-world feel that has been terrifying the weak-willed as this supposed biblical date looms closer. The crew sent on the mission to find the cure is among the stupidest band of hooligans save for Dog Soldiers "Spoon." It had it's own brand of racism to make such an idiotic token black character. Of course, to compliment the on-screen atrocities, Marshall felt the need to incorporate characters who are just plain invincible. People who get shot and beaten but will not die. Cars that auto-heal all broken glass and can fly through a bus unscathed. The beginning was annoyingly set-up and the family drama shit could have been left alone. The ending was completely oblivious to the whole film and just defeated every purpose this rag-tag clan of pussies fought for. Bob Hoskins wasn't Mario, and the all of a sudden stunt driving was so out of place for a woman who grew up in a confined area where there is a strict curfew. How can i respect a film that has Bob Hoskins not as Mario? Action is not a ridiculous genre. It does not call for these blasphemous scenes that challenge the viewers intelligence. Doomsday is devoid of any artistic merit, atmosphere, or any original concept. I feel bad for anyone who watches this post-apocalyptic over-produced piece of shit.

-Maq

THE DRAGON LIVES AGAIN

Law Kei (1977)

In many religious tomes, the devil has been exemplified as a being of red. A coarse demon with a serpent's tongue and wings. Well, ...Bruce Leong made sure to change that as he starred in a "Brucesploitation" film that depicts the prince of darkness as an aging Jap wearing a lamp shade on his head who might suffer a heart attack if he has crazy active sex. The Brucesploitation film to end all others, The Dragon Lives Again takes the afterlife philosophy to the next step by adding a rule that once you die, you no longer appear the same. With this in consideration, this allows the film to have Bruce Lee and Popeye the Sailor fight the Exorcist, the Godfather, Clint Eastwood, Zatoichi, Emmanuelle, Dracula, and of course James Bond. In this rabid free-for-all, we have the most absurd ideas put to test on film and the result is gut-busting. I can't imagine a dubbing so perfect for the ridiculous mood. If I had to use one word to describe this film, It would border the term of being insane. Nothing is against the rules in this cash in to a death that was foreseen due to a curse on the Lee family. Watch as a royal guard uses an abacus to count the Devil King's heart rate as he has sex only to switch to a digital calculator after the sex gets crazier and more rough.

I was taken aback once I saw the action scenes. For a film of low virtue such as itself, the action scenes were impeccable and stand to me what the classics once did. The sound effects were painstakingly raw and reminiscent to the wonderful works of Wu-Tang and co. Each fight scene (Oh and there any numerous) features a "signature move" from the departed as he "Fist of Fury's" his way out of a tight spot.

The Dragon Lives Again is a callous attempt at cashing in at a stars death. but for these reasons, It remains one of the greatest accidental spoofs ever committed to film. There is no way in hell I couldn't recommend this film anymore. It is worth every dollar and I promise you, you will laugh. Mark my words.

-mAQ

THE FIRE WITHIN
THE FIRE WITHIN

Leanne Whitney (2002)

In certain contexts, I have a certain amount of respect for people that decide take the most irreparable of actions by committing suicide, as it demonstrates the power of man's singular consciousness, sense of autonomy, and will power, hence why certain groups of lower intelligences (i.e. black women) are much less likely to do it despite their sorry lots in life while some of the most intelligent and creative individuals in human history have. Indeed, how many times have you heard of a welfare negress or a starving African committing suicide?! In fact, despite all the starving Negroes and third world Asians in the world, virtually all of the countries with the highest suicide rates are white or East Asian. Of course, different people commit self-slaughter for different reasons. While people like to make the libelous claim that many Nazi leaders and their followers committed suicide because they feared revenge from the Allied powers, it probably had more to do with the fact that the utopia they knew and grew accustomed to had been totally destroyed and thus they had no reason to go on living, but people in the contemporary Occident would not understand this because they believe in nothing. Naturally, most people commit suicide because, for whatever reason, they cannot bear to keep on living. Maybe it is because a family friend unexpectedly committed the act not too long ago or because I have recently watched a number of cinematic works surrounding the theme, but I have noticed some of the most potent films that I have ever seen are suicide-themed pieces, even though you know what is going to happen at the end. Indeed, it is nearly impossible for me to empathize with men that chop their cocks off and pretend to be women but In a Year with 13 Moons (1978) is arguably Fassbinder's greatest and most original work. Additionally, underrated Dutch auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst, whose first feature Paranoia (1967) concludes with the antihero jumping out of a window and who committed self-slaughter himself by drowning himself in the Scheldt river, concluded his singular and largely overlooked career with his magnum opus De witte waan (1984) aka White Madness which ends in a bittersweet fashion with a rather romantic mother-son suicide pact. Despite his reputation as a master of micro-budget celluloid necrophilia, Aryan artsploitation Jörg Buttgerit was surely at his most creative and seemingly personal with Der Todesking (1990), which features a brutal suicide (and/or murder) for each day of the week. As someone who has never found French filmmaker Louis Malle (Lacombe Lucien, My Dinner with Andre) to be a particularly intriguing director as a man who, not unlike like his kraut pal and protégé Volker Schlöndorff, mostly directed literary adaptations that reflected his safe and banal bourgeois background, I was quite surprised to discover that he directed a particularly potent work on the subject of suicide that I would argue is the greatest film the man ever assembled. Indeed, Le feu follet (1963) aka The Fire Within aka Will O' the Wisp aka A

Time to Live and a Time to Die—a work adapted from French dandy turned literary fascist Pierre Drieu La Rochelle’s 1931 novel of the same French name (known as Will O’ the Wisp in English) that was inspired by the 1929 suicide of the writer’s opium-addled surrealist poet friend Jacques Rigaut—depicts the last 24 hours or so of a recovering alcoholic writer who has decided to kill himself and spends the next day reuniting with disconnected friends of various stripes who ultimately reaffirm his seemingly unshakeable will to self-slaughter.

Like many high-profile self-loathing bourgeois left-wingers, Malle was born into a wealthy family and seemed to resent that fact despite the fact that his opulent background helped to jumpstart his filmmaking career. Before he was even 30 years old, the filmmaker had already directed a number of successful films, especially Les Amants (1958) aka The Lovers starring Jeanne Moreau in a role that would make her an international star, yet he was apparently hating life at the time and wanted to direct a more personalized ‘auteur’ work that reflected his own mind and worldview which he ultimately found upon being lent a copy of Drieu’s novel Le feu follet, which the filmmaker had actually previously read in his youth. Much like how Fassbinder became obsessed with the character of ex-convict Franz Biberkopf of Alfred Döblin’s Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929) which he adapted into his 1980 15½ hour magnum opus of the same name, Malle found himself thoroughly identifying with the protagonist Alain Leroy of Drieu’s novel. In fact, also like Fassbinder with his work, Malle found himself tormenting the lead actor of his film adaptation, Maurice Ronet (who previously starred in Malle’s Ascenseur pour l’échafaud (1958) aka Elevator to the Gallows), out of jealousy because he felt such a personal identification with the protagonist and even wanted to play the role himself (though, as Malle eventually realized, he did not have the acting talent). As Malle would reveal in a September 1994 interview with journalist Angelika Wittlich for German television a little over a year before he died, he was not necessarily suicidal like the character of his film but could relate to his dismay with life, incapacity to love, and personal crisis in regard to not wanting to confront adulthood, stating of the work that: “It was very simply a way to exorcise my desire to commit suicide.” Updating the story from the late-1920s to the early-1960s and changing the protagonist’s drug of choice from opium to alcohol, The Fire Within is a darkly touching and unrepentant “nocturnal poem” (this is how Malle once described the film) that is much more empathetic to its perturbed protagonist than Drieu’s source novel as a work that penetrates the viewer’s heart in a fiercely unflinching fashion comparable to when lead character finally decides to end it all by unloading a bullet in his chest with a German Luger.

Washed-up French writer Alain Leroy (Maurice Ronet) is such a hopeless alcoholic that his estranged American wife Dorothy, who never appears in the film (aside from in photo form), had to pay for him to stay at an expensive Versailles clinic where he could undergo alcohol detoxification in relative comfort. In fact,

THE FIRE WITHIN

Alain is so fed up with life that, despite being 'cured' of alcohol addiction and reaching equilibrium in terms of his physical health, he does not want to leave the clinic as it allows him escape from the pain and responsibility of real-life and being a man. Indeed, Alain is more or less a lost and morbidly depressed man-child who is afraid of becoming an adult and leading a normal life. Despite being a born lady's man, Alain is an exceedingly emasculated fellow who has spent his entire life living off woman, who he seems to inspire an almost instinctive maternal nurturing quality in due to his innate helplessness, as if he is a cute little puppy dog that has been abandoned. While Alain has no problem attracting women, he has a complete and utter incapacity to love or be loved, thus all his romances always end in abject failure, thus reinforcing his undying sense of loneliness and instability. As for his parents, Alain simply describes them as being "very old" and even depresses an old woman at clinic when she asks about them and he less than emotionally responds, "I don't see them anymore." The Fire Within begins with Alain lying in bed with his old friend/ex-lover Lydia (Léna Skerla) after having what seems to be banal and passionless coitus. Indeed, while Alain is a sort of dapperly dressed Don Juan who can pretty much charm any woman, his seductive persona, like his clothing, is merely a strategically placed mask that disguises a self-admitted poor lover, or as he later states in the film, "I'm awkward, inept. The sensitivity was in my heart, not my hands." While Lydia begs, "Let me see you smile," Alain is incapable of even giving her so much as a contrived smirk. Lydia wants to marry Alain and tells him that his yank wife is no good because "You need a woman who won't let you out of her sight," but as he tells her before saying goodbye to her for the last time regarding the futility of marriage, "You'd be unhappy...Another Dorothy. Anyway, you can't help me. It's too late." Indeed, it is too late because Alain has a date with a bullet that will penetrate his heart like no woman ever could. Of course, also unlike with women, Alain's affair with the lead love letter will last forever, thereupon offering him the sense of permanence that he has always been seeking but could never find.

Alain has turned his room at the clinic into a morbid hermetic fantasy realm that more resembles the unrefined habitat of a rebellious child than that of a grown man. Aside from photographs, toys, and odd trinkets, Alain has adorned his room with newspaper clippings about death, including a 5-year-old boy that accidentally hanged himself with a curtain cord while attempting to fly. When Alain's personal doctor Dr. La Barbinais (Jean-Paul Moulinot) comes into his room under the pretense of playing chess to tell him he is 'cured' and that he should prepare to move out and move on with his life, he reacts by acting like a drama queen and proclaims that, despite being sober, he still suffers from "a single feeling of constant anxiety" that makes living a normal life impossible for him. The doctor gives Alain various recommendations as to what he can do with his life, including opening a store, but he disregards them all and complains of being ridden with debt. Before leaving his room, Dr. La Barbinais says “Life is good” and Alain cynically replies, “good for what, Doctor?” and says to himself “tomorrow” in regard to his intention to kill himself the next day. Before going to sleep, Alain tells himself that he is going to commit suicide. Against his doctor’s orders, Alain heads to decadent Paris—the city that devoured his soul—the next day after hitching a ride from two sloppy proles who assume he is a rich man due to how he dresses. Upon arriving in Paris, Alain cashes two large checks that have been given to him by Lydia and his wife Dorothy, but being off the booze, he does not have much to spend it on.

The first person Alain reunites with in Paris is, somewhat ironically, his old bartender friend Charlie (René Dupuy), who is shocked when his favorite alcoholic turns down a free drink. At the bar, Alain becomes rather dejected when he bumps into a young man named Michel ‘Milou’ Boistel (Bernard Tiphaine) who reminds him of his younger self, as he cannot live with the fact that he mispent his entire life on beers and boobs and has nothing of intrinsic value to show for it. Next, Alain stops by the apartment of his old pal Dubourg (Bernard Noël) who is now a bourgeois family man and academic of Egyptology who is quite comfortable with his new life as a father, scholar, and respectable tax-paying and law-abiding French citizen. Alain tries to mock Dubourg by sarcastically asking him “playing daddy now?,” but he sees it as no laughing matter. When Alain tells of his intention to end his life, Dubourg attempts in vain to talk him out of it by stating, “Life still has things to offer. You must have a sense of your life. That sense can’t perish,” but it is no hope. Needless to say, Dubourg’s words are lost on Alain when he proudly remarks, “Don’t judge by appearances. You see me as a resigned bourgeois...But my life’s more intense now than when I drank and slept around.” As Alain tells Dubourg, “It’s hard to be a man. You have to want it,” as the last thing he wants to be is a man as that would require him to take responsibility for his life. Before parting ways with Dubourg, Alain confides in him, “I wanted you to help me die. That’s all,” but his friend still tries to talk him out of it by offering him the opportunity to stay at his flat where he and his family lives an “ordered life.” Of course, Alain is deathly allergic to order of any sort.

Alain seems to have the most in common with his painter friend Eva (Jeanne Moreau) as she is similarly miserable and pessimistic, calling his wife Dorothy an “American witch” and Dubourg “deadbeat Dubourg,” but he cannot tolerate hanging out with her for long as she lives with an art collective of pathetically pretentious and zombified dope fiends who make fun of him for going to rehab. Repulsed by their lifeless inebriated stupors, Alain remarks to the thoroughly narcotized art fags, “Drugs are life. Boring, like life” and sarcastically adds, “some addicts live until 70.” Alain is especially repulsed by an effete hook-nosed poet named Urcel (Alain Mottet) who describes him as a jealous failure when he leaves, but Eva rebukes him and states, "He's a very sweet guy and deeply unhappy...and I should have let him go." Surely out of all the women that Alain interacts with during the film, Eva seems like the only one that understands him and may have been able to save him, but she lacks the strength to take action. Alain also decides it is not much fun hanging out with his pals François (François Gragnon) and Jérôme Minville (Romain Bouteille) because they are self-professed "stubborn" members of the dissident far-right paramilitary organization OAS (aka "Organisation de l'armée secrète") who keep getting thrown in prison for fighting against Algerian independence. While sitting outside of a café while all by his lonesome, Alain decides to break his sobriety by drinking a glass of wine and naturally gets rather sick as a result. While Alain is walking around sick in a restaurant, an old queen states to another fag about him, "See that face? Alcohol. He's done for. A shame. He was good-looking. Richard was in love with him." Indeed, you have certainly hit a low point in life when you have a couple of snide little faggots gossiping about your decline right in front of your face.

THE FIRE WITHIN

Ultimately, Alain decides to sleep off his alcohol-induced sickness in the lavish home of his opulent old flame Solange (played by Canadian actress Alexandra Stewart, who director Malle later had a daughter with) and her wealthy cuckold of a husband Cyrille Lavaud (Jacques Sereys) where he makes a huge ass of himself after a fancy dinner that his arch-enemy Brancion (Tony Taffin) attends. Like at a lunch he attends at the beginning film with his co-patients at the clinic, Alain seems completely detached at the dinner and barely even reacts when he is directly spoken to. When Cyrille makes the mistake of giving Alain drinks after the dinner, the protagonist gets so erratically drunk that he smashes a glass, cuts his hand, and embarrasses himself in front of all his friends and enemies, especially Solange, who he begins groveling in front, stating things like, "You're life itself. Yes, life." While Solange clearly cares for Alain, she is a married woman with a stinking wealthy hubby and must reject her ex-lover's drunken romantic advances. After deciding he has suffered "enough humiliation," Alain leaves the party and, unbeknownst to them, says goodbye to his friends forever. Before going back to the clinic, Alain gives some quasi-fatherly advice to the young man Milou who reminds of his younger self while the two get drunk and discuss the enigma of the opposite sex. As Alain remarked to his friend Dubourg earlier in the film regarding women, "I have no power over them. I was handsome at 20. They still find me fun and nice. But it's not enough. I have no hold on them. And yet, it's only through women that I've felt some hold on life" and it certainly seems that young playboy Milou will be resigned to a similarly lonely fate, though he does not seem to realize it yet. After waking up in his room at the clinic with a champagne bottle in his bed the next morning, Alain takes a couple more chugs of alcohol, pays a maid money to not visit his room for the next couple hours, locks his door, packs all his photos and money into a suitcase, shaves his face, has a small chat with Solange on the phone where he lies about agreeing to meet her and her friends for lunch (he gets jealous when she calls his enemy Brancion a “force of nature”), finishes reads F. Scott Fitzgerald’s The Great Gatsby, and shoot himself in the heart with a Luger. As for his suicide note, Alain writes: “I’m killing myself because you didn’t love me, because I didn’t love you. Because our ties were loose, I’m killing myself to tighten them. I leave you with an indelible stain.”

As Dutch auteur Adriaan Dittvoorst once wrote, “Pasolini said suicide was the only freedom given to man” and in The Fire Within, the protagonist demonstrates this ‘god given’ freedom in a most perturbingly potent and morbidly fitting way to officially conclude an already aborted life. As Pasolini also wrote, “Death does determine life” and “Once life is finished it acquires a sense; up to that point it has not got a sense; its sense is suspended and therefore ambiguous.” Indeed, not until protagonist Alain Leroy actually kills himself does his degenerate life of aimless dipsomania and depression derive any meaning, as he, like so many drug addicts and alcoholics, was someone who had already long given up on life and his profession and no longer believed any of the will-o’-the-wisps he built up for himself, thus taking the only rational course of action for someone in his beyond forlorn situation of no return. Although none of Alain’s writings are ever revealed during the film aside from his short but sweet and brazenly biting suicide letter, one can almost certainly guarantee without reading them that his self-slaughter only added to their meaning and literary prowess just as Austrian Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger’s suicide was more or less the natural course of action to take after penning his ideas on Jews, gender, and even suicide in his magnum opus Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character. More importantly, Alain realized he would never be able to truly love or be loved, hence his state of perennial loneliness despite the fact that so many beautiful women adored and even financially supported him, as a sort of tragic frog Don Juan. Although The Fire Within can certainly be described as a dark and gloomy work, Alain’s exceedingly pessimistic weltanschauung and eventual suicide will probably only scare or disturb those that can relate to his personality and predicament in life, but then again, people that far gone are more typically afraid of life than death, hence why they commit self-slaughter in the first place. Auteur Louis Malle could certainly relate to the character, confessing: “It was such a personal film...that I thought, ‘If possible, I’d be glad if it were never released.’ I made it for myself. I might show it to some friends, but I really didn’t want it to be released. I thought it was such a personal film. It’s not entertainment. It’s the first film I made that is in no way ‘entertainment.’” Maybe if Malle was not so afraid of making personal films, he would have become a much better director and had created other works of a similar artistic integrity to The Fire Within, but aside from a couple exceptions like his somewhat anomalous dystopian work Black Moon (1975), he mostly went back to directing ‘safe’ entertainment and literary adaptations, hence why he was later able to have a fairly successful career working in Hollywood during the last two decades or so of his life.

THE FIRE WITHIN

Featuring a lead actor that seemed to be born to play the part in what would ultimately be the greatest performance of his life and a striking use of French self-described 'gymnopaedist' Erik Satie's classic minimalistic composition Gymnopédies that immaculately accentuates the perturbed protagonist's lingering state of impenetrable melancholia, The Fire Within is one of those oh-so rare films that seems perfect in its entirety, which is certainly not something that can be said of most of Malle's other largely pansy ass works. It should certainly be noted that Malle was not just obsessed with the source novel Le feu follet, but also the real-life poet that inspired the story, as well as the man that wrote it. Indeed, if one watches the 1994 German television interview with journalist Angelika Wittlich featured on the Criterion Collection release of The Fire Within, Malle describes his longstanding fascination with Pierre Drieu La Rochelle who, despite being his political opposite as a fascist and Vichy collaborator, intrigued the filmmaker due to his lifelong obsession with suicide. Of course, unlike the character of Malle's film, Drieu did not commit suicide until he was 52 while in hiding after the 'liberation of Paris' in 1944 (Malle had to go to Drieu's friend, novelist and Gaullist resistance fighter turned French Minister for Cultural Affairs André Malraux, who protected his fascist writer friend before he committed suicide, to get the rights to the novel). Interestingly, Malle's colleague François Truffaut (who was half Jewish, though he did not find out this until later in his life) stated regarding the political beliefs of Drieu and his compatriot Robert Brasillach (who was actually executed for 'thought crimes' as a collaborationist) that, "views that earn their advocates the death penalty are bound to be worthy of esteem." Despite Malle's left-wing idealism (as especially epitomized by the characters of the Minville brothers), somehow I suspect that Drieu would have more appreciated The Fire Within than anything that Truffaut ever directed. Notably, Drieu's novel was somewhat recently adapted by Norwegian auteur Joachim Trier (a distant relative of Lars von Trier) under the title Oslo, 31. august (2011) aka Oslo, August 31st and though it is an excellent modernist reworking that works quite well in its somber Nordic setting, it is not quite as good as The Fire Within and I say that as someone who prefers Germanic languages over French and who has always thought of Malle as a sort of obscenely overrated arthouse hack.

-Ty E

STORY OF A JUNKIE

Lech Kowalski (1985)

“It’s like a good love affair...It’s nice when it starts...then it becomes fucked” or so says North American Aryan junky punk skate rat “Gringo” (John Spaceley) regarding his wild and wayward relationship with heroin in the pseudo-documentary drama Story of a Junkie (1987) aka Gringo directed by Polish-American documentarian auteur Lech Kowalski (Hey! Is Dee Dee Home?, On Hitler’s Highway). Featuring real-life heroin addicts really shooting up in 1980s East Village NYC, Story of a Junkie is more of a candid documentary than a drama/docudrama in its wretched and raunchy rawness as a portrait of a drug-addled ‘anti-hero’ who was born to lose, even if he knows how to score a couple bags of smack each day so as to appease his haunted soul. A bleach blond dope fiend sporting an iconic eye patch, Gringo is a scavenging and sidewalk-surfing opium-pirate who is just looking to find another fix so as to temporarily dissolve his pain while carelessly cruising the superlatively seedy streets of New York City. Opening with newspaper headlines of various white-collar figures who got busted or overdosed on heroin and/or cocaine, Story of a Junkie briefly highlights these high-profile individuals’ influence on society as a whole and the countless unknown addicts they have helped spawn. Story of a Junkie does not feature the fag fantasy opium den of trust fund junkie William S. Burroughs’ novels nor the phantasmagorical dream realms of French poet/filmmaker Jean Cocteau, but a matter-of-fact depiction of the physical and moral degeneration that is heated and hellish H addiction. Featuring authentic footage of jaded junkies shooting up, dubious drug dealers sharing their insights on the tricks of the trade, and the overall sterile yet ‘unconventional’ loser life that is opium addiction where no scam is too small and where no form of self-degradation is too devastating for one to get their next hit, Gringo sums up the diamorphine maniac life as follows, “heroin is a cruel mistress...a brutal overseer, man...it wakes you up early in the morning and takes you and makes you do things you would never do...and, uh, you just don’t have time to worry about other things, things that you maybe should be worrying about...facing reality sometimes is a hard thing to do.” A sad and sarcastic slave of the dealers (who are many times slaves of their own addictions), Gringo must show off his many track marks to prove his genuine ‘junk status,’ which he is rewarded with a bag of dope and the super sound piece of advice, “don’t OD now” by an outstanding businessmen. Psychopathic semites and a couple amphetamine-addled Anglos may run Wall Street, but in junkie-land nefarious Negroes and hopped-up Hispanic homeboys run the seemingly derelict drug trade, thus making “Gringo” (a named bestowed upon him by his curious and oftentimes callous colored friends) – a man who has no problem sporting a Benito Mussolini t-shirt – a special target in Story of a Junkie; a severely sordid cinematic tale about the trials and tribulations of selling one's soul for a temporary fix.

STORY OF A JUNKIE

Lone junkie punk ranger Gringo (Spaceley) has come a long way since his more youthful years as a momma's boy and a teenage hippie degenerate. A self-described "anarchist" who has "never filed income tax," Gringo is a fierce fuck-up without a cause except heroin. Gringo may be all about the three terribly tempting counter-culture sins of sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll, but heroin is indubitably his one true love, albeit an exceedingly erratic one that oftentimes forces the junky punk to beg for money from his mom, stalk the streets for naive individuals who he can hustle a couple bucks from, and fight with fellow dope fiends. Shooting up and fucking up make for one ominous and overwhelming odyssey where death is around every corner and every friend is a potential – both literal and figurative – backstabber. Dope sick sex is the nearest thing to romance for a junky in love, but as Gringo the Great discovered, being horny on heroin can eventually result in bloody miscarriages and mini postmortem fetuses, but luckily he does not live too far from a dumpster so as to dispose of such unwanted progeny. Gringo may not have a job, but he still wears a uniform of post-adolescent punk rock conformity. When jaded on junk, gainful employment is not an option because looking for a new fix is a career in itself that comes with its own benefit package, including (but surely not limited to) STDs, track marks, liver damage, a short life expectancy, vagrancy, prostitution, quasi-narcolepsy and a complete heroin chic physical makeover. When not getting his skateboard stolen by small and ancient teddy-bear-like negroes, Gringo is hanging out with a junky chick that looks and sounds like "Buffalo Bill" from The Silence of the Lambs (1991) who has a funny fetish for hoarding peculiar packs of pets, including rabbits, rats, mice, and tarantulas. As Gringo explains throughout Story of a Junkie, his lethally lecherous lifestyle consists of one bloody beat down after another, including a blinding incident with an anally retentive drag queen who brought deleterious destruction to the junkie's eye, hence his trademark eye-patch. Gringo may be a pathetic fighter and an impotent lover, but he has the strut of an elderly jigaboo on crack as a crazy character with the sort of unconventional charisma that can only come from a contrived chemical high. As depicted quite soothingly and scenically at the conclusion of Story of a Junkie, especially in comparison to the rest of the film, when it really comes down to it, Gringo truly lived by an ethos of "skate or die." Unfortunately, like most of the real-life junkies featured in Story of a Junkie, John Spaceley ultimately perished doing what he did best.

John Spaceley was far from a seasoned street fighter, even if he was battle-scarred and spent a good portion of his life in the gutter, but, at the very least, he could kick the shit out of fellow NYC junkie Johnny Thunders – rocker of the New York Dolls and The Heartbreakers – as depicted in Story of a Junkie director Lech Kowalski's subsequent documentary Born To Lose: The Last Rock and Roll Movie (1999). The documentary also features Spaceley, who no longer has his bleached blond hair, dying in a hospital bed in 1992 from AIDS that he contracted via junkie business. Apparently, as mentioned by Story of a Junkie producer Ann S. Barish, Spaceley got clean for a number of years (even rejecting caffeine and wine), got an acting agent, and even attempted a career in acting, including an uncredited (but quite memorable) cameo appearance in Martin Scorsese's After Hours (1985) and as a Chelsea hotel resident in Alex Cox's Sid and Nancy (1987), but would inevitably get back on the junk as a 'true' gutter punk. As starkly and unsentimentally depicted in Story of a Junkie, director Lech Kowalski is not some sort of moralist, even once stating in an interview, "I think that it's good to try and destroy yourself because that's what life is all about...trying to destroy yourself to find out who the real person is." Judging by Kowalski's philosophy, John Spaceley was a self-destructive fellow who was totally incapable of living anything resembling a normal life as a man who could only find solace in skateboarding and heroin. Needless to say, the latter killed him, but at least he left Story of a Junkie as his legacy of lechery as a decidedly daunting document infinitely more potent than any D.A.R.E program or miserably melodramatic after-school special in its less than glamorous portrayal of a dumpster-diving drug addict's non-life. Forget opium romanticizing big-budget cinematic works like Trainspotting (1996) and Requiem for a Dream (2000), Story of a Junkie – a work distributed (but not produced) by Troma of all film companies – is the real junky deal; a disgusting, degenerate, despoiling, and devastating gritty celluloid affair.

-Ty E

ON HITLER'S HIGHWAY
ON HITLER'S HIGHWAY

Lech Kowalski (2002)

I typically derive an ample amount of ardor and pleasurable self-indulgence from road trip flicks, especially those featuring anxiety-driven murders like Pasquale Festa Campanile's Hitch-Hike (1977), Robert Harmon's The Hitcher (1986), and Victor Salva's The Nature of the Beast (1985), but that was before I saw punk documentarian Lech Kowalski's video diary On Hitler's Highway (2002), an entry in the Polish-American filmmaker's 'The Fabulous Art of Surviving' documentary trilogy. As an auteur best known for capturing the erratically spiraling lives of sub-rock-stars and their compulsive soul-destroying addictions in films like D.O.A. (1980) and Born To Lose: The Last Rock and Roll Movie (1999), I expected a certain gritty realism to Kowalski's On Hitler's Highway, but little did I know the documentary would be a dauntless modern day testimony to apocalyptic philosopher Oswald Spengler's foreboding prophecies. Being a son of Poland himself, On Hitler's Highway is ultimately a highly personal documentary for Kowalski as expressed by his oversensitive, if strangely laid back, approach to the documentary and its unspectacular yet tragic subjects. In the film, Kowalski somewhat aimlessly (but quite auspiciously in terms of material) cruises Poland's oldest highway; a road constructed under the orders of Adolf Hitler himself, where, apparently, under the asphalt (according to local folklore) lie the bodies of many Polish slave workers who had fallen building it. The highway was built in a historically relevant area of Poland where Napoleon invaded Russia, Muslims invaded Europe and attempted to convert Europeans to Islam via bloodthirsty Jihad, and what was once an eastward extension of the Third Reich, yet one would not expect such a grand history while viewing Kowalski's personal journey through this most Western Slavic nation. On his humble and mostly humorless journey, Kowalski encounters aesthetically-displeasing Muslim prostitutes, jubilant ghetto-dwelling gypsies, and poor indigenous Poles who dream of Uncle Adolf's revengeful return and Poland's complete destruction so as to forever relieve their daily pain. As far as video ethnographies go, On Hitler's Highway is a tolerably amateurish pseudo-anthropological work, but it is also an authentically humanistic piece that surely drives home the collective hopelessness of the post-communist Polish plight like never before.

Apparently, in Poland, teens and young adults care a whole lot more about trendy discos, partying in abandoned underground bunkers, and playing jokes at the expense of elders than the ill-famed domestic history of Auschwitz concentration camp, as expressed by various youth in On Hitler's Highway. Naturally, the Turkish, Bulgarian, and Polish prostitutes featured in the documentary care more about how many customers will give them the old 'in-and-out' than Hitler's infamous legacy. The only truly holocaust-obsessed individual featured in On Hitler's Highway is a disgruntled and scornful elderly survivor with a refined disfaſte for sauerkraut who righteouſly claims that concentration camp victims were, “ſuffocated, NOT GASSED.” Considering that moſt of the individuals featured in the documentary have a hard time providing food for their children, let alone themſelves, the Holocaust is of little, if any, relevance to their lives. In fact, it becomes quite apparent in On Hitler’s Highway that, ironically, Uncle Dolph’s vintage superhighway is one of the very few things theſe Poles have to look forward to and be proud of as many of theſe individuals, who live in an indefinite ſtate of ſtark ſqualor, call rapidly dilapidating ghettos their damned homes. Without big H’s freeway, many of theſe individuals would have no place to peddle their middle-finger flaunting lawn gnomes, nor their long expired and thoroughly abused fleſh as theſe unoffical and unſtable trades provide them with their only means for an income and a ‘livelihood.’ Needless to ſay, it ſeems the Polish populouſ of On Hitler’s Highway has yet to recover from about a half a century of communiſt repression and emotional debaſement, thus Hitler’s partial dismantling of Poland is nothing ſhort of irrelevant to theſe thoroughly disenfranchiſed folk. As ſomeone who perſonally lives in an area flooded with young, ex-communiſt Slavic ‘ſtudents’ and ‘queſt workers’, I can perſonally vouch for the complete and utter deſperation of theſe leſs than bleſſed individuals. Many of theſe Slavs uncomplainingly accept being illegally underpaid (as they are alſo illegally employed) and taken advantage of juſt ſo they can continuously ſtay and marginally proſper in the United States. The ſaddeſt part is that aſide from paying for the neceſſities of food and board, many of theſe Slavic immigrants blow their ſlavishly earned caſh on trendy American consumer products like iPhones and Michael Jackson cds, and have no qualms about abandoning their ancient identities. I remember one particularly comical incident when a young Russian man (who fit the ideal National Socialist physique of being tall, muscular, blond, and having blue eyes) matter-of-factly proclaimed to me that Michael Jackson was the King of Pop as if I was totally ignorant of ſuch a popular American ſentiment. Compared to the men and women featured in On Hitler’s Highway, the young Slavs I know – who are apparently comprised of the ‘cream of crop’ (e.g. ſons and daughters of businessmen and military leaders) from their proſpective nations – live like virtual prince and princesses in the United States.

Forget about irreſponsible junky AIDS victim Gringo from Kowalski’s infamous Troma-diſtributed work Story of a Junkie (1987), the real-life caſt of On Hitler’s Highway is infinitely more forſaken and forlorn as their circumſtances are mainly the reſult of an unfortunate birthright and not of their own making. In fact, many of the nearly ſtarving and ſomewhat emaciated individuals featured in the documentary are eaſtern immigrants who moved to Poland in the hope of making a better life for their families and themſelves, but ſuch crucial ambitions ſeem to have acquired nil reſults for theſe cursed loſt ſouls. On Hitler’s Highway is the ſort of film that ſhould be ſcreened at various American univerſities as it deſtroys the totally mythical illuſions of collective ‘white privilege’ and other wretched liberal abstractions assembled by sneering ethnomasochistic members of the truly privileged white bourgeois, as the poorest of American Negroes live in less dire and much plusher, warmer, and most importantly, more stylin' living conditions than most of the individuals featured in the documentary. On Hitler's Highway is anything but a pleasurable cinematic affair, but to say it is a work without cultural nor socio-political merit would be gross neglect. Both aesthetically and thematically repellent, On Hitler's Highway is an undeniably potent work with a humbling power that does not rely on petty and contrived sentimentalism like a typical Hollywood production, but upon the mere words and images of uncharismatic and impoverished individuals whose most imperative concerns are finding clean enough water to drink and enough food to eat just so they can survive another day. Indeed, On Hitler's Highway is a fine testament to the fabulous art of surviving, but you will probably want to take a shower in bleach and watch a totally fantasy driven work like Tim Burton's Pee-wee's Big Adventure (1985) in an attempt to clean away the 'metaphysical grime' that this eerie and aweless testimony of human tribulation permeates. Still, whether intentional or not (and it is not), On Hitler's Highway does have its moments of genuine humorous human absurdity as few screenwriters could dream up a real-life scene of illegally squatting Ukrainian homeless men serving tea to seemingly unscrupulous Polish cops at a deserted Nuclear airbase. On Hitler's Highway is the sort of film fellow eccentric realist filmmaker Werner Herzog would have made during his more zealous youth as it is a totally selfless work that could have only been made by an individual without an inkling of monetary gain nor critical acclaim in mind. On Hitler's Highway may feature one of the most dismal virtual road trips that one will have the grand displeasure of taking, but you will positively never forgotten it.

ON HITLER'S HIGHWAY

-Ty E

PRECIOUS

Lee Daniels° (2009)

If the decidedly grim Brothers Grimm were born in post civil rights/third world population explosion-America and had lived and written their characteristically macabre stories today, the resulting works may have bore a striking, equally discomfiting resemblance to Precious: Based on the Novel "Push" by Sapphire aka Precious (2009), a less than supernatural but far bleaker modern ghetto fairy tale that even the imaginative Grimm brothers couldn't conjure up. Directed by thoroughly self-obsessed black queer Lee Daniels, and based on the original, largely autobiographical novel "Push" by aberrosexual negress Ramona Lofton using the Afro-typically ostentatious moniker, "Sapphire", Precious is a starkly realistic, and at times horrifying slice of life work about the turbulent and thoroughly disturbing adolescent years of a morbidly obese, fried chicken lovin,' 16 year old mother of two, that delivers to the audience not only a brutally candid depiction of "traditional" (post-1960s) inner city American Negro life in 1987 (which remains unquestionably about the same, if not worse, today), but also renders a scathing, inadvertently incriminating portrayal of black culture, indeed reminiscent of similarly crafted "victim" genre films which seek to elicit pity and compel empathy from the viewer but ultimately serve to only further alienate and disgust the audience (in much the same way that certain films by queer auteur Rosa von Praunheim, specifically It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society In Which He lives (1971), sought the same sort of effect in offering a sympathetic, yet ultimately ruinous representation of hot-blooded homos). Indeed, with its rampantly chilling depictions of keepin' it in the family incest (namely father-on-daughter rape resulting in pregnancy and daughter-on-mother assisted masturbation), flagrant welfare abuse, sickening scenes of family violence, fried chicken thievery and grotesque gorging of soul-sucking soul food (attention all ebony expansion porn/feeder enthusiasts—this is the film for you!), and a general sense of hopelessness that might render anyone suicidal, not least of all the racially-conscious white viewers largely funding debauched lifestyles like those depicted in the film only on a much grander scale, Precious, while classified as a drama, is wholly deserving of a slot in the top ten horror flicks of the last decade.

Sixteen-year old Claireece "Precious" Jones (played by Gabourey "Gabby" Sidibe, of half-Senegalese extraction, who resembles a rather less malnourished rendition of the prehistoric hominids one might expect to see at the politically correct Man's Ancient Ancestors exhibit at the Smithsonian) is decidedly down on her luck. A seemingly resigned and unusually docile, yet typically plump ebony lady growing up on the mean streets of Harlem in 1987, long after the "renaissance" ended, and pregnant with her second child—the father of which is, quite shockingly, her very own father who repeatedly rapes her as graphically depicted in the film—(her first little one, a chromosomally-aberrant toddler lovingly dubbed “Mongo,” was also conceived via Precious’ own daddy, is currently being raised by its great-grandmother, and is largely utilized as a cash cow for welfare checks for Precious’ mother) Precious indubitably spends much of her spare time engaged in escapist polarized fantasies and daydreams—either about being white (she often stares into her bedroom mirror and sees the visage of a pretty, thin blond teen gazing back at her and daydreams about moving into a suburban neighborhood with her uncharacteristically attractive Aryan, presumably liberal, do-gooder math teacher) or, on the contrary, being some sort of fag-fetishized illustrious Aretha Franklin-like ultra black diva of soul singer who rides off into the sunset on a motorcycle with her divinely mulatto “light-skinned boyfriend.” But reality hits Precious hard and fast, often quite literally in the form of her ironically named mother Mary (played by much loved black actress Mo’Nique in perhaps her most epic and dramatic role to date) beating her upside the head with a frying pan or remote, or whatever other object is readily available at the moment within the confines of their section 8 high-rise apartment (that is—when she isn’t forcing Precious to prepare some of the most disgustingly decadent soul food ever seen in a film—collared greens seemingly sautéed in lard, deep fried chicken, etc., which her mother subsequently forces her to gorge upon as they sit and watch TV each night as a means of ensuring her daughter becomes fatter and fatter). Indeed, upon finding out that Precious is pregnant for the second time, Precious’ stereotypically Jewish New Yorker school principal shows up at her apartment and implores her to begin enrollment at an “alternative” school—seeing that her pregnancy places her in danger of failing—to which malicious mother Mary flagrantly responds that Precious should just drop out, that she thinks she is “too good for the welfare,” and she’s basically a triflin’ ass ho for letting some white (Jewish) bitch stop by their apartment (as this is perceived as a threat to Mary’s incoming welfare checks). In spite of her mother’s vicious words, and the fact that her life is basically totally fucked up beyond repair not even 30 minutes into the film, Precious somehow maintains some semblance of hope and optimism (aided perhaps by her vivid imagination and escapist fantasies, which the director very amply unveils to the viewer throughout the film) and decides to enroll in the alternative school.

PRECIOUS

After brazenly walking off with a large bucket of fried chicken from a local “chicken and trout” style shop (her mother won’t give her any money, not even after she is presumably forced to assist her in masturbating in one particularly nauseating, yet thankfully unseen scene wherein she sickeningly summons her daughter to “come help mama out”) in order to feed both herself and the growing appetite of her gestating brother/child, poor, penniless Precious voraciously consumes its contents on her way to the alternative school where she becomes acquainted with her new teacher (incidentally, right as she is regurgitating all of the half-digested fried chicken into the school bathroom’s trashcan), a lipstick lesbian of mixed race origin who calls herself “Blu Rain,” along with a motley crew of contrasting yet equally ghettofied American and Islander negroes and Hispanic females that one comes to expect in today’s inner city America—among them a hardened black butch (perhaps the most feral and menacing of all the lesbian subtypes imaginable), a petulant Puerto Rican or Dominican who instigates fights (and is subsequently thrashed and throttled for her transgressions by a suddenly and surprisingly pissed off Precious after calling her fat), a Jamaican negress who is hardly intelligible, and a prissy and popular black chick who likes to be in the spotlight at all times. As Precious continues her studies at the school, she slowly but surely learns how to read and write, albeit still at an elementary level, and in spending a significant amount of her time with “Mizz Rain” and her new ghetto girlfriends, Precious’ self-esteem is greatly elevated and she starts to feel hopeful that her life will truly change for the better. At the behest of school administrators, Precious meets with a social worker of ambiguous racial origin, Ms. Weiss (played by the annoyingly orgasmic singer Mariah Carey of black/Venezuelan/Irish origins who, quite interestingly, replaced Helen Mirren who was originally sought for the part) to discuss the horrific physical and incestuous abuse she has suffered at the hands of her mother (and the repeated rapes by her very own father by whom she is currently pregnant). Shocked by such arrant allegations, Ms. Weiss and Blu Rain strongly suggest to Precious that she consider relinquishing her son to an adoption agency immediately upon birth, such that both he and she can go on to lead relatively normal lives. In characteristically Negro fashion, Precious vehemently refuses, even though she knows that her son’s impending birth will very adversely affect any positive prospects for her future.

Following the birth of her son, whom she bestows with a rather Afrotaastic name, Abdul Jamal Lewis Jones (and who was lovingly attended to at birth by assumed homosexual, “Nurse John,” played by Lenny Kravitz, another individual of mixed origin being both half black, half Jewish—suggesting something of a theme to the film), Precious brings the baby home with her, only to experience perhaps one of the most epic scenes of violence and abuse in the film in which mother Mary flagrantly drops the newborn infant to the ground (after kindly asking Precious if she can hold him), and upon Precious’ stealthy exit from the debauched home with her screaming, presumably injured little brother/son, Mary exacts further damage by trying to drop a TV on Precious’ head from within the stairwell of their high-rise section 8 tenement. Just narrowly avoiding the heavy projectile with baby Abdul in tow, Precious finally vows to herself to never speak to her mother again and winds up living in a halfway house. Following this highly traumatic incident, Precious makes a vain attempt to move on with her life by continuing her education and trying to raise her son in as nourishing and loving of an environment as an unwed, teenaged black mother raising her own brother/son possibly can, but inevitably, mother Mary re-enters Precious’ life to deliver perhaps the most foreboding, despairing news that she could possibly hear—that her father, a black brother presumably of the depraved “down-low” persuasion, had contracted the HIV virus and subsequently died from complications of AIDS (and probably quite quickly, as was the case in the early days of “gay cancer”). Either immediately choosing to deny the implications of her father’s death or altogether failing to connect the dots, Precious implores her mother to be tested. Precious is finally punctuated with further abject misery and horror with the discovery that Precious is indeed HIV-positive (baby Abdul, quite miraculously, is not). The tragic ghetto tale ends on a terribly bitter-sweet note with Precious continuing to attempt to improve her condition, but the shocked audience is certainly left to wonder: who could reasonably go on with their languishing life in any plausible way being essentially illiterate and morbidly obese, after having birthed two children by her own father, and winding up HIV-positive? Perhaps I am looking at the film strictly through the lens of my own mind and existence as an individual of an entirely different racial constitution, but surely by now, I would have taken my own life years prior seeing the bleak hopelessness of the situation, but this of course suggests the inherent, quite obvious differences between blacks and whites.

PRECIOUS

Admittedly, I find most Hollywood-made, modern horror films to be rather contrived and clichéd, and while Precious is by no means a true horror film, the fact that it very accurately portrays such debauched and disgusting lifestyles, which are encroaching ever and ever closer upon the lives of those that very painstakingly seek to avoid blacks at all costs (via mass white flight, sending one’s children to expensive private schools, and living in bedroom communities, all of which have risen quite staggeringly in recent decades), does qualify it as a horror film in that will certainly stir the primal fears and render nauseated the few remaining racially conscious whites in America (for the remainder of whites who are thoroughly deracinated, the film will have achieved its goal, in that it will likely make them all the more sympathetic to the plight of their hapless, helpless negro neighbors and darker hued soon-to-be son-in-laws). Furthermore, another interesting aspect of the film that the director did not really touch upon in the audio commentary was the ongoing theme throughout Precious of mixed race individuals, namely Blu Rain, Nurse John, and Ms. Weiss, being perceived as “guardian angels” or “knights in shining armor,” whereas the darker blacks are depicted as either the most depraved, sadistic and cruel, or altogether helpless, if not stupid and totally incapable of managing their lives or registering the future consequences of their present actions. One cannot help but walk away from the film pondering if this was some subconsciously directed effort on the part of its creators, seeing that if they were to be frankly asked about it, they would likely deny any such characterization of the film’s decidedly darker complexioned cast. And what’s all the more frightening to ponder about Precious is the fact that while a large subset of the white population continues to distance itself in every way that it can from the burgeoning multiracial dystopia that grows insidiously within America's bounds (and within Europa as well), the very powerful influence of a certain minority of "cultural distorters," continues to pervert and twist the natural inclinations toward monogamy, marriage, and motherhood such that more and more younger whites find the lewd and lascivious lifestyles as depicted in Precious to be decadent, glamorous and at least in the present moment, intensely pleasurable, such that the contrived and tiresome tunes of Lil' Wayne and Kanye West can induce just about any Kim Kardashian idolizing teenage girl in the Midwest to go weak in the knees at the prospect of being impregnated by the nearest black buck only to have the resulting unfortunate offspring raised by her aloof and misguided parents (and who any typical white man will never touch again, with the exception of the occasional wigger cuckold). Indeed, only in a mixed up (both racially and figuratively) and warped world such as we see today in America, and along with the the countless nations the country has hijacked and subsequently culturally colonized, where the meaning of words, as well as morals, have been totally reversed, could a film as conspicuously crude and grotesque as Lee Daniels' coming-of-age flick be titled "Precious," as the protagonist is not even a girl an incestuous bisexual welfare queen mother could love, let alone an ostensibly homosexual mulatto on a motorcycle.

-Magda von Richthofen zu Reventlow auf Thule

3 A.M.

3 A.M.

Lee Davis (2001)

While he did splice a couple single-frame erect cocks in the iconic montages featured in his 'modernist horror' masterpiece Persona (1966), and had somewhat of a talent for erotic tension when need be, Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman never directed a porn flick. Unquestionably, the next best thing to a Bergman blue movie, however, is the erotic melodrama 3 A.M. (1975) aka 3 a.m.: The Time of Sexuality directed by Gary Graver (Garage Girls, Indecent Exposure) under the pseudonym 'Robert McCallum.' It should be noted that the film was not directed by just any hack pornographer, but a protégé of none other than Orson 'Citizen Kane' Welles. Indeed, on top of starting his filmmaking career by working on the unfinished Welles feature The Other Side of the Wind, Graver appeared in and did still photography for F For Fake (1973) and the cinematography for Filming Othello (1978). In fact, Welles felt so indebted to Graver for working on The Other Side of the Wind that he gave him his 1941 Oscar which he had won as the co-writer of Citizen Kane. On top of working with Welles, Graver was the second unit camera operator for Curtis Harrington's underrated Oedipal serial killer flick The Killing Kind (1973), camera operator for John Cassavetes' A Woman Under the Influence (1973), director of photography for Paul Bartel's Renoir reworking Eating Raoul (1982), and countless other cult classic, exploitation flicks, and even Disney films. While best known as a cinematographer that worked with everyone from Roger Corman to Ron Howard, he would truly master directing pornography, with 3 A.M. being arguably his greatest and most mature work. Indeed, if it were not for the graphic sex scenes and pseudo-Anglo American accents, the film would easily be mistaken for a European high drama. Featuring arguably the most lavish and exquisitely lit 'shadowy gold' cinematography that I have ever seen in a fuck flick and set mostly in a beach house in an unnervingly beautiful yet melancholy location that looks like it could have been shot on the other side of the island featured in Bergman's Through a Glass Darkly (1961), 3 A.M. is certainly a lecherous yet equally lavish 'posh porno' that makes the oftentimes pretentious works of Radley Metzger seem like pseudo-aristocratic phony twaddle by comparison. Indeed, if there is a fuck flick that will offend the vulgar and philistine sentiments of the Lumpenproletariat, it is Graver's elegantly titillating assault on the ultra-urbane American upper-middleclass, as well as an amorous depiction of bourgeois angst.

Kate (genuinely talented actress Georgina Spelvin of Gerard Damiano's 1973 crossover hit Devil in Miss Jones fame) is an old spinster with graying hair, but she is certainly not a sexless virgin as she has been carrying on a hot and heavy love affair with her brother-in-law Mark (Frank Mauro) who, with his curly black hair and overall swarthy Semite appearance, looks sort of like a more masculine and muscular version of Hebraic would-be-ladykiller Norman Mailer. As Kate intimately narrates at the beginning of 3 A.M. while she can hear her brother-in-law and sister Elaine (Rhonda Gellard) have sex: "My name is Kate and I live in this house. This is my sister Elaine and her husband Mark...and this is their home. I have lived with them for a longtime...long enough to help raise their son, Ronnie...long enough to help raise their daughter, Stacey. This is me, Kate...and I have lived here long enough for Mark and I to have been having a love affair for 15 years. I knew loneliness...I didn't want to hurt Elaine, but I desperately need Mark's love to help me fill this void. I used my loneliness to justify many sins. I knew the love of other women...even Stacey, my own niece...but this night was to inalterably change the lives of each of us...and the end began at 3 a.m...." Indeed, after having passionate (and secretly recorded) sex with Elaine that concludes with him accusing his wife of being a "half woman" and declaring to her, "what I want to do is be as far away from you as I possibly can...for the rest of my FUCKING LIFE. That's what I want," Mark heads to his boat where he meets and has carnal fun with his mistress Kate, but things get ugly from there. After Mark declares, "I left her [Elaine] and I'm leaving you and I'm finding me!," like some over-the-hill beatnik suffering from a midlife crisis, Kate hysterically declares, "You're not going to leave me! I want you!," and proceeds to hit her secret lover over the head with a large bottle, thus leading to his death via drowning after he falls unconscious and falls overboard.

Flash forward "Several Days Later," and the bourgeois family of 3 A.M. is suffering a crisis due to the tragic and rather dubious death of patriarch Mark; indeed, so much so that the circumstances will erupt into an orgy of melancholy incestuous sex. Not surprising considering the unexpected death of her great, beloved husband after the two had a nasty fight that they never had the opportunity to resolve, Elaine is a self-destructive suicidal mess, declaring "I want to die" and downing some pills with liquor as a chaser, which pisses her sister Kate off so much that she calls her a "silly bitch" and forces her vomit in a sink. While all by her lonesome and thinking about past sex with Mark, Kate declares regarding her sister, "How could you know...you've never known love," and proceeds to hump her pillow. Of course, Kate "swings both ways" as demonstrated by the fact that she gets in a heated carpet-munching session in a shower with some random hippie bull-dyke who randomly shows up at the beach house. Somewhat wantonly warped, Kate is also carrying on a lurid lady-licker love affair with her fire-crotched teenage niece Stacey (played by porn star/exploitation actress Clair Dia, who starred in the strange 1972 experimental porn anthology flick Ramäge (Mobility Cathexis)).

Meanwhile, Widow Elaine is a total mess due to her loneliness and inability to mourn her husband's death, so she ends fornicating with some dorky hippie dude who wants to buy her late hubby's boat. In fact, despite her sorrow over the death of her beloved, Elaine bangs the guy on the very same boat that her husband was in before he drowned. Despite having sex with her, the hippie beach boy more or less tells Elaine that having sex with random men won't help her find what she is looking for and that, "The peace will come...when you learn to accept you loneliness." After his sister Stacey attempts to seduce them after a beachside horse ride, teenage bourgeois bitch boy Ronnie (played by Charles Hooper, whose sole other film credit is Graver's 1979 fuck flick Tangerine) starts an affair with an ex-model named Vicki (Sharon Thorpe), who tells Elaine that she saw a woman with Mark on the boat the night he drowned. Needless to say, lovelorn Kate eventually becomes so plagued by guilt and sadness due to her accidentally killing of her great love Mark that she records a confession on a tape, which her nephew Ronnie walks in on her doing. From there, Kate leaves the beach house, strips off her robe, and commits suicide by walking into the sea, but her nephew Ronnie makes no real effort to save her, even stopping his sister Stacey from helping. While Elaine and Stacey scream for Kate to comeback, Ronnie gets the cassette his aunt recorded and throws it into the ocean with her, thus forever burying the truth behind the tragedy that led to his father and aunt's deaths.

3 A.M.

While clearly specially tailored for a more cultivated audience that expects more out of their fuck films, 3 A.M. is easily the greatest pornographic condemnation of the bourgeois that I have ever seen, even making Cecil Howard's classic works like The Final Sin (1977) and The Scoundrels (1982) seem rather redundant by comparison. Indeed, in its depiction of the cowardice of the bourgeoisie, especially when it comes to perennially living a lie and not confronting open secrets that ultimately result in easily preventable tragedies and heartbreak, Graver's work certainly recalls Bergman, though, aesthetically speaking, it also resembles the early pre-Hollywood works of Roman Polanski. Arguably, the most telling scene of the film is when protagonist Kate's teenage nephew complains, "Nothing's ever different," as a young man who's already come to realize that, due to his class background, he is plagued with a life of softness and domestic banality. Undoubtedly, 3 A.M. also has a somewhat vague 'counter-culture' vibe about it as is especially apparent in a "spirit of '69" scene wherein siblings Ronnie and Stacey mutually exchange oral sex 69 style to the less than soothing sounds of generic psychedelic rock. Unquestionably, it is easy to believe that the film was assembled by a protégé of Orson Welles who mainly worked as cinematographer. Indeed, the warmly lit cinematography of 3 A.M. is immaculate and, pornographically speaking, the storytelling is fairly fluid, though I can certainly see why Graver found his niche in the pornographic realm as the film's greatest weaknesses lie in its acting performances (though Georgina Spelvin is characteristically great as the somber spinster) and structuring. If you ever wonder if wantonness and Weltschmerz can be seamlessly blended together for a curious celluloid combo that is more bitter than sweet but wholly sensual, Graver's porn chic era blue movie masterpiece of upper-middleclass decadence is probably your best bet. Indeed, if the hallmark of a great hardcore flick is that you forget it is a hardcore flick while watching it, 3 A.M. indubitably one of the best porn pieces ever assembled.

-Ty E

LIVE FREE OR DIE HARD
LIVE FREE OR DIE HARD

Len Wiseman (2007) In today's society, it seems to be a social competition to sport the most patriotism on your vehicle. Whether it is POW MIA stickers representing the veterans we have long forgotten and so has our government or SUPPORT OUR TROOPS magnets that do nothing but fill the pockets of false charities. John McClane is the ultimate American. It seems that they kept this in mind when they directed the new Die Hard film. In ways, Live Free or Die Hard is the ultimate American propaganda film. This includes music by Creedence Clearwater Revival including "Red, White, & Blue" and long drawn out shots of panicked citizens and the American flag.

All Die Hard films except for the third, cause it wanted to build on racial aggression, start out on Christmas day. Why else? The day where you can sit trouble free in the comfort of your family and watch pure joy wash over their button faces. John is an average man who has marriage problems and suffers with them. He visits his family on Christmas like any divorced/separated couple should. To further the effect of the nature, they set the timeline back to the 4th of July. Independence Day to be exact. The very country we live in fought for its freedom this very day, and the average American man will have to fight for it again. Blasting his way through French people, acrobats, homosexuals, and Asian hooker bitches. What an eventful evening. Live Free or Die Hard's terrorist content is not new. In fact, since 9/11, most films push to have a post-9/11 theme, which includes one of the following. Airplanes, Terrorists, Foreign Powers growing, or Bombings. This film is the daddy of all. It doesn't show a horrible attack on buildings. It's a direct attack on the system. Or as John would put it. A country. A country with living people. Within the film Independence Day, there is a scene that shows the White house being obliterated by an alien beam. Needless to say, this scene terrified American audiences. The same thing can be said about the destruction of Congress in LFODH. What is the best way to build a rivalry? A fight including two of the same faction or group. In one scene, Gabriel uses go codes to send an American jet after McClane while commandeering a big rig truck. Many explosions later, we tire of hearing McClane scream at this recently proclaimed enemy. After the citizen overpowers the jet, what does he do? He rides on top of it leaving the bastard to eject out. Timothy Olyphant is the antagonist in this film by the name Thomas Gabriel. It seems hilarious to me that they have filled the role of Gabriel with a homosexual. Earlier claims represent that he was "crucified". Not only is this said once, in the generic context, it is said again with the same tone. Only he makes it bolder to say crucified. Seeing as Hollywood is composed of homophobes and greedy bastards who will stop at nothing to make an extra buck, even if it means selling the rights to another remake of a classic. What is scarier than American being taken over and dropped on its knees? Being taken over by the most controversial thing to hit the US since marijuana legalization. Homosexuality. The film's release sparked an outcry amongst fans with the rating of PG-13. That's right. No "Yippee Ki Yay Motherfucker", and no random "Fuck's". While this was disappointing, they did announce an UNRATED release with digitally added in scenes with the signature swearing and CGI blood. This calmed down fans a miniature bit but still left a lot to ponder. This of course, is an annoying marketing technique to get you to shelve your original copy or spend 5 more dollars on a different edition. Clearly a Zionist scheme, this is seen with every new film release in major retailers. The title was originally worked out to be DIE HARD: RESET, but obviously the director Len Wiseman loves his Freedom Fries and decided to spice up the title with American themes. It is clear he wanted the film to be reflective of the past so he filled it with various themes and scenes that connect with the younger John McClane. I.E. In the first Die Hard, we meet 2 FBI agents. One being a naive, ignorant Negro named Agent Johnson and the pompous ass hole who flashes back to Saigon named Agent Johnson. No Relation. In this film, he meets up with another FBI Agent named Johnson and looks real funny when he hears that. I indeed did laugh when I caught that. It almost is too stupid. Another reflective scene is his "insane rambling scene". Every Die Hard film has one. Just when you think Detective McClane has enough, he goes insane which leads to a self loathing monologue and ends with him doing an incredible stunt, "Killing a helicopter with a car".

Attention to the media has become increasingly more powerful and harmful over the years. People are beginning to realize that it controlled by the big wigs and it is there to be the most effective form of advertising. In one scene, Everyone's favorite comedian, Justin Long, is incessantly rambling about how fucked the news is, when he gets silenced quickly by a truck. I view this as a metaphor for everyone who has dared to oppose it. Live Free or Die Hard made me proud to be an American but at the same time, express my disgust to these bold tactics. All in all, it is an incredibly enjoyable movie with epic undertones spread throughout it. I said it before and I will say it again. The ultimate propaganda film. Leave it to the German to play the perfect American.

-Maq

THE MAGIC GARDEN OF STANLEY SWEETHEART
THE MAGIC GARDEN OF STANLEY SWEETHEART

Leonard Horn (1970)

Believe it or not, before he was one of the biggest laughing stocks of Hollywood, the butt of cheap jokes among philistines, and the object of forbidden desire among closeted redneck homos, Don Johnson was an underground gay icon of sorts, mainly because he played the lead in Rebel Without a Cause (1955) star Sal Mineo's original gay-themed 1967 play about prison rape, Fortune and Men's Eyes, which was later adapted into a film of the same name in 1971 (although, Johnson did not appear in it). In fact, Johnson's first role in a film was as the eponymous lead of the largely forgotten counter-culture cult flick The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart (1970) starring alongside flagrantly flaming Fortune and Men's Eyes star Michael Greer (The Gay Deceivers, Messiah of Evil)—a man so gay that he recorded an album entitled 'Tallulah in Heaven' where he mimics the voice of queer icon Tallulah Bankhead—and not only does the film include gay undertones, but it also features the Miami Vice star oftentimes naked and even masturbating in a bathtub while reading a disturbing letter written by his mother. Based on the semi-autobiographical 1970 novel of the same name written by Robert T. Westbrook—the son of English-born Jewish gossip columnist Sheila Graham Westbrook, who is probably best known for writing about Golden Age Hollywood and being the lover of F. Scott Fitzgerald (in fact, she immortalized her relationship with the writer with the book Beloved Infidel, which was adapted into a film in 1959 starring Gregory Peck)—The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart was, among other things, lauded by Andy Warhol of all people as being the film featuring the most accurate depiction of its hyper-hedonistic era, referring to the work as, "the quintessential, most truthful studio-made film about the '60s counterculture." In fact, Warhol (who was supposed to appear as a 'freak-out psychiatrist') and his superstars Ultra Violet, Candy Darling, and Gerard Malanga were actually originally cast in the film, which was advertised in newspapers, but for whatever reason they never actually appeared in the work. While Warhol and his speed-addled superstars did not shoot a single scene for the film, alpha-superstar Joe Dallesandro (Flesh, Blood for Dracula) was hired for one of the lead roles but was fired after the first day after butting heads with the entire film crew, with the stoic sex icon apparently remarking to the assistant director of the film before permanently walking off the set, "I don't want to give you that kind of pleasure, but you make me feel bad because this is the first job I've been fired from. And yet, it makes me feel happy because this is the stupidest film I've ever worked on!" Indeed, with its incessant nudity and voyeuristic camera angles, The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart actually seems like a Paul Morrissey flick had it been produced by Hollywood as opposed to penny-pincher Warhol. Of course, unlike Morrissey's works, the film also takes a less farcical approach to depicting the counter-culture generation and all its drugged-out degeneracy. Directed by a forgotten TV hack who worked on television series like Alfred Hitchcock Presents (1959-1962) and Mission: Impossible (1966-1971), The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart is like the more lurid little brother film to Midnight Cowboy (1969), albeit more immature but also more melodramatically tragic. The sordid story of a young would-be-filmmaker and all-around mentally weak loser who is addicted to masturbation and nihilism who falls in with a 'sexually liberated' counter-culture crowd, only to become all the more perverted and nihilistic, not to mention drug addicted, The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart is less a cautionary tale than a portrait of a 'wasted' generation that unwittingly sold its soul to rock n roll.

As a young man who hated growing up in sunny California and seeing all the fancy Cadillacs driving around, college junior Stanley Sweetheart (Don Johnson) long ago decided to enter a fantasy world of his own mind comprised of compulsive masturbation and daydreaming, as well as amateur exploitation filmmaking. Indeed, Stanley is sort of like a younger and less crazed Anglo version of anti-hero Rupert Pupkin from Martin Scorsese's The King of Comedy (1983), as he constantly fantasizes about how he wishes things were as opposed to how they actually turnout. At the beginning of The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart, Stan the underman daydreams of walking up to a hot girl and impressing her so much with pretentious lines like "It is very difficult to adjust to the technocratic age" that she instantly swoons and starts making out with him in front of dozens of other college students. Instead, the girl, Cathy (Dianne Hull, whose credits include The Onion Field (1979) and Christmas Evil (1980)), walks up to Stanley and ends up hitting on him, thus demonstrating his passive and somewhat effeminate character. After class, Stan looks at some porno mags and then jerks-off in his archaic bathtub while reading a strange letter from his mother, who writes that she hopes that she dies in a plane crash so that he can get the insurance money as she is afraid her son is incapable of ever supporting himself. To impress Cathy, Stan shows her a short black-and-white film he directed entitled 'Head Less' where he is bombarded by a couple of naughty naked nurses on a stretcher, only to become disappointed in the end because he gets sex instead of the new head he so deeply desired. Being from a somewhat traditional background, Cathy is shocked by the film but she is infatuated with Stanley so she pretends to like it and the two make out. When Stan goes out to a diner later that night, a middle-aged creep named Jim begins to brag about how much 'pussy' he used to get and then offers him $10 for his ass, thus causing the college boy to runaway in abject fear. Frustrated he has yet to get real sex, Stan tells Cathy she is "not a real woman" for refusing to put out, thus talking her into losing her virginity in the process by pathetic manipulative means (indeed, Stan's main talents are lying and manipulation). Of course, Stan soon loses interest in Cathy when he gets what he wants and when he discovers that her roommate Fran (Holly Near) is a loose lady who will put out for any man, he conspires to coerce his girlfriend into asking her best friend if she wants to star in one of his little movies in the hope that he will get some tail. Of course, Fran obliges but she is also rather fat but that does not stop softcore sex addict Stan from trying to get in her rather large panties. Indeed, Stan does direct Fran in a somewhat autobiographical short entitled 'Masturbation' but he also plies her with alcohol while they are shooting and eventually takes advantage of her when she is drunk. Naturally, after Stan screws fat Fran, he finds that the less than gorgeous gal is obsessed with him and routinely goes by his apartment for sex, which he always gives into, even though he finds the girl to be somewhat repugnant.

THE MAGIC GARDEN OF STANLEY SWEETHEART

One night while sleeping with his girlfriend Cathy, who has no idea her charming boy toy is banging her best of a best friend, Stan is woken up by his ambiguously gay musician friend Danny (Michael Greer) with a knock at the door. Danny ultimately starts a little party at Stan's apartment and when Cathy discovers the party boy has weed, which she has never tried, she talks him into giving her some. Ultimately, Danny seduces Cathy with his hippie charms while they are stoned and she becomes infatuated with him, even though he has next to nil interest in her and has more of an interest in her boyfriend. Of course, Cathy breaks up with Stan and when he tries to tell her he loves her, she responds, "You're such a liar. It's one of your most endearing qualities. You know you're just saying those things. You live in a dream world...you just need someone along to take care of you and give you a daily ration of sex." Stan also attempts to have sex with Cathy after the bitter breakup, but she pushes him off and he gets so infuriated that he slaps her across the face and violently throws her out of his apartment. With his self-esteem destroyed, Stan dresses up like a gay hustler and goes to his lesbian friend Shayne/Barbara's (Linda Gillin) apartment under the pretense of buying dope and attempts to pull a pathetic Marlon Brando act on his homegirl's Asian girlfriend Andrea (Victoria Racimo). Needless to say, Stan begins a ménage a trios with Shayne and Andrea that involves drug-fueled paint orgies (indeed, they like to get naked, paint their bodies with kaleidoscopic colors, and engage in group sex). Stan also begins to look like a disheveled hippie bum and when his ex-girlfriend Cathy spots him at a concert, she barely recognizes him and seems rather disturbed by the fact that he brags about being on steady doses of speed, weed, and acid. While watching Danny perform with his band at one of his hippie gigs (Greer actually composed songs for the film's soundtrack, which sounds like a rip-off of The Doors), a group of stoned degenerates begin cutting a girl's arm against her will and smearing blood all over each other (Danny especially gets a kick out of this). Possibly due to the fact he is a repressed homosexual (which is hinted at in a couple scenes) and/or because he fried his brain on too much acid, Danny opts for committing suicide in front of his bourgeois mother by putting a shotgun in his mouth as if he is giving it a blowjob and pulling the trigger. Of course, Stan sees this unexpected event as a total bummer and complains to his fuck-buddy Andrea that he has “lost all sense of time.” In the end, Stan stands in front of a railing in a symbolic scene where he looks like he is in a prison cell and then walks away from the once-merry ménage à trois with his head looking down at the ground as if he has a major case of melancholia.

Ultimately, the rather simple yet effective message of The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart is that one becomes more enslaved to sex, drugs, and rock n roll than any sort of strict middleclass background, with protagonist Stanley going from being a goofy college student with a minor masturbation problem to being a sex and drug addicted spiritual slave and college dropout with a horrendous hobo-like wardrobe who is only respected by lecherous lesbians. Indeed, while Stan initially aspires to be at least a filmmaker, has a real girlfriend, and attends college, by the end he literally has nothing (not even his messy studio apartment) except a screwed up brain, a debilitating case of depression, and a dead friend. Notably, the protagonist decides to fully devote his life to debauchery after alpha-degenerate Danny, who cynically describes himself as having a “washed up life and a great bod,” gives him the following words of ostensible wisdom: “Why don’t you just do what you want to do? [...] Just be. Well, accept everything. If your balling your chick’s best friend, well, why not? You don’t have to be a student, you don’t have to be a filmmaker. Just be.” Of course, Danny’s ‘laidback’ existence of ‘just being’, which is really just a passive form of nihilism that is practiced by someone who has totally given up on life and does not give a shit about anything, ultimately leads to his irrevocable mental derangement and rather messy suicide via shotgun in the mouth. Undoubtedly, in many ways, The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart is a confused work that is part exploitation (the voyeuristic camera always manages to catch flesh, especially Don Johnson and his Johnson), part sex comedy, part romantic comedy, part erotic Afterschool Special, part psychotic psychedelic psychodrama, and part coming of age flick, with a subtext about the negative effects of sexual repression thrown in for good measure. As for Don Johnson, The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart is the sole film I can think of that the actor starred in where he gives a believable and memorable performance, as his patently pathetic character radiates naivety, neuroticism, sexual frustration, and youth stupidity in a naturalistic fashion that is even more convincing than Jon Voight was in Midnight Cowboy. For whatever reason (I assume it has to do with music copyrights), the film has never been released on VHS or DVD (I found a copy someone taped off TV), hence one of the reasons for its undeserved obscurity. Indeed, a work perfect for mainstream filmgoers that cannot bother to see aimless scenes of Little Joe suffering from perennial impotence in Warhol produced ‘Paul Morrissey Trilogy’ (Flesh, Trash, Heat), The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart is the one Hollywood film where the counter-culture movement is portrayed as it really was as a self-destructive road of nihilistic hedonism and false values that leads to nowhere except nowhere. A sometimes titillating and constantly entertaining time capsule about the most decidedly degenerate generation in American history that is thankfully now finally dying out, The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart is certainly the film to show someone if they want to understand the real (non)Weltanschauung that the hippies and their equally misguided descendants mindlessly espoused.

THE MAGIC GARDEN OF STANLEY SWEETHEART

-Ty E

THE KILLING OF AMERICA

Leonard Schrader (1981)

Despite being made over thirty years ago and being as American as apple pie in terms of its carnage-filled content, the death-filled documentary The Killing of America (1982) aka Violence U.S.A.—an anti-gun agitprop that chronicles the most infamous murders, assassinations, race riots, and serial killer/mass murderers since the death of JFK leading up to the early 1980s—has yet to be officially released in any format in the United States, which is not surprising, at least at the time of its initial release, as it is undoubtedly one of the most unflattering depictions of the USA ever made as a sort of cinematic rap sheet of American barbarism. A pseudo-intellectual mondo mix-tape of Americana murder and mayhem that strives for enlightening the viewer but thrives on sensationalism of the bloody and ultra-violent sort, The Killing of America is not a work that will entertain sadists and masochists (or a combination of the two) but also cinephiles as it was co-written and co-directed by screenwriter Leonard Schrader (Kiss of the Spider Woman, Naked Tango), the elder brother of writer/director Paul Schrader (Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters, The Comfort of Strangers). Describing America as the “land of a million murders and one hundred million guns” and a place with a homicide rate comparable to Third World shithole countries like Cambodia and Nicaragua during a civil war, The Killing of America wastes no time in portraying the United States as a fallen place of dramatic social, cultural, and moral decline, yet it ultimately has no serious answers as to why, as if the directors (Schrader co-directed it with relatively unknown documentarian Sheldon Renan) and writers (Schrader’s Japanese wife Chieko Schrader also contributed to the script) were too politically correct and fixated on their rather redundant anti-gun idealism to give it much thought, though they ‘dare’ to hint that the assassination of president JFK was a conspiracy. Featuring real-life stock footage of negroes being killed by white pig cops and race riots, as well as interviews with infamous criminals, including (but not limited to) anti-Zionist assassin Sirhan Sirhan, serial killers John Wayne Gacy and Ted Bundy, and mass murdering cult messiah Jim Jones, The Killing of America works best as an uncensored history of post-WWII American true crime, which makes more sense when one considers it was originally made for the Japanese market, who must have laughed their scrawny East Asian asses off after realizing how screwed up the nation that defeated and nuked them during the Second World War really is. A mundanely narrated archival document of American decline, The Killing of America inadvertently depicts a nation that, after embracing civil rights, multiculturalism, counter-culture movements, and liberalism, degenerated into a nihilistic negro-crime-filled real-life nightmare, so it is only fitting that the documentary concludes with the barely tragic assassination of alpha-hippie scum John Lennon.

THE KILLING OF AMERICA

According to The Killing of America, Japan, England and West Germany have a combined population (at least, at the same of the docs release) equal to that of the United States, yet while the former three countries have around 6,000 murders a year, the U.S.A. has about 27,000, thus demonstrating that the krauts and Japs should have probably won the Second World War and England should have sided with their Germanic brothers as America—the stillborn cultural and racial mongrel—is a misbegotten bastard from hell. According to the narrator Chuck Riley of The Killing of America, President John F. Kennedy was a “symbol of his handsome young country” (one must ask what Barack Obama is a symbol of!) and his dubious assassination more or less sparked America’s decided degeneration and assassins, snipers, political terrorists, cult charlatans, serial killers, and ‘mad saviors’ starting popping up all around America as if the country’s population starting worshipping death and destruction. In reference to blacks starting race riots and burning down America’s cities one by one in the name of ‘equality,’ the narrator states that the “government fought a war with its own people,” as if the burning down of cities and assaults against whites should have been simply tolerated. On top of that, the unpopularity of the Vietnam War lead spoiled bourgeois whites to rebel against the government, thereupon leading to a lot of the garbage counter-culture and Frankfurt School/New Left ideas that have become quite mainstream today, albeit in a degenerate form. As The Killing of America reveals, most snipers, assassins, and especially serial killers, are white males from middleclass backgrounds with genius IQs, which is depicted in endearing interviews with real-life man-hunters Ted Bundy and Ed Kemper. In terms of murderous nonwhites, one gets to hear a heartwarming interview with Senator Robert F. Kennedy assassin Sirhan Sirhan, a Palestinian-American Christian whose greatest wish is that, “there should be peace in the Middle East.” One is also introduced to the whitey-hating crimes of Mark Essex, a negro spree killer who killed 9 people, including 5 police officers, and wounded 13 others in New Orleans in late-1972/early-1973 simply because they were white. Of course, aside from Essex and a black sniper who is featured being gunned down the police in broad daylight, The Killing of America totally underplays black criminality. In an aesthetically foul yet fitting (especially considering the film’s leftist anti-gun angle) conclusion, the assassination of John Lennon is discussed while the Brit hippie messiah’s hit shit single “Imagine” plays in the background.

Like a Michael Moore pseudo-documentary minus the Irish-American slob’s infantile sneering humor and actually featuring a number of deaths in real time, The Killing of America is undoubtedly a work by a carelessly cliché leftwing ideologue who does not have the balls nor the common sense to discuss why the United States is turning into a multicultural Third World full of crime and corruption and lacking in even the most rudimentary of culture. Being a perennial peasant nation comprised of Europe’s rabble and ex-slaves whose ancestors were brought here unwillingly from Africa, not to mention an absurdly large and growing Third World population who have no interest in assimilating (not that I blame them, nor that most of them actually could if they tried), the United States is a monstrous mongrel of the untermensch sort, so it is only natural that criminality and cultural chaos reign here and one can certainly expect more of the same in the future as demonstrated by the latest news headlines. The Killing of America essentially depicts a country that, ever since winning the Second World War, has lost its moral compass and racial identity and thrives on fear and terror, as if these things are substitutes for real cultural ingredients, like classical music and arthouse cinema. With the assassination of communist-pawn charlatan Martin Luther King, Jr. resulting in race riots in no less than 125 cities as mentioned in The Killing of America, one can only wonder the sort of chaos that would erupt if some mental midget decided to assassinate the metrosexual mulatto messiah that is now, quite absurdly yet symbolically, the President of the United States.

As someone whose grandfather moved to the United States out of necessity when his own nation was destroyed during the Second World War and ultimately regretted obtaining citizenship in the so-called "New World", I also think that The Killing of America overrates America as a nation before the assassination of JFK as America's prosperity after WWII is almost solely the result of Europa's destruction and the raping/pillaging/occupying of the Occident by the Americans. Culturally speaking, at its height, America was, at best, an over glorified European colony, but with the arrival of Jews and every other non-European race, it has thrived completely and totally on formlessness of the racial and cultural variety, where personal material gain is the sole collective 'Weltanschauung' that 'unites' the people in any sense. Personally, considering how things have deteriorated in every regard since its release, I found The Killing of America to be a bit 'lighthearted', especially considering we now live in a deranged pseudo-culture that respects serial killers (Seven, Dexter) and criminals (Sopranos, Sons of Anarchy), thus the documentary would probably appeal most to serial killer fetishists and those with an interest in true crime, though those who have already read a book or two on the subject while learning nothing new, even if it features an iconic assassination or two. Undoubtedly, even the title of The Killing of America is outmoded as the United States is not being killed, but is already dead as a berserk zombie corpse with a Hebrew brain that is determined to infect the world with its deadly disease. Written by the older brother of the man who penned Taxi Driver (1976)—a film featuring an anti-hero eerily reminiscent in his thinking to various serial killers and assassins featured in the documentary—The Killing of America is ultimately a symptom of the forsaken society it condemns, but also a half-interesting, forgotten celluloid piece of American cinema history that strangely makes for a great double-feature with Martin Scorsese's underrated documentary American Boy: A Profile of Steven Prince (1978), a celluloid cultural artifact that provides a somewhat concise depiction of when and where (but not why) America lost its innocence, or at least its semblance of it.

THE KILLING OF AMERICA

-Ty E

NAKED TANGO

Leonard Schrader (1991)

While Paul Schrader is, at least to some extent, a failed filmmaker in the sense that very few of his films have been monetarily successful and, more importantly, he oftentimes fails when it comes to translating his screenplays into fully realized films (indeed, it is no coincidence that he is best known for his screenplay for Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver), his older and lesser known brother Leonard, who only managed to direct a single feature during his somewhat sad life, is indubitably an artistic failure that was never able to reach anywhere near his full artistic potential. Although surely no masterpiece, Leonard's sole feature Naked Tango (1990) is undoubtedly a intriguing film worthy of reexamination and a cinematic work that reveals that the auteur had the potential to be just as subversive and innovative of a filmmaker as his much better known younger brother. Probably best remembered among cinephiles and film historians for penning the Academy Award nominated screenplay for the poor prison flick Kiss of the Spider Woman (1985) directed by Argentine-born Brazilian Jew Héctor Babenco and based on a novel by Argentine novelist Manuel Puig (whose work played a crucial influence on Naked Tango), Leonard—a draft-dodger that spent most of his life living and working in Japan after fleeing there in a successful attempt to avoid the Vietnam War—is undoubtedly a depressing example of misspent intellect and artistic talent. To anyone that is familiar with the somewhat sleazy but highly entertaining book Easy Riders, Raging Bulls: How the Sex-Drugs-and-Rock 'N Roll Generation Saved Hollywood (1998) by Peter Biskind, it is easy to understand why the elder Schrader, who died under dubious circumstances in 2006, is all but forgotten yet his younger brother Paul has managed to direct a new film every year or two ever since his debut feature Blue Collar (1978) about forty years ago. Indeed, as Paul, who managed to snag the sole credit for their first Hollywood collaboration—the screenplay for Sydney Pollack's somewhat uneven The Yakuza (1974)—confessed in the book, "I had always treated Leonard badly. Taking sole screenwriting credit on THE YAKUZA wasn't very nice. Treating him as an employee wasn't very nice. Throughout all that, he had one thing that I didn't have, which was Japan. And then came MISHIMA, and I stole Japan from him." Apparently, The Yakuza credit and Japan were not the only things that Paul stole from his brother, or as Biskind somewhat questionably argued, "Ironically, his best film as a director was his first, BLUE COLLAR, which he more or less disavowed. Says Leonard, 'My brother finds BLUE COLLAR embarrassing. One reason is, he hadn't yet developed his polish-jewel CAT PEOPLE style. The other is, he didn't write it.' Meaning, of course, that Leonard wrote it." Of course, the brothers, who both spent their younger years fetishizing the virtues of suicide and even had a number of paternal uncles and cousins commit suicide, have a number of things in common, namely their obsession with sex and death and especially a seemingly seamless combination of the two. Notably, nearly a decade before directing his first feature, Schrader acted as co-director of the unintentionally entertaining and unquestionably exploitative leftist agitprop doc The Killing of America (1982) co-directed by Sheldon Renan. More or less a glorified snuff film featuring various pieces of classic true crime stock-footage, the somewhat deluded documentary now seems like a sick piece of leftist moral posturing when compare to the director's uniquely unhinged sadomasochistic melodrama Naked Tango. Like many of his brother's cinematic works, Leonard's film wallows in sex and death, but also dance, which is ultimately depicted as the height of orgasmic embrace and an activity that is driven largely by sheer sexual magnetism.

NAKED TANGO

Featuring suicide, rape, murder, prostitution, homosexuality, Jewish organized crime, flapper fetishism, abattoirs, oedipal gangsters, and a delightfully dichotomous combination of high and low kultur that manages to combine the Symbolist paintings of Teutonic maestro Frank von Stuck with the gritty film noir sleaze of Howard Hawks' pre-Code guido gangster classic Scarface (1932), Naked Tango is undoubtedly an ambitious failure of sorts, but it is also a preternaturally engulfing failure and arguably one of the most elegant 'bad movies' ever made. An unintentional experiment in high-camp excess that attempts to juggle elements of film noir and classic melodrama and pays homage to both the short career of Latin heartthrob Rudolph Valentino and the surreal sadomasochism of late era Luis Buñuel (indeed, Fernando Rey does not star in the film as a cuckolded judge for no reason), Schrader's film certainly deserves comparisons to a number of subversive arthouse 'mad love' themed films, including Bernardo Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris (1972), Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974), Rainer Werner Fassbinder's swansong Querelle (1982), and David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986) and Wild at Heart (1990). In terms of its mongrelized cultural pedigree and dubious execution, the film also has much in common with the similarly flawed yet nonetheless underrated Orphic Belgian-Dutch-French co-production Mascara (1987) directed by Patrick Conrad and starring Charlotte Rampling and Michael Sarrazin. Undoubtedly, like Mascara, Naked Tango is what Manny Farber would have described as 'termite art' as a cinematic work that, for better or worse, attempts to exterminate pre-existing boundaries, exhibits undeniable artistic audaciousness, and wallows in economy of expression, among other things. In terms of being a somewhat arthouse-ish psychosexual thriller set in a culturally confused Buenos Aires, Argentina that makes various overt cinephiliac references to classic Hollywood movies, Schrader's film also has some somewhat superficial similarities with the homoerotic Argentine-British film Apartment Zero (1988) starring Colin Firth and Hart Bochner. Despite its somewhat glaring artsy fartsy qualities, Schrader's flick might be best summed up as a carefully culturally marinated combination of G. W. Pabst's Pandora's Box (1929), Dirty Dancing (1987), and Sergio Leone's

Once Upon a Time in America (1984), albeit sans any sort of tangible commercial appeal.

Aside from an extremely rare out-of-print VHS, Naked Tango has, somewhat curiously, never been released in the United States in any other home media format. Although just speculation, I can only assume that the film was at least partially buried by its mainstream Hollywood distributor due to its less than flattering depiction of Jews and Jewish history. Indeed, the film is based on the real-life Jewish organized group Zwi Migdal and their international trafficking of young Jewesses from the shtetls of Eastern Europe for sexual slavery during a relatively long period that began in the 1860s and did not end until 1939 after an ex-prostitute named Raquel Liberman started a campaign that ultimately led to their downfall. Somewhat shockingly, the film does not feature a single redeemable Judaic character and instead is full of grotesque Jewish caricatures, namely a cowardly and craven young pimp with an obscene Oedipus complex and his similarly malevolent money-grubbing madam mommy. Incidentally, the film was produced by Jewish producer David Weisman—a protégé of Otto Preminger—who previously produced Paul Morrissey less than philo-semitic mafia satire Spike of Bensonhurst (1988). Notably, Schrader and Weisman previously had a quite monetarily and critically fruitful collaboration with Kiss of the Spider Woman, which seems to be a little bit too polished when compared to the visceral elegance of Naked Tango. Of course, Schrader only acted as a screenwriter on the previous film, but it seems that Weisman somehow expected the first-time-auteur to recapture the same success, albeit with a less than semantically sensitive twist. Naturally, a film about Jewish sex slavery would not be complete without a voluptuous seductive Jewess like Mathilda May of Tobe Hooper's Lifeforce (1985) fame and her supple Khazar milkers (while I typically find Jewesses to be innately grotesque, May is a half-breed and it seems her Swedish genes have done her well in both the titty and derriere department). It should also be noted that various mainstream film critics criticized Naked Tango when it was released due to its less than philo-semitic approach to depicting history. For example, assumed chosenite Ralph Novak complained in his September 16, 1991 review for People magazine that, "Great emphasis is placed on Morales's Jewishness, for no clear reason." Of course, Novak is either being willingly ignorant and/or he did not do his homework, as the film is based on a well-known real-life kosher crime syndicate. Additionally, the Jewish pimp played by Esai Morales hardly seems like a Jewish caricature in terms of physical appearance and certainly does not resemble a cunning gremlin like infamous real-life mobster Meyer Lansky. In short, Naked Tango is probably too aesthetically flattering when it comes to depicting Judaic pimps and gangsters. It seems that film specialists and academics are also unaware that it exists, as it does not get a single reference in Russell Campbell's book Marked Women: Prostitutes and Prostitution in the Cinema (2006), which has been marketed as being the definitive text on the representation of female prostitution in cinema history. Incidentally, the book, which covers everything from New German Cinema to retro Swedish pornography, does dedicate a number of pages to Taxi Driver, which of course Schrader's brother Paul is famous for penning.

NAKED TANGO

Admittedly, while I don't know shit about any form of dancing or ballet, I do have a certain inexplicable fondness for a number of idiosyncratic dance and ballet flicks, including (but certainly not limited to), Max Reichmann's experimental Das Blumenwunder (1926) aka Miracle of Flowers, Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid's debut feature Heute nacht oder nie (1972) aka Tonight or Never, Ingmar Bergman's somewhat obscure avant-garde short De fördömda kvinnornas dans (1976) aka The Condemned Women Dance, the sod serial killer oriented Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men (1989) and other Physical Theatre Company DV8 production related films, Rosa von Praunheim's bizarre neo-Expressionist Anita Berber biopic Anita: Tänze des Lasters (1987) aka Anita: Dances of Vice, and even total senseless trash like Lucio Fulci's dance-giallo Murder Rock (1984) aka Slashdance and mercurial guido auteur Peter Del Monte's abortive arthouse neo-fairytale Etoile (1988) aka Ballet starring a rather young and nubile Jennifer Connelly. Indeed, I also regard the 'danse macabre' scene in Belgian master auteur André Delvaux's Un soir, un train (1968) aka One Night... A Train as being among one of the most startlingly haunting scenes in cinema history. While I personally find tango music to be rather aesthetically disagreeable, it is an innate and imperative ingredient in what is ultimately a mostly delectable, yet sometimes bittersweet, cinematic cuisine that manages to combine an eclectic collection of ingredients, including Jewish gangsters, cabaret, proto-fascist aesthetics, Expressionism, Franz von Stuck, Rudolph Valentino worship, flapper sluts, and the perils of elegant excess, among other things. An erotic arthouse flick disguised as a trashy quasi-musical with a somewhat hermetic period setting, Naked Tango is arguably a grand artistic failure but it also indubitably the dead serious expression of a sick failed artist's wounded soul, thereupon making it a quite apt first (and last) feature for Schrader. Indeed, while Schrader may have only been able to direct one feature film during his life, he at least has never directed anything as hopelessly embarrassing as the incoherent shabbos goy tier shoah shit show Adam Resurrected (2008) or the totally worthless Nicholas Cage vehicle The Dying of the Light (2014) like his younger brother. Additionally, Mathilda May makes for a much more appealing prostitute than Richard Gere in Schrader's somewhat uneven Bressonian crime-romance American Gigolo (1980).

While the film's young and beautiful heroine Stephanie (Mathilda May) might be quite easy on the eyes, it is somewhat hard to sympathize with her plight as she is, quite simply, a spoiled little bitch that dares to wallow in self-pity because she made the obvious mistake of marrying an old fart simply because he was a rich and respected judge. Indeed, Stephanie socially cuckolds her husband Juez Torres (Fernando Rey)—a man that seems to genuinely care for his wife despite having nothing in common with her—at the beginning of the film while they are vacationing on a cruise by dancing with a handsome young waiter, who initially mistakes her spouse for her father. While her husband purports to be a legendary tango dancer and she herself loves to tango, Stephanie is clearly disgusted at the thought of any sort of physical contact with Juez; be it sexual or otherwise. When Juez dares to berate her for her rather obnoxious quasi-slutty public behavior by declaring, “Stop making a scene. You’re acting worse than a whore,” she throws a rather childish fit, storms out of the dance hall and then heads to the deck of a ship where she is somewhat shocked to witness a beautiful nubile young girl stripping off all of her clothes and then committing suicide by jumping overboard. Clearly not the sort of person to miss the opportunity to exploit a good tragedy, Stephanie immediately decides to fake her own death and trades places with the mysterious dead girl by stealing her clothes and then leaving her own items at the scene of the glorious suicidal plunge. Upon discovering the dead girl’s journal, Stephanie discovers that the deceased was a Jewish mail-order bride from Poland and that she is traveling to Buenos Aires to wed a kosher chap. Unfortunately for Stephanie, her mysterious husband-to-be is actually a sly pimp and gangster named Zico Borenstein (Esai Morales) that runs a stylish whorehouse with his obscenely overbearing and equally morally bankrupt mother (Cipe Lincovsky). In short, Stephanie unwittingly goes from riches-to-rags, though she ultimately also goes from being a dishonest whore that married for money to becoming an honest enslaved pussy-peddler that does not even get to keep the money that her she actually earned via whoredom.

Upon arriving in Buenos Aires, Zico—a fairly young man whose counterfeit suaveness is only rivaled by his well hidden cowardice—acts like quite the prim and pristine gentleman and even provides Stephanie with a very expensive diamond ring. Although he intends to turn her into a servile sex slave that makes him cash with her gash, Zico also talks up the local neighborhood, even bragging in regard to his corrupt little ghetto, “You’re going to be very happy here. It’s so much better than the old country. We are very proud of our Jewish community. Before we go back, I’ll introduce you to our kosher butcher, the grocer, the banker, the doctor . . . everyone with money. I mean, everyone important. You’ll be surprised at how fast they make you feel at home.” Notably, Stephanie makes no attempt to pretend she is Jewish and Zico does not seem to suspect that she is a duplicitous shiksa that has her own dubious agenda, thus somewhat ironically making them the perfect couple as far as deceptive behavior and morally bankruptcy are concerned. Also, somewhat ironically, it is ultimately a man that initially displays nil interest in fucking her that makes her feel the most comfortable in her own pearly pale skin. Of course, as woman that married an old fart that she has no physical or emotional chemistry with, Stephanie certainly sees it as beneath her to peddle her pussy at the behest of a kosher nostra gangster for a mere couple of shekels that she will not even be able to keep herself. Luckily, Stephanie will at least finally meet a mensch that eventually falls head over heels in love with her in his own preternatural yet highly flattering fashion, thus naturally reaffirming her regret in regard to getting stuck in a loveless marriage. Unfortunately but not surprisingly, Naked Tango—a film where two somewhat unhinged weirdos with sadomasochistic tendencies discover the ecstatic highs and crushing lows of visceral mad love—does not have a happy ending, at least not in the conventional sense. In short, the (anti)heroine discovers that raw passion always has a hefty price, even when you're a busty little bitch that could have virtually any man you want.

NAKED TANGO

When Stephanie first meets her great love 'Cholo' (Vincent D'Onofrio)—a pathologically cryptic yet hyper hip tango maestro that is high on his own idiosyncratic brand of swag—she is wielding two knives and is fully prepared to defend herself, as she has just stabbed her (pseudo)husband Zico and a grotesquely obese jeweler named Bertoni (played by famous Yiddish actor Zero Mostel's fairly unknown son Josh Mostel). Indeed, on their wedding night, Zico attempted to consummate the marriage by forcing a completely unwitting Stephanie to smoke the lard ass jeweler's seemingly ungodly awful choad. Of course, Stephanie, who had no idea that her husband was a pernicious pimp, naturally resisted and thus was forced to stab both Zico and Bertoni in the process. Proving to be the only man that can control Stephanie, Cholo literally grabs her by the pussy and the lifts her up in the air, though he is in for somewhat of a shock when he immediately develops a completely electric erotic attraction while she is attempting to stab him, as if he can immediately sense, like an ancient vampire, a fellow unhinged tango fanatic. Although practically worshiped by virtually every single woman (and even some men) in the area, Cholo loathes sex and seems to see tango dancing as a substitute that is much purer and authentic than actual coitus. Indeed, as a flaming fag hairdresser named Gastón (Patricio Bisso) states in regard to Cholo's preternatural proclivities, "We'd all give our long lost cherries to sleep with him but he sleeps with horses. He's never given any girl a second look." With Stephanie, Cholo gives her a whole lot more than a second look and he ultimately pays the greatest price for it. While Zico attempts to coerce Cholo into killing Stephanie since she is a witness-cum-perpetrator in the murder of the mafia-connected jeweler Bertoni and thus can get them in trouble with a ruthless outfit of Italian gangsters known as the 'Black Hand,' he cannot break his almost immediately self-destructive obsession with her and instead immediately proceeds to focus on transforming her into a sort of designer whore of his dreams. Indeed, after forcing her to get a dark black Louise Brooks-esque flapper hairdo and to take the exotic whore name 'Alba,' Cholo—a suave and romantic yet seemingly sociopathic sicko that commits violence and murder with a certain unrivaled finesse that is comparable to his tango moves—cannot stop his rather deleterious obsession with making love with Stephanie via tango. On top of refusing to shove his almost mythical member in her clearly warm and ready snatch, Cholo also curiously forces Stephanie to wear a blindfold while they dance. In fact, Cholo is such an obsessive lunatic that he also has his own personal three-person tango band that he also forces to wear blindfolds, as if these almost phantom-like elderly musicians, who act as a sort of Greek chorus for the film, are too lowly and aesthetically handicapped to appreciate his perversely penetrating phantasmagoric dance moves.

As a result of her role in the death of mob-connected lardo jeweler Bertoni, Stephanie's life is threatened by both yid pimp Zico and the Black Hand mobsters, so it is a good thing that Cholo becomes absolutely infatuated with her. Indeed, while best buds with Zico and an associate of sorts with the goombah gangsters of the Black Hand, Cholo does not have to think twice about going to war with both just to defend Stephanie. In fact, after saving her from some somewhat intellectually disadvantaged guido gangsters, Cholo declares to Stephanie, who he has personally rechristened 'Alba,' in an almost sinisterly sensual fashion, "I'm sorry. This won't happen again. Don't worry, Alba. I'd never let anyone else kill you." Instead of killing Stephanie, Cholo forces her to do the tango blindfolded sans clothing. While Stephanie is also a tango fanatic of sorts, she much rather have Cholo's cock and practically begs him for it repeatedly but, unfortunately for her, he sees sex as sickening. A somewhat paradoxical chap that radiates a certain alluring degree of machismo and androgyny, Cholo is clearly the man of Stephanie's dreams, at least as far as sheer sex appeal is concerned. When Stephanie cries to Cholo while lying naked in pimp Zico's bed, "I don't know what sex with you is," he replies, "Yes, you do. All sex is the same. It just leaves you more sad. The beauty you're born with does not count. The only thing that counts is the beauty you make." If Cholo was an intellectual, one can certainly imagine him saying something in the vein of Georges Bataille like, "Nudity is only death, and the most tender kisses have the after-taste of the rat." Incidentally, Stephanie's eventual premature death while involve her nudity. As Stephanie learns, real beauty to Cholo is doing the tango in a blood-drenched abattoir while sticking a dagger under your lover's throat. Of course, Stephanie never gives up on attempting to coerce Cholo into jumping her bones, which he eventually does after murdering some pathetic wop gangster. Needless to say, Cholo does not shy away from pounding Stephanie's puss while her buxom bare ass is sitting on broken glass. In short, the fact that Jewish and guido gangsters are trying to kill them only adds more passion to Stephanie and Cholo's quite literally lethally lurid love affair. Unfortunately, being a woman, Stephanie still has strong survival instincts and an insatiable thirst for material things, so she eventually betrays Cholo and goes back to her wealthy judge husband, but not before burning a building down and quite selfishly risking the lives of many innocent people in the process, thus underscoring her sense of quasi-sociopathic greed and self-worship. Naturally, Cholo refuses to let Stephanie go and she cannot deny her undying love for the twisted tango maestro, so it is not long before they are reunited. Needless to say, the lovers are doomed.

NAKED TANGO

In the spirit of classic European ‘impossible love’ myths like Tristan and Iseult and Orpheus and Eurydice and film reworkings of such perennial stories like the Jean Cocteau-penned Vichy era classic L’Éternel retour (1943) aka The Eternal Return directed Jean Delannoy, Naked Tango naturally concludes in a tragically romantic fashion with the leads being completely destroyed because of their quite impossible forbidden love. Indeed, when Stephanie decides to once again betray her husband and choose Cholo over him, he finally loses his patience and opts to kill her in what can only be described as a crime of cuckold passion. Of course, when the judge shoots Stephanie, Cholo immediately retaliates and does so by suavely and quite effortlessly throwing a knife through the old fart’s swarthy decrepit Latin neck. In the end, the judge’s henchman—corrupt local Prussianesque cops that shoot first and ask questions later—unleash a storm of bullets on Cholo and Stephanie as they quite literally take their last dance together. As a symbolic act of both true love and heroic defiance, Cholo uses his last couple moments alive to raise Stephanie lifeless body in the air as if he is trying to vain to send her off to heaven while his feet are just beginning to feel the warmth of the pits of hell. As individuals that were clearly not built for marriage or kids that indubitably reached the zenith of their love for another, Stephanie and Cholo could not have left this world together in a more appropriate fashion. Luckily, Cholo manages to execute Zico as revenge for his betrayal shortly before his own death. Quite symbolically considering the neurotic maternal spirit of Ashkenazi Jewry, Zico’s mother seems to be the only one that survives the blood bath and now she can keep all of the whorehouse money for herself instead of splitting it with her pimp son.

As history certainly demonstrates from Samson’s harlot of Gaza to Heidi ‘Hollywood Madam’ Fleiss, Jews and prostitution go together like peas and carrots, yet Naked Tango is probably the only film that dares to take a fearless and less than politically incorrect approach to the subject. Notably, in her book Luftmord: Sexual Murder in Weimar Germany (1995), Maria Tatar noted in regard to the literary tradition of Jews and prostitution, “Jews came to be linked not only with the perpetrators of sexual murder, but with the victims as well. Like the prostitute, the Jew is seen to represent a serious threat to the moral, fiscal, and sexual economy of the social body. As Sander Gilman has pointed out, both prostitutes and Jews have been liked by what is seen to be a sexualized relation to capital—they have ‘but one interest, the conversion of sex into money or money into sex.’ Unable to find value in transcendent spiritual matters, their interests remain fixed on the material and financial. More important, prostitutes and Jews, because of their spiritual corruption, are considered carriers of sexually transmitted diseases, a view clearly articulated in Hitler’s MEIN KAMPF.” Ironically and somewhat cynically, the protagonists of the film, especially female lead Stephanie, are ultimately destroyed as a result of abandoning material consumption for visceral true love. Interestingly, the leads are ultimately victims of greed and treachery of a Jewish pimp in a film that, quite unintentionally, lends authority to Uncle Adolf's words, "Particularly with regard to syphilis, the attitude of those who guide the nation and the state can only be described as total capitulation [...] The cause lies primarily in the prostitution of love [...] This Jewification of the spiritual life and mammonization of the mating instinct will sooner or later destroy all of our descendants." Of course, the protagonists die before they can even produce descendants despite their eventual abandoning of both literal and spiritual prostitution. Indeed, were it not such a debauched film, Schrader's debut feature could be mistaken as an homage to the classic high-camp melodramas of National Socialist auteur Veit Harlan. Naturally, the fact that it was directed by a lifelong leftist and draft-dodger that previously directed liberal anti-American agitprop makes Naked Tango seem like an all the more inexplicable cinematic work, so it is really no big surprise that has been tragically consigned to the celluloid dustbin of history.

While Naked Tango certainly seems a little bit culturally mongrelized due to its glaring international cast and mostly pleasantly preternatural period setting that oftentimes more resembles Weimar Berlin than Buenos Aires in terms of aesthetic spirit, the film is indubitably deeply rooted in both cultural and social history and reflects Schrader's sagely understanding of art, cinema, and literature as indicated by the film's use aesthetic influences ranging from Manuel Puig to German Expressionism. Indeed, aside from being inspired by the real-life Jewish sex slavery outfit Zwi Migdal, the film follows in the tradition of certain forgotten Jewish art, or as explained at the Jewish Virtual Library, "Yiddish literature of the early 20th century contains a number of powerful portrayals of the social and personal costs of widespread prostitution including Sholem Asch's GOD OF VENGEANCE and Perets Hirschbein's MIRIAM. A 1908 performance of the latter in Buenos Aires led to a bloody public riot." Of course, the almost gothic-like Jewish ghetto setting seems to be largely window dressing for Schrader's eclectic aesthetic obsessions. After all, I doubt many Hebraic whorehouses have stained glass windows modeled after some of Franz von Stuck's greatest paintings, including Die Sünde (1893) aka The Sin and Sphinx (1904). Somewhat ironically considering the film's degenerate Jewish setting, von Stuck was apparently apparently Adolf Hitler's favorite painter. Notably, when Aryan Christ Jung wrote in his book Symbols of Transformation (1956) in regard to von Stuck's paintings, "The mixture of anxiety and lust is perfectly expressed in the sultry atmosphere of these pictures," he certainly could have also been describing Schrader's film. In a January 07, 1990 interview with John M. Wilson at the Los Angeles Times in regard to the production of the film, Schrader demonstrated he was personally obsessed with romance, arguing, "For me, the essence of romance, for all its high-octane fuel, is for romance to burn itself out. In the ashes of romance can grow a more mature, a different kind of love. The more chance you have to take romance all the way to the end, the more chance you have to be ready for the next phase. Most of us only have the courage to take it halfway.” Of course, the lovers in the film go all the way in terms of their love and pay the ultimate price for it, but as Schrader stated in the same interview, “Most romances keep the element of death hidden under the table. I wanted to put it square in the middle of the table.”

NAKED TANGO

It seems that Schrader, who apparently liked the emotional of security of knowing that he was always sleeping with a loaded weapon under his pillow and thus could kill himself at any time, was a somewhat tragic self-destructive individual who was a slave of the Todestrieb. While putting together Naked Tango in the editing room, Schrader even expressed a certain irrational excitement in regard to the artistic uncertainty of his film, stating, “This is why I love it—every choice, every step, every moment is crucial. I love to be in that position, where I can win or lose, because it means that what I’m doing counts.” Judging simply by his statement, it makes one wonder whether or not Schrader was attempting to sabotage his own career by making a film about rather unsavory Jewish pimps and gangsters while working in the hyper Hebraic realm of Hollywood. Of course, despite his brother Paul ultimately directing the film, Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985)—a somewhat experimental biopic of the great Japanese novelist and neo-fascist Yukio Mishima—was ultimately Schrader’s brainchild and an expression of his own romantic and self-destructive tendencies. Knowing this, I can only assume that Leonard was the more subversive and intelligent of the two brothers, but sadly it seems he was an underachiever that was too antisocial and just plain mentally ill to establish a filmmaking career that was extensive as his own little bro. It seems that Schrader was also somewhat lazy, as he spent the majority of his life as ‘script doctor’ which, to quote the failed auteur, allowed him to obtain, “big money for a short amount of work.” Unfortunately, Naked Tango was ultimately such a huge failure that it is all but totally unknown in Schrader’s own homeland and currently unavailable in any home media format, though it seems to have developed some minor success in Europe and Argentina. Still, I doubt that Schrader would have ever been capable of developing any sort of big mainstream success. Indeed, as a strange introverted intellectual that seemed to suffer posttraumatic success as a result of strict and totally movie-less Dutch Calvinist upbringing, the failed auteur probably did not relate to most people. Additionally, I am not surprised that the man that directed Naked Tango also once candidly confessed, “I would be sitting alone in some room at three o’clock in the morning with a loaded gun, thinking about blowing my brains out. It was not, ‘I’m having a bad day, I wanted to kill myself’; no, the desire, the need, felt as real as a fucking table. I want to do this, and I never want to do this. I’m three seconds away from it, and I’m three million years away from it. I felt the fever of two things inside me fighting. I was breaking out in a sweat, my temperature was going up from the intensity of it. Sometimes I would just stare at the wall, trying to quiet the heat down, but sometimes the heat kept building, and that's when I was looking for the gun. Triggered by something physical, like I couldn't sleep. I found out that if I stuck the barrel in my mouth, like some infant's pacifier, I could fall asleep. It worked for two or three weeks, and all of a sudden, it didn't work. I'd been sucking on an empty gun. I knew if I loaded the sonofabitch, I was gonna sleep tonight." While Schrader was apparently not a fag since he was married to a Jap chick, somehow it seems fitting that his real-life, as demonstrated by the above quote, sometimes resembled a scene out of Jean Genet's sole film Un chant d'amour (1950) aka A Song of Love.

-Ty E

BAD BLOOD
BAD BLOOD

Leos Carax (1986)

If there ever was a true diva of the pornographic realm, it was Georgina Spelvin who, at 36-years-old, was nearly middle-aged when she became famous by playing the lead role in Gerard Damiano's wickedly lecherous porn chic classic The Devil in Miss Jones (1973) where she played an old sexless spinster who commits suicide but later gets a sexual chance at unholy sensuality after ending up in purgatory and begging an angel to allow her to earn her rightful place in hell via rampant lechery. Already over-the-hill by fuck film standards and not exactly the most beautiful nor busty babe in the world, Spelvin's popularity relied heavily on her sassy attitude, genuine acting talents, and eccentric erotic charms, as a sort of diva of debauchery whose maturity of age more than hinted at well developed carnal knowledge. If one questions Spelvin's acting talents, they simply need to check out her mostly unclad silent style slapstick comedic performance as an obscenely undersexed Bathsheba in Wakefield Poole's underrated erotic arthouse biblical epic Bible! (1974), or her haunting Bergman-esque performance in Orson Welles' protégé Gary Graver's arthouse blue movie 3 A.M. (1975) where she portrays a lonely yet lecherous spinster who tragically accidentally kills her brother-in-law who she has been carrying on a long affair with and is thus forced to live with her undying guilt over her deep dark secret while living in the largely incestuous company of her pill-popping widowed sister, nephew, and bisexual niece. Of course, like many genuinely talented porn thespians of the porn chic era, Spelvin would also make an attempt at a more 'respectable' acting career by appearing in a couple of non-pornographic films, including small and less than dignified roles as a hooker in both Police Academy (1984) and Police Academy 3: Back in Training (1986), but she did not really get a chance to fully display her true acting talents until pornographic auteur Chuck Vincent (Roommates, Jack 'n Jill) gave her the opportunity to star in his wonderfully warped Gothic psychological horror-thriller Bad Blood (1989) aka A Woman Obsessed aka A Woman's Obsession aka Blutige Liebe as a whacked-out widowed rich bitch of the madly murderous sort who uses her alluring opulence and psychopathic charms to lure in and sexually enslave her long lost son who she schizophrenically mistakes for her long dead husband. A sort of hyper histrionic Reagan era neo-hagsploitation flick where the old homicidal hag is thankfully at least marginally attractive, Vincent's unsurprisingly underrated psychosexual psychodrama, like the director's similarly underrated Repulsion-esque chamber piece Deranged (1987), is an extremely morbid, tastefully twisted, and borderline 'misogynistic' little movie that depicts female mental illness in its most unsettling form. Like the old school psycho-biddy bitch spirits of classics like Sunset Boulevard (1950) and What Ever Happened to Baby Jane? (1962) haunting the same unhinged celluloid universe as Misery (1990) in a work that seems like it was directed by the bastard brood of Alfred Hitchcock and Swiss arthouse auteur Daniel Schmid (La Paloma, Schatten der Engel aka Shadow of Angels), Bad Blood is killer cultivated kitsch with high-camp elements that demonstrates in a horrifyingly hysterical and sometimes darkly humorous fashion that Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned, especially if she is a stinking rich spoiled bitch with a rather unconventional daddy issue who hasn't gotten over her less than faithful hubby's grizzly death from a couple decades ago.

Ted Barnes (second-rate porn star Randy Spears under the pseudonym 'Gregory Patrick') is a seemingly soulless preppie lawyer and proud mindless workaholic who would probably suck Ronald Reagan's cock if asked to and who literally wastes no time doing banal preppie things, even jogging while in his office to get exercise. One day, while jogging in downtown Manhattan, a sneering fag queen named Bobby (Frank Stewart of Gorman Bechar'd's Psychos in Love (1987) and Vincent's Cleo/Leo (1989)) approaches him and literally drags him into his art gallery to show Ted a portrait painting that looks exactly like him to prove to himself that he is "not hallucinating" since the drugs he has been taking recently are "not that good." Indeed, the man in the painting is the spitting image of Ted and as the gallery queen Bobby explains to him, it was painted by "some dilettante from Long Island" that "thinks she can paint." As the bitchy cocksucker gallery owner also explains, the ostensible artist behind the painting rented the gallery for an entire month just to display her work and when Ted asks him for her name and address, he explains that she refuses to give it out, as if she has something to hide. Unquestionably, the strangest thing of all is that the painting was done in 1964 when Ted would have been just a newborn baby and surely not the generically handsome proud preppie prima donna he is today. Interested to find out who was responsible for the painting, Ted goes with his revoltingly sassy know-it-all wife Evie (child actress turned exploitation diva Linda Blair of The Exorcist (1973) and Tom DeSimone's Hell Night (1981)) to the official gallery showing where they are soon aggressively approached by the artist, Arlene Bellings (Georgina Spelvin under the pseudonym 'Ruth Raymond'), who declares that she is "the creator of these masterpieces" and invites the married couple to dinner, thus somewhat strangely leaving in the middle of her own show, as if she just set it up as a way to lure in the two strangers. Needless to say, Ted is in for quite the shock when Arlene proclaims that their meeting was an act of fate and that she is his mother, he is her long lost son, and the man in the painting is her husband/his father. After revealing that she created the painting in 1964 just after her husband Joe stole him when he was just a wee baby and disappeared into New York City, materialistic turd Ted freaks out and threatens to sue Arlene for "everything" she has, "including the kitchen sink." Of course, Ted's initial instincts are right, as Arlene is a bat-shit crazy bitch, though it will take a dead wife and falling victim to a savage mother-on-son rape for him to completely figure this out, as he is a man who has got his eyes on the money and his long lost mother has got tons of it.

BAD BLOOD

When Ted goes to his mother Wanda (Carolyn Van Bellinghen of Vincent's two 1989 films Bedroom Eyes II and Enrapture) about Arlene's claims, she breaks down and confesses that she 'stole' him out of the fear that her husband Jack (Troy Donahue of Douglas Sirk's Imitation of Life (1959) and John Waters Cry-Baby (1990)) would leave her since she was infertile. Apparently a man offered Wanda a baby boy if she screwed him and that baby was Ted, who she visited frequently while contemplating whether or not she should cheat on her husband so that they both could have a son. One day, Wanda went to see the man and the baby, only to find the latter by itself with the man nowhere in sight, so she stole the infant and the rest was history. Of course, the man with the baby was Ted's biological father Joe. Upon receiving the confirmation from Wanda that Arlene is indeed his biological mother, he decides to take a trip with his wife to his long lost progenitor's darkly glamorous Gothic home in Long Island. When Ted and his wife arrive at the huge ancient and somewhat ominous estate, there is a huge fancy party and the protagonist is told by Arlene that it is his "welcome home" celebration. While hanging out at the party, Ted is approached by an old drunk dude named Jasper (Harvey Siegel of Vincent's Deranged and Bedroom Eyes II) who states, "Your Dad and I were in the navy together...enlisted the same day. We had a girl in every port, you know?! Joe had two, sometimes three." When Ted asks if he has heard from his father recently, Jasper reveals that his biological mother's wealthy father blew poor Joe's brains out. That night, Arlene explains her father's hatred towards his deceased father 'Joe Jenkins', stating, "Daddy said you could tell by the name how 'common' he was and insisted I continue using my maiden name even after Joe and I were married...couldn't have a daughter of his named Jenkins, oh no. But Joe didn't care, he just laughed. Of course, Joe didn't care much about anything. See, Daddy was convinced that Joe was a bum who was only after my money. It was true of course, but I didn't care. I loved him. I loved him more than I ever loved anything. You probably find it hard to believe...Joe brought the first true happiness I ever knew in my life. He made me feel alive...like a real person, instead of daddy's little windup doll and he loved me too, I know he did." Arlene then goes on to tell Ted how his father began cheating on her when she became pregnant because, "nine months of sexual abstinence was simply not in Joe's nature." Ultimately, Arlene's father blew Joe's brains out after he asked for a divorced and subsequently kidnapped baby Ted and tried to blackmail the distraught mother with it. Indeed, it seems Ted has accursed blood with a deep irreparable taint.

Ted begins suspecting his biological mother might have a screw loose after catching her ripping up a bouquet of flowers on her father's tombstone while hysterically screaming, "Joe has come back just like I thought he would and you will never be able to keep us apart again. Joe and I will have everything and you will rot in hell." When Ted goes inside, he becomes quite startled after bump-ing into the sexy yet appallingly dumb and annoyingly talkative maid Crystal (Christina Veronica of scifi-horror-comedy They Bite (1996)), who attempts to seduce him while sucking on a carrot like it is a cock, even opening her robe so he can checkout her carnal goods, but the discernibly intimidated lawyer turns her down. At the end of the scene, it is revealed that Arlene has been listening to the entire conversation between Ted and Crystal on the other side of the wall. When it is revealed that Crystal has disappeared the next day, it becomes quite apparent who is responsible. Meanwhile, Ted wife's Evie becomes so sick that she becomes bedridden and a doc soon reveals that she is suffering from "good old fashioned food poisoning," with Arlene's hors d'oeuvres being the culprit for her illness. Naturally, when Arlene gives Ted his father's prestigious purple heart and promises him that he will inherit everything she owns, the lost son finds it easier to overlook his mother's bizarre possessive behavior and various other idiosyncrasies. When Ted and his wife finally decide to leave Arlene's home due to the latter's poor health, they end up unwittingly running over Crystal's corpse, which a cop reveals had already been dead 12-14 hours before they ran over it as a result of being brutally beaten to death. Due to the tragic roadkill incident, as well as because of Evie's declining health, the two decide to stay at Arlene's for a little longer in what ultimately proves to be the biggest mistake of their entire lives. Despite the fact that her maid has been mysteriously brutally murdered, Arlene is in a rather excited mood and forces her son to dance with her while repeatedly 'accidentally' calling him Joe. Meanwhile, after feeding some of her food to Arlene's kitty cat Twinkie that results in the feline's subsequent death, Evie realizes she has been poisoned and attempts to crawl down stairs to tell Ted, who has been drugged himself and begins losing consciousness while dancing with his decidedly deranged progenitor. When Evie finally manages to crawl downstairs and spots her semi-conscious husband being sexually taken advantage of, Arlene grabs a large butcher knife, chases her around, and ultimately slits her throat in front of a roaring fire while poor Teddy boy watches helplessly as his messed up mommy maliciously murders his beloved wife.

When Ted finally awakes, he finds his arms and legs bound to a bed and his mental case mommy calling him 'Joe.' Indeed, with Evie and maid Crystal out of the picture, Arlene can finally fully live out her terribly twisted schizophrenic fantasy that her son is her long dead husband. Of course, Arlene eventually rapes her son by mounting him while he is tied to the bed and stating, "oh Joe, I've waited so long" in a rather waywardly wanton scene that is easily the most overtly 'erotic' scene in the entire film. Arlene also reveals that it was not her father but she who actually murdered Ted's father Joe after threatening her son with the following words, "I'll get daddy's 22 and blow your brains out just like I did before." Hoping to renew her vows with the long dead hubby that she personally murdered, Arlene begins planning a large lavish wedding at her home where Ted will be the groom. Meanwhile, Ted's adoptive parents come by Arlene's house asking for him and when the crazed cunt makes the dubious claim that their son and Evie "went antiquing," they know it is complete and utter bullshit because, as Wanda states, "Those two wouldn't know an antique from a piece of junk." Of course, Ted suffers much torture under Arlene's watch, including the slow breaking of his toes while his mad incestuous mommy sings the nursery rhyme "This Little Piggy" in what one might describe as a warped way for an estranged mother to catch up on her maternal duties. During the day of the big wedding, Ted's adoptive mother walks in on Arlene giving Ted a shave while he is tied to a chair and a somewhat darkly humorous cat fight soon ensues. Brutalized and beaten to the point of complete physical and psychological incapacitation, Ted watches helplessly as Arlene drowns Wanda in a bathtub. When Ted's adoptive father Jack catches Arlene with his badly beaten son, another brawl breaks out that results in the old man falling on his back from a floor or two after being push over a railing and assumedly dying. After that, Wanda, who miraculously survived the drowning, once again attempts to save her son, so Arlene chases her around with a straight razor. Like some retarded slasher killer like Jason Voorhees or Michael Myers, Arlene is seemingly repeatedly killed, but she keeps coming back. Eventually, father Jack puts a couple bullets in Arlene just before she attempts to slit his wife's throat. Ironically, while succumbing to her injuries, Arlene manages to walk down the aisle of her wedding, albeit without her mensch, thus making for one of the most distinctly pathetic embarrassments a woman could ever suffer. While Ted and his two adoptive parents survive the ugly ordeal, he is plagued by ominous Oedipal nightmares involving his belated biological mother Arlene, who haunts her prodigal son's dreams like a sort of femme fatale Freddy Krueger.

BAD BLOOD

Except maybe when I was a naive little kid, I have never believed the stereotype that women are more romantic and sentimental than men. Yeah, a lot of chicks can be conned into being fucked if you feed their egos with kind words, sweet gestures, and worthless gifts, but women are for the most part more practical about life and will dump a man they genuinely love for a man that repels them if he has enough money and other forms of security to provide her with, so the idea of a rich woman not getting over her long dead, deadbeat lumpenprole hubby after around three decades seems somewhat preposterous, but then again, that is one of the reasons that Georgina Spelvin's character is oh-so damn creepy in Bad Blood, though I cannot say that I would not be strangely flattered if some girl loved me so much that she still loved me three decades after blowing my brains out with a .22 rifle. Unquestionably, Spelvin embodies the hyper hysterical emotionally wounded woman in the film to the point of seeming like a female Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde with a perennial case of PMS. Indeed, she might forever best be remembered for her performance in The Devil in Miss Jones, but Spelvin gives her greatest, most captivating and penetrating performance in Bad Blood to the point where she makes her co-star Linda 'The Exorcist' Blair look like an outstandingly annoying and insufferable little plodding twat and more of a distracting dork than the dignified exploitation diva that she has a reputation for being. In fact, it's impossible to imagine Vincent's film without Spelvin, as she is certainly to the film what Gloria Swanson was to Sunset Boulevard (1950) and what Vivien Leigh was to Gone with the Wind (1939). In its debasing depiction of a foredoomed family plagued by inter-generational incest and violent coldblooded murder, as well as its delightfully daunting depiction of homicidally hysterical lovelorn females, Bad Blood is like an Andy Milligan film on steroids, albeit with the use of some minor avant-garde techniques, including split-screen and an unforgettable slow-motion 'dance of death' sequence concluding with Spelvin's character romantically kissing her son as his wife watches on in horror.

The ultimate anti-Oedipal horror show and odious celluloid orgy of incestuous blood, Bad Blood could have only been dreamed up by homos with a Tennessee Williams-esque contempt for straight men and aberrant admiration for strong and sadistic older women. Indeed, aside from Vincent directing the film, the work was penned by queer screenwriter Craig Horrall (who also wrote Vincent's Deranged and Slammer Girls), who incidentally succumbed to AIDS the same year as the director, whose films he also worked on as a casting director, actor, and even assistant director, among various other capacities. Notably, while depicting women as homicidal hysterics, Bad Blood also portrays hotshot heterosexual lawyers as weak ass helpless wusses who need their mothers to fight their fights for them. In short, one of the greatest aspects of Vincent's film, like much of the director's other work, is its wickedly warped yet strikingly nuanced depiction of sexual relations. Indeed, in its fag style misogyny, Bad Blood depicts the unsettling traits of certain women that no heterosexual man is either able to fathom and/or is willing to accept, hence the true source of the film's horror.

-Ty E

WERNER HERZOG EATS HIS SHOE
WERNER HERZOG EATS HIS SHOE

Les Blank (1980)

The title is pretty self-explanatory. Acclaimed eccentric director Werner Herzog once made a promise to his friend Errol Morris that if he finished his film Gates of Heaven, he would eat his shoes. Mixed with footage from old Charlie Chaplin scenes and interviews from the director in his almost-youth, Les Blank creates a documentary that not shows Herzog eating his cooked shoes, but also discussing problems with society.

This is a curio that is highly sought after although being a special feature on the Criterion release of Burden of Dreams. The scenes of Herzog dictating his beliefs on Capitalism and such are increasingly engaging and only adds to the enigma that is Herzog. As shown in his acting role in Julien Donkey-Boy, Werner is an accomplished anything but that will soon be put to the test as the release date of his Bad Lieutenant remake starring Nicholas Cage looms closer. Werner Herzog is a bold director and humanitarian. His visions on film have shocked thousands and moved millions. It's no surprise that watching him eat his own shoe would be of an entertaining essence, but it is a greater surprise that he is so charismatic about the whole deal and continues to view life with such a wide-eye; similar to his camera methods.

-mAQ

SCHALCKEN THE PAINTER

Leslie Megahey (1979)

Forget the various hokey Hammer Horror films based on the works and characters of the Irish Gothic novelist Sheridan Le Fanu, like Roy Ward Baker's The Vampire Lovers (1970) starring Ingrid Pitt, Jimmy Sangster's Lust for a Vampire (1971) and John Hough's Twins of Evil (1971) starring Peter Cushing, Schalcken the Painter (1979) directed by Leslie Megahey (Duke Bluebeard's Castle, The Advocate aka The Hour of the Pig) is not only hands down the greatest and most cultivated Sheridan Le Fanu reworking from the 1970s, despite being based on one of the writer's lesser known works, but also, aside from Carl Th. Dreyer's masterwork Vampyr (1931), the best, most ambitious, and singular film based on a work by the Victorian era Dark Romanticist ever made. Indeed, I do not like to throw around the word 'masterpiece,' but with its tight and claustrophobic direction, decadent yet dignified tableaux and mise-en-scène, cool and collected yet foreboding atmosphere, ostensibly docudrama-like yet classical approach to storytelling, and truly striking and idiosyncratic all-around flavor, Megahey's 68-minute piece of phantasmagorical Gothic horror is certainly a work that seems to be free of all flaws, or at least hides them well. Adapted from Le Fanu's 1839 short story A Strange Event in the Life of Schalcken the Painter—a work aesthetically inspired by the ghostly atmospheric candlelit paintings of 17th-century Dutch Golden Age painter Godfried Schalcken, who also happens to be the lead character of the story—Schalcken the Painter is a darkly (anti)romantic doom-and-gloom-addled ghost story about a young and cowardly yet nonetheless talented Flemish painter who finds himself forsaking love and happiness for artistic ambition after letting his beloved fall into the hands of a grotesque elderly 'demonic lover.' As the head of BBC's arts documentary program Omnibus, auteur Megahey cleverly sold the story as a 'documentary' and was ultimately able to assemble what amounts to an experimental Gothic horror flick, which was also screened as part of the BBC's annual broadcast 'A Ghost Story for Christmas' on December 23, 1979.

Like a Gothic horror film as directed by the rampantly heterosexual twin of Teutonic dandy auteur Werner Schroeter, albeit minus the camp elements and featuring a relatively straightforward storyline, with a mise-en-scène inspired by paintings by both the eponymous subject and his more bourgeois Baroque fellow countryman Johannes Vermeer, Schalcken the Painter is like a virtual living Dutch Golden Age art museum set in some sort of perennially pernicious Calvinist purgatory where all love is lost and has been replaced with lust and where sin, especially greed, reigns. Inspired by the paintings of an artist that is probably best known for his unrivaled mastery in reproducing the effect of candlelight, Megahey's celluloid chiaroscuro might seem like it was inspired by Stanley Kubrick's underrated epic European period piece Barry Lyndon (1975), but the director has credited its inspiration to the more obscure tragic medieval love story Blanche (1972) directed by Polish painter turned animator turned cinematic auteur Walerian Borowczyk. A multilayered subtextual work that is simultaneously a morality tale about the haunting dread that accompanies fame and fortune over true love, an anti-capitalist fable that depicts money as the root of all 'evil,' a scathing crypto-feminist critique of the so-called institution of marriage, an experimental art history (pseudo)documentary that analyzes the life and work of Schalcken, and a foreboding abstract re-working of arthouse folk horror, Schalcken the Painter is a film that does many things and somehow manages to do them rather well, thus making it seem like auteur Megahey, who is far from a household name, made some sort of Faustian pact that gave him the artistry but not the fame and fortune.

SCHALCKEN THE PAINTER

Opening with an off-screen Godfried Schalken (Jeremy Clyde of the British TV series William Tell aka Crossbow (1987-1989) and The Iron Lady (2011) starring Meryl Streep) telling a beautiful classical Nordic model to, "Turn from the light. Your breast bare. Look into the dark," Schalcken the Painter then sends the viewer into literal and figurative darkness where the viewer is greeted by an unseen narrator (fittingly provided by Charles Gray of The Devil Rides Out (1968) and The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975) in a role considered for Vincent Price and offered to Peter Cushing) who describes how his great-grandfather knew the Flemish painter well and states regarding a painting featured in the scene: "To my mind, there are some paintings that impress one with a conviction that they represent not merely the imagined shapes and characters conceived in the mind of the artist, but scenes or faces or situations that have actually existed. There is in one strange picture that intangible something which stamps it as just such a representation of reality. It's a remarkable work by the Dutch painter Schalcken." The painting in question features a beautiful young woman in the foreground holding a large candle while a young man is drawing a sword in the background as if afraid of the seemingly harmless lady, with the rest of the painting being total abyss-like blackness. By the end of the film, the viewer will know what inspired this painting, and that the antihero Schalcken, through weakness and self-absorption, unwittingly sired a demon that haunted him until his lonely death. Schalcken's story begins in 1665 at the Leiden-based studio of his teacher Gerrit Dou (Maurice Denham of John Schlesinger's Sunday Bloody Sunday (1971) and The Day of the Jackal (1973)), who was the student of the great Rembrandt van Rijn and earned great fame due to his "exquisitely detailed and minutely executed paintings," but by age 30, had gone progressively blind and thus became a teacher. While Schalcken will receive a "traditionally formal and academic education" from Dou, his later and greater work "seems to have its roots in some private world of dreams, perhaps never otherwise expressed." The gatekeeper of this "private world of dreams" is Dou's stunning young niece Rose Velderkaust (British TV actress Cheryl Kennedy), who "had all the charm of the fair light-skinned Flemish maidens,” hence why Schalcken will fall in love with her at virtual first sight “as much as a Dutchman can” (unquestionably, the film has a less than favorable view of the national character of the Dutch), but he will ultimately prove not man enough to be worthy of her love.

Behind goofy old fart Dou’s back, Schalcken and Rose start a seemingly harmless love affair mostly comprised of sensual glances and romantic whispers, but their love is soon tested when an elderly ghoul of a fellow named ‘Minjheer Vanderhausen of Rotterdam’ (a rather ghastly and corpse-like John Justin of The Thief of Bagdad (1940)) with a chest full of gold jewelry demands that Dou sign away his niece to him immediately in exchange for the small fortune he has brought. Somewhat reluctantly, Dou gives into his greed and sells his niece to the tall and seemingly rotting ghoul despite Rose’s plea, “Oh Uncle, what a terrible creature. I could never look on that face again for all the wealth of the states.” Rose also reveals that she remembers seeing Vanderhausen, who she describes as an “old wooden figure,” staring creepily at her at a Rotterdam church when she was just a little girl, but her uncle couldn’t care less because, as the film’s narrator states, “Marriages were matters of traffic and calculation. The unfortunate girl was simply the object of a contract.” While Rose attempts to convince Schalcken to run away with her, the painter refuses and states, “I will work, Rose. In the future, I will buy back the contract. I will buy it back double.” Of course, he never has the opportunity to buy her back and as the narrator states regarding the rest of the film, “I have no sentimental scenes to describe, no exquisite details of the cruelty of a guardian, no agonies or transports of lovers. The record I have to make is one of heartlessness, nothing more. The contract was signed, and settlements made even more splendid than Dou ever dreamed of.” Naturally, Rose and Vanderhausen wed but, after the ceremony, both bride and groom disappear without a trace, as if pulled into the bowels of hell to consummate their unholy marriage. When Dou does not hear from his niece or her new husband after weeks, he sends Schalcken to Rotterdam to look for them so as “to satisfy himself as to the comfort and safety of Rose,” but “no one had ever heard of the rich Minjheer Vanderhausen.”

While one might suspect that Schalcken would fall into a deep van Gogh-esque depression after losing his beloved, “bit by bit, the impulse of love gave way to that of ambition” and the painter satisfied his sexual longings by regularly meeting with a prostitute named Hendrije (Helena Clayton of exploitation trash like The Brick Dollhouse (1967) and The Rebel Rousers (1970)) to satisfy his carnal lust in between devoting virtually all of his time to his blossoming painting career, whose work the narrator describes as seeming “to draw upon elements of a peculiarly personal nature, and yet with no apparent foundation in what we know of the life of the painter. In all the paintings I have seen, I have remarked a strange distance in the relationship of the human figures therein. Contacts made only perhaps by the expected conventions and courtesies of polite society, or by commercial transaction. Sensuality without warmth, without passion. Trappings that are ornate and lovely, and yet set in a darkness that the faltering lamplight or candle flame never seems capable of penetrating." As for Dou, he suffered great grief over the disappearance of his niece Rose because "he felt most strongly that he had been defrauded, and he did not know why. In order to dispel his loneliness, for he could no longer work, he continued to keep close company with his now famous pupil." One day while Dou is hanging out with his "now famous pupil," Rose randomly shows up at the house and demands wine and food, which she scoffs down like a starving Congolese toddler. After eating, Rose states hysterically, "Find me a minister of god. I'm not safe until he comes. Send for him quickly!" and demands that she "must never be left alone. I'm lost forever if you leave me. The dead and the living can never be one. It is forbidden. The dead and the living can never be one." Schalcken takes Rose to a back bedroom to rest where she complains, "This is the darkness. The darkness is unsafe. Give me light," so the painter yells to Dou to bring her light, but when the old fart takes too long, he decides to get it himself, only to hear his beloved scream in terror just seconds after walking out of the room. When Schalcken returns to the bedroom, he discovers that Rose is gone and that she may have fallen to her death in a dam via an open window.

SCHALCKEN THE PAINTER

After his beloved disappears once again, Schalcken hires a dirty prole girl to be his model and begins painting portraits of mythical figures like Pandora, Ceres, and Lesbia instead of the biblical figures to which he had been accustomed. The painter also ditches his regular whore Hendrijke when the whorehouse he regularly visits gets a new girl named 'Rose of Rotterdam', who looks more or less like an evil and lecherous version of his beloved virgin-like Rose. While in his late-30s, Schalcken marries a girl from a rich merchant's family named Françoise van Dimen de Breda (Amanda Carlson), who is a bitch of a broad that is "several years his junior" but is "adequately trained in the household arts." Meanwhile, Schalcken demonstrates he is just as big of a whore as his teacher because while he refuses to do commissioned portraits, he caves in when a rich fellow offers him a chest of riches just as Dou caved in when Vanderhausen offered him great wealth for his nubile niece's hand in marriage. As the narrator describes, "Gerrit Dou later faded into obscurity under his much more famous pupil" and when he died in 1675, Schalcken attended his funeral, only to come home in a seemingly haunted state and started painting immediately in his studio without saying a word to anyone, not even his wife. As depicted in an exceedingly macabre scene of necro sex, Schalcken felt a presence luring him to a vault at the church where Dou's funeral took place and upon entering the room, he found Rose—or some sinister apparition that resembled her—who took him to a bed where she strips, mounts, and screws her undead husband Minjheer Vanderhausen right in front of the positively petrified painter, who subsequently faints after witnessing the ghastly sight. After waking up, Schalcken finds the tomb of Rose and Vanderhausen, thus making him realize that he has just witnessed two ghosts copulating. Indeed, the painting presented at the beginning (and end) of the film was inspired by that horrifying night when Schalcken witnessed the ghost of his one great love humping her horrifying haunted hubby and as the narrator states at the beginning of the film: “To his dying day, Schalcken was convinced of the reality of the vision he had witnessed, and he left behind this picture as testimony to it. But look more closely, and remember his last terrible meeting with Rose Velderkauf. If you recall, the painter had fainted dead away at whatever apparition she had presented to him. Here he has painted the observer, himself, in the act of drawing his sword as if to defend himself against the powers that were threatening him. A self-portrait, perhaps? Perhaps also a little self-deception?”

Somewhat notably, when the real Godfried Schalcken visited England between 1692–1697, his seemingly archetypal Dutch rudeness and all around lack of manners made him a sort of unofficial persona non grata, so it is only fitting that Leslie Megahey’s Schalcken the Painter portrays the painter in a most unflattering light. In fact, I cannot think of another film that portrays the Dutch in such an unwaveringly negative fashion and that includes everything from the arthouse works of Paul Verhoeven to the dark comedies of Alex van Warmerdam. Indeed, it certainly says something about a people when the British—arguably the most ruthless and cutthroat capitalists aside from the Jews—depict you as soulless materialists who always choose the lucrative over love and professional success over perennial sensuality, but such is the result of Calvinism, which is something that source writer Le Fanu was all too familiar with as a man whose father was such a strict protestant that he raised the family in an “almost Calvinist tradition.” As a sort of dilettante fan of Flemish Renaissance painters like Pieter Bruegel the Elder and Hieronymus Bosch and the Dutch master painters like those depicted in the film, as well as a man of Dutch extraction whose great-uncle was a degenerate modernist artist of some note, I especially enjoyed Megahey’s film, which not only introduced me to the work of Schalcken, but proved to be one of the most singular, chilling, and unforgettable Gothic horror flicks I have ever seen and not just because it is a rare work of celluloid spectrophilia that features arguably the most haunting ghost sex scene in all of cinema history. Indeed, while Dreyer’s Vampyr is certainly up there among my favorite horror films, I have to confess that Schalcken is now probably my favorite Sheridan Le Fanu adaptation.

Not surprisingly, the film was advertised as “one of the most frequently requested programmes in the BBC archive” when it was released on DVD/Blu-ray by the British Film Institute’s excellent BFI Flipside label. Notably, also included with the BFI Flipside set is the rare experimental British Edgar Allan Poe adaptation The Pit (1962) assistant directed by Peter Collinson (who would go on to direct the popular British caper The Italian Job (1969) starring Michael Caine and Noël Coward), as well as a 39-minute interview with auteur Leslie

SCHALCKEN THE PAINTER

Megahey and cinematographer John Hooper about the making of the film. Notably, Megahey would once again team up with cinematographer Hooper and narrator Charles Gray for another film about a painter, Cariani and the Courtesans (1987), for the BBC series Screenplay. In the film's deconstruction of Schalcken's work and experimental approach to depicting an arrogant young artist, Megahey's work owes comparisons to Peter Greenaway's Rembrandt 'biopic' Nightwatching (2007) and masterpiece The Draughtsman's Contract (1982). With its scathing depiction of the devilish relationship between art and commerce, Baroque period setting, and harpsichord score, Schalcken the Painter certainly deserves comparisons with Danièle Huillet and Jean-Marie Straub's The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach (1968) aka Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach, though Megahey's film is seemingly infinitely more enthralling and aesthetically intriguing, as a rare experimental period piece that has great replay value. Indeed, for an old Grinch like myself, Schalcken the Painter will most certainly be a new holiday season tradition for me.

-Ty E

ENCHANTED FOREST

Lew Landers (1945)

I am not one who enjoys watching poor VHS transfers of films, even if it might satisfy some sort of nostalgic urge. In fact, I purged my fairly large VHS collection a decade or so ago but sometimes I have no choice but to watch a film that has been neglected an appropriate DVD release. I recently viewed a poor (and probably tenth generation) VHS transfer of the Völsch Nationalist Socialist film Enchanted Forest aka Ewiger Wald (1936) directed by Hanns Springer and Rolf von Sonjevski-Jamrowski; a work that churned out an odd mix of mystical awe and a sense of cinematic tragedy upon my fairly cold and mostly impenetrable soul. I have to admit that I was noticeably enthralled by the film due to its pagan spiritualism but was also discouraged by the realization that the film will most likely never receive anything resembling a proper and respectful release that it undoubtedly deserves. Despite having to endure the poor quality of the copy of the Enchanted Forest I viewed, I can't think of another film like it that made me romanticize over the lives of my ancient Germanic ancestors. Sure, it must have sucked to live in a time when death was a very probable possibility in everyday life and food was scarce but people during those times were totally at the humbling helm of the organic and they did not have to endure the abstractness of our modern technocratic world. As a child, I had a deep respect for nature, wild animals, the wilderness, and I truly believed that these things were a gift bestowed upon on the world by an all mighty god. In fact, nothing felt more comforting to me than allowing myself to be swallowed deeply in the pines of local forests that I would frequent in a religious manner. Of course, I still enjoy the outdoors but naturally (or unnaturally), it is virtually impossible for one to live realistically among the leaves and by sleeping under the stars in our deranged day in age. It just so happened that I was reading a book on neopaganism (Summoning The Gods by Collin Cleary) around the time I first saw Enchanted Forest. One of Cleary's major points with his book is that, unlike their ancient ancestors, contemporary Westerners have completely lost contact with the very land that they once held sacred. I found it quite interesting that Enchanted Forest, a film and product of somewhat recent technology, was able to duplicate my long dormant love for nature. I certainly did not feel a touch of nature in James Cameron's epic digital blue turd Avatar (2009); a wholly (but unintentionally) risible pseudo-environmentalist romp into ultra-Hollywood alien-savage-worshipping purgatory. Say what you will about the Third Reich, but at least their state commissioned filmmakers had no difficulty assembling films that depicted absolute beauty in its most organically magical yet orthodox form.

The Nazis themselves proclaimed blood and soil as their ideology and quasi-religion but also led the world in technological advancement and I see Enchanted Forest itself as one of truest expressions of their brief anachronistic empire of healthy blood and monolithic industrial progress. If I wanted to illustrate to an illiterate what the spiritual essence of National Socialist Germany was, I would show them Enchanted Forest. Sure, Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will (1935) exquisitely documented the aesthetic properties and cheerful folk of Nazi Germany yet the film fails to dream up (not that it really intended to) the true Nazi spirit of ancestor worship. In our modern materialistic world, humans look at all things (both living and not) as objects to be manipulated or utilized to their advantage as opposed to appreciating and humbly respecting the "being" (as German philosopher Martin Heidegger would say) of a particular thing. The Nazis may not have respected certain groups of people but they surely respected their land and their Volk simply for "being." One of the reasons the National Socialists despised the Jews so much is due to their deracinated anti-nature-nature and their collective cosmopolitan homelessness, thus it should be no surprise that the Nazis originally (early on during World War II) paid for Jews to immigrate to Palestine to establish Israel (their first homeland in thousands of years). Naturally, Hollywood films have always lacked a certain authenticity in regard to portraying different cultures, nations, and peoples as they lack respect in regard to rootedness and anything of an organic nature, and for this reason, their films have always suffered from a sickening artificiality, hence why they tend to produce so many deplorable neo-vaudevillian comedies (a subject they know oh so well) full of infantile sexuality and repellant scat humor. Despite having unlimited funds and state-of-the-art technology, most of the filmmakers working in Hollywood lack the instincts to produce a film so close to nature as Enchanted Forest because the work permeates emotions that are totally alien to the culture-blind boys of Tinseltown. Believe it or not, money can't buy everything, especially when it comes to something that is passed down through blood.

ENCHANTED FOREST

It would probably baffle a lot of Hollywood green activists actors and Americans in general, to know that National Socialist Germany was arguably the first country to endorse environmentalist policies but this will be no surprise to anyone that has seen Enchanted Forest as the film treats the majestic allure of nature in a most elegant and enriching manner. Of course, the film will be of interest to any serious lover of uncultivated beauty despite whatever political persuasion they may hold. After all, man may have lost faith in god due to technology but few can deny the irreplaceable creations of Mother Nature and her supreme omnipotence and wholly plentiful pulchritude. Enchanted Forest begins in pagan Europe and concludes in Christianized Europe, and as the times change, war only becomes more sophisticated and deadly beneath the alien cross of Christ. The irony of technology is that man has only managed to speed up the death of his fellow man with his "advancement." For me, the greatest message (whether it was the filmmaker's intention or not) of Enchanted Forest is that the farther away man falls from nature, the closer he is to his own miserable demise. Man, most specifically Faustian man, has proven to be the only living organism that has had the gall to wage war against nature, but, of course, he is no match for his all-power enemy and will inevitably fail. As German philosopher Oswald Spengler explained in his 1931 work Man and Technics, technology has only sped up the death of the Occident and given his enemies weapons to use against him, thus, it is only a matter of time before the ultimate showdown begins. On a lighter note, I would be lying if I did not admit that Enchanted Forest gave me nostalgia for a time that I have never experienced but hopelessly yearn for in a most instinctive manner. I am sure that there are others that will also feel an atavistic awakening while watching the film. Enchanted Forest is like a painting by Fidus come to life, only more masculine and domineering and without super-skinny-proto-hippie-nudists. By the conclusion of Enchanted Forest, you may not be worshipping the black sun but you will have taken a virtual mini-epic journey through the ages of Europe on land, water, and forgotten battlefields where one's ancestors use to earn their livelihood from. That being said, maybe it is time for me to learn the secrets of the runes.

