of German kultur. Sukkubus centers around three very divergent peasant herds-men: Senn (Peter Simonischek); the stoic and notably Aryan leader of the threesome who seems to be in his mid-30s, Hirt (Giovanni Früh); a slothful and sexually degenerate fellow who has a proclivity towards Schnapps and young boys despite being middle-aged, and Hüterbub (Hüterbub); a thirteen year old boy who – aside from deriving great satisfaction from the dubious act of having his favorite cow “Bruni” lick salt from his body – seems like a rather normal, if often petrified, lad. After a night of indulging in one of the Germanic people’s greatest vices (aka alcohol), the two elder men decide to build a primitive sex doll out of an odd face-shaped root found by the boy in a cave. To their ecstatic and intoxicated amazement, the rather dull woodpile morphs into a voluptuous lassie’s ass, thus beginning the ferocious fecund curse in seemingly female form that plagues the three sexually-repressed fellows for the rest of the film. Swarthy but also stunning and alluring in appearance, the female apparition more resembles the Salome of Christian folklore than the sort of statuesque Nordic beauty one would expect to be living on the mountaintop. While also protecting themselves from the unclad succubus (played by Pamela Prati of Umberto Lenzi’s Ironmaster and Andrea Bianchi’s Io Gilda), the three men also battle each other, as well as the hallucinations brought upon their own wandering minds due to living in abject isolation. Needless to say, Sukkubus is far from being as holy as Arnold Fanck’s Holy Mountain (1926) nor as aesthetically delectable as Leni Riefenstahl’s The Blue Light (1932), but it does keep up with the tradition of metaphysical Germanic mysticism typical of the Mountain film genre, albeit in a manner also palatable to culturally unrefined horror fans.

Considering that Switzerland is the nation that produced “Aryan Christ” (or so he was once dubbed by one of his most determined detractors) Carl Gustav Jung – the German-Swiss man who coined the phrase “collective unconscious” (a collective, impersonal unconscious of archetypes inherited by members of the same race) – it is most fitting that Sukkubus – den Teufel im Leib, a work of atavistic-exploitation cinema, would be set in the same country. It should also be noted that the dialect of German spoken in the film is an idiosyncratic mix of German and German-Swiss, thus lending a certain cultural authenticity to the film that further compliments its austere Alpine atmosphere. Indeed, like the vintage German Mountain films, the setting itself of Sukkubus gives off the feeling that something that is omniscient is foreboding within the mountains, but what makes Georg Tressler’s hodgepodge horror work different is that nature and bare-skin become nefarious as opposed to rapturous, and as a consequence, the film acts in direct opposition to the sanctified view of the natural outdoors held by prominent völkisch movements (Wandervogel and National Socialists), artists (Karl Wilhelm Diefenbach, Fidus, Ivo Saliger) and thinkers (Hermann Hesse, C.G. Jung) during the early twentieth century throughout the German-speaking world. Of course, being of a deliberately debauched and sexually suggestive nature (e.g. cow milk mimicking cum) throughout, Sukkubus is a work that is more likely to inspire erotomania than ideas of lebensreform among viewers.

SEASON OF THE WITCH

George A. Romero (1973)

George A. Romero has made more failures than successes. Aside from the first three dead movies and Creepshow, I can't say that I am big fan of Romero's films. Season of the Witch is one of Romero's early "experimental" films dealing with a woman that has decided to both cheat on her husband and become a witch. The middle aged house wife protagonist has succumb to the activities of the younger generations (her daughter's) "sexual liberation" era. Season of the Witch is a woman's liberation film disguised as a horror film. This film takes cues from Federico Fellini's Juliet of the Spirits and the realist films of John Cassavetes. George A. Romero experiments with various dream sequences that look like a parody of some hippie's late 1960s college student film. Season of the Witch is an ambitious film that fails embarrassingly. Romero made the right choice when he decided to stay engulfed in the horrid world of mainstream horror (he could be king!). The mainstream critics love to flaunt about the genius of George A. Romero because of the assumed liberal messages in his various films. Whether he is making a joke about a group of shotgun blasting rednecks or showing the courage of a brave woman, Romero is delivering messages (whether consciously or subconsciously) that they want you to hear. His films generally feature a courageous woman and a nonwhite male as heroes. The "crazies" and power hungry psycho's are always aggressive white males (Romero's biggest fear?). The zombies are never the biggest threat as most deaths occur due to the consequences of human conflict. The truth of the matter is (whether Romero wants to believe it or not) that rednecks would be the best mortal opponents of the zombie. Romero needs a reality check. Of course Season of the Witch incorporates elements of psychoanalysis in the form of a pretentious community college professor (telling the housewife of her hidden desires for him). This young "kid" is incapable of taming the feisty witch housewife. Free love has its emotional consequences. I really couldn't imagine a grown man interested in directing a film about a housewife gone heretic. It makes you wonder if Romero's soul is that of a sexually frustrated middle aged woman. Season of the Witch features maybe 10 minutes of what could be considered horror. The average horror fan might contemplate suicide before finishing this mess that should have stayed "lost." Over the years I have become less and less interested with the work of George A. Romero. Night of the Living Dead and Dawn of the Dead are films that changed the way I looked at the horror film. Now I wonder if those films just had all the right variables to add up for accidental zombie masterpieces.

The older I get, the less tolerant I am regarding the films of ‘the people’s horror auteur’ George A. Romero (Night of the Living Dead, Dawn of the Dead), as nothing seems less cinematically unappetizing to me than ‘socially conscious’ left-wing horror films, which the iconic horror filmmaker is almost singlehandedly responsible for sinisterly spawning like an out-of-control monster as if it was one of his filmic zombies. Indeed, it has been nearly three decades since Romero even made a halfway decent film, with the troubled production Day of the Dead (1985) being the last film that he made that I could stomach without feeling like I was being bombarded with populist leftist celluloid flesheater feces of the superlatively superficially satirical sort. In fact, as far as I am concerned, Night of the Living Dead (1968), Martin (1976), Dawn of the Dead (1978), Knightriders (1981), Creepshow (1982), and Day of the Dead (1985) are the only Romero flicks that did not make me feel totally embarrassed by Romero’s calculating cinematic counter-culture redundancies. The director’s closest thing to an ‘arthouse’ flick aside from his totally unwatchable early celluloid abortions—There’s Always Vanilla (1971) and Hungry Wives (1972) aka Season of the Witch—Martin aka George A. Romero’s Martin aka Wampyr is also probably Romero’s most artistically and intellectually ambitious celluloid to date. In fact, Romero himself regards Martin as his personal favorite of his own films, which is a notable sentiment on his part considering he could easily cop-out and name one of his most popular and influential works like Night of the Living Dead or Dawn of the Dead as his fave. Although I would not describe it as his greatest film, Martin is certainly Romero’s most subversive and ‘interesting’ work as a vampire flick that delicately deconstructs and distorts, mischievously molests, and radically reinvents the horror subgenre it pays a sort of reluctant homage to. Indeed, as a vampire flick that is lacking in romanticism and is mostly aesthetically revolting, decidedly dreary, and ultimately quite cynical, Martin is a rare bloodsucker flick for both people that love and loathe the subgenre. Clearly influencing homocore poof Bruce LaBruce zombie flicks Otto; or Up with Dead People (2008) and L.A. Zombie (2010) in its teasing thematic ambiguity in regard as to whether the protagonist is actually a member of the undead or not, Martin is a strikingly singular vampire flick in that the bloodsucking lead is a patently pathetic and decidedly dorky zit-faced teenage turd who could not even glamour a blind midget with Down syndrome if he tried, thus opting for drugging them college frat boy style instead and feeding on them while they are unconscious, thus taking all of the fun out of being a vampire. Featuring a vampire who, instead of living in an ancient castle, squats at the humble home of his granduncle—a pissed and perturbed yet articulate old fart who suffers from a murderous case of Sanguivoriphobia—in the postindustrial wasteland that is Pittsburgh, PA, Martin is probably the only bloodsucker movie where the vampire is a delusional fellow who has no fangs and slits his victim's wrists with a razor so as to slurp up their vital fluids. A demystifying depiction of a degenerate pseudo-Dracula that simultaneously portrays Catholic 'true believers' as the most pernicious of perverted minds and a murderous teenager as misunderstood and angst-ridden young man who is a nasty and nihilistic product of his spiritually backwards background, Martin—arguably more than any other films of the horror subgenre—if nothing else cinematically significant, manages to suck all of the life out of the vampire mythos.

A would-be-Dracula wuss of a young man named Martin Mathias (John Amplas) is on a train heading from Indianapolis to Pittsburgh and since he is somewhat insane, he believes he is a vampire of sorts, so he injects some poor young lady with a debilitating dose of dope, slits her wrist, feeds on her blood, and leaves her to bleed out. Awkward as an ugly duckling on PCP, Martin is far from a suave bloodsucker and almost bungles his deranged date with the sexy stranger on the train. When Martin arrives in Pittsburgh, he is less than warmly greeted by an old man with a Lithuanian accent who looks like Colonel Sanders. Of course, the man, whose real name is Tateh Cuda (Lincoln Maazel), does not sell fried chicken (though he does own a butcher shop!) and despite his animosity towards the young man, he is Martin's granduncle. For whatever reason, crazed Cuda believes Martin is a true blue vampire and treats him as such, calling his nephew "Nosferatu" and covering his home with garlic and crucifixes. Since Martin's family dropped dead and Cuda is his closest living relative, the boy bloodsucker has no choice but to stay with the mystical-minded maniac of a man who believes he is a supernatural creature from hell. Paradoxically, while Martin does his damndest to prove to Uncle Cuda that he is not a vampire, fiddling with garlic and stating things like "There's no real magic... ever," Martin has seemingly schizophrenic visions, which are depicted in luscious monochrome black-and-white, of himself engaged in imaginary classic Gothic vampire horror scenarios that ultimately involve him killing and sucking the blood of beautiful young women. In one of these scenarios, Martin quasi-homosexually kills and drinks the blood of a man outside, yet hallucinates he is inside an old castle draining the blood of a young beauty in her bed. Believing that he is an 84-year-old bloodsucking creature of the night, Martin is playing a most dangerous game that could very potentially get him killed as his medieval-minded uncle has made the ultimatum to him that if he discovers he kills someone, he will personally drive a stake through his Nosferatu nephew's cold black heart. In between working at Cuda's butcher shop as a delivery boy and stalking unsuspecting young ladies, Martin calls into a radio DJ under the alias of "The Count" to set the truth straight regarding vampires (rationalizing there is no "magic stuff" as an excuse for his lack of fangs and hypnotic powers) and asking advice regarding 'female trouble.' Naturally, with his delivery job,

Martin comes in contact with a number of sexually repressed women, but being quasi-autistic, he is incapable of asserting himself, despite the fact that a lonely lady named Mrs. Abbie Santini (Elyane Nadeau) is practically begging him to jump her bones. When Martin finally gets the balls to seduce Santini, he begins a lurid love affair with her that dries up his thirst for blood. After losing control and attempting to drain two bums of their blood, Martin is almost caught by the cops and experiences a temporary sense of relief, but, rather unfortunately, Santini, an alcoholic who is depressed by the fact that she is infertile and will never have children, ironically commits suicide with a straight razor and uncle Cuda blames his nephew for her death. Irked that his granddaughter Christine (Romero's ex-wife Christine Forrest) has moved out of the family home and that no one shares his superstitious beliefs, Cuda keeps his word and drives a stake through Martin's heart, ironically killing the boy for the one murder he did not actually commit.

With the original cut, which is now presumed lost, being at an epic length of 2 hours 45 minutes, Martin as it exists today is certainly not the film it was originally meant to be, yet it still manages to be one Romero's most provocative and penetrating cinematic works, even if it is a rather amateurishly directed work riddled with accidental 'jump cuts,' outmoded wardrobes and mostly horrendous acting and forgettable actors. Set in an aesthetically revolting world of pollution-ridden factories as opposed to foggy ruined castles, nihilism as opposed to spirituality, and pansy proletarian blood-licking posers as opposed to aristocratic bloodsuckers, Martin is a modernist vampire flick where alienation, social and urban decay, mental illness, melancholy, the breakup of the nuclear family, and drug addiction is rampant and rightfully so as a truly and classically 'American' horror film that depicts the land of the free and home of the brave as it really is; a culturally and spiritually vacant multicultural nightmare plagued by vice and identity-crisis-stricken loner losers like antihero Martin. Undoubtedly, the antihero of Martin is a product of his zeitgeist and environment as an introverted psycho whose only source of solace is escaping into an imaginary world of suavely dressed bloodsuckers. Indeed, it is only when Martin starts a romantic relationship that his sanity begins to somewhat reach equilibrium, but ultimately he is a lost cause whose decidedly debilitating mental derangement wins in the end, so, in a sense, his death via a stake in the heart is a fitting way for the boy to go out. Aside from possibly Jonathan (1970) directed by German auteur Hans W. Geißendörfer and The Addiction (1995) directed by drug-addled American McGuido Abel Ferrara—both of which undoubtedly being better directed and more aesthetically pleasing works to Romero's revisionist vampire flick—Martin is indeed the greatest modern vampire flick. Not unlike David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), albeit in a less esoteric and artful way, Martin portrays post-civil rights urban Pennsylvania as a revolting postindustrial nightmare with a degenerating populous suffering from depression, alienation, and sexual dysfunction, thereupon one of only a handful of American vampire flicks that rises above the level of tasteless trash. Featuring a quasi-autistic lead whose MILF girlfriend backhandedly compliments him by saying, "That's why you're so nice to be around...you don't have opinions" thus underscoring the lack of true personality many young American males suffer from, Martin is more relevant today than when it was first released, even if it is rather aesthetically outmoded affair, but then again, that is an innate trademark of George A. Romero's greatest films.

THE DEAD
THE DEAD

George A. Romero (1985)

While this Christmas season has been even more miserable for me than usual, I really had no interest in celebrating it in a violent nihilistic by watching another sleazy Xmas slasher like Bob Clark's Black Christmas (1974) or Lewis Jackson's Christmas Evil (1980), even if I have come to the natural conclusion that blood and boobs (and especially the combination of the two) make for rather aesthetically pleasing additions to images of Santa Claus, mistletoe, and Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer. Instead, I was looking for something more melancholically nostalgic and unpleasantly poignant, so I was lucky to remember at the last minute about Hollywood auteur John Huston's swansong The Dead (1987) starring his half-wop daughter Anjelica Huston and adapted by his one-time screenwriter son Tony Huston from the story of the same name (from the short works collection Dubliners) by famous Irish novelist and poet James Joyce. Directed by the auteur from the relative luxury of a wheelchair at age 80, the film was not just a labor of love because it was a filmic family affair, but also because it was based on a work from one of the director's favorite writers and set in the land of his Celtic ancestors where his children were brought up. While Huston might have already been an old disgruntled fart at the time he directed the film, his later classic works like his underrated Flannery O'Connor adaptation Wise Blood (1979) and delightful dipsomaniac odyssey Under the Volcano (1984) clearly demonstrate that he, unlike many filmmakers, only got more artistically ambitious and subversive with age, or as oftentimes wrong Jewess Pauline Kael certainly got quite right regarding his final flick, "Huston directed the movie, at eighty, from a wheelchair, jumping up to look through the camera, with oxygen tubes trailing from his nose to a portable generator; most of the time, he had to watch the actors on a video monitor outside the set and use a microphone to speak to the crew. Yet he went into dramatic areas that he'd never gone into before—funny, warm family scenes that might be thought completely out of his range. Huston never before blended his actors so intuitively, so musically." Indeed, The Dead is oftentimes quite sentimental and humanistic in the best sort of way (and I say that as someone that typically feels the urge to smash something if I hear someone describe something as being 'sentimental' or 'humanistic'), but it also climaxes in a bittersweetly somber yet strangely hopeful fashion with a beta-male husband coming to terms with the fact that neither he nor his wife truly love one another and that he is more or less a phony that has never truly lived life. As someone that has always seen the Irish, especially the McCatholics, as the red-haired and red-faced pug-nosed negroes of Northern Europe, I am also happy to report that Huston has managed to give the Irish cultivation and even dignity, even if the film does feature a terribly inebriated mick degenerate or two. In other words, The Dead is the perfect cultural antidote to the typical sub-literate Irish-American that proudly describes themselves as 'Irish' despite not being able to locate Ireland on a map. Of course, it would be dishonest of me not to disclose the fact that there is a scene in the film where the character discuss the social and cultural superiority of Italians in comparison to their own Irish culture, but one should not expect anything less in a film directed by a man who got his half-Italian daughter to play the lead and half-Italian son to right the screenplay (which he received an Oscar nomination for).

Set in 1904 at an Epiphany party held by two elderly spinster sisters and their equally barren and unmarried niece, the film certainly features an eclectic collection of quasi-bourgeois characters, including a goofy middle-aged drunk with an overbearing mother, fierce proto-feminist bitch with an obsession with Irish independence, elderly protestant pervert, and various other 'idiosyncratic' individuals that 'normal' people try to avoid every other day of the year aside from the holiday season when they are forced to be in their company due to family tradition. A virtual chamber piece that Kael probably enjoyed due to its Altman-esque emphasis on a bunch of not-always-civil talking heads, the film is somewhat genius in the sense that the main characters are hardly the center of attention, at least not until the final 15 minutes or so, yet it somehow manages to work in the end. In fact, for a good portion of the time you forget that Mrs. Huston is even in the film yet she somehow manages to give the most overtly dramatic and unforgettable performance as a character that is forced to confront her lack of love for her hubby as inspired by her bittersweet remembrance of the tragic death of her one-true-love, who died when she was still just a girl under rather heartbreaking circumstances. Indeed, if there is any good reason that the suicide rate skyrockets during the holidays, it is because the pain of remembering a past love is multiplied to an excoriating degree, which is surely quit effectively depicted in an effortlessly elegant fashion in Huston's film where a middle-aged married woman with children still cannot get over the pangs of heartbreak and guilt associated with a long dead boy who made her feel a way that her short and stocky beta-dork husband never could. Featuring a well liked but ultimately rather pathetic and unremarkable male protagonist that must come to terms with the fact that he has been emotionally cuckolded by a young man that died at the merge age of 17 before he even met his wife, The Dead—a surely fittingly titled flick with more than one meaning—is arguably Huston's most vulnerable and tender film and a cinematic work that seems to carry some cryptic personal message from the auteur about his own lost love, or at least some would assume (it should be noted that the filmmaker's fourth and most beautiful wife Enrica Soma—the mother of actress Anjelica and screenwriter Tony—died tragically in 1969 at the premature age of 39 in a car accident). Needless to say, as someone that is currently single, the film has more special significance for me than I would like to admit, so it felt like bittersweet kismet to re-watch it while recalling the seemingly perennial pain of a certain romantic loss. Undoubtedly, The Dead is not the sort of film you want to watch if you are currently in a happy relationship that you cannot possibly fathom ending.

At the beginning of The Dead, it seems like a Dublin Epiphany party—a Santa-less Christian feast day on January 6 that celebrates the revelation of God in his Son as human in Jesus Christ—could turn into a disaster due to drunk degenerates like McDrunkard Theodore Alfred ‘Freddy’ Malins (Donal Donnelly) and mouthy perverted old protestant fart Mr. Browne (Dan O’Herlihy), but the year is 1904 and these characters are far too classy and organically European to engage in the sort of sordid mick degeneracy that the city is best known for nowadays. After all, poor Freddy is so hopelessly bourgeois that he cannot bear to piss in another man’s company, even when he is stumbling around drunk like a fool. The party is at the charming two-story humble abode of two elderly spinster sisters, Aunt Julia Morkan (Cathleen Delany) and Aunt Kate Morkan (Helena Carroll) and their much younger but similarly childless and husbandless pianist niece Mary Jane (Ingrid Craigie). Although never really alluded to, one might assume Mary Jane is a dyke as she has a number of hot young redheaded debutante students, including Miss Furlong (Kate O’Toole), Miss O’Callaghan (Maria Hayden), and Miss Higgins (Cormac O’Herlihy). Stocky dark-haired male protagonist Gabriel Conry (Donal McCann) and his wife Gretta (Anjelica Huston) are some of the last people to arrive at the party because, as the former complains regarding the latter, “[she] takes three mortal hours to dress herself.” Likewise, Gretta bitches about her husband making her wear “galoshes” because, “Gabriel says everyone wears them on the continent.” Happy to be away from their children but hardly touchy and feeling with each other, Gabriel and Gretta seem to be stuck in a stagnating loveless marriage of convenience, or at least so will the viewer will most certainly assume by the end of the film. While Gretta seems to be simply bored with her hubby, Gabriel—a rather uptight chap with a somewhat phony personality who spends a good portion of the night attempting to memorize a rather contrived speech—just seems to lack the emotional capacity to truly love anyone. In short, Gabriel is the kind of fellow that seems like he would be more interested in video-games and fedoras than women if he lived in contemporary times. Seemingly asexual, Gabriel even acts annoyed when a proto-IRA bitch named Molly Ivors (Maria McDermottroe). In a seeming attempt to flirt with him in an aggressively teasing fashion, Ms. Ivors later mocks Gabriel for his lack of love for Ireland by calling him a “West Britain.” A proudly deracinated cosmopolitan type whose petty boasts of continental open-mindedness ultimately reveal a sort of insufferable passive-aggressive arrogance that is oh-so typical of effeminate males, Gabriel even proudly declares to Ms. Ivors, “To tell you the truth, I’m sick of my country.” Needless to say, if Gabriel and Ms. Ivors were to actually fuck, it would naturally involve the latter violently penetrating the former with a large ribbed strap-on dildo.

Although a nice lass that does not seem to have a mean bone in her entire body, Gretta seems somewhat disconnected from everyone else, especially her husband, who seems to be totally oblivious to her dubious emotional state, at least at first. Unfortunately, an old unhealed internal wound in Gretta is violently ripped open at the party when a somewhat fat fellow named Mr. Grace (Sean McClory) unexpectedly recites an eighth-century Middle Irish poem entitled "Donal Óg" translated from Gaelic by someone named Lady Augusta Gregory that concludes with the forlornly lovelorn lines, "My heart is as black as the blackness of the sloe, or as the black coal that is on the smith's forge; or as the sole of a shoe left in white halls; it was you put that darkness over my life. You have taken the east from me, you have taken the west from me; you have taken what is before me and what is behind me; you have taken the moon, you have taken the sun from me; and my fear is great that you have taken God from me!" While Mr. Grace's recitation does not push Gretta over the edge, it does make her vulnerable enough to completely break down later in the film upon hearing a traditional Irish song that her long-dead teenage lover used to sing to her. In fact, the viewer does not even see much of Gretta again after Mr. Grace's recitation until towards the end of the film after the party has already ended, though we see a lot more of her phony husband than we would like to due to a ridiculous contrived speech where he declares that his two elderly aunts and their niece are the "Three Graces" of Dublin and brags about the hospitality of Irish folks. While Gabriel is keen on demonstrating niceness and kindness, his actions do not always seem sincere. When Freddy Malins arrives at the party drunk and disheveled at the beginning of the film, Gabriel goes out of his way to clean him up, but one gets the sense that his kind acts are more motivated by a desire to avoid conflict at all costs than a sort of pure kindness. Indeed, Gabriel is certainly the sort of archetypal 'nice guy' type that is unfortunately now all too common in the Western world as his occasional bitchy passive-aggressive behavior reveals. Luckily, Gretta gets so ludicrously lovesick after being confronted with reminders from the past that no amount of nice guy nonsense can prevent her from pouring out her heart to her husband Gabriel about how she really feels.

After the party ends, Gabriel only goes looking for his wife after helping Freddy's disgruntled mother get into a carriage, so naturally he is somewhat shocked when he finds her crying at the top of a set of stairs of the Morkan house while secretly listening to a fat chap named Bartell D'Arcy (famous Irish tenor Frank Patterson) singing the traditional Irish song "The Lass of Aughrim." Unbeknownst to poor Gabriel, the song was regularly sung by Gretta's long dead teenage lover Michael Furey. During their somewhat awkward carriage ride back to their hotel, Gabriel makes various failed pathetic attempts to comfort Gretta, including telling a stupid family story about a horse and kissing her hand, but she just cannot seem to stop brooding over her memories. When they eventually get back to their hotel room, Gabriel finally gets the gall to ask

THE DEAD

Gretta what is wrong, so she admits she was thinking about the song “The Lass of Aughrim,” because, as she somberly confesses while on the verge of tears, “I’m thinking about a person long ago who used to sing that song.” From there, Gretta sobs while she tells the tragic prematurely ended love story about her and an inordinately romantic boy named Michael Furey from Galway that died when he was only 17 after assumedly risking his life to see her one last time. Indeed, as her remark, “I think he died for me” clearly reveals, Gretta blames herself for Furey’s untimely demise, though one also suspects that she is also mad at herself for marrying a man that she does not really love. A sickly boy that died a week after he risked his life to visit Gretta during a rainy winter night despite his failing health because he discovered that she was moving to Dublin, Furey certainly loved her in a manner that quasi-narcissist Gabriel never could, but as the clearly haunted female protagonist reveals to her husband regarding her youthful love, “I am implored him to go home at once. I told him he’d get his death in the rain. But he said he did not want to live.” Needless to say, Gabriel is rather taken aback by the entire story and its dejecting implications, not least of all because he has no intrinsic understanding of how a man could love a woman so much, even though the woman in question is his own wife.

While Gretta practically passes out while sobbing after telling her deeply disconcerting story of tragic young love, Gabriel finds his mind racing, not least of all because he finally realizes that he does not truly understand his own wife, or as he thinks to himself while staring at her in bed, “How poor a part I’ve played in your life. It’s almost as though I’m not your husband and we’ve never lived together as man and wife.” Indeed, the viewer soon realizes that Gabriel is an emotionally underdeveloped individual that has never loved another person in his entire life as reflected in his clearly articulated racing thoughts, “To me your face is still beautiful, but it’s no longer the one for which Michael Furey braved death. Why am I feeling this riot of emotion? What stirred it up? [...] One by one, we’re all becoming shades. Better to pass boldly into that other world, in the full glory of some passion, than fade and wither dimly with age. How long you locked away in your heart the image of your lover’s eyes when he told you that he did not wish to live. I’ve never felt that way myself towards any woman, but I know that such a feeling must be love. Think of all those who ever were, back to the start of time. And me, transient as they, flickering out as well into their grey world. Like everything around me, this solid world itself which they reared and lived in, is dwindling and dissolving. Snow is falling. Falling in that lonely churchyard where Michael Furey lies buried. Falling faintly through the universe and faintly falling, like the descent of their last end, upon all the living, and the dead.” Of course, during his rather short life, Michael Furey certainly truly lived more than sad beta-cuck Gabriel Conroy, whose wife’s soul belongs to a dead teenager. Notably, Gabriel also contemplates his old spinster Aunt Julia and how she will probably die soon, as if he realizes that he will also die lonely just like his spinster aunt, even though he technically has a wife. Of course, as the film reveals with its shots of a snowy cemetery where Michael Furey was buried, death is an innately solitary affair that no one escapes, not even pretentious self-absorbed twats.

The not-exactly-morbidly titled The Dead was certainly an exquisite and even poetically fitting way for John Huston to conclude his fairly singular filmmaking career, but I would probably stop short of pulling a Roger Ebert, who included it in his book The Great Movies III (2010) despite giving the film only 3 out of 4 stars in his original 1987 review, and describing it as an immaculate masterpiece. In fact, I consider Huston's other later cinematic efforts Wise Blood and Under the Volcano to be superior to his swansong in just about every way, especially in terms of entertainment value, subversiveness and sheer replay value. Of course, then again, I cannot think of a more artistically sound yet vulnerable film for a filmmaker to end both his life and career with, so I do not want to underplay its value in the context of Huston's entire oeuvre, especially since so many other great filmmakers (e.g. Fellini, Bergman) concluded their careers in less than memorable fashions. Naturally, the film only seems all the more poignant and haunting now that virtually all of the actors featured in it are also dead, yet their memory now lives on via cinema not unlike how the memory of Michael Furey lives on in the mind of poor Gretta, but of course that was probably Huston's intention, hence the film's subtle multilayered brilliance as both a nuanced melodrama and virtual self-obituary in poetic cinematic form. While I cannot say that I am perennially internally wounded by the memory of a dead teenage boy, The Dead inspired a sort of vaguely unsettling bittersweet nostalgia-cum-misery in me, especially in regard to the unwavering feeling of preferring death over being without the bitch I love(d) most. Unlike many lovesick individuals, Gretta certainly has a certain convenience of memory, as her great love died young in what seemed to be the ideal youthful romance before hate and negativity came into play in her relationship. Indeed, there seems to be a certain romantic purity in regard to Gretta's memory of Michael Furey, hence the intolerable nature of her loveless marriage with Gabriel. Of course, the film's male protagonist Gabriel represents the height of beta-male sterility as a man that is so out of touch with his own wife that he has no clue that she finds him to be both emotionally and sexually banal and thus clings to ancient memories in regard to a dead boy that she probably did not even have the pleasure of feeling inside of her. A prosaic pansy whose phony panache is a pathetic substitute for an authentic personality and whose cosmopolitan tendencies reveal a laughably contrived sense of class and superiority, Gabriel is ultimately a truly singularly horrifying character of cinema history in that he represents the everyman par excellence; a walking and talking eunuch corpse that merely floats through life instead of actually living it. Of course, I think it is safe to say that Huston actually lived life as his long and eclectic filmmaking career, various wives and lovers, and children demonstrate, so it seems somewhat curious that he would focus on such a soulless character, but then again he was a man that truly loved classic mick literature and was probably just happy to adapt his homeboy Joyce. After roaming around a small oceanic city until 5am the next morning this past New Year's Eve and seeing countless drunk sluts with fake blonde hair stumble down the streets and tons of brain-dead bros attempting to pick fight with strangers and harass workers and business owners, I cannot help but think a lot has been lost in the Occident in terms of love, romance, and chivalry since the days of Joyce's Ireland as depicted in Huston's The Dead; a film with a title that best describes the both the spiritual and cultural status of modern Western man. Not just a dapperly dressed candy ass that lacks the capacity to love, Gabriel is a sad symbol of European decadence and an entire race's unconscious obsession with collective suicide, which is surely something that would have pained Mr. Joyce to see as demonstrated by his wise words, "Better pass boldly into that other world, in the full glory of some passion, than fade and wither dismally with age." As for Mr. Huston, he might have been somewhat spiritually and politically decadent, but he was unequivocally a true Faustian Man that expressed a certain degree authentic Aryan masculinity, even in a depressing melodrama like The Dead.

MONKEY SHINES

George A. Romero (1988)

Monkey Shines is a film that has garnered a status of "instant retro classic" in horror. This "alleged" story seems ripped from Stephen King's head. The tale of monkey-man love relationship along with the genetic alteration has no choice but to relate instantly along the likes of Dean Koontz's Watchers and Stephen King's Cujo. Romero has worked on such Stephen King works as Creepshow and the pre-planned The Girl Who Loved Tom Gordon. All this over the ever-so-natural horror idolization. If there's any favoritism in the horror culture, it's between King and Romero, after all, neither seem to have their own signature blend of stylistic writing/filming.

Now there's absolutely no reason to wear glasses those enormous unless a secretive heirloom status.

Monkey Shines is a novel by a virtually unknown directed to the screen by the immortal "Romero". The reason this novel is unheard of is beyond me. The whole story figment of a killer primate is a rich blend of ironic evolutionary revenge that has not been seen in films such as Congo and Outbreak, regardless of which came first. The film plays out as planned, each move becoming more predictable than the last, ultimately leaving an anticlimactic battle of "who's higher on the food chain".

Monkey Shines will regrettably always be remembered. The film isn't by any means horrible or bad, but the lack of any visual direction disturbs me. Hell, if it weren't for the horrific poster artwork of the toy monkey with cymbals/razor, this film wouldn't bother my natural existence anymore than The Kindred (which parallels Monkey Shines with overly exceptional poster artwork. The same expectations were soiled with the recent release of Max Payne; a film that couldn't have been THAT bad, but ended up being the stuff of nightmares.

Monkey Shines is a certain kind of film that wishes to be both terrifying and stature sadistic as Cronenberg's The Brood. It takes a special kind of "dreamer" film to fail at any substance and only prevail as a generic tale of terror that isn't as scary as it looks. The obsessive villain of Ella is as intimidating as the average woman - which isn't intimidating at all. Lackluster opening linked directly to an inconsiderate ending. Monkey Shines would love to bridge a connection between man and beast, but fails in the birthing process. As for unadulterated terror goes, Monkey Shines has a negative amount of those. With embarrassing infrared monkey vision, you'd wish you had watched another film prime for replay. Whether the "tortured" quadriplegic main character wishes to be Corky from Magic or the entire lack-of-style wishes to "borrow" from The Brood, Monkey Shines doesn't shine in any aspect. Not necessarily a bad film, but nothing eye-opening about it other than the press material including the amazing poster. A species war could have been filmed so much better.

DIARY OF THE DEAD

George A. Romero (2008)

Didn't Romero say he wasn't going to make any more zombie films? Oh, and then he made Land of the Dead. Well, in effort to spread the apocalypse craze even further, Romero lends his output of first-person terror. Sorry guys, but Cloverfield and [REC] did it better. Well, on the subject of Land of the Dead being released, when the film first debuted, Romero spoke so highly of it; that it is his personal masterpiece. As soon as the negative reviews started pouring in, Romero then harnessed the power of the Internet and began writing blogs and recording webisodes of how studios and executives ruined Land of the Dead. So each of his "Dead" films attacks a subject or even "problem" in society. Diary of the Dead is a direct attack to the Internet/media fad of this generation. The film spouts YouTube, Myspace, and blogging site references. Diary of the Dead is not the proud DIY zombie film that you might think it is, rather, a cowardly attack towards anything that has ever wronged or spoke ill of Romero. Instead of trying to make fun of the critics and people who dislike his accidental cult film's, he should focus more on making a decent film. One thing that made Cloverfield and [REC] so horrifying, is the lack of music. Being as how it is a character holding the camera, it allows the film to almost break the "third wall." In the opening montage of Diary of the Dead, the female narrator explains how she took the footage of the apocalypse and added music to it; to add to the "effect." This alone starts the film off on a low note. The plot takes a group of college kids filming a horror movie in the woods. Again, Romero seems to be attacking the indie horror business, as these kids encounter zombies. To watch all these stupid film school kids get killed off must be his wet dream. "How many times have I told you? Dead things don't move fast." This is a direct quote and another attack, this one against the constant remakes of his films being made, the "new" zombie that always sprints, and again, his very own creation (Land of the Dead.) One thing I still don't understand is, why when Cloverfield was released, every one commented on this authenticity of the characters? Sure, they had their rough spots, but compared to the acting and demeanor of everyone in Diary of the Dead, they were Oscar worthy. Diary of the Dead is the ultimate "How to make a bad movie!" reference source. Is it me, or does the narrator purposely speak like Sarah Connor from T2? The film is entirely composed without any horror fan's wit or ingenuity. If I were to encounter a zombie, I'd sure as hell call it a zombie, not call them "dead" or even deny their existence. Black Militants who are on the run make their second coming in this film. First time since Night of the Living Dead, I believe. When the colored gentlemen are questioned about why they got together, they stated "Because we got the power. For the first time in our lives, we got the power." Romero is now at the point of trying too damn hard to bring social commentary in his films. Diary of the Dead is all about surveillance and censorship. The whole cast features intellectually challenged hicks and film school jerk-off's. This film is nothing new, and it is certainly not good. Zombie effect's don't make movies good, and neither does Romero.

DEATH BED: THE BED THAT EATS

George Barry (1977)

Whether in the underground or the mainstream, I have viewed a plethora of horrible films during my life. I have dug far and wide, from nation-to-nation (cinematically not geographically, of course) hoping to find those few dark films worthy of recognition and notoriety. Despite all the mediocrity I have encountered on my cinematic journeys, the celluloid adventures have been worth it when I recall such horrific masterpieces as Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik, Lucio Fulci's The Beyond, Roger Watkins' Last House on Dead End Street, Andrey Iskanov's Visions of Suffering, and a variety of others. Recently, I took my chances with an odd and peculiar horror film Death Bed: The Bed That Eats, a film with such an odd title that it would make even the most initiated and jaded of horror hunters out there wonder in amusement.

Death Bed: The Bed That Eats was directed by the unknown auteur George Barry, a man that seems to only understand art in his own lost vacuum world as his single horror accomplishment testifies to. The ambiguous ghostly voyeur of the Death Bed is the tragic decadent artist Aubrey Beardsley, who is trapped within his own painting. The last great Sage poet and American patriot Ezra Pound once stated, "Beardsley was a sick man who knew he had to make a name quickly if he wanted to make it, personal wish, not believing in what art is or ought to be.....He was a heroic invalid, up to the point of his force. He didn't lie to himself or his friends in private, He knew that beauty is so difficult. He said, beauty is difficult." Like Pound's statement about Beardsley, director George Barry also should hold the title of "heroic invalid," a filmmaker with a twisted vision whose idea of beauty can only be found in the most dark, damp, and deteriorating of mid-western basements. The world of Death Bed: The Bed That Eats is a place that not many people would willingly go to, but those that desire to will be treated to a place of wonderful phantasmagorical bliss. For those that cherish their deepest and darkest of strange dreams, the film visualizes a supreme deadly daydream, offering the viewer a glimpse of a deteriorated celluloid netherworld that will not be soon forgotten. I can only imagine that director George Barry used a wide variety of mind altering drugs before, during, and after the production of Death Bed: The Bed That Eats. In fact, I would not be surprised if Mr. Barry got the idea for this lovely nightmare of a film whilst wasting away on his own bed. Some of the most aesthetically powerful scenes in Death Bed: The Bed That Eats occur when the bed eats a much deserving docile victim. The beautiful bed does not really eat the person, but burns them alive in a beer-like yellowish liquid which vaporizes human flesh like acid. The bed also resonates a whitish foam that makes one wonder whether or not the bed is sexually aroused by the humans it consumes. Drug connoisseur or not, I am sure George Barry felt a bed that eats people would make for a distinctly interesting film in comparison to a bed that people die on merely by overdosing on. Despite the many killings that have occurred before the sad quaint eyes of forever young Aubrey Beardsley, he seems to have gotten rather bored with bedside killings. If you're looking for a vintage and hypnotic piece of original Sinema, Death Bed: The Bed That Eats is the film to see. I am pretty sure Aubrey Beardsley would not have minded having his ghost make an appearance in this fantastic acid horror experiment, for this is a film merely following in his hopelessly decadent footsteps. Just as I wonder where artistically Beardsley would have ended up had he not succumbed to tuberculosis at an early age, I also wonder where George Barry would have went cinematically had he continued directing films after Death Bed: The Bed That Eats. Maybe Barry only had one film in him, but this single horror film and one-time director deserve exclusive recognition, for Death Bed: The Bed That Eats is one of those rare horror films that manages to go beyond the typical sensory power of the medium, radiating Sinema gold. Swim inside the Death Bed because surreal nightmares like these never get old.