-Ty E

CHRISTMAS EVIL
CHRISTMAS EVIL

Lewis Jackson (1980)

If there is any Christmas-themed slasher flick that would inspire Santa to put steamy reindeer turds in stockings of all crew members involved with film, it is most certainly the superlatively sleazy low-camp anti-Christ-mass classic Christmas Evil (1980) aka You Better Watch Out aka Terror in Toyland; a rather wretched full-fledged assault on Christmas of grand aesthetic futility that the “pope of trash” John Waters claims to be “hopefully its #1 fan” and was praised in the Balti-moron’s book Crackpot: The Obsessions of John Waters (1987), thereupon adding to its ‘cult credibility’ in the long run. On the surface, Christmas Evil seems more like a hokey Chanukah honoring flick considering its notably anti-nostalgic take on old Saint Nick and the countless Hebraic folks (names like Pressman, Rubinstein, Levine, etc.) that were involved in creating the sneeringly festive film. Christmas Evil is ultimately more of an idiotic half-attempt at invalidating Christmas spirit with a tacked on “Pro-Claus” message than a serious malicious attack on those who wish you a merry Christmas, thus making it the celluloid equivalent of a store-bought gingerbread man; cheap and tasteless, but undeniably palatable. Akin to the patently perverse cult porn flick Water Power (1977) directed by Shaun Costello in the seriousness or lack thereof in its depiction of an aberrant anti-hero whose all-consuming holiday season pathologies are too penetrating to keep under control when certain triggers arise (in this case, Christmas lights, delinquent prepubescent children, and mistletoe), Christmas Evil is best looked at as a crappy yet charming crude camp black comedy with nil serious artistic merit, despite the fact that would-be-auteur Lewis Jackson, the man who directed this bittersweet celluloid candy-cane claims the film was heavily inspired by Rainer Werner Fassbinder (thus influencing him to paint all the set walls “institutional green”), as well as the German New Wave auteur filmmaker’s hero Douglas Sirk, of all possible directors! In reality, Christmas Evil is the sort of Xmas film Herschell Gordon Lewis (the smut-peddling Semite did direct a film shot on a high school stage entitled The Magic Land of Mother Goose (1967) to which he later added random excerpts of Santa and re-titled it Santa Visits the Magic Land of Mother Goose) might have assembled had he had a slight interest in somewhat discernible technical competency, sensible narrative construction, and character development as opposed to mere less than sexy sexploitation scenes and grating gore galore that bores. Jackson said that he got the initial idea for Christmas Evil in the 1970s while smoking a joint, henceforth causing him to visualize a random image of sadistic Santa holding a knife in his hand and built the film’s killer kitsch Claus script around this supremely stupid image. Centering around a particularly perverted psychopathic Santa-phile that probably wet dreams of a white Christmas and reams and ravages red-rectum reindeer, Christmas Evil – not unlike Paul Morrissey’s depiction of Dr. Frankenstein Flesh for Frankenstein (1973) and Dracula in Blood for Dracula (1974), but to a more severely unsophisticated degree – will, for better or worse, make you never look at Santa Clause the same way.

After seeing Santa Claus (which, in reality, is really his father in a Santa outfit) paw his mother's legs with his jolly Christmas claws during one fateful Christmas Eve in 1947 in some stereotypical suburban neighborhood in New Jersey, hardheaded Harry Stadling (Brandon Maggart) is never quite the same again and grows up to be a marvelously mundane maniac man-child who has dedicated his life to meticulously checking his list as to whether the kids in his neighborhood have been naughty or nice with a special emphasis on punishing those who have been extra naughty. Like Saint Nicholas, hysterical Harry – a most extreme judge of character with a peculiar proclivity towards perverse power trips – has a most meticulous moral compass that never fails, albeit a decidedly deranged and discordant one, that works without fail; degenerates and perverts who have forgot the meaning of Christmas are mangled, mutilated, and murdered and good little Santa-saluting boys and girls are treated to his obsessively assembled handmade toys. Despite his aversion to all forms of sexual perversion, Harry – who talks to and stalks (via Rear Window-style with binoculars) little children like a seasoned saint of unsavory scopophilia – seems like a latent pedophile and a man after Michael Jackson's own heart in his particularly perturbing Peter Pan syndrome, as he keeps personal photographs of neighborhood elementary school children at his desk and sees them as "spiritual" equals of sorts. Described as an "emotional cripple" by his own brother Phil (Jeffrey DeMunn) and treated with tormenting scorn, contempt and/or disrespect by everyone he knows, Harry strives for an intangible youthful innocence that only grows stronger as it is trampled on by his fellow adults who he cannot relate to in the slightest, which eventually causes him to see red, and not just the color of his much beloved Santa Claus outfit, as many unfortunate people end up dead as a result of their sacrilegious Santa-shunning indiscretions. Essentially living a double life as a result of a split personality, Harry, now Thirty-three years older since that debauched XXXmas night in 1947 that forever changed him, has "a lousy position" as a manager at a toy factory where he reluctantly rules over a group of blue-collar workers who constantly besmirch his Christmas toy fetishism. Of course, Christmas Eve is Harry's night; a time where the loony loser takes on the self-appointed role of both Saint Nicholas and Black Peter (even putting mud on his face at one point in an act of ritualistic blackface where he marks one bad boy's house for carnage in the tradition of nefarious Negro Pete) and he certainly knows who has been naughty and who has been nice.

Claiming to be more influenced by the shadows of German expressionism than the colorful lights of any cinematic Christmas classics, Lewis Jackson ultimately managed to assemble one of the most darkly comedic, yet rather retardedly so, X-mas flicks ever made, thereupon making it seem less dated in retrospect compared with the similarly themed Chris Killer flick Silent Night, Deadly Night (1984) that spawned an ungodly number of needless sequels. Along with Silent Night, Bloody Night (1972) and Black Christmas (1974), Christmas Evil offers some of the best nostalgia for negativity as the sort of sardonic holiday season film one watches for therapeutic reasons after having to meet up with relatives and family friends one would never see under any circumstance, especially on Christmas. Concluding on an absurdly 'positive' happy note not all that dissimilar from Steven Spielberg's E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial (1982) and Alex Cox's Repo Man (1984), Christmas Evil, despite its many scenes of nonsensical depravity and satirical violence, ultimately has a positive message against the cheap commercialization of Christmas (even if the movie itself is a product of such monetary motivated phenomenon) and promotes a message of remembering the true meaning of Christmas, even if the morally dubious maniac promoting such a once-sacred message is far from a role model Santa Claus. Of course, most people watch Christmas Evil because they want to see a seasonal slasher flick with Santa as a blood-soaked sadist slicing up red ribbons of human flesh. Personally, I would prefer a satirical Black Peter splatter flick, but you can't always get everything you want for Christmas.

CHRISTMAS EVIL

-Ty E

ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT

Lewis Milestone (1930)

All Quiet on the Western Front (a film directed by Lewis Milestone aka Lev Milstein) is as close to an American antiwar film that I have ever seen. The interesting element of the film that its from the perspective of Germans as opposed to Americans. It is a film based on the book of the same name written by Erich Paul Remark who was either of ethnically French descent or ethnically Jewish descent. It has also been questioned whether Erich Paul Remark actually saw battle.

Although All Quiet on the Western Front sympathizes with and humanizes the German enemy, it also blames Germans for the war due to blind patriotism. This is obvious in the beginning of the film where a professor convinces his pupils to fight for The Fatherland and they oblige blindly and enthusiastically. To a German this could be quite condescending and offensive. After Germany was ripped apart and humiliated with the Treaty of Versailles which ultimately lead to World War II, All Quiet on the Western Front would be the last thing a German would want to see. I felt that it was at least a step-up from the dehumanizing of Germans in the majority of World War I and later World War II films.

At no point in All Quiet on the Western Front did the director glamorize war, which is virtually impossible with the war film. When viewers see combat battle footage and men in the trenches, its usually going to be very exciting. The films soundtrack and sound design added a feeling that you could be shot at any second. Although thrilling, fear was the main emotion that these sounds of bombs and bullets provoked.

Scenes that took place in the trenches showed the hell of the war. Hungry and injured soldiers waiting for their next deadly battles in the trench both emotionally and physically exhausted, exhibited faces with a loss of hope. The war was something they didn't expect it to be. Once on the battlefield, the soldiers are soon to forget what they are fighting for. When battle actually starts, the soldiers quickly realize they want to go home.

The money men, global bankers, and war profiteers are the only people that benefit from war. War is the biggest moneymaking business in history. The common man is only used as an object for the elite. World War I led to the destruction of four empires: Ottoman Empire, Austria-Hungary Empire, German Empire, and the Russian empire. The war resulted in the deaths of over 20 million people. The last thing a German wants to think about is through being naïve and blindly patriotic, he was a contributor in this mayhem. I seriously doubt that any German would appreciate All Quiet on the Western Front as a motivator and inspirational film. On the contrary, I think the film and book would further their depressed and lost state. A state that would have eventually lead the success of the German Nationalist Socialist party and not far after

ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT

World War II.
-Ty E

A WALK IN THE SUN

Lewis Milestone (1945)

After viewing A Walk in the Sun (directed by Lewis Milestone) I felt as if I hadn't seen anything new. It just seemed like the shell of a movie directed by Steven Spielberg known as Saving Private Ryan. Samuel Fuller's analysis of A Walk in the Sun is dead on its remarks. Samuel Fuller was a filmmaker that liked to expose the dark nature and weakness of our society (I.e. Pickup on South Street, Naked Kiss). Like his films, Fuller's analysis of A Walk in the Sun is brutally honest and has a complete disregard for sentiment. The generic characters in A Walk in the Sun fell into the combat film convention of representing the American melting pot (or partially). The film acknowledged the Italian American as part of the melting pot while presenting shame to real Italians. The two Italian soldiers seen in A Walk in the Sun are recognized as cowardly opportunists who sold their soul to the devil (Germany), but lack the mental capacity to understand this. I don't think the scene was trying to represent any type of symbolic redemption. It was more of, you got what you asked for. Fuller's criticism of "melodramatic bickering" was also dead on. This convention of the combat film is completely pointless and one of its biggest flaws. Steven Spielberg also utilized this convention in Saving Private Ryan. I have always felt these scenes were highly contrived and left little for people to analyze for themselves. "Melodramatic bickering" has as little value to the war film as it would a horror film. Fuller's letter fully incriminates Lewis Milestone as a propagandist and a man that has no understanding of war. Fuller points out that a colonel's screen credit for technical authenticity is worthless. He felt that a Colonel's technical advice on what happens to a platoon was absurd. It is obvious that Milestone had no interest in creating a realistic film, but an already cliché propaganda war combat flick. It amazes me that directors like Spielberg still use this boring 40 years ago conventions today. It symbolizes the sheer lack of innovation in regards to American cinema over the past century. The only difference is that films (like the War film) have advanced in special effects and showmanship. Fuller's praising of All Quiet on the Western Front worked excellently in discrediting A Walk in the Sun. This makes me contemplate the motives behind All Quiet on the Western Front. It is that obvious that Milestone was neglectful of human feeling in his later films. All Quiet on the Western Front had to have been made for an ulterior motive than just being an anti-war film. Either way, it is a much better film than A Walk in the Sun. Samuel Fuller is one of the most qualified to analyze the war film. Being a World War II Veteran, writer, and film director gave him the holistic viewpoint. Fuller later provided his take on World War II combat with The Big Red One. Saving a "Kraut" at the end of the film showed Fuller's human view of the enemy and the universal qualities of all sides during war. A Walk in the Sun didn't even show the German enemies face. I always find filmmakers analyzing films to be the most enlightening. With film critics like Roger Ebert, it always feels like something is missing. Samuel Fuller was a rebel in the film industry when they didn't even exist. Confronting controversial issues with boldness, innovativeness, and honesty, Fuller was his own man.

A WALK IN THE SUN

-Ty E

PUNISHER: WAR ZONE

Lexi Alexander (2008)

In 2004, a Punisher film was released starring such A-list star power as Thomas Jane and John Travolta. Leeching onto the realization that the film sucks, a sequel was never produced. Flash forward to the year 2008, someone had a great idea of doing a reboot of a reboot. Just how "communism looks perfect on paper", the idea shouldn't have worked to such a marvelous degree. Boy, I love surprises. When I first encountered both the trailers to Max Payne and Punisher: War Zone, I found the early opinionated advantage in favor of Max Payne > Punisher: War Zone. When the time came for both to have seen the light of day, the result shockingly became vice versa. Punisher: War Zone perfectly captured the comic art direction and sealed The Punisher as a bad ass vigilante and not some priss with his shirt tucked in. My familiarization with the Punisher character was a journey through various War Journals and film adaptations, ranging from decent to pugnacious. The Punisher was outfitted as a clown but is back with a vengeance. This film should carry surnames as "This Time it's Personal" or "The Revenge". The appeasement of the audience by way of promotional trailers was most unsavory. A man with slick hair and a Kevlar turtleneck with many slow motion shots condensed in a 2 minute trailer can only do so much without making the whole concept seem as an esoteric shout out to some Hollywood buds. Ever so fitting to your needs, War Zone accommodates the Punisher fan in you, and if you're not a fan of the Punisher, then the violence will suit you just fine. The depicted brutality rivals the latest Rambo installment on terms of decapitations, explosions, and visceral close-up shotgun fatalities. The comic thematics are insinuated in the last 20 minutes giving the anti-freedom fighter sufficiently more space to maneuver in. Ray Stevenson perfects the film as the remorseless serial murdering vigilante. Stevenson's performance is the icing on the cake, so to speak. With his actions come a layer of unspoken sorrow and incendiary black humor. The device of his departed family isn't abstrusely forced into some whiny flashback. Rather, we collect our thoughts on his daughter's old musical box. There's no scenes of Stevenson asking the villains to "put the bunny down" or any of that nonsense. On terms of bloodshed, Punisher: War Zone is nearly unmatched by any Hollywood production. This is near as sadistic as action cinema comes. At least until Rambo 5 is released. If Frank Castle indulged a single craving, it would most certainly be the over-the-top, yet excessive deaths of degenerate filth. We witness the fruitful executions of parkour-wannabe gangsta thugs getting shot in the head and exploded with miniature propelled rockets, senile mothers with their head blown in half, and sleazy Gino's biting the dust. All this, backed with throbbing humor and intense fluorescents. This is just one of few films that can sport a heavy metal soundtrack just right. It doesn't choose to go into the exploitation zone near as much as the overkill explored in Feast

PUNISHER: WAR ZONE

II: Sloppy Seconds (Which featured midget wrestlers with foot-long dicks), but just enough to leave a visual impression rather than heaving felt as you witnessed a sideshow. Perhaps one of the greatest looking films of the year, Punisher: War Zone was made for the theater viewing experience. This film cannot come any more recommended.

-mAQ

THE YEAR OF THE CANNIBALS

Liliana Cavani° (1970)

Out of all the female filmmakers who have ever lived, probably none has displayed a greater propensity for concocted curious celluloid works that transcend the usually fine line between cultivated art cinema and tasteless and sensationalized celluloid trash than Italian auteur Liliana Cavani (The Berlin Affair aka Interno berlinese, Ripley's Game) with her first international hit Il portiere di notte (1974) aka The Night Porter—a somber S&M-flavored proto-Nazi-ploitation flick of sorts—probably being the best example of this. Undoubtedly, out of all of Cavani's cinematic works, The Night Porter has left the deepest impact, even if it is a fundamentally flawed work that wallows just as much in now-cliche fetishism as it does artistic pretentiousness. Of course, sexual subversion and artsy fartsy-ness are not the only things that have influenced her films because, like many, if not most, European filmmakers of her generation, Cavani was seduced by the gospel of Marx and his anti-Occidental philosophical disciples. Apparently raised in a working-class household, Cavani had stern antifascists for parents (though she ironically attended “Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia” film school, which was inaugurated by Benito Mussolini) and was fed Engels, Marx and Bakunin via her maternal grandfather. Starting out making political documentaries for RAI like Storia del III Reich aka History of the Third Reich (1962–1963), Cavani eventually made what is arguably her most blatantly socio-politically conscious work, The Year of the Cannibals (1970) aka I cannibali aka The Cannibals, which confirmed her solidarity with the far-left student movements that infected Europa like cancer during the late-1960s. A work only rather marginally influenced by the Greek tragedy Antigone by Sophocles in that it stars a chick named Antigone who wants to bury her brother and ultimately faces a tragic end, The Year of the Cannibals is a quasi-pop-art-inspired dystopian drama and political allegory set in a nefarious neo-fascist state where it is illegal to both pickup and bury corpses, thus the streets are littered with corpses that, for whatever reason, will not decompose. Starring pleasingly petite Swedish actress Britt Ekland (The Wicker Man, Beverly Hills Vamp) in the lead role as Antigone and superlatively swarthy and scrawny French arthouse star Pierre Clémenti (Belle de jour, Steppenwolf) as a seemingly half-retarded Christ-like prophet named Tiresias, The Year of the Cannibals is outmoded ‘pop revolutionary’ cinema with an admittedly catchy soundtrack from Italian maestro Ennio Morricone that reminds the viewer why the hippie movement died as quickly as it was misbegotten. Described by various critics upon its original release as “Catholic from the left” (a label that both director Cavani and co-writer Italo Moscati rejected), The Year of the Cannibals does, indeed, have a rather repellent essence that could probably be described as pseudo-Pasolini-esque ‘comie Catholicism’ as a revolution-raging work of the positively pussycore persuasion that quite blatantly pleads for acts of sissy subversion against a super sadistic state that sics SS-like German Shepherd dogs on beautiful Swedish chicks and even tortures the son of the prime minister for petty acts of rebellion. Like a philistine take on Anti-Clock (1979) directed by Jane Arden and Jack Bond meets George Lucas' THX 1138 (1971) as reworked as a commie CliffsNotes take on Sophocles, Antigone is just one of many reasons why so many European arthouse flicks on the late-1960s/early-1970s are long forgotten, as radically repellent far-left politics and poppy aesthetics make for bizarrely bland bedfellows.

THE YEAR OF THE CANNIBALS

A gang of young grad school children spot a young Christ-like figure laying on the beach and being young kids, they fiddle with the corpse, thus resulting in their rather abrupt deaths via machine gun by neo-gestapo goons lurking in the bushes. Indeed, in the world of The Year of the Cannibals, it is illegal to fiddle with the dead, let alone bury corpses, yet the mysterious figure on the beach, Tiresias (Pierre Clémenti), is not actually dead (though he moves in a rather zombie-like manner), thus the killer cops had ultimately shot too soon, killing a bunch of tiny tots for no reason, thus setting the anti-authoritarian tone of Cavani's film. Meanwhile, nice yet naïve chick Antigone (Britt Ekland) wants to bury the body of her fallen brother, but it is illegal, so she goes to her boyfriend Emone (Tomas Milian)—the son of the Prime Minister (Francesco Leonetti) of the neo-fascist state—for help, but he is not much help, so she goes on her less than merry way. Luckily, while eating at a fantasy sub-futuristic restaurant, Antigone runs into strange stranger Tiresias who, being all Christ-like and anti-usury and whatnot, steals a piece of fish, which rather alarms the waiter. Thanks to Antigone, Tiresias' tab is paid and the two develop a strong sense of solidarity despite the fact that the mumbling messiah only speaks indecipherable gibberish. Ultimately, Tiresias helps Antigone lay to rest her belated brother, but it does not stop there as the act of subversion leads to the two burying more bodies. Of course, Tiresias and Antigone inevitably become fugitives for their acts of criminal kindness, which eventually leads them to running naked in the streets and being chased by a bloodthirsty Alsatian Wolf Dog. Eventually, the two unclad rebels find sanctuary in a Catholic church and absurdly go incognito by wearing priest outfits (indeed, Ekland has a tough time pulling off the whole pedophile priest thing), even visiting a mental institution where pseudo-priestess Antigone tells a patient, "they're castrating you." Of course, eventually Tiresias and Antigone are caught, incarcerated, tortured, experimented on, and paraded on television as radicalized enemies of the state. On TV, Tiresias is described as, "like a type of 'Mowgli,' Rudyard Kipling's hero... The legendary child who was raised by animals in the jungle." The prick newscaster also tells the audience, "Memorize this face. It is the face of a man... who steals corpses from the state." Indeed, as much as one would want to, it is hard to forget the supremely swarthy frog face of Pierre Clémenti. When Antigone's preppy boyfriend Emone discovers his lover has been brutalized, he confides in his Prime Minister father, but he proves to be no help, ultimately writing off his son's girlfriend as a fugitive criminal. In an act of desperation and pussy protest, Emone attempts to pick up a corpse and is subsequently arrested, thus fueling his belief that his rebellious behavior is righteous and whatnot. When Emone's father asks his son what is the meaning of his seemingly nonsensical actions, Tiresias responds while standing imprisoned in a jail cell, "Their corpses serve as examples to avoid others. They shouldn't be touched," and adds, "I want to turn into an animal... Anarchic. Eccentric. Rebellious. Antisocial. Delinquent. Atheist. Homosexual. They're all words from your catalogue. All of them." Meanwhile, Tiresias is let out of prison and a visibly bruised and abused Antigone is paraded through the streets by militant soldiers. When Tiresias attempts to embrace Antigone, she is riddled with bullets and the hippie messiah reacts impotently by attacking a politician, thus resulting in his death as well by machine gun. Of course, as director Liliana Cavani wants the viewer to know, Antigone and Tiresias' actions were not in vain as The Year of the Cannibals concludes with hordes of dirty and unkempt hippies picking up and burying corpses, thus demonstrating the revolutionary spirit is in the air and the neo-fascist state's days are numbered.

Riddled with quasi-commie cliché upon quasi-commie cliché upon quasi-commie cliché, The Year of the Cannibals is nothing if not culturally corrosive counter-culture cinema of the thankfully outmoded sort that demonstrates that even with her early films, director Liliana Cavani had a knack for making the most deracinated Italian films of her era, even with all of its conspicuously 'Catholic' themes and all. Mildly entertaining in part due to the lackluster yet paradoxically iconic performances from leads Britt Ekland and Pierre Clémenti, as well due to its strangely poppy soundtrack by Ennio Morricone (notably, the catchy song "The Cannibals"), The Year of the Cannibals—when watched from a contemporary perspective—is ultimately a testament to the fact the hippies failed and eventually became like the soulless authoritarian establishment they hated so dearly, which can also be said of Cavani, whose curiously gimmicky combination of subversive sex and allusions to classical literature have become a mainstay of Hollywood, hence why she would later go on to direct a work as conspicuously contrived as Ripley's Game (2002) starring John Malkovich. Of course, The Year of the Cannibals also failed to predict the real legacy of the student movement, presenting them as righteous and morally pristine peaceful protestors, when, in fact, it really degenerated into coldblooded murder and senseless terrorism as personified by the Red Army Faction in West Germany, not to mention the Years of Lead period in Italy during the late-1960s through early-1980s when a series of terrorist bombings, political assassinations, kidnappings, and other crimes were committed by the lunatic left-wing autonomist movement, almost plunging Guidoland into a civil war. In its seemingly pathological depiction of Britt Ekland being emotionally and physically brutalized by caricatured neo-gestapo agents (one calls her a "beautiful slut") in extremely stylized scenarios that are essentially like choreographed dance sequences, The Year of the Cannibals expresses the sort of (sado)masochism that would become an innate ingredient of Cavani's aberrant auteur signature, which is probably her greatest strength as a filmmaker. Indeed, inspiring exceedingly effete mainstream liberal Roger Ebert to describe her film The Night Porter as, "naïty as it is lubricious, a despicable attempt to titillate us by exploiting memories of persecution and suffering," means that Cavani has to be doing something right. Of course, The Year of the Cannibals is certainly no The Night Porter, nor even a Beyond Good and Evil (1977) aka Al di là del bene e del male, but instead, a positively passé celluloid artifact from a time when a youthful collective of conforming anti-conformists absurdly believed a utopia was awaiting them as soon they carried out Marx, Trotsky, Marcuse or some other Judaic pseudo-messiah's shabbos goy game plan.

THE YEAR OF THE CANNIBALS

-Ty E

BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL

Liliana Cavani° (1977)

I hate to admit it, but now after watching Liliana Cavani's Beyond Good and Evil (1977) aka Al di là del bene e del male aka Seeds of Evil, I think I can understand why certain bleeding heart film critics, most notably Roger Ebert – who described the following film as, "as nasty as it is lubricious, a despicable attempt to titillate us by exploiting memories of persecution and suffering" – were offended by the Italian auteuress' sordid tale of SS sadomasochism, The Night Porter (1974) aka Il Portiere di notte. Centering around an imaginary sexual ménage à trios between German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, his Jewish-German author/philosopher friend Paul Réé and Russian-born psychoanalyst Lou Andreas-Salomé – the woman that both men (and later Bohemian-Austrian poet Rainer Maria Rilke) fell in love with – Beyond Good and Evil is an innately superficial softcore arthouse melodrama that, at best, uses the last days of sanity of the twentieth century's most influential thinker as a pretext for depicting debauched sex, pseudo-poetic nudity, and the foreboding presence of antisemitism and National Socialism. Featuring sordid incest fantasies, unhinged drunkenness and dope fiending, gay gang rape orgies, whorehouse wantonness and STDs, and all-around cartoonish carnal buffoonery, Beyond Good and Evil is such a radically ridiculous take on the last days of Nietzsche that it portrays him as an extroverted libertine party animal with a proclivity for sexually servicing both gents and ladies. In short, if the real-life Friedrich Nietzsche philosophed with a hammer, Cavani must have directed with a cheap pink dildo. The second film in Liliana Cavani's so-called "The German Trilogy" (the first being The Night Porter and the final The Berlin Affair; an interracial lesbian Nazi tale), Beyond Good and Evil – a curiously cosmopolitan work that was neither filmed in German language nor features a single kraut actor – is about as faithful to historical reality as popular Hollywood biopics like Ron Howard's A Beautiful Mind (2001) and Miloš Forman's cinematic adaptation of Peter Shaffer's stage-play Amadeus (1984), minus the sleekly stylized direction and lavish production values. Indeed, the only thing remotely authentic about Beyond Good and Evil is the title, which is neither gratifying in an aesthetic, thematic, historical nor philosophical sense, nor is it perverted, erotic, nor demoralizing enough to be regarded as a fine piece of subversive cinematic art, hence its relative obscurity when compared to Cavani's infinitely more interesting and indulging, albeit flawed, work The Night Porter.

Although it is true that Paul Réé was romantically involved with Lou Andreas-Salomé and Friedrich Nietzsche fell in delusional love with her as depicted in Beyond Good and Evil, which inevitably resulted in the break-up of the platonic threesome, there was never an ongoing orgy between the three thinkers (as long ago proven by Rudolph Binion's Frau Lou: Nietzsche's Wayward Disciple). In fact, there is no evidence that Nietzsche ever shared carnal knowledge with anyone and he may as well have died a deranged virgin. As mentioned in his mostly fictional autobiography Ecce Homo (1888), "All women all like me. But that's an old story: except of course the abortive ones, the emancipated ones who are simply not up to having children," and such is the case in Beyond Good and Evil; a work where the German philosopher's break into madness is partly the result of his undying love for proto-feminist Lou Andreas-Salomé – a woman that has no interest in being tied down by any man, even if she admires his deteriorating mind. Although Nietzsche did propose marriage to Lou Salomé in a most shameful and relationship severing manner, the German philosopher remained a lifelong bachelor whose one true love was morphine. Although his mental breakdown was originally diagnosed as the result of tertiary syphilis – which many believe he received via a prostitute at a brothel in Cologne or Leipzig – contemporary scholars believe his illness was the result of a number of hereditary taints (Nietzsche's father died from a brain ailment in 1849). Additionally, contemporary Nietzschean scholar Joachim Köhler believes that the German philosopher was a homosexual who may have acquired syphilis in a male brothel in Genoa and was the goy-boy-toy of Paul Rée. Whatever the true manner of Nietzsche's sexual orientation and descent into a insane, infantile state, Cavani's Beyond Good and Evil has nil interest in the truth nor the book by Fritz that the film is named after. Equipped with a score by Mozart instead of Wagner, including cliché, one-dimensional tirades against his former mentor by Cavani's Nietzsche, Beyond Good and Evil is a bastardized Nietzsche For Dummies in celluloid form by a matriarchal Mediterranean matron with no love nor intrinsic understanding of the fatherland.

BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL

The Friedrich Nietzsche (played by Swede Erland Josephson) seems like a mere bourgeois boob who uses his contrived pseudo-philosophical chant "chastity is a crime against nature" as means for justifying his untamed sybaritism and innate intemperance. Naturally, Nietzsche's mom and sister (the infamous proto-Nazi Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche) are portrayed as prying prudes and anti-Semitic agitators who attempt to stop the "filthy Jewess" Lou Salomé (who in reality was of French Huguenot and Northern German Nordic racial stock) from pursuing a relationship with the then-virtually-unknown German philosopher. The self-declared, "son and grandson of Luther pastors...son of a pious woman, the nephew of two god-fearing aunts" who brought him up to be, "good, respectable" and thereupon "stifling" his "finest instincts," the fictional Nietzsche of Beyond Good and Evil declares, "I deliberately chose a sweet demon to free me from my honorable education and I received a gift called syphilis" to the dismay of his puritanical female kin. In the end, Nietzsche is a babbling retard, Paul Rée is anally raped and rubbed out by a gang of barbarian Aryan sodomites, and Lou Salomé (played by the awfully dainty and unconvincing French actress Dominique Sanda) gets away rather unscathed, henceforth proving she – a loose woman with an affinity for leading men on, especially those with commanding intellects – is the only true blue Übermensch of Beyond Good and Evil; a quasi-pornographic yet ultimately unerotic and pseudo-feminist putterer piece of filmmaking that offers a fundamentally fabricated retelling of the last days of the Anti-Christ's sanity, and brings new meaning to the philosopher's writing, "In revenge and in love woman is more barbarous than man" (Beyond Good and Evil, Chapter 4, Maxims and Interludes, Friedrich Nietzsche); possibly the only quote that director Liliana Cavani understood. Unfortunately, Dominique Sanda as a white Russian femme fatale of great intellectual aptitude is about as convincing as Woody Allen would have made as a war-torn, wild Wehrmacht warrior in Oliver Hirschbiegel's Downfall (2004) aka Der Untergang.

At best, Beyond Good and Evil is neither historically accurate nor even the slightest bit amorous, as a feeble and flat feminist cinematic abortion of the most senseless and self-congratulatory kind from a female filmmaker whose sense of female empowerment is derived from directing images of muscular man prancing around during scenes of hallucinatory ballet (which we recycle from The Night Porter) and by way of gay gang bangs, brutal forced buggery and involuntary bung-hole bottling. In short, Beyond Good and Evil is no more historically accurate than the fiercely philo-semitic historical fiction work When Nietzsche Wept (2007) directed by Pinchas Perry and notably less erotic than the low-budget Brazilian cinematographic essay Days of Nietzsche in Turin (2001) aka Dias de Nietzsche em Turim. If you loathe Nietzsche or have no interest in getting to know the life and work of the tragic philosopher and are especially fond of lackluster, superficial European arthouse erotica in the tradition of Tinto Brass à la Salon Kitty (1976), then Beyond Good and Evil might be the film for you. The reality is that German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, like many intellectuals and scholars, lived a rather uninteresting and even pathetic life, so pretty much any cinematic adaptation of his life is doomed to be patently banal or an exploitative exaggeration (Cavani's film does both of these things), although I am sure Ingmar Bergman could have pulled it off – with his cold and brooding Scandinavian melodramas – as a man who also stared into the abyss. With all the miserable and misleading misreadings of Nietzsche's writings about his life and especially his works in written form, I should not have expected much from Liliana Cavani's Beyond Good and Evil, but at least French surrealist author Georges Bataille's morbid, if misguided and megamaniacal reading – via his Acéphale writings and book Sur Nietzsche (1945) aka On Nietzsche – of the antagonistic Anti-Christ is engrossing. When Nietzsche wrote in his autobiography, "I know my fate. One day there will be associated with my name the recollection of something frightful," little did he realize that one of these things would be a debauched and decidedly deluded depiction of his life named after one of his most famous books by an emancipated Italian woman no more impressed with his manhood than the unattainable object of his affection, Lou

BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL

Andreas-Salomé.
-Ty E

THE BERLIN AFFAIR

Liliana Cavani° (1985)

It seems that with each chapter in the so-called “The Germany Trilogy,” of once-controversial female Italian auteur Liliana Cavani (The Year of the Cannibals aka I Cannibali, Ripley’s Game), the films not only became less ‘Teutonic’ in theme, but even more unbearably slow and meandering to watch, with the final film, The Berlin Affair (1985) aka Interno Berlinese aka Leidenschaften being nearly impossible to sit through in a single viewing without dosing off or without my attention gravitating somewhere else. Indeed, while am I fan of the first chapter in Cavani’s aberrant-garde Aryan trilogy, The Night Porter (1974) aka Il portiere di notte, and found the second film, Beyond Good and Evil (1977) aka Al di là del bene e del male, to be sometimes provocative, if not ridiculously so (indeed, Nietzsche fans should probably avoid the film), The Berlin Affair proved to be a seemingly endless exercise in pseudo-subversive plastic eroticism that features quite possibly the most mind-numbingly banal bizarre love triangle in cinema history. An Italian-West German coproduction set ostensibly during the Third Reich right before the Anschluss of Austria and starring German New Cinema lead actress Gudrun Landgrebe, who looks more Italian than German, of A Woman in Flames (1983) and Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984) playing the typecast role of a bored and sexually frustrated German bourgeois housewife who finds true love in the form of a deleterious Japanese femme fatale who is much more pernicious and slutty than she looks, The Berlin Affair has the unrefined distinction of being produced by Israelis Menahem Golan and Yoram Globus for Cannon Films, thus adding to its crud cred as a sub-softcore pseudo-arthouse period piece in the spirit of Mata Hari (1985) directed by Curtis Harrington (who revealed in his autobiography that Golan and his crew forced him to add pointless sex scenes for his pseudo-biopic about the Dutch spy). A pseudo-Germanic film noir flick equipped with would-be-lurid lackluster fetishism and tedious transgressive romantic relationships, The Berlin Affair is the sort of superlatively superficial and aesthetically/thematically vacant Euro-sleaze flick that gives European art cinema a bad name and thus acts as the perfect target from Cavani’s many detractors. As culturally mongrelized and historically absurd as any hack directed period piece released by Hollywood except minus the lavish wardrobes and annoying British accents, The Berlin Affair is a would-be-hot-and-heavy Guido-kraut multicultural lipstick lesbian love story that proves that Japanese women make for the most sinister and shifty of lovers, but not exactly sexy ones. Loosely based on the Jap novel Quicksand (1930) aka Manj written by Jun’ichirō Tanizaki, The Berlin Affair once and for all proves that Liliana Cavani is an unrivaled master of cinematically butchering source material, especially when it comes to the foreign non-Italian sort. In fact, Cavani even once confessed she did not even understand her lead protagonist, stating, “I really do not know how to interpret Louise's survival. Even after reading the book I kept asking myself this very question: whether you love the person you leave behind or the one who remains with you." Personally, by the end of The Berlin Affair, I couldn't care less about Louise and her lunatic lovers and I suspect most viewers will feel the same way after watching Cavani's spiritless softcore flick.

THE BERLIN AFFAIR

Opening with the seemingly poorly translated quote from German pessimist philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer, "As the philosophy of professors exclaims, there is design and unity in universal history, but in the life of every individual," The Berlin Affair soon cuts to a certain Louise von Hollendorf (Gudrun Landgrebe) confiding with her professor (Spaghetti Western star William Berger) about the tragic bizarre love triangle she was involved with in with her hubby Heinz von Hollendorf (English actor Kevin McNally), a German senior diplomat at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and a Japanese woman named Mitsuko Matsugae (Jap singer/actress Mio Takaki), the young and lecherous daughter of a Japanese ambassador. The year is 1938 and Louise is taking a university drawing class, but instead of drawing the unclad archetypal blonde Aryan beauty used as a model in the class, she opts for drawing another student, Jap chick Mitsuko. Louise finally gets the gall to ask Mitsuko to allow her to draw her and the two inevitably make love, with the sexually aggressive German chick eventually madly falling in love with the little Jap princess. Meanwhile, Louise's husband becomes suspicious of his wifey's relationship with Mitsuko because, on top of being jealous in regard to his significant other's extramarital deceit, it might ruin the German diplomat's career were it revealed that his bourgeois beloved is a lecherous lily-licker. Meanwhile, Mitsuko betrays Louise by getting engaged to the two ladies' half-guido drawing instructor, Joseph Benno (Andrea Prodan), a man who is apparently half-gay and sexually impotent. Exceedingly emotionally wounded, Louise breaks off her aberrant affair with Mitsuko and decides to completely dedicate herself to her cuckolded husband, even revealing her brief lesbo relationship with him. Meanwhile, Heinz's high-ranking Gestapo agent cousin Wolf von Hollendorf (Hanns Zischler) forces Louise and Heinz both to be involved in a plot to ruin the career of a gay German general named Werner von Heiden (Massimo Girotti) as homosexuality is illegal in Deutschland under Article 175 of the Penal Code, which proves to be successful. Faking being pregnant and ill, Mitsuko manages to convince Louise to rekindle their romantic relationship, which the Jap's hubby-to-be Benno allows, but he ultimately makes the mistake of attempting to blackmail Heinz, which ultimately gets him deported back to Guidoland. Of course, Heinz naturally becomes enraged after learning his wife is getting wanton with a cracked and wacked carpet-munching Jap chick, but he also develops a decadent taste for lily yellow lesbo flesh, thus siring a ménage à trios between the kraut married couple and the Asian goddess. Although both parties become increasingly jealous of one another, Mitsuko ultimately holds the most power, ultimately sadistically playing the wife and husband against each other. After Benno publishes an account abroad about the curious miscegenation-based case of Mitsuko and her married kraut couple lovers, Heinz is forced to resign from his prestigious position. In the end, the three opt for poisoning one another during a ceremonial rite as opposed to leaving one another (after all, the Japs believe suicide is “not cowardice but victory”), but Louise survives and awakes, ultimately realizing she was given a sedative instead of the poisons and that she was betrayed by both of her lovers, thus allowing to live on as the writer of a sleazy race-mixing romantic novel.

In its melodramatic depiction of lesbianism and cross-racial/cross-cultural romance, The Berlin Affair is much like a Rainer Werner Fassbinder film, albeit directed by a keenly cynical lezzy Italian robot that lacks a flare for storytelling and melodrama. Indeed, The Berlin Affair is the rare sort of film that will probably only appeal to bourgeois latent lesbians, exceedingly emasculated workaholic male cuckolds who have spent one-too-many late nights working in the office, and novice xenophiles with an appetite for yellow meat, yet I doubt even members of these marginal groups will be left anymore than semi-satisfied by Cavani's cinematic work, as a film that teases and wallows in foreplay, but never reaches any sort of real memorable climax, but merely fizzles out like an old hustler suffering from speed-induced erectile dysfunction. Essentially a flaccid film noir flick with pretensions of being a ‘socially progressive’ and conspicuously controversial arthouse period piece, The Berlin Affair might as well have been set in modern day Rome (in fact, a good portion of the film was shot Rome at Paolis Studios) as the film is even less interested in historical facts (let alone realistic architecture, wardrobes, etc. during the Third Reich era) than something directed by a vengeful Hollywood Hebrew like Spielberg. Admittedly, I wanted to like The Berlin Affair and after three or four attempts at watching the film, my opinion has yet to change. Lacking the quasi-oniric operatic etherealness, dark romanticism, and perverse poetry of The Night Porter, The Berlin Affair almost seems like a cynical parody of a Liliana Cavani flick, as if producers Menahem Golan and Yoram Globus got a hold of the film and butchered it so that it could be digested by the most dimwitted philistines. As for director Cavani, she stated of her objective with The Berlin Affair, “For me, a dictatorship is the most irreligious moment in history, because its leader and the hierarchies in power take the place of a divinity, while instead they are a caricature. As a consequence, they cause imagination to become scandalous and impossible, and also religion that feeds on fantasy...With their religious passion that has nothing in common with dictatorship, my characters are not anti-Nazi; however, they become “other” than Nazism, which they oppose, even if it is not overtly expressed in the film.” Keeping Cavani's quote in mind, I can respect The Berlin Affair for one thing in that it portrays bisexual race-mixers who have betrayed the Third Reich as sadists, liars, and degenerates who will screw anyone over for a bit of carnal knowledge.

THE BERLIN AFFAIR

-Ty E

LOVE TO KILL

Lindsay Shonteff (1979)

There are numerous entries in the CAT III library. Each having their own story, if not resembling most, but they offer extreme sex and violence. This one however, is different. It takes the subject matter which of course lends it the label CAT III but extends beyond that into a masterful thriller with a dash of humor along with this ingenious recipe of sick fun. The director's name is Billy Chung who some of us know from the film "THE NEW DR. LAMB" Anthony Wong, who we all know from The Untold Story and Ebola Syndrome, plays, well, Sam Wong. For some reason, he carries the same last name. He has a smart son named Keung and a gorgeous wife named Jade. They live a textbook life. The father pays the bills, works at a big firm. Their son goes to a proper school and the wife is unemployed given the natural (or so it seems) duty of maintaining the house which is presented in many forms of dialogue which will leave the seasoned feminist boiling. This is where the conflict picks up heavily. It seems that Mr. Wong is in fact an insane, sadistic alcoholic who loves to sodomize his wife with a bottle of beer. After escaping from this horrible ordeal, she stumbles out into the street getting beaten on. That is, until loose cannon Fire-Ball Hung of the local police department kicks the shit out of him and charges him with abuse. Danny Lee as Hung was an amazing choice. His role could have made the film or numbed it down. Thankfully, he is here in all his hilarious glory. As we watch her let her husband go testifying they were experimenting, Hung gets down right pissed off. He already put Mr. Wong in the hospital and won't mind doing it again. I have no idea about the system of law in past or present Hong Kong but if it is anything like how this film describes, I can imagine it to be a sewer. There is no "self-defense". If you kill someone, the dead person can "sue" you. I don't get it. Hopefully the subs were mistranslated. After this ordeal, the cop takes her and Keung in his huge house. Well, it is actually his insane girlfriend who is a model and is arriving back home soon. After Jade gets a make over, Hung begins to lust over this degraded diva and lose all interest in Jenny. He even goes as far as to try to give her away but the film picks up when Mr. Wong finds her whereabouts and kidnaps her mother. This film started with a watchable beginning that turned from standard into very entertaining and captivating. Near the end, it morphs into a whole other kind of gritty film that reminds me of when suspense movies actually used to be good. Granted, the CAT III label means it shouldn't be taken easily and you must make sure you are at least desensitized in the slightest for this film. While it doesn't feature an insane amount of blood and gore, it does show a misogynistic lifestyle that frequently promotes the beating of your wife, attempting to smother your mother, and stabbing someone in the ass with a fork. Anthony Wong, of course, is a genius when it comes to playing the villain. Mr. Wong's character is not just some cruel man who has no reason for his actions, but thanks to the flashbacks given, we can see the hell he endured and a clue to the horrible chain reaction that can explode in any family. Love To Kill is a often rough, gritty, and lightly humorous film that shows that in the end, the only person you can count on in yourself. Amazing performances outlined with compelling characters, the film surely is worth it after the end. If you can find a copy, i recommend it. Love To Kill is the ultimate Lifetime movie.

LOVE TO KILL

-Maq

RACE D'EP

Lionel Soukaz (1979)

If Franco Prospero and Gualtiero Jacopetti of Mondo Cane (1962) fame directed a documentary about male homosexuality on a much smaller budget than they used while working on their epically exploitative cinematic vacations, it would have probably resembled Race d'Ep: un siècle d'images de l'homosexualité (1979) aka The Homosexual Century; a militant celluloid salute to subversive sodomy and a semi-educational tribute to one century of homo history (spanning from the 1880s to 1980s) directed and co-written by Lionel Soukaz (Ixe, Maman que man) and co-penned (and, in part, co-directed) by French commie queer theorist Guy Hocquenghem. With the second word of the original Frog title being a play on the word for "pédé," a French slur for gay men, Race d'Ep reveals on merely a superficial level that it is a renegade agitprop work on the so-called 'fag race' and indeed it is. A man who believed 'white supremacy' and 'racism' could be annihilated via fanatical fudge-packing, Hocquenghem, who is clearly behind the majority of ideas featured in the aesthetically and thematically hostile work The Homosexual Century, would, like his homophile hero Michel Foucault, die prematurely via AIDS at the age of 42, yet would earn the title, "the father of queer theory" among his faggy fanboys. Still, Hocquenghem, like director Lionel Soukaz and their cinematic collaboration The Homosexual Century, would fail to earn an international reputation of any notably degree, thus the documentary makes for a rather distinct depiction of what the "gay agenda" was like before it was neutered by mainstreamer fag fascists who sought to homogenize their fellow homos and demand that heteros acknowledge the supposed normality of spitting semen into another man's brown-eye or face the bitter wrath of hysterical homosexualist ad hominem attacks that ruin careers and give petty power to self-glorifying queers. Indeed, during The Homosexual Century, there is no talk of gays wanting to adopt children or joining the military (in fact, anti-fagdom and militarism are treated as one in the same as deplorable traits of hostile "heteronormative" folks), but pro-pederasty is most certainly one of the major themes, as is mass male orgies and the belief that gayness is the result of being biologically different and not just another form of normality. As devilishly expressed in the narrated message towards the third part of the documentary that the, "best thing for an Occidental democracy was a blond and white, liberated, young" aka a sexually aberrant Aryan Marxist who wears women's clothing and sucks men's cocks, The Homosexual Century makes for a decidedly degenerate documentary that argues that the last century – the one that saw Europe lose all of its empires, colonies and status in the world, as well as seeing the dissolution of art and kultur and the rise of feminism, communism, globalism, multiculturalism and other collectivist cancers that appeal to mundane majorities – was a fairly great one for guys who like guys.

RACE D'EP

Essentially four different short films (or at least the version I watched was) that span from the 1880s to the 1980s that make up a feature-length documentary that starts with a curiously campy and queerly carnal pornographic docudrama about German pederast/photographer Baron Wilhelm von Gloeden and concludes with a pseudo-cinéma vérité 'arthouse' melodrama about a closet-case family man and his sleazy encounter with a dirty Frenchman whilst cruising Paris, The Homosexual Century is a relatively eclectic (as far as filmmaking techniques are concerned), if not thematically erratic, work that cannot decide whether it wants to be a piece of poofery erotica or a serious work of pole-smoking propaganda. Unsurprisingly, shot in gay guerilla-style during the height of mass demonstrations for "homo liberation" in fall of 1979 in France and elsewhere in the Occident, part one of The Homosexual Century, "Le temps de la pose" (23 mins), depicts late 19th-century cock-sucking kraut photographer Wilhelm von Gloeden as a princely pervert who started a virtual one-man-revolution with his proto-pornographic photographs of underage boys who he took a special liking due to their perceived exotic and 'Arab' appearances. In between goofy footage of von Gloeden getting his groove on as the master of getting disrobed Guido twinks to strike gay Greek poses, the segment also features sordid and salacious scenic sodomy from consenting young men that ultimately seems more silly than "sexy" as one can only assume the director intended it to be. According to one of the boys, the Baron, "made us princes of art," which must undoubtedly be true as high-profile pederast Oscar Wilde was a fan of von Gloeden's Uranian photos. Naturally, von Gloeden and his cousin Guglielmo Plüschow are important in gay history because they made it somewhat acceptable to eroticize young men, but it seems quite ridiculous that this story would take up about a quarter of The Homosexual Century. It would probably have been better spent discussing Uranian poets like Lord Alfred Douglas (Wilde's treacherous butt boy), John Addington Symonds, John Moray Stuart-Young, Montague Summers, and the eccentric Frederick Rolfe aka "Baron Corvo," but I guess images have always been more popular than actual literature, even among the cultivated cock-sucking sort.

The second segment of The Homosexual Century, "Le troisième sexe ou Des années folles à l'extermination" (25 mins), is indubitably the most interesting and insightful part of the documentary as it depicts the various opposing and philosophically rivaling homosexual groups in Weimar Republic, Germany during the the 1920s and 1930s, which queer British novelist Christopher Isherwood apparently called the "Golden Age of Homosexuality." Essentially divided into three rival yet somewhat overlapping groups – effete supporters of gay German-Jewish sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld; a man who believed homosexuals were a third sex (gay men being biological men with "female" souls), Adolf Brand; an anarchistic völkisch writer influenced by kraut egotist/atheistic anarchist philosopher Max Stirner who published the gay journal Der Eigene (aka The Own) that promoted neo-paganism and promoted the belief that homosexuals were more masculine than heterosexual men, and the “Confederation of Specials” (which is probably a bad translation of the real name); a group that promoted cultured cocktail aestheticism and anarchism – The Homosexual Century makes it quite clear there was actually a time when queers did not have a superficial pseudo-culture like they do today in the U.S. Like Adolf Brand, Hans Blüher (who later became a National Socialist for a time) supported the Wandervogel and German Youth Movement; proto-hippie back-to-nature groups that promoted neo-paganism, nudism, organic foods, eugenics, etc. that were partly inspired by the völkisch symbolist art of Fidus (Hugo Reinhold Karl Johann Höppener) – whose artistic works are featured in The Homosexual Century – and would later inspire the Hitler Youth. Ironically, Magnus Hirschfeld, who was called the “Einstein of Sex” by the New York Times (and later by Rosa von Praunheim), would develop a large body of research that was later used by the Nazis as scientific evidence of homosexual genetic degeneracy as depicted in The Homosexual Century in a most unflattering and quasi-pornographic manner in a debauched docudrama sequence featuring nude twinks and muscle fags dressed in black trench-coats with Nazi armbands. The documentary also goes on to describe how the Nazis trashed Hirschfeld’s research center, but made the mistake of featuring a picture of gay SA brownshirt Edmund Heines, who had his own mini-concentration camp where he tortured enemies as depicted in Rosa von Praunheim’s documentary Men Heroes and Gay Nazis (2005) and was the deputy of Sturmabteilung leader Ernst Röhm (who introduced his boyish compatriot to sodomy, among other things); both of whom would be sacrificed in Hitler’s fratricidal purge, the Night of the Long Knives, under the dubious pretense (Hitler, who was one of Röhm’s best friends, long knew about his loyal cock-sucking commando’s ‘vice’) of their poorer perversity. To the credit of the makers of The Homosexual Century, while it is mentioned that the Nazis had a popular quote, “suppress the Jews, for Marxism to disappear,” it is also mentioned that Soviet writer Maxim Gorky once wrote, “suppress the homosexuals, for fascists to disappear,” thus revealing homosexuality was not uncommon among early leaders of the National Socialist Party. Judging by the political climate today in the Occident in regard to gay special interest groups, Gorky may have been on to something. Somewhat surprisingly, ‘conservative revolutionary’ poet Stefan George (who most modern academics write-off as a proto-Nazi poet of sorts) and his obsessions with getting his members of his literary circle to dress in ancient, homoerotic style Greek clothing is mentioned in a relatively positive light.

Undoubtedly, the final two parts of The Homosexual Century are most certainly the weakest despite the fact that they depict relatively ‘homosexually liberated’ periods in history. While the third part, “Sweet Sixteen in the Sixties” (10 mins), is nothing more than a Soviet montage-inspired agitprop piece of perverse poo-packing pornography filled with erect members, flower power fags fro-icking around rather gayly, pretty boy orgies featuring buff bods and blowjobs, redundant rock 'n' roll/psychedelic music and aesthetics, and a celebration of how sodomy finally became sanctified in the Occident due to the emergence of counter-culture groups, Cultural Marxism/Frankfurt school ideas, and popular unisex clothing (which is described as a being more revolutionary and important than any other from of group protest), the final segment of the documentary, "Royal Opéra" (co-directed with Guy Hocquenghem, 25 mins), which was also released separately as an individual short film the same year (1979), is a minimalistic, melodramatic and would-be-erotic condemnation of homos in the closet as well as a demystification of public pissoir in the golden age of cruising that shares a striking resemblance to the French film Johan – Mon été 75 (1976) directed by the openly gay filmmaker Philippe Vallois (who also directed We Were One Man (1979) aka Nous étions un seul homme starring Piotr Stanislas, who plays one of the leads in Royal Opéra). About as interesting as Royal Opéra gets is when the characters decide to urinate in unison on a city sidewalk in broad daylight, as well as a scene where a racially insensitive remark is made by the dirty Frenchman regarding an urban abyss of sorts, where he states quite sardonically, "Moreover, this tunnel was as dark as a Negro's asshole in the depth of a mine." Needless to say, not a single segment of The Homosexual Century is LGBT-sensitive enough to make the curious contemporary plea for gay marriage to seem even remotely reasonable as most of the proto-twinks, queens, and leather-fags featured in this radically pro-decadence documentary are 'bad to the boner' and love living the wayward way.

RACE D'EP

Ultimately, The Homosexual Century is an uneven yet unintentionally eventful work of fierce fag agitprop from a bygone era when boy-on-boy buggery was still somewhat of a taboo in the Occidental world and that to some extent acts as counter-propaganda to the poofer political correctness that has infectiously engulfed Western European and Northern American society today. As with many works of its kind (and queer cinema in general), the documentary is also an incriminating and wildly wanton work that makes dudes that likes dudes seem like the most depraved and debauched deviants in the world, which is not helped by the the fact that co-writer/co-director Guy Hocquenghem was a vehement victim of his own political puffery, dying of "gay cancer," which was probably caused by one too many anonymous trips to the tearoom. In terms of educational merit, The Homosexual Century, especially the second segment, is proof gay kultur was not always about retarded haircuts and a radically repugnant fashion sense, talking with a contrived lisp, glorifying dastardly drag queens and bitchy old hags and feminist fag hags, so-called LGBT's collective war against heterosexuality (there was actually a time when fags hated dykes and vice versa), pill popping, and promoting a slave-morality-driven victim-based mentality. It might be a stretch, but I would not be surprised if the contemporary cock-sucker cry for "gay marriage" is a result of a lack of persecution among gays in the Western world because, after all, masochism and man-on-man love go hand-in-hand. In the past gays could proudly say they had Stefan George, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Jean Cocteau, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, etc., – individuals who actually suffered to some extent during their time – but who do they have now; Ellen Degenerate, Ogre O'Donnell, and pedomorphic pansy Neil Patrick Harris!? If the last century was the “Homosexual Century,” then this zeitgeist should certainly be concluded with an abberosexual apocalypse of sorts. After all, while the paintings of Caravaggio and the cinematic works of F.W. Murnau will always be treasured, no one is going to miss hearing about the much publicized tearoom exploits of drug-addled fag singers like George Michael and his less masculine compatriot, fairy fag Boy George.

-Ty E

POULTRYGEIST
POULTRYGEIST

Lloyd Kaufman* (2006)

"Night of the Chicken Dead" Troma really has come along way since The Toxic Avenger. Films from Troma have been lacking in originality lately (Not the creative umph! but rather the flawed execution), and seems like the company hasn't aged a year since it's beginning in 1974. Troma, if you don't know, is an independent film company centered on fart jokes, lesbians, and cheap gore effects. So the plot is about a balding goof ball named Arbie (Get it? Fast Food) who is in love with a woman who went to college and became an artfag liberal lesbian and in order to go against her ways, he accepts a job at a chicken shack ran by a black militant. I imagine that Kaufman has a team of Jewish writers to come up with this kitsch. This Indian burial ground that is below the restaurant creates chicken zombies that ultimately make Michael Herz skinny, which is highly unlikely. Denny, the black store manager, instantly becomes a trembling "slave" in front of the general - Yet another example of the horrible undertones of the film. This is not a bad thing at all. Propaganda is a must at times. What would society be without it? Another hilarious scene is in which the militant states that blaming the Jews is the first thing to do, which in most cases of Chicken Zombies would be appropriate. What Poultrygeist does best is mock many races and countercultures which most films dare not to intimidate due to the amount of population conformation. Artfags surrounding in a lesbian protest suddenly pause from their protesting of something they know nothing about other than the fad (This includes Gay Rights parades), to slurp on a smooth latte from their very favorite - Starbucks. There is also a similar scene to the parody in Wayne's World. An old, crooning man who had wasted his life working a part-time job recalls of a time when he was young and had youth. I wonder what would have happened to Lloyd without his film making career? I can see him being a disgruntled office worker which he happens to half-way become later in the film. Lloyd is the kind of Jew that I can appreciate, one who is aware of his own religion and can mock it openly, rather than pretending to be a lawyer or an intellectual. Family Guy can make fun of black but not Jews? Lloyd basically says fuck it, and proceeds without caution. So besides the gore and implants of racial tension and slut chickens, how does this film hold up? To put it simply, Poultrygeist is the most ambitious film created by Troma and puts Lloyd on top of his campy goodness game. Besides being a wonderful musical and a social commentary on fast food and racism, it manages to uphold as the best of Troma. Poultrygeist is perhaps even better than The Toxic Avenger and Terror Firmer. The soundtrack is amazing while breathing recklessness and amazing direction in the cast. Troma made up for the "you either love it or hate it" abomination Cannibal the Musical, although I still respect Parker & Stone. In terms of flat out splatter, Poultrygeist reigns supreme. The slaughter scene in which all the Chick-zombies go on a mad hunt for flesh is one of the most inventive massacres I have seen in recent years. It's impossible to write down the utter enjoyment I had for this film. I can no longer go to Chick-Fil-A due to the cows stating, "Eat more chikin." The gore is top-notch and is only set down by its amazing effects in the creation of the chicken zombies. Such a raunchy tale of "fowl" play can only be undermined by its ridiculousness. Scenes are parodying Jaws, Poltergeist, and many other classic horror films. Tromaville sure is a funky place, with satire and exploding faces and NES cartridges, I'd only like to imagine the headlines. Not since prohibition has there been so much death and despair.

-mAQ

JESUS IS A PALESTINIAN
JESUS IS A PALESTINIAN

Lodewijk Crijns (1999)

While I typically find Richard Dawkins and Christopher Hitchens fan-boys to be even more hateful and annoying than the philistine Evangelical Christians that they love to hate, nothing is more patently pathetic and ludicrously laughable than the sort of spiritually and racially retarded whites who adopt alien religions and find themselves worshiping some turd-skinned charlatan with a special craving for female Europid meat. Indeed, I am talking about people like David Lynch who subscribe to phoney bullshit religious cults like the neo-Hindu Transcendental Meditation (TM) movement, which is backed by rich white Americans and Europeans who somehow found themselves brainwashed by an elderly Indian hedonist who tells his members to refrain from sex while he secretly defiles all of his white female followers and flies around the world in fancy jets. Unfortunately, aside from a handful of examples like George A. Romero's Dawn of the Dead (1978), which hilariously symbolically features white Hare Krishna zombies, there are not too many films that mock this rather retarded phenomenon that reached its peak during the counterculture era yet still unfortunately lives on today. Luckily, there is a little known Dutch film, Jezus is een Palestijn (1999) aka Jesus Is a Palestinian directed by Lodewijk Crijns (Met grote blijdschap aka With Great Joy, Loverboy), that not only makes a major mockery out of mindless white pseudo-Hindus but retarded religious cults led by third world charlatans in general that promote a sort of slave-morality oriented weltanschauung. In fact, on top of parodying trendy religious cults, the film also assaults various other forms of odious Occidental decay that are especially prevalent in Western European nations like the Netherlands, including self-mutilation (ranging from stupid piercings and other forms of so-called body modification to 'cutting'), mindless post-sexual liberation hedonism, so-called multiculturalism, rampant sexual and romantic dysfunction, and even incest, among other things. In a more anachronistic sense, the film also parodies millennialism and the religious retardation that accompanied that, with an obscenely ugly and swarthy Arab prophesying a counterfeit towelhead Palestinian Christ that of course never actually appears in the end. The film is notable for being partly set in the Amsterdam multicultural slum of Bijlmermeer (colloquially known as 'Bijlmer') which is famous for the Bijlmerdijk (aka "Bijlmer disaster") when the state-owned Israeli airline cargo aircraft El Al Flight 1862 crashed into some ghetto apartment buildings on 4 October 1992 in what is notable for not only being the deadliest aviation incident to ever occur in the Netherlands, but also because no one really knows how many people died in the crash because there were so many undocumented third world alien negroes from places like Ghana and Suriname that were squatting there at the time. In an almost sadistically sardonic scenario that the Hebraic gatekeepers of Hollywood would never dare touch, Crijns actually mocks the Bijlmer crash and the fact that the area is more or less a multicultural human garbage dump that is inhabited by people with prehistoric mindsets. Indeed, Jesus Is a Palestinian is an almost pathologically politically incorrect work where the only people that belong to religious cults are white mental and/or physical cripples and ignorant and superstitious barbarians and savages of dubious racial origin from the third world. Featuring quasi-pornographic imagery of unsimulated sex and mirthfully misanthropic humor that unwittingly exposes the sheer and utter lack of testicular fortitude that is involved in the crappy kosher comedies of hymie would-be-humorists like Judd Apatow, Seth Rogen, Jonah Hill, Feldstein, and other creators of philo-Semitic twaddle, Crijns' film is an admirable debut feature from a Dutch filmmaker that would ultimately beat Hollywood at their own goofy con game. If you're looking for low-class celluloid trash of the comically crazed sort that genuinely makes a mockery of certain Occidental taboos, you probably cannot do better than Jesus Is a Palestinian.

After beginning with a megalomaniacal quote from self-described messiah David Koresh, Jesus Is a Palestinian introduces pathetic protagonist 'Ramses' (played by popular Dutch comedian Hans Teeuwen, who was responsible for the idea for Theo van Gogh's Interview (2003) starring Katja Schuurman) as his cult member comrade describes how the members of the American branch of their neo-Hindu cult are involved in drilling holes in their legs where "esoteric smoke" is blown which apparently "goes straight to your bone marrow" and "creates an immediate expansion of consciousness." Indeed, aside from wearing retarded monk-like robes, the members of the cult are covered with various grotesque body piercings that they absurdly believe give them special spiritual powers. By the end of the film, every member of the cult that Ramses belongs to will have holes drilled into their legs with a power drill at the demand of their elderly lunatic Indian leader 'Guru Adi Da Kahn' (Anis de Jong), but before then the protagonist will temporarily leave his Limburg-based farm commune and take a 'spiritual journey' of sorts in his hometown in Amsterdam where he temporarily discovers sex and independent thinking, among other things that any healthy and normal person could not live without. Indeed, at the beginning of the film, Ramses' long estranged sister Natasja (actress and screenwriter Kim van Kooten of Robert Jan Westdijk's Zusje (1995) aka Little Sister) shows up at the Limburg commune and demands to see her brother, but the group's creepily pedantic white cuckold sect leader (Pieter Bouwman) attempts to stop that. Luckily for Ramses, his sister Natasja is an exceedingly arrogant and aggressive bitch who does whatever she wants and she certainly has no problem pushing the neo-Hare Krishna automatons out of the way to get to her brother, who is in the process of decapitating a chicken when she finally finds him. An ex-cutter and glue sniffer who "sniffed so much glue that his nasal septum started to disappear," 25-year-old Ramses was eventually 'rescued' by the Hindu cult about 8 years ago and is somewhat taken aback when his sister approaches him and demands that he come back with her to Amsterdam to see their dying father who apparently wants to see him one last time before he kicks the bucket.

JESUS IS A PALESTINIAN

While Ramses is eventually granted permission by the guru to leave the commune to see his dying father, he is told by his sect leader that he must come back before the “bone marrow experiment” which “has to take place before Iriion shifts out of the Aquarius zenith.” Ramses is also forced to take an oath and, as he states, “I’ll be cast out and my future will be grim,” if he breaks it. Before leaving, Ramses has a sort of mini ‘crown of thorns’ painfully pierced to his penis head by the Guru so that he cannot enter the “forbidden zone” (aka fuck). Unbeknownst to virgin Ramses, his big sister Natasja lives with a busty, if not conspicuously chubby and moronic, blonde sub-babe named Lonneke (Dijn Blom) and he will soon find himself wanting to pound her completely shaved puss. Since the little beast is his best friend, Ramses also smuggles his black baby pig ‘Muštafa’ out of the commune and brings it with him to Amsterdam without his sister’s knowledge. Upon arriving in Amsterdam, Ramses is quite annoyed to learn that his sister has not only lied to him about his father (Peer Mascini) wanting to talk to him since he has apparently been comatose for about four months, but also that Natasja is also involved in a conspiracy with the evil head doctor to have the old man euthanized, which the protagonist ultimately refuses to allow. Eventually, Ramses discovers that his father is faking being unconscious because, to quote the old man, “If people don’t take me seriously, I don’t take them seriously.” Ultimately, Ramses’ father wants him to “take me to the messiah.” Indeed, a Palestinian Christian charlatan named Rashid (Moroccan comedian Najib Amhali) is peddling a scam that the messiah will come back in Palestinian form and will arrive on the roof of a Bijlmer ghetto apartment. Indeed, Ramses even buys some ‘holy’ Christ grade palm cream, which is regularly used by limbless residents of Bijlmer to put on their nubs, from Rashid and puts it on his father. Ramses’ father acknowledges that he was a terrible parent and judging by the fact that both of his children are major fuck-ups with serious mental illnesses, the viewer does not doubt this, so no he naturally seeks to be redeemed for his sins and Rashid claims to have exactly what he is looking for.

As hinted by the fact that they take showers together, Natasja and her roommate Lonneke are involved in a quasi-lesbian relationship where the latter has devoted herself to being dominated by the former. Despite the fact that she is an aggressive slut who seems to fuck a different guy every single night, Natasja has completely cuckolded Lonneke and brainwashed her into rejecting romantic relationships and into thinking all men are scumbags who only want to get into her panties, yet she soon begins to fall in love for Ramses and the two eventually get involved a doomed and rather pathetic love affair. Indeed, after Natasja kicks him out of her apartment when he accidentally exposes her having sex with some random guy named Bob at party and he moves into his hospitalized father's old apartment, Ramses begins developing what might be described as a personality of his own. Of all people, Ramses decides to confide in overzealous Christian conman Rashid about romantic advice regarding Lonneke and before he knows it, he is cutting off his retarded Hindu haircut and wearing relatively normal clothes. Meanwhile, the Guru and his cult members begin stalking Ramses and when they randomly show up at his apartment and attempt to drill a hole into his leg with an electric power-drill, he actually manages to stand up for himself, escapes from the Hindu automatons, and seeks shelter with Lonneke, who later helps him take the ghastly 'cross of thorns' lock off his virginal penis. Of course, as an overweight cutter whose back is covered with scars as a result of self-mutilation, Lonneke is not quite right in the head and weeps and freaks out anytime Ramses attempts to have sex with her. As someone that is brain-washed by a dumb bitch and slut like Natasja, Lonneke is, not unlike Ramses, a weak-willed follower who cannot stand on her own two feet, thus her and the protagonist's romance is doomed to fail even though the two seem to be made for one another.

While Ramses manages to eventually have sex with Lonneke after various failed attempts to insert his ramrod into her shaved gash (which my girlfriend notably described as resembling chicken skin), she sobs the entire time like a pathetic child and then proceeds to mutilate herself afterwards while mega-bitch Natasja pretends to comfort her in an attempt to emotionally manipulate her. Meanwhile, the Guru and his followers accidentally run over poor piglet Mustafa with their commune van and break his back, so Ramses is forced to put the animal out of its misery. Killing the pig ultimately comes in handy, as Ramses is later forced to do the same to his father after Rashid pseudo-redeems him of his sins before dropping dead himself upon falsely mistaking a wayward jet for the second coming of the Palestinian messiah. Indeed, when his father says "Lord, deliver me," Ramses crushes his head with a cement block to end his suffering and then he and his sister symbolically put their dead daddy's corpse inside a cave. In the end, Ramses proves that he is a perennial follower by going back to the commune in Limburg and Adi Da Kahn aka 'Kangaroo' (as people oftentimes mistakenly call him) reluctantly agrees to allow him to stay. While Lonneke is waiting for Ramses when he gets back to the commune, there is no happy ending as the lovers agree to go their separate ways. While Lonneke has decided that she wants to learn to be independent and demonstrates it by rejecting a ride back to Amsterdam from Natasja, Ramses accepts the fact that he is a weak and meek follower who has no problem taking orders from an eccentric old Indian fart who demands that he mutilated his body. In the end, Guru Kahn and all of his followers, including Ramses, get high by collectively smoking a hookah that is connected to all of them via the holes that have been drilled through their legs.

Undoubtedly, one of my biggest complaints regarding Jesus Is a Palestinian

JESUS IS A PALESTINIAN

is that, for all of its religion mocking, it never once parodies Judaism and its obscenely outmoded traditions like brit milah circumcision ceremonies where a so-called 'mohel' circumcises a baby boy and then sucks blood from the child's penis (!). Indeed, for all the mocking that Jewish comedians, filmmakers, and newscasters do of Christianity, their own all the more absurdly outmoded religion provides a goldmine worth of comedic gold material to work with. Luckily, although he never really attacked Judaism as a religion, Lodewijk Crijns would later satire the hypocritical behavior of liberal Jews in his most popular and successful film Alleen maar nette mensen (2012) aka Only Decent People, which depicts the hilarity that ensues when a young Hebrew decides he wants to find himself a black beauty with a ghetto booty and ultimately finds himself ostracized from his oh-so-proper kosher community. Notably, Jesus Is a Palestinian star Kim van Kooten would later collaborate with Crijns on his second feature Met grote blijdschap (2001) aka With Great Joy, which she co-penned the screenplay for. Out of all of the filmmaker's work, With Great Joy is notable for being Crijns' sole dark and serious drama, so it should be no surprise that the absurdist auteur has described it as his least favorite film. Undoubtedly, while watching a scene at the beginning of Jesus Is a Palestinian where the protagonist's sister shows up at the cult commune and the mindless follows stare at her as if she is the weirdo, I felt as if I was watching a sort of anti-The Wicker Man (1973), as the group certainly completely lacks the mystique, aesthetic potency, and sensuality that made the pagans of Robin Hardy's film seem so intriguing and strangely likeable. Indeed, if for nothing else, Crijns' film is important in that it takes a rather incendiary and even iconoclastic approach to satirizing weak and spiritually retarded xenophiliac white people who adopt increasingly trendy religions from the third world, as if mindlessly following elderly brown egomaniacs will result in them obtaining some sort of secret knowledge that will enable them to experience serenity and nirvana or something. As someone that regards Siddhartha (1922) as Hermann Hesse's most obscenely overrated book and considers David Lynch's increasing obsession with Transcendental Meditation to be at least partially responsible for the decline of his talent as a filmmaker, I could not help but delight in Crijns' film, even if it is more or less the cinematic equivalent of Mad magazine, albeit thankfully much more graphic and subversive. Indeed, it is not every day that you see a film where a pornographic joke is made of an ex-glue-sniffer turned neo-Hindu moron repeatedly failing to properly insert his cock into a cunt hole. Indeed, Jesus Is a Palestinian ultimately feels the result of what might happen if Teutonic aesthetic terrorist Christoph Schlingensiefel had attempted to direct a Hollywood comedy, as it ultimately makes Superbad (2007) and The Hangover (2009) seem like Disney movies that were specially tailored for autistic schoolchildren.

-Ty E

WITH GREAT JOY

Lodewijk Crijns (2001)

When Paul Verhoeven left the Netherlands for Hollywood, he left a perennial void in Dutch cinema that no other filmmaker would ever come close to filling in terms of success or output, though some have certainly tried with varying results. Indeed, Ate de Jong's career stagnated after both of his Hollywood films Drop Dead Fred (1991) and Highway to Hell (1991) failed miserably (though both films would ironically go on to become cult classics of sorts), Theo van Gogh only got international recognition after he was assassinated in 2004 and Hollywood actors like Steve Buscemi and Stanley Tucci remade two of his films in tribute, Dick Maas has been making highly accessible Hollywood-esque films his entire career but has failed to make it to the real deal, George Sluizer always remained a one-hit-wonder of sorts, and Americans are probably not brainwashed enough by feminism yet to fully embrace the unintentionally zany gynocentric weltanschauung of Marleen Gorris. In terms of younger filmmakers, Martin Koolhoven has proved himself 'multicultural-friendly' enough with ethno-masochistic cuckold garbage like Het schnitzelparadijs (2005) aka Schnitzel Paradise and 'n Beetje Verliefd (2006) aka Happy Family and profitable enough with his fairly generic WWII flick Oorlogswinter (2008) aka Winter in Wartime, so we will just have to see if his upcoming effort Brimstone (2016) starring big names like Robert Pattinson, Guy Pearce, and Carice van Houten will turn him into the next Verhoeven. As for other young contenders, Lodewijk Crijns probably has what it takes to have a rather successful career churning out raunchy trash comedies as demonstrated by works like Jezus is een Palestijn (1999) aka Jesus Is a Palestinian and Alleen maar nette mensen (2012) aka Only Decent People, which are not only more artful and sophisticated than the cheap and senseless crap kosher comedies that Hollywood regularly defecates out, but also more raunchy and genuinely politically incorrect. Indeed, in its depiction of the phoniness, pomposity, and cryptic racism of Amsterdam's posh liberal Jewish community, as well as its uncompromising and shockingly unflattering depiction of the Dutch negro population, Only Decent People is surely far too radical for the rabid Zionist clowns of Tinseltown, who prefer portraying white (translation: non-Jewish men of Europid extraction) as moronic beta bitches and beautiful white women as jungle fever crazed whores, as well as incessantly mocking, degrading, and falsely stereotyping America's white majority in general. While best known for his iconoclastic comedies, Crijns, who somewhat physically resembles a Game of Thrones character, has somewhat of arthouse roots as reflected in his genre-defying medium-length debut Lap Rouge (1997), which is a sort of quasi-mockumentary about two exceedingly eccentric Dutch brothers of the reasonably socially autistic sort whose odiously overbearing mother moved them to a remote village in southern France in 1959 to spare them the 'prison' of bourgeois life, thus leading to their abject alienation. Although completely unknown outside of the Netherlands like virtually all of the director's works, Crijns' second feature-length film Met grote blijdschap (2001) aka With Great Joy starring Verhoeven diva Renée Soutendijk (Spetters, De vierde man aka The 4th Man) and rather rotund Dutch arthouse star Jack Wouterse (De noorderlingen aka The Northerners, Suzy Q) is nothing short of a modern classic and indubitably the auteur's darkest and most mature work, as a sort of cult film without a cult that is practically begging for an international following (of course, like most great Dutch films, it seems that the film's distributor has nil interest in exporting the work).

WITH GREAT JOY

While fitting no specific genre, With Great Joy can probably be best described as a 'dark family mystery' with decidedly dark comedic overtones that also features conventions of horror, thriller, and melodrama. Quasi-Lynchian in terms of its intricate ominous and foreboding sound landscape, dark and shadowy cinematography, and unraveling of less than flattering family truths, Crijns's film, which was co-penned by actress and screenwriter Kim van Kooten (who also co-wrote Theo van Gogh's Blind Date (1996)), is a work with many shocking twists and turns that depicts the familial misery that ensues when a fairly conventional middleclass middle-aged Dutchman discovers the whereabouts of his estranged loser brother who he has not seen or heard from in 15 years and takes his pregnant girlfriend to Wallonia, only to be confronted with a series of unsettling and shameful secrets from his past that he was certainly better off not knowing about. Indeed, to write a full plot summary of the film would undoubtedly ruin the film's impact on people who have not seen the work, but I think it is safe to say that With Great Joy is a decided downer with an almost wickedly ironic title that will surely provoke anger in certain more sensitive viewers. Undoubtedly, in its cynical and borderline misanthropic depiction of humanity, it is certainly the sort of work that could have only been made in the Netherlands. Set in a wooded region of Belgium where the protagonist's brother has been secretly living with his common law wife for the past decade and a half, the film has a superficial Brothers Grimm-esque fairytale feel to it that seems to intentionally betray its very adult issues, thus underscoring the subtly unsettling general tone of the film in a work that ultimately defies all audience expectations.

With Great Joy begins with a fat and extremely unkempt Dutchman named Ad Sipkes (Jack Wouterse) being spotted from a car by a couple as he walks down a remote road in a wooded mountain region of Ardennes, Belgium. Ad is the estranged brother of banally middleclass protagonist Luc Sipkes (Jaap Spijkers of Karim Traïdia's De Poolse bruid (1998) aka The Polish Bride and Alex van Warmerdam's Ober (2006) aka Waiter), who receives a telephone call from a friend named Jose while he is spooning his thoroughly pregnant much younger wife Mieke (Camilla Siegertsz) that his long lost brother has been spotted roaming around a rural road in Belgium. Needless to say, Luc and his wife Mieke soon head to Belgium and after talking with Belgian authorities, the protagonist figures out where his brother is residing under an assumed name. When Luc and his wife arrive at the house, they find Ad, who is clearly completely alienated from mainstream society as reflected by his unkempt appearance and peculiar behavior, lurking among the shadows of his home and acting rather antisocial and skittish, as if he is trying to hide some deep dark secret. After questioning Luc about their parents and discovering that their mother is dead, Ad eventually breaks down crying and pushes his brother away when he later attempts to give him a hug. Ultimately after various failed attempts to appeal to his brother, Luc and his wife decide to leave, but while sitting in his car the protagonist is startled to see someone from his past walk by, thus inspiring him to immediately exit the vehicle and approach the woman. The woman's name is Els Groenendijk (Renée Soutendijk) and, as the viewer will eventually find out, she used to be Luc's lover but now she is Ad's old lady. Of course, Luc refuses to tell his wife about his romantic past with Els and instead tells Mieke that he knows her from "youth orchestra." Clearly thrilled to see her ex-beau, Els invites Luc and his wife inside and naturally Ad is annoyed so he goes and hides when they come back inside, but he somewhat loosens up over time, especially after having a couple drinks. That night, Els cooks dinner and everyone gets good and drunk on some organic wine. Of course, while drunk, Luc asks his brother why he disappeared and never attempted to contact him and Ad half-joking replies, "No news...is good news" after bitching how he has always felt like the black sheep in their family. Indeed, it is quite apparent that Ad is a sort of resentful fat loser who has always lived in the shadow of his more handsome and better liked brother, hence one of the reasons he decided to disappear and live off the grid. Meanwhile, Luc's wifey Mieke is not exactly humored by Ad's odd sense of humor and she is especially annoyed with Els, who she suspects of having a thing for her hubby. As the viewer will eventually learn, Luc and Els' past is much deeper and more complicated than Mieke suspects.

That night after everyone goes to bed, Luc is woken up by what sounds like a vicious animal in the barn next to the house. The next morning before anyone else wakes up, Luc, who wants to uncover what Ad and Els are clearly hiding from him, decides to sabotage some wires in his car so that he can stay longer and satisfy his undying curiosity while also attempting to create a stronger bond with his misfit brother. Although Luc confesses to his wife that he intentionally sabotaged his car so that he could stay longer, Mieke absolutely refuses to stay and is mad that he is staying because she thinks that Els is an "incredible bitch" and does not trust her with her husband. After Mieke takes a train back to the Netherlands, Luc decides to investigate why there were sounds coming from his brother's barn the night before and soon discovers there is some sort of wild beast lurking inside. When Luc senselessly puts his keys under the barn door to see how the creature inside reacts, the beast almost instantly grabs them in a rather violent fashion. That night, Els reveals her deep longing and desire for Luc by passionately stating to him, "I'd really appreciate it if you can...stay a few days more." After putting Ad to bed with a vodka bottle (indeed, Ad goes to sleep while embracing said vodka bottle, as he is a dipsomaniac who regularly attempts to drown his sorrow and resentment with cheap alcohol), Els tells Luc that she refuses to sleep in the same bed with her beau because "Ad stinks" and then informs him in a rather suggestive fashion that she will be sleeping in the same room and bed as him. Of course, Els attempts to seduce Luc and he naturally turns her down since he is a married man with a pregnant young wife, thus causing her to sob hysterically in an attempt to manipulate him into giving her a sympathy fuck. When Luc decides to leave after becoming uncomfortable with his ex-lover's rather aggressive sexual advances and tells Els that his keys are inside the locked barn, she manipulatively informs him where the key is to open said barn even though she knows that he will ultimately receive the shock of a lifetime upon entering the building. Naturally, Luc is petrified to find what is imprisoned inside the dilapidated old barn, but his curiosity gets the best of him and he decides to go in, thus resulting in him being attacked by a violent retarded child wearing a helmet. Indeed, while the retarded child is attached to his back and clawing at his body like a rabid cat, Luc runs out of the barn and screams to his brother for help.

WITH GREAT JOY

As it turns out, Luc and Els have been hiding out in Belgium because they are ashamed of their rather vicious and completely unpredictable retarded son Thomas, who is kept in the mattress-padded barn at all times because he is dangerous to both himself and everyone that he comes in contact with. After sarcastically stating, "Are you happy now?" to his brother after locking Thomas back in his room, Ad warns Luc to never go near the barn again, but of course the protagonist refuses to abide and becomes obsessed with the feral boy, who acts and is treated like a wild animal. The next morning, Luc spies on Els singing "happy birthday" to Thomas, who has a balloon attached to his helmet, while Ad stares with a face of disgust and contempt and complains regarding the pointlessness of singing to the obscenely retarded lad, "He doesn't understand it anyway." When Luc eventually reveals himself by singing along with Els, Ad yells "sod off" and shuts the barn door. At this point, Luc agrees to leave but tells Ad that Thomas has his keys, which the child likes to jingle as a sort of infantile toy. In the process of attempting to get the keys from his son, Ad is bitten and Thomas manages to flee the barn, so the three adults split up and go looking for the feral boy. Ultimately, Luc finds Thomas and Ad eventually catches up with the two. When Luc bitches to Ad that he should not hit Thomas because he thinks that the boy "has the right to respect," his brother accuses him of being typically arrogant and tells him he has no idea what he is talking about and then reveals that the only way that the feral boy can be calmed down is by being hit, which he readily demonstrates. After going on a rant about how Els' parents are worthless trash, Ad reveals to his brother that Thomas is mentally defective as a result of being born prematurely and that the nurse recommended that he be institutionalized at birth. Hoping that Els would stay with a sloppy and obscenely overweight slob of a beta bitch like himself, perennial cuckold Ad agreed to devote his life to raising Thomas in secrecy. After Ad yells at him, "Sod off. Fuck off, get lost" and "I never want to see you again," Luc finally decides to leave but while driving back he soon has a change of heart and turns around. As the film will soon reveal, Luc should have taken Ad's advice and left permanently, as he has yet to learn the worst family secret of all.

It should be noted that With Great Joy was made as a part of the 2001 'No More Heroes' series produced by the production company Motel Films where five different talented young Dutch novice filmmakers were given the opportunity to direct a feature-length film depicting "individuals who consciously turn their backs on society." Aside from Lodewijk Crijns' film, the other cinematic works that were produced as part of the series are mostly similarly high quality dark and foreboding films and include Martin Koolhoven's Amnesia (2001), Nanouk Leopold's Îles flottantes (2001), Michiel van Jaarsveld's Drift (2001), and Norbert ter Hall's Monte Carlo (2001). Notably, like Koolhoven with Amnesia, With Great Joy is unequivocally Crijns' darkest and most idiosyncratic work and certainly a true black sheep in his otherwise hopelessly modern and overly sleekly stylized oeuvre (indeed, even Crijns' ostensibly darkly themed made-for-TV movie Loverboy (2003), which deals with the fairly serious topic of Arab men tricking underage white Dutch girls into prostitution, is not all that serious and is plagued by sensational pop culture garbage), thus leading me to suspect that the limitations that are forced upon a filmmaker that is involved with a theme based film series can sometimes have fairly positive results. Somewhat curiously but not completely surprisingly considering the rest of his work, Crijns is apparently not that big of a fan of With Great Joy, as he prefers making comedies. It should also be noted that the film was shot by Jooſt van Gelder, who acted as the cinematographer of a number of early Aryan Kaganof masterpieces, including Kyodai Makes the Big Time (1992), The Mozart Bird (1993), Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers (1994), Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! (1996), and Naar de klote! (1996) aka Wasted!, as well as van Jaarsveld's Drift and Erik de Bruyn's Dutch cult classic Wilde mossels (2000) aka Wild Mussels. Considering that the filmmaker's most popular works Jesus Is a Palestinian and Only Decent People have extremely artificial aesthetics that seem like they were made for people with ADD and scream MTV, one must certainly credit cinematographer van Gelder for the decidedly dark and dreary look of With Great Joy, which certainly does not resemble any of Crijns' other films.

Not surprisingly considering its strange, unsettling, and oftentimes genuinely unpredictable storyline, With Great Joy would earn Crijns and his co-writer

WITH GREAT JOY

Kim van Kooten a Golden Calf—the Dutch equivalent of an Oscar—for best screenplay (the film was also nominated for ‘Best Film’ and the ‘Dutch Film Critics Award’). Ultimately, Crijns’ film is a distinctly dejecting tale of shame and guilt that indubitably features one of the most patently pathetic characters in film history as almost immaculately personified by Jack Wouterse as the less than jolly fat man Ad, who bears the shame of self-cuckoldry, among other things that I will not mention because they will surely spoil the film for those that have yet to see it. Of course, as a beautiful yet dysgenic woman with trashy worthless parents and a meta-retarded son, Els is also a rather rare but important film character that offers a sort of warning to men that marrying and/or reproducing with a white trash woman can come at a particularly high price that could haunt you for the rest of your life. Indeed, I know of a kind old man of Irish stock who made the genetically tragic mistake of mating with a woman with tainted genetics and siring a half-retarded son of the deleteriously sexually promiscuous sort who while working as a truck driver produced about thirty different bastard brood around the country. Of course, not only was this proud Irish-American man’s entire bloodline irrevocably ruined, but his degenerate descendants also spread like cancer as is typical of unintelligent untermenschen who have no problem breeding children they cannot feed. Luckily, it is dubious at best that a wild child like the one featured in With Great Joy would ever get the opportunity to reproduce. With its unique combination of dark and tragic family melodrama and unconventional arthouse approach to horror and thriller genres, Crijns’ film is like a seemingly unlikely aesthetic marriage of Douglas Sirk and Rainer Werner Fassbinder with David Lynch and David Cronenberg, albeit with a hint of Walloon master auteur André Delvaux (Un Soir, un Train aka One Night... a Train, Belle) thrown in for good measure. If you’re looking to see a rare film that, in stark contrast to sentimental Hollywood movies like Nell (1994) and independent films like Mockingbird Don’t Sing (2001), depicts a retarded feral person in a no bullshit and genuinely horrifying way, you will probably not find a film as provocative as With Great Joy which, unlike even Werner Herzog’s Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle (1974) aka The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser and especially François Truffaut’s L’Enfant sauvage (1970) aka The Wild Child, does not leave the viewer with even the faintest sense of solace in the end.

-Ty E

LOVERBOY

Lodewijk Crijns (2003)

While few people, especially the culture-distorting parasites that run the mainstream media and governments, are willing to recognize it in any meaningful way (after all, they are some of the foremost proponents of the dissolution of true white manhood), white Nordic Western European men have become so patently pathetic and emasculated that they allow hip-hop-loving and Muhammadan-idolizing illegal aliens from the third world to not only rape and sexually abuse, but also prostitute and enslave their underage daughters and sisters when they should be hanging these swarthy animals from lampposts in the streets. Notably, one of the main reasons the innately impotent Greater Manchester Police failed to swiftly arrest and prosecute the inbred Paki pedophiles that were involved in the gang-raping, drugging, and sexual enslavement of poor white British teens during the so-called 'Rochdale sex trafficking gang' scandal despite knowing about it for years was because these cowardly cuckold cops were deathly afraid that they would be labeled "racist" if they brought these rat-like cousin-copulating thugs to justice. Of course, as the made-for-TV Dutch film Loverboy (2003) directed by Lodewijk Crijns (Lap rouge, Met grote blijdschap aka With Great Joy) and penned by arthouse screenwriter turned TV hack Jacqueline Epskamp (who most notably wrote the script for Drift (2001) aka Adrift directed by Michiel van Jaarsveld) demonstrates in a somewhat curious and almost shockingly sanitized way that totally downplays the severity of the situation, scheming Islamo-pimps that con white proletarian girls into becoming servile sex slaves are not just a menace to not-so-jolly England. Featuring decidedly debasing rap and histrionic R&B noise, mind numbingly vulgar MTV-esque pop kitsch aesthetics and editing, superlatively soulless soap opera style romance and melodrama, and an eclectic collection of miscegenation-celebrating lumpenproles from various (and oftentimes indiscernible) racial backgrounds, this conspicuously cheap and equally tasteless film is something I would typically not touch with a ten foot pole, but I appreciate much of director Crijns' work and wanted to see how he would approach such a taboo multicultural issue. Indeed, in his innately iconoclastic debut feature Jezus is een Palestijn (1999) aka Jesus Is a Palestinian, Crijns made a marvelous mockery of spiritually retarded white xenophiles that become enslaved to trendy Asian religions, as well as other pathetic contemporary European trends like government-sanctioned euthanasia, neo-primitivism, and post-counter-cultural sexual degeneracy. Additionally, in his most commercially successful feature Alleen maar nette mensen (2012) aka Only Decent People, the auteur revealed the spectacular hypocrisy and closeted racism of Amsterdam's Jewish liberal bourgeoisie community, as well as the social and sexual chaos of the Dutch city's blossoming government-subsidized negro population. In Loverboy, Crijns demonstrates in a culturally cringe-inducing fashion how poor white girls that live in so-called 'multicultural' ghettos are very susceptible to the perniciously predatory tactics of maliciously misogynistic camel jockeys, who see European women as nothing more than cheap whores who deserve to be used and abused yet at the same time remind them of their own inferiority and racial schizophrenia (indeed, not unlike red-black-and-green 'back to Africa' negroes, these Arab untermenschen hate Europeans and European kultur and everything it stands for, yet cannot help but lust after blond women).

LOVERBOY

17-year-old blonde high school girl Denise (Monique van der Werff) is like a lot of poor white girls her age in that she is a fatherless bastard who lives in a virtually totally non-white ghetto in the South Holland capital city of the Hague where the only men are coffee-colored deadbeats and criminals and where many of the girls around her wear towels on their head because their Muslim men seem to have an irrational fear of women and sex. Not surprisingly, every single one of Denise's friends is either a negro, Arab, or some sort of racially dubious 'mystery meat,' but like the protagonist, they are all brainwashed by the whore pop (pseudo)culture that is propagated by the American Hebrew gatekeepers of Hollywood and MTV. Naturally, the group's virtual theme song is "Bootylicious" by the yank jigaboo trio Destiny's Child, though it seems Denise has a special affinity for blonde white sluts with assumedly crusty crotches like Madonna, Britney Spears, and vaguely busty pseudo-Latina Christina Aguilera. As demonstrated by the fact that she regularly stares at music videos featuring generically handsome pop singers embracing seemingly lecherous ladies like an erotically entranced automaton, Denise dreams of finding a tall, dark, and handsome mensch that will swing her off her feet and make her swoon with romantic joy of the rather raunchy negrified sort yet such ostensibly magical men only seem to exist in the fictional music video realm, but luckily fate has serious plans for the protagonist that involve the sort of man that seems like the kind of guy she has always dreamed of. Unbeknownst to Denise, a so-called 'loverboy'—a superficially and psychopathically charming pimp that tricks unwitting teens into thinking that he is their boyfriend so as to groom them into becoming prostitutes—that looks somewhat like a backup dancer from some sort of deplorable mainstream music video has been fanatically stalking her and keeping track of her every move and he knows exactly what to say to her to lure her in and eventually make her his pussy-peddling infidel slave.

Like all loverboys, Michael (played by Dragan Bakema, who is actually of Serbian extraction) is an audaciously arrogant Muslim Arab of Moroccan extraction whose smooth charm betrays his superlatively swarthy appearance and scumbag hip-hop style. When Denise and her collection of multicultural friends get in trouble at a fancy department store for trying on various pieces of clothing that they have no real intention of buying, Michael magically saves the day by appearing out of nowhere, pretending to be the protagonist's boyfriend by kissing her on the lips and calling her "honey," and even buying her an expensive dress that she previously would have never dreamed of owning. Needless to say, Denise, who is obsessed with finding a romantic boyfriend that attends to her every need without even having to be asked, is immediately hooked and wastes no time calling Michael immediately after he gives her his phone number under the pretense of being able to reach him if she wants to return the dress that he has bought her. As Denise proudly tells her pregnant sister regarding Michael, "When I saw him, I knew everything would change." Of course, everything will indeed change for the exceedingly naive protagonist, though she has no clue that it will involve routinely peddling her puss to effeminate middle-aged Arab businessmen and unkempt lowlife slobs that look like they crawled out of a sewer in New Delhi. As an ostensibly flashy dresser that drives a Mercedes Cabrio convertible and can easily gain her entry into fancy high-class parties and movie premieres that are attended by the sort of rich and famous white people that the decidedly dumb blonde would typically never dream of encounter in real-life, Michael initially seems like nothing short of a true dream lover to Denise. In fact, when Michael takes Denise on a romantic houseboat and she asks him, "Have you got anything? I don't have any condoms," he acts like quite the sensitive gentleman and pretends he is not just merely interested in her ass, less than sincerely replying, "Such a hurry. A present that's wrapped so beautifully. I think I should leave it wrapped a bit longer." Of course, by the next morning, Michael has pounded Denise's pussy in the houseboat. Naturally, Michael's next move after defiling her is to turn into a full blown pussy-peddler, but first he makes sure to give her the misleading gift of a cellphone with a new number so that he can always keep track of her.

Although he has only known her for a day or two, Michael begins immediately serenading Denise with bullshit lines like, "Nobody can love someone as much as I love you," which the protagonist believes because she is brainwashed by the antics of pseudo-blonde whores like Madonna and thinks that merely fucking a man will cause him to fall in love with her. After all, according to MTV and countless Hebraic specialists, love and sex are interchangeable, thus it is no surprise that Denise suffers from such a pathetic delusion, which is only transcended by her anti-reality belief that Arab men make great lovers and that interracial relationships have high success rates. Ultimately, Michael uses the excuse that he owes 5,000 Euros to a friend and that he might have to leave the country if Denise does not help him by fucking his comrade. Indeed, apparently Michael's towelhead homey Aziz (Walid Benmbarek) is willing to defer payment for three weeks if Denise allows herself to be debased by him. While Denise initially becomes angry with her loverboy's extra dubious request, she gives in by the next day after Michael shows up to her school and surprises her with a tacky fake gold necklace that he probably stole from one of his street whores. When Denise arrives at Aziz's apartment, he turns on ugly Arab noise and begins sweet talking her in Arabic. Notably, after Denise somewhat bitchily informs him that she does not speak Arabic, Aziz absurdly replies, "A shame, it's the language of love" and then equally absurdly adds, "I respect you a lot." To add insult to injury, Michael tells Denise he loves her even more than the day just after his best brown bud Aziz buggers her while she is washing the venomous Arab sex juices off her perennially defiled body. From there, Michael brings Denise to fancy movie premieres where she briefly gets to meet Dutch leading man Tygo Gernandt of Aryan Kaganof's Naar de klote! (1996) aka Wasted! and Pieter Kuijpers' Van God Los (2003) aka Godforsaken! and naturally the young white lumpenprole falls in love with the glamorous lifestyle, so she becomes less hesitant about selling her relatively fresh teenage gash for cash. Indeed, when Denise makes a couple hundred Euros from an Arab man by simply undressing him, she also falls in love with the easy money, but the glamour and, in turn, interracial pseudo-romance, does not last long when the reality of the rather unsavory situations finally becomes apparent to the protagonist.

LOVERBOY

Despite his fancy fast car and suave 'thug chic' clothing, Michael is a dead-beat bum that squats in a small dilapidated apartment in a dirty ghetto with his brother, though he promises Denise that he will soon buy her a lavish apartment in Amsterdam that they both will supposedly live in together. Meanwhile, Denise's mother attempts to get her to move back home after discovering that her daughter is 'dating' a greasy smooth-talking Arab, but Denise hates having to babysit her retarded aunt and is jealous of her pregnant sister, so she would rather live the life of a hooker than return to her worrying family. While Denise initially offers her sensual services to high dollar johns, she soon becomes a low-level gutter streetwalker who learns the tricks of the trade from a negress named Naomi (Monita Mac Intosh). Of course, as a street hooker, Denise is involved in a number of degrading situations, including being bugged by a bearded middle-aged dirtbag in his car while the john's large dog watches on from the backseat of the car. Meanwhile, in an absurdly improbable plot twist that demonstrates that both the director and screenwriter are fairly naive when it comes to Arab sexual slave-drivers, psychopath Michael somehow genuinely falls in love with Denise and, to the chagrin of his all the more thuggish towelhead buddies, begins becoming fairly overprotective of her, especially when it comes to the kind of guys she sells her body to. Towards the end of the film, Michael's pernicious pimp pal Lorenzo (Bulgarian-born actor Philip Rachid) even has to put a knife to his face after he dares to get in a heated argument with him over Denise's safety. It is only when Michael's scorned ex-prostitute/ex-slave (Tara Elders of Theo van Gogh's 06/05 (2004) aka May 6th) randomly shows up out of the blue and completely exposes the Moroccan pimp for who he really is while Denise is selling her adolescent ass that the protagonist finally comes to fully realize that her shit-skinned beau tricked her into degenerating into a gutter gold-digger and that all of his romantic gestures were no more authentic as his supposed identity as a 'Dutchman.' After talking to Julia, Denise learns that Michael promised her all the same things as he did to her, including buying her an apartment in Amsterdam. In the end, Denise goes back to live with her family, but Michael will not let her forget him, as he has a friend slice open her face with a razor upon unexpectedly driving by her apartment complex shortly after she leaves him. While Denise is left with a large scar on her face that she will probably have for the rest of her life, at least she does not get acid thrown in her face like so many stupid white European girls that date Arabs and other swarthy untermenschen like naive Brit Katie Piper, who fell victim to a uniquely ugly ex-lover with a dubious racial background, only to get with another shit-skinned fellow and even eventually having a Café au lait colored mongrel baby with him not long after getting a series of reconstructive surgeries. Of course, one can only assume the protagonist of Loverboy did not learn her lesson and will continue to date mongrel miscreants, but then again, no self-respecting white man would ever have any interest in her due to her less than respectable personal history.

While Loverboy was somewhat popular in its native land of the Netherlands, it is very doubtful that the film will ever be elsewhere, as it unfortunately features tons of mainstream pop music and clips from music videos that would make the work impossible to release in other countries due to how expensive the music rights would be. Notably, the film features a decidedly aesthetically deplorable montage where the protagonist and her pimp are horsing around in a jacuzzi full of bubbles inter-spliced with scenes from the official music video directed by Swedish director-cum-drummer Jonas Åkerlund (Spun, Horsemen) for the 2000 Madonna song "Music." Indubitably, despite its virtually unendurable audio-visual vulgarity, this seemingly retarded montage is fairly successful in articulating the sort of moral and psychological damage that is caused to a young girl who was weaned on a steady diet of MTV and kitschy mainstream pop music. Of course, the sad and pathetic reality of the protagonist's life is in stark contrast to Madonna's video, which depicts the guido whore as a sort of 'queen of the night' and opulent Dionysian diva that wildly parties with friends in a limousine, which is fittingly driven by kosher neo-vaudevillian comedian Sacha Baron Cohen while portraying his rather repugnant wigger rapper alter-ego, Ali G. Aside from the fact that the culture-distorting international tribe that Cohen belongs to is almost solely responsible for defecating out the sort of shockingly mediocre pop music and miscegenation-promoting anti-mores that the protagonist of Crijns' film mindlessly adopts, the female lead of Loverboy more or less parrots everything that Madonna, who is arguably the most powerful and successful prostitute in all of human history, does in the music video, yet she ultimately leads a tragically debasing life of prostitution where her only reward is mindless hedonism. In a cleverly and darkly cynical way that brings new meaning to the putrid pop singer's words, the protagonist and her pimp's relationship is pretty much summed up in Madonna's song where she almost sinisterly sings, "Music makes the people come together...Music mix the bourgeoisie and the rebel” (of course, the latter part of the lyrics should be changed to “Music mix the white woman and Arab pimp”). If anything, Crijns’ film downplays the loverboy phenomenon so as to presumably make it more accessible to brain dead teenage girls that want to see a love story and vicariously experience the deranged fantasy of being fucked by a primitive Arab thug. Perhaps most shockingly, Loverboy dares to make the brown slave master seem somewhat sympathetic by portraying him as a victim of his own backward culture and religion. While watching the film, I was certainly reminded of French Nouvelle Droite theorist Guillaume Faye’s remark in his book Sexe et Dévoiement (2011) aka Sex and Deviance, “Among certain Muslim men one notices a strange mixture of prudishness and sexual obsession which is typical of schizophrenic neurosis. This pathology is even more marked among them than among the Christian Puritans. Statistics on the ethnic origin of rapists and sex criminals in the broad sense would speak for themselves—if they were published honestly.”

LOVERBOY

Unfortunately, Loverboy does not dare to depict the more depraved behavior that these pseudo-macho savage pimps engage in like brutal gang rapes (though it is alluded to that Michael’s friends will “break in” the protagonist if he does not turn her into a whore fast enough), drugging (which includes getting girls hooked on heroin so that they become perennial slaves to their Muslim masters), and even murder, among countless other deplorable things that have absolutely no place in the Occidental world. As also mentioned in Faye’s book, “Women [...] are legally and socially more ill-treated today in North Africa and the Middle East than under European colonialism,” yet the medieval savagery of the Arab world is now being imported to Western Europe via the ‘soft genocide’ known as multiculturalism, which, as the steadily dying indigenous populations and insidiously expanding melanin-privileged populations, clearly demonstrates, can only end in racial and cultural chaos as most modern Western cities reveal. Of course, MTV and related Zionist propaganda entities will continue to plop out morally bankrupt xenophilic vomit to guarantee that incoming generations of Europid youth will be too hopelessly jaded, debased, culturally and spiritually retarded, and illiterate to resist their globalist master plan. While important in the sense that it is one of only a handful of films that deals with the tragic and seemingly unfathomable multicultural plague of the sexual enslavement of teenage girls by Arab parasites, Loverboy ultimately reveals one of many very sickening side effects of a much more malefic problem that has to do with the intentional third worldization of Europa by anti-European globalists and their white traitor politician whores. In its somewhat cleverly ironical use of MTV aesthetics and spastic editing, Crijns’ work is ultimately not too different from the prosaic pop (pseudo)culture dribble that it negatively portrays, thus its greatest strength is ultimately also its greatest weakness as a work that wallows in the same sort of reckless wantonness and vapid style(lessness) it unwaveringly mocks. Of course, if Loverboy saved just one single white Dutch girl from falling prey to a misogynistic Moroccan parasite with a serious inferiority complex and racially schizophrenic mindset, it is already infinitely culturally more important than all of the Hollywood films released in 2003 combined, even if it is by no means a decent film. After all, I doubt anyone could make any sort of legitimate argument that contemporary Hollywood has contributed anything of sincere value to the Occident.

-Ty E

ONLY DECENT PEOPLE
ONLY DECENT PEOPLE

Lodewijk Crijns (2012)

I am not exactly sure of his exact cultural or ethnic background, but Dutch filmmaker Lodewijk Crijns (Met grote blijdschap aka With Great Joy, Kankerlijers aka YOLO: You Only Live Once) certainly stands out in the Netherlands for making rather racially-charged works of the somewhat dubious and uniquely artistically unmerited sort that are quite accessible to mainstream audiences, as if the filmmaker was trained at the same scatological Semitic film school as the Weitz brothers of American Pie fame. Indeed, with his first feature Jesus is een Palestijn (1999) aka Jesus Is a Palestinian, Crijns not only made a mockery of trendy cults run by megalomaniacs but also the absurdly 'multicultural' nature of the contemporary Netherlands, which is beginning to resemble a third world sewer in various urban parts. In his made-for-TV movie Loverboy (2003), Crijns dared to portray the taboo subject of Moroccan 'loverboys,' who seduce young and naive white Dutch girls and force them into sex slavery. Undoubtedly, the director's most controversial yet commercially successful work to date is Alleen maar nette mensen (2012) aka Only Decent People, which is based on the 2009 best-selling novel of the same name by negrophiliac Dutch Israelite Robert Vuijsje (who notably received death threats due to his novel) and which was the second most popular film in the Netherlands in 2012 as a work that won the coveted 'Gouden Film' (a dubious award that more or less reduces the value of a film to its commercial success as opposed to artistic merit). Were the film not based on a book written by a Hebrew who is married to a negress, it is quite doubtful it would have ever been made, as it is an innately scathing cinematic work that wallows in rather raunchy racial stereotypes, especially of the Jew and negro oriented sort, with the latter group being depicted in such an unflattering, if not oftentimes realistic, way that one might as well describe Only Decent People as a sort of post-Jolson neo-minstrel show. It should be noted that Jew-Negro 'solidarity' is nothing new in the Netherlands as demonstrated by the fact that Sephardic Jewish filmmaker Pim de la Parra directed the first Surinamese film, Wan Pipel (1976) aka One People, which depicts a bizarre love triangle between a Afro-Surinamese man, Dutch dame, and Hindi chick. As mentioned in passing in Only Decent People, most of the blacks that live in the Netherlands today are Afro-Surinamese since the South American nation of Suriname used to be a Dutch colony and many of these blacks speak Dutch and feel that the Netherlands owes them something since their ancestors were slaves. What makes Crijns' film vaguely intriguing is that it is about Black-Jew relations as opposed to the stereotypical Black-White relations, thus depicting a somewhat absurdist scenario where two different groups with their own very different sets of victim mentalities express their undying hostility for one another, but also their mutual resentment for the white Aryan Dutch.

As a work about a super swarthy and short young bourgeois Dutch Jew from the upper-middleclass section of Amsterdam who dumps his longtime bitchy Jewess of a girlfriend so that he can realize his dubious dream of procuring a 'ghetto fabulous' negress with a big ass, equally big tits, gold teeth, and the cultural sophistication of the typical Detroit welfare queen, Crijns' film has naturally caused much controversy in and outside of the Netherlands, with everyone from militant black nationalists to mainstream neo-liberal pansies to Zionist Jews condemning the film, as if such a retarded work were worthy of such eclectic attention. Indeed, Only Decent People is the height of aesthetic asininity and pre-packaged Hebraic Hollywood-esque humor, but at least it dares to depict Jews and negroes as something other than the imaginary morally superior virtual angels that they are oftentimes portrayed as in mainstream movies and television shows in the United States. Indeed, Crijns' film depicts a world where all people are the same in the sense that they all consider themselves superior to other groups, with the Dutch Jews thinking they are superior to all other peoples, including the real white Dutch, and the Afro-Surinamese thinking they are superior to other types of blacks like Antillean and Ghanaian negroes. Somewhat fitting for a conspicuously contrived work that lacks even the slightest inkling of artistic merit and was funded by various Jewish sources (including the Abraham Tuschinski Fund), Only Decent People features next to nil actual indigenous white Dutch people and is instead set in a sort of absurdist hyperrealist 'allochtoon' nightmare realm where all the less than flattering stereotypes about negroes and Jews that whites hope to ignore are cinematically projectile vomited into their face in what is ultimately a true celluloid disgrace that demonstrates that the Dutch are now paying dearly for their colonial roots and contemporary liberal approach to so-called multiculturalism, among other things. With the film's gratuitous sex scenes featuring so-called 'thick' (translation: overweight) ghetto negresses and special emphasis on the fiercely fetishistic miscegenation-based fantasies of a philistine Jew that looks more like a Mexican Mestizo than a member of the same kosher cosmopolitan tribe as Trotsky and Spielberg, Only Decent People ultimately offers a more eclectically repugnant experience than any of the films of Russian artsploitation filmmakers like Andrey Iskanov and Svetlana Baskova, albeit with none of the marginal artistic merit.

Like the author of the book of the same name that the film is based on, Only Decent People protagonist David Samuels (played by Geza Weisz, who is the son of Dutch Jewish filmmaker Frans Weisz of Naakt over de schutting (1973) aka Naked Over the Fence fame) is a bourgeois Hebrew with a soft spot for big black ghetto booties who narcissistically sport gold necklaces with their names on them. David lives in the nice respectable area of Amsterdam Old South which his overweight mother Judith (played by auteur Alex van Warmerdam's wife Annet Malherbe) describes as a place where "only decent people" live, hence the ironical title of the film. Due to being fairly short and swarthy (not to mention the fact he dresses like a would-be-thug), David is oftentimes mistaken for being a Moroccan and thus always wears a Star of David necklace, or as he complains upon being mistaken for an Arab shoplifter by a super Aryan-looking blond male store clerk, "The Dutch can't tell a Jew apart from a Moroccan. Or a Turk from a Moroccan. In the eyes of Dutch people, they're all foreigners." While David has had a happy relationship with his Jewish girlfriend Naomi (Sigrid ten Napel) for over seven years, his voracious thirst for fatty dark meat is beginning to become uncontrollable and he does not care if he brings great shame to his fellow Jews by starting a raunchy romance with a ghetto negress with multiple bastard kids. As the son of a half-Jewish father named Bram (played by real-life half-Jew Jeroen Krabbé) who is the proud "editor-in-chief of the only decent current affairs show on national TV" and who looks down on lesser sophisticated "textile Jews" like the protagonist's girlfriend's family, David ultimately brings the ultimate shame to his hyper hypocritical neo-liberal Hebrew community. Luckily for the protagonist, his oh-so-proper family members are too weak and phony to take any real action against his sexually aberrant tendencies, at least at first.

ONLY DECENT PEOPLE

After offending his girlfriend Naomi by faking an orgasm because he is no longer aroused by her small kosher derriere, David abruptly decides to break things off with his beloved and begins hunting for a sizable dark diva, though she must be a spade sista' who has never been with a non-negro before as he wants to be the first Hebrew to hump her. In his search for a spade babe, David calls the sole negro he knows, Reginaldo, and tells him regarding what kind of woman he is looking for, "For me, she has to be as dark as possible. The darker she is, the closer she'll be to nature." Rather absurdly, David's black buddy is repulsed by dark dames and only dates blonde babes, stating of black women, "They've got hard, rough faces." Ultimately, David finds a stereotypical black beastess named Rowanda (Imanuelle Grives) at a club and hits on her by proclaiming that you "can't trust the Dutch," as the protagonist rightly believes that he will find common ground with her in their assumed mutual hatred of white blond Aryans. Not unlike the majority of black people living in the Netherlands, Rowanda is Afro-Surinamese and like of her relatives, she resents Jews as is especially apparent with her mother Janine (Urmie Plein), who states to the protagonist, "In Suriname, there are also Jews who think they're the boss [...] The Dutch owe a lot to Afro-Surinamese black people because of slavery." As David remarks via narration regarding the similar victim mentality that both blacks and Jews have, "Negroes think of slavery every day. Besides negroes, nobody thinks of slavery. Jews think of World War II every day. Besides Jews, nobody thinks of World War II." In a rather bizarre scene that demonstrates David's delusional arrogance, the protagonist infuriates Janine by arguing that the holocaust was worse than centuries of black enslavement, as if some of the most heinous merchants during the African slave trades, not to mention top mass murderers of the 20th-century, were not Jewish. Somewhat absurdly, Rowanda's younger brother blames the fact that he, his sister, and most other Afro-Surinamese negroes have bastard kids on the fact that, "...my ancestors were separated from their families during slavery." While Rowanda and her relatives trash talk on Jews and virtually every other race and culture, David mostly takes it like a little bitch aside from on the one occasion where he attempts to deflect Jewish guilt for the African slave trades by arguing that the holocaust was worse than slavery. Indeed, like most miscegenators, David is willing to go to great masochistic extremes to be with his 'African queen,' but he soon learns that, as a pampered Israelite from Amsterdam's most posh neighborhood, he is not quite fit to live the ghetto negro lifestyle.

Rowanda incessantly tells David she doesn't like "stingy men," which really means that she expects any man that is screwing her to buy her whatever she wants. When David does not last long the first time they 'make love,' Rowanda complains, "You don't last long. You're stingy," but the protagonist does not mind as he ridiculously believes that he is in love and even tells his parents such. Indeed, David describes having sex with a black woman as being like "another sport" in comparison to spoiled Jewish girls who, as the protagonist's ex-girlfriend demonstrates at the beginning of the film, just lay dead during coitus as if they are a corpse. When Rowanda comes to his mother's conspicuously kosher birthday party, things end badly after the protagonist's father Bram asks the black gal what her father does for a living. Like most members of the global African community, Rowanda is a fatherless bastard and she is so offended by Bram's seemingly banal everyday question that she pathetically attempts to criticize him for owning and reading so many books, thus revealing her inferiority complex in the presence of an ostensibly sophisticated Jewish intellectual. Ultimately, David's romance with Rowanda goes sour when he begins hanging out with her 'pimp' cousin Ryan (played by a rapper named 'Negativ'), who mocks the Jewboy for partaking in cunnilingus ("Men don't do that. We do not do oral sex. It's humiliating") and monogamy. Needless to say, when Ryan hooks David up with a low-class Antillean negress named Alessandra and Rowanda catches her kosher beau dancing with the dark dame at a club, all hell breaks loose. After assaulting Alessandra in a slapstick-oriented ghetto booty brawl, Rowanda slaps the shit out of David and screams at him, "You're the opposite of a bounty, a white man who hangs out with blacks too much. You copy all their bad habits. At least, you know what to expect from a negro. You're much more dangerous. I thought you had respect for me." Naturally, Rowanda tells David to go fuck himself and Ryan assures him that he will help him to find more big black butts. Of course, as fairly gentle Jew-boy David soon learns, his pathetic kosher libido is no match for Ryan's mandingo negro sexual virility.

When David comes home after his fight with Rowanda, he is surprised to find his father and his friends in the company of a young well groomed negress named Rita (Belinda van der Stoep) who apparently has an internship at Bram's network and is studying Eastern European immigration to the Netherlands. As a hardcore fan of ghetto fabulous negresses, David is rather offended by what he sees as Rita flushing her culture down his father's kosher toilet and more or less accuses her of being a sell-out 'Uncle Tom.' David also rightly describes Bram and his Jewish friends' conversation as being nothing more than "neo-liberal, armchair socialist talk" after listening to the old liberal Jews regurgitate rubbish about Israel that they probably heard Jonathan Stuart Leibowitz (aka 'Jon Stewart') pontificate about on The Daily Show. In fact, David gets so agitated by the entire scenario that he accuses his father of being a phony half-Jew and then declares in a manner that makes him sound like some sort of militant post-Irgun Zio-gangster suffering from a bad case of wishful thinking, "Dutch Jews think Israelis are barbarians who treat the Palestinians in a brutal manner. But the Israelis think Dutch Jews are sissies. If they had lived in Germany during World War II...they would have taught those Germans a lesson. They would have turned the entire Germany into one barren field. The holocaust would have never happened. Amsterdam would have been crawling with Jews at the moment. And the embalmed body of Adolf Hitler would have been a trophy in the Jewish Historic Museum with queues as long as for the Anne Frank House." As David later tells his father, he is offended that he treated Rowanda like untermensch scum while fawning over Rita just because she is a negress who can speak and dress properly. Of course, little does David realize that Rita is the perfect negress for him.

ONLY DECENT PEOPLE

While hanging out with Rowanda's cousin Ryan, David gets into all sorts of degeneracy, including getting in a threesome in a storage closet with a random fat black single mother with fake blonde hair while the revoltingly wanton woman's young son looks on while licking a lollipop in his stroller (notably, the protagonist receives a blow job from the black broad). After deciding to opt out of a quasi-homoerotic orgy involving one ratchet-faced black anti-beauty, Ryan, a sleazy scrawny wigger, a towering black dude with large bitch-tits, and a violent gangster thug that seems to be suffering a perennial temper tantrum, David attempts to catch a taxi and is robbed and beaten by the gypsy driver and his equally swarthy friend for refusing to pay an absurdly inflated rate to get back to Old South. When David's ex-girlfriend's friend Esther spots the protagonist talking to black teenage mothers at a local hospital where she works as a nurse, news get around the Jewish community that he is a depraved degenerate surreptitiously spreading his semitic seed among Amsterdam's underage Afro-Surinamese rabble. Ultimately, David's father tells him enough is enough, kicks him out of the house, and tells him he cannot move back until he registers for college. Indeed, David is such a loser that all he has to do to avoid sleeping in a gutter is to register for college classes that his parents will gladly pay for, but he is just too damn stupid and lazy to accomplish such a simple feat. After attempting to get back with Rowanda and nearly having his cock cut off by her and her two brothers in what would have surely been a less than kosher second circumcision, David becomes desperate and attempts to get back with his Jewish princess Naomi, but when he walks in her room he finds his Jewish best friend performing cunnilingus on her kosher cunt, thus confirming Ryan's belief that eating pussy is for bitches. After hitting rock bottom, David is forced to take a lowly job at KFC which he rather enjoys since he constantly gets to see big black booties since it is a fried chicken fast-food joint and all. While working one day, David bumps into his dad's black intern Rita and the protagonist is shocked to see that she is dressed just like Rowanda and even sports a similar gold necklace with the name "Sherida" on it. As the young black professional explains, Sherida is her real name and "Rita" is her "Dutch" name that she used to help land her a job. When Rita leaves, David is quite enthralled to find that the dark diva has written her phone number on a napkin for him. In the end, negrophiliac Jew David gets both brains and booty, thus confirming that sometimes 'love conquers all,' even when between a tiny Israelite and a negress twice his size.

Ironically, despite the almost unanimous agreement among the Dutch media that the film was racist, Only Decent People was not only a huge hit in the Netherlands, but also in Suriname where it was completely sold out the first week after its premiere, thus indicating that the average lumpenprole negro probably prefers seeing their race presented as a bunch of pimps and hoers rather than in the sort of phony way Hollywood depicts blacks, as if every negro child has the potential to be a Nobel Peace Prize winner or rocket scientist. Personally, I found the film to be an exceedingly grotesque experience that transcended the average Japanese Pinku eiga in terms of vulgarity and human depravity, as a sort of all-too-flashy Dutch equivalent to a Todd Solondz movie, albeit nowhere near as cleverly and brilliantly depraved in the sort of idiosyncratic autistic-neurotic Hebraic way that the Welcome to the Dollhouse (1995) director is best known for. Indeed, had director Lodewijk Crijns exercised the sort of debauched 'subtly' that Solondz has demonstrated with his works, he probably would not have received such a public outcry from Only Decent People, but then again the film probably would not have been such a great commercial success as the scandal it caused certainly lured the lemmings to the theaters. Certainly, I have no doubt in my mind that Crijns' film would be a huge hit in the United States if it were remade in English, as it is not only tasteless enough to appease the American filmgoer, but also features a more honest look at race that most yanks would love to see but are denied by Hebraic agitpropandists in Hollywood who thrive on mocking whites whilst basking in their own Jewishness (after all, who has ever seen a Seth Rogen or Jonah Hill flick were they don't incessantly allude to their horrid Hebraicness?!). While I respect the fact that Crijns' film unequivocally demonstrates that foreigners, including rich Jews that have been there for hundreds of years, have no true loyalty to the Netherlands and resent indigenous white Dutch people, Only Decent People reeks of MTV anti-aesthetic retardation of the ADD oriented sort and thus should be watched with caution lest the viewer contract spiritual syphilis. Ultimately, the film is a sort of satirical take on the age-old phrase 'Once you go black, you never go back,' which, depending on the viewer, obviously can be interpreted in many different ways. Indeed, my girlfriend and I interpreted Only Decent People as a sort of warped cautionary tale, though I would be lying if I did not admit that I find the idea of a romance between a turd-sized Jew-boy and gigantic ghetto fabulous negress to be an innately hilarious prospect that would surely sire superlatively racially schizophrenic progeny as the life of black-Jewish white nationalist terrorist Leo Felton attests to.

ONLY DECENT PEOPLE

-Ty E

CLEAN, SHAVEN

Lodge Kerrigan (1993)

After viewing Clean, Shaven, the 1993 film directed by Lodge Kerrigan, I found myself concluding a psychological experience of abstraction. Like Harmony Korine's Julien Donkey-boy, Clean, Shaven realizes a more honest view of schizophrenia. Hollywood has given us soft and friendly views via Ronald Howard's A Beautiful Mind. Clean, Shaven pertains to viewers interested in a film that doesn't distance the viewer from the pain of the schizophrenic. This lack of distancing from the viewer and the general subject of schizophrenia, accomplishes more in film and viewer interaction.

Kerrigan unquestionably took cues from David Lynch with his utilization of ambient sound and its interaction with image. Sound plays a very significant part in the film's success of creating a world of delusion, confusion and paranoia. Many scenes rely on auditory dissonance with a combination of noir style lighting and small town decay. These three things set the emotional atmosphere for the film.

Instead of relying on quick-cuts often found in most contemporary films to create emotion, Clean, Shaven's obsession of the shot creates a world of unrelenting experience. The viewer is forced and driven into mandatory pain. By not giving into quick-cuts, the film traps the viewer in the moment. Quick-cuts allow the viewers to be aware of what they are supposed to feel emotionally but fall short of doing it naturally.

For fans of gore and body counts, Clean, Shaven also takes the unconventional route. The film contains such scenes as the body of a naked, rotted little girl and fingernail amputation. Both scenes are presented to the audience in precise detail and virtual authenticity. Even the most seasoned exploitation fans might find themselves unable to deal with these realistic scenarios of depravation.

No task of the schizophrenic protagonist seems to be simple in Clean, Shaven. As the viewer, you also find yourself subject to these mental inconsistencies. Nothing ever seems to be in place and every moment seems to be unpredictable. Although the film has a consistent plot, the real reward lies in the experience. You won't find yourself much different in the end.

I believe Clean, Shaven to be a worthy experience for anyone interested in looking into the mind of a schizophrenic. At the end of the film you will be more engrossed than entertained. Good films do that for us. Clean, Shaven is evidence that you don't have to settle for a happy schizophrenic. They aren't fun anyways.

-Ty E

CLAIRE DOLAN
CLAIRE DOLAN

Lodge Kerrigan (1998)

While it might sound like a crock of shit to most men (and women), I can say unequivocally that I would never under any circumstances voluntarily fuck a prostitute and there is a number of reasons for this, though it is mainly because I find few things less arousing than the prospect of penetrating an internally necrotic mess that has literally set a specific price to smash her overly used and abused gash. Additionally, when it comes to vaginas, there is no fun in being able to open a lock that can be unlocked with any key. On the other hand, I have developed a certain unexpected and misplaced (and probably delusional) empathy for these forsaken women, mainly due to my chronic cinephilia and affinity for filmmakers that have bravely tackled the subject in various ways, including Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Paul Morrissey, Paul Verhoeven, Walerian Borowczyk, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Federico Fellini, Andy Milligan, and Frank Henenlotter, among countless other examples. In fact, when it comes to streetwalkers in cinema, I think I have a pretty eclectic understanding of the subject and do not feel like I am being even remotely hyperbolic when I declare that Claire Dolan (1998) directed by underrated American auteur Lodge Kerrigan (Clean, Shaven, Keane) is indubitably one of the most intimately brutal, nuanced, and tightly constructed of these taboo-driven studies in carnal (self)degradation. In short, while the film might depict various sex acts and nudity, it is about as sexy as the prospect of masturbating with sandpaper or reusing a used semen-and-menstrual-blood-soaked condom, as Kerrigan's film is an unconventionally humanistic neo-Bressonian experiment in the slow-burning despoilment of the soul as a strangely foreboding cinematic work where the viewer is forced to confront the fact that being a whore is more of a metaphysical affliction than a simple urban black market trade. As far as I am concerned, fucking a pussy-peddler is something akin to spiritual necrophilia, or so one might assume if they are fully willing to embrace Kerrigan's keenly cold yet somehow strikingly empathetic and understated quasi-realist celluloid nightmare.

Undoubtedly, one of the most intriguing aspects of Claire Dolan is that the titular anti-heroine makes the valiant attempt to transform herself into her archetypal opposite by going from being a prostitute to a mother. As he detailed in his classic text Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character, suicidally self-loathing Viennese chosenite Otto Weininger regarded the dichotomous psychological extremes of femininity as being divided between the mother and the prostitute types, or as he wrote, "The fact that motherhood and prostitution are polar opposites can probably be gleaned from the simple observation that good housewives and mothers have more children, while the cocotte never has more than a few, and the streetwalker is mostly sterile. It must be noted that the type of the prostitute includes not only women who sell themselves, but also many so-called nice girls and married women, some of whom never commit adultery not because the circumstances are not favorable, but because they themselves do not allow things to reach that point. Therefore no exception should be taken to my using the term 'prostitute,' which is yet to be analyzed, in a much broader sense than that of women who sell themselves. The streetwalker is distinguished from the more prestigious cocotte and the more genteel hetaera only by an absolute lack of differentiation and a total absence of memory, which makes her live from one hour to the next or one minute to the next, without the slightest connection between one day and another. Moreover, the prostitute type could manifest itself even if there were only one man and one woman in the world, because it expresses itself in a specific kind of behavior toward a male individual." In short, despite her aspirations towards motherhood, the film's lead is and will always be a sort of spiritual prostitute, thus her rather ambitious efforts at rehabilitation are ultimately in vain, or so her baby-daddy concludes just before kicking her to the curb while she is still pregnant. Indeed, while the pussy-peddler does in fact manage to fill her womb with cum that leads to life, the mensch that plants the seeds ultimately decides to leave her after coming to terms with the harsh reality that she is a whore and will always be a whore whether she is peddling her meat curtain or pretending to be a proper housewife. In that sense, Claire Dolan is not the sort of film that would be deeply appreciated by the sapless sort of people that use pc terms like "sex workers" as it is a rather harsh and emotionally brutal film that unequivocally demonstrates that prostitutes are by no means typical women, but tragically damaged goods that no man—no matter how kind or well meaning—can ever hope to 'save.' For better or worse, the film follows Bresson's cinematic dictum, "Neither beautify nor uglify. Do not denature," though it gets pretty organically ugly.

Claire Dolan (English mischling Jewess Katrin Cartlidge, who previously worked with Mike Leigh and Lars von Trier, in what is indubitably the greatest performance of her fairly respectable career, which was tragically cut short when she died in 2002 at the premature age of 41) is a slightly swarthy Dublin-bred whore that is wise enough to peddle her puss to white collar corporate types instead of negro dope dealers, but she seems to loathe everything about her rather lonely life. Throughout the film, the viewer discovers bits and pieces about Claire's dubious past, but it seems her sole reason for existing now is to pay off a hefty debt that she owes to a pimp named Roland Cain (Colm Meaney)—a stereotypical red-faced, curly-red-haired, and alcohol-addled mick bastard—who was 'kind' enough to pay for her dying mother's expensive nursing home and medical bills. Not surprisingly, Claire decides to quit her trade when her mother drops dead and ultimately decides to betray her employer by running away and starting a new life in Newark, New Jersey as a lowly hairstylist. Needless to say, mad mick Roland hunts Claire down and forces her back into selling her gash for cash again during what proves to be a somewhat inauspicious point in her life.

CLAIRE DOLAN

While Claire initially meekly abides and slavishly gets back into the loose-coat game, things become complicated when she meets and ultimately falls in love with a sloppy and somewhat neurotic taxi-driver named Elton Garrett (Vincent D'Onofrio in one of the many underrated and largely unseen performances of his rather singular acting career) who treats her a whole lot better than a blowup doll. In fact, not long after meeting, Elton reveals his keen sensitivity and strong altruistic sense of intimacy by performing cunnilingus on Claire, so naturally she is somewhat freaked out when a john attempts the same thing a couple days later and thus further compounds her rather schizophrenic sense of sexuality. As demonstrated by a scene where she angrily kicks out a man that she had a soulless one-night-stand with, Claire has a lot of pent of (self)hatred, confusion, and anxiety when it comes to sex, yet Elton manages to completely change that, at least momentarily. Undoubtedly an emotionally battered beta-male of sorts that seems to have a pathological compulsion to try to save forsaken women, Elton even opts to stay with Claire after discovering that she is a prostitute and is on prescription drugs to treat STDs, though he is certainly painfully self-conscious about the situation like any half-sane self-respecting man would be. Of course, to settle for such a damaged woman who literally cucks him for cash, Elton has to be an extremely wounded individual himself, which is probably, at least partially, the result of being a divorced father that only gets to see his adolescent daughter every once in a while. Indeed, if Claire and Elton have anything in common, it is that they are both decidedly debased and degraded virtual human-punching-bags that have mostly lived their lives serving others while failing to take of themselves in the process. Naturally, you cannot help people that do not want to help themselves, but Elton tries and almost immediately begins giving Claire money to pay off her debt to Roland. When Claire stoically declares to Elton on a rooftop, "I want to have a child" and he simply replies, "Are you sure?," she demonstrates her seriousness by responding with the utmost stoicism, "Yes. We can make it work." Naturally, as a relationship involving two terribly emotionally damaged individuals, it does not work, but Claire at least gets the baby, which was obviously her main motivation. Indeed, while she loses her mother at the beginning of the film, Claire still manages to continue the so-called 'circle of life' by creating a (bastard) child of her own.

Right from the get-go of the film when we are first introduced to Claire as she attempts to flirt with a nameless/faceless john on a payphone, it is immediately apparent that, on top of selling both her sex and soul, she lies for a living. Indeed, aside from pretending to enjoy having sex with strange men and dressing in a slutty way that she clearly does not enjoy, Claire spends her free time telling potential johns over the phone with a monotone dispassionate voice things like, "I wanna be with you. I can be at your hotel in ten minutes [...] I want you to fuck me." In fact, Claire has such a decidedly degraded and depressing essence that it is a surprise that any man would want to fuck her lest they succumb to the emasculating shame of erectile dysfunction. In fact, Claire looks like she is more aroused at the prospect at castrating men than engaging in coitus with them. Of course, Claire is also not a particularly pulchritudinous pussy-peddler as she looks like she could be the emo big sister of Anne Frank and not like the sort of overtly lecherous chick that has a talent for downing Brobdingnagian dicks or engaging in the art of double penetration, but of course that is why she might appeal to certain strange men. In fact, Claire is sometimes stalked by sadists and degenerates that seem attracted to the special brand of degradation that she practically radiates. Luckily, Claire has managed to project a rough exterior. For example, when a young ugly hood approaches her at a diner and reveals his intent to sexually defile her, Claire emasculates the man by audaciously replying that she would prefer banging his friend because he is "better looking." Of course, Claire's 'tough bitch' routine is nothing but a carefully crafted act and she is just like everyone else in the sense that she desires to be loved, hence her attraction to the inordinate sensitivity of Elton. While Claire certainly gets to exploit her talent for extra wanton female wiles, she is also incapable of using classic feminine weapons, including the exploitation of the stereotype of female weakness, or as Friedrich Nietzsche once wrote, "The Strength of the Weak.—Women are all skillful in exaggerating their weaknesses, indeed they are inventive in weaknesses, so as to seem quite fragile ornaments to which even a grain of dust does harm; their existence is meant to bring home to man's mind his coarseness, and to appeal to his conscience. They thus defend themselves against the strong and all 'rights of might.'" Not only does Claire work in a deleterious trade of the flesh that involves her customers, who technically engage in a crime or two just to procure her services, leaving their consciences at home, but she also cannot afford to show weakness as it could get her raped or even killed, or so the film hints in its rather unflattering depiction of everyday bipedal sidewalk scum.

Undoubtedly, out of the three main characters of the film, mick pimp Roland—a man that unquestionably personifies everything that I find repugnant about the stereotypical Irish phenotype—is, in many ways, the most magnetic yet understatedly monstrous. While the viewer does not learn much about Roland aside from the fact that he is a proud traditional family man and that he uses a bourgeois bar as a sort of front/hang-out for his prestigious slut-slinging enterprise, the viewer is exposed to the imperative little detail that he has actually known Claire every since she was just a wee little girl, thus making his relationship with her seem all the more sick and morbid. As hinted by a random photograph that appears in the film, Claire's mother seems to have been friends with Roland and was probably also one of his whores in the past, hence why he was probably helping to foot her hospital bills. Despite their deep-rooted history together, Claire seems to both deeply hate and fear Roland, hence her rather sneaky failed initial attempt to escape his wrath. Needless to say, Roland can be pretty emotionally brutal to the anti-heroine as demonstrated by rather rude remarks to her like, “You’re looking worn, Claire. How many years do you think you got left? Two, maybe three? What are you going to do when you start falling apart? Push your pussy on the street for 20 bucks a pop? You’re not a new girl.” Still, at the same time, Roland is a completely practical man that willing to honor a deal and freely releases Claire from her bondage when she finally manages to pay off her hefty debt. Needless to say, Roland has very little faith that Claire could excel at anything aside from peddling heir puss, but she is fanatically determined to prove him otherwise. While Roland certainly gives Claire some tough lessons about life, he ultimately provides poor hopeless sap Elton with the greatest lesson and gives some harsh yet true insights about life that seem to completely change his worldview, at least on the highly personalized level. Indeed, when Elton randomly approaches him in an aggressive fashion at his bar, Roland hits him in the family jewels and then angrily states whilst grabbing him in a rather painful position, “I don’t like to repeat myself, so listen carefully. She may have paid me off, but she’ll never quit. I’ve known Claire since she was 12-years-old and I knew then what I know now—that deep inside, she’s a whore. She was born a whore . . . she’ll die a whore.” After kicking his ass and doing his nice little perennial whore spiel, Roland, who is not an unreasonable man, proceeds to act friendly toward Elton by giving him some whisky and leaving him with the following thought, “I know it’s hard, but try to accept what I told you. You’ll have a happier life and be a better person for it. It’s time you started looking after yourself. You’re not a little boy anymore.” Undoubtedly, had Roland not kicked his ass, Elton might have been made the biggest mistake of his life and settled down with a woman that seems to have a different STD every other week.

CLAIRE DOLAN

While Roland clearly knows next to nothing about Elton, he, like any good pimp, is a highly intuitive individual and can clearly sense that he’s a broken emotional cripple that has the unfortunate self-destructive compulsion to want to help other broken emotional cripples, hence his dubious love for a godforsaken second-hand Sue like Claire. While it is immediately apparent after he discovers that Claire is a prostitute that he is extremely bothered by her curious choice of trade and that he should not be involved in such a decidedly deleterious and clearly foredoomed relationship, Elton is clearly a victim of his own low self-esteem and misplaced empathy. In short, getting the shit beat out him by a pimp was probably the best thing that ever happened to Elton as he probably would have lacked the testicular fortitude to break up with Claire otherwise. At the very end of the film, it is revealed that Elton ultimately made the right choice as he ended up with a much cleaner and ladylike woman. Indeed, in the very last sequence of the film, Elton is depicted a couple years later randomly running into Roland while he is with his new extremely nice pregnant blonde wife Madeline. Notably, Roland states to Elton in regard to kids, “It’s the best thing that’ll ever happen to you. It changes everything. You can’t stop with one! You gotta keep on having them.” When Elton’s wife asks how he knows her husband, Roland somewhat humorously states, "We knew each other years ago in another life. It's funny how time passes." Of course, it is doubtful that Elton's wife knows that he has a bastard son with Claire. Of course, as the bastard son of a whore, Claire and Roland's son probably has a good chance of growing up to be a rent boy, tranny freak, druggie, and/or some other sort of irredeemable urban concrete-pounding degenerate. Additionally, even if Elton had not left Claire, their love affair would have undoubtedly been doomed to failure as it was built on extreme doubt and lies. After all, as Weininger once wrote when describing the mother and prostitute archetypes, "Whether a woman will meet a man who can make her the mother of his child through his mere presence is a matter of chance. To that extent it is imaginable that the destinies of many mothers and prostitutes could have turned out the opposite of what they have actually become. On the other hand, there are not only countless examples of women remaining true to the type of the mother even without such a man, but there are also doubtless cases in which this man does present himself and even his presence fails to prevent the woman from finally and irrevocably turning to prostitution." In a sense, Elton acts as a sort of 'emotional prostitute' to Claire to the point of providing her with what she wants most but cannot seem to acquire: a child. Of course, Elton completely lacked the strength and sense to transform Claire into a real 'mother,' but then again even sub-literate rappers and gang-bangers know that you cannot turn a whore into a housewife.

As a sort of unintentional connoisseur of call-girl cinema of all sorts and someone with an interest in perversity and abnormal psychology in general, among other things, I do not feel I am committing puffery when I say that Claire Dolan is unequivocally one of the greatest and most effortlessly emotionally grueling depictions of a pussy-peddler ever committed to celluloid. Indeed, while there are a number of films ranging from Federico Fellini's early classic The Nights of Cabiria (1957) to Andy Milligan's gritty classic exploitation piece Fleshpot on 42nd Street (1973) to Ken Russell's weirdly high-camp Crimes of Passion (1984) to Mike Figgis' endearingly pathetic Leaving Las Vegas (1995) that depict the seeming incapacity of prostitutes to find real lasting love or even simple emotional connections, Kerrigan's underrated film is arguably more effective than any other cinematic work of the same sort in that it manages to intimately communicate the almost intolerably grating emotions associated with such abject romantic forsakenness. In that sense, the film is quite comparable to Kerrigan's equally potent debut feature Clean, Shaven (1994) in terms of its gratingly viscerally authentic approach to the virtually never good, very bad, and uniquely ugly reality of living with a sort of metaphysical affliction. Also, like the director's debut, Claire Dolan mostly shies away from any overt political subtexts aside from a mostly superficial critique of the evils of capitalism, though it could arguably be interpreted as left-wing or right-wing. Undoubtedly, the film's fairly obvious theme of capitalistic degradation is pretty much summed up when a random

CLAIRE DOLAN

John acts inordinately empathetic towards Claire and makes the heartfelt speech just before, rather ironically, defiling her frail body, "It's ok. I understand. I used to do a lot of things for money. Things that I hated. Things that got inside me and tore me up, but I learned to push it away and seal it off. The worst part—the thing that I kept coming back to—was that I couldn't completely understand how I got into those positions. I couldn't figure out what it was inside me that allowed me to accept those things. For years, I thought I was different from everybody—in a bad way. I had no one to turn to, to get myself straight. It took me years to realize that I wasn't a freak. There are a lot of people out there that do things that tear them up—that they hate. Do you understand what I mean? Just try not to think about it." Like Iranian auteur Sohrab Shahid Saless' hard ghetto West German epic Utopia (1983)—a similarly painfully raw and gritty yet slightly less intimate portrait of pussy-peddling—the film cuts sharply into the soul with an acidic pathos-laced knife as wielded by the most forlorn of female fuck machines; or, tears of (anti)eros.

In the eyes of left-wing Nietzschean Georges Bataille, virtually all women have the capacity to be capitalists of the cunt that see their pussy as always having a very specific price, or as the degenerate frog once wrote, "Not every woman is a potential prostitute, but prostitution is the logical consequence of the feminine attitude. In so far as she is attractive, a woman is a prey to men's desire. Unless she refuses completely because she is determined to remain chaste, the question is at what price and under what circumstances will she yield. But if the conditions are fulfilled she always offers herself as an object. Prostitution proper only brings in a commercial element. By the care she lavishes on her toilet, by the concern she has for her beauty set off by her adornment, a woman regards herself as an object always trying to attract men's attention. Similarly if she strips naked she reveals the object of a man's desire, an individual and particular object to be prized." Of course, the great irony of Claire Dolan is that it is only through the very same prostitution that led to her personal debasement that the titular twat acquires her freedom and capacity for motherhood. Indeed, in a sick semitic sort of way, Claire owes her sense of personal sovereignty to selling her cunt to be used as a virtual all-purpose public porta-potty. On the other hand, Bataille believed that "Prostitution seems to have been simply a complement to marriage in the first place." Still, Bataille—an unhinged mensch that married a Jewess at a time when it was less than vogue who seemed to fetish things simply because they were sick and repellent, including eggs-in-pussies and human sacrifice, among other things—might as well have been summing up the metaphysical employment resume of Claire when he wrote, "The lowest kind of prostitute has fallen as far as she can go. She might be no less indifferent to the taboo than animals are except that because what she knows about taboos is that others observe them, she cannot attain an absolute indifference; not only has she fallen but she knows she has. She knows she is a human being. Even if she is not ashamed of it, she does know that she lives like a pig.” After all, she does not seem all that terribly shocked when her special savior Elton eventually leaves her, but she probably first and foremost wanted him to knock her up, thus he arguably becomes the exploited whore in the end yet he still greatly pays for it, at least both emotionally and monetarily speaking. In short, Claire Dolan contains the relatively simple but extremely imperative message that one should not dip their dick in a dirty dasher dame’s dearest bodily part lest they seek cuckoldry and extreme emasculation, among other obscenely odious things.

According to Weininger, “The prostitute is very different. She at least lives her own life fully, even if—in extreme cases—she is punished for this by being excluded from society. Rather than being brave as the mother is, she is a coward through and through, but she always possesses the correlative of cowardice, which is impudence, and thus she is at least brazenly shameless.” Of course, the same could be said of artists, especially good ones. In fact, somewhat ironically, Weininger argues that prostitutes share much in common with great men/leaders of history—another obsession of artists—arguing, “The unique phenomenon of the great man of action has always had a powerful attraction for artists in particular (but also for philosophical writers). The surprising unanimity displayed in this respect will perhaps make it easier to approach the phenomenon by means of conceptual analysis. Mark Antony (Caesar) and Cleopatra are not altogether unlike each other. Initially, most people will probably regard this parallel as quite fanciful, and yet the existence of a close analogy seems to me to be beyond any doubt, however different the two persons may at first sight appear. The ‘great man of action’ renounces any inner life in order to express himself (the term is appropriate here) fully in the external world, and to suffer the fate of everything that expires, rather than achieving the permanence of everything that is internalized. He tosses his whole value behind him and keeps it at arm’s length with all his might. Similarly, the great prostitute flings the value that she would be able to obtain from being a mother into the face of society, not in order to take stock of herself and to embark on life of contemplation, but in order to give completely free rein to her sensual urges. Both the great prostitute and the great tribune are like firebrands which, when lit, illuminate vast expanses, pile corpses on corpses as they pass, and fade out like meteors, without contributing anything worthwhile and meaningful to human wisdom, without leaving anything permanent behind, without any sign of eternity—while the mother and the genius quietly work for the future. Both the prostitute and the tribune, therefore, are perceived as ‘scourges of God,’ as anti-moral phenomena.” Of course, this would explain why prostitutes, not unlike great men, are among the most intriguing and intricate female characters of cinema history, just as archetypal mothers tend to be the most banal and one-dimensional. Certainly, Peter O’Toole’s performance as a great man in David Lean’s Lawrence of Arabia (1962) has something particularly whorish and wonderfully immoral about it. By dedicating himself to the melancholy and even morose life and times of a walking and talking sex object, auteur Kerrigan, despite his modernist art fag cred and his fairly young age at the time of directing the film, reveals himself to be a timeless artist with a knack for depicting ancient perennial archetypes in a relatively idiosyncratic fashion. Needless to say, I think I would rather enjoy seeing Kerrigan directing a film about a historical great man, though I think he is probably more fit for making a film about Nietzsche or even SS-Oberführer Oskar Dirlewanger.

CLAIRE DOLAN

It is undoubtedly fitting and even somewhat ironic that one of Kerrigan's greatest cinematic achievements is a film about the metaphysical perils of prostitution as he has, rather unfortunately, been forced to spend the greater portion of his somewhat uneven filmmaking career prostituting himself out to projects that are surely beneath him. Indeed, aside from the singularly artistically tragic bad luck he suffered when his fully finished feature In God's Hands starring Maggie Gyllenhaal and Peter Sarsgaard was scrapped in 2002 due to what the director described as "technical issues with the negative" as a result of some insipid retard destroying it in a lab, Kerrigan has spent most of the 2010s directing episodes for lame and/or generic TV series like Homeland (2012, Episode: "State of Independence"), Longmire (2013, Episode: "Carcasses"), Bates Motel (2014; Episode: "Caleb"), and Starz' patently pointless TV adaptation of Steven Soderbergh's pretentious turd The Girlfriend Experience (2009), among various other examples. On the other hand, it does make some sense that the auteur would tackle The Girlfriend Experience (2016-current), which was just renewed for a second season and which he is once again co-writing and co-directing in collaboration with vaguely attractive Mumblecore veteran Amy Seimetz. Aside from his TV work, Kerrigan also directed the French-American co-production Rebecca H. (Return to the Dogs) (2010)—a French-language flick about a crazy frog bitch that supposedly wants to be Jefferson Airplane singer Grace Slick—though the film seems to be impossible to find (as far as I know, it has never been released in any home media format) and it has received mostly terrible views, which is no surprise considering it contains a particularly preposterous premise that seems inconsistent with the director's previous cinematic efforts. Still, Kerrigan's first three features—Clean, Shaven, Claire Dolan, and Keane—are good enough to secure Kerrigan's place in cinema history as one of the most underrated and uncompromising American auteurs that has ever lived. As Ingmar Bergman revealed with his covertly spiritually autobiographical film Ansiktet (1958) aka The Magician, the life of an artist can sometimes be more degrading than a whore. In his fairly favorable 3.5 out of 4 star review of Claire Dolan, Roger Ebert concludes with the following somewhat humorous sentences, "I think Claire Dolan will make a good mother. I think she can make it work. Not with Elton, but by herself, which is the only way she can live and not have to lie." Of course, as the film subtly hints, Claire's mother was probably a whore too that was responsible for turning her daughter onto prostitution so she's probably somewhat ill-equipped to be a mother, not to mention the fact that being fatherless is one of the biggest prerequisites for failure and criminality in life (as a childless celebrity that settled on an overweight and unattractive, I sincerely doubt that Ebert knew much about women). Indeed, I can only feel sorry for the kid but then I am reminded of Nietzsche's quote, "Where are thy greatest dangers?—in pity." Speaking of Nietzsche, who may have owed his break with sanity to syphilis that he obtained from a whore, he was certainly onto something when he wrote, "Praise in Choice.—The artist chooses his subjects; that is his mode of praising," though I think in Kerrigan's case it is more about empathy. Undoubtedly an acutely sensitive empath, Kerrigan has revealed an inordinate love and affection for the trash and rabble of society that is almost Christly in character. In that sense, Claire Dolan is Kerrigan's tribute to Mary Magdalene, but of course the auteur does not have any use for the Virgin Mary.

-Ty E

THE INCREDIBLE HULK
THE INCREDIBLE HULK

Louis Leterrier* (2008)

Regardless of what other reviewers have to say, that is entirely their opinion and I respect that, but after seeing this film, I must say that most of their gripes are wrong. After seeing Iron Man in theaters, I must admit I was blown away. The sheer gimmicky comic feel it had was enough to have me jumping in my seat. Hell, the local homeless man bought a $500 dollar gift card (True Story) just so he could return to every showing. There is no doubt that Marvel Studios had created something beautiful which could have been disastrous. When the dust settled from the release of Oscar-winner Ang Lee's visioning of the comic, people realized how much that movie sucked. Some of us were a little late on that train, but in the end, no one was happy with it. 5 years later, Marvel is back with a reenactment of a visioning. This time, It stars Edward Norton, and that was all you had to say. Women flock to the actor. Hell, he even made skinheads sexy. So how does this fare after reading several horrible reviews? It kicked hard ass. The idea opens up with a collage of images showing the incident, his escape, and his pain. This sequence saves us from what could have been a 30 - 40 minute plot point scene. Already on the right track. The Incredible Hulk is one of those purely action-packed films where I can't and won't give rid of the surprises that await for any comic book fan. Familiar faces and names such as Tony Stark, Nick Fury, Lou Ferrigno, and Samuel Stern appear, paving way for a beautiful sequel which we all know will be amazing. Louis Leterrier is a director that some of us can appreciate. He has given us The Transporter (Which was great) and a shoddy sequel to The Transporter as well as a useless kung-fu crime film (Unleashed) This is a return to his action roots. The final battle might be the most satisfying clashing of titans ever to grace to big screen. The said films with titles such as VS. (Alien VS. Predator / Freddy VS. Jason) do not deserve such a title. This film is all about humiliation and revenge on Blonsky's part. Expect some somber scenes with Norton which explains his anguish and lack of human companionship. The acting as a whole is partially amazing. In the trailer, It showed Blonsky getting kicked and flying back in an incredibly fake way. I guess the director browses iMDB forums and updated this with an incredibly hilarious approach to breaking every bone in his body. I can imagine nit-picking on CGI, but not in this film. Everything looks stunning and fleshy. The Incredible Hulk is a reboot that works in a big way. As Ty E put it himself, It's a commercial for another commercial. As in, a sequel machine that churns out comic film after film with tie-in's and cameo's galore! But isn't that what us comic book fans want? An Incredible film that captures destruction well with signature moves from the hit game The Incredible Hulk: Ultimate Destruction. You shouldn't be disappointed.

-mAQ

LACOMBE, LUCIEN

Louis Malle (1974)

With my recent viewing and somewhat surprised enjoyment of his soothingly somber suicide masterpiece Le feu follet (1963) aka The Fire Within, I decided checkout some more works directed by famed frog filmmaker Louis Malle (Les Amants aka The Lovers, My Dinner with Andre), whose works I find to be either hit or miss, not to mention oftentimes obscenely overrated, thus leading me to the admittedly quite masterful French-West German-Italian co-production Lacombe, Lucien (1974). Notable for being one of the first French films to deal with the subject of collaboration with the Gestapo during the Second World War in a fairly serious and reasonably objective non-partisan fashion, Malle's nearly 140-minute wartime epic depicts the fast rise and equally swift fall of a seemingly half-retarded 17-year-old peasant boy as played by a real-life peasant boy who joins the Milice française—a blackshirted paramilitary force created on January 30, 1943 by the Vichy regime that fought and hunted down members of the resistance—after he is rejected by the resistance, only to fall hopelessly in love with a conspicuously cultivated blonde-haired and blue-eyed Parisian Jewess that is hiding out in a decrepit apartment with her wealthy yet wimpy tailor father and sassy non-French-speaking grandma. Co-penned by half-Hebraic Nobel Prize winning novelist Patrick Modiano—a man whose Sephardic Jewish father curiously regularly hung around with the Gestapo during the Vichy era after most Parisian Jews had already been sent to concentration camps—and directed by an avowed left-wing filmmaker and philo-Semite who went out of his way to mock the dissident far-right paramilitary organization OAS in his masterpiece The Fire Within, Lacombe, Lucien is, relatively speaking, a fairly objective work for its kind as a film that never would or could be made today in ultra-philo-Semitic frogland and that, somewhat shockingly, hardly ever succumbs to vomit-worthy sermonizing, hence why the film was considered controversial and even offensive by some, including Judaic agitpropagandist Marcel Ophüls (who apparently bitched about the film to Malle's brother), upon its release. Originally entitled Le faucon aka The Falcon and set in present-day Mexico, Malle's work might not be the classic it is today were it not for the fact that the filmmaker was unable to film in Mexico, as the director and his kosher co-writer were forced to rethink and rework the entire film as a result, ultimately making it infinitely more provocative by setting it in one of France's most infamously disgraceful periods in history as a once great empire that found themselves to be the groveling cuckold of their perennial enemy, the Teutons. Featuring an ambiguous antihero who despite his rather low IQ and brazenly boorish behavior is fairly unpredictable and morally anomalous, Lacombe, Lucien stars a "real-life Provençal farm boy" named Pierre-Marc Blaise who originally worked as a woodcutter and was chosen over 1,000 other prospective actors despite the fact that he had never acted in his entire life. As the son of a rich industrialist, Malle certainly demonstrates in the film his seeming love-hate intrigue for anti-intellectual peasants who are one with the earth and nature and always rely on their instincts over their intellect, as the eponymous lead (the title is in reference to the bureaucratic 'fascist' way the protagonist introduces himself) is a sort of half-man/half-beast who is in his element in the wild but becomes a coldblooded killer and borderline psychopath when given power over other people by the Gestapo.

LACOMBE, LUCIEN

It is June 1944 Vichy France and Lucien Lacombe (Pierre Blaise) is a black-haired 17-year-old boy from the small southwestern French village of Souleillac who lives a remarkably mundane life involving mopping floors at a Catholic retirement home in between senselessly killing cute songbirds with his slingshot, shooting wild game, and plucking chicken, which he kills with a karate chop to the neck. While Lucien's father is in a POW camp, his mother takes it upon herself to start an affair with her boss and rents their family home out to a rather dirty sub-peasant family with a dozen or so small half-clothed children, so the protagonist decides he wants to join the resistance and brings the local leader, a seemingly pompous school teacher named Robert Peyssac (Jean Bousquet) that is known as 'Lieutenant Voltaire' by his comrades, a dead rabbit as a gift in the hopes of letting him join, but he is told that he is "too young" and that "the underground is not like poaching." While riding his bike back to the old folk's home late one night, Lucien spots a fancy hotel called 'Hotel Des Grottes' where a wild party is raging on and before he knows it, the protagonist is busted for snooping around the place and taken inside. Hotel Des Grottes is local headquarters for the so-called 'German police' aka Milice française and Lucien is accused of spying and roaming around outside after Nazi-ordained curfew, but when he recognizes and compliments the bartender Henri Aubert (Pierre Decazes)—a somewhat effete ex-professional cyclist with a beer belly who he saw win a race in 1939 in Caussade—the French collaborators decide he is harmless and begin plying him with alcohol to see if he knows anything about the local resistance. Before he knows it, Lucien is thoroughly intoxicated and ratting out Monsieur Peyssac aka 'Lieutenant Voltaire'—the mensch who rejected the protagonist's plea to join the resistance—to the frog Gestapo. Lucien is so ignorant about politics, that he tells the German police that Peyssac is purportedly a Freemason and then asks them, "What's a Freemason?," which causes them all to chuckle. After Lucien runs his mouth, Peyssac is arrested and tortured, but that protagonist does not seem too concerned, as the German police give him a job and he ultimately becomes their youngest, and certainly one of their most ruthless, members.

Before he knows it, Lucien becomes a stoic soldier and coldblooded killer who is willing to do any and everything he is told, as he finds most of the work to be fun, even hunting rabbits while engaging in gun battles with members of the resistance, and seems to have no idea of the moral or political magnitude of his actions. Indeed, the protagonist loves his job as it gives him power over members of the upper-classes and the job pays fairly well, not to mention the fact that it features a fairly generous benefit package that includes, among other things, “war loot” (valuables taken from enemies) and a unending flow of expensive hard liquor and aged wine. Indeed, Lucien has no idea how good and cultivated the wine he is drinking, but his comrades let him know. Lucien is taken under the wing of a charming yet seemingly psychopathic opportunistic aristocrat named Jean-Bernard de Voisins (Stéphane Bouy) who owns a gentle giant of a cow-colored Great Dane and who dates a slutty redhead hack actress named Betty Beaulieu (Loumi Iacobesco). Among other things, Betty gets a narcissistic sense of joy out of giving Lucien an autographed photo of herself and loves running her mouth about the most pointless and shallow things, even openly remarking in front of her blueblood beau and his comrades how she thinks British Jewish actor Leslie Howard, himself an anti-Nazi propagandist who died under dubious circumstances in 1943, is more attractive than Frenchmen. Jean-Bernard is all in it for the money and power as demonstrated by the fact that he sells forged papers to a disgraced wealthy Jewish tailor of the Yiddish-speaking sort named Albert Horn (Austrian-Swedish Bergman actor Holger Löwenadler)—a disillusioned fellow that has broken by the war and spends most of his time lying around in a fancy robe—who lives with his elderly non-French-speaking mother (German Jewish actress Therese Giehse, who Malle dedicated his 1975 work Black Moon to) and a beautiful Paris-born blonde daughter symbolically named ‘France’ (Aurore Clément of Wim Wenders’ Paris, Texas (1984)). While Lucien initially begins a romantic relationship with a peasant girl with a lazy eye named Marie that works as a maid at German police headquarters, he more or less falls in love with France at first sight. Needless to say, cultivated Jew Albert Horn is not happy when a borderline retarded low-class fascist goy cop begins regularly hounding his dainty daughter, who is a piano prodigy of sorts who blew her chance at going to a conservatory because she had fallen in love with a boy. Indeed, commie killer by day, Lucien soon finds himself in an inexplicable situation at night while attempting to vie for the attention and affection of a Jewess by bringing her and her family various gifts, including flowers, expensive wine, jewelry (or what the protagonist calls “war loot”), cash and other scarce items that they could not get otherwise. Due to his lack of manners, poor and oftentimes strange manner of speech (France is perplexed by the fact that Lucien constantly calls her “my dear” despite the fact he does not even know her), and overall lack of sophistication, France oftentimes finds herself laughing at Lucien, but he will ultimately have the last laugh after managing to get in her kosher panties.

Aside from a staunch and insanely idealistic Hitlerite named Faure (René Bouloc)—a bitter and less than educated fellow who believes Jews breed like rats (any self-respecting anti-Semite knows that the Jewish population rarely grows)—virtually none of the members of the German police really believe in the National Socialist cause, with a smooth-talking negro bartender named Hippolyte (Pierre Saintons) even being among their ranks. While the boss of the group, Inspector Tonin (Jean Rougerie), became a member of the German police after being fired from the regular French police in 1936 for being an “undesirable,” Jean-Bernard joined up because he is an unscrupulous opportunist who is willing to do whatever it takes to maintain his distinguished life of aristocratic luxury. Protagonist Lucien more or less unwittingly joined up, but it does not take him long to realize he enjoyed the power and privilege it afforded him as a lowly peasant who got to humiliate and persecute the bourgeois class that he felt humiliated and persecuted him (rather revealingly, Lucien oftentimes says to his enemies, “I don’t like people talking down to me”). Using his easy-to-abuse power as a kraut-backed cop, Lucien somewhat absurdly threatens to take Monsieur Horn to the Gestapo if he refuses to allow him to take his daughter France to a dance party at fascist headquarters, stating, “If France does not come, I’ll take you to my friends...and some of my friends are not too fond of Jews.” To protect her father, France goes against his wishes and goes with Lucien to the decadent Gestapo dance, but problems arise when the protagonist’s date dances with other men because he does not know how to dance. After his comrade Jean-Bernard reveals that he is leaving for Spain and remarks in reference to France, “Some Jewish girls are so very beautiful...They make other women look like old hags. I had a Jewish fiancée once. Incredibly stacked and very rich,” Lucien gets extremely enraged and manhandles his friend Aubert for dancing with his date. After Lucien forces her out of the dance hall in a rough fashion and breaks the heel of one of her shoes in the process, France plays peacemaker and says to him, “It’s a shame you can’t dance...I’ll teach you” and begins slow-dancing with him, but their would-be-romantic moment does not last long because the protagonist’s exceedingly jealous hotheaded maid girlfriend Marie sees them, yells, “Filthy Jew! They all have syphilis,” and threatens to tell the Germans about the Jewess. While Marie is being restrained, France runs upstairs and hides in a bathroom where she sobs hysterically in the dark. Of course, Lucien eventually finds her there and comforts her by rubbing her hair. After crying “I’m tired of being a Jew,” the two begin kissing and ultimately make love. Indeed, a cultivated Jewess finds herself engaged in coitus with a borderline retarded farm-boy, but such are the strange and seemingly unlikely acts of desperation that wars spawn.

LACOMBE, LUCIEN

Needless to say when dapperly dressed Hebrew Monsieur Horn discovers that his pretty progeny has slept with a dimwitted peasant collaborator who has been routinely taunting his family with his aggressive and boorish behavior, he blows a gasket and calls France a “whore,” so Lucien threatens to give him a “thrashing.” Of course, the entire situation pushes Horn over the edge and he finally gets the gall to stroll around in public in a fancy suit like he did before the war instead of sitting inside all day in a robe like he usually does, stating that, "I feel like my old self." Horn wants Lucien to help him and his daughter France escape to Spain, but when he asks him about talking to him "man to man" about the issue, the protagonist blows him off. In a rather drastic attempt to get Lucien's attention, Monsieur Horn absurdly goes to Gestapo headquarters and is caught by rabid anti-Semite Faure, who predictably sends him on a train to Toulouse. When Lucien informs France of what happened to her father and says "it was his own fault," she freaks out and starts hitting him, so he calms her down by raping her. Things are not going too well with the 'German police' either as virtually every single one of them, including the black bartender, are killed one night while Lucien was guarding a prisoner upstairs. With all his comrades dead, Lucien decides to betray his masters by killing an SS SD man when he comes to round up France and her granny. After that, Lucien drives France and granny south, though their car breaks down on the way, so they are forced to take refuge in abandoned old shack. While living in the countryside, Lucien reverts back to his old and more simple farm-boy ways, which comes in handy, as he is able to provide France and her grandmother was tons of freshly killed meat. Aside from being rather repulsed by armies of ants climbing up her leg, cosmopolitan Parisian Jewess France seems to adapt well to the country and even seems to fall in love with Lucien to some degree (though there is one ambiguous scene where she holds a rock over his head as if she wants to kill Lucien). Indeed, everything seems idyllic until an inter-tile juxtaposed with a shot of Lucien lying in a relaxed fashion in a meadow reveals that the protagonist was arrested on October, 12 1944, given a show trial by the Resistance, and swiftly executed via firing squad.

Tragically, Lacombe, Lucien lead Pierre Blaise died less than two years after the release of the film while driving a car, a Renault 17 Gordini, he had bought with the money he earned for the handful of films he had starred in, thereupon somewhat ironically facing a deplorable fate that was not all that unlike the eponymous character he played in Malle's film in that he perished before ever getting to develop into a full man and experiencing everything that life has to offer. In the book Malle on Malle (1993) edited by Philip French, Malle stated regarding Blaise: "...he was very much of a rebel, and somewhat of a social outcast, although he came from a great family. I still see his parents. He died in a car accident two years after the film. I loved him dearly. He had no conventional culture whatever: he had never seen a film in his life, had never been to a cinema. Not only had he never seen a camera, but he's never been to a movie! And never read a book." Indeed, a sub-literate farm-boy who had never seen a single film in his entire life managed to give one of the most idiosyncratically memorable acting performances of post-WWII French cinema. When it came to karate-chopping the heads of chickens or chugging liquor, Malle relied on Blaise's experience as a rural lumpenprole to give a certain authenticity to his film, or as the director stated: "One of the difficulties from me with LACOMBE, LUCIEN was that I knew very little about the character since he was someone whose social background was the opposite of mine [...] Pierre Blaise was helpful. And I always followed his instinct. I would watch him very carefully and I could see when he was uncomfortable with a line or situation.” One of the major themes of the film is Hannah Arendt’s idea of the ‘Banality of Evil’ yet Blaise brought intrigue and mystique to this so-called ‘evil’ which Malle summed up as follows: “In a way, you could look at him as the ultimate villain, but at the same time he was incredibly moving, as he was discovering power and money and how you can humiliate people who have been humiliating you for years. Pierre Blaise was so good, he got me into trouble. A lot of people saw the film almost as an apology for a collaborator because Blaise was so moving and disturbing that you could not completely hate him.”

LACOMBE, LUCIEN

Arguably the director’s most Bressonian effort as a work where the lead was “subconsciously” (as Malle once described it) inspired by the teenage collaborator François Joist played by Charles Le Clainche in Un condamné à mort s’est échappé ou Le vent souffle où il veut (1956) aka A Man Escaped, as well as a strangely tender celluloid affair that features a serene pastoral naturalism that recalls Au hasard Balthazar (1966), Lacombe, Lucien is surely Malle at his best, even if it is not as immaculate as The Fire Within, but of course one expects a certain amount of imperfection for such an ambitious film. While featuring a certain amount of realism and naturalism in terms of its use of non-actors and depiction of real animal killings, the film also has a certain oneiric quality that makes it feel like it is set in a sort of alternate reality even though it was inspired by much historical research. The only other French Vichy era film I can think that has a similar quality is Michel Mardore’s The Savior (1971) aka Le sauveur starring as Horst Buchholz as a German officer who pretends to be an English paratrooper and uses his psychopathic charms to seduce a cutesy yet busty 14-year-old blonde played by Muriel Catalá so that he can eradicate every single person in her village. Of course, Lacombe, Lucien is a much more intricate and morally ambiguous work, hence the public outcry various intellectuals and film critics, or as Malle stated regarding the response to the film: “People who had lived through that period knew that this film was completely true and honest about what actually happened. And people who were not French took it for what it was: a reflection on the nature of evil. The controversy was between French intellectuals and politicians. Those who attacked the film did it on the grounds that it was fiction; we had invented and put on the screen a character who was complex and ambiguous to the point where his behavior was acceptable. For them, it justified collaboration – which certainly is not what I was trying to do.” Not surprisingly, French Jewish documentarian Marcel Ophüls was apparently “shocked” by the film’s ambiguity, but of course unlike The Sorrow and the Pity (1969) aka Le Chagrin et la pitié—a work that even Jewish French minister Simone Veil, herself a Auschwitz survivor, felt was too biased and played a ma-major role in having the doc banned from French television until 1981—and Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie (1988), Malle's work depicts the intricacies regarding French collaborators and does not proselytize about the evils of collaborators and Nazi and the supreme righteousness about the resistance. To Ophüls' minor credit, I found the eponymous hero of Malle's work to be more likeable than any of the resistance fighters in the film. Of course, as people seem to hate to admit, both the resistance and the collaborators were comprised of gangs of ruthless killers and had the Second World War ended differently, the former group would now be regarded as bloodthirsty butchers and the latter would be regarded as European heroes instead of the other way around. Indeed, I'm sure the French resistance had its fair share of Luciens, as well as Dirlewangers, but no contemporary French filmmaker has the testicular fortitude to depict such a figure, so Lacombe, Lucien acts as the next best thing.

-Ty E

BLACK MOON
BLACK MOON

Louis Malle (1975)

Admittedly, when I first saw Louis Malle's postmodern post-apocalyptic fairytale Black Moon (1975), it somewhat irked me – not least of all due to its deep-seated narrative incoherence and seemingly mindless anti-erotic imagery – yet the film never left my mind, thereupon I consequently decided to give it another chance, which undoubtedly proved to be the wise decision. After watching an interview with Malle in regard to the film, I am quite sure that he also had no clue as to what Black Moon is about, at least in any concrete sense, but if one thing is for sure, it is that the surreal spastic celluloid work is an excellent escapist window into the French auteur filmmaker's seemingly aberrant subconscious. Inspired by the timeless fairytales of Lewis Carroll and the director's mixed feelings on the fermenting feminist Women's Movement of the 1970s, Black Moon is a curious pomo celluloid concoction that blurs the often fine-line between delightful dream and nefarious nightmare. Filmed on location of Malle's own 200-year-old manor house at Le Coual in the Causses region of southwest France, Black Moon – although an intrinsically disquieting work of wonder and mystique – has a certain newfangled yet compelling welcoming warmth to it that few other cinematic works can boast. With its many scenes of the scenically surreal, it should be no surprise that pioneering Spanish alpha-auteur Luis Buñuel's daughter-in-law Joyce acted as a co-writer for the screenplay of Black Moon; a cinematic work that both transcends and acts as a translucent tribute to the early twentieth century art movement. Gorgeously photographed by Bergman's main cinematographer Sven Nykvist (Persona, Fanny and Alexander), Black Moon, despite its lack of narrative coherence, is indubitably a preternatural panoramic feast for the eyes with its marvelous yet macabre mix of gloomy grays and beautiful blood. Aside from lapsed Warhol Superstar Joe Dallesandro (Trash, Blood for Dracula), most of the actors featured in Black Moon were relatively unknown. Cathryn Harrison, the granddaughter of legendary British actor Sir Rex Harrison (My Fair Lady, Doctor Dolittle) who began her acting career in a secondary role in Robert Altman's British-American genre-crossing psychological thriller Images (1972), would never play in another role as prestigious as the protagonist she played at the mere age of 15 for Black Moon, which is not a surprise when considering she probably typecasted herself after allowing an elderly wench supple on her nipples in the film as such a conspicuously grotesque and perturbing scenario is not soon forgot. Needless to say, aside from the avant-garde porn flick Through The Looking Glass (1975) directed by Jonas Middleton, Black Moon is probably the most perverse Lewis Carroll-esque work ever dreamed up by a filmmaker.

Black Moon begins abruptly when the film's female protagonist Lily (Cathryn Harrison) sows roadkill after running over a furry creature with her automobile. Dressed like a tomboy to hide her lack of protruding genitals, lil white Lily fights for her life to escape the man-hating mayhem of a gender-based civil war where female guerillas wearing ghastly gas-masks delight in torturing male captives and men merely lineup members of the fairer sex to be communally executed. Eventually abandoning the mobile manmade machine that murdered one of mother nature's creatures, Lily is soon engulfed in an area full of crawling insects, assorted fuzzy friends, and naked feral children running around with a similarly colored giant pig. Soon after, she discovers a cozy mansion full of animals and a fatherless family that seems to have regressed into some sort of atavistic state. The human animals of the house comprise of a bed-ridden old lady (Jewish-German actress Therese Giehse in her final acting role) and her two sexually androgynous and seemingly incestuous children, both of which are also named "Lily" (Joe Dallesandro, Alexandra Stewart) like the film's protagonist. Displaying symptoms of dementia and with a keen proclivity towards regurgitating gibberish and conversing with animals, the old lady lures Lily into her madness which ranges from infantile temper tantrums to something of a more sinister slant. Depending on her daughter Lily for nourishment, the old lady drinks from her peculiar progeny's teat; a particularly perverse practice that the lead character Lily will later be coerced into in what is one of the most drastically debauched scenarios ever captured for non-pornographic cinema, but I guess Malle couldn't have contrived a better surrealist portrait for the frightening and visceral period of a girl reaching biological womanhood. Having trouble communicating with the homo sapien members of the household, Lily eventually finds her greatest conversationalist in the form of a degenerate black unicorn with a small yet bloated build. Agitated with Lily's unkind words regarding her un-unicorn-like appearance, the seemingly impure symbol of purity states, "The most beautiful things in the world are the most useless. Peacocks and lilies, for instance." Of course, the unicorn's snide remarks perfectly highlight the marvelous misanthropy of Louis Malle's lurid celluloid fairytale where the looking glass is decidedly shattered and where genitals act as one's combat uniform.

Beyond question, one of the most exquisite and bewitching moments of Black Moon is when Lily plays "Liebestod" – the final aria of Richard Wagner's opera Tristan und Isolde – on piano while the Lily siblings soulfully sing along. Not long after, brother Lily beheads a giant hawk that flies into the maniac mansion, thus symbolically spark the dissolution of the rapturous fantasy world as the siblings begin to frantically destroy each other and machinegun bullets and bomb blasts soon bombard the area. By the conclusion of Black Moon, Lily is left all by her lonesome, aside from armies of animals surrounding the house as if she is in control of them via some sort of black magic. With the old lady gone, the unicorn – who has the demeanor of an antagonistic lily-licker – is the only lady left to suck on Lily's blossoming bosoms, thus acting as a symbolic declaration of her newfound and fully developed femininity. Needless to say, Black Moon poses more questions than it answers, but this is also one of its greatest attributes as a work about a strange soul in a strange land that demands one to embrace its diacritic dream logic. As such, Black Moon requires multiple re-watchings for all of its exceedingly erratic and eccentric themes and determinedly discordant storyline to properly sink in. Described by Louis Malle as, “the most intimate of my films, I see it as a strange voyage to the limits of the medium, or maybe my own limits,” Black Moon – although by means an immaculate work – is also his most extraordinary and experimental cinematic effort. Not unsurprisingly, the film also acted as a bold and blatant bridge between his French period and American period. That being said, if you loath the cheap talk of My Dinner with Andre (1981), you might love the terribly tongue-tied realm of Black Moon.

BLACK MOON

-Ty E

JOY RIDE 2: DEAD AHEAD

Louis Morneau (2008) I wasn't unethical towards the original Joy Ride film, and by original, I mean that annoying road-slasher film with Paul Walker and Steve Zahn. I really couldn't bring myself to hate that movie cause it brings something that isn't overkill to a dying genre. Although road terror isn't an untapped market, it had only a few successful endeavors. To aid in the recent plague of direct to DVD sequels, Joy Ride too will enjoy a second helping with the return of Rusty Nail. Some undesirables meet up discussing the wild antics of meeting people on Myspace. They plan on wasting a merry weekend in Las Vegas where the sun never rises. Of course, a detour is in order and when their car breaks down in front of a pleasant looking house, they decide to borrow a car not knowing it belongs to Rusty Nail. An hour long game of cat and mouse then ensues. Joy Ride 2 is a film that lacks any form of essence. It is a generic marmalade churned out with the sole existence to sell stock to the fans of the original. I don't look at this film in any professional manner other than an excuse to attempt to create a horrifying figure out of the mysterious Ted Levine voiced highway killer. With that said, Rusty Nail has a lot more menace about him than Death Proof's Stuntman Mike ever had going for him. Joy Ride had characters that were irritating and mousy looking, but they each had principles. This is something that allows the viewer to spark a connection with them. Joy Ride 2 has none of this and features characters that will do nothing short of annoying the absolute piss out of you. Characters like Nick who wax poetic about The Crow and stopping nothing short of defining a counterculture. Stereotypes and labels cluster fuck into an inane roster of victims that will leave you with cottonmouth and the only absolution is their death. Joy Ride 2: Dead Ahead is the same bargain bin blunder you'd expect from a 2008 title that ends with 2. See also: Rest Stop 2, The Lost Boys 2, Feast II, The Hills Have Eyes II, and Wrong Turn 2. With the exception of Wrong Turn 2, all of these films have a decided fate to burn on peoples shelves only to be traded in to a local GameStop months later. Have you no shame for purchasing a film like this? Joy Ride 2 is a pathetic film in every aspect. This is foreseeable knowing that the director also directed The Hitcher II: I've Been Waiting.

-mAQ

LÉON: THE PROFESSIONAL
LÉON: THE PROFESSIONAL

Luc Besson (1994)

Making a sensitive film on a serious subject can be a fickle thing. Many problems can occur within the film and cause it to crumble, despite its greatness. Léon is perhaps the most perfect action film and the perfect Hitman film. As Leon puts it, he is a "cleaner" He is the local assassin who is the best. He keeps his money with local mafia member named Tony. Morose enigmatic Frenchman Léon (Jean Reno) lives his life day by day. His hobbies include drinking milk, exercising, watering his best friend, and the occasional kill. Léon is a man of many mysteries and many quirks. Then we meets a woman. As you can guess, bad goes to worse and he recruits this feisty rascal as a fellow assassin to get pay-back on Oldman. Léon is largely a film that bathes in its own emotions. Rather than relaying gunfight after gunfight, or even soaking in its explosions like the bulk of the genre tends to do, it sorts out all the characters, lays them out on the table, and begins to build on them with the utmost accuracy. Luc Besson captured the feel of a cramped apartment rather splendidly. Gary Oldman makes a shocking appearance as one of the most sadistic characters portrayed in film. His melodic outbursts rival Léon's sadness effortlessly. Eric Serra creates a score that feels like a tribute to Morricone's early days with First Blood except with an Eric Clapton dose. Beyond the orchestral and the original hit songs, there lies a deeper side of The Professional. When Léon: The Professional was released in America, 27 minutes were trimmed off. Why? Well, Americans has in intolerance for pedophilia. Not to say I have a tolerance, but for it's usage in this film, it's quite poetic. The Professional is a completely different film and is missing several tones with most of it's narrative cut off, but still manages to be an epic savage tale of revenge. What is any action film or any contemporary drama without a Bollywood remake? Yet again, they have ruined or even worse, tainted a masterpiece with a stagnant piece of shit. This time, the Indian word for shit is Bichhoo. The difference between the two (Despite it being a shitty Third-world country feature) is the lack of charisma and amazing cinematography. Much props go out to the wide angle lenses that Besson uses. As much as I'd love to rant about the pure love I have towards Reno, the show partly belongs to Gary Oldman. Stansfield's character even rivals Blue Velvet's Frank. Little Israel-born Natalie Portman as Mathilda happens to be in love with the tall burly French assassin. When you watch this film, the chemistry is uncompromising. The characters are all unique in each ways and this very combination fits Léon as one of my favorite films of all time. As much as I wish to divulge this films secrets and splash new perspectives on this film, I cannot. Besides its muddled cultural confusion, It's far from a normal film but with its shocking love story to its unprovoked violence, Léon: The Professional is the definitive tale of violence and the related struggle of love.

-mAQ

ANGEL-A
ANGEL-A

Luc Besson (2005)

Luc Besson is a director that is somehow able to take an artistic approach to films with fairly Hollywood like conventions. Films like The Professional, The Fifth Element, and La Femme Nikita wowed audiences with their combination of ultra stylized cinematography and enticing action. Little is known about the unflattering looking director (who was once married to Milla Jovovich). I would be interested to know Besson's film influences. Besson's Angel-A is another extravagant and fantastic film from the French director. The film has a Neo-Noir atmosphere set in the subversive underground of France. Angel-A seems to take some influences from Frank Capra's It's a Wonderful Life and Wim Wender's Wings of Desire. The angel featured in Angel-A is quite unconventional. She is a six foot tall platinum blonde (played by Danish model, actress, and director Rie Rasmussen) that knows how to use here ASSets. She has come to earth to save the life of an cowardly Algerian Arab (with American green card Citizenship) named Andre from his life of debt and nothingness. He is a mentally and physically weak man in which the angel Angela topples over of. Angela inspires Andre to assert himself in life and to utilize honesty for his own benefit. Angel-A features very little in the way of action (especially in comparison to Besson's other films). The film acts more as an inspirational to those lacking purpose in life. Angela is the opposite of the femme fatale featured in Film Noirs. She is the physical and mental embodiment of personal inspiration (claiming she is the femme part of Andre). Terry Gilliam stated that his inner child is a little girl (in reference to his recent masterpiece Tideland). Would that make Besson's inner adult a gorgeous six foot tall model? I think that would be a little bit of an exaggeration (of course film is an outlet for such dreams and fantasies). Angel Angela is a much better angel to look at than Clarence from It's a Wonderful Life. Angel-A is Luc Besson's most mature effort to date (I guess that happens with age). It is a solidly constructed and beautiful rarity in today's cesspool of passable films. Luc Besson seems to have many more years of capable filmmaking under his belt (and such a grandiose belt it is). I will be sure to follow the fantastic frogs future efforts (I still need to see Arthur and the Minimoys).

-Ty E

GHOULIES

Luca Bercovici (1985)

There's no rest for the wicked. Especially the naive. Young Jonathan inherits a decrepit Hollywood manor. Following traditional horror sub lines, said young adult dabbles in magic and the occult with the aid of a mystic book. This event leads to the inception of a malevolent spirit that begins to slice off digits from the population. We've seen it all before. Sometimes with more gore, with more comedy, but still, we've never seen it quite like this. Ghoulies has Gremlins to thank for the 32 million dollar box office reception. Critters has Ghoulies to blame for the horrible critical reception. It's an awkward Hollywood train of monster deceit. An interesting note to add, the character of Donna was played by Mariska Hargitay. Her mother, Jayne Mansfield died in a car accident after a Satanic curse was cast on Sam Brody, her boyfriend at the time. The "culprit" of this incident, you might know as a man known as Anton Szandor LaVey - the leader of the Church of Satan. With scent of the brief history behind the satanic roots of Ghoulies, it also manages to serve as a slightly entertaining and reactionary story of miniature creatures of hell with very accurate inscriptions of black magic led with many Latin translations. The real stars of Ghoulies are the "ghoulies" themselves. Without the tiny monster cast, it's sad to say that this film would be absolutely nowhere. Thanks to these creatures, many sequels were produced including one with a surname of "Ghoulies go to College". With a generous ad campaign, Ghoulies soared to phenomenal cult success. The infamous image of a suspender adorned slimy monster propped inside of a toilet has been laser engraved into the back of most horror fans eyelids. This image brings to mind many fears and at times makes me look twice when using the bathroom. With the "toilet humor" intact, Ghoulies certainly makes going back into the water indeed a scary thing to do. Perhaps the most generous contribution Ghoulies returns is not the over-the-top stoner persona's but the heavy dosage of mysticism and occultism. Ghoulies also delivers in the department of PG-13 titillation. Hints of a role perfect by Jack "Don't Call Me Eraserhead" Nance are periodically strewn about through the film of Ghoulies. His unexplored role as deus ex machina exists solely to attribute to a happy ending and a believable (and cameo induced) resolution to the story of Ghoulies. In a dazzling scene that makes Lord of the Rings look like a campfire tale, Nance grapples a decaying Rutger Hauer lookalike while wardrobe in a purple glittery garb. Gandalf himself would be rolling in his grave at the sight of this marvelous display of wizard virility. Please note that the last two sentences are examples of the occasional weakness of writing and the glories of sarcasm. The "Ghoulies" in question are a rather mischievous bunch of demonic misfits. They all are displayed physically as a slimy, hairy lot of devils, many of which seem to fit the bill of microscopic relatives of select "wild things" from Maurice Sendak's Where the Wild Things

GHOULIES

Are. Despite the fact that the Ghoulies appear lovable, the bunch quickly puts the smiles to an end and decides to face-attack every party goer to be pawns in a satanic ritual. You might eventually mix up several for one another due to a poor character design flaw. But yet, the biggest surprise is the uber-creepy life size clown doll that moves but mere inches and still manages to terrify me after 20 years.

Ghoulies is a rather amusing B-grade horror film that managed to pull through and make marvelous revenue at the box office. Call it the little horror film that could if you must. Either way, Ghoulies is recognizable for rental fodder sequels and the marvelous campaign of toilets conquered by slimy creatures with serrated teeth. Many venomous things can be said about Ghoulies but no one can deny the entertainment factor that is visible to all beings. Even a jaded cynic such as myself could find much to love about this film. Ghoulies lies dormant on most bargain bin shelves just waiting for recognition. Pick this film up and give it a chance but don't forget about the infinitely better Critters.

-mAQ

SUSPIRIA

Luca Guadagnino° (2018)

When I first learned that guido giallo maestro Dario Argento's arguable magnum opus Suspiria (1977) was being remade, I was not all that surprised considering even the most innately idiotic and fiercely forgettable horror films are receiving remakes nowadays as indicated by the existence of such excremental cinema as Andreas Schnaas' Anthropophagous 2000 (1999) and Eli Roth's Knock Knock (2015), at least until I realized that queer Italian auteur Luca Guadagnino—a seemingly constantly evolving arthouse auteur that has never dabbled in horror—of all people would be helming the production. Best known for directing the overrated cocksucking coming-of-age flick Call Me by Your Name (2017) that depicts a lurid love affair between a dorky Jewish teenage (ersatz)twink and a slightly older and more masculine Hebrew in a scenario that is vaguely (but notably enough) similar to underrated artsploitation Italian auteur Salvatore Samperi's poofter period melodrama Ernesto (1979), Guadagnino seemed a bit ill-equipped to remake a phantasmagorically kaleidoscopic horror classic that was originally directed by a rampantly heterosexual misogynist, yet somehow he didn't let me down, even if he created a completely different sort of monster that would probably defile the souls of most hardcore Argentophiles. In fact, I would go so far as saying that, in terms of sheer cinematic art that tests the bounds of the medium, Suspiria (2018)—an elegantly eccentric estrogen-drenched arthouse epic poorly disguised as bitchy and witchy horror trash—is superior to Argento's film, though to compare the two is, to borrow an odd Serbian idiom, like comparing grandmothers and toads. Indeed, whereas the original film was a 98-minute orgasm of neo-gothic terror that basks in incoherence and esoteric intrigue and is arguably best remembered for its potent palette exaggerated neon colors, Guadagnino's 153-minute epic in eerie aesthetic eccentricity with multilayered stories and a number of strong themes that is literally dark and lacking in even the use of primary colors. In short, the remake is a sort of almost overtly ambitious anti-Suspiria, as if Guadagnino totally hated the original film and decided to completely deconstruct and reinvent it to his liking without even the slightest consideration for diehard fans of the original. Notably, the auteur apparently does not hate the film, but actually has wanted to remake it ever since he was a little kid, albeit as a so-called “cover version” as opposed to a sort shot-for-shot remake à la Psycho (1998) directed by Gus Van Sant.

Undoubtedly its eclectic collection of divas both young and old, fierce and frenetic feminine energy, over-the-top aesthetic decadence and sometimes high-camp tableaux, and lesbianic subtext more than hint at the innate queer character of Guadagnino's shockingly rapturous remake, which is rather fitting considering the film's time period and setting. Indeed, the film, which is set in 1977—arguably the height of the New German Cinema movement that began in the late-1960s and fizzled out in the early-1980s—was clearly influenced by cocksucking kraut auteur filmmakers, especially Rainer Werner Fassbinder and his dandy-like art fag compatriot Werner Schroeter. In fact, the film's co-screenwriter David Kajganich once even confessed that, “one of the great wells of inspiration for this film: the work of Rainer Fassbinder. Some of the most potent women on film came out of the crucible of his collaborations with his actresses—including the great Ingrid Caven—and I did my best to construct [Tilda Swinton's character's] way of using words and occupying scenes in a Fassbinderian way.” In short, Algerian-blooded guido Guadagnino and his screenwriter were clearly not trying to appease the mostly lowbrow erotophonophilic tastes of Argento and Fulci fans when they conceived of the film. Aside from the obvious decadent Teutonic aesthetic influences, the film also virtually pays tribute to the entire New German Cinema movement as a whole—or at least the political spirit of it—via its 1977 German Autumn setting and its (rather unfortunate and clumsily executed) Vergangenheitsbewältigung theme. In its apparent influence of films ranging from the omnibus piece Deutschland im Herbst (1978) aka Germany In Autumn and classic high-camp Werner Schroeter flicks like Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran (which, notably, stars Suspiria star Ingrid Caven), the film virtually covers both the aesthetic and political extremes of New German Cinema, as if Guadagnino simply used the fact that Argento's original film was set in Berlin, Germany to pay tribute to a beloved Germanic cinema movement. In its arguably pretentious division into a number of narrative acts that conclude with a somewhat surreal climatic epilogue, the film also vaguely recalls Fassbinder's magnum opus Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980), which itself is a period piece that is a ‘remake’ of sorts that also covers a rather traumatic period in the Fatherland's past (the Alfred Döblin novel it is based on was previously adapted by commie-turned-Nazi auteur Phil Jutzi in 1931). In fact, as a huge fan of New German Cinema, I cannot imagine someone fully appreciating Guadagnino's Suspiria without being at least somewhat familiar with the movement. While New German Cinema only produced a handful of horror flicks, these rather dark and somber cinematic works—which include the Fassbinder-produced sod serial killer flick Tenderness of the Wolves (1973) directed by Ulli Lommel, Niklaus Schilling's singularly haunting Heimat horror piece Nightshade (1972) aka Nachtschatten, and Hans W. Geissendörfer's allegorical vampire flick Jonathan (1970)—could have certainly influenced the film due their ominous (and oftentimes cryptic) references to Germany's past and totally twisted takes on the timeless tradition of German gothic horror. In fact, despite the majority of these films being fairly unknown, it cannot be ignored that they are certainly more ‘artsy’ than Argento's Suspiria and thus more up Guadagnino's alley.

SUSPIRIA

As for the film's brutally baroque Tanz Dance Academy setting, it resembles something in between a somberly lit version of the fascist palace depicted in Pier Paolo Pasolini's sexually apocalyptic swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) and a lavish château in some obscure Jesús Franco flick like Sinfonía erótica (1980). Of course, despite their more glaring differences, Pasolini, Franco, and Fassbinder certainly had one important thing in common and that was their lifelong dedication to shameless diva-worship, which is certainly strong in Suspiria. Aside from old classic divas like Ingrid Caven—Fassbinder's one-time wife and criminally-underrated Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid's main diva that demonstrated an unrivaled talent for morosely melancholic performance in such sickeningly underrated films as Tonight or Never (1972) and La Paloma (1974)—and Paul Verhoeven's greatest Dutch era diva Renée Soutendijk (Spetters, The Fourth Man), the film features some of the more notable young divas of the modern era, including Chloë Grace Moretz, Mia Goth and—most importantly—Dakota Johnson as the lead. While Argento's original film certainly features beautiful women, most of these characters seem largely forgettable compared to those in Guadagnino's remake. Naturally, as an extremely operatic film, this somewhat daunting diva-centrism is imperative as the diva was originally the creation of opera and not cinema. While Argento has never been big on character development—diva oriented or otherwise—the remake does pay tribute to the giallo maestro's legacy by featuring Suspiria heroine Jessica Harper in a somewhat brief yet imperative role that arguably symbolizes, in a somewhat lame way, German post-WWII guilt over the holocaust. In short, in Guadagnino's film, there is not a single filler character as every single actor makes some sort of impression, whether it be the exceedingly ectomorphic alien-like South Sudanese negress model Alek Wek in a mostly mute role as a low-level witch or German-Hungarian auteur-cum-cinematographer Fred Kelemen (Frost, Abendland)—probably the last filmmaker you would expect to randomly pop up in a horror remake—in a cameo role as a policeman that literally comes under the spell of the witches.

In its seemingly intuitive depiction of the dark side of femininity, it is hard for me to imagine anyone aside from a gay man directing such a film and this is arguably what most distinguishes it from Argento's original movie, which is hopelessly heterosexual in terms of its very straight scopophilic approach to the female form; or, in short, it has a glaringly gay gaze as opposed to the stereotypical (heterosexual) male gaze. In fact, aside from a couple exceptions, Argento's female characters are not much more than aesthetically pleasing ciphers meant to be dispatched in a most marvelously macabre fashion as if the auteur sees the purest poetry in the death of a young dame in her physical prime, hence the (arguably dubious) claim made by certain film critics that he is a misogynist. To the contrary, aside from depicting rather hot young actresses in rather physically and psychologically grotesque ways that will guaranteed to prevent any hetero audience member's cock from getting hard, the remake features a much more unflattering, if not disturbingly intuitive, depiction of womankind than anything Argento ever directed, as Guadagnino, not unlike many great queer filmmakers including Fassbinder and Schroeter, seems to have an instinctual understanding of the more loathsome and monstrous traits associated with the so-called fairer sex, which could not be any less unfair and uniquely insufferable in the film. Indeed, not unlike popular crypto-cucksucker TV creations like Sex and the City and American Horror Story where the warts-and-all approach to femininity is absurdly glorified and undoubtedly a major selling point, Suspiria is expression of a gay man and thus arguably must be read as an unflattering covert depiction of gay men that—by using statuesque twats as stand-ins for sassy sods—ultimately makes women seem more sophisticated than they actually are, hence the disturbing popularity of such ultimately quite sexually deleterious shows among (largely heterosexual) women. In that regard, I am surely not surprised that Argento has complained that the remake, “betrayed the spirit of the original film.” Rather revealingly, despite being a film that technically does not feature a single gay male character, Guadagnino apparently regards the remake as his most personal to date, which is somewhat ironic considering the auteur originally optioned the film in 2007 with the intention of having David Gordon Green (who, incidentally, also directed his lackluster Halloween remake in 2018) direct it instead of himself.

SUSPIRIA

Whereas Argento’s film takes a largely esoteric approach and basks in the unexplained and mysterious, Guadagnino’s film is considerably more exoteric (despite being no less esoteric) and provides the viewer with various hints as to how to read the (sub)text. Arguably, most fundamentally, Suspiria is an unconventional tale of historically-charged post-holocaust Jungian individuation where a young and naïve yet talented budding dancer named Susanna ‘Susie’ Bannion (Dakota Johnson)—an American from a strict Ohio Mennonite background that, rather inexplicably, feels like she has been virtually summoned to Berlin to dance shortly after the death of her mother—eventually discovers that she is, in a striking twist, the sort of bodily reincarnation of supreme alpha-witch ‘Mater Suspiriorum, Our Lady of Sighs.’ While Argento’s film was also partially based on opium-addled English essayist Thomas De Quincey’s text Suspiria de Profundis (1845) aka Sighs from the Depths, this source was undoubtedly a much more crucial influence on Guadagnino’s undeniably more intricate film. Unlike the heroine in Argento’s film, Susie is no mere stupid innocent American with simple dreams of stardom, although she initially seems as such, and the only real good guy is an elderly psychiatrist named Dr. Josef Klemperer (Tilda Swinton in old fart drag as ‘Lutz Ebersdorf’) who is not even in the original film. In a morbidly matriarchal cinematic work consumed with sinister (and arguably Sapphic) feminine energy, it is only fitting that the (arguable true) protagonist is a patriarchal character that provides fatherly help to young dancers in trouble, even if he is rather weak and ineffectual and ultimately provides very little help to the girls he attempts to save. Of course, the good doctor's guilt and weakness are no coincidence as they are surely symbolic of the spiritually castrated state of post-WWII Deutschland. After all, as Guadagnino has stated himself, a main theme of the film is, "the uncompromising force of motherhood," so it is no surprise that patriarchy would be allegorically personified in the patently pathetic form of a nearly mummified childless intellectual that still hasn't gotten over the fact that he lacked the strength to keep his wife alive over thirty years ago. As can be expected in such a film, Dr. Klemperer finds it somewhat questionable when some of his patients, including Patricia Hingle (Chloë Grace Moretz) and Sara Simms (Mia Goth), begin complaining about the witchy tendencies of their teachers at the Tanz Dance Academy, so naturally he gets deeply involved when the girls eventually disappear under dubious circumstances. Undoubtedly, Dr. Klemperer's failure and inadequacy when it comes to saving both his Jewish wife Anke Meier (Jessica Harper) during WWII and his female patients can be seen as symbolic of the hopelessly emasculated and guilt-ridden state of post-WWII Europa. Just like his Jewish wife and her warnings of the Nazis, the good doctor fails to act soon enough when his patients warn of the very imminent danger that waits them. Even though Dr. Klemperer is the only character that manages to uncover the secret witch coven operating at the dance studio, he lacks the strength and youthful exuberance and will-to-power to even truly challenge such fiercely feminine and malevolently matriarchal evil, just as German authorities were not prepared for the untamed nihilistic terrorism of the largely estrogen-driven Red Army Faction (RAF) whose aberrant actions fittingly act as a hauntingly ethno-masochistic backdrop to the film. In short, Dr. Klemperer is both literally and figuratively the sick old man of Europe and he and his Jungian theories seem like an absurd anachronism in a decadent West German world that is being terrorized by hyper hedonistic neo-Marxist would-be-rock-stars that want to castrate the cock of the Fatherland. Needless to say, it is not by sheer coincidence that Mater Suspiriorum makes her great reappearance during this weak and decadent point in Germany history.

In a world of virtual demonic divas where there is not a single male dancer and a system of covert unspoken misandry reigns, masculinity is naturally undermined the handful of times it makes an appearance at the academy. For example, when a couple police detectives show up at Tanz Dance Academy to investigate the disappearance of one of the girls, the witches amuse themselves by engaging in termagant terror as they put the two men under some sort of spell, force one of them to strip off his pants and underwear, and then collectively mock the unconscious cop's cock by playfully pointing at it, laughing, and calling it "kitty" as if it is a 'pussy' of some sort. At the end of the film, they use a similar form of sexual humiliation against Dr. Klemperer—an elderly man that seems especially debased by such experiences, as if he is a concentration camp prisoner that is about to be gassed by the all-the-more-sinister sister of Satan himself—by stripping him completely naked while he is somewhat incapacitated and forcing him to endure their big finale ritual since they need a ‘witness’ while he lies on the ground in a fetal position and babbles hysterically about his innocence during the National Socialist era (which, of course, he was also a sort of pathetic passive ‘witness’ to, hence his seemingly perennial guilt). Of course, these witches have certain Sapphic tendencies, as Madame Blanc (also Tilda Swinton)—arguably the fairest and least insufferable of the two head (competing) witches, which also includes a grotesque rotting beastess named ‘Mother Helena Markos’ that literally lurks in the dark for most of the movie—clearly has an almost immediate deep affection for her young blonde nubile American protégé Susie Bannion (whereas Markos simply sees the little lady as a body she can use as her new earthly vessel). The sadomasochistic lesbian nature of the dance academy is also hinted at when Patricia Hingle states at the beginning of the film with a strange combination of fear and fascination in regard to the carpet-muncher coven that she so hysterically fears, “They’ll hollow me out and have my cunt on a plate.” All of this adds up to a totally twisted realm of staunch gynocentrism that is so innately irrationally destructive and cannibalistic that it eventually leads to the deaths of about half the witches; or, more specifically, a superlatively sick and sanguinely Sapphic Götterdämmerung of sorts. In the end, the power struggle between Madame Blanc and Mother Markos ultimately leads to both women being destroyed and the extermination of the latter’s followers, which one could certainly argue is symbolic of the ‘spiritual’ war between Germans (and Germanic people in general) and World Jewry during WWII.

SUSPIRIA

Undoubtedly, it is quite fitting that a film about a power struggle between pernicious witches is set in 1970s Germany as it depicts an era reflecting the first generations of krauts, who inherited the supposed sins of their Nazi parents and grandparents, to collectively embrace feminism, which was arguably most glaringly and idiotically represented by the psychotic cunts of the Baader-Meinhof Gang like Ulrike Meinhof and Gudrun Ensslin. The same era also produced the first generation of prominent German feminist and/or lesbian filmmakers, including Margarethe von Trotta, Ulrike Ottinger, Helma Sanders-Brahms, Doris Dörrie, Helke Sander, and Elfi Mikesch (who is best known for shooting the films of Werner Schroeter and probably the greatest female cinematographer of all-time), among various others. One should also probably mention Austrian performance artist turned auteur Valie Export who, as her more aberrant-garde films like Unsichtbare Gegner (1977) aka Invisible Adversaries demonstrate, would have been perfectly at home at the witch dance coven. To watch films by some of these female filmmakers, one might assume they were either witches or demonically possessed as they feature sympathetic portrayals of the Baader-Meinhof Gang and tend to depict largely soulless (pseudo)intellectual women that lack any sort of maternal instincts and see men as either an oppressive pestilence and/or insufferably arrogant fuck-toys. Indubitably, Chancellor of Germany of Angela Merkel—a childless (ex)communist that, in terms of feminine prowess, is about as dainty as a Dobermann—is surely symbolic of this generation (despite being from Eastern Germany) and I do not think that it is any coincidence that she has single-handedly caused more long-term damage to the Father(less)land than any American or British firebombers caused during WWII by opening the flood gates to a virtually apocalyptic deluge of innately hostile phony refugees from the global south. Not unlike many modern European politicians, Merkel has no children and thus has no need to take heed of Germany’s rather dubious future. At least figuratively speaking, Merkel is the kraut witch par excellence, but I digress.

Of course, Suspiria is a film that obsesses over mothers—both biological and symbolic—albeit in a largely sinister, ungodly, and hardly totally literal fashion. I don’t think it is a coincidence that Mother Suspiorum is a sort of goddess of death and that she randomly appears in 1970s West Germany as it is a country that has since been plagued with a suicidal drop in the birth rate of the indigenous white population as at least partly inspired by (the at-least-partly-Hollywood-induced sham of) Vergangenheitsbewältigung, which undoubtedly gave birth to metaphysically sick miscreations like the feminist movement and self-destructive commie movements like the RAF. Mother Suspiorum is hardly the sort of mother that enjoys pregnancy and breastfeeding, but instead the witch equivalent of a wicked whacked-out bitch that engages in Munchausen syndrome by proxy (MSBP). In fact, Suspiorum demonstrates her maternal qualities by literally summoning death to kill her enemies and reveals her idea of mercy by allowing the undead corpse-like victims of Markos to finally kick the bucket. In short, she takes a little bit too much pride in providing mercy to the singularly suffering. In fact, most of the motherly displays by the witches is glaringly phony aside from how Madame Blanc closely mentors Susie—though she is clearly her ‘favorite’ (which mother’s aren’t supposed to have)—and, of course, is, not coincidentally, ultimately revealed to be the great Mother Suspiorum. It is notable that, in a flashback scene, Susie’s mother—notably a strict Mennonite and thus someone of German descent—complains, “My daughter. My last one. She’s my sin. She’s what I smeared on the world.” Indeed, it is surely fitting that Susie compulsively travels to Berlin after the death of her mother as if being compelled by some ominous unseen force where she is reborn as the ‘Mother of Sighs,’ as post-WWII Germany and especially New German Cinema has enough sighs and mothers to go around as Odin and his imperative influence are nowhere to be found in contemporary krautland. As films ranging from Sanders-Brahms’s Deutschland bleiche Mutter (1980) aka Germany, Pale Mother to Edgar Reitz’s Heimat (1984) reveal, the mother is the (rather desperate) backbone of post-WWII Germany and the father is either physically or emotionally completely absent. Undoubtedly, Thomas De Quincey could have been speaking of the titular heroines of Schroter’s The Death of Maria Malibran

SUSPIRIA

(1972), Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun (1978), and Ottinger's Freak Orlando (1981) when he once wrote in regard to Mother Suspiriorum, "Her eyes, if they were ever seen, would be neither sweet nor subtle; no man could read their story; they would be found filled with perishing dreams, and with wrecks of forgotten delirium." In short, much of New German Cinema reveals a largely male-less world full of damaged dames and Suspiria also depicts an unhinged world where damaged dames also dominate society. Of course, as virtually all of European history demonstrates, a gynocentric Europe is no Europe at all; or, to be more precise, there is no 'Fatherland' without a father.

Out of all the filmmakers associated with New German Cinema, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg—an auteur that dared to combine the aesthetic theories of proto-NS Romantic composer Richard Wagner with the audience-alienating dramaturgy of bolshevik bastard Bertolt Brecht—was pretty much the only one that did not fetishize and/or sympathize with leftist terrorist groups like the RAF. In fact, Syberberg who probably not coincidentally, spent his youth in East Germany before eventually moving to Bavaria in the early-1950s, was really the only filmmaker to seriously acknowledge and critique the culturally apocalyptic Americanization of German culture and uprooting of great German traditions that naturally occurred in West Germany. I would also argue that, to a somewhat lesser extent, Suspiria attempts to aesthetically do what Syberberg did with his films in terms of being one of the closet examples of a horror film attempting to be a 'Gesamtkunstwerk' (aka 'total work of art') in terms of its utilization of a number of artistic mediums (e.g. dance, opera, performance art, literature/mythology, etc.), but of course it would be a sort of political liability for Guadagnino to even mention the cinematic neo-Wagnerian as he is more or less unofficially blacklisted in his homeland due to some of his less than kosher political statements in regards to Jews and left-wingers. Among other things, Syberberg was one of the few filmmakers to actually attempt to not only acknowledge, but also honestly diagnose the spiritual sickness and metaphysical malaise that plagues post-WWII Germany, thus making his cinematic work worth seeing for anyone that wants a deeper understanding of some of the more implicitly Teutonic themes touched on in Suspiria. Indeed, whereas Fassbinder and most of the other directors associated with New German Cinema were part of said sickness, Syberberg at least attempted to combat it in terms of both art and deeds while criticizing his contemporaries, hence his lack of popularity among his peers despite being revered by celebrated cineastes ranging from Henri Langlois to Susan Sontag.

Notably, not long after the release of an omnibus film co-directed by Fassbinder, Alexander Kluge, Volker Schlöndorff, Edgar Reitz, and various other filmmakers, Syberberg once wrote in regard to what he perceived as the post-shoah cultural cuckoldry and innate cluelessness of his leftist peers, "Now a film was made on this topic, entitled GERMANY IN AUTUMN, by filmmakers of my generation, about the guilt that went back to a different generation. But how are we to depict guilt without a concept? Without aesthetic, metaphysical control and responsibility? I heard from them about anxiety fits—surely small ones compared with mine—in the face of our generation's representation-compulsion thirty years ago. But without this labor, cinema as a genre will surrender its possibilities. Too many things so far remain unreflected upon, tied to reality, action, goal-oriented, a part of the entertainment and propaganda industry. A profound impotence of means strikes us before the question of how to depict all this—namely, just why all this? This terror, this eruption? Is it not something like the explosion of repressed German irrationalism? The dull, unconscious shriek of a diseased nation without an identity? So much suppression of its own tradition and its nature was bound to evoke aggressions, in the German manner, radical and fanatic. But the decay of methods is dismal. An entire generation in Germany was simply not trained to understand and manipulate the things lying beyond the rational. . . ." Of course, Syberberg rightly considered irrationalism to be an innate and imperative ingredient of Teutonic kultur ranging from fairytales to Wagner and one could certainly argue that Suspiria represents a sinister, albeit bastardized, example of this Teutonic tradition that is so ingrained in the Aryan collective unconscious that it is most strongly unleashed in an American Mennonite girl, who becomes what can be seen as being like a sort of spiritually deathly dyke sister of the old German pagan deity and 'All-Father' Odin. In fact, considering both the physical and cultural colonization of West Germany following the capitulation of the Third Reich, it is only natural that Susie is American.

If there is one individual that is a sort of link between old school German irrationalism and New German Cinema, it is the late great auteur Christoph Schlingensiefel who, on top of proclaiming to be a maternal relative of Joseph Goebbels, once dared to remake National Socialist auteur Veit Harlan's morbid melodrama Opfergang (1944) as a savagely sardonic satire. Aside from his obsession with (mostly recent) German history, Schlingensiefel has a small connection of sorts to Suspiria in that he and Tilda Swinton were once lovers and she even played the heroine of his obscenely underrated film Egomania - Insel ohne Hoffnung (1986) aka Egomania: Island Without Hope (which, incidentally, also stars Udo Kier who also starred in Argento's original film). Despite its use of unnerving dark humor, including Kier as a demonic baron in drag, Egomania, in many ways, feels like a bad dream about German history of the past century or so, as if it is a depiction of one of the worst nightmares from one of the older witches from Suspiria, but I digress. All of these things got me thinking how that, despite its mischling Italian director and international cast, Guadagnino's film feels more like a piece of German cinema history than anything else, which says a lot considering the same cannot be said of the films of most contemporary German directors.

SUSPIRIA

In its various overt (e.g. shots of books) and subtextual references to Jung, Suspiria naturally hints at the collective unconscious and it can be argued that heroine's Susie's climatic transformation into Mater Suspiriorum is simply a phantasmagoric depiction of Jungian Individuation, which involves the personal and collective unconscious being brought into the consciousness and ultimately assimilated into the whole personality. In fact, just as Jung indicated, Susie finally achieves this transformation via dreams, artistic expression, and free association, among other things, but I would argue that the arrival of the fiercely feminine Mater Suspiriorum is also symbolic of the demise of the masculine Wotan (aka Odin) archetype that Jung once notably wrote about in reference to Hitler and the Third Reich. Indeed, in his controversial 1936 essay Wotan, Jung argued, "We are always convinced that the modern world is a reasonable world, basing our opinion on economic, political, and psychological factors. But if we may forget for a moment that we are living in the year of Our Lord 1936, and, laying aside our well-meaning, all-too human reasonableness, may burden God or the gods with the responsibility for contemporary events instead of man, we would find Wotan quite suitable as a causal hypothesis. In fact, I venture the heretical suggestion that the unfathomable depths of Wotan's character explain more of National Socialism than all three reasonable factors put together. There is no doubt that each of these factors explains an important aspect of what is going on in Germany, but Wotan explains yet more. He is particularly enlightening in regard to a general phenomenon, which is so strange to anybody not a German that it remains incomprehensible, even after the deepest reflection." While Mater Suspiriorum might be a fictional invention of Guadagnino and, in turn, Argento and De Quincey, she is certainly is an archetype that symbolizes something very real as personified in a quite suicidal Germany that refuses to reproduce, allows itself to be colonized by ancient perennial alien invaders, and cares not for what arguably matters most—its ancient art, culture, and traditions. In short, without the return of Wotan and demise of what Mater Suspiriorum really represents, Germany might disappear from history just like the ancient Romans that the Germanic tribes once conquered after the people became too decadent and averse to reproduction, among other things. Of course, luckily for the Romans, they were at least conquered by a fellow European race and not hyper hostile groups that turned places like Sicily, Spain, and Greece into racial/cultural wastelands. Of course, like tons of films and TV shows created by gay men ranging from Breakfast at Tiffany's (1961) to American Horror Story, Suspiria is arguably first and foremost the expression of a literal art fag projecting his own group's arcane homosocial tendencies onto a group of women, thereupon making women seem more sophisticated and cleverly vicious than they actually are (not that women aren't known for being particularly vicious) while giving the auteur the opportunity to live vicariously through stylish and exotic female characters. After all, despite the themes of the ostensibly classic lesbian-themed film Mädchen in Uniform (1931), the oppressive hierarchical structure depicted in the film is more typical of gay men than woman, or as Camille Paglia once noted in her magnum opus Sexual Personae (1990), “I notice that the Wildean-style homosexual still speaks of race and class with the same breezy daring. Oppressed groups tend to oppress other subgroups. But lesbians do not talk this way. On the contrary, lesbians, in my experience, are relentlessly populist—possibly a function of their repressed maternalism. Male homosexuals have an instinct for hierarchy unparalleled in contemporary culture, outside of Roman Catholicism. Hierarchism explains their cult of the Hollywood star, in whom so many are dazzlingly learned.” Notably, the film’s major cinematic influence, Fassbinder, accomplished something similar in his early classic chamber piece Die bitteren Tränen der Petra von Kant (1972) aka The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant where Margit Carstensen and Hanna Schygulla act as stand-ins in terms of depicting the disastrous one-sided romance of the filmmaker and his black Bavarian ex-lover Günther Kaufmann. Notably, Werner Schroeter, who I would argue had an even bigger aesthetic influence on Suspiria than Fassbinder, went even further and had Isabelle Huppert act as his stand-in in the curious form of identical twin sisters(!) in his insanely nonlinear autobiographical penultimate film Deux (2002) aka Two. In fact, out of all the films I can think of, Schroeter’s Tag der Idioten (1981) aka Day of the Idiots—a film starring model and one-time Bond Carole Bouquet that is set in a mental hospital that is plagued by Sapphic surrealism and the obscenely gorgeously grotesque (including a uniquely unhinged urolagnia scenario)—is the one that most reminds me of Guadagnino’s film. Needless to say, I don’t think it is a coincidence that Ingrid Caven appears in both films, just as I don’t think it is a coincidence that there is very little difference between the dance academy and mental hospital as both surely represent the insanely incendiary irrationalism and deep black bottomless abyss that is the feminine psyche, especially one that has been left unchecked and completely neglected to be penetrated by a true patriarchal influence. Suspiria may be an Italian remake of an Italian film directed by an Italian director, but it owes its broken black heart and deathly despondent soul to the degenerate generation of kraut filmmakers that beat the La Nouvelle Vague at their own game in terms of unbridled iconoclasm and reinventing the cinematic language. In that sense, Guadagnino is inordinately cinematically literate and demonstrates a grand eclecticism in his virtually celestial synchronization of Italian horror and New German Cinema that puts pathologically posturing pop cineastes like Tarantino and Nicolas Winding Refn to abject shame. Undoubtedly, one of the things that makes Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart’s 1791 opera The Magic Flute (and especially Ingmar Bergman’s 1975 cinematic adaptation Trollflöjten) such a joyous experience in the end is that it depicts a honorable patriarchy destroying a malefic matriarchal force. Needless to say, horror makes a suitable genre for depicting the triumphing of the matriarchal spirit, hence the true visceral power of a film like Suspiria where one learns the real reason as to why certain women—usually the worst sort of women—were suspected of being witches in the past. Of course, the film also teaches us that it takes a gay man—or, more specifically, a guido cocksucker with a feminine spirit—to teach heterosexual men the true nuances of misogyny, henceforth confirming that Guadagnino's hero Fassbinder taught him well.

SUSPIRIA

-Ty E

CONVERSATION PIECE

Luchino Visconti (1974)

Undoubtedly Italian maestro auteur Luchino Visconti's most modern work, Conversation Piece (1974) aka Gruppo di famiglia in un interno, is one of a few European films that brilliantly looks at the striking difference between the filmmaker's own outmoded zeitgeist and that of the post-WWII generation, most specifically the ultimately failed generation associated with the leftist 1968 student movement. Centering around a retired professor of the extremely introverted and solitary sort whose world is turned upside down when a perverse post-modern 'family' comprised of a brazenly bitchy Italian marchesa and her crude yet charismatic 'kept man'/lover, daughter and her boyfriend barge in and take over the aged academic's house and life, Conversation Piece illustrates the absurdity that follows when refined classical and traditional Europe confronts the decidedly decadent and vulgar post-WWII Europe of the new, which sought to revamp the continent but only sped up its damning demise as the living and breathing multicultural cadaver it is today. Starring Visconti's much younger (by nearly four decades) lover Helmut Berger in the role of a debauched quasi-commie revolutionary who has morally fallen to the point where he pawns his wayward Wienerschnitzel to a contemptible capitalist rich bitch of the superficially right-wing sort, Conversation Piece was a very personal work for director Visconti in that it acted as the filmmaker's thoughts on the 1968 student movement (which, not like Pasolini, he withheld up until that point), as well as his romantic relationship with the film's Austrian star, with the character of the retired professor acting as a stand-in for the Guido maestro, and thus his final message to a world that has ultimately passed him by. Additionally, Conversation Piece is also recognized as a thinly veiled criticism of the sort of spoiled and salacious jetsetters like the sordid and superficial sort featured in Federico Fellini's La Dolce Vita (1960), who Visconti does not seem to have a grain of sympathy for, while his sympathy, if not confusedly so, for the 1986-ers is quite unmistakable. Suffering from a cerebral hemorrhage in July 1972 that left his left-side paralyzed and his entire body ultimately confined to a wheelchair, Conversation Piece, which takes place in a handful yet lavishly and intricately stylized rooms, is a celluloid cabinet piece that was clearly setup so the crippled auteur could manage direct the film in relative comfort and practicability. Produced by Rusconi Film, which was owned by a well known right-wing publisher, Conversation Piece caused Visconti to catch a lot of criticism by quasi-Marxist types, yet it is surely not a 'rightist' film in the slightest and as his great fan Rainer Werner Fassbinder recognized in an interview, "they gave him more leeway than the leftists." If anything, Conversation Piece portrays a world where both leftist and rightist have turned into terrorists of a similar stripe and both ends of the political spectrum are mutually enslaved by the mixed up mores of the so-called sexual revolution, as well as a country and continent facing complete and utter uncertainty due to suffering a certain sociopolitical schizophrenia as caused by two opposing and vastly different generations sharing strikingly different values in every regard, be it taste in art or women.

CONVERSATION PIECE

Retired American professor (Burt Lancaster), a Yankee-born yet Roman-bred man with an Italian mother who hid commies and Jews in the home he now lives in during the Second World War, lives a rather solitary and even antisocial life where his only friends are old books and fine art of the rather expensive sort. While now living a lonely existence of merely waiting for his inevitable death, the professor has lived a full life as a man who has traveled the world, fought in the Second World War, and was even once married, but for whatever reason, at some point, he decided he was no longer interested in a social life and escaped in his post-professional studies and collecting of expensive art, even spending a wealth of his time staring at details of paintings via a magnifying glass. Of course, that all changes when emotionally grotesque yet physically beautiful Italian marchesa, Marquise Bianca Brumonti (great Italian diva Silvana Mangano), the wanton wife of a rich right-wing industrialist, shows up to his large house and cons the professor into renting an upstairs apartment to the bitchy broad and her unconventional family. The apartment is mainly for Bianca's German 'boyfriend' Konrad Huebel (Helmut Berger) or what she describes as "my kept boy...paid lover," an ex-member of the commie Baader-Meinhof Group who still flirts with far-left politics, even if he screws rich right-wing women, who also happens to be married to a 'fascist' industrialist. Also staying at the apartment are Bianca's daughter Lietta Brumonti (Claudia Marsani) and her boyfriend Stefano (Stefano Patrizi), also the son of a rich right-wing industrialist. The professor is repulsed by the odd family due to their pushy and vulgar persuasions, open bisexuality, and vehement hatred toward one another, yet he cannot help but feel intrigued by their company and rather 'unconventional' ways. As Konrad tells the professor, his lover's family is "cheap, cheap inside," but, of course, he has no problem selling his flesh to them at a rather high monetary price, funding his lavish and lecherous lifestyle. Despite being repelled by their behavior, the professor somehow becomes a father figure for the 'modern family,' even symbolically 'adopting' Konrad as a son, who like himself, has an interest in fine art and Mozart and even studied at the university before his life-destroying transformation into a criminal revolutionary. As Konrad tells the professor when asked why he quit studying art history, he states, "Those were the times...68...I threw myself into the student movement...deeper than most...got in trouble and had to run...god knows how I ended up in the world I am now." Despite his terrorist proclivities, Konrad ultimately proves to be the only decent member of the 'family,' although Bianca's daughter Lietta does show some minor sympathy, even if she is a spoiled brat who always gets whatever she wants. In the end, a crude yet strangely kind kraut commie dies under dubious circumstances and leaves the professor emotionally and physically ill and his apartment in pieces. Ultimately, the professor was right to suspect that personal relationships would lead to misery and heartbreak.

While his penultimate work, Conversation Piece might as well be considered Visconti's final film and 'filmic farewell' because it is clearly the work of an elderly man who no longer understands the people of his homeland, but could not leave this world without giving his opinion how things have changed in Italy and Europe in general. Although the character of the professor was based on the real-life Italian literary critic Mario Praz (who ironically faced a similar disruption of his peace and quiet a few months after the film was released), the character is clearly a stand-in for director Visconti, so it is no surprise that his lover Helmut Berger played the role of the son figure/political radical. Visconti, a man who expressed his inherent masochism in films like Death in Venice (1971), was known to be publicly criticized and insulted by his much younger boy toy Helmut Berger and this dysfunctional relationship certainly radiates vividly throughout Conversation Piece, a film directed by an old maestro, who unlike most people his age, does not besmirch and degrade the younger generation, even if they are portrayed as dandy degenerates of the vivacious vulgarian sort. Undoubtedly an idiosyncratic work among Visconti's cinematic oeuvre, in part due to the director's crippling health, Conversation Piece is quite different from the auteur's later aristocratic period pieces that escape in the past in that it confronts a perturbing present. Were Visconti alive today, one can only wonder what he would think of the contemporary generations of Italians who seem to have little interest in arts and revolutionary politics, let alone actively getting involved in either. Featuring unbecoming bitches who will, as Konrad states, "break your balls," Conversation Piece portrays an Italy where the rich are just as debauched as the leftist hippies and the revolutionary left has been crushed by the very same sort of terrorism itself employed. In an interview with gossip columnist/journalist Boze Hadleigh, Visconti stated quite stoically when the interviewer remarked "the world is your oyster" that, "No. (shakes head, smiling.) Not now. Not in a wheelchair. But soon. When this picture is completed, I will watch it. And like everyone else, I will forget there is a wheelchair." And, indeed, one almost forgets that an elderly and crippled gay aristocrat directed Conversation Piece, one of only a handful of both Italian and European films that manages to act as a bridge between classic European cinema and that of the counter-culture generation and if anyone could do it, it was Luchino Visconti, the old man that managed to bone a very young Helmut Berger.

-Ty E

REGOREGITATED SACRIFICE
REGOREGITATED SACRIFICE

Lucifer Valentine (2010)

The second in his self-proclaimed "Vomit Gore" trilogy, Lucifer Valentine brings us exactly what he promises with his convention breaking genre. Descending from the final moments of Slaughtered Vomit Dolls is where ReGOREgitated Sacrifice (Don't mind the pun) begins. Armed with a plot that rivals What is it? and a visual effects department that would be able to re-create the most disgusting crime on earth, Kingdom of Hell Productions proudly brings you ReGOREgitated Sacrifice. ReGOREgitated Sacrifice is a non-linear structured film (that can be told by viewing the trailer) which features a plot that could be best explained by Lucifer Valentine himself. Guided by identical twin demon spirits, the black angels of hell, we see the diabolical depiction of the alternate-parallel dimension of the simultaneous suicide deaths of Kurt Cobain and bulimic porn star Angela Aberdeen; as seen through the mental activity of Angela's journey toward brain death as a result of her self-inflicted death by drowning. Valentine's editing is a bad taste to a lot of fans and critics alike. Andrey Iskanov on speed comes to mind, but nonetheless, the care and time put forth in splicing frame by frame to various audio clips of distorted screams and guttural grunts presents a love for one's own craft that transcends boundaries. The scenes are either a fleeting confessional before brain death or a splurching form of violence constringing stringy flesh and feeble brain matter. The one thing more notorious about the film is the director's promoting methods. If you frequent a horror-themed message board, I'm sure you've seen him posting a thread about his latest film and how it's available for free on ReGOREgitatedSacrifice.com, besides the point, His films have been bashed repeatedly by people who haven't viewed the film, or people who criticize Valentine's lack of caring about Grammar whose respect of the English language. The film's strength is essentially derived from the beautiful posthumous scenes of debauchery and vivid back drops. If the scene starts with a brightly lit white empty space, you can be sure that it's going to be tainted with all sorts of bodily fluids and excess matter for that fact. I also happen to like picking up visual metaphors in his shots. I.E. Whore vomiting ingested piss creating splash effects on the lens distorting her already tortured face. The extreme scenes of symbolism that have been derived from Kabalistic teachings can be described as a formerly diluted Matthew Barney. The run time is split up into fractions of certain types of scenes. Lucifer Valentine plays it by the book and continues using Hooker Scene/ Vomit Scene/ Hooker Vomit /Hooker Gore/ Confession/ Home Video, then repeats the process. This surprisingly doesn't get as old as it sounds. At being a sliver over an hour, it's hard for anything to get old. A scene that comes to mind that breaks from this snare is the scene of Pregnant Ameara being idolized by two prostitutes. The Hooker scenes feature amazing styles of camera work which range from tepid "stand in the corner and shoot" angles to breathtaking techniques of which I've never seen executed. The following results in penetrating voyeurism. Much of the anguish in this film seems to be of a personal exorcism routine exercised by fellow film maker Rozz Williams. If this film lacked "Vomit Gore", this trilogy might have ended up being porno for smart sociopaths. The Satan shtick grows tiresome after a while. I don't really care about forms of religion enough in a sense to bother myself about what they talk about. It also seems that Mr. Valentine might have seen a J-AV in his time. The get up for blank spaces being home for violation, degradation, extreme rape, and other-worldly forms of vaginal torture seem oddly reminiscent of various MASD's or GEN's. Suddenly, the film halts when you see something unheard of in a Gore film. A negro woman appears. Even goes as far as being a racial border-basher as she is vomited all over. Two clean shaved white women beat, smash, degrade, and rape (with fluids) a young Negro whore. Scenes like these make me chuckle while imagining that the reason Valentine films these upwards shots beneath vomit is due to him being an emetophile. Suicide Girls don't have shit on this ragtag group of ladies. ReGOREgitated Sacrifice (and the lot) are in essence a psycho-surreal Odyssey idolizing Kurt Cobain. I don't happen to like Nirvana for that matter, so I might have missed something here or there. Regardless of what you think about his previous films, or his forum trolling habits, ReGOREgitated Sacrifice is a fine independent film with several high points. Hell, even if I down right hated these films, I'd still be proud of the intensely creepy crayon art he produces.

-mAQ

LA BOUCHE DE JEAN-PIERRE
LA BOUCHE DE JEAN-PIERRE

Lucile Hadzihalilovic (1996)

A film to do with the strictest imitation from mother to child, La Bouche de Jean-Pierre is a film directed by Lucile Hadzihalilovic, the wife of Gaspar Noe. Early on, I pointed out the directorial inspirations of La Bouche de Jean-Pierre to be that of French psychodrama, I Stand Alone. After discovering that Gaspar Noe was not only the cinematographer but charitable husband to the lady director, let's just say that some pieces finally fit into place. Opening this 52 minute short is the introduction of an unstable woman first forcing a man out of her house only to decide that she really wants him to stay. A female prioritizing is domestic suicide, so it seems. What originally tempted him to leave is unknown. Perhaps the mental fragility of his once little whore. Upon his exculpation of what was likely a terrible and domineering relationship, the mother, the woman with sole responsibility of her daughter, decides to swallow a mouthful of prescription medication. Like the average youngster in cinema, the little girl observes, unknowingly, as her mom attempts to take her own life. As most of these (generally) young adult tales begin, Mimi is sent to live with her callous aunt in a small apartment.

Smart idea, slut.

Once the adorable little girl settles into the closet of this squalid flat, no sooner is she introduced to the namesake of the film, Jean-Pierre. Her innocence catches the eye of Jean-Pierre and upon his instincts catching onto the vestiges of what was once a "normal" young girl, his eyes flicker into a predatory state. After the exposure of the pitiless Solange sinks in, the emotions that are already mutilated begin to bleed again. Being forced out into the hallway, young Mimi is greeted by a group of friendly teenage musicians. Housing in their apartment while Solange ignorantly vacuums, the silent, vulnerable girl smiles, for the first time in ages, while these boys strum on their guitars. After Mimi is scolded by this pseudo-father figure, Jean-Pierre storms to the next door, threatening grievous bodily harm on the boy. Most likely because he feels his territory was impeded on. This leads to the next pivotal scene, arguably the most discomfiting, in which Jean-Pierre attempts to force himself on the impressionable girl. Touting Gaspar Noe's name was the logical thing to do in case of releasing a French experiment in continued nihilism. While the look and camera-work compliments the aesthetic of Noe's, the tone is inexplicably lighter, as Noe would never feign from displaying the cruelties of life. Lucile Hadzihalilovic dips her foot into the pool of madness in which her husband occupies but the horrors within must have frightened her as she quickly withdraws. La Bouche de Jean-Pierre is an unwillingly doubt of female directors and their optimistic escapism. Rarely has a female director been brazen enough to tap into a primal discourse in which men find so natural.

Begging for a kiss, hence the title (which roughly translates into Jean-Pierre's Mouth), Jean-Pierre fondles the girl as her pupils reflect only an emptiness, an emptiness that even as soulless as she currently is, could never mask just how glazed over and miles away she is. The performances within are incredible. The young female lead must have familiarity with sexual abuse as her passive resistance seemed to be such a fluid reaction to the advances of men, and Jean-Pierre dominates as one of the slimiest men in cinema. Although the pieces are all present, much of the sympathy doesn't seem directed properly. While the ending was mildly heart-breaking, it's noticed that the handling of this "doll" wasn't delivered to full effect causing much impact to wander about and audience interests aloof. Seeing such a sweet girl sunken to trauma so swiftly shouldn't be enjoyed by anyone and as usual, the women are blind to the abuse as it doesn't involve heirlooms or hairbrushes. La Bouche de Jean-Pierre is nowhere near a marvel but adjacent to Sodomites, concludes what is an excellent campaign towards the aberrant nature of sex in the hands of the weak.

-mAQ

DON'T TORTURE A DUCKLING
DON'T TORTURE A DUCKLING

Lucio Fulci (1972)

Unquestionably, Don't Torture a Duckling (1972) aka Non si sevizia un paperino is one of my top three favorite Lucio Fulci films and not without good reason as the Italian filmmaker, who himself regarded it as his own personal favorite among all the films he had directed, finally found his nefarious niche with the wonderfully wicked work, ultimately eventually earning himself the much deserved title of "Godfather of Gore." Indeed, a sort of vaguely Pasolini-esque Giallo flick set in a small Southern Italian village revolving around the mysterious death of young prepubescent Catholic boys by a deranged psychopath, Don't Torture a Duckling was the film where the Guido master of the cinematically grotesque demonstrated his subversive eye for gorgeous gore and unhinged ultra-violence. A pre-flesheater flick created before Fulci became an international horror icon for directing Zombi 2 (1979) aka Zombie, Don't Torture a Duckling stands out strikingly among the filmmaker's oeuvre in that it is an innately linear and plot-driven work that lacks the sort of Artaud-inspired oniric essence of his later masterpieces of the macabre like The Beyond (1981) aka L'aldilà and The House by the Cemetery (1981) aka Quella villa accanto al cimitero. Also quite unlike Fulci's later flicks, Don't Torture a Duckling does not hopelessly pretend to be an American production, but is, in fact, aside from possibly his pre-horror goofy goombah comedies, the director's most intrinsically and flagrantly Italian work that wallows in the angelic beauty of the Southern Italian countryside and features the sort of 'anti-Catholic Catholicism' that only Catholic-indoctrinated Guido filmmakers can pull off. In fact, despite being an imperative and groundbreaking work in Fulci's career, Don't Torture a Duckling was immediately blacklisted and only received a limited theatrical release (it was not even released in the United States in any format until 2000) due to its uniquely unflattering depiction of the Catholic church and portrayal of Italian peasants as hotheaded hicks with murderously superstitious minds. As far as I am concerned, Don't Torture a Duckling is one of the strangest, greatest, and most artfully assembled Giallo flicks ever made as a work that deserves a place alongside Giulio Questi's Death Laid an Egg (1968) aka La morte ha fatto l'uovo and Silvio Narizzano's Bloodbath (1979) aka Las flores del vicio aka The Sky Is Falling as a wonderfully wayward work that takes the Guido murder mystery genre into more delightfully deranged territory. A work that unquestionably proves that Fulci was not a no-talent horror hack who merely used buckets of blood and phantasmagoric imagery to hide the fact he was incapable of telling a story with character development and complex plots, Don't Torture a Duckling is a 'whodunit' flick with equal doses of scathing style and substance that leaves the viewers guessing until the very end, thus concluding in an ungodly manner that makes one question whether or not the director was the victim of a sexually repressed priest when he was a child.

Bruno, Michele, and Tonino are a troublesome trio of boys who live in the small and isolated Southern Italian village of Accendura and not one of the boys will live long enough to reach puberty and deflower their first girl as a mysterious mad man with an unhealthy obsession with little lads will ultimately brutally murder each one of them. When bad boy Bruno goes missing, the remote village of Accendura has the rare distinction of reaching the national spotlight as a media frenzy occurs that brings the sharp and satirical liberal journalist Andrea Martelli (Tomas Milian) to the area to investigate. Initially, the local village idiot and peeping tom Giuseppe Barra (Vito Passeri) is implicated in the crime after he is found lurking around the body where Bruno is buried. Indeed, while Barra was one the first ones to discover the corpse of Bruno, he did not kill the boy but merely phoned his parents in a patently pathetic attempt to extract an absurdly small ransom. Of course, when the drowned corpse of Bruno's friend Tonino is found while Barra is imprisoned, it becomes quite obvious that the retarded peeping tom did not commit the killing. When the last of the three boys, Michele, is killed via strangulation after he makes the fatal mistake of sneaking out of his home at night, the townspeople begin to look for a scapegoat for the murders. Of course, the villagers suspect the sexually promiscuous beauty Patrizia (German-American actress Barbara Bouchet)—a scantily clad counter-culture chick from Milan who is laying low after being involved in a drug scandal and who gets off to displaying her unclad tanned body to prepubescent boys, including one of the ones who was killed—as a young local priest, Don Alberto Avallone (Marc Porel), even hints to journalist Martelli that the murders only started to occur after she arrived and defiled the village with her voluptuous presence. Priest Don Alberto also confides in Martelli that he firmly believes loose morals are to blame for the tragic deaths and that he has managed to censor liberal/counter-culture material appearing in the village, stating, “Then something bad happens, and everyone wonders why! So they look for a culprit...and nobody understand that it's our tolerance that's to blame...I'm friends with the news vendor, and he won't sell certain magazines...They don't even arrive here.” The priest runs a youth group at the church and cons the boys into going to become more involved with god and the church by playing soccer with them. While twink-ish priest Don Alberto is unanimously loved and respected by all the villagers, his reclusive mother Aurelia (Irene Papas) is a strange and mysterious woman who, as Martelli is told by one villager, is essentially “only tolerated because she is the priest's mother.” Another suspect in the murders is a beautiful yet decidedly dirty black magic witch named La Magiara (Florinda Bolkan) who has a peculiar proclivity for digging up infant skeletons and fiddling with voodoo dolls, including driving pins through three dolls that are ostensibly symbols of the three little lads that were killed.

Eventually, proletarian witch Magiara is arrested for the murders and when she is brought to the police station, she proudly proclaims she is responsible for killing the three boys as she seems to assume her voodoo doll excursions were successful. While Magiara is cleared of the charges after a police officer provides her with an alibi, she ultimately meets a grizzly end when a group of superstitious villagers decide to take matters into their own hands and brutally beat the would-be-witch an inch away from her life after spotting her in the local graveyard. While succumbing to her wounds, Magiara attempts to flag down passing cars but is ignored as if she is mere rodent road kill, ultimately dying on the side of the road. The next day, another boy is killed via drowning and posh druggo princess Patrizia's fancy gold-plated cigarette lighter is found at the scene, thus implicating her in the crime, but luckily she has an alibi as she was buying some dope at the time of the murder. Naturally, Martelli and Patrizia, being the most cosmopolitan and 'progressive' people investigating the boy murders, decide to team up and solve the mystery themselves. After learning that priest Don Alberto has a retarded six-year-old sister with a perverse, peculiar proclivity for dismembering her dolls, including Donald Duck dolls (hence, the title Don't Torture a Duckling), Martelli comes to the conclusion that the girl has witnessed the murders and is merely imitating what she saw. Ultimately, Martelli and Patrizia conclude that either Don Alberto or his mother is responsible for the murders. Although Don Alberto's sister and mother disappear, Martelli and Patrizia later track down the mother, who is semi-conscious after taking a beat from her unholy holy son, in a medieval shack. Don Alberto begs Martelli to stop her perturbed priest from killing her daughter. Luckily, Martelli catches Don Alberto right before he throws his sister off a cliff. Martelli and Don Alberto get in a small brawl and the wussy journalist manages to trip up the pussy priest, who falls off the cliff head first, and ultimately smashes his skulls against the rocks as he plunges to his violent yet fitting death as a fallen disciple of Christ. As to why he committed the crazed killings of the young boys that he proclaimed to love so much and devoted his life to, Martelli states, "They grow up...They feel the stirrings of the flesh. They fall into the arms of sin. We must stop them. Sin that God easily forgives, yes...But what of tomorrow? What sordid acts will they commit? What sins will they enact when they no longer come to confession? Then they will be really dead. Dead forever." Indeed, maybe if Patrizia had not gotten busted for snorting coke in Milan and sought exile in the small Sicilian village, then all the senseless deaths could have been prevented.

DON'T TORTURE A DUCKLING

Described by Lucio Fulci's contemporary and Giallo maestro Dario Argento as, "One of Lucio Fulci's best films and a superb Giallo!" Don't Torture a Duckling certainly managed to bring new lunatic lifeblood to a fiercely formulaic genre as a work that manages to reconcile the celluloid blasphemy of Alberto Cavallone (indeed, it is a great incidental irony that the killer priest's name is "Alberto Avallone") with the thrilling crime-drama of Fernando Di Leo and the atmospheric Guido Giallo greatness of Argento. A socially scathing work that depicts Sicily as a quasi-medieval shithole populated by superstitious lynch mobs, pernicious priests of the homicidal (and possibly pedophilic) sort, and a rather large population of retards, Don't Torture a Duckling is ultimately no less hateful, if not more personally so, in its depiction of rural Southern rednecks than the anti-Heimat films of German New Cinema and popular Hollywood movies like John Boorman's Deliverance (1972), thereupon also making it one of Fulci's most socio-politically penetrating works. Personally, I am glad that Fulci eventually dropped the socialpolitical pretenses yet, admittedly, it does not reach intolerable nor obnoxious extremes in Don't Torture a Duckling, in part due to the fact that 'progressive' Patrizia is portrayed as a county cocktease who gets off to pseudo-seducing preteen boys and does not do much aside from drugs and sunbathing. Also, unlike the degenerates in Hollywood, who merely make crude and preposterous caricatures of rednecks and other people they are afraid of, Fulci's hatred is clearly personal and thus more authentic. Featuring an unflattering portrait of a Catholic village that could have most certainly inspired Cavallone's absurdist masterpiece Man, Woman and Beast (1977) aka L'uomo, la donna e la bestia - Spell (Dolce mattatoio) and easily one of the creepiest and most bizarre portrayals of a priest in cinema history, Don't Torture a Duckling is certainly a masterpiece of its genre that also, like the greatest works of the genre, transcends said genre. Including a totally complimentary score from Riz Ortolani (Goodbye Uncle Tom aka Addio Zio Tom, Cannibal Holocaust) and alluring landscape scenes of the Sicilian countryside that recall the films of Pasolini, Don't Torture a Duckling is, in my less than humble opinion, the ultimate Guido Giallo film as a curious cinematic cocktail of what dagoes do best cinematically: sex, death, crime, politics, and religion. Although a pure assumption, I think it is safe to say after watching Don't Torture a Duckling and The House by the Cemetery that maestro Fulci had an unhappy childhood, but thank god he did or otherwise the world would otherwise not have what is probably the greatest killer priest movie ever made.

-Ty E

ZOMBI 2
ZOMBI 2

Lucio Fulci (1979)

The very first Italian film I ever saw—be it exploitation or otherwise—was Zombi 2 (1979) aka Zombie aka Zombie Flesh Eaters aka Woodoo directed by Guido “Godfather of Gore” (fuck hokey Hebrew Herschell!) Lucio Fulci (A Lizard in a Woman’s Skin, City of the Living Dead). Before actually watching it, I had almost mystical expectations for Zombi 2, especially after hearing about the iconic scene where an aquatic flesheater battles a shark, so naturally I was a little bit let down when I actually saw the film for the first time some 15+ years ago and realized how poorly directed and nonsensical it was, but since then it has grown on me like an old battle scar such that I have developed a strange sort of sentimentality for it as the years have passed. One of a number of films that proved that Italians are the only people in the world that can make cinematic rip-offs that are better than the originals, Zombi 2, which was titled simply as ‘Zombie’ in the United States, was released as an ostensible sequel to George A. Romero’s Dawn of the Dead (1978), which was known as Zombi in Italy. Apparently lifting scenes and dialogue straight from Dawn of the Dead, Zombi 2, despite being a work titled to cash in on another film, is especially interesting in that it deconstructs what Romero revolutionized with Night of the Living Dead (1968) in its reintroduction of the black voodoo angle which was quite typical of pre-Romero flesheater flicks like the first feature-length zombie film ever made, White Zombie (1932) directed by Victor Halperin and starring Béla Lugosi. A pleasantly putrid postcolonial celluloid guts-and-gore-fest featuring worm-infested zombie Spanish Conquistadors and pale black flesheaters descended from the African slave trades (although, despite being set on a mostly black island, most of the zombies are actually white!), Zombi 2 is a vaguely intertextual zombie flick that derives a great amount of its fright factor if looked at as a depiction of negro spiritual revenge for slavery and forcing civilization on the uncivilized (the fact that one of the main characters, Dr. Menard, is irked that he cannot figure out a scientific reason for zombification is symbolic of this ‘revolt against civilization’). Indeed, in its great cliffhanger ending (Zombi 2 would work better as a prequel to Dawn of the Dead) where the zombies begin invading New York City—a place that prides itself in taking in rabble from the darkest and most primitive spheres of the earth—Zombi 2 has aged surprisingly quite well since its release over four decades ago, as not only has America been drastically degenerated into a third world shithole, especially where urban areas are concerned, but the American populous itself has turned more and more zombie-like, hence the popularity of flesheaters nowadays as a sort of biting reflection of humanity as a whole. Like Night of the Living Dead set on a tropical island with slight influence from H. G. Wells’ The Island of Doctor Moreau and White Zombie, Zombi 2, which was written by Fulci’s longtime collaborator Dardano Sacchetti (1990: The Bronx Warriors, Manhattan Baby) and his wife Elisa Briganti, is a work that features almost intolerable histrionic acting, a shockingly juvenile and oftentimes nonsensical script, glaringly bad dubbing and a conspicuously culturally mongrelized cast comprised of people who could not even communicate with one another in real-life, yet it is also an undeniable masterpiece of quasi-exploitation zombie scenes with some of the most classic and iconic gore, makeup, music, death scenes and—most importantly—zombies in film history as a work that truly proves that Italians do it better, especially when it comes to agreeable cinematic trash of the superlatively sleazy sort. The film that made director Lucio Fulci a maestro of the macabre and an international superstar auteur of sleazy schlock cinema that was followed by important works like City of the Living Dead (1980), The Beyond (1981), The House by the Cemetery (1981), The Black Cat (1981), The New York Ripper (1982) and Manhattan Baby (1982), Zombi 2 is and will always be, if nothing else, a rite of passage for any serious and self-respecting horror fan.

An abandoned yacht of the seemingly yuppie sort is floating around a New York City harbor, so two Harbor Patrol officers board the ship to investigate and one of them is in for a surprise when a bloated zombie that resembles a sort of rotting Fat Albert bites the flesh out of the officer's neck thereupon instantly killing the man in blue, so the remaining cop shoots the undead being and the grotesque bulky beast falls in the ocean and simply disappears. Not long after, a beautiful babe named Anne Bowles (Tisa Farrow), whose doctor father owned the phantom yacht and apparently left town to do some research on a tropical island, is questioned by the police regarding her daddy, who is nowhere to be found, thus inspiring her to do her own investigation. Meanwhile, semi-sleazy English newspaper reporter Peter West (Ian McCulloch), who for whatever reason thinks he has the refined wit of Oscar Wilde, is asked by his editor (played by Fulci in a cameo role) to investigate the bourgeois ghost ship and when he does, he bumps into Anne, who he admits he has been stalking for some time at the behest of his boss. While getting to know one another on the boat in what will ultimately evolve into an aborted romance, Anne and Peter discover a note written by the girl's father stating he is on the island of Matool (Saint Thomas, U.S. Virgin Islands) and that he contracted some strange undiagnosed disease, so the two strangers decide to head there. Upon arriving in the tropics, Anne and Peter bump into two sexy seafaring strangers, Bryan Curt (Al Cliver aka Pier Luigi Conti) and Susan Barrett (Auretta Gay) and the two join them on a pseudo-erotic exotic adventure that recalls Ruggero Deodato's Waves of Lust (1975), which Mr. blond Nordic Guido Al Cliver also starred in. Unbeknownst to the four beautiful yet one-dimensional characters whose existences are ultimately trivial when it comes to the sleazy cinematic majesty that is Zombi 2, Matool is a perturbingly primitive island ridden with disease and death, especially of the walking dead sort, which has been assumedly cursed by voodoo slave magic. An atheistic physician at the local Christian mission, Dr. David Menard (Richard Johnson), is determined to figure out why the negro natives, as well as partners, are dropping like flies and becoming reanimated into cannibalistic creatures, but his boldly bitchy yet nonetheless beautiful young wife Paola (Olga Karlatos) is determined to leave for obvious reasons. On their way to Matool, Susan decides to go topless scuba diving while wearing nothing but a thong of the ass-flossing sort and while under water she is approached by a shark, but luckily a predatory zombie, who can swim faster than most undead ghouls can walk, appears from nowhere and battles the sea beast, ironically saving the little lass' life in the process in what is easily one of the most iconic and irritatingly absurd scenes of Zombi 2.

ZOMBI 2

Rather unfortunately, Mernard's seemingly sexually repressed wife Paola is not so lucky because after a zombie plays peeping tom on her while she is in the shower, she is soon attacked and has her eye pierced when a zombie pulls her head into a large splintered piece of wood. The next day, aside from losing his much younger wife to cannibalistic corpses (which he has yet to discover), Mernard has the luxury of shooting his friend Matthias (Franco Fantasia) in the head after he turns into a zombie. Eventually Anne and her new friends arrive at Matool and she tells Mernard about her sob story regarding her father. When the group heads to Mernard's cozy mansion, they discover the body of Paolo being dined on by a motley crew of reanimated corpses, but luckily they make a hasty escape, only to crash their jeep on the way out, which causes Peter to injure his leg. While resting in the jungle, Anne examines Peter's leg and the two eventually begin to finally makeout after flirting for the entire film, but they make the unwitting mistake of getting down and dirty over the graves of Spanish Conquistadors, whose gorgeously grotesque corpses rise from the earth and immediately start feeding on human meat. While Anne merely has her hair pulled and Peter has his leg grabbed by the antiquated corpses, Susan is not as lucky as she becomes petrified at the sight of the zombies and essentially does not put a fight with the Conquistador corpse, ultimately being ripped to shreds in the process. Eventually, Matool becomes totally overrun by wobbling corpses, so the survivors barricade themselves in Mernard's backwards mission hospital in a Night of the Living Dead-esque fashion. Naturally, the zombies bombard the hospital and break in, killing Mernard while he is looking for bullets. Stunned at seeing his girlfriend Susan in postmortem yet mobile zombie form, Bryan fails to fight back against his undead girlfriend and is bitten, thus contracting the cursed contagion. Anne, Peter, and infected Bryan manage to escape Matool via their yacht, but little do they realize what awaits them back at civilization. Of course, Bryan eventually turns into a zombie and Peter decides against Anne's wishes to keep him locked in a secure boat room to prove to people back home about the zombie nemesis, but the journalist's efforts prove to be in vain as NYC is already crawling with zombies as the ungodly epidemic has reached global proportions, thus basically superficially concluding where Dawn of the Dead begins.

Featuring pretty morons who go on romantic rendezvous in graveyards despite zombie epidemics, zombies who can barely walk but make great swimmers and underwater shark hunters, and centuries old Spanish Conquistadors that are still somehow rotting and fresh with worms, among various other absurd and nonsensical moments that transcend simple 'movie magic,' Zombi 2 is undoubtedly celluloid trash of the sickeningly stupid sort, yet it is suavely stylized trash with charisma and 'class' that indisputably proves that sometimes style and sensationalism can reign over substance as a work that ultimately belongs to the best that the zombie horror subgenre has to offer. Featuring more (meat)balls than brains and more guts than sagaciousness, Zombi 2 is half-ass exploitation horror cinema done right as the sort of cinematic equivalent to going on a haunted house amusement park ride with a high-talian hooker. Thankfully, missing the moronically simple leftwing social commentary that plagues George A. Romero's films, Zombi 2 even goes so far as being politically incorrect, portraying a corner's black assistant named James as a bungling buffoon, black islanders as supernatural beings of sorts who can sense evil as if they have some special animal sense, and women as hopelessly helpless and hysterical perennial victims who do not even have the sense to run when a zombie is slowly approaching them. Once described by its Scottish star Ian McCulloch in an interview as being, "a very silly and horrible film," Zombi 2 was ultimately more successful at the box office than the film it ripped off, Dawn of the Dead, even spawning four unrelated and ultimately worthless sequels (only of one these, Zombi 3 (1988) aka Zombie Flesh Eaters 2, was an 'official' sequel and was directed by Fulci, who got sick and could not finish the film), though director Lucio Fulci would go on to be arguably the greatest Italian filmmaker of celluloid horror splatter who has ever lived. Featuring the greatest eye gouging scene since Salvador Dalí and Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou (1929) aka An Andalusian Dog and zombies that are superior to any ever created by George A. Romero, Zombi 2 is, indeed, the ultimate flesheater flick as a work of hypnotic (and never hokey!) zombie horror that refuses to die and rightfully so!

-Ty E

CITY OF THE LIVING DEAD
CITY OF THE LIVING DEAD

Lucio Fulci (1980)

In my opinion (as well as many other people's), the first film in Guido 'Godfather of Gore' Lucio Fulci's unofficial pseudo-American Gothic 'Gates of Hell' trilogy, City of the Living Dead (1980) aka Paura nella città dei morti viventi aka The Gates of Hell aka Twilight of the Dead aka Fear in the City of the Living Dead, is also the worst and most intrinsically incoherent chapter in the maestro of the macabre's flesheater triptych, as if the director took a bunch of bad LSD and jumbled together a bunch of horrifically half-baked yet sometimes hypnotic horror clichés, ranging from Lovecraft to Romero, and threw in some admittedly grotesque and even gorgeous gore, thinking it would be enough ingredients to make for a filmable feature-length film. Indeed, City of the Living Dead is in many ways, Fulci at his most compulsively cliché and culturally mongrelized as the perfect work for the director's detractors to criticize as a film that, not unlike Zombie (1979) aka Zombi 2, was shamelessly marketed to capitalize off of Dawn of the Dead (1979) Guido-style, so much so that United Film Distribution Company filed a cease and desist order against Motion Picture Marketing due to the film's title (which was originally 'Twilight of the Dead' until legal problems changed that) and posters with a striking resemblance to the Romero flick, hence why the work was later re-titled The Gates of Hell for its release. Somewhat following in the thematic tradition of the director's subversive Giallo Don't Torture a Duckling (1972) aka Non si sevizia un paperino, City of the Living Dead is a Catholic-themed work where pseudo-metaphysical movie madness is ushered in after a mentally perturbed priest commits suicide in a Gothic New England graveyard, thus unwittingly opening the gates of hell in the process, which includes an invasion from Übermensch zombies of supernatural strength that seem more powerful than Jesus Christ himself. Featuring people vomit out their innards in a manner that seems to be a mockery of the bleeding orifices associated with stigmata of traditional Roman Catholic iconography, City of the Living Dead is clearly the work of a hostilely heretical man who is the closest thing to a genuine anti-pope of the horror genre, as a man reared in Catholicism who utilized the religion's most stereotypical traditions against itself, assumedly reserving a spot in hell for himself in the process, or at least one would hope. Featuring endless bucket loads of creepy crawling maggots and gushing guts, more fog and frights than John Carpenter's The Fog (1980), all-powerful and positively pernicious zombies that make Romero's zombies seem like retarded road kill, and enough misogyny to act as the nemesis of Romero's 'female power' pseudo-feminist flesheater flick Day of the Dead (1985), City of the Living Dead, even in all its nonsensical glory is still, when everything is said and done, a must-see flick for zombiephiles as one of Fulci's more interesting and flagrantly fucked celluloid abortions.

A Catholic priest named Father William Thomas (Fabrizio Jovine), whose name should probably be Padre Guido as he looks like a super Sicilian wop, makes the horribly heretical mistake of committing suicide by hanging himself in a foreboding and fog-covered graveyard in the Lovecraft-inspired area of Dunwich, New England, as the holy man's act of unholy self-slaughter somehow causes the gates of hell to open up thus causing all hell to break loose, including the rising of undead, perpetually rotting corpses. Meanwhile, a pretty New York psychic named Mary Woodhouse (Catriona MacColl) ostensibly dies of fright during a multicultural séance (one of the psychics is a black drug dealer) after having a vision of Father Thomas' untimely suicide, or so everyone assumes. Luckily, a less than handsome and hardly youthful investigative reporter named Peter Bell (Christopher George) gets nosy and happens to go by Mary's grave as she screams right before she is buried six feet under (the undertakers are too lazy to completely bury her that day!) and he saves her from suffocating to death in just the nick of time, ironically almost killing her in the process while breaking the coffin open. Naturally, Peter and Mary unite and eventually realize that everything that has happened was prophesied in the Book of Enoch. No longer holy nor human but super sinisterly Svengali-like in his decidedly demonic and deadly wickedness, Father Thomas is now a sort of all-powerful zombie Führer who can make hot girls barf out their guts and compel cruddy corpses to turn into supernatural flesheaters with quasi-cosmic powers that transcend both time and space. Meanwhile, a young and seemingly normal chick named Emily Robbins (Antonella Interlenghi) goes to hang out with a young degenerate named Bob (Giovanni Lombardo Radice)—a fiercely fucked fellow who has a peculiar propensity for fondling and fucking anatomically correct blowup dolls—but she is soon attacked and killed by zombie overlord Father Thomas, who also kills a young couple on a date shortly after, causing a little lady to barf out her intestines and rip her boyfriend brains out in a manner that makes the back of his head seem like it had a date with a shotgun instead of his girlfriend. Not long after, in what is arguably the most infamous scene of City of the Living Dead, burnout blowup-doll-fucker Bob has his brain drilled in from temple-to-temple by a girl's father he was screwing around with who has decided to take matters in his own hands and has quite wrongly assumed the pathetic pervert is responsible for all the recent deaths in Dunwich. Eventually, Mary and Peter hook up with another couple, psychiatrist Jerry (Carlo De Mejo) and his patient Sandra (Janet Agren), as the would-be-fierce but ultimately feeble foursome hopes to close the portal to Hell before All Saints Day, or else the world will plunge into total darkness and Satanic supernatural flesheaters will consume the earth. In the end, only Gerry and Mary survive and City of the Living Dead concludes in a ridiculous manner after a young boy named John-John Robbins (Luca Venantini)—the prepubescent little brother of Father Thomas' victim Emily Robbins—runs to the survivors, only for the image of the boy to pause and shatter. Apparently, John-John turns into a zombie, or at least that is what director Fulci said, stating of the ambiguous ending, which was originally supposed to be happy (with the little boy merely reuniting with the two adult heroes), that it was the film editor's idea. Anyway, whoever's idea it was, it was a half ass one that screams 'hatchet job.'

CITY OF THE LIVING DEAD

Indeed, compared to the ominously otherworldly conclusions of the other two films in Fulci's Gates of Hell trilogy—The Beyond (1981) and The House by the Cemetery (1981)—City of the Living Dead seems like it ends in a manner where funding for the film ran out and the director was just forced to tack something on the end in a decidedly desperate attempt to get it released. Indubitably, the weakest and most lackluster chapter of the Gates of Hell trilogy, City of the Living Dead is only saved from being a total filmic failure due to its superlatively sadistic gore and unhinged ultra-violence, oftentimes foreboding atmosphere, and nonchalant misogyny. Indeed, aside from depicting most women as empty ciphers, City of the Living Dead also features great pseudo-Freudian dialogue like, "You're only nurturing a pet neurosis... Like 70% of the female population of this country!" which, it should be noted, is stated by one woman to another as if that is actually how members of the fairer sex speak to one another! Ultimately, City of the Living Dead is a compulsively confused and innately incoherent work where certain individual parts—mainly the grotesque gore scenes—are greater than the whole, thus making it comparable to two nice tits and an ass without a head. Alluding to two of America's greatest and darkest minds of horror literature, Edgar Allan Poe and especially H.P. Lovecraft, City of the Living Dead, not unlike the other two chapters of the Gates of Hell trilogy, is a curiously conspicuous celluloid cultural mongrel that almost seems to go out of its way to reveal its grand goombah origins as a work intrinsically ill-equipped with superlatively swarthy actors, brazenly bad dubbing, reckless wop Catholic themes and imagery, and American cultural clichés, including random references to the Salem witch trials. Still, like any Fulci flick from the 1970s and early 1980s, City of the Living Dead still belongs to the celluloid aristocracy of both Guido exploitation cinema and zombie cinema in general. Intrinsically irrational to its corpse-ridden core due to its erratic editing, nonsensical storyline, totally superficial and shallow characters, and castrated conclusion, City of the Living Dead only stands out today as a somewhat singular work mainly due to its aesthetic pleasing hatred for the human body via its venomously extravagant depictions of violent deaths as a cinematic work that makes aberrant art out of a woman literally regurgitating her intestines out. Apparently, inspiring a young kraut to hang himself after it was released in Deutschland under the title of 'A Zombie Hanged on a Bell Rope' (the film has since been banned in Germany for over 20 years), City of the Living Dead is macabre movie misanthropy at its most visceral and philistine, which is something I can respect more than than feminist flesheater-killers à la Romero's Day of the Dead.

-Ty E

THE BEYOND
THE BEYOND

Lucio Fulci (1981)

I consider myself a fan of one of the Italian auteurs of shock and blood; Fulci being one and Argento being the other. I've chewed through films so fast in the last several years that I constantly jump from genre to genre and never fully expunge the classics and must-see's out of my queue. Finally, I halted the procrastination and have given more attention to the ones that deserve it. The Beyond (Seven Doors of Death) is Fulci's most critically acclaimed work and it's not hard to see why. It's an intelligent horror film with that dreary oneiric dust that shimmers across the screen. It's visually tempting and an exercise in master lighting and sound progression, but I found myself wanting substance to the body of the film. I did appreciate Fulci's "two cents" on Neurobiology and the attack on the "thought process" by constantly denouncing the hallucinogenic experiences that were occurring all around. The Beyond is composed of three different sections. Much like most Italian horror, the opening is a flashback to a time of a severely disenchanting land where butchery and crucifixion were carried out. The middle of the film is the "Hey, let's shove a lot of nonsensical gore into a tight space". The body count was entertaining but otherwise useless. I found the "Gate of Hell killing you for finding out its secret" factor quite bothersome after the 3rd random killing. The ending is a full fledged attack on "happy endings" as it isn't neither a sad or a grand outcome. The result leaves you mystified and in awe. It's part of a void that engulfs everything; a lingering plane of dimension also known as hell. I fancy the way Fulci designed this purgatory. It's barren and littered with mummified bodies (Who are actually hobo's that Fulci bribed with alcohol). I even sniffed out a trace of the same aesthetic used by Lamberto Bava in Demons. The Beyond is definitely one of his best. It took several attempts for him to create a "masterful" supernatural film with the undead using correct lighting and color filters. The setting is eerie and the gore is in place. The stand alone scenes include a dog ripping out a jugular and a head explosion that has become quite iconic in the gorehound culture. This film was an absolute blast and I think I favor this over Suspiria, albeit the soundtrack was infinitely better.

-mAQ

THE HOUSE BY THE CEMETERY

Lucio Fulci (1981)

When I first saw The House by the Cemetery (1981) aka Quella villa accanto al cimitero—the concluding chapter of Italian maestro of mayhem Lucio Fulci's unofficial abyss-staring 'Gates of Hell' trilogy, following City of the Living Dead (1980) aka Paura nella città dei morti viventi and The Beyond (1981) aka L'aldilà—some fifteen or so years ago, I thought it was one of the most shamelessly derivative, conspicuously culturally confused and mongrelized, and nauseatingly nonsensical films I had ever seen and although my opinion has not changed much regarding most these ultimately irrelevant complains, like many of the films directed by the the great goombah "Godfather of Gore," the cross-subgenre horror flick has grown on me quite considerably, as a sort of Guido exploitation horror equivalent to European arthouse cinema that wallows in stunning schlock and shock. Directed by a man who was highly influenced by crazed French playwright Antonin Artaud's idea of 'cruel' imagery to shock the audience members into action and reaction and who once stated during a general discussion of his works The Beyond and The House by the Cemetery, "my idea was to make an absolute film...there's no logic to it, just a succession of images," The House by the Cemetery, like most of Fulci's films, will seem totally incomprehensible to the average American filmgoer and even horror fan, as a work that focuses on audacious aestheticism of the aberrantly atmospheric sort over plot and storyline, thus being a work of 'pure horror' in the truest, at least if one can look past the rather ridiculous dubbing. Of course, considering its flagrant thematic and aesthetic similarities with Frankenstein (1931) directed by James Whale, The Amityville Horror (1979), and The Shining (1980) directed by Stanley Kubrick, as well as Fulci's admitted influence from the classic British gothic horror flick The Innocents (1961) directed by Jack Clayton, The House by the Cemetery is certainly a film with a plot and storyline, if not a hopelessly holey and haphazard one featuring a sort of degenerate dego dream logic that acts as an innate and ultimately intriguing ingredient of the film that—when everything is said and done—makes it stand strangely apart from the films it so shamelessly rips off. Like most of Fulci's filmic nightmares, The House by the Cemetery is an undeniably Italian flick with an all Italian cast that pretends to be American, as a Guido gothic horror flick ostensibly set in New England, but feels like it takes place in some ominous otherworldly metaphysical hell of the culturally mongrelized sort. Borrowing conventions from horror subgenres including (but not limited to) psychological horror, haunted house flicks, zombie flicks, teen slasher movies, Poe-esque Gothic/Victorian horror, and Fulci's own classic celluloid splatter and unhinged ultra-violence, The House by the Cemetery is, if nothing else, a fierce fever dream of the divinely derivative sort that derangedly defecates out virtually every classic convention and cliché of cellu-loid horror, thus acting as a sort of cinematic link between classic silent horror and senseless splatter cinema.

THE HOUSE BY THE CEMETERY

Opening with a topless young babe (Daniela Doria) calling out for her boyfriend, only to receive a knife to the back of her skull that exits through her mouth shortly after discovering her man's mangled body, The House by the Cemetery begins like a pseudo-sexy slasher flick, but soon switches to more traditional horror, albeit with gore galore thrown in between. Little blond boy Bob Boyle (Giovanni Frezzi) has a lot in common with Danny Torrance of The Shining as he can talk to dead people, most specifically a redhaired little girl named Mae Freudstein (Silvia Collatina) who looks like a young Lindsay Lohan and who the little boy first notices in a vintage photograph of an old New England house. Bob's father Norman (Paolo Malco) is taking his son and wife Lucy (Catriona MacColl) and moving the family from NYC to Boston to the New England house in the photograph, which was previously occupied by his ex-colleague, Dr. Peterson, who went mad whilst living at the home and slaughtered his mistress and subsequently committed suicide, thus making it a rather eerie and senseless place to move, especially for a young family. Upon arriving in New Whitby, Boston, Bob sees his phantom friend Mae across the street and she warns him that both him and his parents are in danger and should have never moved to the curiously quaint and antiquated New England home; when Bob's parents go searching for him, instead of seeing him speaking with Mae, they find him holding a creepy old Hans Bellmer-esque doll, which looks a lot like Mae, and ultimately creeps out the boy's mother Lucy. Indeed, Norman and wife Lucy suspect something is amiss about the house when the realtor Mrs. Gittelson (Dagmar Lassander) gets offended when one of her fellow employees describes the house as "the Freudstein" as opposed to her preferred name, "Oak Mansion." Upon arriving at so-called "Oak Mansion," the Boyles discover the place is in rather poor shape, as if it had not been occupied in decades or even a century, not to mention the fact that the cellar door is nailed/locked shut for whatever reason. In order to uncover more about the history of Oak Mansion, Norman Boyle goes to the local library the next day and learns from the assistant librarian, Daniel Douglas (Giampaolo Saccarola), that his former colleague Peterson conducted dubious research on Oak Mansion, as well as related local disappearances and related demographic materials. Meanwhile, Mae shows Bob the ancient tombstone of her mother Mary Freudstein, claiming that she is not really dead nor buried there. Most disturbingly, mother Lucy discovers the tomb of a certain "Jacob Tess Freudstein" built into the floor of Oak Mansion and her husband Norman tries to calm her fears by correctly claiming that it was not uncommon for people to be buried inside of their homes as the cold New England winters made it possible for people to be buried in the ground. Of course, Norman's own nerves are shocked when he finally is able to open the cellar door, where he is brutally bitten by a rather fake looking vampire bat, so the family tries to move to a home elsewhere, but are told that it will be another couple days before they can be rehoused. Not long afterwards, real estate agent Mrs. Gittelsohn goes by Oak Mansion to tell the Boyles she has found them a new home, but the family is not there as Norman is being treated at the hospital for the bat bite, so she makes the fatal mistake of letting herself in, where she stands on the Freudstein tombstone, which cracks apart and pins her ankle and not long after, the grotesque being appears and drives a firepoker through her neck, subsequently dragging her lifeless body to the cellar.

Naturally, Lucy is rather disturbed to find the new family babysitter, Ann (Ania Pieroni), who bears a striking resemblance to Brooke Shields and rather bizarrely is the one who was responsible for unlocking the cellar door, cleaning blood off the kitchen floor, ultimately evading all questions asked about the mysterious hemoglobin stain. Not long after, Norman tells Lucy that he has learned that Jacob Tess Freudstein was a vile Victorian surgeon who conducted inhuman illegal experiments. On his way to New York City to conduct research on the Freudstein home, Norman drops by the library and finds a cassette tape of his ex-colleague Peterson discussing how Dr. Freudstein committed familicide, ultimately killing his entire family. When babysitter Ann goes in the cellar to look for Bob, she has her throat slit and head decapitated by the monster Freudstein, which the little boy witnesses the end of, but cannot convince his mother Lucy that it really happened. Determined to take matters into his own hands, little Bob returns to the cellar from hell to look for his babysitter Ann and in no time, his mother Lucy hears the boy crying with terror from the basement. Although Lucy cannot seem to get the cellar door open, Norman inevitably comes home and takes an axe to the basement door. When Norman finally enters the cellar, he finds corpse-like monster-mummy-zombie Freudstein (Giovanni De Nava), who is over 150-years-old and uses his victims' body parts to regenerate his rapidly degenerate blood cells, grabbing Bob by the face, so he cuts off the ghastly ghoul's arm and the undead being scampers away like a hobo cripple. After Norman once again attempts to attack Freudstein with the axe, the reanimated corpse manages to take the weapon away and before Mr. Boyle knows it, his throat is ripped out. Lucy and Bob attempt to make a getaway via a ladder leading to Freudstein's tomb upstairs, but the hysterical mother does not have enough strength to move the gravestone and she ultimately dies when Dr. Zombie rams her down on each step as her corpse falls to the cellar floor. Magically, Bob manages to escape when he is randomly yanked from the ladder to the upstairs floor where he is greeted by his little girlfriend Mae. Mae's mother Mary Freudstein urges the two children to leave and Bob enters 'the beyond,' thus become an adopted member of the prestigious Freudstein family as an inhabitant of a nefarious netherworld of melancholy, mayhem, and misanthropic phantasms.

While the setting is all wrong (post-WWII Vienna would be the ideal place),

THE HOUSE BY THE CEMETERY

The House by the Cemetery is especially interesting, at least to an anti-Freudian like myself, due to its inclusion of a grotesque zombie doctor known for a murderous sort of malpractice as the archfiend villain, as if he is an undead Sigmund Freud who has set to destroy children and families with his debauched alien ideas. Considering the lack of political correctness in his films, I do not think it would be going too far to suggest that Fulci and his co-writers, Giorgio Mariuzzo and Dardano Sacchetti, intentionally sought out to use the name of Freud as a symbol of derangement and depravity because, like the theories of the hostile Hebraic psychoanalyst, Freudstein undermines traditional culture as a pernicious parasite who lives off the health of normal families. Of course, Sigmund Freud's theories have gone on to become parts of mainstream culture and vocabulary, with stereotypical Freudian sexual innuendos even appearing in children's films like Shrek (2001) and subconscious psychoanalytic techniques being used in advertising and 'public opinion forming' (aka propaganda) since his nephew Edward Bernays began working for President Woodrow Wilson during World War I. Interestingly, Bernays died in Cambridge, Massachusetts, which is just north of where The House by the Cemetery was set, thus one could argue that it is the very first anti-psychoanalytic horror flick. Ironically, like what Bernays did when implementing his propaganda (i.e. manipulating the goys), The House by the Cemetery, not unlike virtually all horror films, albeit to a more audacious extent, is a work that exploits the innate irrationality and 'herd instincts' of the viewer, as a work that ultimately stirs man's most archaic emotions. A totally tasteless yet sleekly stylized work that wallows in spectacle and negates narrative, The House by the Cemetery—in its mystification of monsters and morbid metaphysical horror—is essentially psychoanalysis in reverse. In describing the ending of the film, Fulci offered the followings insights, "...what is to me the most tragic thing in The House by the Cemetery is not the people who die, but that little girl who opens for her young friend the gates to the world of the dead, and saves him from normality (i.e. from the monster who killed the boy's parents), but also plunged him into the Beyond." And, indeed, The House by the Cemetery concludes much like The Beyond, where the lead protagonists are not brutally butchered like their dismembered compatriots, but suffer a much more sinister and soul-stirring fate where they are plunged into a sort of pandemonium of nothingness and necromancy in what amounts to hell everlasting. Not unlike his early atypical giallo Don't Torture a Duckling (1972) aka Non si sevizia un paperino, The House by the Cemetery is a children's horror flick made for adults, so it should be no surprise the film concludes with the Henry James quote, "no one will ever know whether children are monsters or monsters are children." Ultimately, The House by the Cemetery is a film about the loss of childhood innocence, which considering the director's Catholic upbringing and seemingly contradictory cinematic output, demonstrates that Lucio Fulci was a hopeless romantic who sought tirelessly to once again obtain something he lost long ago.

As somewhat farcically depicted in his rather reflexive work A Cat in the Brain (1990) aka Un gatto nel cervello, it seems that no one was more horrified by the films of Lucio Fulci than Lucio Fulci, a filmmaker who started making copies but ultimately ended up churning out some of the most grotesque horror films ever made, thereupon epitomizing the overused Nietzsche aphorism, "He who fights with monsters should look to it that he himself does not become a monster. And when you gaze long into an abyss the abyss also gazes into you."

-Ty E

THE NEW YORK RIPPER
THE NEW YORK RIPPER

Lucio Fulci (1982)

Ready to dance with the absurd, I began watching Lucio Fulci's The New York Ripper with promises of extreme misogyny and a duck voiced serial killer. Let me tell you, I was not disappointed. In 1982, Lucio Fulci directed what is known to be his most controversial and shocking film. Its basis for a killer was derived from his prior film Don't Torture a Duckling. A Jack the Ripper is roaming the streets on New York by night, stalking young women and mutilating their genitals in crazy ways as police scramble to find the one responsible before more women are claimed. Their only lead? The killer quacks like a duck. This simple plot mechanism takes the film a lot farther than expected as a serial killer profiler torpidly narrates the killers would-be psyche. The film in question is heralded for its realistic violence. This is understandable to a degree as we see eyeballs and nipples sliced open with a straight razor. The result is extremely graphic and unnerving to even the most jaded cinephile. Besides this point, the violence is almost ridiculous. Extended lacerations are caused with little reaction and exaggerated blood spurting. I find women to be easier to kill and maim on screen due to an intimacy between the form of a female and a camera, but maybe that is just me. The New York Ripper is more than just an average giallo/exploitation film. It takes the formulaic approach to a serial killer and adds a twist, but the difference in this outing is that the twists birth more twists which intelligently flop around leaving you confused and attempting to solve the film before it is over. The ending cuts off at a genius frame due to a misprint in the DVD authoring stages which gives the film an extra layer. It's as if Fulci planned out several scenes with the knowledge of what would happen to the print. The New York Ripper is a fine slasher film that presents New York in its grimmest limelight with disgusting Greek perverts polluting the city. Many appalling citizens are on display as we forget the central story and dedicate our brief time affirming our own morals with the side-stories at hand. Each character has a soul and Fulci made damn sure that once we were done analyzing dysfunctions, more extreme violence would occur.

-mAQ

MURDER-ROCK: DANCING DEATH

Lucio Fulci (1984)

Scrawny negro breakdancers with butt tight jeans and gaily leaping multicultural dancers in unflattering black leotards and grey sweatpants are probably the last things you would associate with the gloriously grotesque giallos of Guido 'Godfather of Gore' Lucio Fulci (Don't Torture a Duckling, Zombi 2 aka Zombie), but near the mid 1980s the director made one of his most shameless attempts at commercial success by attempting to jump on the Flashdance (1983) bandwagon with his shockingly kitschy Americanized retrograde giallo-musical hybrid Murder-Rock: Dancing Death (1984) aka Murderock - Uccide a passo di danza aka Giallo a disco aka The Demon Is Loose, which was sometimes released under the alternate title 'Slashdance' for no reason. One of Fulci's first films following his arguably career-crashing split with his longtime collaborator, screenwriter Dardano Sacchetti (who was rather resentful that Fulci failed to let him in on the would-be-lucrative deal of working on the failed 1983 'sword and sandal' Conan the Barbarian rip-off Conquest), Murder Rock was apparently forced on the director by the monetary-motivated producer, hence its absolutely horrendous score by English keyboardist Keith Emerson of the dreaded pro-rock 'supergroup' Emerson, Lake & Palmer (ELP). Unquestionably, Fulci's somewhat misanthropic musical (virtually all the characters are bitter scumbags, including the ostensible 'good guys') is, upon a superficial glance, the sort of the film that you would think would appeal to preteen girls with big dreams of becoming dancers, as well as the most uncultivated of proletarian cocksuckers who like saying silly and sassy things like, "you go girl!" and other forms of lisp-addled linguistic savagery but, ultimately, the film will only probably appeal to Fulci completists, nihilistic aesthetes, and decidedly demented dudes who have a special fetish for 1980s girls with big stupid poufy hair, leotards, and spandex. Out of all of Fulci's films, Murder Rock is probably the only one that would more appeal to fans of camp than Fulciphiles and gorehounds. Indeed, the film has more dancing than death and less blood than an old school Universal Horror flick, but that does not mean it is not a stereotypical dirty 1980s dago affair that seems to slightly channel the seething hatred and moral retardation of gutter auteur Andy Milligan, albeit in a flashy and rampantly heterosexual Mediterranean sort of way (who knows, maybe being in NYC 'touched' Fulci the same way it did to mad sadomasochist Milligan).

Penned by semi-distinguished goombah screenwriter Gianfranco Clerici (Cannibal Holocaust, Fulci's The New York Ripper), Murder Rock is a glaringly uneven piece of deadly Dancesploitation that is easily one of the most visually pleasing films ever made as a work with ethereal dream-sequences and armies of scantily clad young blonde beauties, yet it is drastically despoiled by its audience-degrading score and lack of Fulci-esque gore. Indeed, to think that Fulci hailed from the land of Italo-disco and could have probably easily included tracks like "Faces" by Clio and countless Cyber People songs instead of Emerson's enraging audio excrement makes the film all the more of a cinematic tragedy, as it could have just as easily been an idiosyncratic masterpiece of murderous Italo-excess. The would-be wild-and-whimsical 'whodunit?' tale of a mysterious mad man (or in this case, woman) who begins randomly killing off the best dancers of a prestigious dance school with the rather ironic name "Arts For Living Center," Murder Rock is an inexplicable abortion of a movie that somehow manages to be reasonably entertaining due to its undying kitsch character, understated performance by Anglo-Guido leading man Ray Lovelock (Plagio, Let Sleeping Corpses Lie) and marvelously misogynistic conclusion that puts the movie misogyny of Dario Argento to shame. Arguably Fulci's very last ambitious film as a work created right after his relationship with screenwriter Sacchetti concluded somewhat bitterly and just before the director developed critical health issues (right after finishing the film, Fulci was hospitalized in NYC after become critically ill from hepatitis, only to become hospitalized again the same year for cirrhosis and spend most of 1985 recuperating at home, only to become plagued by diabetes-based illnesses in 1986), Murder Rock gives you a good idea where the goombah goremeister might have headed artistically had he not spent the rest of his career churning out pathetically directed low-budget celluloid bile like Il fantasma di Sodoma (1988) aka Sodoma's Ghost and Demonia (1990) aka Liza.

MURDER-ROCK: DANCING DEATH

Opening with a flashy scene of little negroes breakdancing in a jubilant fashion juxtaposed with shots of NYC as if to absurdly insinuate that the rotten Big Apple is such a nice and happy place that people just dance around all the time due to a pleasant plague of perennial happiness that has engulfed the superlatively shitty city, Murder Rock then cuts to a show of a group of girl dancers entering a high-tech building called the "Arts For Living Center" where they soon dance their asses off for their bitchy buxom brunette overseer Candice Norman (Greek actress Olga Karlatos of Fulci's Zombie, as well as more mainstream works like the 1984 Prince musical Purple Rain and Sergio Leone's 1984 Jewish gangster epic Once Upon a Time in America) and their negress choreographer Margie (Geretta Marie Fields aka Geretta Geretta of Lamberto Bava's 1985 hit Demons aka Dèmoni). When the dancers stop dancing cunt Candice bitches them out and tells them their routine "needs perfecting." Indeed, unbeknownst to the dancers, the academy director Dick Gibson (Claudio Cassinelli of Massimo Dallamano's highbrow giallo What Have They Done to Your Daughters? (1974) aka La polizia chiede aiuto), who is also banging Candice and probably some of the dancers, is in talks with two TV producers, some assumed Hebrew named Steiner and his shabbos goy bud, about hiring the three best dancers to be on an upcoming TV show. Of course, Candice is jealous of these dancers' talents just as she is jealous that her sleazy bastard beau Dick might be putting his dick in one or two of them. The students also hate Candice, with one of the few male dancers, Willy Stark (Christian Borromeo of Ruggero Deodato's 1980 classic House on the Edge of the Park), stating of her to his dancing comrades, "You think it would kill her to be happy just once." Of course, little does Willy realize that Candice is a much bigger bitch than he ever could imagine.

One night, little Willy stays behind with his fuck buddy/fellow dancer, busty blonde Susan (A. Lemerman), after the dance academy closes so they can have some carnal fun together, but the fun ends before it even begins when someone violently attacks the little lady while she is in the shower, knocks her out with the old (and scientifically unsound) movie cliché of a rag covered with Chloroform, and drives a large needle into one of her tender wet tits, thus killing her. Needless to say, it seems that the high-tech security system at the dance academy is worthless, or else it is someone with access to it that is the one responsible for the killing. A majorly misanthropic and callously cynical NYPD Lieutenant named Borges (Cosimo Cinieri of Fulci's two 1982 NYC-based flicks The New York Ripper and Manhattan Baby), as well as a police profiler and psychotherapy professor named Dr. Davis (Giuseppe Mannajuolo of the 1988 pseudo-Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979) sequel Vampire in Venice starring Klaus Kinski) are brought in to solve the murder and they soon conclude that the killer is someone at the dance academy. When a second dancer, Janice (played by Carla Buzzanca, whose sole other film credit was Michelangelo Antonioni's obscure failed 1980 Cocteau adaptation The Mystery of Oberwald aka Il mistero di Oberwald), who moonlights as a degenerate dancer at an exotic erotic bar, is killed, Lt. Borges and Dr. Davis decide to interview some of the dancers and the former finds them so revolting in character that he states to the prissy little dancing prima donnas, "have you considered the possibility of some paranoid among you who hates dancers and has decided to do you all in? You know, I'll tell you all something.... He'd have my heartfelt approval." Dr. Davis is slightly more sympathetic to the degenerate dancing troupe and uses his cultivated background as a criminologist to label the dance academy a "viper's nest" as opposed to boorish cynic Borges, who describes it in a more frank manner by calling it a "school full of sons of bitches." When one of the male dancers, a blond bitch boy named Bert (Robert Gligorov of Michele Soavi's devilishly delightful debut feature StageFright: Aquarius (1987) aka Deliria), leaves an anonymous message for Dr. Davis calling him a "first class nerd" and threatening to kill again, Borges uses a voice analyst to identify him. When they bring in Bert for questioning, he acts like a sniveling little pompous shit and claims he killed Janice because, "She was a lousy Puerto Rican and I don't like spicks." Although Borges concludes that Bert is not the killer, he locks him up anyway so that he can be raped by swarthy untermenschen because the little shit pissed him off, stating, "You're not going to like spicks for a long time...you shouldn't have provoked me." What actually happens to Bert is anyone's guess, as he never reappears in the film.

MURDER-ROCK: DANCING DEATH

Meanwhile, Candice has a nightmare about an unnaturally pretty blond beauty (Ray Lovelock) coming after her with the same needle that killed the girl dancers. Not long after the ominous nightmare, Candice spots the same man, who turns out to be an ex-actor turned model named George Webb, on a giant billboard. After doing some research, she tracks down George's apartment and sneaks in after paying off a sleazy front desk attendant, but she is in for quite a surprise for the dipsomaniac model arrives and yells in a boorish manner, "Relax, lady...haven't you ever seen a drunk before?" so the startled dance teacher runs away and leaves her purse behind by accident. After meeting up with George to get her purse back, Candice confesses to him that she looked him up because she had a nightmare about him killing her. Needless to say, the two soon start a lurid love affair and jealous academy director Dick Gibson attempts to convince Borges and Dr. Davis that pretty boy George is the killer. As their love affair progresses, Candice reveals to George that her dancing career was ruined by a hit-n-run accident, explaining to him, "there I was ready to take on Broadway when some idiot on a motorcycle slams into me and ended my career before it even started." Naturally, things get a bit complicated when an elderly Chinaman with traditional chink garb and large chopsticks does a fortuneteller reading of George at a Chinese restaurant at Candice's insistence and accuses him of being a "muda-erer." Of course, things only get worse when Candice gets a call from a talent agent named Phil (played by director Lucio Fulci in a cute cameo role) who she had do a background on her new boyfriend and he reveals that George was the suspect in the murder of an underage girl that he was defiling.

As the film progresses, more dancers are killed and George seems more and more like the culpable suspect. At one point, black choreographer Margie also goes to kill Candice and frame the mysterious killer, out of jealousy, but she does not have the gall to execute the execution and director Dick eventually walks in on her. Director Dick also becomes a suspect after they find him with the corpse of one of the dancers, Jill, that he was banging and deeply in love with. Of course, Candice is no victim. In the end, Candice confronts George in the manager's room at the dance studio while he is watching footage of all the dead dancers and confesses that she is the killer and she has known all along that he is the motorcyclist that committed the hit-and-run that ruined her budding career. Jealous of all the young dancers and their very promising careers, Candice could not help killing the best of the best dancers and frame George for it. Since she already blames him for her figurative death and wants him to suffer the lifelong guilt of being a murderer, Candice begs George to kill her because he "has to pay," but he refuses to do it. Considering herself more or less 'metaphysically dead' ever since the hit-and-run accident ruined her career, Candice kills herself right in front of George with the needle hoping that he will be charged with the murder as she considers him a murderer. Luckily for George, Borges and Dr. Davis have already come to the conclusion that Candice is the killer. In the end, George is riddled with the guilt for ‘murdering’ Candice by destroying all her “hopes and ambitions.” In the end, the film closes with the following quote from the classic John Huston film noir flick Asphalt Jungle (1950): “Often crime is a distorted form of human endeavor.”

I might be the only one in the world that would have the balls to admit this, but I found Murder Rock to be one of Lucio Fulci’s most fun, unbelievable, and wildest films, even if it is a piece of blatant cheesy celluloid crapola with one of the most patently preposterous premises in film history. An excellent example of Fulci’s undying dedication to whoring himself out to producers for financial gain, it is only fitting that the work features a scene where the cynical lieutenant Borges—an arguable stand-in for the director himself—states as to the reason why one of the dancers, Bert, would falsely take credit for the murder, “Because he’s an artist. He’d sit on his mother’s head for a laugh. It’s like a disease, he’s a born liar [...] he’s an asshole [...] the kid’s an idiot, just another punk.” Indeed, in Murder Rock, Fulci—a perennial artisan who seems to never have had an interest in being a real cinematic artist—declares his hatred for the ‘artiste.’ Of course, Fulci is not just critical of ‘serious’ artists, as the film also blatantly attacks Bernaysian advertising and the sinister power of the ads and commercials to manipulate the psyche and plant ideas in a person’s subconscious (for example, the man of killer Candice’s nightmares first appears in the physical world in the form of a billboard). Ironically, unlike Dario Argento, who famously told the ballerinas starring in his masterpiece Suspiria (1977) that he couldn’t care less about their ballet talents, Fulci made full use of the talents of the performers with the help of choreographer Nadia Chiatti. Indeed, Murder Rock is certainly the Flashdance of giallos and is completely deserving of its alternate title Slashdance, as a decadent and Dancesploitation flick of strangely erotic deaths that perfectly epitomizes the nihilistic excess of the Reaganite 1980s. If you’re looking to contaminate someone’s Halloween spirit this year, show them Fulci’s misbegotten filmic freakshow and have them bask in the unintentionally schlocky splendor of sweaty 1980s spandex and hairsprayed to hell hair, as well as some of the most sickeningly banal and malevolently (anti)melodic synth sounds imaginable. Pseudo-Borgesian in its depiction of dark coincidences spawned from chaos, chaotic labyrinthine visuals and plot structure, and rabid cynicism (after all, one of the characters is named ‘Borges’), Murder Rock is a work that, although clearly made to appeal to the lowest common denominator (e.g. teenage breakdancers and braindead teenyboppers), will probably be more appreciated by misanthropic cinephiles, softcore cultural pessimists, and cultivated culture junkies. Murder Rock is also a great film to show to your lady friend because, aside from being rather misogynistic in its depiction of a crazed cunt who kills young blonde beauties out of jealousy, it also features some of the most titillating yet tit-terrorizing scenes in cinema history. Indeed, I know because I showed my girlfriend, who is rather ample in the bosom department, and she was absolutely scared stiff and discernibly unnerved by the scenes of the needle entering the forlorn dancer's big bare boobs. As for me, I was more petrified by the busty bosomed victim's big goofy legwarmers. As Murder Rock vulgarly demonstrates, if you want to take away attention from a voluptuous young blonde girl's dangerously curvy body, have her wear a pair of Flashdance-esque legwarmers.

MURDER-ROCK: DANCING DEATH

-Ty E

SODOMA'S GHOST

Lucio Fulci (1988)

Sodoma's Ghost or The Ghosts of Sodom is a rare Fulci film made in 1988 that has done nothing but collect dust. The story opens up inside a villa that was under Nazi power located in the middle of France. There were several Nazi's snorting cocaine and were involved in an orgy. Willie, played by Robert Egon, was walking around the room filming it going on. A drunken officer was playing pool with a passed out woman on the table. You can only imagine how that one goes. Right as he hits the middle pocket, we see stock footage of an air raid and with that whim, the building is destroyed. We then cut to 5 college students studying in France. After getting lost, they wind up at the Villa. After coming to the conclusion that it is isolated, they go around back and find a key under a conveniently placed door mat. Upon entering, they view a vividly red chamber with a fireplace, exquisite paintings, and a wine cellar that would make a grown man cry. They party it up then head to bed. At this time, one of the women has a dream that Willy appeared to them and seduced her in a masochistic manner. They wake up and attempt to leave, but no matter where they turn, they always end up back at the villa and because he has no lights, they cannot drive at night. They recede back into the villa only to find they are locked in and normal windows are unbreakable. They begin to start envisioning the ghosts of Nazi soldiers and whores one by one. Lucio Fulci is considered worldwide to be "The Godfather of Gore". With such a boasting title, he doesn't disappoint in this film. There is a rather violent scene in which a body melts and the rib cage begins to violently extrude. Robert Egon plays a wonderful role in this film and balances all elements of the film. He plays the pretty boy Nazi with sparkling eyes and blonde hair. He appears to be the ringleader ghost. Not only featuring a little bit of gore and bad acting, we are treated to a very tense and well set up Russian Roulette scene involving Willy and one of the students. For being a Fulci film, it deserves some credit. Several characters make scenes of this become hilarious. Meanwhile, the film does a impeccable job at drawing you in. It also features a lot of that esteemed nudity and a scene of lesbianism. You can actually feel Fulci behind the camera of this one. So far, I have only seen an all region version of this on xploitedcinema.com. I would say it was worth the price to pay. The only thing anybody should really have anything to complain about is the lack of gore and the ending. It is one of those endings that is extremely hokey and no one really wants to talk about. Sometimes I find myself denying that film even had an ending. An overall decent Fulci movie that exploits the natures of Nazi's and the skin of women.