HOW TO MAKE A MONSTER

It's humorous to see on the assortment of various "grade" films the name of the fabled creature designer, Stan Winston. In light of his marvelous creations not limited to Pumpkinhead, Xenomorphs (With due given to Giger), and Predator, the good outweighs the bad. The first half of this film is made-for-TV gold. I loathe straight to video horror more than the next guy. Having to work at a rental chain introduced me to the macabre world of DIY film making and such horrors as vampire midget films (Ankle Biters). I'd pick any of Winston's Creature Feature series over any Sci-Fi Channel film. This is the early film that beat the Slacker-power film Stay Alive to the punch. Better than Stay Alive in almost every way, the sniveling, pathetic "in-game graphics" are both on par. Which says a lot, considering the massive budget differences and year made. The graphics in TRON are considered more revolutionary than anything presented in this film. Again, It all lies on the weight of Stan Winston creating a cool bad guy; which seems to rip off Virus in a big way. In the series, there is She Creature, Earth vs. The Spider, How to Make a Monster, and Teenage Caveman. Teenage Caveman is most known for being directed by pedophile auteur Larry Clark. Each of these films is a modern remake (retelling) of a classic AIP film (American International Pictures). Plot in a sentence: Computer programmers racing to complete a game accidentally unleash "killer" A.I. into a computer game thus possessing a telemetry suit. Nerdcore is becoming a prominent voice in pop culture this century. It started with Nintendo geeks, now it is blossoming into the musical category (mc chris) as well as fashion (J!nx). The characters have the charm of old school Full Moon characters (Which isn't too boasting). Is that a Pikachu? Self-proclaimed Scream Queen Julie Strain plays a role in this film. As expected, she wastes no time stripping nude and jumping up and down. The title Scream Queen should be buried with the legends and not be used to label Troma stars and low budget models. To me, It's as disrespectful as it sounds. I can't look Strain in the eyes without remembering her acidic role in Tales from the Crapper. That movie was a cinematic cock punch; Arguably the worst Troma film in existence. Stan Winston's decision to create low-budget films really made me look up to the man even more. His hard-working unbiased work environment should be noted by every director or film crew member. What Geung tried to create with the characters is the food chain, expect presented and highlighted by social status, gender, and race. Being a Chinaman, he places a zen black man in the role, and even makes him an intellectual named Sol. (The very same Karim Prince.) Sol: The name is Sol. As in Solomon. As in the King That Is Wise. As in the solution to all of your problems. Why should you hire me? [laughs] Sol: That's just dumb; that is a dumb question. Why do you call that a chair? Why is the sky blue? Why are you dressed like a thirty-two year old when it's obvious

you're at least fifty- [gets interrupted] Then to typecast some more, they place an awkward wrestler in the film (Tyler Mane) whose name is Hardcore. Just don't ask him if it's his real name. This man swings around ancient weaponry as if he knows how to handle such antiques. Not only is the group a social rat race but each character fits a class or race in the standard video game. Hardcore obviously being the "Warrior", Sol being the "Mage", Laura being an "Elf", Bug being a "Cleric", and ironically, Steven being the "Thief". The film takes a hilariously awkward role when all blame for the approaching carnage falls on the Negro's shoulder. He designed, created, and gave life to the monster. He is also the first to die. The monster then takes his "tainted" pupils and exchanges them for something a bit more "white". The marketing for a "Scary" game in this film is all in vain. The scariest game is not one with a monster and awesome weapons. This film should be re-titled to "How to Not Make a Scary Game" This is arguably better than the film. Another flaw is the shameless product placement. P.O.D. can clearly be heard in one scene which warranted some groans from me and Evil Dead video game posters cover the wall. There is something about Video games and women mixing that leaves a bad taste in my mouth. Wait a minute, allow me to correct that. Something about Video games and Clea DuVall mixing makes me nauseous. She is up there with one of my least favorite faces in film. No. Speaking of video games and actors not fitting, I don't believe any of these "Stars" have ever played a video game in their life. In many scenes, each of these celebrities showed extreme acting vigil while mashing away at their controllers to do the simplest command such as jumping. Swinging a sword should not call for pressing every button as fast as you can and biting your lip. How to Make a Monster is seriously flawed, but there is something within the first hour which makes it almost worth my time. Tattoo's switch arms and people hear a fluttering rooms away through steel walls. This is a infected film which is dragged down by a horrible climax with a juvenile attempt at a symbolic layered ending. This film's ending is almost as fun as playing Virtual Boy and allowing your brain to bleed. I still think it's partially fun, especially being a homage to the 50's. shrugs "Battle not with monsters lest ye become a monster. When you gaze into the abyss, the abyss gazes into you." (Note: This quote is exercised in the film in a most pretentious context)

HOLD ME WHILE I'M NAKED

Just like with Andy Milligan about three years ago, I never thought my taste in cinema would grow so low to the point where I would actually come to appreciate the work of the “the Mozarts of 8mm Cinema,” the Kuchar twins, especially belated brother George (The Devil's Cleavage, The Mongreloid), whose singular quasi-autistic trash aesthetic finally began to appeal to me rather recently after I saw a screenshot from his extra experimental montage-based short Eclipse of the Sun Virgin (1967)—a work once described by the auteur as something that, “must be seen by the victims of perversity, regardless of sex or age. Painstakingly filmed and edited, it will be painful to watch, too”—and decided that I must watch it immediately. In the almost repugnantly perverse yet addictively playful short, Kuchar absurdly appears in a leather biker outfit that is quite similar to that of the eponymous gutter stud in Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964) and hangs out with a couple morbidly obese Jewesses that surely inspired John Waters to make ‘Divine’ his main diva. Needless to say, after wallowing in Eclipse of the Sun Virgin, I needed to see more Kuchar and ultimately naturally decided on his 17-minute experimental micro-melodrama Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966), which is regarded by many, including the various politically correct film scholars who pretend to like his films because they believe they are useful to their sterile LGBT agenda (even though the modern ‘homo friendly’ world would never ever produce a single Kuchar, Anger, or Markopoulos, as their films are expressions of suffering and longing and not banal issues like gay marriage), as his magnum opus and was incidentally made at the same time that his brother Mike was assembling his lo-fi sci-fi masterpiece Sins of the Fleshapoids (1965), which he also starred in. An absurdist film-within-a-film that authenticates the director's remark that “I work best under terrible pressure” as work that had its genesis in an aborted film and was inspired by real-life in that big bosomed lead, Donna Kerness, decided to quit production, which forced the auteur to completely change the entire flick and ultimately sire something that is thankfully much more personal, Kuchar's bizarrely kaleidoscopic piece of histrionically melodramatic metacinema tells the story of a perennially lonely and sexually repressed filmmaker who begins to lose what is left of his mind and dignity after his busty yet seemingly half-brain-dead lead heroine abruptly decides to quit the production because she is tired of exposing her juicy jumbo jugs on camera. Notably, Kuchar once somewhat mockingly reflected regarding his own film that it was, “A dazzling ruby in Kuchar's jewelry box of cinema gems and gossamer garbage. Financed with unemployment checks...[it] goes beyond the erotic into the world of hyper-neurotic, a world which exists behind the filmmaker's shower curtain.” Indeed, not only does the film reveal Kuchar to be a hyper-neurotic self-flagellating homo that wishes he got more cock than his leading lady, but also an obscenely guilt-ridden pansy momma's boy whose mother seems to carry around his testicles in her purse. A rare cinematic work that is just as intrinsically campy as it is melancholic and thus makes the viewer laugh when they should probably cry and vice versa, Hold Me While I'm Naked is pseudo-Sirkian in an almost psychotic way that makes it quite clear that Kuchar is unequivocally one of the most self-denigrating, enigmatically eccentric, and benignly unhinged filmmakers who has ever lived. Of course, Kuchar is not Rock Hudson as the male lead, but a character that makes the titular human turd in Napoleon Dynamite (2004) seem like what ghetto-dwelling American negroes describe as a 'pimp.'

Hold Me While I'm Naked begins with Kuchar, who plays an overtly autobiographical character named Phillip, directing a farcically frantic chase scene where he shouts to his lead actress Donna Kerness while she is running away from some unseen entity that she should look "scared" because her "life is a stake." In a display of his true carny-esque gentlemanliness, Kuchar also shouts to Kerness while directing her, "This is your greatest portrayal. You're a star and this is going to be your biggest picture. Keep running." After finishing shooting the scene, human goober Kuchar smiles in a charmingly goofy fashion and waves in approval while still holding his film camera. In the next scene, Kuchar films Kerness and a man that is embracing her behind a stained glass window and while he describes her first take as "wonderful" and "almost just perfect," he then tells her that they have to reshoot the scene with her bra off, "because the mysticism of the stained glass window and the profanity of that brassier do not go well together." While Kerness immediately sheds her bra and has no problem shooting the scene, she decides it is the last straw in terms of having to shed her flesh for the particularly perverse looking fairy filmmaker, especially after he announces after shooting the scene, "Terrific! That's it for today. Tomorrow we do the massaging table scene and maybe after that, if we have time, we'll do the scene where you're found naked in a fallout shelter and there are those radioactive welts on your side."

After wrapping up shooting for the day, Kerness and her onscreen/offscreen lover continue to makeout behind the stained glass window while Kuchar proceeds to walk home by himself while looking like a pathetic impotent loser in a scene that seems to underscore the filmmaker's nonexistent sex life and overall emotional impoverishment. While walking home, Kuchar happens upon a little bird sitting on a tree branch and he is so entranced by its natural beauty that he somehow manages to magically pick up the little creature without it flying away and then proceeds to kiss it in a scene that misleadingly makes the viewer think that the filmmaker is headed towards a brighter and more beautiful future, but of course that's not how things work out when you are a goofy gay loser who lives with their mother. Meanwhile, Kuchar's leading lady Kerness melodramatically moans to her lover, "I'm sick and tired of being naked in almost every scene. I'm not going to do this picture anymore, he's like some kind of erotic parent," to which he fittingly replies, "A neurotic parent is more like it." Ultimately, Kerness pleads to her discernibly horny white knight beau, "Just take me away from him" and then calls him the filmmaker and lets him know that she is quitting the film. Instead of getting mad at Kerness for quitting and, in turn, destroying the picture he has dedicated his life to making, Kuchar meekly asks her on the phone, "You're not going to finish the movie?" and then slowly puts his phone down on the receiver and then stares out of his window in a pathetically forlorn fashion as if he is staring into oblivion. It becomes quite apparent at this point that, without filmmaking, Kuchar's life is meaningless and he has nothing to live for. In between inexplicably applying red lipstick to the plastic lips of unclad vintage baby dolls that are lying next to him in bed, Kuchar makes various attempts to find new actors but, as a man with a hilariously flat affect, he is not a very good salesman, especially when people have better things to do like fuck. When Kuchar calls up one longhaired hippy dude and declares like a senile bible salesman, "Yes, there happens to be an opening in my new film for you and a girl of your choice. I have a great role for her," the silly looking beatnik bastard finds himself hanging upon on the filmmaker after his girlfriend gets his mind focusing on more important things by taking her bra off. Indeed, the two hippies have such passionate sex that they cause power-lines outside to seemingly shake.

In a montage that seems to highlight the fact that Kuchar is a man with an undying sense of loneliness and sexual repression who has hit rock bottom because the one thing that helps him to partially fill the void that is his life, filmmaking, has been taken away from him, shots of the filmmaker lying on the ground entangled in reels of film is intercut with scenes of hippies fucking. Naturally, as the film progresses, Kuchar's idiosyncratic montages only get all the more merrily melancholic. In what is the most (in)famous segment of the film, a montage of Kuchar taking a sad lonely shower is intercut with scenes of the filmmaker seemingly daydreaming about his ex-superstar Kerness ecstatically making love to her man in a shower. Notably, Kuchar is strangely wearing a similar translucent dress as Kerness while taking a shower, thus indicating the filmmaker is fantasizing about being her and making passionate love to rough macho men in the shower. While showering, Kuchar seems to lose it and begins banging his head against the shower wall like some sort of lethargic mental patient who refuses to take his meds. At about the same time, the corpse of the little bird that Kuchar kissed at the beginning of the film appears at his window and then the film cuts to a shot of the filmmaker kissing the cutesy winged being and it subsequently dying as a result of his literal kiss of death, thereupon arguably insinuating in an allegorical fashion that the auteur believes he is some sort of corrosive force who only has the capacity to debase and destroy, hence his fetish for pornography and getting girls naked. At the end of his shower of sadness, Kuchar's mother (played by his real-life Ukrainian peasant mother Stella Kuchar of Anita Needs Me (1963) and Ascension of the Demonoids (1985)) starts attempting to open the bathroom door and then yells to her son in an exceedingly bitchy fashion, "Phillip, it's me, Mom. Get out, for Christ's sake. You've been in there an hour. The food's gonna get cold. Get out already. I'm sick and tired of hanging around this house all day. I wanna get out too. Now remember, put the bathmat on the floor so you don't get any water all over the bathroom. Come on, hurry up! The food is getting cold." As demonstrated by the fact that he stares at the bathroom door in a somewhat disturbing fashion while you can hear his heart beat, Kuchar seems afraid of having to simply leave the room and confront his mother, who is undoubtedly largely responsible for his autistic behavior and remarkably low self-esteem, among other things. Somewhat curiously, when Kuchar does finally leave the bathroom, he is dressed like a middle-aged woman, thus hinting that he takes after mommy dearest and is more or less becoming her. After his mother serves him a pathetic looking pork chop dinner that she serves on a paper plate (I guess Kuchar's mother was too lazy to wash dishes), Kuchar abruptly breaks down the fourth wall by staring into the camera and declaring to the viewer, "I guess there's a lot of things in life worth living for...isn't there?"

In a rather insightful segment featured in the documentary It Came from Kuchar (2009) directed by Jennifer M. Kroot, Hold Me While I'm Naked heroine Donna Kernness states while fiddling with a lollipop like it is a cock, "I was in the beginning of HOLD ME, but I was feeling weak because I was on Prednisone, so I called George...and you know how he is, he says, 'ok Donna, ok Donna.' He was devastated...I know he was, but he'd never show that. He went on to finish the movie. I think what it turned into was his devastation, along with his other devastations about things in his life that maybe bothered him. We were laughing at and yet crying at the same time when he's lying on the floor with film all over his face...the cuttings of movies and calling people who are saying, 'Oh, no, no...I can't see you now'" and they're all having their own personal sex life. And what is he doing?! He's twirling in the shower with his mother calling him to eat his pork chops." Indeed, despite being less than 20 minutes long, Kuchar's film is one of the patently pathetic self-pity parties ever sired on celluloid, yet it also one the greatest, most idiosyncratic, and joyously bittersweet self-pity parties as the pure and unadulterated expression of a seeming autistic queer who fantasizes about being a dreamy diva that every macho man desires yet is ultimately too strange to even appeal to the average AIDS-ridden tearoom sod. Of course, most viewers of the film will probably be asking themselves how Kuchar got so screwed up and socially inept in the first place and thankfully the film at least partially answers that question, albeit in a campy hermetic homo way. Aside from the film's various references to Catholic guilt, Kuchar makes it quite clear by casting his own mother in an repugnantly bitchy role that she is largely the reason he suffers from ludicrously low-esteem and is so intrinsically plagued with such a debilitating case of neuroticism that he makes Woody Allen seem like a strong and stoic Waffen-SS soldier by comparison. In fact, Kuchar has such a preternatural relationship with his mother that when she died, he filmed her wake and even got a shot of his then-98-year-old aunt crying at her casket for his singularly morbid short Currents of Destiny (2007). In that sense, I think Kuchar used his camera as a sort of shield-cum-safety-blanket that made it somewhat easier for him to deal with the more emotionally and psychologically difficult things in life. After all, he also documented his good friend and collaborator, filmmaker Curt McDowell (Thundercrack!, Loads), while he was on his deathbed dying of AIDS for his video piece Video Album 5: The Thursday People (1987) and you can tell while watching the footage that he surely did not do it for exploitative reasons. As a man who proclaimed in the doc It Came from Kuchar, "...But you know, adults are weird, you know. I think all kids understand that," it seems that Kuchar always saw himself as a child and this sort of childish innocence and naivety is certainly apparent in his films.

Indeed, judging by the uncompromisingly confessional, almost self-destructively and nihilistically autobiographical, and radically retrograde 'home-movie-esque' yet meticulously stylized essence of Hold Me While I'm Naked, it is hard to imagine that, aside from more obvious influences like John Waters and Nick Zedd, that the films of Guy Maddin, who notably appears in the doc It Came from Kuchar and cites The Devil's Cleavage (1975) as one of his favorite films, would exist today. Additionally, the overtly mechanical and intentionally contrived bird scenes in the film almost certainly influenced the conclusion of David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986). Undoubtedly it takes a certain striking degree of social retardation and pathological cinemania to churn out a film like Kuchar's where life and cinema become one and the same, with the filmmaker's perturbably pathetic life ironically obtaining crude yet captivating poetic meaning in its celluloid form. In its recklessly daring expression of real ugly and less than flattering pathos, impotence, and despair, Kuchar's truly short but sweet melodrama managed to accomplish the seemingly impossible by giving camp artistic credibility. Somewhat shockingly, the film was even included in the popular but somewhat uneven film reference guide 1001 Movies You Must See Before You Die (2003) edited by Steven Jay Schneider. Directed by a superlatively scatological fellow (notably, John Waters has acknowledged that the shocking 'shit-eating grin' conclusion of Pink Flamingos (1972) was probably inspired by the turd scene in Pagan Rhapsody (1970)) who seems to suffer from an inverted Oedipus complex and a love-hate relationship with some of his leads that was probably inspired by his desire to live vicariously through them, Hold Me While I'm Naked ultimately unwittingly reveals the cocksucker essence of 'camp' and how it is merely an exaggerated expression of the how the homo—an abstraction from the mainstream that is innately incapable of truly understanding the heterosexual mind—perceives and interacts with the world, especially in regard to sex and cinema. Of course, what makes Kuchar a braver filmmaker than his contemporary Jack Smith and disciple John Waters is that his films, especially Hold Me While I'm Naked, are hopelessly personal and incriminating, hence their singular charm. I also must not forget to note that I have never noticed a gay filmmaker with such a shameless big titty fetish, but I guess that is what happens to you when your father introduces you and your twin brother to pornography at an early age. Surely, one almost gets the impression while watching Hold Me While I'm Naked that Kuchar thought that if he looked at enough massive mammary glands, it might turn him straight (notably, at the end of his career, Kuchar seemed to sexually mature and became obsessed with filming the shaved granny pussy of elderly diva Linda Martinez in works like The Fury of Frau Frankenstein (2005)), which is just one of the many interpretations that one can get while watching the film, as a work that tests the bounds of cinematic tastelessness in a way that is, unlike most campy trash, anything but soulless. Indeed, if there is a celluloid heaven, Kuchar is probably filming Pasolini right now getting run over by a car driven by Fassbinder while Curtis Harrington commands a UFO that is hovering in the background.

ECLIPSE OF THE SUN VIRGIN

While Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966) and A Reason to Live (1976) are oftentimes considered two of the filmmaker's very best films, George Kuchar's Eclipse of the Sun Virgin (1967) certainly holds a special place in my heart simply because it was the very first film that I saw by the seemingly quasi-autistic auteur that made me realize that he was more than just an obscenely outmoded amateur film director who flooded the American underground with his shamelessly neurotic experiments in excess, eccentricity, and senseless scatology. Arguably Kuchar's most innately esoteric and experimental film as an anti-linear montage piece, the film is a sort of quasi-sequel to the filmmaker's most well known and revered cinematic work, or as he stated himself, "ECLIPSE OF THE SUN VIRGIN was the follow-up to HOLD ME WHILE I'M NAKED, in which I try to get into the character's mind. The character was me of course. I did it in a more dreamlike way. NAKED was about the experience of what's happening; SUN VIRGIN was more enigmatic. When it first came out, no one could make head nor tail of it, but now people understand it—which scares me. I didn't totally get it 'til years later. Someone saw it and said this is a gay picture, and I thought, he's right. I had no idea at the time, twenty years ago." Indeed, the film is a piece of semi-cryptic Catholic cocksucker guilt where the auteur fittingly plays the lead and displays his sense of disgust while in the company of fat grotesque girls while, at the same time, he longs to be with some greasy Guido guy of his dreams. Featuring an almost all-Hebraic cast of morbidly obese Divine-esque Jewesses, wops and Yid dorks, as well as Kuchar as himself in the lead role sporting all-black Scorpio Rising-esque leather motorcycle outfit, Eclipse of the Sun Virgin reveals that the filmmaker's preferred communication with girls is by way of belching and farting and his interest in boys is almost religious in a sort of ritualistic Catholic homoerotic sense where the lead character worships young men in a fashion not unlike how sexually repressed nuns pray to the image of Jesus on the cross. Of course, when it comes to both genders, Kuchar does not have the testicular fortitude to pursue any sort of meaningful physical relationship and instead attempts to impress his would-be-sexual-conquests with screenings of vulgar medical footage. A film with a sort of distinct dream logic that seems to be set more in the director's terribly sexually repressed fantasy realm than any sort of tangible reality, Kuchar's all-too-brief 13-minute experiment in middle class repression is indubitably one of the most idiosyncratic, enigmatic, and truly quirky queer themed films that I have ever seen and I say that as a fan of the oeuvre of Teutonic dandy Werner Schroeter. Indeed, the film makes anything that John Waters has ever done seem hopelessly contrived and insincere by comparison. Additionally, the film makes anything Jack Smith has ever done seem like the obnoxiously abhorrent aesthetic ravings of a hyperactive poof philistine queen. Most importantly, Eclipse of the Sun Virgin is more thoughtful and intriguing than anything directed by the majority of so-called Structural filmmakers like Paul Sharits and Hollis Frampton that were working during the same era, as a playfully perverse piece of highly personalized preternatural cinema with a deep and bizarrely darkly joyous soul.

George Kuchar plays a college graduate who is plagued by Catholic guilt, fat obnoxious sisters (all of whom are played by fat and swarthy Jewesses despite Kuchar's own Slavic Catholic origins), and a low tolerance for alcohol. At the beginning of the film, a drawing of Jesus Christ is juxtaposed with a frigid sounding woman narrating, "he that shall lose his life for me, shall find it" from Matthew 10:39. In the next shot, a framed college graduation photo of Kuchar is juxtaposed with the same woman narrating, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me" from Matthew 19:21. In the next shot, Kuchar is featured attempting to drink liquor out of a coffee mug, though he has a hard time swallowing it and seems to almost barf it up. From there, we witness a bizarre scene where Kuchar's Hebraic homeboy Larry Leibowitz plays piano while his mother Frances Leibowitz plays on a different piano that is positioned in the opposite direction. Out of nowhere, Mrs. Leibowitz grabs an old framed portrait of her and her son when he was just a small lad and stares at it intently as if disappointed that her little boy is a now a little mensch with sexual urges. In what is the first overtly homoerotic scene, Kuchar stares like a goofy gay goofball at a somewhat gawky guido boy named Joe Zinzi as if he wants to devour his dago dong, but the filmmaker becomes afraid of the wrath of god when he notices that his little friend is sporting a large crucifix necklace. Indeed, guido Zinzi will homoerotically haunt Kuchar for the rest of the film, but so will Christ and his deep-seated Catholic background. Somewhat strangely at almost the three minute mark of the film, it is insinuated that Kuchar might actually be dead as the Jesus portrait from the beginning of the film closes to reveal a leather bound obituary reading "In Loving Memory" on the cover. Humorously, a storm knocks the obituary down and exposes that it was being propped up in a half-ass manner by a bottle of Right Guard deodorant. Whether Kuchar is dead or not is questionable, but it seems fairly undeniable that most of the characters in the film, including the protagonist, seem like sexually repressed phantoms that live in some sort of alternate dimension for forsaken perverts that lack the fleshy goods and charisma to obtain a mate.

As the film progresses, Kuchar continues to attempt to hold his liquor but he ultimately ends up spitting it back in his blue coffee cup. When Kuchar ends up going outside, the film ends up taking an all the more mystical tone that only gets all the more bizarrely esoteric as it progresses. After a segment where the matronly narrator states, "Only as your pride slowly crumbles will you get the glimpse of true humility," Kuchar uncovers a mirror that is covered with pieces of fruit and closely stares into it in a scene that is certainly a hilarious allegory for homosexual narcissism. At this point in the film, Kuchar begins a temporary excursion in so-called heteronormality and tries in vain to attempt to court a somewhat chubby girl that sometimes has a parakeet resting on her shoulder who he watches playing Beethoven on a piano while seemingly like he is bored to death. When Kuchar attempts to pick a rose for the girl in a scenario one might interpret as his abject failure at attempting to live as a heterosexual man who courts women, he ultimately fails pathetically and merely pricks his finger instead to the point where blood is gushing out of it (not long after, the girl also receives a bloody finger). In another scene that illustrates Kuchar's decided disinterest in the fairer sex, the protagonist is featured sitting on a stuffed animal adorned bed while sporting leather-fag biker gear and keeping his distance from his would-be girlfriend, who is admiring herself in a compact mirror and seems to be waiting in vain for her hapless beau to peck her on the lips. In a preternaturally potent montage that sort of feels like an experiment in subliminal pop art, shots of the pseudo-girlfriend displaying where she pricked her finger on a rose are juxtaposed with Kuchar checking out his guido pal Zinzi, who gives him a flirtatious knowing smirk. Notably, during this montage, Kuchar is sporting the leather biker outfit and a pair of black sunglasses, which one might interpret as the sort of idealized macho homo that he wishes he was. In the same montage, Kuchar is also featured stealing a Beethoven bust and throwing it into a dirty above ground pool in a scenario that seems symbolic of the protagonist's sacrifice for sodomy (after all, Kuchar's female 'love interest' was featured in a previous scene playing Beethoven on the piano). After Kuchar tosses both the Beethoven bust and a partly deflated beach ball in the pool, the girlfriend is featured sobbing hysterically while staring at a goofy portrait of the protagonist. Naturally, Kuchar and his little fake girlfriend are not featured in another single scene together for the remainder of the film, thus confirming that the poof protagonist has rid himself of any heterosexual pretenses that he might have had before and has accepted the fact that he is about as straight as a circle.

After his failed girlfriend cries to the point where her face is literally soaked with tears as if someone hit her in the face with a water balloon, Kuchar is depicted calling a fat Jewess on the phone and belching into the receiver when she picks it up. Hilariously, the heavyset Hebrewess responds to Kuchar's fairly powerful burp by farting so loudly that she causes the bed that she is lying on to shake. From there, the viewer is forced to endure the unsightly sight of fat, Divine-esque Jewesses applying lipstick, smoking cigarettes, and playing with kitty cats, among other things that seem to make a mockery of femininity and the so-called fairer sex in general. For whatever reason, during this truly grotesque kosher chick montage, a random photo is spliced in of a young black bourgeois mother staring lovingly at her young daughter as she prays in a scene that—whether intentional or not—seems to hilariously highlight the absurdity of the American negro's devotion to the white man's brand of Christianity. In a scene that may or may not be of Kuchar as a child, a boy is depicted playing with a cardboard toy 'skeleton-plane' in a scenario that hints that the filmmaker is dead and that he is now merely floating back and forth through time (which would explain the overall dreamlike nature of the film). After the surreal skeleton-plane scene, Kuchar trips an obese Jewess and causes her to spill coffee on the cover of a comic called "Teen-Age Love" featuring an attractive young man and woman embracing on the cover. Of course, the spilled coffee scene seems to symbolize Kuchar's rejection of all-things-heterosexual. In the end, George screens footage of a man showing off his rather large and flexible Adam's apple, as well as surgery footage. While screening the footage, Kuchar spends more time watching his friend than the actual film, thereupon indicating that he has finally embraced his homosexuality, even if he has yet to physically act upon it. When the surgery footage ends, Eclipse of the Sun Virgin also fittingly ends.

Notably, in a segment from a lecture in the documentary George Kuchar: The Comedy of the Underground (1983) directed by David Hallinger, Kuchar states regarding the genesis of his film and why he decided to make a sequel to Hold Me While I'm Naked, "I had myself in the picture and there were all these trilogies coming out... Antonioni's was coming out with trilogies... Satyajit Ray was coming out with these trilogy movies... So I wanted to make one so I put myself in another picture called ECLIPSE OF THE SUN VIRGIN. ECLIPSE OF THE SUN VIRGIN hit more closer to home. Some of you may realize that...those that know me...that it came close to home. So therefore I had to change it...I had to make it more ambiguous and have the plot line more like a dream...So that it doesn't tell that much." Of course, while absurdly esoteric for a Kuchar flick, there is no doubt while watching Eclipse of the Sun Virgin that it is an extremely personal film about homosexuality and the seemingly innate neuroticism that accompanies it, especially if you had a strict religious upbringing like the filmmaker, who never quite let go of his Catholic roots as his films readily demonstrate (in fact, at various points in his career, Kuchar has credited Catholic iconography and ritual as influencing his distinct aesthetic sensibilities as a filmmaker, which is especially apparent in his highly confessional video diary Temple of Torment (2006)). Interestingly, Kuchar would once state in a somewhat self-deprecating tongue-in-cheek fashion regarding Eclipse of the Sun Virgin, "I dedicate this film poem to the behemoths of yesteryear that perished in Siberia along with the horned pachyderms of the pre-glacial epoch. This chilling montage of crimson repression must be seen by the victims of perversity, regardless of sex or age. Painstakingly filmed and edited, it will be painful to watch, too." Of course, considering his strong Catholic background and the era he grew up in, it is easy to see why Kuchar had some major hang-ups regarding his homosexuality, which his mother was apparently not too glad about, or as the filmmaker once confessed in regard to some of his seemingly traumatic personal experiences, "I made a transvestite movie on the roof and was beaten by my mother for having disgraced her and for soiling her nightgown. She didn't realize how hard it was for a 12-year-old director to get real girls for his movie." Although quite different aesthetically speaking, Eclipse of the Sun Virgin is quite comparable to Gregory J. Markopoulos' masterpiece Twice a Man (1964) in terms of being a sort hyper hermetic homo 'coming out' film that depicts the depression and sense of despair that results from being a young gay man from a fairly normal middle class background.

While Kuchar once confessed, "I don't see myself as a gay filmmaker....I don't think other people see me as a gay filmmaker either because certain of my films don't deal with that—and because I don't grab my student audience and fondle them on the side. Curt [McDowell] felt the gay scene was a ghetto," Eclipse of the Sun Virgin is unequivocally an innately gay film directed by a filmmaker of the extra queer persuasion and, interestingly but not surprisingly, it also happens to be what is probably the most difficult, offbeat, baffling, and just plain curious work that he ever made. Incidentally, the same also can arguably be said of gutter auteur Andy Milligan whose first flick Vapors (1965) is not only his only overtly gay and least exploitative film (even if it features a dangling cock at the end), but also easily the most artsy fartsy and idiosyncratic flick that the AIDS-ridden sadistic sod filmmaker ever sored. Undoubtedly, what films like Eclipse of the Sun Virgin, Twice a Man, and Vapors demonstrate is that repression and persecution of homosexuality at least had some positive consequences, as it resulted in truly groundbreaking art that reflects the height of human misery and melancholia from a sort of highly introverted gay perspective. Of course, what makes Kuchar's films different from works like Twice a Man and Vapors is that it manages to create a sort of delectably disharmonious marriage between camp and pathos, which seems totally oxymoronic upon hearing but makes total sense in the wonderfully wayward world of Eclipse of the Sun Virgin, which is probably the only film ever made that makes gay self-loathing seem like a quite merry experience.

PAGAN RHAPSODY

George Kuchar (1970)

With my growing obsession with the films of the Kuchar twins, especially in regard to the more prolific brother George (The Devil's Cleavage, Symphony for a Sinner), I have discovered that a scene featuring a gigantic monster turd in a toilet does not exactly make for bad melodrama, or at least so is the case with Pagan Rhapsody (1970), which seems to be one of the more underrated cinematic works directed by the unfortunately belated The Mongreloid (1978) director. Apparently, as the director would oftentimes reveal himself during lectures, many film critics wrongly believed that George K. was "all washed up" after the release of his hilariously self-pitying masterpiece Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966) because they felt that none of his other cinematic works could ever possibly live up to that work, yet I would argue that he has directed various superior works since then, especially around the same time period (for example, the film's somewhat lesser known sequel Eclipse of the Sun Virgin (1967) is, at the very least, just as good and certainly more intricate and ambitious). Indeed, while I am not totally sure that Pagan Rhapsody is unequivocally superior to Hold Me While I'm Naked, it is indubitably at the same level, even if it lacks the same fiercely and neurotically self-reflexive tone. An eclectically tragic micro melodrama of the hypnotically high-camp sort that demonstrates why Kuchar was a master at being able to pack more 'pathos' (or, more accurately, 'bathos') and hysterical emotions in about 20-minute than most filmmaker can pack into an entire feature, the unhinged featurette is notable for featuring an eclectically tragic(omic) and romantically cataclysmic conclusion where every single major character suffers a distinctly dejecting end that certainly inspired the early films of John Waters (who once stated of Kuchar and his brother that they, "...made me want to make films. THEY are the reason."). Ironically, despite being one of Kuchar's most pessimistically tragic and even misanthropic cinematic works, the auteur did not originally intend it to be as such, or as he once stated himself that, "[although] originally not scheduled as a tragedy, things swiftly changed as the months made me more and more sour as I plummet down that incinerator shaft I call my life." Featuring busty yet brainless big bosomed scheming whores, less than handsome lovelorn pseudo-aristocrats with bastardized noble blood, self-loathing closet queen playwrights who have dubiously dedicate their lives to writing heterosexual high dramas, and a couple other more minor but no less colorful characters that remind the viewer that Kuchar was just as good at finding the right superstars for his films as Fassbinder, Pagan Rhapsody is an elegantly obscene and largely anti-erotic cinematic ode to those that find romance films and romance in general to be rather repugnant. As one can expect from a Kuchar flick, there are no morally righteous and dignified fair ladies, but instead conniving and self-absorbed sluts whose use their twats as their sole means of survival, whether it be robbing a rich fat brokenhearted loser out of his money or attempting to con empathy and protection from a lonely art fag. Of course, what makes Kuchar's film different from most films in general is that the abhorrent (anti)heroine/femme fatale gets what she deserves in the end by dying the most absurd and undignified of tragicomic deaths. On the other hand, men are depicted in a no less unflattering light, as the film demonstrates that even repressed homosexuals can be conned and cuckolded via the wiles of wicked wanton whores, thus exposing man's greatest and most perennial weakness. Ultimately, Pagan Rhapsody is a rare example where the typically preposterous phrase "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy" has real meaning, as it is a film that reveals things about the so-called fairer sex and heterosexual relationships from a poof's perspective that most straight men are either too blind and/or too afraid to see.

There are probably few things that are more pathetic to a tearoom-lurking gay man than a lovelorn heterosexual who has yet to get over a woman that has long vanished from his life, or so one would assume while watching Pagan Rhapsody where a rather wealthy yet all the more miserable middle-aged fat fuck named Edgar (Kuchar regular Bill Cowan of Color Me Shameless (1967) and Encyclopedia of the Blessed (1968)) attempts to pay tribute to his long deceased beloved by contracting a young latent homo named Camillo (Lloyd Williams) to write a play about their lurid love affair, but ultimately ends up committing suicide when a scheming cunt of a femme fatale who he hires to portray his dead lover betrays him and ultimately destroys the entire project in the process. Indeed, at the beginning of the film, Edgar states to Camillo following a lavish credit sequence, "You understand, Camillo, that I'm not exactly an Adonis, but I do possess royal blood...at least on my mother's side of the family. My affair with the Countess Del Monaco was, therefore, not a national scandal but a beautiful affair. An affair I wish you to immortalize on the stage with your remarkable talents as a playwright. Although it's been fifteen years since her tragic death in a skiing accident in Zürich, her memory is more real to me than all the wealth and extravagant garbage I have accumulated since." Edgar's most magical night with the Countess Del Monaco apparently involved the two playing an otherworldly arpeggio-driven rhapsody, which also happens to be the film's exceedingly ethereal score, on a piano together during a romantic evening that eventually evolved into sex and mutual declarations of love, or as the mixed blood aristocrat states in a somberly nostalgic fashion, "I can remember us now. That night at the Steinway." As poor Edgar will soon learn during his hopelessly and ultimately tragically failed attempt to create a lavish stage play in tribute to his belated beloved, it is futile to attempt to recreate or even pay tribute to a glorious romantic past, especially when you live in a pathetically prosaic present and are surrounded by whores and homos who could certainly care less about such banal things.

PAGAN RHAPSODY

After hiring Camillo to write the play, Edgar immediately begins looking for a lead to play the role of his deceased lover Countess Del Monaco. It does not take Edgar long to find his female lead as he merely calls a somewhat questionable 'heroin chic' blonde named Olga (Janine Söderhjelm of Kuchar's Unstrap Me (1968)) and asks her to have her new roommate Eva (Jane Elford of Kuchar's Tales of the Bronx (1970) and Portrait of Ramona (1971)) come by his humble abode so that he can 'interview' her to see if she is right gal for the part. A not-quite-ravishing redhead with big bosoms who apparently bears a striking resemblance to the Countess (of course, Elford portrays the Countess during the flashback scenes), Eva is instantly hired by Edgar, who proudly describes her as the "perfect girl" and then sends her by Camillo's apartment so that he can tell her about her important part in the play. While Eva might resemble the Countess in terms of physical appearance, she could not be any less aristocratic, as she is more or less a proletarian whore who lives to con and seduce men but lacks the intellect to pull off any sensual scam that transcends simple one-dimensional romantic deceit. When Camillo opens his door after Eva knocks, he is absolutely stunned by her entrancing pulchritude, but being a crypto-cocksucker who has no real use for women, he is more intimidated than enticed by her. In fact, when Eva decides to get naked for no reason at all while lying on his couch, Camillo gets fairly afraid and immediately calls Edgar to tell him to immediately come by his place and pick her up. As demonstrated by a shot of her sinisterly smirking when Camillo meekly calls Edgar while there is an discernible expression of fear on his pudgy little pansy face, it is quite obvious that Eva gets a sick kick out of using her sex appeal as a means to strike fear in men, especially when it comes to pansy wimps like the playwright. As for Edgar, he calls Olga and tells her to drop Eva's luggage at his place as he is having her move in with him. Indeed, it seems that Edgar not only sees Eva as the star of his play but also as a sort of replacement from his long deceased lover.