-mAQ

A CAT IN THE BRAIN
A CAT IN THE BRAIN

Lucio Fulci (1990)

Although he directed a couple more films before his dubious death at the age 68 in early 1996 from complications relating to diabetes (some suspect he may have committed a sort of passive suicide by refraining from taking his medication), Guido 'Godfather of Gore' Lucio Fulci's late era effort A Cat in the Brain (1990) aka Nightmare Concert aka Nightmare Concert (A Cat in the Brain) aka Un gatto nel cervello is certainly his last decent work and acts as a sort of fitting conclusion to the director's roller-coaster-like career in celluloid carnage. A sort of highly reflexive yet rather ridiculous 'metafilm' in the autobiographical spirit of Federico Fellini's 8½ (1963), Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Beware of a Holy Whore (1971), François Truffaut's Day for Night (1973), Bob Fosse's All That Jazz (1979), Woody Allen's Stardust Memories (1980), Wes Craven's New Nightmare (1994), and Tom DiCillo's Living in Oblivion (1995), A Cat in the Brain is a work starring director Lucio Fulci as himself as a fallen old filmmaker that is having trouble differentiating between the unhinged ultra-violence scenes in his films and real-life, which some viewers might take as an admittance of guilt from the director in regard to making a moviemaking career out of the cinematically morbid and grotesque. Wallowing in wonderfully wicked Grand Guignol-esque dark humor, A Cat in the Brain, like the totally unwatchable Demonia (1990), was meant as a comeback film of sorts for Fulci, but highly disappointed his fans and was almost never actually released, yet since the over two decades since its initial release, the film has gone on to become regarded as a classic and even minor masterpiece among fans, hence its lavish release on DVD in 2009 by Bob Murawski and Sage Stallone's Grindhouse Releasing (a sort of 'Criterion Collection for horror flicks'). Arguably Fulci's most experimental yet simultaneously half-assed and gimmicky work, A Cat in the Brain has the curious quasi-conman distinction of being mostly assembled in post-production as a work largely comprised of clips from not only the filmmaker's previous (and largely inferior) works, including Il fantasma di Sodoma (1988) aka The Ghosts of Sodom aka Sodoma's Ghost, Touch of Death (1988) aka Quando Alice ruppe lo specchio, and Hansel e Gretel (1990), as well as music from the director's magnum opus The Beyond (1981) aka ...E tu vivrai nel terrore! L'aldilà, but also films directed by other Italian horror filmmakers. Indeed, on top of featuring clips from films Fulci directed, A Cat in the Brain also, quite absurdly, features excerpts from films that the filmmaker worked on in some other capacity (presenter, special effects, etc.) including Andrea Bianchi's Massacre (1989) aka La morte della medium, Mario Bianchi's Non aver paura della zia Marta (1988) aka Don't Be Afraid of Aunt Martha, and Leandro Lucchetti's Bloody Psycho (1989). In part shot at Rome's Cinecittà Studios—the studio of Italian master auteur Federico Fellini—A Cat in the Brain is a sort of 'Fulci's worst hits' that manages to combine some of the best segments from the director's greatest and most embarrassing cinematic failures, thus saving fans of the 'Godfather of Gore' the trouble of having to watch these absolutely horrendous horror hatchet jobs in their seemingly endless entirety. A totally trashy yet equally charming self-denigrating work where Lucio Fulci—a man who started out as a director of comedies and who tackled virtually every film genre, but only found success in gore and guts drenched giallo and zombie horror flicks—comes to terms with the fact that he made a minor monetary killing off celluloid killings and thus must live with that fact, but also someone who has been pigeonholed as a director of horror/gore/giallo and has been condemned to a genre ghetto.

Dr. Lucio Fulci (Fulci as essentially himself, or at least as how his fans see him) is an ex-medical doctor (Fulci indeed studied medicine in college, before becoming an art critic and eventually a filmmaker) who has just wrapped up the day's shooting for his latest half-ass horror flick Touch of Death (1988) starring Brett Halsey at Cinecittà Studios and he is rather hungry for steak as an Italian man of refined tastes, but when he goes to eat at his favorite restaurant, he has a traumatic flashback from a grizzly cannibal scene he shot earlier that day, so he leaves the eatery on an empty stomach. The next day is no different as Fulci loses his cool on his movie set upon examining the special effects, forcing a film technician to remove a plate of gazing animal eyeballs out of his decidedly distorted sight. After coming home from an exhausting day of work and attempting to sleep, Fulci is rudely awakened by a funny fellow sawing wood with a chainsaw, thus causing the filmmaker to have flashbacks about his latest conspicuously craven cinematic chainsaw craziness. In a fit of rage, Fulci pseudo-sinisterly storms outside and smashes a bunch of paint cans with an axe, thus causing red paint to pour out that reminds him of his metaphysically macabre masterpiece The Beyond (1981). Luckily, Fulci discovers that his neighbor, Professor Egon Swartz (David L. Thompson), is a Jewish psychoanalyst that bears a strikingly resemblance to Sigmund Freud (as Fulci revealed in an interview, he thought Freud was a charlatan who stole his idea of 'confession' from the Catholics) who takes on the filmmaker as a patient, recommending that he begin, "breaking down the barrier, the boundary between what you film and what's real" as a means of eradicating his perturbing celluloid-induced psychosis. Of course, Fulci's problems are compounded by the fact that he is directing two films at the same time, Il fantasma di Sodoma (1988) aka The Ghosts of Sodom and Touch of Death (1988), and that his prick producer Filippo (Shilet Angel) wants him to pick up the pace, even at the sacrifice of artistic integrity. In preparation for a scene for his negligently assembled Nazisploitation flick The Ghosts of Sodom, Fulci tells the young actor playing a SS officer, Robert Egon (who looks a lot like Justin Bieber!), that he is "a symbol of death...And you've also the whole horror of the Nazis," but the scene he shoots comes off looking about as sinister as a Jess Franco flick and the filmmaker mutters to himself, "Sadism, Nazism; is there any point any more?," thus demonstrating his disillusionment with degenerate exploitation sleaze that was already done before and better by Liliana Cavani with The Night Porter (1974) and Tinto Brass with Salon Kitty (1976). After spotting a tall German Aryaness reporter (notably, during the mid 1970s, Fulci was engaged to a German woman who eventually ran off and stole all his money, leaving him nearly bankrupt), Fulci has a nasty vision from The Ghosts of Sodom and flips out, ultimately running amok and smashing the TV crew's camera and even attempting to rip the Teutonic babe's clothes off. Of course, Fulci's worst problems have yet to begin.

A CAT IN THE BRAIN

Naturally, Fulci goes back to Professor Swharz, who in the meantime has viewed all of his patient's films and who puts the filmmaker under hypnosis and states, "You'll do everything I tell you when you hear this sound. Your mind will make you live scenes you think are real. You will slowly be possessed by madness. You'll think you've committed terrible crimes," thus revealing that he is not a saintly soul-doctor, but a Svengali-like psychopathic sadist with a lurid lust for blood who is an even bigger crackpot than Wilhelm Reich. Somehow via hypnosis-activating remote control buzzer device, Swharz is now able to transmit his thoughts to Fulci and plans to frame the filmmaker for a serial killing spree he has planned out. Fulci fails to remember what happened during his session with the deadly doc, but Swharz certainly does and subsequently kills a prostitute, for which the filmmaker wrongly thinks he is responsible upon arriving at the scene of the crime. Meanwhile, Fulci's car breaks down on the way to a film shoot and when he finally gets there, he finds that his producer Filippo and assistant director have already started without him, thus taking over his power as auteur without his consent. Naturally, after having such horrendous and horror-cliché-ridden visions, Fulci goes home to relax, but is once again plagued by scenes from his creepy celluloid past. Of course, Swharz continues to kill, which includes a young couple and a poor groundskeeper who witness the killing, and after Fulci arrives at the scene of the crimes, he takes the blame while the prof hides in the background. On his way back home, Fulci hallucinates he runs over a hitchhiker in a hallucination of a scene from Touch of Death, which puts him over the edge to the point where when he gets home, the director attempts to make a 'full confession' to the police, but luckily a certain Inspector Gabrielli (Jeffrey Kennedy) is on vacation. After failing to get real psychological help from Swharz, Fulci goes by Inspector Gabrielli's home, where he witnesses the good cop's family being brutally butchered and dismembered, but it is just another horror flick inspired hallucination caused by the professor. Eventually, Swharz strangles his nagging wife, who is arguably the source of his homicidal proclivities, to death with a piano wire, nearly decapitating her in the process. Afterward, Swharz once again follows Fulci and causes him to have nightmarish visions, eventually causing the filmmaker to faint in an open field. The next day, Fulci learns that Inspector Gabrielli's men caught Swharz redhanded and shot him dead, thus vindicating the filmmaker of the heinous crimes. Flash forward several months later, Fulci is shooting his latest film 'Nightmare Concert' and in the end he sails off with his leading lady (whose body parts were shown previously in a basket, with her dismembered fingers hanging from fishing hooks), but not before bidding a farewell to not only his film crew, but also to fans in what is his last 'great' film.

Described by the director's daughter Antonella Fulci as being her "best beloved enemy" aka filmmaker father's cinematic realization of "his juvenile dream of being Peter Lorre in Fritz Lang's "M" for 20 seconds over the flute of Grieg's "Peer Gynt"," A Cat in the Brain is not only in many ways the Godfather of Gore's most personal work, but also his funniest and most eccentrically entertaining as a sort of fittingly superficial autobiography from a once serious filmic artist who ironically became famous directing some of the most exploitative and gratuitous gore flicks ever made, only to have his career and success degenerate just as quickly as it had risen, sort of like one of the zombies from his films. As someone who considers myself a softcore Fulci fan whose longstanding yet undoubtedly wavering interest in Italian horror and exploitation fan is largely nostalgic, A Cat in the Brain is sort of 'fanboy' (I hate to use this word!) guilty pleasure that reminds me why I started loving artistically meritless Guido gore flicks in the first place. The fact that Fulci was able to haphazardly churn out one more masterpiece, A Cat in the Brain, on a meager budget of around $100,000 using recycled celluloid sleaze from the lowest point in his career just goes to show that he was no mindless moron who was totally unconscious of his lot in life, but a keenly conscious fellow who had a nasty knack for using his weaknesses to his advantage, hence how he eventually found his niche as a 'thee gore godfather' in the first place as an eclectic filmmaker who failed in virtually every other film genre he worked in. A work where Fulci cannibalized his own films and those of lesser filmmakers to bring new life to cinema conventions he not only pioneered, but also helped to kill by 'beating to death' one-too-many times, A Cat in the Brain is ultimately a sort of undead celluloid epitaph that offers more laughs than screams and tears. Indeed, concluding with Fulci sailing away on a yacht named "Perversion" (a reference to the filmmaker's proto-Basic Instinct erotic giallo Perversion Story (1969) aka Una sull'altra), A Cat in the Brain is undoubtedly the best way for his fans to remember him, as a swarthy old little man whose humble appearance acted in stark contrast to his mastery of the cinematically grotesque and bedding much younger ladies. Of course, if nothing else, A Cat in the Brain is the film where Fulci demonstrates once and for all that, at least to some degree, he really was an artist and not merely a mindless artisan with a curious craft, and for that reason alone, the film is mandatory viewing for anyone that loves the art of filmmaking, degenerate or otherwise.

-Ty E

HALLUCINATION STRIP
HALLUCINATION STRIP

Lucio Marcaccini (1975)

Maybe it's because I am not an old hippie or young hipster, but I have always found Bud Cort (Brewster McCloud, The Life Aquatic With Steve Zissou) and his one-note adult-baby quirkiness to be an intolerable bore and his role in Hal Ashby's Harold and Maude (1971) is one of the most overrated in all of cinema history, though I must give the actor some credit for being rather adventurous in terms of choosing the roles he played, ranging from the eponymous protagonist in the never-released Hitlerite comedy Son of Hitler (1978) to portraying a low-camp Freud alongside Klaus Kinski in The Secret Diary of Sigmund Freud (1984) to the voice of a talking computer in Electric Dream (1984). Undoubtedly, one of the most bizarre and absurdly against-type roles ever played by Cort was as an antique-thieving and drug-dealing far-left student revolutionary in the somewhat obscure and rather idiosyncratic Italian poliziottesco-psychedelic hybrid Roma drogata: la polizia non può intervenire (1975) aka Hallucination Strip aka Allucinating Trip directed by and co-written by one-time auteur Lucio Marcaccini (whose only other film work involved working as an assistant director on a couple films, most notably Vittorio De Sica's Academy Award winning work Il Giardino dei Finzi-Contini (1970) aka The Garden of the Finzi-Continis) and co-penned by Fulci collaborator Vincenzo Mannino (The New York Ripper, Murder-Rock: Dancing Death). A considerably convoluted work that manages to be simultaneously artsy and trashy, anti-bourgeois and anti-communist, and anti-drug and LSD-ridden, Hallucination Strip is a peculiar piece of oftentimes kaleidoscopic celluloid counter-culture chaos featuring a rich pansy momma's boy receiving a bath from his momma and maid, perennial baby-face dork Bud Cort pretending to be a ballsy neo-bolshevik bad ass, bourgeois communist scum protesting about the bourgeois and having to read salacious works by Gabriele D'Annunzio in high school, and a swarthy middle-aged Sicilian as the biggest and most ruthless dope-pusher in Rome. Featuring a shockingly well done and over-extended LSD dream-sequence of the orgasmic Oedipal sort that climaxes with an exceedingly effete young nobleman leaping to his death prematurely after having a rather bad yet beautiful trip that would make Freud's panties wet, Hallucination Strip is sleekly surreal style over substance that reminds one why—for better or worse—LSD creator Albert Hofmann probably had the greatest unintentional influence on cinema and literature. A philistine equivalent to Liliana Cavani's I Cannibali (1970) aka The Year of the Cannibals and Luchino Visconti's Gruppo di famiglia in un interno (1974) aka Conversation Piece as directed by the half-braindead bastard son of Fernando Di Leo and Carmelo Bene, Hallucination Strip is surely the sort of aesthetically whimsical artsploitation that could have only been made in 1970s Italy.

Petite man-boy Massimo Monaldi (But Cort) is a would-be-cool-guy with a fast motorcycle who thinks having Trotsky-esque facial hair makes him some sort of chic revolutionary when in reality he is nothing more than a petty high school criminal whose most audacious form of political activism is complaining to the teachers at his high school about having to read the decadent prose of D'Annunzio and the poor conditions of hospitals. Due to his self-stylized counter-culture rock-star-commie persona, Massimo is hated by his friend's exceedingly wealthy parents, which is no surprise since he is an immoral thief who steals from his comrades' families, not to mention the fact he feeds his pals drugs. Indeed, in an absurd plan to ostensibly fund a trip for both himself and his yagdigging friends to go to the 'fabulous Orient,' Massimo steals a 17th century French antique snuffbox from the rich prick father of his girlfriend Cinzia Roldi (Annarita Grapputo). Needless to say, Cinzia's father calls the cops as the snuffbox is apparently worth millions and soon Massimo finds himself being watched by a semi-Serpico-like cop (he supports 'free joint') named De Stefani (played by Marcel Bozzuffi, who is probably best known for playing Pierre Nicoli in The French Connection). Massimo has a pansy would-be-poet mama's boy friend named Rudy (Settimio Segnatelli whose only other film role was starring alongside lapsed Warhol star Joe Dallesandro in Il tempo degli assassini (1975) aka Season for Assassins) who is a bit of an eccentric fellow as both his Madre (Eva Czemerys) and maid give him baths as if he were a helpless newborn baby. Indeed, Rudy is the kind of socially retarded dude who cannot so much as walk without looking absurdly autistic. Massimo attempts to sell the snuffbox to Rudy, but he is saving his money for a 'liberation rite' aka party where he and a bunch of friends will have a drug orgy of sorts. Of course, Rudy wants Massimo to procure the dope and LSD.

While Massimo is initially skeptical about getting Rudy dope for his hip 'happening,' he finally gives in after his friend makes the following rather melodramatic and even hysterical plea, "This party isn't a whim at all. It can bring a magical moment in my life. In closing an absurd existence I'll begin to live at last. The thing is all the time now I'm obsessed with a doubt. It's insidious like an illness... That is I'll never be able to live my own life. I'll have to stop this absurd existence or I might as well jump off the top floor." Ironically, it will ultimately be the drugs that inspire Rudy to jump out of his window. To get drugs for Rudy, Massimo gets involved with an unsavory and equally swarthy fellow who goes by the name 'The Sicilian' (Maurizio Arena), who has a hitman (Leopoldo Trieste, who appeared in small roles in big films like Don't Look Now (1973) and The Godfather: Part II (1974)) that is leaving bodies around Rome. Though Massimo manages to get rid of the snuffbox and get the drugs in what seems like a win-win transaction in his deals with the Sicilian, little does he realize this tradeoff will ultimately create an intricate web of death and conspiracy. Needless to say, when Rudy gets high on LSD, dreams of lizard people and having sex with his mother, and inevitably jumps to his death from his balcony,

HALLUCINATION STRIP

Massimo faces trouble from both 'good cop' De Stefani and the Sicilian, not to mention the fact that his girlfriend is institutionalized. Indeed, De Stefani, who goes against his commander's orders in terms of investigating the dope-dealing business, uses Massimo to get to the Sicilian. To De Stefani's chagrin, he finds the Sicilian dead, as he hopes to use the dealer to get to the mob. De Stefani also learns that the mob wants to kill Massimo, but things may be too late.

While Hallucination Strip is unquestionably a celluloid mess it sorts, it is also a relatively entertaining and aesthetically pleasing mess that is certainly worthy repeat viewings. In a recent interview with the film editor Giulio Berruti (who is best known as the director of Suor Omicidi (1979) aka Killer Nun starring Anita Ekberg and Joe Dallesandro), he revealed that Hallucination Strip director Lucio Marcaccini was a sort of indecisive 'anti-auteur' who had no idea what he was doing and essentially allowed everyone else on the film crew to help guide him to directing the film. Indeed, as Berruti explained regarding Marcaccini, "He was rather short, with a kind of Charlie Chaplin moustache. He was very thin and had very meek eyes. But he didn't seem to be the director of the movie. He seemed he just happened to be there by chance. There were the gaffer, the assistant director, the lead actor, the extras, the secretary; all of them were telling him how he should work. And he tried to follow everyone's advice before starting shooting a scene." Hallucination Strip star Patrizia Gori was so unaffected by working with Marcaccini that she did not even remember being directed by him (!), or as she stated herself, "Honestly, I don't remember the director because he was a newcomer, and I don't think he did other things later." Regardless, someone was responsible for directing a number of fantastic dream-sequences in Hallucination Strip that rival some of the best surrealist scenarios ever directed by the likes of Alain Robbe-Grillet and Carmelo Bene. In its use of psychedelic body paint on slender statuesque bodies, Hallucination Strip also reminded me of melancholy arthouse effort Veruschka: Poetry of a Woman (1971) starring German supermodel Veruschka von Lehndorff and Lucio Fulci's psychedelic psychosexual giallo A Lizard in a Woman's Skin (1971), but such aesthetics were characteristic of that drug-addled period of heightened consciousness. Of course, narcotic-inspired Marxist politics were also in fashion in that time, but luckily Hallucination Strip portrays the student activists as misguided hypocrites who, despite being rich and pampered, complain the world is an unfair place full of big mean fascists who keep the working man down. In the end, virtually all of the main hippie degenerates are either dead or have ruined their lives, thus making Hallucination Strip a sort of pseudo-moralistic cautionary tale that criticizes the very people the film was made for, thus making it an archetypical work of Guido celluloid sleaze. Featuring a mostly highly complementary score by marginal Italian composer Alberto Verrecchia (who, like many people in the film, also worked on Il tempo degli assassini aka Season for Assassins that is unfortunately degraded by a token hippie gospel song entitled "We Got a Lord”, Hallucination Strip is undoubtedly a work of its zeitgeist, which is thankfully long gone.

-Ty E

DEVIL'S PLAYGROUND
DEVIL'S PLAYGROUND

Lucy Walker (2002)

I happened to catch Peter Weir's Witness the other night starring Harrison Ford, who is easily one of the most overrated and emotionally dead of actors ever to walk the candy ass halls of the Hollywood studio system. Witness got me thinking about the Amish and their commitment to a life of banality where pride is sinful and where collective conformity is a must. In Witness, director Peter Weir makes the Amish seem like a bunch of pacifistic yet noble folk who have no time for lollygagging. Unlike the rest of the German-Americans (who make up the largest ethnic group in the USA) that immigrated to the United States, the Amish have retained their native German tongue, at least for church and other special occasions. When I saw the Devil's Playground, a 2002 documentary about the Amish rite of passage Rumspringa (where the Amish leave their homes at age 16 to decide whether they want to be baptized in the Amish church), sitting on a public library shelf not long after seeing Witness, I felt that cinematic fate caught me in a way. Despite featuring an Amish girl smoking a cigarette on the cover, little did I realize I would be watching a film about 16 year Amish teens dealing and doing crystal meth on top of banging ugly "English" chicks with greasy zit-covered pizzafaces. Despite the somewhat poor production values of the documentary, Devil's Playground would turn out to be a revelation of sorts. I guess growing up in the United States and watching trash cable TV just like everyone else, I did not realize how criminally dangerous the material was. Of course, I noticed a good percentage of the kids I knew growing up would watch untermensch Rap videos and decide (sub)consciously to adopt the linguistic styles of ill-literate Negroes. It was also obvious that pseudo-rebellious idealistic teens would become pro-gay marriage and pro-illegal immigration because they would be told they were evil racists (gotta love wearing that "Good Guy Badge") if they thought otherwise. To put it simply, it was very obvious to me in my younger years that TV was poison and that it turned people into slaves with their own personal mental-gulag, more so than any fascist or communist government ever could. Not until I saw Devil's Playground did I realize how fast the virus of TV and "pop culture" could spread to a TV-Virgin, someone naïve and unfamiliar with the degenerate ways of the internationalist "American" media. Faron is the main subject of Devil's Playground and it did not take him long to get hooked on Crystal Meth after leaving his Amish life for Rumspringa. Although he may be as skinny as a Holodomor survivor, Faron is one of the top teenagers in his Amish community. His father is an Amish preacher and Faron knows how to quote from the good book better than anyone he knows. When he leaves for the world of the "English" (the non-Amish world), he starts quoting Tupac and speaking with a Negroid speech impediment. All of his fellow Amish buds idolize Faron and also start parroting his new MTV-inspired ill-literate-lingo. Faron is no doubt completely naïve to the complete and utter degradation of American society. Like a person of honor and virtue, he probably expected those things of popularity, like in his own Amish community, to be of the most highest moral standards. Due to his life of being “sheltered” by discipline and morality, he has no defense against the decay of the “west.” In our mixed-up and backwards American world, the person that would come out on top in the Amish world, ends up being the most criminal of all, selling Crystal Meth just to support his $100.00 a day habit while strutting around in his much beloved Wal-Mart baggy threads.

Fortunately for the Amish, there is about a 90% retention rate of those young people that decide to stay in the community. Personally, I would never want to be Amish but I can certainly say that the Amish people are better off in their small world of family and serious commitment. Modern America is full of vices that are constantly put in people’s faces via Television with the intent of enslaving the individual. I can’t count the times I have had to hear every moron I know verbally regurgitate the same stupid Hollywood comedy line over and over again yet never realize their Hollywood induced psychosis. Devil’s Playground is almost a religious documentary in the sense that it truly shows the hellish world America has become even if one were to step into American “culture” and “society” just for a second. The mark of the cultural Marxist beast is libel to be ingrained forever.

-Ty E

SS HELL CAMP
SS HELL CAMP

Luigi Batzella (1977)

Soiled Sinema is no stranger to the concept of Nazi exploitation, or also "Nazisploitation". In these films we find solace in gratuitous sexual violence and inexplicable tortures. In theory, they're the equivalent of your average exploitation film or cult horror. It's in the political vein that the film loses the label of your average trash piece. SS Hell Camp or rather, The Beast in Heat is one of the original video nasties directed by Italian Luigi Batzella. When directing a film, one injects his own influences and voices his/her opinions. Directing is among the most artistically pleasing careers (or hobbies) with many directions to branch. As Jan Svankmajer calmly explained, art is all but dead. I'd have to agree with this assumption for the most part. There's no reason to indicate an artistic movement of the new millennium and there's only reasons to look back. With SS Hell Camp, Batzella pursued her own ethnic goals and decided to cast an all Italian cast complete with Nazi uniforms that don't fit. We're all familiar with the gross exaggerations of World War II. The theory of an Aryan "superman" is attempted in this film by our lead villain, Dr. Ellen "Not Ilsa" Kratsch. In her failed evil Nazi experimentation, a synthetic pink goo is injected into a man to create a rabid Neanderthal rapist whose own instincts are fuck & kill, mostly like man, but a bit more primitive. Even for an idea to up the ante of sexual violence, this disastrous addition is considered the main obstacle, but only appears for a total of 6 minutes screen time (estimated). Now down to the only real highlights this film has; violence. To be a special effects wiz, now there's an achievement. Many can get by but few can master the art of practical effects. For every horror film, there are three more videos on how to create your own personal blend of fake blood, mostly by using Karo syrup and food coloring. SS Hell Camp has some of the progressively worse special effects I've ever seen. Close shots to obviously fake nails being plucked off, not out. On terms of spectacle, SS Hell Camp has none. Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS has castration, heavy themes of feminism, and hatred for men all going for it. The film is the icon of Nazisploitation for a reason. It's one thing to be a valid attempt at creating sleaze, but when the sleaze itself is not the film contents, but the film making? That's a true problem. This is a laughable and cowardly attempt at creating something offensive.

-mAQ

WITCHCRAFT '70

Luigi Scattini (1970)

Witchcraft '70 is a "documentary" in the tradition of the Mondo Cane films on the evil stuff like witchcraft and Satanism. The documentary claims to capture real blasphemous rituals for the entertainment of the audience. Unsurprisingly, the documentary is full of beaten to death moral commentary and a variety of ad hominem attacks against the terrible heretics. The height of Witchcraft '70's appeal is an appearance by Church of Satan founder Satan LaVey. Evil stuff here! Witchcraft '70 features interviews with a cop about young people involved with Satanism and its effects on his jurisdiction. The well-mannered officer tells of ritualistic animal killings and Satanists on LSD. I got the feeling from the cop's commentary that he just wanted to tie the Satanists to the animal killings. The cop also seemed to think dirty hippies and Satanists are one in the same. Apparently he has not read the writing of Anton LaVey. As can be expected, Witchcraft '70 features many scenes of nude satanic ritual. The documentary justifies the appearance of exploitative nudity in the film by showing that the participants are "openly evil." I especially liked how the Witchcraft '70 narrator seemed to really have it out for the British devil worshipers. The narrator surely has no respect for those individuals that want to fall in the footsteps of Aleister Crowley. The lowest part in the documentary is when a group of naked Negroes become seriously engaged in evil rituals. These individuals seem to be the most believing bunch featured in Witchcraft '70. Aside from a few drugged-out visual effects and its unintentionally comical, blatantly exploitative nature, Witchcraft '70 doesn't offer much. It was even a somewhat painful experience. During the documentary's conclusion, a group of stoned hippies listen to shitty rock music and start molesting a girl. Although this may sound hilarious, it was actually quite boring. The narrator attempts to liven the mood of the content of Witchcraft '70 but fails embarrassingly throughout.

-Ty E

UN CHIEN ANDALOU
UN CHIEN ANDALOU

Luis Buñuel (1929)

Unquestionably, seeing the Spanish surrealist short Un Chien Andalou (1929) aka An Andalusian Dog during an intro to film course over a decade ago was a life changing experience for me, not least of all because it proved to me that cinema had always been a subversive art with seemingly unlimited aesthetic and thematic potential, which was in total contrast to everything I expected from cinema up until that point. Indeed, as someone who grew up like virtually all Americans watching the absurdly priced and mechanically manufactured celluloid products of Hollywood, Un Chien Andalou made me realize that, in a way, cinema had died in its infancy because if such nonlinear and iconoclastic work was created over $\frac{3}{4}$ a century ago, one could only imagine how cinema would have advanced if America and its culture-distorting cuckolded allies were not defecating artless swill around the world in an imperialist manner. Directed and co-written by Spanish surrealist master auteur Luis Buñuel (The Exterminating Angel, The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie) and co-written by Salvador Dalí before he 'sold out' and earned the nickname "Avida Dollars" (an anagram of the alpha-surrealist name that translates to "eager for dollars"), Un Chien Andalou, despite being a short film under 20 minutes with an intentionally incoherent and nonsensical plot, stands today as one of the most influential, important, and revolutionary celluloid works ever made as a work that not only predates the poetic celluloid surrealism of Jean Cocteau and acted as the prototype for every film Alejandro Jodorowsky would direct, but also a work the manages to offend, shock, and disgust after all of these years. Opening with a scene of a flapper-like chick having her eye slit open with a straight razor thus causing gooey vitreous humour to drain out of her severed peeper (Buñuel would later confess he used a real dead calf's eye), Un Chien Andalou lets the viewer know straight from the get go that it is a film meant to attack the viewer both viscerally and spiritually, with auteur Buñuel later writing regarding the film, "Nothing, in the film symbolizes anything. The only method of investigation of the symbols would be, perhaps, psychoanalysis." A high-class piece of delightful celluloid degeneracy with a decidedly unrelenting dream logic, Un Chien Andalou was cleverly concocted by Dalí and Buñuel as an aesthetic assault against the young wine-sniffing bourgeoisie, with the latter later confessing regarding the film's place in history, "Historically, this film represents a violent reaction against what at that time was called 'avantgarde cine,' which was directed exclusively to the artistic sensibility and to the reason of the spectator." Unfortunately, Buñuel underestimated the decadence and nihilism of the cultivated French middle class as they loved Un Chien Andalou, which the director had mixed feelings about, stating, "What can I do about the people who adore all that is new, even when it goes against their deepest convictions, or about the insincere, corrupt press, and the inane herd that saw beauty or poetry in something which was basically no more than a desperate impassioned call for murder?" A work that inspired surrealist movement leader André Breton to invite both Dalí and Buñuel to become members of the iconoclastic art movement thereupon making them the first filmmakers officially welcomed to the ranks of surrealism, Un Chien Andalou was, more importantly, the arrival of a new cinematic language and universe that declared Europa had lost its sanity and art had lost its meaning as a nasty and nonsensical celluloid work that uses Richard Wagner's "Prelude and Liebestod" from the opera Tristan und Isolde as a sick joke.

Opening with the title card "Once Upon a Time," Un Chien Andalou then cuts to a man with slicked back hair played by Luis Buñuel sharpening a razor and then slitting the eye of a young woman (Simone Mareuil) with said razor appearing as a cloud glides by the moon in a similar manner. After the eyeball releases more than just tears, a title card appears reading "Eight Years Later," and a young man (Pierre Batcheff) in semi-drag nun garb, peddles down the city street, but falls over on a curb, which is witnessed by the same woman who had her eye slit (her eye is magically still in place), who rushes to his aid and attempts to revive him by sweetly kissing the stranger. For whatever reason, the helpful young woman arranges the young man's nun clothing on the bed in her apartment. Apparently, the bike accident was rather brutal as the young man has ants crawling out of a hole in his hand ("ants in the palms" is a French phrase meaning "itching to kill"). Meanwhile, an androgynous drag king with a dyke cut pokes at a decapitated hand with a stick outside as police and a growing crowd circle around her. A gentlemanly police officer picks up the hand and puts it into a box for the boyish broad, but she gets so happy that she forgets that she is standing in oncoming traffic and is killed instantly after being ran over by a car. The whole event seems to rather excite the bike boy as he begins fondling the bosoms and buttocks of the young lady that previously came to his aid. Unfortunately, the young man is cockblocked after he picks up two ropes and is forced to pull two grand pianos containing dead and rotting jackass corpses, stone tablets containing the Ten Commandments, and two discernibly perturbed priests (played by Jaime Miravilles and Salvador Dalí), all of which are somehow attached to the ropes in the small apartment, and the young woman subsequently escapes after trapping the lad's hand, which is once again covered with ants, in a door. After leaving the apartment, the young woman finds the young man, who is once again sporting nun drag, sleeping in a bed like a baby. After another title card appears reading "Around Three In the Morning," another young man appears (also played by Pierre Batcheff) and heckles the young man laying in the bed for sporting nun drag garb, so after another title card appears reading "Sixteen Years Before," the lunatic lover of holy female clothing shoots and kills his heckler. Somehow the second young man is transported to a scenic meadow, where he drops dead on the unclad Venus-like body of a young lady that also magically appears out of nowhere. After the second young man's corpse is carried away by a group of men, the young lady reappears in her apartment and spots a sinister The Silence of the Lambs-esque Death's-head Hawkmoth on the wall and the first young man sneers at her and subsequently wipes his mouth away with his hand, thus making it disappear. In her defense, the young lady puts some lipstick on and the young man responds by magically transporting her bushy armpit hair to where his mouth once was. Irked by the young man's nasty armpit hair fetish, the young woman exits the apartment while sticking her tongue out at her would-be-suitor and finds herself inexplicably walking on a beach instead of the street where she meets a third young man who courts her by walking arm-in-arm with her. Whilst strolling on the beach, the two new lovers find the torn nun garb and the couple lives happily ever after, or so one would hope. Instead, a final title card appears reading "In Spring..." and Un Chien Andalou concludes rather abruptly and cynically with the lovers buried to their waste in sand and assumedly dead.

UN CHIEN ANDALOU

Featuring pansy priests being pulled by nooses, murderous molester men dressed in nun outfits, and various scenarios of sexual sadism and bloodlust, Un Chien Andalou may not make any sense, but it is certainly a certifiably sacrilegious celluloid work that wickedly (if not playfully so!) wallows in the sort of aggressive yet absurdist atheism that auteur Luis Buñuel would become revered for. Ultimately, Un Chien Andalou had many notable admirers, including the French aristocratic couple Viscount Charles and Marie-Laure de Noailles, who offered to finance a sequel to the film that would inevitably be released as L'Age d'or (1930) aka The Golden Age. Originally titled La Bête andalouse and set to be the same length as Un Chien Andalou, L'Age d'or ultimately had a 63 minute running time (as opposed to the less than 20 minute running time of the previous film) and was mainly the result of Buñuel's efforts as he had a famous falling out with Dalí and finally took it upon himself to develop a cinematic technique as opposed to relying on mere Dadaist diletantism. Ultimately, L'Age d'or was withdrawn (which lasted over 40 years) by the Noailles family after being banned by the Paris Prefect of Police and being described in a Spanish right-wing newspaper as, "...the most repulsive corruption of our age ... the new poison which Judaism, Masonry, and rabid, revolutionary sectarianism want to use in order to corrupt the people." Undoubtedly, both Un Chien Andalou and L'Age d'or are decidedly degenerate works that are quite symptomatic of the cultural, aesthetic, and spiritual decline of the Occident as works in league with Freudian psychoanalysis, bolshevism, antagonistic anti-Christian atheism, and anti-classicalism, yet the aesthetic potency of these works transcends the political sentiments of their creators as these pioneering works of cinema history have gone on to influence everyone from Kenneth Anger to Lucio Fulci (compare the eye-slicing scene of Un Chien Andalou with the eye-piercing scene of Zombi 2 (1979) aka Zombie) to Wes Craven to David Lynch. Described by Jewish-Austrian-

American cineaste Amos Vogel in his revolutionary book Film as a Subversive Art (1974) as “the most famous avant-garde film ever made” and designed by Buñuel “to change our consciousness,” Un Chien Andalou ultimately set the standard for all subsequent iconoclastic auteur filmmakers to come. Thankfully, Buñuel eventually managed to combine his surrealist imagery with nuanced and allegorical storytelling, thus Un Chien Andalou makes for an immaculate introduction to the Spanish filmmaker’s eclectic oeuvre. A darkly humorous nightmare dreamed up by two of Spain’s most prodigal sons, Un Chien Andalou is sadistic celluloid surrealism without a cause that ultimately changed the course of cinema history and is thus mandatory viewing for anyone that has even the remotest respect for cinema.

-Ty E

L'AGE D'OR
L'AGE D'OR

Luis Buñuel (1930)

A number of years ago, I had a somewhat peculiar experience after getting a blowjob on a large coastal island-cum-park. As my then-girlfriend and I were walking back to her car, a wild Spanish pony appeared out of nowhere on the path and scared the shit out of my lady friend due to the loud noise it made as it galloped by us. In fact, her fear was so frenetically intense that it initially scared the shit out of me too, as if I had to immediately prepare to take on a homicidal killer with nil notice. Upon getting back to my girlfriend's car, I discovered between twenty and thirty tiny deer ticks crawling up my foot and sock, which were surely the consequence of the partly wooded beachside BJ. Needless to say, when my girlfriend and I finally got home, we administered full-body cavity searches on each other shortly after sharing a long warm shower. While we did not find any ticks, my girlfriend felt something on her head a couple hours later after we were lying in bed together and I soon found myself using tweezers to carefully pull off the parasitic bloodsucker. Naturally, the gf was positively pissed and took her revenge by repeatedly brutally stabbing the less than sentient Ixodidae to death in what was a genuinely sadistic rage that I will never forget. While everything I said above really happened, I cannot help but think the story is somehow allegorical, at least after recently watching the surrealist masterpiece L'Age d'Or (1930) aka The Golden Age directed by Spanish master auteur Luis Buñuel (The Exterminating Angel, Belle de Jour) and somehow saw it as a depicting something akin to my own failed love affairs. While most people might find the film to be indistinguishable from bad gibberish of the arcanelly archaic sort, I somehow found a kindred spirit lurking inside the film, as if I—a proud conservative libertine and born-again post-Yockeyite—found my soul in sync with a nearly ancient film that once caused right-wing riots against commie scum.

Indeed, it is hard to imagine liking a film directed by a filmmaker that was then-flirting-with-communism and that was produced by the part-Jewish mischling descendant of the great Marquis de Sade, but a lot has changed in the Occident in the nearly-90-years since the film was first released and even some leftists back then actually had balls (also, while the film's co-writer Salvador Dalí was literally obsessed with Hitler's testicles, Buñuel would eventually realize that commies and other related rabble are retarded). Oftentimes feeling like a romance film created by a lovelorn schizophrenic lunatic that dreams of engaging in orgies in hell with the mangled corpse of Pasolini and de Sade in the vain hope that he will finally get over his forsaken perennial lovesickness, L'Age d'Or is unequivocally a rare piece of technically-quite-antiquated celluloid iconoclasm that still has the power to offend and disturb today. A radical piece of gleefully scathing cynical romanticism where the seemingly foredoomed cultural history of the Occident is blamed for the innate impossibility of love conquering all in the spiritually moribund modern age, the film is also anti-Christian in the best sort of way by depicting Christ as a two-faced Sadean killer of hot young nubile girls and, in turn, worshiper of death and female defilement. Indeed, in the film, the protagonist is more or less cockblocked by civilization, which is indubitably one of the most audaciously absurd premises in cinema history and something that makes Charlie Chaplin's Modern Times (1936) seem like the patently prosaic expression of a posturing prole philistine, but I digress.

Undoubtedly, one of the reasons I loathe leftists, especially leftist activists, so much as the majority of them tend to be self-loathing hypocrites and the nadir of the very bourgeois they loathe (indeed, Judaic background aside, Marx was also a failed bourgeois, not to mention the fact that he never worked a single day in his entire life). While one could accuse Buñuel—a Spaniard from a distinguished background that, as recounted in his memoir, looked down on the poor as a youth—of such glaring hypocrisies, he never really tried to hide his roots and as he eloquently explained in his short-but-sweet memoir My Last Sigh (1982), “Like the señoritos I knew in Madrid, most surrealists came from good families; as in my case, they were bourgeois revolting against the bourgeoisie. But we all felt a certain destructive impulse, a feeling that for me has been even stronger than the creative urge. The idea of burning down a museum, for instance, has always seemed more enticing than opening of a cultural center or the inauguration of a new hospital.” While this might seem like harsh words, especially considering Buñuel, who was initially influenced by Italian Futurists like Filippo Tommaso Marinetti, was already fairly old when he wrote them, L'Age d'Or is so intoxicatingly iconoclastic and awe-inspiringly aberrantly absurd in its essence that one cannot help respect the great passion of the auteur, especially since he manages to seamlessly express such savage surrealist sentiments alongside a strangely endearing (ill-fated) love story as the bourgeoisie—and its retarded rules and customs—becomes the ultimate callous murderer of love. Indeed, as Buñuel also wrote in his memoir, “Although Dalí compared it to American films (undoubtedly from a technical point of view), he later wrote that his intentions ‘in writing the screenplay’ were to expose the shameful mechanisms of contemporary society. For me, it was a film about passion, l’amour fou, the irresistible force that thrusts two people together, and about the impossibility of their ever become one.” Speaking of love, Buñuel and Dalí, who previously demonstrated to be great collaborators on Un Chien Andalou (1929), had a major falling out after the former choked the latter's new whore muse-cum-future-wife Gala, thus the film is mainly the brainchild of its director (according to Buñuel, only one scene, which involves a guy walking around with a rock on his head, was written by Dalí). In fact, even more than his debut film Un Chien Andalou, L'Age d'Or is like a virtual artistic manifesto where Buñuel outlines the themes, obsessions, fetishes, and visuals that would come to dominate his truly singular filmmaking career. In short, it is an imperative (albeit technically formative) work from one of the greatest and most important filmmakers of cinema history.

L'AGE D'OR

L'Age d'Or begins in a fashion that is considerably less fairytale-like than Un Chien Andalou as it is comprised of primitive vintage orthochromatic footage of scorpions doing evil scorpion things and related creature qualities that are ultimately compared to humans, including toxic aggression, ungodly survival instincts, and tendency towards the most evil forms of treachery against its own species, among other things. Just as the scorpion has “five prismatic joints” and a “sixth vesicular joint,” the film has five main segments and a savagely subversive Sadean concluding segment. As British surrealist scholar Robert L. Short noted in regard to the possible esoteric meaning of this literally quite gritty documentary opening, “The scorpion is the zodiac sign that governs the genitals and the anus. As such, it’s the symbol of sex, excrement, and death. Thus, this opening sequence introduces the ambivalent dynamic that powers our impulses of attraction and repulsion alike and officiates at the alchemical marriage of shit and gold.” Needless to say, L'Age d'Or is a film with an intrinsically ironical title as a tragicomic romance trapped inside of a purgatorial absurdist cinematic nightmare where nothing goes right and evil, especially of the nasty Nazarene sort, triumphs in the end. In short, aberrant avant-garde cinematic alchemy where human shit is elevated to artistic gold.

After the scorpion doc that opens the film, a group of ornamentally dressed Catholic bishops, who certainly look more glamorous than the average meth-addled drag-queen, practically wash up onto some rocks where they soon turn into ornamentally dressed skeletons yet their dubious ‘sacrifice’ seems to be totally triumphant as they leave an indelible mark on the land as demonstrated by the fact that their martyrdom (or whatever) is soon followed by a ‘golden age’ as a large colonial entourage subsequently arrives that includes priests, military men, government whores, etc. and it is soon declared, “Upon this rock I shall build my church.” Naturally, the group of humorless bureaucrats becomes exceedingly angry when a sort of religious ceremony that they’re performing is interrupted by the great ecstasy of two lovers (Gaston Modot and Lya Lys) engaged in exceedingly orgasmic mud-wrestling. At this point, the lovers—the film’s main protagonists—are separated for the first time and the rest of the main section of the film involves the man played by Modot’s strange quest to be reunited with his beautiful beloved. As the film eventually reveals via spasmodic flashback, Modot is a special agent of the so-called ‘International Goodwill Society’ and is ostensibly on a “goodwill mission” that, as described by his ‘Minister of Interior,’ is based, “On your spirit of self-sacrifice and proven valor depend many lives. Children, women, old men. The honor of our Fatherland rests on the outcome of this noble enterprise.” Needless to say, lovesick Modot completely ignores his audaciously altruistic mission as he has much more important things to think about than the lives of children, namely being reunited with his lover.

Hardly a humanist or lover of animals, Modot is not beneath kicking little dogs like soccer balls, senselessly stomping on beetles, and assaulting blind men, yet one finds it hard to fault such a passionate lover. Suffering from a sort of Freudianism in reverse, immediately visualizes women masturbating when encountering advertising (or as British film theorist Raymond Durgnat described, Modot “sees through” the impersonal, commercialized eroticism of the posters to his anima”). As for Modot’s lover Lys, she has her own problems, including suffering the banality of her bourgeois parents, large cows invading her bed, and a magic mirror with racing clouds that seem to express her lovesick erotic longing. Of course, the two lovers are soon reunited but, like most great romances, the love affair does not last and ultimately concludes on a quite chaotic, if not downright cataclysmic, note that inspires apocalyptic dreams.

Using a special certificate that proves his on a certified “goodwill mission” to supposedly save millions of children and elderly people, Modot is able to finally escape from two cops that are senselessly parading him around the absurd decaying civilization “Imperial Rome”—a modern metropolis that looks nice from a bird’s-eye view yet is quite brittle and decayed as revealed by the fact that buildings randomly collapse—so that he can make his way back to his lover. While never made totally clear, Modot may have once been a true idealist and humanistic do-gooder like so many naive and/or otherwise idiotic young people, but now he simply has a monomaniacal obsession with lady Lys. After his odious odyssey, Modot eventually makes his way to a large party at Lys’ family chateau where many absurd things occur, including a maid being blasted with a roaring flame and a pesky Mongoloid child being shot after daring to annoy a man while he was rolling a cigarette. Clearly infatuated with Modot and his masculine majesty, Lys can only look on in delight when the hero slaps her mother in the face for the crime of spilling a drop of wine on his rather stylish suit. Plagued by the spiritually moribund etiquette and the callously contrived civility of the ball-less bourgeoisie, Modot finds it seemingly impossible to get to Lys at the party as he is constantly approached by pestering guests attempting to make small talk with him. In what is arguably one of the most shamelessly yet touchingly romantic scenarios in all of cinema history, Modot and Lys’ eyes remain ecstatically glued to one another while being hassled by party guests as if they are the only two people in the entire world, at least in their own minds. Unfortunately, fate has different plans for the ill-fated lovers and it does not even involve full-on fucking.

It is only when the party guests begin congregating at a garden in preparation for a sort of makeshift Wagnerian concert that the lovers are able to finally reunite outside with some privacy near a male statue. Rather unfortunately, the reunion is only momentarily happy and very much abstractly resembles the most absurd of botched orgasms. Indeed, not long after the two begin smooching, Modot is forced to take an emergency phone call where he is berated by his boss, who subsequently commits suicide, for causing the deaths of men, women, and especially children due to his negligence. Undoubtedly, in his eager willingness to sacrifice the lives of millions of innocent children for the sake of a love that isn't even guaranteed, Modot's behavior symbolizes the ugly emotional extremes of romantic obsession. Meanwhile, Lys, who is clearly quite horny, begins fellating the toe of the statue as if she cannot wait to mouth Modot's member. When Modot finally gets off the phone and reunites with Lys after a two minute ordeal that feels like a decade in terms of abject anticipation, the two seem incapable of properly channeling their repressed passion for one another as if their love has become necrotic. For example, Modot hallucinates that Lys is an elderly grey-haired woman and the two become very sleepy. While the couple continues to kiss as if trying to chase a bliss that just doesn't exist, they are soon rudely interrupted by a seemingly demented conductor that walks over to them with his hands gripping head like a neurotic somnambulist on acid, as if his performance of Richard Wagner's "Liebestod"—a splendid piece of music that reveals Buñuel's own monomaniacal tendencies, which are almost always characteristic of all great men, in that he used the same exact work in his previous film Un Chien Andalou—has caused him to suffer a complete mental breakdown. Immediately inexplicably spellbound by the unhinged old fart as if she suffers from serious daddy issues, Lys leaves Modot and then proceeds to embrace and French kiss the cracked conductor with a certain girlish gusto. After his love affair comes to a swift and brutally bizarre end, Modot gets his revenge against his (ex)lover by immediately going to her room where he proceeds to tears up some pillows like a tyrannical toddler and then begins hurling stuff out of the window, including a wooden plough, bishop, bishop's staff, burning Christmas tree, and giraffe statue, among other phallic items that arguably hint at a sort of spiritual castration. At this point, Modot is probably done with love and ready embrace de Sade.

L'AGE D'OR

While the film's love affair ends on a rather erratically brutal note where the protagonist suffers soul-crushing defeat in the romance department in the most preposterously pathetic of ways, the quasi-epilogue—a virtual homage to the Marquis de Sade's posthumously published The 120 Days of Sodom, or the School of Libertinage (1785/1904)—is a sort of allegorical final nail in the coffin of Western Civilization that begins with a long scrolling inter-title that reads: "Just as these feathers fell but a long way away...the survivors from the Château de Selliny...emerged to return to Paris. 120 days earlier, four godless and unprincipled scoundrels had, driven by their depravity, shut themselves away...to indulge in the most bestial of orgies. To them, the life of a woman mattered no more than that of a fly. They took with them eight lovely adolescent girls...to serve as victims for their criminal desires...plus four women well versed in debauchery...whose narrative skills would serve to stimulate...their already jaded appetites...whenever interest flagged." After the pseudo-moralistic inter-title, a bearded Jesus/Duc de Blangis figure—a character that may or may not be a ‘liberated’ post-love Modot—emerges from an ominous (yet somehow goofy) gothic castle where he is followed by a couple similarly tired and debauched-looking aristocrats. When a wounded young woman, who may or may not be Modot’s ex-lover Lys, emerges from the castle, Jesus takes her back inside and assumedly murders her. In the end, Jesus loses his beard and a couple female scalps are depicted hanging from a large Christian cross as snow falls from a sky in a scenario that arguably allegorically symbolizes the twilight of romance in (post)Christian Western Civilization.

While Buñuel bemoaned the tragic character of love and the impossibility of two lovers becoming one, L’Age d’Or is, somewhat ironically, the artistic consequence of the auteur’s one-time collaborator-cum-friend Salvador Dalí finding his great love-cum-muse Gala and thus only playing a minor role in the film. Of course, despite his anarchic spirit, Buñuel was rather bourgeois in his romantic dealings as he courted his future wife, Jeanne Rucar Lefebvre, in a formal Aragonese manner—complete with a chaperone—and stayed together with her for nearly half-a-century for what was the rest of his life after marrying her in 1934. As noted by Hermann Hesse in Steppenwolf (1927), the artist is one of the few things that redeems the bourgeoisie and Buñuel was certainly one of the greatest masters of this form of critique, especially in regard to the modern post-religious bourgeoisie. After all, it is no coincidence that the auteur wrote in his memoir, “I’m lucky to have spent my childhood in the Middle Ages, or, as Huysmans described it, that ‘painful and exquisite’ epoch—painful in terms of its material aspects perhaps, but exquisite in its spiritual life. What a contrast to the world of today!” A man of the past that created art of the future, Buñuel was, in the sense described by Uncle Adolf’s #1 fan-girl Savitri Devi in her magnum opus The Lightning and the Sun (1958), a ‘Man Against Time’ that ultimately used a destructive aesthetic power for life-affirming purposes, thereupon performing a sort of aesthetic alchemy by turning the shit that is modernity into artistic gold. Considering that L’Age d’Or caused reactionary riots and was banned from public exhibition in late-1930 after the Prefect of Police of Paris arranged to have it banned, one could certainly say that Hesse was right when he wrote that, “The bourgeois today burns as heretics and hangs as criminals those to whom he erects monuments tomorrow.” On the other hand, Buñuel—a man once associated with communist cunts and other degenerates—is now attacked by ‘bobo’ (bourgeois bohemian) leftists—undoubtedly the nadir of the slave-morality-ridden priest types that Nietzsche condemned for destroying Europa—with ad hominem oriented buzzwords like ‘misogynistic,’ ‘xenophobic,’ ‘homophobic,’ and other completely meaningless modern vile, thus confirming that his fears about the future of the Occident were not in vain as things have only gotten ten times worse in terms of their surreal stupidity and inanity.

Undoubtedly, after recently re-watching L’Age d’Or and doing research on

L'AGE D'OR

Buñuel, I could not help but reminded of the following excerpt from Steppenwolf: "Every age, every culture, every custom and tradition has its own character, its own weakness and its own strength, its beauties and ugliness; accepts certain sufferings as matters of course, puts up patiently with certain evils. Human life is reduced to real suffering, real hell, only when two ages, two cultures and religions overlap. A man of the Classical Age who had to live in medieval times would suffocate miserably just as a savage does in the midst of our civilization. Now there are times when a whole generation is caught in this way between two ages, two modes of life, with the consequence that it loses all power to understand itself and has no standard, no security, no simple acquiescence. Naturally, everyone does not feel this equally strongly. A nature such as Nietzsche's had to suffer our present ills more than a generation in advance. What he had to go through alone and misunderstood, thousands suffer today." When I watch Buñuel's films, especially L'Age d'Or, I fell as if I am being confronted by the excremental excesses of the Occidental collective unconscious in an eccentrically esoteric form; or, the prophetic cinematic daydreams of a very real future nightmare from a mensch with the keen artistic sensitivity to foresee that which should not be seen, at least by those that still value their sanity. In that sense, it is only fitting that the film was funded by the direct descendant of de Sade who, in all his savagely sadistic degeneracy, still expressed something very real about the 'liberal' future to come (as a far-left degenerate aristocratic revolutionary that was an elected delegate to the National Convention during the French Revolution, de Sade also actively created that forsaken future). After all, child drag-queens, the chemical castration of children, sex changes, wiggerism, and fat rights activists are modern phenomenons that are more surreally disturbing and/or absurd than anything that you might find in a Buñuel flick.

Recently, I discovered that the 'great love' of a childhood friend of mine was recently tragically killed after a police cruiser ran her over. Notably, this girl brought great misery to my friend and everyone around them when they were together (for example, she would sneak into my parent's home to get to my friend while they both had restraining order against each other), yet I could not help but feel a certain degree of sadness for my old comrade, as if the final lingering sense ecstasy of his l'amour fou had been finally fully extinguished for all of eternity via absurd tragedy. Even today, I cannot help but be reminded of bittersweet memories from a love affair that began nearly a decade ago, or feel an irrevocable sense of loss for a fairly recent all-too-brief romance that happened that—for better or worse—reminded me what l'amour fou feels like. If you want to experience what it feels like to be in heartsick hell and back in a film that somehow manages to unintentionally reconcile the miserably melodic lovelorn lyrical pathos of John Maus and pre-apocalyptic Occidental despair of Oswald Spengler with a certain Dirlewangerian depravity thrown in for good measure, L'Age d'Or is certainly the film to see. As to why the average spiritually neutered bourgeois would find both l'amour fou and a film like Buñuel's quite disagreeable, Hesse summed it up quite well with the words, "The bourgeois treasures nothing more highly than the self... And so at the cost of intensity he achieves his own preservation and security. His harvest is a quiet mind which he prefers to being possessed by God, as he prefers comfort to pleasure, convenience to liberty, and a pleasant temperature to that deathly inner consuming fire."

-Ty E

LAND WITHOUT BREAD
LAND WITHOUT BREAD

Luis Buñuel (1933)

As a virtual lifelong loather of the sort of debasing deluded dreams that Hollywood so sickingly sells like a pimp attempting to pass off a seasoned slack-jawed STD-ridden streetwalker as a prized virgin beauty, I have naturally always been more attracted to a sort of realism that borders on the surreal; whether it be Bavarian sensation Werner Herzog's morosely morbid depiction of infamous necrophile Ed Gein's hometown in Stroszek (1977), the somehow mystifying yet simultaneously demystifying avant-garde docs of Dutch auteur Henri Plaat (Fragments of Decay, El cardenal), or the hypnotically darkly humorous aesthetically nihilistic excesses of Harmony Korine's delightfully deranging debut feature Gummo (1997). Needless to say, as both a cinephile and longtime Luis Buñuel fan, I should have probably watched the Spanish auteur's third film and sole documentary contribution, Las Hurdes: Tierra Sin Pan (1933) aka Land Without Bread aka Unpromised Land, a very long time ago, yet I just recently endured it for the first time after being inspired by the animated feature Buñuel in the Labyrinth of the Turtles (2018) aka Buñuel en el laberinto de las Tortugas directed Salvador Simó. While I am not a huge fan Simó's of film—a somewhat superficial and even hagiographic semi-fictional tribute to Buñuel's personal mein kampf while making Land Without Bread that, at least partly, feels inspired by the troubled Walt Disney-Salvador Dalí collaboration Destino (1945/2008)—it certainly did its job in terms of inspiring me to finally watch the documentary, especially after I watched the extra features included on the Shout Factory blu-ray and discovered the Dutch documentary Buñuel's Prisoners (2000) aka De gevangenen van Buñuel where modern-day descendants of the Spanish region depicted in the doc express both great hatred and loving respect for the Spanish auteur. Indeed, Buñuel's 28-minute doc—a pioneering cinematic work that is described as both a 'pseudo-documentary' and 'Ethnofiction' on Wikipedia yet anticipates cinema-vérité and is surely both more intriguing and subversive than anything Jean Rouch has ever directed—has ultimately proved to be such an influential film that it has inspired multiple documentaries and a virtual children's animated feature, yet it seems that no one can actually agree on what the film actually is or the auteur's intent in what is arguably a playfully morally dubious experiment in understated cinematic savagery of the delectably distastefully tragicomic sort where the misery of man is ruthlessly rubbed into the viewer's face with an almost demonic dispassion. Depicting the everyday destitution and surely surreal poverty of the Las Hurdes region of Spain, the short does the seemingly impossible and equally nonsensical by being a true 'Surrealist documentary' that makes a mockery out of the sort of nauseatingly naive proto-Rouch-esque ethnographic racial fetishism associated with frog surrealists like Michel Leiris. In short, in Land Without Bread, the viewer is shocked to discover that even parts of Europe exhibit the same sort of perturbing sub-Lumpenproletariat impoverishment and almost transcendental backwardness that is typically associated with the Dark Continent.

As a cinematic work that was directed by one of the greatest filmmakers of all-time, funded by the lottery winnings of an anarcho-syndicalist sculptor-cum-painter named Ramón Acín that was murdered by supposed fascists during the first year of the Spanish Civil War (which, ironically, the film supports the start of!), and co-written by a commie Surrealist named Pierre Unik who died in a concentration camp in 1945, Land Without Bread is undeniably an important piece of both cinema and (meta)political history where the loony leftist idealism of its creators now seems genuinely absurd on retrospect. In that sense, the film seems even more innately surreal today than when it was first released in what is ultimately a great example of an artist (or, in this case, artists) becoming a victim of his own youthful political naïveté (not surprisingly, Buñuel's political views, or lack thereof, would only become more nuanced and cynical as he aged). Taking its title from a reference by Russian anarcho-communist Peter Kropotkin about how every social and political problem can supposedly be cured with mere bread, the film would seem relatively political ambiguous if Buñuel had not later added a sort of patently preposterous postscript that reads: "The generals' rebellion aided by Hitler and Mussolini would restore together with the privileges of the owners, the peasant workforces. But the workers and peasants of Spain will defeat Franco and his accomplices. With the help of anti-fascists all over the world, tranquility and happiness will make way for civil war and forever eradicate the pockets of misery this film has shown you." Of course, as everything from intentional Soviet famines like Holodomor to the current starvation plaguing much of Venezuela today, commies are not very good at feeding people—whether it be moldy Bolshevik bread or otherwise. Idiotic youthful idealism aside, the doc was a valiant act of cinematic rebellion and a film that apparently could have gotten Buñuel killed, or as the auteur explained in his memoir My Last Sigh (1982), "When the Republican troops, backed by Durutti's anarchist column, occupied Quinto, my friend Mantecon, the governor of Aragón, found a dossier with my name on it in the files of the civil guard. In it, I was described as notoriously debauched, a morphine addict, and the author of that heinous film, that crime against the state, LAS HURDES. If I could be found, the note said, I was to be turned over immediately to the Falange, where I would receive my just deserts." Of course, Buñuel collaborators Acín and Unik were not so lucky, but such was the spirit of the age as artists were purged from both sides of the political spectrum. For example, upon France's so-called liberation during WWII, French filmmaker Jean Mamy—a one-time leftist that acted as the editor of Jean Renoir's Baby's Laxative (1931) aka On purge bébé—was executed in part for directing the Vichy anti-Freemasonry propaganda film Occult Forces (1943) aka Forces occultes (in fact, the film's writer Jean Marquès-Rivière and producer Robert Muzard were also sentenced to death, but they both managed to ultimately survive).

LAND WITHOUT BREAD

Notably, despite only covering a couple pages of Buñuel's excellent book, you arguably learn more about the history of Las Hurdes, which the auteur was initially inspired to make a film about after reading the anthropological study Las Jurdes: étude de géographie humaine (1927) by Maurice Legendre, by reading the auteur's autobiography. As Buñuel explains in My Last Sigh, "Once upon a time, the high plateaus of Las Hurdes were settled by bandits, and by Jews who'd fled the Inquisition," though one surely would not know that after watching the film as Jews and banditos seem like otherworldly Übermenschen compared to the fiercely forlorn modern-day inhabitants of the region. In Land Without Bread, the viewer discovers a seemingly endless arid wasteland that is described as follows by narrator Abel Jacquin, "Throughout this labyrinth of mountains...the 52 villages that make up Las Hurdes are scattered...with a total population of 8,000 people. Ahead, we must descend a steep slope...and cross the splendid valley, Las Batuecas...currently inhabited by an old monk who lives here...surrounded by a few servants." Apparently, for four centuries, the valley was inhabited by monks, the Carmelites, who preached Christianity in the main villages of Las Hurdes, but now the monasteries are completely deserted aside from a sole monk and his handful of loyal servants. Despite the decline of spiritual leaders in Las Hurdes, the nicest buildings in the area are all churches, which surely reminds its lowly inhabitants of their ultimate value in the face of god almighty. In fact, it seems that the only thing these pitiful peasants have is religion as that don't even really have a folk culture, or as Buñuel explained in his memoir, "As for folk dances, those trite expressions of misplaced nationalism, Las Hurdes didn't have any." Indeed, instead of pesky fascist folk dances, the area is plagued by roaming packs of rock-throwing inbred mutants, or so one discovers while watching Buñuel's oftentimes organically grotesque yet hardly garish film.

Due to poverty, malnutrition, poor hygiene and inbreeding, among other things, genetic degeneration in Las Hurdes is a serious problem to the point where the area is plagued with dwarfs and violent mental retards that tend to throw rocks and attack people, including Buñuel's small film crew. Indeed, while the auteur's intent is certainly dubious, there is no denying the nightmarish reality of the genetically forsaken sub-troglodytes featured in the film. Naturally, senseless death is also an everyday occurrence in the area, as Buñuel encounters a small little girl lying on the ground that, as the narrator reveals, apparently died only a couple days later after the footage was shot. At one point, the viewer encounters a seemingly elderly woman breast-feeding a baby with her completely deflated bean-bag boobs, only to be told by the narrator that she is actually only 32-years-old (admittedly, I found this claim to be more than a little bit improbable). Most people in the area only have the choice of potatoes and beans as food (with the slightly richer inhabitants occasionally partaking in pork), though, every so often, goat meat becomes available when said livestock accidentally falls off a cliff (for the film, Buñuel did not have time to wait for such an accident so he shot a goat off a cliff himself!). Dysentery is also a big problem in the area as the locals tend to eat unripe cherries out of sheer desperation. Even death is not easy in the region, as corpses have to be carried many miles as most of the villages lack cemeteries (for these admittedly rather realistic scenes, Buñuel had an infant 'play dead' and somehow the fly-plagued babe does a good job acting!). While the primary food industry in the area is beekeeping, the locals do not actually own the bees, thus making it all the more absurd that goats, mules, and people are oftentimes killed by said bees. In short, death seems to be the main concern for the locals of Las Hurdes and, as an old woman says at the very end of the doc, "Nothing keeps you more awake than to think always of the dead. Recite an Ave Maria for the peace of their souls." Of course, considering Buñuel's own staunchly cynical stance on his ancestral faith, the inclusion of the poor wretched old woman's words seems all the more bleak yet simultaneously playfully nihilistic.

At the end of the film, the narrator less than passionately declares, "After a two-month stay in Las Hurdes...we leave the country," but, as referenced in the documentary The Journey of a Surrealist, Buñuel later remarked, "Once you've been to hell, how do you get out?" Cynical exaggeration or not, the doc makes its case with very little effort that Las Hurdes is a miserable virtual pre-medieval hellhole and, as the auteur intended, the idiotic sort of European xenophiles that fetishize African poverty merely need to travel a couple miles to find the ugly extreme of abject human suffering, just as the white liberal and Judaic intellectuals of today pretend to weep for the melanin-privileged people of the world without batting an eye for the poor whites of Appalachia (who, in their disgustingly deluded slave-morality-ridden minds, believe that these poor whites deserve it due to imaginary privilege being part of their magical racial birthright). Rather ironically, despite the film's contrived commie postscript, Buñuel was later forced to concede to Mexican actor and screen writer Tomás Pérez Turrent that Francisco Franco enriched Las Hurdes, confessing, "Yes, some years ago I went to Las Hurdes. It had changed somewhat because it had become part of Franco's favorite region. There was electricity in some towns and they made bread everywhere." In short, ostensible fascist Franco brought bread to the land without bread. Political intent aside, Buñuel felt the doc was part of the same personal Surrealist Weltanschauung as his previous two films Un Chien Andalou (1929) and L'Age d'Or (1930), noting, "It's in the same line. The first two are imaginative, the other is taken from reality, but I feel it shares the same outlook." Still, the film was distinct to the auteur in at least one way as he stated to José de la Colina, "Nothing is gratuitous in LAND WITHOUT BREAD. It is perhaps the least gratuitous film I have made."

In the worthwhile compilation The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to

LAND WITHOUT BREAD

Hitchcock (1975), André Bazin noted, “With LAS HURDES (LAND WITHOUT BREAD), a ‘documentary’ on the poverty-stricken population of the Las Hurdes region, Buñuel did not reject UN CHIEN ANDALOU; on the contrary, the objectivity, the soberness of the documentary surpassed the horror and the forcefulness of the fantasy. In the former, the donkey devoured by bees attained the nobility of a barbaric and Mediterranean myth which is certainly equal to the glamour of the dead donkey on the piano. Thus Buñuel stands out as one of the great names of the cinema at the end of the silent screen and the beginning of sound—one with which only that of Vigo bears comparison—in spite of the sparseness of his output.” Indeed, while Land Without Bread does not quite transcend the singular shock of an eye being slit like in Un Chien Andalou (1929), it manages to defile the soul in a striking fashion to the point where death feels like it can be virtually touched and the smell of decay is not too far away, which was surely the auteur’s intent in depicting his homeland as a place of deathly destitution and dystopian delirium where the crucifix is a symbol of death and the legacy of Catholicism is one of starved disease-ridden corpses and perennially smirking retards. While Bazin would also argue in regard to the film, “The documentary on Las Hurdes was tinged with a certain cynicism, a self-satisfaction in its objectivity; the rejection of pity took on the color of an aesthetic provocation,” I personally deeply respect Buñuel—a bourgeois boy that had no real innate personal understanding of the human misery he encountered—for not succumbing to conspicuously contrived bleeding-heart buffoonery by taking the easy gutmensch route and pretending to weep for people that need everything but misspent tears.

Notably, at one point in Land Without Bread, Buñuel plays virtual art critic in a scene featuring morbid midgets and mental defectives juxtaposed with the deadly serious narration, “The realism even of a Zurbarán or of a Ribera falls far short of such a reality. The degeneration of this race is primarily due to hunger, lack of hygiene, poverty and incest.” While some might find such sentiments to be as cold as an unclad Icelandic female corpse, I am also reminded of the auteur’s words, “I’ve always believed that the imagination is a spiritual quality that, like memory, can be trained and developed.” After all, only Buñuel could arrive to such a charmingly twisted yet aesthetically truthful conclusion after being confronted with such miserable misbegotten untersmenschen that have no time or taste for the bourgeois luxury of fine art. Thankfully, Buñuel did not pull a Forough Farrokhzad who, after finishing her sole film The House Is Black (1963)—a 22-minute doc depicting the horribly disfigured individuals of an Iranian leper colony—decided it would be wise to adopt two leprotic children due to her haunting experiences while working on the film (notably, she died only four years later in a car wreck, thus assumedly leaving those kids orphans once again). The last thing the world needs, especially the cinematic world, is another documentary where we are supposed to feel sorry for poor brown people and thus it comes as a great relief that one of cinema's greatest and most singular artists created a classic documentary that is the total opposite of the Michael Moore school of ludicrously lame liberal agitprop of the unwittingly shamelessly grotesque sort. In short, Buñuel was a pinko-leftist the same way German Expressionist poet Gottfried Benn was a National Socialist. Literal documentary or not, it is hard to imagine Werner Herzog's underrated second feature Even Dwarfs Started Small (1970) without the existence of Buñuel's short doc due to certain striking aesthetic similarities, especially when it comes to the 'ecstatic truth.' Although Buñuel would never again direct a documentary, he apparently edited together an abridged version of Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will (1935) featuring elements of Luftwaffe auteur Hans Bertram's Feuertaufe (1940) aka Baptism of Fire for the Museum of Modern Art (MoMA), but it unfortunately has never been released. While Buñuel would even demonstrate an apparent antifascist stance in later works like Diary of a Chambermaid (1964), I somehow doubt his MoMA edit of Naziland is as unflattering as his depiction of Las Hurdes in Land Without Bread. After all, as certain wise people sometimes say, you cannot polish a turd but you can certainly polish a Stahlhelm. Either way, I think it is safe to say that no modern-day leftist would believe the film was made by one of their brethren. As for the poor people of Las Hurdes, thank god that Franco could do what Buñuel's (or, more literally, André Gide's and Jean Cocteau's boy toy Marc Allégret's) camera could not. Admittedly, while Land Without Bread is one of the Buñuel films that I am least likely to revisit anytime soon, if I am feeling in enough of a masochistic mood to experience very vintage human suffering, I will certainly choose it over French master auteur Alain Resnais' obscenely overrated shoah showcase Night and Fog (1956) aka Nuit et brouillard. In describing one of his later masterpieces, Manny Farber—the virtual Sam Fuller of film critics—argued in regard to Buñuel, "His glee in life is a movie of raped virgins and fallen saints, conceived by a literary old-world director detached from his actors but infatuated with his cock-eyed primitive cynicism. It's this combination of detachment and the infatuated-with-bitterness viewpoint, added to a flat-footed technique, that produces the piercingly cold images of THE EXTERMINATING ANGEL." Of course, the same could also be said of Land Without Bread but it is exactly Buñuel's so-called "cock-eyed primitive cynicism" that allows us to face the harsh truth of the dreadfully primitive in a wonderfully wicked way that reminds one of the classic Spanish phrase: "¡Viva la Muerte!"

-Ty E

THE PHANTOM OF LIBERTY
THE PHANTOM OF LIBERTY

Luis Buñuel (1974)

Luis Buñuel's The Phantom of Liberty completely destroys linear film plot structure and replaces it with a compilation of random scenarios. Once again Buñuel utilizes satirical surrealism offering the viewer a look into the irrationality of humans. No character in The Phantom of Liberty is likeable or contemptible. The characters just merely exist as tools to keep the film going. Like most communists, Luis Buñuel was undeniably a pervert. He used film as an outlet for his fantasies and desired pleasures. Family excrement bonding, incestuous piano playing, and sadomasochism keep The Phantom of Liberty interesting from beginning to end. A sniper also makes an appearance and kills random people in a French city. This scene is very comedic in its absurdity. I like to think that the snipping scene was also one of Buñuel's many fantasies. Buñuel also attacks the lack of reason involved with bureaucratic governments and institutions. A family meets with a police commissioner to set-up a search for their missing little girl (who is in the room with them). The sniper is found guilty in court and is treated like a hero signing autographs. Scenes like these take a refreshing approach to film making. Buñuel deserved his title as "auteur." Very few directors would take the chances that Buñuel took. I guess that would make him a film "revolutionary." The Phantom of Liberty has no progressive hurdles to jump over in the way of viewer anxiety. The film is very mellow and free flowing in its entire construction. As the viewer, you have no real expectation for what may come next. Without characters to care about or a plot to follow, The Phantom of Liberty still keeps viewers attention throughout the films entirety. Luis Buñuel's later films may be his best. That Object of Desire (Buñuel's last film) and The Phantom of Liberty go great when watching both back to back. The title The Phantom of Liberty is an homage to philosophical terrorist Karl Marx. What a great title.

-Ty E

THAT OBSCURE OBJECT OF DESIRE

Luis Buñuel (1977)

Out of all the great cinematic auteur filmmakers, Spanish surrealist Luis Buñuel (Los Olvidados, Belle de Jour)—a virtual one-man-cinematic-revolution—was probably the greatest in terms of sheer longevity, eclecticism, and artistic consistency as a succulently scathingly sardonic morcillismo humorist with an intrinsic flair for the intoxicatingly (yet elegantly) iconoclastic, sensually absurd, playfully pessimistic, and merrily misanthropic. Indeed, whether it be the uniquely unforgettable eye-slicing and juxtaposition of surreal sexual sadism with Richard Wagner’s “Liebestod” from his opera Tristan und Isolde in his debut Un Chien Andalou (1929), proto-Aguirre, the Wrath of God action-adventure jungle allegory of Death in the Garden (1956), preternatural depictions of race-hate in the unconventionally humanistic southern gothic The Young One (1960), simultaneously psychotic yet erotic religious allegory of Simon of the Desert (1965), or the plot-free aesthetic anarchy of his perfect penultimate film The Phantom of Liberty (1974), Buñuel—with his big brown bull-sized balls—always produced something strikingly singular that defied classification, expectation, and impressed his contemporaries, including respected figures ranging from a Hemingway-esque Hollywood maverick like John Huston to a melancholic Nordic master like Ingmar Bergman. As far as I am concerned, only Robert Bresson is comparable in terms of being able to manage to churn out subversive modernist masterpieces in the late-period of his career when he was technically already an old fart. In that sense, it was probably not a simple cope when Buñuel once declared, “Age is something that doesn’t matter, unless you are a cheese.” In fact, I would argue that Buñuel’s swansong That Obscure Object of Desire (1977) aka Cet obscur objet du désir—a film that is truly like no other aside from sharing some aesthetic/thematic similarities with other Buñuel flicks—is unequivocally one of his greatest masterpieces, which is somewhat ironic when one considers it also one of his most linear and, in turn, accessible. Admittedly, unlike with a lot of Buñuel’s films, I found myself especially enthralled for somewhat personal reasons upon a recent re-watching of this singular cinematic masterpiece for the first in well over a decade, thus confirming to me that the auteur’s films only improve for viewers with age and experience.

Undoubtedly, watching a man put pussy on a pedestal is a putrid thing to witness and surely something that revolts both men and women alike, albeit for somewhat different reasons. While both sexes are appalled by the emasculation that comes with such groveling behavior, women are especially disgusted by it as it spells desperation and—arguably, worst of all—a sure-thing as ladies like a chase and are bored by a pathetic bastard that is ready to commit to the figurative monogamial ball and chain. In That Obscure Object of Desire, the viewer watches with oftentimes Fremdscham-inducing delight as an old mustached frog of the rather wealthy sort as portrayed by Spanish leading man Fernando Rey disposes of all self-respect and becomes an emotional wreck over a hot twat Spanish flamenco dancer as portrayed by two different actresses (Carole Bouquet and Angela Molina). Concluding in a virtually apocalyptic manner with the violent deaths of both the lovesick hero and his fiercely frigid would-be-beloved in a film set in a world plagued by an increasingly-tedious terrorist insurgency, the film also manages to express Buñuel's lifelong obsession with linking sex and death, or as the auteur once expressed in his memoir My Last Sigh (1982), "And although I'm not sure why, I also have always felt a secret but constant link between the sexual act and death. I've tried to translate this inexplicable feeling into images, as in UN CHIEN ANDALOU when the man caresses the woman's bare breasts as his face slowly changes into a death mask." War oftentimes results in death and, as they say, love is a battlefield, but Buñuel does not depict the pangs of lovesickness in a fruity fashion as That Obscure Object of Desire presents it as the most obscenely odious of irrational obsessions; or, the most pleasantly painful path to senseless self-destruction.

THAT OBSCURE OBJECT OF DESIRE

By mere coincidence, I recently watched That Obscure Object of Desire back-to-back with Marcel L'Herbier's singularly striking silent avant-garde feature L'Inhumaine (1924) aka The Inhuman Woman—a film that somehow manages to reconcile Expressionism with Art Deco—and could not help but notice the stark contrast between handling the central theme of a lovelorn gent going to great extremes to warm the cold cunt of a seemingly impenetrable ice queen. In L'Herbier's aesthetic hypnotic flick, a young playboy-cum-Dr. Frankenstein not only fakes his own death to 'impress' his rather evil Gorgon-like opera singer love interest, but he also manages to use his pioneering techno-wizardry to bring her back from the dead in what is ultimately a rather unconventionally happy ending that almost (seemingly unintentionally) manages to mock the absurdity that comes with romantic pursuit. Not surprisingly considering the auteur behind it, That Obscure Object of Desire is nowhere near as classically romantic or heart-wrenching in terms of its depiction of the perils of all-consuming love as it is a virtual anti-garde anti-love story where the viewer begins to eventually feel contempt for both the frog protagonist and Spanish cocktease that has completely contaminated his psyche. Indeed, quite unlike L'Inhumaine, the film not only does not provide any sort of solace in the end, sort of like a ruined orgasm during self-immolation, but it is rarely, if ever, romantic, as if one of Buñuel's main objectives with the film was to completely demystify the majesty of love and romantic conquest altogether. Undoubtedly, if that was his goal, he certainly succeeded as That Obscure Object of Desire is a virtual contra Casablanca (1942) and brazenly brilliant because of it.

Notably, That Obscure Object of Desire is based on French lesbo-lover Pierre Louÿs's novel La Femme et le pantin (1898) aka The Woman and the Puppet, which was previously adapted no less than four times, with Josef von Sternberg's

The Devil is a Woman (1935) starring Marlene Dietrich undoubtedly being the greatest and best known of these earlier adaptations (filmmakers Reginald Barker, Jacques de Baroncelli, and Julien Duvivier also adapted the novel). Of course, it goes without saying that Buñuel's version is easily the most subversive and anarchistic of these adaptations. It should also be noted that the auteur apparently previously made a failed attempt at tackling the source novel, henceforth revealing his strong commitment to the project. When asked by actor and screenwriter Tomás Pérez Turrent what interested him about Louÿs's novel, Buñuel replied, "The idea of a man who wants to sleep with a woman and never manages to. In the book, of course, the man ends up sleeping with her. Then she tells him, 'If you want to see me sleep with another man, come to my house tomorrow.' The next day he went, and there she was with another man. But I was more interested in the story of an obsession that can never become a reality." Ultimately, the film is a morbidly merry tale of male masochism and the female sadism the propels it, or as Buñuel explained in regard to what motivates the (anti)heroine's heinous behavior, "A sadistic feeling. She takes advantage of him, she knows it's in her best interest to keep him happy, but at the same time she hates him to death, she enjoys tormenting him." In that sense, the film is a reminder as to why it is never a good idea to let a woman know how you really feel about them, lest you become a pathetic pawn in a grotesque gynocentric game where no gash will be smashed and all hope will be lost. Better yet, the film is also a reminder to all men that, in regard to women, one must: "abandon hope, all ye who enter here."

Obsessing over any one woman, especially those that you're not even sure you can obtain, is never good and oftentimes a glaring sign of beta-boy bitch behavior yet, as someone that finds very few women attractive, including those that are technically physically attractive (yet have the personalities of gnats), I have personally fallen into this pathetic trap. For example, I somewhat recently started a 'romance' with a girl that, despite all the obvious red flags and qualities that I would usually consider major 'deal-breakers,' I could not help but be inordinately infatuated with her to the point where I felt as in control as a negro on PCP in a titty bar. Needless to say, as my intellect informed me it would probably be from the very beginning, this erotic excursion was rather brief and cost much more (especially emotionally) than it was ultimately worth, but such is the tragedy of a tyrannical testicular trance. Still, I can thankfully say that, as someone that does not physically resemble a sort of decrepit old Super Mario like the film's protagonist, I have never been in a position that was as sexless or patently pathetic as that of the rich old fart in That Obscure Object of Desire who dedicates his life and tons of his money and energy to attempting to defile a dumb dame that repays him with nothing but sadism, indifference, and heartbreak. Personally, I wanted to slap the shit out of the protagonist, as his superlatively self-deluded campaign for cream of the crop cooch is absolutely sickening to watch in a film that deserves credit for featuring the most irksome depiction of a dude thinking with his dick in cinema history in what is ultimately one frivolous farce of a dis-romance. In short, That Obscure Object of Desire is the renegade anti-romantic-comedy par excellence and a prophetic expression of avant-garde anti-thottery.

THAT OBSCURE OBJECT OF DESIRE

That Obscure Object of Desire 'hero' Mathieu (Fernando Rey)—a wealthy middle-aged widow that is hardly handsome yet seems to think his wealth makes him worthy of a real-life Venus de Milo—demonstrates a special sort of hatred for a young woman at the beginning of the film when he sadistically dumps a bucket of water over her head as she attempts to board the same train he is taking from Seville, Spain to Paris, France. The woman in question is the protagonist's young (ex)girlfriend Conchita (as portrayed by both Carole Bouquet and Angela Molina) and the viewer soon discovers how Mathieu got to hate her so much in a series of flashbacks that are told to a small group of fellow travelers, including a midget psychology professor, in the same train car as him after they bear witness to his water bucket belligerence. As one can expect from an old fart attempting to cultivate a clearly one-sided romance with a much younger woman that is way out of his league, Mathieu is at least partly responsible for putting himself in the pathetic position he is in as he was dumb enough to almost immediately offer virtually the entire world to Conchita soon after they initially met at a house where she was working as a friend's maid. Of course, Mathieu probably also felt it would not be too hard for a rich prick like himself to obtain a mere maid, but he could not have been more wrong. Undoubtedly, Conchita's behavior almost immediately raises a number of glaring red flags, including her patently preposterous claim that she is an 18-year-old virgin despite looking at least decade older and her naturally slutty behavior (among other things, she's a stripper with a loyal following of male friends). Additionally, aside from the fact that her father committed suicide under seemingly dubious circumstances, Conchita's mother (María Asquerino), who Mathieu almost immediately begins financially supporting, is a somewhat nutty old bitch who, owing to being once-rich, refuses to work, bragging, "I'd rather kiss church steps than sweep doorsteps. My daughter helps me but I don't want her to work. Because of the bad influences." Notably, Conchita is similarly worthless as a woman as revealed by the fact that she proudly boasts after admitting she refuses to give her dubious virginity to Mathieu, "I don't like sewing. I can't cook." On top of everything else, Conchita is friends with a group of handsome young twink criminals that rob Mathieu, yet the protagonist seems completely blind to the profound dubiousness of this. In short, aside from being bloated with all sort of personal and emotional baggage, Conchita has nothing to offer aside from her statuesque beauty yet Mathieu just cannot get over her despite not being able to get a little carnal taste of said beauty in a sad scenario that is akin to being friend-zoned by a Maenad.

As the film progresses, Mathieu's patience is increasingly tested as he chases after Conchita while trying in vain to penetrate her main vein as a terrorist insurgency brings chaos to Europe in a backdrop that somewhat parallels the protagonist's seemingly perennial failed (anti)romance. Although Conchita eventually allows Mathieu to touch her titties, she adamantly refuses to give up her much prized virginity as if it is the only thing she really has to offer (it is!). Eventually, Mathieu gets so fed up with Conchita's callous cockteasing that he attempts to penetrate her by force, but ultimately fails after spending no less than 15 minutes attempting to takeoff a canvas corset that acts as a virtual chastity belt. On top of everything else, Conchita derives a sort of sadistic glee by cuckolding Mathieu, including sneaking young handsome males into her room, dancing naked for Japanese tourists, and even forcing the protagonist to watch as she fucks a male friend (though she later tries to play off such behavior as a 'joke' and claims the male friend was actually a homosexual). Needless to say, Mathieu completely loses it after being so ruthlessly cucked and beats her to a bloody pulp, thus inspiring the heroine to questionably proclaim as blood drips from her face, "Now I know you love me. Mateo, I'm still a virgin." In the end, after telling his entire savagely sordid story to his rather attentive traveling companions, Mathieu still cannot help but desire Conchita despite the fact she pays him back by dumping a bucket of water onto his head. Luckily, the rancid romance comes to a swift explosive end when the two are killed in a terrorist explosion at a mall shortly after mutually admiring a seamstress that is symbolically mending a bloody nightgown.

Although a virtual cipher of a character, the titular twat of That Obscure Object of Desire also happens to be one of the most intensely intriguing love interests of cinema history as a sort of archetypical Madonna-whore creature that embodies qualities of both the naïve virgin and savage slut in the most insufferable ways (hence the incidental brilliance of utilizing two actresses to play one character), as if it was Buñuel's goal to create the greatest she-beast—a cravenly cruel character-without-character (like so many women) that basks in inducing male anxieties and lovelorn lunacy, sort of like a young child slowly killing a fly—in cinema history. In that sense, it almost comes as a great cathartic relief when the protagonist and his love object are blown up in the end, as if the tension created by their emotionally terrorist disharmonious romance could only conjure up such a cataclysmic scenario. Despite the glaring pulchritude of the two lead female actresses, their beauty is almost completely extinguished in the viewer's mind by the end of the film, as the character embodies some of the most repugnant negative female stereotypes, including jealousy, pettiness, sadism, shallowness, narcissism, histrionics, stupidity, hypocrisy, projection, unreliability, flakiness, and deceptiveness, among other things. While an absurdist masterpiece of cinema that is packed with plenty of playful dark humor, the film's heroine is ultimately scarier than the greatest of female villains of both cinema and television history, including Elsa ‘Rosalie’ Bannister of The Lady from Shanghai (1947), Nurse Ratched of One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest (1975), Catherine Tramell of Basic Instinct (1992), Alexandra of Alexandra’s Project (2003), and Cersei Lannister of Game of Thrones (2011–2019), among countless other examples. Undoubtedly, only fellow Mediterranean Marco Ferreri (The Seed of Man, Dillinger Is Dead) has come anywhere near to Buñuel in terms of exquisitely yet brutally depicting the unflattering character of European women in the age of Occidental decline.

THAT OBSCURE OBJECT OF DESIRE

Rather humorously, despite being a wealthy widow that should be worldlier when it comes to the wayward ways of women, the film’s protagonist Mathieu seems like a pussy-novice compared to his lowly servant Martin (André Weber) who declares when asked by his boss about the so-called fairer sex, “I have a friend who loves women very much, but he claims they’re sacks of excrement.” In a humorous misquote of Nietzsche, Martin also declares after examining the room where Mathieu has just brutalized Conchita, “If you go with women, carry a big stick.” In fact, the Nietzsche quote in question is from Thus Spoke Zarathustra: A Book for All and None (1883) and actually reads: “You go to women? Do not forget the whip!” Rather revealingly, it is only when Mathieu uses his figurative whip and beats Conchita does she express any sort of love to the protagonist in what can certainly be read as a classic display of female masochism (though one certainly doubts the sincerity of her rather conveniently timed declaration of love). Either way, there is no doubt that Mathieu was too ‘terminally nice’ to Conchita to the point where the viewer could not help but feel a certain deep-seated disgust for him, especially after multiple viewings of the film. Going back to Nietzsche, he also once wrote, “Ah, women. They make the highs higher and the lows more frequent.” Of course, the tragedy of Mathieu’s character is that, not unlike Nietzsche with his supposed great love Lou Andreas-Salomé, he does not really even get to experience any sort of high and thus comes off as the lowest of men despite his wealth and social prestige, thereupon revealing the true innate chaotic destructive power of women.

While Nietzsche is probably not the best guy to seek for advice on women, he probably had a point when he wrote, “Everything in woman is a riddle, and everything in woman has one solution – namely, pregnancy,” hence the proliferation of uniquely unhappy and prematurely-aged spinsters and wine aunts of the sexually used-up sort that now pollute the Occidental world and promote such socially deleterious things as intersectional feminism, xenophilia and third world alien ‘refugees,’ child drag-queens, government-subsidized abortion-on-demand, Holocaustianity, general neo-commie horseshit, and Marvel movies, among various other forms of garbage that appeals to infertile resentment-ridden broads that are in total denial that they wasted their lives on the false song of sexual liberation. While one could utilize Freudian psychobabble to argue that Conchita is a symbol of the male libidinal drive and the continual frustration of said drive naturally causes the explosion in the end, That Obscure Object of Desire proves to be a more enriching experience when viewed today as a cautionary tale about putting modern-day post-feminist pussy on a pedestal. Despite the film's rather unflattering depiction of women, it apparently offended the sensitive sensibilities of gay terrorist extremists in a rare instance of 'life-imitating-art,' or as Buñuel—a man that, incidentally, practiced fag-bashing in his youth—explained in his autobiography, "Ironically, a bomb exploded on October 16, 1977, in the Ridge Theatre in San Francisco, where the movie was being shown; and during the confusion that followed, four reels were stolen and the walls covered with graffiti like, 'This time you've gone too far!' There was some evidence to suggest that the attack was engineered by a group of homosexuals, and although those of this persuasion didn't much like the film, I've never been able to figure out why."

Interestingly, despite concluding his career with a film as radically anti-romantic as That Obscure Object of Desire, Buñuel—a proud lapsed Catholic atheist and iconoclast that seemed to believe in nothing aside from the power of biting humor aimed at all form of authority (including the commies he once sided with in his youth)—was apparently a strong believer in not only love, but sacrificial love, as indicated by his words, "I would willingly sacrifice my liberty to love. I have already done so . . . I would sacrifice a cause to love, but each situation would have to be considered separately." Indeed, as British film critic Raymond Durnat noted in his book Luis Buñuel (1968), "He declared that he would renounce being the person he could be, if that were the cost of being sure of his love. He would think highly of a man who, to please the woman he loved, was willing to betray his principles." While Buñuel also replied "I don't know" when asked if he believed in love's victory over the sordidness of life (or vice versa), he would also state, "I should still ask him not to betray his principles—in fact, I'd insist on it" in regard to the sacrifice of self for love. Of course, Buñuel's belief in love can be seen in his depiction of l'amour fou in his rarely-seen Emily Brontë adaptation Abismos de pasión (1954) aka Wuthering Heights. While it has certainly did little good in the long run for my life, I also believe in the power of love, including 'mad love,' which is also why I find the one-sided lovesickness of the protagonist of That Obscure Object of Desire to be so completely infuriating as it is a waste of pure diabolic energy on an unloving dumb dud of a dame that is probably lame in bed and really has nothing to offer outside the aesthetic appeal of a carefully manicured mannequin, hence the 'object' of the film's title. After all, at least from my experience, love tends to be a carefully cultivated post-coital phenomenon that requires a certain degree of mutually expressed emotional and physical intimacy (and anything less seems to be simple beta-boy infatuation conjured from too much fantasizing about the totally intangible). After recently re-watching That Obscure Object of Desire, I can safely say that Buñuel was onto something when he wrote, "Sometimes, watching a movie is a bit like being raped.” And, while I find the idea of a woman being able to rape a man somewhat equivocal (and I say that from experience!), Buñuel’s film demonstrates beyond a shadow of a doubt that a woman—even an insufferably stupid woman—can certainly completely ravage a man’s soul and turn him into a pathetic shell of his former self.

THAT OBSCURE OBJECT OF DESIRE

-Ty E

DER VERLORENE SOHN

Luis Trenker (1934)

If any National Socialist 'propaganda' succeeded in expressing the völkisch metaphysical feeling that permeated throughout various parts of the German-speaking world during the early 20th century, it is most certainly Der Verlorene Sohn (1934) aka The Prodigal Son written, directed, and starring South Tyrolean (Austrian-Italian) adventurist auteur Luis Trenker (The Mountain Calls aka Der Berg Ruft, Love Letters from the Engadine aka Liebesbriefe aus dem Engadin), yet the filmmaker was by no means a full-fledged fascist, let alone a Hitlerite as some might expect. While The Prodigal Son was exploited by the National Socialists as a work expounding the Faustian gospel of blood and honor in its dichotomous portrayal of the city as an unhealthy human zoo that spawns unnatural corruption, thievery, and starvation, and the country as a magical and majestic place of purity and bloody mysticism where one's soul is rooted in the soil, Luis Trenker – a genuine man's man and trained architect who not only directed films on dangerous mountain tops, but also performed his own stunts, including height altitude mountain-climbing and skiing – decided to move to Rome so as to avoid artistic subversion by the Nazi government. Incidentally, Trenker's The Prodigal Son would act as a forerunner to Italian neorealism, as the film had a major influence on Italian auteur Roberto Rossellini (Europa '51, Journey to Italy) and would ironically direct arguably the most important post-WWII Italian film trilogy (Rome, Open City (1945), Paisà (1946), Germany, Year Zero (1948)); three anti-fascist war films utilizing the real ruins of war torn Europa. Although Trenker got his start in filmmaking in 1921 by working on Mountain films with the pioneer of the distinctly Germanic film genre Arnold Fanck (The Holy Mountain, The White Hell of Pitz Palu) and Leni Riefenstahl (The Blue Light, Triumph of the Will), the 'German Guido' – a filmmaker while mostly Germanic culturally, but also displaying a certain Italian sentimentalism – would eventually become a filmic Renaissance man in his own right with The Prodigal Son being his most unique and standout auteur piece. As film historian William K. Everson once wrote, "The mountain film was to Germany what the Western was to America, and Trenker, as its leading practitioner, was in a sense Germany's John Wayne and John Ford rolled into one." Doing his own death-defying stunts on the snowy Alps, traveling to the United States and directing scenes illegally guerrilla-style without permission in Great Depression era New York City, displaying a deeply religious faith in an idiosyncratic yet totally organic form of Germanic Pagan-Catholicism not unlike the sort of 'positive Christianity' espoused by Nazi philosopher Alfred Rosenberg (although firmly anti-Catholic himself) in his tome The Myth of the Twentieth Century (1930), and expressing a genuine oneness with his nation and kultur, Luis Trenker single-handedly proved real honorable and masculine men could apply the same sort of dedication and integrity that one would invest in commanding an army or building a skyscraper.

DER VERLORENE SOHN

As a sort of Stroszek (1977) of its time, albeit by no means nihilistic and pessimistic in its concluding message, The Prodigal Son centers around protagonist Tonio Feuersinger (Luis Trenker), an adventurous Tyrolean logger and mountaineer who travels to the United States to climb the American Rockies, but he never quite gets there as the merry mountain-man's innate romanticism is so overwhelming for his own good and causes him to have a delusional vision of the supposed land of the free and home of the brave. While also inspired by the idiom "he who never leaves never returns," to the dismay of his faithful lady friend Barbl Gudauner (Maria Andergast), Tonio also has his Tyrolean Teutonic eye on wealthy American beauty Lillian Williams (Marian Marsh) – a cosmopolitan lady more Aryan in appearance than his Tyrolean sweetheart – thus making for a secondary reason for leaving his small village. Far from the sort of negrophiliac barbarian typical of modern Hollywood action heroes with no sense of comradeship, Tonio is an old school male who takes pride in his hard work, even while working on Saturdays and singing the verse, "The merriest folks are the wood-cutting folks," while jollily busting his ass with his logger compatriots, as well as playing a fair good game of roughhousing with his friends. Tonio also puts family first above all else, finishing the work of his father (Eduard Köck) so as to help the old man with work that is getting harder and harder to do as he ages. A dual sun-worshipper and spiritual son of a Freyja-like Virgin Mary, Tonio has no idea that he is going to land on a virtual hell on earth full of beggars, degenerates, and racial mongrels of the superlatively American 'melting pot' sort. While dreaming of traveling to America and New York City, Tonio speaks too soon when he states, "God, I imagine living in a city must be a hundred times more beautiful than here," as he feels like a "caged fox" and claims he does not, "like the mountains anymore," but then again, as a son of the sun and blood and soil, the especially enthusiastic Aryan adventurer has yet to experience the distinctly inorganic manmade realms of crime-ridden cement metropolises of misery, which contain no natural beauty, free natural resources, or earthly adventure, but are instead teeming with distinctly human social abstraction and alienation, poverty and starvation, and rampant yet outlawed vagrancy; the sort of story that can turn a healthy farm boy into an HIV-positive tranny in no time.

When Tonio arrives in NYC, his senses are overwhelmed as he is bombarded with a curious cosmopolitan cocktail of pollution, claustrophobic atmosphere, stylistically sterile skyscrapers that block his view of the sky, unemployed Negroes and other racial groups he has never seen before, pawn and cigar shops, and the endless lines of cars in traffic, which is in stark contrast to the relatively quiet and wide-open area of his mountain village where one need not worry about having too little personal space. Although he intended to meet up with the wealthy benefactor Mr. Williams (F.W. Schröder-Schrom) – a man who funded the prizes for a local ski competition in his hometown and would have provided the young man with financial security had his resources run dry – Tonio soon learns that the man is away for the winter, thus he must fend for himself without a dime to his name in a foreign city that eats people and spits them out in no time. Out of desperation, Tonio pawns all his belongings for a mere $1.50 and resorts to sleeping on park benches, where he is hassled by local police. Eventually, the Germanic immigrant finds work at dangerous job doing welding on a skyscraper in scenes that have a startling resemblance to the iconic photographs of American sociologist/photographer Lewis Hine, and, needless to say, Tonio is soon daydreaming about taking a boat back to his hometown. Despite working hard for virtually nothing, Tonio begins to resemble a degenerate drunken hobo of sorrowful sorts and even resorts to the previously seemingly unthinkable by stealing food and standing in foodlines, which a local police officers catches him for, but lets him go out of compassion for the immigrant’s decidedly destitute state. Tonio ends up making one mere friend, Jimmy (Jimmie Fox) – an off-white Italian/Jewish type funnyman, not unlike a character from an early Fellini film like I Vitelloni (1953) – who is constantly in trouble with the law, but someone with whom down-and-out Tonio can identify due to his equally degraded and despairing position in American society. Eventually, by happenstance while interfering with a boxing match, Tonio becomes a successful prize-fighter and hooks up with wealthy Mr. Williams finally, even making his friend Jimmy successful in the process, but Tonio ultimately longs for the place of his birth and having experienced everything America has to offer, decides to go back home, where he is crowned the “Rauhnacht King” during the ancient Germanic pagan celebration of Rauhnacht where all the spirits rise from the earth (meadows, fields, fire, wind, etc.), in the from of the locals dressed in eerie and phantasmagorical costumes and masks, to worship the Sun-God, whereupon he is given the opportunity to choose between 12 Raunhnacht girls wearing masks to be his wife.

Ironically, immediately after the conclusion of the Second World War, The Prodigal Son was banned in both Western and Eastern Germany, because whereas the American military occupying forces believed the film was innately anti-American in sentiment, the Soviets felt the film was an advertisement for Americanism and the American way of life. Indeed, the film is certainly not nearly as American as one would expect because while The Prodigal Son portrays NYC in a most unflattering light, it also depicts the cultureless country as a place where one can truly go from rags to riches virtually overnight with a little good luck and, of course, if one is willing to work hard enough, which is indubitably one of America’s ‘noble’ attributes, if not a mostly unrealistic one for most people. With its partial quasi-Mediterranean sentimentalism for the importance of friends and family, as well as its concluding setting during the holiday Rauhnacht celebration – an event that usually takes place during the 12 days of Christmas – The Prodigal Son is somewhat surprisingly in good company with Frank Capra’s Christmas classic

DER VERLORENE SOHN

It's a Wonderful Life (1946); a work also featuring a man who has to go on a spiritual journey of sorts, only to realize the intrinsic and irreplaceable value of friends and family in a small community and life itself, is infinitely more important to material gain. Unlike most films of its epoch, The Prodigal Son holds up quite well after all the years, so much so that I was rather surprised by how fast it went by in its immaculate editing, striking action sequences, and surprisingly 'modern' direction, so much so that that I can see myself watching it next Christmas season, but I cannot say the same about It's a Wonderful Life; a work I can tolerate viewing every decade or so. Combining some of the best elements of the German Mountain film genre with proto-Italian neo-realist/Cinéma vérité imagery that depicts the bowels of the Great Depression era big rotten apple in an audaciously authentic manner like never seen before, as well as featuring Germanic Pagan and Aryanized Catholic imagery and costumes that would chill the most coldhearted of atheist's souls, The Prodigal Son is both an important piece of cinema and cultural history that makes one question who were the real barbarians during the Second World War. Personally, I would rather celebrate Rauhnacht during a cold winter night than rage at an ecstasy-addled rave, but maybe I am just old fashioned.

-Ty E

THE NEW DAUGHTER

Luiso Berdejo (2009)

It hit me with the combined force of a thundering stampede, this Kevin Costner desire. As a pregnant woman would awaken in the middle of the night yearning various sweets, I, too, experienced an all too similar craving for junk food which I discovered the films of Kevin Costner. Realistically, it had been years since I have sat down and paid mind to his various methods of acting - whether it be of an assertive and bold villainous mold (3000 Miles to Graceland) or an all-American Joe (A Perfect World), albeit confrontational and quick-to-kill as the human genome would have it. I had ran into The New Daughter multiple times since its release but have passed it off as marquee fodder. Big name actors mixed with hurried horror never seem to go the way of quality but after eventually collecting a large mass of Costner titles and indulging in The New Daughter I must now redefine my standards of acceptance. Obviously heading the cast, Kevin Costner plays single father (John James) to an insecure daughter all too well. There's the son too, but not much focus is given to him as his role in the family is young mediator to a detached teenage girl. Moving into a house located in a rural area, things quickly shift from tolerable to dreadful as his daughter becomes more and more disheveled and distant, which may or may not have to do with a large mound of earth located directly on the property.

Now I must admit, another factor in my deciding against The New Daughter were select reviews opposing the film in its entirety. Some even went as far as suggesting it be among the ranks of SyFy films while crucifying the poor film for not being "cool" or "exciting". To be fair, these notions are true for the most part, there are no stunning car chases to be found in The New Daughter, nor are there any choreographed scenes of combat. But to its credit, The New Daughter drips with dread and conceals itself in a dense and murky atmosphere. The woodland deities that crawl through the forest produce some of the most unnerving howls in recent creature cinema memory. Luiso Berdejo (writer of [Rec]) has expertly crafted a spooky thriller in which Costner is given free reign to adapt to survive. Also in tune with the feminine abscess is the soundtrack consisting of drone and slight distortions - almost like ripples through the terror. Another great quality of The New Daughter is how understanding the film is of its earthen aesthetic. Brush, twigs, soil, and branches play a large part of morphing a backyard into an embryonic tomb home to strange "mound-walkers" - nocturnal creatures that prowl, searching for a queen to ensure continuity of their species. And it is thus that makes The New Daughter such an eerie coming-of-age tale, one woven from fascination of barrows and ancient civilizations.

But the fascination comes at a steep price. Most Western efforts of fantasy covering such native ruins tend to skip from the wondrous reach of a (past)traditional way of life to cold, hard terror of the unknown. It is the act of demonizing things unknown or peculiar to us that make for such excellent horror fodder. Now most complaints tend to adhere to the minimalism that is employed (very effectively, mind you) or the lack of parenting skills on Costner's behalf. Both arguments are ludicrous as both tend to the characters of the film rather than the finished product. If Costner's character John made an error in judgment then that can be directly attributed to a character flaw. The New Daughter is striking, brooding, violent when it needs to be, and quite tragic. It also happens to be one of the finest direct to video horror films I have seen yet. With ambiguity clouding the ending for all, The New Daughter is sure to alienate viewers. Take a second to loosen restraint on strict judgment and give The New Daughter a whirl. Whether or not you enjoy it, it is more consistent in quality than a vast majority of cinematic practices out there. Have you a penchant for realized night terrors, the otherworldly mound-walkers might be enough to rattle your bones. If not the sight than surely the bone-rattling shrieks and stammers of such a dying breed. I can hear them purring away nightmare fuel as I type.

THE NEW DAUGHTER

-mAQ

THE DOUBLE HEADED EAGLE

Lutz Becker (1973)

The Double Headed Eagle is a unique documentary chronicling Hitler and the National Socialist Party's humble beginning to their assumption of power in 1933. The documentary merely relies on stock footage after Germany's defeat in "The Great War" to the book burnings of works from "exaggerated Jewish intellectualism." There is no commentary featured in the documentary and it is up to the viewer to analyze the Nazi Party's rise. Director Lutz Becker concludes The Double Headed Eagle with a spiteful out of context quote by German Jewish romantic poet Heinrich Heine. From the beginning of The Double Headed Eagle you get the feeling there was something hidden behind the Nazi Party. At first the Nazi rallies are community sized featuring local peasants interacting with Adolf Hitler and his right hand men. The Nazi Party was a hit with peasants because the "blood" was the one thing that united them with the rest of Germany. As the years pass, the Nazi Party rallies get bigger and more extravagant. The rise of the Nazi Party parallels with the increased degeneracy of the failed democratic Weimer Republic. The Weimer Republic seemed to have a similar cancer that plagues the "democracy" of the United States today. Throughout The Double Headed Eagle Nazi SA street fighters battle limp wrist communists through the streets of Deutschland. The leaders of the SA were aggressive and masculine beer gulping homosexuals that sought to destroy what they saw as the "Jewish" plague of communism. Of course, many of these communists were Jewish but most German Jews were not communists. The SA would have it's meeting in a local German gay bar. In the book The Pink Swastika, the Zionist Judeo-Christian propagandists authors make up the absurd theory that German Nazism was the result of a long history of German homosexual war societies. The reality is that the SA was the only truly "gay" faction of the Nazi party and it lost most of it's power after Hitler seized the German state. Shortly after Adolf Hitler gained power he had gay SA leader Ernst Röhm killed in the famous "Knight of the Long Knives." A very interesting speech found in The Double Headed Eagle is when Adolf Hitler states that he will have all political parties banned. Most holocaust "historians" will tell you this did in fact happen. There was, however, one party that was not banned. The Jewish Zionist party was allowed to continue publishing newspapers, flying their flag, and promoting the Jews to emigrate to Palestine (which in 1948 would be declared the official Jewish state of Israel). The Zionist party also collaborated with rounding up "dissent" assimilated anti-Zionist Jews from concentration camps among other "forgotten" and "unspeakable" things. Even today in Israel, the race laws on "who is Jewish" is similar to that of the Nuremberg laws. After viewing The Double Headed Eagle, the "effect" for the viewer is that the "evil" Nazi party came to power due to the irrational desperation of the people. Unemployment is at an all time high, democracy failed (although Adolf Hitler was elected in Democratically), and the Jews control all of the banks. The documentary forgets to enlighten the viewer on one crucial element though. Without Adolf Hitler's Wall Street bankers, he could have never risen to power. Furthermore, without his bankers Hitler could not have prolonged the second World War and his suicide for so many years. It is also interesting to note that Germany's industry and factories were disassembled after the war only to be sent to the Soviet Union (among other countries). The firebombing of Germany only executed with the intentions of killing civilians (mainly women and children) and destroying German culture. After all, very few soldiers were killed and military complexes destroyed in these bombings (I.e. Dresden). The Double Headed Eagle is the best documentary of it's kind. The footage featured in the film seems to be neglected by most because it lacks dead corpses. The Nazi leaders make a couple threats to Jews that seemed a bit contrived. The Double Headed Eagle is essentially a must view for anyone that has even a slight interest in it's subject matter.

THE DOUBLE HEADED EAGLE

-Ty E

HOMMAGE À 'LA SARRAZ'

Lutz Dammbeck (1981)

Rather ironically, as their various strong national movements and general intolerance towards Hollywoodism/Americanism demonstrates, it seems that the eastern half of Europe that was under virtual slavery to the Soviet Union for about half a century is less deracinated, decadent, and 'liberal' than the western half that lived under the softcore dictatorship up Uncle Sam, Ronald McDonald, and the Rothschild Army Faction. In fact, American neo-Spenglerian philosopher/revolutionary Francis Parker Yockey was so convinced that America and the rest of the American-colonized West was such a lost cause and that the Soviet Union was less taunted that by late 1952 he argued that Yank and European nationalist groups should align themselves with the Russians to cut the tentacles of Americanization once and for all, but I digress. Undoubtedly, post-WWII German cinema is a good place to study in regard to discerning the different effects of Americanization and Soviet communism, as while virtually all of the West German filmmakers associated with German New Cinema were hardcore leftists, feminists, and neo-Marxists, Eastern Germany at least produced a couple of filmmakers that had not succumbed to the various spiritual ailments (i.e. ethno-masochism) that were quite common in the American-colonized segment of the Fatherland. Indeed, although associated with German New Cinema, Prussian auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King, Hitler: A Film from Germany), who would go on to become one of the most hated filmmakers in Germany due to his political persuasion and scandalous public statements about certain 'protected groups' (i.e. Jews, communists) and dared to mix kraut commie Bertolt Brecht's doctrine of epic theatre with romantic Wagnerian opera aesthetics, was associated with GNC, he actually grew up in Eastern Germany. Additionally, painter, filmmaker, and multi-media artist Lutz Dammbeck (Herakles Höhle aka The Cave of Hercules, Dürers Erben aka Dürer's Heirs), who has spent a good portion of his career focusing on the history of National Socialist aesthetics and Teutonic art in general, is from the commie GDR, but that did not stop him from utilizing NS aesthetics, including Arno Breker statues, for his early art instillations during the 1980s. Indeed, although best known for his documentary The Net (2003) aka Das Netz—an experimental work about technology and its relation to Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, LSD, the CIA, and the counter-culture movement—the seeming majority of the director's work has had to do with National Socialism in some shape or form, with his early 12-minute experimental collage short Hommage à 'La Sarraz' (1981) be a rather striking, if not aesthetically corrosive, example of this.

Featuring a radio recording of National Socialist propagandist Fritz Hippler of Der Ewige Jude (1940) aka The Eternal Jew infamy, excerpts from the völkisch quasi-avant-garde Nazi flick Enchanted Forest (1936) aka Ewiger Wald directed by Hanns Springer and Rolf von Sonjevski-Jamrowski, the romantic musical Wunschkonzert (1940) aka Request Concert, and audio recordings of Austrian-German singer Marika Röck and Dutch actor Johannes Heesters, as well as clips from various 1930s UFA newsreels, contemporary news clips, and various other forms of recycled footage, Hommage à 'La Sarraz' was made with quite different intentions than its subversive ingredients might indicate as it takes its name from and pays tribute to a meeting that took place in 1929 among members of the European/Soviet film avant-garde at La Sarraz castle in Switzerland where a number of important auteur filmmakers made a manifesto condemning two specific things: "The commercialization of film and its subservience to ideology." Of course, as a meeting attended by the likes of bolshevik auteur Sergei Eisenstein, whose whole career was based on subservience to an ideology (even if he did find himself in trouble at different points in his career), as well as Walter Ruttmann, who later became an assistant to Leni Riefenstahl on Triumph of the Will (1935), it is quite dubious as to whether or not these men stuck to their pledge, but that is ultimately irrelevant as Dammbeck's film was intended as a tribute to that spirit of the avant-garde, or as the director wrote himself, "And the result was my own experimental 'La Sarraz' revival studio, where we adapted the idea to the present day in an attempt to carry on in the 'La Sarraz' tradition." Originally part of a multi-media project created by the director called the 'Hercules Media Collage' that combined performance art, painting, dance (Fine Kwiatkowski), film ('La Sarraz'), and photography, Hommage à 'La Sarraz' is not exactly something you would expect to have been assembled by a GDR artist (in fact, the director submitted a script for an experimental film that was 'unalterably rejected' by the 'Dresdener Studio für Trickfilm' aka Dresden Cartoon Studio in 1984), as a sort of innately anarchistic postmodern 'neo-Heimat' celluloid poem of sorts.

HOMMAGE À 'LA SARRAZ'

Teutonic art faggotry at its finest where autistic animation, home movie footage (including a humorous scene where Dammbeck and his friends are introduced as (in)famous Nazi filmmakers), about half a century's worth of eclectic German film/news footage, and a truly throbbing 'music' track by noise group Throbbing Gristle, Hommage à 'La Sarraz' feels more or less like the chaos of the Volksgeist of a Volk without a true Heimat, or as Syberberg once wrote, Germany is, "spiritually disinherited and dispossessed... a country without a homeland, without 'Heimat.'" Indeed, during one especially interesting scene, Dammbeck juxtaposed footage of an ugly post-industrial highway with the following narration from the film Enchanted Forest: "From the forest we came, like the forests we live, from the forest we crave out Heimat and space. Like the forests our souls expand, full of life, lust, and need. Full of questions. God, please tell us, what is the hidden meaning of death?" Of course, there are no forests in the film, as the technocratic plague has bulldozed them down, with East Germany being blessed with the ungodly Soviet aesthetic. In another standout scene, a guy being interviewed for a contemporary news show remarks: "For Goebbels it was always important to provide good entertainment [...] they [people] don't want to watch anything where at the end of the film they say: "We might as well hang ourselves, there's no sense in living!" No: People want to be entertained!" Of course, Hommage à 'La Sarraz' was not created to entertain, as it is a sort of playful aesthetically terroristic wake-up call about a divided nation that only has an undigested past and thus no future, hence the Burroughs-esque 'cut-up' technique style use of vintage footage and audio recordings. Undoubtedly, while watching the short, it is clear that the director has a genuine interest in understanding his nation's history and his subsequent works, especially his for 4-documentary "Kunst & Macht" project certainly demonstrates that. Of course, only when Germans have properly 'accepted' their past will they be able to go on with the future and once again create truly groundbreaking cinematic art. Naturally, the same can be said about the rest of Europe, hence the all but total evaporation of not only national cinema movements, but art and culture in general.

-Ty E

AGE OF THE GODS
AGE OF THE GODS

Lutz Dammbeck (1992)

While the Allies, especially the Americans, have gone to great pains to present themselves as flawless angel-like heroes who saved the world from the Great Satan Adolf Hitler and his demonic armies of kosher-baby-eating killer krauts, they also committed their fair share of crime and atrocities against humanity, especially of the aesthetic sort, as while the Nazis are constantly criticized for looting art, the Yanks and Brits intentionally destroyed ancient cities, cultural landmarks, and especially contemporary neo-classical statues like true jealous and opportunistic barbarians who finally got to achieve their depraved dream to wipe out the great cultural legacy that their own philistine nations lacked. Indeed, aside from the firebombing of Dresden, which was the brainchild of bloated alcoholic Winston Churchill and done with the quite questionable intention of merely spreading terror and chaos in already war-ravaged Germany, destroying an ancient city (which, being old, was largely made of wood and thus easy to incinerate), and senselessly killing mostly innocent civilians, the Allies perpetrated countless other crimes that are not that well known, including the destruction of over 90% of German sculptor Arno Breker's public works. As a man whose ancient Greek inspired neo-classical sculptures reflected the strength, beauty, and godlike essence that was officially endorsed by National Socialism, Breker naturally found his work to be the target of Allied resentment yet, somewhat surprisingly, he was partly rehabilitated after the Second World War and in 1946 was even offered a commission by Joseph Stalin of all people. Of course, as a personal friend of Jean Cocteau who created busts of people ranging from Jewish poet Heinrich Heine to alpha-surrealist Salvador Dalí, Breker was not exactly a true believer in the Nazi cause and in the artsy fartsy documentary Zeit der Götter (1992) aka Age of the Gods director Lutz Dammbeck attempted to find out what made the sculptor transform into a budding modernist/avant-gardist into one of the most powerful artists in the world as the "official state sculptor" of the Third Reich who was commissioned in 1938 to redesign Berlin as the "World Capital GERMANIA." Part of Dammbeck's rather idiosyncratic four-part "Kunst & Macht" art documentary series which is, in turn, part of the director's Heiner Müller-inspired "Herakles-Konzept" (aka "Hercules Concept")—a highly personalized multi-media theory that began in 1982 and utilizes paintings, collages, installations, films and other artistic mediums—Age of the Gods is an exceedingly ambitious (and thus somewhat convoluted) work that largely uses the life and work of Breker as a pretext to discuss the modernist influence of National Socialist art, the corruption of an artist by the prospect of power, and the strange occult influences that gave birth to both the National Socialist Weltanschauung and aesthetic. Directed by a seemingly apolitical auteur from the communist GDR who seems more interested in provocative mysteries from German art history than pedantically preaching about how innately evil Breker's Uncle Adolf approved statues are, Age of the Gods is a work of art in and of itself that demonstrates that Teutonic art history is not exactly as transparent as whiny left-wing art historians would have you believe.

Age of the Gods begins with the story of an unnamed kraut sculptor from an old town in Prague who became the Minister of Fine Arts for the GDR after the Second World War and was commissioned to create the largest Stalin sculpture in the world, only to later kill himself after coming to the realization that he, "betrayed his youthful artistic ideals to this power" and failed to become an heir to "all the sculptors in his country's history" (of course he failed, as he was a cuckold of communism and thus a traitor to himself and his country's history). Of course, this unnamed sculptor's tragic story somewhat superficially parallels that of Arno Breker who was seduced by Adolf Hitler when the Führer apparently said to the sculptor in 1936, "Young man, from now on you will only work for me." Of course, as the doc reveals, Breker always had an interest in both romantic and völkisch Teutonic ideals as demonstrated by the fact that he was a member of the Wandervogel and was once heavily inspired by listening to Teutonic philosopher Ludwig Klages—a member of the Stefan George circle who was certainly no friend of the Jews—read from his work Man and Earth, in which is described by Dammebeck as, "an appeal to revolt against Nihilism...an invocation of the Germanic and pagan gods which progress, capitalism, and Christianity work to defeat." As Dammebeck describes, Breker ultimately broke with a played-out 200 year artistic tradition that started with the French Revolution that attempted to depict the so-called "equality of the people" via statues, as the National Socialist sculptor apparently had, "another vision, something more ancient, more powerful rooted far back in history...not always visible, but always present."

Ironically, according to Breker's main model Gustav Stührk, it was Breker's Greek wife Mimina who convinced the sculptor in 1935 to begin creating neo-classical works and get involved with the "national wave in Germany," as so-called "Gothic Expressionism" had been labelled a degenerate art. In no time, Uncle Adolf discovered Breker's art and had Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels look around Berlin for the mysterious young man whose sculptures he greatly admired. As Dammebeck subjectively narrates, by 1938, "Breker, now a Nazi party member, is on his way to the top but he has no theme anymore. He and his art are now part of a mighty machine, attempting to redesign the whole world, in conjunction with the vision of the return of the gods." Indeed, Breker's transformation into an artistic god is most apparent in an infamously iconic photo from June 23, 1940 of Breker posing with Hitler and architect Albert Speer in conquered Paris, which Demmebeck describes as follows: "Before a suggestive backdrop, Hitler, Speer, and Breker imitate a scene from antiquity: Hitler as the successful general, Pericles. Left: Albert Speer as building master Iktenus. Right: the sculptor Arno Breker as his new Phidias...from now on sworn to the future ruler of the world.” As the documentary makes quite clear, Breker seemed more interested in hanging out with his fellow artists than conquering the world, as he befriended frog sculptors Charles Despiau and Aristide Maillol and started an enduring friendship with poet/filmmaker Jean Cocteau during his stay in Paris in 1942. Cocteau and Breker also went to a private screening of Carmen (1944) starring the former’s rather Aryan-looking boyfriend Jean Marais, whose life was saved by the German sculptor. Indeed, as Marais himself describes in the documentary, he was arrested after beating up a Nazi-collaborator journalist who worked for the Gestapo and if it were not for Breker’s influence, he might have met a grizzly end at the hands of the Gestapo. Interestingly, Marais, who had a rather Aryan appearance, starred in the Vichy era Cocteau adaptation L’éternel retour (1943) aka The Eternal Return, which is a modernist take on Tristan und Isolde that some viewers felt had Nazi undertones.

AGE OF THE GODS

Undoubtedly, one of the more interesting segments of Age of the Gods is an interview with German Conservative Revolutionary novelist Ernst Jünger who, on top of being almost a centenarian at the age of 97 at the time he was interviewed, is featured sporting a goofy Japanese button-up shirt featuring dragon designs that is quite in contrast to his dubious reputation as an elitist ‘nazi artistocrat.’ Ultimately, the novelist sums up Breker better than anyone else in the doc by remarking, “The political doesn’t interest me in an artist...only the artistic. What political bend he has...is absolutely secondary in comparison. I don’t agree with everything Breker did, especially not the very large things, but I’ve always felt that he’s very capable.” Jünger, who once sat for 8 days for the sculptor for a bust that was made of him, also compliments Breker’s sensitivity as an artist by stating, “I suppose, the bust he did of me is good. I have to rely on my wife there. She said, he’d captured elements which were only familiar to her. One has to extract the best of a person. I tried to with Breker too. I’ve always had a heart for persecuted persons.” Jünger also concludes that Breker was naïve about the war and National Socialism, remarking that if the sculptor had realized Germany was involved in a ‘Weltbürgerkrieg’ (global civil war) as opposed to a national war during the Second World War that, “he may’ve made figures like Harmodios and Aristogeiton, that is the Greek figure, where two heroes kill a tyrant.”

Despite revolving around the life and work of Arno Breker, Ages of the Gods is ultimately a work that is more about whether one can separate the aesthetic from the political, especially in regard to a disgraced/blacklisted artist, as well work about the timeless dichotomy of opportunism versus autonomy among artists, than a traditional biographical documentary. Additionally, auteur Lutz Dambeck also uses the documentary to propose various theories and speculation, including that Uncle Adolf may have had gay love for the sculptor. Indeed, during one scene in the doc, the following 1942 diary entry by Jean Cocteau is read by the director: "When Hindenburg worked with Hitler, he became totally attached to him. When Hitler went to Munich, Hindenburg never slept until he had a call from Hitler. So is was with Hitler and Breker: He asks him to drive carefully. He loves him. He is his adoptive son, like Jeannot for me." The documentary also reveals that in 1990 Breker helped found a seemingly homoerotic neo-Männerbünde group called the 'Alexander Order' with frog fag novelist/diplomat Roger Peyrefitte and Austrian Jewish painter Ernst Fuchs that was dedicated to the "glory of male genius and beauty in the spirit of eternal antiquity." The documentary also goes on a number of bizarre and seemingly random tangents about proto-Nazi occult groups and occultists like the Thule Society and Lanz von Liebenfels. Interestingly, the doc features rare footage of an SS expedition to Tibet and other Ahnenerbe expeditions, as well as random references to SS man Otto Rahn's failed attempts to locate the Holy Grail in Southern France. Unfortunately, Dammbeck also attempts to associate Conservative Revolutionaries Ernst Jünger and German poet Stefan George with the same anti-humanistic aesthetic trend that led to National Socialism, as if they are also culpable for the holocaust despite the fact that both men rejected the Third Reich. In fact, towards the end of the documentary, the director interviews fairly unknown and rather eccentric contemporary German völkisch poet Rolf Schilling, who collaborated with Breker on a poetry book, in a fashion that seems like a rather pathetic way to discredit the sculptor. Quite ironically, both Jünger and a typically boorish Soviet officer agree that Breker's art totally transcends its political connotations.

At the conclusion of Age of the Gods, director Dammbeck narrates the following words in a pseudo-sinister fashion as if to warn Germans about some imaginary Luciferian National Socialist uprising: "The attempt to realize the vision of the return of the gods failed politically in 1945. The artist Arno Breker, who had served this vision, also failed. The building blocks of this vision remained, to be reconstituted at will. 'Giants and Titans grow first in the dawn' says Ernst Jünger. Are the old gods returning today, after an interim period?" Interestingly, the last couple of minutes of the documentary features grainy footage of one of Breker's lost sculptures that was trashed by the Allies after the Second World War being salvaged from a lake in a somewhat silly scene that insinuates that the old Germanic gods are rising from the abyss for the first time since 1945. Naturally, one must take into consideration that the doc was made around the time of the German reunification, so many Teutons had fears regarding the future of Deutschland that ultimately proved to have no basis in reality. Of course, Germany has only become all the more socially and culturally degenerate since Age of the Gods was first released over two decades ago, so it is rather unlikely that the nation will produce another Hitler or Breker anytime soon. Describing his "Herakles-Konzept" as an attempt to present, "a cyber-netic concept, an endless loop made up of guilt, and violence, and attempted disintegration,” Dammbeck certainly proves with the documentary that he has the sort of nihilistic and self-flagellating psychology that is quite typical of post-WWII Germans, albeit to a lesser degree (indeed, it seems Western Germans are much more screwed up in that regard), so the Breker flick must be viewed as a collection of wrongly assembled yet nonetheless provocative puzzle pieces that were put together by a figurative blind man. Indeed, maybe if contemporary Germans looked to the aesthetics of masters like Breker, Jünger, and George instead of celebrating the senseless extermination of their grandparents in firebombings like the distinctly degenerate and exceedingly ethno-masochistic pro-Zionist ‘Antideutsch’ movement does, then the Teutonic people might survive to see the next century. Undoubtedly, for those individuals with even the slightest interest in German art history and/or the Third Reich, Age of the Gods, as well as the other three documentaries in Dammbeck’s Kunst & Macht series, makes for mandatory viewing. After all, what other documentary can boast featuring an elderly Ernst Jünger speaking kind words regarding Breker while sporting an eccentric Jap shirt?!

AGE OF THE GODS

-Ty E

THE VILLAGE

M. Night Shyamalan (2004)

Recently I decided to watch M. Night Shyamalan's The Village just for the hell it. Or maybe it was because I wanted to see the would-be cool hip-hop Hebrew Adrian Brody play a retard among pleasant Aryan kinfolk. Maybe it was also because I also wanted to further my respect for Shyamalan being one of the most shameless cinema plagiarists out there, showing his unrelenting knack for reproducing worn out shock endings and highly predictable climaxes. Another reason was probably due to a silly article I read calling Indian-American M. Night Shyamalan the "last white nationalist" filmmaker, a statement that shows the utter desperation of white nationalist types attempting to reveal any type of "pro-white" sentiment in pop culture. After all, Shyamalan has a fairly brown complexion. M. Night Shyamalan had the luxury of growing up in one of the most white states in the country; Pennsylvania. It is no doubt a given that Mr. Shyamalan encountered some Amish and Mennonites folk whilst growing up but he also probably encountered the human zoo desperation of Philadelphia, one of America's various third world refugee disaster sites. Despite his own third world ancestry, M. Night Shyamalan seems most cinematically concerned with the dispossessed majority aka America's white population. Unlike most of the cynical artless filth that comes out of Hollywood, M. Night Shyamalan seems to respect white American traditionalism even if he acknowledges it as a rusting antique hardly capable of refurbishing itself. In The Village, M. Night Shyamalan looks into a vacuum of the old white world, although the world really is not old but a creation of a group of elders who decide having a contrived atavistic re-awakening is the best way to go about rejecting the urban degeneracy of parasitical postmodernism located in the city. Although most whites do not know it, the third world has been awaiting for the collapse of the Occidental world for sometime. The historical masterpieces The Rising Tide of Color by Lothrop Stoddard and Hour of Decision by Oswald Spengler reveal how even the most backwards gutter-dwellers of the world's numerous ghettos have long realized that the white man is losing his power. In fact, this has been going on for over a century (or more like a couple) now, for that is exactly why the former slave has lost respect for his master. After all, the former slave had more respect for his master when he was a slave, not now where the former master is a slave morality-filled coward who goes out of his way to seek atonement from the formerly dominated. What could be more pathetic? Of course, The Village does not deal with white slave-owner types, but instead the more respectable attributes of traditional white culture. The tight-knit community in The Village is morally sound, hardworking, honest, god fearing (or monster fearing), and friendly amongst one another. There is even room for the town retard (played by Adrian Brody) to be justly treated (and not as someone that should be babied like in modern American victim "culture"). After all, welfare is a Nordic invention that has no doubt been exploited by America's finest conspiring types. When retard-Brody falls to his death whilst pretending to be a monster (he never needed the mask with that beak on his face), the town uses the death of the intellectually challenged man as something positive, a young man martyred to the evil monsters of the woods. Like the renegade Jew Jesus Christ, it does not matter whether the man was a sinful saint or a dandy delinquent, what matter is that his death symbolizes something more powerful and higher than themselves, something that can make others feel more humble. Like in all the other M. Night Shyamalan films I have seen (and I can't say I care to see all of them), the white family/families finally come to terms with their hardship and go on. Maybe this is M. Night Shyamalan's hope for America's future, for the immigrants from India generally seem to realize that they can do quite well in white America, unlike many of the other third world diaspora groups who are simply destroying it/feeding off it's fruits. With the intellectual bankruptcy of modern American academia it is no surprise that another Indian S. T. Joshi has taken over the work of two of America's last great writers: H.L. Mencken and H.P. Lovecraft. Surely, the average white American is unfamiliar with the work of these two great literary sages, but at least someone has enough respect for them to keep their legacies going. M. Night Shyamalan, for better or for worse, is one of the few American filmmakers whose films uphold any type of traditional values. I might not think much of The Village or any of his other films, but I can respect he has given the general public a voice of reason, something that seems to be on it's way out in the West. One thing I do like about M. Night Shyamalan is his Hitchcockian cameos, for he surely is an outsider looking in.

THE VILLAGE

-Ty E

THE HAPPENING

M. Night Shyamalan (2008)

For me, It appears that M. Night. Shyamalan is the most under appreciated director of our time. He has given us an incredible "comic book" film starring Bruce Willis and the dastardly devil Samuel L. Jackson titled Unbreakable. He has given us a film that has managed to truly shock and deeply terrify; Signs, and the original massive twist ending that lies within The Sixth Sense. After a recent slump in directing, doesn't it seem like the perfect time for a comeback?

Truth is, you're wrong. We're wrong. The Happening fails as a serious film all together. Shyamalan has managed to film horrific Playstation 2 product placements with horrible jokes scattered throughout a mess of film that only attempts providing "Hitchcockian" thrills and jolts. The scene which foreshadowed the lack of seriousness is in which Wahlberg tries to make peace with a plastic Plant. Such antiquities such as comedy never had such a serious backlash.

All right, so you've seen the trailers and experienced the "spoiler trauma" Due to the early script title, The Green Effect, there should be no doubt what the film's enemy is. Right now, this might be considered a spoiler, but it really isn't. Plant's are the baddies. They react to human stimulants which cause them to breathe a toxin out that forces us to commit suicide. This whole process has it's own flaws and which brings the question of "How do you create a suicidal being out of someone that has no comprehension of death? AKA a child"

This seems to be a plot hole which is unexplained. We've all seen Wahlberg in The Departed. An amazing performance, if I do say so myself. Wahlberg has shown the ability to act and Zooey Deschanel has proven her beauty. Once again, Hollywood betrays us leaving Wahlberg as bad of an actor as Keanu Reeves gets credit for and leaving Deschanel ugly as all hell and accented her age.

Near the end of the film, It switches gears just as 28 Days Later did. It turns face presenting a cruel side depicting rural Americans exploiting much hatred for city folk. This leads to a scene including the murder of children, one being of African descent which only leads to laughter. This laughter of course is sparked by the common theory of the "Black man" always dying first. An old woman plays the creepy card for half of the film, despite only being in it for little over 10 minutes. She later begins the disturbing cycle of suicide which creates the only real suspense in the film.

Now what really held the film together; what was the glue to the wood, was the acting performance of a certain Mr. John Leguizamo. After seeing most of his films, such as Spawn, Cronicas, The Pest, and King of the Jungle, I have come to a decision that Mr. Leguizamo has a special acting aura around him. See, I believe that in The Departed, Wahlberg was playing a familiar role. That would explain why he did so great. Leguizamo adapts to each role he plays, whether it be the ever-so-popular Hollywood retard, to the pedophile demon clown.

THE HAPPENING

The instant I saw the red band trailer for this film, I had a certain idea that this film would be great. Boy, was I wrong. This film was bad, but it had elements of good. The suicide scenes were very bare bones. What you saw in the trailer is what you saw in the film. The camera still shys away from suicide. It seems Shyamalan has not matured much as a director. A scared director is a feeble director, incapable of creating tension in the act of suicide such as other directors have.

Much of the special effects were bad. The idea of a female Lioness being able to rip off a Mexican cleaner's arm off with as much velocity as presented onscreen is definitely fictitious. Now if he had coerced the Lioness, perhaps by taunting it, that would have been much more effective. Overall, Plot holes surround the film, snaring the storyline and dumbing it down. Not even God has this much forgiveness for A-List celebrities.

The Happening is like a jawbreaker of a Hollywood horror film; sometimes sweet, sometimes sour. This film has acting so atrocious, you cannot help but to laugh. I wouldn't be lying when I said that John Leguizamo's performance was by far the best throughout the film. A handful of decently filmed suicides doesn't make a film great. Percentages do make people feel better. I got a percentage for you. 73% of decent film viewers will realize the stupidity of this film and feel close to the same that I do.

P.S. Sacrebleu!

-mAQ

VENUS IN FURS

Maartje Seyferth (1995)

Due to the fact that it has crossed my path countless times in my life, I recently decided it was about time that I read Austrian writer Leopold von Sacher-Masoch's most famous novella Venus im Pelz (1870) aka Venus in Furs, even though I am not a masochistic mensch who enjoys being whipped or generally mistreated by women in absurdly expensive fur coats. Originally a part of a rather ambitious epic six volume cycle (with each volume featuring six novellas) envisioned by the author entitled Das Vermächtnis Kains aka Legacy of Cain that was ultimately never completed (Sacher-Masoch only completed two of the six projected novellas), the work ultimately inspired psychiatrist turned sexologist Richard von Krafft-Ebing to coin the word 'masochism' in tribute to the book's perverted flagellation-fetishizing author and would go on to influence everyone from the Velvet Underground (who included a single entitled "Venus in Furs" with their debut album) to kraut carpet-muncher filmmaker Monika Treut (who directed a modernist lesbian reworking of the novella under the title Verführung: Die Grausame Frau (1985) aka Seduction: The Cruel Woman). In fact, von Sacher-Masoch's novella has been adapted by a number of other filmmakers, including exploitation hack Joe Marzano, slightly underrated Italian giallo maestro Massimo Dallamano, and most recently Roman Polanski, but none of these works are more faithful to the original work than a little known and considerably underrated black-and-white Dutch adaptation. Indeed, Venus in Furs (1994) aka Venus im Pelz was the stunning directorial debut of real-life lovers Maartje Seyferth and Victor Nieuwenhuijs, who are easily two of the most underrated filmmakers working in the Netherlands and have created a half dozen or so highly idiosyncratic and rather dark yet aesthetically resplendent features, including Lulu (2005), Crepuscule (2009), and Vlees (2010) aka Meat. Originally co-written by South African auteur Aryan Kaganof (whose contributions to the work were apparently mostly unused for whatever reason, though he is credited in the film under his birth name Ian Kerkhof in the film), the film is unquestionably one of the most elegant and seemingly visually immaculate and exceedingly exquisite S&M/BDSM-themed films ever made, as a work that makes being beaten and humiliated by a bitchy and superlatively shrewd woman seem almost pleasurable and ultimately makes Fifty Shades of Grey (2015) seem like a tasteless and equally soulless piece of senseless pseudo-erotic softcore swill on big budget Hollywood steroids. Aesthetically speaking, Venus in Furs is a positively penetrating piece of pure and unadulterated cinema of the rather refined risqué sort that oftentimes resembles a chiaroscuro and owes much of its absolutely entrancing majesty to German Expressionism, film noir, Dutch avant-garde auteur Frans Zwartjes (who was once Nieuwenhuijs' teacher), and the black-and-white works of Ingmar Bergman and Mai Zetterling. In short, Seyferth and Nieuwenhuijs' film features a sort of aberrant yet arousing aristocratic elegance and dignified decadence that is completely absent from contemporary cinema, be it European arthouse or otherwise. Indeed, if you're looking for a cheap and sleazy masturbation aid featuring used-up sluts with silicone tits and spastic editing, Venus in Furs is surely not for you.

VENUS IN FURS

Based on a cryptically autobiographical novel inspired by author von Sacher-Masoch's experience of voluntarily making himself the slave of a novice novelist named Fanny Pištor (who used the Slavic noble alias 'Baroness Bogdanoff') who carried out the writer's fantasy to be regularly whipped by a cruel and wickedly demanding ice queen wearing nothing but a fancy fur coat, Venus in Furs depicts the doomed BDSM roleplay-based (anti)romance of an effeminate dark-haired aristocratic writer/artist and self-described 'suprasensual man' named Severin von Kusiemski (André Arend van Noord) who coerces his buxty blonde lover Wanda von Dunajew (Anne van der Ven) into becoming his cruel master and even draws up a contract to make sure she will carry out their aberrant arrangement, which surely no sane man would ever think of, let alone obsessively desire. Told in a partly nonlinear yet seamlessly constructed fashion, Seyferth and Nieuwenhuijs' superlatively sadomasochistic piece of intricately stylized celluloid will certainly be much more accessible to those that have read von Sacher-Masoch's novel (in fact, I highly recommend reading the book before daring to watching the film). Near the beginning of the film in a strangely soothing yet foreboding scene where the two lead characters are lying on the ground after sex, prospective femme fatale Wanda mentions to her beau that she wants to go on a journey, so protagonist Severin asks her if she will sign a contract that he has written to make him her slave, cuckold, personal gardener, and all-around personal bitch boy so long as she agrees to become his 'Venus in Furs' and regularly whip him while wearing nothing but a fur coat. Notably, as written in the source novel: "Venus in this abstract North, in this icy Christian world, has to creep into huge black furs so as not to catch cold." Of course, Christ's presence is totally absent from the film and Wanda ultimately becomes Severin's dark goddess in a hermetic sadomasochistic world somewhere between heaven and hell, though most viewers will certainly see it as more of the latter.

Although Wanda is initially reluctant to go along with Severin's warped fetish-based fantasy, she ultimately gives in and eventually comes to love the power she holds over her increasingly weak and meek (non)lover, who she soon naturally begins to lose all empathy for, as no sane woman can genuinely respect a feeble man who takes orders from a member of the fairer sex. As Wanda's slave and servant, Severin is forced to drop his aristocratic title and take on the common servant name 'Gregor,' which he is proud to be called to the point where he gets rather mad when his malevolent mistress mistakenly calls him by his real noble name. As Severin explains via narration, he developed his rather idiosyncratic tendencies when he was a young man after a distant aunt of his tied him up and whipped him until he begged for her forgiveness and kissed her feet in a life-changing experience that, to quote the protagonist, made him realize, "A fierce passion was awakened in me and ever since my aunt has been the most attractive woman in the whole world." As Severin also explains, "At the age of ten, I laid my hands on a copy of THE LEGENDS OF THE GREAT MARTYRS. I read it with a revulsion bordering on voracious ecstasy." While a handsome nobleman, Severin has dedicated his life to drawing sadomasochistic images and he is not even very good at that, or as he describes, "I live as I paint and write. I progress no further than an intention. A plan...A first act...A first line. Such people just happen to exist...People that start all kinds of things, but never finish anything. I am someone like that...A dilettante." Unquestionably, as his undying dedication to being debased by a devilish dame demonstrates, Severin is only truly motivated by being brutally whipped by a beautiful babe wearing a fancy fur coat. In fact, Severin is so dedicated to his contract with Wanda that he makes a mockery of his noble bearing by carrying out proletarian jobs that include serving drinks to his master and giving her baths, mopping floors, and tending to a garden, among various other dull and tedious forms of unskilled labor. While in public, Wanda walks Severin around like a dog on a leash that is hooked to his nipples. While it seems like Severin will accept any and every form of degradation from waywardly wanton wench Wanda, the protagonist ultimately learns that every man has his limits when it comes to receiving abuse from a brutish blonde beastess.

While Severin is so severely and unwaveringly masochistic that he allows a trio of topless negroes to hunt him down and hook him to a cart like he is a horse so that he can give them a ride, the protagonist begins to feel some real internal torture when Wanda forces him to track down a marginally handsome and masculine Greek aristocrat (Raymond Thiry) that she has become infatuated with so that she can go on a date with him. Ultimately, Severin becomes extremely angry when he realizes that Wanda is simultaneously afraid of and infatuated with the Greek, who is depicted as a Byronic hero in the novel and who gives her the sort of martial masculinity that she hopelessly craves and the protagonist completely lacks. When Severin calls Wanda out on her infatuation with the other man and she responds by stating, "I will torment you until you hate me," the protagonist becomes so irked that he falls out of his 'Gregor' character, grabs his 'master' by the throat, and forces her to get on her knees, thus momentarily obtaining the little lady's respect again for the first time since the two began their master-slave relationship. That night, Severin suffers a nightmare that foretells his brutal fate and pathetically complains to Wanda that, "I dreamt you betrayed me." The next day, Wanda ties Severin to a large pillar and asks him, "Do you still love me?" to which the protagonist replies in a groveling manner, "Insanely. You're divine." After a period of time of leaving Severin tied to the pillar by himself, Wanda returns, though she brings two friends that include a Sapphic lover and the stoic Greek. Needless to say, Severin feels betrayed and demands that he be released as he refuses to be beaten by anyone else aside from his mistress, so his master's lesbo lover reads the protagonist's contract that gives Wanda the full right to do with him whatever she sees fit, including allowing him to be brutalized by a rival male. Despite begging "not him," Wanda gives the Greek the whip and the stoic fellow subsequently begins violently beating the protagonist. After Wanda and her carpet-muncher friend drop their fur coats and walk out of the torture room completely naked, the Greek brands the protagonist in a conclusion that is more delightfully dark than von Sacher-Masoch's novel.

VENUS IN FURS

Notably, the real-life collaborative filmmaking relationship between Venus in Furs co-directors Maartje Seyferth and Victor Nieuwenhuijs does not seem all that different from the lead characters in the film, as while the former is responsible for 'dictating' to the actors what to do and penning most of their scripts (aka creating the oftentimes fetishistic filmic 'fantasies'), the latter is somewhat the 'servant' and certainly the laborer as the man responsible for most of the technical aspects of the work, including the cinematography (in fact, Nieuwenhuijs is responsible for shooting every single one of their films). Of course, whatever the dynamics of their romantic relationship, I think it is rather revealing that Seyferth and Nieuwenhuijs would opt to adapt von Sacher-Masoch's novella as their first feature film, as most men would probably be too embarrassed to co-direct a film with their partner where the male protagonist is a macabre masochistic cuckold who is violently whipped and branded by his lover's new ultra-masculine male fuck-buddy. In terms of its pleasantly preternatural structure, refreshing faithfulness to its source material, consistently oneiric essence, and erotic yet dark and forlorn aesthetic prowess, Venus in Furs is quite arguably Seyferth and Nieuwenhuijs' most immaculate work to date. It should also be noted that the film is faithful to the message of von Sacher-Masoch's source novel in regard to the perennial war between the sexes as reflected in protagonist Severin's words, "That woman, as nature has created her, and man at present is educating her, is man's enemy. She can only be his slave or his despot, but never his companion. This she can become only when she has the same rights as he and is his equal in education and work." Of course, history has proven that von Sacher-Masoch was wrong in regard to his belief that both sexes can become companions when women are "equal in education and work," as modern career-obsessed Occidental woman more or less acts as if she no longer needs man and even resents him, hence the increasing proliferation of S&M/BDSM and cuckold porn. Undoubtedly, it was to my great surprise that the novel features almost Weininger-esque criticisms of the fairer sex like "Woman's character is characterlessness," which are mostly expressed in a subtle and somewhat esoteric visual fashion in the film. As someone that finds cuckolds to be the height of emasculation and spiritual castration, I certainly could not relate to the pathetic figure of Severin, yet Venus in Furs ultimately proved to be an exquisitely erotic celluloid experience that brings a sort of moribund and decaying spirit to classical Occidental pulchritude, as a work that seems like it was directed by the sadomasochistic deathrock-obsessed bastard brood of Teutonic sculptor Arno Breker and true cinematic avant-gardist Frans Zwartjes.

-Ty E

LULU
LULU

Maartje Seyferth (2005)

The Dutch married filmmaking team Victor Nieuwenhuijs and Maartje Seyferth (Crepuscule, Vlees aka Meat) demonstrated early on in their iconoclastic careers a special fondness for old decadent German-language literary works as indicated by their darkly erotic black-and-white directorial debut Venus in Furs (1995), which was naturally an adaptation of the 1870 S&M/BDSM-themed novella of the same name by Austrian mischling writer Leopold von Sacher-Masoch, whose surname was where the word “masochism” was derived. Apparently, the Netherlands’ then most subversive filmmaker, South African-born auteur Aryan Kaganof, co-wrote the screenplay for Venus in Furs, but Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth decided to drop most of his ideas and created what is regarded as the most cinematically faithful adaptation of von Sacher-Masoch’s (in)famous novel. For their second feature, Lulu (2005), the couple decided to adapt proto-expressionist Frank Wedekind’s Lulu plays, but unlike with Venus in Furs, they decided to take a more ‘loose’ approach to their source material that also takes influence from French decadent poet Charles Baudelaire, among various other influences. Needless to say, aside from being a much darker and subversive take on Wedekind’s play than G.W. Pabst’s German Expressionist silent work Pandora’s Box (1929) starring Louise Brooks, the only thing that both works have in common is that the eponymous femme fatale is a seemingly soulless and satanically seductive siren and both films are set in ‘evil’ and deadly decadent worlds where love is mistaken for desire and obsession and where a person’s value is based solely on their material wealth and/or physical attractiveness. The ‘neo-Gothic’ Lulu of Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth is easily one of the most fierce femme fatales of cinema history as a nefarious force of both conscious and unconscious (self)destruction that sinisterly uses her overt sensuality to destroy any person that crosses her particularly pernicious path, but especially the lead character in the film. Indeed, the film mainly revolves around a mysterious dinner set up by a rich coke-addled publisher of the somewhat overweight sort that has fallen under Lulu’s ultimately lethal spell. As the viewer soon learns, the titular character Lulu has figuratively fucked over the protagonist by seducing and/or literally fucking virtually everyone of his friends and family members, including his painter son and priest brother. More of an intentionally exaggerated archetype and walking and talking ‘Penis Flytrap’ than an actual character, Lulu is the living embodiment of erratic and violent feminine sexuality, as a sort of lethally lecherous gypsy lady that puts all the various big bosomed femme fatales of Brian De Palma’s Hitchcock ‘homages’ to abject shame in terms of carnal cruelty, calculating destruction, and nihilistically decadent self-destruction.

A majorly melancholic work where love is all but an illusion and sex is no more meaningful than a trip to the bathroom, Lulu is surely one of the greatest cinematic love(less) romances ever made and a work that unwittingly captures the spirit of an entire age. Lulu begins with the protagonist Leon Mortier (played by Titus Muizelaar, who has starred in most of Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth's works) dragging Lulu (Vlatka Simac), who is sporting a red kimono with nothing else underneath, down the stairs of his fancy mansion and then putting a gun to the little lady's head, but he stops when she uses her almost supernatural erotic powers to stop him and the two begin to kiss. While Leon and Lulu kiss, a gun goes off and the viewer will not find out who was actually shot until the climatic end of the film. Featuring a somewhat nonlinear fashion comprised of random flashbacks, one learns that Leon randomly met Lulu while driving down a wooded road. Without saying anything, Lulu entered the passenger side of Leon's car while baring her thigh, as if to advertise the reward the driver would get for picking her up. Literally as soon as Leon started driving again, he runs over an old gypsy who he also takes back to his mansion with him. As the viewer eventually finds out, the old gypsy is Lulu's violin-playing father and the two have set Leon up to leech off his wealth and life of hedonistic luxury. While comprised of many flashbacks, the film is mainly set during an extravagant dinner that Leon has strategically set up so that he can confront all of his friends and family members regarding their various romantic rendezvous with Lulu, who the protagonist has deeply fallen in love with, or so he thinks. While she rarely talks, Lulu easily emotionally manipulates Leon in a variety of strange psychopathic ways, including 'attempting' suicide by nonsensically trying to drown herself in the protagonist's fountain. Of course, everything she does seems to be for the benefit of her fat, bald, and repugnantly swarthy untermensch gypsy father who she seems to be having an incestuous relationship with as demonstrated by the fact that the old man has no problem stroking his daughter's completely bare body in front of Leon, as if to demonstrate that she is his property, as well as sole true love.

If all the characters in Lulu have something in common, it is that they are miserable weltenschmerz-racked individuals living in a sort of metaphysical hell who engage in any act of hedonism they can, no matter what the consequences, in a vain attempt to bring some temporary solace to their seemingly impenetrable melancholy and forlornness. Leon suffers the delusion that he has somehow transcended this bout of malignant melancholia due to his dubious love for Lulu, but he is really just deluding himself, as he does not really know her and she couldn't care less if he dropped dead as demonstrated by the cold and cruel yet completely fitting conclusion of the film. While Lulu is fondling her unclad body in bed with a small dagger, Leon confesses to her "you don't know what you stir in me" and then tells her "I don't like these games" regarding to the little lady's sadomasochistic blade fetish, so she replies by stating that he is "scared of everything. Of love, of death, of pain." As the guests arrive at varying times for the dinner, Leon approaches each one of them and warns them to stay away from

LULU

Lulu, especially his much more handsome son Alec (played by Hugo Metsers, who is co-director Seyferth's son from a previous marriage) who is a painter that screwed the femme fatale while using her as one of his subjects while his middle-aged female manager masturbated while voyeuristically watching from afar. A swarthy scumbag named Franco (André Arend van de Noord) also got the opportunity to share carnal knowledge with Lulu because Leon owed him money. Needless to say, Leon does not want Franco fucking Lulu anymore, so he pays him the the rest of the money that he owes him at the dubious get-together and the dirtbag leaves before dinner is even served, even leaving behind his dimwitted bimbo date Zita (Georgina Verbaan), who later makes a failed attempt at getting into Alec's pants. Most bizarrely, Leon's priest brother Maurits (Maiko Kemper) manhandled Lulu when she was praying in desperation, but it seems the unholy holy man failed to seal the deal as far as coitus is concerned. Clearly, Leon is either a man plagued with pernicious family members or there is just something about Lulu that turns people into sleazy traitors. If one thing is for sure, Leon's mansion is more morally bankrupt than the red light district in Amsterdam. Somewhat strangely (or not so considering the innate irrationality of femininity), Lulu seems to have no reason to play the craven carnal games that she does aside from possibly wanting to help her repugnant father as reflected in one seemingly unimportant yet ultimately rather revealing scene where the femme fatale decides to pour out a bag containing a large quantity of cocaine she has stolen from Leon while she is riding on a ferris wheel, thus reflecting her innately nihilistic character and seeming love of senseless destruction.

After various failed attempts at dinner are interrupted by the main character who brought everyone together, Leon finally announces to his increasingly agitated guests, "see this dinner as a metaphor...As a reflection of your attitude towards me. I once cherished your friendship...But it has become painful to me. Your only motivation to be here tonight is Lulu." Of course, most of the guests are rather offended and those that haven't already left begin to do so then. Before Leon's rather rude announcement, it is revealed that the violinist playing the horrendous weepy gypsy music is Lulu's father—the same man the protagonist ran over—and he threatens Leon with the remark, "you fuck my girl and I make problems," so, like Franco, he is also paid off. Not exactly a religious man, Leon reads the following line from Charles Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du mal (1857) aka The Flowers of Evil, "Once our heart has gathered the grapes from its vineyard, living is an evil. That's a secret known to all," at the beginning of the film and by the end the viewer knows these words ring true. Meanwhile, Lulu complains, "I only feel melancholic. There's nothing left here...Nothing that holds me here" and describes how she feels like she is being stabbed in the stomach, so she attempts suicide by stripping off all her clothes and absurdly drowning herself by lying face first in Leon's outdoor fountain. When Leon runs out and saves Lulu from drowning, she merely gives a sinister smirk, as if she just did to upset her pseudo-lover/sugar daddy. Ultimately, Leon decides enough is enough when he sees his son Alec and Lulu having sex on one of the various surveillance cameras he has hidden in his home and pulls a gun on the two love birds in a rather awkward situation of coitus interruptus. After telling Lulu how she has ruined his life and destroyed all of his personal relationships, Leon drags her out of the room, down the stairs, and puts his revolver to her head like he plans to blow her brains out, but she uses her sinister powers of allurements to stop him from pulling the trigger and the two begin to passionately kiss. Needless to say, Lulu turns the gun on Leon while they're kissing and kills him, which is witnessed by Alec. While Alec is in shock and comforting his dead daddy, Lulu's bloated rodent-like father comes downstairs, puts a trench coat on his daughter, and the two leave the house without incident. Of course, Lulu and her father probably plan to scam another rich overweight cuckold.

A work featuring uniquely unsavory gypsies as the ultimate Svengali-like swindlers and cold killers and a femme fatale that epitomizes the subtly sinister nature of the more evil members of the fairer sex, Lulu is shockingly politically incorrect for a contemporary Dutch flick, thus putting it in welcome company with the work of avant-garde auteur Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Pentimento) and Aryan Kaganof (Kyodai Makes the Big Time, The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man). Not surprisingly, co-directors Victor Nieuwenhuijs and Maartje Seyferth are hardly even known in their homeland of the Netherlands despite the fact that the latter's father was famous Dutch painter/sculptor Constant Nieuwenhuijs (in fact, Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth directed a short entitled New Babylon de Constant (2005) depicting the artist's architecture models of the futuristic utopian anti-capitalist city 'New Babylon'), thus reflecting the conformist nature of contemporary Dutch cinema which, aside from Edwin 'The Dutch Fassbinder' Brienen (Terrorama!, Last Performance), is mostly sterile and reflects the historically artistically revolutionary nation's cultural decline. The fact that Lulu was directed by a married couple makes it all the more baffling, especially considering the film's distinctly unflattering depiction of both genders, but especially females as reflected in the eponymous lead, who makes the Lulu played by alpha-flapper Louise Brooks in Pabst's Pandora's Box seem like a sensitive sweetheart by comparison. Indeed, while I can think of a couple examples of husband and wife directors, like Messiah of Evil (1973) aka Dead People co-directed by Willard Huyck and Gloria Katz and the oeuvre of commie frogs Jean-Marie Straub and Danièle Huillet (The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach, Moses and Aaron), that managed to successfully direct films with each other, none seem to have such a discernible and iconoclastic 'auteur' signature than that of Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth, whose works unequivocally prove that spouses can do more together than just make babies and have nasty divorces as so many people seem to do nowadays. Apparently, not unlike Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg with their counterculture masterpiece Performance

LULU

(1970), the couple shares their directing duties by Seyferth largely working with the actors while Nieuwenhuijs deals with the camera and more technical aspects of filmmaking, thus making for singular cinematic works that feature nuanced understandings and insights into both genders, especially in regard to sexuality, (anti)romance, mental illness, and decadence, among other timeless themes. Surely it says a lot about the directors' own relationship when the male lead of a film is a weak, decadent, sloppy and overweight jealous cuckold and the female lead is portrayed as a sadomasochistic schemer of the decidedly deadly sort who lives to figuratively and literally kill men as depicted in Lulu. Needless to say, I was not surprised to learn that Nieuwenhuijs and Seyferth are apparently notorious for getting in huge fights and screaming matches on the set of their films. Of course, considering that their films feature long scenes of naked nubile girls, I can kind of see what Seyferth might get mad about while working on the film sets with her hubby.

-Ty E

JCVD

Mabrouk El Mechri (2008)

The hype is a mean mustered force, The man is an international legend, and the film is a stunning character revelation. JCVD shattered my thoughts when I read about a film expressing the life and perils of a failing actor. Bruce Campbell demanded respect with his novel If Chins Could Kill, now Jean-Claude Van Damme demands your attention in what might be the single greatest action-turned-melodrama film of the century. Jean-Claude Van Damme walks into a post office. Before you think this is the intro to a dirty joke, be wary of the creeping events soon to follow. With nothing to lose, the robbers decide to fashion Van Damme as the perpetrator of the heist. The sadness that permeates from Van Damme's emotions is at least disturbing. The tribulations he faces are more so than the average citizen can account for. Pieced from a satire, and rudimentary in nature, JCVD marks the rebirth of an action star into something more. A film of this magnitude is a fly trap for harsh criticism. While many choose to defy a film to "rebel" against popular vote, the lure of this film could prove to be a powerful magnet. Festival favorite Let the Right One In contains a similar amount of hype. On my first (and only) attempt to view it, I found the 2 hour+ run time intimidating at 3 am. That, and the film bored me beyond death. The lack of visual entertainment actually brought about a craving of anything - even an Olaf Ittenbach film. JCVD is tear-inducing and visually brilliant, using a popular grain look to accentuate his homeland of Belgium. Many stabs are made at John Woo throughout the film, particularly on Hard Target although Face/Off is brought up. Steven Segal/Jean-Claude Van Damme rivalries are brought up in a humorous spectacle of a hint of the muscle-bound rat race to scripts involving combat. I'm just glad he "agreed to cut the ponytail". Excellent cinematography grants the film wings. This, and the amazing Vantage Point perspectives put to work in order to explain the entire happenings. JCVD is an earnest tale of a hypothetical breakdown of an actor that has never been analyzed as important, but he definitely is. He not only brought John Woo to Hollywood but gave his hometown people something to be proud of. An icon and a hero; JCVD is more important than you'd give the chance to believe. For a truly exceptional scene, his monologue epiphany left me absolutely speechless. Inspirational to the core, I couldn't have been more satisfied with this film.

-mAQ

MOON CHILD
MOON CHILD

Mahfuzah Issy (1972)

I do not think it would be an exaggeration to say that Spanish auteur Agustí Villaronga (In a Glass Cage aka Tras el cristal, Black Bread aka Pa negre) is the most proficient director of bleak coming-of-age films. Out of all of Villaronga's films, Moon Child (1989) aka El niño de la luna – an exotic and sometimes erotic esoteric Adventure-Fantasy work worthy of any adult's time – is easily the Spanish filmmaker's most optimistic effort, yet the film is far from a feel-good-flick that one would watch with the entire family, let alone with small children. In the film, a 12-year old orphan boy named David discovers the prophecy of an ancient African tribe that foretells the random appearance of a white child (the "moon child") that will become their god: The Son of the Moon. Overtime, David begins to believe that he is, indeed, the soon-to-be-all-powerful Moon Child. Due to his budding extrasensory perception, David is adopted by an odd Occult institution with unsavory intentions that is sort of like a dystopian X-men academy, that experiments and does research on idiosyncratic Übermensch children. Unfortunately, for God-in-the-making David, the academy has plans to make their own Moon Child by channeling the energy of the moon into an unborn child. To an extent, the plans of the occult group somewhat resembles that of the conspiring white magicians featured in British alpha-occultist Aleister Crowley's novel Moonchild (1917). During his dangerous journey, David befriends a blonde girl named Georgina (played by Lisa Gerrard of the ethereal neoclassical music group Dead Can Dance in her only acting role) who becomes a mother figure for the boy and whose slender body becomes a vessel for the evil occult group's man-made Moon Child. Davey also fancies an older woman with split loyalties named Victoria who struggles over her allegiances to the all-power Occult organization she is an unflinching member of and the lost boy that needs her love. On his precarious journey, David encounters everything from institutional lunar sex (featuring Lisa Gerrard totally nude) to the totally devastating and debilitating heat of African deserts. Needless to say, David and his struggles make that of the children in The Goonies (1985) seem like those of young peons on a slightly perturbing playdate.

Like Villaronga's previous film In a Glass Cage (1987), Moon Child is an aesthetically-splendid work that, despite its stark story, brings solace to the eyes and harmony to the ears. For fans of Dead Can Dance, Moon Child is also quite the rare treat as the ineffable score composed by the music duo was done specifically for the film, thus, the only way to hear it is by watching this unfortunately scarce and mostly magical motion picture. Moon Child is certainly the best and most fitting marriage between avant-garde filmmaker and musical group since the collaboration between Derek Jarman and post-industrial group Coil for The Angelic Conversation (1985). Like the music of Dead Can Dance, Moon Child transports the viewer to various mysterious and nonexistent thaumaturgic lands and sparks emotions that range from delightful dread to indescribable splendor. Thankfully, the storyline of Moon Child is for the most part in tune with the aesthetic qualities of the film. Although, the plot of Moon Child may seem rather incoherent at times, this seemingly glaring flaw inevitably adds to the already persuasive mystique and intrigue of the film. Needless to say, Moon Child becomes more potent upon subsequent viewings. If any cinematic work manages to mix thematic and aesthetic elements of Nicholas Roeg's Walkabout (1971) and The Witches (1990) and Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968), Moon Child is surely that seemingly unreal and otherworldly film. All of the actors featured in Moon Child, including the one who played David, also deserve praise for their talents. I must admit that I find most child actors nothing short of deplorable and ultimately unbelievable, but Enrique Saldana (the boy who plays David) is certainly convincing as a daunted yet daring child who is totally devoted to fulfilling a metaphysical mission that he has trouble verbally articulating. Despite her lack of acting experience, lovely Lisa Gerrard – who is indubitably a modern Renaissance woman – brings a strong performance to Moon Child that is an imperative to the believability of the film. In what is probably the most memorable scene in the film, Ms. Gerrard goes from being in a state of bewilderment as she lays naked on a cold, sterile metal ritual bed; to a mood of total ecstasy as she makes love with her seedman; to a position of total terror as a couple occult members takeaway her lover and surgically pick at her freshly soiled vagina in a most crude and calculating quasi-scientific fashion.

John Waters' once remarked regarding Villaronga's In a Glass Cage, "(it) is a great film, but I'm too scared to show it to my friends." Moon Child is not a film one should fear showing to one's friends, but it most certainly has the capacity to stupefy both small children and Quentin Tarantino fans alike. If you're one of those many individuals who found themselves slightly disturbed by films like Wolfgang Peterson's The NeverEnding Story (1984) and Jim Henson's The Labyrinth (1986) as a young and naive child, Moon Child is probably one of a handful of films that can potentially help you recapture those youthful emotions of partially petrified nostalgia. Like In a Glass Cage, Moon Child is a film that neglects to follow the gospel of the Hollywood studio system, as it is a work that is certainly not cognizant of the taboos of political correctness. I am sure that had Moon Child been produced within the strict, authoritarian socio-political confines of a typical Hollywood studio production, the Moon Child would have been a starving and saintly Ethiopian boy who is on a journey to central Europe (with the help of a good liberal white couple, nonetheless) to fulfill an ancient Germanic prophecy for peaceful world unity. Politically incorrect or not, Moon Child is certainly a rare work of 'World-Class Cinema', as the film manages to swimmingly cross both cultural and country barriers (whether they be real or not as none of the locations, aside from the continents, are mentioned in the film). Of course, most important of all, Moon Child is a flavorsome flick that manages to activate the imagination of the most bitter, skeptical, and misanthropic of viewers (myself included), and for that reason alone, it is a must-see film.

MOON CHILD

-Ty E

NATTLEK

Mai Zetterling (1966)

If there is one female auteur that has yet to get her due, it is Swedish filmmaker/actress Mai Zetterling, a controversial member of the so called ‘Hollywood Left’ and a purported communist and fierce feminist who is strangely all but forgotten in our modern day Occidental world of gender neutrality and forced equality. Acting in cinematic work from all around the world during her nearly 1/2 century long career in film, ranging from acting alongside Dirk Bogarde in the British anthology film Quartet (1948) to the Roald Dahl film adaptation The Witches (1990) directed by Nicholas Roeg (Don’t Look Now, Bad Timing), Zetterling ultimately made her greatest contribution to the history of film with her experimentally adventuresome auteur-pieces. After first stumbling upon her work after randomly viewing her British female prison flick Scrubbers (1983) – a work inspired by the success of Alan Clarke’s similarly bleak yet captivating work Scum (1979) – I did some research and discovered that Zetterling originally directed extremely controversial and experimental arthouse flicks in her homeland during the 1960s. With her first feature-length film Älskande par (1964) aka Loving Couples, Zetterling not only managed to get the film banned at the Cannes Film Festival due to its explicit erotic persuasion, but also had her femininity brought into question by certain film critics. Indeed, after watching some of her early works, I must agree with the pompous film critic that soundly yet sardonically stated, “Mai Zetterling directs like a man.” Deeply and irrevocably affected by the critic’s remarks like a heartbroken teenager who had been dumped by her first true love, Zetterling acted in a reactionary manner by attempting to explore unfeminine feminist themes in her subsequent works. Although her late-period work Scrubbers no doubt has the distinct feel of a femi-commie rant, Zetterling’s second feature-length film Nattlek (1966) aka Night Games is a work I would have never thought could be directed by a woman, nonetheless a fierce feminist, if I didn’t know otherwise. Just as defiantly salacious and morally ambiguous as her previous work Älskande par, Zetterling’s Nattlek would earn the distinction of being banned from the Venice Film Festival, thus securing the feisty female auteur reputation with Leni Riefenstahl as one of the most controversial and artistically ambitious lady filmmakers who ever lived.

Although not unwarranted, most of Zetterling’s detractors have criticized the filmmaker’s works as highly derivative and – even worse – works of plagiarism. Admittedly, Zetterling’s minor masterpiece of Swedish cinema Nattlek is a work that is quite thematically and aesthetically similar to Swedish alpha-auteur Ingmar Bergman’s Wild Strawberries (1957). Additionally, a number of scenes featured in Nattlek, especially the carnivalesque party sequences featuring flamboyant and flaming fag characters, recall Federico Fellini’s La Dolce

NATTLEK

Vita (1960). Still, with that being said, Nattlek is an original film in of itself and a movingly and mortally melancholy one at that. Having the visual and emotional essence of a Bergman film from a decade earlier like Smiles of a Summer Night (1955) minus the charming comedy, The Seventh Seal (1957), but especially the aforementioned Wild Strawberries (1957), Nattlek features the rich and ravishing black-and-white cinematography associated with the work of the greatest Swedish filmmaker to ever live, yet with an exceedingly bleaker and more artistically belligerent artistic flare. Featuring Bergman stars Ingrid Thulin (Wild Strawberries, The Magician, Winter Light) and child actor Jörgen Lindström (The Silence, Persona) in two of the leading roles, Nattlek, much like Wild Strawberries follows a protagonist as he comes to terms with less than fond memories of his past. Shot almost entirely in a medieval Swedish castle, Nattlek centers around Jan (Keve Hjelm) – a sexually and emotionally sterile man-child – as he comes to terms with his materially comfortable, yet emotionally debilitating childhood. Psychologically castrated by his cold, calculating, sadistic, self-centered mother Irene (Ingrid Thulin) at an early age – which reaches its peak when she scolds and humiliates the boy for masturbating – Jan has trouble sexually satisfying his fiancée/wife Mariana (Lena Brundin). When things take a turn for the worst in regard to his companion's health, Jan – who describes himself as already 'dead' – must decide whether he wants to live his life in the past as an emotional cripple or to give his wife the fresh, new life she deserves. Seamlessly weaving scenes from the past and present, Nattlek is a work that highlights how familiar places and objects can open old wounds.

Despite its intrinsically crestfallen and disheartening persuasion, Nattlek – not unlike Wild Strawberries – concludes on a rather rosy and transcendent note, even if it partially echoes the conclusion of Edgar Allan Poe's short story The Masque of the Red Death. Unlike your typical (and atypical) contemporary feminist, Mai Zetterling did not shy away from the mostly unmentioned topic of mother-on-son/woman-on-boy sexual and psychological abuse, which is uniquely and uncompromisingly portrayed in Nattlek; a cerebral yet sometimes grotesque cinematic work that still has the power to make viewer's stomachs turn. Inadvertently causing the death of her second born by her narcissistic negligence by insisting that she rather have a carnivalesque bedside party than proper access to hospital medical facilities during childbirth despite her wealth and turning her son into an impotent, emotional cripple by the way of incestuous child abuse and sexual humiliation, only to die before her son reaches his teenage years, high-class whore Irene makes one of the most deplorable and dastardly yet physically delectable high-class whores to ever grotesquely grace the silver-screen. If one learns anything from watching Nattlek, it is that behind every male faggot, warped transvestite, and impotent man with Peter Pan syndrome is a sadistic vainglorious cunt with too much time on her hands. As the countess of a castle full of conspiring fairies, whorish Jazz singers (Swedish singer Monica Zetterlund has a small role in the film), and debauched aristocrats, mother Irene of Nattlek makes for an aberrant type of femme fatale of the overzealous micro-dictator sort in a role that makes the royals of the popular HBO television series Game of Thrones seem like unsophisticated peasants with base taste. If you're looking to see a film with a decisively feminine yet gnarly touch, you won't find a better example than Zetterling's wonderfully exploitative and undeservedly forgotten minor masterpiece of Swedish arthouse cinema Nattlek.

-Ty E

STORM
STORM

Måns Mårland (2005)

It is quite a challenge to make a film work in many different genres. (For a good example, See; Save The Green Planet!) Storm starts off with a nifty scene involving a fiery vixen running through the streets holding a cube of unknown origin and contents. All they know is that it must not get in the wrong hands. The plot kicks off with a Matrix type of feel. We meet Donny AKA "DD", he is a perverted, alcoholic who bathes in his success and spoiled existence, ergo, the average citizen. His life is suddenly shattered when this warrior woman crashes into his life quite literally. From this point on, Donny is sent through time travel, comic-book adaptations in the style of a classic Goosebumps story (Attack Of The Mutant anyone?), and finally into personal territory. While the plot is confusing as all hell, it eventually falls into place. It appears to be a grand scheme, a puzzle, even. Prepare for a lot of textures to this film. While not being a homage, it has similar scenes to great films, such as Oldboy, The Matrix, and even The Butterfly Effect. While not being personally directed, this film stands with the greats on terms of a psychological head-screw. As for the action goes, it amazes and keeps you on your feet. Many scenes are well choreographed and frenetic. This film picks up where Night Watch failed. Horrible foreign action/horror/thriller's were not welcomed. Storm gladly blows my expectations down and presents a film that could have went awry but didn't. Whether the reasons be the acting, scenery, wonderful score, or the sci-fi toss around. Eric Ericson does an amazing job as the confused Donny. Disoriented and constantly bleeding from various scraps with the silent, bald henchmen. The main villain's (Or is he?) presence reminds me of Robert Patrick's Kogo Shuko in Double Dragon, except a lot more effective. Many scenes of humor are present and features wonderful narration. What i felt was the most important aspect of the film was the end. Instead of wrapping everything up in a neat package, we deal with more conflict. This goes without saying there is never an end to conflict. I felt this was a very humane approach that kept the film in reality. Freshens the viewer up after the roller-coaster ride through dimensions and conspiracies. Storm is the cyberpunk film for the new generation. Loaded with gritty violence and philosophical views on our existence, it never ceases to amaze. Somethings can be forgotten, this film can't. Expect a forecast from TLA Releasing for more information on its release.

-Maq

MARIE FROM THE BAY OF ANGELS

Manuel Pradal (1997)

Undoubtedly, Frogs like making films about sensual underage girls and ugly swarthy dudes with guns (or, as Jean-Luc Godard once famously stated, "All you need for a movie is a gun and a girl."), but few French films take this approach more literally and obsessively than Marie from the Bay of Angels (1997) aka Marie Baie des Anges aka Angel Sharks directed by quasi-auteur Manuel Pradal (The Blonde with Bare Breasts, A Crime). A coming-of-age tale for eager ephedophiles and unhinged urchins alike, Pradal's pathologically playful piece of montage-ridden sensual cinema follows a classless teenage crook of the racially dubious sort and his would-be-touching but ultimately senselessly tragic love affair with a 15-year-old prostitute who routinely leads on moronic American sailors so she can steal their money. Filled with partially bare youthful flesh and incessant teen philistine delinquency, Marie from the Bay of Angels is like a frog The Blue Lagoon (1980) meets Larry Clark's Kids (1995) and Bully (2001) as directed by a young filmmaker that wishes he was the next François Truffaut yet got too hung up on Sergei Eisenstein's theory of montage to tell a coherent story. Still, Pradal's rather wanton work is an endlessly enthralling celluloid poem of sorts that, although somewhat like one long music video in structure, undoubtedly makes the Mediterranean seem genuinely beautiful, romantic, and even mystifying, even if it is crawling with deadly teenage delinquents that look like they crawled out of some of the most decrepit shacks from the South of France. Described by Stephen Holden of the New York Times as a, "dizzying paganistic ode to Eros," Marie from the Bay of Angels indeed features pagan pageantry in the form of festive parade, as well as no moral compass, at least not a Christian one, as a low-class libertine work featuring prepubescent boys attempting to buy guns and getting wasted on vodka while crashing bumper cars, obscenely stupid American sailors acting like typical stupid ass Americans as rather repellant individuals lacking individuality that think the world is a gigantic whorehouse and treat native women as such, packs of adolescent frog morons attempting to steal cash and gash from whoever has the misfortune of crossing their rather wickedly wayward path, and a young girl that is just getting to know the power of her pussy but does not use it wisely because she just wants to have fun and gets bored banging old farts. A rather idiosyncratic flick with a somewhat timeless quality about it (indeed, at first I was not sure whether it was set in the present or the 1950s, but I guess that is the point as a work depicting the world in the age of Americanization) set in Promenade des Anglais along the Mediterranean at Nice, France, Pradal's decidedly decadent work is more of a cocktease than an explosive climax, though the film could not end more nihilistically with the death of a child or two and the total moral degeneration of the male antihero, who has a seemingly inbred face that only a white trash streetwalker could love.

MARIE FROM THE BAY OF ANGELS

Orso (played by non-actor Frédéric Malgras, a Russian gypsy, hence his 'peculiar' appearance) is not even an adult, but he is already a degenerate piece of untermensch trash who spends his days robbing beautiful bourgeois babes and naïve vacationers in the French Riviera when he is not riding around aimlessly on trains, catching a bumpy ride on his equally criminally-inclined friend's motorbike, or posing like a true moron with his beloved handgun, as if he is some sort of iconic filmic bad ass. Marie (played by 'contemporary Brigitte Bardot' Vahina Giocante in her very first film role) is a 15-year-old hooker who is a rather big bitch, especially when it comes to men who want to tear off her panties, but since she is underage, she has no problem luring in philistine American sailors who are just trying to get laid while abroad. Although more or less homeless, Marie's pussy-peddling allows her the luxury of staying in a lavish suite in a fancy hotel, though a life of sub-high-class existence does not seem to do much to comfort her seemingly sullen soul. When Marie first meets antisocial Orso, she thinks he is a major asshole, but after she sees him attempt to rob two large American sailors, who ultimately kick his scrawny little Romani ass, and commit various other petty yet oftentimes dangerous crimes, she becomes rather intrigued by him and begins to reconsider her dead-end life as a Lolita-like gold-digger. Although Marie takes advantage of being routinely wined and dined by pathetically pigheaded American soldiers, who think they are god's gift to women yet do not even have the skills to impress an ignorant 15-year-old girl, she eventually realizes her heart yearns for the ugly teenage hood. When Marie ends up hitching a ride on a motorbike with Orso and his comrade, and the junior thief begins to feel up and down her thigh and nibbles on her neck, she falls in love and assumedly gets rather wet between the legs. Eventually, Orso and Marie decide to head to a secluded island where they declare their love for one another via words and acts. Of course, scheming con Orso is well aware that his lover is a libidinous little whore and uses her as such, even getting her to dance provocatively on a pier to distract an old man and his son so that he can steal the old horn-dog's boat. In an act of warped and reckless love, Marie also robs a handgun from one of her pussy patrons and gives it to Orso, who is more than a little bit delighted as he previously failed at attempting to procure a weapon after his blonde prepubescent middleman friend was robbed. Of course, as a born thief and 'heterosexual Jean Genet' of sorts (indeed, not only is he a small-time criminal, but his face is no less repugnant than that of the queer toad novelist), Orso cannot help but use his prized new weapon for pernicious purposes and eventually has the bright idea to rob a sweet middle-aged married couple that owns a bar. Of course, things go wrong and a struggle occurs between Orso and the bar owners that results in Marie accidentally receiving a fatal gunshot wound that ultimately brings the pubescent lover's touchingly romantic love affair to a totally avoidable premature end. After taking Marie's corpse to the scenic villa of a beautiful young woman (Amira Casar) he previously robbed and shooting up all the televisions and surveillance cameras in the home while watching the Monaco Grand Prix race, Orso goes completely berserk and nonsensically kills his blonde prepubescent friend who, rather ironically, was supposed to help him find a gun (of course, had the boy found the gun before Marie did, she might still be alive, thus one can only assume that, in his warped logic, Orso blames his friend for his girlfriend's death). Indeed, in the end, what little hope that existed before has been irrevocably lost, with Marie dead and Orso becoming a coldblooded killer who wasted one of his friends in the most craven and pointless of fashions.

Featuring footage of the 1995 Monaco Grand Prix, riot-ridden patriotic soccer games that resemble fascist rallies, and fiercely festive carnivals with people dressed as pagan gods, Marie from the Bay of Angels is certainly like a cinematic vacation to one of the most addictively scenic and strangely romantic spots in the Mediterranean. With its blatantly and not so blatant nods to François Truffaut, Jacques Rivette, and Eric Rohmer, among various others, Pradal's film is also like a lurid love letter to the La Nouvelle Vague, albeit with an exceedingly fast-spaced editing style that the filmmaker (or his editor) seemed to have learned from watching one-too-many American TV commercials. A morally dubious celebration of juvenile delinquency and debauchery, Marie from the Bay of Angels is, not unlike Francis Ford Coppola's Rumble Fish (1983) and the films of Larry Clark, a rare arthouse flick for the sort of teenager that does not dare admit that they like poetic art films, as it probably features enough salaciousness and visceral violence to keep most ADHD-addled adolescents happy. Undoubtedly, one of the more hilarious aspects of the film (and probably the only aspect of the film that acts as comic relief) is its less than flattering depiction of American sailors who, although dress in a classic fashion like the brutal semen demons from Kenneth Anger's Fireworks (1947) and the sadomasochistic sodomites of Fassbinder's Querelle (1982), are really just a bunch of arrogant and loudmouthed pansies who can barely scare off a gang of teenage boys and who do not have the balls to assert themselves onto young ladies (indeed, during one scene, a sailor awkwardly and disingenuously tells Maria that he loves her just so he can get in her pants). In one especially humorous scene, one of the sailors arrogantly proclaims, "It's like purgatory here man...Every single woman is after my body," while Marie looks bored to death while eating an expensive meal that the Yankee gentleman bought for her. When the American sailors eventually realize that Marie has no interest in them, they kick her out of their lives and treat her like total trash, telling her she "stinks" and whatnot, as if they are afraid of vaginas and need an excuse for not consummating coitus with her. While featuring next to nil nudity (aside from a pair of tits or two from a couple older women), Marie from the Bay of Angels certainly radiates raw youthful eroticism in a rather nicely nuanced fashion that even puts the uncensored 'kiddy arthouse' flick Maladolescenza (1977) starring Eva Ionesco to shame in terms of perverse adolescent poetry. For those that were hoping to enjoy Catherine Breillat's 36 fillette (1988), but found the little lady lead to be a bit homely and the overall film to be plagued by banality and a rather foul feminist subtext, Marie from the Bay of Angels offers a delightfully debasing rollercoaster ride over the soothing surf and turf of the French Riviera that may be somewhat incoherent (the time frame of the film is nearly impossible to discern) and emphasizes style over substance, but it certainly never bores or wallows in pseudo-erotic/pseudo-intellectual pretense like most of the films that are halfheartedly churned out of frogland nowadays. Indeed, unlike The Blue Lagoon, there is an element of delectable danger to Pradal's film that is quite rare to find in cinema nowadays. Like a cultivated Kids with an uncommon respect for indigenous kultur and a complete disrespect for the plague that is American intervention, Marie from the Bay of Angels is like a The 400 Blows (1959) for the lost post-national generation that has nothing to believe in or live for, hence the nihilistic non-existences of the true Les Enfants Terribles of Pradal's rather bleak yet bewitching and epodic film.

MARIE FROM THE BAY OF ANGELS

-Ty E

BRUSSELS BY NIGHT

Marc Didden (1983)

If Western Europe ever had its own sort of equivalent to William Friedkin during the 1980s, it was almost certainly Flemish auteur Marc Didden (Sailors Don't Cry, Mannen maken plannen aka A Man Needs a Plan), who made the eponymous metropolis featured in his debut feature Brussels by Night (1983) seem like a deathly dreary dystopian hellhole where beautiful blondes are either miscegenating whores or sullen spinsters, married Arab fathers cannot keep their hands off said miscegenating blonde whores, predatory barmaids throw themselves at broken men, and musicians sing melancholy covers of crappy American pop songs in broken English, among other things. Based on a script that was co-written by Belgian cult auteur Dominique Deruddere who went on to direct the Bukowskian masterpiece Crazy Love (1987) aka Love Is a Dog from Hell (which Didden co-penned), the film might be best described as the all the darker and more nihilistic Belgian answer to Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976) as a gritty and visceral piece of unhinged urban cinema where social alienation, pathological paranoia, anhedonia, race hate, senseless acts of violence, death fixations, and self-loathing are just some of the problems that plague the hopelessly angst-ridden antihero, who was portrayed by one of the greatest and most eclectic Flemish actors of his era. Indeed, as a man that got his start starring in the early films of Belgian master auteur André Delvaux, including portraying the happy-go-lucky young man 'Val' in Un soir, un train (1968) aka One Night... a Train, and who later appeared in the great contemporary cult flick Ex Drummer (2007) directed by Koen Mortier, François Beukelaers can certainly be considered a sort of Brando or Pacino of Belgian cinema and his performance in Brussels by Night offers ample reason as he portrays one of the most unsettlingly emotionally constipated characters I have ever seen as a uniquely repugnant yet sometimes strangely charming chap that is fed up with life and the world who you just cannot help but somewhat empathize with, at least for about the first hour or so of the film. While Belgium has a grand tradition of dark and dreary cinema as indicated by everything from Delvaux's morbidly phantasmagorical debut masterpiece De man die zijn haar kort liet knippen (1966) aka The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short to anarchic art-shockers like Roland Lethem's La fée sanguinaire (1969) aka The Bloodthirsty Fairy to Thierry Zéno's fiercely fucked feces-filled arthouse affair Vase de nocces (1974) aka Wedding Through aka The Pig Fucking Movie to sardonic dystopian cult trash like Rob Van Eyck's The Afterman (1985), Didden's film took the malignant melancholy and dejecting despair to a new and more serious extreme, albeit in a surprisingly accessible way as if the film was made distinctly to depress as many as people as possible as opposed to just merely appealing to Bergman and Antonioni fans.

Directed by a young ex-journalist who was heavily influenced by the "no future” attitude of punk, the existentialist novels of Italian-Jewish writer Alberto Moravia (whose works have been adapted by Vittorio de Sica, Jean-Luc Godard, Bernardo Bertolucci, etc.), and especially the largely forgotten French flick Extérieur, nuit (1980) aka Exterior Night directed by Jacques Bral, Brussels by Night is a film that ultimately makes it seem quite fitting that Joy Division frontman Ian Curtis cheated on his wife with a Belgian music journalist not long before he killed himself. Notably, the only filmmaking experience that Didden had before directing the film was as a sailor extra in Harry Kümel’s misunderstood fantastique genre masterpiece Malpertuis (1971) and collaborating on the fairly unknown Belgian punk documentary Gisteren zal ik pogo dansen (1978) aka Yesterday I’ll Pogo. Incidentally, Didden would later take a screenwriting course that was taught Kümel which would act as the genesis for Brussels by Night as the filmmaker would write the film’s screenplay for the class, which won a national prize for ‘best screenplay’ in 1980 and ultimately led the way for him to get the opportunity to direct the film. Of course, being a novice filmmaker, Didden naturally needed guidance and ultimately hired Dominique Deruddere to act as a sort of assistant auteur (in fact, Deruddere would state in the documentary The Brussels by Night Archives regarding his contribution to the film, “Here I was responsible for a large part of the visuality because Marc was very inexperienced. He knew what he wanted but did not how to do it technically. While I knew more about how to do it. But not everything. I still don’t.”). A piece of rather unpleasant ‘nihilist noir’ that combines the nocturnal urban entertainment value of Scorsese’s After Hours (1985) with the glacial emotions and physical violence of a Michael Haneke flick, Didden’s flick is notable for being a rare cinematic work that manages to make misanthropy, cultural cynicism, collective alienation, and self-destruction palatable to the sort of pop culture philistine that thinks that Quentin Tarantino is one of the greatest filmmakers that has ever lived. The increasingly foreboding story of a middle-aged married Flemish truck driver who considers committing suicide but instead abruptly decides to travel to Brussels where he runs into an old retired friend and randomly starts a troubled quasi-romance with a hot yet slutty blonde bartender who is also banging a racially sensitive Arab that the protagonist naturally grows to deeply loathe and resent, Brussels by Night is, if nothing else, one of the best ‘feel-bad’ flicks I have ever seen, even if I cannot really call it a masterpiece.

BRUSSELS BY NIGHT

At the very beginning of the film, the viewer gets more than just a mere hint that there is something not quite right about antihero Max (François Beuke-laers) because he is initially portrayed playing a rather heated game of one-man Russian roulette where he seems both simultaneously heavily relieved and considerably depressed when a bullet does not go through his brain after he intensely pulls the trigger of a gun that he has shoved in his mouth. Instead of offing himself, Max ultimately decides to use his decision to give up on life as an excuse to catch a train to Brussels where a fat old bourgeois bitch questions the fact that he is riding in the first class section, as if he is a stupid lowly prole who does not deserve to be among the rich and rather rotund. Upon arriving at the Brussels trains station, Max demonstrates his short temper and propensity for violence by kicking and ultimately smashing the glass display case of a cigarette vending machine in front of various strangers after the machine steals his money. Upon getting a taxi that is driven by a sarcastic slob, Max disobeys the cabbie by smoking and then eventually randomly jumping out of the car in the middle of a busy tunnel. From there, Max heads to a mall where he runs up an escalator that is going in the opposite direction and then attempts to call his wife on a public payphone. Indeed, throughout the film, Max tries in vain to get in touch with his beloved wifey, but not until the end of the film does the viewer realize why she will not pick up. Like most things in his personal life, Max is fairly evasive when it comes to discussing his somewhat mysterious spouse, so it is only fitting that he eventually hooks up with a slutty chick who has no qualms about sleeping with strange married men. Unfortunately, starting lurid love affairs with lecherous ladies oftentimes causes hostility between the various men that dare to fuck such women, or so Max learns after falling for a Flemish ice queen who seems to get a sick kick out of pitting men against one another.

While randomly walking the streets of Brussels, Max's old short and pudgy friend Louie (Michiel Mentens) spots him, yells his name, and then somewhat insults him by stating, "What are you doing here? I didn't know you knew how to get to Brussels." As he explains to Max, Louie is now retired and lives with his beautiful blonde spinster daughter Josephine (Nellie Rosiers), who apparently cannot find a single decent marriageable man in the entire city. Naturally, Max follows Louie back to his flat where the two shoot the shit. When Max explains the he and his wife do not have any children, Louie asks him, "You have been married for six years and you still haven't talked to your wife about children. Max, are you sure you are right in the head?," to which the protagonist somewhat absurdly replies in a humorously unwitting quasi-autistic fashion, "We haven't discussed it yet," as if having children is a banal business transaction that is about as important as deciding on a restaurant to eat at. After half-jokingly asking Max "Are you sure you are right in the head?," Louie expresses his sadness in regard to the fact that no man wants to marry his nearly middle-aged barren daughter, complaining, "A good girl but can't find a husband. Actually, her name is Josephine-Charlotte, like the princess." Indeed, it seems the most of the women in the film have a hard time finding decent men, but then again most of them are portrayed as lecherous whores that believe they will eventually become a famous actress and will fuck a guy for a beer. Before taking a brief nap at Louie's apartment, Max stares at his friend's daughter Josephine-Charlotte as if he has a deep desire to defile her seemingly virginal body, though he controls himself and does not actually act on his instincts.

After going to a bar with Louie and getting terribly annoyed with a hot yet

BRUSSELS BY NIGHT

whorish barmaid who attempts to get him to buy her a beer, Max states to the classless chick, "I'll give you a new mug, if you like" and then goes to another taproom that is completely empty where he drinks by himself while the fairly attractive female bartender reads a book. Although initially somewhat rude and emotionally apathetic towards the bartender, Alice (Ingrid De Vos of Chantal Akerman's Toute une nuit (1982) and Hans Herbots' De Behandeling (2014) aka The Treatment), Max warms up to her when she states to him, "And don't drink too much. I can see you are sad," as if he appreciates the fact that someone has finally taken notice and interest in his glaring misery. When an effeminate Moroccan Arab named Abdel (Amid Chakir of Didden's Istanbul (1985) and Crazy Love (1987)) eventually shows up at the bar, he less than sincerely states to Alice regarding the protagonist, "...if he's your friend he's my friend, too." As becomes quite apparent as the film progresses, brown boy Abdel is in love with Alice and Max will soon be waging a very personal war against him for the bartender's heart in what might be best described as a hate-based bizarre love triangle of the increasingly racially-charged sort. When Max temporarily leaves the bar to once again try to call his wife, Alice reveals her somewhat morbid mindset by stating to Abdel regarding the protagonist, "I like him. I like unhappy people. They make me happy. I like drama." While Alice agrees to close the bar early so that the three virtual strangers can hangout at a more hip bar, Max ruins their plans by attempting to attack a doorman, so they all head back to Abdel's apartment and eat Moroccan food. When Abdel tries to be superficially friendly with the protagonist by asking him where he is from, Max firmly states "nowhere" in a somewhat agitated fashion and then abruptly decides to leave when he gets annoyed after the over curious Arab asks him too many stupid questions, though he demands that Alice come with him. As one expects, Max and Alice proceed to have sex, with the former forcing the latter to foot the bill at a sleazy old hotel that is run by a sleazy gay old man. While the carnal session turns out ideal, Alice jokingly complains that Max should not have said "A double, please" in French while cuming inside of her. Although the two share a fairly happy and intimate orgasmic night together, this is ultimately the closest Max will ever get to Alice, as the antihero's deteriorating sanity and paranoia only becomes all the more debilitating as the film progresses.

A sort of bargain bin femme fatale who exploits the vulnerabilities and emotions of men for seemingly no reason at all aside from possibly as a means to pass the boredom, Alice ultimately begins playing Max and Abdel against one another in a classically female passive-aggressive fashion as if she is not even completely in control of her emotionally manipulative behavior. Indeed, shortly after Max leaves her apartment, Abdel shows up and rightly accuses her of fucking the protagonist. While Alice does not deny it, she complains to Abdel that she "doesn't like jealous men" and then attempts to comfort the jealous Arab by stating to him, "I like him...But I like you more." Meanwhile, Max meets up with his friend/co-employee Jules (Fred Van Kuyk) at a café and the two discuss their problems with work and women. After berating Max for abruptly quitting his driving job by simply abandoning the position, Jules tells him he is not cut out for such employment, stating, “You think too much. You’re not suitable for the work we do.” When Jules confesses that his wife is having an affair with “cheesemonger” and Max tells him that he should not allow himself to be cuckolded, his friend brags that he is currently carrying on an affair with a pair of perky twins. Rather revealingly, Max also hints at his growing hatred for Abdel by randomly asking Jules if his wife is fucking a Moroccan, as if Brussels was already flooded with as many third world aliens as it is today. Later that night, Max and Jules meet up with Abdel and Alice at the latter’s sister’s 21st birthday party where racial tensions ultimately reach a boiling point. Indeed, when a somewhat dorky four-eyed blonde sits beside Abdel and reveals that she is the typical naive liberal-brainwashed white moron by stating to him in Dutch, “I don’t think us white people should feel superior to you. I think there are far too many prejudices. People like you are first and foremost people. With the same faults and feelings, etc.,” Max jovially lies to the French-speaking Arab and says, “She’d like to give you a blow job.” When Max gets the DJ at the party to play “La Mamba” and then proceeds to passionately kiss Alice while dancing with her, Abdel gets extremely jealous, grabs the dorky white girl with glasses, and begins aggressively kissing her, thus predictably resulting in the ostensibly liberal-minded girl pushing him away and a random party guest punching the Arab in the face for daring to defile a shy Aryan chick. After agreeing to leave Jules behind as a “souvenir,” the three head to a café where Max yells at Abdel for stupidly kissing a random white girl in a room full of white people. Playing the pathetic victim, Abdel irrationally takes out his shame and feelings of rejection on Alice by stating to her, “You’re as big a slut as the rest” and then running out of the building like an upset little girl. Of course, Alice chases Abdel and Max slowly follows behind, only to be disheartened when he sees his love interest curiously sharing an extra intimate moment with the super sensitive camel jockey who just called her a slut. While they all agree to take a day trip to Ronquières Inclined Plane in central Belgium the next day, it is quite obvious that it is only a matter of time before Max and Abdel violently butt heads.

Upon doing some personal research by questioning random people around the city, Max discovers that his nemesis Abdel is a married father and decides to confront Abdel about this fact, stating, “I’ve been asking around. You’ve got a wife and child in Morocco yet you’re living it up here... With Alice. You and Alice, I don’t think much of that.” Needless to say, Abdel is not too happy when Max reminds him of the fact he has a family back home, as he is now living the ultimate third world dream of living a first world lifestyle that involves premium Eurapid pussy. On top of that, Max begins openly referring to Abdel as “wog” and “Muṣṣafa,” so naturally the Arab decides to give up on pretending to befriend the protagonist and instead begins acting all moody and broody. Ultimately, Max picks up Alice, Abdel, and Louie in a Jaguar that he has just stolen and they head to Ronquières Inclined Plane in the Walloon municipality of Ittre for a scenic day trip where everything goes wrong and them some as the protagonist's pathological jealousy, rage, and paranoia reaches murderous proportions. Demonstrating some slight schizophrenic qualities that are quite fitting in a nation that is divided by both language and culture, Max is depicted at one point in the film complaining to Alice in regard to people in general, "I want them all to leave me alone. To stop staring at me on the street and to shut up on the radio. So that I can be myself." While she curiously only adds to his rage by leading him on and fueling his jealousy, Alice is absolutely convinced that Max will eventually explode as indicated by her remark to Abdel in regard to the protagonist, "I think he's very unhappy. His problem is that he doesn't say anything. One day it'll come out and then we'll be surprised." Upon arriving in Ittre, Max gets so enraged while taking a photo of Alice and Abdel that he smashes Louie's prized camera and then runs away. Not long after, Max emotionally manipulates Alice by pretending he is dead just because he wants to see her reaction. When the four head to a tourist site, a tour guide asks their nationality and Max responds, "Three Flemings and an Arab," though he jokes that he is "...the Arab." Of course, the fleeting moments of comic relief pretty much ends there.

BRUSSELS BY NIGHT

At one point during their day trip, Max forces Alice to get into his car so they can "talk" and then demands that she tells him whether or not she believes in capital punishment. Needless to say, Max is fairly agitated by Alice's stubborn apathy when it comes to answering his questions, though he eventually gets her to state regarding capital punishment that she believes, "In some circumstances, yes. If it happened in cold blood, yes." When Max asks her what she thinks, "If a madman murdered a madwoman. Or another madman," Alice naturally begins to become somewhat unsettled as she realize that the protagonist is trying to hint to something her. Meanwhile, Abdel becomes increasingly agitated and states to Louie regarding Max, "I should've punched him in the face right away. He's going too far. They deal with it differently in Morocco." Clearly, Abdel is quite jealous of Max as he does not want him stealing his precious white whore from him. When Alice subsequently gets out of Max's car and tells Abdel that she is no longer interested in being the concubine of a gutter sheik, the lovelorn towelhead becomes enraged and states to her, "It's because of Max you don't want me anymore." Not surprisingly, when Abdel demands that Alice tell him what Max had said about him earlier that day and she states, "He said he wasn't jealous [of] a wog," the angry Arab slaps her so hard that she falls to the ground. Naturally, Max is not going to tolerate some swarthy wog hitting the woman he is starting to fall in love with, so he gets out of his Jaguar and starts effortlessly beating the shit out of Abdel while Louie holds Alice back. Of course, being a man with a less than sound of mind that is involved in a heated brawl with his untermensch romantic rival, Max ultimately opts to brutally murder Abdel by simply picking him up and swiftly throwing him over the railing from what is no less than a three-story drop. While Louie attempts to get Alice to lie to the cops about Max's actions by stating, "Wipe your eyes before you see the commissioner [...] It was an accident. He didn't mean it. He wasn't himself," she is an erratic woman that feels guilty about her coffee-colored fuckboy's violent death and decides to tell the police everything, stating to a detective in regard to Max, "No, it wasn't an accident. I am sure of that. I know him too well for that. I know what he is capable of." When the cop questions how she can know Max so well if she only just met him a couple days before, Alice defends her position by stating, "A lot has happened since Thursday. And I've talked to him a lot. About everything. About life...About death...About everything." Ultimately it is revealed that Abdel is not the first person that Max killed, hence what incited him to attempt suicide at the beginning of the film.

After Brussels by Night became a cult hit that somewhat revolutionized Belgian cinema in terms of its brutal content and fairly nihilistic 'message' (or lack thereof), auteur Marc Didden subsequently had the opportunity to direct what was his closest thing to a mainstream international film production. Indeed, Istanbul (1985) is notable for starring eccentric Hollywood actor Brad Dourif (One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, Dune) as a deranged pedophile drifter who accidentally ends up in Belgium where he hooks up with a cynical loser portrayed by Crazy Love director Dominique Deruddere and ultimately goes on a road trip that involves attempting to get enough money to travel the titular Turkish city by agreeing to kidnap the fairly young daughter of a distraught father played François Beukelaers whose wife left him for a shady young Italian restaurant owner. While Didden's second feature is certainly worth checking out, it unfortunately oftentimes feels rather contrived, overly goofy, and quite Hollywood-esque, and of course ultimately lacks the uncompromisingly visceral and nihilistic essence of his decidedly dejecting yet nonetheless endlessly enthralling debut. Aside from Istanbul, Didden also worked on a freeform stage adaptation of Jean-Luc Goard's Pierrot le Fou (1965) entitled Re-Make/Re-Model (1983) that was directed by Brussels by Night lead François Beukelaers, thus reflecting the somewhat unconventional working relationship between the auteur and actor. Of course, Beukelaers is just as much responsible for the film's potency as Didden, whose performance is just as an imperative ingredient to Brussels by Night as that of Marlon Brando in László Benedek's The Wild One (1953), Robert De Niro in Scorsese's Raging Bull (1980), and Christoph Waltz in Tarantino's Inglourious Bastards (2009), among countless other examples. It should be noted that idiosyncratic artistic collaborations are somewhat of a tradition in Belgian cinema as is perfectly demonstrated by a classic flick like Meeuwen sterven in de haven (1955) aka Seagulls Die in the Harbour, which was co-written and co-directed by a film critic (Roland Verhavert), a writer (Ivo Michiels) and an amateur filmmaker (Rik Kuypers) and which is sort of like a 1950s Brussels by Night as a bilingual Flemish flick of the fiercely forlorn noir-ish sort about a lonely fellow in a trench-coat who finds temporary solace in the form of misfits and equally internally wounded women.

BRUSSELS BY NIGHT

A work that somehow manages to combine the haunting the nightlife paintings of Belgian surrealist Paul Delvaux and films of his namesake André Delvaux with a (post)punk spirit that is comparable to the cinematic works of No Wave filmmakers like Amos Poe and Vivienne Dick while also attempting to be accessible to mainstream viewers, Brussels by Night was fittingly dedicated to two famous figures that died under dubious deaths, including French-speaking pop journalist Bert Bertrand (who committed suicide in 1983 while staying in NYC) and tragic Hollywood star Natalie Wood (whose two-time husband Robert Wagner was suspected of playing a role in her somewhat bizarre drowning). Not surprisingly, in the doc The Brussels by Night Archives, Didden's ex-boss Guy Mortier, who was the editor-in-chief of HUMO magazine, would describe the antihero of the film being somewhat like the filmmaker, stating, "People have speculated about to what extent the main character Max is Marc Didden. It's certainly an aspect of Marc. The Marc Didden who wants to hit all those he detests and who wants to destroy everything. But there is also a very different Marc Didden. Someone who also wants to hit everyone and destroy everything." Featuring grating Belgian covers of popular American pop songs like "Piece of My Heart" and a malignantly somber Brussels where beautiful blondes become sullen spinsters and miscegenation and familicide seem more common than genuine love and affection, Brussels by Night ultimately reveals a spiritually necrotic Belgium that seems to be on the verge of collective suicide, so it should be no surprise that the indigenous population birth rate of the country has been in steady decline for decades while the Muslim Arab populations has been growing at a absolutely revolting rate (while around 23% of the nation's population is of non-Belgian origin, around 70% of Brussels is of non-Belgian origin, with about 36% being Muslim Arabs and negroes). Although completely different types of films, Brussels by Night makes a great double feature with Ex Drummer as it demonstrates that the lowland nation has only become all the more degenerate and nihilistic over the past two decades. In terms of brutal yet stylish European flicks with teeth and a fiercely foreboding atmosphere, Didden's flick also makes for an excellent double feature with the Austrian serial killer flick Angst (1983) aka Fear directed by Gerald Kargl. Indeed, if you want to see a rare 1980s European flick with testicular fortitude that does not wallow in pretentious art faggotry and makes most of Scorsese's post-Taxi Driver films seem like goofy big budget Guidosploitation pieces and virtually all of Tarantino's films seem like autistic exercises in superficially stylized fanboy masturbation, Brussels by Night makes for a somewhat surprisingly worthwhile cinematic work that demonstrates that anti-romantic race-hate in a noir-ish form can make for an endearing experience if senseless death and destruction is involved.

-Ty E

HÔTEL TERMINUS: THE LIFE AND TIMES OF KLAUS BARBIE
HÔTEL TERMINUS: THE LIFE AND TIMES OF KLAUS BARBIE

Marcel Ophüls (1988)

When most people hear the word Barbie they think of a plastic blond doll with all the right curves. Unfortunately, most people do not ordinarily know the name of Klaus Barbie, the infamous “Butcher of Lyon,” one of the Gestapo’s top men in France. Klaus Barbie originally intended to study theology and became a teacher but fate sprung him and instead his name has permanently entered the history books as the personification of evil, at least according to Jewish filmmakers like Marcel Ophüls. Ophüls, being a French Jew, must have felt a special calling when he decided to make the documentary Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie, an over 4-hour long documentary about Barbie. Marcel Ophüls is probably best known from Woody Allen’s Annie Hall, where Woody makes reference of the French-Jewish director’s documentary The Sorrow and The Pity.

It is clear from the get-go that director Marcel Ophüls is dedicated in his documentary Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie to present Barbie, as well as most Europeans, in a light of the most despicable and depraved evil. Those that are not evil are just portrayed as ignorant barbarians with the incapacity for any type of intellectual or abstract thought. For example, when questioning a German farmer about the young Klaus Barbie, Ophüls questions whether or not Barbie was the much liked and loved little boy as portrayed by childhood neighbors. Ophüls writes-off the peoples love of the young Sonny (Barbie’s childhood nickname) as the result of his Father being a local and well respected teacher. In fact, throughout the documentary, aside from Jews and French “Resistance”(aka Communists) fighters, most people have kind words to say about the young and old Klaus Barbie. It becomes apparent though the documentary that Ophüls is extremely annoyed by this occurrence, but what really sets him off is how many Europeans bring up the fact that Barbie’s “crimes against humanity” were committed over 40 years ago. Obviously, these silly goy Europeans do not understand the Jewish tradition of an “eye for an eye (or two)” bloodthirsty vengeance.

Apparently, while the Germans and Italians stayed in Germany during World War II, they were known for being great tippers (or at least they were at Hôtel Terminus). This makes one wonder whether or not a Frenchman could spot whether one was a Jew or not by their generosity in regards to gratuity. It has been said that Klaus Barbie was fairly generous with his whip but I digress and now have to ask the question, was Klaus Barbie really the monster Marcel Ophüls portrays him as? Knowing Klaus Barbie had a very important job as a SS- Hauptsturmführer, one just comes to expect a little bit of blood, death, and torture. When one also compares Klaus Barbie to his Communist enemies, whether it be in France or Soviet Eastern Europe, he seems like a fairly reasonable killer. How many Americans know about Jewish mass murderers like Béla Kun, Lazar Kaganovich, Genrikh Yagoda or Yakov Sverdlov, individuals responsible for the deaths of tens of millions of white Russians and Eastern European people. We never hear a word about these dubious ghetto characters yet people like Klaus Barbie are put on a kosher pedestal of pure evil.

Although not mentioned in Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie, it is been recently noted in the Kevin Macdonald documentary My Enemies Enemy that Barbie may have helped the American CIA capture and execute corporate Marxist-icon Che Guevara and for that alone, Klaus Barbie should at least get some recognition as a fighter for the Occidental and destroyer of Marxist culture-distorting scum. After all, it would be much nicer to see teenagers wearing t-shirts with Klaus Barbie's infamous Gestapo picture on it as opposed to the swarthy face of Che Guevara. Throughout Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie, Marcel Ophüls makes a special point of portraying the United States Government, CIA and other U.S. departments as "men with their hands dirty" for putting evil Nazis like Klaus Barbie on the payroll. Personally, I think the most disgraceful thing the United States ever did was align itself with the Soviet Union during the second World War and the late great General Patton felt the same way, dying tragically in an automobile accident shortly after making his opinion on the barbarism of the Soviets and dubious character of the Judaic known.

One SS man, a German hero that was awarded The Knight's Cross of the Iron Cross, lets it be known in Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie that there is no way Klaus Barbie can be an evil man because his pet Dachshund dogs showed great love towards Barbie. I must admit that I also have a soft spot for dog lovers but not so much for Philo-Semites. Klaus Barbie maybe was not a Philo-Semite but apparently he did not have an irrational hatred of Jews like most individuals would suspect knowing his Gestapo background. While living in Bolivia, Mr. Barbie had no problem doing business with Jews and even harboring them as associates. Like Hans Landa in Inglorious Bastards, Klaus Barbie was competent at hunting Jews and Communists in France but he was not a fanatic Jew-hater. When it comes down to it, Barbie's only crime was that Germany lost the war because if the Krauts won the war, such modern inventions as "war criminals" would not exist. Going back to General Patton, he believed that the Nuremberg trials were anti-Christian and blatantly Judaic, certainly not part of the noble tradition of European war. The Soviet Union and the Allies no doubt had their fair share of mass murdering "war criminals," yet they will never be "brought to justice" like those damn evil NATZIS!

In Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie, Herr Barbie makes it clear that there is no such things as "Nazis." By this, Barbie is addressing the fact that the word "Nazi" is a derogatory slang term invented by the enemies of National Socialism. Certainly, the average American is unaware of this as the media, Hollywood, and American public schools use the term “Nazi” when describing The National Socialists. If one cannot not even address a well known political party without resorting to childish slang in an academic setting, it is quite apparent that the bias against that group is so immense that one is going to have to dig very deeply for an objective view of history. Hollywood mainstream comedy trash cinema like the Rat Race, starring the grotesquely Jewish Jon Lovitz, is a great example of the Jewish obsession with denigrating ones enemies into oblivion (it is no coincidence that all Jewish holidays are celebrations of destroying the enemy of the Jews and self-worship). In the film, Lovitz and his obscenely unpleasant and overweight family accidentally stroll into a Nazi museum thinking it is a Barbie doll museum. Unsurprisingly, this short scene does more to shit on the legacy of Klaus Barbie, especially when considering the average American movie-going philistine, than the whole over 4-hour long Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie documentary. Hôtel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie is a documentary I can recommend to anyone interested in The Third Reich, for Marcel Ophüls certainly failed in regards to his documented smear campaign.

HÔTEL TERMINUS: THE LIFE AND TIMES OF KLAUS BARBIE

-Ty E

DEADGIRL

Marcel Sarmiento, Gadi Harel (2008)

Fucking a decomposing corpse has never seriously crossed my mind, not even a freshly preserved one. Of course, I seem to like at least a couple films featuring the good ol' "in and out" between living humans and cold corpses. German director Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik films come to mind as does the 1987 Belgian film Crazy Love as romantic movies for those that lust for corpse fucking art. In fact, these European Necro-films are quite aesthetically pleasing pieces of spoiled human meat. Due to my undying love of certain films containing Necrophilia, I felt it necessary to watch the 2008 film Deadgirl, a less artistic motion picture featuring the schlock art of postmortem arousal. Deadgirl was written by Trent Haaga, a man best known (or not) for his work as an actor and writer for Troma Entertainment. Fortunately for this sick flick, it does not share the garage sale aesthetics and production values of your typical Troma Scheiße-fest, for Deadgirl is the kind of film Lloyd Kaufman wishes he had made (and cashed in on).

Whilst watching Deadgirl, I wondered to myself whether or not the film was supposed to have some type of deep subtext. After all, it is kind of hard to look past a bunch of loser high school dingle berries fornicating with an animated corpse to find any type of deeper meaning. One thing I do know is that certain girls who get sexually abused (especially in their prepubescent years) tend to become emotionally dead, just like the undead corpse gal in Deadgirl. A lot of the sexually promiscuous women in the Adult entertainment industry many times admit to be molested as do many leading Feminists and Lesbians. Like the not-so-rotten corpse in Deadgirl, the girl who has unfortunate sexual encounters at a young age turns into a vicious and sex-craved monster; the prostitute archetype. After all, the dead girl may enjoy getting gang raped by a bunch of high school degenerates but one wrong move and she will literally tear your guts out.

I am weary in regards to classifying Deadgirl as a Zombie film as that would be misleading to those that have yet to see the film. It is very apparent to me that most modern Zombie films are formulaic dead-weight lacking even enough entertainment for the average American Zombie filmgoer. Deadgirl is not a film that will re-animate the already postmortem Zombie genre, although a surplus of banal Zombie films will no doubt continue to appear from the gates of Hollywood Hell as well as the backyards of beer guzzling baboons (in many ways, digital video has become a Voodoo curse). Like most semi-decent films, Deadgirl defies fitting into any particular genre. Of course, the film does have its flaws, the most obvious being the petty melodrama between the loser protagonist, his love interest and pathetic friends. After all, the real star of Deadgirl is the dead girl. Not since Zombie-Punk Suicide from The Return of the Living Dead has there been such an erotic Zombi-babe as featured in Deadgirl. Who does not love a beautiful naked and rabid animated corpse running around, ripping out throats and scrotes?

DEADGIRL

-Ty E

FISTS IN THE POCKET

Marco Bellocchio (1965)

After first seeing him play the character based on Bavarian auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder in

Beware of a Holy Whore (1971), Lou Castel (The Scarlet Letter, The American Friend)—a Colombian born actor of 1/2 Swedish racial stock who got his start in film acting playing as an uncredited extra in Luchino Visconti's The Leopard (1963) and who starred in important arthouse works by everyone from Pier Paolo Pasolini to Philippe Garrel, as well as sleazy Guido nunsploitation flicks like Killer Nun (1978)—has always rubbed me the wrong way, which is certainly a good thing when playing creepy twerp characters like the actor did. Indeed, for his breakout role in the Italian film Fists in the Pocket (1965) aka I pugni in tasca directed by Marco Bellocchio (Slap the Monster on Page One aka Sbatti il mostro in prima pagina, Vincere) he portrayed a bourgeois epileptic who absurdly commits matricide and fratricide in an ostensible attempt to liberate his sole 'normal' brother from a life of virtual enslavement to a family of invalids who rely on his generosity. A work that predates the far-left student movements that almost plunged Italy and various other European nations into civil wars, Bellocchio's film is completely anti-bourgeois to the quasi-commie core that demonstrates why the auteur trashed his co-commie cinematic compatriot in the winter 1967-68 issue of Sight & Sound when he stated, "...the sad thing about Visconti is that today he is part of the bourgeois life that he really could analyze and criticize ten years ago. His recent films are trivial and unimportant." Directed by Bellocchio when he was only 26, Fists in the Pocket is undoubtedly an exceedingly idiosyncratic work that, like Bernardo Bertolucci's second feature Before the Revolution (1964) aka Prima della rivoluzione, helped take Italian cinema out of the neorealist era and start a new and highly experimental period in Guido cinema. Still delightfully deranged after all these years, originally being released nearly half a century ago, the film was so controversial upon its release that it was attacked by two of auteur Bellocchio's greatest heroes, Luis Buñuel and Michelangelo Antonioni. Part Guido Gothic horror, part anti-Visconti family melodrama, part libertine black comedy, and part sadistic keenly class conscious quasi-Marxist satire, Bellocchio's brazen directorial debut is nothing short of a berserk black-and-white celluloid monster that sinisterly devours and dementedly regurgitates film genre conventions, Catholicism, and bourgeois traditions in a rather refined iconoclastic fashion that does not resemble the mental masturbation of a pedantic film nerd/Marxist ideologue with too much time on their hands. Starring Castel as a sort of bonkers Brando figure (indeed, a photograph of Brando from The Wild One (1953) is featured prominently towards the end of the film), Fists in the Pocket is ultimately a rare work of 'revolutionary cinema' that has aged quite gracefully that does not only still feature subversiveness, but acts as an example of what Pasolini once described as a “cinema of prose” (as opposed to a “cinema of poetry,” which the auteur used to describe Bertolucci’s French New Wave inspired works).

FISTS IN THE POCKET

Alessandro aka Ale aka Sandrino (Lou Castel) is the black sheep of a once-well-to-do bourgeois family that no longer has a patriarch (what happened to the father is never mentioned), so the eldest son Augusto (Marino Masé) has reluctantly taken over and now financially supports his blind mother and epileptic siblings. Indeed, his Mother (Liliana Gerace) costs him 3 million lire alone. Ostensibly to help his brother become free from financial and familial slavery, blonde beast Alessandro—a young epileptic degenerate who seems to be suffering from a high-functioning form of autism and stares at people at parties as if he wants to murder every single one of them—decides that he will kill his mother and siblings. Indeed, after failing to execute a plan where he hoped to kill himself and his entire family sans Augusto during a periodic trip to a cemetery (he even writes his brother a suicide letter discussing how he would like to be cremated), Alessandro exterminates his blind Madre by pushing her off a cliff and states, “Blessed mother, pray for her,” right afterward. For whatever reason, Alessandro decides to tell his sister Giulia (Paola Pitagora) that he was responsible for their mother’s death. Indeed, Alessandro also complains of his brother’s seeming lack of gratitude, as well as his jealousy of his big bro’s fiancé Lucia (Jeannie McNeil), stating, “I killed her [their mother]...with these hands despite my fears. I risked life imprisonment for the family’s benefit, while he, like a thief suddenly becomes “big brother.” He brings in Lucia and has her serve coffee, and he’ll walk off with the fortune I made! This little brain of mine...that you didn’t trust an inch...planned the whole thing.” Naturally, Alessandro and his sister destroy their mother’s things in an attempt to erase her memory. Of course, Alessandro is not quite finished after offing his mother, as he has a rather retarded brother named Leone (Pier Luigi Troglia), who also must die. After his mother’s somewhat eerie funeral where the prodigal son leaps over his passed progenitor’s coffin, Alessandro opts for giving him an overdose of drugs while he is taking a bath, which causes his sister Giulia to have such a bad seizure that the doctor tells him that, “She could live or die or end up paralyzed.” Despite being much closer to Giulia than his other siblings, Alessandro considers smothering her with a pillow, but pussies out. In the end, Alessandro, who tells himself, “everything’s working out for the better,” seems to finally succumb to his familial guilt after singing opera in a Werner Schroeter-esque scene and seems to die after a panic attack.

Featuring a rather unconventional Ennio Morricone score, bizarre Marlon Brando worship, and Lou Castel in what is undoubtedly his most loony role to date as a decidedly Dostoevsky-esque character in a rather idiosyncratic work that is equally as stark as it is sardonic, Fists in the Pocket is certainly the sort of audience-dividing work that people will either love or love to hate. While auteur Marco Bellocchio joined a Marxist–Leninist group called the ‘Communist Union’ three years after the release of his debut film, the work seems more like the product of a naughty nihilistic member of the bourgeois who has fantasies about killing his relatives and thus used cinema as an outlet to carry out said sick fantasy. In fact, the auteur came from a very similar family to that featured in the film, with Bellocchio once stating in an interview conducted by Danish filmmaker Christian Braad Thomsen featured in the winter 1967–68 issue of Sight & Sound: “The film is not autobiographical in the sense that I recognize myself in a particular sequence or a particular character. I have tried to avoid that. On the other hand, I was raised in a bourgeois family, in the same sort of provincial milieu as that described in the film. This is all part of my own experience, and my life has been a strong reaction to my bourgeois and Catholic adolescence.” Indeed, in terms of fucked families, Bellocchio’s puts all of Fassbinder’s films to shame and even makes Pasolini’s Teorema (1968) seem somewhat boobeiose by comparison. As I assumed while watching the film, Bellocchio has described the antihero played by Lou Castel featured his debut film as a quasi-fascist of sorts, remarking: “The boy in FISTS IN THE POCKET is destroyed because he will not accept reality. His attempt to escape reveals not only decadent but semi-fascists traits. I was brought up in a large family that was founded in the Fascist period in Italy, and though my father was not a member of the Fascist Party, I suppose he was emotionally linked to its policy.” Indeed, not unlike the films associated with German New Cinema, Bellocchio’s work demonstrates a certain incapacity with dealing with his nation’s past, with post-WWII ‘fascism’ taking a rather aberrant and sinister form of the somewhat ironic family-extermimating sort. Unfortunately, as his later works like Vincere (2009) demonstrate, Bellocchio eventually became soft with age, with Fists in the Pocket easily being the most audacious, unconventional, and curious film he has made to date. Unquestionably, if it were not for Bellocchio, Italy would have never produced directors as uniquely and unsettlingly subversive as Albert Cavallone (Spell – Dolce matatoio, Man, Woman & Beast, Blue Movie), who also assembled a singular oeuvre of truly modernist apocalyptic horror. Indeed, not just a movie, Bellocchio’s Fists in the Pocket is a celluloid symptom of the death of the Occident and its accompanying spiritual sickness.

-Ty E

DEMOLITION MAN
DEMOLITION MAN

Marco Brambilla (1993)

One cannot assess the amount of ludicrous fun that Demolition Man serves up with a steady stream of off-the-wall costumes and set designs. The titular showdown depicted on the poster is the basis of plot development. A deranged police officer played by Stallone in an eerily foreshadowing of Judge Dredd fashion, squares against a bleach blond Wesley Snipes who borrows a Joker-esque attitude and exchanges fashion tips with the Super Mario Bros. This explosive dystopian film echoes the greatest aesthetics of 90s science fiction action and manages to provide some great satire that, as depressing as it is, wasn't created with a light-hearted sentiment. Rather, Demolition Man is a goofy film that takes the insolence of an amateur and creates a new breed of schlock entertainment. In my time observing the "cult" effects of 90s cinema, I've become overwrought with the lack of recognition picked up by Demolition Man. For being a purveyor of cheese, explosions, and utopia-shattering multicultural mayhem, Demolition Man has raked none of the profits and has even been reduced beyond bargain bin fodder as a copy of this auspicious masterpiece is relatively scarce in both supply and demand. The older this film gets, the more realized the science fiction aspects become. Far from eventual reality, of course, but nonetheless something that could come to be expectant of a future of tomorrow seeing as how this society has orphaned anything considered hazardous to any extent. Also, I think we can all agree that Taco Bell winning the franchise wars is easily one of the most insightful and resourceful prophecies to every have been preached on celluloid. Thought it is a shame that this scene was removed from most foreign releases of the 1993 classic and replaced with Pizza Hut. At least we still have the one-liners in place. Those quips are the jewelry that adorn this diamond-encrusted crown. Every film should have a special assignment and I don't use the term "assignment" with utmost authority. Demolition Man takes a special mission of ridiculing social commentary as a whole and the experience for me, third time around, resulted in my inebriated self howling with patriotic excitement when all-American John Spartan commented on a delicious looking rat burger. Playing the lead of the "Scraps," Denis Leary turns a role as a vagrant by the name of Edgar Friendly, whom Simon Phoenix (Snipes) has been defrosted to exterminate by a corrupt cleric who runs the megatopia of what used to be Los Angeles and co. In this society where free will has been silenced along with swearing, sodium, and sex, John Spartan is resurrected to battle Simon Phoenix who has rocked the city to the core as the last incident of violence was many years before. In a humorous turn of events, you discover that the cops aren't equipped to handle insubordination and Spartan's nickname of "Demolition Man" is soon elaborated on many shells later. For me, action film has three faces: Bruce Willis, Sylvester Stallone, and Mickey Rourke. Without any of these American role models, my childhood would have been sheltered and dreary without that certain propagandized market for cable television viewers. It's films like Die Hard, Rambo: First Blood Part II, Harley Davidson & The Marlboro Man, Judge Dredd, and Demolition Man that made running home off the bus in time to catch the ending to one of these great flicks so worth it. It's pure, collected nostalgia in form of dated special effects backed with amazing performances so washed up in their own 90s visage that it's damn near impossible to appreciate such roles as Wesley Snipes' chaos adoring Phoenix who must have been inspiration for Heath Ledger's Joker character. The two names Spartan and Phoenix is a clever clashing of the old school and the new school. We got the warrior who mates and kills and that's the only code in his nature whereas Phoenix is reborn from his metaphorical ashes in hopes to create chaos. With technology and limitless product and combat knowledge, it's a classic example of brute force pitted against an evil of the tactical kind. Demolition Man is easily one of the last great true-blue "versus" films that revolves around man against foe, regardless of which way the alignment compass faces. Maybe I'm putting too much thought in it - or maybe you're too blind to absorb top-notch entertainment at the expense of nothing but your own naivety. Who couldn't enjoy such a charming blockbuster as this. That's a rhetorical question so there is no need to answer it. Simon says, "Enjoy."

-mAQ

DILLINGER IS DEAD
DILLINGER IS DEAD

Marco Ferreri (1969)

Italian auteur Marco Ferreri (La Grande Bouffe, Bye Bye Monkey) was undoubtedly one of the most hardcore, nihilistic, and eloquently hateful European filmmakers of his generation, with a number of his films seeming like, on retrospect, nothing more than sick celluloid novelties that were made specifically to terrorize the bourgeoisie and to totally destroy the filmgoing experience for people altogether. In fact, in a 1977 interview, Ferreri made the following declaration: “The values that once existed no longer exist [...] The family, the bourgeoisie—I’m talking about values, morals, economic relationships. They no longer serve a purpose. My films are reactions translated into images.” In what some might describe as his masterpiece, Dillinger Is Dead (1969) aka Dillinger è morto, Ferreri depicted a day in the life of one bourgeois man who gets a little bit of testicular fortitude after discovering German-American gangster John Dillinger’s handgun wrapped inside a newspaper in a closet and decides to run a one-man revolution of sorts by murdering his pill-popper Aryan Barbie doll wife in cold blood, defiling his braindead pop-star-worshipping maid with honey, and disposing of his previous life altogether by jumping into the sea, boarding a luxury ship to Tahiti, and becoming the virtual cuckold of a beautiful virtual goddess, serving her chocolate mousse and what not, with the film concluding with the entire screen being tinted blood red. More of an iconoclastic experiment in social, cultural, and cinematic deconstruction than anything resembling a traditional film with a linear narrative, Dillinger Is Dead features a virtual cipher for a protagonist, next to no dialogue, a misleadingly simple storyline, and an otherworldly ending that is located somewhere between heaven and hell. Directed by a man who once described himself as being, “50 percent misogynist and 50 percent feminist,” Ferreri’s film unquestionably features a damning depiction of women as autoerotic automatons that are addicted to effeminate pop stars, prescription drugs, and domestic leisure, yet Dillinger Is Dead is an innately incendiary work where no facet of boobeise buffoonery is left unscathed and thankfully the film does not wallow in a traditionally idealistic left-wing mode of critique, but instead opts for an aggressively anarchistic approach to the decided destruction of aesthetic, cultural, and socio-political norms. A work said by some to be heavily influenced by Theatre of the Absurd, Dillinger Is Dead indeed defies logic and does indulge in absurdism, with auteur Ferreri once describing the film as “entirely ambiguous” in a 1969 interview, thereupon making for an innately impenetrable film that does offer some critiques and messages, but is ultimately a curious celluloid creature that refuses to be accurately analyzed and classified and thus offers seemingly infinite replay value as a particularly paradoxical work that both infuriates and intrigues like virtually any worthwhile piece of art.

Glauco (veteran French actor Michel Piccoli, who worked with everyone from Jean Renoir to Alfred Hitchcock to Jacques Rivette) is a relatively successful industrial designer who designs seemingly apocalyptic gasmasks for a living and is getting rather bored with his job. At the beginning of Dillinger Is Dead, Glauco is given a demonstration of his latest gasmask in action by an employee and asks his loyal underling to read some notes he has written, which are as follows: "Isolation in a chamber that must be sealed off from the outside world because it's full of deadly gas...a chamber in which...one must wear a mask to survive...strongly evokes the conditions under which modern man lives. One cannot reflect on this mythical one-dimensional man without analyzing all the characteristics of our industrial society. Nevertheless, a well-drawn metaphor could be very informative and shed light on certain far-reaching consequences that are never explicitly addressed. For example, doesn't knowing that one must wear a mask create a sense of anxiety? Internalizing these obsessive, hallucinatory needs leads not to an adaptation to reality but to mimicry and standardization, the elimination of individuality. The individual transfers the outside world to the interior. There is an immediate identification among individuals in society as a single entity. One's needs for physical survival are met by industrial production, which, in addition, sets forth as equally necessary, the need to relax, to enjoy oneself...to behave and consume according to advertising models that render in explicit detail desires anyone may experience. Film, radio, television, the press, advertising and all other facets of industrial production are no longer directed at different goals." The scenes where Glauco's notes are read aloud comprise of probably 95% of the dialogue in the entire film, as a work that features incessant monotone talking for the first couple minutes or so and is virtually totally silent for the next 90 minutes or so thereon after. While listening to his own written words, Glauco comes to the natural conclusion that he no longer wants to design gasmasks. Glauco's assistant confesses he does not understand the final part of his boss' notes, but he reads them anyway, which are as follows: "Under these conditions of uniformity, the old sense of alienation is no longer possible. When individuals identify with a life-style imposed from without and through it experience gratification and satisfaction, their alienation is subsumed by their own alienated existence." After getting done at work, Glauco's assistant hands him a couple reels of film, which contain footage from a vacation, and then the industrial designer heads home and does what he assumedly does every day by basking in his own alienation, but things ultimately change later that day when he discovers a dirty revolver wrapped up in an old newspaper that may or may not have been owned by alpha-gangster John Dillinger.

Upon arriving home, Glauco takes a drag on a cigarette and goes to see his trophy wife Ginette (Anita Pallenberg), who complains about having a headache and refuses to join him for dinner. Glauco goes downstairs and discovers that dinner has already been prepared for him, but he seems to find it inadequate as he puts the food away and begins making his own fancy dinner after referencing a cookbook. After watching a talk show about young teen sluts bragging about wearing makeup in rebellion against their parents, Glauco goes looking inside a closet full of magazines and discovers something wrapped inside an old newspaper, which later turns out to be an old and rather dirty revolver. After unwrapping the newspapers, which features headlines like "Dillinger Is Dead" and "Public Enemy No. 1 Gunned Down Outside Movie Theater" (with real stock footage of Dillinger, including his bullet-ridden corpse, being juxtaposed with the scene), Glauco discovers a black revolver that seems to spark a reawakening in his seemingly impenetrable bourgeois soul. Glauco goes back to work preparing his extravagant feast and his cute pixie-like maid/mistress Sabine (Annie Girardot) arrives at the house. While preparing his food, Glauco begins to literally deconstruct his gun and painstakingly clean every crevice of the weapon with the utmost care, as if it is his baby. Quite notably, the gasmask artisan looks exceedingly emasculate while wearing an apron that undoubtedly demonstrates that the culturally cuckolded character has been domesticated and spiritually neutered by his banal bourgeois existence. While eating, Glauco watches a documentary in tribute to legendary Guido cyclist Fausto Coppi, as well as a documentary on a 'satellite' filmmaker of the Godardian sort who uses 70mm film stock and creates so-called "cinemato-physiological" processes. Of course, Glauco is not so hopelessly emasculated that he would go so far as cleaning up his own messes, so he gets his maid Sabine to do it for him, though he decides to eat a second meal while watching a pretentious black-and-white experimental film featuring dirty hippies, including an anorexic black woman that looks more masculine than the white boys featured in it.

DILLINGER IS DEAD

After finishing multiple dinners, Glauco finally gets around to watching the home movies that were given to him by his co-worker, which include a bullfight and his scenic vacation to the beach with his wife. While watching the footage, Glauco stands in front of the screen and begins to interact with the images in a seemingly mocking fashion. By the time all the home movies have been completed, Glauco has finished cleaning his revolver and puts it in his mouth as if he has a death wish, even mockingly pretending to blow his brains out. By this time, the industrial designer seems to have fallen completely in love with his gun and decides to personalize it by painting it blood red with white polka dots. After painting his revolver, Glauco attempts to go to bed, but finds himself mildly torturing his sleeping wife (who he previously gave sleeping pills and a douche before she went to bed) by recording her snoring and fiddling with a toy snake over her slightly twitching body. Since his wife does not want to play, Glauco decides to wake up his maid/mistress (who he previously caught kissing a poster of her favorite singer, 'Dino') and begins spoon-feeding her watermelon. Instead of having normal sex, Glauco decides to lick honey off of Sabine's spine while she takes swigs of the sweet stuff from the honey jar. After his strange sexual rendezvous with Sabine, Glauco decides to tryout his new improved revolver by shooting his sleeping wife in the head three times, but not before turning on loud music and covering his beloved's head with a couple of pillows. By the time Glauco is finished committing uxoricide, it is already daytime, so the novice wife killer gets dressed, rips up the latest designs he has created for work, picks up his suitcase, drives to the seaside, and dives into the water, but not before stripping off most his clothes and putting on a rather effeminate gold necklace. While in the water, Glauco spots a ship whose crew has just dropped the corpse of their cook into the sea. Glauco boards the ship and tells the blond Nordic captain that "The sea's always been my dream" and begs to replace the cook. Glauco is told by the owner of the ship, a beautiful young woman, to go make her some chocolate mousse and then she takes his golden necklace and wears it. Glauco learns that the ship is headed to Tahiti and seems more excited than ever.

When describing the seemingly (and absurdly) happy ending of Dillinger Is Dead in a 1969 interview, auteur Marco Ferreri offered the following insights: "I certainly wanted the end to give a positive spin to the film as a whole. But this sort of ambiguity strikes me as less vivid and provocative than the ambiguity of my other films. It is essential to Dillinger, though, for it gives meaning to the whole. It is the film's reason for being, in fact. The film, incidentally, is entirely ambiguous." Personally, I interpreted the ending as the delusional childish fantasy of a deranged man who has lost all touch with reality and the fact that the film concludes with the entire screen turning blood red makes this seem all the more true. With Dillinger Is Dead, Ferreri more or less cinematically murdered the essence of the bourgeoisie in a work that depicts a respectable inventor who lives a lavish lifestyle, which includes a live-in mistress, yet throws everything away after 'inheriting' the gun and spirit of a proletarian gangster/killer like John Dillinger. The same year Dillinger Is Dead was released, underrated Italian auteur Salvatore Samperi (Nenè, Ernesto) directed a somewhat similarly themed yet more accessible work entitled Mother's Heart (1969) aka Cuore di mamma where a mute bourgeois mother decides to throw her life away by plotting with far-left terrorists to blow-up her ex-husband's factory. Additionally, a number of years before Ferreri's film was released, Romano Scavolini directed the hidden gem of a film A mosca cieca (1966) aka The Blind Fly aka Ricordati di Haron—a work described by celebrated Italian fascist/futurist poet Giuseppe Ungaretti as a "masterpiece"—which follows a completely alienated young gentleman who discovers a revolver and decides to shoot a bunch of strangers, but not before pushing his girlfriend out of his life and contemplating suicide by shoving the gun in his mouth in a fashion that is not all that unlike the protagonist of Dillinger Is Dead. Indeed, while Ferreri's film is often revered for being a revolutionary work that was created during a critical socio-political political climate, it certainly was not the first film to express such aesthetic and thematic idiosyncrasies, though it did do it in a manner that was nothing short of masterful and ultimately reached the mainstream, thus changing the way people perceived cinema during an imperative moment in history. In an interview, Ferreri would describe his film as virtually introducing the theme of “cinema as an anti-alienation weapon,” yet rather ironically, Dillinger Is Dead is one of the most notorious audience-alienating works of all time. An awkwardly foreboding work that falls in somewhere between cultivated celluloid torture, hermetic socio-politico-culture cinematic revolution, and entrancing absurdist black comedy, Dillinger Is Dead is a rare example of late-1960s experimental cinema that does not seem as worthless and outmoded as the “bobo” far-left politics that accompanied it. Set in a bourgeois world where images ranging from Italian Futurist paintings to photos of the Universal Horror icon The Wolf Man (which the antihero points his gun at) cover the wall, Dillinger Is Dead is a work that renounces both fascism and American capitalism as outmoded cultures, yet Ferreri would also demonstrate with his later films like The Future Is Woman (1984) aka Il futuro è donna that the politics of the new left had also degenerated into an outmoded memory. Indeed, Dillinger Is Dead reminded me how hopelessly the left failed in attempting to dream up a new and wonderful world but then again, Ferreri’s film ends in a manner that seems to reflect hell with its blood red tint.

DILLINGER IS DEAD

-Ty E

THE SEED OF MAN

Marco Ferreri (1969)

While I generally have a hard time getting into virtually any sort of fantasy film, especially if it involves supernatural crap like fairies and elves, I take great delight in dystopian flicks as they provides me with the sort of escapism that, quite unlike bombastic cinematic bullshit like The Lord of the Rings or Star Wars, seems somewhat tangible, thus giving me some hope that someday the modern liberal globalized multicultural world, as well as the people that run and/or support it, will be relegated to the perpetually flushing toilet that is history for eternity. Indeed, whether it be the sometimes hokey flesh-eating horrors of George A. Romero's Dawn of the Dead (1978) or the dangerously hedonistic post-apocalyptic counterculture chaos of Jim McBride's Glen and Randa (1971) or the crippling metaphysical melancholia of Nikos Nikolaidis' Proini Peripolos (1987) aka Morning Patrol, there is indubitably something quite exciting and inspiring about the idea of a lawless world where all forms of bourgeois phoniness, civility, and 'tolerance' have become totally obsolete and true 'equality'—nature and her indiscriminate ruthlessness—reigns supreme. Personally, I have a special affinity for apocalyptic arthouse films as they oftentimes manage to undermine the expectations of both the sci-fi subgenre and art cinema, not to mention the fact that these films tend do be more thoughtful than obscenely overrated works like Soylent Green (1973) and especially Alfonso Cuarón's Children of Men (2006), which are both hopelessly tainted with phony and shallow liberal humanist messages that would make any person with any common sense feel like they are on the verge of projectile vomiting. While he certainly leaned to the far-left in some regards, great Milanese auteur Marco Ferreri (La Donna scimmia aka The Ape Woman, La Grande Bouffe) was also one of the most scathingly culturally cynical and preternaturally politically incorrect filmmakers that ever lived, thus it is only fitting that he played around with apocalyptic cinema, with Il seme dell'uomo (1969) aka The Seed of Man being his most overt contribution to the subgenre. A somewhat ironically titled work, the film depicts how a young and intelligent beta-boy tries in vain to coerce his fiercely frigid girlfriend into getting pregnant in a post-apocalyptic world where most of humanity has been wiped out in some sort of unidentified Cronenbergian plague. A sort of admirable warm-up to Ferreri's somewhat superior and all the more absurd NYC-based flick Bye Bye Monkey (1978) aka Ciao maschio starring Gérard Depardieu and Marcello Mastroianni, The Seed of Man, like many of the auteur's films, is actually really a film about the forsaken nature of modern sex and relationships and merely uses genre conventions as window-dressing to communicate the culturally apocalyptic nature of love affairs between contemporary men and women as a result of being totally tainted by feminism, so-called sexual liberation, and consumerism, among other things. Indeed, in Ferreri's flick the sexual roles are largely reversed as the chick hunts and kills animals (and people) while the man tends to his garden, thus reflecting the gross inversion of sexual polarities in the Occident. After all, most normal women would probably have a hard time getting wet for a man whose ass that they could kick.

THE SEED OF MAN

Featuring Varangian blueblood beauty Anne Wiazemsky in a role in stark contrast to her legendary debut performance as a tragic virginal beauty in Robert Bresson's pastoral black-and-white masterpiece Au Hasard Balthazar (1966), Ferreri's film features arguably the most frustrating yet simultaneously absurdly farcical depiction of female frigidity in cinema history as a work that depicts a stunning and seemingly highly fertile little lady who refuses to fuck, let alone reproduce, despite the fact that the world needs to be repopulated due to the fact that most of humanity has been wiped out in the plague of all plagues. While one would assume that some wild barbarian would stop by and impregnate Wiazemsky's character simply by raping her into oblivion, virtually all of the men featured in the film have about as martial prowess as a Vietnamese toddler with Down syndrome, with the most masculine and stoic men being ambiguously gay (indeed, a couple of actors that almost resemble women portray black-clad bandits that proclaim to be the new government of the post-apocalyptic world). Of course, in a world where many (mis)educated Western women consider having children and starting a family to be anachronistic, suffocating, and downright shameful and tend to believe it is an act of 'liberation' to live a life of recreational fucking where pregnancy is a curse that can easily be remedied with a quick pill or relatively painless abortion where their unborn spawn is vacuumed out of their vagina while they are sleep, The Seed of Man is naturally more relevant today than when it was first released as indicated by Europe's collectively suicidal behavior, especially in regard to their dwindling birth rates. Of course, Ferreri's film does not just focus on the plague of spiritually comatose barren women and their candy ass male partners, but also the great pains a woman will go to destroy the competition and take down a woman that is attempting to steal her man, even if she does not really care for said man. Indeed, in The Seed of Man, the male protagonist is quite excited when a woman who, quite unlike his lover, wants to have children comes into his life, but of course his perennially barren spouse does not go down without a fairly brutal and ultimately venomously vindictive fight. Indubitably one of Ferreri's most shamelessly aesthetically pleasing features as a cinematic work where the camera is practically magnetized to Wiazemsky's largely vacant but oftentimes subtly forlorn stare and the haunting organic pulchritude of a desolate beach that is eventually cursed with the corpse of a gigantic whale, The Seed of Man is questionably one of the most soothing and serene yet simultaneously cynical dystopian flicks ever made as a fairly idiosyncratic cinematic work that sometimes feels like an attempt at reconciling the films of George A. Romero with that of Pier Paolo Pasolini, albeit with a slight lowbrow 'proletarian' influence that is typical of latter's sole protégé Sergio Citti. Of course, in the end, the film can only be adequately classified as a Marco Ferreri flick, as the anarchic auteur invented his own readily identifiable brand of cinema just as virtually all great filmmakers do.

The Seed of Man begins with a medium shot of a fairly attractive guido gal holding a somewhat creepy homemade human-size blonde doll and stating directly to the viewer in a somewhat contrived fashion, "If you see signs of this color, it means that area is infected. Yellow means plague. But can we be sure that we shall never see these signs? We'll be right back." The little lady warning about the precarious nature of the color yellow is ultimately revealed to be a TV announcer that the film's protagonists, young couple Cino (Marzio Margine of Fernando Di Leo's I ragazzi del massacre (1969) aka Naked Violence) and Dora (Anne Wiazemsky of her then-husband Godard's La chinoise (1967) and Pasolini's Teorema (1968)), are somewhat apathetically watching on a large television screen while they enjoy a fancy meal at a diner. When Cino remarks while eating, "If we leave now, we'll be back home by tonight," the two decide to abruptly leave the diner and head home in their atrociously goofy orange jeep, but little do the protagonists realize that they will never reach their desired destination, as a pernicious unidentified biological plague will ultimately irreparably change the course of their lives in just a couple of brief moments. While sitting in their singularly aesthetically revolting automobile, Cino notices a phallic-shaped plane in the sky and pedantically remarks to Dora, "Look, that's a Sikorsky '61, old model. It's got 12 seats. They don't manufacture them anymore. In the new models, the style has been completely changed," thus revealing the male protagonist's affinity for historical preservation and technology, which will be the focus of his life later in the film. As Dora demonstrates while barely paying attention to Cino, she could care less about his interests, which will only become more obvious as the film progresses. In other words, Cino and Dora make for a rather shitty couple, which only becomes all the more apparent when they are forced to totally rely on one another as a result of an apocalyptic scenario.

In a somewhat eerie scene that is arguably symbolic of the precarious nature of civilization and how it can disappear with the blink of an eye, the couple drives through a tunnel and by the time they reach the other side, their car radio has cut out and most of the country side is covered in corpses. Indeed, when the two pass a school bus that is curiously sitting in the middle of a highway, they decide to investigate and are startled to discover that driver and all the children inside the vehicle are dead. Not long after passing the bus, an emergency helicopter forces Cino's car off the road and the couple are examined by doctors at a checkpoint where piles of bloody of corpses, including a fairly bloody little boy, are being burnt with blowtorches. Ultimately, the head doctor checks the two for diseases (he seems especially interested in learning about Dora's sexual habits, or seemingly lack thereof), gives them a pill that is supposedly "a concentrate against leprosy, cholera, typhus, and plague," and then tells them to find a new home in the local area. Before they leave, the doctor gives them a shot and remarks, "Remember that the plague that killed one-third of the Europeans in the second half of the 14th century was insignificant compared to what we are experiencing now." As a rather indulgent young woman with a pathological sweet tooth as demonstrated by the fact that she has dozens of lollipops wrapped around her neck and is depicted for a good portion of the beginning of the film sucking on a sucker, Dora naturally opts to spend her remaining change at a bubblegum vending that is strangely located at the checkpoint. Unfortunately for the protagonists, their car and precious bottles of whiskey are confiscated by the military men at the checkpoint, thus they are forced to walk during their search for their new home and must accept a future where dipsomania is just not a realistic option.

THE SEED OF MAN

While roaming the beach in pursuit of a new place to call home, Cino and Dora get lucky and discover a fairly large and startlingly scenic two-story beach house that seems like it is located at the edge of the end of the world. Somewhat humorously, they find the lifeless corpse of the house owner (as fittingly portrayed by auteur Marco Ferreri) sitting in a chair outside the front door, as if the man was admiring the natural beauty of the ocean when he succumbed to the plague. As indicated by the large library of books, various taxidermied animals, and assortment of scientific instruments that are discovered by the couple in the house, the previous owner was a reclusive intellectual of sorts. Needless to say, Dora is quite happy when she discovers a cabinet full of fancy dresses in the house and thus dresses accordingly, though, as the film progresses, vulgar rubber military fatigue style overalls seem to become one of her favorite wardrobes. During the first night at the house, Cino and Dora watch a TV broadcast that reveals that all of London is on fire and where the announcer somewhat melodramatically states, "This footage speaks for itself. A whole civilization destroyed. We'll have to start over again." Somewhat humorously, there is also footage of the Pope repenting to god while dying, stating while seeming terribly guilty about the life that he has lived, "I rather die than offend you." Of course, compared to the rest of the world, it seems that Cino and Dora have lucked out in many regards as they have a splendorous house full of various fancy trinkets and knickknacks, but, as one can expect from a Ferreri flick, nature and especially human nature, will ultimately get the best of them in the end.

When Dora notices a gigantic object floating in the sky while looking through an antique telescope, she and Cino wrongly believe that it a plane that has come to rescue them, so naturally they are quite disheartened when they eventually realize that their ostensible savior is actually a gigantic blimp in the shape of a Pepsi-Cola bottle that reads "Merry Christmas." In a scene that seems to epitomize Dora's sort of passive nihilism and overall seemingly nonsensical attitude towards life, she states when the large blimp begins to float away, "The bottle is floating away. What a pity, it was pretty." As for Cino, he, quite unlike vapid philiſtine Dora, has a more practical and even sometimes romantic view of life and really cherishes European man's singular contributions to technology and civilization as indicated by his obsessional reading of books on rocket science and space travel. Indeed, as demonstrated by the fact that he wears the dead man's clothes and even grows the same sort of medieval facial hair, Cino begins to adopt the identity of the previous owner of the house, thus indicating in a somewhat symbolic way that he, quite unlike Dora, is a staunch traditionalist that sees culture and history as something that is linear and is inherited. Using the previous owner's books, Cino starts a garden and even manages to cure Dora with medical herbs that he has grown when she becomes sick. For his efforts, Dora pays Cino a backhanded compliment about how she is surprised that he was able to harvest such herbs and then coldly ignores him after he sensitively states to her, "I want a child." Indeed, for reasons that are never made totally clear, Dora refuses to have children, though one suspects that it is the result of her being a thoroughly spoiled and self-centered modern woman who just can't bother to suffer through childbirth or make the effort to be a loving mother. While Cino will clearly do anything for her, Dora refuses to budge when it comes to her stern antinatalism, as if she considers reproduction to be the gravest of mortal sins.

One sunny day while beating a wild black hog to death, Dora is startled to see a group of masked horsemen dressed in all-black approach her property. Rather pathetically, both Cino and Dora immediately submit to the somewhat enigmatic horsemen by passively raising their hands in the air as if they expect to be executed, though luckily the worries are ultimately revealed to be in vain. Led by a strangely effete, slender and pale man with dark curly hair named Major Devotis who curiously carries the bright red revolver with white bold polka dots from Ferreri's previous film Dillinger è Morto (1969) aka Dillinger Is Dead and later also featured in the auteur's anti-western Don't Touch The White Woman! (1974), the sort of 'Horsemen of the Post-Apocalypse,' who all seem like gay repressed holy men types, are revealed to be the new leaders of the government (or as Devotis stoically states, "We are the State Administrative Service"). Not surprisingly, Major Devotis' right-hand man is an older but similarly effeminate priest that has a giant crucifix symbol on the front of his black robe. As men with strikingly sullen feminine faces, they are the sort of rare men that could pass as women if they dressed in drag and one can only speculate that Ferreri decided to use these uniquely unforgettable actors to insinuate that government and religion are oftentimes ruled over by gay men that have no interest in women or children. After the priest berates Cino because Dora is not pregnant, Devotis declares, "The world needs new inhabitants. All women must be fertilized. That's an order." After the couple is forced to enter their names and provide a bloody fingerprint in a giant three-foot-long leather-bound black book with a lock, Cino proudly declares, "I haven't had children yet...But at least I had an idea that I think everybody will find interesting” and then shows the horsemen how he has taken upon himself to transform his home into a sort of makeshift museum, with items like a portable TV, refrigerator, gold watch, piece of Parmesan cheese, etc. being on display as historical remnants of the pre-apocalyptic world. While his fairly flat affect gives no indication of his true emotions, Major Devotis seems fairly impressed with Cino’s work and not only gives the protagonist a “memento of Florence” to add to his collection in the form of an ancient painting of a stoic blonde woman, but also appoints him as the “Museum Curator” of the new post-apocalyptic world. Cino is so happy with his new title that he informs Major Devotis that he will be putting up a sign in his museum that reads, “Major Devotis Foundation.” After pulling his red revolver on a beautiful blonde whore that is traveling with his group who attempts to steal a gold watch that is on display in a scenario that further hints at the character’s latent homosexuality, Major Devotis and his men leave just as abruptly as they once came, though the priest warns Cino before getting on his horse, “Dear young man, there is darkness, there is lightning, and you two are alone, but remember, a child. You need to have a child.” Naturally, as a man that clearly respects law and order, Cino’s plans to abide with the priest’s fairly reasonable request.

THE SEED OF MAN

Not long after the horsemen ride away into the sunset, the protagonists discover a large whale corpse on their beach that makes Cino quite happy but completely petrifies poor dunce Dora, who complains to her beau in regard to the rotting sea beast that “It will only bring us misfortune!” and then pleads to her lover, “Let’s lock ourselves in the house. It’s cold. I’m scared.” When Cino asks Dora after joyously climbing on top of the whale corpse, “Why aren’t you happy? It’s the white whale. It’s Moby Dick. It’s Pinocchio’s whale,” she replies in a fairly bitchy but ultimately quite prophetic fashion, “Soon, because of the beast, we won’t be able to live here anymore.” Not surprisingly, Dora’s perturbing premonitions seem to be not unfounded, as a strange foreign woman (Annie Girardot of Visconti’s Rocco and His Brothers (1960) and Haneke’s The Piano Teacher (2001)) soon randomly shows up on the beach while Cino is painting a sketch of the dead whale and then proceeds to seduce the assumedly hopelessly horny young male protagonist. Naturally, when Dora comes home after spending the day hunting a rabbit and overhears the foreign woman state, “It’s an absolutely charming shelter. And what about these clothes? But maybe it’s a dream,” she has good reason to be concerned as she knows that she is now in competition for Cino. In fact, the foreign woman actually has the gall to brag that she is a “thief” that “emptied three stores” while taking a bubble bath in front of both Dora and Cino in a scene that reveals that the post-apocalyptic femme fatale is quite confident with her body and has no qualms about exploiting it in her quest to steal the male protagonist from his frigid girlfriend. At one point, Cino even goes so far as to hint that he is interested in the foreign woman and her womb after stating to her after she asks him to take a picture of her and Dora,

“No. I only have two pictures left. And I’ll keep them for my child.” After all, at this point, Cino is desperate for a child and Dora is just too pigheaded to give him one, so the male protagonist has to keep his options open, not realizing that his beloved will literally kill for him if she is forced to.

Notably, the foreigner woman symbolically helps herself to a wig and fancy dress that she finds in the house in a rather cunning attempt to make her seem like a classy broad that is fit to be a mother, thus representing how women tend to wear a sort of figurative costume when attempting to appeal to males, who are always dumb enough to fall for such disguises (indeed, as Esther Vilar once wrote, “A woman [...] is the author of her own transformation and produces femininity by means of cosmetics, hair style, and different components: emphasis on secondary sexual characteristics and distancing herself by means of masks. Woman makes use of various types of masks in order to make the difference between herself and a given man as conspicuous as possible. The first component serves to make her desirable to man, the second to make her mysterious to him. She herself thus creates the equivocal, unknown ‘opposite sex,’ making it easier for him to accept his enslavement. Thanks to the wide range of possible transformations each woman can offer a man [...] she keeps him in a state of constant bewilderment. While he is still trying to find yesterday’s woman in today’s, she gains time to achieve her own ends. She will maneuver the man into an untenable position, all the time skillfully distracting his attention from the stench of rotting mind beneath the pleasing mask.”). Of course, the foreign woman is far from the elegant and cultivated bourgeois wife type that she attempts to disguise herself as, yet book-smart beta-boy Cino seems entirely oblivious to her fairly glaring aesthetic deceptions. Indeed, one night while the protagonists are asleep, the foreign woman knocks on their bedroom door and manages to make her way into their bed after crying in a less than believable fashion, “Can I come in? I’m so scared. I’m all alone downstairs.” While lying in bed with the couple, the foreign woman strategically massages Dora until she falls asleep and then fucks Cino in the hope she will be impregnated with his seed. The next day while Cino is working in his study, the foreign woman successfully hints that she would be a better wife than Dora by showing genuine interest in his studies. On top of that, the foreign woman declares, “I’ve been thinking about last night” and then gives Cino a present in the form of a pacifier, thereupon letting the protagonist know that she is fully committed to having his child. Unbeknownst to the foreign woman, Dora was only pretending to be asleep when she dared to fuck Cino while lying next to her and thus fully realizes the cunning homewrecker’s unsavory intentions. Indeed, when the foreign woman eventually attempts to beat Dora to death with a stick, Dora is ready to fight back and not only manages to strangle her nemesis to death, but also goes to the effort of dismembering her body with an axe. In a sort of sick celebration of her defeat over the foreign woman in a scene that wickedly demonstrates that Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned, Dora cooks her corpse for dinner and then serves it to Cino, who remarks while unwittingly savoring his quasi-mistress' flesh, "This is good meat. It is very sweet."

THE SEED OF MAN

Towards the end of the film, Cino gets so desperate to have a child that he builds a naked woman with sand and then simulates copulation with it. While Dora witnesses the particularly pathetic sight of Cino's sand sensuality, she lets him know that she still refuses to have a child and then forces him to take sanctuary with her at a nearby building this is full of dummies since she is afraid that the beach house will continue to give them bad luck due to the dead whale. In fact, Dora tells Cino that she does not even care if he stays with her. When a virtual army of bloodthirsty vultures transforms the dead whale into nothing more than a sort of abstract skeleton formation, Dora eventually agrees to move back into the beach house because she is finally convinced the curse has been lifted. Using the dozens upon dozens of dummies that he found in the nearby building that they temporarily lived in, Cino creates what Dora describes as a "dummy cemetery" by laying the somewhat creepy mannequins on the beach in parallel rows outside of their home, as if he hopes they will somehow come alive and provide him with company. Finally completely fed up with Dora's pathological frigidness, Cino comes up with a pathetic rape strategy and decides to drug his lover's wine and ricotta cheese and then insert his semen inside her while she is knocked out cold. Indeed, before penetrating her assumedly less than wet main vein, Cino writes in a journal, "Today I'm going to sow, I hope, the seed of man" and then proceeds to quasi-ritualistically remove the clothes from Dora's lifeless body. When Dora complains a couple days later that her stomach hurts and that she is hungry, Cino smiles and eventually brags, "You're pregnant. I sowed you." Needless to say, Dora is not happy with her involuntary pregnancy and starts chasing after Cino while yelling "We didn't have the right," but the male protagonist is just too damn happy to care and instead proudly chants, "The seed of man has sprouted." Considerably upset, Dora proceeds to lie on the beach in a somewhat fetal position while holding her womb while Cino jumps around her in a jubilant fashion and proudly shouts, "The seed of man has sprouted! All the children! The children of the children! I sowed the seed! I sowed the seed! The seed of man has sprouted." Ultimately, in the end, Cino looks like a pathetic braggart who was too quick to celebrate, as both he and Dora are both killed when at least one of them inexplicably spontaneously explodes.

In many ways, The Seed of Man is one of the most patently pessimistic and culturally cynical dystopian films ever made, as a work that not only makes human existence after an Armageddon-like scenario seem patently pointless and completely undesirable, but also dares to make a scathingly sardonic mockery of such reproductive ambitions, as if human existence is nothing more than a cycle of nihilistic progress that is built upon nothingness upon nothingness without end. Indeed, while watching the film, I certainly got the image in my mind of auteur Marco Ferreri as a sort of guido Joker who laughs and daintily sips wine while watching the entire world burn. In his depiction of a woman that refuses to fuck and make babies in a post-apocalyptic realm where repopulation is an unquestionable necessity, Ferreri hints that the world, and especially the Occident, ended long before the plague even happened as a result of some sort of malignant metaphysical affliction that had completely consumed both the Faustian spirit and collective unconscious, with the surviving humans being mere hollow shells of their former selves. Indeed, one could certainly argue that, in a sense, the characters are not unlike the relics from the museum displays that male protagonist Cino collects, as they are mere anachronistic remnants of a decidedly dead civilization that only exists today in a purely material post-decadent corpse-like form. Interestingly, in his later work Bye Bye Monkey, which almost feels like a pseudo-Warholian reworking of The Seed of Man (notably, the lead character played by Gérard Depardieu resembles Joe Dallesandro) and even features the beach-ridden corpse of King Kong in place of a dead whale, Ferreri would do somewhat of a 180 in terms of the sexes and pretty much solely blame man as opposed to woman for being too weak and ill-equipped to sire children. Of course, then again, one could argue that Wiazemsky's character did not want to have children because her boy toy was too big of a bourgeois pussy, hence why she is depicted hunting while he is sitting around the house reading books. If one thing is for sure, it is that the female protagonist, who is somewhat like a frog female equivalent to Melville's Bartleby in terms of her somewhat deleterious campaign of passive resistance against pregnancy, is symbolic of the fact that, at least on a primitive level, it is ultimately the choice of womankind where the fate of humanity leads, as she holds the biological keys to the future (after all, it is no mere coincidence that Ferreri would later direct a film entitled Il futuro è donna (1984) aka The Future Is Woman). Indeed, as the anti-feminist Jewess Esther Vilar once wrote in her classic text The Manipulated Man (1971) aka Der Dressierte Mann, "The basis of any economy is a system of barter. Therefore, someone demanding a service must be able to offer of equal value in exchange for it. But as a man must fulfill his sexual desires and, since he tends to want to possess exclusive rights over one vagina, the prices have risen to an extortionate level. This has made it possible for women to follow a system of exploitation which puts the most exploitative robber barons to shame. And no man remains exempt. The concept of femininity is essentially sociological, not biological. Even a homosexual is unlikely to escape without paying his dues. The partner whose sexual drive is less developed quickly discovers the weak points of the other, whose drive is more intense and manipulates him accordingly. It will always be the woman, or the 'female' partner in any homosexual relationship, who exploits the man: for to be a female means to be undersexed."

Of course, what makes Wiazemsky's character so disturbing and even horrifying than the sort of archetypal female described by Vilar is that she is so superbly stingy that she won't give up her pussy for any price to the point where she brutally murders another woman just so that she can maintain her largely platonic 'romance' with her hapless boyfriend. Judging by the breeding habits of contemporary European women, one can only come to the conclusion after watching the insanely ironically titled work The Seed of Man that the apocalypse has already happened and most Europeans just do not realize it yet, or as Francis Parker Yockey once foresaw in his book The Enemy of Europe (1953), "The Europe of 2050 will be essentially the same as that of 1950, viz. a museum to be looted by barbarians, a historical curiosity for sightseers from the colonies; an odd assortment of operetta-states; a reservoir of human material standing at the disposal of Washington and Moscow; a loan market for New York financiers; a great beggars' colony, bowing and scraping before the American tourists." Undoubtedly, the fact that Ferreri was able to make such a cute and sweet dame like Wiazemsky seem like such an insufferable cunt to the point that you would not even want to fuck her just goes to show the director's genius as a filmmaker. Indeed, I certainly cannot even guess how many beautiful blondes I have met that only provoked contempt and hostility in me due to their post-feminist mentalities and complete and utter lack of feminine virtues, hence why so many contemporary American and European males have given up and have begun settling on women from Eastern Europe and the third world. Of course, the fact that the male protagonist of the film passively tolerates such an attitude indicates that males are just as hopelessly despoiled as their female counterparts. Indubitably more relevant today than when it was first released, The Seed of Man demonstrates in a darkly humorous absurdist fashion that Europa and the rest of the West is inhabited by revoltingly entitled and frigid navel-gazing cunts that lack even the most fundamental motherly nurturing qualities yet expect handsome princes and pathological passive pushovers and cuckolds that would probably just stand around and do nothing if they saw their girlfriend being raped. In that sense, I can see why Ferreri would be cynical about the prospect of surviving humans attempting to rebuild after an apocalyptic scenario. After all, it is horrifying to imagine a futuristic museum where the displays include a pink iPhone, Eminem CD, Schindler's List Blu-ray, three-foot-long rubber dildo, a bottle of Viagra, and Afro-Sheen, among other worthless consumer objects that epitomize the innate soullessness of the modern world. Post-apocalyptic considerations aside, if there is anything that can be learned from The Seed of Man, it is that one should not bother with any woman that does not support your goals and interests and/or fails to provide a special wet place for you seed as she is probably a parasite and psychic vampire that will drain you of everything yet give nothing back in return aside from the occasional phony smile.

THE SEED OF MAN

-Ty E

THE LAST WOMAN

Marco Ferreri (1976)

Although I cannot remember my exact age at the time (I assume that I was no older than 12) nor even the name of the film (it seemed he had an erotic interest in his daughter), I remember distinctly the first time I saw the fat froggy bastard Gérard Depardieu in a movie and I was completely astounded by his bloated pomposity and patent pretentiousness despite his rather rotund frame and flabby physique, but had I known about his long career prior to that role maybe I would have understood his overblown (and by then blown) ego. Of course, although always terribly tumescent and at least partially plump, there actually was a time when the name Gérard Depardieu was not totally the source of ridicule and disdain as notably demonstrated with his strikingly macho and marvelously misogynistic performance in the X-rated Italian-French flick La Dernière femme (1976) aka The Last Woman aka L'ultima donna directed by Italian auteur Marco Ferreri (Dillinger Is Dead aka Dillinger è morto, Tales of Ordinary Madness) – a filmmaker known for his oftentimes mirthful yet misanthropic and mordant films – being one of the best examples. Maybe it was the fact that I watched a version of the film dubbed in German, but in La Dernière femme Depardieu seems all MAN (at least until the last couple of minutes) and brazenly and unabashedly so. In short, seemingly non-French, which is quite the feat for a crouton actor unless you're Eddie Constantine (who being born Edward Constantinowsky to a Russian father and Polish mother was not actually a true blue butterfingers). Of course, being a sexually potent mensch in his prime in spiritually-castrated post-war Europa, especially France of all places, the crude yet charming character Depardieu plays in La Dernière femme – directed by a clownish cine-magician of misery – is decisively doomed to fail, thus the real question when watching the film is how, when, and why. The single father of a blond baby boy, Gerard (Gérard Depardieu) quite literally has his hands full in between working to provide for his son and changing the little lad's reeking diapers, so he does not have a lot of time to search for a woman and possible pseudo-mother, so (un)luckily, one very beautiful lady named Valerie (played by buxom brunette Italian actress Ornella Muti; a woman with a Neapolitan father and Estonian mother) practically falls into his lap, but little does he realize that things are about to get much harder than dealing with the delight of infant droppings on a day-to-day basis.

Vaguely Cavallone-esque in nature, especially in spirit and most certainly during the last couple minutes of the film, La Dernière femme might be named Man, Woman, and Baby (not that title 'The Last Woman' does not do the job), if for the sake of its sardonic mundanity, but certainly no title could possibly articulate the complete and utter psychological degeneration of protagonist Gerard at the whim of what he sees as nothing more than a pathologically addicting walking-and-talking biological flesh wound. Opening with a straining sourpuss score at the site of a somber and sterile industrial plant that the 'every-man' engineer hero happens to work at, we are immediately introduced to gutsy and gracious Gerard who – due to his exaggeratedly extroverted personality and belligerently boastful behavior – is in stark contrast to his spiritless surroundings. Seemingly a man who refuses to take shit nor gruff off of anyone, Gerard soon confronts one of the bigwigs at his work site – threatening him to “get out of here or I’ll kick your ass” – despite not even knowing the man nor whether he could be fired because of his bold yet bellicose actions. Little does Gerard know that soon-to-be-inamorata Valerie has already assumed the role of surrogate mother to his infant son. When he comes to the daycare center where his little boy stays during the daytime, he finds the babe crying as Valerie somewhat curiously attempts to get the little lad to sup on her remarkably ample teat. Initially scared of Gerard and his devilish yet philistine charm, Valerie finds him to be a natural protector when he comforts her after a large German shepherd randomly claws at a window. Gerard gives Valerie a ride at her request and on the way back they run into the luscious lady’s lover – a 50+-year-old man of wealth. In front of the elder yet more elegant man, Gerard has the gall to say to Valerie: “Choose – Tunisia, or home with me.” Of course, she chooses her gallant blond knight in shining armor on a motorcycle and the rest is history. Before he even knows her name, Gerard has invited Valerie into his apartment, undresses her (in front of his infant son, no less), mounts her like a champ, and his damning addiction to the precariously carnal is in full swing. Needless to say, for the remainder of La Dernière femme, Valerie – assuming the role of both mother and wife as a sort of mousy femme fatale who has the 'nefarious' plan of wanting a family as opposed to material wealth thus breaking completely with convention in regard to the timeless female archetype – never leaves the apartment, at least for any lengthy period of time, thereupon eventually draining – quite literally and figuratively – Gerard of his formerly virile and vehement manhood.

THE LAST WOMAN

It should be noted that Gérard Depardieu gives the 'performance' of a lifetime in La Dernière femme that more than exceedingly eclipses his role as the sexually potent commie lead in Bernardo Bertolucci's less than epic sociopolitical saga 1900 (1976) aka Novecento. Totally disrobed for an abounding portion of the film despite his already somewhat flabby physique, even in the presence of at least three beautiful women at once – Depardieu even flaunts a full and genuine erection in a couple scenes, thereupon making the unpredictable (but nonetheless foreshadowed) conclusion of La Dernière femme all the more perniciously potent and penetrating, if not positively paralyzing. That being said, it should be no surprise to viewers of the film that La Dernière femme was banned virtually everywhere outside of debauched post-war Europe, including the U.S., upon its initial release and remains virtually impossible to find today in any official format despite the fact that Depardieu was nominated for best actor for his performance in the film at the César Award ceremony in 1977 (which he later won for his roles in Jean-Paul Rappeneau's Cyrano de Bergerac and François Truffaut's The Last Metro). I am sure that many people went to see La Dernière femme expecting to get some sort of perverse masturbation aid, thus making director Marco Ferreri's capricious choice ending for the film all the more provocative in retrospect. If any auteur filmmaker had the intrinsic ability to make his audience members simultaneously laugh, cry, get-off, and become sick to their stomach, it was indubitably ferocious yet funny Ferreri; the delightful 'Duce Supremo' of deranged yet debonair exercises in celluloid cynicism.

-Ty E

BYE BYE MONKEY
BYE BYE MONKEY

Marco Ferreri (1978)

Alpha-frog actor Gérard Depardieu must have had a deep sense of respect for the great Guido auteur Marco Ferreri (Dillinger Is Dead, Tales of Ordinary Madness) as he not only waved around his erect member and even simulated self-castrating himself in the director's devastatingly depressing French-Italian co-production The Last Woman (1976) aka La Dernière femme aka L'ultima donna, but he would also later play a cuckolded male rape victim with a monkey-based maternal instinct in the filmmaker's NYC-based Italian-French co-production Bye Bye Monkey (1978) aka Ciao maschio aka Rêve de singe. Indeed, filmed in English and set in New York City yet never actually released in the degeneration nation it so scathingly depicts, Ferreri's flick is an absurdist dystopian piece about the decline of both Western Civilization and masculinity where Depardieu attempts in vain to do his best Joe Dallesandro impression (in fact, Dallesandro's one-time goombah girlfriend Stefania Casini even plays a feminist rapist in the film). Described for various contemporary reviewers as Ferreri's most nonsensical, incoherent, and poorly outmoded work, Bye Bye Monkey, which won the coveted Grand Prize of the Jury at the 1978 Cannes Film Festival (notably, Polish auteur Jerzy Skolimowski's metaphysical horror flick The Shout also received the prize as both film's tied for the Grand Prize), is actually a relatively accessible, if not audaciously absurd and offbeat, satire of the Western world in the post-counter-culture/post-feminist age where all morals, heroes, culture, and history have been disposed of in a Trotskyite-approved Uncle Sam brand trashcan, hence why the film would probably not make much sense to neo-Marxist film critics and academics who root for the destruction of the very things (i.e. civilization, masculinity, heterosexuality, etc.) that the film decries. Indeed, although directed by a man that was arguably of the left (though it would be unfair to pigeonhole someone with such an idiosyncratic Weltanschauung), Ferreri's work more or less espouses same ideas as Viennese philosopher Otto Weininger and Teutonic philosopher of decline Oswald Spengler as a film set in a dying world where the Occident is taking its last gasp, virtually all men—be they young or old—are spiritually castrated, and where young women have started deranged feminist cults that see rape and getting collectively pregnant as forms of 'progressive' and 'liberating' behavior. Set in a post-industrial NYC wasteland where the corpse of King Kong lies on a beach while an elderly sexually repressed women sings "Rock-a-bye Baby" with her elderly black beau as the World Trade Center twin towers stand clearly in the background, Bye Bye Monkey is a work that wallows in esoteric eccentricity that has, in some ways, become all the more relevant in the post-9/11 age. Undoubtedly, the corpse of King Kong—arguably the greatest and most blatant cinematic symbol of rampant male heterosexuality—is symbolic of the death of males and masculinity. Featuring Depardieu as a cuckolded young man who becomes the adoptive father-mother-figure to King Kong's bastard child, rampantly heterosexual Italian stud and leading man Marcello Mastroianni as a weak and senile old fart of an art fag whose masculinity has withered away long ago, an exceedingly effete and putridly pretentious museum owner played by Italian-American actor James Coco as an unfit preserver of Western Civilization, and American porn star Abigail Clayton aka Gail Lawrence (Dixie, Alex de Renzy's Femmes de Sade) as a feminist rapist who tries to be a born-again woman/mother, Bye Bye Monkey (a work that's Italian title 'Ciao maschio' translates to something along the lines of "Goodbye to Manliness") is a severely sardonic satire about the fact that Europa has lost its balls and has been turned into the cheap whore of the culture-less and cannibalistic mongrel beast that is the United States of America.

In Ferreri's fierce vision of America, New York City is a pre-apocalyptic hell-hole that is policed by neo-Gestapo soldiers in gasmasks carrying machineguns and plagued by armies of hungry rats and degenerate European immigrants who have a hard time penetrating young American pussy, as all the young women are brainwashed feminists who have no morals and whose maternal instincts are next to nil. Goofy frog Gerard Lafayette (Gérard Depardieu) is a masters of electronics/jack-of-all trades handyman who lives in a shitty rat-infested basement and he works for a variety of eccentric clients, including the arrogant owner of an Ancient Rome-themed wax museum named Andreas Flaxman (James Coco) who rightfully believes, "Civilizations fade away...but the rats remain. The future belongs to the rats!" as well as collective of hot yet crazed feminist actresses who perform pretentious twaddle for no one aside from themselves and their French handyman/passive sex slave. Lafayette is also friends with a nearly elderly Italian artist/sculptor named Luigi Nocello (played by acting maestro Marcello Mastroianni in a totally against-type role), who is well past his prime and has a serious problem attracting women, be they young or old, as the so-called fairer sex has lost all respect in men. When a feminist goes on the following rant, "Women are violent. Why do we always have to show women as victims or helpless...and why whitewash the fact that women are just as capable of violence as men are?" and Lafayette remarks, "Go ahead, shoot up your mouth! I shoot up my load!" the handyman is hit over the head with a glass Coca-Cola bottle by a fucked feminist actress and is subsequently raped by another feminist named Angelica (Abigail Clayton), who ironically falls in love with her victim during mid-rape, thus ushering in the beginning of a misbegotten romantic relationship in a zeitgeist where the war of the sexes has reached its zenith. After Lafayette and his friends happen upon the bloated corpse of cinematic super simian King Kong (apparently, this was a prop borrowed from the 1976 Dino De Laurentiis produced King Kong remake) on a NYC beach, Luigi finds the dead beast's son which the young Frenchman decides to adopt despite

BYE BYE MONKEY

Flaxman's prophetic warning, "your freedom will be dead and gone forever." Indeed, Lafayette, who later idiotically states, "I don't give a fuck about race" like so many modern self-righteous brainwashed Europids, is symbolic of Western man's suicidal altruism, as a man who cares more for a hairy baby beast than in his kind. Of course, as the film will ultimately demonstrate, Lafayette's nihilistic altruism will lead to his demise just as the white world's nonsensical altruism to mostly ungrateful and largely hostile nonwhite world is leading to its progressive demise (in that regard, Ferreri's film has only become all the more relevant). Indeed, there is certainly something sick about a group of people who see adopting African savage children as the height of moral righteousness while at the same time not having biological children of their own. Of course, like many American celebrities and moronic adoptees, Lafayette is petrified of spreading his seed and having children of his own, even though a beautiful blonde who has the body of a voluptuous teenage girl wants to jump his bones.

Despite being a crazed chick who has suffered a full feminist lobotomy, Angelica decides to move in with Lafayette on a whim without permission from him even though she will not have sex with the blonde frog because, as she seemingly absurdly states, she loves him. Indeed, Lafayette, Angelica, and the monkey turn into a sort of dystopian nuclear family, though the fun does not last forever. Meanwhile, Flaxman is visited by a Svengali-like government bureaucrat from something called the "State Foundation of Psychological Research" who demands that the wax museum owner, who is working against American interests because he "supports the advance of civilized man," change the faces of the wax figures of great Roman leader into American presidents in a scene symbolic of mongrel America's post-WWII colonization of Europe and disgusting distortion of the history of Western Civilization. Threatening Flaxman with typical bogus bureaucratic "safety violations" if he does not comply, Flaxman is forced to change the face of Julius Caesar into JFK and Nero into Nixon, as if 20th century American presidents have any right to be compared to great Roman leaders. After being rejected by various women, including an old lady named Mrs. Toland (played by Geraldine Fitzgerald, who has had the distinguished honor of portraying both Laurence Olivier's wife and Rodney Dangerfield's mother-in-law) who digs dark meat (she has a portrait of a near-nude negro on her wall, which has caused her son to refuse to speak to her), as well as the group of feminist actresses, Luigi becomes seriously depressed and feels hopeless not just about his own future, but western civilization in general. Indeed, after failing to swoon a feminist rapist by remarking how his generation invented the pill so that young women could be more sexually and sexually free, Luigi comes to the conclusion, "Nobody wants to listen to us [men] anymore," and subsequently tells Flaxman, "You're the worst [...] you're trying to preserve something that does not exist anymore. It's time to destroy that image of a man!" Indeed, while Flaxman believes he is doing something righteous by preserving Occidental history in his own small way by running a wax museum dedicated to the greatness of the Roman Empire, he is really just a coward who is unwilling to accept the fact that all has been lost. Not surprisingly, Luigi opts for committing suicide via hanging and he leaves most of his possessions to Lafayette hoping that his family will blossom. Unfortunately, despite all of his pessimism, Luigi was a little too optimistic in regard to young Lafayette's future.

When Angelica tells Lafayette that she is pregnant, everything comes crashing down for simian-loving frog bastard. Indeed, after Angelica tells him that she is knocked up in a serious and loving fashion while the two are sitting on the beach, Lafayette—a self-centered man-boy who is certainly lacking in maturity—complains to his girlfriend, “what is going to become of me?,” to which she soundly replies, “What is going to become of you?! What is going to become of us?” Needless to say, Angelic is pissed and runs away, but not before stating to Lafayette, “You and your damn monkey. I hope you'll be happy together.” After making a half-hearted attempt to chase down Angelica and predictably failing, Lafayette comes home to his basement apartment, only to see that his beloved monkey has been killed and is being eaten by rabid rats. With nowhere to go, Lafayette goes to visit Flaxman, who is acting out a scene from Act 3, Scene 2 of Shakespeare's play The Tragedy of Julius Caesar all by himself and becomes rather annoyed by the young Frenchman's unexpected arrival. When Lafayette cries about his dead monkey, Flaxman spits in his face and states in a scornful fashion, “All this grief over a monkey...A civilization disappears. You disgust me.” Ultimately, Flaxman attempts to get Lafayette to kill him, but he does not have the testicular fortitude, so the wax museum owner kills himself instead and accidentally sets his business on fire in the process. In a rather allegorical scene, Lafayette stares like a moron as a small model reconstruction of ancient Rome burns while a degenerate humanoid-like ape (aka man of the future, or a late stage version of what Nietzsche described as the 'Last Man') stands in foreground. Having no reason to live, Lafayette also lets himself burn up in the wax museum. Notably, the final scene of the film features Angelica naked on a beach with Lafayette's child. As the conclusion of Bye Bye Monkey demonstrates, it is no surprise that Ferreri would later direct a film entitled The Future Is Woman (1984) aka Il futuro è donna.

Notably, auteur Marco Ferreri once stated, “The values that once existed no longer exist. The family, the bourgeoisie—I'm talking about values, morals, economic relationships. They no longer serve a purpose. My films are reactions translated into images.” Indubitably, Ferreri took this personal philosophy to cinema one more step further with Bye Bye Monkey, which is not just a critique of the death of the bourgeoisie, but an absurdist allegorical depiction of the death of the West in its entirety, as well as the decidedly deleterious anti-culture/anti-European effects of American hegemony. Indeed, Ferreri's film translates into sardonic cinematic form the sort of apocalyptic pessimism that lapsed fascist philosopher Emil M. Cioran—a man sometimes regarded as the last great European philosopher—spent his entire life brooding over. Unquestionably, despite the film's overriding satirical tone, there is a somber feeling throughout, thus indicating that Ferreri was not celebrating that death of the Occident like so many of his cinematic compatriots were, but instead, cynically mourning it. Interestingly, in the highly worthwhile documentary Marco Ferreri: The Director Who Came from the Future (2007), the director states that he is "50% feminist and 50% misogynist," and in none of the filmmaker's other works is this more clear than in Bye Bye Monkey, as a work where women have become morally retarded rapists yet where men have also become emasculated boys and senile old men who do not have what it takes to properly tame or satisfy the female species. While featuring incessant full-body nudity and even female-on-male rape, Ferreri's flick is hardly arousing, as a post-counter-culture piece that depicts influence of so-called sexual liberation as being largely corrosive, hence why the character Angelica says she will not have sex with protagonist Lafayette because she actually loves him, as sex has become meaningless to such a despoiled woman. In terms of cinema history, I cannot think of a film that more hilariously depicts what German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche described as the 'last man,' which as a passive pansy that takes no chances and wallows in creature comforts, is the antithesis the Übermensch. While Nietzsche believed that the last man is the final goal of what western civilization supposedly sought out to achieve, in Ferreri's film, the last man is a production of Americanization and late capitalism, with America being the culturally and spiritually void bastard son of Europe that, like all resentful people(s) that lack culture and civilization, seeks to destroy anything that reminds it of its' own innate inferiority, hence why the wax museum owner is forced to replace the faces of great Roman leaders with those of American presidents. Indeed, there is certainly something wrong with a nation where a rampantly heterosexual beast like King Kong even succumbs to death in an undignified fashion on a beach where he should have been raping countless chicks.

BYE BYE MONKEY

-Ty E

TALES OF ORDINARY MADNESS

Marco Ferreri (1981)

With all the novelists and philosophers that have claimed to be speaking for the loser masses known as the Lumpenproletariat, Amero-Kraut dipsomaniac Charles Bukowski (Factotum, Notes of a Dirty Old Man) was probably the only one who was not full of shit, as a virtual real-life bum and self-destructive addict that, not unlike the millions of alcohol-addled American men that look and act just like him, would have probably dropped dead in a gutter completely unknown and unloved were it not for his unconventionally charming writings. Italian auteur Marco Ferreri (Dillinger Is Dead, La Grande Bouffe)—a man who also liked to call out bullshit when he saw it, especially regarding the decadent bourgeois, albeit in sardonic celluloid form—seemed to have taken notice of Bukowski's lack of bullshit, as indicated by his rather underrated work Tales of Ordinary Madness (1981) aka Storie di ordinaria follia starring American Guido Ben Gazzara (The Killing of a Chinese Bookie, Buffalo '66), great Guido goddess Ornella Muti (Flash Gordon, Once Upon a Crime), and exceedingly eccentric cult diva Susan Tyrrell (Andy Warhol's Bad, Forbidden Zone). Adapted from stories featured in the 1972 Bukowski collection Erections, Ejaculations, Exhibitions, and General Tales of Ordinary Madness, including the short story The Most Beautiful Woman in Town, Ferreri's rather elegant yet exceedingly fucked film features a rare booze-and-boobs-addled "no bullshit" depiction of America, namely Los Angeles, that reminds the viewer why America has never and will never be the land of kings and queens, but instead, a gigantic anti-cultural world toilet of the anti-organic sort swimming with decidedly desperate and depraved untermenschen who live for the bread and circus (or, should I say, cheap beer and crusty cunts) and nothing more. As a native goombah, Ferreri opted for transforming Bukowski from an ugly kraut with an ugly Polack surname into an ugly old wop with an ugly Anglo surname. Featuring the sort of lavish and meticulous set-design and Mise-en-scène you would expect from Italian maestro Luchino Visconti, albeit set in a proletarian pandemonium form full of intentionally aesthetically vulgar mustard greens, vomit yellows, feces brown, and dried up blood reds, Tales of Ordinary Madness is fitting is an (anti)tribute to a nation full of forlorn physical and psychological cripples, criminals, bastards, mongrels, addicts, and other miserable sub-subhuman serfs whose ancestors had been flushed out of Europe. Focusing on a wanton wino writer antihero who stoically states, "I didn't want to go home, I didn't want to see anybody. I just wanted to be invisible for a few days. To get down in the dirt and lose myself with all the others...the defeated, the demented, and the damned. They're the real people of this world and I was proud to be in their company," while watching a group of multicultural bums fight, Ferreri's Bukowski flick is a rare 1980s Reagan era film that depicts America as it really was, as a culturally vacant (sub)human sewer as seen through the blurry eyes of a true blue American prole philosopher-poet.

TALES OF ORDINARY MADNESS

Opening with poet-philosopher antihero Charles Serking (Ben Gazzara) doing a spoken word performance at a mostly empty opera house while drinking a bottle of liquor wrapped in a brown paper bag and proudly proclaiming, "Style is the answer to everything... a fresh way to approach a dull or dangerous thing. To do a dull thing with style is preferable to doing a dangerous thing without style. To do a dangerous thing with style is what I call art. Bullfighting can be an art. Boxing can be an art. Loving can be an art. Opening a can of sardines can be an art. Not many have style. Not many can keep style. I have seen dogs with more style than men - though not many dogs have style. Cats have it in abundance. When Hemingway put his brains to a wall with a shotgun, that was style," Tales of Ordinary Madness immediately establishes an offbeat libertine tone that has disposed of all conventional morals and pretense in a vomit-covered trashcan. After getting bored with a banal folksinger that performs after him, Serking wanders around the opera house and finds a busty blonde teenage runaway who claims that she is only 12-years-old, but that does not stop the proudly perverted poet from attempting to get in her middle school panties. Determined to find out her true age, Serking grabs the runaway's tits and after feeling them for a couple seconds declares, "Your tits are too big...their at least 8 years old apiece. It adds up to 18. You're a liar." Undoubtedly, when it comes to the ladies, the gutter philosopher does not discriminate, as he loves all ages, shapes, sizes, and persuasions of women, so long as they have a nice warm wet hole that he can enter. As Serking narrates, he has "come to the conclusion that the touring poet act was a mistake, but then again, my life's been one big one, so I am told," so he decides to head back to the Los Angeles hellhole of an apartment that his ex-wife Vicky (Tanya Lopert) rather reluctantly retains for him. When Vicky throws a can of Serking's beer out of a window to protest the fact that he has rather poor health as a result of decades of drunkenness, the Poet becomes so enraged that he begins to strangle his ex while shouting, "You owe me for that beer, bitch! Cough it up!" like a wounded animal. Needless to say, Serking has to get away from Vicky, whose voice is quite grating, so he heads to the beach and soon spots a hot middle-aged blond named Vera (Susan Tyrrell) and declares that he has, "hit the jackpot when I spotted this blonde number. She was that rare kind that gives you an instant hard-on. All sexual sleaze with the ass of a wild animal...my kind of game. She was radiating heat, putting out signals and I was hooked." Needless to say, Serking stalks Vera all the way to her apartment and quasi-rapes her. After they have 'passionate' coitus, the Poet asks her how she liked it and Vera responds, "Yes, I liked being raped," though she later decides to call the police and accuses Serking of "carnal violence" in the form of forced oral sex.

Undoubtedly, Serking's life takes a rare temporary turn for the better when he meets a girl he describes as “devastating” and “the most beautiful girl in town.” Although a pussy-peddler by trade, Cass (Ornella Muti) claims to have previously been a member of a Catholic convent. She is also a suicidal sadomasochist who even freaks an old drunk degenerate like Serking out when she randomly drives a giant safety pin from one side of her mouth to the other, as if attempting to prevent herself from speaking. Serking tells Cass that her self-destructive behavior hurts him and his uncommon sensitivity ultimately touches the metaphysically wounded hooker, so the two head back to the poet’s apartment, only to see that his ex-wife has locked him out of his room. When Serking eventually gets Vicky to unlock the door to his apartment, he decides to write instead of fuck, which impresses Cass, who states of the Poet, “You’re the only man I’ve ever known who wasn’t in a rush.” Indeed, the two do not screw until the next morning, but when they do it is quite passionate, as Serking porks Cass from behind while grunting the word, “love.” Naturally, Cass comes by to see Serking the next day, only to walk in on him receiving a foot massage from a quasi-cross-dressing Mansonite-like bull-dyke with a shaved head who has the words, “Love, He Said” written in red on her forehead. Cass demands that Serking get rid of the dyke and then passionately proclaims, “I want to be fucked and have nothing left for the others. Nothing.” Ironically, Serking absurdly demands that the hot Hooker pay him for sex despite the fact that he is a physically repellant human-booger and she is a great Guido goddess, which she, quite inexplicably, gladly does. After choking Cass and prophetically declaring, “I’ll kill you, you understand,” the two make love on the floor in front of the bald bull-dyke and the hooker states, “give it to me...take my soul with your cock.” When Serking bails Cass out of jail a couple days later for hustling, the prostitute proudly declares, “you’re my man forever,” which seems to somewhat annoy the Poet as he subsequently decides to pay a morbidly obese single mother for sex. While shoving his head up the morbidly obese single mother’s cave of a cunt, the fat woman sings, “It’s ok, it’s ok,” thus causing the Poet to subsequently cry like a little baby. Indeed, it seems like Serking would like nothing more than to crawl back into his mother’s womb.