A very voluptuous yet somewhat creepy broad with big tender tits and seemingly stoned glazed eyes, Eva has an almost ominous presence about her that is underscored by foreboding music that is played during crucial scenes featuring her. When Camillo remarks to Eva regarding the Countess Del Monaco, "She must have been a remarkable woman," she simply says nothing as if jealous of her blueblood predecessor's borderline mythical reputation as an otherworldly beauty that still holds the heart of a wealthy man despite being dead for about fifteen years. When Edgar foolishly gives Eva a dress that belonged to his beloved Countess, the redhead subsequently puts out a cigarette in a skull ashtray in a shot that will foretell the grisly fate that both characters will meet. While Eva becomes Edgar's live-in whore, it is quite obvious that she is rather repelled by her swarthy sugar daddy because at one point she walks in his bathroom and screams in abject horror upon discovering a gigantic unflushed turd in the toilet. Indeed, Edgar might be an elegantly spoken and dressed over-the-hill dandy of partial noble blood, but he is also a fat slob who is clearly too lazy and careless to flush his inhuman horse-sized feces down the toilet when a beautiful woman is living with him. Needless to say, it does not take long before Eva goes behind Edgar's back and begins bringing dumb hunks to the house while he is away so that she can properly fulfill her seemingly voracious sexual appetite.

Not unlike many great leading men of film and theater history, the fellow that is cast for Edgar and Camillo's play, Desmond, is a homosexual, though he is so exceedingly effete and insufferably queer that he makes Montgomery Clift and Anthony Perkins seem about as butch as Herr Schwarzenegger. Naturally, being that Camillo is a sexually repressed sod with nil sexual experience, tragedy strikes when he goes by young booty-buffer Desmond's apartment by himself so that he can show the actor the play. While Desmond describes his play as "Pretty hot material," it is quite obvious that he is not interested in heterosexual romance as he as gay beefcake muscle magazines lying all over his apartment floor, which naturally makes Camillo somewhat uneasy. When Desmond decides to randomly take a shower, Camillo is compelled to follow him into the bathroom where he impulsively opens the shower curtain while his leading mensch is in the middle of bathing. Somewhat curiously, instead of defiling Desmond, Edgar instead subsequently encounters two completely unclad phantoms that appear out of nowhere and proceed to fuck in front of the clearly shocked and seemingly schizophrenic playwright. Of course, when one of the poof phantoms begins carnally manhandling Camillo, the closest queen becomes completely petrified and immediately runs out of Desmond's apartment as if his life depended on it. As can be expected from a repressed queer who is too afraid to even be defiled by other queer dudes, Camillo experiences a truly vomit-worthy absurdist tragedy of sorts when Eva eventually attempts to get him to screw her.

While redheaded hussy Eva might bear a striking resemblance to the late, great Countess Del Monaco, Edgar seems to begin to see her as nothing more than a low-grade counterfeit cunt and cheap carnal cipher whose value is purely visual. Indeed, while making love with Eva in a bed that is absurdly sitting next to a gigantic Campbell's Chicken Gumbo soup can that would probably cause Warhol to cream his panties, Edgar gets noticeably agitated, declares, "I have to get up, really," pushes his pseudo-lover aside, and abruptly leaves the house, but not before informing the raunchy redhead that he will not be taking her to a fancy restaurant that he originally promised to take her for dinner before. Far from offended or agitated by Edgar's flaky behavior, Eva seizes the opportunity to call her equally lecherous lady friend Vivian (Kuchar regular Donna Kerness of Sins of the Fleshapoids (1965) and House of the White People (1968), who was pregnant at the time of the shooting) and joyously declare, "Hello, Vivian. He's gone. Get the boys and come over." Although Vivian does not bring multiple boys to Edgar's apartment, she does at least bring by a single boy that wastes no time in sharing carnal knowledge with Eva, who is certainly flattered by the

Needless to say, when Edgar abruptly shows up and discovers that his home has been transformed into a vulgar beatnik party pad and finds his 'kept woman' Eva being defiled by some scruffy biker type, he becomes homicidally enraged and begins choking the redheaded wench like a berserk Frankenstein monster on cocaine, though unfortunately the lecherous leading lady eventually manages to escape his grip and run out of the apartment after her male friend knocks out the melancholy pseudo-aristocrat. As an aggressively wanton woman that thinks she can get whatever she wants from any man so long as she shakes her ass or flashes her tits in the right fashion, Eva decides to seek both emotional and physical support in pathetic beta-boy Camillo and she does so by simply appealing to his innate male protective instincts by running to his door under the guise of being a poor damsel in distress and hysterically sobbing like a stereotypical battered housewife, "He's crazy. He's crazy. He tried to strangle me." At this point, the two embrace kissing and in the process Eva hilariously rips off Camillo's shirt after he makes a half-hearted attempt at grabbing her hearty derriere. While the two make love, closet homosexual Camillo is so grossed out by the entire anti-erotic experience that he begins violently projectile vomiting to the point of petrifying Eva, who is probably not used to men being repelled by her meat curtain. Horrified at the sickening sight of Camillo perversely puking white substances all over the place, Eva makes a valiant attempt to hightail it out of the apartment but in the process slips on some of the barf and hits her head upon falling backwards on the floor, thus killing her instantly. Meanwhile, Edgar decides to kill himself by swallowing an entire bottle of pills after Camillo fails to pick up his telephone. While playing the eponymous theme score on his beloved Steinway in the dark while it is violently thunders outside, Edgar's face becomes drenched in tears of sorrow. In the end, Edgar drops dead in the middle of playing, with his head fittingly hitting the piano keys and producing discordant noise when he finally succumbs to his self-administered intentional drug overdose.

Somewhat humorously, Pagan Rhapsody is partly best remembered today as influencing the infamous shit-eating scene at the conclusion of John Waters' classic art-trash masterpiece Pink Flamingos (1972), or as the Baltimore-bred 'Pope of Trash' stated in the documentary It Came from Kuchar (2009) directed by Jennifer M. Kroot in regard to the film, "There is a close-up of a turd in a toilet, which may have led the way to the end of PINK FLAMINGOS. I don't think I had ever actually seen a turd in a movie. That was... Even today, that was a fairly rare shot." Still, despite the film's fleetingly scatological tone, it is also arguably Kuchar's most eclectically beautiful, transcendental, solacing, and lavish cinematic work as a sort of shockingly hypnotic high-camp meta-melodrama that successfully manages a seemingly aesthetically schizophrenic marriage between the decadently gorgeous and hilariously grotesque. Out of all the cinematic works that I can think of, Kuchar's 20-minute masterpiece of melancholic celluloid majesty most reminded of a Jesús Franco flick of all films. Indeed, with its elegant aristocratic and neo-classical sets, heavy use of lit candles in dark rooms, ethereal piano score, unhinged psycho-dramatic essence, and hysterically exaggerated tragic tale of dark romantic deceit that eventually evolves into a deadly bizarre triangle, Pagan Rhapsody features a number of striking similarities with Franco's underrated Marquis de Sade adaptation Sinfonía erótica (1980) aka Symphonie érotique aka Erotic Symphony. Additionally, I would argue that Kuchar's film is the closest American aesthetic equivalent to the great high-camp German-language arthouse works like Daniel Schmid's La Paloma (1974) and Werner Schroeter's Goldflocken (1976). In fact, next to Kuchar's film, Jack Smith's magnum opus Flaming Creature (1963) seems like a retardedly redundant and aesthetically autistic piece of handicapped camp that really suffers due to its lack of bathos and storyline, among other things. In its depiction of a self-loathing fag's failed attempt at embracing heterosexuality, Pagan Rhapsody follows in the somewhat preternatural thematic tradition of the director's twin brother Mike Kuchar's classic short The Secret of Wendel Samson (1966), which brother George also stars in. Of course, unlike Mike's flick, George's film does not feature any sort of happy ending or positive resolution for the gay character (as Mike has revealed in interviews, his brother George was apparently more deeply influenced by their mutual traditional Catholic upbringing).

Notably, in the doc It Came from Kuchar, Mike Kuchar would state of his brother's film Pagan Rhapsody that it was, "about the underlying organic horror of existence." Personally, I feel that the film is more about the absurdity of life, love, and romance, but then again it is sometimes hard to read the exact intent of Kuchar's rather idiosyncratic work, hence its singular brilliance. Of course, there is no doubt that Kuchar's film informs the viewer that love, sex, and romance can drive most people to the point of insanity if the 'right' variables come into play, especially if you're a lovelorn heterosexual man who cannot simply go cruising in a public park or bathroom to get a blowjob like many homos oftentimes do. As Kuchar once stated himself in an interview featured in the book Queer Looks (1993) in regard to the power of sexuality and as to why he would maintain abstinence while working on a film, "People want different things, different shades and graduations. The world of sex is based on how you were brought up, other peculiarities. I've been to that world. There's an incredible driving power, it gives so much energy. It's also funny to see it masked in mainstream films—it will always surface, and you can read it, you can get the message. People are driven by sex. It'll drive you crazy. Everyone knows if you hump before making a picture, you lose that spark. You have to clean yourself up before you make it work. You have to go on to the steam room, get the poison out, the vices. Then you make a picture about the vices, but you have to be clean to do it. And then the process makes you pent up. I was never really able to merge the two. My pictures are mostly about the binges, the vices.” While Pagan Rhapsody certainly features a sort of gay gaze, its cynical conclusions regarding heterosexual romance are just as keen as the lavish Hollywood melodramas of Douglas Sirk, albeit with a sort of good honest no bullshit venom injected in them. While mainstream gay movies like Ang Lee’s Brokeback Mountain (2005) and Tom Ford’s A Single Man (2009) attempt to persuade straight viewers that homos are just like heteros when it comes to romance, Kuchar’s film demonstrates that gays are more likely to be tormented by neurotic self-loathing and deleterious compulsions than the loss of a single lover. As for women, Pagan Rhapsody depicts them as parasitic and perpetually conniving creatures who see men as a means to an end and nothing more, especially if they are attractive dames that know how to take full advantage of their carnal currency. Sort of like the (anti)Rebecca (1940) of the late-1960s/early-1970s NYC underground, Kuchar’s film is a delectably deranged cinematic dance with dark romance that ultimately reminds the viewer why you should never allow a woman that you have just met to move into your home under any circumstances. Arguably more importantly, Pagan Rhapsody also reveals why you might look like a serious asshole if you attempt to create a piece of art in tribute to some great long lost love.

THE DEVIL'S CLEAVAGE

Although I have somewhat mixed feelings, I have to concur with many of his fans that Slavic-American sod auteur George Kuchar (Hold Me While I'm Naked, Symphony for a Sinner)—arguably the most lovably degenerate filmmaker that has ever lived—created most of his greatest and most idiosyncratic cinematic works before he left his hometown the Bronx and relocated to San Francisco and became a perennial professor at San Francisco Art Institute where he would stay for the rest of his relatively singular life. Indeed, one might assume that relocating to the virtual homo capital of the world would have been artistically beneficial to a homosexual filmmaker, yet Kuchar's early keenly kaleidoscopic no-budget masterpieces like Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966), Eclipse Of The Sun Virgin (1967), and Pagan Rhapsody (1970), among various others, certainly demonstrate otherwise. Still, Kuchar did manage to direct a couple of unequivocal classics during his first decade or so again in SF, including the masterful The Devil's Cleavage (1973), A Reason To Live (1976), the rather underrated Forever And Always (1978), and The Nocturnal Immaculation (1980). In fact, it was not until his one-time-student turned great-love, hyper hedonistic queer filmmaker Curt McDowell (Loads, Sparkle's Tavern), died of AIDS in 1987 that Kuchar's artistic evolution seemed to end and that he got lazy and satisfied making relatively generic shot-on-video student films. While one could certainly argue that the digital dioramas featured in one of Kuchar's later works like Secrets of the Shadow World (1999) have a certain anachronistic schlock appeal, the film seems like a lethally kitschy piece of grating aesthetic autism compared to something as visually alluring and strikingly hermetic as Eclipse Of The Sun Virgin. In terms of sheer ambitiousness and intrinsic cinematic insanity, Kuchar's rare feature-length film The Devil's Cleavage is arguably the filmmaker's magnum opus and certainly one of the great unhinged masterpieces of the American underground. Indeed, it is hard to argue that Hold Me While I'm Naked is superior to the fecal-flavored tragedy and chiaroscuro-laden doom and gloom of Kuchar's bizarrely ballsy black-and-white feature. Modestly described by Kuchar himself as "an impressionistic series of romantic set pieces filmed in seedy interiors," the innately fucked feature reeks of perverse pulchritude and grotesque glamor, as if the aberrant auteur was attempted to direct something as ethereally beautiful as an avant-garde flick directed by French auteur Marcel Hanoun like L'été (1968) meets Josef von Sternberg's Shanghai Express (1932) for morally retarded John Waters fans and Troma turds. A sort of all-the-more-eccentric big sister film to the Kuchar penned and McDowell directed black-and-white pornographic cult horror classic Thundercrack! (1975), the film is equally grotesque as it is gorgeous as an unrelenting scatological farce that satirizes classic Hollywood melodramas by European-born filmmakers like

THE DEVIL'S CLEAVAGE

Douglas Sirk and Josef von Sternberg and gritty film noir flicks by Nicholas Ray and Sam Fuller. Hopelessly convoluted in terms of plot and storyline as a cinematic work that feels like it is set in some alternate unhinged universe where time and place are dictated by the wayward whims of the mostly mentally unstable and sexually insatiable characters, The Devil's Cleavage is, in many ways, not much more than the psychosis-ridden fantasy of an obsessive cinephile that demonstrates more interest in golden age Hollywood than the sort of avant-garde and experimental cinema that Kuchar was loosely connected to. In other words, the film was not made with the intent of giving experimental cinema gatekeeper Jonas Mekas a hard-on.

Upon doing as much research I could on the film due to my suspicion that it would offend the outstandingly anally retentive and politically correct sensibilities of respectable bourgeois faggots and morally righteous white liberal wimps, I discovered that The Devil's Cleavage was not exactly beloved among many film critics, including bitchy gay ones, when it was original released. Indeed, in a 11/27/1975 review featured in Soho Weekly News, the nameless reviewer bitched regarding the film and his belief that Kuchar had totally degenerated as a filmmaker, "With HOLD ME WHILE I'M NAKED (1966), he made a kind of breakthrough into home-movie big time, and I can remember lines of Lower East Side patrons (mainly dirty old men) eager to suffer through the heights of a New American Cinema program just for 15 minutes of Technicolor Kuchar and of his star Donna Kerness wetting her magnificent breasts behind a shower curtain. We all thought someone had arrived capable of saving even independent cinema. But a lot of bathtub water has flowed down the drainhole, and I don't see that Kuchar has gone anywhere except he has moved from the Bronx to San Francisco and—as a friend pointed out—he has advanced from color to black-and-white." Additionally, in a slightly less scathing review featured in the Chicago Daily News, Christine Nieland complained, "Unfortunately, THE DEVIL'S CLEAVAGE looks a lot funnier on paper than it does on film. For one thing, Kuchar makes no concessions to technical competence. The dialog is scratchily recorded, while the black-and-white visuals are harsh and ugly. Secondly, once we get the idea, we realize that we're laughing at a one-joke movie. The level of parody remains consistent, which is to say the film never really tops itself. When you've seen one of Kuchar's grotesque housewives, you've seen them all." To his great credit, experimental filmmaker Warren Sonbert (Short Fuse, Carriage Trade)—a somewhat tragic auteur who is best known for cinematic works dealing with his own frail mortality and losing battle with AIDS—certainly seemed to have a better grasp of the film when he wrote in an article for the Bay Area Reporter entitled An American Treasure, "This uproarious romp through the fleshpot dumps of San Francisco is a relentless exploration of sin, greed, lust and various inviting body parts – like Douglas Sirk on Ecstasy." Of course, it is ultimately impossible to articulate the singular majesty of the film in mere words, especially when describing an abstract (anti)melodrama directed by a man that was not very verbally articulate himself.

Undoubtedly, what virtually all of the reviews that I encountered in regard to The Devil's Cleavage have in common is that the reviewers seem incapable of accurately describing even the most rudimentary elements of the film's plot, which is certainly no surprise to anyone that has seen the flick. Indeed, the film is a hot and steamy mess of the nicely (and sometimes nefariously) nasty sort where logic and rationality are nowhere to be found. Indeed, Pacific Film Archive director Edith Kramer was not exaggerating when she stated, "I don't think anybody can copy or imitate George's style. His whole career has shown an independent spirit in the best sense—he's applied a very personal, unique style to an enormous body of work that's like a fountain, never running out of wit, energy, or inspiration," as the filmmaker's many and oftentimes quite blatant technical fuck-ups and plot inconsistencies are even part of his own charmingly preternatural auteur stamp. In short, it is quite obvious while watching The Devil's Cleavage that it was directed by a uniquely uncompromising lost soul that only creates films for himself and is imprisoned in his own scatological universe where common everyday human wants and needs, especially of the sexual and romantic sort, are the butt of one big perennial joke that seems to be at the expense at humanity as a whole, especially that portion of humanity that was born and bred on the delusional dreams of Hollywood. Directed by a homosexual man that mostly rejected the label of being a gay filmmaker that makes gay films as clearly indicated by remarks like, "I don't see myself as a gay filmmaker. . . . I don't think other people see me as a gay filmmaker either because certain of my films don't deal with that—and because I don't grab my student audience and fondle them on the side," the film is only queer in the sense that the auteur sees heterosexual romance as a patent absurdity that he has nil nature intrinsic understanding of, hence is depiction of it as the height of irrationality and insanity (but then again, he depicts gay romance as equally absurd). Indeed, in a Kuchar flick, love can only end in death, despair, sexual and social dysfunction, and/or abject delirium. Somewhat strangely (or maybe not so since Kuchar would subsequently pen Thundercrack!), the viewer can only conclude after watching The Devil's Cleavage a bisexual ménage à trois is the only reasonable antidote to heartbreak and lovesickness. When Josef von Sternberg said, "Shadow conceals—light reveals. To know what to reveal and what to conceal, and in what degrees to do this, is all there is to art," it seems that Kuchar took these words of cinematic wisdom more seriously than most. Indeed, there is probably not one single shot in The Devil's Cleavage where a character is not at least partly lurking the shadows, as Kuchar wants you to know these sad and mostly sexually depraved individuals are shameful slaves of their lustful longings. As many of his films rather hilariously reveals, Kuchar, quite unlike his sex-saluting cocksucker comrade Curt McDowell, was a sexual neurotic of sorts. In The Devil's Cleavage,

the viewer is treated to what might be best described as low-budget neurotic erotic neo-Expressionism where carnal crimes are mostly boldly highlighted via the lack of lighting.

Divided into three equally debauched chapters that chronicle the romantic decline of the less the glamorous female protagonist, The Devil's Cleavage is a farcically forsaken film where madness is the method. Featuring a naughty nurse named Ginger (Ainslie Pryor) that lives in the seedy suburbs of San Francisco, the film could be described in literal terms as a cautionary tale about the perils of being a nymphomaniac that is married to a lazy and seemingly sexually impotent Hawaiian man that falls to deliver regular dick injections (as any honest lady will tell you, every healthy woman needs their hole to be filled every once and a while lest they go insane and become feminists or something). Indeed, Ginger's somewhat literally lethally lethargic hubby Edmund (Al Wong) is such a lazy loser that she is forced to search for new cock each day because he simply will not fuck her, let alone work or pretend to act like anything resembling a respectable husband. When Edmund briefly wakes up from his eternal slumber to beg "I want an egg," Ginger prepares a lavish breakfast and then feeds it to her beloved dog 'Bocko' instead of her yellow bedridden spouse. Aside from resenting her husband, Ginger hates the grotesque old fart patients that she takes care of so much that she regularly creates fake vomit and throws it at these poor helpless souls. A hopeless hawaiiophile that seems to be attracted to men that most women simply ignore, Ginger married Edmund because he is a Hawaiian aristocrat and she expected it to be an immaculate storybook marriage, but as she complains in terms of her grand disillusionment in regard to her somnambulist-like spouse, "He was the ancestor of some fat Hawaiian monarch [...] He promised me a pineapple plantation and a necklace from the teeth of a tiger shark. Well, as it turned out, he became the pineapple and the necklace became nothing more than the collar of the leash." Of course, since her hubby sleeps all day, Ginger has no problem cheating on Edmund and getting away with it, at least at first until a couple busybody bitches decide to ruin her marriage with an anonymous letter.

On top of everything else, Ginger is violently mocked and ridiculed by her slutty ghetto skank neighbors. Indeed, when one of the neighbors asks Ginger how her husband is and she nonchalantly retorts "not so good," a haggard bimbo (Kathleen Hohalek) hatefully remarks, "Maybe if you both slept in the same bed, he'd feel a lot better." At this point, Ginger gets in a brutal literal bitch-fight with the two neighbors that involves exposed panties and rabid bitching but seemingly nil landed punches. An unbelievably cruel and craven bitch, the haggard bimbo neighbor regularly tortures her own bedridden ghoulish mother, who bears a striking resemblance to Leatherface of Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (notably, the film was apparently completed in 1973, which was one year before the release of TCM), by dumping her own full turd-packed bedpan on her. When a tall, not-so-dark, and slightly handsome handyman named Marvin (musician and Curt McDowell regular Mark Ellinger) swings by the haggard bimbo's humble abode to fix her dishwasher, she opts to drug the unwitting prole's coffee so that she can rape him. Unfortunately for her, instead of successfully molesting Marvin, the sexually predatory haggard bimbo gets disgusted, runs out of the room, and is subsequently suffocated to death with a plastic bag during a brutal display of much-needed Filicide in what is indubitably one of the most potently perverse Schadenfreude-inducing moments in all of cinema history. As for Marvin, he luckily manages to rob the haggard bimbo and then escape without even noticing that his would-be-rapist is being brutally murdered by her own progenitor.

When Edmund somehow wakes up long enough to receive and read an anonymous letter that reads, "Your wife is a tramp," it more or less spells the end of Ginger's horrible marriage. Indeed, while Edmund is reading the letter, Ginger is flirting with a sleazy Swedish beatnik doctor named Dave. A shameless slut that likes to pretend she has something resembling dignity despite the fact that she has downed about half-a-dozen dicks in the last seven days, Ginger cynically remarks to Dave, "Do you expect me to commit adultery for the sixth time this week? What sort of woman do you take me for?" and he reveals his sexual desperation by retorting, "I'll take you in sickness and in health until death do us part." Ginger also reveals her bizarre flirting techniques with Dave by telling him that she knew he was "Swedish" because, as she pretentiously states, "I could tell by the cold light burning in your eyes. Northern Lights . . . always shifting." Ultimately, poor Edmund dies under dubious circumstances and Ginger exposes how much of a self-obsessed bitch she is by complaining, "Oh, why is he always gone when I need him most." Not surprisingly considering her less than ideal circumstances, the death of her husband proves to be a blessing in disguise for Ginger as it affords her the opportunity of being able to relocate to wholesome Blessed Prairie, Oklahoma and begin a new life that is free of savage slut neighbors and worthless men that don't know how to treat a woman, or so she initially believes before she receives a rude awakening that involves a hunky yet less than faithful Midwestern mensch with a Cruising-esque mustache.

Upon relocating to Blessed Prairie, Ginger checks into a seedy motel where she meets a nice but morally feeble and sexually promiscuous motel manager named Frank (Curt McDowell), who hits on her by asking her, "Would you like some assistance to that Stairway to Heaven?" and then somberly telling her the abridged version of his hilariously tragic life story, stating that he is, "The only son of Mary and William. Mom died six years ago. She fell into a wheat-thrashing machine and became hamburger for the crows. My father's in a mental institution near Tulsa. He was driving the machine." As for Ginger, she explains that she is nervous about identifying her dead husband's corpse because she is afraid she will laugh and that the morgue attendant will realize that she is “just black inside” like “the gates of hell.” When Ginger complains of the degeneracy of Hollywood Hills, Frank retorts, “Debauchery here is limited to tilting pinball machines on the Sabbath” and recommends that they drink a local alcoholic mix known as the “Devil’s Latrine” in symbolic moment that seems to seal the fate of what ultimately proves to be a disastrously aborted romance. Completely shocked at his inordinate warmth and kindness and seemingly enticed by his boyish good-looks and pervert mustache, Ginger asks the motel manager, “Why are you so good to me, Frank?” and he autistically replies with not even the slightest hint of irony, “Once, about two years ago, in an Oklahoma City restaurant on Main Street, I read a saying by the owner of the place. It was written on the menu, right beneath the beverage section. It said, and I quote, ‘Be good and you’ll be happy.’ I’ve never forgot that, Ginger.” Unfortunately for the two new love birds, Ginger has to go identify her dead hubby’s corpse and the two must temporarily part company, so Frank makes her promise to come back to him during an extremely cheesy yet somehow foreboding moment of melodrama where the viewer immediately realizes that things will end terribly for both the nurse and her new gentleman suitor. Despite making Ginger promise to come back to him, Frank has not forgotten two of his ex-lovers and he makes the rather ridiculous mistake of attempting to reconnect with both of them after the naughty nurse leaves, thus ultimately eventually leading to tremendous soul-shattering heartbreak for all those involved.

After Ginger leaves, Frank totally loses his mind and literally treads snowy mountains and examines caves while yelling “Ginger, where are you?” in the hope of finding his new lover, as if he suffers from amnesia and has forgotten that she has promised to promptly come back to him. A self-destructively neurotic romantic hysteric with a feeble mind and all the more feeble heart, Frank cannot even bear being without Ginger for a couple days and soon finds himself getting into contact with two of his ex-flames, including a lecherous good-for-nothing slut named Loretta that he looks for in a sleazy bar. On top of hunting down Loretta, Frank calls his devoted ex-girlfriend Angie (Virginia Giritlian) and attempts to coerce her into leaving her abusive homosexual boyfriend Ronald to come back to him. Frank’s old flame Angie loves him so much that she confesses to him over the phone upon agreeing to leave Ronald and come back to him, “Why? . . . Why after so long do you stand in the way of the torrent I call my life? You’re the only dike I cannot crumble; the only wall of sandbags immune to my treacherous tides. You have only to say the words and I’ll head back north.” As a pretentious woman-beating prick that cares more about his “war buddies” (translation: fuck buddies) than her, Ronald is practically begging to be dumped by Angie, who ultimately uses a gun to make her way out of the door. As a man that proudly brags that her once picked her off the street and fed her “caviar and Ritz crackers,” Ronald refuses to let Angie go in peace and defiantly declares to her when she walks out the door, “I’ll follow you wherever you go.” Of course, as a sexually confused mad man, Ronald naturally follows through with his pernicious promise. While on the journey to get back to her beau Frank, Angie passes a strange nighttime parade featuring unintentionally grotesque giant floats of Charlie Brown, Batman, and various other cartoon figures that seem like a bad omen. Needless to say, the perturbing parade is nothing compared to the hell that awaits her at Frank’s dilapidated motel.

While Angie is traveling across the country to desperately get back to him so that they can reignite their hot and steamy love affair, Frank hooks up with another ex-flame named Loretta at a trashy party, though he initially does not recognize her because she has become a militant Girl Scouts supremacist of sorts. Frank agrees to go with Loretta “into the darkness” and initially seems quite adamant about jumping her bones, but when she attempts to fuck him, he bitches like a retarded prude, “A Girl Scout doesn’t act like this, Loretta” and then curls up into a fetal position and pathetically whines, “I hurt all over.” Disturbed that Frank seems to have nil interest in her nice nubile body, Loretta asks him, “who has crippled you in mind and body?” and then bitches, “Strange . . . I brought you in here to help me become a woman and, instead, I find myself wanting you to accept your manhood.” Meanwhile, Ginger eventually gets back to the motel and happily declares while in the company of her large mutt Bocko, “I’ve come back, Darling, like I said I would, only I brought a friend with me this time,” but is perturbed to find Angie instead of Frank. When Ginger asks Angie who she is, she replies in a somberly poetic fashion, “A dead memory that someone dug up from the past” and then promptly points at gun at her somewhat less attractive rival. After complaining about Frank, “I must have been insane to believe that telephone call,” Angie attempts to shoot Ginger, but it is ultimately the former that dies in the struggle (or so the viewer assumes). When Frank finally gets back to the motel, he discovers a grisly crime scene and immediately emotionally breaks down during a much deserved moment of self-loathing (after all, he acted as an unwitting catalyst to the deadly estrogen-driven encounter). To his slight chagrin, Frank also discovers Angie’s ambiguously gay (ex)boyfriend Ronald, who states to him in a somewhat sinisterly sadistic fashion while curiously rubbing his rival’s back in an aggressively homoerotic fashion, “Why don’t you go out and lay in some meadow. The dew is already falling and it may rain later on. If it does rain, don’t run. There’s nothing like a little bit of god’s water to wash away the dirt to collect the Devil’s Cleavage.”

After losing Ginger, Angie, and Loretta, Frank somehow finds himself in an ultra sleazy bisexual ménage à trios with San Francisco handyman Marvin and Ginger’s slutty ex-neighbor Stella (Michelle Gross-Napolitano). As Frank mournfully declares to his new lovers, “six-dollar-a-night-key” is a “small price to pay for twelve hours for merciful amnesia,” especially when you manage to lose three different lovers in a single day despite all of the three lovers being hopelessly in love with you. Stella is an even more hopeless and sexually nihilistic case after breaking up with his abusive beau (overrated Judaic cartoonist Art Spiegelman in a rare acting role), as she longs for, “an eternity of forgetfulness,” which she attempts to achieve via cheap alcohol and dirty loveless sex. Apparently, Stella was enticed by Frank because she could tell he was “one of the lost” just like her and Marvin. Not surprisingly, lovesick loser Frank bitches of his love for the nurse from the “city by the bay” while in the ludicrously lusty company of Stella and Marvin, though that does not stop him from partaking in a threesome. Eventually, Frank seems to accept his new sorry lot in life and declares to his new lovers before embracing them, “Do you think there could be happiness for us? Not individually, but as a threesome? I mean, perhaps there is some truth in that theory of three being a sacred number.” Meanwhile, a seemingly severely wounded Ginger is coerced into following a slutty pseudo-blonde home where the female protagonist is more or less raped by the pseudo-blonde’s hyper horny sleazebag husband. While being sexually savaged by the sleazy scumbag husband, Ginger sees her beloved dog Bocko outside and cries out for him, but he does not even respond. Indeed, it seems that even Ginger’s beloved canine Bocko no longer wants anything to do with her. When Ginger complains, “I’m afraid. I’m so afraid” while symbolically bent over in a doggy style position, the sexually sadistic husband replies in a stern matter-of-fact fashion, “We’re all afraid” and then proceeds to penetrate her puss in a relatively savage manner. Upon being forcibly fucked, Ginger seems to finally accept her pathetically perverse plight in life as an unlovable slut that is not even loyal enough to be a dog owner. As one can expect from a Kuchar flick, love destroys all in the end and virtually all of the characters are left completely emotionally wounded. Undoubtedly, if there is any special insight that The Devil’s Cleavage reveals, it is that everyone is foredoomed to live in isolation and emotional solitude and that love can only end in devastating heartbreak and, in some special cases, a very ugly death.

As a somewhat quirky (although not quite queer) chap with a similarly perverse sense of cinephilia and bizarre affinity for classic melodrama and film noir movies from golden age Hollywood, Canadian auteur Guy Maddin (Tales from the Gimli Hospital, My Winnipeg)—a romantic cynic with a fierce fetish for anachronistic filmmaking techniques—is naturally a huge Kuchar fan and even regards The Devil’s Cleavage as one of his favorite films. In fact, Maddin would lovingly state regarding the film in the documentary It Came from Kuchar (2009), “The movie I really want to be able to quote but I have to be able to see it again and again and again to do it is George’s THE DEVIL’S CLEAVAGE. I just remember it having one line after another, each one eclipsing the previous one. And you could just tell it was just so much fun, and because they’re at the dawn of my adult film viewing experience, they might as well have been my earliest childhood memories. But when I’m on the filmmaking road, trying to reach my own version of perfection, I still see THE DEVIL’S CLEAVAGE floating there.” Notably, as an extremely modest and humble man, Kuchar rarely boasted about his own films and their importance and once even summed his artistic contributions to cinema history by stating, “I just, um, made pictures,” yet he seems to have also regarded his black-and-white melodrama as one of his favorite films as indicated by his remark in It Came from Kuchar, “THE DEVIL’S CLEAVAGE played in England. I made it with the school’s camera, which was sync sound. I got letters...people really enjoyed it, so I felt so much better, you know. I was happy I made it. It’s a big, turbulent drama about a big city nurse and stuff.” Additionally, in an interview with Scott MacDonald featured in the book A Critical Cinema: Interviews with Independent Filmmakers (1988), Kuchar remarked, “DEVIL’S CLEAVAGE has a revival now because of the punk thing. They like the heavy make-up and the costumes, and they like the subject matter. It’s real loud. When it first came out, some people liked it, some didn’t. Then it hit a period where everyone thought it was a grotesque horror. And now it looks good.” Indeed, for a film that is well over 40 years old, The Devil’s Cleavage is still shockingly subversive and, aesthetically speaking, nothing short of an otherworldly celluloid orgy of delectable obscenity and blissful odiousness, among other things. Certainly, in no other film will you find such a seemingly aesthetically schizophrenic mix of trashy toilet humor and chiaroscuro-heavy celluloid majesty. Indeed, Kuchar is probably the only filmmaker that has ever lived that has managed to so blatantly blur the line between excrement and ecstasy, dementedness and deliciousness, and pathology and poetry. In other words, The Devil’s Cleavage offers unwavering happiness in a steamy and fiercely fecal fly-ridden filmic form that is seductively shadowy as Carl Theodor Dreyer’s Vampyr (1932) yet as scatological and schlocky as the most shamelessly morally bankrupt of Troma turds. Undoubtedly, the fact that the film has never been released in any home media format is a crime against cinophilia and a sure sign that American cineaste oriented companies like the Criterion Collection and Kino Lorber Films are run by uptight prudes that rather peddle communist poverty porn and senseless feminist dribble than authentic American cinematic art.

Notably, in his book Desperate Visions: The Films of John Waters & the Kuchar Brothers (1996), trash film historian Jack Stevenson revealed in regard to the imperative relation between Kuchar and McDowell, “In return for Curt’s help on THE DEVIL’S CLEAVAGE, George assisted Curt on his 1975 feature, THUNDERCRACK! This would be their glorious gift to posterity – the world’s only underground porno horror movie. George titled and wrote the film, did lighting, made up and costumed lead actress, Marion Eaton, and acted in the role of ‘Bling’ – the psychosexually troubled gorilla keeper who attempts suicide by crashing his circus truck in a thunderstorm.” Indeed, in terms of aesthetics and the people behind it, The Devil’s Cleavage is certainly a big sister film to the more pornographic Thundercrack!, which also notably features McDowell’s jumbo juggled sister Melinda McDowell and a number of the other same superstars, including Michelle Gross, Virginia Giritlian, Mark Ellinger, and of course Mr. McDowell himself. Additionally, Kuchar's A Reason To Live starring McDowell is a sort of little sister film to the other two. While technically a melodrama of sorts, I would most certainly argue that The Devil's Cleavage is easily the most bizarre, horrifying, and decidedly disturbing of these three films, even if it is not technically a horror film and lacks the oftentimes downright unsexy pornographic imagery of Thundercrack! (though it does feature a couple limp dicks and large saggy tits). In short, I imagine the film would be nothing short of audio-visual torture to the majority of humanity, but for me The Devil's Cleavage is a healthy reminder why I love the art of cinema and why it sometimes takes the morbidly mirthful wisdom of a weird gay guy to realize the absurdity of getting all lovesick and melancholy over any one chick when there are so many other equally hysterical hymen-less harpies in the world. Indeed, as a guru of the cinematically grotesque, Kuchar might have been a literal cocksucker but he was no loathsome faggot and his films reveal more testicular fortitude than the majority of action and superhero films.

A REASON TO LIVE

George Kuchar (1976)

At the very end of his film Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966), tasteful trash auteur George Kuchar (Pagan Rhapsody, The Devil's Cleavage) looks directly into the camera and asks the rhetorical question, "I guess there's a lot of things in life worth living for...isn't there?," to which he seems to attempt to answer in his inordinately beautiful yet nonetheless sometimes scatological micro-masterpiece A Reason to Live (1976), which depicts the absurdist tragedy that ensues when a melancholy man whose wife is cheating on him decides to ditch both of his babes and move from San Francisco to Oklahoma to fulfill his dream of living in a sleazy motel in tornado territory instead of rotting away like some banal bourgeois bastard in a lame apartment in fag city. Starring his then-lover/student/longtime best friend, filmmaker-cum-pornographer Curt McDowell (Thundercrack!, Loads), in the lead role as a fairly pathetic mensch who gets a fair amount of pussy but seems completely apathetic to the couple of dames that want to down his dong, especially his wifey, Kuchar's film tells the joyously cynical story about how following one's dreams can lead one to lying naked and dead in some cheap Oklahoma motel, which becomes all the more curious when one considers that the lead character actually dies as a result of doing something that the auteur did on a yearly basis. In fact, not unlike the protagonist of the film, Kuchar would travel annually to Oklahoma where he would stay in the same cheap hotel so as to observe the weather and clouds as demonstrated by his shockingly entertaining video documents like Weather Diary 1 (1986). Apparently co-directed by female lead Marion Eaton, A Reason to Live is an endlessly entrancing 25-minute melodramatic fever dream that oftentimes degenerates into a histrionic mock-ominous nightmare where a man's fate is both literally and figuratively in the clouds, at least until he finally decides to take action for what is probably the first time in his life and eventually must pay the ultimate price for a seemingly benign choice. Easily the most bizarre tornado flick ever made as a work that even makes Michael Almereyda's debut absurdist family dramedy Twister (1989) seem terribly tame by comparison, Kuchar's film is a sordid little cinematic work that mimics the tableaux and melodramatic hysterics of filmmakers like Josef von Sternberg and Douglas Sirk in the way that borderlines the line between respectful homage and preposterous parody. Of course, like his other masterpieces like Hold Me While I'm Naked and Eclipse of the Sun Virgin (1967), the film is genius in that it somehow manages to do the seemingly nonsensical by juggling camp and kitsch with Weltschmerz and melancholy in a way that makes it seem as if Kuchar is so hopelessly self-denigrating and neurotic that he cannot even take his own abject misery seriously, hence its singular brilliance as a an outstandingly aesthetically pleasing piece of phantasmagorical celluloid trash with a preternatural degree of class. A mix of nihilistic nerd neu-roticism, pathological cinephilia, crypto-cocksucker longing and despair, shadowy (anti)glamour and gloss, and morbid suicide fetishization, A Reason to Live is ultimately auteur cinema in the truest sense, even if Kuchar opted to give one of his stars a co-director credit when it is obvious that the film is 100% his own personal vision. Indeed, only George Kuchar could make a small apartment living room seem as mystifyingly foreboding as the famous swamp scene from F.W. Murnau's Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927). A totally improvised work where Kuchar apparently created and personally dubbed all the dialogue after the film was shot, the campy genre-bending horror-thriller-melodrama hybrid with pseudo-mystical undertones is notable for being probably the only film ever made where taking out the garbage and a taking shit are depicted as climatic events that are worthy of extended screen time.

A Reason to Live begins with a shadowy woman (Marion Eaton of Thundercrack!) that looks like a drag queen attempting to impersonate Gloria Swanson in Sunset Boulevard (1950) creeping up on her beau Vince (Curt McDowell) while he is less than gracefully sleeping on an ugly sofa and surprising him with a passionate kiss on the lips that he is less than passionate about. After kissing her boy toy, the woman stares out of a window and states to her assumed husband, "Wake up, darling. It's dawn" and then walks over to a plant and says while stroking one of its branches like it is a hard cock, "I'm going to give thanks to god for making dawn shed its light on my beloved." Vince reacts to his beloved's romantic words by pulling a blanket over his face, thus more than hinting that he is absolutely disgusted by the exaggerated love and affection his wife regularly showers him with. When his insufferable lady love goes to make breakfast for him, Vince secretly gets on the telephone and tries to call his busty blonde-haired sister Julia who, for whatever reason, has positioned a hose with water pouring out of it between her leg, as if she has a bad case of penis envy. Somewhat strangely, the sound of the ringing telephone proves to be a borderline tragic experience for Julia as it causes her to collapse on the ground. After his aborted attempt at calling his sis, Vince's wife asks him who he tried to call and he curiously ignores her question and instead replies, "I saw some cirrus clouds this morning and I had high hopes. I hoped that they turn into cirrocumulus then altostratus, then maybe a big nimbostratus would move in....But." Indeed, as the film reveals, Vince is more interested in clouds than cunts.

After Vince's wife declares to him, "I'll get you your pecan pie," the fairly gratifying 1950s melodic Sirk-inspired musical score of the film is abruptly replaced by a sort of erotic and energetic celestial synthesizer score and then the protagonist proceeds to call his slob mistress Chichi, who is moronically passed out on her couch with a lit cigarette in between her fingers and tons of trash all around her floor, including a pizza box with half-eaten pieces of crust, countless empty Pepsi and beer cans, and other items that indicate that the less than gorgeous harlot lacks even the slightest inkling of dignity and does not exactly care about her health. When Chichi picks up the phone after stumbling around trash that is lying around her apartment, Vince asks her if she was sleeping and she lies and states, "No, darling...I was in the garden planting vegetables," which seems to arouse the hopelessly naive protagonist as indicated by his excited reply, "I like you...you're natural." From there, Vince proceeds to fondle and finger a small statue of a topless aborigine chick, which somehow magically turns on not only just Chichi, but also his wife too, who is secretly listening to the entire conversation on the other line in another room. At the end of their largely wordless orgasmic phone conversation, Vince declares to Chichi, "I'll meet you at moonrise." After his worried wife asks, "Going already?" and proceeds to cry, Vince begins walking through the street of San Francisco to meet Chichi, but tragedy strikes for his slobbish mistress when she is in such pain as a result of intestinal issues that she has to crawl to the bathroom and subsequently takes such a massive dump that she has to use a large stake to get the turd pile down the toilet when it fails to flush. Meanwhile, after scrawling on the ground near a skull, Vince's sister Julia goes outside and states to a fellow dirty blonde that may or may not be her girlfriend, "Nora, I tried to kill myself." Somewhat humorously, annoyingly happy-go-lucky Nora, who is tending her garden, responds to Julia's mundanely stated confession by passionately embracing her, calling her "foolish," and then giving her the following timeless advice, "Remember...there are three things in this world that you can do: you can do good, you can do bad...or you can do nothing." Obnoxious optimist Nora also states to Julia, "Lookout there, Julia. A fog is coming to us...it will give you strength," but not long after ominous music begins to play and fog proceeds to engulf the SF suburbs in a scene that eerily foreshadows the series of absurd tragedies that will soon destroy most of the characters in the film.

After finally managing to get her giant turd(s) flushed down the toilet, Chichi, who is late as a result of her major bowel problems, makes a frenetic attempt to meet Vince in time for the moonrise and in the process she absurdly attempts to wave down a taxi in an open field and then subsequently falls off of a cliff after carelessly not watching her step in her valiant struggle to get to her boy toy. Meanwhile, Vince's wayward wife almost suffers a complete mental breakdown while taking out the trash. As a result of the fact that Chichi did not meet him in time for the moonrise and thus probably assumes that she stood him out, Vince goes to see Julia, complains to her, "Sis, I feel sort of bad," and while sharing a coke with her during an extra touching brother-sister moment proudly declares, "I'm leaving this place, Sis." After confiding in Julia, "I saw some cirrus clouds this morning and I had high hopes. I hoped that they turn into cirrocumulus then altostratus, then maybe a big nimbostratus would move in, but I'm leaving this place, Sis," Vince goes back to his place and reads a book entitled Oklahoma Weather by meteorologist Gary England (who is apparently a pop culture icon in Oklahoma City and who had a cameo in Dutch master cinematographer turned Hollywood hack filmmaker Jan de Bont's blockbuster Twister (1996)). In the next scene, Vince is featured standing stoically in front of a large airplane during a sunny day while putting on a pair of sunglasses on like he is a man on the mission yet he ultimately ends up at a sleazy motel in Oklahoma where he plans to start his supposed dream life. Unfortunately, while downing a banana like it is a pulsating purple-headed monster, Vince sees a news report on TV about a tornado warning in his area, but of course he makes no attempt to seek safety elsewhere because he has come to Oklahoma to experience the splendor of mother nature's destruction. After Julia catches a news program about how a tornado ravaged Oklahoma, Vince's unclad corpse is featured on the floor of his ravaged motel room and next to one of his feet is a newspaper with the headline "Twisters, High Winds Rip Area" and "Tornado Hits Apartments." After seeing a young muscular negro father and his two young children appear on the news, Julia immediately turns off her TV, heads to her bathroom, fills up the bathtub, stands inside said bathtub, and then puts her fingers inside a light bulb socket, thereupon finally achieving her dream of committing suicide and possibly reuniting with her recently deceased brother, who arguably committed a sort of passive self-slaughter. While Nora is horrified upon hearing Julia's gruesome ear-piercing screams while she is outside fiddling with her garden, she soon gets happy upon seeing fog entering the area, as she sees it as another good omen, even though all the recent series of events have affirmatively proven otherwise. Of course, Nora's happiness does not last long when Julia's skeleton appears from an upstairs window and cynically states, "Look, look out there! The fog is coming. It will give you strength" while smoke oozes out of the eye-sockets of her completely fleshless skull, which resembles one of the various corpses of German citizens that were burned alive during the Allied bombing of Dresden during World War II due to the fact that it still covered with a head full of hair. Indeed, A Reason to Live may begin as a lurid melodrama but it concludes as a sort of pseudo-supernatural horror flick.

As far as I am concerned, when it comes to the seemingly oxymoronic category of truly cultivated psychotronic celluloid, A Reason to Live is like the Black Narcissus (1947) of the trash avant-garde, albeit featuring debauched dames with bad dye jobs instead of naughty nuns and clouds and tornadoes instead of mountains, among other things. Evoking films ranging from William Dieterle's Fog Over Frisco (1934) to von Sternberg's Ana-ta-han (1953) to Sirk's William Faulkner adaptation The Tarnished Angels (1957) and featuring lavish and vaguely oneiric phosphorescent black-and-white celluloid, the film is really like no other (aside for some of Kuchar's other flicks) yet it has only ever been released on VHS as part of a 'Best Of' video compilation entitled Color Me Lurid (1966-1978), which also features Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966), Wild Night in El Reno (1977), I, an Actress (1977), and The Mongrel (1978). Like his Weather Diary videos, Kuchar's Wild Night in El Reno is notable for continuing the filmmaker's weather watching fetish. Notably, Kuchar would reveal that there are ancestral roots attached to his storm and weather fetish in Jennifer M. Kroot's doc It Came from Kuchar (2009) where he tells the seemingly apocryphal story, "Mom was born in the Ukraine. She was a farm girl. There was a lightning storm. One of the farm boys ran into a bale of hay to escape the rain and lightning hit and incinerated him...And that's why she's always been afraid of electrical storms. You couldn't calm her down. I've always liked lightning and thunder and I'd always be by the window and she's say, 'Get away from the window!,' and she'd be very agitated." Indeed, like much of his work, A Reason to Live seems to be at least partly rooted in Kuchar's somewhat morbid mommy issues, albeit in a more rebellious way since Mrs. Kuchar apparently was horrified by inclement weather yet the filmmaker loved it. As to whether or not Kuchar wanted to be killed by a tornado, that remains to be seen but I suspect that he felt it would be a romantic way to die, especially after watching his film.

As quoted in the book Queer Looks (1993), Kuchar remarked regarding certain minor problems he had with his ostensible 'co-director', "I had fun photographing A REASON TO LIVE—it was all done with a Bolex, and the sound was dubbed in later. Plus I loved designing Marion Eaton, although she was horrified at the result; because it was black and white, I wanted the lipstick to look just right, to stand out, and I had to redesign her eyebrows. I liked the way the sofa looked when you took the cushions off—you could see the shapes of the springs underneath. Marion couldn't understand why I'd want such a horrible-looking sofa in the film. I explained that this movie was about a relationship falling apart, about disillusionment, I guess." Apparently, Eaton, who is probably best known for her performance in the Kuchar penned and McDowell directed epic 'old dark house' porn flick Thundercrack! (1975), had somewhat mixed yet largely positive feelings about the film, or as she once stated herself regarding her experiences, "A REASON TO LIVE was the first time I did a film for George that was not scripted. It was pure improvisation and it wouldn't have sync sound, so I wouldn't be using his language, his feelings. And it was a learning experience for me, that I got to share with him [...] George wanted me to empty the garbage [laughing] wearing this dress. It was a little hard for me to get that together until it finally clicked through my mind that when I empty the garbage myself in my house in Mill Valley, I would go out and walk up the stairs in this beautiful day and that's when I'd usually think about the poetry that was going on my mind while doing this mundane task. So, I was really pleased with the shot, the way it came out, because this woman who is feeling a great deal of emotional dramatic tension has to perform this mundane act and so there's...I can't finish that; I don't know why; I got lost..."

With its crypto-cocksucker material that emphasizes camp over actual cock-sucking as personified by Kuchar's then-lover playing a sort of dime-store Don

A REASON TO LIVE

Juan who is adored by various lecherous ladies, A Reason to Live offers a great example as to why the filmmaker once stated regarding his loathing of being described as a fag filmmaker, "I don't see myself as a gay filmmaker....I don't think other people see me as a gay filmmaker either because certain of my films don't deal with that—and because I don't grab my student audience and fondle them on the side. Curt felt the gay scene was a ghetto. He loved mixed crowds because he liked straight guys. Another friend of mine, Dan Turner, was saying how he liked interchange situations. That's where I come from." Indeed, one of Kuchar's greatest talents as a filmmaker is that, not unlike Andy Milligan and to a lesser extent John Waters, he was oftentimes able to mask his homo sensibilities and give them an ostensibly hetero form and ultimately assembled with A Reason to Live a delectably disturbing subtextual melodrama that puts all the films of Sirk to shame in terms of its scathing critique and ironical cynicism in regard to seemingly banal subjects like love and romance, which is something that people of all sexual persuasions can relate to. Somewhat ironically considering its various depictions of brutal deaths, A Reason to Live really does offer some reasons to live, albeit some fanatically self-destructive ones like tornado hunting, sexual promiscuity, and suicide ideation. Of course, as Kuchar once stated in regard to a scene in Weather Diary 3 (1988) where there is a shot of him taking a piss, "Everyone wants to be a stripper, but if you don't do it now, you'll go to your grave bitter. That's how I felt. What could be better in your past than a nude scene? It's a dream come true. We all want a scandalous past—it's what Hollywood pictures were always made about. I think it's the dream of our nation, to be a person like that."

STAR WARS EPISODE IV: A NEW HOPE

George Lucas (1977) Stars War IV: A New Hope is a film school jerk off fest. George Lucas obviously took all he learned at film school and put it all together in a "futuristic" way. Essentially Star Wars is just another Samurai or Western. Just add the sci-fi setting.

John Ford was a huge influence on the film. The scene where Luke's Aunt and Uncle are found dead was taken from The Searchers. Kurosawa was another big influence as Star Wars is a loose remake of Hidden Fortress. Droid C-3PO was taken from Fritz Lang's Metropolis. Leni Riefenstahl's third reich art masterpiece Triumph of the Will also influenced Star Wars (especially during the end heroic award scene). The "rebel alliance" seem to be modeled after Bolshevik revolutionaries (who were the most evil people in history). I am not surprise that an Antichrist like George Lucas would show props to mass murderers. The "Galactic Empire" is supposed to be modeled after EVIL NAZI BUTCHERS!!!! Lucas wasn't try to hide this when he decided to name the imperial soldiers "storm troopers." The soldiers (and Darth Vader) also share similar helmets to that worn by German in World War I and II. I like to interpret Darth Vader as Adolf Hitler. Adolf was a Jew that decided it was a time for a change just as Vader went from "good" to "evil." English hammer film actor Peter Cushing (who played a Nazi in Zombie classic Shock Waves) plays Grand Moff Tarkin who looks like he was modeled after Nazi Minister of Propaganda Josef Goebbels. Tarkin and Goebbels were both very charming characters.

Josef Goebbels Grand Moff Tarkin

George Lucas updated Star Wars with new and "improved" special effects. Like Steven Spielberg, Lucas seems to have the mind of a child. His obsession with candy polished special effects makes me sick. Lucas's net worth is estimated at $3.6 Billion. Hopefully he will take the money (as it keeps growing) and build his own spaceship which might tragically crash in Uranus. Portrait of an Artist P.S: Mark Hamill is a little turd.

RAMBO: FIRST BLOOD PART II
RAMBO: FIRST BLOOD PART II

George P. Cosmatos (1985) I like to think of the legend of Rambo to be an evolutionary one. He first appears as a weathered and tortured anti-hero who happens to be the best of the best, hiding from people who have done him wrong. First Blood happens to be a powerful film conveying an important message against those discriminating against 'Nam veterans. Somewhere along the way, Rambo went from an artist painting a tapestry of death to a bonafide American action hero who sports his curly Wop hair pinned back with a greasy headband worthy of the Karate Kid. In the original Morrell book, Rambo dies. However, that is non-profitable and a pussy's way out, so George P. Cosmatos decides to resurrect him. While I don't particularly favor directors who taint an amazing film, it is true that Stallone held the reigns over this film. That would explain the jump from First Blood Part II to Tombstone. Rambo is back to help win the war. So while Rambo mines rocks in prison, Trautman comes to him with a mission. A mission so fierce, that Rambo couldn't say no. Rescuing P.O.W's has never been so difficult, especially when there is a traitor in their midst's. This is by my knowledge, one of the first action films to incorporate the usage of a cartoony sadistic Russian as the villain. As we all very well know, this political tactic is still being used to this day (I.E. Indiana Jones and the Kingdom of the Crystal Skulls) It seems that people are starting to wise up to Spielberg's fetish for portraying National Socialists as an evil entity. So Rambo gets captured and in an intense scene, withstands the most extreme tortures. From here on out, Rambo is alive due to his extreme hatred towards his own country. This is the only real aspect that carries on through the first film. In First Blood, John Rambo is blown away at the reasoning of his rejection by the country he fought for. This time, he is left to die by his own country. The final words go along the lines of "I would die for my country and I want my country to love me as much as I love it" Strong words coming from a strong man. After his escape, Rambo takes on a chopper piloted by an evil Soviet. It's instances like these that make me aspire to create a syndicated television show facing Rambo off against various celebrities and Hollywood monsters, just to watch Stallone kick as much ass as he always does. First Blood Part II is by no means an excellent film, but it brings the character formerly known as Rambo back, and I love it for that. After all, Rambo is known for its political content mixed with Ass-whuppin. Bring on Rambo V.

George Pavlou (1986)

When I think of Clive Barker, macabre philosophy comes to mind. Along with sadomasochistic tendencies, Barker infuses a potential homosexual "flaw" to his bookwork that coincides with the horror creating new planes of metaphysical and abstract terror and depravity, in other words: "future of horror, and its name is Clive Barker." Clive always had a way of creating both exceptional stories along with films but we know his work towards film and video games are always both a bit sketchy. So what would happen, if someone without a true merit for filmmaking attempted to recreate a fabulous tale of inhuman godless terror? Well, the true answer to all these questions and more lie within the process of both making Rawhead Rex and viewing Rawhead Rex. The film is an absolute chore to finish without pausing. Granted, there are some true die hard fans of the film but that being said, their happiness towards the creative property was most likely birthed off the film first and then the comic/short story. Rawhead Rex started out as a godless "god." A creature undefinable by all modern science and judging by the contorted shape of its body, contemporary symmetry didn't exist either. Rawhead Rex looks as what would occur if Hey Arnold! fused with Pumpkinhead and it is nothing short of a lovely image, right? Wrong, Rawhead Rex was titled such as he was born of an undeniable 9 foot tall phallic image that looks of a wild, hairy, unnaturally shaped cock. Director George Pavlou decided to denounce Rawhead's fear of post-fertile women in order to change the scene into what seems to be yet another demonic possession film until we realize that one character, whom we expected to birth a hell spawn, is never approached by the lens again. Meanwhile, Rawhead Rex looks like an eight foot tall version of Donny from The Wild Thornberry's and we're supposed to take seventy more minutes of this seriously?. Something must have been lost in translation cause not even an incompetent coworker of mine could fuck up this badly this many times. It's purely shameful that this is the second film of Clive Barker's that he had disowned. My sadness is short-measured though because after this atrociously "almost entertaining" film, he directed Hellraiser. Rawhead Rex begins like any other "Nature gone amok!" film would - a poor schmuck who does his duty disrupts/pisses off a species of creature or a single entity into a widespread panic and/or chaos. In terms of horror, this very plot line is normally eligible on a Tom Clancy level, as in you can mix and match names, archetypes, and settings and normally come up with a similar thesis to a monster film without sacrificing the amusing value of the genre. An everyman photographer is on a business trip with his family in Ireland's country side when a huge monolith is unearthed and a goofy looking behemoth is born from the soil. So is the page that Rawhead Rex begins on and it's not a very good page. There really is no starting point for this monstrosity. Rawhead Rex begins on a long note and features an emasculated, malnourished short note full of hypocrisies and text-to-visual error. Anything that the short story was known for is void on film - a toxic cinematic conundrum. It's very hard to wonder how such a simple plot could get so off track. "There was clearly a misapprehension over what [Underworld] was all about - they told me they wanted a horror movie and then took all the horror out! [I said], 'Look, if I get involved in Rawhead and you take the horror out again, there's nothing left as this is a monster-on-the-loose movie.' As they owned the rights anyway I thought I'd write a first draft and at least have some control over the project. Frankly, I needed the money at the time as well. I wrote a draft and a half and that was literally the last I ever heard from anyone. I was never invited on the set, never saw the promised plane ticket for Dublin, and all I kept hearing were pretty lousy things about the way the film was progressing." I'll never understand why I was ignored. It still remains a complete and utter mystery to me. Even to this day I've never received an explanation why I was never consulted over any of the major decisions to change the thrust or details in my original script. Either they thought I was useless and wouldn't have anything to contribute or else they worried I might have some valid opinions which would make too many waves." Rawhead Rex is simply another misconception from those assholes at the studios who simply do not value an artist's integrity. The tale of Rawhead Rex involved a monster who enjoyed feasting on children. In the film, Rawhead Rex, we get a movie about a Neanderthal creature with a receding hairline whom "grabs" a child and when the scene shifts angles in its cowardly way, we don't know if the kid is deceased or not. Or maybe that was just on my behalf. You see, after viewing The Host, I learned never to trust those "are they dead yet?" scenarios with children. A child is far too harmful to kill off camera or on and there within lies my doubt towards this experiment in faulty, belligerent filmmaking. As it seems, I remember now that Rawhead doesn't even kill in the manner of which it is supposed to. After a vicious mob attack, many suffer from missing faces and in this visual tale, it seems only chewing leads to slashed jugulars. Rawhead Rex may be entertaining in such a vain way as "Hey! I'm in the mood to turn on my television without having to waste a single brain cell thinking about any commercial values or sub-political messages. What's Rawhead Rex?" The title Rawhead Rex can only be mistaken for absolute trash but don't get it twisted. The short story was a wonderfully quick read, the film is a painfully dredging experience in films that go past their unwanted prime.

George Roy Hill (1972)

A nonlinear big budget Hollywood sci-fi arthouse flick addressing the Allied powers unofficial war crime of the totally terroristic firebombing of Dresden during the Second World War certainly seems like a sort of wishful alt-right fanboy fantasy yet, somewhat inexplicably, such an insanely idiosyncratic cinematic work actually does exist and naturally it is not exactly a famous film despite being based on a relatively famous novel. Luckily, it is also a great film that, despite being nearly half-a-century old, is rather fresh despite technically belonged to a genre that does not typically age gracefully. Indeed, Slaughterhouse-Five (1972)—a film based on American postmodern writer Kurt Vonnegut's 1969 novel of the same name—is, in my less than humble opinion, one of the greatest films of the so-called 'New Hollywood' era and certainly more deserving of notability than the various classic films associated with the movement as directed by the likes of Peter Bogdanovich, Hal Ashby, Miloš Forman, and Arthur Penn, among countless others. Likewise, I would also argue that it is a rare film that, not unlike Ridley Scott's Blade Runner (1982) and Stanley Kubrick's The Shining (1980), is superior to its source novel (in fact, Vonnegut was quite happy with the film and would even state, "I love George Roy Hill and Universal Pictures, who made a flawless translation of my novel"). Of course, the film's director George Roy Hill is best known for the New Hollywood classic Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid (1969)—a sort of American Western answer to François Truffaut's Jules and Jim (1962)—which is a film that I have always found to be hopelessly soft, sentimental, and obscenely overrated. Not unlike his American New Wave contemporaries Michael Ritchie (Prime Cut, The Bad News Bears) and Alan J. Pakula (Klute, Sophie's Choice), Hill is a good argument against auteurism as a talented filmmaker that, relatively speaking, lacked a potent personalized approach and signature style, which was arguably a benefit to a preternatural picture like Slaughterhouse-Five that could have easily been an absolutely abominable artistic disaster were it helmed by a more monomaniacal and/or fetishistic filmmaker (speaking of, Guillermo del Toro, who has certainly demonstrated his commitment to the cultural marxist cause by introducing interspecies miscegenation in the fiercely fishy The Shape of Water (2017), announced in 2013 that he plans to remake the film in collaboration with silly semitic screenwriter Charlie Kaufman). That such a film was ever made in Hebraic Hollywood—a place that, more than any other, clearly has no sympathy for the complete destruction of an ancient German city and countless priceless pieces of architecture—is nothing short of a miracle and virtual fluke of cinema history that reveals Hill's inordinate artistic integrity as a rare Hollywood filmmaker that was clearly not willing to bend-over for Zion (notably, underrated kiwi mischling auteur Vincent Ward would later depict the firebombing of Dresden in a somewhat less effective yet nonetheless still potent fashion in his rarely-seen film Map of the Human Heart (1992)). Needless to say, had Hill prostituted himself by directing a holocaust film on a similar scale to Slaughterhouse-Five, he would probably be better remembered and more revered today.

Notably, the full title of Vonnegut's book is Slaughterhouse-Five, or The Children's Crusade: A Duty-Dance with Death and the author is described on the title page as "A FOURTH-GENERATION GERMAN-AMERICAN NOW LIVING IN EASY CIRCUMSTANCES ON CAPE COD [AND SMOKING TOO MUCH], WHO, AS AN AMERICAN INFANTRY SCOUT HORS DE COMBAT, AS A PRISONER OF WAR, WITNESSED THE FIRE-BOMBING OF DRESDEN, GERMANY, 'THE FLORENCE OF THE ELBE,' A LONG TIME AGO, AND SURVIVED TO TELL THE TALE. THIS IS A NOVEL SOMEWHAT IN THE TELEGRAPHIC SCHIZOPHRENIC MANNER OF TALES OF THE PLANET TRALFAMADORE, WHERE THE FLYING SAUCERS COME FROM. PEACE." Indeed, as Vonnegut's author description (possibly unwittingly?) alludes to, one of the greatest absurdities of WWII, not unlike WWI, is that German-Americans made up the largest ethnic to fight for the United States against Germany and Vonnegut—a battalion scout with the 106 Infantry Division that was captured on December 22, 1944 during the Battle of the Bulge—even had the singular displeasure as "fourth-generation German-American" of witnessing an irreplaceable Teutonic city from his ancestral homeland being completely eradicated by his own countrymen while a POW in what was ultimately a literal 'holocaust' (aka 'sacrificial mass slaughter via fire'). Notably, Jean-Luc Godard of all people noticed the absurdity of this situation in his obscure feature Germany Year 90 Nine Zero (1991) aka Allemagne 90 neuf zero where it is narrated, "The US never understood the war, or took part in it. At best, their fight was not the state's fight, nor on the same battleground. The US can only imagine a civil war. It's always themselves and their own defects, personified by the enemy, that they combat in all wars. For them, war is a moral dilemma. When they were English, they fought the English. When they became Americans, they fought Americans. Once sufficiently influenced by the Germans, morally and culturally, they attacked the Germans. The first American to take a prisoner in 1917 was Meyer. The prisoner's name was also Meyer." Of course, life's great dark absurdities are what Slaughterhouse-Five is all about, hence its lack of popularity among the general public which prefers disposable neatly-packaged feel-good banalities to mercurial movies that challenge the mind and seep into the soul.

Alien abductions, the firebombing of Dresden, homicidal wop psychopaths with lifelong grudges, and a seemingly autistic affectless hero are just a couple of the seemingly discordant ingredients that make Slaughterhouse-Five so insanely yet ideally idiosyncratic, yet the film is no less exceptional in terms of its form as a nonlinear flick with a virtual 'jigsaw' approach to editing (courtesy of editor Dede Allen of such classics as The Hustler (1961) and Night Moves (1975)) that manages to mimic human memory in terms of switching back-and-forth between major events from the protagonist's fairly eclectically traumatic life. Indeed, it is an extraordinary film about an extraordinary life as lived by a largely less than extraordinary individual that just floats through existence yet somehow achieves a sort of strange truly out-of-this-world transcendence in the end. While technically a sci-fi film and undoubtedly one of the first to deal with the theme of alien abduction, Vonnegut clearly has no special love for the genre and merely uses it trappings for mostly philosophical reasons (of course, for Hebraic Hollywood to make a film about the horrors of the Dresden Bombings seems like science fiction in itself, but I digress). Just as in the novel, the film is a quasi-existentialist work where the magnificent meaningless of life is given a vaguely optimistic spin where the viewer is asked to focus on the good and forget the bad, even in a demented culture-destroying world where the Dresden tragedy occurred. Notably, in a special introduction featured in the 1976 Franklin Library edition of the novel, Vonnegut stated of the event, "The Dresden atrocity, tremendously expensive and meticulously planned, was so meaningless, finally, that only one person on the entire planet got any benefit from it. I am that person. I wrote this book, which earned a lot of money for me and made my reputation, such as it is. One way or another, I got two or three dollars for every person killed. Some business I'm in." Undoubtedly, Vonnegut's sentiments sum up the overall charmingly dispiriting spirit of the film, which is very much beautiful in a biting surreal fashion comparable to blood splattered across fresh white snow (which, quite fittingly, actually appears in the film).

Although a man that probably could be best described by the title of Austrian novelist Robert Musil's unfinished three-volume novel The Man Without Qualities (1930–1943), the film's protagonist Billy Pilgrim (Michael Sacks)—a tall blond American boy with an all-American Norman Rockwell-esque essence—has led a virtually magical life filled with great tragedy and heartbreak but also great wonder, intrigue, and splendor. A virtual cipher of a man that lead actor Sack portrays quite perfectly as far as effectively radiating a flat affect is concerned, Billy is clearly a model for the eponymous heroes of Woody Allen's Zelig (1983) and Forrest Gump (1994), Chance the gardener in Hal Ashby's Being There (1979), Léon in Andrzej Żuławski's L'Amour Braque (1985), and Dougie Jones in Twin Peaks: The Return (2017), among various other examples. Luckily, Billy's character is perfect for such a story as it allows the viewer to more easily embrace a film that deals with both the very real horror of war and a sort of goofy science fiction that defies reason. Falling somewhere in between an 'Everyman' and Nietzsche's 'last man' with a good bit of autism thrown in for good measure, Billy is also in many ways quite typical of an American male of his era in that he goes off to war, gets married and has two kids, has a relatively successful career, and then retires, but only two events from his life give it true meaning:

the Dresden firebombing and alien abduction. Of course, the latter is pure fantasy and a sort of expression of Vonnegut's own pseudo-metaphysical wishful thinking in regard to some intangible humanist heaven where even autists like Billy Pilgrim get to fuck premium grade pussy for eternity for an exceedingly erudite all-alien audience.

While the film begins during WWII with a seemingly lost Billy roaming around in a considerably chaotic snowy Europa, the film rather seamlessly weaves back-and-forth between his life, including before and after that war that seemingly left indelible scars on his curious psyche. The son of a fierce fat father that—to impress his equally big boorish friends—put him in a traumatizing 'sink-or-swim' scenario as a small child where he was thrown into the deep-end of a public pool while completely naked and a comparably ludicrously large-and-in-charge mouthy mother, Billy hardly has the makings of a martial soldier and he virtually sleepwalks through the entire war despite it also having a totally traumatizing effect on his life. For example, when the Germans give him a woman's coat to wear in an attempt to emasculate him, Billy is completely clueless that he is being mock until a British POW makes it crystal clear to him and even then he does not seem to care. Aside from surviving the horrors of the Dresden terrorist bombings and being forced to move countless charred kraut corpses with other GI POWs, Billy also witnesses the senseless execution of his sole friend Edgar Derby (Eugene Roche)—a kindhearted teacher and family man that acts as a sort of much-needed father figure for the hapless protagonist—who is punished for 'theft' by some overly enterprising SS men after randomly being spotted rather innocently grabbing a Hummel figurine from some ruins. Undoubtedly, Derby's absurdly senseless death, which is over a cute inanimate object that, rather innocently and sentimentally, reminds the poor character of his son and that one of the SS men subsequently throws away like trash after having the middle-aged GI swiftly executed, completely personifies the spirit of dark tragicomic absurdism that guides both the film and novel. Although Billy made a short-lived but completely unforgettable friend in Derby while a POW, he also becomes the #1 eternal enemy of a psychotic Sicilian-American named Paul Lazzaro (Ron Leibman)—a loudmouthed lunatic of the suitably swarthy sort that, arguably quite revealingly, has turned irrational homo-hating into a sort of unintentionally humorous poetic art—that vows to kill him one day because he quite wrongfully believes that he caused the death of his comrade Roland Weary (Kevin Conway), or as he initially threatens the protagonist, "A fag frolic in Wyoming. I'll be there, Pilgrim, waitin' for you." Needless to say, Lazzaro does kill Billy and, as someone hopelessly "unstuck in time" that experiences various events from his life at various times multiple times, the protagonist is well aware this death-by-dago awaits him.

While Billy survives the Dresden Bombing and, in turn, the Second World War, and then gets married, has two kids, and becomes a successful optometrist, he seems completely detached from his 'life' and instead seeks sanctuary in his beloved doggo 'Spot.' After catching his son Robert (Perry King) masturbating to a centerfold of a sexploitation starlet named Montana Wildhack (Valerie Perrine of Bob Fosse's Lenny (1974)), Billy also finds a rare source of solace in the sensual lady and the silly sword-and-sandal (aka peplum) films that she stars in (and that his incessantly nagging lard ass wife, who he clearly does not love, highly disproves of). The Tralfamadorians—a group of highly intelligent and sophisticated extraterrestrials who exist in all times simultaneously—seem to realize this and transport both Billy and Montana to a virtual human zoo located on their planet of Tralfamadore, thereupon leading to an unlikely love affair between the protagonist (who is now middle-aged) and voluptuous diva that eventually leads to the birth of one son. As Billy tries in vain to explain to his pedantic son-in-law in regard to the important insights that he has acquired from these aliens, "On Tralfamadore you learn that the world is just a collection of moments, all strung together in beautiful, random order. And if we're going to survive, it's up to us to concentration on the good moments and ignore the bad." In the end, Billy even learns to accept his own rather absurd assassination at the hands of his deranged wop nemesis Lazzaro who kills him while he is giving a speech on the subject of Tralfamadore while in the Guido's shitty home city of Philadelphia. Despite Billy's insistence on remembering the good, the Dresden bombing, which acts both as the climax and 'centerpiece' of the film, sticks out the most in the end (as it should). After all, it is hard to forget the complete incineration of a singularly striking place full of happy children and old people (as Hill underscores during the pre-bombing scenes) that the protagonist initially describes upon first seeing it as, "the Land of Oz." Indeed, right before the climatic bombing scene, the viewer is teased with a quasi-travelogue of sorts featuring the most beautiful pieces of ancient Teutonic architecture juxtaposed with a composition by Johann Sebastian Bach in a virtually aesthetically angelic combo that arguably represents the height of apolitical German high kultur in an exceedingly ethereal scenario where it seems 'nothing bad can happen,' henceforth perfectly underscoring the true apocalyptic horrors of the firebombing of Dresden.

When I was in college, I once had this insufferably whiny slave-morality-ridden professor—a seriously shameless shabbos goy that once asked all the Jewish kids in my class to stand-up in a bizarre scenario of seemingly worshipful racial fetishization—that used to use his monotonous lectures to cry about being persecuted for being a "polack" (which, considering his relatively young age, seemed rather unlikely) or to philo-semitically proselytize for the chosen amongst god's chosen. During one fairly unforgettable lecture where he rather recklessly exposed the pathetic heights of his craven resentment-driven bloodlust, this exceedingly erratically effete professor did an impassioned speech on how good the Dresden firebombings were and even went on to describe in great detail the cultural importance of the city and how it was easily incinerated because it was largely made up of wood buildings due to being so ancient. After witnessing this bitchy biddy—a virtual middle-aged boy with the sad sick soul of a neurotic sex-starved old woman that probably still has not gotten over the ostensible trauma of a jock shoving him into a locker during high school—practically drool with a certain sadistic glee at the mere thought of the totally senseless brutal extermination of German woman and children and destruction of great German culture, I naturally came to the conclusion that those that ordered the senseless bombings were operating from a similar unhinged mindset. After all, rabid Jewish United States Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau Jr. infamously came up with the Morgenthau Plan with the odious objective of turning Germany into a depopulated wasteland, not to mention the fact that Albert Einstein lied to FDR about Germany's advancements in nuclear science so that he could get the Manhattan Project started in the hope that his ex-homeland would be nuked. Of course, what makes Slaughterhouse-Five such a successful antiwar film is that it is not plagued with the sort of hatred or resentment that inspired the pseudo-heroic Morgenthau and Einsteins of the world or the literary frauds like Elie Wiesel and Jerzy Kosiński. Indeed, it is only because Germany was destroyed and Zion prevailed that we even know of the zio-media-hype names of Einstein and Wiesel today while ignoring real geniuses like Nikola Tesla and a peaceful Aryan humanist like Vonnegut (who, if he was not a leftist of sorts, would have surely been completely ignored).

While Slaughterhouse-Five is unequivocally the greatest Vonnegut film adaptation of all-time as the novelist himself recognized, Mother Night (1996) directed by Christine (1983) lead Keith Gordon surely makes for a great double feature with George Roy Hill's film. Based on the 1961 Vonnegut novel of the same name, the film, which features an iconic cameo from the German-American writer, centers around the considerably conflicted antihero of Howard W. Campbell, Jr.—a character that seems to be inspired by both American modernist poet Ezra Pound and William 'Lord Haw-Haw' Joyce—who lives a sort of double life and overall schizophrenic existence as an American Nazi propagandist that quite deceptively uses his radio show to spread hidden messages that can only be decoded by Allied intelligence. Notably, the character also appears in Roy's Slaughterhouse-Five during the early part of the Dresden bombing scene in a red-white-and-blue swastika uniform that whacked-out wop Lazzaro describes as a "fag outfit." While neither film is even remotely 'pro-Nazi,' they both manage to question the official WWII narrative and, quite unlike virtually any Hollywood WWII films, make light of atrocities committed against the Germans (in fact, Mother Night director Gordon is a member of the tribe, but he doesn't let his ethno-racial loyalties get in the way of a good weird paranoid story, as the film even makes reference to the mass rape of German women by Soviet hordes). As for other Vonnegut adaptations, the Jerry Lewis/Sam Fuller vehicle Slapstick of Another Kind (1982) is one of the worst films ever made and Breakfast of Champions (1999)—a film that should have worked since it was directed by offbeat auteur Alan Rudolph who, not unlike his friend-cum-mentor Robert Altman, is totally suited for such subject matter—is a total mess that the author apparently felt was “painful to watch.”

As far as I am concerned, George Roy Hill is one of the most underrated filmmakers associated with the so-called American New Wave and Slaughterhouse-Five is superior to anything that was ever directed by more respected filmmakers associated with the movement like Paul Mazursky, Norman Jewison, Sydney Pollack, Peter Bogdanovich, Mike Nichols, and countless others. A sort of spiritual cinema son of Hollywood maverick William A. Wellman (Wings, The Ox-Bow Incident) as both filmmakers were man’s men that served as fighter pilots and had a lifelong love of flying in general as demonstrated by their respective films, Hill brought a certainly inordinate masculinity to American cinema during an exceedingly emasculated (post)hippie era with underrated films like the mesmerizing männerbund aviation drama The Great Waldo Pepper (1975)—a film that pays tribute to the singular glory of Teutonic fighter pilots and the similarly daredevil-ish American pilots that, despite technically being enemies, respected them—and the vehemently anti-p.c. hockey dramedy Slap Shot (1977) starring Paul Newman in a rare lovably sleazy role. With The World According to Garp (1982)—a personal childhood favorite that, until relatively recently (last year), I could not recall the name of despite it being burned into my mind nearly thirty years ago—Hill directed a film that was clearly a (quite superior) model for Forrest Gump, albeit darker and more inordinately eccentric. While not one of his masterpieces, Hill brought some unexpected much-needed-nuance to the whole perennial Israeli–Palestinian conflict with his John le Carré adaptation The Little Drummer Girl (1984) starring Klaus Kinski of all people as a sort of Machiavelian Mossad agent in an uneven yet reasonably enthralling film where the Israelis ultimately come out looking like the most underhanded of international terrorist exploiters. In my less than humble opinion, it is a damn shame that Hill will always be best remembered for the softcore western Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid, but Americans love their westerns and hate their war crimes.