Fed up with his day-to-day life as a dipsomaniac poet, Serking decides to enter the wino underworld and stays at a homeless shelter for a couple days where he bears witness to bum fights and the unconventional wisdom of hobo philosophers. When the Poet gets so drunk one night that he ends up sleeping in a car at a used car dealership, he awakens to the owner and his preteen son double-teaming him with baseball bats. While the used car salesman would like nothing more than to see his son beat Serking to death, he eventually tells his son to stop pulverizing the Poet because he fears a lawsuit. Bored with his sabbatical at the hobo shelter, Serking goes back to his apartment and learns that his ex-wife, who now has a new wop boyfriend, is engaged. Vera also proudly states regarding her new and seemingly gay goombah boy toy, “You won’t believe how he eats my pussy.” When Serking finally goes back to his lady love Cass, he breaks down and smashes a bottle after noticing that she has attempted suicide by slitting her own throat with a broken beer bottle. Determined to cheer his quasi-girlfriend up and strengthen their somewhat dubious relationship, Serking takes Cass on vacation to a scenic beach house where he used to live before becoming famous. While making love on the beach, Serking asks Cass to marry him, but she says nothing. After sex, the Poet falls asleep, only to learn upon waking up that his lady love has abandoned him without leaving so much as a note. When Serking goes back to his apartment, he finds Cass laying on his bed holding a letter from a publishing company. After reading the letter and learning that he has been accepted by a major NYC publisher to come to the superlatively shitty cultural void of a city to write, Serking also receives some bad news after discovering that Cass is bleeding from her gash, even though it is not that time of the month. Indeed, Cass has driven an earring through her vagina because, as she states, “I’ve closed it, for you and for everybody...forever.” Needless to say, Serking’s career in NYC does not last long, as his new boss eventually tells him that he needs a doctor and not a publisher, thus bringing him back to square zero. Upon arriving back in LA, Serking is horrified to receive the news that Cass has finally successfully committed suicide, so he goes to her traditional Catholic viewing where she is dressed in nun garb and causes a major scene by opening her casket and fiddling with her cold corpse. Completely dejected by the senseless death of the “most beautiful woman in town,” Serking hits rock bottom and crawls into a cheap liquor bottle. It is only when an underage girl agrees to get naked for him (he just asks to see her tits, but she bares her bush as well) that he finds the strength and inspiration to compose poetry again.

TALES OF ORDINARY MADNESS

Undoubtedly, when it comes to the insanely idiosyncratic oeuvre of Marco Ferreri, one cannot receive a better and more accessible introduction to his work than Tales of Ordinary Madness, which is also, at least in my less than humble opinion, the greatest Bukowski film ever made and I say that as someone who also enjoyed Barbet Schroeder’s Barfly (1987) starring Mickey Rourke. Interestingly, aside from Ferreri and Schroeder’s films, the Bukowski adaptations Dominique Deruddere’s Crazy Love (1987) and Bent Hamer’s Factotum (2005) were also directed by Europeans, thus demonstrating what little Americans think of their handful of true artists. It should also be noted that Hollywood heart-throb turned would-be-arthouse-auteur James Franco has just completed a film entitled Bukowski (2014) about the poet’s early years. Indeed, not unlike works as varied as Michelangelo Antonioni’s Zabriskie Point (1970), Werner Herzog’s Stroszek (1977), Peter Lilienthal’s Dear Mr. Wonderful (1982) aka Ruby’s Dream, and Wim Wenders’ Paris, Texas (1984), Tales of Ordinary Madness is an audacious outsider’s portrait of the United States that depicts the the land of the culture-free and home of the depraved in a no bullshit fashion that is more revealing, authentic, and poetic than any Hollywood film ever could be.

While star Ben Gazzara's appearance and demeanor scream Sicilian-American, his performance in Ferreri's film is, in my opinion, among the most understated and underrated in film history, especially when it comes to films about novelists. American's closest thing to a Louis-Ferdinand Céline, albeit of the ugly drunkard Yankee kraut variety, Bukowski proved that, not unlike auteur Ferreri, great pulchritude can be found in human ugliness and vulgarity, hence why Tales of Ordinary Madness is such an effective, if not marginally flawed, film. As someone who has never understood the appeal of drunk sex and alcohol in general, I have to say that Ferreri's flick is probably the only film I have ever seen where I managed to empathize with a self-destructive drunkard. Indeed, being stuck in a small and slimy dilapidated apartment covered with beer cans, vomit, and a nagging ex-wife is the last place I would want to be, but somehow Ferreri managed to find primitive beauty in all of this, thus providing evidence that it may, in fact, be possible to polish a turd. While I think Bukowski was a pathetic lazy bum who just happened to write some interesting and insightful things, Tales of Ordinary Madness reminded me that he had good reasons to be the way he was, with the following remark made by Gazzara's character being an excellent insight into why one might want to live the degenerate life of a ditch-dwelling dipsomaniac: "As long as you don't believe in god, you got nothing to sweat [...] Death isn't good and death isn't bad, it's just the Joker in the deck. There's worse things anyways, like living with someone you don't like or working 8 hours on a job you hate. Now, that's definitely worse than death."

-Ty E

THE STORY OF PIERA
THE STORY OF PIERA

Marco Ferreri (1983)

Upon the death of her master/mentor Rainer Werner Fassbinder, blonde Teutonic diva Hanna Schygulla (Effi Briest, The Marriage of Maria Braun) tried in vain to find a new master by working with various eclectic filmmakers from all around the world, ranging from Polish auteur Andrzej Wajda to second-rate Israeli's like Amos Kollek and Amos Gitai to modern masters from ex-communist nations like Béla Tarr and Alexander Sokurov. Of course, the actress never reached the level of glamour, beauty, and charisma that she did while working with Fassbinder, who essentially turned her into the Marilyn Monroe of post-WWII German cinema. Indeed, like the tragic Some Like It Hot (1959) star, Schygulla is not exactly the most gifted of actresses but, not unlike Billy Wilder with Norman Jean, Fassbinder was fully aware of his muse's strengths and weakness and knew how to figuratively and literally cast her in the right light when directing her, as he essentially molded her into the actress she is today. While no other director could touch Fassbinder's iconic celluloid achievements with the voluptuous little blonde, Italian auteur Marco Ferreri (Dillinger Is Dead, La Grande Bouffe) certainly attempted to inspire Schygulla to transcend her meager acting abilities, while also making her bare her skin in various scandalous fashions. In fact, for her role in Ferreri's strikingly sleazy yet strangely charming celluloid abortion The Story of Piera (1983) aka Storia di Piera, the actress won the award for "Best Actress" at the 1983 Cannes Film Festival. While I would not have exactly described her performance in the film as the greatest of her career, it is certainly her 'bravest,' as she plays the negligent nymphomaniac mother of sensual frog Jewess Isabelle Huppert in a work with a legendary sexually unhinged ending where the two European diva actresses get totally naked and embrace in a meta-erotic fashion that demonstrates why Ferreri was the most idiosyncratic Guido pervert filmmaker to have ever lived, which is certainly no small achievement. Indeed, starring Marcello Mastroianni and Schygulla as disharmonious husband and wife, as well as Huppert as their equally sexually perverted teenager daughter, The Story of Piera certainly has the cast of what one would assume to be a marvelous masterpiece, yet the film is a miserable mess of a movie that has little to offer aside from subversive sex of the unintentionally absurdist sort. Based on the tell-all autobiography of Italian stage (and sometimes cinema) actress Piera Degli Esposti (Ghosts – Italian Style, The Tenth One in Hiding), albeit focusing more on the mother than the actress, The Story of Piera is not much more than salacious yet suavely stylized arthouse smut that allows certain cinephiles to see some of their greatest sexual fantasies come to life. In short, the film is arguably Ferreri's most daring attempt at making a fantasy fuck flick (though the film is not as graphic as the director's 1977 work The Last Woman aka La Dernière femme, which features Gérard Depardieu walking around with an unstimulated erection). Indeed, like the average porn movie, The Story of Piera is full of frivolous filler, plagued by incoherence, and only really gets good during the sporadic sex scenes, though one must give credit to Ferreri for cinematically spitting in goombah neo-bolshevik Bernardo Bertolucci's face by depicting a Marxist true believer as being more or less sexually impotent. Lacking Ferreri's signature sardonic and quite cartoonish comedy, the film ultimately seems like a sexy celluloid skeleton without any real meat, even if it exposes Schygulla and Huppert's meat.

While giving birth to her daughter Piera at the end of the Second World War, debauched dago dame Eugenia (Hanna Schygulla) laughs as if being defiant at god, for she seems to derive ecstasy from having a little human coming out of her little hole. While still just a prepubescent girl, Piera (as depicted by Bettina Grün during the preteen years) accompanies her mother while she has sex with numerous strange and usually physically repulsive men. Indeed, due to the fact that her commie professor husband Lorenzo (Marcello Mastroianni) cannot sensually satisfy her, Eugenia regularly swaps fluids with swarthy strangers and her daughter Piera soon learns to be a shameless whore as well by setting up lines where she makes out with countless boys and rates their kissing talents in a rather harsh fashion, thus demonstrating her early resentment towards men of all shapes and sizes. Piera's social problems are not just in the sexual realm, as she confesses to her father that she is deathly afraid of "other people" and that she rather kill herself than go to school. Eugenia is such a neglectful mother that she allows a completely naked and horrendously hairy middle-age man to sensually touch her daughter, as if she wants the man to deflower her little girl. Eventually, Eugenia is locked up in a mental institution and the head psychiatrist tells Piera that her mad mommy, "needs shock therapy to get well," though he also remarks to the girl that she has "nice little tits." After being institutionalized and berated by her husband for incessantly whoring around town, Eugenia yells at Piera for not defending her debauchery, stating, "Stand up for me, you idiot," as if it is a daughter's ordained duty to defend her messed up mother's slutty behavior. Of course, Eugenia does attempt to teach her daughter a couple of important things, like how to French kiss, but in the long run, the little girl would ultimately look at her mother as her nemesis and born rival.

Naturally, when Piera (Isabelle Huppert) comes of age and becomes a fully developed teenager, she begins all sorts of unhinged sexual relationships. Indeed, father Lorenzo describes her as "my masterpiece" whilst hitting on his little girl Piera and touching her nubile titties. Being from an overtly incestuous family, Piera wants daddy dearest all to herself and even attempts to convince Lorenzo to break up with Eugenia, but the old pinko is too pussy-whipped to give up on his wildly wanton wife. Meanwhile, Piera begins a lesbian relationship with a slightly overweight Sicilian-like woman named Arianna who is about the same age as her mother. After Piera, who is now an actress, collapses on stage, Arianna has her suckle on her nipple as if she is her daughter, thus demonstrating the theory that lesbianism is sometimes the result of a girl having a horrible relationship with her mother and desiring a new mother figure. When Lorenzo asks his daughter to show him her legs, he complains they are not as good as Eugenia's, so Piera whips out her bushy pussy and rhetorically asks, "My mother's is better too?" While gently caressing her pubic fur, Lorenzo confesses to his daughter regarding his troubled relationship with her mother Eugenia, "I made love to her for hours. And I could never satisfy her." Indeed, Lorenzo is a broken would-be-bolshevik who complains regarding his two self-professed loves, the red flag and Eugenia, "Now the red flag has retired me. And Eugenia is destroying my life." Perennially determined to one-up her mother in terms of sex appeal, Piera steals one of Eugenia's young boyfriends and asks the man how she makes love. According to the young man, Eugenia makes for a good lover because she is, "Very tender. Clean. She has a scent." After playing the eponymous lead in a stage performance of Medea, Piera begins to find purpose and stability in her life, though her mother is as crazy as ever and is ultimately institutionalized again, while her father is placed in a separate mental institution. In the end, Piera picks up her mother from the nuthouse and the two go to a beach where they get naked and embrace, as if they are about to make love. I guess one might describe this as a 'happy' ending.

THE STORY OF PIERA

Needless to say, since the film incessantly depicts incestuous situations but never depicts all-out carpet-munching, The Story of Piera concludes rather anticlimactically. After The Story of Piera, Hanna Schygulla would once again work with Marco Ferreri on the film Il futuro è donna (1984) aka The Future Is Woman, which also stars Guido goddess Ornella Muti. Like The Story of Piera, The Future Is Woman is a dead serious work lacking the director's signature sardonicism and absurdism and featuring weak communist men who cannot handle the strong and hyper horny women in their lives. Indeed, it seems the older he got, the more Ferreri seemed to believe that Italian men, especially of the Marxist sort, developed a deleterious degree of emasculation from which they could never recover. During The Story of Piera, Eugenia more or less unwittingly reveals the source of her nymphomania by crying, "nobody loves me the way I want." Of course, Eugenia's hubby was too busy wanking off to Trotsky and writers from the Frankfurt School to sexually satisfy his sexually voracious beloved. As the title of The Future Is Woman quite clearly demonstrates, it seems Ferreri believed that men were headed for a decidedly dystopian future of all-encompassing cuckoldry and total social and sexual submission. Indeed, it certainly takes a major lack of total testicular fortitude for him to allow his wife to screw other men while their prepubescent daughter watches intently as depicted in The Story of Piera. If one ever needs evidence that debunks the myth of Italian male sexual prowess, they can just check out Marco Ferreri's oeuvre.

-Ty E

THE FUTURE IS WOMAN

Marco Ferreri (1984)

As a man who once directed a film, The Last Woman (1976) aka La Dernière femme aka L'ultima donna, where a sexually potent proletarian castrates his meaty member because he cannot handle the sexual power that a young little bodacious bitch with nice tits has over him, Italian auteur Marco Ferreri (La Grande Bouffe, Bye Bye Monkey) was probably the most likely filmmaker to come up with a self-cuckolding film title like The Future Is Woman (1984) aka Il futuro è donna. Indeed, while the title of Ferreri's film refers to the fact that women literally are the future of humanity in that they reproduce and carry on mankind, it is also a figurative remark regarding the dominant position that women will take in the future in all regards, or so one would assume after watching a film where the male protagonist, a bourgeois communist male of the mentally and physically weak sort, dies pathetically after being trampled by a bunch of goofy goombah music fans while protecting his wife, who only becomes all the more stronger after her husband's grizzly premature death. Ferreri's second and final collaboration with Rainer Werner Fassbinder's main muse Hanna Schygulla, who previously starred in the director's somewhat inferior work The Story of Piera (1983) aka Storia di Piera, The Future Is Woman is more or less a morbid and sometimes even grotesque quasi-melodrama that depicts how the ostensible 'revolutionaries' of the Marxist far-left student movement of the late-1960s, as well as the Italian bourgeoisie (of course, most of these armchair revolutionaries came from middleclass backgrounds), have gotten weak and passive and, quite thankfully, will die out soon as they are too spiritually and physically impotent to produce progeny. Depicting a troubled ménage à trios between Schygulla, Guido Goddess Ornella Muti (who previously starred in Ferreri's The Last Woman and Tales of Ordinary Madness), and goofy ½ Danish frog Niels Arestrup (The Beat That My Heart Skipped, A Prophet), Ferreri's work is surely a rare quasi-feminist flick that is not banal as hell, though it might make the viewer question whether or not auteur Ferreri was seriously considering becoming an eunuch at the time he made the film, as a somewhat matriarchal work where virtually all of the male characters are weak, meek, and passive. Featuring an upbeat Italo-disco soundtrack with numerous highly addictive songs like "Banana" by Jane Chiquita, Hanna Schygulla dancing around ecstatically in a crowded club while sporting quite unbecoming black 1980s spandex pants, a rather therapeutic scene where a wussy guy who likes wearing Che Guevara t-shirts gets his skull crushed, and seedy skinheads picking on hot pregnant goombah gals by threatening to punch them in the stomach, Ferreri's film is certainly a curious celluloid oddity of sorts, even if for the most part it lacks the director's signature sardonic humor. The partly tragic but ultimately 'uplifting' (especially for a Ferreri flick!) tale of a steadily aging married middle-aged couple of the new left sort who refuse to have children of their own, only to have their views tested upon providing shelter and sex to a young pregnant chick who describes herself as a “warrior.” The Future Is Woman is a rare cinematic marriage between 1980s aesthetic Euro-cheese and avant-garde arthouse pretense that has aged quite gracefully over the years.

THE FUTURE IS WOMAN

While hanging out at an ostensibly ‘hip’ and ‘happening’ Italo-disco club called Marabu Music Hall, a failed leftist revolutionary/tree-mover named Gordon (Niels Arestrup) manages to successfully find his wife Anna (Hanna Schygulla) among all the people in the big building while blindfolded. As his friends remark, Gordon will do anything for Anna and he has no problem tracking her merely by tracking out her particular scent. After playing the game, Anna, who symbolically refuses to reverse roles and play the blindfolded game, spots a pregnant young woman named Malvina (Ornella Muti) crying for help as she is being roughed up by a couple young Guido guys, including a skinhead, so she comes to the rescue. Despite being married, Anna agrees to “fuck” the men if they leave Malvina alone, though she never actually carries out her half of the deal. Unbeknownst to Anna, Malvina, who is five or six months pregnant (she is not actually sure), has chosen her to become the adoptive mother of her unborn child. A bourgeois commie of sorts who has become a passive whore of capitalism as an ‘artist’/designer who works in the cultural department of a megastore, Anna has a bizarre obsession with projecting stock footage of dead children from Hiroshima and other historical atrocities over photos of Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich while hanging out in her office. In fact, Anna has giant busts of Garbo and Dietrich—two highly independent and individualistic women who, not unlike the protagonist, attempted to act like men and lacked many traditional female traits—commissioned for her store, though the customers are ultimately repelled by the gigantic diva sculptures. Unquestionably, as his friends recognize, Gordon worships Anna but she treats her somewhat effeminate hubby like the slavish ½ man that he is. Of course, it only becomes a matter of time before Anna becomes quite irked by the fact that her groveling husband begins to give some of his attention to a young salacious chick like Malvina, who has the gall to complain, “what about me?,” while watching the married couple have fetish-fueled sex. Indeed, in no time, a juicy ménage à trois blossoms between the three but it ends just as quickly as it began.

Naturally, when Malvina moves in with the somewhat unconventional married couple, Anna almost instantly becomes jealous of her young rival and soon attempts to throw the knocked up homeless girl out of her humble abode. Indeed, Anna not only accuses Malvina of stealing her life and home, but the unborn baby as well. Rather absurdly, Malvina attempts to appeal to Gordon’s discernibly fragile ego by telling him that he looks like Marlon Brando (even though he looks more like Klaus Kinski had his head been squashed) and naturally the middle-aged man is quite flattered by the young lady’s attention. Of course, as a man that digs his teeth into his wife's derriere on command like a little dog, Gordon is a slave of Anna who, although somewhat of a jealous bitch, at least temporarily allows her hubby the opportunity of a lifetime of partaking in a threesome with a young pregnant girl. While a domineering and somewhat masculinized alpha-chick (undoubtedly, her dyke-like haircut accentuates her 'manliness') who carries around her spouse's tiny testicles in her purse, Anna eventually becomes an unwitting slave of sorts to Malvina, demanding nice meals (especially chicken) and other sorts of things for the benefit of her unborn baby. When Anna's jealousy of Malvina becomes too unbearable after she catches the pregnant babe modelling one of her fancy dresses for Gordon, she kicks the young lady out of her home and makes a pathetic failed attempt at suicide. Of course, Anna later has second thoughts and Malvina once again reenters her and her husband's life just as if nothing has happened. Although a patent pansy and pathetic pervert who says sick stuff like, "If I were a father, I'd like to make love to my daughter...And not get my nose and ears cut off as punishment," and is reduced to tears merely because his wife is late getting home one night, Gordon is certainly an uncompromising protector of both Anna and Malvina and when a riot breaks out at a large concert after a bunch of music fans storm the arena after being denied entry, he even dies protecting the two special ladies in his life after someone steps on his skull. After having Gordon cremated at what looks like some sort of futuristic concentration camp, Anna develops a deeper bond with Malvina that resembles a sort of warped mother-daughter relationship. One night while hanging out at an isolated beach in the country, Anna tells Malvina to expose her stomach to the moon, which induces labor in the little lady. In the end, Malvina's 'maternal mission' is accomplished, as she gives Anna her baby so she can continue living her life as a wanton wandering young woman who has no problem accidentally getting pregnant and pawing off her children to other people.

Unquestionably, one of the most potent and memorable things about The Future Is Woman is its rather singular depiction of the superficially 'zany' yet reactionary (indeed, during one scene, Gordon is harassed and searched by the cops merely because he is playing soccer late at night) zeitgeist in which it was made. Indeed, depicting a time when one's fashion sense was more important than their personality and personal integrity, far-left politics had grown even more stale and vapid, cocaine was consumed as much as Coca-Cola (in one rather grotesque scene, Anna finds the pale corpse of an Italo-Disco fan who snorted one-too-many lines), and new and more 'inhuman' forms of authoritarian technocracy began to consume the Occidental world, Ferreri's film ultimately demonstrated that Wop-land was not much different from America at that time, though those gregarious Guidos certainly had greater music and a more refined fashion sense, not to mention more exotically erotic women. In its depiction of a deracinated 'modern' post-feminist woman of the rather bitchy sort who has complete control over her husband and who ultimately becomes the (pseudo)mother of a child sired from a classically feminine woman that probably flunked one of those absurdly easy feminist indoctrination courses they have in college, The Future Is Woman seems to, quite absurdly, argue that the children of the future must be reared and educated by frigid self-centered single mothers. In that sense, Ferreri seems like a postmodern prophet, as single-mothers with bastard children have become quite the growing phenomenon in the western world, especially in the United States where a woman, especially a so-called 'woman of color,' can jumpstart a workless career merely by allowing herself to get knocked up by the most degenerate of criminal thugs, thus securing herself a nice big welfare check that only grows larger with each extra bastard baby spawned. Of course, Schygulla's character is depicted as the height of female sophistication and cultivation and not as a morbidly obese sub-literate welfare queen. Indeed, as a sort of spiritual daughter of bisexual Aryan bitches Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich (notably, the latter of whom died single and childless), protagonist Anna fits in with what Viennese Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger described as the 'prostitute' type (as opposed to 'mother' type) of woman who, although highly intelligent and completely emancipated from man, more or less lacks all the necessary maternal qualities one needs to be a decent mother yet Ferreri absurdly makes her a mommy in the end. While I found the film to have a somewhat incoherent and rather dubious message, The Future Is Woman is most certainly one of Ferreri's most underrated and overlooked yet strangely accessible works, as a film that, in terms of style, is like a Guido Liquid Sky (1982) minus the satirical sci-fi element with a tinge of late period Buñuel as directed by a lapsed Marxist feminist cuckold whose greatest dream is to sacrifice himself for his bitchy significant other by dying in a brutal fashion. Indeed, like many Mediterranean men, especially of the Italian persuasion, Ferreri seemed to accept his position as a member of the ostensibly inferior sex.

THE FUTURE IS WOMAN

-Ty E

I LOVE YOU

Marco Ferreri (1986)

There has never been a film directed by Marco Ferreri (La Grande Bouffe, Tales of Ordinary Madness) that I have seen that I did not like and I say that as someone that mostly loathes sex-comedies and rom-coms, especially the sort that is regularly vomited and defecated out by the cheap and uncultivated weed-and-wiener-obsessed kosher clowns of Hollywood. Of course, though largely forgotten today, Ferreri was completely in a league of his own as a man that made savagely sardonic (anti)romantic-comedies that arguably make the cinematic works of the great Luis Buñuel seem like meaningless Dadaist diarrhea by comparison in terms of greater cultural and metapolitical significance. If Woody Allen depicted what it was like to be a physically feeble and rather repulsive neurotic Jewish intellectual that somehow managed to bang hot shiksa sluts for good goy families, Ferreri viewed things from a distinctly European lens and focused on far more important things like cultural decay and the death of love, sex, and romance in the Occident, especially in regard to the bourgeoisie (or at least what used to be called the bourgeoisie). Luckily, Ferreri was not a politically correct pansy, as he had no problem gleefully reaming both sexes into oblivion as a man that once proudly described himself as “50% misogynist and 50% feminist.” Indeed, while the women of his films are oftentimes depicted as carnally carnivorous beastesses that know how to exploit their bodies and can turn a sexually virile alpha-male into a self-castrating beta-cuck pussy like Ornella Muti did to Gérard Depardieu’s happy-go-lucky lumpenprole character in La Dernière femme (1976) aka The Last Woman aka L’ultima donna, the men are oftentimes depicted as weak and ineffectual sexual cripples who are so patently pathetic that they can manage to die at far-left peace protests like Niels Arestrup’s insufferable character does in the rather fittingly titled film Il futuro è donna (1984) aka The Future Is Woman starring Fassbinder diva Hanna Schygulla as a woman that ultimately realizes that she needs neither men nor sex to become a mother and start her own sort of (post)modern family. Certainly if I were to credit Ferreri for any singular accomplishment as a filmmaker, it is being the foremost satirizer of the European sexual apocalypse, with his lesser known films from the 1980s and early 1990s demonstrating that the auteur only got all the more pessimistic about Eurupid sexuality as the decades passed. As demonstrated by the fact that his own homeland of Italy was declared a “dying country” in early 2015 by Italian Health Minister Beatrice Lorenzin due to the fact that it has the second smallest birth rate in all of Europe and that there are more elderly people than babies (which says a lot considering the fact the indigenous populations are dying out in virtually every single European nation due to the fact that people refuse to have children), Ferreri has ultimately proven that his films are more relevant today than when they were first released, so it is somewhat of a cinematic tragedy that the majority of his oeuvre is largely unknown outside of Europe and especially the United States, even among serious cinephiles and cineastes. Over the past couple years, I have been slowly but surely acquainting myself with all of Ferreri's flicks and my most recent discovery is the Italian-French absurdist (anti)rom-com I Love You (1986) starring American-born French actor Christopher Lambert in his first acting role after his legendary performance as the eponymous lead in Highlander (1986).

I LOVE YOU

While Lambert is not exactly known for his acting talents (notably, he once stated himself, "It may be a mistake to say this, but I know my limitations as an actor and I know what I can and can not do. Robert De Niro can do everything. I can't. [...] I would love to do a RAIN MAN, but I think ultimately this is my thing."), his lack of acting prowess comes in handy in Ferreri's film where he essentially plays a male bimbo and meta-vain walking and talking vassal who epitomizes the modern day equivalent to the 'alpha-male,' as a male subject that has no problem procuring plenty of high-grade pussy yet is completely lacking in every other regard in his life, especially when it comes to having truly meaningful relationships with women that produce children. In the documentary Marco Ferreri: Il regista che venne dal futuro (2007) aka Marco Ferreri: The Director Who Came from the Future, Ferreri even admits in regard to why he decided to cast the actor, "I chose Christopher Lambert because, to use a fashionable phrase, he's a 'hard man.' He has tempos, expressions, movements, ways of moving his body and hands that he's not aware of but that are harmonic. They're determining." Of course, by casting a fairly handsome organic alpha-male type, Ferreri, who was once rightly labelled by the press as "The specialist of the modern couple," was better able to emphasize than effeminization and degeneration of European males than if he had hired some wimpy and unattractive looking actor like Dustin Hoffman. In fact, Lambert's (post)modern alpha character is so ludicrously shallow and emotionally stunted that he falls deeply in love with a talking keychain in the shape of a beautiful female face that says "I love you" anytime he whistles, even though he has a virtual army of gorgeous chicks that regularly through themselves at him. Quite like the lead character portrayed by Depardieu in Ferreri's dystopian cult classic Bye Bye Monkey (1978) aka Ciao maschio, Lambert's character is a sort of hopelessly directionless man-child that seems afraid of having children and starting a serious relationship with a woman. Also like Bye Bye Monkey, the lead's best friend is a thoroughly emasculated quasi-paternal figure who is fed up with his sorry lot in life, thus indicating that the degeneration of European males is intergenerational and nothing new. Somewhat fittingly, I Love You stars Marxist turned antifeminist/anti-Zionist sociologist Alain Soral's cutesy blonde sister Agnès Soral as a dumb dame that Lambert's character rebuffs so that he can remain faithful to his beloved waif-like keychain. Set in a cryptically dystopian world where TV commercials are more erotic than real-life, the only children are Chinese and black, middle-aged men live with their mothers, androgynous negroes do degenerate stripteases on TV, and not a single man or woman is in a stable relationship, Ferreri's rarely seen flick, which is more or less an absurdist reworking of the ancient Greek Pygmalion myth, might not be one of the director's masterpieces but it is surely an undeniably singular and highly worthwhile cinematic work that provides much farcical food-for-thought. A sort of long lost son film to Ferreri's arguable magnum opus Dillinger è morto (1969) aka Dillinger Is Dead, I Love You is notable for a number of things but probably most strangely for featuring the most aesthetically pleasing and eroticized shots of a keychain in all of cinema history, thereupon underscoring magical illusionary powers of cinema, which the auteur would notably later pay tribute to with his swansong Nitrato d'argento (1996) aka Nitrate Base.

Michel (Christopher Lambert) is a sort of perennial bachelor whose sole friend is an eternally unemployed pathetic old fart named Yves (rocker turned actor Eddy Mitchell) who loathes himself because he cannot find a job and who hilariously complains at the very beginning of the film regarding a nameless young dark-skinned Chinese boy (Hua Krung) that the two hang out with, "He wanted the comic book on credit! The 'yellow peril' exists. That Chinese boy always screws me up." A sort of modern post-counter culture family as characters that seem to have no real blood relatives, Michel, Yves, and the Chinese boy like doing things together like feeding a black piglet with a baby bottle. As the viewer soon discovers, Michel is afraid of having a real child of his own and thus acts as if the Chinaboy and pig are his surrogate sons, just as Depardieu's character preferred adopting King Kong's son over having his own child in Bye Bye Monkey. Indeed, at the beginning of the film, Michel is visited by his (ex)girlfriend Barbara (played by 'Anémone,' who adopted her stage name from the obscure 1968 TV-movie of the same name directed by Philippe Garrel) so that they can have farewell sex. When Barbara shows up at Michel's flat, she immediately declares, "We have time to make love, then you'll take me to the airport" and the two proceed to have sex, but not before the protagonist plays around with a giant tribal mask like a rambunctious child while making goofy animal noises. After they fuck for the final time, Michel takes Barbara to an airport where she attempts to have a serious talk with him and semi-somberly declares, "Had you asked me, maybe I would have stayed. Perhaps. No, I would have left anyway. You don't want this baby and I want it too much. I don't know if I will miss you. Of course I will miss you! You didn't want to give me a son, but I have good memories." In a demonstration of his apathy towards her and their stagnant dead-end relationship, Michel rudely walks away while Barbara is talking so that he can talk to some guys about his motorcycle. Before Barbara boards her plane, Michel unwittingly mocks her and her dream of having a child by handing her a naked baby doll and declaring, "At night it lights up, and it's washable." Needless to say, baby-obsessed barren woman Barbara is not happy with Michel's juvenile antics, so she hits the protagonist over the head with the baby doll.

I LOVE YOU

While young, beautiful, and fertile women are incessantly practically rubbing their wet pussies in his face, Michel seems thoroughly disinterested in most members of the opposite sex and it is not because he is a homo but because he is an innately immature chap with a dubious IQ whose sole interest seems to be his motorcycle. Undoubtedly, Michel is a true rebel-without-a-cause in the most redundant and literal sense. While hanging out a fairly strange and colorful New Wave club located in an abandoned warehouse, a blonde chick named Isabelle (Laura Manszky of the celluloid turd Sweet Lies (1987) directed by Alain Delon's onetime wife Nathalie Delon) complains to Michel, "What is it you don't like about me? My name? You're right. Isabelle sucks. I'm going to change it then. My name's Camelia now: like it?," to which the protagonist somewhat apathetically replies, "Camelia is cute." While Michel proceeds to kiss 'Camelia,' he soon roughly pushes her away and abruptly leaves, as if he gets off to leading women on and then callously pushing them away. An overtly slutty pseudo-blonde prostitute (played by Bob Geldof's current wife Jeanne Marine) who provocatively sucks on a banana like it is a cock also offers Michel her body free of charge, but he tells her that he would rather pay for her puss and then blows her off. Luckily, after scaring away two lovers that are having sex in a car and then declaring his hatred of relationships by stating "Lovers! Jerks!," Michel manages to find his true love in the form of a talking keychain that he finds out of happenstance after randomly whistling to himself and hearing the inanimate object reply, "I love you." Indeed, it is love at first sight with keychain as far as Michel is concerned, as the small plastic piece of junk has big beautiful blue eyes and large and full dick-sucking lips, not to mention the fact that it says "I love you" whenever he wants it to. When a beautiful young blonde named H el ene (Agn es Soral) shows up at the travel agency where Michel works (indeed, like many modern men, the protagonist has been reduced to doing what is probably best described as women's work), she cries upon hearing the protagonist's keychain say "I love you" and declares, "I can't afford going around the world, but at least I'd like one of those," thus reflecting her desperate desire to feel loved and appreciated. While Michel goes on a date with H el ene and even agrees to give her his beloved keychain, he ultimately reneges and chooses his keychain over the dumb blonde, even though she goes as far as dumping her boyfriend for him. In an absurd scene that epitomizes the protagonist's delusional infatuation with a totally worthless piece of plastic, Michel stares lovingly at the keychain while H el ene bangs on the front door of his flat and demands to be let in. Of course, Michel does not let H el ene in, as the pseudo-affection he receives from the keychain is a sure thing while a romance with a real living and breathing woman is prone to end badly and cause much internal pain and misery, among other things.

When Yves begins dating a sassy guidette singer named Maria (Flora Barilaro) who has no qualms about speaking her mind, especially when it comes to the negative qualities of modern men, Michel faces criticism for the first time in regard to being in an ostensibly hot and steamy love affair with a keychain, but he is so deeply enamored with the pretty piece of plastic that he does not even care and barely notices the little lady's harsh remarks. Indeed, when Maria notices that Michel is more interested in whistling to his keychain than staring at her tits, she becomes infuriated, bitches at him, "You'd like a girl like that, wouldn't you? You whistle and she... 'I love you! I love you!' Wouldn't you like that? That's what you'd want to have. A submissive girl, always ready. That's your ideal woman. An object at your service!" and then slaps him in the face. Later that same night, Michel notices that a porn flick is playing on his TV, so he decides to place his keychain lover on the television screen and then proceeds to masturbate while staring intensely at the particularly odd object of his desire in a bizarre quasi-avant-garde scene that is not atypical of auteur Ferreri's films from the 1980s. The next morning, Michel sentimentally states to his keychain regarding the 'sex' that they had the night before, "It was nice yesterday. The first time is not always good. It went fine last night. Don't get all worked up just because you made it. You are a keyholder and you must hold the keys," thus indicating the patently preposterous state of the protagonist's psyche. When a dorky Jewish guy named Pierre (Marc Berman) comes by Michel's work and demands a train ticket to Japan (!), the protagonist is surprised to discover that he is not the only man in town that is love with a talking keychain. Indeed, Michel and Pierre bond over their mutual love of their almost identical keychains, with the two drinking champagne and declaring a toast, "To our dreams." Of course, Pierre becomes jealous of Michel when he whistles at his keychain too many times. Later in the film, Michel goes by Pierre's house and not only discovers that his middle-aged friend still lives with his mother, who absurdly describes the keychain as "my son's girlfriend," but also that he has a painting of his plastic lover hanging on the wall of his home. Rather ridiculously, the only thing that bothers Michel in regard to Pierre's keychain painting is that the imaginary woman in the portrait has slightly different colored eyes from his own keychain.

Ultimately, everything goes downhill for Michel when he makes the mistake of fucking a blindfolded babe who randomly shows up on his balcony and opens her coat to reveal she is not wearing any panties (notably, the woman has a shaved nether-region, which was not that common at the time the film was made). While mounting the almost hysterically horny mystery dame, Michel predictably attempts to whistle at his keychain lover, but is disheartened when he does not receive a reply. In fact, not matter how many times Michel whistles at the keychain after that, he cannot get a single, "I love you," thus ultimately pushing the protagonist over the edge. Indeed, lovelorn keychain lover Michel becomes so upset that he becomes nihilistically self-destructive and nonsensically decides to drive his motorcycle through a warehouse wall covered with a giant degenerate painting of Jesus Christ in a scene that surely highlights the protagonist's gross emotional immaturity and complete and utter lack of self-control. Somewhat ironically, after crashing through the Christ wall, Michel fractures a premolar, thus causing him to lose his ability to whistle and, in turn, totally destroying any possibility that he will get another "I love you" from his keychain. Desperate for the imagined affection that he used to could count on receiving from his plastic lover, Michel convinces the slutty pseudo-blonde prostitute that offered him free sex at the beginning of the film to act as a sort of pseudo-keychain and has her say "I love you" when he whistles. Of course, a living and breathing wanton woman is no match for the mechanical love of the keychain in Michel's eyes. Luckily, a miracle of sorts occurs when the keychain eventually begins saying "I love you" again, but the happiness is short-lived because Yves, who was dumped by Maria and denied a job that he was initially promised, subsequently attempts suicide by drinking poison. Somewhat hilariously, a young black boy ultimately finds and saves Yves before he can croak from the poison, yet the creepy colored kid later expresses regret to Michel over saving the old man, stating "He drank the poison, but he's out of danger now. Too bad! I have never seen anyone die. It would have been interesting," thus arguably emphasizing the lack of empathy that non-whites have for Europeans. While hanging out with Yves while he is recovering from his botched suicide, Michel becomes rather upset when the keychain says "I love you" after hearing Maria, who is now a superstar diva of sorts, sing on television. Indeed, after realizing that he is nothing special since the keychain will say "I love you" to anyone, Michel declares in regard to his cheap manmade lover, "They are all the same, a bunch of witches." After Yves agrees with Michel and calls the keychain "a whore," the two decide to take turns smashing the plastic lady to bits with a hammer. Luckily, after destroying the keychain, Dillinger Is Dead randomly appears on TV and inspires Michel to drive to the beach on his motorcycle so that he can join the crew of a yacht ruled over by a hot dream babe just like Michel Piccoli's character did at the conclusion of the classic 1969 Ferreri flick. Rather inexplicably, the luxury yacht is indeed sailing the sea when Michel arrives at the beach, so the protagonist decides to ride his motorcycle into the ocean and then begins swimming to the ship. Unfortunately, the yacht is long gone before Michel has any real chance to board the ship. Notably, before attempting to swim to the ship, Michel uses binoculars that he randomly finds on the beach to look at the diva on the yacht and he is quite satisfied to discover that she has the same exact full lips as the keychain, thus highlighting the fact that the protagonist's dream lover is indeed nothing but a delusional fantasy which he seems to have unconsciously created in his mind after watching one-too-many movies and TV commercials. Undoubtedly, one of the morals of the wayward story that is I Love You is that, like protagonist Michel, modern young men are always liable to face disappointment when it comes to love because no real-life woman can possibly compare to the idealized imaginary immaculate woman that has been planted in their mind via television.

I LOVE YOU

If there is anything to learn from I Love You and its importance in the context of the director's entire oeuvre, it is that auteur Marco Ferreri felt that society had become all the more irreparably screwed up since the counterculture era, hence why he probably decided to incorporate excerpts from both Dillinger Is Dead and vintage erotic commercials featuring nude women into the film. While the true meaning behind the somewhat bizarre, ostensibly happy conclusion of Dillinger Is Dead is disputable (though it seems to insinuate that the bourgeois protagonist played by Piccoli has gone completely insane and has embraced a sort of Utopian fantasy realm was inspired by TV commercials), I Love You ends in an unequivocally unhappy fashion that makes it quite clear that Ferreri thought that even the escapist fantasy realm was no longer a possibility for disillusioned men due to the glaringly culturally apocalyptic reality of Europa during that time. Of course, it is only fitting that the film takes place in France, which is the land of decadence par excellence, especially where social and sexual matters are concerned. After all, despite being a handsome chick-magnet with an Adonis-like physique, the lead protagonist of I Love You is completely lacking in even the most rudimentary virtues of masculinity, not to mention the fact that he is an arrogant dolt and virtual walking hard-on whose delusional love for a keychain is probably the direct result of his infantile narcissism as a mensch that becomes stupidly happy as a result of being told "I love you" at anytime of the day simply by whistling and not as a result of certain desirable character traits that he might display. I also do not think it is a coincidence that Lambert's character loathes the idea of having a child of his own and instead shows quasi-fatherly affection to both a seemingly autistic Chinese boy and black piglet, as such behavior epitomizes the sort of cultural cuckoldry, ethno-masochistic altruism, and hysterical animals rights activism that has become synonymous with contemporary neo-liberal Europe, especially France, over the past couple of decades. After all, a healthy race of people strives to procreate and sire new generations of all the more strong progeny to take their place so that their legacy can continue and would never dare dream of wasting their time and resources on hostile alien races, yet France, like much of Europe, has senselessly become the adoptive parent for the world's most unlovable untermenschen and now it is finally beginning to really bite them in the ass, hence the escalating towelhead terrorist attacks that have occurred in 2015.

It should be noted that in the documentary Marco Ferreri: The Director Who Came from the Future, Ferreri prophesies the Islamic Arab-negro menace in an interview where he states in regard to the pathological naivety and arrogance of white liberal Europeans, "We think we know everything thanks to the airplane. Instead, we don't know...We don't know anything. We think we know it all.

I LOVE YOU

We arrive by plane somewhere with lovely hotels and we think we've known that place. Now we're entering a period of religious wars. The Muslim Brotherhood and Islam are coming to the fore. It's a more political voice than Catholicism." Notably, in the same doc, Ferreri would also prophetically state, "Geographically, Europe is very small. It's a fortress that thinks it's invincible, but it isn't. It's surrounded and under siege by peoples who are less technologically advanced but more motivated than we are." Needless to say, Ferreri would have probably been the most fit director to cinematically adapt the racially-charged and oftentimes satirical dystopian novel The Camp of the Saints (1973) aka Le Camp des Saints by French novelist Jean Raspail which depicts an eerily probable near-future where France and the rest of Western Civilization are destroyed as a result of political impotence and left-wing support of the flooding of Europe with (sub)human rabble from the third world. In his little seen flick Ya bon les blancs (1988) aka How Good the Whites Are where a couple of hopelessly naive European do-gooder 'activist' types are eaten by a tribe of cannibalistic sand negroes who could care less about the supposedly humanistic ways of the white man, Ferreri would ultimately foretell the sort of mayhem that would ensue as a result of so-called multiculturalism, globalization, and liberal altruism, among other socially suicidal metaphysical afflictions that have only gotten all the more worse since the film was originally released over a quarter of a century ago.

Of course, the overall massive decline of Europe is a direct consequence of the progressive emasculation and moral degeneration of European man as is depicted in I Love You. While Ferreri oftentimes rightly described himself as an anarchist, he certainly subscribed to a sort of quasi-Spenglerian Weltanschauung where he obsessed over the progressive rotting of the Occident, especially when it came to the worsening disharmony being the sexes and the disintegration of traditional European mores and customs, hence why the filmmaker once matter-of-factly stated regarding his own work, "The values that once existed no longer exist. The family, the bourgeoisie – I'm talking about values, morals, economic relationships. They no longer serve a purpose. My films are reactions translated into images." Of course, as a man that made a film about a fellow who falls in love with an artificially beautiful keychain, Ferreri would probably not be surprised to know that we now live in an era where people are so vain and artificial that it is not common for girls get their labias chopped off or receive ass implants and lip injections. Certainly, one cannot also forget the rise in popularity of porn, sex toys, and sex robots, among other dubious pseudo-erotic inventions that indicate that people are becoming increasingly sensually autistic. Despite being totally forgotten today, I Love You ultimately predates Spike Jonze's obscenely overrated film Her (2013) by almost three decades in terms of its depiction of a spiritually castrated virtual automaton who pathetically falls in love with a piece of manmade technology and thus it is begging to be reexamined by contemporary cinephiles, even if it is one of Ferreri's lesser works. In an intrinsically culturally and socially suicidal era where it is trendy for Hollywood celebrities to adopt black African spawn as personal accessories and Europeans are refusing to get married and have kids while their criminal socialist governments tax them to death so that they can subsidize the bastard brood of hostile illegal immigrants of the mostly Islamic Arab and negro sort who breed like rats and transform cities into crime-ridden no-go-zones where rape, especially of white women, is considered a virtual god-given right, Ferreri's films are more important than ever but unfortunately, as Spengler once wrote in regard to the fragile nature of art, "One day the last portrait of Rembrandt and the last bar of Mozart will have ceased to be — though possibly a colored canvas and a sheet of notes will remain — because the last eye and the last ear accessible to their message will have gone."

-Ty E

HOW GOOD THE WHITES ARE
HOW GOOD THE WHITES ARE

Marco Ferreri (1988)

Maybe it is because of the unfortunate admixture of Sub-Saharan African blood among certain southern Goombahs or that they are unlike Nords and are less timid about saying what they think and expressing how they feel, but out of all the great European peoples, the Italians have had the most testicular fortitude when it comes to cinematically depicting the than less than good, almost always bad, and the uniquely ugly in regard to the Dark Continent. Indeed, from Mondo maestros Jacopetti and Prosperi's singularly scathing post-colonialism-themed schlockumentary Africa addio (1966) to the nasty apocalyptic artsploitation nihilism of Alberto Cavallone's Afrika (1973), Guido filmmakers have always been at the forefront of depicting post-colonial Africa as a virtual hell-on-earth that is plagued poverty, war, starvation, rape, disease and—arguably the most ugly thing of all—European altruism. Of course, it should be no surprise that Milanese auteur Marco Ferreri (Dillinger Is Dead, La Grande Bouffe) would make a movie mocking those hopelessly neurotic and decidedly deracinated white degenerates who make it their big business to save wild starving negroes in negroland. Indeed, the Spanish-Italian-French co-production Ya bon les blancs (1988) aka How Good the Whites Are aka Come sono buoni i bianchi depicts a fiercely farcical fable-like vision from Ferreri's typically ruthless perspective where naïve white liberals attempt to give starving African spaghetti and tomato sauce as aid, ugly Italians attempt boning bloated black native broads, a Catholic priest is gang-raped while he eats Russian chicken and stares at the starved corpse of a preteen negro boy, a deranged jigaboo wearing a white mask claims to whites that he is a real white man and that they are imposters that must leave, and a group of cannibalistic negroid nomads who eat two crackers that dare to sully their magical waterhole. Shot in Morocco, the film is clearly one of the most aesthetically flaccid and least thought out works in Ferreri's rather striking oeuvre, yet it is still a consistently hilarious little romp that completely reams the figurative rectums of ethno-masochistic whites who feel spiritually lost on their own continents and thus feel the need to put their noses in poor Africans' business. Indeed, from French Symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud to great miscegenation-obsessed English explorer Captain Sir Richard Francis Burton, restless Europeans have always journeyed to distant lands like Africa in a desperate attempt to find solace from their forsaken souls, yet the whites of How Good the Whites Are are soft bourgeois wankers, misguided lily liberals, and miscegenation-celebrating cranks who think living in a third world country is as simple as riding in an airplane and who ultimately finds themselves to be victims of their own naivety in regard to the truly archaic way of predatorial pickaninnies who do not buy into decadent white man scams like liberalism and multiculturalism. Undoubtedly, if you're the kind of person that derives Schadenfreude from seeing white wimps getting their just deserts from patronizingly groveling to sand savages, Ferreri's grotesque little piece of celluloid cultural sensitivity training is just for you.

The crackers of How Good the Whites Are are not really good at anything, not even when it comes to simply transferring food to starving sand spades via large trucks, or so one quickly learns while watching Ferreri's fiercely facetious film. Although initially rather idealistic about the prospect of deriving self-satisfaction from feeding dying illiterate jigaboos in North Africa's Sahel region, the ethnically eclectic group of white do-gooders of 'Operation Blue Angel' (they described themselves as, "the women and children of Bergamo, Italy, Ropesa, Spain, Villeneuve, France") will be asking themselves: "Why didn't we stay in Europe?," by the end of the film. Led by a particularly pompous pansy Spaniard named Diego Ramirez (Juan Diego) who acts like an anally retentive French fairy and does not like getting his hands dirty yet thinks it will be a good idea to travel through unpredictable African war-zones to deliver spaghetti, tomato sauce, and powdered milk to negroes in need, Operation Blue Angel is unquestionably made up of the European bourgeois' most weak and neurotic rabble, with every member suffering some sort of repellant quirk that is even instantly spotted by the sand negroes. Almost immediately upon arriving in Africa, the group is swindled out of most of their foreign aid by a goofy black brother named Vincent Dupont de Protocol (Ben Taleb Moha) who, among other things, likes showing off his European language skills and hustling naive crackers. Indeed, Vincent takes the group to a fancy motel where his entire family has been staying and gives the white suckers the bill (which Diego hilariously describes as being "barbaric") as he knows the white altruists are big enough bitches that they will pay it, but they don't have any money so they have to give up a large fraction of their spaghetti to pay off the dubious debt. Of course, this incident of Afro-hustling is nothing compared to the true savagery the group will ultimately face at the hands black tribesmen who do not take too kindly to white devils in their sacred savage lands. As one of the characters remarks regarding the murder trends in Africa, "Last year almost 10,000 [died]. Africa is dangerous."

While featuring a dozen or so characters, the film many revolves around a decidedly dumb Dutch single mother named Nadia (Maruschka Detmers) and a sleazy middle-aged Guido named Michel (Michele Placido) who immediately attempts to get in young girl's pants by discussing how he would like to get involved in a "good intellectual rapport" with her. Pseudo-macho horn-dog Michel also has a thing for dark meat and does not mind getting inside the toga of an overweight negress tribeswoman every once in a while. Although the Blue Angels decide to hire an adventurer that sort of looks like a chubby version of Adolf Eichmann named Peter (Jean-François Stévenin) to help guide them to Sahel, he ultimately takes them through war-zones occupied by less than gregarious guerillas who he is friends with. At one of these particular guerilla camps, the group meets a French priest who has lost the faith and meekly states, "I am Father Jean-Marie. I don't want to save anyone. I'm going back to Europe. Please give me permission to spend the night here." As Father Jean-Marie has concluded regarding black Africans, "They prefer the Koran to the Gospel. And they are not completely wrong." During one of the most hilarious scenes of the film the Priest is gang-raped by some militia men while eating Russian chicken and staring at the corpse of a negro boy. Despite being in the middle of nowhere and only running into archaic hunter-gatherer tribes, Nadia runs into a black chick named 'Katuscia' she once met in Paris who is now the Princess of a tribe and who Michel assumedly bones. Of course, the interactions between the deracinated whites and the deeply rooted blacks only get more hostile and absurd as the film progresses.

HOW GOOD THE WHITES ARE

In one of the more jovial scenes of the film, the group bumps into a tribe of severely spastic spades who wear poorly made 'whiteface' masks and vintage colonial adventurer hats and hostilely declare to the Europeans, "no whites" because "the whites are us!" Indeed, somehow these poor Africans believe that the Europeans are imposters and that they are the true Europids. Of course, on the way, the Europeans have various things stolen from them from the more violent tribes, including barrels of oil. By the end of the film, all of the whites are ready to give up, but a watering hole that initially seems like a mirage gives them enough hope to tread on. When Nadia and Michel decide to stay at the scenic water hole, they find themselves to be the prey of a group of pissed tribesmen with voracious appetites. Indeed, when the tribe arrives there, a seemingly nice French-speaking tribesman—a smiley sort of guy who lived in France for a while but eventually got fired from his job and had to go back to his humble tribe—approaches the two bourgeois crackers and asks them, "The chief wants to know why you have polluted the water?" Needless to say, Nadia and Michel never make it back to Europa. Indeed, when Operation Blue Angel leader Diego and adventurer Peter fly back to the watering hole to pick up Nadia and Michel, the only thing they find is a camcorder and some burnt bones. As the two learn while playing back footage from the camcorder, Nadia and Michel were eaten by the tribesman during a fireside cannibal ritual. Of course, if these obnoxiously altruistic crackers had minded their own business and never left Europe, they would have never been the dinner and, in turn, excrement of some starving Africans. Ironically, as victims of cannibalism, Nadia and Michel did manage to accomplish their original mission of providing starving negroes with some pure white meat from Europe.

Undoubtedly, the final scene of How Good the Whites Are featuring camcorder footage of two of the characters being eaten certainly resembles Ruggero Deodato's Cannibal Holocaust (1980), as if Ferreri was attempting to lampoon the unkosher cannibal classic. While far from Ferreri's greatest work, the film certainly has a great message: Europeans need to stay the hell out of Africa! Indeed, despite their ostensibly good intentions, the characters in Ferreri's film only bring cultural contamination, unconscious arrogance, resentment, and superlatively shitty food to the Dark Continent. Aside from making a major mockery of would-be-well-meaning white altruists, the film also depicts the glaring absurdity of multiculturalism and globalization in a variety of ways, with a cannibal who once worked in France being one of the more obvious examples. As the timeless European colonialist saying goes: "You can take the Negro out of the jungle, but you can't take the jungle out of the Negro." Indeed, How Good the Whites Are is a work that wallows in sardonic culture shock and demonstrates that virtually all European xenophiles are degenerates, neurotics, and/or perverts who fail to fit in their own society, hence their dubious fetishism for dark meat. Ironically, it is only when the characters in Ferreri's film are fully exposed to the 'other' that they began to appreciate their own indigenous culture and develop a sense of national identity. Indeed, while loony leftist believes that the best way to solve the race problem is by absurdly mixing people into a so-called 'melting pot,' race hate is really a direct result of multiculturalism and that the melting pot will never melt (not that it would be a good thing if it did, as demonstrated by the mystery meat that make up the populous of Brazil!). In the documentary Marco Ferreri: The Director Who Came from the Future (2007), Ferreri prophesied that there would be a great showdown between the Occident and the the third world, remarking: "We think we know everything thanks to the airplane. Instead we don't know... We don't know anything. We think we know it all. We arrive by plane somewhere with lovely hotels...and we think we've know that place. Now we're entering a period of religious wars. The Muslim Brotherhood and Islam...are coming to the fore. It's a more political voice than Catholicism." Most importantly, Ferreri revealed that Europa is on its way to a cultural apocalypse of sorts, stating regarding the continent's precarious future: "Geographically, Europe is very small. It's a fortress that thinks it's...It thinks it's invincible, but it isn't. It's surrounded and under siege by peoples who are less technologically advanced but more motivated than we are." I don't know 'How Good the Whites Are' nowadays, but if they think it is a good idea to leave their abstract bourgeois world of Starbucks and Barnes & Nobles to feed hostile savages then they deserve to be eaten. Of course, since the barbarians are already inside the gates thanks to American hegemony and globalization, whites no longer need to leave their countries to become victims of 'cultural enrichment.'

-Ty E

THE FLESH
THE FLESH

Marco Ferreri (1991)

Despite the introduction of birth control, the success of the so-called sexual liberation movement, seemingly unending proliferation of pornography of every degenerate sort, and mainstream acceptance of even the most deleterious and dysfunctional sexual proclivities, people are apparently having less sex on average than their supposedly more puritanical ancestors. Of course, there are a variety of reasons for this, but one of the most obvious reasons is the institutionalized inversion of sexual polarities and feminization of political and social values and institutions via authoritarian style feminism, which has been spread like cancer throughout the West and has led to the divirilization of males and masculinization of females. The sexes are not 'equal' but complimentary just as a cock is complimentary of a cunt, so when the natural sexual order is artificially subverted by feminist and cultural Marxist social engineering, it inspires things like erotic dysfunction and impotence, among other things that seem increasingly common today, hence the rise and popularity of prick-powering drugs like Sildenafil (aka Viagra). Personally, I think that taking Viagra is innately emasculating and that using the drug is just as a fraudulent approach to fucking as if one were to use a strap-on dildo, but I digress. In the largely forgotten Italian absurdist romantic-comedy La carne (1991) aka The Flesh directed by Marco Ferreri (Dillinger è morto aka Dillinger Is Dead, Tales of Ordinary Madness), the film not only unwittingly foretells the philosophical dilemmas involved with dubious drugs like Viagra, but also the various complicated problems that arise when a less than handsome downtrodden divorcee who has experienced much pain as a result of past loves begins an obviously one-sided relationship with an almost supernaturally stunning and seductive diva with DD tits. Apparently partly inspired by the curious case of Jap cannibal Issei Sagawa, the film also depicts the problems that arise with Priapism, especially when you are a swarthy little man that becomes the virtual sex slave of an obscenely beautiful babe with an unquenchably voracious sexual appetite. Indeed, if there ever was a film that demonstrates why it can be particularly precarious to put pussy on a pedestal, it is Ferreri's flick, which depicts in an oftentimes allegorical and sometimes convoluted fashion what happens when a man decides to give up everything, including his job and friends/family, for a physically and erotically immaculate woman who clearly has some serious emotional problems and lacks virtually all the ingredients that make for a good wife and companion. Indeed, the story of a middle-aged lounge pianist who randomly meets a big bosomed bombshell and decides to abruptly abandon his job, friends, and family and live a sort of perennial vacation of his vice with a quasi-femme fatale in his secluded beach house, The Flesh is a quite fittingly titled work that demonstrates in a sometimes aberrant way that some women are nothing more than an addictive carnal indulgence, even if they radiate a sort of goddess essence due to their sexual powers.

While a seemingly commercial effort due to starring then-popular Italian model Francesca Dellerà (who was later set to star in Fellini's Pinocchio adaptation) and a soundtrack featuring pop songs by Queen and Kate Bush, The Flesh is an oftentimes esoteric flick that makes various references to Dante Alighieri's classic 14th-century epic poem Divine Comedy as well as obscure Catholic saints. In fact, it is arguably Ferreri's most innately Italian work and not just where history and culture are concern, as the film is a virtual Guidosploitation piece in terms of its uniquely unflattering depiction of sex relations in Goombah-land. Indeed, whereas the lead of Luis Buñuel's swansong That Obscure Object of Desire (1977) becomes a victim of perennial cock-blocking, the poor pathetic sap in Ferreri's flick is drenched in so much premium guidette pussy juice that it eventually becomes quite painful for him to the point where he begs his lecherous lady friend to stop mounting his member. While female lead Dellerà certainly cannot act, she is unequivocally a domineering diva that radiates so much wild and erratic erotic energy that she ultimately steals the show, hence why Ferreri hired her for the role in the first place. In fact, in the documentary Marco Ferreri: Il regista che venne dal futuro (2007) aka Marco Ferreri: The Director Who Came from the Future, Ferreri stated regarding Dellerà's sexual powers, "Every period, every two or three generations, a new type of woman appears. A woman is also a type because she constructs a way of speaking and acting. Once upon a time there was Muti, now there's Dellerà. I chose her because she went to the motor show in Bologna. She put herself on a stand in the street. Eight thousand people went to see her. She doesn't dance, jump or recite poetry. This must mean something!" Indeed, Dellerà is such a singularly stunning woman that it should be no surprise to anyone that has seen The Flesh that the model turned actress never needed to cultivate any sort of talent or skill to become famous, as her ass alone, among her other womanly parts, was an impressive enough asset to get her career going.

The Flesh begins in an almost curiously and seemingly intentionally misleading Spielberg-esque fashion with protagonist Paolo (Sergio Castellitto of Giuseppe Tornatore's L'uomo delle stèle (1995) aka The Star Maker and Sergio Castellitto's Non ti muovere (2004) aka Don't Move) hanging out with his children at a museum with various animatronic dinosaurs. Paolo's grade school son is upset because his self-absorbed atheist mother will not let him take part in his Catholic First Holy Communion, which rather infuriates the protagonist because he not only hates his ex-wife, who he regularly calls "the hyena," but also because he firmly believes that "No one should be denied the First Communion." Indeed, even though his father was the head of the local commie organization when he was a boy, Paolo was able to have First Communion because his beloved mother stood up to her Marxist hubby and even received a black eye as a result. Paolo is fed up with women and romance for a number of reasons, as his ex-wife not only has custody of both of their kids, but also got his dog Giovanni, who the protagonist seems to value even more than his own kids. The only support that Paolo has is his shady sleazebag carny friends Nicola (Philippe Léotard of John Frankenheimer's French Connection II (1975) and Aldo (Farid Chopel), who he works with at a local nightclub where he plays the piano. One night while at the nightclub, Paolo meets the woman of the dreams in the form of busty babe with big tits and lips named Francesca (Francesca Dellera of Tinto Brass' Capriccio (1987) and Jacques Deray's L'Ours en peluche (1994) aka The Teddy Bear), who is a friend of the protagonist's pal Nicola's mistress Giovanna (Petra Reinhardt). Immediately upon talking to Paolo, Francesca says a number of things that raise a couple red flags about her character, including that she had an abortion fifteen days ago and that she was impregnated by her 22-year-old Tantric guru 'Saynanda.' With no home of her own, Francesca less than reluctantly agrees to accept a ride from Paolo and the two head to the beach. Of course, as a less than handsome fellow with a somewhat puny frame, Paolo feels like he has hit the jackpot as a result of coercing Francesca into coming with him, but little does he suspect the savage sexual servitude that he will have to endure at the hands of a carnally carnivorous woman who never takes no for an answer.

THE FLESH

Upon arriving on the coast where the protagonist has a quaint two-floor beach house, Paolo becomes hysterical and makes the major beta-cuck pussy mistake of literally getting on the ground and kissing Francesca's feet while sporting Hindu drag (!) and declaring in an insufferably meek fashion, "You are God" and "A moment like this should last an eternity." Indeed, Paolo's first major mistaking is putting pussy on a pedestal and groveling for Francesca, which is something that no normal woman respects, especially not a stunning dame who can have any dick that she wants. Despite Paolo's declarations that she is god, Francesca seems totally unimpressed with his rather grandiose compliments and complains that she is hungry, so the two go by a food stand that is run by a boy with Down syndrome named Giuseppe and his bitchy mother, who acts as if the female protagonist is a wicked witch. Additionally, an old man at the stand warns Paolo to keep Francesca away from him and even calls her a "devil," which ultimately proves to be true, at least in a sense. When they eventually go inside the protagonist's beach house for the first time, Paolo has so much anxiety about having sex with a woman as gorgeous as Francesca that the little lady more or less forces him down on the bed and fucks him into submission. After the seemingly underwhelming fucking, Francesca shows her true face by degrading and emasculating Paolo by stating to him while maintaining an almost gleefully sinister smirk, "Now when I see you well you look like a monster [...] You even have a beer belly. And, I, who have been with handsome men only." Paolo is so upset with by Francesca's cold and callous remarks that he runs to the ocean like an upset little girl and slits both of his wrists. Assumedly because she realizes the ridiculous power she wields over him, Francesca is visibly aroused by Paolo's hilariously histrionic suicide attempt and even sensually licks up the blood that is dripping from his wounds and then proceeds to fuck him on the beach in a scene that demonstrates that, at the very least, the female protagonist is a psychic vampire of sorts who feeds off the energy of men.

It is obvious right from the very beginning that Francesca wears the pants in the relationship and, despite her exaggerated and extra curvy female figure, is quite masculine in her behavior. Indeed, aside from insulting Paolo's appearance and lack of carnal talents, Francesca drives the protagonist's car, applies mascara to his eyes, and courts him around in public like he is her girlfriend. It seems that Francesca has adopted male qualities because she is more or less a failed female who lacks what it takes to be both a wife and mother yet is, at the same time, every man's dream (or what Otto Weininger described as the prostitute type). Aside from aborting her child and being the personal whore of some sleazy shit-skinned guru, Francesca has a pathological obsession with the idea of the motherhood as expressed in the fact that she has a stork tattoo on her back. At one point in the film, Francesca happens upon a mother that is happily breast-feeding twins. When the mother allows Francesca to breastfeed one of her babies, it is quite obvious that it gives her great joy as she seems more genuinely happy and satisfied during this scene than at any other time in the film. Of course, beta-pussy Paolo is completely oblivious to Francesca's internal wounds and true needs, thus their lurid love affair is predictably destined to fail miserably.

When Paolo's pecker goes soft right before they are about to have, Francesca uses Tantric mumbo jumbo to help the protagonist rise to the occasion, but instead of obtaining a simple erection he not only develops Priapism, but also becomes completely paralyzed and is thus left perpetually bedridden. Indeed, as a completely physically incapacitated man with a unwavering hard-on, Paolo more or less becomes Francesca's 24 hour sexual slave as she is free to mount his mighty member anytime she wants without his permission, even when he cries like a little bitch and begs her to stop. After initially causing Paolo's Priapism, Francesca declares while staring at his extra stiff tubesteak, "Your body is a condenser of energy now. It's huge now. It's almost frightening. Well done" and then the two proceed to have sex ten times in a row. When Paolo vainly boasts of his extraordinary potency and how he managed to bust ten loads in a row, Francesca berates him by stating to him while simultaneously riding his ramrod, "If you have counted them, then, we didn't make love. You only fucked me...With this phony thing. It was only a mechanical erection. The soul can also make a cock hard. If there's no soul..." Indeed, as the title of the film indicates, Francesca is not much more than premium grade meat to Paolo and there is no real genuine love or affection between the two characters, as they are both emotional cripples that are not much more than glorified blowup dolls to one another, though the male protagonist is certainly the more soulless of the two.

THE FLESH

In fact, at one point in the film, Paolo points at Francesca's derriere and various other body parts and asks a butcher at a grocery store what each part would be called if it were a cut of meat. Ultimately, Paolo's carnal obsession with Francesca takes a more sinister and even carnivorous turn in the end in what is ultimately a reversal of roles where predator becomes prey and vice versa.

After getting fed up with the extra hard work that comes with Priapism, Paolo begs Francesca to rid him of the "curse," though the little lady naturally takes her time and waits a day or two before she releases him from his sensual serfdom. Not long after being cured of his super boner, Paolo is visited by two obnoxious cops who inform him that they have been sent by his employer since he has not been to work in three months and five days. While Paolo self-righteously declares he needs a "rest period" since he is supposedly plagued by "nervous depression," the protagonist totally breaks down when one of the cops reads him a letter from his ex-wife informing him that his canine comrade Giovanni just died of an apparent broken heart since he has not visited him in such a longtime. In an allegorical scene that seems to reflect Paolo's status when it comes to romantic relationships, especially his current one, Paolo pays tribute to his canine companion by fucking Francesca doggy style in the dead doggy's flamboyantly colored doghouse. Of course, jovial guido Paolo's mourning does not last long, as he has a big party when all of his friends randomly come to stay at his beach house, though the protagonist spends most of his time with Francesca and his pal Nicola's mistress Giovanna. Indeed, since Nicola dumped Giovanna, Paolo and Francesca decide to cheer her up by engaging in a short-lived ménage à trios with her, with the three even having a threesome on the beach at sunset. Of course, all good things must come to an end and shortly after Giovanna leaves, Francesca decides she wants to leave Paolo as well.

When Francesca spots a stork flying through the sky, she sees it is a sign that she must leave Paolo for good, not realizing he is an over-possessive maniac who refuses to give her up. In a scene that indicates that Francesca is upset that Paolo does not really understand her, she completely infuriates the protagonist when she hands him a vintage baby doll with a missing eye and somberly states, "She needs affection just like me." Naturally, the last thing that Paolo would ever consider is that Francesca might be something more than flavorsome female flesh, let alone that she might desire genuine love and affection. In a scene that truly demonstrates Paolo's lack of empathy for Francesca, the protagonist violently throws the baby doll at a window and then proceeds to scream at her, "You should end up like Count Ugolino." Of course, Count Ugolino was a real-life 13th-century Italian nobleman, politician, and naval commander of Germanic origins that was depicted in Dante's Divine Comedy and was the subject of many other great works of art who was convicted of treason by an Archbishop and who, with his sons and grandson, was locked in a tower and starved to death. Ultimately, Francesca suffers a fate that is as barbarically medieval as Count Ugolino at the hands of Paolo, who initially seems like a pathetic yet relatively harmless loser but in the end comes out looking like a uniquely unsympathetic momma's boy from hell who treats women like shit because, in his deluded dago mind, no chick can compare to the overweight woman who gave birth to him and risked her life so that he could receive First Communion.

If Marco Ferreri remade Spanish auteur Jesús Franco's classic La comtesse noire (1975) aka Female Vampire as a highly hermetic black rom-com with absurd commercial pretenses, that might begin describe the insanely idiosyncratic essence of The Flesh, which is surely the sort of film that could have only been directed by the man by such mirthfully mad cinematic masterpieces as La Grande Bouffe (1973) and Ciao maschio (1978) aka Bye Bye Monkey. Indeed, even a couple scenes from the film, especially when heroine Francesca's face is covered in blood after feeding on protagonist Paolo's self-inflicted wounds, seem like they were taken from Female Vampire. Of course, what Ferreri and Franco had in common aside from being distinctly unattractive men that somehow managed to surround themselves around beautiful women was that they seemed to both respect and fear the enigmatic 'vampiric' powers that certain beautiful (and not so beautiful) women have, but what makes the former different is that he was more sensitive to the pain and overall forsaken nature of such fatally forlorn feminine creatures, as if he saw them as victims of their own pulchritude. Despite unquestionably being one of Ferreri's lesser works, The Flesh still gives more than a couple hints of the filmmaker's singular genius, especially in regard to how the flick goes from initially making the male protagonist more empathetic than the female protagonist to the total opposite in the end, thereupon making the viewer conscious of their own misguided assumptions when it comes to certain beautiful yet bitchy women. Also, in arguably no other film does Ferreri better demonstrate why he once confessed that he was "50% misogynist and 50% feminist" than in his cannibal comedy, which is a rare film that dares to show great empathy to a female monster while also depicting the true inner depravity of an unimpressive and rather pathetic fellow. Aside from the fact that you can tell that the auteur absolutely worships Francesca Delleria due to the way his camera practically fondles her every curve throughout the film, Ferreri also demonstrates his inordinate sense of sympathy for the tragic real-life femme fatale, as if the entire movie was modeled after the model turned actress' own personal internal pain. In fact, in the doc, Marco Ferreri: The Director Who Came from the Future, lead actress Delleria describes how Ferreri took a special interest in her psychology, stating, "He often came to my house. We spoke about all sorts of things. He tried to get to know my character better. In the end he outlined the personality of the character he was creating." Ultimately, it seems that Ferreri discovered a tragic little girl inside the body of a singularly mature female adult body.

As far as darkly comedic cinematic works the link the carnal and culinary and depict a bizarrely dark and ultimately decidedly doomed romance between an attractive young woman and a hardly handsome older man, the quasi-Lynchian Dutch flick Vlees (2010) aka Meat directed by Victor Nieuwenhuijs and Maartje Seyferth makes for a great double feature with The Flesh. Undoubtedly, both films demonstrate that you're what you eat when it comes to relationships. Indeed, if you suck the cock or eat the cunt of a shithead, you probably are a shithead. While feminist brainwashing and white knight faggotry misleads people into thinking otherwise, women that are in relationships with abusive men are typically attracted to abusive men and vice versa, hence why it is not uncommon for a woman to start attacking a cop who is arresting her husband only minutes after she has called 911 on her beloved because he smacked her around a little bit. Additionally, the female lead of The Flesh knows that she is a nice piece of flesh and she lets the protagonist treat her as such as they are both shallow and emotionally damaged individuals that have nothing in common aside from said vanity and emotional damage. Somewhat intriguingly, I suspect that auteur Ferreri was projecting his own feelings toward Francesca Dellera onto the male protagonist, which is supported by the fact that the actress stated regarding the filmmaker and his somewhat unconventional approach to directing the film, "He wrote this script for me. He wrote it thinking about the way I exist. He's a very clever person. When he works, he's always changing things. He doesn't follow the script." Judging by his portly physique, lifelong obsession with culinary motifs, and unwavering obsession with unbelievably stunning screen sluts, one gets that Ferreri would have loved nothing more than gorging on Dellera, as there is only so much you can do to a woman with your trouser mauser and tongue. While The Flesh features a rather extreme example of the overused metaphorical phrase "don't judge a book by its cover," even the most sensible and restrained of men would surely find it impossible to ignore a woman like Dellera. Of course, what's even worse is actually falling in love with such a woman, as she will slowly but surely cannibalize your soul without even giving it a second thought.

THE FLESH

-Ty E

THE COLLECTOR

Marcus Dunstan (2009)

When presented with this over-stylized piece of shit, I thought to myself "Do I deserve this ungovernable martyrdom by way of film?" and the answer turned to be a solid "Yes." I groaned throughout the music video-esque credits and held my face through my palm as the font seized its way across the screen in quick-cut shots along with over-contrasted shots of simplicity. I found out however, this was nothing compared to the introduction to our "anti-hero" as he moped his way across the screen with a general air of unpleasantness to him. Consider me shocked when the end credits rolled and I discovered that the film was actually a decent romp in what is stupidly referred to these days as "torture porn." To get to the digestible portions of this film, your resolve will be tested. Watching Josh Stewart creep around screen with his character's issues on his sleeve while avoiding the eye of a reclusive killer will turn you off if not handled with delicate eyes. The thinly veiled plot of The Collector is as follows: Ex-con needs money so he attempts to bungle a house only to find that a serial killer has imprisoned the tenants in the basement and ulterior motives might be at stake. Not too shabby for something that could be brainstormed by a lower level primate. It's not just the story that propels this film into watchable territory, it's the Collector himself. Juan Fernández doesn't do much on screen but it's in this cold, stoic killer that evil protrudes, especially through the highly effective mask created for the villain. Hands down, one of the greater motive driven maniacs in recent low budget horror. To reiterate my shock at finding this film not just tolerable but actually enjoyable and clever, I will again announce my limitless dislike for Marcus Dunstan. He, as a collective, co-wrote and created the Feast trilogy. While the first Feast was a no-rules splatter film with the likes of Henry Rollins as he facetiously graced the screen, the other two sequels shriveled up into a flaccid shadow of what it once was. I blame Dunstan solely for the two train wrecks and to be fair in every regard, he was responsible partly for some of the worst horror series' known to the film community e.g. Saw and Feast. So without a steady track record, who am I to lay my trust on this wavering line yet again? Well, that is in the past. I had and I was assured a comfortable horror experience while also being unnerved at the looming monster lurking through the halls decorated with some wildly over-the-top traps while still being tangibly believable. When the grand finale was afoot and there was only one place to go but hell, The Collector remained a tact thriller with gratuitous violence and nudity in all the right places. The delivery was calculated and intense with an ending that will have you rewinding your film to the beginning and searching for something, anything to calm this clambering curiosity. I expected this film to be nothing more than an exercise in rebellion against quality and focused more on the gore sake of horror but I was pleasantly reassured that this film only has one place to go and it moves steadily in that right direction. I honestly can't wait for the sequel in hopes for a bit more light to be shed on this "Collector" character. I'd be lying if I said he didn't make the film.

THE COLLECTOR

-mAQ

100 TEARS

Marcus Koch* (2007) I refuse to loosen my cynical slack on indie horror. If they want my respect, they've got to earn it. Any jerk off can pick up a camera and create a concoction of Karo syrup and other ingredients, ultimately resulting in a DIY horror film. It takes real talent to do so effectively. 100 Tears is an attempt that dared to try, but gained mileage too quick. Take any contemporary serial killer film and dissect it slowly. What is the end result? Surely I'd place my money on a duo "investigating" the killer who stumble upon him or her eventually. Directors don't seem to like change. Two douche bag tabloid reporters decide grudgingly on investigating the Teardrop killer. This remorseless inhuman clown has been slaughtering people for 20 years? Doesn't add a whole lot of sense to the equation, but I'll bite. The few things that have going for 100 Tears is the enjoyable (and overused) freak show back story lingering behind the myth of Gurdy the Clown, and the over-the-fucking-top violence that is exhibited for all to see. It doesn't seem to matter why this clown with a GIANT cleaver just shows up at random places and kills people. It doesn't worry you and you eventually forget how ridiculous the entire plot is. 100 Tears tries to throw small twists in there, and suffers a similar fate of most films by including incompetent cops who cannot find a mass-fucking-murderer. The idea of a clown slicing his way through a huge population for over 20 years is almost as retarded as saying Jeepers Creepers was based on a true story. I also get this feeling that Koch wanted a Devil's Rejects feel to his film. Trust me, that's not a very good inspiration. The direction of the film is led by Marcus Koch. He might be a simple exhibitionist, assumed by his insatiable appetite for inane violence and extremely brutal tortures committed on pulchritudinous women (Which heightens the suspense and overall shock value of the production). 100 Tears really aspires to be an indie classic but fails due to a horrible and amateurish ending, and the lack of delivering any memorability. The only memorable thing I can recall is the damned annoying techno track that would loop whenever the killer strikes. 100 Tears is just another bland & tasteless horror film. The only striking difference is that this is shot on HD.

-mAQ

THE TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE
THE TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE

Marcus Nispel (2003)

It has been a couple years since the release of the Texas Chainsaw Massacre remake. This piece of blasphemous garbage helped carry the torch for the Horror remake trend (among other trash). The first people need to realize is that the "remake" is just a moneymaker. When you remake a well known film it's guaranteed that people are going to watch it. Michael Bay (the cinematic antichrist) knows this as he was the producer of the film (and a handful of other Horror remakes). Texas Chainsaw Massacre is also a propaganda film. The film is used as a tool to scare city folks into being afraid of rural areas. This Long Island invention has been long and running in Horror films for over thirty years (and probably longer). The same people that condemn what they call "Xenophobia (which is just a Marxist agitator tool)" promote the hatred of "rednecks." I think its pretty fair to say that if you walk around in a city you are more likely to get killed. Hollywood hates people from rural areas and the South. They fear "rednecks" as these "horror" films reflect. The remake of TCM takes away all the magic that was found in the original. The original TCM is a masterpiece because of it's realist feel. One could even say that the original TCM borders cinéma-vérité. The remake of TCM is just a cheap piece of gratuitous trash leaving out all the great elements of the original. Having 7th Heaven star Jessica Biel play the role of a strong female character in TCM should make any horror film cringe. The only positive aspect of TCM is R. Lee Ermey plays the role of the local sheriff. Ermey is a hilarious fellow and a great comedian. His performance in Full Metal Jacket alone is enough to confirm his place in acting history (a true method actor?). Lee Ermey does a great job scaring the shit out of hippies and that is to his credit in TCM. His performance in the horrible TCM prequel (Texas Chainsaw Massacre: The Beginning) was even worth seeing. Most of the Texas Chainsaw Massacre related films are complete shit (with the exception of the original and second). Furthermore, most remakes are complete shit. If people stopped watching them, they wouldn't get made. Cannibal Holocaust and Last House on the Left are expected to get remade sometime in the near future. The people involved in these projects should be burned at the stake.

-Ty E

THE TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE

Marcus Nispel (2003)

Judging from personal experience, the best way to view Tobe Hooper's 1974 masterpiece The Texas Chainsaw Massacre is on a local television station as a morose eight year old boy next to a sleeping grandmother and with no idea what you are about to watch is a horror film. The "based on a true story" preamble was all it took to set me off guard, and over sixteen years later I'm still reeling from the stale sweat nightmare that befell a group of five youths, in particular Sally Hardesty and her invalid brother, Franklin. Much has been written about The Texas Chainsaw Massacre- how despite its title and grisly reputation, there is very little on-screen violence and almost no gore. The brilliance of the jarringly dissonant soundtrack and the incredible set design of the Sawyer family residence- akin to a house decorated by Hermann Nitsch and then left to mummify over the course of a searing Texan summer. Leatherface, Ed Gein influence, the diminishing returns of the sequels and remake and prequel to the remake. Influence on punk culture, what with the hippie killing, The Ramones' "Chainsaw", Spanish post-punkers Paralisis Permanente's immortal "Un Dia En Texas", and Leatherface buttflaps blowing in the wind of many a shopping mall parking lot.

To this, I have admittedly little to add, aside from some personal reminiscence perhaps. For years, I have longed to relive the experience of going into a movie completely blind to what it is about (if anything, considering the opening narration and the lurid title, I was expecting a 'true crime' story a la Helter Skelter or In Cold Blood and not a horror film, despite Halloween being a week away) (never one for deductive reasoning at that age, or now for that matter) and being so completely bowled over. For my money, there is no scene more gutwrenching in the annals of cinema than the scene where the hippie youth, en route to a concert, decide to accrue some good karma and pick up a hitchhiker. In the cramped confines of their van, the hitchhiker, played to sun-damaged perfection by Edwin Neal, succeeds in sufficiently unnerving the kids first with his overpowering slaughterhouse stench and then with his incredibly stunted and awkward attempts at conversation, nervously giggling and stammering through descriptions of slaughterhouse techniques and headcheese recipes from behind some very authentically filthy locks. The hippies' disgust is palpable, and the scene verges on the unbearable as you develop a sort of sympathy for the brain damaged Manson family castoff with the smudge of facial birthmark and pitiful, twitching leer trying to connect with the "normies" while simultaneously empathizing with the infinitely more relatable plight of the hippies whose initial regret about picking the guy up quickly descends into all-too-real horror.

By the time this scene came to its close, with the hitchhiker ejected from the van and smearing blood on it's door while hollering and blowing raspberries at the shrieking longhairs, I was as good as meathooked, my heart in my throat, my breath shallow, and not even a slew of commercials able to rouse me from my wide-eyed reverie. As Hooper and cinematographer Daniel Pearl took the film from the subtle menace of the roadside mirages, dead armadillos and desecrated gravesides of the opening scenes to the full blown bad trip surrealism of the dinner scene that closes the film my life was forever changed. Freddy and Jason were out and I learned to see terror not in superhuman boogeymen and dark stormy nights but in all-too-human aberration and the overbearing presence of the unforgiving summer sun. To this day I fear nothing more than a wavering horizon line, dry grass, and desolate stretches of desert, entirely a result of stumbling upon The Texas Chainsaw Massacre that night in October, 1994. And furthermore, to this day, there hasn't been a single film as harrowing, both for the unique circumstances aforementioned and because it is a singularly terrifying film- the best display of pure nightmare logic I've seen outside of maybe that scene behind the diner in Lynch's Mulholland Drive (another uniquely scarring viewing experience as I'd dozed off during watching the beginning of that particular film at two in the morning following an intense bout of studying for finals and woke up just at the beginning of the scene in question--FUCK). It never for a second lets up in terms of intensity and doesn't bother explaining itself too much but lets us experience the nightmare firsthand along with the flared pantsed human cattle (I think about the only time it lets up aside from some brief 'comic relief' concerning Grandpa's executioner skills towards the end is when Franklin bites the dust...that irritating invalid is the sole smudge on this flawless flick, and when he meets the chainsaw it's impossible not to sigh a breath of relief).

THE TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE

Hooper stated in interviews that the spark of inspiration for the film was childhood imaginings of vague passed along stories of necrophile/amateur taxidermist Ed Gein, and this really carries through into the final product, as it feels at times less a traditional horror film than childhood fever dreams brought to revving, gasoline-soaked life. It certainly permeated my childhood nightmares, and looking up Gein after researching the film as a kid was quite the disappointment- the banality of evil versus the sheer mindfuck Vietnam-brought-home dementia of Hooper's sole great film (the rest of his oeuvre ranging from the competent to the beguiling and terrible to the directed by Steven Spielberg)- and oh yeah, cannibalism. People eating people and stuff. That's what this one is about, I guess. Reading over what I wrote so far I realize I kinda left that out. Then again, I'm preaching to the choir, right? Surely you've seen this movie. And if you haven't, what the fuck?! It's your duty as an American, way more vital to being an American than voting, selective service, or even citizenship. This movie IS America, or something. Fuck the pledge of allegiance, pledge to show this movie to the children in your life. I pity the kid who stumbles upon one of the remakes or sequels in lieu of the real thing and thinks they have seen the stitched-together, fly-ridden face of horror. They have no idea. If you have younger siblings or impressionable youth around the house- do them a favor and give them a taste of the real thing. Tell them that it IS based on a true story and force them to sit through at least the scene in the van, at which point they should be riveted and you can retreat from the room. Then enjoy the next couple months of being woken by their cold sweat screams every time a dirtbike cruises down the block and the look of supreme unease during that family trip to the Grand Canyon.

-Jon-Christian

FRIDAY THE 13TH
FRIDAY THE 13TH

Marcus Nispel (2009)

Jason is undoubtedly the greatest horror movie icon ever created. Some may argue Michael Myers, some may scream Freddy Krueger, some may even mutter Chucky's name under their breath, but the fact of the matter remains that Jason Voorhees is the scariest (if any were scary), meanest, and toughest villain of all time. When a Friday the 13th re-imagining was announced, many were speculating the success of the film, both monetarily and within the allotted fan base. Seeing as how the original films were trashy body count sprees, the expectations for this film could only rise above 90s cheese. Friday the 13th begins with a "Kill first, ask questions later" paraphrasing. You will encounter a group of teenagers searching for weed growth in order to harvest and become rich. This classic "Drugs and sex" vantage is necessary to start the tale off on a right foot. Early during the credits, we're given a flashback to the scene of the death of Pamela Voorhees. This alludes to the plot that will be slowly, but surely, fleshed out to your prying eyes. I must admit for a sense of needless anticipation for this film. While scoping out the theatrical trailer, I noticed something elusive to the older Jason films - style and lighting. Marcus Nispel took something ugly and made it beautiful. In a similar tactic that Rob Zombie used to horrible effect in Halloween, Friday the 13th, for the first time, is tenderly beautiful to look at. On the matter of gore/violent deaths, it doesn't disappoint. Normally and frequently, I tend to stray from the topic of violence as it never really adds anything true to a film but Friday the 13th features some barbaric scenes that flash back to the heydays of classic Friday the 13th films. One amazing scene in instance is the stringing of a slutty teen in a sleeping bag that is tied to a tree. Oh yeah, she's suspended over a fire and is slowly being burnt to a crisp. Much humor is carefully intersected into each scene. With a multicultural cast including a Black and Asian male, Friday the 13th takes very little time to build up a body count. But be wary of other pre-release reviewers. They have laid claims that this movie is as ultraviolent as it gets and as much as I'd like to agree, the majority of death scenes are simple impalements with the occasional elaborate murder. It's absurd, the effect of violence on horror fans that is. As many teenagers as we see die, we'll never quite get the feel of a loss. Maybe the slasher genre is to blame. Many strokes of genius can be discovered within the confines of a shallow slice n' dice film. For example, within the opening scene, a male requests for a can of Heineken. The all-American man exclaims "Fuck that Euro shit!" and holds up a can of the great Pabst Blue Ribbon. Now for those in the know, you will quickly discover that this is a reference to David Lynch's Blue Velvet. Not bad, Marcus Nispel. Just like with many Jason films, there will be questions, albeit small, that will never be answered. As in, why in the sex scene are they listening to M.I.A. whilst fucking? Not so much the choice of music but why, with the minutes later cut-back, is the same song playing? Sure, repeat is an option but the song wasn't playing during the foreplay. Another is the very concept of a "retard" living in the forest, built like a train, gallivanting around, decapitating teenagers and local folks, and never having to use deodorant. Prescribed deaths always equalize into a jump out scene of Papa Voorhees but if someone was creeping behind me that didn't bathe in 20+ years, I'm pretty sure I could smell him from miles away. The tale is short but sweet. Friday the 13th has been given the reboot it deserves with style, grace, and an all-star teen cast of teenage heart throbs. My only real complaint is the choice of survivors. Many can agree with me concerning the invention of a "Choose your own" adventure-like method to filming a slasher film. I'm tired of seeing nice people die the cruelest. Of all the trash featured, why when the innocent dies, is there such a lingering suspense and disbelief. Now that's proper horror movie magic. I can imagine many people complaining but the expectations were low. Jason Voorhees has been successfully reborn and I'm not sweating it. The legend of his terror breaks into a new millennium (not counting Freddy vs. Jason) and he's given motive, reason, and a fervid dislike for anything with a lifeforce. Welcome to 2009.

-mAQ

LESS THAN ZERO
LESS THAN ZERO

Marek Kaniévka (1987)

Although I think Bret Easton Ellis (American Psycho, Glamorama) is a mostly untalented, uninteresting, and exceedingly overrated writer who pollutes people's brains with his frivolous degeneracy, I like, to some an extent or another, virtually all of the films based on his novels, if not for all the wrong reasons. Indeed, it seems that even with an incompetent director, Ellis' signature emotionless satirical attacks on the members of his decidedly decadent and seemingly psychopathic white collar upper-class background seem to translate better on screen, with music and actors accentuating the 'hip' flatness of his scribblings. Unquestionably, one of the worst, if not the worst, film based on Ellis' work is Less Than Zero (1987), which is loosely based on the writer's debut 1985 best-selling novel of the same name. Of course, as a film featuring real-life cockhead Robert John Downey, Jr. playing a fictional cockhead who peddles his ass and mouth to men for blow, the film is not all bad, as a soulless and largely aesthetically worthless cinematic venture that more or less perfectly expresses the essence of the spiritually and culturally vacant zeitgeist that it depicts. Directed by Polish-British TV director turned mainstream auteur Marek Kaniévka, who previously directed Another Country (1984) starring real-life butt-darting Brit Rupert Everett as a butt-darting school boy turned commie true believer who defects to the Soviet Union because he believes the English class system persecutes cocksuckers and that the reds will accept his cocksucking with open arms, Less Than Zero is certainly no less critical of capitalism and the upper-class, as it depicts Los Angeles as a plastic radio rock Sodom inhabited by dapper drug zombies and Barbie doll debutantes where wimpy pseudo-suavely dressed WASP psychopaths sell their coke-addled friends into sex slavery, young models cannot get enough cock and cocaine, and every night is one big stupid party plagued by vulgar flashy fashion statements, putrid pop rock and rap, and mind-numbingly boring small-talk and business talk. Centering around a weak dork played by perennial weak dork Andrew McCarthy (Mannequin, Pretty in Pink) who comes back to his hometown in Los Angeles for Christmas break after his first six months in college, only to discover his best friend and (ex)girlfriend have degenerated into erratic cocaine addicts who think life is one big party, Less Than Zero is ultimately an emotionally vacant film about emotionally vacant people who suffer senseless self-induced personal tragedy, thereupon making it vaguely humorous in a sick unintentional sort of way. Indeed, a sort of half-entertaining antidote to the sentimentalist pseudo-angst of John Hughes flicks where one of the 'heroes' drops dead in the end due to his own mindless self-indulgence, Kaniévka's badly bastardized Ellis adaptation is ultimately a reminder of how worthless the 1980s were, with the west coast upper-class reflecting everything that is repugnant about white America. Featuring arguably the most airheaded Jewess ever depicted in cinema history as played by Jami Gertz and the always annoyingly arrogant WASP wuss James Spader as a dope-dealing preppie villain, Less Than Zero is like a melodrama for Abercrombie & Fitch automatons who need a guide towards expressing actual human emotions.

It is 1987 and three over-privileged L.A. friends graduate with “money and happiness” on their mind, yet they will ultimately have a hard time obtaining both, especially the latter, hence why 2 of the 3 rich kids become preppie dope fiends. As a graduation present from his exceedingly wealthy father, an extroverted cokehead goofball named Julian Wells (Robert Downey, Jr.) is given enough money to start a record label, so he opts out of getting a higher education, though his friends, lovers Clay Easton (Andrew McCarthy) and Blair (Jamie Gertz), are planning to move away to college. In six months, the friends are no longer the best of friends anymore, as sex, drugs, and rock n roll come into play. An aspiring model that is afraid to move away and has more boobs than brains, Blair ultimately decides to stay behind at the last minute and eventually starts a love affair with her boy toy Clay’s best bro Julian, who eventually loses all of his money after his rather naive record deal scheme falls through. As someone who cannot handle failure, small-time cokehead Julian turns into a full-blown blow addict to relieve his inner pain, which ultimately only further compounds his problems. During Christmas break, Clay heads back to Los Angeles, though he is not interested in seeing his friends who literally and figuratively screwed him over, but they need his help, so he really does not have a choice and eventually gets lost in the narcotic-fueled nightmare that is his decidedly degenerated comrade’s lives. Indeed, Julian is so in love with gutter glitter that he owes $50,000 to a suave and pathologically cynical psychopath named Rip (James Spader) who, on top of being a white collar drug dealer that mainly supplies the rich man’s candy, is a preppie pimp who has a rather lucrative business prostituting out his more desperate buyers to rich Hollywood homos. To his credit, Rip is a proud prick who has no problem exploiting people as demonstrated by his remark to Clay during a party, “These people are assholes. You know, who gives a fuck about these people?” Of course, even though Julian fucked his girlfriend, Clay cares about his blow-addled friend, so naturally he and Rip are going to have a wuss war of sorts involving passive-aggressive behavior and the sort of sassy remarks that candy ass rich boys from California make.

Being a rich kid, Julian does not understand the concept of work and thinks that by borrowing enough money to start up a nightclub, he will be able to get out of the perennially growing hole he is in, but he of course screws that scheme up and continues to obtain large quantities of coke from Rip. Of course, passive predator Rip does not give him the drugs for free, as he coerces him into sucking the cocks of rich queers to pay off his tab. Meanwhile, Clay rekindles his seemingly soulless relationship with braindead brunette bimbo Blair, who also snorts a lot of blow, though she is not as bad off as Julian as she does not need to blow men to support her rather expensive habit. Somewhat reluctantly, Clay attempts to help Julian with his hellish addiction, even being by his friend's side when he goes through drug withdrawal, but his friend's sobriety only lasts a day or so. Indeed, when Rip has one of his henchmen whip out a crackpipe and wave it in Julian's face, the cokehead turned crackhead begins smoking the blue-veined Havana once again. When Clay goes looking for Julian at a fancy hotel that Rip has rented out for his cultivated cocksucker clients, he finds his friend blowing some wealthy blonde guy. Though Clay manages to get Julian out of the hotel, he later has a PBF (pretty boy fag) fight with Rip and one of his henchmen, with Blair jumping in to help her weakling boyfriend. In the end, Clay, Blair, and Julian drive through the desert late at night so the latter can reach sobriety, but the teenage cokehead ultimately ends up dying of heart failure at sunset. Of course, with their friend dead, Blair agrees to go back to college with Clay, so at least some good came out of Julian's premature death.

LESS THAN ZERO

Not surprisingly, Bret Easton Ellis absolutely hated Less Than Zero when it was released as he felt all the characters were miscast aside from Downey and Spader's, though he has slightly warmed up to the film over the years. Ellis would later state regarding why he thought the film was a failure: "Well, who was happy with it? I don't know anyone who was happy with it. The director wasn't happy with it, and it was this compromised movie for many, many reasons. I don't think it began that way - I think that Scott Rudin and Barry Diller, who were the ones who brought it to 20th Century Fox, had a very different movie in mind. I think when there was the regime change at the studio with Leonard Goldberg taking over, who was a family man who had kids, it became a different beast. I grew up around Hollywood, and I had no real desire to see the book made into a movie. I thought, 'Well, we'll take the money, and 98% of all books optioned never make it to the screen, so...'" Of course, there are countless differences between the film and novel. For instance, while protagonist Clay is a banal tight ass in Kanievsk's flick, he is a bisexual hedonist of the one-night-stand-oriented and coke-snorting sort in Ellis' source novel. Additionally, the novel features, among other things, an appearance from a 12-year-old female sex slave who villain Rip keeps drugged in his bedroom and who is apparently raped by a character named Trent that is barely even featured in the film. In a somewhat tongue-in-cheek fashion, Ellis would mention the film in his sequel to Less Than Zero, Imperial Bedrooms (2010). Additionally, Ellis would make reference to Less Than Zero star Jami Gertz in his novel American Psycho (1991), with the serial killer antihero Patrick Bateman asking about the actress at a video store and zoning out while fantasizing about fucking the actress after a video store clerk remarks that he does not know who she is (indeed, aside from people who have seen superlatively shitty 1980s teen movies, no one knows who Gertz is nowadays). While Less Than Zero is rather weak in terms of wantonness and nihilism in comparison to the source novel, director Marek Kanievsk is not totally to blame as he apparently shot a raunchier and more debasing work than the pansy cut that exists today, but 20th Century Fox studio took the film away from the director during post-production and edited out all the more provocative and depressing scenes. Of course, one also cannot leave out the fact that Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Michael Cristofer wrote the original screenplay for the film, which was more faithful to the book, but it was ultimately rejected for being too degenerate and depressing, as the people at Fox were probably hoping to make some sort of monetarily successful Breakfast Club (1985) rip-off (ironically, the film was still a commercial failure).

Undoubtedly, out of all of the Ellis related films, including The Informers (2008) and The Canyons (2013), Less Than Zero is easily the weakest, least provocative, and most contrived, as a sort of coke-fueled West Coast St. Elmo's Fire (1985), minus anything resembling character development and nuance. As the quasi-documentary This Is Not an Exit: The Fictional World of Bret Easton Ellis (1999), which features no-budget adaptations of segments from the novelist's various works (including Less Than Zero and American Psycho), reveals, Less Than Zero could have been an even bigger disaster than it already is, as Kaniewska's mise-en-scène is easily the most potent thing about the film. Unquestionably, as the novelist himself agrees (he once stated of the work, "I think the movie itself is the one movie that captured my sensibility in a visual and cinematic language"), Roger Avary's 2002 The Rules of Attraction adaptation is an Ellis flick done right, as a film that is easily superior to the novel. As I mentioned before, Less Than Zero is mainly of interest because of its portrayal of real-life coke addict Robert Downey Jr. as more or less playing himself, with the added bonus of the Hebraic actor smoking cocks for crack rocks, thus making it a mildly entertaining example of pseudo-art imitating life and vice versa. Unquestionably, the film also features some of the most innately vapid and unsympathetic characters in film history, even for a 1980s flick, as a film that should probably be buried in a time capsule. Indeed, when people of the future ask why rich whites became culture-less whores of Zion who helped lead American to abject ruin, they can simply watch Less Than Zero and see how that zeitgeist (and everyone after it) had the spiritual and moral prowess of an elderly French hooker. But then again, one cannot completely loathe a film featuring Slayer's cover "In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida" and Glenn Danzig singing a crappy ballad featuring negresses doing backup vocals.

-Ty E

THE ORDER OF MYTHS THE ORDER OF MYTHS

Margaret Brown (2008) Why have documentaries become the pseudo-intellectual's stock answer to the question, "So, what kind of movies do you like?". Well, I guess that question kind of answers itself. Pseudo-intellectuals are, by definition, deficient in original, independent thought. Like seventh graders, they follow fashions fairly well, and lately, the "cool" answer to give when someone inquires about your taste in film is, "Oh, well I mainly just watch documentaries". This answer is typically coated in a snooty syntax that is immediately intended to put the pseudo-intellectual in a position of artistic and cultural superiority versus someone who may have just seen Bedtime Stories.

It may sound as if I'm being unfair to the documentary genre, as if I place a low-quality on the "non-fiction" films simply because I despise a certain, specific sub-class of people who like them. Not so. I think documentary = lazy cinema. Not lazy in the physical sense, as if to imply that the makers of these types of films aren't ambitious hard workers. But lazy in that no matter what style the documentary takes (talking heads, verite "on the scene" accounts, narrated passages of found footage) it is inherently less visually interesting than a narrative film. I watch films to see production design, acting, lighting, framing, composition, color, camera trickery. That is cinema. There are exceptions, yes, but I feel that 98% of documentaries are always inferior to the artistry involved in the making of a narrative film.

Still, documentaries can be entertaining, and my fierce stance against them as a credible art form has led me to watch quite a few in order to keep my argument fresh. Just like a news story on 20/20 can be fun, or a bullsh*t piece on PBS can introduce me to an unknown topic, this genre of film is not without value... don't misunderstand me. High art, it ain't, but a cute and casual time kill? Sure.

A couple of days ago, I watched The Order of Myths. The film is your typical guilty liberal puff-piece where race-hustling is used to garner instant critical acclaim. Check the way director Margaret Brown juxtaposes a scene where a town elder in Mobile, Alabama talks about the importance of trees to his community in a totally holistic way, with a scene talking about past lynchings and hangings in Alabama. Without conscience, she just labeled this man a racist. Same goes for the way she traces the roots of one of her young subject's family back to the time of the slave trade, implying that this 21st century young woman has the instincts of hate in her heart. Documentarians can be passive-aggressive scum at times.

But Brown redeems herself a tad in the film's final third (perhaps she realized she was unfairly painting an innocent girl with a very broad brush). The major focus of the film surrounds Mobile, Alabama's annual celebration of Mardi Gras, and it questions why the community still has one parade for whites and one parade for blacks. Though from the (few) explanations that Brown allows the locals - both white and black - to give, tradition seems to have a lot to do with it. I don't doubt that some of the participants of both parades suffer from serious feelings of bigotry, but I get the feeling that it's a small percentage. Yet hate sells, so Brown plays that angle up... until the end.

Finally, as if feeling a disservice to the people of Mobile (who are all genuine and warm to Ms. Brown) was starting to take shape, The Order of Myths shows the united fronts of both white and black parades coming together in a sharing celebration, proving once and for all that the separation of the two parades wasn't based on prejudice at all, but simply tradition and cultural differences. The last shot of the film has Brown revealing to the audience that one of the men she frequently interviews throughout the film is her grandfather. This moment gives Brown credibility, motivation for why she decided to enter this small town and try to stir up a controversy. Her own ties to the community explains that she may have been hungry to understand her past and heritage on an honest level, and it urges you to let the director off the hook for a second... but just for a second.

-The Man With No Name

HANNAH ARENDT
HANNAH ARENDT

Margarethe von Trotta (2012)

Popular German New Cinema auteur Margarethe von Trotta (The Lost Honor of Katharina Blum, Rosenstrasse) has always had a peculiar proclivity for taking beautiful blonde Aryan actresses and making them seem as sexually unappealing, frigid, and soulless as possible, turning Fassbinder's leading lady Hanna Schygulla (The Marriage of Maria Braun, Lili Marleen) into a pedantic feminist literature professor in her film Sheer Madness (1983) aka Heller Wahn and statuesque beauty Barbara Sukowa (Berlin Alexanderplatz, M. Butterfly) into the most horrendous of Hebrew hag communists in Rosa Luxemburg (1986) aka Die Geduld der Rosa Luxemburg, the latter of which she received the German Film Award (Bundesfilmpreis) in 1986 for her bizarre philo-Semitic efforts, so it should be no surprise she did the same for her latest flick Hannah Arendt (2012), albeit with more interesting and surprising results. Once again featuring Barbara Sukowa in the lead aesthetically degrading role of a historically controversial butch Jewess, Hannah Arendt is a Hollywood-like biopic that depicts the controversy regarding German-Jewish philosopher Hannah Arendt's groundbreaking book Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil (1963), a work written for The New Yorker that not only offended world Jewry due to its depiction of National Socialist SS-Obersturmbannführer (lieutenant colonel) Adolf Eichmann—a naughty Nazi who fled Germany after the Second World War and was dubiously captured by members of the Israeli Mossad and ultimately executed in 1962 via hanging after being found guilty of 'crimes against humanity' and 'war crimes' at an Israeli show trial that was a major media event—as a boring bureaucrat who did not genuinely hate Jews and was merely 'following orders' in his deportation of Jews to concentration camps as if he was the manager at a fast food restaurant like McDonalds, but also because she revealed the imperative role that Jewish leaders, especially Zionist Jewish leaders (who wanted Jews out of Germany just as much as the Nazis and sent to Palestine), had in voluntarily collaborating with the Nazis during the holocaust. To add to the hostility felt by her fellow Hebrews, Arendt was also the protégé and mistress of German philosopher Martin Heidegger, who joined the Nazi Party (NSDAP) on May 1, 1933 and never expressed an inkling of regret nor remorse for being arguably the greatest 'National Socialist' thinker who has ever lived. A sort of real-life 'Romeo and Juliet' story among philosophers, Arendt kept in contact with Heidegger for the rest of her life, even after he became a Nazi and she spent a brief period of time in Camp Gurs concentration camp in Vichy, France before escaping to America, and her relationship with the Aryan philosopher sparked her famous concept about "the banality of evil" where evil acts are not typically carried out by psychopaths and sadists, but ordinary people who are brainwashed by the state and consider actions they carry out for the government—no matter how deplorable—as normal. A German-Luxembourgian-French coproduction ironically released by a production company called “Heimatfilm”, Hannah Arendt is a fiercely formulaic flick that looks like it could have been directed by a sorry shabbos goy Hollywood hack like George Clooney, yet considering its unflattering portrayal of Israel and its hypocritical Hitlerite-esque tactics, von Trotta’s film could have never been made in Hollywood despite it depicting arguably the greatest female Jewish philosopher of all time.

Hannah Arendt (Barbara Sukowa) smokes like a chimney but when she takes the job of reporting on the war crimes of Adolf Eichmann for The New Yorker, cigarettes become practically her only real friends as she learns that criticism of the Jews in any context, even if you’re a holocaust survivor, is nothing short of Hebraic heresy. Being named the first female lecturer at Princeton University in 1959, Arendt is a prestigious philosopher who is also happily married to a kraut cuckold communist poet/philosopher named Heinrich Blücher (Axel Milberg), but her life was not always so grand as she was forced to flee her birth nation of Deutschland in 1933 for Paris to escape from Uncle Adolf and she even stayed in a Vichy, France concentration camp as an “enemy alien” after Germany took over frogland, but she eventually escaped with her hubby and mother to New York City in 1941, where she became actively involved with the German-Jewish community and after the Second World War even became involved with the Zionist organization Youth Aliyah. As depicted in von Trotta’s Hannah Arendt, Arendt, an uncompromising individualist with no need for a superficial collective identity, got over her reactionary flirtation with Zionism and had no problem with factually implicating many bigwig Jewish leaders in collaborating in the holocaust while covering the Eichmann trial. While at Eichmann’s trial in Jerusalem, Arendt notices that the big bad SS man “doesn’t scare me at all. He is insignificant” and he “speaks in horrible administrative jargon,” thus being far from the sinister Satanic SS man that threw Jewish babies off moving trains like the mainstream American and Israeli media portrayed him to be. While Arendt confides in her Israeli friend Kurt Blumenfeld (Michael Degen)—the the secretary general of the World Zionist Organization from 1911 to 1914—that “Israel must ensure that it doesn’t become a show trial,” she is more than a little bit let down by her people’s exploitation of Eichmann as a sort of scapegoat for Jewish/Zionist (in)action in regard to the holocaust.

After releasing her article for The New Yorker, Arendt faces hatred and hostility from all sides and angles, including many of her lifelong friends. Only her husband and her friend Mary McCarthy (Janet McTeer)—an anti-Zionist/anti-Stalinist Trotskyite of partial Jewish ancestry—backs her up against her hateful, largely Hebraic, detractors. Arendt even receives a visit from a Zionist fanatic/Mossad member sent by the Israeli government who comes all the way to the United States to threaten her not to publish her book Eichmann in Jerusalem, which she sharply retorts to with the remark, “You forbid books, and you speak of decency!,” thus alluding to the Nazi-esque tactics of Israelis in criminalizing thought. Naturally, reading hate mail from anonymous holocaust survivors that reads, “DAMN YOU TO HELL - DU NAZIHURE” (aka Nazi Whore) rather depresses Arendt, but as a true uncompromising philosopher and intellectual, she does not let the “banality of evil” Zionist-brainwashed public opinion defeat her as it only fuels her belief in the validity of her claims. In a very telling scene featuring Arendt comforting her dying Israeli friend Kurt, who is saddened by his belief that she has turned her back on the Jewish people, the Hebraic Heidegger protégé confesses she does not love the Jewish people, stating, “Kurt, you know me though. I have never loved a people. Why should I love the Jews? I only love my friends. This is the only love I am capable of.” Arendt ultimately faces her worst criticism from her lifelong friend Hans Jonas (ironically played by Ulrich Noethen, who has planned Heinrich Himmler in at least two German films, including in Downfall (2004) aka Der Untergang)—a German Jewish philosopher who also studied under Heidegger who took it quite personally when his professor joined the Nazi Party in 1933—who vehemently attacks her after she gives a heated lecture to her students defending her report on Eichmann, stating quite scornfully, “You’re acting like a German intellectual quibbling who despises Jews. And you try to make us accomplices of the Holocaust!...You never accepted that the Germans have shamefully betrayed you. They have expelled you, and they’d have killed you if they had the chance! Your friend Eichmann was responsible for Gurs transportation. If you didn’t get the chance to escape in time, you would have suffered the same fate as the other women!” In the end, Arendt says to her husband Heinrich while looking outside her apartment bedroom, “the whole world is trying to prove that I’m wrong. And no one sees my real mistake. Evil can not be both ordinary and radical. Evil is always extreme. Never radical. Good is always deep and radical,” thus essentially associating her own radical thought with the Eichmann trial as “good” and those of her extreme yet mindless detractors as “evil.”

HANNAH ARENDT

While certainly no masterpiece, Hannah Arendt is easily one of the best biopics I have ever seen on an intellectual figure, even if it is a bit aesthetically banal, as it demonstrates that Hannah Arendt was a rare German-Jewish thinker of courage who, despite being technically a ‘holocaust survivor’ and having the potential to milk her Jewishness to further her career, stoically sought philosophical truth, proving that not all men that do monstrous things are monsters and, indeed, the cowardliness and/or greed of Jewish leaders played a imperative role in Jewish suffering during the Second World War. As someone who has read Eichmann in Jerusalem (1963), it is quite clear to me why Hollywood has never directed an Arendt biopic as the book basically discredits a good portion of the ‘holocaust narrative’ as depicted in films like Schindler’s List (1993), where the Nazis are virtually portrayed as demonic disciples of the devil himself and all Jews are portrayed as morally immaculate angels in kosher form. While I cannot say

I have ever had much respect for Margarethe von Trotta or her films, I must admit Germany's foremost female auteur surprised me with Hannah Arendt as she demonstrated that she is not just an ethno-masochistic and philo-Semitic feminist as demonstrated by works like Rosa Luxemburg (1986) and Rosenstrasse (2003), but also a rare modern day Teutonic filmmaker who has the gall to portray not only mainstream leftist academia, but especially the Hebraic nation of Israel, as being true blue hypocrites who just as slavishly follow orders as Mr. Banality of Evil himself, Adolf Eichmann. Additionally, von Trotta also refrained from portraying Martin Heidegger as an evil Nazi, but instead as a wise and loving man who was not exactly the greatest genius when it came to politics. While it is probably unlikely, I would not mind seeing Ms. von Trotta direct a biopic about Leni Riefenstahl as it might be rewarding to see how the most famous contemporary female German filmmaker depicts easily the most (in)famous female filmmaker—be it German or otherwise—who has ever lived.

-Ty E

THE ANGEL'S MELANCHOLIA
THE ANGEL'S MELANCHOLIA

Marian Dora (2009)

Admittedly, German auteur Marian Dora's arthouse exploitation flick Cannibal (2006) – a deadly serious reconstructed depiction of the intimate cock-chomping antics of real-life gay cannibal Armin Meiwes and his willing lover/dinner – left a notably profound impression on me. Opening with images of miscegenating cannibalistic serial-killer Jeffrey Dahmer and the Third Reich and featuring some of the most audaciously aberrant 'love' scenes ever captured on digital video (and that includes hardcore pornography), Cannibal is a delightfully deranged tribute to the wild and wonderful cryptic world of homo-cidal sadomasochism. Needless to say, I was quite excited when I learned about Marian Dora's second feature-length film The Angel's Melancholia (2009) aka Melancholie Der Engel; a 165 minute neo-pagan cinematic nachtmahr of dreamy Dionysian depravity that features a bombastic blitzkrieg of expressive and sometimes strikingly therapeutic portrayals of coprophilia, urolagnia (aka watersports), genital mutilation, animal cruelty, and melodramatic left-wing hero worship. Including music by swarthy American-born Israelite David A. Hess of The Last House on the Left (1972) infamy and featuring lonely scenic walks through Auschwitz concentration camp by the film's two lead anti-heroes, The Angel's Melancholia is a vehemently visceral window into the post-WWII German psyche and the death-drive-afflicted mania and scatological perversity that such ethno-masochistic self-loathing entails. Following in the aesthetic and thematic footsteps of his fellow countrymen Jörg Buttgerit (Nekromantik, Der Todesking) and Andreas Bethmann (Der Todesengel aka Angel of Death: Fuck or Die), as well as Italian auteur Ruggero Deodato (Waves of Lust, Cannibal Holocaust), The Angel's Melancholia is an unflinching work of noisome and loathsome yet lavishly assembled cinematic artistry that wholly transcends its influences, thus sailing subversive sicko cinema to a new uncharted sea of sadistic and satyric extremity. Forget Siegfried Kracauer's neo-Marxist psychobabble on the German expressionist films of the Weimar Republic, The Angel's Melancholia is a truly sordid spectacle of a spiritually devitalized, emotionally demoralized, and self-flagellating people that worships death and strives unceasingly for self-annihilation; or at least one would be led to believe that is the case after watching such an innately intemperate and inimical post-völkisch work.

During the beginning of The Angel's Melancholia, we are introduced to two loving yet loony friends: Katze; a slightly overweight Nordic degenerate with a keen fondness for warm urine and Brauth; a seemingly Semitic Christ-like/Satan-like messianic figure who initially gives off the impression of being the more dominant of the two fiendish confidantes. These two bodacious bros of brutality haven't seen each other in years, but they are eternally united due to their past communal excursions in debauched perversity. On their way to achieving abyssal Arcadia, the two cunning comrades pick-up three girls who have nil inkling as to what sort of vicious licentiousness the mysterious men will force them to partake in. Katze and Brauth initially cruise an amusement park to find potential female concubines. I found this segment of The Angel's Melancholia to be especially effective in setting the tone for the rest of the film. Echoing the foreboding phantasmagoric atmosphere of Herk Harvey's Carnival of Souls (1962), but especially Curtis Harrington's cult masterpiece Night Tide (1961), the early carnival segment of The Angel's Melancholia lets the viewer know that they are about to go on a riveting ride with Brauth acting as a overly extroverted and mesmerizing lead carny/magician of sorts who guides the show and with Katze as his introverted crony who helps carry things along behind the scenes. The deranged dynamic duo is later turned into a threesome when an older but equally demented artist named Heinrich joins the group. The clique eventually settles in an old dilapidated house where they commence their quasi-spiritual journey that includes physical and metaphysical pandemonium, hedonistic degradation, ritualistic torture of a sexually swinish nature, and heathenish animal sacrifices. When not smearing his feces on vaginas, Katze seeks to obtain final transcendence through the defilement, mutilation, and – eventually – the total disintegration of his earthly body, thus becoming – or so it would seem – the much idealized 'Melancholy Angel.'

What makes The Angel's Melancholia particularly enthralling and singular, especially for Germanophiles and Germanophobes alike, is the consciously and distinctly Teutonic nature of the film, most specifically within a post-Nazi era context. During his often erratic exploration of mind and body, Katze reflects somberly while visiting the graveside of leftist German New Wave alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder and the memorial burial ground of Red Army Faction members Jan-Carl Raspe, Gudrun Ensslin, and Andreas Baader; individuals whose piercing hatred of the National Socialist era Germany – the epoch of their parents and grandparents – played a cardinal role in ultimately leading to their total self-destruction. In one notably symbolic scene in The Angel's Melancholia, Katze's corpse can be seen firmly gasping a copy of controversial German novelist Wolfgang Koeppen's last major work Der Tod in Rom (1954) aka Death in Rome; a novel that sparked nationwide controversy upon its release in Germany due to its uncomplimentary and uniquely critical portrayal of a German family set only a couple years after the Nazi era that does not shy away from holding the entire Fatherland accountable for the sins of its fathers. Katze and Brauth also take a hallucinatory pilgrimage to Auschwitz as if it is some sort of Holy site in a brief but pivotal allegorical scene that symbolizes the internal reasoning behind the characters' deleterious compulsions and self-debasement: the burgeoning burden of guilt of a people that has yet to come to terms with its unscrupulous history and debilitating defeat. While certain Judaic psychoanalysts absurdly described the archetypal National Socialist as an individual that was compelled by the death drive ("Todestrieb"), one can certainly argue that is the case for many German citizens of the post-WWII era as exemplified by popular historical figures like Fassbinder and Bader, thus The Angel's Melancholia acts as an extremely lucid, veracious, and uncompromising expression of a nation on the brink of collective suicide. This phenomenon becomes especially obvious when one examines modern Germany's steadily declining birth rate and the sort of sadomasochistic (and, in turn, innately antinatalist) pornography that is popular there nowadays. I do not think it is any coincidence that many of the scenic nature scenes featured in The Angel's Melancholia come off as some sort of grotesque parody of illustrations created by the prestigious völkisch scientist Ernst Haeckel. Needless to say, The Angel's Melancholia brings new meaning to the National Socialist phrase Blut und Boden (Blood and Soil).

THE ANGEL'S MELANCHOLIA

I think it is safe to say that The Angel's Melancholia is a film that is not for everyone and that even includes certain individuals from the already marginal subculture of thoroughly desensitized gorehounds due to its artsy fartsy portrayal of fetishistic bloodlust and hermetic view of German history. The film can be best described as a glimpse into the German collective unconscious that illustrates a Ragnarök within the Germanic soul, but it is quite dubious as to whether or not the two lead characters reach any sort authentic rebirth, therefore The Angel's Melancholia also acts as a sort of metaphoric tombstone for the Fatherland, henceforth giving meaning to the Goethe inspired narration (featured near the conclusion of the film), "All evanescent is but a parable....here, it's done. The eternal feminine pulls us down." Despite featuring some of the most ridiculously repugnant scenes ever concocted in celluloid history, The Angel's Melancholia – in its overwhelming and often odious entirety – is a work about the liberation of mind and soul through self-sacrifice of the body, therefore it would not be absurd to describe the film as a intrinsically spiritual effort, even if it is of an exceedingly nihilistic persuasion. Christ, Crowley, Nietzsche and Wotan may be long dead, but their historical influence lives on in The Angel's Melancholia as exhibited in many scenes featured throughout the film. After all, only with death can Katze truly rid himself of the necrotic spiritual syphilis that has corroded his sin-ridden soul. One can only speculate in regard to Marian Dora's personal motivations for directing such a fiercely idiosyncratic work, but I think most people will concede that The Angel's Melancholia is – for better or for worse – one of the most exceedingly emotionally enervating films ever made. Indeed, in terms of aesthetic malignity, the film indisputably eclipses the cinematic works of Pasolini, Buttgereit, Hussain, Cerdà, and Spasojević. Whether or not The Angel's Melancholia has as much artistic merit as the films of these compatriot auteur filmmakers of the carnal and callous is quite debatable, but I unequivocally found it to be worthwhile as it is a work that I will never consign to oblivion, especially when comparing it to overly stylized and superficial modern German films like Run Lola Run (1998) and Good Bye, Lenin! (2003).

At worst, The Angel's Melancholia is a potent work of incandescent decadence and barbarous yet beautiful bliss that offers a crude but uncommonly charming cinematic experience that one might expect to see at a concentration camp in purgatory.

-Ty E

REISE NACH AGATIS
REISE NACH AGATIS

Marian Dora (2010)

Indubitably transcending his fellow kraut countryman Jörg Buttgeriet of Nekromantik (1987) fame in terms of carefully concocting the most unwaveringly subversive and extreme German arthouse horror flicks ever made, Marian Dora (Cannibal, Melancholie der Engel aka The Angel's Melancholia)—a mysterious man who has consistently cinematically depicted real-life animal killings, the most foully fetishistic sex, and unrelenting artsy fartsy and atmospheric drama to the point of receiving threats against his life—is also undoubtedly one of the most, if not the most, extreme and esoteric 'horror' filmmakers in the world and one of his most recent releases, the rather brief yet brutally beautiful Reise nach Agatis (2010) aka Voyage to Agatis, is certainly no exception in terms of its extremity. Described by Dora himself as a "not so personal" work in comparison to his vulgarian 'völkisch' epic Melancholie der Engel (2009) aka The Angel's Melancholia—a fiercely fetishistic, virtual cinematic 'wild hunt' of the foreboding and apocalyptic expression of the Teutonic soul featuring tributes to German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder and the suicidal far-left terrorists of the Baader-Meinhof Group, as well as angelic pilgrimages to Auschwitz concentration camp—Reise nach Agatis is a much simpler piece of digital video derangement which seems to be a loose take on the director's hero Ruggero Deodato's early work Waves of Lust (1975), which itself is a take on Roman Polanski's first feature-length film Knife in the Water (1962), meets The Most Dangerous Game. Shot on a beggar's budget of an estimated €10,000 (around $14,900) in Croatia over May 27-29, 2008, Reise nach Agatis builds on what director Dora experimented with in his rather uneventful experimental short Caribbean Sunrise, an aesthetically pleasing depiction of a voluptuous naked corpse of a woman laying on a beach during an ethereal sunup. A simultaneously cinéma vérité-like work with an oftentimes transcendental dreamlike quality, Reise nach Agatis brazenly blurs the line between natural beauty and the distinctive brutality and sexual sadism of man. Featuring shaved pussies and shriveled cocks, Hans Bellmer-esque dolls, the malicious mutilation of sea cucumbers, a malevolent Ménage à trois and one of the most boorish and innately sleazy alcohol-addled kraut characters to be featured in a film since the release of Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993), Reise nach Agatis is an uncompromising celluloid vacation where bloodlusting vivisection of the manhunter sort proves to be the most potent antidote for a superlatively sadomasochistic couple whose relationship is on the rocks, both literally and figuratively.

During the first couple minutes of Reise nach Agatis we witness from the perspective of an unseen killer a somewhat pretty yet also somewhat homely and swarthy young woman going from being a lonely tourist to a naked piece of hysterical human prey who is slaughtered on the beach as her blood poeti-cally dissolves in waves with the tide. Clearly dead as a day old Negro, the film cuts to solacing scenes of grotesque baby dolls submerged in the ocean set to the score of slightly somber jewelry box-like music. From there, the film takes an almost home-video-like feel when it introduces the two anti-heroes, lunatic lovers Rafael (Thomas Goersch) and Isabell (Tatjana Mueller), who are taking a much needed holiday trip to the beach. It is quite clear from the get go that the two middle-aged lovebirds are having relationship problems as Rafael drinks liquor like a McKraut fish and Isabell does not waste any time bitching to her bad-mannered dipsomaniac beau about his seemingly vicious vice during a scenic drive through the country. Rafael and Isabell eventually reach a bourgeoisie café around nighttime and run into a pedomorphic Slavic chick named Lisa (Janna Lisa Dombrowsky), whose sheer lack of pubic hair on her un-bearded clam, which is featured bare throughout Reise nach Agatis, falls in line with the paradoxical virgin-whore doll and 'destruction of purity' themes that run throughout the film. After attempting to 'sell' his woman to men at the café, Rafael pseudo-suavely confronts Lisa and tells her how Isabell is "a bit complicated" but "fucks good." Sleazy swine Rafael must have something going on for him in terms of charisma, as Lisa agrees to join him and Isabell on a sailing trip on their yacht. In a reversal of gender roles from Polanski's Knife in the Water, Lisa and Isabell ultimately vie for the sexual attention of the seemingly psychopathic pig Rafael, a megalomaniac of a mensch who sports an undecorated German officer's uniform to distinguish himself as the captain of his rather small ship.

While Rafael tells little blonde babe Lisa that her "decision was just the right one" in terms of sailing with the couple, little does she realize that the captain is a deleteriously domineering sadist who will not take "no" for an answer, especially when it comes to a woman and the sanctity of her own body. Of course, as someone who incessantly flaunts her nubile young body at a homicidal horndog of a man and his discernibly jealous romantic partner, she is just asking for trouble and, indeed, trouble she receives. With the discovery of a corpse-like baby doll in the sea and foretelling of a terrible fate via tarot cards, including the "Five of Cups," which typically reflects perennial melancholy over past events (while not appreciating what one still has), and the Devil tarot, which typically reflects being shackled to an unhealthy addiction to earthly desires, Reise nach Agatis goes from being a bargain bin Duran Duran video to an ominous oceanic bottomless pit of torture and sadism. After a horrible dinner that results in Rafael throwing wine in the bitchy babe's face and Isabell physically assaulting Lisa, the tables are turned for the cutesy cocktease, who is not only physically forced to strip by the crazy captain, but also thrown overboard with all of her belongings—purse, panties, and all—which are inevitably lost at sea. Not merely content with brutally assaulting Lisa and throwing away all of her belongings, Rafael ties her au naturel body to his boat and rapes her shortly after, but not before spitting the blood and guts of a sea cucumber he had just caught and dismembered into the sad Slavic girl's mouth. More horny and hysterical than the honeymoon killers, Rafael and Isabell receive mutual sexual ecstasy while torturing Lisa, especially when the man in the relationship does the involuntary manhandling while his lunatic old lady watches. Ultimately, Rafael is a hunter and Isabell is a voyeur, so when the two decide to let Lisa go on an island, it is the man who takes care of business in the form of knife-to-vagina mutilation that results in the young girl's bloody and fecal-following disembowelment.

REISE NACH AGATIS

During a couple scenes throughout Reise nach Agatis, a vintage black-and-white portrait picture of the unnamed dark-haired girl that was brutally butchered on a beach at the beginning of the film is glanced at by maniac murderer Rafael with love and affection, thus hinting that she was his daughter/lover and that his lust for youthful female flesh and blood is the result of not getting over the girl's death as a victim turned victimizer. With the film's reference to the Devil Tarot card, a symbol of self-bondage to an unhealthy idea and/or fixation that prevents one from living a healthy life, which Rafael certainly does as an alcoholic murderer who still longs for a dead girl, Reise nach Agatis is ultimately a film about a wayward sort of 'redemption' via genital mutilation and murder. Rather ridiculously, after Rafael guts Lisa like a pig, he and his lover Isabell, who only have resentful disdain for one another throughout most of the film (Rafael even gives Lisa the opportunity to kill Isabell), lovingly embrace and seem to settle the differences and start a new beginning at the conclusion of Reise nach Agatis, thus one could argue the film concludes on a rather happy and positive note, heavenly and angelic sky and all, at least as far as a Marion Dora film is concerned. Although easily his 'most accessible' and least unwaveringly grotesque effort to date, Reise nach Agatis is still pure and unadulterated Marian Dora in short but sadistically sweet form. A literally gut-wrenching work with a discernibly discordant moral compass, Reise nach Agatis is so-called 'torture porn' with a brain in Dogme 95 style that portrays decidedly deranged individuals who no longer have the same mental processes as the rest of humanity as hopelessly tainted individuals whose only source of solace is from the suffering of others so as to dull their own suffering. A filmmaker who has referenced great Teutonic romantic poets and thinkers like Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Georg Büchner, and Eduard Mörike, as well as great modern kraut cultural creators like Wolfgang Koeppen and Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Reise nach Agatis is undoubtedly a work that aspires to be a reflection, if not a rather unflattering one, of the German collective unconscious just as it strives to be one of the most aesthetically pernicious yet poetic horror flicks ever made. And, indeed, while it is somewhat dubious whether Dora achieves what he sets out to accomplish (I certainly feel it does, at least to some notable yet nauseating degree), it is nothing short of indisputable that Reise nach Agatis is a piece of erratic emotional excess and audacious anti-entertainment of the Hollywood-free variety that initially sets up the viewer for a lovely scenic sail that transforms into an aesthetically entrancing psychodrama of inhumanity wherein the viewer becomes a metaphysical accomplice to murderous misogyny, which will certainly be no small cinematic task for the typical Spielberg-lobotomized filmgoer, but it is undoubtedly a rewarding one.

-Ty E

Mariano Peralta (2007)

Snuff 102 is what happens when your film strays from source material. Argentinian born Mariano Peralta, decided to make a faux-snuff film, but instead made a bastardizing mess mixing "footage" with long and contrived shots of a young reporter in her loft, drinking coffee and eating apples. These quiet shots of suburbia are only intended for our false securities and just an example of the scenes which are out of place.

The plot (I didn't know there was supposed to be one) is about a reporter who is interviewing a film critic about violence in film. At the same time, three women are being tied up and getting tortured in cruel, inhumane ways. For some stupid reason, these two stories intertwine. It's funny when you watch two characters interact and you can clearly notice that the lines of which they read spout intelligence that the actor or actress is incapable of comprehending. This is the case in this film. Many pseudo-philosophers in film have one method of being pretentious, for example. Woman: "Don't you agree that violence is wrong?" Man: "What is violence? What are morals?" It's these kind of rhetorical questions that drive me insane; as if these characters knew anything about that of which they speak. The main actress (I'll be damned to look up her name) might be the most idiotic actress that has ever graced the screen. I'll give her the respect for being able to scream and cry real well, but whenever she says a big word, I can see her face contort as if she doesn't even know what it means. For trying to be a snuff film, even in its "snuffish" parts, It seems to be wallowing in its own mess. Cracks on the screen are fixed and edited in, sort of like Grindhouse, but at least they made it believable. A droning soundtrack compliments the "reality" of it all and the long shots focusing on a camera are supposed to be taken seriously. In one scene, when the reporter was researching Snuff Fantasy, we just have a 5 minute shot of over-edited shock videos collaged together with her facepalming during the intermission. The one thing I must applaud this film for, is its use of brutality. When the killer punches the pregnant lady, it looks very believable. Let's just be thankful that they can fake a punch rather than the pathetic example shown in the original August Underground. While being of a faux-snuff film, It really has nothing in common with any other film, besides shitty Hollywood serial killer films. I doubt they even have DVD's in Argentina (Sarcasm), let alone a copy of August Underground. Another tasteless point of the film, is its chronic use of shock footage. The film even opens up with a pig's throat being stabbed. Gaspar Noe can pull this off because the man can film and find beauty in depravity while still being a realist. Peralta should be slung up from his ankles and sodomized for making this sad excuse of a film. All the controversy surrounding its premiere, with the director getting attacked and all, It comes as no surprise. Snuff 102 is a boring fucking film.

-mAQ

ALIAS
ALIAS

Marina de Van (1999)

Alias is a short directed by Marina de Van and is on the present DVD of her magnum opus, In My Skin. This short clocks in at about 12 minutes long and is a relatively slow moving short. In order to fully understand what happens in this film, you need a layout of the story. "On the day of her birthday, Juliette feels particularly unhappy. However, in her despair she doesn't notice the eerie behavior of her cleaner who is copying everything she does and mimicking her dress sense..." We begin the short with a crying female named Juliette. Post-feminism has never been so bold as to maintain a beautiful shot of an aging woman smoking naked on her bed crying. It is apparent that it her her esteemed birthday party, complete with memories tacked onto a slide show projector. She is in a form of depression and judging by her appearance, it might even be mid-life crisis related. Through-out the party, she is binging herself on wine and eventually throws up. When the cleaner comes up, it is a very horrifying shot, with intense music and creepy-ass vibes coming off of her. Her mascara is applied with no direction towards beauty and her earrings are inspired by Juliette's. A film that definitely requires multiple viewings. It won't be hard to dedicate another 12 minutes of your time to this short. The film might be a piece on Identity crisis (as the late film LOST HIGHWAY did) or could be a dark tale of obsession. No one really pays attention to the people you are used to having around. People such as the cleaner who might, for all we know, could be the eventual demise of Juliette's family. Oh how she appears to dislike her mother. This film made me want to pay attention to detail at all costs.

-Maq

PSY-SHOW

Marina de Van (1999)

Psy-Show is a near perfect short film from Marina de Van, the director of the recently reviewed ALIAS and IN MY SKIN. Psy-Show might be a perfect short. It is just the right length at 19 minutes, has a tremendous tone to it, features impeccable performance, and features an amazing song by Tom Waits at the end credits. This short follows a very different style of filming. You know only certain details about the characters. One is a depressed male who's age is semi-apparent due to his balding scalp and the other is the psychoanalyst who's intentions are mysterious and he has a lunatic feel. A similar character is the Marquis off of Svankmajer's Lunacy. So what indeed happens, is that this fragile man becomes a pawn in this analyst's everyday routine. He has equipped his chair with a motor and a joystick hidden in the arm of his chair that allows him to move his chair around without the victim viewing, in order to create true hysteria. Seems a bit barbaric to me. His methods may be uncivil but could be determined as effective to say the least. Throughout this short, the man becomes unnerved and irritable. Getting more hollow as the time goes by. The analyst just smiles this devilish look and tells him it is all in his head. For being such a almost hopeless short, it is quite humorous and has an immense amount of French charm. Highly recommended with it's divine lighting and mood, In My Skin is a DVD you must get. Three great films for the price of one.

-Maq

PENTIMENTO
PENTIMENTO

Mario Costa (1952)

With 20% of its landmass and 21% of its population located below sea level, and 50% of its land lying less than one metre above sea level, the Netherlands is a tiny nation that has been historically ravaged time and time again, so it is only natural that its inhabitants would have an atavistic aversion to water and the sea; or at least that seems to be the case with Dutch avant-garde filmmaker Frans Zwartjes as vividly depicted in his feature-length film Pentimento (1979); a quasi-erotic and pseudo-exploitative 'horror' film where cold oceanic blues dominate the film's aesthetic, and an assortment of Adam's ale, sweat, urine, blood, and vaginal lubrication become characters unto themselves. Of course, Zwartjes – a rather eccentric fellow whose morbid, proto-goth/death rock film aesthetic was largely influenced by his experience working in mental institutions – is no doubt not afraid of all forms of water as he is a fervent nudist who enjoys voyeuristically gazing at beautiful women's bearded clams on the seaside as he explained quite adamantly in the documentary De grote tovenaer (2006) aka The Great Magician directed by Ruud Monster, but Pentimento is certainly no day at the beach with its severely salacious portrayals of sexual violence and sadism. Featuring a feverish and foreboding musical score that tingles one's spine and takes prisoner of one's soul, and set to a globalist post-industrial wasteland where beautiful Nordic women are nefariously encroached, experimented on, and eventually disposed of like common trash by Japanese scientists with a positively prurient poise, Pentimento is probably the closest thing to an 'Actionist Thriller' and the sort of film jaded Jap cannibal Issei Sagawa – who became a minor celebrity in his homeland after murdering, molesting, and munching on a female Dutch student – would yank his yellow yoo-hoo too.

Although a country well known for its painters and artists, especially of a magnificently morbid and metaphysical sort, The Netherlands has produced few filmmakers of notoriety aside from Paul Verhoeven (Turkish Delight, Robocop) and possibly Rene Daalder (Massacre at Central High, Population: 1), but both of these directors would emigrate to the United States and, at least to some extent, Americanize their aesthetic, so Frans Zwartjes makes for a notable exception. As a musician (playing viola for the Dutch opera), draughtsman, violin maker, painter, sculptor, academic professor and all around creative renaissance man of sorts, it was only natural for Zwartjes to be one of the first Dutchmen to embrace film as a serious and legitimate artistic medium (although initially using it to document performances) and he would ultimately approach filmmaking as a Dutch Master painter would with a certain meticulousness of the mise-en-scène of misery that entrances the viewer in a manner like they have never endured before. After completing a series of delightfully daunting and seemingly plot-less, bodacious and bleak black-and-white shorts oftentimes starring his young student wife Trix Zwartjes (who he met while teaching “Non-Applied Design” at Eindhoven Academy), including Birds (1968), Anamnesis (1969), and Visual Training (1969) – audacious awe-inspiring works that would ultimately inspire me to become enamored with the avant-garde auteur – Zwartjes would eventually experiment with color in the short with the chilling, aesthetically and thematically frigorific, bluish gray-toned short Living (1971); an unwelcoming yet weirdly wanton depiction of the biting barrenness of bourgeois life. Although still experimenting with black-and-white film stock (Audition, Bedsitters), Living would hereafter act as a rudimentary model for what would be Zwartjes most accomplished effort, Pentimento; a feature-length work with a discernible, if discordant, narrative set in a terribly technocratic building of emotional sterility where sadomasochistic Japanese scientists perform seemingly preposterous and patently perverted procedures on Dutch girls.

Featuring authentic scenes of unflattering female masturbation and a variety of other fecund unfriendly scenarios of noticeably feeble ladies in exceedingly perilous and lethally lecherous situations, Pentimento eventually caught the attention of The Netherlands’ more militant, sexually-repressed, and intrinsically lesbian feminist population (unfortunately for the Dutch, daftly dyke Andrea Dworkin decided to move to Amsterdam in the early 1970s), thereupon condemning the film for perceived misogyny and whatnot and bitchily bombarding a Rotterdam screening of the film. As the son of a nun that had fallen from grace who helped her boy survive starvation through the Second World War and a masculine father (an amateur boxing champ) who died while his scion was just a schoolboy, Zwartjes most certainly had an unconventional childhood where the feminine touch was the prevailing force of family, so, if anything, the prolific filmmaker probably had a special empathy and esteem for the fairer sex, even if in an erratically visceral, vicarious, and vehemently veiled manner as depicted in Pentimento; a certainly clandestine cinematic work with a seemingly effortlessly effete command. Using mere glances and symbolism to tell a sibylline story of female servitude and slavery carried out by tiny yellow men with serious cases of small man’s complex who commit ungodly acts of surgical and sexual sadism, Zwartjes demonstrates innate sensitivity towards the sanctity and sensuality of the female gender, albeit from an inordinately opaque outsider’s perspective.

With its audacious audience-antagonistic artistry, vague allusions to the Japanese experimentation Unit 731 – a place infamous for carrying out some of the most depraved war crimes committed during the Second World War – and the sexual sadism of Sagawa, Pentimento is not the sort of film that many Hollywood-spooned, multiculturally-enriched filmgoers will be able to stomach, but of course Zwartjes’ goal with the film was obviously not to yield to vulgarian viewers. Resembling Italian auteur Alberto Cavallone’s Blue Movie (1978) and Blow Job (1980) in its arcane approach to expressing the more labyrinthine motivations behind human licentiousness and callousness and excessive impenetrable essence of works like Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) and Day of the Idiots (1981) by German auteur Werner Schroeter but to a more flagrant degree, Pentimento – of which the title literally means the alteration of an artist work, evidenced by traces of previous work – is ultimately a work about the progressive terrorizing and mutilation of the female body by a Japanese doctor with an unhealthy obsession with designer high-heel shoes. When it comes down to it, only Frans Zwartjes can truly understand the artistic intent behind Pentimento, but if there is one thing we can be sure of it is the filmmaker's determinedly indefatigable artistic forthrightness in turning personal fantasy and nightmare into cinematic reality.

PENTIMENTO

-Ty E

SWEET SAVAGE

Mario Morra (1983)

Sweet Savage is a vast tale of the grand frontier...and Indian titties. This drama has been disguised as an XXX feature, or the other way around. I really couldn't tell what I was watching at various points of this racially charged porno film. I had picked it up with the premise of slimy whites raping an Indian only to have slimy Indians rape a white only to explode into a full-scale racial war. Sounds awesome, no? I always feel awkward reviewing a pseudo-porn, but the truth is far from. Sweet Savage is just plain fucking ridiculous. There's nothing really to work with other than the XXX scenes. This film doesn't know whether it wants to be an ole' time rape-revenge flick or a standard missionary pornographic film. This clutters any sort of story this film has, but I must applaud its feverish attempt at forcing a story here. Most films of this caliber use a story as a mere side dish, whereas Sweet Savage embraces its roots and rolls with it. The Indians are casted as dark skinned hippies and the Whites are casted as old rednecks who are in it to sodomize young Native American women. I can imagine there being a lot of tension on the set due to the proflic Western civilization disaster that was in the process of being filmed. With that said, there's really nothing much to see here. Just American trash in the purest sense. It isn't really worth a watch and the rape scenes (We all know that's why you want to watch this) are horribly acted.

-mAQ

FAREWELL TO AUTUMN
FAREWELL TO AUTUMN

Mariusz Treliński (1990)

Admittedly, making fun of Polish people (or, more specifically, American Polacks) is an old favorite family pastime for me, so, in a sense it is kind of hard for me to take anything Polish seriously yet I cannot deny that the perennially changing Slavic nation has produced a couple obscure geniuses like novelist and poet Stanisław Feliks Przybyszewski, who was associated with both the decadent naturalistic school and Symbolism movement and who sired the classic occult text Die Synagoge des Satan (1897) aka The Synagogue of Satan. A comrade of Teutonic Satanic Renaissance man Hanns Heinz Ewers, who apparently moved around in the same occult circles, Przybyszewski mainly wrote in German since Poland was still part of Prussia at the time and he was certainly one of the most decadent literary figures of his time, but his literary perversity and innate 'Polishness' pales in comparison to the great Stanisław Ignacy Witkiewicz (aka 'Witkacy'), who was indubitably the most important artistic Renaissance man of his nation during the first half of the 20th-century and whose death via suicide upon the Soviet invasion was quite symbolic of the death of both aesthetic and individualistic freedom as a result of communist takeover. Although a decidedly debauched libertine dandy who loved devouring drugs and genitals from members of both sexes (though some scholars doubt his homoerotic excursions), Witkacy was a pan-Slavic nationalist and cultural pessimist of the quasi-Spenglerian sort who wisely feared that Mongol hordes would invade and colonize the Occident and turn it into a cultural wasteland plagued by collective slavery and aesthetic sterility. Indeed, such was the central theme of his third and arguably best novel, Insatiability (1930) aka Nienasylenie, which was adapted into the rather disappointing 2003 dystopian film of the same name directed by Wiktor Grodecki. Directed by a dubious dude who has dedicated his entire filmmaking career to creating hyper homoerotic films about underage teenage male prostitutes like Not Angels But Angels (1994) and Mandragora (1997), Grodecki's pathetically politically correct Insatiability completely sanitizes Witkacy's work by turning Mongol hordes into Aryan hordes and focusing almost entirely on the perverse sexual themes of the source novel despite the fact that they are more or less only incidental to the story. Luckily, at least one of Witkacy's novels, Pozegnanie jesieni (1927) aka Farewell to Autumn, was adapted into one fairly worthwhile film (notably, some of his plays were also adapted into worthwhile works, including the bizarre arthouse horror flick W starym dworku czyli niepodleglosc trójkątów (1984) aka In an Old Manor House or The Independence of Triangles directed by Andrzej Kotkowski). Made not long after the long awaited death of communism, Pozegnanie jesieni (1990) aka Farewell to Autumn directed by Polish auteur and opera director Mariusz Trelinski (Lagodna aka A Gentle Woman, Egoisci aka The Egoists) is an insanely tragicomic and innately iconoclastic indictment of the Polack aristocracy and the Catholic Church that depicts sexual degeneracy of the hetero and homo sort, drug addiction and alcoholism, racial and cultural deracination, and scheming seductive Jewesses, among other things, as the sort of vices that plagued the upper-classes and caused them to be destroyed with next to nil effort by the bolsheviks during the revolution. A delectably dystopian piece of culturally pessimistic philosophical celluloid disguised as a raunchy black comedy, Trelinski's film is probably the most decidedly degenerate and aberrantly action-packed anti-communist flick ever made, thus making for a true enigma of celluloid history and a truly respectable tribute to Witkacy.