While the curious combination of real-life war atrocities and alien abductions might seem a tad bit silly, especially to those that take the Dresden firebombing seriously, the two things somehow work together perfectly in Hill’s Slaughterhouse-Five and their seemingly discordant combo make even more perfect sense if one has consulted the UFO writings of the great ‘Aryan Christ’ Carl Jung. While Jung did not completely rule out the possibility of space aliens and flying saucers, he did feel that the whole UFO phenomenon that more or less kicked off during World War II was part of a psychological and, in turn, spiritual crisis that was plaguing the Occidental mind. Indeed, as Jung argued in Flying Saucers: A Modern Myth of Things Seen in the Sky (1959), “One can hardly suppose that anything of such worldwide incidence as the Ufo legend is purely fortuitous and of no importance whatever [...] The basis for this kind of rumor is an emotional tension having its cause in a situation of collective distress or danger, or in a vital psychic need. This condition undoubtedly exists today, in so far as the whole world is suffering under the strain of Russian policies and their still unpredictable consequences [...] Precisely because the conscious mind does not know about them and is therefore confronted with a situation from which there seems to be no way out, these strange contents cannot be integrated directly but seek to express themselves indirectly, thus giving rise to unexpected and apparently inexplicable opinions, beliefs, illusions, visions, and so forth. Any unusual natural occurrences such as meteors, comets, ‘rains of blood,’ a calf with two heads, and suchlike abortions are interpreted as menacing omens, or else signs are seen in the heavens.” Undoubtedly, despite his general autistic demeanor, Slaughterhouse-Five protagonist Billy Pilgrim—an absurdly lucky survivor of the hell-on-earth Dresden nightmare—is a man plagued with a certain ‘emotional tension,’ which he is ultimately relieved of with the best next thing to heaven: a sort of extraterrestrial fuck factory where he gets to make love with the literal girl of his dreams in a baroque out-of-this world setting where his alien overlords, the Tralfamadorians, tell him everything he needs to know about life and existence, thereupon elevating him of every single fear and worry that he has. In that sense, both Vonnegut’s novel and Hill’s film adaptation act as sort of esoteric escapism where the ‘emotional tension’ that has resulted in the UFO phenomenon is cured by said UFO phenomenon; or at least Vonnegut’s fantastic fictional humanist version of it.

Notably, in attempting to describe the nightmarish state of painting in the post-WWII UFO age, Jung remarked, “Just as women’s fashions find every innovation, however absurd and repellent, ‘beautiful,’ so too does modern art of this kind. It is the ‘beauty’ of chaos. That is what this art heralds and eulogizes: the gorgeous rubbish heap of our civilization. It must be admitted that such an undertaking is productive of fear, especially when allied to the political possibilities of our catastrophic age. One can well imagine that in an epoch of the ‘great destroyers’ it is a particular satisfaction to be at least the broom that sweeps the rubbish into the corner.” While Slaughterhouse-Five—a film that literally depicts one of the greatest cities in human history as a sort of grotesquely gorgeous rubbish heap as partly caused by largely cultureless American philistines—does have a certain ‘soothing’ quality, it is also indubitably an expression of the ‘beauty of chaos’ that Jung describes in our pre-dystopian age of ‘great destroyers’ of the innately cosmopolitan alien culture-distorting sort. In that sense, the film is more potent than ever, not to mention radically red-pilled compared to the rancid raunch and cultural retardation that epitomizes most recent Hollywood sci-fi flicks (and movies in general). After all, you will not find another Hollywood movie that makes positive reference to English historian and supposed 'holocaust denier' David Irving who, as the film alludes to, was the first to seriously study the Dresden atrocity with his revolutionary text The Destruction of Dresden (1963). As for Vonnegut's novel, it might even eventually prove to have predicted the forsaken future of the U.S. when it notes that, "The United States of America has been Balkanized, has been divided into twenty petty nations so that it will never again be a threat to world peace. Chicago has been hydrogen-bombed by angry Chinamen. So it goes. It is all brand new." Indeed, so it goes.

George Terwilliger (1935)

With the decidedly deplorable and downright disgusting deluge of miscegenation-championing propaganda in movies, commercials, and virtually every and any sort of advertising, it is quite relieving when one is reminded that there actually was a time when race-mixing was depicted as something universally unholy and akin to bestiality. Luckily, I recently happened upon the film Ouanga aka The Love Wanga aka Drums in the Night aka Drums of the Jungle which, aside from being the second zombie film ever made in cinema history (White Zombie (1932) starring Béla Lugosi and directed by Victor Halperin is the first), is a work about the evils of miscegenation featuring Jews like Hollywood writer/director/producer/actor Sheldon Leonard (The Andy Griffith Show, The Dick Van Dyke Show) portraying negroes and starring green-eyed high-yellow beauty Fredi Washington, who was best known for playing “Peola” in the 1934 version of the film Imitation of Life directed by John M. Stahl and starring Claudette Colbert, as a black Haitian plantation owner that demonstrates that there is no wrath quite like a negress’ scorn by unleashing a voodoo curse to reanimate the dead as revenge against her WASP boy toy for getting engaged to a racially pure blonde Aryan babe. The first talkie as well as cinematic swansong of once prolific but now forgotten silent era auteur George Terwilliger (who directed, among other things, the 1922 William Randolph Hearst produced work Bride’s Play, which was intended as a starring vehicle for the producer’s then-mistress Marion Davies), this little proto-flesheater flick is an unequivocally b(ad) movie that has probably rightly been forgotten by cinema history, yet as a would-be-titillating tale of racial discontent, deleterious mayhem-inspiring mixed blood, and savage spiritual warfare that is completely at odds with the left-wing counter-culture zombie flicks of George A. Romero and the overall multicultural-friendly state of contemporary horror, Ouanga makes for an undeniably provocative footnote from zombie film history. Of course, anti-miscegenation themes are nothing new for the horror genre as demonstrated by the collected works of American Spenglerian horror novelist H.P. Lovecraft, as well as satanic Teutonic Renaissance man Hanns Heinz Ewers (whose work was influenced by his own personal travels to places like Haiti, as well as by the eugenics movement, especially in regard to early Zionist Max Nordau’s 1892 work Degeneration aka Entartung). Additionally, the early decades of cinema produced their fair share of classic anti-race-mixing works, as most obviously demonstrated by D.W. Griffith’s pioneering epic The Birth of a Nation (1915), which features a scene where a character played by Mae Marsh leaps to her death to avoid being raped by a nefarious negro named Gus. Advertised with the then-salacious taglines, “Meet CLELIE. . .Naive. . .YOUNG and BEAUTIFUL. . . LITHE YIELDING and PRIMITIVE LOVE-HUNGRY CHILD OF THE TROPICS!” and “STRANGE LOVES OF QUEER PEOPLE!,” Ouanga is certainly no Val Lewton masterwork, but it is certainly more enthralling than the majority of intolerably frivolous and formulaic flesheater filmic feces that comes out nowadays.

Set in Paradise Island in the West Indies, Ouanga opens with a shot of a voodoo statue and a nameless/faceless narrator remarking regarding the ex-slaves of the island, “The life of its inhabitants is marked by an unhurried peacefulness and a joyous contentment. Their simple occupations are colorful and primitive. And whether they live in mountain, valley, or town, eventually they find their way to the great city markets.” Of course, at night the negroes get naughty as demonstrated by scenes of sinister half-naked spades walking amongst the shadows in a zombie-like fashion and the narrator’s ominous remark, “Night falls...and with the rise of the great white tropical moon comes a sinister awakening...mysterious figures slip from shadow to shadow...nature becomes ghostly and unearthly...alive with evil movement, shuddering incantations and gruesome rites...and seemingly from everywhere comes throbbing, pulsating beats of the voodoo drums.... Drums... Drums...” One of these mysterious figures is double-black magician Klili aka Clelie Gordon (Freda Washington), who after receiving a sacred necklace from an elderly voodoo priest, declares, “Shall I lose this, may evil and death come upon me,” thus officially ushering in her second career as a venomous voodoo priestess. Indeed, Clelie is a high yellow Haitian plantation owner who has adopted the dually dark religion of her much darker servants and she plans to use her new black magic skills to obtain her great white love Adam Maynard (played by Philip Brandon, who spent most of his filmmaking career working as an assistant director, including on Ouanga), who has just inherited the quaint Haitian plantation of his deceased father.

Clelie is so hopelessly infatuated with wussy white boy Adam that she stalked him all the way from Haiti to New York City. While Adam confesses to Clelie that she was “wonderful during those two lonely years” (he assumedly used her as a concubine/exotic primitive curiosity) when he bumps into her on a ship sailing to Haiti, he also tells the very Eurypid-like black broad that there is no way in hell that he will be her lover again, as he soon plans to marry his virginal blonde Aryan fiancée Eve Langley (Marie Paxton). Clelie has talked herself into believing that she is as Aryan as a BDM (Bund Deutscher Mädel) girl to deny the fact that her ex-lover believes, “the barrier blood that separates us cannot be overcome.” In fact, she is so desperate, she even offers herself into slavery, melodramatically pleading to Adam, “I’d be your slave...anything.” As a novice voodoo priestess, Clelie decides to work her magic on Adam and recruits a pitch black maid named Susie (Babe Joyce) to help her to carry out her demonic deeds. Indeed, Susie has a thing for Adam’s servant Jackson (Sidney Easton) and Clelie offers to help the black maid obtain her ebony wonder via voodoo if she agrees to put a “voodoo death charm” (aka “ouanga”) in Eve’s purse, though the plan is ultimately botched. Of course, Clelie is not the only lunatic lover in Haiti, as Adam's overseer LeStrange (played by swarthy but non-negro like Hebrew Sheldon Leonard, who wore no make-up for the film) is in love with the self-loathing black voodoo priestess and tells her, "You must be mad to think you can win the love of that sort of white man." In fact, LeStrange is so obsessed with Clelie (who calls him "black scum") that he makes her the following threat: "You said that if you couldn't have my master, no other woman would. Well...that goes for me too. No one else is going to have you, is that clear? I'll kill you first." After Clelie manages to reanimate two coon corpses, she has the negro zombies kidnap Adam. While Clelie confesses to LeStrange regarding Adam, "I'm trash to him. Good-for-nothing, trash. Black trash," she still manages to suffer delusions of grandeur and resentfully states to her captive Eve, "A placid white-blooded thing like you make Adam happy? Adam needs a woman of fire...passion, like me." In the end, lethally lovelorn negro overseer LeStrange saves the day by killing cultivated yet crazed coon Clelie just like he said he would. Indeed, symbolically named Aryan lovers Adam and Eve are rightfully united and can go on to have racially pure (aka racially unconfused) babies that will not suffer from the racial schizophrenia that ultimately led to Clelie's truly tragic end.

While Fredi Washington would portray a character that attempts to 'pass' for white in both Imitation of Life and Ouanga, she apparently had a much different view on the subject in real-life as demonstrated by her 1945 remark: "You see I'm a mighty proud gal and I can't for the life of me find any valid reason why anyone should lie about their origin or anything else for that matter. Frankly, I do not ascribe to the stupid theory of white supremacy and to try to hide the fact that I am a Negro for economic or any other reasons; if I do I would be agreeing to be a Negro makes me inferior and that I have swallowed whole hog all of the propaganda dished out by our fascist-minded white citizens." Ironically, it was Washington's racially ambiguous appearance that prevented her from getting more black roles (apparently, she turned down the opportunity to play white characters), as she lacked the jet black appearance to play archetypal negro maid/mammy roles. Judging by the fact that she refused to 'pass' and play white characters and only dated/married black men (she was once married to Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., who was the first black brother that was elected to Congress from New York state), it is fairly likely that the actress approved of the anti-miscegenation message of Ouanga, though she probably found some of the film's depictions of blacks to be somewhat dubious. Indeed, the film features a number of scenes that would probably cause most modern p.c.-lobotomized pansy viewers to piss their panties, including a scene where a cracker states regarding blacks, "They're as dumb as ghosts." Additionally, most of the Haitian buck negroes featured in the film are totally indistinguishable from the two choco-zombies. Of course, anyone who has visited any American urban area will probably notice that most of the colored folks there walk and move in a fashion that is not all that unlike that of the walking undead. Indeed, were it not for the likes of Romero, zombies may have always been associated with blacks.

Somewhat reminiscent yet ultimately aesthetically inferior to White Zombie, Ouanga somehow managed to spawn an all-black remake entitled The Devil's Daughter (1939), yet it lacks the potent miscegenation theme and is thus totally worthless in every single regard. While director George Terwilliger originally planned to shoot Ouanga entirely in Haiti, he befriended a real-life Haitian voodoo priest that scared the hell out of him and inspired him to relocate the production to Jamaica, or as Gary D. Rhodes wrote in his book White Zombie: Anatomy of a Horror Film (2006) regarding the seemingly cursed production: "...Terwilliger befriended the head of a cult and his voodoo followers. When asked to perform in front of the cameras, however, the group became angry. Terwilliger soon found an OUANGA in his car, as well as encountering a punctured tire and a tree deliberately placed in the road. Warnings came of more evil to follow, and Terwilliger quickly decided to move the cast and crew to Jamaica. The morning he was to sail, however, his dancers had disappeared and the drummers and some extras had been arrested. Undaunted, the director began shooting again after settling in Jamaica, only to have a rainstorm drown two Jamaicans working on the film; in addition, sickness killed a crew member, and a cyclone destroyed the sets. After two months, an exhausted Terwilliger returned to the U.S. with footage in hand. Though seen in England as early as 1934, OUANGA--for unknown reasons--did not play U.S. Theaters until 1936." As Richard Stanley revealed in his documentary The White Darkness (2002), scientists have done brain scans of black Haitians while they are in voodoo trances that prove their gray matter takes on a different form during these heightened spiritual states, thus demonstrating how serious these black, black magicians take their unholy religion. While I am hardly someone that believes in magic, especially third world ghetto magic, the curious production history of Ouanga, as well as the film's tribal-drum-driven score and sometimes oneiric visuals certainly allowed me to be able to enact suspension of disbelief and get into the whole voodoo negro zombie atmosphere, which is certainly something I cannot say for most zombie flicks. Of course, as someone who was first taught about the religion in elementary school by a borderline elderly negress who once confessed that her husband put a litter of kittens in a sack and shot them with a shotgun, voodoo (or Vodoun aka Vodun) has always been a marginal interest of mine and Ouanga certainly reignited that interest and of course, the anti-miscegenation theme was the icing on the cake. There's certainly something special about a hokey old horror film that seems like it was inspired by the writings of Madison Grant and Lothrop Stoddard.

George Tillman, Jr. (2009)

The climax we all knew was coming but began expecting painfully early (such was the tragedy of B.I.G.'s life) arrived on time to coincide with Big Poppa's new release. Only when it arrived on the silver screen, something else was miraculously present, a cohort if you will; tear-jerking emotion. The final moments of Notorious finds itself in unfamiliar biopic territory as I find tears brimming in my eyes. Reliving the nightmare of hip-hop is no easy feat but yes, you will brave the death of an icon once more. Between the life-like performances of figures we've all heard of before and the redefining of re-enacted concert footage, Notorious thumps and pulses life into someone that is never forgotten. Between the coastal rap war of Biggie and Tupac that spread throughout every urban environment, I found myself braving the side of the East coast. I'm not necessarily a fan of Puffy but the Notorious B.I.G. made my allegiance of the utmost loyalty. With my condolences to Tupac, I never got into his style of music making or his "revolutionary" tactics. The legend of Tupac Shakur is rarely listened to or experienced first hand. His spirit and memory lives on thanks to crude airbrushed shirts at your local farmer's market and his Makaveli brand of clothing. Perhaps one day, a biopic in his name will give him justice but until then I'd rather be hypnotized by Biggie's presence. Few of you might have seen Robin Williams' film The Final Cut. The concept of this film follows "cutters" - cold film splicers who take a hard copy of memories and the vision of a persons entire life and trim them to make a fitting eulogy. This may seem like a departure from the topic of a deceased rapper but the tale is an unintentional philosophizing commentary on the subject of a biopic. Much like "biopics", the "producer" must pick and chose the struggles of a man and his saving grace, so to say that in the end, Christopher Wallace would appear a good and justified man. The truth might be farther than we know. While he represented the busted niggas, he was also a womanizing, drug-dealing piece of meat. But who's to say any of those are negative things? On the topic of the music behind the film, Danny Elfman conducts the powerful theme of Notorious. Backed with classic hits from Biggie and the occasional departure such as the tune from Slick Rick the Ruler's Children's Story, Notorious is in no way malnourished in the arts of music. Notorious works in such mysterious ways that it presents songs that we've heard time and time again, but revives them. I can now listen to "Hypnotize" and "Juciy" and think to myself how fresh these tracks are, regardless of the decade gap. The concert footage is absolutely breath-taking. Early on from the trailer, I noticed the surreal like shots from behind Biggie's outline. The camera does his larger than life figure, literally and metaphorically, justice and the hues of dark blues and bright fluorescents light up the dancing crowd. As Biggie once said, "Dumb Rappers need teachin". This statement weaves perfectly for our era of Soulja Boy's and Rico

Todriquez Wright's Notorious is a film that touched me. The fact that I let my guard down to this marvelous character who is faulted by none of his own is a progressive piece of instinct to me. Jamal Woolard is a highly qualified actor to star as Hip-Hop's departed titan of lyrical terror. Although the cast is mainly full of beautiful people to fill the roles of ugly people, mainly Lil' Kim, such is the ways of the Hollywood machine. I feel the greatest asset this film has is the young appearance of Biggie's son filling the shoes as the Notorious B.I.G. as a child. The pain conceived behind this film is entirely evident. Although this is only the perspective of the East coast on the war and the West coast is still not documented in a visually provoking way, I find solace in the fact that these facts are true. Who knows who killed B.I.G. and Pac? The world will never know.

WU: THE STORY OF THE WU-TANG CLAN

Gerald K. Barclay (2008)

Any opening remark on the subject of a Wu-Tang Clan featured piece of writing should begin with the words "Wu Tang Clan Ain't Nuthing Ta Fuck Wit." Not only because this is a true self-assessment of the legendary Shaolin-based hip-hop group but because it has also become an anthem for a vulgar generation. Stemming from Staten Island which is referred to as Shaolin, this merry band of rappers defied all odds in creating a legendary hybrid of stunning lyricism and classic Kung-fu themes and equipped sound bytes. Finally their story will be told through the eyes of a childhood friend and unfortunately for us, this director/friend also happens to be illiterate as he misspells many a word leaving most of the educated folk stunned, mock-turning away and questioning if what they just saw was legit. This documentary opens up with the eventual collective piece of Wu-Tang Clan with narration by the director, Gerald Barclay, acclaimed creator of such classics as Bloody Streetz, and explains Prince Rakim's (RZA) grouping of an unheard of expansive rap group to create an early prototype of Wu-Tang Clan. This BET produced documentary chronicles their rise to global fame and success finally slowing down to a halt with the saddening death of Ol' Dirty Bastard, who is humorously alter-egoed as Dirt McGirt. Like it should, not much happens when Ol' Dirty passes. Solo albums are produced and the Wu recollect to release records that are great, but lack the comic intrigue and carny pitch that Big Baby Jesus gave them. All good things do come to an end and with Ol' Dirty's death, the biography becomes almost less than interesting and sees itself as an elongated tribute to the Ol' Dirty Bastard and loses all pride & integrity. My main gripe with this feature isn't without an inciting event. With the short runtime of barely clocking in at an hour, this film rushes through events that could, no, should be embroidered to fans or "hataz" alike. For instance, the Wu-Tang Clan is secondarily known as marketing geniuses. They have promoted everything from documentaries, books, video games, a clothing line, and DVD restorations but only the clothing line is fleshed and no justice is brought to the other mediums of product inflation. For instance, I would have loved to hear thoughts and interviews about the horrid cult video game Wu-Tang: Shaolin Style in which you can engage in 4 player 3D combat. For a self-proclaimed story of the greatest urban performers, this is surely bare bones and finds itself glorifying the Wu-Tang Clan with no instance of stability and focuses on the light more than the dark, which can be understandable in filmic context. Wu: The Story of the Wu-Tang Clan also paves the way to make Raekwon and only Raekwon look like a complete dickhead while promising a mutual downfall of fame. Meanwhile, the RZA is glorified to be messianic with a solid vision of hip-hop but this comes as no surprise. After seeing the RZA's acting performance in Derailed, it's easy to see he is a cool cat.

On a similar subject of depiction, Ol' Dirty advocates frequent use of his seed and spreads it throughout many Negro women. That nigga has 13 children and I bet they are all from different mothers. A true hero for children to look up to, ODB also managed to save a little girl, age 4, from a burning automobile. Irony within, ODB would allegedly later light himself ablaze in order to escape from Clinton. That scene remains one of very few that has any materialization of being considered "powerful."

If my thoughts appear jumbled on this documentary, it's no fault of my own. This is a documentary that "documents" hardly anything of importance and remains as a collected package of interviews with the men responsible for this cultural Asiatic phenomenon and several cohorts such as Popa Wu, the platonic father of the group and many other acquaintances. Halfway through the feature, the sight on the Clan is lost and trails off to snootily follow the tail of the dearly departed Dirty Bastard and his trails & tribulations. The RZA bellowed in recorded concert footage that "We're not going to mourn his death but to celebrate his life." And contrary to these moving words amplified to a sea of fans, Barclay mourns ODB's death with a shoddy documentary that is almost as incomplete as his spelling education. For a "Greatest Hits" moment of archived footage of interviews, concerts, and music videos, Wu: The Story of the Wu-Tang Clan isn't a bad reference piece but will ultimately disappoint the die hard Wu-Tang fanatic. Look at me, I'm disappointed.

ANGST

Gerald Kargl (1983)

Gerald Kargl's Angst is a sadistic serial killer masterpiece. This intense and deranged film even rivals the masterpiece Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer. Angst follows a newly released killer that never stopped seeing red despite his "rehabilitation." As soon as he is released from jail the man embarks on his killing spree. A killing spree that gives this killer perverse sexual satisfaction. Angst features amazing camera work that flows from one scene to another. The film has a very seamless and superbly constructed feel. I would even go as far as saying Angst is the most perfect serial killer film that I have ever seen. To further compliment the film's amazing camera work, the soundtrack adds a crucial cinematic energy that leaves nothing to be desired. The killer finds a secluded house to carry out his killings. A middle aged mentally retarded and wheel chair bound man is found in the quiet house. Quite an odd first victim for this killer. I was disturbed by the retarded man's random appearance. Later the handicapped man's mother and sister show up. The killings become an undesired family affair.

The young sister (mid twenties I suspect) suffers the worst attacks of brutality. The killer has an orgasm of blood and sadism with her. I can't help to think this is what real victims of serial killers face when they tragically succumb to their unrelenting path. The family dog watches the killings playfully. As a lover of dogs, I couldn't help to focus on the dogs reactions to the killings. The dog eventually hides under covers from the killer. This is probably the only "cute" moment of Angst. The killer narrates Angst with stories of his tormented childhood and confessions of his most darkest desires. He is the product of neglect and sadism. One can't truly feel sorry for the killer, but we get an idea where his perversities derive from. Out of all the serial killer films I have seen, Angst most successfully psychoanalyzes the mind of a serial killer. Hannibal Lecter would be proud.

THE SATISFIERS OF ALPHA BLUE

After my recent discovery of the 'adult film actress' Lysa Thatcher (Touch Me in the Morning, Pink Punk)—probably the only blue movie star that has ever caught my attention—in Cecil Howard's phantasmagoric porn masterpiece Neon Nights (1981), I decided to dig up some more lecherous flicks starring the little Lolita-like lady and ultimately discovered the decidedly dirty yet strangely moralistic dystopian sci-fi flick The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue (1980) aka The Satisfiers aka 2001: I odysseia tou sex directed by none other than Italian-American cult pornographer Gerard Damiano (Deep Throat, The Devil in Miss Jones, Splendor in the Ass). As someone who has never been a hardcore science fiction fan (nor a fan of hardcore science fiction), let alone seen a single episode of Star Trek, I was quite enthralled to see dirty dago Damiano debase the played-out genre that is oftentimes associated with impotent and/or virginal fanboys that collect toys. Starring superlatively swarthy and less than handsome Hebrews Robert 'Cannibal Holocaust' Kerman aka R. Bolla and porn star turned standup comedian Herschel Savage (a man who was given his pseudonym by his kosher comrade Jamie Gillis in an attempt to mold a 'nerdy Jewish identity' with that of an ostensible super stud), as well as the ever so radically repulsive vulgarian Jewess Annie Sprinkle (My Father Is Coming, War Is Menstrual Envy), The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue seems like the sort of soulless technocratic and politically correct future that might be sired if the most despicable of Hollywood liberals had their wayward way and turned the world into one big kosher cesspool of semen-drenched humanist sloganing and perverted loveless sex where family, kultur, art, and individuality are nowhere to be seen. An ideally idiosyncratic and totally kitschy cult item from the late part of the great Golden Age of Porn, The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue tells the satirically sordid story of a sub-homely heeb homeboy who suffers from all-consuming melancholy and resentment due to the fact that there is merely great superficial sex in the 21st century and where real authentic love and commitment are no longer vogue, so he faces a bit of heartbreak after falling for a high-tech hooker and decides to make it his duty to deflower her cold heart. The pornographic answer to quasi-erotically-charged sci-fi cult classics ranging from Curtis Harrington's Queen of Blood (1966) and Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982), The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue, despite being a hardcore flick featuring mostly nasty sex, most certainly has a lot of out-of-this-world ingredients that, like all decent films of the genre, reminds the filmgoer that the future will probably be a fucked place worthy of an atom bomb or two.

It is the 21st century and some post-apocalyptic scenario has inspired the surviving humans to revamp society in a sophisticated yet soulless manner somewhat comparable to Aldous Huxley's Brave New World where hedonism reigns with a laser-prick and where women are not allowed to birth to children in a real and organic fashion and are instead subjected to the sexual desires of men. Rather unfortunately for the women, it seems all the handsome men died in the nuclear apocalypse. Female 'Relaxers' merely give men massages, but 'Satisfiers' must sexually service men in any manner they so desire. Kosher comrades Algon (Robert Kerman) and Griffin (Herschel Savage) have just arrived at the vice-fueled vacation planet of 'Alpha Blue' via teleportation and while the latter is quite excited about being at the exotic pleasure-dome, the former is a brooding cultural pessimist looking for love and is tired of loving in an emotionally pacified universe where superficial slogans like "save the whales" make up a good portion of the (non)conversations people have. As Griffin states to Algon, "They gave it up in the 20th century and you're still smoking," but that is the least of the fellow's problem as an emotional wreck of a man in a world of robotic automatons. When Algon meets a busty blonde nymph Satisfier named '805' aka Diana (Lysa Thatcher), he falls in love at first sight and the two make passionate love after eating a full dinner (as opposed to the tablets that most people eat), but when the Semitic pseudo-stud brings up real love and how great the pre-apocalyptic world use to be, the feminist-brainwashed hooker states, "You mean like the old days? You're crazy, the old days are old...they no longer work. There's no pain, no frustration. I'm a satisfier. That's what I do best. I'm the best fuck in cubicle seven" and "Fuck you! Love my mouth, my cunt. Don't waste my time on love." Storming out of the room, Diana yells at Algon, "Talk to yourself, I'm going to eat cock, eat cock until I choke" and, indeed, she proceeds to down no less than four beefy dicks. Although Algon now thinks Diana is a "cunt," he cannot get her out his miserable mind, but as a wanton woman of the borderline lesbian sort who proudly proclaims to her fellow lady-licking Satisfiers, "I like having my cunt sucked, especially by a woman. Men can be too tough when it comes to eating pussy. Oh, it's not that they don't try to do it well...it just takes a woman to understand another woman," it will be hard for him to make her his monogamous lover. Meanwhile, all sort of sexual debauchery is happening around Alpha Blue, especially involving an unsavory Satisfier (Annie Sprinkle) with cow utters for tits who gives fellows golden showers and even buggers a statuesque Aryan man with a veiny strap-on dildo and then forces the assumedly fecal-covered object in his mouth and subsequently sticks it inside herself while it's still in the mouth of said statuesque Aryan man. An unhinged universe populated by philistine lemming perverts without even the least bit of individuality, Algon is even berated by his best friend for his complaints about love, with Griffin complaining, "That's what your problem is, good buddy. You care, no one else does. You are the one out of step. It's really simple...if you can't beat them, join them." Luckily, in the end, Algon demonstrates his sophisticated carnal knowledge to such an otherworldly degree that debauched dame Diana agrees to do 'anything' for him, including the unthinkable; loving him like a real human being.

Despite being a super sleazy piece of aberrosexual pornography featuring some of the most degenerate, ludicrously unappealing porn stars of its era, The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue ultimately has a 'moral' message as a work that champions making love over loveless sex and even satires the sort of trendy liberal ideals that inspire naive boys and girls to go to third world hellholes like the Congo for some non-profit organization. Set in a world where there is no real love, the nuclear family has been nuked, virtually all the men are ugly, physically pathetic Jews and where the women are brainwashed by a post-culture-culture/feminist view of sex, and senseless hedonism for hedonism's sake is the only thing that is strove for, The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue is undoubtedly more thematically relevant today than when it was released over some three decades ago. Sleaze duce Gerard Damiano followed up the film with an innately worthless and unworthy shot-on-video sequel entitled Return to Alpha Blue (1984) that of course does not feature lady Lysa Thatcher and has less of a sci-fi essence than Godard's Alphaville (1965). Rather bizarrely, The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue seems like it was made to mock the very same people that it was made by, as if Damiano was attempting the same sort of 'anti-erotic' erotica that Jonas Middleton (Illusion of a Lady, Through the Looking Glass) and Stephen Sayadian aka 'Rinse Dream' (Café Flesh, Dr. Caligari) pioneered, but decided to take a less mystifying and more literal approach, even opting to cast some of the most repugnant porn stars of all time (indeed, Lysa Thatcher certainly seems out of place in this putrid planet). Aside from featuring the uniquely unlikeable likes of Herschel Savage and Annie Sprinkle, The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue also features the ever annoying untermensch trainweck that is white trash wonder Sharon Mitchell who, in the documentary Kamikaze Hearts (1986), demonstrated her erratic relationship with heroin and butch blonde chicks. If nothing else, The Satisfiers of Alpha Blue is an ugly film about mostly ugly people and mostly ugly sex acts in a cardboard cutout science fiction pandemonium of infantile scatological pleasure that ultimately offers more thrills and food-for-thought than Ridley Scott's big plastic celluloid dildo Prometheus (2012).

Gerd Reda (2013)

Somewhat understandably considering most white males don't even have the testicular fortitude to stop their countries from being colonized by the global south and turned into third world shitholes, let alone stop their sisters and daughters from being defiled by the untermenschen, cuckoldry and submissiveness has become quite vogue in the United States and especially Europe over the past decade or so, so it certainly does not surprise me that a German filmmaker would make a film featuring a dude being raped in the ass and mouth by members of a decidedly deranged feminist terrorist cult sporting strap-on dildos and fetishistic white vinyl suits. Indeed, such is the unsavory scenario that plays out in the 13-minute German 'torture-art-porn' short Herrmann (2013) directed by film critic turned filmmaker Gerd Reda, who writes for a film review site called Splatting Image and has worked on numerous films by Teutonic splatter anti-maestro Olaf Ittenbach (Legion of the Dead, Garden of Love) and other directors in various capacities, including as a lighting technician, key grip, and gaffer. A sort of spin-off film for the director's dream project, the short and its history were described by Reda in 2013 as follows: "In 2011, I wrote the screenplay for a feature film called FRAU MUSTERMANN. Kommando Frau Mustermann is a terrorist organization comprised of four women who kidnap, rape, and then free the men they have captured. The feature is set on the day of the kidnapping of the last victim. Cabin fever has grown amongst the women and thus conflicts ensue. The short HERRMANN is not a truncated version of the feature, but a spin-off. The story concerns the kidnapping of the third victim, Herrmann." While normally I would question the sanity and sexuality of a mensch who makes films featuring men being anally and orally pillaged by crazed cunts who probably fried their brains after one-too-many communal readings of Warhol's failed assassin Valerie Solanas' hilarious SCUM Manifesto (1968) and the hysterical scribbling of morbidly obese Hebraic dyke Andrea Dworkin, Herrmann is notable for the fact that the male rape victim is an over-the-hill far-leftist family man and arm-chair revolutionary who apparently sexually ravaged a couple of girls in between 'raging against the machine' (i.e. handing out pointless pamphlets to people that don't give a shit about them and holding impotent protests against an imagined fascist super-state). While auteur Reda devotes most of his film writings to marvelously misogynistic S&M-themed Japanese films, especially of the 'Pinku eiga' variety, his debut short is certainly of a more masochistically misandristic nature to the point of aesthetic terrorism as a work that would certainly traumatize more faint of heart viewers while at the same time being the ultimate delight to the male cuckold. Indeed, as much as I hate psychopathic Zionist hack Eli Roth and his innately anti-European post-Auschwitz Hostel swill, Herrmann is certainly not the answer to his work as far as so-called 'torture porn' is concerned, though it is not a complete waste.

Opening with a seemingly nostalgic and sentimental credit sequence montage featuring stylized vintage still photographs of punk concerts and punks, including the eponymous protagonist (Andreas Berg) sporting a Black Flag t-shirt, juxtaposed with a melodically melancholy song by superlatively wimpy American experimental post-punk group Xiu Xiu, Herrmann initially seems like it is going to be some sort of intolerably generic punk drama made for pseudo-rebellious middle schoolers and stupid little girls that worship punk rock star cock, but of course the film eventually changes its tone fairly quickly and quite dramatically after a couple minutes of banal bourgeois drama. After the opening credit sequence, the viewer is transported to 'protagonist' Herrmann's home where he and his wife Tina (Martina Ysker) tuck their small son into bed. Herrmann and Tina seem to have a nice little bourgeois family, but for whatever reason, the husband cannot seem to get over his love of the punk scene and 'revolutionary' left-wing politics despite the fact that he is bordering on middle-age and has quite the conspicuous receding hairline and is nowhere near as cool as a Andreas Baader or even a Holger Meins. When Herrmann declares, "I have to go now. 'Revolution' is calling," to let his wifey know that he is leaving to hang out with his fellow far-left man-child comrades, Tina complains, "Can't your group save the world without you? Not even once?" in a half-serious fashion. When Herrmann asks her why he should not go, Tina reminds him that she is ovulating, as the two assumedly plan to have another child together. Of course, little does Tina realize that her husband is the only one that will be buggered that night. After promising to be back home that night at 11pm, Herrmann leaves his home to meet with his comrades, but after only walking a couple dozen feet or so, he is knocked unconscious with a stun gun and kidnapped by two masked young women with uniquely unsavory intentions.

When Herrmann awakes from his temporarily artificially-induced slumber, he finds himself unclad and strapped to a table in an awkward position in a small bright white room that seems like a prison cell in some kind of dystopian Teutonic nuthouse straight out of Fassbinder's Welt am Draht (1973) aka World on a Wire. Herrmann's mouth has also been forced open via a metal dental device as if someone plans to shove something large inside of it. Before Herrmann knows it, two lanky long-legged women (Katinka Maché and Stephanie Reinhardt) sporting featureless white masks, black bob haircut style wigs, large black strap-on dildos, white vinyl dominatrix-like outfits, and black high heels walk into the room and one of the women proceeds to brutally swing a baseball bat at his rather bony bitch boy arm. From there, one of the sinister she-bitches shoves her strap-on in Herrmann's mouth and the other sticks hers in his seemingly virginal bung-hole and the two proceed to hatefully defile the protagonist's fleshy orifices while staring at each other in a knowing fashion of crazed cuntcentric camaraderie. While being mouth and ass fucked into oblivion, Herrmann thinks of his sleeping and son and past fragments from that night as they flash in his mind in an ADD-esque collage. When the two loony ladies finish hate-fucking the unlucky fellow, one of them knocks the protagonist out after injecting something into his back in a rather forceful fashion. When Herrmann finally wakes up, he finds one of his hands handcuffed to the same table he was just fucked on in front of a camcorder on a tripod. From there, the girls film him reading the following agitprop script: "Enough is enough. No forgiving! No forgetting! There is no statute of limitations for sexual violence. Men shall no longer feel safe: Neither at work, nor at home, and certainly not within their family environment. From now on they also have the right to lifelong fear and trauma. And I am not here by coincidence. I am an offender. I am well-known, but have never been punished." Indeed, as it turns out, despite being some sort of old school far-leftist 'social justice warrior,' Herrmann is some sort of pernicious pussy pillager and the girls have decided to take out their pernicious post-Solanas brand of penis envy on him. After taking a Polaroid of their prisoner, the girls drop off Herrmann in an abandoned park. In the end, one of the girls makes the following threat to the viewer: "You will hear from us. Those who don't will get to feel. Don't be afraid: You will survive. So did we." Somewhat humorously, the end credits of the film feature another song by Xiu Xiu.

Somewhat notably, the introduction page for the official website for Herrmann reads: "Drawing a thick red line from Art House to Exploitation." Indeed, in its curious combining of of highly stylized artsy fartsy aesthetics with violent hate-filled (anti)sexual imagery, the film certainly qualifies as artsploitation in the spirit of Nacho Cerdà's "Trilogy of Death" (Awakening, Aftermath, Genesis), Mitch Davis' Divided Into Zero (1999), Karim Hussain's Subconscious Cruelty (2000), Andrey Iskanov's Philosophy of a Knife (2008), and Marian's Dora's Cannibal (2006), but it certainly lacks the dark and distinctly Teutonic romanticism of aberrant-garde maestro Jörg Buttgerit (NEKRomantik, Der Todesking), which is somewhat odd considering a reproduction poster of the great 1890 painting "Lucifer" by German Symbolist painter Franz von Stuck is featured on the wall of the home of the titular protagonist (it might just me, but from my experience, I see it as rather unlikely that a nearly middle-aged far-leftist punk poser would be a fan of von Stuck's work). Needless to say, I was not surprised to discover that director Gerd Reda has written extensively on the work of Spanish artsploitation auteur Agustí Villaronga (In a Glass Cage, El mar aka The Sea) after watching Herrmann. In terms of socio-political messages, you would have to be somewhat unhinged to take the film seriously, as it is about as subtextually intricate and sophisticated as a Pussy Riot PR stunt or an American Hebraic businessman-backed pseudo-feminist Femen titty show. In short, Herrmann is about as subtle as Andrea Dworkin's farts after an all-nighter at a non-kosher Mexican buffet. Indeed, as much as I like seeing poser left-wing revolutionaries being gang-raped by unhinged feminist sexual terrorists who make old Germanic feminist filmmaker hags like Margarethe von Trotta, Helke Sander, and Valie Export seem sane by comparison, I have my doubts about auteur Gerd Reda's proposed feature Frau Mußermann, as the last place I want to be is around a sect of psychotic misandrists who somehow think bugging beta-males with fake dicks will help them get over their deep-seated daddy issues. Undoubtedly, the last thing the film world needs is more Lisbeth Salanders. Indeed, maybe Reda should re-watch some of those Jap pink films he likes so much and reconsider the 'gender equality' of his films. Of course, like with most of the rest of Europe, rapes, like most other violent crimes, are overwhelmingly committed by foreigners, especially of the brown Muslim sort, but I will give Herrmann credit in that it exposes the fact that many beta-males join punk scenes (rather unfortunately, I know this from experience), as well as left-wing and feminist groups, as a pathetic means to procure pussy, with the eponymous protagonist of the short probably taking advantage of naive teenage girls after getting them good and drunk at shitty punk shows. Indeed, if one learns anything from watching Reda's film aside from the the director seeming to have female-on-male rape and strap-on dildo fetishes and that women make fairly pathetic rapists (indeed, the two latex ladies' thrusts make those of Michael Jackson seem like the height of rampantly heterosexual masculinity), it is that weak left-wing punk pansies are just as likely to rape chicks as drunken frat boys.