Opening with a tribute to its source writer Witkacy, which describes him as a "Philosopher and erotomaniac...Extravagant dandy, painter and writer" whose "works were compared to lunatic dreams," Farewell to Autumn immediately sets a tone of absurdism that will ultimately help the viewer be able to more easily swallow all the senseless tragedy, misery, sexual dysfunction, cultural decay, nihilistic excess, and patent pessimism that will follow. As the film proudly reveals in regard to its firmly anti-commie stance, "It is a tongue-in-cheek analysis of society on the verge of destruction. It is the story about the chaos which brought to us 100 million inhabitants of Central Europe...the fate of being slaves of only one and "rightful" idea: The communism." The lead protagonist of the film is a debauched bisexual aristocrat of sorts named Atanazy Bazakbal aka 'Tazio' (Jan Frycz) and he is torn between marrying a beautiful blonde Jewess who certainly does not look like a Jewess named Hela Bertz (Maria Pakulnis) and a somewhat banal blonde named Zofia Oslabedzka (Grazyna Trela). More than anything, Tazio seems to resent Zofia as reflected in his remarks to her, "...I hate you with pure, beautiful hate...And because of only that I want to marry you," thus reflecting the protagonist's bizarre and seemingly sadomasochistic psyche. When Tazio goes to visit Hela at her yarmulke-sporting father's large mansion, he finds her in bed with a candy-ass Persian prince named PrepuRech (Leszek Abrahamowicz), so he kicks the effeminate blueblood out and begins pounding at what is left of the Hebraic girl's hymen (she claims to be a virgin, but that is dubious to say the least). During the middle of sex, Tazio randomly stops, complains "I can't read Proust," and then reveals to Hela that he is engaged to Zofia even though he is already engaged to her. After revealing his love for Zofia, Tazio grabs Hela's pussy and passionately says to her that she is a "A rich, coarse, Jewish she-boor" and she absurdly replies "I am a virgin" even though she just screwed two different men in one night. Meanwhile, high-strung pansy Prince PrepuRech watches the two having sex outside while standing in the rain and screams at Tazio, "I will kill with no regrets. Like a dog, I will kill you." Indeed, the next day, the two decadent aristocrats will duel for Hela's hand in marriage. Meanwhile, Hela decides that she is going to convert to Catholicism, though she also considers converting to communism after Tazio leaves her sexually frustrated after failing to give her an orgasm, thus hinting that, contrary to what whack-jobs like Wilhelm Reich and useful idiots like Bernardo Bertolucci think, Marxism is born out of sexual discontent.

FAREWELL TO AUTUMN

Undoubtedly, Hela's rich father Belzebub Bertz (Henryk Bišta) is a classic penny-pinching and morally vacant Jew à la Jud Süß who wants to auction off his baby girl to the highest bidder. When Daddy Bertz finds his daughter in bed with Prepudrech and she reveals her intention to marry the pussy Persian Prince, the old Talmud scholar gets angry and tells her he has chosen "two great marquises...Italian fascists" for her to marry (contrary to popular opinion, many Jews were originally involved with Italian fascism). After telling her father that she plans to convert to Catholicism and marry Prepudrech if he is not killed in the duel, Hela also attempts to coerce her father into converting, hilariously arguing, "Papa should do the same if only for business." In a scene symbolic of how effeminate the aristocracy had become, both Tazio and Prince Prepudrech are incapable of properly using their firearms, with the latter even pathetically fainting like a little girl during the fairly absurd duel. Ultimately, the Prince gets lucky and shoots his comrade in the neck, though he survives. Naturally, Prepudrech and Hela and Tazio and Zofia marry in a large double wedding that is raided by overtly moronic and cartoonish communist revolutionaries who are eventually pacified after a charlatan priest comes out and waves a crucifix at them like they are vampires and they immediately cower like the collectivist-minded slaves that they are. As Papa Bertz accurately prophesizes during the wedding regarding his daughter and her three friends, "A terrible fate awaits those four." After the wedding, a huge Dionysian party occurs where men openly perform cunnilingus on women right in front of everyone, debauched dames dance around naked while having champagne poured on their unclad bodies, and the two brides dance with one another in a highly eroticized lesbo fashion while simultaneously making threats to kill one another due to their mutual love for Tazio. As a piano player states in a melancholy fashion during all the debauchery, "We've reached the endpoint of bourgeois culture, which didn't produce anything but doubt...in everything."

Undoubtedly, Tazio is in doubt as to whether or not he married the right woman, as he clearly loves fierce femme fatale Hela, who tells him that he will have to fight for her if he truly wants her. Just like with the wedding, the party is raided by bands of indiscriminately murderous bolsheviks, but things get way more violent than before, with people being burned alive, shot, and run over with cars, among other things, though this does not ruin the protagonist's big day. Luckily, Tazio manages to make a great escape with the help of a friend on a motorcycle that is ultimately killed after getting his friends to safety. Instead of consummating his marriage with some honeymoon sex, Tazio pulls a Fassbinder and has sex with his middle-aged queer bud Jedrek instead of his wife on his wedding night. Before engaging in cross-generational sodomy, Tazio and Jedrek make reference to Nietzsche, most notably Beyond Good and Evil, which the two believe they are engaging in. Since the Bolsheviks have taken over, all the young aristocrats are forced into exile and decide to take a train to Switzerland, but Tazio is a no show at the train station because of his hard hedonistic homo night of cocaine, cognac, and cocks. Naturally, old queen Jedrek acts quite melodramatic about Tazio leaving and complains to him, "Tazio, I have only you and even this you want to take away from me," to which the protagonist equally melodramatically replies, "Jedrek, don't make a demoniac woman out of me." Ultimately, Jedrek refuses to follow to Tazio to Switzerland, but later has a change of heart at the last minute. Upon arriving at the station, a self-righteous commie officer attempts to stop Tazio and Jedrek from getting on the train and ultimately the latter is gunned down like a dog by some rabid red comrades, thus leaving the protagonist irreparably shattered. Naturally, things only get worse from there.

Upon arriving in the snowy Swiss Alps, Tazio becomes so completely and utterly disillusioned that he absurdly remarks, "Maybe Jedrek's one minute of life after five grams of coke had more meaning than my whole life." To make matters worse, Hebraic whore Hela starts a fling with a Nordic ski instructor named Erick Tvardstrup (Waldemar Kownacki), who has no respect for pessimistic artists and describes the protagonist as being sick in both the mind and body. On top of the fact that Erick is screwing his beloved kosher cock-tease, Tazio absolutely hates sportsman and hatefully states to the Swiss ski champ during a heated argument that he firmly believes that sports are ruining the entire world, adding, "Your records are blocking the place in the newspapers for the serious art critics...In the literary journals and others." During the same conversation, Tazio also reveals his hatred for both communism and democracy, wisely stating, "I'm am getting furious with the lies of contemporary democracy. Equal start for everyone...What moronic idea is this? Justice based on equality, hierarchy is the foundation of sound social life [...] What is coming – it is a grey end with unpredictable consequences. A wave is engulfing us which will destroy all our values." Of course, the protagonist is in denial that everything is lost, including the entire way of life he once knew, or as Hela states to Tazio, "What values? Don't make me laugh! Do you still pretend to believe that we still have anything left?" Since he is full of rage and hatred as a result of his new sorry lot in life as a wealthy aristocratic artist turned homeless/jobless writer, Tazio has no problem brutally murdering Erick after challenging him to a duel by driving a sword straight through his thick sportsman neck. Of course, Tazio and Hela eventually begin having sex again and Zofia loses her mind as a result of her new husband's flagrant unfaithfulness. After catching Hela riding Tazio's cock during an almost satanically salacious scene where the Jewess truly resembles an evil and lecherous demoness, Zofia drops a lantern while waving a pistol and sets the hotel they are staying at on fire. Completely heartbroken, Zofia runs away into the snow and Tazio attempts to chase her down while sadistically teasing her by begging her to shoot him. Instead of shooting her unfaithful lover though, Zofia turns the gun on herself, thus blowing off the side of her face and killing her instantly. Of course, Zofia probably opted to kill herself right in front of her husband to spite him, as well as to leave him with an undying sense of guilt for the rest of his already miserable life. When Tazio goes to see his wife's corpse in the morgue, he is so shocked by Zofia's mangled corpse that he collapses.

FAREWELL TO AUTUMN

Now a totally broke widower and persona non grata in Switzerland as a result of the dubious circumstances regarding his wife's death, Tazio hits rock bottom and is forced to go back to his now new and hardly improved 'proletarianized' Polack homeland where he attempts to whore himself out to a communist government official, who ultimately offers him a less than glamorous job as an official government snitch. After breaking down to the communist official by pathetically stating, "The Future is yours and I accept that," Tazio is told by the Bolshevik bureaucrat, "So, you accept that we use you and then throw you away? So, you agree to be fertilizer? I am speaking with you that way as you're intelligent." Ultimately, Tazio refuses to be a bolshevik bitch and turns down the less than dignified snitch job. Meanwhile, Tazio begins a short-lived love affair with a 26-year-old girl that looks exactly like his dead wife Zofia, albeit with brunette hair. When his new girlfriend begs him to take her away from Poland, Tazio must admit to both her and himself that he is now a broke bum with no future, somberly stating, "But I have nothing anymore. I have no place to go. I have nothing." In the end, Tazio does some drunken hiking while foolishly attempting to cross the Polish border, but he is ultimately caught by some faceless commie comrades that are hiding in the woods and is forced to quote poetry by Russian octoroon negro Alexander Pushkin to prove his devotion to the oh-so precious proletariat. After botching Pushkin, Tazio is reduced to groveling like the most pathetic of slaves and declares that he is, "only shit, I am not a man anymore. Do you understand?" and the Bolsheviks respond to him by putting a bullet in his brain and disposing of his corpse in a river. The film concludes with the following narration, "September 18th, 1939 when Poland was invaded by German and Soviet armies, Witkiewicz committed suicide. For sure, he had been aware that his prophecy was fulfilling. The witnesses testified that his face was calm and relieved."

Undoubtedly, one of the most intriguing aspects of Farewell to Autumn is that, unlike the source novel, it depicts Poland under the anti-human hell of Marxist slavery, with protagonist Tazio's experience acting as a sort of "what if" scenario of what Witkacy might have faced had he not killed himself during the Soviet invasion. Ultimately, the message of the film is that you're better off killing yourself than living under communism, with Tazio dying in an uniquely undignified fashion and Witkacy's suicide being glorified as a heroic act committed by a man who would rather be a rotting corpse than a living

Slav(e). As a pan-Slavic nationalist who served as an officer in the Imperial army of the Russian Empire during World War I and lived through the so-called Russian Revolution in Russia and was eventually elected political commissar of his regiment, Witkacy experienced the rotten genocidal fruits of bolshevism firsthand and knew exactly what was awaiting his beloved Poland if the Soviets took over. As Harold B. Segel wrote in his essay Polish Romantic Drama in Perspective regarding the ultimate importance and validity Witkacy's pessimistic worldview, "Witkiewicz's Bleak prophesies of the future, unrelieved by the promise of messianic deliverance or the hope of an East-West, Catholic-Orthodox, Russian-Polish pan-Slavic symbiosis as advocated by Miciński, were fulfilled beyond even his darkest imagination by the events of World War II and its aftermath in Poland. The reality of totalitarian power in the postwar period from the consolidation of a Soviet-backed communist regime in the last 1940s down to the suppression in December 1981 of the most recent expression of the Polish desire for true independence and democratic freedoms – the Solidarity movement – provided a new impetus to the continuation of the debate over the Romantic past." By Hebraic Hollywood standards, Farewell to Autumn could certainly be described as 'anti-Semitic' as the superlatively seductive Jewess character Hela is the most predatory of femme fatales and she has no loyalty to no one or nothing, as a pathological social-climber without roots or traditions who switches religions like wardrobes and who gets a kick out of getting her two lovers to try to kill one another. Of course, Hela's father is no less flattering of a Jewish caricature as a seemingly incestuous miser who is willing to whore his daughter out to an Italian fascist count because he feels that it would be a great monetary investment for his family. Ironically, despite featuring subject matter and themes that would never be tolerated in Hollywood, Farewell to Autumn is easily the most accessible Polish film I have ever seen as a work that routinely mocks Hollywood genre conventions and classic works by Hitchcock (e.g. Vertigo). Indeed, despite its innate (meta)political overtones and quasi-philosophical essence, the film can also be enjoyed on a more superficial philistine level due to its incessant debauchery and dark humor. Not surprisingly, director Mariusz Trelinski won a number of awards for Farewell to Autumn, including the Andrzej Munk Prize and the Award of the Minister of Culture and Art of the Republic of Poland for best debut of the year. Undoubtedly, Trelinski's film is unequivocally evidence that cutting edge, artful, and downright unhinged nationalistic films can be made that make the neo-vaudevillian comedies of Hollywood seem like infantile Freudian filmic feces. Indeed, as the work of not only Witkacy and H.H. Ewers, but also Gottfried Benn, Stefan George, Pierre Drieu La Rochelle, Ernst Jünger, Gabriele D'Annunzio, George Sylvester Viereck, Arthur Moeller van den Bruck, Fidus, and Yukio Mishima, among countless others, certainly demonstrates, the so-called "right-wing" used to always be at the forefront of all things delectably decadent and Farewell to Autumn is certainly a revival of this timeless tradition.

FAREWELL TO AUTUMN

-Ty E

THE THAW

Mark A. Lewis (2009)

The Thaw is a very recent entry in those Ghost House Underground DVD releases that showcase mediocre horror material borrowed from many classic ideas in an attempt to lure consumers in with flashy and mindless cover art that hints to frights and confusion to as why it was made, with the exception of Last House in the Woods. What The Thaw has going for it are two things - top billing for Val Kilmer, whose career is as dead as the potential characters in this film of choice, and actual suspense built with a fear of parasitic hosts. This fear isn't even limited to just these prehistoric creatures. If you haven't heard of a Human bot fly, I recommend you keep it that way and not let your morbid curiosity search for it. The Thaw opens with a potentially disturbing scene of a blonde woman adorning an open sore on her forehead. Many chattering people are in the background of this shaky-cam film opener and the heightened sense of urgency is on each of their tones. Behind the woman's crying figure is a blowtorch heating up a needle. Carefully positioning her sobbing face still, the hot needle is applied to the wound. A few stunning seconds pass and a tiny larvae protrudes from her creamy-complexioned flesh. At first I was overcome with a premature form of disgust but then the effects of terrible CGI took hold and my muscles relaxed once more. This scene in particular is what happened endlessly throughout the entirety of The Thaw - some suspenseful build up with an incredibly lackluster pay off on every end. Soon after the opening credits of the film, we (the audience) are force fed one of the most appalling, mind-numbing trends in horror films these days - global warming propaganda and ecoterrorism. Hints that later flourish in an impatient stab to sideswipe with a twist one can see coming from the first time Aaron Ashmore opens his mouth. I hate to say it but the only reason worth watching The Thaw is for the maybe 5 minutes of especially graphic footage wrapping up with the parasitic consumption of multicultural flesh. With the line up in this film, you'd be surprised that this wasn't a high school reunion of the original cast of Saban's Mighty Morphin' Power Rangers. Let's see, you got the chink, the negro, the two lead white couples with a minor bit of sexual tension between the both and that one white guy whose only noticeable effort in the film is making a grab for a gun cause he "inconveniently" has a terrible phobia of insects. Personally, global warming isn't a very good cinematic mantle piece nor an effective plot device. To move me with terror requires the extraordinary, not dime-a-dozen morality inducing monologues about the stinginess of humanity. I get it, we're shit to our planet that has so graciously given us food, shelter, and all the necessities of life, but I will be damned if some remake of The Last Winter will preach to me what is apparent as the directors with their flashy gas-guzzling cars and spacious condos try to shove their "social commentaries" in my face. Nor do I like it when they shove Val Kilmer's post-mortem "acting" in my face - to which I would more or less credit as a cameo. You'll find hype for this film as I surprisingly uncovered many "10 star" blessings. I guess I just don't "get it." A film with 10 minutes (give or take) of mediocre cinematography and a few key scenes of gross out body horror combined with 80 minutes of coma inducing dialogue and terrible CGI worthy of Lorenzo Lamas' mug shot is enough to make it credible enough to horror fans to rave about. Now I now know why Dreamcatcher is so reviled. While I appreciate the prehistoric reinvention of the Bot fly, I'd rather spend my personal time in purgatory watching reruns of Raptor Island than ever watch this dismal piece of shit again. The only thing I could even mutter as the credits ran was a sternly deserving "eh..."

THE THAW

-mAQ

SPAWN

Mark A.Z. Dippé (1997)

The impact wasn't that noticeable to me while I was a child. When I first read Spawn (comic), I had no idea what was happening on these inked pages. I noticed from the blood and swear words that this was intended for mature audiences but it was too much of a perfect relic of the modern comic book era. Then the film stormed in on a golden horse. The idea of a Spawn film just makes my knees shake, but the film was an utter disappointment. Roger Ebert generously gave the film three and a half stars calling it "unforgettable". Spawn is the same train wreck that is Nicholas Cage's Ghost Rider. Same deus ex machina's, same horrible dated CGI, and same pillaging of a classic comic series although I was much more saddened at the death of Spawn than Ghost Rider. Alan B. McElroy, the scribe of Spawn, has written some of the most atrocious scripts for films including The Marine and Ballistic: Ecks vs. Sever. The only thing he can warrant as a success would be Wrong Turn 2, but that lies entirely in the hands of Henry Rollins. For those who've been trapped under a rock for 10+ years, Spawn concerns a black guy getting betrayed, winding up in hell, making a deal with the devil Malebolgia to exact revenge, and along the way encountering demons and deceit all with the help of his incredibly awesome super necroplasmic powers. Sure, it sounds hokey but for a comic depicting murder, pedophilia, and other scourges of humanity, Spawn kicked righteous ass. Whoever decided that an actor in Toxic Avenger II could play Spawn should have his family burned alive. The only thing right that Spawn achieved was the monumental casting of John Leguizamo as Clown/Violator. Truth is, I loathe director Mark Dippé for his work in directing Spawn. Thankfully, he seems to have been blacklisted from Hollywood after that bomb seeing as how his only real work after Spawn was creating Garfield releases. What a furious case of karma. With a crew of retards and a cast of inexperienced tough guys sans John Leguizamo, Spawn really was doomed from the start. It's a shame that such potential wasn't exploited. Neil Gaiman was created for helming a Spawn film, too bad it will never happen. For its time, it might have had substantial CGI but the effects of Malebolgia looked god awful. Tron predated this film by decades and served as a bigger visual treat than this under-produced hell. If hell is anything like watching Spawn for its laughable effects or entertainment, count me as a saint. This is one of those films you regret loving as you grow older. Roger Ebert would be rolling in his grave had he died already. I don't remember debates concerning ratings back when film was processed meat like this waste of 35mm film. Nowadays, anyone with a brain will scream and shout about the newest Die Hard or Max Payne film being PG-13. The studios want that accessibility and the fans want source material to be prudent. It seems the studio's raped franchises as early as 97'. How we've been deceived. Please stop me before I begin to shred apart Spawn's practical effects depicting his "burnt" face. How did they go so wrong? If you want to watch a "black" man with a pink cork face prance around barely using any of the amazing powers he's been given, go for it. Sure, Jason was made into a white character to try and shoo away urban audiences but Spawn's the kind of film that ignorant masses want, although I doubt anyone wants it anymore. Spawn received the shit end of the stick with its inability to age well. The only thing this film's good for anymore is a prop to stop your short-legged table from wobbling.

SPAWN

-mAQ

ISLE OF THE DAMNED

Mark Colegrove (2008)

In Hollywood and elsewhere, the parody has become a standard in entertainment. In our present but somehow “postmodern” world, the parody tackles cultural items of yesteryear to make the masses giggle in delight. Unsurprisingly, many things parodied in television and film aren’t worth the recognition of special treatment. Leave it to swell guy and funny man Mark Colegrove (aka Antonello Giallo) to parody the infamous Italian exploitation cannibal films. What old sub-genre is more ripe for such treatment? It is a shame that the general American audience is not usually aware of the cannibal genre. That did not stop Mr. Colegrove from creating Isle of the Damned, a film full of flesh eating hilarity that even manages to break open the longtime taboo of incestuous sodomy. Isle of the Damned recognizes and pays tribute to the best of the cannibal films. I don’t think it would be too careless to say that Cannibal Holocaust and Cannibal Ferox are easily the best Italian cannibal films to ever appear from the sub-genre and Mark Colegrove gives appropriate tribute to these old school low budget masterpieces. With the cannibal film, one can expect rape, torture, ritual killing, real animal killings, deranged anthropologists and awful post-production dubbing. In Isle of the Damned, Mark Colegrove brings back all these lovely things for future generations of horror fans. To be fair, Isle of the Damned does not feature any real animal killings which isn’t necessarily a bad thing. Instead, the film features a very cute and fake looking spider which is stepped on resulting in an exaggerated amount of arachnid guts flying everywhere. Isle of the Damned also features gore, bodily dismemberment, and “savage cruelty” that easily beats the best of the Italian cannibal films. One of the most memorable scenes features a cannibal cutting off a sizable flaccid penis and shoving the member of the now castrated man up his daughter’s gash. I guess the cannibals believe that if “civilized” folks aren’t going to practice incest then they are going to be forced into it. Also, unlike the cannibals featured in earlier Italian cannibal films, those featured in Isle of the Damned enjoy playing butt darts. Overall, the cannibals in this splendid film have much more character than those featured in the Italian cannibal films. In fact, they even are more discriminate in who they eat. One lardo and criminally minded pedophile is rejected by the cannibals and is instead ass reamed by a gang of homosexual savages. I couldn’t help but think of John Boorman’s American outdoor classic Deliverance while watching this scene of a man being porked like a pig. Although private investigator Jack Steele is the main character of Isle of the Damned, his adopted son Billy is my favorite character of the film. Director Mark Colegrove did a ridiculously hilarious job voicing the traumatized young man’s overly neurotic voice. Poor Billy was the victim of a fatherly fuckfest which drove him to homicide. Unlike most cannibal films, Isle of the Damned features various subplots and flashbacks that do not waste a second of footage in the film. The film features a colorful and distinct cast of characters that I had no problem getting into. I consider myself to be a fairly discriminating cinemaphile, but Isle of the Damned really leaves nothing to be desired. Maybe big budget degenerate "postmodern" filmmakers Jason Friedberg and Aaron Seltzer (Date Movie, Epic Movie, and Meet the Spartans) should take notes from low budget parody filmmaker Mark Colegrove. Unlike Friedberg and Seltzer, who make me want to put a bullet in my head with their cinematic abominations, Mark Colegrove's Isle of the Damned put me in a humored state from beginning to end. But then again, Colegrove is a filmmaker that seems to care about the comedic quality of his films whereas Friedberg and Seltzer are catering to the lowest common denominator. Isle of the Damned is a mandatory viewing for cannibal fans, horror fans, parody fans, and individuals that hate cultural anthropology. With Isle of the Damned, Mark Colegrove beats to death the token moral message "we are the real savages (civilized folk)" featured in Cannibal Holocaust and other cannibal classics. That being said, Isle of the Damned is the greatest tribute one could have created for the Italian exploitation cannibal film. Mark Colegrave knows his stuff and did his research. The least an eclectic fan of cinema can do is watch his film Isle of the Damned. Not to mention, Ty E makes an appearance in the film as a cannibal. Find out more about Isle of the Damned

ISLE OF THE DAMNED

-Ty E

THE PUNISHER

Mark Goldblatt (1989)

After watching Punisher: War Zone, I decided to first write about the two entries before this second reboot. I appreciate the casting selection of Dolph Lundgren. His jawline is cut in such a way that it brings the fearsome devil that lurks behind his pupils out. With only the expectations from the horrid 2004 film starring Thomas Jane and the 2008 adaptation, I had no idea what to expect from this film other than a Punisher without his emblazoned trademark logo. But after seeing the shameful scene of Thomas Jane's Punisher being granted his infamous "shirt", I found the sacrifice to be for a cause. The Punisher is among the runts of the Marvel film flock. Before Marvel acquired their own studio, they just relinquished the creative control over to underlings, in this case, New World Pictures. Though New World Pictures was an independent film company, it produced some of the greatest retro sci-fi and horror films of several decades. In order to get the most from their films is to be a child of time. While I thoroughly enjoyed Dolph Lundgren's Punisher film, I found it to be cleverly underwhelming in a way that didn't spoil the film experience. Rather than featuring a "super villain", The Punisher battles against the general idea of a crime syndicate. Many personal details of Frank Castle's past were changed and an almost-homo erotic partnership has been added in. The receiver is played by none other than Louis Gossett Jr. Personally, his face is most memorable from his role in Jaws 3 (3D). Without this disappointing sequel, I might not have recognized Gossett Jr.'s ability to overact any role into perfection. Regardless of his performance, I still felt a love sustaining almost if chronic. The traits of the Punisher linger in the aftermath of this film. Whereas in the 2004 film, The Punisher hasn't reached his violent roots yet, same with this stillbirth. The Punisher should lack compassion or any other discernible euphoric trait. This Punisher wouldn't mind hijacking a bus to save a handful of kids. In a humorously illustrated scene, we watch Dolph Lundgren kick ass for children in the same vain that Stuart Devenie kicked ass for the lord in Peter Jackson's Braindead. Mark Goldblatt serves as the director. He has edited amazing films together such as Predator 2 and Terminator 2: Judgment Day, but I fear that his qualification for being a director can be represented by the fact that he directed an episode of Eerie Indiana. The Punisher is a film that was just created without the discipline and helping hand of Marvel. This Punisher, while more masculine than Thomas Jane's pretentious rendition, was still a man without a logo or a cause. Watching Dolph Lundgren slaughtered many Asians proves to be an entertaining cause to continue but the overall product is devoid of meaning, cause, and a celluloid soul. I enjoyed The Punisher for what it provides and that is a character that is sympathetic yet repugnant. Dolph Lundgren couldn't provide the depth of Castle but instead served a full dish of the Punisher "look". This leads to many scenes that quick-cut to Lundgren's face in a timely void stare that eats up a surprising amount of run time. The Punisher features eccentric weapons, a disturbing ending featuring Lundgren meditating in the nude, gratuitous violence towards women, and an extremely violent environment in comparison to the 2004 Punisher reboot. Recommended only to the fans of what the 80s provides.

THE PUNISHER

-mAQ

WHITE MADNESS

Mark L. Lester (1975)

When I think about it, there seems to be very few truly decent, distinct, and memorable films about complex relationships between mothers and sons, especially in terms of works depicting troubled relationships between a matriarch and her male progeny. While I found Russian Aleksandr Sokurov's Mother and Son (1997) relatively touching in its own Slavic overly spiritual way, I also found it a tad bit too 'sentimental' for my tastes. Indeed, I like my films to be a little bit darker and more complicated, hence my appreciation of Teutonic dandy auteur Werner Schroeter's The Rose King (1986) aka Der Rosenkönig, but the problem with that film is that it is about a mother that is jealous of her son's male lover/sex slave, which is certainly not something I can relate to. Luckily, I recently discovered the truly criminally neglected work De witte waan (1984) aka White Madness directed by Dutch auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst (Flanagan, Paranoia), which is a film I can better relate to as a particularly perturbing yet rather romantic piece of culturally cynical celluloid of the unwaveringly decadent sort about a misanthropic junky nihilist who lives completely off the grid in a large abandoned factory building and has been estranged from his mother from over a decade, only to reunite with his melancholy mommy after she is hit by a car and badly paralyzed. While I have never shot junk in my arm and it has not been a decade since I last saw my mother, I can certainly relate to the film's less than Oedipal but certainly obscene essence and foreboding tone in a somewhat inexplicable way. Lauded by such heavyweight European arthouse filmmakers as Jean-Luc Godard, Bernardo Bertolucci and Pier Paolo Pasolini for his 22-minute experimental directorial debut Ik kom wat later naar Madra (1965) aka That Way to Madra as the greatest talent to emerge from the Netherlands during the mid-1960s, Ditvoorst was an auteur purist who believed that film was a mixture of poetry and painting and never had an interest in appeasing the tastes of the masses, hence why virtually all of his works were commercial failures, including White Madness, which was the last film the diehard avant-gardist directed before committing suicide at the premature age of 47 in late 1987 by walking into the Scheldt river near his childhood hometown of Bergen op Zoom. Well over a decade before his suicide, the filmmaker began drastically deteriorating and living the life of a cynical misanthropic hermit after his most conventional and mainstream-oriented work, the crime-drama Flanagan (1975) based on the novel of the same name by popular Dutch novelist Tim Krabbé (The Vanishing), also turned out to be a commercial flop despite it being the director's first (and ultimately last) serious attempt at appealing to the masses. Unemployed and living as a drug-addled alcoholic recluse in an attic near Vondelpark in Amsterdam, Ditvoorst hated daylight, only came outside during the night to go to his favor bar, and by the early-1980s began hanging out and doing drugs with socially alienated hobos, punks, and skinheads who would ultimately inspire his swansong and magnum opus White Madness, which was also a flop (only attracting about 1860s filmgoers at theaters) and baffled both viewers and critics alike upon its release, though it is now considered an unrivaled masterpiece of sorts of Dutch cinema. Like Day of the Idiots (1981) era Werner Schroeter meets the satiric dark proto-surrealism of Comte de Lautréamont (whose poetic novel Les Chants de Maldoror aka The Songs of Maldoror is featured prominently in Dittvoorst's film) meets a decidedly Dutch take on 'magical realism,' Dittvoorst's masterpiece of moribund melancholia is simultaneously a poetic suicide letter, reluctant nod to maternity and the eternal feminine, and transcendental tribute to personal freedom and the perennial solace of death.

WHITE MADNESS

Like virtually all the protagonists of Dittvoorst's films, Lazlo (Thom Hoffman of Paul Verhoeven's The 4th Man (1983) and Rudolf van den Berg's De avond (1989)) is an antisocial loner who abhors all forms of authority and rejects society in its entirety, as a solemn and sullen mensch who incessantly paints murals of strikingly stoic eagles, which symbolize freedom to him. The aristocratic junky son of an eccentric ex-actress (veteran Belgian actress Pim Lambeau) who lives in a similarly reclusive life surrounded by books and debris, Lazlo lives in an abandoned ruined factory that is symbolically named "De Adelaar" (aka The Eagle) that he shares with an eccentric old man known simply as 'Portier' (Hans Croiset of Dittvoorst's Flanagan, who is not coincidentally the brother of the actor that plays Lazlo's much hated father) who has been working on an invention for four decades that he hopes will "bring forth a sound that will destroy the echo of the Big Bang with a deviant speed" and thus bring forth eternal silence as a result of the destruction of the entire world. Aside from Portier, Lazlo's only other friends are a dope-dealing Chinaman named Fuji (Joe Hennes) and his much taller white girlfriend Lili (Hilde Van Mieghem of Steven Soderbergh's Kafka (1991)) who live on a rusty old battleship. Lazlo rarely talks, but when he does it is usually in a no bullshit fashion that completely shies away from any verbal frivolousness (which can also be said of Dittvoorst's film, which is almost a purely visual experience, as a work that only has about 280 lines of dialogue). With his friend Fuji, Lazlo also likes talking about dreams while the two are both high on heroin and whatever other narcotics they have lying around. Lazlo has not seen his mother in twelve years and has nil desire to do so, but a tragic event will change that and plunge the antihero out of his hermetic glacial void and into an uncomfortable state of vulnerability where he must confront his repressed feeling as a born prodigal son who does not want to accept the fact that he loves his mother dearly.

Lazlo's mother cannot let a single minute go by without thinking or dreaming about her estranged son and what might become of him. Indeed, during the beginning of White Madness, she suffers a nightmarish hallucination after seeing TV footage of a baby seal being clubbed to death and then imagining the furry white pup is actually her son. Mother's only source of solace is the music of Mozart and her favorite play The Cherry Orchard (notably, director Divoorst planned to cinematically adapt the play, but his screenplay was rejected, so he directed White Darkness instead) by Anton Chekhov, who she states of, "That Chekhov...he knew about the ladies." Mother also has a tendency to talk to furniture, including chairs and cabinets, when she is not pretending to drink coffee spiked with liquor with her son. Fed up with life and quite literally dying to get her son's attention, Mother decides to throw herself in front a car and suffers a variety of injuries and afflictions as a result, including paralyzed legs and random seizures. After her accident, Mother sends her half-sister Tante (Louise Ruys of Dick Maas' Amsterdamned (1988)) by Lazlo's squat to tell him about the bad news, but the protagonist responds rather rudely by throwing a carton of strawberry milk at her and walking away without saying a single word. Ultimately, Tante decides to track down Lazlo's prostitute friend Jasja (Gusje van Tilborgh), who more or less resembles a younger version of the antihero's mother, as she is convinced that the whore will be able to help. When Jasja goes by Lazlo's pad to attempt to talk some sense into him regarding comforting his hospitalized mother, he responds by stating, "My mother...She is a lifeless garden...a fossil from the Balkan." When Jasja states "your mother is suffering," Lazlo responds in a sadistically sarcastic fashion by stating "finally." When Jasja states regarding his mother "you love her," Lazlo cannot deny it and finally agrees to accompany the prostitute to the hospital. While taking a taxi ride to the hospital, the driver abruptly pulls over and attempts to kick Lazlo and Jasja out of the cab after the former refuses to stop smoking in his car. When Lazlo gets out of the car, he drops the cash on the ground and steals the cab while the taxi-driver is scrambling to pick-up the money. Jasja finds the whole ordeal highly hilarious, but Lazlo doesn't and throws the hooker out of the cab when she laughs too loudly. Indeed, Lazlo cannot stand anyone, including hot carpet-munching hookers he used to fuck.

When Lazlo gets to the hospital, he finds his mother bedridden, covered in bandages and casts, and only semi-conscious yet she still manages to still give her son the warmest and most loving of smiles. After the mother gently hands her son an envelope with his name on it in a discreet and almost conspiratorial manner, Tante destroys the beautiful moment by barging into the hospital room and unleashing a storm of accusatory verbal swill, so Lazlo grabs her and throws her out by force, thus causing her to land on an injured man on a stretcher. After seeing mommy dearest for the first time in twelve years, Lazlo goes by Fuji's place to buy a month's supply of heroin but the Chinaman does not have that much dope to spare so the antihero must meet with a suavely dressed bartender who is their main supplier. Just before Lazlo arrives for the drug deal, a lard ass junky (played by Dutch auteur Theo van Gogh in a highly memorable and mirthful role) that is fiending for a fix kills the bartender by stabbing him in the gut with a knife after the dealer refuses to sell him so dope. When Lazlo finds the murdered man, he only seems concerned about whether or not he will get his drugs. After digging through the dead dealer's pockets for cash and dope, Lazlo feels sympathy for the murderous fat junky and places a large bag of dope into his mouth. In fact, Lazlo subsequently has an epiphany and decides to give the rest of the drugs to Fuji as he plans to quit drugs altogether, stating regarding the junky lifestyle, "It's the same everywhere...A sad bunch of pathetic losers." Of course, Lazlo really wants to get clean because he plans to live with his mother and wants to have a literally and figuratively clean start with her. After telling Portier that he will be spending the next couple weeks in the top story of the factory and that he does not want to see anyone during that time, Lazlo suffers the lonely metaphysical hell of drug withdrawal and, in turn, incessant diarrhea.

WHITE MADNESS

When Lazlo reaches equilibrium and emerges from drug withdrawal, he says farewell to Portier, who remarks "you're leaving. I can hardly believe it," and makes his way to mommy's manor, but not before taking a shower at a clinic where an old woman voyeuristic gazes at his unclad body and briefly encountering the bloody feeble corpse of his childhood self. When Lazlo finally arrives at his mother's dilapidated mansion, he finds himself literally standing in debris, dust, and shambles of his childhood. Indeed, the large family manor is mostly in ruins and art supplies, various types of taxidermied and decayed animals (especially snakes and iguanas, but also birds), and mountains of books are lying all over the thoroughly cluttered house. While waiting for his mother to arrive home from the hospital, Lazlo hears ghosts from his childhood, including that of his abusive deceased father, who is rarely mentioned in the film but whose ominous presence is deeply felt. When Mother finally arrives, she is wheeled into the house in a wheelchair by her half-sister Tante and she happily remarks "Hello Boy, I'm glad you're here" after Lazlo warmly greets her in a romantic fashion with a single red rose. Before long, Lazlo and Mother decide to symbolically throw all of their favorite possessions out of a window, including the latter's favorite play The Cherry Orchard, the telephone, and about a hundred or so books, though the protagonist spends a fairly long time brooding over de Lautréamont's Les Chants de Maldoror aka The Songs of Maldoror in between working on a new eagle mural before deciding to rid himself of his worldly material possessions. Unfortunately, Lazlo also soon begins using various types of drugs again, including weed (which he sits next to his lavish illustrated copy of Les Chants de Maldoror) and angel dust. Mother also reminds Lazlo about how his father used to regularly say hateful things to him like "Junior, out of my way...You smell like chicken shit" and "one day, I'll beat the light out of your eyes." At one point, Lazlo suffers a hallucination where his father forces him to blind his own eyes with cherries (which is surely reference to The Cherry Orchard) while his mother suffers a surreal seizure while dressed like a cheap hooker. Indeed, it soon becomes quite apparent why Lazlo decided to stay away from his childhood home for twelve years, as the familiarity of the family manor throws the protagonist into an existential pandemonium where repressed memories mutate into living and highly lucid nightmares.

After getting in a petty argument with his prideful progenitor, Lazlo storms out of the manor while his mother yells, “Runaway...That’s what you always do.” Unfortunately, Lazlo soon discovers that virtually all of his friends are dead and thus he has nothing left to go back to. Indeed, on top of Fuji overdosing on heroin, Lazlo discovers the snail-covered corpse of Portier at the factory. Next to the Portier’s corpse is a sign telling Lazlo to tryout the dead man’s big experiment—the world-destroying sound machine that is supposed to be louder than the Big Bang—but when the protagonist turns the ambitious invention on, it malfunctions because a rat has eaten through one of the electrical wires. Needless to say, loser’s loser Lazlo realizes that all is lost and predictably goes back to mommy, who he is distressed to find lying unconscious at the bottom of the manor stairs. That night, Lazlo imagines himself strangling to death the man that ran over his mother—a virtual doppelgänger of the protagonist’s father (symbolically played by Hans Croiset, who also played Portier and is the brother of the actor that played Lazlo’s father)—while the chap pleads, “Prince, there goes your King. Stop dreaming, Junior.” Although dead, Portier also comes by the manor and informs Lazlo, who is adamant about not letting his undead friend in his house, that his mother’s accident was “The Big Bang.” After buying some pills from an Arab drug dealer and symbolically destroying his latest eagle mural by tossing a bucket of blood red paint on it, Lazlo is prepared to carry out his Mother’s wishes in regard to her upcoming birthday. Indeed, on the day of his Mother’s birthday, Lazlo carries her to a lavish room full of splendid pageantry, including 3,000 candles and roses, that resembles a high-camp funeral procession à la Daniel Schmid’s La Paloma (1974). After slow dancing with his mother, Lazlo gently lays her on a bed, pours a glass of champagne for her and himself, and puts two of the four pulls that he bought from the Arab dope dealer in her mouth with a truly deadly kiss. As it turns out, the letter that Mother handed Lazlo at the hospital towards the beginning of the film included specific instructions for a mother-son suicide pact reading, “Champagne and Mozart on my birthday. I love you too much. Your mother.” In the end, mother and son die beside one another in bed.

Notably, before he killed himself in late 1987 by taking pills just like those taken by the antihero of White Madness and walking into the waters of the Scheldt, Adriaan Ditvoorst had not spoken to his mother or family members in two decades. Like the Portier character of his film who attempted to build a machine louder than the Big Bang that would ultimately destroy all sound and ultimately the world, Ditvoorst was apparently looking for a sort of perennial silence as reflected in the suicide letter he mailed out his family members and friends reading: “When you read this, I will have entrusted my body to the waves. All is silence. There is nothing else.” Notably, a half a decade after Ditvoorst entrusted his body to the waves, White Madness star Thom Hoffman directed the quasi-avant-garde documentary De domeinen Ditvoorst (1992) aka The Ditvoorst Domains about the filmmaker and his rather troubled life as an uncompromising avant-garde auteur purist and born-anarchist who spent his entire life at odds with both the Dutch film world and society in general. The doc is highly insightful in that it makes it perfectly clear that White Madness was Ditvoorst’s final testament and the culmination of his life’s work and singularly cynical and pessimistic weltanschauung. Indeed, while Ditvoorst apparently opted to commit suicide partly because he could not find funding for his films, it is hard to imagine that the auteur would have been able to top his final work, which practically bleeds the director’s hopelessly forlorn soul and is certainly the crowning achievement and swansong of an artist that had decided to throw in the towel on life. Indeed, next to Ditvoorst, fellow ‘starving artist’ and world famous Dutch post-impressionist painter Vincent van Gogh (whose great-grandnephew Theo van Gogh incidentally appears in White Madness as a somnambulist-like junky) almost seems like a happy-go-lucky sort of guy. In my less than humble opinion, Ditvoorst is one of the few true artist heirs to van Gogh, just as Fassbinder once described his friend Werner Schroeter as a sort of heir to Comte de Lautréamont, albeit of the cinematic as opposed to literary realm. As once-controversial Dutch filmmaker Wim Verstappen (Blue Movie) remarks in The Ditvoorst Domains regarding Ditvoorst and the tragic failure of his singular filmmaking career: “If you do something well in Holland, you don’t get any credit.” Of course, it is hard to imagine that Ditvoorst would not commit suicide after watching a film as malignantly melancholy and idiosyncratically and elegantly morbid as White Madness. With the rather shocking recent suicide of a rather kind, caring, and seemingly always happy family friend who did not seem the least bit suicidal, I can only assume that a person that was so overtly miserable and forlorn as Ditvoorst was dying to die, with filmmaking being the only thing that gave him a reason to live, hence his remarks regarding White Madness: “Well, if things go wrong, I’ll be gone. I hate quarreling and nagging...But I never felt as happy with a film before. I feel like someone climbing a descending fire ladder...who keeps climbing, but never reaches the fire.” One can only hope that with his suicide, Ditvoorst was finally able to reach the fire.

WHITE MADNESS

-Ty E

CLASS OF 1984

Mark L. Lester (1982)

I love exploitation films that discredit their token moral code. Class of 1984 is an exploitation film that takes a 1980's look at the deterioration of public schools and the degeneracy so commonly practiced today. Class of 1984 is more relative today, but who cares about that? I enjoy the film for its extreme and offensive showmanship. I really hate the whole serious "empowering teacher" genre. Class of 1984 features a gang of criminals led by high school fuehrer Stegman. The gang runs drugs, hit jobs, and prostitution at the school. The gang meets their match in the form of a new good guy music teacher. This fellow can't handle seeing crime and subversion in the sacred grounds of a multicultural public school. Actor (who plays Stegman) Timothy van Patten went on to direct episodes of Sopranos (among other HBO shows). Michael J. Fox plays the role of a turd like music student (and ally of the music teacher). I was disappointed that Stegman's gang didn't finish off Fox's impotent character. Instead, one of Fox's friend takes drugs, climbs a flag pole, and finally falls to his death. Class of 1984 is a film that is no doubt fun for the whole family. Unfortunately for Troma, Class of 1984 puts Class of Nuke 'Em High to shame. It also makes me wonder if Lloyd Kaufman may have borrowed a couple ideas from the Class of 1984. The film is one of most impressive (if that is saying much) and well crafted exploitation to ever grace the screen of a downtown cum filled movie theater. I don't even want to think about what Lloyd Kaufman does when the lights go down in a public theater (or bathroom). Class of 1984 succeeds in making murder, rape, death, and drug use hilarious. I would much rather see that than some garbage intercity shit-fest centering around the dangers and problems regarding public schools. Public schools are only destined to further failure in the future. Why not laugh about it?

-Ty E

CLASS OF 1999
CLASS OF 1999

Mark L. Lester (1990)

Class of 1999 is the surprisingly excellent sequel to Mark L. Lester's exploitation masterpiece Class of 1984. The film is set in a time where American public schools are more of detention centers than places for teenagers to take in knowledge that will help them in life. That being said, Class of 1999 does reflect contemporary American schools to a certain degree. This time around, gangs aren't the biggest threat in school. A small group of three killer robots have now taken jobs at this public school wasteland. Both gangs featured in Class of 1999 wear outfits that put today's philo-homosexual Emo and Wigger play thugs to shame. Writer and director Mark L. Lester makes it known that subversive types of people reflect that their brains and sexual equipment are more than a little scattered through their choice of clothing. The film's hero and protagonist Cody Culp has just gotten out of jail and is ready to straighten his life out. That becomes a bit difficult for Cody when gang members try to rape his love interest and beat up his turd of a brother (played by Joshua John Miller). You know the world is a dangerous place when Malcom McDowell is the principle of a high school. The school is apparently titled Kennedy after the two Irish American brothers that offered promises for a new America, but just ended up getting assassinated. Ideological dreams of peaceful (and peace in general) diversity, collective harmony, and a world without crime have been confirmed fantasies in Class of 1999. This has also no doubt been proven the reality of contemporary America as the country has gone from global world power to the inevitable third world sewer that so-called liberals continue fighting like little girls for. The three killer robot teacher in Class of 1999 come in three forms: a stoic old white man, a middle aged bitchy black woman (played by Blaxploitation icon Pam Grier), and an asshole white jock. These three human engineered psychos have decided that any interruption to their orderly teaching must be dealt with via extermination. They can snap a neck faster than turning a page in a book. Eventually the students realize who their true enemy is and take action. If only kids in real public schools could put two and two together. Class of 1999 is an underrated work of exploitation filmmaking. In all honestly, I found Class of 1999 to be much more entertaining than any three films in the Terminator trilogy. The politically incorrect film is also one of the few more recent exploitation films that has any redeeming qualities (and it has a lot). I don't think that it would be an exaggeration to call Mark L. Lester a genius of exploitation filmmaking. Very few individuals can live up to such a title.

-Ty E

CANE TOADS: AN UNNATURAL HISTORY

Mark Lewis (1988)

This little ditty is a 47 minute short documentary of a bizarre nature. Directed in 1988 by Mark Lewis, this film has undoubtedly traveled a long way by word of mouth through classrooms of all kinds and featuring unforgettable interviewee's and many toad-vision moments (An attempted first person toad viewpoint) Rather than opening up with an introduction elaborating on the disposition of the Cane Toad, it opens up with a segment explaining the faults of man and the depth of a human idiocy that knows no end. It seems that during an outbreak of Cane Beetles (Bugs + Crops = Bad), some genius decided to import a hundred or so Cane Toads from their native land of Hawaii to Northern Queensland (Australia) As expected, his mathematical equations proved to be void when the fat toads couldn't reach the flying insects, and the once brilliant man became a staple in the ever-so present category of faulty pseudo-intellectuals who fucked shit up. See also: The Terminator Series. So these toads began massively breeding and began over taking the entire culture of Northern Queensland. This documentary features interviewee's who grew up through the Toad Revolution and what they think about this sore subject. We meet men who have an enormous stuttering problem. Actually, we just stay acquainted with him. It takes him about damn near 5 minutes to say a single goddamn sentence. We meet a guy who seems to act just like Hooper off of Jaws and explains a passionate story about his favorite cat biting one of these toads and dying. This man went into the woods with a pick axe and piked the hell out of it, causing it's poison discharge to strike him in the eye, thus blinding him for 6+ hours. We then meet a pedal-happy son-of-a-bitch who demonstrates one of his favorite hobbies by swerving all over the road, keeping a high score of how many of these blessed toads he can squish. We then take a fleeting look into people who actually love God's creatures. This one select old man begins to tear up and choke on his words talking about how much he loves to pet them, and feel them squish in his hands, and dress them up. Things certainly get weird in the down under. The male toads all share one thing; being a horny mother fucker. These toads practice an act that is called amplexus in the science circle. The male toads jump on top of the female toad, gripping his muscly toad arms in her side, forming a piggy-back ride sex position while she hops around and he ejaculates in the entire pond. I seriously lack the initiative to ever wade through a pond again. This documentary should be rated R for scenes of graphic toad sex and necrophilia. Yes, necrophilia. The camera caught sight of a very bizarre act - a cane toad fucking a dead cane toad. This toad was squashed in the middle of the road, and the horny bastard was going away at it like Will Smith on summer vacation. The documentary is split into a neutral viewpoint, allowing people to side with, or against the plague-like creatures. Cane Toads: An Unnatural History is a true to life "When Animals Attack!" film. If being a documentary on sex-crazed toad maniacs wasn't enough, this documentary also happens to give way for the most horrendous acts of singing on film, even showing a naked fat hairy man in the shower singing a folk song dedicated to these lazy creatures. Toads then break in through his window. A funny thing about this film, is that the wild-life footage is so seamlessly spliced in, that it gives the Cane Toads a significant boost in intelligence. I doubt these creatures could storm a house. The highlight of the film? A fucking toad ate a fucking mouse. I almost choked. These toads are not to be screwed with. Whether they poison your ass, or eat it, Australia is screwed. Let's hope these new ultraviolet and gene screwery works. Cane Toads: An Unnatural History is a fun documentary that doesn't stray away from the true story of bat-shit locals and old myths.

CANE TOADS: AN UNNATURAL HISTORY

-mAQ

CRANK: HIGH VOLTAGE

Mark Neveldine, Brian Taylor (2009)

We've seen this sort of competition before; genres duke it out all the time but never has a competitor been as fierce and unprovoked as Crank: High Voltage. Anticipating much, the sequel to the action bonanza Crank, which featured sex, guns, and sex, exploded instantly with an 8-bit letter to my heart depicting the final events of the first film in glorious old-school NES graphics which really grips a reign on the absurdist trophy this film extends its reach towards. I thought I had seen it all including the death of this so-called "absurdo-cinema" wave that was extinguished with the excruciating entries of both Feast 2: Sloppy Seconds and Feast 3: The Happy Finish. What a finisher it had been, momentarily not happy at all. With these film theories, evolution certainly takes place while initiating a free fall course of change. In Feast, the humor got too over its own head and slowly suffered and drowned until the egotistical director decided to lampoon his own lampooning. Complex this, complex that; the eventual ending of Crank left a brand on all who have seen it. These dire images of a helpless quest forces us to ask ourselves if his revenge tale was at all in vain. Of course after finding out the hint of a continuation, we allow the lore of Chev Chelios to be dissected rather prudishly with various flashbacks and an idea of his "Superman" status and the extents this raging man will go to secure his future sex life. Crank: High Voltage is a film I had been craving since my first fix back when the original piece was released to DVD. A simple image of Statham wielding a gun to a psychotropic washout explosion of reddish colors was my bargaining chip but upon further inspection, this piece of "intellectual" film based on lucid entertainment broadened my horizons in a major way. Entering with absolutely no expectations other than a seemingly Escape from New York plot progression ripoff, I was absolutely hammered with images of extreme chaos, nerve-shattering chase sequences, and endearing amounts of public display of genital affection. It should come as no surprise to any that have heard of the sequel that our main "hero," Chev Chelios, died (or so we thought) at the grand finale of this revolutionary wake-up call to action cinema. Within the marketing advertisements for the sequel, we discover that our friend is not dead but has been taken captive - again. This time, his heart is removed and in place is an electric heart. I'll skip the schematics and the scientific assets but in a nut shell, Chev Chelios needs electricity to survive in order to acquire his heart for correctional surgery. When Crank: High Voltage was given authentic life; a red-band trailer, a few images, and a teaser poster, I was blessed with dream-like images of Kaiju Chelios, hardcore vein-extraction in a family friendly habitat for ritualistic cinema indulgence, and an amount of profanities to build a fucking bomb shelter out of. Judging from these few samples of what was to come, I knew that the duo directing team behind the masterful original had been hard at work with a film that will surpass even their own limited expectations. Armed with 10 $1,000 HD mini-cams, this team worked with passive digression and a destructive vision of action cinema to create the holy grail of entertainment. I dub thee, Crank: High Voltage, the honor of being one of the most enormously engaging films of the past century and one of the few films that made me sick, not because of the outrageous moments of lenticular extremes, but the vulgar amount of obscenity transferred into any possible object containable with kinetic energy. Crank: High Voltage isn't just a "must see film," It's a goddamn infection that must be spread to every little boy or girl whether they be naughty or nice. Where do I begin on the aspect of the score that also serves as an sound effect board. The directing team decided to hire General Mike Patton for work on the score of Crank: High Voltage. If you can expect anything from the godfather of modern spazz-avant-garde, It is a damn remarkable score that keeps you enthralled while doing the past duty of the previous film by keeping your heart rate constantly accelerating with primitive beats and screeching whistles from he who can only be deemed as a musical genius. If it wasn't for this man's genius rendition of what a contemporary "Dogme 95" action film should sound like, I couldn't even imagine how dreary this flick would have sounded with the aid of a studio faucet like Hans Zimmer. Mike Patton is indeed welcome to any and all forms of gracious praise to cleverly aid this tongue-in-cheek hitman film to an era of films based on hired killers that doesn't center itself around a loathsome creature that is just Another Lonely Hitman. To boost the man's ego even more, I could consider the Crank: High Voltage score to be one of the more memorable ones. Watch in delight as Chelios breaks the "third wall" when he begins to whistle along Patton's score. Such delights have never before been captured on film. Crank: High Voltage feels like a breakthrough experiment in filmic "Cryptozoology": Something so rare that you'd never thought you would encounter in your natural life. It's not easy accepting the idea of Crank: High Voltage. Look at me, out of fear that our local theater wouldn't receive the film (which it didn't,) I began to have strenuous nightmares about the idea of never seeing a follow up to the original ending that needed more depth excavated into the instantly cult lore of top assassin Chev Chelios. To put it gingerly, Crank: High Voltage is a masterpiece of auteur action cinema destined for the gutter with regards to the modern sensibilities of most folks poisoned by "sexual repression." To make a film with no conditions of political-correctiveness and in turn reap the rewards of having the freedom to film whatever-the-fuck-you-want proved to ultimately be the resuscitation that the dying body of Chelios needed. After this riotous, raunchy film, I demanded more Crank. I need more to keep my own "Strawberry Tart" going. This is something I personally need to see through to it's bittersweet completion. Whether you're looking for lunch box/Kevin Costner jokes or simply to watch a mulatto receive a shotgun, greased up in oil, shoved up his ass with intentions to fire, Crank: High Voltage is an action film that will never backfire on you, only upset whatever vulnerabilities you might not be acquainted with. Out of all the films to need discretion warnings, Crank: High Voltage is the only one that matters. God only knows the strange impulses I've experienced after watching this cardiac arrest of cinema academia.

CRANK: HIGH VOLTAGE

-mAQ

THE MOTHMAN PROPHECIES
THE MOTHMAN PROPHECIES

Mark Pellington (2002)

Terror is an intimate subject. Many things can horrify someone; It's all dependent on one's personal fears and experiences. As i walk past the theater where Prom Night is being shown and hear the chorus of pre-teen girls screaming, I question modern horrors respect for the very feeling that gave birth to the genre. The Mothman Prophecies is a film that stands on it's own. While it is a modern work that slightly butchers the source material (John Keel; The Mothman Prophecies) I find this film to be in a league of its own. It was strong 10 years ago, and its still strong now. In fact, the film hasn't lost any of it's emotional impact. When i first saw this film, I was horrified. The levels of sound and the depth of the perception that is in every frame is astounding. If anything, this film should be hailed as a masterpiece of sound editing. After my initial viewing, i scoured the Internet searching for the stories that this film was based on. After finding a site, I began to read hundreds of case files, making notes of everything of interest. As i began to de-socialize from the real world, I Myself, became lost into this myth of a moth creature. The stories scared me more than the film because for once, I believed. After this, I went into a Cryptzoology stint. In West Virginia during the 60's, a Moth creature terrified the local populace. Many people began to create conspiracy theories and dig up of Indian curses put on the town. The fact is that these hard-working church-going people saw something otherworldly. It was also seen on the Silver Bridge during its collapse. Several scenes will terrify you, no matter who you are. The several with the enigma Indrid Cold and the camera trick mirror scene are just a few of the more memorable ones. The music is a mixture of ambiance and weird clicks & whistles synced with orchestral music. The boldest move of this film, is to not show the Mothman in the flesh. Due to various reports, nobody can have a true depiction of the creature. Science may debunk the creature, but things aren't always that simple. This film manages to embrace every thought of the unknown in such an abstract way that it presents itself as unsurpassed. The Mothman Prophecies is like an amazingly terrifying episode of The X-Files, but without the character development and sexual tension. After seeing this film, I desired nothing more than to visit Point Pleasant for myself and hope for a sighting. I for one, believe in the Mothman, more than i believe in most things.

-mAQ

I MELT WITH YOU

Mark Pellington (2011)

As far as I am concerned, one of the most repugnant contemporary trends in Hollywood is the so called “bromance” film, especially of the lowbrow pseudo-libertine comedic variety. The portmanteau term ‘bromance’ itself was apparently coined by Dave Carnie; the former editor-in-chief of the now-defunct and onetime-Larry Flynt publications-owned risqué skateboarding magazine Big Brother. Unsurprisingly, many of the quasi-carny Jackasses from the MTV show Jackass, including alpha-Jackass Johnny Knoxville himself, got their start exposing their genitals to live electrical currents via Big Brother. Like Johnny Knoxville and his erratic, angel-dust-fueled untermensch entourage, the seemingly homoerotic undertones of mock-male bromance, in the form of low-camp Hollywood party propaganda films, would eventually occupy the mostly vapid minds of the mainstream and further contribute to the full-fledged senseless and nihilistic hedonism that has now become a pronounced and never-ending rite-of-passage for desperate and horny teenage boys and middle-aged man-children alike. Indeed, bromance films seem to reflect and pathetically glorify a totally degenerate ‘eternal coming-of-age’ that is now undoubtedly typical of modern cosmopolitan Western (and especially American) man where traditional male ideals like physical and mental strength, stoicism, and spirituality are seen as a joy-killing ‘bummer’ and where an endless buffet of nugatory sex, drugs, and rock ‘n’ roll are the highest of ideals. Thankfully, I have only viewed a handful of these maniacally-conceived movie monstrosities, yet they have unfortunately left a deep enough impression on me to the degree where I unconsciously cringe in literal physical disgust at hearing the mere word ‘bromance.’ Last week, I had the opportunity to watch the film I Melt with You (2011) directed by Mark Pellington (The Mothman Prophecies); an anti-bromance film of sorts that ultimately delightfully demystifies, marvelously mutilates, and befittingly murders the retarded romance of the dreaded bromance.

In I Melt with You, a middle-aged foursome (played by Thomas Jane, Rob Lowe, Christian McKay, and Jeremy Piven) of former college friends/party boys reunite at a mansion in Big Sur, California and hopelessly attempt to relive their misspent youthful lifestyle of forgotten sex, numbing drugs, and redundant Rock ‘n’ Roll. From the beginning of the film, it is most apparent that these four men have become totally disenchanting with their youthful ideals and that their life-long bromance has significantly soured as a result. Most of these men also have a hard time relating to their former pals and can only seem to find collective solidarity in their commitment to rampant intoxication-based escapism, and overall bitterness and disappointment with life. To evade the glaring reality of their age, the miserable four even go as far as partying with a group of 20-somethings (one of which is played by porn-whore-turned-legit-hollywood-whore Sasha Grey) in a pathetic attempt to rekindle the spirit of their youth. Instead of forgetting about their undesirable physical maturity and failed lives, their disillusionment with their miserable existences is all the more highlighted and disastrously confirmed. The night after their unexpectedly insightful inter-age orgy, the ugliest member of fab four commits suicide not long after passively engaging in a bisexual threesome with two menacing youths, thus forcing the three remaining self-loathing neo-yuppies to weigh in the pros and cons of suicide. As you find out I Melt with You, the fabulous four made a suicide pact during their college years stating that if they failed in their idealistic, unrealistic life ambitions, they would all settle for mortal sin of suicide instead. After languishing through deplorable bromance fantasy-comedies like Todd Phillips' The Hangover (2008) and Steve Pink's Hot Tub Time Machine (2010), I came to the blatant conclusion that men who act so hedonistically as the characters featured in these films could only be as miserable as a homeless orthodox Jew accepting food charity from a Mormon temple. As far as I know, I Melt with You is the only film that realistically portrays the emasculated void that is the totally shallow, infinitely worthless, and intrinsically self-destructive, faux-male-comradie bromance. On top of honestly portraying the banal brotherly pseudo-love of bromance in loathing detail, I Melt with You is totally free of a typically compromised, happy holy-wood ending. To say anything more about the film would be an injustice to prospective viewers.

I MELT WITH YOU

In one particularly telling scene early on in I Melt with You, an old interview with Johnny Rotten of The Sex Pistols is voiced over images of domestic mundanity. Mr. Rotten quite matter-of-factly and unsentimentally admits that his goal with The Sex Pistols was to destroy Rock 'n' Roll, as he essentially feels that it has worn out its welcome and is nothing more than a repulsive anachronism. Of course, the formerly idealistic man-children of I Melt with You are indubitably Rock 'n' Roll casualties who fell prey to the golden calf of distorted electric guitars, free love and STDs, and the pseudo-transcendence of mind-altering controlled substances. The real tragedy of the four protagonists in I Melt with You is that it took them their entire adulthood to realize the utter bankruptcy and worthlessness of their fundamentally deleterious, self-obsessed ideals. Of course, mind-numbingly moronic, potty humor movies like The Hangover portray such barren lifestyles as something akin to magical mystery tours, but I guess that it is one such should expect from an era that likens redundant rock lyrics to the holy writ. Artistically, I Melt with You is far from exceptional, but it is a rare Hollywood film with a legitimate moral message that is not too preachy nor horribly contrived, but is told with a somewhat unique, therapeutic flair. I Melt with You also features a sometimes enjoyable, complimentary soundtrack with songs from Bauhaus, Adam & The Ants, The Sex Pistols, Pixies, The Jesus and Mary Chain, and, unsurprisingly, Modern English (doing a bastardized 2011 re-working of the hit 1982 song the film was named after) among others. If you're looking for a film that is a true "party crasher" and that is guaranteed to ruin everyone's buzz, pop I Melt with You into your dvd player and grin as you watch the smiles melt.

-Ty E

MARAUDERS
MARAUDERS

Mark Savage (1986)

On March 4th of the year 2009, I had commented on a pseudo-obituary posted by favorite blogger Phantom of Pulp in which he described his first encounter with a man named James, who they later became great friends and shared film thoughts under a pseudonym. I don't wish to repost his sentiments as they are strong in their own environment and context but I was moved by what Mark Savage had to say about his dearly departed friend. I wanted to offer something, words of encouragement, maybe telling him that everything is alright and that James went on to a better place but I couldn't bring these ideas to fruition and instead left a comment promising him I'd return later with a response. Two years later and I still haven't done that. But I have, however, viewed one of the main topics of his post, Mark Savage's debut feature Marauders (1986). Opening with snapshots of the several actors in what could be interpreted as a slideshow presentation of the "Golden Years", Marauders unfolds rather quickly with the casually intertwined mornings of two sociopaths. J.D. gets his early morning nutrients by killing his mother for getting the police involved with a shady deal and Emilio murders his girlfriend over a simple misunderstanding. Played wonderfully by Zero Montana and Colin Savage (brother to Mark), these two punks represent the dark-seed of society, a lot that Mark Savage admitted to have mingled with. Can you blame him? As Marauders will later indicate, violence is surely an infectious act that will dissolve morality quicker than sugar in coffee.

Now, one thing to understand are the budgetary restraints on Marauders. To quote Mark Savage - "made for a bag of peanuts". For this reason, Marauders is visually unstimulated and would be aptly remembered as a punk rock soap opera. These aren't huge concerns of mine as the storytelling remains solid and the roughness, in the end, grants Marauders with such nihilistic charm that it has pass over minimal complaints. After the initial bouts of violence, J.D. waits on the street corner for Emilio to pick him up in his green automobile. Meanwhile, a bloke named David is on the move to pick up a girl he has convinced he loves in order to rape her at his father's cabin. Their paths cross in a most unfortunate manner as J.D. moves to cross the street and gets clipped by the fast-moving red vehicle which, in turn, creates one of the greatest amateur stunts in an independent production seen yet. Modesty cannot mask this remarkable feat. Actor Zero Montana's implied injury had to have been real as the bumper makes direct contact with the side of his legs, sending him spiraling to the ground, shattering a bottle in his hand. Call it stunt-work or youthful ignorance, Zero Montana could not have possibly walked away from that scene unscathed. Following the hit-and-run is what eventually boils into the exploitation meat of Marauders, the consequential forming of a lynch mob to take down these boys who know no innocence.

The reign of terror committed by these teenagers includes such irrationality as thieving (which my youth succumbed to) and deceiving women with intent towards molestation. Playing David's hopeful mistress for the weekend, Becky, is Megan Napier. Becky's character seems to be chastity personified, even going as far as gushing sweet nothings into David's ear via phone while he's in bed with two other women. This marks a definite sadness as Becky is just a little girl existing in a world of twitching members. Her virginal sanctitude has an expiration date but it hopefully isn't today. For a truly humorous and cheap thrill, rival her performance of high school sweetheart with her short role in Beyond the Pale in which she swallows the load of a character beaten and burned unconscious. I always found Mark Savage to be a brother in regards to fetish and film and this scene, no, these shorts, cement this notion. Sadly, Marauders seems to suffer a drought from his trademark eroticism, albeit containing handgun irrumatio and a brief scene of rape. What really compliments these scenes of teenage hysteria is the performance of Colin Savage as Emilio. Zero Montana as J.D. represents the "beautiful" side of carnage, with what, his pretty-boy looks. Colin Savage's rude and lavish conservative punk demeanor plays off perfectly the vile side of the original marauders. Emilio is, for certain, the alpha dog of the duo and proves this during a scrappy test of friendship with the obligatory "loveyou" blows.

Marauders is certainly a calculated film. Opening with high-class and thought behind each shot, the result of careful calculation, Marauders soon boils into hectic tracking through an Australian forest as the film culminates into a violent explosion baring a high body count. In a sentence, Marauders can be summarized as a tale of two boys, far from home, angering the locals to the point of inciting citizenry into the titular "marauders". This unsurmisable hatred stems from the appearance of J.D., Emilio, and David onto these townsfolk's stomping grounds. This line of aggression is cast once these embers of oppression roar to life. It isn't just the naivety of J.D. or Emilio. No, David is also guilty of stealing a car and with intent to victimize a young girl. David will unwillingly become martyred by the script of Marauders and during the short solidarity of these three young adults, show you that J.D. and Emilio are, without facade, scared teenagers in a world that has finally to bite back. If justice existed in the world and finances were as they are uncommonly considered - scraps of paper - then perhaps this perfect world would give Mark Savage carte blanche as for his erotic grandeur be told the world over. Marauders is a labor of love; a work that can be attested to stemming from early shorts of Mark Savage's - particularly one titled The Violent Years - though that short contains Colin Savage in a similarly "savage" role, thematically it is worlds apart. The films of Mark Savage are rough diamonds to behold and his early short films are "Kern" without Kern influence. With Marauders in tow and the death of James heavy on my mind, it is no surprise as to why James admired Marauders so and with my long-standing promise of returning sentiments towards the unfair collection of a fellow cinephile, I present my review of Marauders - dedicated to James and the legacy of fertilecelluloid.

MARAUDERS

-mAQ

DEFENCELESS: A BLOOD SYMPHONY

Mark Savage (2004)

Usually, I refrain from watching any horror film that was created via digital video. In my less than humble opinion, digital video has unfortunately given a voice to people who have nothing to say. In the past, filmmaking was a labor extensive procedure even in regard to low-budget filmmaking, thus precluding less serious individuals from attempting to make films. Of course, there are obviously positive aspects to digital video, as some genuine artists have successfully created fantastic works out of the seemingly schlocky format. For instance, Russian auteur Andrey Iskanov has already created an admirable body of innovative work during his relatively short filmmaking career, taking digital video into dark realms that I would have never imagined possible considering the home-video-like aesthetic generally associated with the format. Recently, I had the pleasure of watching Mark Savage's Defenceless: A Blood Symphony (2004) - a delectable digital video work that successfully combines macabre moments of vengeance inspired castration and blissfully serene family beach scenes. As advertised in the title, Defenceless is indeed a bloody symphony - featuring no dialogue, but instead - a strictly classical music based soundtrack that highlights every memorable movement made by the characters in the film. In fact, it seems like the film's female protagonist is conducting the cinematic symphony as she gracefully, yet violently waves a knife at her former tormentors.

Like I Spit on Your Grave (1978) and Thriller - A Cruel Picture (1973) before it, Defenceless: A Blood Symphony is a revenge film about a broken, bruised, and ultimately brutalized (yet beautiful) woman who takes warranted vengeance against a trio of men that had previously sadistically ravaged her - unflinchingly killing them off one-by-one during the final act of this extravagant exercise in cinematic violence. Unlike most female protagonists in revenge films before it, the luscious lady that stars in Defenceless: A Blood Symphony brings a certain authenticity and realism to the her role that is quite rare for such a work. In fact, "the woman" (played by the beautiful and talented novice actress Susanne Hausschmid) resembles a barbaric Viking broad expressing blood-lust during an unfulfilling and ultimately unfruitful mating season. Defenceless: A Blood Symphony is a film that brings poetry to murderous scenarios that are seemingly unpoetical - no small feat successfully accomplished by Aussie auteur Mark Savage. Indeed, Mr. Savage was blessed with a fitting surname - as Defenceless: A Blood Symphony portrays humans at their most depraved - where the distinctly human characteristic of rationality is obsolete. The classical musical contained throughout Defenceless: A Blood Symphony brings a certain irony to the film that is comparable to Stanley Kubrick's use of Ludwig Van Beethoven in A Clockwork Orange. Despite the fact that Europe gave the world the most complicated musical compositions and the greatest genius composers; the same continent also gave the world its most deadly wars. In Defenceless: A Blood Symphony, the most culturally refined aspects of European culture are met with the most destructively archaic. For this reason - like the films of Jörg Buttgerit - Defenceless: A Blood Symphony will most likely offend pretentious Art House film fans and bore braindead gorehounds - as it is an ambitious work taking influence from both high-class cinema and the most violent of exploitation flicks.

DEFENCELESS: A BLOOD SYMPHONY

After having read Mark Savage's excellent cinema-obsessed blog (Phantom of Pulp) over the years and finally seeing his film Defenceless: A Blood Symphony, it is apparent to me that he is a filmmaker's filmmaker and an eclectic cinephile (in the truest sense of the word). In my opinion, cinema is primarily a visual art as proven by the still powerful (yet nearly a century old) silent works of F.W. Murnau and Carl Th. Dreyer. Thus, despite lacking dialogue, Defenceless: A Blood Symphony is a truly cinematic (albeit, in the digital video format) work that never wallows in banality nor languishes in repetitive gore. On top of featuring impeccable camerawork and top notch direction, every second of Defenceless: A Blood Symphony is perfectly accentuated by the film's classical music score. Unfortunately, you won't likely find Defenceless: A Blood Symphony in the horror section of your local video store nor playing at an independent movie theater in the big city, for the film is only appealing to an elite type of cinephile; the oh-so rare cine-maniac - who likes to indulge in an almost nonexistent breed of film - the sadistic Art House flick - an unrecognized non-genre where few filmgoers have gone before. If you're one of those rare individuals that can find beauty in blood and comfort in a cinematic galore of gore, Defenceless: A Blood Symphony is a film that will fulfill your discerning cinematic appetite like never afore.

-Ty E

DIE REISE

Markus Imhoof (1986)

From the anarcho-mystic heimat flicks of Werner Herzog to the nasty melodramas of Rainer Werner Fassbinder to the fierce feminist flicks of Helma Sanders-Brahms, German New Cinema was littered with melancholy films about a father-less nation that could not forgive the fathers of the Fatherland for siding with Aryan fascism. Despite being technically a Swiss flick, Die Reise (1986) aka The Journey directed by Markus Imhoof (Das Boot ist voll AKA The Boat Is Full, More Than Honey) is easily one of the most heavy hitting and no nonsense portrayals about how the lost children of the National Socialist generation grew up to be anti-patriarchal/anti-authoritarian far-leftists who went so far as getting involved with murderous terrorism and guerilla warfare and even almost plunging economically prosperous West Germany into a civil war. Based on German student movement activist Bernward Vesper's popular autobiographical 1977 novel of the same name, which has been described in Deutschland as "inheritance of a whole generation," Die Reise is a devastating tale about a young man practically born foredoomed as the son of an infamous Nazi poet and would ultimately grow up to be his father's personal and ideological enemy, thereupon symbolizing Germany's sort of collective Oedipus complex during the late-1960s/early-1970s as a nation full of prodigal sons and feminist daughters. The girlfriend/baby-daddy of lady terrorist and Red Army Faction co-founder Gudrun Ensslin, Bernward Vesper ultimately lost his loony leftist lady love when she met her partner-in-crime Andreas Baader and in Die Reise one watches as the son-of-a-nazi-poet steals his son from his terrorist ex-girlfriend and goes on an anti-nostalgic road trip around Europa that makes Jack Kerouac's On the Road (1957) seem like the retarded ramblings of a hipster reject. Although portraying neither Vesper nor members of the RAF as heroes, Die Reise—a work directed by a man known for directing an ethno-masochistic holocaust flick entitled The Boat is Full implicating his fellow Swiss countrymen as crypto-Nazis and Jew-baiters—takes more than a couple artistic liberties when depicting history, portraying the protagonist father, Will Vesper, as a heinous Hitlerite tyrant who disowned his own son when he started dating Gudrun Ensslin. In reality, both Bernward Vesper and his girlfriend tried in vain to get a collection of the senior Vesper's works published. While adopting his father's ardent anti-Americanism and talent for literature, Vesper resented the fact his father went from being a popular Nazi poet and literary critic to a 'respectable' mainstream conservative and supporter of West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, hence his adoption of radical leftwing causes as a member of the 68er-Bewegung (aka German student movement). Although not depicting said suicide (he committed suicide in 1971 via sleeping pills after being sent to a mental institution), Die Reise essentially portrays the slow burning self-destructive and inevitable self-slaughter of a man that had the grand misfortune of being the forsaken son of a völkisch literary 'war criminal.'

DIE REISE

Being a miserable melancholy man whose father has totally disowned him and whose terrorist fiancé left him for a criminally-inclined terrorist hunk, German student activist Bertram Voss (Markus Boysen)—a character based on Bernward Vesper—has nothing to lose except his son Florian (Alexander Mehner), so he kidnaps said son from a Sicilian beach where his terrorist girlfriend Dagmar (Corinna Kirchhoff), who is a character based on Gudrun Ensslin, is plotting the next act of idiotic guerilla warfare with her RAF buddies. Considering the last time they spoke, Bertram's father (Will Quadflieg) stated, "I no longer have a son" and forbid him from attending his funeral, he wants to develop a strong and loving relationship with his kid Florian, even if he has to kidnap him to do so. As revealed through a series of unsettling flashbacks, Bertram's life essentially took a turn for the worse while he was still a young lad when the Third Reich was defeated and his luxurious family home was taken over by a multicultural platoon of barbaric American GIs. To battle the degenerate jazz and swing music of the occupiers, Father Voss teaches his son to respect German classical music, using, "Our last weapon. Our culture" as a means to drown out American negro music. While just a wee lad in school, Bertram's schoolteacher ordered the entire class to rip out pages from a book featuring his father's poetry due to his nationalistic tone, thus embarrassing the boy in front of his entire class and forcing him to publicly disgrace his dear daddy. Apparently, the teacher could not stomach Vater Voss' völkisch words, "We are all related through blood and earth. We all plough the same land. We fight with the same sword for our soil, home and hearth!," so he also forces Bertram to put the pages of his pa's poetry in the school bathroom to literally be used as toilet paper. When Voss senior discovers that his poetry has been ripped out of Bertram's schoolbook, he bans the entire Voss family from speaking to the already emotionally brutalized boy. When father Voss does eventually speak to Bertram, he condemns his son for secretly owning a pet cat, absurdly stating regarding the antisocial behavior of felines, "Cats cannot be trained or integrated into a community. They are an unpredictable, oriental race. Semitic animals," so naturally the pet kitty is slaughtered in a less than kosher fashion. When Bertram grows up to become a promising student of German studies and sociology, he impregnates his girlfriend Dagmar—the left-leaning daughter of a pastor who is not too keen on the writings and ideas of Voss senior—and the two decide to not abort the baby and when the child is actually born, they prove to be responsible parents by taking their infant son to violent protests. When Bertram eventually brings his girlfriend to his family's home to meet his parents, a heated argument breaks out regarding the Vietnam War and the holocaust. Of course, Vater Voss does not believe in the holocaust and couldn't care less how many gooks have been slaughtered, which rather upsets lady Dagmar. Not surprisingly, Bertram breaks all contact with his father, stating to his papa, “I never had a father” as his father states, “I no longer have a son.” Unfortunately, in between criminal anti-Vietnam protests, Dagmar falls in love at first sight with a young revolutionary named Schröder (Claude-Oliver Rudolph)—a character based on counter-cultural criminal and rock star terrorist Andreas Baader—and drops Bertram like a bad Bolshevik. While driving across country and attempting to evade authorities, Bertram tells his son Florian about his less than ideal child, but the young father and young son manage to bond like a true father-son relationship should be. In the end, Bertram takes Florian to the house where he grew up and in the end, Gestapo-like cops capture the fugitive father, thus inspiring his son to bite the hand of cop in a symbolic gesture of generational rebellion against the capitalist state.

Rather paradoxically (or not so considering the context) while watching Die Reise, one comes to the conclusion that the protagonist did not merely adopt a far-left political persuasion to spite his father as a sort of archetypal prodigal son, but to also carry on his legacy as a stern anti-American who refuses to recognize barbarian Uncle Sam as his lord and savior, thus denying America's self-proclaimed role as 'liberators' of Germany during the Second World War. In terms of the tragic circumstances surrounding his youth and dubious relationship with his father, Bernward Vesper was a sort of Teutonic William S. Burroughs, Jr. who could not keep up with his father's literary output and infamy, thus opting for self-destruction instead, which ironically helped to popularize his novel Die Reise and mystify his legacy as a kraut counter-culture figure. While not exactly the most innovative and aesthetically pleasing film ever made, Die Reise is certainly one of the best and most insightful cinematic depictions of how the Nazi generation spawned seemingly politically schizophrenic children who absurdly adopted kosher forms of class warfare, ultimately waging both figurative and literal war against the father and the Fatherland and sending West Germany into social chaos not seen since the days of street fights between communists and brownshirts during the Weimar Republic. Unlike Uli Edel's The Baader Meinhof Complex (2008), which portrays the members of the RAF as romantic rock stars who were too cool for school, Imhoof's Die Reise portrays Gudrun Ensslin and Andreas Baader as sort of idealistic idiots who had no business raising children, let alone running a revolution and creating a commie 'utopia,' thus making Bernward Vesper seem like an alright father in retrospect, even if he kidnapped his own son and committed suicide in the end, making his son a bastard in the process. Of course, it is rather ridiculous that Vesper ever became a role model for anyone, but at least his book Die Reise was able to express what an entire generation of Germans would not and could not say. In a country that produced Thomas Harlan (Torre Bela, Wundkanal)—the son of National Socialist auteur Veit Harlan, who directed such melodramatic high-camp masterpieces as Jud Süß (1940) and Opfergang (1944)—a mixed-up Marxist fool and friend of Klaus Kinski (the two friends once made a pilgrimage to Israel) who spent his entire lackluster filmmaking career denigrating the legacy of both his father and fatherland as depicted in the documentary Harlan: In the Shadow of Jew Süss (2008), it should be no surprise that it took a Swiss auteur filmmaker to create a film so revealing as Die Reise, a cinematic work that is contrary to everything that Hebraic Hollywood has taught us about both fatherhood and the fatherland.

DIE REISE

-Ty E

MICHAEL

Markus Schleinzer (2011)

There are few members of the human race as worthy of contempt as the pedophile, and no I'm not going to go on a rant about the well-documented effect childhood sexual abuse has on the individual or society as a whole. Rather, I disagree with pedophilia on grounds of (a) it is arrested development taken to its most pathetic extreme and (b) why would ANYONE want to fuck a kid? Pedophilia to me is the most extreme form of social retardation, in which a delusional man-child who has not spent enough time with actual children to realize that however intermittently amusing they may be from time to time, kids are iron-willed little shits with terrible hygiene, awful taste, and precious little life experience (duh), or who has spent plenty of time with kids and finds the above qualities boner-inducing. Sure, there are plenty of why's, often pointing to abuse in the pedo's own childhood, but do we weep in sympathy when we see a thirty year old man decked out in Spiderman PJ's playing Xbox in his parent's basement? A pedophile is essentially that guy, only instead of trying to grasp onto childhood via video games or buying seasons of beloved Saturday morning Hanna-Barbera shitfests on Blu-Ray, he tries to re-live the sexual excitement of playing "house" for the first time.

You see, most of us at some point or another, have better, wetter, and altogether more satisfying sexual experiences when we "put away the childish things" and make our way through high school and into the early years of adulthood. This is when the human being of either sex is both at peak physical form AND often blissfully unaware of the power they wield over interested parties, thus enabling schlubs like us to experience the divinity of silky smooth skin, taut firm breasts, rock-hard boners and abs, and the incomparable beauty of age-appropriate braces. This is why "teen" is probably the most popular category of pornography, at least in terms of search results. Pedophiles, I'd say, tend to be those who missed out on some of those pivotal experiences and continued to fixate on the only sexual experiences they've had, be it playing house with their sister or showering with pops. Of course, I'm sure some pedophiles are such without rhyme and reason, and that wanting to fuck someone who in a year or two will be of no interest to them sexually (sounds like most relationships, though, but I digress) is an "orientation", though only in as far as a rapist could claim that donning a ski mask is a part of his "orientation", and something to take pride in. However fringe, there are groups like Nambla (Ginsberg dug 'em) and "activists" like Lindsay Ashford who attempt to put a "human face" on the affliction- a pasty, doesn't-get-out-much, relies on checks from mom, collects Star Wars memorabilia face, but a face nonetheless. Guys who take great care in stressing that somehow being a "girl lover" or someday-diddler of boys doesn't translate into being a "molester", and that often feel isolated from society at large, ostracized for their "beliefs", and as a result, are often suicidal. On the flip side are parents groups, the media, and politicians, who use the fear of these failures to rally the public into all kinds of hysterics. Just look at all of the "ritual abuse" at daycares in the eighties, in which prosecutors, law enforcement, and bewildered kids worked themselves into a frenzy and used the mere spectre of childhood sexual abuse to send countless innocent people to prison, people who no doubt could not understand what the fuck was going on. Who would want to "schtup" one of those little snottoses anyways?

MICHAEL

Which brings us to Michael, an Austrian film that neither weeps for the titular pedo nor works itself into hysterics over its subject matter- five months in the life of man who keeps a young boy locked in his basement as a sex slave. Michael is in many ways the textbook pedophile- a fairly immature man-child, isolated from society because of his compulsions, but still managing to shuck and jive his way through an office job, some strained "surface level" friendships, and keeping the family at bay with tales of a long-distance girlfriend. Michael Fuith, with his shy, nerdy countenance, male pattern hair loss, and pale "doesn't get out much" complexion, is dead-on in the title role. Where Michael differs from many pedophiles is that, rather than simply beating off to Tiger Beats in view of playgrounds or offering to babysit his sister's kids, Michael has himself his very own Wolfgang (a heartbreaking performance by David Rauchenberger), a ten-year old boy kept locked in the basement of his state-of-the-art flat. The film is an extreme exercise, not in terms of the specifics of what is shown onscreen (in fact, there is not a single scene of molestation in the entire film, and the only questionable moment- of Michael exposing a non-plussed Wolfgang to his flaccid penis- was achieved via split screen), but in restraint, giving us only enough details to figure out what Michael is foisting on the young boy (seeing Michael, in an earlier scene, wash said cock in the sink after leaving Wolfgang's lodgings is the first overt reference to what precisely is going on). Director Markus Schleizer, a long-time casting director for Michael Haneke, takes the cold, clinical ambiance of his mentor's best films to new heights, refusing to cut the audience any slack through lazy moralizing. Nor does he attempt to instill outrage by assaulting our senses with any over-the-top imagery whatsoever, instead cultivating a thick blanket of unease via static camera non-movement and letting subtly unsettling moments linger uncomfortably throughout and letting our own imaginations add the necessary pathos and horror to Wolfgang's situation.

As the film wears on, a surprising amount of jet-black humor enters the fray. Rather than view Michael as an 'stache-twiddling super villain, we are treated to the site of a pathetic sociopath whose life outside of his fuck slave is one sad encounter after another, whether it be painful attempts to connect with other men on a ski trip, a particularly humiliating go at having sex with an adult woman, or having to dodge the advances of a smitten co-worker. As his exterior life continues to be awkward and ungratifying, Wolfgang begins to fight back, first by attacking Michael's idealized view of their relationship (such as giving Michael a crayon drawing of a mommy and daddy for Christmas), and then by physically attempting to put up a resistance to Michael's advances and planning his escape. Michael, with no idea of how to treat a child aside from as a sexual object, meets these road-bumps with physical aggression, condescension, and eventually, in a scene that rides the creepy/comedy divide expertly, by attempting to kidnap Wolfgang a companion to assuage the boy's loneliness (and no doubt replace Wolfgang, as in one chilling scene of misdirection we see Michael clearing a spot in the woods when Wolfgang exhibits a high fever that Michael, understandably, can't seek medical attention for). The film also skirts the thin line between tragedy and hilarity in a scene resulting from Wolfgang's fever, when Michael, walking to a pharmacy, is struck by a vehicle. The absurdity of the situation is drawn to almost painful suspense as we witness Michael's extended hospital stay, all the while wondering what is becoming of the ill Wolfgang, hanging on to life in the basement.

Michael is as bold an achievement as I've seen in the cinemas all year. The effect it has on the viewer is not unlike that of Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer in the way it respects us, the audience, enough to show the realities of a resolutely unsympathetic, destructive main character without having to beat us over the head with how evil and disgusting he is. And unlike a comparatively "Hollywood" flick like The Woodsman, there isn't some underlying message about "kidfuckers are people, too." What we're given is a reality that is experienced by unlucky nephews, altar boys, and Thai pre-teen "sex workers" on a daily basis, from a purely objective standpoint. Sure, we see the terrible effect this has on the defeated Wolfgang, whose tears mean next-to-nothing to his bulge-stroking captor, but Schleizer trusts us to draw our own revulsion from his plight without having to rely on any showy speeches or risqué imagery, and when the boy does strike out and become insolent, I for the only time in my adult life found myself rooting for a kid to be as annoying and "difficult" as possible. As the film nears its end, unexpected occurrences foreshadowed earlier on ratchet up the tension considerably, creating a true-to-life horror film with none of the familiar trappings of the genre. Watching it with an audience was definitely an experience, as groans and often showy "need to convince others around me of how horrible I find this" gasps gave way to nervous chuckles, then outright laughter, then further groans, and in the ending scenes, a tension-enhancing hush that made it all the harder to bear. All in all, a masterpiece that I won't be revisiting any time soon, and one of the only films to examine this particular subject matter with honesty and candor.

-Jon-Christian

SUGAR BREAD AND WHIP
SUGAR BREAD AND WHIP

Marran Gosov (1968)

It must suck to be an enterprising young auteur filmmaker with a seemingly bright future who rejects a young man's application for becoming your meager assistant director, only for that young man to later not only become more popular than you, but also the most popular, successful, and important filmmaker of your zeitgeist. Indeed, that is exactly what happened to German auteur Marran Gosov (Angel Baby, Wonnekloß), who probably had no idea that the young whippersnapper that wanted to be his AD, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, would go on to become the most important filmmaker of the post-WWII era and that his career would more or less fall apart during the early 1970s. The progeny of a Bulgarian father and a German mother (his birth name is "Tzvetan Marangosoff") who originally wanted to be a painter but discovered that he enjoyed writing even more after penning a novel in prison after clashing with the commie Bulgarian government, Gosov relocated to West Germany in April 1960, in part due to his loathing of Soviet style Marxist authoritarianism, and eventually settled in Munich in 1964 where he directed the first of no less than 27 short films which he would make between 1964 and 1978. While most revered in the filmmaking world for his shorts (none of which are currently available anywhere, even in Germany, and can only be seen when they are occasionally shown in large German cities), Gosov also made an initially fruitful attempt at commercial filmmaking, ultimately directing five feature films, beginning with Engelchen - oder die Jungfrau von Bamberg (1968) aka Angel Baby, which was an extended reworking of the director's short Sabine 18 (1967) about a little lady who wants to lose her virginity in a desperate attempt to win back her ex-boyfriend(!) and was a surprise hit, and concluding with Wonnekloß (1972) aka Spiel mit Bulle, which was a huge flop that the auteur made the mistake of funding mostly with his own private savings. Thanks to a certain Nuremberg-based cinephile, who also provided what little info I was able to find on the filmmaker, I was recently able to see Gosov's second feature Zuckerbrot und Peitsche (1968) aka Sugar Bread and Whip aka Gangster Love which, like the director's first feature Angel Baby and the third feature The Sex Adventures of a Single Man (1968) aka Bengelchen liebt kreuz und quer, was produced by prolific Dutch producer Rob Houwer, who is probably best known for producing the pre-Hollywood arthouse works of Paul Verhoeven like Turkish Delight (1973), Soldier of Orange (1977), and The Fourth Man (1983), and who also produced important New German Cinema works like Peter Fleischmann's anti-Heimat flick Hunting Scenes from Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdszenen aus Niederbayern and Mike Verhoeven's undeniably amateurish yet gritty anti-Vietnam War artsploitation flick O.K. (1970) featuring Fassbinder superstar Eva Mattes portraying a raped and murdered gook gal.

Like his comrade Klaus Lemke (who appeared in Sabine 18 and whose screenplay Gosov reworked for his fourth feature Der Kerl liebt mich - und das soll ich glauben?), Gosov belonged to the largely forgotten 'New Munich Group', which was eventually eclipsed by New German Cinema, even though the former would influence filmmakers involved with the latter (especially Fassbinder, whose debut 1969 feature Love Is Colder Than Death is blatantly influenced by the NMG genre-warping style), with Sugar Bread and Whip being 'typical' of the movement as an overtly offbeat genre-defiling (anti)gangster flick set in a late-1960s 'Swinging Munich' backdrop of jaded jet-set degeneracy, darkly humorous libertine criminality, and doomful absurdist (anti)romance. Starring actor and fellow New Munich Group auteur Roger Fritz (Mädchen, Mädchen aka Girls, Girls, Mädchen... nur mit Gewalt aka The Brutes)—a handsome fellow that once resembled a sort of Teutonic Joe Dallesandro, except much taller, who is probably best known to American filmgoers for playing the treacherous mustached crypto-cocksucker traitor Lieutenant Triebig in Sam Peckinpah's The Cross of Iron (1977)—and the star's then real-life wife Helga Anders (Vojtech Jasný's 1976 Heinrich Böll adaptation Ansichten eines Clowns aka Clowns), Sugar Bread and Whip is the darkly mirthful and audaciously absurd yet melancholic and Weltschmerz-rattled tale of a disillusioned cigarette ad model turned amateur drug dealer and murderous jewelry store robber who has a doomed fleeting romance with a young rich bitch of a fiercely frigid femme fatale with a reluctantly self-cuckolded husband who gets off to the idea of his much younger wife blowing other men, though he would never actually admit it. A film that will appeal to gangster film lovers and haters alike (personally, I couldn't care less about the subgenre), Gosov's film is a potent reminder of how a bunch of relatively unknown Bavarian quasi-avant-gardists beat commie frog fanboy Jean-Luc Godard at his own game in terms of defiling and molesting Hollywood genre conventions.

Opening with a "pop art" montage of the antihero Roger Klaus (Roger Fritz) shooting his machinegun and then succumbing to imaginary bullets in an intentionally superficial and satirical advertisement-like scenario where the character's robotic body movements resemble that of a mannequin in stop-motion, Sugar Bread and Whip immediately establishes an absurdist anti-realist tone that disguises a sort of foreboding melancholia that is just beneath the surface. The opening credit montage concludes with the revelation that "Even dead men smoke." Indeed, Roger is a super suave but equally somber iconic model of a popular cigarette brand called "Top Ten," though he personally likes to roll his own cigs, which he does before committing robberies. Roger became a robber after becoming fed up with the fact that he is featured in ads with fancy cars and villas yet he does not actually own these status symbols in real-life, thus he has taken it upon himself to obtain his own Bavarian version of the American dream. As a hashish abuser, Roger may have also had the idea to start strong-arming jewelry stores and banks after suffering some sort of drug psychosis. At the beginning of the film, Roger enters a jewelry store while sporting a trench coat and ski mask, smashes all the glass display cases, steals all the best jewelry, and then shoots the store clerk when he makes the mistake of attempting to press the emergency alarm. The robbery is witnessed by a spoiled and sexually frigid pixie-like broad named Helga Arnold (Helga Anders), who lies to the police and tells them that the robber hit her while withholding the fact that said robber dropped a small musical instrument, which she decides to keep as a souvenir. Helga is married to a stinking rich art dealer/gallery owner named Robert Arnold (actor and sometimes TV director Harald Leipnitz of the 1965 Kraut-Yugoslav western The Oil Prince aka Der Ölprinz and exploitation trash like Franz Antel's "Sexy Susan" series), with whom she bore a young lederhosen-adorned son that she rarely acknowledges aside from when she is giving violent puppet shows inspired by Roger's robberies. Since hubby Robert, who seems more interested in seeing his spouse being defiled by other men than doing the job himself, will not have sex with her, Helga derives most of her pleasure from playing with her beloved tortoise Markus, whose shell she likes petting while she is lying naked on a fancy fur rug. It does not take Helga long to realize that she also derives pleasure from seeing Roger commit blood-splattered bank robberies.

SUGAR BREAD AND WHIP

When not shooting cigarette advertisements where he declares "Love the French way, smoke the English way" and avoiding two gangster brothers, scar-faced sadiſt Jörg (Jörg Jung of Roland Klick's brutal 1968 cult classic Bübchen and Hans W. Geissendörfer's 1970 'anti-Heimat' Dracula reworking Jonathan) and big buffoon Helmut (Helmut Hanke), Roger is attempting to bang Helga, who is aroused by his criminality but is too much of a spoiled ice queen to let the model turned coldblooded murderer penetrate her posh pussy. Meanwhile, Helga's husband Robert seems to be taking as much interest in his wife's non-romance with Roger as she does. The closest Roger even comes to sharing carnal knowledge with Helga is slapping her on the face and feeling up her tits while she 'attends' his various robberies, where the model/murderer senselessly kills at least one person because he knows it turns on his would-be ladylove. Meanwhile, Roger literally and figuratively dodges the bullets of the two gangster brothers who want revenge against the cigarette model for killing their third brother. Apparently, the gangster family began stalking Roger after he confronted the men because they owed him money for 50,000 marks worth of hashish he fronted to them and killed one of the brothers after brother Jörg began shooting at him. As a result of 'scarface' Jörg's erratic behavior, Roger also ends up killing brother Helmut in a parking garage shootout after the brother makes the mistake of shooting at the model while he has a gun pointed at the fat bro's head. Notably, two young cap-gun-wielding preteen brothers witness the shootout in a scenario that seems to highlight the fact that gangsters live in a perpetual state of childhood.

Eventually, Roger gets tired of Helga's perennial cockteasing, calls her a "little

bitch,” and tells her to fuck off. Of course, that does not stop Helga’s husband Robert from hounding Roger after seeing his wife getting all hot and bothered while watching the murderous model mug one man and shoot another. Just to fuck with Robert, Roger lies and tells him that he has been screwing Helga when he asks, which ultimately turns the art dealer on so much that he goes home and screws his wife while asking her for details about her nonexistent extramarital affair. Although too seemingly borderline retarded to be a successful femme fatale (her hubby does not call her a “bird brain” for nothing), Helga comes up with a plan to get away from her husband and run away with Roger. After attempting to make up with Roger by telling him “I like you,” Helga reveals that her husband is having a big gallery showing that will be attended by various wealthy politicians and industrialists and their wives. While proclaiming to Helga that he has quit the armed robbery trade and is planning to move to England where he will make a living continuing to model, Roger shows up to the art show in his trademark ski mask, robs all the patrons, and shoots Robert dead when he makes a pathetic and rather anticlimactic attempt to stop him. Before being blown away with a machine-gun, Robert demonstrates ‘Entartete Kunst’ is once again vogue in Germany by giving a speech on the so-called “art of the fantastic” and and Swiss-German painter Paul Klee (whose use of dry humor seems to have influenced auteur Gosov). Upon getting in his getaway car after the robbery, Roger finds Helga sitting in the passenger seat and while the two are almost gunned down by surviving gangster brother Jörg, the two go home and finally commence coitus in what should be a happy ending. Of course, since Roger has yet to obtain passports to get him and his ladylove out of the country, the two still have plenty of time for their budding love affair to be destroyed by the last remaining gangster, Jörg. After proclaiming their “like” for one another, Helga leaves Roger’s flat and discovers a newspaper about her husband’s death in the art gallery, so she decides to screw over her lover by calling the police, but just before she does, Jörg catches her and takes her hostage. Ultimately, Roger is killed in his Aubrey Beardsley painting adorned flat after Jörg shoots him in the eye after he looks through the peephole of his front door upon Helga showing the gangster where her boy toy lives. In the end, Helga, like all femme fatales and most women in general, is left unscathed and goes back to her deceased husband’s fancy mansion.

Unquestionably, what virtually all the filmmakers associated with the New Munich Group of the late-1960s/early-1970s had in common was that they tended to direct laidback yet nihilistic and quasi-avant-garde counterculture-tinged (anti)gangster/film noir flicks that seemed to have just as much contempt as respect for the Hollywood films that they sardonically mimicked. Out of these films, which include such mostly forgotten kraut cult classics as Rudolf Thome’s Detektive (1969) and Rote Sonne (1970) aka Red Sun and Klaus Lemke’s 48 Stunden bis Acapulco (1967) aka 48 Hours to Acapulco, Gosov’s Sugar Bread and Whip is clearly the most innately anarchistic, culturally cynical, and melancholy, which is probably at least partially due to the director's real-life dystopian roots as a bastard Bulgarian-German son of Soviet-led bolshevism who seemed no less disillusioned by the American style capitalism that he encountered in West Germany as his films hint at. Indeed, aside from Thomas Schamoni's sole feature Ein großer graublauer Vogel (1971) aka A Big Grey-Blue Bird, Gosov's film is certainly the most idiosyncratic, decidedly dope-addled, and obscenely offbeat gangster film of the New Munich Group. After his fifth and final feature Wonnekloß flopped, Gosov went back to directing shorts and worked in television before becoming solely a musician who created musical scores for largely queer films, including the Rosa von Praunheim flicks Horror Vacui (1984), A Virus Knows No Morals (1986), and Affengeil (1990), as well as Sapphic filmmakers Elfi Mikesch and Monika Treut's sadomasochistic arthouse effort Seduction: The Cruel Woman (1985) aka Verführung: Die grausame Frau. The fact that Gosov would go on to write music for New German Cinema/New Queer Cinema filmmakers certainly acts as a metaphor for how Fassbinder and his NGC comrades would more or less erase the New Munich Group from cinema history. Notably, Sugar Bread and Whip star Roger Fritz would go on to star in a couple Fassbinder flicks, including Despair (1978), Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980), Lili Marleen (1981), and Querelle (1982). As for Gosov, I bet he regrets not giving Fassbinder that assistant director job.

SUGAR BREAD AND WHIP

-Ty E

LE GRAND DÉPART

Martial Raysse (1972)

Apparently (and not surprisingly) considered a 'lost film' until its release in late 2008 on DVD by a French company, Le grand départ (1972) aka The Big Departure aka The Great Departure also has the dubious distinction of being the first and sole feature-length film directed by French Nouveau réalisme artist/painter Martial Raysse, a fellow who had the honor of having some of his paintings exhibited with Jean Cocteau in 1958 when he was just still a young man. Rather unfortunately, Le grand départ, although an experimental feature-length work utilizing some minor (but rather dominant) special-effects, is not exactly up to par with the cinematic masterpieces of Cocteau, but is instead an innately incoherent and plot-less counter-culture-inspired work featuring merry morons in animal masks frolicking around gayly, pedo-worthy scenes of little girls naked, and other forms of would-be-hip hippie hijinx and hedonism in a positively passé flick that would probably be described as celluloid beatnik feces. Indeed, fittingly titled 'The Great Departure' in English, Le grand départ is an ostensibly avant-garde work that seems to reject most conventions of cinema history as a nauseatingly nonlinear piece of whimsical yet seemingly lethargically-assembled cinematic pseudo-libertinism of the putridly pretentious and plodding sort that reminds the viewer that art and drugs do not always mix well. A member of the French Nouveau réalisme (New realism) movement—a sort of frog equivalent of the Warhol-dominated Pop Art movement in New York that was in part inspired by Dadaism/Marcel Duchamp and placed special emphasis on collage and assemblage (incorporating real objects directly into their artwork)—auteur Martial Raysse certainly assembled a flashy piece of celluloid postmodern posturing with Le grand départ, a sort of whimsical celluloid wreck that says very little in its overly long 70 minutes or so of hallucinatory hippie hysterics. Almost entirely shot in kaleidoscopic negative exposure that was done via reversed color (negative) developing process, Le grand départ looks like a living painting directed by German völkisch symbolist artist Fidus where he an autistic hippie with an obsession with psychotropic drugs. Marginally enjoyable for a minute or two in a sort of 'outsider artist' sort of way, Le grand départ is virtual, archetypically failed 1970s counter-culture cinema from beatnik froggy hell that makes Franco Brocani's equally obscure work Necropolis (1970) seem like an unsung masterpiece.

Starting with images of a seeming tropical island paradise, Le grand départ soon demystifies the viewer by revealing that the images were merely that of a flabby fellow's Hawaiian shirt who is sitting beside his rather bitchy wife watching the news on television. From there, the Hawaiian shirt man and his wife are rudely greeted by a menacing yet strangely merry man who is wearing a creepy cat-mask and is riding a cheap motorbike. The cat-man is a criminal trickster and delinquent of sorts and most certainly a degenerate who, when not mugging people and stealing their cars, hangs out with a totally unclad prepubescent girl who he promises to take to “heaven” and sort of does so by allowing the little lady to ride in one of his pinched automobiles. The cat-man also has a rather strange knack for rescuing people, which he totally discredits by raping multiple women. The cat-man is also a Grim Reaper of sorts who represents ‘death’ as demonstrated by the fact that virtually all of the people he runs into end up dying, many of whom he personally kills, or as some burnt out hippie broad states, “This cat brings death.” Meanwhile, a group of mask-wearing hippies hang out in the forest and dream of some sort of intangible utopia of sorts just like all drug-addled flower child bastards. Eventually, the cat-man hooks up with a charlatan hippie guru named “M. Nature” (American commie/leading man Sterling Hayden) and his dirty and delinquent mask-wearing followers. Mr. Nature, on ‘the advice of the almighty,’ has built a raft that is retardedly named “raft of freedom,” that will supposedly take his followers and the cat-man around the world in what is apparently the ‘ultimate voyage’ to a ‘land of peace’ or something. As if part of the LSD division of NASA’s Apollo program, M. Nature and his crew are counted off for lift off and soon enter a psychedelic trip of sorts via the raft of freedom. In the end, the negative exposure film finally reverts back to normal colors and the cat-man’s naked preteen friend appears once again, thus concluding what is essentially a short film that has been painfully stretched out to feature-length.

LE GRAND DÉPART

For anyone who has seen Clive Barker’s self-described ‘home videos’ (aka early no-budget avant-garde shorts) Salomé (1973) and The Forbidden (1978), especially the latter film, Martial Raysse’s Le grand départ seems rather redundant and absurdly over-long by comparison. Indeed, Le grand départ, like Barker’s The Forbidden was shot in negative exposure, but whereas in the horror short it makes aesthetic and metaphysical sense as a piece of morbid psychosexuality, Raysse’s film feels like an obnoxious celluloid gimmick of the pseudo-liberating sort that has long worn out its welcome in just the first ten minutes! Undoubtedly, if any film personifies the aesthetic puffery and counterfeit rebellion of the counter-culture generation, it is surely Le grand départ as a work that pretends to be cinematically subversive simply due to the fact it was shot in negative exposure (making the majority of the film have a neon pink/purple tint!), has nil plot and preteen tits, and features a ‘cool cat’ of the rapist sort as its (anti)hero. Naturally, Le grand départ also reminded me of E. Elias Merhige’s Begotten (1990) and Din of Celestial Birds (2006) due to its negative exposure imagery, but also due to its pseudo-Biblical themes. Of course, while Begotten is a flawed and overly long work (the first 15 minutes are immaculate, but the rest seems like a ‘nightmarish mess’), it left me nothing short of entranced in multiple parts, which I certainly cannot say of Raysse’s Le grand départ, even if I found it to be slightly more provocative and interesting than, say, the latest Hollywood block-buſter. Described as “A Martial Raysse fable” during the opening credit scenes and featuring a bunch of hippie hedoniſts frolicking around the woods, Le grand départ is like a The Wicker Man for braindead acidfreaks (and that is giving it too much credit!) For experimental/rare film completiſts only who like Hebraic Beat poet Ira Cohen’s totally intolerable avant-fart short The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda (1968) , skip Le grand départ, drop some acid, and re-watch Kenneth Anger’s Lucifer Rising (1972) inſtead.

-Ty E

APARTMENT ZERO
APARTMENT ZERO

Martin Donovan (1989)

While well known and praised for his sophisticated yet lethally lovelorn suicidal sodomite professor in A Single Man (2009) in a role that would earn him the first Academy Award nomination of his acting career, stereotypically English actor Colin Firth (Girl with a Pearl Earring, The King's Speech) gave a much more interesting and radical performance over two decades before as a hysterical homo cinephile in the UK-Argentinean production Apartment Zero (1988) directed and co-written by Martin Donovan (State of Wonder, Somebody is Waiting) and shockingly co-written by Hollywood hack screenwriter/sometimes-director David Koepp (Jurassic Park, Panic Room). A penetrating and sometimes strangely campy psychosexual-thriller of the meta-cinematic sort that was practically specially tailored for cinephiles who like films with infinite replay-value, Apartment Zero is a celluloid ride drowning in intentional filmic clichés that manages to pay perverse tribute to everything from the films of Hitchcock to hagsploitation to Fassbinder to Lynch that ultimately reminds the viewer why they love the silverscreen. An aberrant anti-love story about an absurdly anally retentive closest-homosexual who essentially hates everyone aside from imaginary characters in movies and who ultimately falls in love with a charming yet extremely psychopathic terrorist turned serial killer but is too socially retarded and seemingly sexually sterile to properly pursue the relationship romantically, Apartment Zero is like the more charming, humorous, and stylish bastard Latin American brother of Hitchcock's Psycho (1960). Created by the two minds responsible for penning the much more popular but innately inferior work Death Becomes Her (1992), Apartment Zero is a marvelously morally repugnant and oftentimes misanthropic movie with essentially nil redeemable characters that concludes on a uniquely unhinged note that is more in the spirit of Curtis Harrington meets Jörg Buttgereit than something you would expect from a monetary-motivated hack responsible for penning such blockbuster swill like The Lost World: Jurassic Park (1997) and War of the Worlds (2005).

Adrian LeDuc (Colin Firth) is the proud owner of a fancy rival house movie theater named 'Cine York' in Buenos Aires who has no real friends (though he superficially converses with fellow cinephiles) who lives in an imaginary world of dead Hollywood movie stars and directors, with portraits of James Dean, Montgomery Clift, Orson Welles, Marlon Brando, Elizabeth Taylor, and various other icons adorning his immaculately decorated apartment. Indeed, a character with zero character who escapes in movies to fill the void of his non-life, Adrian automatically rejects most people because they simply do not know as much about movies as he does. Having spent 16 years in England due to the fact his now-deceased father was a cultural attaché, Adrian only really socializes with his mother as he is a crypto-homo mamma's boy of the Norman Bates-esque variety, but unfortunately she has late stage Alzheimer's disease and no longer recognizes her son. Considering he owns a movie theater that only plays old classics and arthouse flicks, Adrian begins to lose money and is forced to rent out a room in his apartment, but luckily a tall, dark and handsome American stranger named Jack Carney (Hart Bochner) inquires about the room and the two ultimately become an ominous 'odd couple.' To the chagrin of his jealous queen roommate Adrian, Jack instantly makes friends with the other tenants of the apartment building, which include two elderly busybody Anglophiles, a manly tranny, and a beautiful young lady he begins copulating with. Meanwhile, various beautiful women and effeminate gay men start getting killed around the city and not a single person has any idea who is responsible for the deaths. Indeed, death seems to be in fashion in Buenos Aires as the ticket seller at Adrian's theater, Claudia (Francesca d'Aloja), begins setting up screenings of documentaries about death squads and political mercenaries for a far-left committee she belongs to.

Perturbed by the fact Jack oftentimes does not come home at night and is often late, Adrian begins investigating his roommate's background and discovers that he does not really work at the computer company he claimed to work for. While snooping around his roommate's room, Adrian also finds old photos of Jack in paramilitary garb. Needless to say, Jack is an ex-mercenary who has developed an unquenchable bloodlust, thus he has decided to pick up the dead serious hobby of serial killing. At one of Claudia's leftist documentary screenings, Adrian spots Jack on the screen while Jack is standing right behind him and realizes that his would-be-lover is a callous killer. Of course, Jack has no fear that Adrian will go to the cops as he knows his roommate is unwaveringly in love with him, but he decides to flee to America anyway. Stealing and falsifying Adrian's passport, which he does not realize is expired, Jack is ultimately denied flight, so he cruises for a fag, kills said fag, and steals his passport. When the neighbors of the apartment watch a news program about the recent killings and wonder why Jack has disappeared, they all confront secretive weirdo Adrian, who is almost killed during the altercation by accident. Luckily, Jack shows up just in time to dissolve the apartment tenants' fears and to attend to Adrian's wounds. Meanwhile, Adrian's mother drops dead and Claudia spots Jack in a photograph of a death squad and learns that his real name is 'Michael Weller.' Unfortunately for her, Claudia makes the mistake of confronting Jack and he murders her, which Adrian later walks in on. Instead of calling the police, Adrian volunteers to help Jack dispose of his employee's bloody corpse. After dumping the chick's corpse, Jack tells Adrian that he is flying back to California in the morning and the latter volunteers to go with him. Of course, antisocial bitch boy Adrian later changes his mind as there is no way he cannot leave the escapist sanctuary that is his apartment, so he decides to pull a gun on Jack. After a scuffle with the weapon, Adrian ultimately kills Jack and keeps his rotting corpse as his daily companion. In the end, Adrian's rival theater is turned into a sleazy porn theater (as demonstrated by a poster of the post-apocalyptic avant-garde Café Flesh (1982) directed by Stephen Sayadian hanging outside the theater), which the proprietor walks out of after a midnight screening dressed exactly like Jack, thus assuming his non-lover's identity.

APARTMENT ZERO

Following in the fine fucked tradition of Robert Altman's 3 Women (1973), Fassbinder's Despair (1978), and Philippe Vallois' Nous étions un seul homme (1979) aka We Were One Man, Apartment Zero is a film about a weak antihero without a real identity who decides taking on the identity of someone else is the only way to develop some testicular fortitude and a real-life. Indeed, while looking vaguely similar, Adrian—a beta-male weakling of the socially awkward sort—and Jack—a manly man who both men and women swoon for—are total opposites whose personalities 'complement' one another as a sort of wayward and pathology-ridden yin and yang. Indeed, while the film's title is in reference to the fact that Adrian's apartment lacks a door name, it is also a reference to the fact that the character himself is a man without personality who is nothing more than a venomous void who is willing to go to the ungodly extreme of murder and assumedly necrophilia to become a 'full' person. Undoubtedly, I must admit that Adrian made a much wiser decision than Norman Bates, as the last thing the world needs to see is Colin Firth dressed in hag drag. Making references to films including (but certainly not limited to) Compulsion (1959), David and Lisa (1962), Catch-22 (1970), The Godfather (1972), The Conversation (1974), Eyes of Laura Mars (1978), Café Flesh (1982), and Blue Velvet (1986), Apartment Zero certainly makes no lie of its equally idiosyncratic celluloid influences. Of course, as auteur Martin Donovan confesses in the audio commentary for the Anchor Bay DVD release of the film, "I'm just as obsessed with movies as Adrian is," though the filmmaker seems to have a much warmer personality than that of the protagonist of his film. As Donovan also confesses regarding his homeland in the commentary, "You know what they say about Argentina, don't you? It is a country of Spanish-speaking Italians who live in French houses and they are very British." And, indeed, one of the reasons for the aesthetic success of Apartment Zero is due to its truly striking and ethereally atmospheric quasi-European-like setting. Indeed, made in a truly 'multicultural' country with a conflicted and seemingly schizophrenic identity featuring characters with mostly split-personalities/identities (i.e. multiple trannies, Argentinians who pretend to be British, young men pretending to be old housewives, etc.), Apartment Zero ultimately unwittingly makes a great cause against globalization, as well as cultural and sexual hegemony, which is just one of the many reasons why the film is a criminally underrated, especially compared to trash like Death Becomes Her.

-Ty E

SUZY Q

Martin Koolhoven (1999)

With such a moronically cutesy and philistine chic girly title, one would think that the fairly celebrated and multiple-award-winning made-for-TV film Suzy Q (1999) directed by prolific Dutch auteur Martin Koolhoven (Amnesia, Oorlogswinter aka Winter in Wartime) was the Dutch equivalent of Amélie (2001) or some other superlatively silly feel-good celluloid bullshit that makes hot young women seem like gigantic toddlers and brings credence to Schopenhauer's remark that members of the fairer sex suffer from being, "big children their whole life long." While the film does feature a cute eponymous girl played by Dutch diva Carice van Houten in a breakout role that would ultimately earn her a Golden Calf (the Dutch equivalent of an Oscar) and jumpstart her fairly successful career, Koolhoven's coming-of-age-cum-(anti)family-sitcom is about as feel-good as a drunken colonoscopy or receiving a herpes-ridden blowjob from a buck-toothed negro tranny. Deriving its title from both the name of the teenage protagonist and her mindless fan-girl love of Mick Jagger (The Rolling Stones recorded a version of the song "Susie Q" written by Dale Hawkins which appears in the film), Suzy Q tells the decidedly dejecting, if not delightfully darkly comedic, tale of an eclectically dysfunctional family led by an incestuous undersexed lard ass patriarch of the perennially unemployed and exceedingly emasculated sort who uses his family members as both emotional and physical punchbags to derive an artificial sense of power and authority because his wife won't put out and he feels like a loser because he cannot even obtain an unskilled labor job moping bathroom floors. Set in 1967 Amsterdam when the counterculture movement began to eradicate what little was left of traditional European values, culture, and religion, Koolhoven's 80-minutish tragicomic family dysfunction micro-epic is a thematically ugly and cynical work that's pop-art aesthetic betrays its tone and ultimately seems like it was made simply to shit on all of American television history, which is certainly something I can respect, but at the same time, I found the work somewhat slightly distressing for more personal reasons. Indeed, as the American grandson of a Dutchman who left the Netherlands after the Second World War due to the miserable place his homeland had become, Suzy Q made me confront the patently pathetic place that the Kingdom of the Netherlands—a tiny yet once powerful ex-empire that had colonized parts of virtually every continent but is now best known for its 'liberal' (translation: apathetic) approach to drugs, abortion, prostitution, euthanasia, and third world immigration—became after the Americanization and Hollywoodization of Europa. If all the characters in the film have anything in common, it is that their sole source of solace in life is in the form of American and British mass (pseudo)culture. For example, when not attempting to fuck or beat his daughter, the father featured in Koolhoven's film sits on his big boorish ass and watches

SUZY Q

Rawhide will sporting a goofy cowboy hat as an artificial way to reaffirm his broken masculinity as an unemployed lard ass ex-soldier who is so pathetically fat that he cannot even button up his much cherished old army tunic. Additionally, to escape from thoughts of her bastard father and loony loser brother attempting to defile her virginal body, the eponymous teenage protagonist makes scrapbooks filled with pictures of Mick Jagger and other weak and effeminate drug-addled rockers. If you ever wondered what Federico Fellini's Amarcord (1973) or Bob Clark's A Christmas Story (1983) would be like if they were reworked by a culturally pessimistic Dutch nihilist who wisely decided he need to have a protagonist that would provide an excess of nubile virgin eye-candy, Suzy Q is surely your best bet.

The year is 1967 and rather rotund jobless patriarch Ko (Jack Wouterse of Alex van Warmerdam's The Northerners (1992) and Theo van Gogh's 06/05 (2004)) is excited because he has found a box full of old canned WWII rations, thus giving him nostalgia for a time in his life that actually meaning and was not full of aimless banality and personal impotence. Ko is such a fat and pathetic beer-binging slob that his own wife Ruth (Linda van Dyck) won't even fuck him, so lately he has been scheming to pop his little girl's tight teenage cherry. Aside from the minor taboo of father-daughter incest, Suzy (Carice van Houten) does not want to fornicate with her father because she thinks he is such a pathetic loser that she literally wishes he would die. Suzy's deranged brother Zwier (Roeland Fernhout of van Gogh's Baby Blue (2001) and Cyrus Frisch's Blackwater Fever (2008)) recently starting going steady with the neighborhood whore, 'horny Betty' (Ricky Koole), but after getting in a bloody knife-fight in a movie theater with his girlfriend's ex-boyfriend, the relationship falls apart. When Betty complains about Zwier's violent behavior, he hatefully remarks, "What?! I did this for you bitch." Clearly agitated that he did not get to pound Betty's beaver, Zwier sneaks into Suzy's bed, puts a knife to her throat, and demands that she strip, but unfortunately the involuntary brother-sister erotic excursion is cut short when drunken fat fuck Ko gets home after handing out WWII rations to hookers. The next day, Ko wakes up in pain as a result of a major hangover and his wife makes him blow chunks by teasingly offering him a scrumptious breakfast that includes, "Chocolate cake with cream...mixed with sausages...in a cat poop dressing." Since her father is in the bathroom crying like a little bitch in between unloading loose stool and vomit from his grotesque fleshy orifices, Suzy is forced to piss in a bucket because she has to urinate so bad that she begins grabbing her genitals in an awkward fashion. The only semi-sane member of the family is brother Palmer (Michiel Huisman) and he wisely tries to avoid his kinfolk at all costs by regularly smoking dope in his friend's Volkswagen hippie van and playing gigs where he performs painfully bad Jimi Hendrix and Rolling Stones covers. As Suzy says to Palmer while comparing him to their mutual hero Mick Jagger, "You're never going to look like him. Mick just has it and you don't." Although Suzy does not it know it yet, Jagger will soon touch her jailbait main vein in a superlatively sleazy fashion that even puts her father Ko to shame, but of course considering that the rocker is her dream crush, she wallows in the sensual attention.

Rather preposterously, Suzy manages to get in the plush pleasure-dome of golden-haired counterculture diva Marianne Faithfull (Miranda Raison) after getting the singer's phone number from her friend and convincing her that she is the friend of her personal designer. Of course, Suzy, who uses the English alias 'Suzy Queen' (hence the title of the film) and contrives a terribly phony British accent, only wants to meet Ms. Faithfull so that she can get to her much-publicized-lover Mick Jagger (played by Andrew Richard in a role that was originally supposed to be played by the rocker's real-life nephew Demetri Jagger, who apparently backed out of the film so as not to potentially offend his uncle). When Suzy arrives at the singer's luxury suite, Faithfull answers the door without any clothes, but the protagonist does not seem to notice because she instantly spots Jagger lying on a bed and begins immediately focusing all of her attention on him in a meek and hopelessly shy fashion. Before she knows it, the rock star is making out with her and grabbing her naughty bits, though he soon gets uncomfortable after feeling a bulge in her nether-region because she had to wear a pair of gym shorts since she ran out of clean underwear. Undoubtedly, the scene where Suzy meets Mick and Marianne has a strange and almost dream-like quality about, thus hinting that it is merely a figment of the considerably eccentric protagonist's imagination. As Suzy Q makes quite apparent from the very beginning of the film, the titillating teenage titular character largely lives in an extravagant fantasy world full of big dreams that are in sharp contrast to her unfortunate reality as the much lusted over female progeny of a despicable dipsomaniac deadbeat and potential daughter-defiler.

Although Suzy only gets to hang out with Mick and Marianne for what seems like only a couple minutes, these couple of moments seem to be the best and most magical of her life and she immediately begins obnoxiously bragging to everyone she knows in a fairly unwittingly cute fashion about how she got the blood in Mick's prick going, or as she states to her mother, "His dick got hard...And he smelled like old tea. He fell in love with me straight away." While Suzy's mother attempts to tell to warn her, "sex and love are not the same, dear, especially for men," she does not care as she genuinely believes that magical Mick loves her. After all, considering her own father and brother express overt and somewhat predatory sensual feelings to her, Suzy naturally confuses lust with love like so many other young debutantes do. Naturally, Suzy's jealous father has a much worse reaction to her infatuation with Mick which is only further compounded when he breaks into her diary little a sneaky little girl and reads, "I feel sorry for my dad. He should die as soon as possible. My dad without a job is like a chair with no seat." Indeed, while getting drunk and watching Rawhide in a silly cowboy hat, Ko accuses his daughter of being a money-grubbing whore and being attracted to “golden dicks” and then proceeds to rip her Jagger scrapbook into shreds like a jealous toddler, so Suzy hilariously calls him a “living room cowboy” and he responds by brutally slapping her around and dragging out of his flat by her hair. When Suzy’s mother hears her daughter’s horrific screams, she pathetically decides to ignore it by burying her head into a pillow.

SUZY Q

Not surprisingly, Suzy does not want to go to school the next day because her body is completely covered in bruises, especially her neck, which is so discolored that it looks someone tried to strangle her to death. Meanwhile, Ruth finally gets the gall to confront her husband regarding his regular abuse of their children, stating, “One more time and I’ll divorce you.” Meanwhile, Zwier’s fragile mind begins to further deteriorate and after he discovers his pet rat ‘Victor’ dead in a mousetrap, he decides to cut off the head of the family tortoise with his beloved pocketknife—a weapon that he always carries around and seems to have a psychosexual fetish for à la Reverend Harry Powell in Charles Laughton’s 1955 masterpiece The Night of the Hunter (which, not surprisingly, director Koolhoven has described as one of his favorite films)—in a grizzly and seemingly unsimulated scene of reptile decapitation and then makes turtle soup out of the poor pet which he serves to his unwitting family. After everyone has taken a bite, Zwier whips out the turtle shell and smirks in a sadistic fashion upon revealing to his entire family that they have just delighted in devouring the family pet. Needless to say, Zwier is not happy when he does not get the desired attention that he was seeking, with his brother Palmer even complimenting him on the soup while continuing to eat it in a completely unphased fashion. When everything is said and done, Zwier just ends up looking more pathetic than ever in his ridiculous juvenile attempt to receive attention from his unimpressed family, who clearly think he is a troubled loser. Ultimately, Ko and Ruth go for a stroll in a park where they reconcile their differences regarding their seemingly irreparably broken marriage while their Zwier slits his wrists in a bathtub. Unfortunately, poor Suzy Q suffers the shock of a lifetime after she is the one who finds Zwier’s naked corpse floating in the blood-soaked tub. Although the viewer never learns what becomes of the somewhat strangely sweet teenage girl, my guess is that she eventually wound up working in the Red Light District, which would be a somewhat ironic fate considering it is her father’s favorite place.

Although paid for with Dutch government funding, Suzy Q is currently not allowed to be legally screened or sold in any form and has been more or less held hostage by music rights scumbags because the music licensing for the film ran out. To auteur Martin Koolhoven’s great credit, he has decided to fight back by urging pirates to upload the film onto the (in)famous BitTorrent site The Pirate Bay. On top of the pirates responding to Koolhoven’s plea, he also uploaded the film himself onto YouTube, though it is currently predictably blocked in the United States due to copyright issues. Koolhoven told the website torrentfreak.com that he felt obligated to promote the film through less than legal means because, "To me, it felt like the movie had died." In fact, Koolhoven went so far as to state, "Everyone can go to The Pirate Bay and grab a copy. People are actually not supposed to, but they have my permission to download SUZY Q." Obviously, films are meant to be seen and not deteriorate in some old forgotten vault, so I consider Koolhoven's efforts to make his own cult classic available as evidence that he is a virtuous auteur and serious artist who, quite unlike the kosher capitalists in Hollywood, loves cinema more than money. Indeed, it does seem a bit absurd that the most awarded Dutch film of 1999 and a work that is considered a cult classic of sorts in the Netherlands has been made completely unavailable because of a couple shitty play-out songs by Jimi Hendrix and the Rolling Stones, but that just goes to show how meaningless, vapid, and hypocritical classic rock stars are as delusion drunkards and drug addicts who spoke of utopia yet helped usher in a culturally homogenizing dystopia where art is merely a commodity and not the expression of an artist's lifeblood. Of course, Mick Jagger did not star in the fittingly titled work Performance (1970) where the protagonist notably says to the rocker's 'character,' "You're a comical little geezer. You'll look funny when you're fifty," for nothing.

Admittedly the classic songs used in Suzy Q are somewhat important to the film in the sense that they give the viewer a good idea as to the sort of deleterious world famous losers that 'everyday' proles like the protagonist latched onto as heroes as a result of the tragic Hollywoodization of Europe. Indeed, instead of confiding in an imaginative but in some ways helpful figure like Christ, they put all of their faith and worship into eccentric dressing negroid junkies and Brit libertines with faggy lips who would have probably been janitors or bums had they not become successful with their musical careers. Indeed, the eponymous teenage protagonist of Suzy Q is so obsessed with the shallow goal of obtaining a celebrity status that she goes outside on her balcony at night and loudly reads from Dutch counterculture degenerate Jan Cremer's writings as if she is onstage and talking to a large audience so that she can 'practice' for when she gets famous (of course, as the daughter of a deadbeat dead who tells her that, "the only thing that suits you is a job in a raincoat factory," Suzy has her reasons for having such outlandish yet comforting dreams). On the other hand, if people like Suzy did not have their dreams than they would almost certainly have nothing to live for, but at least Christianity offers the metaphysical insurance policy of eternal life in an ostensibly immaculate utopia in the sky and whereas false heroes like Mick Jagger can only offer limp dicks, shitty blues guitar licks, STDs, and drug overdoses. Like the films of Todd Solondz, albeit centering around Amsterdam(ned) lumpenproles instead of the American east coast Jewish bourgeois and mostly lacking the irony that offers the viewer temporary relief from the domestic horror show they are watching, Suzy Q is surely a landmark work of true

SUZY Q

Dutch proletarian cinema that demands to be illegally downloaded. Indeed, if you're a serious cinephile and/or cultural pessimistic, you certainly owe it to auteur Martin Koolhoven, who is himself a product of the working-class as the son of a prison guard who briefly followed in his father's trade before his filmmaking career took off, to steal Suzy Q and screw the Rolling Stones and their record label out of royalties. While the film gives the impression that Koolhoven would eventually become a sort of Dutch Oskar Roehler, his first theatrical feature AmnesiA (2001), which also stars Carice van Houten, was certainly a change of pace artistically and made it seem like he might become the Dutch bastard son of David Lynch and Roman Polanski, thus demonstrating the filmmaker's talent as a truly chameleon-like auteur whose potential seems endless, at least as far as quasi-mainstream cinema is concerned.

-Ty E

AMNESIA

Martin Koolhoven (2001)

If any contemporary Dutch filmmaker has the talent and versatility to pull a Paul Verhoeven by leaving the Netherlands and creating well crafted big budget mainstream movies in Hollywood, it is big boorish bear auteur Martin Koolhoven (Suzy Q, De Grot aka The Cave) whose most recent effort, the World War II flick Oorlogswinter (2008) aka Winter in Wartime, was so popular in Holland that it managed to out-gross big blockbusters like Twilight (2008) and Christopher Nolan's The Dark Knight (2008). Indeed, considering Verhoeven also first got Hollywood's attention with a film about the Dutch resistance and the Nazi occupation of the Netherlands, Soldaat van Oranje (1977) aka Soldier of Orange (though the filmmaker made a couple more Dutch films before leaving), it almost seems like Koolhoven is following in the footsteps of his filmic father-figure. In fact, Koolhoven is currently working on an English-language 'gothic western' set for a 2015 release entitled Brimstone starring popular Australian-born Hollywood actress Mia Wasikowska and English-born Australian leading man and sex icon Guy Pearce. While Koolhoven certainly has a talent for making films that appeal to large eclectic audiences, his first 'official' feature (he had previously directed a couple reasonably successful TV movies) Amnesia (2001) is a somewhat esoteric, oneiric, enigmatic, and quasi-Lynchian fever dream that would certainly not fare well with most American mainstream audiences, though somewhat ironically, it is the only one of the Dutch director's films to have received any sort of theatrical release in the United States. In fact, if I knew nothing about the director and watched Amnesia, I would assume Koolhoven was attempting to be the opposite of the next Verhoeven by following in the tragic and disastrous footsteps of the Netherlands' most unruly and antisocial auteur, Adriaan Ditvoorst. Indeed, Amnesia feels like a sort of 'son' film to Ditvoorst's magnum opus De Witte waan (1984) aka White Madness, albeit more overtly and shamelessly Oedipal and a bit less arcane. Indeed, like White Madness, Koolhoven's film follows a perturbed artistically-inclined protagonist of the largely silent sort with greasy black hair who reunites with his estranged widowed mother at her dilapidated nightmarish home after a number of years of nil contact, but unlike in Ditvoorst's marvelously morbid masterpiece, the protagonist has an evil identical twin brother who he is eternally united with in a deep dark abyss of sin and unspeakable family secrets revolving around their parents. Whereas White Madness is largely an abstract work full of symbolic and oftentimes absurd imagery and cultivated literary allusions, Amnesia is an arthouse murder mystery with a reasonably coherent story the unravels in front of the viewer in a fiercely foreboding and sometimes shocking yet equally darkly mirthful fashion, thus making it a much more accessible work that demonstrates Koolhoven's special knack for meticulously woven cinematic storytelling. In other words, Koolhoven's quite literally titled work begins as a hypnotic phantasmagoric haze and concludes in complete transcendental elucidation.

AMNESIA

Alex (Fedja van Huêt of Mike van Diem's Karakter (1997) aka Character and Erik de Bruyn's Wilde mossels (2000) aka Wild Mussels) is a professional photographer of the highly introverted sort who is incapable of taking photos of people, especially women, because of something that happened to him while he was snapping pictures when he was just a teenager. A majorly melancholy mensch with a seemingly permanent scowl on his face that more than hints that he is irreparably internally wounded, Alex is more or less a meekly walking and barely talking lost soul that is still incapable of coping with a tragedy from his youth that he played a major role in. When Alex gets a phone call from his identical twin brother Aram (also played by van Huêt) who he has not seen or talked to in many years, his immediate reaction is to hang up as if he has just been contacted by a ghost, but his exceeding extroverted twin, who is not the sort of guy that takes "no" for an answer, immediately calls back and informs him that their mother (Sacha Bulthuis) is sick and is coughing up blood. Ultimately, their mother's sickness is a pretense for Alex and Aram to reunite so that they can come to terms with something unsettling from their youth that they both played an integral part in that inevitably decided the very different courses that their respective lives would take. While Alex is a passive and even pathetic shell of a man who would probably refrain from fighting back if someone began violently raping him in the ass with a rusty machete, Aram is a cold, calculating, and charismatic psychopathic career criminal of the suavely-dressed deranged dandy sort who at the beginning of the film is involved in a semi-successful robbery that results in him and his depraved goofball partner-in-crime Wouter (Theo Maassen of Verhoeven's Zwartboek (2006) aka Black Book) being wounded. In fact, Wouter spends the rest of the film succumbing to a stomach wound while hanging out Alex and Aram's mother's house and getting increasingly drunk to ease his plaguing death pangs.

After receiving the phone call from his twin about their mother's ailing health late one night, Alex immediately begins driving to his family home and even falls asleep at the wheel on the way but luckily and somewhat inexplicably a strange busty black-haired beauty that has been inconspicuously hiding out in his backseat wakes him up before he crashes. Indeed, the girl's name is Sandra (popular Dutch actress Carice van Houten of Verhoeven's Black Book and Bryan Singer's Valkyrie (2008)) and when she demands that Alex ask her why she is in her car, she absurdly responds, "It's none of your business." Although they know absolutely nothing about one other, Alex and Sandra can tell that they are both lost souls and immediately become passionate lovers despite the fact that the protagonist is fairly lifeless otherwise. In fact, when the first two have sex, Sandra has an otherworldly orgasm that brings a fiery spirit to her mostly spiritless body, thus reflecting that the two dead souls seem to be soul-mates. As the viewer later learns, both Alex and Sandra are responsible for bringing misery to their fathers as a result of their actions. When Alex finally arrives at his mother's home, it is revealed that it is an old junkyard called 'Amnesia' with a large old falling down house that resembles a smaller but certainly more ominous version of the estate from Nothing But Trouble (1991). As Alex tells Sandra upon arriving home, he cannot remember the last time he saw his mother. Alex's mother is an eccentric and seemingly half-senile hypochondriac who is afraid that she will die of a heart attack because her mother and grandmother died that way and incessantly drinks wine as a result because, as she states, "it's good for your heart." While Alex is more or less gentle with his mother, Aram acts like a rabid animal to her, screaming at her, "Excuses! A good housewife always has beer for visitors" because she does not have fancy Chinese beer to offer him and his dying friend Wouter. Although Aram lives with her, Alex's mother seems in complete denial of the fact that her nasty little psychopath of a son makes his living as a ruthlessly dedicated member of the criminal underworld. In fact, Aram's mother does not even bother to ask her son why his friend is dying on her kitchen floor, as if it is a normal everyday occurrence. During his first day there, Alex manages to avoid his brother but he cannot put off the auspicious reunion forever.

When Alex randomly meets Wouter, his brother's friend remarks that he must be Aram's brother and when he asks how he knows, he responds, "Right description: identical, but with a loser's look on his face." Of course, Alex takes Wouter's insult like a little bitch. When Wouter asks Alex, "Which is the odd one out: Jesus, Mohammed, Buddha or Bhishma?" and the protagonist correctly responds Bhishma, Aram's friend accuses him of guessing but the protagonist proves he is no moron by remarking, "Bhishma was invincible and could decide when he would die." Indeed, like Aram, Alex is a rather clever and sophisticated fellow, but unlike his tyrannical twin, he is deleteriously oversensitive. Later that day, Alex accuses Aram of using a 'pleonasm,' so his evil twin makes him come up with a series of self-denigrating pleonasm about himself like "boring Alex" and "cowardly Alex." Indeed, aside from acting somewhat passive-aggressive, Alex tolerates virtually all of his 'big brother's' (Aram was apparently born a half an hour before Alex and thus absurdly considers himself to be the oldest brother, which he constantly brings up as a characteristically petty and frivolous means to maintain dominance over his twin) insults. Despite their differences, Alex and Aram are also remarkably similar in many ways, or as the latter remarks to Sandra, "We don't meet for years and then have about the same haircut." As the film will ultimately reveal, both brothers instinctively knew that their disharmonious reunion was more or less foretold.

While living at his mother's house, Alex bizarrely begins taking on the role of his dead mechanic father Theo and, to the chagrin of his twin and to the delight of his mother, begins working on totaled automobiles even though he knows nothing about cars. As the story unfolds, it becomes quite clear that Alex has a lot of repressed guilt regarding his father's mysterious death. One night, Aram gives Sandra an envelope full of vintage black-and-white photographs of the twins' father and a somewhat masculine black-haired female doctor (Carly Wijs) that were taken by Alex when he was a teenager. Apparently, Alex's father was cheating on his mother with the female doctor and the twins decided to come up with a plan to stop the affair that ultimately resulted in the deaths of both the doctor and their father, which is something that the protagonist still cannot cope with after all these years. While unequivocally evil, it is quite apparent the events also had a life-changing effect on Aram who might have become a lawyer or banker instead of taking on a more dangerous psychopathic trade had he not committed such heinous acts in his youth. Meanwhile, Wouter finally succumbs to his wounds after looking like Christ during a dinner prayer and no longer after Aram's boss Eugene (top Dutch character actor Cas Enklaar) and his fat muse Esther (Eva van der Gucht) show up at the house. As punishment for Wouter being fatally wounded during their robbery, Eugene has Esther urinate on the dead con's grave as an example to Aram. After Esther literally pisses on Wouter's grave, Eugene decides they should celebrate by having a barbecue which concludes in a game of hide-and-go-seek that Alex does not play because he has to attend to his sick mother who he has just learned is terminally ill with cancer. When Aram was busy acting like an asshole, Alex took his mother to a doctor to get tested and when he got the test results back from the lab, the protagonist decided not to tell his progenitor as he wants her to die in peace.

AMNESIA

While everyone else is playing a heated game of hide-and-go-seek that results in Esther getting stuck in a chimney after preposterously deciding to hide in one despite her rather impressive girth, Alex's mother mistakes him for her dead hubby Theo and begins making out with him in bed and the protagonist does virtually nothing to stop her. Needless to say, Aram and Sandra walk in on this disturbing display of motherly affection and the latter is so disturbed by it that she suffers a seizure due to the fact that she is epileptic. Aram volunteers to 'revive' her with CPR that ultimately evolves into a PDA between Sandra and the evil twin that is witnessed by Alex, who does nothing to stop it, thus demonstrating that he has no problem being cuckolded by his own brother. In fact, Alex wakes up the next morning in bed with Aram and Sandra, with the former embracing the latter's unclad body in a somewhat sinister fashion. Disturbed by the fact that her boyfriend does not seem to care that his twin brother fucked her, Sandra confronts Alex, who finally admits that he cannot cope with anything as a result of past traumas. Although Sandra convinces Alex to leave his mother's home ASAP, Aram coerces him to stay by stating, "We aren't finished, Alex. You know it as well as I do." Ultimately, Alex and Aram have a long-time coming climatic showdown of sorts where both twins reconcile with their shared tragic pasts and come to terms with their strikingly different but completely intertwined fates. Needless to say, only one man can survive. Somewhat strangely, Aram seems somewhat more sympathetic in the end. Like with the tragedy from their teenage years, Aram is ultimately the one that makes the ultimate sacrifice in the end while Alex mostly stands back passively.

Judging by interviews I have watched with the director, Martin Koolhoven seems to be a somewhat arrogant and annoying bloated blabbermouth with a banal and considerably cliched film school fanboy view of cinema and I find it to be almost shocking that he is the same mind that was responsible for creating Amnesia, as if the auteur was guided by an unknown force to create a minor masterpiece full of happy accidents that even he does not even fully comprehend. Indeed, despite having a cleverly constructed story, the film is full of various ancient archetypes and symbolism that give it a sort of metaphysical potency that I doubt even the director was fully cognizant of when he directed the film, which is much more spiritually-oriented than his other works. Not unlike the characters in Amnesia who seem to walk through life like somnambulists being led by Dr. Caligari, I felt like I was able to understand the more important aspects of the work on a subconscious gut-level and I think that is one of the film's greatest strengths, with the murder mystery subplot being of secondary importance, at least in my less than humble opinion. Notably, Koolhoven credits Roman Polanski's Cul-de-sac (1966) and Harold Pinter's play The Birthday Party (1957), which was once adapted by pre-The Exorcist William Friedkin in 1968, as the two main influences for his film as if it has no Dutch influences, which I certainly find to be somewhat dubious. Aside from Ditvoorst's White Madness, Koolhoven's film also seems to be influenced by the pre-Hollywood work of George Sluizer (Spoorloos aka The Vanishing, Dark Blood) who, aside from Dick Maas, seems to be the least intrinsically 'Dutch' of the post-WWII filmmakers from the Netherlands. Interestingly, in a September 2013 interview with BelleOog, Koolhoven said that he plans to put a Dutch spin on spaghetti westerns for his upcoming work Brimstone and criticizes Quentin Tarantino for making plastic 'homages' to the Guido western subgenre instead of making genuine works with a more personalized influence, thus hinting that the Dutch filmmaker might not go the route of his countryman Paul Verhoeven by making schlocky big budget blockbusters that are more or less the cinematic equivalent of junk food.

In its provocative take on the timeless myths about identical twins and shadowy doppelgängers, Amnesia is somewhat open to interpretation in the sense that one could easily argue that the film should not be taken literally and that the brothers are not two different individuals but two dichotomous extreme sides of the same person. Indeed, one could certainly argue that emotionally erratic Aram is actually Alex's Jungian shadow—the unconscious aspect of the personality which the conscious ego does not dare identify in itself lest the psyche crumbles—especially considering the protagonist spends a good portion of the film attempting to avoid his brother. When the protagonist does finally confront his brother in the end, he achieves what Jung described as ‘individuation’—a process of psychological transformation whereby the personal and collective unconscious merge and are brought into consciousness to be assimilated into the whole personality—hence why he is finally able to leave his past behind and move on with life. Unquestionably, whether intentional on Koolhoven’s part or not (personally, I don’t think it really matters either way), Amnesia certainly features one of the most effective portrayals of the shadow aspect and individuation in cinema history, as it is certainly more accessible and fluid than Fred Haines’ consciously Jungian Hermann Hesse adaptation Steppenwolf (1974) starring Max von Sydow. Jungian psychobabble aside, Koolhoven’s film is a compulsively darkly comedic work that does the seemingly impossible by managing to juggle humor, angst, and melancholy in an addictively foreboding fashion that few other films can boast. Ultimately, Amnesia is like an unpretentious art-house film that is carefully crafted in a way that even the most art-intolerant of filmgoers can understand it, though I think it’s brilliance would be lost on the average American viewer, but of course that is not exactly a bad thing.