Gilberto Martínez Solares (1975)

It's truly saddening to see such masterpieces of cinema sunk to such obscure depths. Haydn Keenan's Australian black comedy, Pandemonium (1988), is officially now one of the most bizarre excursions in silliness that I have ever been pleased to witness. The plot(s) develop as such - A girl thrown to the dingoes is instead raised by them only to return after all those years to Sydney in search for her betrayers. In case you're not up to speed with Australian news considered legend, this happenstance is based on Azaria Chamberlain's disappearance which inspired the phrase done to death by pop culture - "The dingoes ate my baby!" Upon finding the mansion of her parents, many crazy events begin to unfold including but not limited to: a four foot tall Hitler and his 2 dyke-Reich assistants, a mad doctor inspired by Frankenstein and his zombie henchman, and an end-of-the-world scenario. All this in what I would refer to as an incestuous affair between Saban's short lived Beetleborgs and The Rocky Horror Picture Show without lyrics. Starring David Argue with an accent permanently reflecting a sense of achievement and Playboy model Amanda Dole, who is topless for more than half the film, Pandemonium is criminally panned the world over for not making a lick of sense. But you see, that's just where the magic comes in.

Hitler getting a handjob to spread the perfect seed Pandemonium earns its chips with its bizarro nature of religious and political satire, as sharp and esoteric as humor towards a non-Australian citizen can get. Pandemonium not only breaks every rule cinema ever set in stone but incites a riot in which to vandalize every standard with its crude and intelligent message. This atrocity can only be the work of some surreal, anarchic infection left behind by the assault of nonsensical hi-jinx. Once the gorgeous "Dingo girl" arrives at the place of residency, several characters bumble directly into her path, which ignites pagan sacrifices, forced surrogacy in order to create a new strain of Aryans, and a caveman with "animal magnetism". If I could compare the frenzied manner of Pandemonium to any sense of reality, it would be to compare the images projected on screen to having your brain inserted into a pinball machine. Maintaining its absurd composure is one thing Pandemonium does best. Only in the last 15 minutes of runtime does the film show any hints of slowing down. But for what it's worth, the endless barrage of the incredibly lovely Amanda Dole's breasts leaves a feeling of euphoria spread evenly over every hormone. You will never be able to take your eyes off them - the real stars of Pandemonium.

It's a damn shame that films as critically developed and ripe with insanity as Pandemonium remain impossible to find. Only through VSoM (Video Search of Miami) are you able to order a copy, that or rare video traders. DVD companies like Severin Films give me hope for Ozploitation to appear in American markets though. The prime exploitation label currently, Severin has given sight to many genre classics such as Stone, another piece of Australian history. Director Haydn Keenan might be either a cinematic genius or an absolute loon. The effects of Pandemonium are exactly what the title implies. So many characters, juggling many horror legends, from vampires to mummies, are introduced throughout with little reason other than the further the adventures of the messianic Dingo girl and her obsessive would-be lover, Kales Leadingham. After consummating with God in the guise of a jazzy Negro, the Dingo girl is reborn in a true tale of Christian fiction, as believable as any other book of Christ. My current state renders me damn near a blubbering idiot. The psychotropic adventures of Pandemonium have overloaded my senses to the point of indistinguishable. I don't think I could ever tire of Pandemonium as a single scene features many deranged, madcap happenings all at once, leaving much lost during the initial viewing. You will observe the mania relapse to the point of coaxing you to rewatch the film, picking up on more maladjustments in a purely meta fashion. I have no idea what I had just watched but I assure you that like me, you will enjoy every panicked and blasphemous minute of it. If you're brave enough, you can purchase the film here.

L' APPARTEMENT

Gilles Mimouni (1996)

In the immensely frustrated state that I am currently delving in, one might tell me to relax or take a load off. Instead, I chose to go forward with writing about the most rewardingly frustrating film that I have ever seen called L' Appartement. Now we've all encountered a film called Wicker Park. Chances are that you've stumbled upon this hipster insta-classic at your local video rental chain or even caught it in theaters. If it's not ringing a bell, it's that one "artistic" film starring heart throb Josh Hartnett. Perhaps this film could be described as one of the early mainstream indie films. Now, for the uneducated, Wicker Park is an exercise in shot-by-shot remakes - One of the early ones too. The original film is a little ditty called L' Appartement. In case you've been in a sheltered American life, this obviously is translated into The Apartment. Which in case is our main setting and where most of the drama unfolds. The story concerns Max, a playboy who is engaged to someone who doesn't matter. He recalls an old flame named Lisa who he encounters after her strange disappearance. From this event, Max spirals into a deadly web of obsession. L' Appartement is a drama of the fiercest kind. When making a genre addition to the drama section, it's inevitable to include some form of love, whether post-humous or a love of an inanimate kind. Gilles Mimouni has infused a style that breathes life into the instinct to pick a perfect mate rather than one that you might lust over. He stares the myth of love dead in the face and challenges any preconceived notion you'd have on the subject. Vincent Cassel happens to be one of my only cinematic vices. If he releases a film, I immediately must view it multiple times and process every movement he makes on film. After seeing this film, I feel obliged to leave this film alone and never watch it again. Before this comes off as some bad review, I must say that this film had a very advanced cinema disease attached to it that I will call Motion Picture Frustration. For example, I am a hip-hop and rap fan, particularly old school N.W.A. and Sugar Hill Gang. When I had first seen (unbearably) Are We There Yet?, I almost ripped my teeth out watching one of the original gangsters being exploited by a couple of little annoying niglets. Watching L' Appartement for the first and only time could be the equivalent to having my teeth and brain ground down to a liquid powder and snorted by an obese geek. If you've seen Wicker Park and not the original like so many others have, You will be surprised by the almost nihilistic outcome of this film. I could list reasons as to why this film hugely differs other than the annoying Matt Lillard as a sidekick, but truth be told, I want you to be horrifically surprised like I was. L' Appartement is a godsend in romance films. It is a film that will make you challenge any tall-tale of happily ever after. I blame a friend, Derek, for making me watch this film. L' Appartement is the film to end all films. It will make you laugh with coyish delight as Cassel awkwardly stumbles across every visually striking set with enough on screen fervor to light a match. Together with future wife Monica Belluci, they single-handedly create the most mindfuck of a film ever invented next to Sion Sono's Strange Circus. Both of these films were viewed at horrible times, which only strengthens the mood. Fuck, I need a real vacation.

THE NIGHT OF THE DEVILS

Giorgio Ferroni (1972)

Indubitably, no Halloween is complete without at least watching one Guido horror flick, preferably of the vintage Gothic sort, whether it be a cultivated Golden Age classic from Mario Bava like Black Sunday (1960) or one of Godfather of Gore Lucio Fulci's gorgeously grotesque pseudo-American films like The House by the Cemetery (1981). Indeed, like the krauts long before them during the German expressionist period, Italians certainly know how to bring art, atmosphere, angst, and foreboding anticipation to a typically disposable genre that prides itself on cheap thrills, senseless sensationalism, and soulless sex, among other things. While any self-respecting Italian horror fan knows the works of Mario and Lamberto Bava, Lucio Fulci, Dario Argento, Ruggero Deodato, and Michele Soavi, as well as the strikingly less talented exploitation filmmakers like exploitation-oriented pornographer Joe D'Amato and Umberto 'Cannibal Ferox' Lenzi, some rather talented wop filmmakers have been inexplicably forgotten, with Giorgio Ferroni (Calvin Jackson Padget aka Calvin J. Padget) being a perfect example, which might partially have to do with the fact that his formative years were spent working for a now less than fashionable authoritarian regime that fashionable Guido commie filmmakers of the late 1960s and early 1970s like Bernardo Bertolucci and Pier Paolo Pasolini would most certainly disapprove of. Notably, Ferroni got his start in filmmaking during the fascist period when he made Mussolini-sanctioned documentaries and pro-war propaganda films like The Thrill of the Skies (1940) aka Lebbrezza del cielo, which is about a group of young pilots who construct a glider, travel to Spain during the Spanish Civil War, kick ass for Franco, and come home to receive warm receptions by the populous of their home city of Asiago due to their heroic Bolshevik-bombing efforts. After World War II, Ferroni temporarily dabbled in neorealism before working in swords-and-sandals films and finding some commercial success in a series of spaghetti westerns he directed starring Giuliano Gemma, but he is best remembered today, if at all, for two rather aesthetically pleasing and absurdly atmospheric gothic horror flicks, Mill of the Stone Women (1960) aka Il mulino delle donne di pietra and his penultimate work The Night of the Devils (1972) aka La notte dei diavoli, with the latter being my personal favorite of the two.

Only available in bootleg form in the United States and most of the rest of the world until relatively recently when it was released by the Italian label RaroVideo on DVD and Blu-ray in 2013, The Night of the Devils is an almost-avant-garde vampire flick revolving around a man who becomes more or less insane after encountering a peasant that is haunted by a vampire-witch hybrid with the plot being partly based on the Gothic novella The Family of the Vourdalak (1884) aka The Wurdulak by Russian poet/novelist Aleksey Konstantinovich Tolstoy (not to be confused with Leo Tolstoy, who was the novelist's second cousin). Of course, Ferroni updated the story, adding gore and other grotesque imagery, bushy goombah beavers, horrendous 1970s wardrobes and haircuts, and even hallucinogen-inspired psychedelic imagery. Featuring a nonlinear narrative structure that would give Quentin Tarantino an even bigger hard-on than tall Nordic women's large feet and featuring an eerie and highly complementary original musical score by one-time Michelangelo Antonioni composer Giorgio Gaslini (La Notte, Deep Red), The Night of the Devils is an unequivocally unjustly forgotten masterpiece of Guido horror that reminds one why Italians were most certainly the true masters of European, and largely international, horror during the post-WWII era.

Opening with a psychedelic red and turquoise title screen comparable to that of Juan López Moctezuma's The Mansion of Madness (1973) and set to the strangely melodic yet haunting sounds of Gaslini, The Night of the Devils then cuts to the lead protagonist Nicola (Gianni Garko, who is best known as the eponymous protagonist of the countless Sartana spaghetti westerns and who also starred in Gillo Pontecorvo's 1960 proto-Holocaust classic Kapò), who is all bloody and broken, collapsing in the countryside, and from there a hallucinatory dream-sequence proceeds that includes a skull with maggots crawling in its eye socket, a faceless man feeling the mighty bush and ample bosoms of a faceless woman, a man having his face blown off with a shotgun, and two sinister dudes sporting cloaks and skull masks performing a seemingly Satanic ritual on an unclad babe inside a jail cell. From there, the viewer learns that Nicola is institutionalized and the doctors cannot figure out who he is or where he came from because he is either a mute, simply refuses to talk, or has lost the ability to speak due to fear, with the latter ultimately being the reason for the character's unnerving speechlessness. Meanwhile, a beautiful young redhead named Sdenka (Agoština Belli of Edward Dmytryk and Luciano Sacripanti's curious 1972 cult item Bluebeard and Dino Risi's The Career of a Chambermaid (1976)) arrives at the loony bin and reveals to the head doctor that Nicola is a lumber importer who she met a week ago and swooned over. When Nicola sees Sdenka and she warmly states "it's me...it's your Sdenka," he becomes so gripped by fear and panic that he manages to escape the grasp of two orderlies and runs away despite the fact he is wearing a straightjacket. Not long after Nicola is strapped to a hospital bed and given a sedative, Sdenka magically disappears from the hospital without a trace, though she leaves behind an empty purse (why she does this is never answered). From there, the film flashes back to the weekend before and depicts how Nicola went from being a suave, super bourgeois businessman to a semi-vegetable that lives in a permanent state of fear.

While heading to the Yugoslavian border in his luxury automobile, Nicola almost hits a stunning young dame, but manages to swerve his car out of the way at the last minute, thus causing him to crash. With his car out of commission, Nicola heads through the woods where he encounters gigantic black hogs but not a single person, not even the mysterious woman that he almost hit, though a seemingly unsavory hick named Jovan (Roberto Maldera) sees him. Jovan and his equally uneasy and seemingly haunted 'father' Gorca Ciuelak (Bill Vanders of Luchino Visconti's 1969 high-camp Third Reich melodrama The Damned and Lucio Fulci's 1969 erotic pre-giallo Perversion Story aka Una sull'altra) are burying the latter's forsaken brother whose body is wrapped in a blood-soaked white sheet. Gorca eventually tracks Nicola down, tells him about his dead brother, and warns him to stay out of the woods, especially after dark, and offers him room and board at his house. When Nicola enters the seemingly ancient Ciuelak home, he is taken aback by the fact that the family members immediately board up their windows and doors and seem to be hiding some imperative fact from him. While eating dinner with the family, Jovan comes down and explains to Nicola that he has training as a mechanic and will help him fix his car the next day. At dinner, Nicola also meets lovely Sdenka, the same girl who caused him to crash his car and will become a figure of demonic torment for him only a week later. As it turns out, Jovan has been carrying on a secret affair with his father's dead brother's wife Elena (Teresa Gimpera Víctor Erice's masterpiece The Spirit of the Beehive (1973) aka El espíritu de la colmena). It is also revealed when Jovan and Gorca talk in secret that a centuries old curse plagues the family involving a woods witch (Maria Monti of Massimo Dallamano's masterful 1972 What Have You Done to Solange? and Bernardo Bertolucci's 1976 botched comsymp epic 1900 aka Novecento) who kills people and turns them into flesh-eating vampire-zombies that have a thirst primarily for their own loved ones.

The next day, patriarch Gorca decides to go end the family curse for once and all by driving a super large stake through the witch bitch's cold black heart, but his son Jovan warns him that he could destroy the entire family and that if he does not get back by 6 pm, he will personally drive a stake through his heart. While talking to one of Elena's prepubescent daughters, Nicola learns about the family curse and Gorca's plan to end it by killing the witch, who sleeps in a barn and resembles a black magic-inclined gypsy zombie. While Gorca comes back home early with proof of his success in the form of a dismembered human hand wrapped inside a gypsy-style scarf, things are much darker than they seem. When he sees someone lurking outside near the window of the children's room that night and alerts Jovan, he accuses the guest of drinking too much Euro-hick moonshine. That night, Nicola consummates his lurid love affair with Sdenka in what will ultimately be the first and last time they make love. The next day, Jovan fixes Nicola's car and everything seems to be looking up, at least until Elena's daughter reveals that Gorca has taken her sister Irina (Cinzia De Carolis of Argento's 1971 flick The Cat o' Nine Tails and Antonio Margheriti's 1980 flick Cannibal Apocalypse) into the woods. As it turns out, Gorca was indeed turned into one of the undead zombie-vampire beasts and only pretended to have killed the witch while under the spell of said bitch witch. When Gorca gets back without Irina, he rips off the old man's shirt and reveals that his chest is rotted out, so the prodigal son drives a stake into his undead daddy's heart just as Nicola walks in. Nicola tries to stop Jovan, but he is too late and is soon all the more horrified when he sees Gorca's face cave in and completely rot within seconds, thus revealing that he is not quite human. That night Elena finds her daughter Irina but the little girl is now an undead ghoul and soon takes a bite out of her mom's neck, rips off her shirt, and claws at her tender tits as if she is on the brink of performing some atavistic breastfeeding routine.

Meanwhile, Nicola has already left the woods to pick up his lumber, but he decides to stop by a Catholic church where he talks to a disgraced military man named Brigadier Kovachich who reveals to him regarding the creatures that have cursed his beloved Sdenka's family that they are, "incorporeal material creatures. Something like the notes of [...] music. It's the terror of silence on which they feed, the terror of loneliness. They kill others primarily because they want company, especially those persons they happened to be in love with. And their victims search for their own company. A never-ending chain of death unless one can break a link." Needless to say, Nicola heads back to the woods to save his darling forest nymph Nicola, but when he sees her and notices blood on her neck, he assumes the worst. After Sdenka reveals that Elena has turned the rest of the family into flesh-eaters in what is ultimately one fucked up family affair, Nicola decides to make a run for it, but he once again wrecks his car. Of course, members of the extended zombie-vampire family take turns clawing at Nicola and he manages to kill them off one-by-one in rather grotesque ways. Flash forward a week later and Sdenka visits him one night in his room at the nut ward. Naturally, Nicola runs for his life and manages to dispose of his straightjacket in the process. When Sdenka finally finds him and corners him in a cremation room while declaring her undying love, Nicola arms himself with a large metal rod and proceeds to impale her with it. Ultimately, The Night of the Devils ends rather cynically and makes the viewer wonder whether Nicola took one-too-many hits of acid and suffered from sort of mental break.

If an intemperate Hightalian with a love of big bushes, psychedelic drugs, and Victorian gothic horror attempted to remake Sam Raimi's The Evil Dead (1981) in the Italian countryside, albeit minus the neo-vaudevillian Semitic slapstick routines, it might begin to describe the marvelously macabre majesty of Ferroni's unfortunately unsung horror masterpiece The Night of the Devils. Indeed, while it might seem far-fetched considering the obscurity of the film in the United States, it is hard for me to believe that Raimi did not see Ferroni's film and use it as a sort of embryonic blueprint for The Evil Dead. Notably, horror maestro Mario Bava was the first to adapt Tolstoy's novella as the second segment of his classic Gothic omnibus film Black Sabbath (1963) aka I tre volti della paura starring Boris Karloff, Susy Andersen, and Mark Damon, but it is not nearly as penetrating, subversive, and idiosyncratic, though it is certainly a classic piece of creepy gothic guido celluloid in its own right. Indeed, it is a work created during the intermediate period of Italian horror after the influence of Bava and before the rise of Pier Paolo Pasolini's (in)famous arthouse shocker Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) and the unwaveringly brutal ultra-violent and nihilistic works of genre extremists like Fulci and Deodato. The only film that I think is even remotely comparable to Ferroni's fetishistic piece of foul filmic flesh is Elio Petri's counter-culture-tinged quasi-avant-garde (anti)ghost story A Quiet Place in the Country (1968) aka Un tranquillo posto di campagna starring Franco Nero and Vanessa Redgrave, as both films are semi-experimental and somewhat sensual works that are set in a haunting rural environment and center around a blonde Nordic-like Guido who loses his sanity after encountering feminine supernatural elements. The Night of the Devils is also notable for being a rare masterful piece of Italian (anti)folk horror. Despite being directed by a lapsed fascist filmmaker, Ferroni's film depicts a depopulated wasteland in which its handful of survivors are so hopelessly backwards that they do not know what television is, do not own phones or cars, engage in quasi-incest, and blame all their troubles on their seemingly perennial work unions and mega-bitchy wood-dwelling witches, with the inter-familial bloodsucking being of both the literal and figurative sort. Needless to say, The Night of the Devils is a cynical, pessimistic, and deranging work that manages to capture the spirit of its zeitgeist in a seamless and subtle esoteric sort of way that is anything but polemical and unsurprisingly directed by a man who lived through the fascist era to see Italy degenerate into a virtual overseas brothel of America and a socially chaotic nation on the brink of civil war as agitated by student revolutionaries and Marxist terrorists. Arguably more so than the arthouse works of enfant terrible arthouse auteurs like Pasolini, Bertolucci, and Bellocchio, 1970s goombah horror flicks act as a sort of exaggerated primal expression of the Guido volksgeist. After all, what better way to reach the so-called proletariat than the innately irrational horror genre?!

ANGEL

Giorgos Katakouzinis (1982)

Greece is not exactly known for its film industry, especially of the ostensibly homicidal homoerotic sort, so when Angel (1982) aka Angelos directed by Giorgos Katakouzinis (Apousies, Zoe) – a fierce fag flick featuring a Hellenic homo Norman Bates of sorts who has no qualms about sporting a dress in public – was released, it was quite a big deal and strangely one of the country's biggest commercial successes, being "seen by almost one Greek in twenty" (according to American DVD distributor Water Bearer Films), and was played at a number of Gay Film Festivals and even swept the awards at the Salonika Film Festival and was also well received at Cannes, but not everyone was happy, especially due to its less than flattering portrayal of proletarian Greek gaydom. Described by Raymond Murray in Images in the Dark: An Encyclopedia of Gay and Lesbian Film and Video (1994) as being, "From the 'Tis a pity he's a homosexual' school of filmmaking," as if William Friedkin had time in between directing mostly 2nd-rate thrillers to teach Greeks the proper way to portray perplexed poofs, Angel is the sort of somber and seedy sort of harrowingly hysterical melodrama that has the potential to drive certain viewers to suicide, especially those whose fathers rather be dead than have a debauched son who downs dicks and/or plays wide receiver on the pink team. Sometimes seen as the Greek equivalent of German New Cinema master of melodrama Rainer Werner Fassbinder's highly personal auteur piece In a Year of 13 Moons (1978) aka In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden – a painfully penetrating film inspired by the director's lover's suicide – Angel is no more of a merry, but certainly an equally metaphysically malignant work, albeit an innately inferior one. Like In a Year of 13 Moons, Angel centers around a lonely, low-spirited lad from an irreparably broken background who finds himself cross-dressing (although the character of Katakouzinis' film does not go as far as mutilating his meat) so as to please his sadistic love interest, only to discover that love does not always conquer all, especially when the callous corruption of the soul is involved. For those that even wondered why the slasher sodomite of William Friedkin's homo-hated homicidal homo work Cruising (1980) was driven to drive more than just his phallus into fellow members of the flaming fag club, Angel might offer some memorable, if not mostly miserable and melancholy, answers.

Athenian aberrosexual Angel (Michalis Maniatis) leads a rather pathetic and increasingly perturbing life and his only source of solace – being buggered by ugly bum-like bozos in public parks in the dark – is a totally illegal one, so naturally the young Mediterranean man is best friends with misery and even misanthropy, even if his blank stare hides his most dark and daunting thoughts. Having a belligerent bindle boozier for a father (Vasilis Tsaglos), a hardworking masochist for a mother (Katerina Helmy) who guts chickens for a living, a retarded sister with cerebral palsy, and an ex-prostitute grandmother who nostalgically remembers the good old days when, “our daughters spread their legs for a cup of olive oil,” Angel has a lot more problems than just being a hapless homo who hopelessly longs to find a fatherly Mr. Right as poverty is especially unkind to the pathologically perverse poofter. Things only get all the more dreadful for exceedingly effeminate Angel when he is drafted into the Greek army; a place where patent pansies do not fare well. When Angel finally meets and starts a relationship with a macho, mustachioed sailor who could have easily been a character in fag frog novelist Jean Genet’s novel Querelle of Brest (1947) named Mikhalis (Dionysis Xanthos) who acts as a hunky husband to the bashful gay boy, things start looking up for the fairy fellow. Determined to make Angel his 24/7 bitch boy, martially manipulative Mikhalis makes his sensitive sweetheart dress in frisky female drag and sell his body as a flaming tranny flesh peddler. Needless to say, Angel has a bit of trouble juggling his damning and daunting dual career as a secret sodomite soldier and a chick with a dick who reluctantly turns tricks for the depraved dudes into dudes with dicks. When Angel is busted giving a blowjob while working his naughty night job, his contradictory life as a poorly paid cocksucker and military man is finally exposed, thereupon leading to his inevitable expulsion from the army, and hostility and heartbreak from his family at home. While Angel is less than happy when an unpleasant policeman tells him, “I spit on you...A soldier and a fag,” his depression and degradation reaches an all time low when his deadbeat drunk of a dad hysterically cries, “My son is a fag!...How can I face the neighbors?!” and “I’ll kill myself.” Indeed, while Angel’s dad is certainly an alcoholic asshole, he is also a man of his words because not only does he beat his own head into a bloody pulp, but he also commits self-slaughter by passionately penetrating his own large gut with a pair of scissors in front of his wife, disabled daughter, and sack-less sacrilegious son. Needless to say, life as he knows it becomes less and less fun for the fragile flamer Angel and he starts to get stranger and stranger to the point of total debasement and deadly derangement.

Near the conclusion of Angel, Angel – who was ruthlessly raped the night before by an eco-unfriendly garbageman who delights in anally traumatizing young twinkles – wakes to find himself with his mascara smeared and his wig gone, surrounded by mountains of trash in a junkyard. Like many of the characters featured in Angel, the poofter protagonist – due to his devastating upbringing and undignified lot in life – is ultimately no more valuable than the garbage dump he eventually ends up in or so the film insinuates, hence why it seems that the majority of (mostly gay) reviewers of the strikingly sullied cinematic work regard it as, ‘homophobic.’ More than a tragic, albeit trashy, film about the protagonist’s sexual persuasion, Angel is a film about a totally degenerated nation where public fudge-packing is the least of its more overwhelming problems, which are more likely the result of some less than humble but certainly horny Turk raping their great-great-great-great-great grandmother, especially considering that Greek kultur was at its height when it was all too common for elder men to bugger young boys in a manner that would give Oscar Wilde joy, albeit with one of the men (like Angel of the film) taking on the role of the passive partner. Of course, with the legalization of male prostitution in Greece in 2006, men like Angel no longer have to worry about being busted by the police for literally busting their asses. If Angel and the legalization of salaried streetwalking are any real indication of Greece's seemingly metaphysically greasy soul, it is no wonder that 'far-right' nationalist political parties like Golden Dawn, which currently has 18 seats in the Hellenic Parliament, are growing quite popular in the EU's most impoverished nation. Call me crazy, but I do not think a country is on the road to success when men are better at passively bending over while wearing a dress than they are at climbing walls in boot camp.

Giorgos Noutsias (2005)

Evil (To Kako) is a rare breed of horror - Greek horror. Greece hasn't seen a decent horror film since Island of Death (To my knowledge). Evil takes the very overdone (and ignorant) story of a group of survivors trapped in a zombie apocalypse (Cue the mc chris fans). What allows this film to shine aloud, more so than the fluff, is the violence, incredible characters, and effective DIY camera work including skilled editing. Think of that horrible, horrible film Automaton Transfusion, except entertaining and ambitious. The characters are obviously the blissful creation of a hivemind AKA Yorgos Noutsias. With character progression being "the geographic gradation of expression of specific characters over the range of distribution of a race or species", it's easy to notice the careful steps taken to slide in humor, tragedy, and restlessness within each scenario as seen by a specific survivor. Lovable and enticing characters each with a horrific demise, if fate should see it that way. I once saw this film in a fantastic media shop in Philadelphia christened Long in the Tooth. I was perusing through the volumes of obscure films and I found 3 titles of interest and they were Strange Circus, The Coffin Joe trilogy, and a zombie film called Evil. Two of these were from the divine Danger After Dark collection but I wasn't chancing a blind buy, after all, Sion Sono is a name I can trust. I don't regret not purchasing it then due to the extremities and polar shifts that Coffin Joe and Strange Circus performed on me, but I always adored the DVD illustration by a Mr. Michael Bukowski. Eye-popping, colorful, and savage. What Yorgos Noutsias has distilled upon the horror market isn't a vain attempt to "recreate" another mythos that doesn't need altering. The official job of zombie recreation lied in the hands of Lucio Fulci, who has been as much of a gentleman to lay down instant classics for our starving retinas. The "zombie infection" isn't at all anything zombie like. In the opening scene, An eerie outbreak occurs from a spirit (That heavily reminds me of Ghosts of Mars) that possesses those who unleashed it. Evil carries the foreign torch for the sub-par zombie branch of horror. This isn't the greatest accomplishment but it is an accomplishment and that is more than I could ask for. It has also been revealed that a sequel is in the works starring none other than - Wait for it - Billy Zane. After seeing Zane's underrated film The Mad, it would be a fatal understatement to not exclaim my gratitude. Evil is merciless with a shock ending that raises questions concerning the directors work on a low budget piece. I'm currently listening to Work/Death and I must say that this droning static fits the ideas of this film incredibly well. Evil comes highly recommended.

RITUAL - A PSYCHOMAGIC STORY

Giulia Brazzale (2013)

Chilean-born Renaissance mensch Alejandro Jodorowsky may be Hebraic by blood but his films and persona certainly demonstrate that he has somewhat of a Latin spirit, so I was not all that surprised when I recently learned that he collaborated with some avant-garde guidos on a film. Indeed, the Italian 'metaphysical horror-thriller' Ritual - Una storia psicomagica (2013) aka Ritual - A Psychomagic Story co-directed by first-time feature filmmakers Giulia Brazzale and Luca Immesi was not only influenced by Jodorowsky's autobiographical novel turned film The Dance of Reality and his psychotherapy technique known as 'psychomagic,' but also features the El Topo (1970) director in a small role as the ghost husband of a widowed 'good witch' of sorts. A sort of sadomasochistic arthouse flick that puts special emphasis on savagely sensual tableaux and self-described 'atheist mystic' Jodorowsky's pseudoscientific psychomagic mumbo jumbo, Ritual is part exercise in style and part tribute to the cinematic and spiritual journeys of one of the world's greatest and most eccentric cult filmmakers. There is no question that Italy used to be one of the greatest, if not the greatest, producers of films and auteur filmmakers as the land of Fellini, Pasolini, Rossellini, Antonioni, Visconti, and Bertolucci, among countless others. Likewise, Guidoland was also one of the greatest and most eclectic producers of horror masters ranging from the truly revolutionary pioneer Mario Bava to the artful and surrealist giallos of Dario Argento to the compulsively subversive 'artsploitation' avant-gardists like Giulio Questi and Alberto Cavallone to the gorgeously grotesque celluloid splatter of Lucio Fulci to the unhinged ultra-violence of major misanthrope Ruggero Deodato yet, like with most contemporary cinema in the boot-shaped Mediterranean nation, Italian horror is now a cinematic wasteland that, at best, can only try in vain to compete with old glories. Admittedly, I probably set my expectations absurdly high for Brazzale and Immesi's debut Ritual, as I hoped it would prove to be a sign of a new spark in Italio-horror and would represent a sort of rebirth for the genre in Italy, yet I ultimately was not totally disappointed as the film had enough perverse pulchritude and morbid memorable moments to keep me interested from beginning to end. Most importantly, Ritual—a work that depicts an abusive anti-romance that only gets all the more worse when the female protagonist is forced by her brutal man-child boy toy to get an abortion after unexpectedly getting pregnant—is a work that offers a rather incriminating window into a dying nation with a dwindling indigenous birthrate and an almost completely bankrupt culture. Indeed, aside from possibly Asia Argento with works like Scarlet Diva (2000) and more recently Incompresa (2014) aka Misunderstood and to a lesser extent Paolo Sorrentino with obscenely overrated works like La grande bellezza (2013) aka The Great Beauty, very few Italian filmmakers have dared to depict the dispiriting spirit that has led to Italy becoming something akin to a barely living museum and tourist attraction that relies on the reputation of its great past in the hope of somehow making it into the future. In Ritual, the protagonist and her malevolently misogynistic boyfriend have no future, neither as a couple nor as individuals as they are decidedly damaged individuals whose 'complimentary' flaws ultimately make for a deleterious and completely killer combo of the savagely schizophrenic and superlatively spiritually sick sort. Although it might not exactly explain why things are the way they are in Italy, the film captures a forlorn and forsaken zeitgeist of spiritual and sexual dysfunction where marriage and parenthood are an absurd anachronism, mindless hedonism and self-indulgence are the name of the game, and spirituality is the tool of the senseless or senile.

Ritual begins with something that one might describe as a degenerate 'dating ritual,' as it depicts somewhat young and reasonably beautiful protagonist Lia (played by Désirée Giorgetti, who also appeared in the Jörg Buttgerreit co-directed horror anthology German Angst (2015)) walking around a decadent yet sterile 'modern art' museum while being seemingly stalked by a discernibly unsavory guido in a fancy suit named Viktor (played by Ivan Franek, who appeared in Sorrentino's The Great Beauty), who eventually corners his voluptuous prey in a room projecting an experimental film. As the viewer soon learns, Viktor is actually Lia's bourgeois bad boy boyfriend and he is a staunch sadomasochist who seems to be only able to become sexually aroused when abusing his girlfriend in a variety of verbal and physical ways. Since Lia is a rather atypical Italian chick as a highly neurotic, introverted, and passive dame, Vik the dick has no problem making her his perennial vulnerable victim, thus the couple's sex life is rather active, if a bit one-sided. As a dress designer, Lia has a somewhat artistic sensibility that seems to go hand-in-hand with her discernibly delusional perspective of her relationship with Viktor, who only gives a shit about himself and will do every and anything to get his jollies and that especially includes using his girlfriend as a virtual blowup doll. Viktor oftentimes surprises Lia with random gifts, but that is because he is a scheming psychopath and the items are really for his own amusement as demonstrated by the fact that he mainly gets her BDSM contraptions and sexually revealing clothing. Viktor literally rules over everything Lia does, including what she eats, even force-feeding her sushi even though she cannot stand raw fish. Of course, the more Lia cries and begs for mercy, the more turned on Viktor gets, as he thrives on abuse as if his life depended on it. Not surprisingly, Lia regularly goes to a psychiatrist named Dr. Guerrieri (Cosimo Cinieri), but she adamantly denies that Viktor abuses her or is in any way a problem, even pseudo-proudly proclaiming to the head doc in a rather hysterical way regarding she and her superlatively sadistic beau, "He and I are meant to be together." The progeny of a decidedly deranged mother who she indubitably takes after, Lia was raised by her maternal aunt Agata (Anna Bonasso) and when she was only 9-years-old she suffered a tragic event while at her home as a result of having her first period at such a young age, thus causing her to become convinced that she was literally cursed by the devil, even calling her first menstrual cycle “a curse,” hence her rather bizarre masochistic sexual habits.

Since Viktor is a psychopath, he is always stalking Lia and when he spots her talking with a gay fashion designer named Flavio at a coffee house, he later interrogates her, accuses her of cheating on him, calls her a “slut” repeatedly, bends her over a kitchen table, and more or less rapes her in a pathetic demonstration of his less than potent sexual prowess in an absurdly brief coitus session that lasts less than a mere minute. Assumedly as a result of the quasi-rape or one of their aberrant erotic escapades, Lia becomes pregnant and Viktor predictably responds to the seemingly good news by forcing her to get an abortion that results in the protagonist suffering an ominous nightmare involving her bastard beau performing an abortion on her where he pulls out a bloody log instead of a fetus. Soon after the abortion, Viktor decides to pick up a prostitute with a glaringly fake blonde wig that looks like a cracked out tranny but he ultimately decides to scream in the streetwalker’s face and kick her out of his car instead of paying her for pussy, so he goes back home and is startled to find Lia unresponsive in a bathtub full of blood as a result of a fairly serious suicide attempt. While Lia survives her senseless attempt at self-slaughter as a result of Viktor getting her help, she wisely decides to abruptly leave her boyfriend and move in with her beloved aunt Agata so that she can recover from the trauma caused by having an abortion.

During the first night that she sleeps at her aunt’s large 18th century luxury chateau in the Veneto countryside, Lia wakes up to the sound of a woman singing outside, so she goes outside on her balcony to investigate and spots a beautiful lady that seems to be about the same age as the protagonist. Not only does Lia begin believing that this mysterious woman is a wicked witch, but she also thinks that she has ‘stolen’ her aborted baby. Notably, Lia’s aunt Agata is as ‘psychomagician’ whose magic rituals include doing such things as having a seemingly gay boy set a picture of his father on fire so that the ashes can be mixed with wine to be drunk as a means to purportedly cure the gay boy of his overwhelming fear of his dead daddy. In another absurd magic ritual, Agata has a young negress wear ‘whiteface’ while her white friend wears ‘blackface’ so that the former can feel more integrated into quasi-white guido society. Not surprisingly, good witch Agata’s husband is Alejandro Jodorowsky aka ‘Fernando’ and although he is dead, he visits his ladylove at night in bed where he provides her with psychomagic advice and flirts with her in a bizarre manner by stating things like, “While I’m caressing you, I see you’re getting old. I love both you...and your death.” Of course, it is alluded to that Agata practices spectrophilia and what better person to engage in it with than Señor Jodorowsky. Meanwhile, loony

RITUAL - A PSYCHOMAGIC STORY

Lia befriends two imaginary children that call themselves 'Elves' named Nicola and Gaia who only speak in song and in nursery rhymes. Naturally, the 'Elves' freak the hell out of Lia when they randomly give her a 'new age' style tarot card reading and sing as a duo, "...there's a child who is her baby, it's her baby who's crying loudly, turn the card and here comes death."

Of course, Lia's spiritual recovery is completely compromised when loser loverboy Viktor randomly shows up at the family chateau and acts quite vindictive to the protagonist after initially putting on a 'good boy' act to get in her good graces so that she would not immediately kick him out when he initially showed up unannounced. Indeed, at one point, Viktor holds Lia's head under water in a bathtub—a place she typically seeks solace in as especially exemplified in a scene where she bathes with a bunch of goldfish—to scare her into thinking he is drowning her and then hatefully states, "You shouldn't have left me like that." Naturally Viktor absolutely hates Agata, complaining to Lia that he thinks "she's an old fool" and "This house gives me the creeps." Of course, one cannot completely blame Viktor as he suffers a nightmarish hallucination at the house where he slowly slices his face up with a shaving razor in a scene that seems to be a direct tribute to Guido-American Martin Scorsese's pre-fame short The Big Shave (1968). Viktor also becomes rather perturbed when he walks in on Lia caressing and singing to an antique baby doll as if it is a real live infant. As Viktor proudly states, "I don't want children. Children are only a burden," so naturally he is not going to tolerate his girlfriend fawning over a children's toy as if it is a living and breathing baby. Ultimately, Agata attempts to rid Lia of her post-abortion sorrow by staging a magic ritual that involves the protagonist pretending to give birth, but of course sadist Viktor, who gets increasingly drunk, intolerant, and violent as the film progresses, ruins it and ultimately pays a hefty price in the end that results in his death and the loss of what little bit of sanity his girlfriend had left.

If you're ever dreamed of an ambitious celluloid marriage between Roman Polanski's Repulsion (1965), John Cassavetes' A Woman Under the Influence (1974), Argento-esque retarded female hysteria, and a Jodorowsky-esque approach to genetic inheritance and spirituality, Ritual is probably the film for you, but it is also certainly one of those somewhat disappointing works that is not exactly as delectable as it sounds, as a film that demonstrates that the two filmmakers know their cinema history but are still at a formative stage in their careers and still need to find their own idiosyncratic voices (that is, if they each have one). While the film is seemingly infinitely superior to anything that fallen maestro Argento has directed over the past two decades or so, it is ultimately too conspicuously contrived, 'Jodorowsky chic,' and 'too-cool-for-school' for its own good as a work that feels like a celluloid fashion show with buckets of blood, S&M fetishism, and goombah meathead misogyny thrown in for good measure, but then again the film also says a lot about contemporary Italian culture and society in general. Set in a sub-opulent realm populated by flashy dressing Hightalian beta-males posing as alph-males who can only get their cocks hard by beating a woman, as well as barren childless women who will use their pussy for pretty much anything aside from procreation and giving birth and who do not think twice about getting abortions even though they want to keep the baby but are too weak and passive to say no to their boyfriends, Ritual ultimately makes Italy seem like a giant disco club in Sodom where the wisest and most level-headed people are elderly witches with dyke hair-cuts and where anyone under the age of 60 is a perennial child with some sort of serious sex disorder, which acts as a sort of aberrant allegory for why they would never procreate. Personally, I find Jodorowsky's so-called 'psychomagic' to be just a more exotic and attractively packaged version of the old kosher carny Freudian con and certainly one of the most unappealing aspects about the filmmaker, so for someone else aside from him to incorporate this brand of dubious metaphysical psychotherapy into the film seems like a patently pathetic gimmick to me, but I cannot say that I was unhappy to see Mr. Topo actually appear in the film. For those expecting Brazzale and Immesì's film to be the sign of a new Renaissance in Italian horror cinema, they will surely be sadly disappointed, but I'm sure Jodorowsky fanboys and fans of unclad and unhinged guidettes will surely find something to like about it, as I surely did. Indeed, Ritual is certainly no masterpiece, but it at least demonstrates that Italians know how to bring style and sex appeal to just about anything, including rape, abortions, and suicide. There is also a sort of cryptic moral message in the film. Indeed, according to Jodorowsky himself, he was the product of his father raping his mother, but unlike the protagonist of Ritual, who aborts her rape-baby, the Chilean Israelite was actually born so one should always think twice about getting a baby vacuumed out of their cunt as it might cause you to go crazy with murderous schizophrenia and/or prevent the birth of a future filmmaking genius.

EYES BEHIND THE WALL
EYES BEHIND THE WALL

Giuliano Petrelli (1977)

Undoubtedly, when it comes to Guido giallo flicks, I always prefer the insanely idiosyncratic ones that either totally defy and/or destroy the conventions of the genre and/or bring something aesthetically new (or even avant-garde) to the style with Giulio Questi's Death Laid an Egg (1968), Elio Petri's Un tranquillo posto di campagna (1968) aka A Quiet Place in the Country, Dario Argento's 4 mosche di velluto grigio (1971) aka Four Flies on Grey Velvet, Lucio Fulci's Non si sevizia un paperino (1972) aka Don't Torture a Duckling, and Silvio Narizzano's Las flores del vicio (1979) aka Bloodbath being a couple of my notable favorites. More recently, I discovered the whacked-out wop giallo-melodrama hybrid Locchio dietro la parete (1977) aka Eyes Behind the Wall aka Voyeur pervers aka The Crystal Man directed by actor turned one-time-director Giuliano Petrelli (La villeggiatura aka Black Holiday, La mala ordina aka The Italian Connection) and starring Buñuel regular Fernando Rey (The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, That Obscure Object of Desire) in a rather fitting role (sorry, but it is hard for me to believe that old ugly fart Rey could get with the kind of chick(s) he does in That Obscure Object of Desire) as a decidedly degenerate and equally wealthy wheelchair-bound pervert of the pathologically voyeuristic sort who gets off to spying on his tenants, especially of the male persuasion, via a secret spy room in his house. A sickeningly sleazy yet seductively stylish work that mischievously molests Hitchcock by adding gratuitous sex/nudity, incest, and interracial sodomy Italian exploitation style, Eyes Behind the Wall ultimately makes for a cruel celluloid work that is just too damn pathologically perverted to be sexy despite the fact that the film was made to appeal to certain debauched individuals looking for a kinky masturbation aid. A bitter mix of macabre melodrama with incestuous giallo horror, Eyes Behind the Wall, with its depiction of a discernibly despicable (and less than sexually virile) intellectual, seems like it was specially tailored for Hebraic quack Sigmund Freud. About 70 minutes of psychosexual celluloid perversion with some mind-molesting twists and turns that make for fiercely fetishistic cinematic foreplay that ultimately erupts into a literally and figuratively explosive climax that was meant to provoke just as much as it is meant to penetrate the psyche of the viewer, Eyes Behind the Wall is delightful dago filmic decadence that, unlike most films of its now mostly outmoded celluloid breed, somehow demands subsequent re-viewings.

Beginning with the Italian exploitation answer to Alfred Hitchcock's Strangers on a Train (1950) in a scene featuring a young and handsome gent named Arturo (American actor John Phillip Law of Roger Vadim's Barbarella (1968) fame) staring at a young lass's legs on a train and proceeding to sexually ravage her against her will, Eyes Behind the Wall then cuts to the seemingly banal bourgeois world of crippled old rich dude Ivano (Fernando Rey) and his ostensible 'wife' Olga (Bosnian-born actress Olga Bisera, who played the role of the 'Baker's Wife' in Sydney Pollack's Castle Keep (1969)), who is young and beautiful and who seems about only half the age of her wheelchair-bound hubby. Rapist Arturo is the latest tenant at Ivano's home and little does he realize that his landlord is a sinister voyeur who has 24/7 access to seeing everything that he does in his new apartment. Indeed, Ivano has a secret room hidden in the wall with state-of-the-art spying equipment, including a fancy periscope/telescope-like device with which he and his wife watch Arturo's every move. As Ivano tells Olga, he finds Arturo to be a provocative individual of the "hermetically shut" sort, stating of his particular interest in his new tenant, "What really makes me mad is that, while this apparatus perfectly frames him, I, on the other hand, can't seem to frame his psychological profile in any way." Of course, wifey Olga concurs, stating that Arturo is "certainly a strange animal," though her interest transcends a simple voyeuristic fascination with the fellow's collection of ethnology, sociology, and anthropology books and affinity for classical and modern avant-garde music.

At the Svengali-like encouragement of Ivano, Olga decides to follow Arturo around town, ultimately spotting the new tenant buying porno magazines and befriending a Negro at a local disco. For whatever reason, Arturo brings the Negro back to his apartment and in no time, the black buck is borderline raping the introverted white boy, which rather turns on borderline psychopathic cripple Ivano but rather distresses Olga, who seems to develop a crush for the quasi-gay boy. Not long after the scene of miscegenation-based sodomy, Ivano remarks regarding his tenant, "It would be interesting to find if his homosexuality is casual or firmly rooted. Or if he brought that torture and pain on himself as some absurd need for suffering" and decides that his wife should befriend and seduce Arturo to investigate, which she has no problem doing, even if her loony love interest was reamed in the rectum by a disco jigaboo. While Olga tells Arturo that he is "just plain weird. Too weird," she still has passionate sex with him while Ivano watches from the comfort of his hidden spy room. In the end, it is revealed that Olga is not really Ivano's wife but actually his daughter. Additionally, Olga previously carried on an incestuous affair with her now-deceased brother, who died in a car wreck that also resulted in Ivano's crippling, hence the why perverse patriarch is now in a wheelchair. Indeed, Olga found Arturo to be alluring because, like she, he is a 'lost soul' who never got over a traumatic experience from the past (with Arturo's 'traumatic' experience being raping the chick on the train) and the two decide to cement their bond forever by committing suicide in a car explosion.

A sort of mutated and molested pseudo-Italian remake of Hitchcock's Rear Window (1954) that makes Disturbia (2007) starring Shia LaBeouf come off like a pansy preteen wet dream for posh prepubescent girls, Eyes Behind the Wall ultimately does what all great giallo films should do by making the macabre movie master himself, Alfred Hitchcock, seem like a self-censoring sissy who did not have the glorious gall to go all the way in his psychosexual/psychoanalytic celluloid depictions of human sexual perversity. Of course, Eyes Behind the Wall is nowhere near as immaculately assembled as a Hitchcock flick and even features a seemingly pointless subplot between a misogynistic pederast butler and a blonde teen, but it certainly stands as one the most original and under-appreciated giallo flicks ever assembled as a rather wicked work that manages to juggle morbid melodrama with pop psychology for a most mean-spirited and even misanthropic cocktail with a smashed moral compass that depicts a violent rapist and an incestuous chick as the most empathetic characters. To add to the film's slickly stylized sleaze credit, Eyes Behind the Wall also features a synth-driven musical score composed by Giuseppe Caruso, who also assembled the score for the kiddy arthouse-erotica flick Maladolescenza (1977) starring Eva Ionesco. 'Psychopathia Sexualis' with a distinctly 1970s Italian flare, Eyes Behind the Wall will certainly appeal to the unconventionally refined tastes of Alberto Cavallone and Giulio Questi fans, though I think it might offend the aesthetic sensibilities of those cinephiles that are obsessed enough with the Master of Suspense that took the time to read Hitchcock/Truffaut (1967) by François Truffaut because, as far as I am concerned, Giuliano Petrelli's film is nothing short of Hitchcock heresy and not of the superficial pseudo-softcore Brian De Palma variety.

KILLER NUN

Giulio Berruti (1979)

Upon breaking ties with weirdo Warhol and his mentor Paul Morrissey and moving to Italy to establish a 'legitimate' non-arthouse acting career, Italian-American counter-culture sex icon Joe Dallesandro (Flesh, Trash, Heat) starred in a series of superlatively sleazy and largely forgotten Guido exploitation flicks, with the nunsplotation flick Killer Nun (1979) aka Suor Omicidi aka Deadly Habits directed by relatively unknown director Giulio Berruti and starring busy Swedish model turned actress Anita Ekberg being one of the more well known of these films. A piece of overtly sacrilegious trash of the super softcore Sapphic sort, the film was banned in the UK and pulled from distribution shortly after its release despite being the no. 2 film at the box-office in Rome due to pressure from the Catholic Church, who rather objected to the film's absurd tagline: "From the secret files of the Vatican." A work that more than clearly demonstrates that Ekberg's waist increased and popularity decreased over the nearly two decades since she appeared in the iconic scene in Federico Fellini's La Dolce Vita (1960) where she played a bodacious Nordic "dream woman" who dances in Rome's Trevi fountain for the pleasure of Marcello Mastroianni, Killer Nun features the sensual Swedish actress as an unhinged middle-aged opium-addled bisexual nun who suffered brain damage as a result of neurosurgery and now has an unhealthy hunger for blood, boobs, and Joe Dallesandro. Notably, in the book Joe Dallesandro: Warhol Superstar, Underground Film Icon, Actor (2011) written by Michael Ferguson, Dallesandro would confess regarding his involvement in the nunsplotation flick and various other goombah exploitation flicks: "When I worked in Italy, they'd take all these old actresses who were overweight and they would put them in films with me and they'd ignite again. They'd have something going for them because I wouldn't make them look like an old person. I play to everybody as if they were the most important thing in the world." Indeed, both onscreen in the Warhol/Morrissey films and offscreen as an actor, Dallesandro played the role of a hustler who used his body in a way that few women are even capable of. The lapsed Warhol superstar previously worked with Killer Nun director Berruti (who only directed one other film, the forgotten 1976 exploitation flick Noi siamo come le lucciole starring Cannibal Holocaust director Ruggero Deodato's then-wife Silvia Dionisio) three years before on the fairly trashy and mean-spirited but ultimately worthless crime flick Il tempo degli assassini (1975) aka Season for Assassins, for which the Guido filmmaker acted as the editor (Berruti worked as an editor and screenwriter before getting the chance to direct). A ridiculously sleazy work that, for better or worse, owes most of its charisma to Ekberg's over-the-top, if not dead seriously played, performance, Killer Nun might qualify as a hagsplotation flick were it not for the lead actress's relatively well preserved beauty and rather serious and less than campy performance. In short, this dago nunsploration celluloid abortion is the dubious, if not curious and even sometimes interesting, result of what happens when a lapsed sex icon who is best known for her meta-busty body attempts to be a serious actress in a fucked film that lacks seriousness where an elderly wheelchair-bound cripple receives a blowjob during a thunderstorm from a hot young maid, a lesbo nun demands that her much younger spiritual sister wear stockings during sex, Little Joe portrays a sensitive and sophisticated yet ultimately weak and sex-starved doctor, an elderly man is suffocated via cotton balls, and a nun offers to sacrifice herself into servitude to save her murderous lesbo lover from prison.

After receiving major brain surgery to remove a tumor from her seemingly under-used gray matter, big bosomed blonde nun Sister Gertrude (Anita Ekberg) becomes a crazed cunt of the lethal lesbo sort who gets off by reading sexually-charged S&M-like stories of saints being tortured to elderly patients at the psychiatric ward where she works. While Gertrude pleads to the head physician, Dr. Poirret (Massimo Serato, who played a bishop in Nicholas Roeg's 1973 arthouse-horror masterpiece Don't Look Now), as well as her Mother Superior (played by Austrian-Italian countess Alida Valli, who appeared in several masterpieces, including Carol Reed's The Third Man (1949) and Luchino Visconti's Senso (1954), though her career suffered as a result of a scandal involving the murder of a young fashion model during a sex-and-drug-orgy), that she needs therapy to fix her damaged brain, she is looked at with a sort of superstition-fueled indifference and does not get the serious help that she needs. After allowing one of her elderly patients to drop dead, Sister Gertrude steals and pawns the victim's jewelry so she can buy some dope (she is a morphine addict, after all), booze, and a sexy wardrobe, which she uses to lure a man who enters her holy hole after she decides to go incognito as a non-nun aka real woman one day. On top of being a passive murderer and major morphine addict, the sensual Sister is also a closest lipstick lesbo who makes up the dominant half of a lurid love affair with a younger Sapphic sister named Sister Mathieu (played by Paola Morra, who is probably best known for being the Italian Playboy Playmate of the Month for February 1978), who is much nicer than her lunatic lover. Ultimately, Sister Mathieu will help her loony lady lover cover-up her violently murderous crimes.

On top of having a broken brain, Gertrude hates men as a result of being molested as a child, even admitting to a priest during a confession that she would like to "snuff out all men" in revenge for having her happiness snuffed out as a child. Needless to say, the nasty nun begins murdering men, including an old fart who she catches receiving a blowjob and sex from the luxury of his wheelchair. Although she hates men, Gertrude is no gentler with women, who she tortures before killing. In fact, the nympho nun even tortures her girlfriend Sister Mathieu, who she forces to wear stockings and declare, "I'm the worst kind of prostitute" before they have lurid lesbo sex. Indeed, Sister Mathieu is somewhat of a slut, but she is well meaning, as she kisses the crotch of a new young doctor named Dr. Patrick Roland (Joe Dallesandro) in a rather raunchy attempt to get him to overlook his suspicions regarding Sister Gertrude's murderous behavior. A crippled patient named Peter (played by Lou Castel of Marco Bellocchio's Fists in the Pocket (1965) and Fassbinder's Beware of a Holy Whore (1971)) also becomes suspicious of Gertrude's deranged behavior, so the sadistic sister maliciously murders him, but not before taunting the paraplegic victim with a healthy dose of terror and torture. When Dr. Roland finally discovers that Sister Gertrude is a morphine-addicted serial killer, Sister Mathieu threatens to kill herself if he tells anyone about her lover's deranged behavior. In the end, the nuns cover-up the murders and lock Gertrude in a cell where she falls into a quasi-catatonic state and Sister Mathieu becomes the virtual sex slave of Dr. Roland in return for him not going to the cops about the deaths. Ironically, as a result of being a Sapphic sister in sexual servitude, Mathieu develops homicidal tendencies and confesses to a priest her fantasies about killing men.

A spiteful little film without morals and redemption starring two of the biggest sex icons of their respective eras, Killer Nun is the aesthetically atrocious result of what happens when a novice director who is somewhat resentful about their old school Italian Catholic upbringing attempts to inexplicably juggle anti-Catholic sermonizing with aesthetic immorality. In the featurette from the Secret Files of the Vatican, director Giulio Berruti, who has a small Hitchcockian cameo in Killer Nun as a Priest, stated regarding his film and its relationship with the Catholic Church: "I love the Church, I admire them as educators, but maybe they push Church life too hard: Mass every day and Sundays...so when you come out of there, how can I say, you look for something different. So the idea of this nun caught my attention. I think she was killing because of her loneliness. So this is the theme, the plot of the movie. Not everything came out as intended but it was supposed to show that drug addiction could substitute for God." Indeed, the film would have probably made a little more sense if a scene featuring the anti-heroine raising a syringe like a chalice over a church altar and 'communicating with God' via morphine injection was not cut out (and, according to the director, destroyed). According to director Berruti, Italian distributors could do whatever they wanted to do to films and ultimately destroyed the film. Describing his own film as being, "like a daughter abandoned by her father," Berruti gave up on feature filmmaking after Killer Nun and decided to be a documentary filmmaker so he could get his creative freedom back. Despite being a blatant celluloid hatchet job, I, as someone who is not really a fan of the exploitation subgenre, found Berruti's work to be one of the more interesting nunsploitation flicks. Indeed, no film featuring Anita Ekberg, Joe Dallesandro, and Alida Valli can be completely bad, though it can remind you of a grand missed cinematic opportunity.

THE VISITOR

Giulio Paradisi (1979)

There is no other way to approach this title than with severe caution. Fans (seldom found) of The Visitor know full well of the haphazardous alternate cuts of the film, either volleying ten or more additional minutes to further elaborate on the insane plot mechanics at hand or the shortened American version clocking in at 96 minutes, which hurriedly speeds through the ramblings of a screenplay penned by an Egyptian writer (no doubt played a part in the heavy dosage of religious symbolism and surrealism). What follows is something that really no one understands. No amount of sifting through the various versions will leave an imprint of concise understanding. The Visitor is as foreign to us as both the extraterrestrial fixture and the history behind such a film - a film in which the budget surely went straight to the star-studded cast which includes, but not limited to, Sam Peckinpah as an abortionist masked with shadow - rumors abound that while on set, was fueled on cocaine and constantly drunk, a performer if I ever saw one. With so much confusion towards the film, one thing is certain; The Visitor is hands down, one of the strangest films I have ever been pleased to see.

Popular belief leaves children in light as the only innocence to be found in our society. The Visitor entirely suggests otherwise. Insisted upon as an Italian masquerade of The Omen, The Visitor is accredited to stealing motifs from Close Encounters of the Third Kind as well, what, with its blending of surreal science, extraterrestrial life and religious forces of good & evil. Joanne Nail stars as the lovely Barbara Collins, mother to a sinister young girl named Katy, whose lone hobby is skulking downstairs playing Pong using her telepathy. Father to the child is Lance Henriksen whose turn as a Faustian father marks one of the brighter performances in his career (as well as the wonderful Nature of the Beast). Raymond Armstead (Henriksen) has sold his soul as well as his family's to a mega-conglomerate led by Mel Ferrer whose intentions are to get the two adults wed and to procreate another perfect being - most likely timed to coincide with astrological alignment. Among other things, John Huston has a rather important role as a mystic emissary who is detailed in flashbacks before time on a sun-scorched rock garbed in a thick cloak. The Visitor is essentially two astral entities, representing either sides of chaos and order, speeding towards an inevitable collision. I will go out on a limb in assuming that much of The Visitor was lost on me at first due to the alternate cut that I viewed. However, further examination led me to forums crowded with pleas for understanding. Director Giulio Paradisi learned the ropes of intrigue well playing assistant director to Fellini on 8½. Allow me, firsthand, to debunk any rumors that The Visitor just blindly swings The Omen as a fail safe. The Visitor simply takes several cues and paints the remainder of the picture with bewildering symbolism and bad biology,

Barbara Collins, at the end of the day, is simply a gorgeous lass that fell victim to circumstance as well as a grand pattern (that will continue to repeat itself). Withholding evil forces, imagine, if you will, the plight of mankind being so extravagant and recurring as in cinema, now making that an everyday occurrence. It's a strange topic to ponder about, especially when Franco Nero, portraying Christ, stares off with icy-blue eyes into the camera surrounded by hairless children, as per their metaphysical baptism. The Visitor is, quite frankly, one hell of a brain-rush. A film as esoteric and bizarre as this, having such funding and blowing it on an ensemble cast, destroys my thought process. Here I sit attempting to connect the shattered remains of what was once an idea on how to approach reviewing The Visitor. Words cannot simply highlight all there is to enjoy and despise about The Visitor. Am I scornful because it genuinely confused me with its alternate cuts and switchable narratives? Almost, other than that, The Visitor was quite a surprise with excellent performances from top grade acting talent and its pseudo-science blended with alien life and other pleasing abnormalities. Don't think, just give it a chance. Who knows, it might shred the last hint of decency you have towards no-expectation-cinema, rewriting the very way you view random cassette tapes. I know it did for me.

Giulio Paradisi (1979)

Italians sure know how to polish turds, especially when it comes to taking banal Hollywood blockbusters and making them more stylish, cynical and—most importantly—sincerely sleazy. Undoubtedly, out of all the great Guido rip-off films, none is probably more ambitious than The Visitor (1979) aka Stridulum directed by Giulio Paradisi (who used the pseudonym ‘Michael J. Paradise’ so he would seem more ‘American’), who previously worked as an assistant director and actor on Federico Fellini’s autobiographical masterpiece 8½ (1963) and was later mainly responsible for directing comedies. A work that shamelessly steals from Hitchcock’s The Birds (1963), Rosemary’s Baby (1968), The Exorcist (1973), The Omen (1976), Close Encounters of the Third Kind (1977), Donald Cammell’s Demon Seed (1977), Damien: Omen II (1978), and The Fury (1978), among countless other films, yet throws in conspicuous arthouse and psychedelic elements that ultimately give the film its insanely idiosyncratic character, The Visitor is an extravagant celluloid monster gone berserk that defies both expectation and classification. Produced and co-penned by Egyptian-born Greek producer/director Ovidio Assonitis (Forever Emmanuelle aka Laure, Piranha Part Two: The Spawning), who previously co-directed/co-produced the notable Guido The Exorcist rip-off Beyond the Door (1974) aka Chi sei? and was later a stockholder and CEO of Cannon Pictures during the early 1990s, The Visitor was originally intended as just another cheap take on William Friedkin’s hit supernatural horror flick, but evolved into a phantasmagoric science fiction horror epic of the celestial metaphysical sort with an eclectic all-star international cast, including Hollywood auteur John Huston (The Maltese Falcon, Wise Blood), Mel Ferrer (The Longest Day, War and Peace), Lance Henriksen (Aliens, The Terminator), Shelley Winters (The Night of the Hunter, Lolita), director Sam Peckinpah (Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia, Straw Dogs), Franco Nero (Django, Querelle), and Glenn Ford (Gilda, 3:10 to Yuma). Notable among cinephiles as being one of the most recklessly whimsical and inately incoherent films ever made (which is more than a slight exaggeration), the film was originally released in the United States in a badly butchered cut that made the work seem even more inexplicable than it actually was, or as producer Assonitis stated in an interview with Zack Carlson, “When THE VISITOR was released in the US, the cut was very different than the original version, and much shorter as well. They did that without asking our permission. It was a distributor from Atlanta. They really eliminated a tremendous amount of the story [...] They’d made the cuts, and they had no right to do it, but what could I do? There was a conflict, and we were going to take legal action, but the film had already played. It took decades for people to see the complete version.”

Luckily, Independent distributor Drafthouse Films re-released The Visitor

in its complete form in 2013 in both theaters and on DVD. While I had previously seen the original butchered cut of the film and admired various random scenes, it was not until I saw the complete version of this much maligned work that I was able to appreciate it fully as being one of the most ridiculously ambitious oddities of Italian copycat cinema. Mostly shot in Atlanta, Georgia of all places with the support of the state government (then-governor George Busbee actually enticed the Italian crew to shoot there as they wanted to develop a film industry in the state), city mayor (three-term high yellow black democrat Maynard Jackson), and even media mogul Ted Turner, The Visitor is certainly a big celluloid cultural mongrel that producer Assonitis bizarrely claims was more influenced by video-games (indeed, the archaic first-generation video-game pong is featured somewhat prominently in the film) than other films (!), but is really a schizophrenic hodgepodge of various blockbuster Hollywood films and genre conventions that manages to bring artfulness to mainstream American industrial style filmmaking. Featuring a long-haired Franco Nero as a Christ-like figure, John Huston as an extraterrestrial exorcist/warrior battling an evil little blonde girl and quasi-Satanic businessmen, Shelley Winters once again portraying a bitchy maid, and Sam Peckinpah (who was apparently a pain to work with and only worked on the film for a single day) playing a doctor who gives his ex-wife an abortion because she is pregnant with a demon seed of sorts, The Visitor is a rare (anti)genre film where thematic insanity reigns and audacious aestheticism trumps genre formulas. Like Dario Argento at his prime meets Satyricon (1969) era Fellini as penned by William Peter Blatty had he fried his brain on acid and developed a nasty bird fetish, The Visitor is arguably the most entertaining mess of a low-budget (around $800,000) mega movie ever made.

An ostensible old Polack/intergalactic warrior named Jerzy Colsowicz (John Huston) has been summoned by a blond Aryan Christ figure (played by Franco Nero in a role he apparently offered to play for free just so he could work with his hero Huston), who surrounds himself with bald children acolytes in glittery white robes, to take care of an evil 8-year-old American girl from Atlanta named Katy Collins (Paige Conner). As the supremely stoic Aryan Christ explains, a certain Commander Yahweh managed to capture an evil mutant being known as 'Sateen' in a battle that claimed hundreds of lives. Unfortunately, Sateen eventually managed to escape in a tiny scout craft and landed on earth where he developed new psychic and occult powers and used them to dish out death and destruction. To rid planet earth of inevitable destruction by dark forces, Commander Yahweh sent a flock of specially trained birds to kill Sateen, but the evil being managed to procreate with earth women before he kicked the bucket, thus spreading his demon seed in a somewhat cryptic fashion. 8-year-old Atlanta girl Katy Collins—a confederate Heather O'Rourke lookalike of sorts who is a master of gymnastics and figure skating—is one of Sateen's descendents and it is 'extraterrestrial exorcist' Jerzy Colsowicz's job to rid the girl of her sinister genetic inheritance as well as preventing her mother Barbara Collins (Joanne Nail) from breeding again, or else evil may spread like the plague throughout the cosmos. Barbara's boyfriend Raymond Armstead (Lance Henriksen) is a professional basketball team owner who works for a group of satanic businessmen who sent him on a sinister assignment to procreate with his girlfriend to create another demon spawn. Luckily, Barbara can sense her daughter is evil and does not want another child, but of course, Raymond and Katy have teamed up to make sure she spawns a satanic spawn against her will.

Demonic brat Katy is so powerful that she merely stares down negro Muslim NBA player Kareem Abdul-Jabbar to give him the power to do a literally explosive game-winning slam-dunk, but she has more pressing things on her mind as a little bad rich bitch who wants a bad little bro to help her establish an out-of-this-world aristocracy of satanic evil and destruction. In between playing pong with her stoned babysitter and using her evil pet bird 'Squeaky' to carry out devilish deeds, Katy plots to get her dimwitted mother pregnant. On her birthday, Katy magically receives a gun as a gift from her aunt (who really bought her niece a talking bird toy, but someone or something replaced the present) and 'accidentally' shoots her mother with it after throwing the weapon on a table in an excited fashion, thus resulting in her paralysis and her total dependence on her evil boyfriend and deranged daughter. Despite being a worthless cripple, Barbara refuses to get married or have a kid, telling Raymond, "I want my freedom." Barbara also hires a maid named Jane Phillips (Shelley Winters) who loves to sing negro spirituals (which hint at the fact that she has sort of 'supernatural negro powers' despite the fact she is white) and talking about astrology and she can tell instantly that there is something not quite right about Katy. Meanwhile, a detective named Jake Durham (Glenn Ford) begins investigating the circumstances revolving around Barbara's paralysis and when he asks little Katy about it, she says "Go fuck yourself," adding, "I don't like you. You're a child molester. I bet you do dirty things to children." Needless to say, it does not take long for the Detective to drop dead after snooping around the Collins home, as Katy has deadly demonical pigeons unleashed on him, which poke his eyes out while he is driving, thus causing him to crash and subsequently die after his unmarked cop car explodes. Meanwhile, Barbara ends up getting pregnant after her car breaks down, as evil scientists land Close Encounters of the Third Kind style, abduct her, and artificially inseminate her with the demon seed. Jerzy, who previously babysat for Katy and had a pong showdown of sorts with the little girl, tells Barbara that she has conceived out of the evil business men's hatred for this world, so she naturally opts for aborting it. Luckily, Barbara's ex-husband Dr. Sam Collins (Sam Peckinpah) knows how to perform abortions and reluctantly gives her one. When evil bird Squeaky attacks Barbara, maid Jane kills it, which irks Katy so much that she pushes her wheelchair-bound mother through a fancy gigantic fish tank (which contains no fish!). Barbara attempts to set

Katy straight by bringing her in for psychological testing and experimentation, but nothing helps. Ultimately, Katy becomes completely demonically possessed, strangles her mother, and then throws her down the stairs. With the help of Katy, boyfriend Raymond attempts to lynch Barbara for aborting her demonic fetus, but Jerzy sends in some magical birds (the same sort that killed Katy's evil ancestor Sateen), which kill the satanic basketball franchise owner when one drives its beak into his neck. Ultimately, the angelic birds also manage to 'peck out the evil' of Katy, who is delivered to Aryan Christ, albeit minus the evil and a head of hair. In the end, Jerzy states, "You can't kill children. Only the evil part. That's no more."

As Ovidio Assonitis revealed in a recent interview, apparently John Huston was not embarrassed by his role in The Visitor, or as the Producer stated himself, "Long after THE VISITOR was finished, I was invited out to visit John Huston. He was a week from dying. I got there, and he was very sick. He'd brought together all the women from his life. So he had a 22-year-old girl there beside an 80-year-old woman, all sitting around the same table. That was his farewell. I was the only other man there. And at that time, I saw that he'd purchased a video cassette of THE VISITOR so he could watch it at home." Personally, I only have all the more respect for Huston for being in the film, as a legendary Hollywood director who dared to get a little dirty in a dago celluloid beast that demonstrates that Italians do it better, at least when it comes to ripping of soulless Hollywood mainstream trash. As both revealed in the extra features included with the 2013 Drafthouse Films DVD release of the film, star Lance Henriksen (who had no clue what the film was about) and Italian-American screenwriter Luciano Comici (who was mainly hired because he spoke both English and Italian) do not exactly have fond memories of The Visitor, with both men recollecting their chaotic experiences working on the film and essentially describing producer Assonitis as an intolerable egomaniac. Of course, Assonitis admitted himself that the film was made under intense and largely improvised circumstances, with the producer stating in an interview regarding how the film was in a constant state of evolution, "The story was being built and rebuilt day-by-day, even as we were shooting. Sometimes you include things that come out from your subconscious without you knowing it." Cultivated and kaleidoscopic metaphysical sci-fi-horror kitsch crammed with sensational and otherworldly cine-magic, a pinch of psychosexual degeneracy, and a wonderfully warped sense of logic (or lack thereof) that even puts Brian De Palma to abject shame, The Visitor is ultimately pure style and spectacle over substance and that is certainly one of the reasons I enjoyed it so much. As someone who cannot be bothered to invest any sort of emotion in the majority of Hollywood horror/sci-fi/thriller films, I managed to appreciate The Visitor because it is such an aesthetically overwhelming and thematically convoluted experience that I never found myself bored and I certainly never found myself feeling lost while watching the work.

THE VISITOR

Indeed, compared to the films of David Lynch and Alejandro Jodorowsky, The Visitor tells a fairly linear story that is easy enough to digest, especially on subsequent viewings. As for the importance of the film in the context of film history, I think Assonitis said it best when he once remarked, "All in all, I am sadly aware that my contributions to the horror genre are not of such historical relevance as, say, THE EXORCIST (1973) or PSYCHO (1960). We're not talking masterpieces here, but I have put all my love and enthusiasm into my films and I think it shows. What's most important, I have gained the respect of true horror fans, who are always loyal and extremely perceptive--they know a good film when they see one!" as The Visitor is certainly a work that deserves an even larger cult following than it already has as a sort of poor man's The Holy Mountain. The virtual father film to Beyond the Black Rainbow (2010), The Visitor is a "pre-Reagan-era fever dream" that demonstrates in a dreamscape-addled sort of way that CEOs (in one notable scene, a satanic businessman, who later dies with what looks like feces on his face, states, "Power corrupts [...] And absolute power corrupts absolutely. But we must have that power."), politicians, and related parasitic psychopaths have been transforming America into a Devil's playground for sometime. Of course, more importantly, the film demonstrates that a random Guido hack director has more creativity in his pinky than Spielberg has in his entire truly satanic being.

DEATH LAID AN EGG

Giulio Questi (1968)

I would not exactly call myself a “giallo man”, especially considering my favorite films from the great Guido genre tend to be works that defy convention or barely belong to the genre at all, including Eyes Behind the Wall (1977) aka Locchio dietro la parete directed by Giuliano Petrelli, Bloodbath (1979) aka Las flores del vicio directed by Silvio Narizzano, A Quiet Place in the Country (1968) aka Un tranquillo posto di campagna directed by Elio Petri, Order of Death (1983) aka Copkiller directed by Roberto Faenza, Four Flies on Grey Velvet (1971) aka mosche di velluto grigio directed by Dario Argento, and last but certainly not least, Death Laid an Egg (1968) aka La morte ha fatto l'uovo directed by Giulio Questi. Directed by the man who assembled the quasi-surreal gothic western Django Kill... If You Live, Shoot! (1967) aka Se sei vivo spara—a film of no direct relation to Django (1966) that only took its rip-off name due to the financial success of the Franco Nero vehicle despite, in my opinion, being a superior and more multifaceted cinematic work—Death Laid an Egg would ultimately prove to be the greatest celluloid achievement of criminally underrated auteur Giulio Questi's rather brief filmmaking career as a completely unclassifiable pop-arthouse, proto-giallo sardonic sci-fi work of the misanthropic, anti-technocratic, and quasi-Marxist (indeed, the director Questi was a commie, albeit of the rather now-unconventional 'masculine' variety) sort. Featuring a deranged dystopian psychedelic essence and a delightfully discordant score, Death Laid an Egg—a film with indubitably one of the greatest titles in film history—is centered on an all around sexually perverse Ménage à trios comprised of one man and two women who, on top of sharing carnal knowledge, also co-operate a high-tech Faustian chicken farm where they hope to become God and sire a mutant race of futuristic fowl that will bring them massive profits as technocratic prophets, but, unfortunately, mutual deceit of the dark romantic variety gets in their way and the unhinged untermensch of the house seems to have an unhealthy obsession with brutally murdering pretty prostitutes by slitting their throats in a sleazy hotel room. With eccentric and erratic editing by Franco Arcalli (who also acted as the film's co-writer, as well as the co-writer of virtually every other Questi film and one of the co-writers of the Sergio Leone epic Once Upon a Time in America (1984)) that seems like a Soviet montage on acid and a jarring avant-garde soundtrack by Bruno Maderna (who provided some music to 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968)), Death Laid an Egg is a trying and—some would say—aesthetically torturous trip that will only appeal to a certain sort of cinephile, but surely not every jaded giallo fan. An absolutely aesthetically and thematically loony labyrinth of the lurid celluloid libertine variety that keeps the viewer simultaneously discombobulated yet hypnotized from the intriguing beginning to its eremitic end, Death Laid an Egg is the thing delectably decadent and dead celluloid daydreams are made of and with a tagline like, “See them tear each other apart. Then see what they do with the pieces” it is all but impossible to resist such a film’s cynical charms.

Although being the sole male in a bizarre love triangle with two beautiful women might seem ideal to most men, it is certainly not that way for handsome yet weak beta-male Marco (Jean-Louis Trintignant)—a man so dissatisfied with his sex life that he feels the need to regularly buy cheap hookers and ritualistically slit their throats at the same hotel room, or so things seem from the very beginning of Death Laid an Egg—a biting attack on the sexual and social perversions and pathologies of the bloated bourgeois. Like the protagonist played by Franco Nero in Hitch-Hike (1977) aka Autoštop rosso sangue directed by Pasquale Festa Campanile, Marco must live with the fact that he is an intrinsically impotent man-whore who married a woman who, although unquestionably dropdead gorgeous, he no longer loves, thus he daydreams of breaking free from the sheer and utter banality of his contrived and unnatural bourgeois life. Indeed, as the sole owner of the high-tech chicken farm where Marco works, wife Anna (Gina Lollobrigida) certainly wears the pants in the relationship, even if she is always taking them off for the much younger babe Gabrielle (Swedish blonde bombshell Ewa Aulin)—the temptress of a third wheel of the terrible threesome that will end in abject tragedy. A somewhat older woman than Gabrielle and most certainly past her physical prime, Anna seems to have a sexually charged, yet jealous infatuation over the young blonde beauty and discusses dismembering her with husband Macro, albeit in an eroticized and figurative fashion. Sort of like the cute yet creepy young lily-licker from Chloe (2009) directed by Atom Egoyan, Anna sees Gabrielle (who even admits “my mother was my only happiness”) as an unspoken rival and perverse mother figure and has a sort of lesbian Oedipus Complex (although, in the end, it seems like she really had a lesbo Electra complex). An ultra-paranoid lady with a rather guilty conscience, Anna—a bourgeois babe and capitalistic enemy of the working-class—is paranoid that her ex-workers, who she fired and replaced with state-of-the-art machinery to save money, are out to kill her as they stare at her behind a fence near her chicken factory, but little does she know that she has more ‘personal’ romantic acquaintances that are out to kill her, albeit for different reasons. Marco is also the rather reluctant adviser/representative of an arcane organization called “The Association” that wants to push the visibility of chickens to the forefront of mankind as the bald chicken-ophile Führer of the group believes, “The difficulty we face is that nobody knows poultry.” The members of the Association don’t seem to know shit about chicken shit either as they feel the fowl should be promoted in an aberrant advertising campaign as the “principal actor in the drama of modern life,” by promoting degenerate quasi-Warholian pop-art of chicks as doctors and poultry playboys and proletarians. The Association also hooks Marco up with a suave Svengali character named Mondaini (Jean Soubieski), who begins to conspire with Anna for dubious reasons. Marco, Anna, and Gabrielle have it easy at the chicken factory as they have a magic all-purpose poultry machine called “The Machine” that, on top of feeding and slaughtering chickens, plays acoustic avant-garde music. The Machine, which uses radioactive chemicals, is also being prepared to create mutant headless, wingless, and boneless chickens of the future that will cut expenses and dramatically increase profits.