AMNESIA

-Ty E

SOUTH

Martin Koolhoven (2004)

I don't typically have mixed opinions regarding filmmakers, especially auteur filmmakers, but relatively young Dutch film director Martin Koolhoven (Duister licht aka Dark Light, De Grot aka The Cave) certainly infuriates me in many regards because he indubitably has the talent to make fairly dark, idiosyncratic, and atmospheric works as demonstrated by his phantasmagorical cult flick Amnesia (2001) yet he chooses to make intolerably kitschy pro-multicultural miscegenation schlock like Het schnitzelparadijs (2005) aka Kitchen Paradise and Happy Family (2006) aka 'n Beetje Verliefd, as well as cliché formulaic war films like Winter in Wartime (2008) aka Oorlogswinter, as if to demonstrate to the culture-distorting globalists of Hollywood that he is a good little goy who is culturally cuckolded and ethno-masochistic enough to have what it takes to be a shabbos goy protégé of some Hebraic gatekeeper like Steven Spielberg or Michael Bay. Undoubtedly, what all of Koolhoven's cinematic works have in common—be it his delectably darkly comedic incest-themed made-for-TV anti-sitcom Suzy Q (1999) or his rather merry yet undeniably unconventional family film Bonkers (2005) aka Knetter—is that they are highly stylized and meticulously crafted pieces that were clearly directed by someone who loves directing films, so I would argue that the fairly minimalistic flick Het zuiden (2004) aka South is the sort of 'black sheep' of the director's somewhat eclectic oeuvre. A work produced by Els Vandevorst (Dancer in the Dark, Dogville) and co-produced by Danish auteur Lars von Trier and his partner Peter Aalbæk Jensen for their production company Zentropa, Koolhoven's work was originally intended as the first Dutch Dogme 95 effort, but the auteur ultimately found the rules of the avant-garde filmmaking movement to be somewhat preposterous, stating in a September 2013 interview with BelleOog regarding his decision to opt out of following the rules: "...the only reason you would do it is to ride that wave or something and I didn't believe that wave was necessarily going to bring me anywhere because there we already a couple of them made and I could hear people say, 'Holland comes five years later with a Dogma movie'...so there was no benefit in terms of content." Instead, Koolhoven ultimately made a work that "followed the spirit" of Dogme 95 in terms of its realist minimalist approach, emphasis on acting, and lack of special effects, but thankfully lacks the amateurish homemade aesthetic that plagues most works associated with the film movement. Penned by female screenwriter Mieke de Jong who the auteur would later collaborate with on Bonkers and Winter in Wartime, South is indubitably Koolhoven's most dejecting and upsetting work and certainly not something one would expect from the big hairy boorish bear of a director that directed a film as mindlessly retarded as Het schnitzelparadijs, which depicts a radically repellant Romero and Juliet story between a swarthy Moroccan and blonde Dutch beauty as something to celebrate and feel good about. Indeed, the story of a severely socially awkward laundry service manager that has serious problems in the romance department due to having only one breast as a result of a mastectomy and who ultimately decides to imprison her latest slob of a love interest in a boiler room while pathetically fantasizing about having an imaginary family that includes her bloated prisoner and the unwanted bastard baby boy of a young Russian illegal alien played by Oksana Akinshina of Lilya 4-Ever (2002), South is ultimately a piece of rather devastating Dutch style kitchen sink realist horror that reminds the viewer of the sort of malicious morally defective behavior women can get involved in when they are part of a close-knit collective group, as well as the very particular forms of cognitive dissonance that only members of the fairer sex seem to suffer. Featuring an angst-ridden anti-heroine who is absolutely beloved by her mostly uniquely unattractive third world employees because she makes their lives easy and provides them with a sense of security that they have never known before, Koolhoven's decidedly disturbing pseudo-Dogme piece of horrifying and hapless celluloid female hysteria will certainly strike fear and disgust in any rampantly heterosexual man in its distressing depiction of female group think and feminine mental derangement as a sort of modern Dutch lumpenprole equivalent to Roman Polanski's Repulsion (1965), albeit minus a beauteous blonde lead and scenes of surrealist horror.

SOUTH

While protagonist Martje Portegies (Monic Hendrickx) is a master at ruling over the laundry service business that she manages and is well loved by her colorful assortment of third world female employees, her personal life is virtually nonexistent as she has found it hard to reintegrate into the dating world ever since she had one of her breasts removed as the assumed result of breast cancer. Of course, as an unmarried barren woman approaching middle-age whose maternal clock is ticking, Martje was certainly more affected by the mastectomy than a married woman that has already had children and one can certainly look at her missing breast as being symbolic of the protagonist's failed womanhood as a lonely lady with a figuratively decaying womb. One day after being rudely denied a seat at a diner and being forced to eat her lunch outside while standing up and leaning against her car, Martje meets a friendly, if not fat and sloppy, truck driver named Loe de Koning (Frank Lammers) who is also eating his lunch outside and who seems romantically interested in her, but when the marginally charming chap goes inside the restaurant to get the protagonist some coffee, she pathetically panics and uses the opportunity to drive away, as she is horribly afraid of rejection and will do just about anything to avoid it. To Martje's delight, Loe later shows up at her work by happenstance to apply for a truck driving job, so the two immediately flirting with one another and the protagonist's employees even attempt to coerce her into getting romantically involved with the less than handsome truck driver. While Loe is used to driving south to hellholes like Morocco and Algeria, he impresses Martje by telling her he wants to stay local and ultimately gets the job under the assumed pretense that he will begin a love affair with the laundry joint manager. Unfortunately for shameless horndog Loe, who is actually married, he has no clue that Martje is somewhat unhinged and is looking for something more than just a simple fuckbuddy.

While Martje initially denies Loe's rather forward romantic advances, the protagonist eventually decides to give in after the trucker incessantly reassures her that she can trust him. Of course, Martje makes the major mistake of failing to inform Loe that she is missing a breast, so when the trucker takes a peak under her shirt and finds a prosthetic boob inside her bra, he is so startled that he literally jumps back and remarks, "Jesus, I got a fright." Needless to say, Martje is left in tears, which her Russian friend/employee Galina (Olga Louzgina) misinterprets as being the result of Loe sexually assaulting her. With Galina at the lead, Martje's multicultural army of female employees decide to avenge their beloved boss' honor by ganging up on Loe and locking him in a boiler room where a fat and out-of-shape fellow like him will surely have a hard time breathing. At the end of the day, Martje absurdly accuses Loe of assaulting her and decides to leave him locked in the boiler room after he offends her by comparing their disastrous failed sexual encounter to a story about how a friend of his once unwittingly brought home a tranny with a cock thinking it was a real biological woman. The next day, Martje lies to her employees by telling them that Loe is gone for good because their "action gave him a good fright" and then persuades them never to speak of the matter again. Of course, it does not take Galina long to realize that Loe is still locked in the boiler room, but she naturally decides to keep quiet about the matter.

When Martje notices a young blonde Russian named Zoya (Oksana Akinshina) randomly working at her laundry business that she has never seen or talked to before, let alone hired, she naturally becomes quite angry as the girl is an illegal immigrant without papers who has brought her newborn baby to work, but the irrationally empathetic protagonist ultimately lets her stay when the destitute Slav babe begs, "You're a good boss. I need a good boss. Please." When Martje learns that Zoya has not named her baby son and merely absurdly calls him "The Baby," she becomes rather irritated and demands that the negligent young mother give her child a name, but the rebellious ruski chick refuses and tells the protagonist to name him instead. In fact, Zoya tells Martje, who envies the young mother simply because she has a child, that she would trade her baby for a mere bicycle and then tells her that she can have her son, who the protagonist ultimately names 'Jan' and treats as if it is her own biological child, even attempting to breastfeed the babe with her surviving tit. Unfortunately for Loe, Martje's new obsession with the baby only compounds her penetrating psychosis and she begins believing that she now has her own family, with the imprisoned trucker being her hubby and the bastard Slav infant being her son. Needless to say, Martje is completely infuriated when she learns that Loe has a wife after the unlucky woman, a somewhat homely blonde dame named Dorien (Ina Geerts), shows up at her work looking for her missing husband. That night, Martje decides to berate Loe, who is by now slowly but surely dying, by proclaiming that she and his wife Dorien are victims of his lecherous male chauvinist pig behavior, but the crudely charming trucker manages to fall back in her favor after pleading to her that she is the only one that matters to him and then proposes, "Let's take the truck and go away together." Of course, hopelessly naive Martje likes Loe's rather romantic idea and decides the two will go "somewhere south." Unfortunately for Loe, whose time is certainly running out, Martje wants to pick up a new wardrobe and a new realistic prosthetic breast before the trip so that she can look her best for her would-be-beau, which ultimately proves to be a death sentence for the forsaken trucker. Meanwhile, Zoya figures out that Loe is locked in the boiler room and although she could care less if the ostensible rapist trucker croaks, she is worried that she might lose her job if Martje gets busted by the cops. Unfortunately for everyone involved, Martje's behavior becomes increasingly unpredictable to the point where Zoya has to confront her while she is having a sort of necrophiliac candlelight dinner with loverboy Loe.

SOUTH

Notably, Dutch filmic femme fatale Renée Soutendijk of Paul Verhoeven's Spetters (1980) and De vierde man (1983) aka The 4th Man was originally supposed to play the lead role in South, but director Martin Koolhoven wisely decided at the last minute that she was not right for the part and subsequently gave the role to Monic Hendrickx, who ultimately earned the Golden Calf—the Dutch equivalent to an Oscar/Academy Award—for her singularly perturbing yet pathetic performance as crazed breast cancer survivor Martje. I must admit that Hendrickx certainly deserved the award as she brought a sort of seemingly authentic unnerving creepiness to the role that a more beautiful actress probably would not have been able to pull off. Certainly, in terms of tone, themes, and aesthetics, South rarely feels like a Koolhoven flick, which is something that the director himself would probably agree with as hinted by remarks he has made in interviews regarding the film. In fact, in his September 2013 interview with BelleOog, the filmmaker would reveal regarding the film: "I think of all my movies...it is the one that I least rewrote...or had the least influence on the script, because I read it and though it was, I don't know, 80 or 90% ready...and we talked and we changed things, but not that much," thus indicating that screenwriter Mieke de Jong was probably just as much the 'auteur' of the film as Koolhoven. Of course, I doubt many heterosexual males have an interest in watching, let alone directing, films about distressingly socially awkward breast cancer survivors, so I do not think it would be a stretch to describe South as Koolhoven's most blatant 'for hire' artisan work, even if it is a penetrating arthouse piece that will most certainly leave a beyond bitter taste of abject discomfort in most viewers' mouths. As Koolhoven described in his interview with BelleOog, he did not like the fact that the film earned him a reputation as a dark and gloomy filmmaker, so he demanded that his screenwriter de Jong allow him to take a more 'fun' and 'jovial' approach to his next work Bonkers which, despite featuring a tragic death and a manic-depressive character, is ultimately a 'feel good' family flick. Like a Lifetime movie from a hysterical pre-menopausal lady lumpenprole hell that is as unflattering to certain members of the fairer sex as it is strangely empathetic, South is ultimately a film the most viewers might not necessarily 'enjoy' but is certainly something they will never forget. Indeed, it is hard to think of another film where a killer is depicted in a more favorable light than the male victim she pointlessly kills. While not Koolhoven's greatest work (in my opinion, he will probably never top AmnesiA), it is most certainly his most serious, understated, and least pageantry-plagued piece. Also, I have to admit that I respect Koolhoven for telling Lars von Trier to fuck-off and not succumbing to the cinematic golden calf of Dogme 95.

-Ty E

WINTER IN WARTIME
WINTER IN WARTIME

Martin Koolhoven (2008)

When Dutch arthouse auteur turned Hollywood blockbuster filmmaker Paul Verhoeven (Turkish Delight, Robocop) returned to the Netherlands to make his first Dutch film in over two decades, Zwartboek (2006) aka Black Book starring Nordic blonde beauty Carice van Houten with a bad dye job in the patently absurd role of a Jewess in the Dutch resistance who infiltrates the SS SD and seduces a Hauptsturmführer, I was terribly disappointed as it demonstrated the aesthetically and socio-politically deleterious effect that his twenty years in Tinseltown had had on his film making. Indeed, Verhoeven is responsible for directing one of the greatest and most critically revered Dutch war films ever made, Soldaat van Oranje (1977) aka Soldier of Orange, which featured none of the absolutely odious Zionist-pandering or soullessly sleek film making that plagued the obscenely overrated Black Book. Despite the fact that he has yet to make it to Hollywood, relatively young and popular Dutch auteur Martin Koolhoven (De grot aka The Cave, Het zuiden aka South) has already demonstrated that he has been poisoned by the conspicuously clichéd, contrived, and sentimental Spielberg brand of WWII filmmaking with his most recent work Winter in Wartime (2008) aka Oorlogswinter based on the popular best-selling 1972 novel of the same name by Dutch politician and scientist Jan Terlouw. The story of a 14-year-old Dutch boy who gets involved with the resistance after finding an injured British RAF airman in the woods and naively sees it as a sort of heroic adventure to help the Brit avoid being captured by the Germans, source writer Terlouw, who was 8-years-old during the German occupation of the Netherlands, said his intent with the novel was, “to make it clear to readers that they shouldn’t think, after finishing the book, that the war had somehow been a glorious period; the second was to provide—in a moderate manner—a human face for the Germans...,” yet the Teutonic invaders hardly have a human face in Koolhoven’s film, which depicts the Huns as boorish automatons who are just too plain dumb and slavishly subservient to notice the evilness of their atrocious actions. Strategically utilizing some of the ugliest untermensch-esque actors they could find to play Germans (e.g. Dan van Husen) and shot from the perspective of a 14-year-old that looks and acts more like a 10-year-old who thinks girls have cooties, especially when considering the time period in which the film takes place, Winter in Wartime features an extravagantly stylized cardboard tale of morality that attempts to disguise its dichotomous grade school level view of good and evil with pseudo-poetic melodramatic slow-motion scenes that beg for profoundness but scream of accidental kitsch and vulgar asininity. Indeed, the film is like the Dutch equivalent of Elem Klimov’s Come and See (1985) minus the Soviet propaganda and as made for Hollywood-lobotomized toddlers and American tourists. A work that barely scratches the surface of what the Dutch really suffered during the end of the Second World War, Winter in Wartime might as well have been directed by any Hollywood hack as one could probably learn just as much about the Dutch wartime experience had a proud protege of Michael Bay assembled the film. Curiously set during the end of WWII in the winter time yet making no reference to the 'Hongerwinter' famine of 1944-1945 in which as many as 22,000 Dutch people starved to death and could not be buried because the ground was frozen solid, Koolhoven's film ultimately makes the war seem like a minor annoyance that caused a couple mischievous people some slight discomfort when in reality it devastated the entire country, destroyed what was left of the Dutch empire, and arguably irreparably destroyed the spirit of the Dutch people. Indeed, the Netherlands did not go from being best known by foreigners for windmills and wooden clogs to legal weed and hookers for nothing.

Michiel van Beusekom (Martijn Lakemeier) is a slightly rebellious 14-year-old Dutch boy who thinks his father Johan (Raymond Thiry) is a pansy pushover because he is the mayor of his town yet is keeping the peace with the daftardly German occupiers, who have been arresting and killing members of the shadowy resistance. Michiel practically worships his uncle Ben (Yorick van Wageningen) even though he is a deadbeat because he is apparently a member of the resistance and is fighting the Germans in his own personal way, or so the terribly naive protagonist believes. It is obvious that Ben is a loser as he constantly hangs out with his nephew as though they were brothers, despite being a middle-aged man, while his brother is a successful family man and respected mayor of an entire town. When Michiel's friend Dirk (Mees Peijnenburg), a member of the resistance, gives him a message just before he is arrested to give to a blacksmith named Bertus van Gelder (Tygo Gernandt) who is ultimately killed by a kraut, the protagonist decides to read the letter and ultimately finds the coordinates to the wooded hideout of a British airman named Jack (played by less than masculine Twilight star Jamie Campbell Bower) whose plane crash landed in the Netherlands. Despite the fact that Jack is kind of an arrogant and seemingly ungrateful scrawny little twat who seems to have no qualms about putting a underage kid's life in great danger, Michiel fetishizes the resistance so much that he is more than happy to risk his young life and get the Brit to the nearby town of Zwolle, but a problem arises when the airmen is unable to walk due to an infected leg injury, so the protagonist gets his somewhat Jewish-looking nurse sister Erica (Melody Zoë Klaver) to help clean-up the wounds. Needless to say, Jack and Erica fall in love and Michiel becomes exceedingly jealous, but he is soon going to have more serious and potentially deadly things to worry about involving virtually everyone in the protagonist's rather sheltered bourgeois family.

When the Germans find the corpse of one of their comrades who was killed by Jack shortly after his plane crashed in the Netherlands, Michiel's mayor father is arrested and subsequently publicly executed with two other men as an example to the Dutch to not mess with the almighty occupier. In an unintentionally absurdist piece of Spielberg-esque agitprop, two German soldiers laugh in a stupidly sinister fashion while holding Michiel back while his father is being executed via firing squad. Of course, had the protagonist turned Jack in instead of helping him, his father would have never been killed in the first place. During Johan's funeral a group of coldhearted Gestapo agents break into Michiel's family home and wreck the place, including smashing the protagonist's grieving mother's fancy dishware. Despite the fact that Jack's leg seemed like it was going to rot off only a couple days before, he and Michiel soon make an attempt to travel to the town of Zwolle but their plan is foiled by a unit of Germans that were hiding by a riverbed and thus they must make a great escape while the Nazis are chasing them through a forest on machine gun-blasting motorcycles. During the chase scene, Jack proves he is not only an airman, but a rare British daredevil rodeo master who makes the stupid krauts eat his dust. Unfortunately, while Michiel and Jack manage to outwit and ultimately outrun the Germans despite the fact they were in motorcycles and jeeps, the former's beloved horse Caesar sustains a fractured leg in the process and must be euthanized but since the boyish protagonist cannot get the courage to do it himself, the RAF puts the beast to sleep. Since Jack is no longer safe in the woods, Michiel decides to bring him home where he introduces him to his uncle Ben, who agrees to help the Brit get to Zwolle using phony German documents. Shortly after Jack, Ben, and Erica leave to go to Zwolle, Michiel realizes that his uncle mentioned something about his resistance fighter friend Dirk that he could not have possibly known because he never told him about it and thus suspects his beloved Oom might be doing the incomprehensible by collaborating with the Germans. Upon inspecting Uncle Ben's suitcase, Michiel finds Nazi documents and realizes that his uncle is not a member of the resistance but a double-agent that works for the Germans. Indeed, because of his actions, Uncle Ben is responsible for the deaths of various neighbors and family friends. Luckily, Michiel manages to chase down the threesome just before they arrive at the bridge and pulls a gun on Uncle Ben and exposes his treachery to Jack and his sister.

WINTER IN WARTIME

Ultimately, while Michiel guards Uncle Ben, Erica walks across the bridge while Jack absurdly climbs along underneath it as if he has superhuman strength. Demonstrating that he is a stern anticommunist who thinks that Europe will soon be taken over by the Soviets, Uncle Ben complains to Michiel, "The Russians will be here soon. Then we'll see who's occupier and who's liberator." Uncle Ben also reveals to Michiel that, due to his German connections, he managed to secure his father's release but the mayor wanted to be a martyr and refused to allow another citizen to take his place as was the stipulation for sparing his life, thus now the protagonist can rest easy knowing that his father was not the pussy that he always thought he was. Of course, Michiel was quite wrong about Ben as well. When Ben manages to escape and Michiel soon catches him, he realizes he must kill his uncle or otherwise his sister and Jack will be shot dead. After Ben pleads, “Think about it, Michiel. I’m a bastard but I’m also your uncle. I’ve always protected you” and a unit of German soldiers appear nearby, Michiel acts if he has changed his mind about killing his uncle, but just as Ben begins to walk away from him, the protagonist symbolically shoots him in the back. Indeed, although not having the gall to euthanize his suffering horse, Michiel manages to kill his favorite uncle in cold blood. After the war has ended, everyone in the Netherlands celebrates with a huge parade and various parties, but Michiel has a malignant case of melancholia and cannot find it in himself to celebrate, so he merely sits at his dead dad’s desk as if trying in vain to take his place, though his friend Theo eventually manages to get him to crack a smile.

To my complete and utter shock, director Martin Koolhoven stated in a September 2013 interview with BelleOog, “WINTER IN WARTIME is the first film since AMNESIA where...the first idea was completely mine. I said I wanted to do this. I already said I wanted to do this before I was doing SOUTH. I said it to that producer Els Vandevorst [...] that was the movie that was ‘me.’ And I had a much higher ambition on an artistic level. Funny enough, it was the big success.” Of course, anyone that knows anything about Dutch film history realizes that WWII flicks tend to be the most profitable and all around successful works in the Netherlands as Paul Rotha’s The Silent Raid (1962) aka De Overval, Verhoeven’s Soldier of Orange and Black Book, Fons Rademakers’ The Dark Room of Damocles (1963) aka Als twee druppels water and The Assault (1986) aka De aanslag, Roeland Kerbosch’s For a Lost Soldier (1992) aka Voor een verloren soldaat, and Ben Sombogaart’s Twin Sisters (2002) aka De tweeling, among various other works, clearly demonstrate, so Koolhoven should not have been too surprised that Winter in Wartime was such a big hit in the Netherlands as it seems like it was practically specially tailored to be a celluloid cash-cow that would win all the awards and make him a household name. For Koolhoven to say that Winter in Wartime is his most personal ‘auteurist’ work since his debut feature Amnesia—a darkly comedic and oftentimes surreal work that seems to combine elements of works by Andrei Tarkovsky, Adriaan Ditvoorst, and David Lynch—seems nothing short of patently preposterous to the point of abject absurdity. Not only is the film seen from the perspective of a boy, but it is also a work that will appeal to mostly young boys as a sort of ‘teen arthouse’ flick that does for the Second World War what Francis Ford Coppola’s Rumble Fish (1983) did for teenage rebel flicks. Additionally, the Dutch are easily one of the least sentimental, unemotional, and ‘no bullshit’ type of people in the world, so for Koolhoven to take such a superlatively sentimentalist approach to World War II is nothing short of disgraceful and totally unrepresentative of his countrymen and how the war affected them. I’m not Dutch, but my grandfather was and he was a messenger in the resistance who was shot in the head by a German soldier (the bullet only grazed his skull) and whose family hid a Jewish girl in their house, yet he never mentioned any of these things to my mother during his entire life (it was only at the end his life when my aunt coerced him into talking about his experiences during WWII that he ever revealed any of this) and sure as hell did not tell sentimental stories about his wartime escapades which, as far as I could tell, totally destroyed his entire life, hence why he immigrated to an uncultivated nation like the United States. Ultimately, Winter in Wartime is a fanciful borderline-fever-dream depiction of the Second World War from a Dutch filmmaker who, unlike Verhoeven, did not personally experience the German occupation and thus romanticizes it in a pseudo-poetic fashion that oftentimes looks ‘pretty’ and ‘elegant’ (not surprisingly, Koolhoven has described spaghetti westerns like Sergio Corbucci’s The Great Silence (1968) and Sergio Martino’s A Man Called Blade (1977) as having an influence on the film), but is ultimately about as profound as an exploding cyst. Indeed, even the obscenely overrated and sickeningly sentimental pro-pederaŝt flick For a Lost Soldier—a film based on the autobiographical novel of the same name written by gay ballet dancer and choreographer Rudi van Dantzig, who managed to die of male breast cancer (combined with lymphoma)—features a more insightful depiction of the effects that WWII had on the Netherlands in its unintentionally allegorical depiction of a Canadian soldier in his early-20s seducing and bugging a vulnerable and highly impressionable 12-year-old Dutch boy.

WINTER IN WARTIME

-Ty E

BRIMSTONE

Martin Koolhoven (2016)

While the western is as distinctly American as a Robert E. Lee statue or a phillandering Baptist negro preacher, many enterprising foreign auteur filmmakers have tackled and, in some cases, even improved on the fairly formulaic genre. Indeed, whether it be Luis Trenker's surprisingly good Nazi era western Der Kaiser von Kalifornien (1936) aka The Emperor of California, Italian auteur Sergio Leone elevating the genre to virtual high art with his 'Dollars Trilogy,' underrated guido anarchist Giulio Questi incorporating gothic horror and gay fascist blackshirts in Django Kill... If You Live, Shoot! (1967), Hebraic Chilean Alejandro Jodorowsky's hyper hermetic Mexican midnight movie El Topo (1970), Swedish auteur Jan Troell's rather modest yet original Zandy's Bride (1974), iconoclastic Brit Alex Cox 'punking' the cowboy cinema with Straight to Hell (1987) and Walker (1987), Teutonic enfant terrible Rainer Werner Fassbinder making his own distinctly debauched take on the spaghetti western with Whity (1971), the various lame commie 'Ostern' (aka 'Red Western) flicks of the Soviet Eastern Bloc, South African auteur Aryan Kaganof's ghostly genocide-laden avant-garde short Western 4.33 (2002), or Argentine auteur Lisandro Alonso's Danish flavored Viggo Mortensen vehicle Jauja (2014), the western—a genre Clint Eastwood once quite rightly stated of, "I have always felt that the Western movie is one of the few art forms that Americans can lay claim to. Next to jazz"—has certainly been reshaped, raped, and molested by filmmakers from virtually every first world nation in the world aside from the Netherlands, at least until relatively recently with the release of the somewhat underrated, if not flawed, epic Brimstone (2016) directed by rather rotund Dutch auteur Martin Koolhoven (Suzy Q, Oorlogswinter aka Winter in Wartime). Billed by some, including Koolhoven himself, as "the very first Dutch Western," the film is technically a Dutch-French-German-Belgian-Swedish-British-American coproduction and features a largely international cast with mostly English speaking roles, yet it is also the film that probably comes closest to capturing the apocalyptic Calvinistic spirit of Dutch Renaissance painter Pieter Bruegel the Elder paintings like The Triumph of Death (1562). In short, the film could not have been directed by a Hollywood filmmaker, which might seem far-fetched to some considering it stars baby diva Dakota Fanning, Australian action heartthrob Guy Pearce, and Game of Thrones stars Kit Harington and Carice van Houten, among various other non-arthouse oriented celebrities. In short, the film is far too idiosyncratic, subversive, and just plain 'feel bad' to have been directed by some Hollywood hack or produced by some money-grubbing Tinseltown pimp producer.

Undoubtedly, Koolhoven—a relatively young auteur that has clearly suffered a certain degree of Americanization as far as cultural and cinematic influences are concerned—is a filmmaker that I certainly have somewhat mixed feelings about.

BRIMSTONE

Although he began his filmmaking career on an inordinately strong note with the sweetly sick suburban melodrama-cum-satire Suzy Q (1999) and the decidedly dark, cruelly comedic and quasi-Lynchian oneiric arthouse thriller Amnesia (2001) starring a delectably young and nubile Carice van Houten and Fedja van Huêt in a dual-role as twins and he would go on to direct admirable flicks like the rather grim quasi-Dogme 95 project Het Zuiden (2004) aka South, Koolhoven has also done his fair share of superlatively cringe-worthy hack work. In fact, Koolhoven demonstrated with infantile mainstream comedies like Het Schnitzelparadijs (2005) aka Schnitzel Paradise—a degenerate Rome and Juliet story about a brown Muslim's quest to defile a blonde Dutch Aryanness that apparently made a lot of money in the Netherlands—and 'n Beetje Verliefd (2006) aka Happy Family that he is a shameless cuckold that has no problem disposing his artistic integrity to make insipid pro-miscegenation twaddle for stupid and naïve adolescent girls that might be dumb enough to believe that Moroccans make for cool boyfriends. Unfortunately, Brimstone also suffers from a slight yet unmistakable rancid Cultural Marxist stench, but luckily the film is so misanthropic and just plain fucked up that any left-wing message it contains is virtually neutralized. Vaguely feminist in the sense that it features an absurdly rough and tough dame portrayed by lapsed child star Dakota Fanning, the film is a sort of grotesque neo-revisionist western where the Wild West is portrayed as a virtual hell-on-earth where going to church and whorehouses are the most popular recreational activities and where Calvinist virgins can be turned into seasoned whores virtually overnight. In short, Koolhoven does not seem to believe in heroes and practically views the Old West as one big gigantic plantation where a couple evil cowboys and religious men treat the rest of humanity like slaves and cattle.

While I was initially dubious of Brimstone due to Koolhoven's uniquely uneven oeuvre and the fact that it is the Dutch director's first English language film, I knew I had to watch it after reading a couple reviews from clearly offended mainstream American film critics. Indeed, seeing the film as a sort of "endurance test," many of these lamestream critics seem to just lack the testicular fortitude (or, in many cases, testicles in general) to consume any sort of cinema that transcends sort of sociopathic Tarantinoesque pop violence, but I must admit that even I was somewhat taken aback when I read Glenn Kenny's review at rogerebert.com where he reveals that he was so hopelessly offended and triggered by the film that he states regarding director Koolhoven, "I wonder if President Trump can extend that travel ban to The Netherlands." While Brimstone features a heroine that could almost be described as an 'all-competent ingénue' were it not for her final fate, it seems the film's propensity for girl power posturing is not enough to satiate the dry vags of the feeble feminists and limp dick cucks that just cannot bear to see a girl treated as anything less than an immaculate jewel that needs to be daintily polished and displayed in the most flattering of fashions. Another excellent example of the hysteria against the film is a review from some emotionally bloated bitch boy named Zach Budgor at pastemagazine.com who goes so far as complaining in regard to Brimstone that, “Calling it ‘problematic’ seems colossally inadequate” and then bitches, “Beneath all the pretensions, this is just a movie about Guy Pearce desperately wanting to fuck his daughter.” Of course, Calvinist predatory father-daughter incest is a subject that, for better or worse, has more substance and intrigue than anything that Tarantino has ever touched. Notably, this is not Koolhoven’s first film that deals with father-daughter incest, as the Dutch auteur’s aberrant made-for-TV cult flick Suzy Q also features a perverted patriarch with serious daughter issues, albeit depicted in a considerably less sensational fashion.

Although oftentimes overlooked due to America’s dominant Anglo-Saxon roots, the Dutch played a pivotal role in influencing the cultural and political climate of early America. For example, a 1657 religious clash between Peter Stuyvesant—the last Dutch director-general of the colony of New Netherland from 1647 until it was ceded provisionally to the English in 1664 and renamed New York—and Quakers led by John Bowne resulted in the Flushing Remonstrance, which ultimately served as the basis for religious freedom in America. While it is somewhat hard for me to imagine Dutch cowboys (incidentally, auteur Sam Peckinpah’s paternal family, which was involved with the Old West, originated from the Frisian Islands), the covert influence of Calvinism on the western genre is unmistakable and certainly put to intriguing use in Koolhoven’s Brimstone where a singularly wicked Dutch Reformed Church reverend acts as a sort of symbolic devil of sorts in the still untamed land of the great American frontier. As depicted in the film, the Dutch immigrants have come to the U.S. because they believe that their motherland has become fair too spiritually degenerate and they truly believed that their new homeland is the literal ‘Promised Land.’ Scorning his fiercely frigid wife due to the fact that their daughter still prays in Dutch, the Reverend, like so many of his contemporary kinsmen, is rather serious about ridding himself of his Dutch identity (incidentally, many of the original Dutch-Americans maintained their native tongue as demonstrated by the eighth President of the United States Martin van Buren who, despite being a sixth generation American, spoke Dutch as his first language). In that sense, the film reveals the American tendency toward deracination and eventual cultural retardation. Indeed, the good Reverend aggressively advocates the eradication of his first language in both his church and household, yet he and his flock are easily the most literate and cultivated people in the film, thus demonstrating the innate absurdity of the so-called melting pot.

Undoubtedly, one of the most intriguing aspects of Brimstone is that Koolhoven was able to incorporate the Calvinist angle in a surprisingly cinematic fashion, or as he explained in an interview with creativescreenwriting.com, “There is an idea of predetermination in Calvinism, and I wanted to hint in the movie that things are in a way predetermined. Just as an example, if a character gets shot in the head, at some previous point in the movie that character will touch their head. If somebody gets knifed in the stomach, they'll touch their stomach earlier in the film." Of course, the idea of predetermination becomes rather perverse when one considers the film features incestuous father-daughter rape, patricide, suicide, white child sex slavery, infanticide, unjustified whore lynchings, archaic glossectomies, etc. Needless to say, the film does not exactly feature a positive portrayal of Calvinism, but I doubt Koolhoven is any sort of religious scholar despite his religious upbringing as his film features the same sort of one-dimensional critique of Christianity that one would expect from the average Hollywood Hebraic hack. Luckily, Koolhoven is not as arrogant as the average Tinseltown Christ-killer and his anti-Calvinist tendencies do not seem to be motivated by mere atavistic hatred or resentment like the average chosenite. Notably, underrated Dutch auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst did a much better job criticizing Christianity with his sardonic anti-Biblical epic De mantel der Liefde (1978) aka The Mantle of Love, but I digress. Personally, I think Koolhoven has repressed spiritual longings and Brimstone feels like a warped expression of that. Unfortunately, Koolhoven lacks the nuance of a fellow lapsed Calvinist like Paul Schrader, who at least lends a certain humanity to the Dutch-American religious community depicted in his rather visceral flick Hardcore (1979).

BRIMSTONE

An undeniably ambitious and meticulously constructed 148-minute epic with a surprisingly provocative non-linear narrative that is divided into four Biblical chapters, Brimstone tells the somber yet sordid and sadomasochistic tale of a tongueless young mother named 'Liz' (Dakota Fanning in arguably the greatest and most mature role of her entire career) and why the mere voice of a false prophet Calvinist reverend (Guy Pearce) that randomly reappears in her completely consumes her soul with dread and disgust. Indeed, it is only long after he has committed a couple grisly killings and two of the four chapters of the film have passed that the viewer finally discovers the Reverend's true connection to Liz and why he is so ruthlessly and wickedly determined to abduct the heroine and make her pay for her supposed sins so that he can ostensibly redeem himself from his own pathetic purgatorial existence. At the beginning of the film when she is first introduced, Liz seems to be somewhat happy, albeit mute, as she works as a midwife with her little daughter Sam—a virtual 'mini-me' that practically worships her vocally-challenged mother in the sweetest sort of way—who she uses sign language with when communicating to women in labor. Although her 14-year-old stepson Matthew (Jack Hollington) somewhat resents her since she has replaced his own deceased mother, Liz has a loving, if not somewhat naive and somewhat weak, husband named Eli (William Houston). Despite her seemingly happy home life, Liz has a somewhat vague haunted expression, as if she is doing everything she can to hide the internal pain that plagues her soul. As the viewer learns as the film progresses, Liz is a survivor in the truest sense, though, rather unfortunately, everyone she seems to love and care about is killed in quite horrendous ways by the all-jealous and all-vengeance Reverend. Surely accused yet completely undeserving of her seemingly perennially nightmarish plight, the heroine is indubitably a virtual symbolic punching bag in terms of the brutality and lack of fairness and justice in the world.

Unfortunately, Liz's life of relative normalcy almost immediately becomes a nefarious nightmare when the good Reverend unexpectedly arrives at her local church and begins his cryptically self-denigrating 'fire and brimstone' homiletics routine about the perils of false prophets. Indeed, literally the same day that the Reverend—a well groomed authoritarian type with a fairly large and intimidating scar on his face—shows up at church, a pregnant woman goes into labor inside of said church and Liz must make a horrific choice in regard to the pregnancy and ultimately takes upon herself to kill the baby by crushing its skull so that the mother does not die in childbirth. While Liz immediately accuses the Reverend of somehow orchestrating the tragedy, her husband Eli simply cannot believe that the (un)holy man has the assumedly supernatural means or harsh amorality to carry out such a depraved act. Not long after the tragic incident, the dead baby's heartbroken father, Nathan (Bill Tangradi), shows up late at night at the family's farm while drunk on whisky, sets a wagon on fire, and then begins shooting at Liz's house in a desperate attempt to kill her. Ultimately, the Reverend shows up and acts the part of a noble hero by coercing Nathan into going home. While Eli believes the Reverend is a hero, Liz certainly knows better. Against Liz's wishes, Eli invites the Reverend into his home to thank him while the heroine hides in another room with a petrified expression on her almost ghostly, porcelain-like face. When Eli temporarily leaves the room, the Reverend, who can sense the heroine's presence, reveals his true feelings for Liz by stating as she lurks behind a wall, "I know you're there, and I know you can hear me. You may have no tongue, but there is nothing wrong with your ears. Why do doubts rise in your heart? Why are you troubled? How do you sleep at night? How does it feel to be a murderess? Do you know why I am here? I'm here to punish you. Do you love this family? I've looked at your daughter. She's almost a young woman already." Needless to say, the Reverend's words positively petrify Liz, but it is not until much later in the film that the viewer comes to understand why the heroine is so abjectly afraid of the menacing man of god. On top of quite symbolically slaughtering the family's flock of sheep to such a savage degree that he rips an unborn lamb out of one of the beasts' wombs, the Reverend eventually disembowels Eli and then makes him suffer in hellish agony by wrapping his intestines around his neck like a noose. Before his son Matthew puts him out of his misery by blowing him away with a shotgun, Eli tells Liz to take the kids and flee to his father's home in the mountains. Of course, the Reverend follows, but the viewer has to watch two flashback chapters before the film picks up where it began in the first chapter.

BRIMSTONE

As the film progresses, the viewer eventually discovers that Liz is actually the extra estranged daughter of the Reverend and that she is living under a fake identity that she borrowed from a dead friend. In fact, Liz, whose real name is 'Joanna,' was so adamant about changing her identity and starting a completely new life for herself that she dared to personally cut out her own tongue so that she could assume the identity of her tongueless prostitute pal 'Elizabeth Brundy' (Carla Juri), who had her tongue dismembered by the girls' mutual ultra sleazy cowboy pimp Frank (Paul Anderson). Although born into a devout Calvinist family, Joanna aka 'Liz' eventually ran away from home and was forced into prostitution after a series of tragic and just downright disgusting and depraved events, including the violent suicide of her meek mother Anna (Carice van Houten), the coldblooded murder of her outlaw would-be-lover Samuel (Kit Harington), and incestuous rape at the hand of her own depraved daddy, among other things. Notably, all of these horrible things happened to Liz when she was practically still a little girl shortly after her period in a scenario that brings sick irony to the Reverend sermon, "The serpent said to the woman, 'You surely will not die! For God knows that in the day you eat from it, your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil.' And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and was a delight to the eyes, and that the tree was desirable to make one wise, she took from its fruit and ate. And then the Lord God said to the woman: 'I will greatly multiply your pain in childbirth. In pain you will bring forth children; Yet your desire will be for your husband, and he will rule over you.'" As if he could instinctively smell the scent of her first drop of menstrual blood, the Reverend became completely sexually enamored with Liz after she had her first period and soon came to the conclusion that he should marry and procreate with his daughter. Unfortunately for the Rev, Liz is a fighter that learned from the pathological passivity of her mother to never submit to the depraved desires of an overbearing brute. While the suicide of her mother gave the Reverend the perfect opportunity to make her his wife, Liz ultimately decided to runaway from home and take the risk of fending for herself in the quite dangerous and morally bankrupt realm of cowboy country, hence her first occupation as a prostitute. Spending her best teenage years as a pussy-peddler at a cathouse with the fitting name 'The Inferno,' Liz encounters some of the most unsavory, brutal, pervert, and just plain degenerate men in the Old West, but none of these foul fellows are quite as cruel as her own distinctly fucked up father. As someone that was deflowered by her own daddy, Liz is naturally able to tolerate a couple cruddy cowpokes creaming in her cunt. In fact, she is depicted as being quite bored by sex with johns.

Using the words of Paul the Apostle "If any man thinks that he is behaving himself unseemly toward his virgin daughter, if she pass the flower of her age, and if need so requires, let him do what he will; he is not sinning; let them marry" as a rather creepy and desperate yet nonetheless seemingly biblically sound rationalization, the Reverend intended to make his daughter Joanna/Liz as his wife, but he was only able to rape her once before she managed to get away and thus was never able to consummate the incestuous marriage. On top of raping her, the Reverend murdered Liz's first true love Samuel—a kindhearted convict and killer that she secretly hid in her family's barn for a number of days, if not weeks—after he dared to attempt to stop the (un)holy man from ritualistically raping his daughter on a church altar. Needless to say, becoming a prostitute was a small price for Liz to pay after being raped by her preposterously prideful progenitor. Of course, it was while Liz was working at 'The Inferno' whorehouse that her father was finally able to catch up with her after a number of years of looking for her in the hope of finally consummating their marriage. Needless to say, Liz was not exactly interested in becoming her father's lawful fucktoy. Indeed, instead of being defiled by her daddy a second time, Liz, who has turned into quite the bad bitch after a number of years of commercial sexual debasement, opts to slit his throat and set him on fire, hence her almost otherworldly dread and fear when he somehow returns many years later as depicted at the beginning of the film in an assumedly all-powerful undead form. On top of being a spiritually schizophrenic puritanical zombie of sorts, the Reverend is all the more murderous, displays a supernatural level of strength, and is seemingly immortal, or at least until he dares to fuck with Liz's tiny blonde daughter Sam. While the Rev manages to demonstrate he is a master sniper by shooting and killing Liz's stepson from a great distance in the middle of a blizzard, he is not exactly as efficient when it comes to dealing with his own severely emotionally damaged daughter.

Near the very end of the film, the Reverend poetically declares whilst in literal flames just before his daughter delivers what may or may not be a fatal blow via gunshot, "People think it's the flames that make hell unbearable. It's not. It's the absence of love." This quote and a couple other quotes from the film reveal that the Reverend is not simply a perniciously perverted monster, but a grotesquely tragic figure who, despite his many glaring flaws, is a hopeless romantic at heart who is forsaken with falling in love with his own teenage daughter. In fact, the film's portrayal of the Rev inspired film critic Glenn Kenny to reveal his lack of testicular fortitude and moan, "In any event, by the finale, it is entirely clear that the Reverend is the character with whom Koolhoven actually identifies. Gross. I wonder if President Trump can extend that travel ban to The Netherlands." Personally, I can only hope that Koolhoven most closely identifies with the Rev as it would be rather pathetic, impotent, and emasculating if he felt close to the heroine, but I sincerely doubt it as the character is far too contrived to be an expression of the auteur's somewhat dubious soul. Indeed, while Liz unquestionably takes up most of the screen time, the Reverend is ultimately the most nuanced and unforgettable character in the entire film, as a ludicrously lovelorn figure comparable to Vincent Price's eponymous character in Robert Fuest's The Abominable Dr. Phibes (1971), albeit way more fucked up. While Koolhoven has stated in various interviews that he wanted to do something new with the western genre by depicting the supposed inordinate misery that women suffered in the American West in comparison to their male counterparts, I somehow doubt that he, like many so many other male feminists, really gives a serious shit about female suffering, especially since certain scenes in Brimstone border on torture porn and they oftentimes have a fetishistic S&M/BDSM quality that would certainly get some women wet and some men hard, but I digress. Naturally, it is only fitting that the heroine of Koolhoven's film is an (ex)prostitute because, as Georges Bataille once wrote, "With prostitution, the prostitute was dedicated to a life of transgression. The sacred or forbidden aspect of sexual activity remained apparent in her, for her whole life was dedicated to violating the taboo." Somewhat ironically, the prostitute is a revered figure in classic westerns as indicated by the timeless whore-with-a-heart-of-gold archetype, so it is somewhat curious that Koolhoven would portray pussy-peddlers as a much loathed figures that are frequently mutilated and hanged by overly eager bloodthirsty hicks. In Koolhoven's mind, women only become prostitutes as a result of some form of male abuse, as if women completely lack agency. Of course, it is no coincidence that Brimstone—a film that prides itself on breaking taboos—was directed by a lapsed Calvinist, as it is symbolic of the very real spiritual degeneracy of the Netherlands as a whole and how the nation went from Puritanism to legal pot and prostitution virtually over night, just as the equally degenerate Germans went from attempting to ridding themselves of racial aliens during the Third Reich to attempting to commit virtual collective suicide via low birth rates and mass immigration. Indeed, for or better or worse, there is no question that the film was directed by a spiritually sick man with a busted moral compass and no amount of insincere feminist posturing is going to change that. Undoubtedly, it might be better to describe Brimstone as the 'first anti-Calvinist western' instead of the 'first Dutch western,' as the film is first and foremost as rather resentful work of contra Calvinism that just features too many cowboys to feel even remotely Dutch.

BRIMSTONE

Somewhat unfortunately, in his rather revealing interview with creativescreenwriting.com, Koolhoven expressed a special affinity for proudly pozzed pop filmmaker Quentin Tarantino and his intricately cuckolded negrophile anti-westerns, or as the Dutch auteur himself explained, "DJANGO UNCHAINED looks at that period through different eyes, showing the black experience, and my movie looks at the era through female eyes. They're both movies that look at history in a different way. It's not something that I really thought about as I was writing BRIMSTONE, but at some point I realized that even though I made a movie that is completely different from DJANGO UNCHAINED, I think they are in some ways spiritually connected." Of course, in a certain sense, Koolhoven is right as his film, not unlike Tarantino's celluloid cow turd, is a product of its particular pathetic zeitgeist and thus an unwittingly damning expression of the spiritual degeneracy, gross emasculation, moral retardation, and senseless nihilism of the contemporary Dutch male. Undoubtedly, it is the ultimate disgrace to the genre that a perverted part-injun podophile and proud ethno-masochist like Tarantino would direct a Western—a style created by proud white Americans that reflects, quite literally, true and virtuous white supremacy of the classic nation-building sort—as he personally lacks any of the qualities of the traditional western hero, hence his nasty knack for nappy-headed degeneration and groveling feet fetishism. Naturally, as the bastard broad of a sexually promiscuous single mother that would expose her son to various black boyfriends during a time when only the most irredeemable white trash proles engaged in such dysgenic behavior, Tarantino would grow up to be the virtual spiritual nemesis of western genre maestro John Ford. While Django Unchained (2012)—a film that is a grotesque insult to the classic Sergio Corbucci spaghetti western Django (1966) that it borrows its name from—is indubitably vapidly buffoonish neo-blaxploitation porn for anti-white bloodsucking negroes and racially schizophrenic white liberals and wiggers—Tarantino would completely outdo himself in terms of self-flagellating faggotry with his follow-up ‘neo-western’ The Hateful Eight (2015), which is notable for featuring loudmouth alpha-spade Samuel L. Jackson forcing a Confederate soldier to suck his STD-ridden prick just before killing him in a scenario that can only be described as negro power style sod sadism. Undoubtedly, for reviewers to complain about the supposed ‘twisted brutality’ of Brimstone yet not so much as make a peep about the truly otherworldly masochistic cuckolded fantasies featured in celebrated shabbos goy Tarantino’s melanin-marinated westerns just goes to show the sort of collective moral insanity and racial retardation that plagues the conspicuously kosher mainstream. Additionally, while Koolhoven’s flick might have been directed by a degenerate man that clearly has hang-ups in regard to both his own gender and ancestral faith, the film never succumbs to the cartoonish gynocentrism of Tarantino’s two volume foot fetish fantasy Kill Bill (2003). Indeed, Koolhoven’s film might feature various examples of female strength that border on the patently absurd, it also features a lot of female weakness and concludes on a bittersweet note that reminds that viewer that, quite unlike the Hebrew-helmed Star Wars: The Force Awakens (2015), even female heroines are not invincible and that this planet has always been and will always be a man’s world.

Although Koolhoven clearly intended to direct his own equivalent to Erich von Stroheim’s Greed (1924) in terms of sheer cinematic grandeur and misanthropic magnitude, Brimstone is ultimately a flawed cinematic curiosity that is, in my humble opinion, slightly inferior to the director’s rather ambitious early feature AmnesiA. In terms of epic flawed westerns directed by assumed megalomaniacs that people either seem to love or love to hate, the film certainly deserves to be compared to Michael Cimino’s Heaven’s Gate (1980). Don’t get me wrong,

BRIMSTONE

I think the film is considerably overlooked in the United States where it barely played in theaters and received scathing reviews from a number of mainstream film critics, but it might be a little bit of puffery to compare it to a genuine masterpiece like Charles Laughton's The Night of the Hunter (1955), even if it shares superficial similarities, as it is simply not a film of the same artistic caliber. Indeed, aside from being somewhat flawed in the narrative sense and featuring rather awkward dialogue and delivery of lines (it should be noted that Koolhoven, who speaks fairly good English, originally wrote the script in Dutch and then later had it translated into English), the film suffers the virtually artistically fatal flaw of lame leftist virtue signaling, namely of the innately inane quasi-feminist sort. As an anti-Marxist Pasolini fan, I can certainly overlook the politics of a flick if it is artistically genuine, but the anti-Christian and feminist posturing of Brimstone just does not feel completely authentic, as if the director included such repugnant elements in the hope of receiving praise from the right film critics. While a totally preposterous piece of prosaic pussy juice, Kelly Reichardt's Meek's Cutoff (2010), quite unlike Koolhoven's film, at least has a certain undeniable authenticity about it as far as feminists westerns are concerned. Not unlike Tarantino, albeit to a less critical degree, Koolhoven seems to be a moral savage that has drunk the cultural Marxist Kool-Aid and feels it necessary to emasculate himself in a less than sincere fashion by creating a world where all powerful men are evil and virtually all women of victims of said men, as if the West was not won mostly via the blood, sweat, and tears of courageous men that were quite literally willing to risk their lives to make a better life for their wives and children. Naturally, it is a sad irony that is a seemingly spiritually castrated man would tackle a genre that is notorious for being fueled by pure and unadulterated testosterone, but then again Brimstone still has its odd virtues and can certainly be celebrated for, if nothing else, its decidedly darkly romantic tone. In a sense, the film is an artistic tragedy of sorts as it is so close to being a great film, thus making its flaws all the more unbearable to accept. In terms of its anti-Calvinist angle and somewhat frivolous and phony feminist subtext, Brimstone can certainly be compared to Robert Eggers' somewhat more immaculate horror flick The Witch (2015). Unfortunately, both films were clearly created by spiritually castrated 'nu-males' that somehow see it as a necessity to use their genre films as a means to criticize the patriarchy while depicting teenage girls as the most enlightened of beings. Personally, I just think these beta boys worship the nice and fresh cunts of hot teenage girls. Either way, nothing screams beta-male more than directing a film where strong and masculine males are depicted in an excessively negative light, as only a resentful wuss would be compelled to do such a thing.

Although Irish poet William Butler Yeats once insightfully wrote, "Sex and death are the only things that can interest a serious mind," one has to wonder if death is more arousing to Koolhoven than sex as Brimstone is indubitably at its most erotically-charged during its death and torture scenes. Indeed, whether it be a man being strangled by his own intestines or some sadistic hick almost choking to death a whore during a session of capitalist coitus, the film takes both a fetishistic and ritualistic approach to death while at the same time portraying sex oftentimes in an oftentimes grotesque and uniquely unpleasant fashion, thus revealing the director's somewhat warped latent Calvinist tendencies. In short, as Brimstone and some of his other films demonstrate, Koolhoven seems to be compelled by a 'Todestrieb,' as if his films are the visceral expression of atavistic impulses associated with being descended from a long line of anti-sex Calvinists. In that sense, Koolhoven's film can certainly be compared to Dutch auteur Jos Stelling's excellent directorial debut Mariken van Nieumeghen (1974) Mariken from Nieumeghen. Undoubtedly, the following words from Nietzschean anarchist Georges Bataille seem to offer some insight into the overly sensual murders of Koolhoven's film, "Erotic activity, by dissolving the separate beings that participate in it, reveals their fundamental continuity, like the waves of a stormy sea. In sacrifice, the victim is divested not only of clothes but of life (or is destroyed in some way if it is an inanimate object). The victim dies and the spectators share in what his death reveals. This is what religious historians call the element of sacredness. This sacredness is the revelation of continuity through the death of a discontinuous being to those who watch it as a solemn rite. A violent death disrupts the creature's discontinuity; what remains, what the tense onlookers experience in the succeeding silence, is the continuity of all existence with which the victim is now one. Only a spectacular killing, carried out as the solemn and collective nature of religion dictates, has the power to reveal what normally escapes notice [...] Everything leads us to the conclusion that in essence the sacramental quality of primitive sacrifices is analogous to the comparable element in contemporary religions." Although just speculation, I have a feeling that the rather visceral and sacrifice-like murders depicted in the film are a degenerate subconscious attempt by Koolhoven—an atheist that had a religious upbringing—to express certain latent spiritual tendencies. Needless to say, Koolhoven would probably benefit from readopting his Calvinist faith and laying off too much exploitation trash lest he devolve into a spiritually deformed creature that is as hopelessly morally and aesthetically bankrupt as Tarantino.

While Brimstone would have the viewer believe that the Old West was a virtual hell-on-earth for all women, the fact remains that, even during that time, Western women were the freest and most privileged women in the entire world. Indeed, it is no coincidence that a long dead kraut fart like Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1860) would complain of "...our old French notions of gallantry and our preposterous system of reverence – that highest product of Teutonic-Christian stupidity." After all, only the metaphysical affliction of feminism and its related comorbid spiritual diseases could inspire the esoteric white knighting depicted Brimstone. In fact, the thing I found most disturbing about the film is that it was produced by a male mind, even if it is not all that strange for a male mind to create scenarios where a very young and nubile dame like Dakota Fanning is forced into sexually compromising positions (though she is never actually depicted nude). As far as westerns are concerned, Hollywood golden age maverick John Ford would have probably deeply loathed the film, or so one would assume from his less than pretentious remark, "I like, as a director and a spectator, simple, direct, frank films. Nothing disgusts me more than snobbism, mannerism, technical gratuity... and, most of all, intellectualism." Speaking of Ford, he practically perfectly described the Reverend's curse and a central theme of the film when he once stated, "Love is the tyrant of the heart; it darkens reason, confounds discretion; deaf to Counsel it runs a headlong course to desperate madness." Plagued by perennial aimless peregrinations in a metaphysical purgatory of the heart, the Reverend is nothing if not the most hopeless of hopeless romantics and a character that reveals that auteur Koolhoven is a passionate man that makes passionate films, even when they are tragically tainted with lame leftist posturing. Despite its flaws, Brimstone is indubitably unforgettable and a cinematic work that merits subsequent viewing. Undoubtedly, were Koolhoven to be 'red-pilled' and receive so much needed lessons from the writings of Nietzsche, Spengler, Evola, and Weininger, he could probably become a great auteur, but for known he seems to be plagued by tactical nihilist tendencies that compel him to subvert primordial archetypes, hence his weakness as an artist. After all, there seems to be an innately repellent quality in the artistic creations of someone that seems to be ashamed of their own genitals, just as there is something quite loathsome about someone that goes to great pains to besmirch and defile their own ancestral faith and culture. If one learns anything by watching Brimstone, it is that Koolhoven seems petrified by the concept of the Old West and he, quite unlike so many generations of American males, really does not have an innate understanding of the romantic quality of being a cowboy and gunning down redskins.

BRIMSTONE

-Ty E

THE PLAGUE DOGS

Martin Rosen (1982) From since i remember, films directed towards children with animals, namely canines, have been produced with various family film production companies. Homeward Bound, Oliver & Company, and Old Yeller are the likelier ones to remember. It's a shame this film has been unknown for so long. This film deserves the term "classic" just as much as the less-worthy films did. See also "Watership Down" The plot features 2 dogs who are differing in size greatly being captive in a laboratory designed for cruel animal experiments. This one is likely to anger PETA officials everywhere. They escape one night after the local idiot guard leaves the latch unlocked. These dogs who have been tortured in the most horrific ways including a brain surgery and endurance testing. After their impromptu escape through the tense-as-hell incinerator, they roam the country side trying to adapt to this cruel world that has denied them the right to live properly. They kill a sheep in an embarrassing spectacle that proves these two dogs need each other. Being as one is small and the other is of a decent size, they play almost a "See No Evil, Hear No Evil; Richard Pryor" sort of relationship. They eventually wind up in huge trouble from the local enforcement for the deaths. Meanwhile, the lab denies all claims of dogs escaping but shit hits the fan when rumors spread that they are infected with the bubonic plague. Not only is this the ultimate anti-children family film ever made, it is also increasingly violent. Gored sheep and dead, rotting things are drawn in a glorious manner. I can imagine this to be traumatizing on little Johnny or Susie. Not recommended for kids. While these things could drive you away from watching this, you must know how much of an impact this film has. This is the Requiem For A Dream of animated films. The content in this animated classic belongs with Heavy Metal for straying away from the thought to be course of the genre. Greatest animated film ever? It is up in the top list. Watch this then go play fetch with your dog, attempting to isolate the horrible feelings you have.

-Maq

THE BIG SHAVE
THE BIG SHAVE

Martin Scorsese (1967)

This short opens with a golden Saxophone score, triumphing as it outlines the pristine porcelain bathroom. Everything is normal in this American home. The knobs are clean and the faucet is leaking. An American man walks up and begins to shave. This seemingly normal exercise of masculinity is interrupted as soon as he doesn't stop. Scorsese asks for six minutes of your time, and in doing so, he cuts a swath of ideas you may have housed in your head towards any sort of political affairs. In a scene that should have inspired Cutting Moments or Cabin Fever, he begins to peel his own skin off. The charming melodic oldie's makes this short visually horrifying and even more so, this beautiful American sink is stained with the blood of it's own forefathers. This all being said as this short was a Vietnam piece. Symbolism in hand, Scorsese maintains the same nihilistic atmosphere as trademarked in all of his films. Long after Bunny Berigan's "I Can't Get Started" is done, the blood doesn't cease dripping. The suggested political involvement is made noticeable from it's previous name "Viet '67" The Big Shave is a metaphorical massacre; a gut punch in most student films. Scorsese had talents at a young age and proved his worth. This generation just houses cheap rockers making shitty no-budget zombie films.

-mAQ

WHO'S THAT KNOCKING AT MY DOOR

Martin Scorsese (1967)

With the unexpected huge commercial success and critical prestige of counterculture flicks like Bonnie and Clyde (1967) directed by Arthur Penn and Easy Rider (1969) directed by Dennis Hopper, a fairly unexpected artistic renaissance began in Tinseltown that would eventually be dubbed 'New Hollywood' (aka 'American New Wave') where the 'auteur' (as opposed to the producer or studio head) was respected and given real artistic freedom for the first time in mainstream American cinema history. Indeed, even George Lucas—a man that has probably done more than anyone else to retard and infantilize cinema—originally stylized himself as an experimental auteur and celluloid poet who was proudly influenced by American avant-garde filmmakers like Jordan Belson, Stan Brakhage and Bruce Conner as well as European arthouse filmmakers like Federico Fellini and Jean-Luc Godard, which is evident in his early and rarely-seen 'pure cinema' shorts like Look at Life (1965), Herbie (1966), 1:42.08 (1966), The Emperor (1967), and Anyone Lived in a Pretty How Town (1967). Of course, not unlike many filmmakers of his generation, Lucas decided to give up on any artistic pretenses that he previously had after the abject critical and commercial of his debut feature THX 1138 (1971). Additionally, while he originally intended to establish himself as a highly personal auteur, Francis Ford Coppola ironically became famous after directing The Godfather (1972), which is a film that he initially refused to direct and would ultimately prove to be a mixed blessing for the filmmaker, who never actually became the great European style 'artiste' he dreamed of being (notably, when Coppola was at the height of his megalomania while working on post-production for Apocalypse Now (1979), he temporarily decided he wanted to be a sort of American Syberberg and declared that he planned to direct a ten-hour 3-D adaptation of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's third novel Die Wahlverwandtschaften (1809) aka Elective Affinities). Whereas some of the filmmakers of New Hollywood never had any sort of success like Henry Jaglom and others simply burned out after a series of cataclysmic commercial failures like Peter Bogdanovich and William Friedkin, a handful of filmmakers actually managed to survive, especially Martin Scorsese, though his perseverance ultimately came at the decided detriment of his art. While Scorsese's most recent feature The Wolf of Wall Street (2013) makes him seem like not much more than a sort of morally bankrupt celluloid DJ who simply constructs degenerate pseudo-Dionysian montages to go along with terribly played-out pop songs that have been featured in dozens (if not hundreds) of other films, there was actually a time when he hoped to be an American equivalent to Roberto Rossellini (after all, it is no coincidence that he married the maestro's daughter Isabella Rossellini).

Undoubtedly, out of all of his films, Scorsese's somewhat forgotten debut feature Who's That Knocking at My Door (1967) is unequivocally the much beloved filmmaker's most innately personal, experimental, and artsy fartsy work to date, even if it is a sort of warm-up for his somewhat superior work Mean Streets (1973). In fact, when proto-indie auteur John Cassavetes, who later became a sort of mentor and father figure to Scorsese, saw the film, he was so impressed that he stated, "This movie is as good as CITIZEN KANE. No, it's better than CITIZEN KANE, it's got more heart." Additionally, Roger Ebert was so deeply affected upon seeing the film at the 1967 Chicago International Film Festival that he penned a rave review where he stated that it was, "a work that is absolutely genuine, artistically satisfying and technically comparable to the best films being made anywhere. I have no reservations in describing it as a great moment in American movies." Originally intended as Scorsese's graduate film at NYU (in fact, the director's Armenian-American professor Haig Manoogian co-produced it) and the second part of a projected trilogy about growing up in Little Italy (the third part, which was originally titled Season of the Witch, would later evolve into Mean Streets), Who's That Knocking at My Door had various names and lengths before becoming the film it is today, including a 65-minute cut entitled Bring on the Dancing Girls, which was poorly received on its debut. Ultimately, Scorsese managed to save the film by adding a romantic subplot featuring Zina Bethune, as well as an erotic dream-sequence that was shot in Amsterdam (Scorsese would also contribute dialogue to Wim Verstappen's script for Surinamese-Dutch-Jewish filmmaker Pim de la Parra's Dutch-German pseudo-Hitchcockian homage to Republic Pictures, Obsessions (1969) aka Bezeten, Het Gat in de Muur aka Besessen - Das Loch in der Wand). Somewhat ironically, Scorsese only shot the amorous dream-sequence because sexploitation producer Joseph Brenner offered to buy and distribute Who's That Knocking at My Door if he added the smutty scene, which ultimately proved to be one of the most artful and memorable aspects of the entire film.

WHO'S THAT KNOCKING AT MY DOOR

Proudly described by Scorsese himself in Scorsese on Scorsese (2003) as, "...the first film to show what Italian-Americans really were like and that was what was good about it," Who's That Knocking at My Door might be best described as the filmmaker's cruder and all the grittier equivalent to Federico Fellini's I Vitelloni (1953) as a film that features a fairly sentimental yet less than flattering depiction of a group of young urban guidos from Little Italy that seem to live in a state of perpetual childhood and have yet to start families or serious careers. Indeed, comparing both films, one might assume that the Italians of the mother country are doing slightly better than their somewhat deracinated American counterparts, but I digress. A somewhat dated work in our peak degenerate Jersey Shore age in the sense that the young wops depicted in the film are so still cuckolded enough by Catholicism that they are actually afraid to have sex before marriage, Scorsese's film truly feels like an important historical artifact nowadays as it depicts a forgotten bygone era before every young NYC goombah was a pill-popping aspiring rapper. The somewhat somber, bittersweet, and pathetic yet strangely heartfelt tale of a truly ignorant and proudly boorish unemployed young Sicilian-American who falls for a nameless college-educated blonde WASP of the considerably more cultivated sort and must inevitably confront the fact that Catholicism has turned him into a sort of sexual and social autistic of sorts upon losing his Aryan lady love after he treats her like a piece of despoiled trash when she puts her heart on the line and confesses to him that she was once raped, Who's That Knocking at My Door ultimately tells a simple story in a raw and energetic yet elegant fashion that would later come to epitomize the director's greatest works.

To give the film a sort of true Little Italy vibe that highlights the sort of tradition oriented closed community that the protagonist and his comrades come from, Who's That Knocking at My Door begins with a sentimental quasi-neorealist scene featuring a fat grey-haired guido grandmother making and baking a Stromboli (or possibly a calzone) and then serving it to her five grandchildren, with one of the children assumedly being the male lead. After this fairly wholesome scene and a brief title sequence, Scorsese abruptly slaps the viewer across the face with a violent fight scene where two rival guido gangs beat the shit out of each other with clubs for seemingly no reason like brain-dead barbarians who need a therapeutic outlet for their instinctual desire to rape and pillage. hilariously, a guido sporting a white headband kisses a large crucifix he is wearing around his neck before the fight, only to get his ass immediately beat with a club to the face, thus revealing that Jesus does not answer everyone's prayers. Luckily for protagonist J.R. (Harvey Keitel), his little gang wins the brawl and he celebrates by playfully hitting his best friend Joey (Lennard Kuras), who is a somewhat annoying little twat that incessantly talks out of his ass but is clearly the more domineering of the two in the friendship. Indeed, as demonstrated by the fact that he smacks that shit of his philistine friend Sally Gaga (Michael Scala)—a fellow that is so hopelessly sleazy that he steals $40.00 out of his girlfriend's purse while making out with her—after catching him gambling at their local bar with cash that he stole from him, Joey is the dictator of the group, at least in his own mind. A somewhat more stoic fellow, J.R. seems to ignore a lot of Joey's moronic behavior because he seems completely oblivious to how stupid and crude his friend is acting. While the guys like playing practical jokes on one another like aiming loaded weapons at each other while drunk, there is not much pointless drama that goes on in the group aside from a scene where Joey temporarily throws J.R. out of his car after the get in a pointless argument. Of course, J.R.'s animosity towards Joey was largely inspired by an outside source. Indeed, virtually all of the drama depicted in Who's That Knocking at My Door takes place in the film's somewhat crudely constructed romantic subplot, which depicts the absurdity that ensues when a terribly naïve and seemingly virginal Catholic momma's boy from a closed community begins a somewhat unlikely hot and heavy romance with an Anglo-Saxon beauty of the fairly cultivated and literate sort.

WHO'S THAT KNOCKING AT MY DOOR

While waiting at a ferry station and looking all moody and broody, gentleman J.R. becomes absolutely enamored with the fact that a publicity shot of John Wayne from John Ford's classic Western The Searchers (1956) is featured in a French magazine that a young blonde 'Girl' (Zina Bethune) that is sitting beside him is reading. Since J.R. keeps looking at her magazine in a somewhat obnoxious fashion, the Girl decides to break the tension and asks him if he wants to look at it, but he says no and then awkwardly remarks, "Yeah, but that isn't an American magazine. . .and it just seemed funny to me. You know what I mean?" Of course, the Girl, who seems like the sort of upper-class gal that would have attended some fancy prep school, has no clue what J.R. means, but she seems somewhat entranced by the shy young Sicilian and his strange ways, as if he is a potential forbidden pleasure for her. From there, J.R. goes on a pointless spiel about how great The Searchers is and when the Girl remarks, "Well, I'm not used to admitting I like Westerns," he replies in a playful pseudo-offended manner, "Oh, yeah, Why not, huh? Everybody should like Westerns. Solve everybody's problems if they liked Westerns." At this point, the Girl laughs in a flirtatious fashion and remarks, "Okay, I like Westerns!," thus demonstrating that she is interested enough in J.R. to listen to and agree with his truly childish discussions about Westerns. Unfortunately, unbeknownst to the Girl, J.R. is so badly brainwashed by his spiritually castrating Catholic upbringing that he will not share carnal knowledge with her, let alone be able to handle the fact that she was once violently raped. Indeed, in J.R.'s eyes, it does not matter if a girl was physically forced to have sex by a violent rapist, as she has already been fucked and thus is not respectable marriage material.

As J.R. explains to the Girl after a screening of Howard Hawks' Rio Bravo (1959) regarding the difference between 'girls' and 'broad,' "You know what a – a broad isn't exactly a virgin, you know what I mean? You play around with them, you don't... You don't marry a broad." Indeed, according to J.R., Angie Dickinson's character in Rio Bravo is a 'broad,' as she is as loose as a goose and thus too irrevocably despoiled to be any self-respecting man's spouse. Of course, the Girl seems somewhat offended by what J.R. says and she even asks him if he is serious, but she, like many young women that are just starting a new relationship with a man that they are infatuated with, attempts to shrug it off just like she shrugs off most of the moronic things he says. Needless to say, when the Girl reveals to him her big secret about being traumatically sexually ravaged, J.R. will also begin thinking of her as a 'broad,' even if he does not want to, as it is an impulsive reaction to his strict religious upbringing. When the two make-out with one another and things get a little bit too heated, J.R. practically acts like a petrified middle schoolboy and stops before either of them even has the chance to take their shirt off. Additionally, J.R. acts exceedingly anally retentive about his mother's Catholic religious decorations. Indeed, when the Girl admires a statue of the Mother Mary while they are kissing, J.R. freaks out and yells, "Don't touch it. Anything happens to that, my mother will pass out." Of course, J.R.'s remark reveals that he has serious Oedipal issues and that probably no woman could ever live up to his mother, especially not some blonde Protestant chick who does not know how to cook decent pasta. When J.R. abruptly aborts one of their make-out sessions while the two are on the verge of engaging in steamy session of the four-legged frolic, he tries in vain to articulate to the Girl why he will not go all the way and fuck her like a man and while stumbling on his words he less than eloquently states, "Listen, I . . . I love you. I love you, but [...] Well, now I feel...I feel silly saying this. What I mean is...If you love me, you'll understand what I mean. Just not now." While the Girl caters to J.R. glaring sensitives, she cannot seem to figure out what is wrong with him, especially since he has a sort of pseudo-stoic tough guy attitude where he attempts to hide and ignore any of vulnerabilities. Naturally, when the Girl reveals her big secret, J.R. has more than a little bit of trouble masking his irrational rage.

While his fairly mundane aborted make-out sessions with the Girl make him seem like an evasive eunuch who is trying to hide the fact that his cock does not work, J.R.'s personal dreams reveal that his true sexual instincts are much more primal and fetishistic. Indeed, in an extended erotic dream-sequence juxtaposed with the classic psychedelic rock song "The End" by The Doors, J.R. finds himself naked and tied to a bed in an ethereal S&M scene where it is quite obvious that actor Harvey Keitel has aged somewhat since the other parts of the film were shot. During these scenes, J.R. encounters no less than three different prostitutes with varying tit sizes, with one of them fittingly being portrayed by stunning frog beauty Anne Collette, who is probably best known for starring in Godard's pre-Breathless shorts Charlotte et Véronique, ou Tous les garçons s'appellent Patrick (1959) aka All the Boys Are Called Patrick and Charlotte et son Jules (1960) aka Charlotte and Her Boyfriend. Rather revealingly, during the dream-sequence, the viewer is exposed to Jim Morrison's overtly Oedipal spoken word lyrics, "The killer awoke before dawn...He put his boots on...He took a face from the ancient gallery...And he walked on down the hall...He went to the room where his sister lived...And then he paid a visit to his brother...And then he walked on down the hall...And he came to a door...And he looked inside...'Father'...'Yes, son?'...'I want to kill you'...'Mother I want to...'," thus underscoring J.R.'s pathological obsession with both his mother and Jesus' mommy. Undoubtedly, it becomes apparent to the viewer while watching this debauched yet surprisingly aesthetically delicious dream-sequence that the protagonist is a masochist of sorts who, despite his worship of macho Western figures like John Wayne, gets off to being in a submissive position with women. In that sense, it is no surprise that his relationship with the Girl fails because she is far too passive and restrained to make an adequate lover for the protagonist. Indeed, what J.R. seems to need is the stereotypical incessant nagging guidette with jet-black hair who beats him over head with a broom if he gets too out of line.

WHO'S THAT KNOCKING AT MY DOOR

If any segment of the film truly reveals how sheltered J.R. and his friends are from the world as a whole as individuals that live in a closed urban community, it is when they take a road trip to the rural area of Copake, New York and find themselves totally out of their element, especially Joey, who bitches the entire time like a prissy preteen with PMS. While Hollywood tells us that it is small town rural folk and rednecks who are close-minded bigots that hate anyone that is not like them, in Scorsese's film it is the NYC wops that do all the shit-talking, as they see the rural WASPs as dumb hicks, even though they somewhat resemble the sort of cowboys in John Ford flicks that the protagonist and his friends admire. Of course, to J.R. and his pals' credit, the Copake locals are fairly petty, with a couple of them getting in a petty drunken argument about the pronunciation of the town's name, stating it's "Not Copake, but Copiague" (as someone that grew up in a rural area, I can attest that it is not uncommon for small town yokels to get offended if outsiders do not pronounce the name of their town in the same idiosyncratic fashion). After hanging out at the bar, the boys climb up a small mountain, though Joey complains the entire way and almost gives up as he seems afraid of treading through leaves and sticks, as if it is too much of a culture shock for him to walk on anything aside from flat NYC asphalt. When they finally reach the top of the mountain, J.R. admires the scenic view while Joey bitches to himself, "Three, four hours I spend climbing a mountain. For what? To come up here. So, what's up here? Big deal. I don't understand."

While J.R. and the Girl seem genuinely in love with one another in a sort of hopelessly infatuated naive high school kid sort of way, the protagonist cannot help berate his girlfriend for the most petty of reasons to the point where he acts like she is a retarded child, even though she is clearly much smarter and more articulate than he is. Indeed, when the Girl attempts to be kind and thoughtful by lighting a candle and putting it on his kitchen table, J.R. immediately complains that she is not supposed to put a "holy candle" on a kitchen table. After the holy candle incident, the Girl drops a bomb on J.R. by stating, "I have to tell you something [...] I love you, and I do want it to last" and then reveals a traumatic life-changing incident from a couple years ago when she was driven to a quiet country road during night by a seemingly nice male suitor and violently raped when she refused to put out. While the Girl merely wants J.R.'s sympathy and acceptance and confesses in a somewhat embarrassed fashion, "I felt dirty. I felt I wasn't as good as anyone else. I felt ashamed. I couldn't even talk. I didn't talk. I love you. And I don't wanna lose you. With you it'll be the first time," the protagonist is only angered and more or less blames her for what happened, stating to her in a somewhat hostile fashion, "How could I believe you? Well, how could I believe you? How can I believe that story? It just doesn't make any sense.” In fact, at one point, J.R. yells at the girl “Look at me” and then interrogates her in an invasive fashion by stating, “you go out with a guy and don’t even know what he’s like? You let him take you out on some goddamn road and you don’t mind it. It just... It doesn’t... It just doesn’t seem real, does it? It just doesn’t make any sense.” Naturally quite upset that her lover would dare to question the authenticity of what is probably the most traumatic experience of her entire life, the Girl eventually cries “It’s true!” and then storms out of J.R.’s apartment after he continues to hostilely question her.

After spending a night getting drunk with friends and savagely teasing two fairly unintelligent Jewesses that Sally Gaga brings by (among other things, the boys scare the Hebrewesses by putting fish in their drinks), J.R. still cannot get over his bitter last meeting with the Girl and thus decides to pay her an unexpected early morning visit at her apartment. Like the almost completely unconsciously self-absorbed man-child that he is, J.R. obnoxiously bangs on the Girl’s front-door for an extended period of time until she eventually responds and when she asks “Who is it?,” he hilariously replies like a dump wop “It’s me” instead of saying his name, hence the title of the film (which is also a reference to the song “Who’s That Knocking?” by the Genies, which is played near the end of the flick). Despite J.R.’s rather rude early morning knocking, the Girl is quite thrilled to see him. While J.R. has come to apologize to the Girl for how harshly he treated her after she revealed to him her rape story, it is ultimately not an apology that any self-respecting person would accept. Indeed, after making a generic general apology while the two are making out, J.R. states to the girl “I understand now, and I forgive you,” as if it is her fault that she got raped. At this point, the Girl gets noticeably annoyed and asks, “Forgive me?,” to which unwitting moron J.R. replies, “Yes. I forgive you, and I’m gonna marry you anyway,” as if he is a particularly prized piece of man meat that is doing her a big favor. When the Girl asks if her rape story bothers him, J.R. replies in a somewhat angry fashion, “Well, yeah, it bothers me, damn it. But I love you, and I’ll marry you anyway,” so she responds, “No, I can’t. I mean, I won’t marry you on that basis.” Of course, J.R. is so hopelessly deluded by his Catholic upbringing that he actually believes he is doing the Girl a favor by offering to marry her even though she is ostensibly damaged goods. While the only the the Girl wants from him is his sympathy, J.R. just cannot seem to figure this out. Totally incapable of wrapping his head around the fact that someone as supposedly despoiled and unholy as the Girl would refuse to marry him, J.R. goes berserk and proceeds to make all sorts of absurd accusations, stating to her while she is clearly upset and turned in the opposite direction, “Who do you think you are, the Virgin Mary or something? Leading me on like that, letting me in here this hour of the morning. Leading me on like that, letting me in here this hour of the morning. Come off it, will you? What kind of broad does that make you? And tell me something else. Who else is gonna marry you? Tell me that, you whore. Because that's what you are, if you don't know it by now, you whore." While J.R. eventually becomes aware of how harsh and irrational he is acting and apologizes, the damage has already been done and the naturally Girl asks him to leave.

WHO'S THAT KNOCKING AT MY DOOR

After J.R.'s failed final meeting with the Girl, the film segues into an unforgettable montage that features the protagonist walking into a Catholic confessional booth intercut with shots of the Girl's rape, statues of Christ on the cross and the Virgin Mary, and excerpts from the amorous dream-sequence in an intricately edited segment that pretty much sum up most of the central themes of the film. At one point in the montage, J.R. sensually kisses a crucifix in what is a somewhat unsettling shot that really highlights how Catholicism has warped the character's sexuality. Undoubtedly, the eloquently shots of the Catholic Church and iconography recall the films of Spanish documentary auteur José Val del Omar, especially his trilogy Tríptico Elemental de España (1953-1960) aka Elementary Tryptich of Spain. Notably, the very final shot of the film is a night scene where J.R. states to his best bud Joey, "OK, I'll talk to you tomorrow" and then the two head their separate ways to go home to sleep in preparation another mundane day of stupid nothingness upon stupid nothingness, thereupon underscoring the sterility and stagnation of their decidedly dead-end lives as uneducated and unemployed young goombah bums that have no chance of making it in the real world. Certainly, had Scorsese not become a filmmaker, there is probably a good chance that he would have turned out a lot like J.R. and his friends.

While Who's That Knocking at My Door was obviously influenced by a number of European arthouse filmmakers that were popular at the time it was made like Ingmar Bergman, Jean-Luc Godard, and Pier Paolo Pasolini, its imperative American influences cannot be ignored. Indeed, aside from Scorsese's acknowledged influence from Kenneth Anger (who influenced his now signature use of pop music) and John Cassavetes (who arguably had a greater influence on him than any other filmmaker, at least during his early pre-fame years), the film seems to have been influenced by somewhat more obscure avant-gardists like John E. Schmitz and Gregory J. Markopoulos, especially in regard to the auteurs' somewhat ritualistic and even metaphysical approach to repressed sexuality. Schmitz, who was a buddy of Anger, is probably best known for his phantasmagoric black-and-white short The Voices (1953), which, not unlike Who's That Knocking at My Door, is almost homoerotic in its depiction of a rather repressed and frustrated young man that is both literally and figuratively haunted by chicks and crucifixes, among other things. In its depiction of an 'ethnic' momma's boy whose sexuality almost seems completely cursed by his mother's influence, as well as heavy use of fragmented editing, Scorsese's debut feature has much in common with Markopoulos' films, especially works like Christmas U.S.A. (1949) and Twice a Man (1964). Of course, despite his cultivated cinematic influences, it is even apparent in his first feature that Scorsese still wants to entertain the sort of crude crouch-grabbing lumpenproles that he grew up with, hence why the film opens up with a nice and trashy brawl. Indeed, as Scorsese once said in the book Easy Riders, Raging Bulls (1998) by Peter Biskind in regard to his target viewers, "After NEW YORK, NEW YORK, I thought, I'll never have the audience of Spielberg, not even of Francis [Ford Coppola]. My audience is the guys I grew up around, wiseguys, guys from Queens, truck drivers, guys loading furniture. If they think it's good, I'm fine. Maybe I'm crazy." Unfortunately, it seems Scorsese's most recent films appeal to drunken frat-boys and zany Zionist psychopaths.

Rather unfortunately, as most of his post-The Last Temptation of Christ (1988) films demonstrates, Scorsese has unfortunately totally given up on being any sort of serious auteur with a strong personal vision. Indeed, as Scorsese also stated in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls in regard to his decision to reinvent himself during the late-1980s after the commercial failure of some of his best works, including Raging Bull (1980) and The King of Comedy (1982), "I had to make up my mind whether I really wanted to continue making films. There was such negativity that you might as well stop. So what do you do? Stay down dead? No. I realized then, you can't let the system crush your spirit. I really did want to continue making pictures [...] I'm going to try to be a pro and start all over again." Notably, Scorsese's mentor Cassavetes attempted to warn him early in his career to never degrade himself and accept hack work (indeed, when he made the Bonnie and Clyde rip-off Boxcar Bertha (1972) for Roger Corman, Cassavetes apparently stated to him, "Nice work, but don't fucking ever do something like this again. Why don't you make a movie about something you really care about."), but unfortunately he did not listen to this advice and instead traded in his artistic integrity for the shallow American dream of fame and fortune. Of course, Scorsese would go on to make tons of money, but he would also besmirch his legacy by directing pointless remakes (e.g. Cape Fear (1991)) and fairly lame sequels to classic Hollywood films (e.g. The Color of Money (1986)). With bombastic CGI-ridden big budget Leonardo DiCaprio vehicles like Shutter Island (2010), which makes absurd references to Dachau concentration camp, and The Wolf of Wall Street (2013), which glorifies a real-life psychopathic kosher conman, Scorsese would also reveal that he is an unequivocal Shabbos goy, which of course is mandatory if you plan to be successful in Hollywood as indicated by the fall of Mel Gibson. Of course, then again, Scorsese's arguable magnum opus, Taxi Driver (1976), was penned by Paul Schrader, thus hinting that he was always more of a talented craftsman than a distinctive auteur. In fact, it could be argued that most of the great filmmakers of New Hollywood, including Francis Ford Coppola, Brian De Palma, William Friedkin, Bob Rafelson, and Hal Ashby, were not true auteurs because they did not write their own original material and instead mainly adapted other people's novels. As Biskind wrote, "The ugly truth is that some directors never had much to say in the first place. Their own self-estimation to the contrary, most of them were not auteurs, not in the sense that Woody Allen is an auteur. Few directed movies from their own scripts; they were hostage to the material they were given. Says Coppola, 'Even the great directors are not all great screenwriters. Scorsese is not the kind of guy who's going to sit in a room alone and just write about something. He needs that perfect book.'" While it is just mere speculation on my part, I am going to have to assume that Scorsese already said all he had to say with Who's That Knocking at My Door and Mean Streets, as there are only so many personal stories you can tell if you're a sickly film nerd that grew up hanging around philistine low-lives in Little Italy.

WHO'S THAT KNOCKING AT MY DOOR

While probably nowhere near his greatest film, Who's That Knocking at My Door is more intriguing to me than most of Scorsese's movies because there is an undeniable visceral authenticity to it that is just plain nonexistent in his later works. Indeed, while The Age of Innocence (1993), Kundun (1997), and Gangs of New York (2002) might be quite different in terms of genre and setting, they are all star-driven works that seem like they could have been directed by virtually any highly technically proficient Hollywood Golden Age studio hack. In other words, I think one could learn more about Scorsese the man by watching one of his early shorts like It's Not Just You, Murray! (1964) and The Big Shave (1967) or his somewhat obscure documentaries like Italianamerican (1974) and American Boy: A Profile of Steven Prince (1978) than by watching all the films that he has directed in over the past twenty-five years combined. Of course, most great European auteur filmmakers like Bergman, Pasolini, Fellini, Fassbinder, and Antonioni directed personal auteur films until they dropped dead, thus underscoring the difference between America and Europa when it comes to cinema and culture in general. While I might not be too fond of much of his work, I can at least respect Godard for never giving up in terms of staying so dedicated to making highly personal auteur films that hardly anyone cares about any of the films that he has made over the past couple decades because he has completely alienated most audiences due to the increasingly arcane Verfremdungseffekt-oriented nature of his work. On the other hand, Scorsese has never pretended to be anything that he isn't and I think he eventually came to the realization that he had more in common with a fellow American like John Ford than one of his European cinematic heroes like Fellini and Rossellini, as a filmmaker that just loves directing films, even if they are not too personal. As Who's That Knocking at My Door reveals in a fairly blatant fashion, Ford has always been one of Scorsese's greatest cinematic heroes and that is just one of the many reasons why the film is a crucial work in the filmmaker's somewhat uneven oeuvre. If Scorsese's film has any historical value, it is immortalizing NYC's Little Italy before it got taken over by various forms of mystery meat from the third world. Somewhat symbolically, one of film's actors, Michael Scala, had a son that went on to become a rapper named 'Pizan,' thus reflecting the abject cultural degeneration of Italian-Americans, who now pathetically imitate the very people they used to collectively hate (indeed, as Scorsese's longtime buddy/collaborator Robert De Niro's directorial debut A Bronx Tale (1993) reveals, guidos used to have no love for the 'Moulinyan'). Made at a time when many Catholic girls would only let guys fuck them in the ass because they felt it was a reasonable means of hanging onto their virginity, Who's That Knocking at My Door is also an insightful psycho-dramatic remainder about how Catholicism perpetuates sexual psychosis. Indeed, as someone that once started a relationship with a 21-year-old Catholic virgin who ultimately demonstrated that she had more pussy prowess than many women with a decade of carnal experience under their belt, I firmly believe that, at least in some cases, Catholicism can act as a sort of perpetual aphrodisiac.

-Ty E

TAXI DRIVER
TAXI DRIVER

Martin Scorsese (1976)

If there is a director that American cinephiles and film students all unanimously have a hard-on for, it is NYC “sometimes” auteur Martin Scorsese. Martin Scorsese has had a long and, for the most part, consistent career for over four decades. Fans of Scorsese have to admit that they love early artsy fartsy films like Who’s That Knocking at My Door just like they enjoy fun mafia wopfest Goodfellas. Without a doubt, Taxi Driver is one of Scorsese’s most popular and critically acclaimed films. I personally believe Taxi Driver to be both Scorsese’s greatest and most important film. Martin Scorsese maybe a NYC WOP, but that doesn’t mean the films he directed about the mafia are his greatest. With Taxi Driver, Martin Scorsese was able to achieve creating a film that was a cinematic attack to viewer’s eyes and ears. Although I have never been a fan (and never will be) of degenerate Jazz, the score in Taxi Driver by Bernard Herrmann is one of the best musical accompaniment to a film in cinema history. Herrmann is also known for providing the scores to Alfred Hitchcock’s greatest films such as Psycho, Vertigo, North By Northwest, and a variety of others. Despite creating a score for a completely different type of film, Bernard Herrmann was able to resonate the dreary tone of Taxi Driver and anti-hero Travis Bickle’s undeniably pathetic life. Martin Scorsese is now often known for using pop music (which he borrowed from Kenneth Anger) in his films, but with Taxi Driver I believe he was most successful in creating a cinematic assault of both sight and sound. Despite the film’s simple title, Taxi Driver is quite the fitting title. The film’s anti-hero Travis Bickle, is pathetic as they come. Despite being pretty much a loser, he works nights 60 hours or so a week and is assumed to be a Vietnam veteran. For someone who has fought for his country, Travis has yet to receive any real thanks for heroics. Instead, he drives around the DARK urban jungle streets like at a city that looks like it’s on the verge of an apocalypse. Travis Bickle has odd relationships with other human beings and has no friends. I must admit that Taxi Driver successfully captures loneliness and an anti-social existence better than any other film I have yet to see. The emotions and themes found in Taxi Driver are very rare for an American film, especially a mainstream film. One could say that Taxi Driver is one of the few truly American films that has a genuinely anti-Hollywood feel to it. For that alone, Martin Scorsese should be commended. In Taxi Driver, Travis Bickle decides to take the law in his own hands. Bickle’s actions in the film, although virtuous and righteous, seem to be more a form of venting than merely to “do the right thing.” Bickle does the right thing when he decides to target the pathetic pimp Matthew (aka sport). Pimps are easily one of the most lowly scum and parasitical creatures out there. The real man is supposed to provide and take care of a woman. The pimp does the opposite and lives off women by putting their lives in danger merely for financial gain. In contemporary society, “pimp” has turned into a word associated with a “cool” and “badass” dude. With an assortment of self-loathing white Wiggers and criminally inclined blacks, tons of impotent American males want to be thought of as the truly anti-manly “pimp.” Travis Bickle, by confronting a pimp and saving a 12 year olds life, shows what a real (although unconventional) man is. The only flaw with the Taxi Driver is that the film should have ended after Travis Bickle’s “shootout session.” The high angle shot in slow motion featuring Travis bloody on the couch with police breaking in should have been where the film ended. What happened to Travis after his trigger happy mission is irrelevant. I feel that Martin Scorsese settled for a more “Hollywood” ending so that the typical infantile minded American viewer doesn’t get confused or felt “cheated.” I almost felt that “happy” ending added on to be a little silly and in conflict with the overall film. Chronic insomnia, porn addiction, irrational urges, and alienation are symptoms of our contemporary apocalyptic world. Travis Bickle was a man that went the next step and attempted to transcend the world for something more real. In a world that seems to be only getting worse as the years pass, America needs more films about people like Travis Bickle and the dystopian nightmare before him that he constantly contemplates about. Films like Taxi Driver are rare in the mainstream, and the opposite of what Hollywood wants to present. Hollywood wants to train preteen girls to be sluts, train white boys to want to be black criminals, and influence black men to sell crack. The real question is, why hasn’t a Travis Bickle type taken a trip to Sunset Boulevard?

-Ty E

THE WOLF OF WALL STREET
THE WOLF OF WALL STREET

Martin Scorsese (2013)

The older I get, the more I realize that darling American Guido film director Martin Scorsese is not an artist but a mere pumped up artisan and that British auteur Peter Greenaway was right when he said of the director that he is still “making the same films that D.W. Griffith was making early last century” and that a video artist Bill Viola is “worth 10 Martin Scorseses.” Indeed, it seems Scorsese has been making the same film since Goodfellas (1990) and that his masterpiece, Taxi Driver (1976), is largely the result of Paul Schrader’s writing. Undoubtedly, with his latest flashy one-note epic The Wolf of Wall Street (2013)—a virtual three-hour-long music video celebrating psychopathic Judaic white collar criminals—Scorsese has really outdone himself, not only demonstrating that he must have fried his brain from all the excessive cocaine use over the years, but that he is also a Sicilian-American Shabbos goy who is willing to go to any extreme to please his masters. Although only referenced in cryptic ways (i.e. Yiddish slang, derogative references to WASPs), The Wolf of Wall Street is a work that essentially pays totally tasteless and puffery-plagued tribute to the fact that a real-life Semitic stockbroker named Jordan R. Belfort swindled countless rich (and poor) WASPs out of their money as a pseudo-Robin Hood of the highly Hebraic sort. Adapted from the memoirs of Belfort—who ultimately spent a mere 22 months in prison after stealing $200 million dollars and being convicted of fraud relating to stock market manipulation and running a penny stock boiler room (the ‘pump and dump’ method)—by writer/producer Terence Winter (The Sopranos, Boardwalk Empire), The Wolf of Wall Street is nothing if not a piece of patently pompous and bombastic psychopathic celluloid of the superlatively soulless sort the manages to combine the criminal-worship of Goodfellas with senseless Hebraic hyper-hedonism and juvenile Judaic scat humor of Superbad (2007), which is certainly an aesthetically corrosive kosher combo that only the most decidedly debased of degenerates will enjoy swallowing. Starring good goy Aryan actor Leonardo DiCaprio as a drug-addled degenerate Heeb with an unquenchable thirst for theft, hookers, Quaaludes who made millions upon millions ruining countless lives and was punished with less than two years in a country club prison, The Wolf of Wall Street is ultimately a depiction of the American dream in the post-WASP-rule age of kosher con men like Bernie Madoff. Starring singularly repugnant lard ass Jonah Hill (real name Jonah Feldstein) as the Wolf’s best friend/coconspirator (based on real-life Belfort co-conspirator/Israelite Danny Porush), The Wolf of Wall Street also demonstrates that you can be ugly both on the inside and outside in America and still be richer than the devil himself. Featuring the real Jordan Belfort in a cameo role at the very conclusion of film, The Wolf of Wall Street is ultimately a true and trying testament to the fact that Martin Scorsese’s morals are just as cheap and tasteless as his absurdly overrated 'artistry.'

The year is 1987 and young budding psychopath Jordan Belfort (Leonardo DiCaprio) manages to land a job with the Rothschilds (aka the most evil Jewish banking family in all of human history, which has been essentially responsible for funding both sides of every European/American war for the past couple centuries) on Wall Street. Baby Belfort becomes the protégé of his decidedly debauched boss Mark Hanna (Matthew McConaughey), who recommends that his employee literally masturbate to the thought of money, fuel himself via cocaine, and see streetwalkers regularly. Belfort has no problem following his boss' odious orders and eventually passes his Series 7 Exam and earns his broker's license, but he loses his job not long after because of 'Black Monday' (October 19, 1987) when the stock markets around the world crashed. With the help of his supportive wop wife Teresa Petrillo (Cristin Milioti), Belfort manages to find a job with an undignified Long Island-based 'boiler room' outfit which deals in dubious 'penny stocks', thus allowing him to become a big fish in a small pond as a man who had real experience on Wall Street. With his aggressively charismatic and psychopathic sales pitches, Belfort manages to profit handsomely by scamming poor schmucks out of their hard earned bucks. Not long after, Belfort meets a fellow Hebraic brother named Donnie Azoff (played by Jonah Hill in a role based on Belfort's real-life criminal partner Danny Porush) who, on top of being married to his cousin, wears nerdy glasses so people think he is a WASP. Belfort and Azoff star their own firm, Stratton Oakmont, and they hire a bunch of the latter's dope-dealing friends to peddle scam stocks for them. Belfort also hires his parents and despite being Jewish, he lovingly describes his father "Mad" Max (Rob Reiner) as his own personal Gestapo.

The firm eventually evolves into a billion-dollar entity and they move into a huge building and one of the employees (who later blows his brains out) christens the office by receiving a blow job from a secretary in the elevator. Before long, the office turns into a 24 hour orgy where employees snort coke and screw prostitutes in the bathroom. Meanwhile, Belfort cheats on his wife and hooks up with a hot blond bimbo named Naomi Lapaglia (Margot Robbie) who he ultimately divorces his Guido wifey for. Before marrying high dollar whore Naomi, Belfort blows $2 million on an overextended bachelor's party that includes a luxury plane ride with fifty prostitutes and a pharmacy full of drugs, as well as another fifty prostitutes for when they land. After they marry, Belfort and Naomi have a daughter, but the husband continues seeing prostitutes, including a dominatrix who he allows to shove candles up his less than kosher, kosher ass. Addicted to coke, ludes, morphine, alcohol, and loose prostitute pussy, Belfort is probably in the wrong state of mind to deal with the FBI, but after attempting to bribe a morally pristine agent named Patrick Denham (Kyle Chandler), he begins to become routinely hounded by the Feds and thus begins laundering money to a Swiss bank account with the help of a Swiss degenerate named Jean-Jacques

THE WOLF OF WALL STREET

Saurel (Jean Dujardin). Among other things, Belfort manages to destroy a yacht that used to be owned by Coco Chanel after he idiotically orders the captain of his ship to sail in a storm while his family is on board, thus demonstrating both his psychopathic and self-destructive tendencies. After seeing a plane that was supposed to pick him up explode in mid air, egomaniac Belfort believes it is a sign from god to sober up, but not long after ending his lechery he is picked up by the FBI while filming a sleazy infomercial. It is revealed that Belfort's Swiss partner Saurel was arrested and squealed to the cops, thus incriminating everyone at Stratton. Of course, Belfort bitches out, complies with the FBI, and agrees to wear a wire. On top of that, Belfort's wife asks for a divorce, so he beats her up, gets high, attempts to kidnap his own daughter, and crashes his car in his driveway with said daughter in the passenger seat. In the end, Belfort naturally pussies out and tells the cops everything, thus leading to a raid of Stratton and the destruction of his entire life's work. Sentenced to three years in prison, Belfort has a plush stay at a country club-like minimum security prison where he can play tennis and pretend to be a WASP. After getting out of prison after a mere 22 months, Belfort becomes a 'motivational speaker' and teaches individuals how to con people just like he conned some many people before.

A couple days ago, Joel M. Cohen, a former federal prosecutor who prosecuted Jordan Belfort when he an assistant United States attorney, wrote an article entitled 'The Real Belfort Story Missing From 'Wolf' Movie' that totally demystifies Scorsese's film and exposes that the white collar antihero continues to con people to this day with his lie-ridden self-flattering memoirs. Aside from the fact that Cohen reveals that Belfort was never really called 'the Wolf of Wall Street' but merely created the catchy narcissistic name to sell his books, the ex-prosecutor revealed that the man he prosecuted was a true blue coward, stating, "His now-defunct firm, Stratton Oakmont, wasn't representative of the typical Wall Street brokerage firm. When their days of reckoning came, Mr. Belfort and Mr. Porush didn't stand up against law enforcement, but rather caved, quickly agreeing to cooperate against virtually everyone close to them." Of course, Scorsese's The Wolf of Wall Street portrays Belfort as a valiant fighter with the utmost personal dignity who fought to the bitter end. Aside from also revealing that, despite gaining a killing in regard to his book royalties, Belfort has paid virtually nothing to his victims as was court ordered, Cohen ultimately concludes regarding Scorsese's film, "'The Wolf of Wall Street' creators can possibly justify excluding victims from their story, but not while they literally give the final scene to the real Jordan Belfort. That might be art, but it's wrong." Of course, Cohen was being mighty generous when he described the film as 'art' as nothing could be further from the truth because, like virtually all of the films Scorsese has directed since Taxi Driver, The Wolf of Wall Street takes nil artistic risks and meekly caters to the same corrupt kosher crowd that any sniveling hack in Hollywood would kiss up to further their career.

With its nonstop use of generic pop music (a technique Scorsese openly admits he stole from Kenneth Anger), never-ending debauched Spring Breakers-esque orgy party scenes, and ironically narrated storyline, The Wolf of Wall Street is like one long flashy car commercial that has about as much as artistic merit to it as, well, a car commercial. Indeed, just like Belfort's boiler room stocks, The Wolf of Wall Street is a fulsome celluloid con meant to appeal to man's most base instincts. Undoubtedly, what I found most patently absurd and indicative of how degenerate our times are in regard to The Wolf of Wall Street is that the psychopathic Hebrew antihero of the film is more disgusting, criminally-inclined, and irredeemable than the eponymous Jewish villain of Veit Harlan's infamous National Socialist melodrama Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süß and yet he is glorified for it. Undoubtedly, that a would-be-wanton work like The Wolf of Wall Street could be made for the American mainstream public, let alone warmly received and respected by said American public, just goes to show that a good portion of the American public is also both irredeemable and destined for a rather bitter end. Of course, I never doubted Martin Scorsese's degeneracy as he made that quite clear long ago when he made the documentary American Boy: A Profile of Steven Prince (1978), which is about a gay Jewish junky criminal friend of the director who had a cameo role as a fast-talking criminal weapons dealer in Taxi Driver, yet The Wolf of Wall Street is truly an all-time low for not only the filmmaker, but for Hollywood in general. Featuring Leonardo DiCaprio taking a lit candle in the ass, wild gay orgies, horrendous Heeb Jonah 'The Whale' Hill masturbating at a party in front of hundreds of people, and the real Jordan Belfort wallowing in his egomania at the conclusion of the film, The Wolf of Wall Street, ultimately reminds me why I have not stepped in a movie theater for a good half a decade or so and why I will probably never do so again.

-Ty E

KILLER CONDOM
KILLER CONDOM

Martin Walz (1996)

Long before I understood the usage of contraceptives, Killer Condom taunted me from afar. How could it not? Troma specializes in creating vivid and often ridiculous sleeve art for its many films. Bold and brilliant like a Trapper Keeper but fundamentally banal and childlike in design. Killer Condom struck me as a film I'd have to eventually watch, possibly upon maturity cause Heaven knows when mother would allow me to rent such a distinguished "exploitation" picture. Like few other children, I suffered from a rapidly declining and accelerating method of childhood restrictions which led to Wes Craven's New Nightmare one minute, then on to strict reruns of We're Back! A Dinosaur's Story. From this essence of relinquished motherhood authority is from where my standards of film constantly rise and fall. I approach every film, every movie, with intentions of giving my regards to the absurd, the serious, and the stoic with nary a spiritual interruption.

Flash forward 13 years later and I've finally gotten my hands on a copy of Killer Condom for honest consumption expecting not much from a film that backbone structures around "creative consulting" of H.R. Giger's and the special effects of art-horror master Jörg Buttgerit. Whenever I encounter a specimen of filmmaking that relies on girth from foreign names and titles, it tends to alert me of an otherwise incompetent film and gladly, Killer Condom is not the case. Of the imperfectible horror/comedy genre, Killer Condom stands as the only one I've seen that has demonstrated courageous and biting satire while keeping the horror and absurd elements apart, careful not to spoil the mix. It can be argued that this film's (few) shortcomings overpower the strong arm of Killer Condom but I dare you to find a more suitable paradigm of light appearing amongst darkness. Better yet, up the ante. Find me another murderous prophylactic film and we'll depart with even ends. Encounter gay detective Luigi Mackeroni and experience his seedy, colorful world in New York City. But unlike most vantages of the Big Apple, this one is entirely Teutonic and representative of a cleaner scum that stalks the alleyways. To call his world perfect would be a homosexually charged lie but to call it safer would be a correct and logical assumption of a modern day world turned less ethnic. After all, the death of the west is upon us. Soon into the tale, we witness a key Hotel becoming home to a species of sentient condoms that sever a male's favorite appendage. As later uncovered, this manmade species requires no sleep, no food, and lives only to carry out orders from a strung-out religious sect also seen in Crimson Rivers II: Angels of the Apocalypse. Soon into Killer Condom, it's revealed that the clockwork foundation of this film mainly mocks three things: homosexuals (while at the same time redeeming them), Sicilians, and least importantly, Christians. As every film before it in some way mocks Christ loving ways, the main humor is derived from making Wops look silly and culture crazed from something evidenced by the nonexistent. Entertainment at its finest. When Killer Condom's not lampooning goombahs it's focusing its targets on the homosexual, transsexual, and biasing out the heterosexual as being a balanced creature. All this and more makes Killer Condom a very dizzying experiment in politically incorrect humor that shines down some truth in the midst of a hypersexual drive that will leave room for many messy castrations and disgusting creatures that crave cock - and I'm not referring to the "killer condoms." What has been created is a film that has reached the maximum height of memorability. People from all walks of life will discover this film in some way and always be tainted with its presence. Killer Condom is a film whose grasp you can never really escape from. It is performance art based in crude, vile, and vulgar entertainment. Whether or not you can manage to dismiss this film as trash, the theory of low quality cinema stands triumphant with a title - no, an image, that will never leave your mind. Be it years later when you're bedding down a local broad and that contraceptive on the tabletop casts a smug grin on your face when you recall a specific time when such low brow entertainment ignited a bonding effort on behalf of two people, Killer Condom is exactly what I go to the movies for. I want to laugh, I want to squirm, I want to feel. Being human isn't such a request and Killer Condom kindly fulfilled my wishes. One of the few classics that the Troma library has to offer. Don't miss Killer Condom.

-mAQ

IN THE MIRROR OF MAYA DEREN
IN THE MIRROR OF MAYA DEREN

Martina Kudláček (2002)

In the Mirror of Maya Deren is a fairly straight forward and soothing introduction to the life of Maya Deren. Deren is best known for her avant-garde short films which were filmed in everywhere from the over glamorized streets of Hollywood to the natural landscapes of Haiti. Deren was a Russian Jewess who made her way from Russia to the United States a few years after the so called "Russian" Revolution of 1917. Her shorts have an untamed feeling of a rootless human wandering through the most mystic areas of the world.

In the Mirror of Maya Deren features a variety of interviews with closest friends of the unconventional filmmakers and filmmakers that she inspired. Experimental filmmaker Stan Brakhage pays his tribute to Maya Deren as the man should. Film as a Subversive Art author Amos Vogel talks respectively of Deren. With all the people interviewed in the documentary, it's as if not one of these individuals seemed to truly know Maya Deren. She was an individual as ambiguous as her films. Deren's films are probably the closest window into who the woman really was.

Maya Deren surely utilized her 16mm Bolex camera to its fullest potential. Many filmmakers learned their art and technique on the camera. Maya Deren created her masterpieces on the Bolex and proved that it is more of who is behind the equipment than the quality of the equipment itself. Hollywood, a place that Deren always despised, always has the best technology yet truly is lacking in regards to cinematic masterpieces. I believe that attempting to create art in Hollywood would have been too financially risky for the bigwig pigs in Hollywood. They certainly let F.W. Murnau know that art wasn't wanted in Hollywood. After the German director finished the monetarily unsuccessful film Sunrise, a film that is at the center of cinematic artistry, Hollywood restricted Murnau's artistic freedom until his early death.

As can be expected, In The Mirror of Maya Deren features a variety of clips from the director's very short career. The documentary also features early and later photographs of Deren. You even get to see her at a Communist rally in the United States. Her first husband was of a culture despising Bolshevik. If one hasn't even seen a clip of Deren's work, In The Mirror of Maya Deren is still highly recommended. The documentary is sure to entice anyone into Deren's work that even has a remote interest in avant-garde films.

-Ty E

GOOD LUCK, MISS WYCKOFF

Marvin J. Chomsky (1979)

Maybe it is just me, but when I see a scene from a film with the words "Miss Wyckoff Fucks Niggers," I have to check it out, if only for novelty reasons. Indeed, within about the first 30 seconds or so of the exceedingly exploitative melodrama Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff (1979) aka Secret Yearnings aka The Sin aka The Shaming directed by Marvin J. Chomsky (Evel Knievel, The Deliberate Stranger), one sees such 'politically incorrect' words written in chalk on a sidewalk in regard to the eponymous female protagonist, who ultimately learns how unhealthy dark meat can be for a white woman. A work set in 1954 in suburban Kansas, Chomsky's film may seem like a reworking (or rip-off) of Douglas Sirk's All That Heaven Allows (1955) and/or Fassbinder's remake Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) upon a superficial glance due to its depiction of an elder woman starting a 'forbidden romance' with a much younger man in an unforgiving 'puritanical' town, but it is really a piece of pathetically assembled agitprop trash masquerading around as keenly socially conscious high drama, thus making for an unintentionally hilarious film that depicts the extremes that some semi-Asiatic left-wing filmmakers were willing to go in terms of their semi-hermetic hate campaign against America's white majority. Indeed, directed by Hebraic hack Chomsky and adapted by Jewess Polly Platt (whose father presided over the Dachau Trials and who was once the wife of fellow chosenite Peter Bogdanovich) from the 1970 novel of the same title by gay Pulitzer Prize winner William Inge, Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff has aspirations towards being a more subversive Guess Who's Coming to Dinner (1967), but it was both a critical and commercial failure and it is really just a superlatively sleazy exploitation flick on steroids featuring a couple forgotten Hollywood stars. The patently pathetic story of a virginal 35-year-old high-school teacher who is suffering premenopausal symptoms and is inspired to start a random sexual relationship after being conned into doing so by a Jewish psychiatrist, only to find herself a rape victim and the quasi-sex-slave of a young psychopathic negro janitor (!), Chomsky's film seems to have been made with the sole intention of offending and shocking white middle America and is thus a one-note-celluloid-wonder of sorts, albeit a sometimes entertaining one-note-celluloid-wonder that demonstrates the Semitic Sunset Boulevard truly has no shame. Of course, it should be no surprise that the film was somewhat recently released on DVD/Blu-Ray by the porn/exploitation distribution company Vinegar Syndrome, as it is more or less a 'crackersploitation' with Blaxploitation overtones that depicts most whites from the 1950s as dimwitted true believers of the so-called 'Red Scare' who mindlessly hated negroes and ostracized anyone who even remotely acted in a socially transgressive fashion. Directed a crypto-propagandist hack who directed episodes of the cultural Marxist favorite Roots (1977), the majorly moronic and totally tasteless TV miniseries Holocaust (1978), and the terrible TV movie Inside the Third Reich (1982), Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff is nothing short of left-wing porn twaddle made for those hopelessly impressionable individuals who consider Howard Zinn's A People's History of the United States (1980) to be the definitive book on American history.

GOOD LUCK, MISS WYCKOFF

Opening in Freedom, Kansas in 1954 with old maid protagonist Evelyn Wyckoff (played Anne Heywood, who was 48 when she starred in the role) walking home and spotting the words "Miss Wyckoff Fucks Niggers" written on a road near her house, Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff then goes back a couple months to reveal how the main character went from being a sexless spinster to earning the deplorable reputation of being a, "nigger fucker." Miss Wyckoff is 35-year-old high-school Latin teacher and she is suffering from debilitating depression due to the fact that she is almost middle-aged yet she has never had her hymen broken. Indeed, after suffering hysterical panic attacks and committing random acts of irrational violence (among other things, she smashes a mirror with her fists in front of her equally sexually prudish friends), less than wanton Wyckoff needs a serious change of pace and her almost creepily stoic gynecologist Dr. Neal (Robert Vaughn) is ultimately the man that is going to be the who unwittingly leads her on a deplorable path of no return. Indeed, after Dr. Neal gives Miss Wyckoff a rather awkward gynecological exam and realizes that she is showing some perturbing pre-menopausal signs, he recommends that she begin having sex, stating, "Nature wants us to use our bodies...if we don't, they dry out and function poorly." Dr. Neal also recommends that she see his Jewish psychiatrist colleague Dr. Steiner (Donald Pleasence of the Halloween franchise fame), who, using Freudian hocus pocus, eventually gets Miss Wyckoff to admit that the source of her sexual hang-ups is the result of a traumatic childhood experience where her mother more or less told her that she would grow up to be a slut. A somewhat impenetrable man with dubious motives, Dr. Neal recommends to Miss Wyckoff that start an affair with a married bus driver, but when the teach finally gets the gall to jump the bones of the proletarian philanderer, he has already moved away, thus leaving her with very little options where losing her virginity is concerned. Luckily, a young psychopathic negro named Rafe Collins (John Lafayette) begins working as a janitor at Wyckoff's high school and he is going to make the frigid teach learn a lesson or two about carnal knowledge, whether she likes it or not.

A nastily narcissistic negro that is in his mid-20s and who is stereotypically on a football scholarship at a less than prestigious community college, Rafe has rape on his mind, especially when it comes to naïve liberal white women, and he is not going to let any white woman tell him, "no," as it only makes him all the more horny. One day, Rafe walks into Miss Wyckoff's classroom and states, "I wonder how many of you white people really mean it when you pretend to care about us negroes" while beginning to pull out his poisonous black snake. While

Miss Wyckoff manages to convince Rafe to leave immediately, the next time he shows up will result in the teacher involuntarily losing her virginity. Indeed, the next time Rafe comes to Miss Wyckoff's classroom, he takes her hand and forces it down his pants. When Wyckoff resists and bites the naughty negro's hand, Rafe slaps the teacher like a pimp slaps his whores. After locking Miss Wyckoff in her classroom and threatening her by stating, "I'm warning you...not one sound," Rafe takes off his clothes, forces the petrified teacher onto her desk, and rapes her while she cries hysterically and pleads for him to stop. When Miss Wyckoff shows up to her classroom the next day and discovers the negro-style sentence, "you be here this afternoon," written on her chalkboard, she decides to sneak out of the school before Rafe can find her, but on the following day she is not so lucky. When Rafe rapes Wyckoff the next day, she begins to rather enjoy it, which the narcissistic negro immediately notices and uses to his advantage. Indeed, the next day Rafe sexually degrades Miss Wyckoff by forcing her to get on her knees and crawl to him while begging for his very potentially diseased colored cock.

After talking to another black janitor on the football team, Miss Wyckoff learns that Rafe is not a boy, but a 24-year-old ex-hustler who was "discovered" by the school football coach. Indeed, it seems that white Americans will do anything for their beloved philistine game of football, including supporting criminally-inclined nig-nogs. In that sense, Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff reveals that not much has changed in America, at least where stupid mainstream sports are concerned. When Miss Wyckoff's best friend/fellow teacher Beth (played by Carolyn Jones, who is probably best known for her role as Morticia Frump Addams on the original TV series The Addams Family from the mid-1960s) remarks regarding Rafe, "He's the kind that makes everyone hate niggers. That's what he is...an uppity negro," the race-mixing educator responds hysterically by absurdly stating, "Racial prejudice is one of man's most difficult problems to solve during his time here on earth...perhaps god intended it to be that way. And if we don't solve it, Beth, we're all going to be destroyed," thus making it seem like xenophilia is a major mental disorder. Of course, rumors begin to spread around the high school due to the fact that Miss Wyckoff spends way too much hanging out with a jigaboo janitor in her classroom. When two young white male janitors who suspect Miss Wyckoff is a "nigger fucker" hear the teacher screaming out in pain, they swiftly run to her classroom, only to find her completely naked and being bent over a hot heater by Rafe, who has intentionally burnt her breasts while viciously bugging her from behind. While one of the white men calls Rafe a "rotten bastard," neither of them attempts to rescue Miss Wyckoff, who more or less got what she deserved. Of course, with the cat out of the bag, Miss Wyckoff is ostracized by everyone in the small Kansas town, including her best friend Beth and a cowardly communist-sympathizing dork teacher named Chester Rollins (J. Patrick McNamara), who she had previously defended when he was about to be fired from his teaching job due to his commie views. In the end, Miss Wyckoff briefly contemplates suicide, but ultimately opts to leave town after being given a letter of recommendation from the school's principal. Indeed, as they say, once you go black, you never go back.

GOOD LUCK, MISS WYCKOFF

While clearly a carelessly convoluted cultural Marxist-oriented work that was probably made with the sole objective of antagonizing white America by making it seem like the secret desire of every moral and cultured white woman is to be forcibly bent over by a half-braindead black buck with a primitive talent for savage sexual pillaging and throwing pigskins, Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff is also rather incriminating in many respects, namely due to the fact that all the ostensibly progressive leftist characters, including the eponymous protagonist, are weak and socially defective individuals whose championing of negro causes is due to the fact that they can 'relate' to the negro due to their own dubious place in society as weaklings and emotional cripples. As revealed in the film, Miss Wyckoff was partially responsible for the desegregation of her high school. Although mere speculation, one can only assume that if she had been a normal happy woman with a husband and kids and not a sex-starved childless spinster, she probably would not have time to waste on negro rights and promoting the reading of Karl Marx. It should also be noted that it is two non-Europids—a Jewish psychiatrist and a young negro—that are ultimately responsible for Miss Wyckoff's moral decline. Of course, Israelites also played a large role in the Civil Rights movement, as it enabled them to weaken their greatest enemy—the white majority. Indeed, like the lead protagonist in Robert Redford's revoltingly sappy and superficial piece of obscenely overrated celluloid twaddle Ordinary People (1980), Miss Wyckoff ultimately finds herself even more screwed up after going to regular sessions with a Judaic psychiatrist. I also found it interesting how psychopathic spade Rafe has virtually the same sociopathic attitude that is popular among black American 'youths,' rappers, and football players nowadays, thus making Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff a somewhat prophetic work, if not unintentionally so. Undoubtedly, despite being a somewhat nonsensical piece of trash exploitation, I would be lying if I did not admit that the film reminded me how much America has gone down the morally vacant multicultural drain since the film's release some 35 years ago. Indeed, we now live in a such racially, culturally, socially, and morally defective era that it is not uncommon for white sluts to be impregnated negros and then pass on their misbegotten mulatto spawn to be raised by its cuckolded white grandparents. Of course, maybe if contemporary whites were more like those depicted in kosher agitator Chomsky's agitprop piece then America would not be the ugly dying mongrelized bastard beast that it is today. A Semitic-sired quasi-Blaxploitation/melodrama hybrid that surely reminds one what Hebraic Hollywood really thinks of the white majority, Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff is certainly absurdly asinine celluloid excrement yet, like the high school teacher protagonist of the film, the viewer learns a very valuable lesson: "once you go black, you never go back, as no self-respecting white man wants you back."

-Ty E

GODZILLA vs. MEGAGUIRUS
GODZILLA vs. MEGAGUIRUS

Masaaki Tezuka (2000)

To celebrate Godzilla's recent millennium makeover, Godzilla vs. Megaguirus represents the very aesthetics of the new and improved Godzilla series. Hints of what's to come are placed meticulously in the scenes featuring suit re-do's and character mannerism explorations. Much of the run time of this Showa series flashback rests on the very irritating cocky Asian hacker characters that prove that a character can be as stubborn as the writer is. Megaguirus is almost as uninteresting as Godzilla's son was on terms of characters within the Godzilla universe. The encompassing attraction of the Godzilla franchise is the slambang monster madness and Megaguirus doesn't satisfy, that is, until the last 5 - 10 minutes of the film where in a cop out twist, Megaguirus reaches his final form. Note to Toho: This isn't Dragonball Z. The origins of Megaguirus revolve around an insect that was featured in Rodan called the Meganulon. The evolution/radiation clock ticks and little by little these creatures grow while posing a more discernible threat. A clashing romance begins between the street-smart hacker/engineer and the stern feminazi named Kiriko. These two characters obviously fancy each other for reasons oblivious to me but I brave the romance plot line for as long as it takes for the disappointing action to build up. To intervene, the Godzilla story this time around is far more unrealistic than I'd expect a giant lizard film to go. The preferred method of getting rid of Godzilla is a space gun that shoots mini-black holes that reminds me of the alternate ship battles in Skies of Arcadia. When the "vs." finally takes effect, the Meganula finally evolves into Megaguirus. A fossilized dragonfly dinosaur hovers above Tokyo taunting our scaly anti-hero. In a disappointing battle, the only true applaudable effort is the effect for the Megaguirus. In a surprising turn of events, Godzilla's methods of dispatching the villain proves to be irrevocably bad ass. Godzilla vs. Megaguirus doesn't fare well compared to some of the above-average entries. You can thank the clear storytelling that would rather focus on embarrassing characters instead of the implied title.

-mAQ

LOST PARADISE

Masami Akita (1990)

You may know the name Masami Akita or you may not. He happens to be behind Merzbow, the amazing noise project. Not many people know of this, but he actually directed a film in the "seppuku" series. Even fewer know that he did the droneful score which creepily makes the viewing experience even more tense. Lost Paradise (#3) is the best out of all of them. The film opens up with a very stiff woman in military garb walking into a room. She formally begins to undress and begins to take off her shirt. She is sitting there, bare breasted, and begins to take a ritualistic knife and wraps it with a form of paper/ribbon around the blade and builds up the courage to drive it deep within her belly. She absorbs the fact that she is now fated and decides to venture on through her hellish decision. She drives it through her belly until the pressure from the intestines gushes out and furthers the rip. She is sitting there moaning, her beautiful pearl white clothes are now a deep shade of red and she eventually collapses and you have the pleasure of watching the life seep from her eyes. I don't fancy harakiri films. I love the idea, but face it, It's a dead idea to make a film on. Their is no honor in doing so and it happens too fast or looks stunningly fake. Lost Paradise does not fit in with this. To top it off, it has an ultra disturbing score which consists of various hums and feverish drones. When you add extreme realism and efficient effects, you got the mother of all harakiri films. Granted, if you don't enjoy gore or the philosophy of death, this might not appeal to you at all. While there are no subs, the only time you would need them is at the end, when there is a monologue between a man who commits suicide. Watching this woman die was a powerful experience for me. As this once proud figure has been reduced to a gored nobody, you realize that no matter what rank you are, or what achievements you have accomplished, in death, you are nothing. One hell of a 33 minute ride. One that chugs by of course.

-Maq

TAMPON TANGO
TAMPON TANGO

Masashi Yamamoto (1984)

From the realms of absurdity and from the magmatic hatred of Chakan: The Forever Man comes perhaps the most bizarre, narcissistic attempt at making a porno. Hell, film for that matter. I could attempt to dissect the contents before your eyes in hopes that you too could see the batty mind behind this film. This is the exact reason why I will begin to illustrate the events for you, visually. Take heed that this might be the most visually venomous theme of pornography ever brainstormed upon. With the Japanese believing they are the sole proprietor and pioneers of high art, the director also has an egotistical vision of a film separate from American cinema. This might explain why the first scene is the director howling "To hell with the US! To hell with Herpes!" in a megaphone. Only from this pivotal scene of craziness could the subversive elements float to the surface. Tampon Tango was definitely an experiment in a personal vision, in way, this vision might be TOO personal. In no way could the director have made this film for the fans of obscure cinema of today. There really is no logical reason for a film of this degree to be produced. The scenes continue to stack with a followed shot of Japanese couples "necking" and dry-humping on a public sidewalk. We are soon introduced to a rag-tag Japanese "Real World" crew. After discussing their intention to practice fornication in a van, they rest at a beach so two of the lady companions can deodorize their soapy vagina's in brackish waters. During this quest of femininity, Defcon 5 is triggered with a meteorite warning indicator flashing on screen. A space rock lands on one of the females craniums issuing a bloody nose. The loony, impassioned director begins screaming for more tampons at this point. Cut to two naked Japanese men running over sand dunes with a plethora of tampons tied to their dicks while hollering a war cry. As a member of the audience, you really don't know what to do. You can either brave through the rest of these unnatural occurrences or get out while the getting is good. To become of an accomplished genre, sex scenes are inimitably placed in a verbose manner. To call this portion of the film difficult would be an understatement. To film the human body as an intimate instrument is an achievement. The director has done the exact opposite and composed shots of intercourse as to appear grotesque and deformed. Greasy Chink flesh flapping and squishing together in a non-rhythmic performance in horribly edited loops makes up most of the running time. Had the antics been stretched more, Tampon Tango would have fit within its boundaries perfectly. However, the slack stretches over the line thanks to sex scenes that will leave you gasping for breath. Eat your heart out, Bat Pussy. To pick up for any inconveniences, we're treated to a slam-bang finale including and not limited to a three-piece marching band in ironed skirts, an enormous paper-mâché tampon, a giant meteorite crashing through the ceiling, punk guys initiating a bi-family orgy of confetti, streamers, and festive screaming. Tampon Tango acknowledges what it is and perfects the formula other than the sex. It is equal parts insanity and unflattering sex scenes. Had the potency of the intercourse been toned down, Tampon Tango would appear more honed and polished. One of the most illustrious and talented shots of the film is a mid-edited scene of a man doing a back handspring and during the middle of his flip his clothes are removed resulting in a flawless frame rate -- Thus cementing a true piece of cinemagic, although tasteless. Of course through out this "anti-American film" piece, we have many true-to-life stereotypes being played out by those of the mocked nationality. Women remark disgustedly at the size of their partner's fuzzy penis before performing putrid fellatio upon him. The only aspect that I could deem erotic is the project itself. There's something arousing about a film as goofy as this. Call it whatever you will but it's more of an aesthetic appreciation. Tampon Tango is the most obscure and bizarre film I've ever had the pleasure to see. As it may be, I took this film far too seriously upon my preliminary viewing but I can tell you this; I look forward to introducing my fellow town residents to this mock up of the porn industry. I'm just not sure how many of these chosen will retain their sanity. I sure as hell know I didn't.

-mAQ

HUNGRY DEVIL SPIRIT
HUNGRY DEVIL SPIRIT

Masayoshi Sukita (1985)

This Japanese shocker follows the technical formula of many 70s and 80s Chinese horror films. High in color contrast and low on lighting, Hungry Devil Spirit aka Gakidama is simply a stunning 55 minute horror film. It's a shame that Masayoshi Sukita had such a short life span in directing seeing as how his film Hungry Devil Spirit remains an unknown creative force in miniature terrors. After a ghost-hunting duo photograph a will-o-wisp looking entity on a mountain, one of the two is struck ill with possession from the traveling spirit. An enormous appetite erupts from his senses which drives his wife into a state of panic as he snores comatose pregnant with a demon (unknown to her). After it "hatches" and explodes his chin in the process, a mysterious man enters and captures the demon only to fall victim to its tricks and allows it to escape. From here, many side plots are fleshed out not limited to a bizarre cult of Gakidama consumers who've become addicted to eating the "Tastiest Flesh". The story has many notable quirks to it creating a dense and foggy atmosphere. The film's protagonist is feminized as he is impregnated with the embryo of a ghoul. His wife who is unable to birth a child, takes this as a godsend for their non-existent family. The nuclear family is pissed on as their child is a hungry demon who ravages the human body in an attempt to feast. This is a wonderful examination on the family without a uterus. The Gakidama itself is a fleshy abomination that is about 12 inches tall. Its attacking pattern is very similar to that of the Totem from Puppet Master 4 & 5. Its vocal chords rasp out a stark gurgling sound that is incredibly terrifying and disgusting. These assets make for a silly looking albeit horrifying creature that now lies in the deepest recesses of my fears. Chestburster's are one thing, but a creature being born from my throat is a completely different story. Hungry Devil Spirit is a marvel of a short film. While it can be a tedious chore, the special effects and the cunning plot devices are enough to push this film past moderate territory into the limelight of supernatural creature horror that was famously churned out by the Chinese. If you enjoyed Centipede Horror, Gakidama comes highly recommended for all fans of horror, obsession, and the mystique.

Hungry Devil Spirit on DVD exclusively at wtfdvds.com

-mAQ

THE SECRET OF DORIAN GRAY

Massimo Dallamano (1970)

If any post-WWII European actor was born to play the role of Dorian Gray, it was Austrian Helmut Berger – the positively peculiarly pretty, passionate and pompous camp prince of arthouse Euro-sleaze – as no other actor has been able to pull off a believably narcissistic pedophilic Nazi fag in drag nor a homo Bavarian Wagnerite king with an affinity for romantic art over his own people the way this brazenly bisexual star of self-worship and seduction did. For whatever reason, the trans-European (Britain/Italy/Germany) production The Secret of Dorian Gray (1970) aka Dorian Gray directed by Italian auteur Massimo Dallamano (who previously worked as a cinematographer for Sergio Leone) and co-produced by the infamous exploitation producer Harry Alan Towers (who worked with Jess Franco and Ken Russell) – Berger's next acting job after his groundbreaking performance in his older aristocratic Italian lover Luchino Visconti's The Damned (1969) aka La caduta degli dei – was a film that never really got its due in terms of gaining a cult following as it so incontestably deserves. In fact, The Secret of Dorian Gray quickly disappeared after its initial scant appearance in theaters and until its rather recent release on DVD (RaroVideo), it was never released for the home market aside from an obscure bastardized English-language version for certain foreign markets, which was solely the result of the lackluster promotion and distribution from the company that produced it. Indeed, to call the film a 'lost masterpiece' would be a bit of patent puffery, unless you happen to be an exploitation/Euro-Sleaze junky, but I would be lying if I did not admit that aside from possibly Ulrike Ottinger's Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (1984) aka Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press – an innately ambitious total deconstruction and revolutionary reinvention of the tale – The Secret of Dorian Gray is one of my favorite takes on debauched dandy Oscar Wilde's sole and surprisingly incriminating novel as a sort of clever and thinly disguised condemnation of his own life. Set in the perfect postmodern atmosphere of ill-flavored fag-end 1960s of Swinging London, The Secret of Dorian Gray follows dainty yet decidedly domineering Dorian's deluge into salacious self-destructive debauchery as the city around him parallels his decisive degeneration into nihilistic sex, brain-damaging drugs, and reckless rock 'n' roll. In short, the film feels like the sort of adaptation the belated beatnik auteur Donald Cammell (Demon Seed, White of the Eye) would have assembled, albeit a bit less thematically and aesthetically erudite than a cinematic work by the suicidal Scotsman, The Secret of Dorian Gray oftentimes feels like it was produced by a fan of Performance (1970), although both films were released the same year (despite Performance being produced two years earlier). That being said, I have no doubt in my mind that Mick Jagger would have concurred with Dorian Gray's declaration, "I would give my soul to stay like that" in regard to the prospective of eternal beautiful youth, as both men certainly had sympathy for the devil, but that did stop them from degenerating into ghastly and ghoulish elderly lesbians of sorts.

THE SECRET OF DORIAN GRAY

Starring real-life Dorian Gray Helmut Berger in an iconic, if rarely seen, performance that is at least as memorable as the actor's roles in Visconti's Ludwig (1972) and Tinto Brass' Salon Kitty (1976), The Secret of Dorian Gray – a work that shows the lurid and lascivious libertinism that is oftentimes implied, but never gratuitously depicted in Oscar Wilde's novel, including bisexuality (and – in this case – of the biracial black buggerer sort), needless nihilistic drug excess, and hip unhinged sexual promiscuity – opens in a backdrop that displays an inkling of the kind of blatant signs of post-war debauchery that would consume London and rest of the discordant Occident from about the mid-1960s on. After less than enthusiastically watching a tranny cabaret show (echoing Berger's Dietrich-esque performance in The Damned) with his friends, Dorian Gray (Berger) meets the love of his life by mere happenstance – a self-proclaimed starving would-be actress and feisty virgin (at least until Mr. Gray has his gentlemanly way with her) named Sybil Vane (Marie Liljedahl) – but ultimately a painting of himself by his painter friend Basil Hallward (Richard Todd) proves to be his true “soul mate”; as he symbolically sells his soul to the devil in order to retain the boyish beauty that is expressed in the sexually androgynous portrait. Describing the inspiration behind the portrait, Basil states, “I did it because the subject is exceptional. An extraordinary combination of pure beauty and male virility. Incredibly sensual...timeless,” but little does the artist realize that sometimes beauty kills. Of course, it is not only the painting that propels Dorian into a life of self-debasement, flesh usury, and drug use as a fated life-changing meeting with a fashion chic and cultivated homosexual gallery owner named Henry Wotton (Herbert Lom) who haphazardly parrots Mr. Wilde with the words “What is vice anyways? Simply pleasure without shame” and his loose and salacious yet imbecilic socialite wife Gwendolyn (Margret Lee) – both of whom want to fondle and fuck the lad – also help to groom the young man into a debauched daredevil of decadence who seeks soulless pleasures to make up for the emotional void in his personal life. Although Dorian is already on the road to degeneration and overwhelming narcissism before her untimely death, it is ultimately his sweet ladylove Sybil's tragic death via self-slaughter after the two have a heated lover's spat that the decadent dandy fully embraces his tormenting thirst for eternal youth and unquenchable excess. As the portrait painting of himself deteriorates into a grotesque caricature of himself that parallels his positively perverse personal life of terribly trendy and solely superficial sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll. In the end, Dorian Gray is, at best, a poor man's Ronnie Kray and a shameless and opportunistic whore with a faggy fashion sense who will fuck anything and anyone, including elderly women, to reap materialistic earthly rewards and, at worst, a gaudy and grotesque living and breathing monstrosity of the mischievous molesting and murdering McFagger-wanna-be sort.

“Lying on the floor was a dead man with a knife in his heart. He was withered, wrinkled and loathsome of visage. It was not till they had examined the ring that they recognized who it was,” or so concludes The Secret of Dorian Gray with the words from Oscar Wilde’s source novel. Admittedly, I would not call myself a fan of many films adapted from classic novels, nor am I generally fan of many traditionally critically revered ‘classic’ novels themselves, but The Secret of Dorian Gray does make for a notable exception, not least of all because it one of the very few cases where the degenerate cinematic art at that time complimented the theme of the literary work itself as a magical marriage between softcore Fin de siècle Europa and semen-drenched Swinging London. Starting in a rather traditional and quasi-Victorian London and concluding in a nefarious Negrophiliac bongo-drum-blasting, curiously corrupt, gender-bending, drug-devouring, back-stabbing, player-hating and miscegenating nation of lost souls, The Secret of Dorian Gray effortlessly excels in managing to execute a clear-cut depiction of London of the old and the overzealous Zeitgeist of the new and needlessly narcissistic as a work that ironically wallows in the same sort of degeneracy it commends; no doubt an idiosyncratic Italian specialty on director Massimo Dallamano’s part. Naturally, The Secret of Dorian Gray is a must-see film for Helmut Berger fans as the marvelously manic and crazily camp Austrian actor proves once again why he is one of Europe’s greatest queens of the sophisticatedly seedy and satanically suave silver screen. Indeed, the thought of Berger staying perennially pretty and pernicious is a particularly palatable and prepossessing prospect, but as one can readily see from his steadily declining acting career and current physically flaccid and fatigued appearance, such an idea is nothing short of being a preposterous pipe dream, thereupon making The Secret of Dorian Gray seem like the next best thing. Indeed, few things in life make more sense than Helmut Berger Gone Wilde.

-Ty E

WHAT HAVE THEY DONE TO YOUR DAUGHTERS?
WHAT HAVE THEY DONE TO YOUR DAUGHTERS?

Massimo Dallamano (1974)

What Have They Done to Your Daughters? is a notable giallo film made in 1973 depicting politically incorrect themes of child prostitution rings. The fact that this film depicted societal figures high in power being corrupt throughout an illegal ring is a ballsy move for Massimo Dallamano. This is the same director of such iconic genre films as the idealistic sequel What Have They Done to Solange? and Venus in Furs. If the stylistic approach to this gialli seems familiar, note that Dallamano also was the cinematographer to Sergio Leone's For A Few Dollars More. As with most Italian crime thrillers, the music leads the film while serenading your ears with eerie synth and prog-rock aversions. A black mysterious Wraith-figure is constantly escaping the crime scenes armed with a cleaver. This eventually leads into the most magnificent scene of a cop with idle hands getting it chopped off which leads into a color explosion of filters and a stream of blood. The sound effects are purely a tour de force. What Have They Done to Your Daughters? is a work in giallo that is clearly a film made for entertainment and a PSA to missing children. The film takes an exciting Bikesploitation turn as we are assaulted with many-a chase scenes on a flashy classic Italian motorcycle. This film works as a powerful drama, murder mystery, and a detective story. It does more with three genres than a film with one can muster. It takes the child prostitution sub line and adds a really creepy vibe. Whenever I view Lifetime films of the sort about human trafficking, I just cannot help but laugh at the dramatic reenactments reeking of post-industry trauma. In an overview of this marvelous piece of work, It really is hard to label this film in my endearing retrospect. If you're a fan of crime cinema in general, this film should find a home snugly within your confines of tastes. In a world populated with horrid uninspired films chronicling events that are dismayed upon, What Have They Done to Your Daughters? hits the spot on terms of pure sleaze. If I had a daughter, watching this film would sure tweak my nerves.

-mAQ

L'IMMORALITA

Massimo Pirri (1978)

It certainly seems to help reviewers pad their writings of "cult rarities" by dubbing any European film sleaze, no matter the content within. By pushing the bounds of propriety and/or expressing something considered "obscene" or vile, these daring directors are thrown to the sharks along with what is perceived as a snub to good taste. L'immoralita is a film considered as such. Featuring a scene of sexual activity between an 11 year old girl and a child-killer, L'immoralita has been crucified due to this and labeled as an example in sleaze, which it is not. To further put into perspective, it would appear Luc Besson took several cues from this French romance to intersperse throughout Leon. Opening with a wide-ended shot of our fugitive, Federico, holding a young girl's corpse, L'immoralita begins without a hitch in slowly establishing our character, anti-hero, if you will. He swears by his innocence yet retains the same absolute hypnotic effect when a young girl's body is presented.

Fleeing from the police, wounded, Federico stumbles upon a young girl, Simona, and charms her into hiding out in the garden villa. Their relationship at first is budding and teasing to what will result in freak outs, death threats, and a bizarre love triangle including Simona's promiscuous mother, Vera. Once the village slut discovers her daughter's secret, Vera pulls her god-given veins of manipulation to ensnare and blackmail Federico in a boiling plot to off her wheelchair-bound husband. To cite comparisons, L'immoralita looks and feels exactly the way that Maladolescenza did, and not even for the nudity of the youth. Both were shot with an unequivocal eye for playground romance and shedding of desires. The averse sexuality that is included seems almost natural, the way spying on her oversexed mother leads to the almost-hereditary skill of laying down and humbling men into domination. This is what Simona has known her whole childhood. While young, she understands fully how to control these men, how to feed and fuel them and this is what makes her so deadly.

To stitch together scenes, Morricone's score is applied gracefully but at times creates outlandish and side-showy results. That's not to say that, by its lonesome, it's not an excellent composition to a peaceful setting with no interruptions. The "poisonous" Simona takes condescension with her absence of innocence, including the hunky-dory symbolic bird aviary revisited after the metamorphosis from girl to woman is complete. Seems all a female has to do to gain rite of passage is commit large and great acts of deceit and betrayal. Fascinated and dense, Federico certainly underestimated the tiny terror which leads him directly into a web from which he can't escape. Voyeurism has always been an unhealthy fetish of the great taboos. Direct links are consistently met with vulgar tendencies and strange and frightful urges unearthed. L'immoralita is simply a turn based system of sexual hypnosis. The dizzying rate of which lovers quarrel and alliances are severed comes as a shock to me from a film I hadn't heard of until recently. Even the ever-slow implosion of the bourgeois family is a manageable task for this French oddity. Even the rarely visited reclusive father figure, with his escapist tendencies to dwell on weaponry and target practice, becomes a sympathetic character of which pity is felt for. L'immoralita is a film that brings up critical points to "sexual repression" and provides insight into the notion that some children don't possess innocence. As for Vera's maternal manipulation, I'd like to believe the cervix doesn't nullify the honor system, in which case, Federico is screwed in more ways than one.

L'IMMORALITA

-mAQ

LA HAINE

Mathieu Kassovitz* (1995)

Needless to say, La Haine is a mesmerizing film. One of utmost importance and leaves a shimmering brand upon your first viewing. Watching this film for the first time is equivalent to your first car or your first relationship - Something that you will never forget. Mathieu Kassovitz has since moved on to acting in decent films and directing horrible thrillers starring Halle Berry (Gothika) On a personal note, I remember the first time i saw it. Before i had any cinematic standards, this film managed to hold on to me complete attention while supplying my mind with enough thought to give attention to every word or gesture. I was interrupted about an hour and a half in, only to resume it in another room on an old VHS tape deck. The instant the climax reached the film, brainfire occurred. La Haine is about a group of young friends, all from different walks of life and ethnicity's, coping through an era of riots and political uprising. All the drama leads to one of their own being in critical condition after an episode of police brutality. This brings Daniel Day-Lewis's epic role in the film In The Name of the Father to mind. Without the soundtrack, most of it's intensity and look on rebels would be lost. Featuring great booming tracks from the best of French rap groups, both mainstream and underground, It delivers an amazing feeling to witness the blossoming of a hateful society. The film starts the careers of Vincent Cassel, Saïd Taghmaoui, and Hubert Koundé. Cassel has an amazing career and an impressive filmography, Saïd has been in many films; many being a mixed bag and is scheduled for the new G.I. Joe film, and Hubert did The Constant Gardener and now mainly does television. The film has changed many lives and even caught closet-lesbian Jodie Foster's attention. Kassovitz hides his inspirations clearly in his work. One influence i noticed, was how Vinz was modeled partly after Travis Bickle from Taxi Driver. Its message is of the most important kind. It chronicles the downfall of youthful patience and holstered emotions. After Vinz discovers a gun left from a pig in a riot, he decides he wants to make a change around the banlieue (Suburbs.) La Haine must be seen to be believed. It is the highlight of Kassovitz's career and is a must see for anyone who is interested in politics, youth, urban decay, and French cinema. There is no doubt in my mind that La Haine changed the face of France, and even French cinema.

-Maq

BABYLON A.D.
BABYLON A.D.

Mathieu Kassovitz* (2008)

What is the easiest way to make a film appear to be a saddening and thoughtful film? Put Clint Mansell's Lux Aeterna as the backdrop for the trailer and you immediately have a spicy preview that leaves no hint of odor and creates an entirely fictional theme for the film. Had you seen the trailer, the vibes would echo heavily of a supernatural Children of Men with just a hint of xXx, which may or may not had been a bad thing. The film escalates quickly into shitty territory when our anti-hero smuggler Toorop who is hired by a typecast Russian to export a girl who is host to an organism used for a seedy religious cloning process. Along the way, Vin Diesel one-liners will be thrown out rapid-fire; almost as fast as he'd like the action scenes to be. This film is one of the most bland action films this year, second only to The Mummy: Tomb of the Dragon Emperor. The film features another outing of the overused Michelle Yeoh who likes to force down our throats the idea of every Asian knowing martial arts. It's really pathetic. I cringed when I heard her declare that she knew how to defend herself. I'd love nothing more than to punch her square in the face while she was asleep. Other than Diesel, another star is attempted to be introduced to American audiences, and that white dwarf's name is Mélanie Thierry. I understand that it was within her character role to play the furious pacifist that Aurora is, but she plays it off so well that she becomes the solid entity of pure frustration. Every time anyone died, she'd go off screaming for at least several minutes. It almost makes me wish Diesel had the Tak Sakaguchi (Versus star) tactic of knocking her the fuck out so the scenes wouldn't be as torturing. It seems that Mathieu Kassovitz has what I like to call The Romero Syndrome. He creates a film that generates a lot of buzz amongst the media circuit, and as the screening date looms closer, he realizes how horrible the film actually is. Cue the rage targeting the studio system for screwing up "The Director's Vision." This has not been the only film to directly blame Fox for vandalism. It seems Fox has been under fire for attempting to screw up Wolverine and Watchmen. Babylon A.D. wasn't too bad, that is until the second half. The first half is like a really generic sci-fi action film that has awkward fore-shadowing and situations and styles that try to give Kassovitz's films that edgy French feel. That is, with all the attempted parkour going on and graffiti. Then there's the case of incredibly embarrassing product placement as in the almost-apocalyptic future, we're still stuck on Coke Zero and Playstation. Point is, the fatality performed on Babylon A.D. was the last half of the film. The beginning created the illusion of a moderate or at least enjoyable major motion picture, but the film has dug its own grave. R.I.P. Babylon A.D. and Mathieu Kassovitz's career. You may have created The Crimson Rivers and La Haine, but damn if you fucking suck at creating entertainment.

-mAQ

FRITT VILT II

Mats Stenberg (2008)

Allow a bit of superficial distant relativity for but a minute. The world of music has been captivating me recently after viewing Fritt Vilt and the sequel counterpart. It seems that verses bring about strict flashbacks to these films and the story of the "snowman." From Rapider than Horsepower to Wu-Tang Clan, simple rhymes reciprocate with theories and in turn elevate the experience of Fritt Vilt II even further than imagined. I've beckoned the idea of a sympathetic character system since the birth of horror but only recently has my request has been answered - no thanks to disposable trash destined to perish as formulaic and contrived studio-funded contraptions shallower than playing a game of Mouse Trap with someone with down-syndrome. Picking up where the last film left up (Spoilers for "virgins"), we find ourselves viewing a close-knit community with the main focus on a hospital and police station prior to their inception of a certain traumatized Jannicke [Note to self: pronounced almost like Hanukkah.] After explaining to the police what happened to her friends and the killer, they discover the frozen corpses and bring them back into the morgue along with the killer. We soon discover that her hectic nightmare is not over and has been jump started into life once more with seasoned experience in resurrection all in part from his stillbirth as a fetus. As for the respectful precognitive ideal that all sequels are utterly incompetent, Fritt Vilt II awards many more enjoyable factors accounted for than the first film but doesn't build as much of a claustrophobic environment with the dark halls of a hospital. The tension is there but it isn't exactly as potent in the second. Consider this with the likes of 28 Weeks Later which took a similar formula and immersed the audience into a much more detailed and enjoyable environment of prosthetic gore being exercised freely and often over indulgently. The character of the Snowman isn't explored as feverishly as the previous but shallow water is merely rippled into by the fist of an omniscient scribe that further spreads his evil legacy. He's simply someone who was born into unhappiness and murder. While I can't blame his parents, I can't exactly blame him either. The normal innocence is devoured by a merciless soul destined to perish. I wouldn't say the Snowman is entirely unreachable but luck be towards you tapping into his lucid persona. He murders without remorse and there is scarcely any sight of vacant emotion. For fan boys still groping up onto Kane Hodder, a new hulking figure of horror has emerged from the wintry hills of Norway. His eyes aren't hollow but resonate with indestructible fear and invoke a cold color aided by the divine whites of the backdrop. For a certain unproposed reason, I feel myself drawn into this narrow void of a alternate reality lead by Ingrid Bolsø Berdal. Her defined features strike up beauty in what is known as a feminine movement in cinema. Over all the Jane Austen adaptations, a single figure slowly erects in a plague-filled wasteland feebly wielding a shot-

FRITT VILT II