A man stuck in a loveless relationship with a domineering wife who desperately desires love, Marco attempts to convince Gabrielle to run away with him as he hates his job, life, and wife, and with the young blonde he wants to, “find something permanent.” Unfortunately, Gabrielle is from a younger, more machine-like and psychopathic generation, thus she only has her eye on the money and the archetypical ‘modern man,’ Mondaini will help her, telling his co-conspirator that they are “much stronger” than miserably married couple Marco and Anna. Gabrielle and Mondaini plan to frame Marco for a murder that he has ironically been fantasizing about committing, but while the married man has deep-seated reasons for wanting to commit the crime and escape his hopelessly humdrum life, the two psychopathic schemers are merely motivated by money. When Marco’s cute little doggy “Blackie” is grinded up in the Machine, he begins to lose his mind all the more, realizing that his life is literally being grinded up by the monster appliance. When the Machine actually ends up successfully churning out living and apparently breathing headless chickens, Marco freaks out and smashes the grotesque miscreations to death, which infuriates the Association and Anna. Before killing them, Anna—in a heated attempt to save their dying marriage—pleads to Marco, “Can’t you see how very important it is?! It’s something I always wanted, something we could share between us, something that was ours, something that’s mysterious and now that it has finally come you reject it. You’re too weak to accept it. You’re a coward if you kill them... I WARN YOU!” Of course, Anna’s plea to her husband has the opposite of her desired results and Marco brutally bludgeons the mutant chickens to death, thus symbolically exterminating his marriage and riches in the process. Meanwhile, Anna goes incognito as a pseudo-prostitute so as to surprise Marco face-to-face when he goes to pick up his weekly whore to use and abuse, but Gabrielle and Mondaini have hatched a more malicious conspiracy that will inevitably usher in the end of a Ménage à trios and a marriage.

During one especially symbolic scene towards the conclusion of Death Laid an Egg, the leader of the Association verbally chews out Marco for killing the mutant chickens, ironically stating, “Your behavior seems to me outside the realm of any human standard,” as if playing God and creating ungodly freak fowl for monetary profit is a morally glorious thing. Totally breaking with every convention of the giallo aside from the ‘whodunnit?’ angle, Death Laid an Egg is an aberrant avant-garde assault on modernity, attacking consumerism, the sexual revolution, feminism, technocracy, and Faustian man’s eternal need to conquer, subjugate, and control nature in what is a neo-Grand Guignol hen Hades. As German philosopher Oswald Spengler wrote in his short work Man and Technics: A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life (1931), one of the first books written on technology, "As once the microcosm Man against Nature, so now the microcosm Machine is revolting against Nordic Man. The lord of the world is becoming the slave of the Machine. Their strength is bound up with the existence of coal," and that can certainly be said of the world featured in Death Laid an Egg, but unsatisfying sexual degeneracy and moral retardation also reign in the film in an apocalyptic depiction of humanity that only sees pessimism for the future. Featuring the celluloid pop art aesthetic and phantasmagorical playboy perversity of works like The Laughing Woman (1969) aka Femina ridens directed by Piero Schivazappa and with the avant-garde wild and wanton weirdness of A Quiet Place in the Country (it should be noted that both film's had the same production designer, Sergio Canevari, hence the aesthetic similarities), Death Laid an Egg is a curious celluloid work of its time that, although poorly aged in parts, still holds up quite aesthetically and thematically as a work that is more politically pertinent today than it was upon its initial release, even if has been deep fried in psychedelic psychobabble. After all, no one who has ever eaten at McDonalds could deny there is something rather off about their disgusting chicken meat with dubious pink and black chunks in it and after watching Death Laid an Egg, I doubt I will ever be able to eat such fried filth again. Indeed, the film brings truth to Werner Herzog's words, "Look into the eyes of a chicken and you will see real stupidity. It is a kind of bottomless stupidity, a fiendish stupidity. They are the most horrifying, cannibalistic and nightmarish creatures in the world," but as Death Laid an Egg demonstrates, humanity, especially members of the bourgeois, are much worse in a world where men are cowardly chickens and chicks want to be men.

TOUCH ME IN THE MORNING

Giuseppe Andrews (1999)

Touch Me in the Morning was the first feature length film from trailer park auteur Giuseppe Andrews. It was shot on a camcorder in black and white because Andrews couldn't figure out how to shoot in color. Giuseppe Andrews also stars in the lead role as Coney Island. Mr. Island's unapologetic father (played by the legendary Bill Nowlin) tells his son that he is a "tar baby." Throughout Touch Me in the Morning, Coney Island's father takes tons of real drugs (like crack) and even drinks alcohol in the shower. One could say that Bill Nowlin is much more than just a "method" actor. Giuseppe Andrews's writing talents are like no other. Like his more recent films, Touch Me in the Morning features a flood of stream of consciousness poetry spoken through the mouths of those that have disconnected from the world. Whether it be senior psychosis or too many beers, the "characters" in Touch Me in the Morning have decided to checkout of the "real world." I believe that Giuseppe Andrews has done the same as his films exemplify. Only a true outsider could make films as distinct as Andrews. Not many filmmakers would be daring enough to sit next to Bill Nowlin as he recites poetry while defecating in the toilet. Giuseppe Andrews has often stated that German New Wave auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder is one of his favorite directors. Like Fassbinder, Andrews is able to take a small set and turn it into a world of captivating drama. Also like Fassbinder, you won't find a second of worthless footage in a Giuseppe Andrews film. In all of Giuseppe Andrews films, you will find more than one "happy accidents" as a result of his "one man" guerrilla style film making. Touch Me in the Morning opens with a drunken fist fight between one of his best "players" Walt Dongo and a long bearded (but bald headed) biker. This opening scene sets the pathetic (yet engulfing) feel of the overall film. The world of Touch Me in the Morning is one that is completely opposite of a Hollywood world. The film lacks any type of production value, features aesthetically displeasing individuals, and is a complete assault on Hollywood Bolshevik style "political correctness." Giuseppe Andrews is most notorious for his acting roles in Hollywood so he knows the type of soulless goons that he is waging a "holy" war against. The trailer park in Touch Me in the Morning has more to do with America than any propaganda piece (of shit) Hollywood vomits out its lying lenses. Touch Me in the Morning is a personal film from a reclusive man. A man that seems like he can only communicate abstractly through the medium of a camcorder. Touch Me in the Morning is excellent example on why it takes an interesting individual to make an interesting film. No matter how much money Hollywood pumps into their latest epic (or epidemic), their films for the most part lack any type of real humanity or human emotion. They are expressions of the materialistically diseased and valueless. Hollywood is a cancer and the individuals featured in Touch Me in the Morning are unfortunate victims of that

TRAILER TOWN

When I was younger and much more impulsive, I would blind-buy random Troma dvds and naturally I was typically quite disappointed with what I bought upon actually viewing it, but at least one of these poorly manufactured films, Trailer Town (2003) directed by Hollywood teen-heartthrob-turned-gutter-auteur Giuseppe Andrews (Touch Me in the Morning, Period Piece), proved to be a well welcomed exception. Like many 'Troma classics', Trailer Town is not actually a real Troma production, but merely a film distributed Troma Entertainment so that Lloyd Kaufman and a couple of his cronies can profit off the cinematic labor of some other poor filmmaker. Regardless, Giuseppe Andrews may be a Hollywood actor whose image countless teenage girls have secretly touched themselves to after seeing him in such sorry films as Independence Day (1996) and Detroit Rock City (1999), but he is also a true blue proletarian auteur and gutter enfant terrible of the quasi-junky sort who grew up in the very same trailer hood that his camcorder-recorded 'outsider films' depict. Indeed, instead of mocking his unhinged untermensch subjects like kosher carny auteur Harmony Korine (Gummo, Spring Breakers), Andrews is the real drug-and-alcohol-addicted quasi-white trash deal as a filmmaker's whose work Bavarian adventurer auteur Werner Herzog rightly described as reflecting the following, "This place, this trailer park, I have a feeling that this is the real America." In Trailer Town, there is not a single drop of the superlatively soulless and sentimentalist Hebrew-manufactured pseudo-humanism of Hollywood, but an audacious aberrant array of perversely poetic tragicomic trash treasures from the sort of forsaken human rabble that spend their entire miserable lives on disability or mindlessly working themselves to death stocking shelves at Wal-Mart. A sort of horrifically humbling yet hyper humorous Amerikkkan Heimat home-movie that demonstrates why the United States is the world's foremost genetic toilet, Trailer Town is not only true independent cinema, but an absolutely authentic piece of American avant-garde cinema and libertine comedy that features a uniquely unflattering depiction of the USA as the perennially proletarian land of the culture-free and discernibly depraved. A film that proves failed bourgeois, bourgeois bastard Marx did not know shit about the working-class, Trailer Town is a rare piece of American kosher-free comedy that simultaneously cinematically farts on Woody Allen while unwittingly deconstructing every single convention of the comedy genre. A sacrilegious and shit-stained stream-of-consciousness assault on virtually every single pansy ass p.c. American taboo, Trailer Town is the anti-titillating and delightfully debasing tale of a maniac mobile home park owned by a washed-up soap opera star that is inhabited by equally washed-up libertine comedians who cannot seem to crawl out of their whisky and Heineken bottles long enough to leave their post-industrial village of vulgarity. Featuring highly quotable lines like “We drank piña colada by the pool while some raſta fairy piece of garbage fed us papaya” and “Your hole had herpes but I didn’t give a shit. I dove in” as spoken by poesy dipsomaniacs, Trailer Town is Bataille meets Burger King as seen through the cockeyed lens of America’s moſt warped ex-teenage heartthrob.

What is the ſmartheſt thing that ever came out of a woman’s mouth? According to bodacious trailer park bum Billy Cossacchi (played by Andrews ſuperſtar Bill Nowlin), “Eiſtein’s dick” is the ſmartheſt thing ever to come off a lady’s lips. In Trailer Town, there might not be many Eiſteins, but there is ſurely a curious collection of exceedingly eccentric entertainers who would probably be beſt deſcribed as dyſtopian alchemiſts as they ſurely know how to turn excrement into ſcathing comedic gold. Indeed, moſt of the characters in Trailer Town may be one or two drinks away from liver failure, but they know how to live and enjoy life, even in abject squalor. After awaking from a long night of drinking and bull-shitting, barroom hero Billy throws off his newspaper sheets and demands that his personal slave negro Stan Patrick aka ‘Stan the Nigger Man’, who fittingly sports and old school coon hat, make him a microwave burrito, which the brown brother does with guſto but not before wrapping it in skidmark-ſtained underwear. Indeed, Billy boy is certainly the maſter of his dilapidated mobile domain, but troubles arrives in Nor-Cal paradise when the pre-geriatric garbagecan man receives an eviſtion notice, thus ultimately culminating in an “aluminum holocaust” of ſorts. Of course, before tragedy ſtrikes, tons of bawdy booze-inspired poetry is vomited out by America’s laſt true rebel wordsmiths. After an exceedingly inebriated fellow named Walt Williamson (Walt Dongo) proclaims his love for getting behind the wheel and driving after drinking countless bottles of cold beer, his belligerent buddy Long Dong Ron (Vietnam Ron)—a bearded bum beaſt that makes Charles Manson ſeem like a young cultivated twink—recites a note written to himſelf, eloquently ſtating: “I fucked you on a lawn chair...paid for your liposuction...Your hole had herpes but I didn’t give a shit. I dove in. Because I float like a butterfly and ſting like a bee. The raſta fairy fucked animals...rolled us joints the ſize of toilet paper. I got you ſo ſtoned that you...allowed me to alienate your asshole with my afghan.”

Aside from poetry and ſpoken word performances, Trailer Town also features candid musical performances, including an up-close-and-personal appearance from a young white trash folk artiſt who ſings a ſcat-fueled ſong about his unſettling personal experience with “swamp water pussy,” which he follows up with a ſtory about the real-life experience that influenced the anti-salacious ſong. An elderly and rather deteriorated fellow named O-Henry (Bill Tyree) goes on a date with diarrhea (which looks like old taco beef) that ends with the old fellow getting lucky and unloading his expired ranch load on the juicy pile of rotten meat. Jolly negro Stan Patrick “tips his hat a little bit” to his would-be-white-maſter Billy and does a little Stepin Fetchit-eſque dance as he “firmly believes” that “country dancing is the answer” to all of America’s problems. After Billy boy makes a heated drunk call to the ‘fuckin’ manager’ of the trailer park where he threatens to call the ACLU due to “some fuckin’ white bitch down here with her fuckin’ white daughter livin’ with a nigger,” among countless other things, total war is declared in Trailer Town. Before the war, Billy strolls into a record store sporting a gigantic strap-on dildo and sombrero and tells the queer store clerk, “Really, what I need is some nigger music. You dirty, nigger-lovin’ cocksucker, suck this, motherfucker. I wanna hang you by your balls and shit blood in your fuckin’ mouth.” After the gay store clerk calls the cops, Billy reveals to him that his “little buttercup turned out to be a nigger fucker” and that “She was a fucking slut that gave money to the bible channel...She put canola all over her hola. She didn’t fuckin’ need to do that.” Billy may be a raving racist who hates his raunchy mudshark of a daughter, but his friend negro Stan knows he is a true sweet heart at heart, ultimately thanking him for helping to take care of “the fuckin’ black, bloody booger that gave me life” (aka his mother). Meanwhile, wild man Walt Williamson loses his marbles and shoots the fat fanboy lover of his elderly ex-girlfriend. In the end, a pussy redneck security guard with a loaded weapon shows up and the trailer park’s inhabitants, including Billy boy, get on top of their mobile homes and begin to wage battle against a one-bastard army. In the end virtually everyone dies, but not without putting up a fight, which is ultimately the moral of the innately immoral camcorder tale that is Trailer Town.

In one of the final scenes of Trailer Town, the creepy character Long Dong Ron tells the strikingly allegorical tale: “There used to be this Mexican girl that lived around here. And she had unbelievable beauty. And she always looked nice. She had tight, black pants. And her hair flowed through the wind. But she lived in this shitty apartment. It wasn’t much bigger than a toilet bowl. And it looked so strange to see such a sweet, little lovely, coming out of such a scum pit. But I’d sit there and watch her come out of that place every day though. I dreamed about riding up on a white horse and taking her away. But I thought to myself, look at what the word does to beauty. Look at where the world puts beauty. They keep beauty in shitholes!” Indeed, if Trailer Town has any message at all, it is that pulchritude and poetry can be found in the most unlikely of unhinged places, namely a Northern Californian trailer park inhabited by truly gifted ghetto showmen and gutter gurus. According to aberrant-garde auteur Giuseppe Andrews, he followed up Trailer Town with two sequels, but he tragically destroyed both of them (with no copies remaining) before they were ever released. More genuine and empathetic than anything ever directed by Harmony Korine and more waywardly melodramatic than most Fassbinder flicks (Andrews has cited Fassbinder’s I Only Want You to Love Me (1976) as a personal favorite and major influence), Trailer Town is indisputable proof that a couple alcohol-addled white trash degenerates and jaded jigaboos are intrinsically more humorous and likeable than filthy rich Hebraic Hollywood comedians like Jonah Hill, Adam Sandler, and Jon Stewart. An absurdly amateurishly assembled camcorder comedy featuring pointless hardcoded English subtitles, Trailer Town has been a favorite comedy of mine since I originally first saw it about a decade ago or so. A rare unadulterated and authentic America film that really shows the world where white America is headed (and where a large portion of the poor cracker world is at), Trailer Town is, most importantly, an antidote to the thematically nefarious and xenophiliac neo-bolshevik flicks that the psychopathic swindlers of Sunset Boulevard routinely pump out. Forget Wes Anderson, Noah Baumbach, Lena Dunham and other soulless bourgeois hipster hacks, there is more truth in one of 'Stan the Nigger Man's' steaming turds than most 'highbrow comedy' director's entire odious oeuvres.

Before I review Schoof, I think I'll take some time and address the peculiar genius of its creator. For well over ten years, Giuseppe Andrews has engaged and enraged audiences fortunate enough to stumble upon his microbudget masterpieces. With casts consisting of the denizens of his trailer park home, a video camera, and a budget of no more than a thousand dollars a picture, Andrews has managed to carve out a niche for himself in the post-post-meta, cynical landscape of contemporary cinema. What his films lack in polish or "good taste" is easily trumped by the vitality of his writing and the defiance of his imagery. The sight of a nude elderly man in a hotel room rubbing pork rinds on his penis while simulating sex with an imaginary partner ("Period Piece") might sound like an exercise in shock value, but filmed from Andrews sympathetic perspective it is instead an inspiring "fuck you" to anyone that would rather deal with issues like aging, mental illness, elderly sexuality or the consumption of meat from a safe distance. His dialogue-lewd limericks haltingly delivered by his stable of (brilliant) non-actors akin to a stable of teenage boys in an acid-induced stream-of-consciousness free-for-all is among the funniest you will ever hear. Instantly quotable, rib-tickling gems litter his films. Better still, the lack of condescension that characterizes his work. Like John Waters, you get the sense that Andrews loves his stable of derelicts, junkies, and freaks, and his films are a testament to that love as opposed to a freak show like, say, Gummo which, while not without aesthetic merit, certainly seems to laugh at and not with its white trash subjects. With this in mind, it is particularly saddening that Andrews recently announced his retirement from the world of film. In an e-mail and website statement chock full of strange new age sentiment, Giuseppe revealed that he is foregoing cinema to concentrate on making music. And while his music is fun and has its moments (if you're familiar with his films, you've heard your share of it), what the fuck?! When again will we have a maverick who finds beauty in the deep-set facial lines of Vietnam Ron or who can wring never-ending hilarity from grown men eating each others farts in a way that doesn't make one feel like a complete idiot? Who can end a film called "Who Flung Poo?" on such a note of pathos that my ex-girlfriend's lip quivered in sympathy?

"gods/goddesses, i have never talked much about my movie making experience, and the times i have for the most part hide what they were really about. Film (like all other mediums) is an artistic tool for soul-lessons, this medium in particular allows the artist to record visually the outer-life...there in lies the difficulty with it since true answers are found inside. The artist is born yearning to express to others the inner-life even if he or she doesn't realize it when they begin to explore their gifts. I became very frustrated with trying to make film exude what music can do so easily that it would be a waste of time to keep pursuing it. This exiting of the film medium is not sad for me, it is joyous! I'm glad to not be stifled any longer from what i can share with you through music about our inner-life, the outer is obviously a huge part of cinema (even for the greats) and you run into all it's lies, nonsense and agony time and time again (along with it's massive beauty too of course but the other hoops get old.) My soul learned what it needed from this medium and i am grateful for the experience, i beat every addiction, confusion and ignorance through it, and most importantly learned music from it! My greatest joys making the films were when scenes i created gave one of the actors a heightened experience that took them away from their pain, loneliness, & fears for a moment.. for me that's why they're important. i love you, giuseppe"

Anyways, Schoof, while not the best of the auteur's work, marks a major breakthrough in terms of style and ambition. An extraterrestrial curse called "schoof" has descended upon the town. Characters are driven to obsessively jump over Christmas trees, hallucinate attacks from giant hamsters, and sexually molest dolls on live television. As this is going down, two "weekend" cowboys must dispose of the body of a woman who overdoses in their hotel room, whose spirit in turn appears to her ex-boyfriend at the grave of the baby she forced him to abort with the wire coat-hanger he carries on him at all times. Along the way, we are treated to musical sequences, "special effects" sequences, and one of the more charming dildo-naming/reconciliation scenes ever committed to celluloid. While an outright description of the plot might make Schoof sound like a surefire winner, it is hurt by slack editing and a dearth of memorable dialogue. Whereas a classic like Period Piece or Who Flung Poo barrages the viewer with line after line of scatological delirium and use multiple storylines to keep the momentum going at full speed, Schoof relies far too much on being 'weird' as opposed to 'funny' and the multiple storylines don't connect in a thematically satisfying way. Period Piece, for example, consisted of many different storylines, the result of the film in fact being many shorter works combined (hence the title—a piece consisting of different works from that period in his career), but somehow manages to gel together in such a way that it never really feels like the mix-and-match job it in fact is, as all of the tangents and fragments add up to a cohesive statement about love and sex. Schoof, on the other hand, feels a little too loose for its own good. Sometimes takes drag on a little bit past where they would in a superior film, draining much of the charm from the stilted delivery. The dialogue suffers as there is more effort expended on surreal, nonsensical statements fueled by the schoof curse than on the poetic potty-mouthed diatribes of past classics. Furthermore, I for one was excited from the description to see Andrews work within the confines of a genre film, but for the most part it feels not unlike his other work, only with the addition of some sci-fi asides to set up the surreal goings-on. What does work? Marybeth Sychalski, Andrews' main squeeze in real life, makes for an appealing narrator and is all kinds of a babe. The low-rent special effects, be it the cut-and-paste "giant hamster", the radioactive shrimp tempura, or an alien battle that creatively uses sound to create an otherworldly vibe, are great fun. Best of all, the movie ends on a musical note that is no doubt indicative of the direction Andrews would soon take in eschewing film in favor of his musical ambitions, as the entire cast join hands to sing the extraterrestrials into submission. It is inspiring, uplifting, and a great end to a so-so flick. Even at his most uneven, Giuseppe Andrews is a talent to be reckoned with. One can only hope his sabbatical from film is short-lived, as filmmakers this intense, inspired, and completely free of obvious influences are increasingly hard to come by in this age of remakes, homages, and ironic distancing.

MALÈNA

Malena is a coming of age film about a young boy named Renato and his obsession with the most beautiful woman in Sicily. This striking woman is named Malena and all the women in town are jealous of her for obvious reasons. As soon as Renato sees Malena his life is forever changed. He starts spying on the beautiful Sicilian every chance he gets. He also starts masturbating while thinking of Malena and her exaggerated curves. Little Renato is truly a hopeless romantic. Malena follows in the steps of the legendary Italian filmmakers. Federico Fellini's films were the biggest influence on Malena as the prepubescent masturbation in the film demonstrates. I couldn't help but think Amarcord, 8 ½, and I vitelloni had an influence on Malena. I had a young Sicilian American friend growing up and I would be lying if I didn't say Renato reminded me of him. Italian coming of age films, despite their perversity, are heartwarming to say the least. The beautiful Monica Bellucci is amazing as Malena. Despite her lack of dialogue in the film, Malena carries the film with her beauty. Monica Bellucci makes Marilyn Monroe look like a cheap dollar store blonde by comparison. Mrs. Bellucci has deadly and bare curves in the film that catches any living male's fancy. Little Renato is quite mature and wise for his age. Malena is set during World War II and despite the chaotic time period, the film is for the most part a happy experience. One scene had me angered when a group of aged Sicilian women are finally able to take out their inferiority regarding their aged looks out on the young Malena. Malena is tragically beat and has her hair cutoff by the overweight wop women. The only thing these spiteful women are good for is making calzones. A brief Nazi orgy scene in Malena reminded of the great Italian erotic and exploitation films of yesteryear. Malena is truly a trip down Italian cinema memory lane which is something I can always appreciate. This is a film for any male that has a beating heart and love for film. Although Renato never "hooks up" with Malena, he is happy helping her in the end. What a splendid film indeed.

WILLARD

Glen Morgan (2003) The way acting supports a film is like the way condiments make food better. Some brainless films don't need incredible acting; like Jumper. With Willard, another remake of a classic horror film, the above par notch for remakes is set even higher by the eccentric headliner Crispin Glover who completely reworks the film at its foundation. The plot is familiar. Willard Stiles is a man whose life has been destroyed due to his fathers death and his mothers ailness. Similar to Jackson's gorefest Dead Alive, both children have much maturing to do and leaves them with a distorted sense of reality. Willard works a deadend job with no friends. His boss happens to be R. Lee Ermey, and as this role applies, a lot of emotional damage occurs from this bastard. Eventually he finds solace in an incredibly intelligent white rat he named Socrates. Using his new friends, he decides to bite back at everything that has caused him pain over the years. So we have a "When Animals Attack!" film with a deep psychological burning inside of it. This by itself makes it a great movie. A beautiful though occurs within all of Glovers films. When you think about him acting in all these common popular films, it's nice to see his privately funded artistic visions being produced with his own brand of sacrifice. The acting is phenomenally deranged and poignant. Willard is truly a disturbed man. There is no real sense of accomplishment for him, only sorrow, which he uses to fuel his silent rage. Willard is a landmark in mainstream cinema, bringing harsh realities in touch with the common viewer. This film is perfectly complimented by Crispin Glover's music video "Ben". In the music video, you will see trademark Glover, as philosophers and Hitler make an appearance.

I SELL THE DEAD

Glenn McQuaid° (2008)

Straight from the horse's mouth comes the base element of I Sell the Dead. Only since it established off of a very similar presentation of reflective nurseries dictated from a dead man walking was it able to gain a fresh and authoritative vision of cinematic entertainment. Glenn McQuaid has shown us the potential for Irish period horror-com's and boy does the future look dead since we can all agree this clever film was a fluke. Must I recall painful and scathing memories of the late Bernie Mac's Irish performance in Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle? For this reason, I refuse to acknowledge that McG is directing a new Terminator film. Had he any doubt of seriousness, he would have changed his gay ass name into something a bit more professional and not something kids in the 3rd grade nicked him.

I Sell the Dead is a rather whimsical piece of horror/comedy that would eventually erupt, violently, in murder, supernatural mystique, and rival gang drama. Basically, this film is equipped with what it needs to entertain thoroughly and not bore a single fan. Dominic Monaghan is the apprentice underling of an infamous grave robber by the name of Willy. Only just recently, Willy met his fate at the guillotine for a frame job convicting him of murder. Well, the same fate has hit his partner, Arthur, as he awaits trial by execution and his only saving grace is pleading his life story to a passive-aggressive priest played by Ron Perlman. The following recited tale is a brilliant story of a pair of down-on-their-luck grave robbers and how they struggle to cope with thievery, deceit, zombies, vampires, wait what?

This cunning idea that's presented in I Sell the Dead is an unsuspecting creeper -- one that waits for you to enjoy what the film gives you and surprises you with fantastical tales that don't seem to fit the current scheme of things. After the slew of proportions panned out, I certainly wasn't expecting the roles of vampires and zombies to be entering my visions. I was expecting a cultural "fuck all" which gingerly describes most period pieces now-a-days but what I got was a film that starkly illustrated good times in the events of two bumbling would-be heroes. Budget based on reputation and directed towards slimy aesthetics is the formulaic stamp of period pieces. Recreating an era takes time and this doesn't even begin to cover the story at all. These "famous frauds" should be stripped of the worthy title of "Director" and be listed as an incompetent costume designer but wait, Irony prevails as that listed job already exists. Homo sapien decor has never been so frivolous. To add to the already stiff blessing you've received from the dear company of I Sell the Dead, this also marks a horror comedy that doesn't entirely insult your intelligence. Fact of the matter is that most of these hybrids flat out suck on terms of scares, humor, and overall direction. Severed head gags work to a stifled extent and armed with predictability, can drag a film to hell with a non-styled free fall of "been there, seen that." I Sell the Dead is probably one of Ireland's only recent point of characters; the irony resides in the shooting location of New York, but alas, all's well. I Sell the Dead is still one of the only "great" horror comedies recently that see to the entertainment of the potential audience.

CAPTURED FOR SEX 2
CAPTURED FOR SEX 2

Gô Ijuuin (1986)

This rough ero-gro pinku film is a rough, sentimental film that focuses on the bizarre change between extreme pain and enormous pleasure. The beginning of this film shows a young couple driving down a trail in the forest when, you know it, their automobile breaks down. Before they get the chance to sulk, a strange passerby offers to fix the car the next day. They enjoy his shaded company with some sake and a weird shaped bath tub.

Later that day, Miki runs out screaming for some unknown reason and she notices their car is gone. Cue the creepy man with a knife leading them back into the house before tying them up tight and forcing her to perform fellatio on her significant other. This is only the beginning of this descent into the beautiful annals of BDSM and forced Ecstasy. Shiko Shima (Antagonist) forces him to perform cunnilingus on the poor girl and sodomize her with various objects before getting raped repeatedly. After many cruel scenes of torture and erotic situations, the captor begins to make it into more of a visual art performance. Carressing her flesh with lit candles while managing to find the deepest beauty in her squeals and whines. After becoming a voyeur in these tactics, the salaryman boyfriend notices this excites him in ways never trekked and sparks unknown desires. After escaping, he begs to become the mans apprentice. He is then a pawn in the cruel twisted games he entrenches his girlfriend in. After they use her body in disgusting ways such as filling her anus with a milk enema and corking it in for weeks only to let it spew out, they find new targets. Kidnapping young girls off the street and taking them back their hut of pleasure, they make these poor women slaves to their game. After all is said and done, Captured For Sex 2 is an erotic masterpiece. Comparable to such great films like Blind Beast, this film is certainly not for everyone and may be deemed disgusting, perverse, or even untañteful, but if you have a keen eye for the elegance of depravity and sadomasochism, this film is yours. The one fact about this film that will enhance the viewing pleasure is that Shiko Shima is actually famous in Japan for being the king of S & M. He revealed his fetish to the public and opened up a VIP torture chamber in which he trained over 3,500 women the art of sadism. Some of the acts in this film are arousing and some of them are putrid. One scene involves filling an anus with marbles and flushing it with wine. Then letting it sit until she loses bowel control filling a funnel with a tasty cocktail. We have whippings, beatings, burning, wax tickling, bondage, forced discharge consumption and many more neatly wrapped into a tough product to swallow. The title of this film refers it to be the sequel to Captured For Sex but it is actually a loose sequel to Ikenie. The original Captured For Sex was actually a sequel to Daydream, another pinku XXX film involving strange set pieces. Captured For Sex 2 is a bizarre ride through lust, pain, and the transgression of normal pain. It is not to be missed and it will not be forgotten.

LATE BLOOMER
LATE BLOOMER

Gô Shibata (2004)

So many clustered feelings on this film, all of which are incredibly favorable. Late Bloomer is probably the most responsive film I've seen in quite some time. Taking cues from masterful pieces of disturbing fiction and presenting it in such a fashionable manner requires tedious work. Even better, Late Bloomer may have been a film exercise that came naturally. I don't believe we'll ever discover the genius within that wrapped this project up in a tight little package. Taking a controversial step in hiring an actor with cerebral palsy to play Sumida - a blood-fueled vengeful handicapped person, Late Bloomer takes a step towards visualizing a steam punk movement with the beeline track the camera gestures towards. A smoky venue for his friend Take's punk band gives dismal light to nightmarish fantasies of revenge and retribution, all homicidal in nature. Presented in unnerving gray-scale, Late Bloomer features a comfortable life for Sumida. Clinging to visions of partying, beer, and women, Sumida hires a young college girl to be his caregiver. After her affection is blessed to Take, Sumida slowly erupts in a fit of jealousy that will be one for the books. Though not barbaric in nature, his curiosity with life and death leans towards extremes on both ends. Unsatisfied with life, he decides to take and satisfied with taking, he himself seems without life. The result is a tableaux of nerve-shredding avant-garde cinema. Late Bloomer encompasses ideas that I, myself, are uncomfortable visualizing. When I see someone with down-syndrome, thoughts come flooding into play. "Do they understand vengeful nature?" That amongst others rush forward but I doubt I'll ever get an answer lest I fall victim to one myself.

World's End Girlfriend composes the soundtrack to Late Bloomer and might I say, I've never heard such a deeply affecting and perfectly juxtaposed soundtrack giving life to calamitous intent and whatever-form of innocence this depicts. Watching Sumida's disfigured body twist and contort with frightening detail, all while wielding a knife, comes off as repulsively shocking and grotesque. Late Bloomer has been called a hybrid of the serial killer genre and this assertion is highly accurate. At first, his motives come off as vengeful but soon his victims are randomized. He kills without decision, without empathy. Soon, his already-crippling handicap results in him appearing brain dead. By way of superior editing tricks, Go Shibata will immerse you in a world I fear you may never return from. Late Bloomer is the birth of a naturalist noise-horror, something more akin to everyday social activities but infused with passive soundscapes. Late Bloomer definitely fits the motives of noise music and goes well with brainstorming over the likes of Kites and Caen. This is one film that doesn't spout grandeur of a "Could-be serial killer living next door" and Late Bloomer certainly doesn't give color to the scenario. What we get is starkly real and one of the greatest foreign films I've seen in some time. Occasionally, I found a slight flaw in the process of Late Bloomer but a mistake during birth can be applied to most things. Late Bloomer is a tour de force on terms of revolutionary Japanese psycho-cinema. From the scene in which Aya asks Sumida if he wishes he was born normal and his disturbing speak'n'spell device replying "I - will - kill - you," we accept our fate to be entwined in the absolute experience that is Late Bloomer. Seizure-driven and casually over-the-top, Late Bloomer will leave you marked as there is no way to escape both the wrath of Sumida or Late Bloomer. As an experience, Late Bloomer is raw and scathing; along the lines of something I'll never count on seeing again.

MARUTA 3 ... DESTROY ALL EVIDENCE

Godfrey Ho (1994)

Alternately titled Men Behind the Sun 3: A Narrow Escape, Maruta 3 is a spiritual sequel to T.F. Mou's Men Behind the Sun. Having previously directed Men Behind the Sun 2: Laboratory of the Devil, Godfrey Ho returns to the reigns of schlock-shock with an entirely unnecessary sequel to a film that needn't a sequel. I had previously reviewed this film, unbeknownst to me as I set out to watch it. This must say something about the quality of the film for I only felt a twinge of Déjà vu once but kindly shrugged it off. What a coincidence it was to see that a comment had been left on my older review the day I happened to revisit the dreadful film. Regardless of this minor setback, I intend to update my previous thoughts of Maruta 3 with knowledge of the atrocities in depth as documented in the late Iris Chang's document The Rape of Nanking: The Forgotten Holocaust of World War II. You see, the pressure from such aggravated Japanese nationalists and the burden of the pain suffered by her people pushed Mrs. Chang into taking her own life. This itself is an event with such deadly agitation that no bargain exploitation title could ever encompass.

What Godfrey Ho succeeds at is a feat that should be, unquestionably, easy enough for a child to pull off; capturing the grueling patriotism of the Japanese. Maruta 3 takes place as Unit 731 struggles to escape with the secret of the atrocities committed intact. The comical aspect of this is Godfrey Ho's notorious ability to make even the most dramatic of instances into running gags and Maruta 3 is no stranger to this. The character Ito in Maruta 3 bears a fatal infection in a manner linearly comparable to Godfrey Ho's filmmaking, from which stems a powerful irony. This is illustrated in keen example as a commanding officer issues the news that Japan has surrendered to the invading Russian forces. This, in turn, prompts a scene in which many-a-soldier commits seppuku and/or take their own lives with a complimentary vial of arsenic. A scene of this sort should idolize the selfless servant to state but under God Ho's command becomes that of sketch comedy. This play on death is as rigid and under-realized as a theater form - lapsing in and out of dramatic prose. The rat-trap that Ho got twisted up in past the error of his Chinese-shit aesthetic was his laziness combined with his willingness to disturb. This led him to recycle past footage of the original Men Behind the Sun within Maruta 3. While Godzilla could somewhat successfully use this to its advantage, in Maruta 3, this leads to many characters reminiscing the cruelties suffered by Chinese prisoners of war with contrived flashback sequences and the obligatory "Oh god, what have we done?" tantrum.

Regarding Godfrey's cost-effective decision to recycle scenes of grue, you'd think handling a scene in which a group of demoralized soldiers overlook a train station littered with assorted clothing and blood spilled everywhere would be moving, at least minimally. This sequel has nowhere near the same effect as the original, neither in shock value or in exploitive tone. While Maruta 3 may include scenes of live autopsies and the obligatory severed-limb-in-jar, the film can not sustain any form of shock value nor can it withhold any emotional impact, let alone impact of any kind. Maruta 3 will dissolve as salt in water after your introductory viewing. Take my prior inspection for example. I forgot I had even seen this film, let alone reviewed it. I'd recommend avoiding this title at all costs as you, too, might end up viewing this waste of entitlement twice, as I have already done. If you haven't viewed the original Men Behind the Sun, do so immediately as it serves as a rite of passage for any aspiring "cult" or "gore" fan, catering to both with its illicit controversy.

Godfrey Ho attempts to take duty in either immortalizing the horrors of Unit 731 or slandering the ordeal. I cannot tell because either way this experiment was a failure. Maruta 3 just equates into an anti-Japanese sentiment aimed straight for the heart of Manchuria. The guilty party within the film feign a guilty conscience but to pull off an emotional effect as such, would require skilled actors, which I'm sure Godfrey Ho does not have at his disposal. Not even the angst or the cultural reconciliation make this film anything other than a visual distraction from superior daily duties such as washing dishes. The namesake of the film's English distribution alone should exist a shred of enjoyment to be had in this slice of Oriental schlock, but behold, a barren viewing experience. Maruta 3 features no sex, hardly any original performances of violence, and a whole helpings worth of dismal drama to be consumed. It is hardly a way to spend a Saturday night, that is for sure. Of course, we get it Godfrey, "casualties of war...". As far as his ethnicity goes, Godfrey Ho appealed to the title Men Behind the Sun as this doomed unit of "unspeakable evil" needed their cinematic comeuppance. Imagine a film presenting Unit 731 without the cruel, hyper-aesthetic of Russian auteur Andrey Iskanov or the amiable T.F. Mou. Maruta 3 stands as a drab war drama that closes on a note of superior cinematography; a scene of a live burial, the only iconic image in the film.

Gordon Douglas (1954) AKA Ils/Them is a film that debuted in Europe in 2006, "terrifying" the nation. It is based on actual events which, when known, are pretty horrifying. While it is a very effective film and has a great feel, the film does drag in many spots and leads to much frustration. The plot has a minimalistic feel. A loving couple in their inconveniently placed home one night, become under siege from a group of unidentified things. Them had a lot of hype for me. Seeing the clips and the trailers, it seemed that it might even scare me. With these expectations in mind, i set out to begin watching it. The action picks up rather quick within the first 15 minutes and doesn't let up until the end. It runs at about 77 minutes, which is not long for a feature length film, but keeps you entertained, which is a great thing. The directing style seemed bland, too many contrived shots on things of no purpose and the lack of lighting to add to the feel. The lack of lighting worked for The Descent but was not needed in this film. Even in areas of natural light, it was still too dark. It's hard to praise a stalk/slash film for having realistic actions. We all claim we would grab a knife, but who knows? Terror has an adverse effect on the brain and we won't know until we are placed in said situation. Many of the sets were manufactured to thrill and scare, which was annoying. Scenes like a plastic sheet corridor in her attic and manufactured sound effects to startle. The plastic scene looked ripped from Child's Play 2. It was like a French survival horror version of Shyamalan's Signs, except without aliens. The sound effects were extremely effective at times, rarely getting dull, but what this film did reminds me of what Open Water did, take an event that not much is known about, and give it some expressionist feel to it and try to create wacky situations and moods. Most of what happened could not even be possible for the attackers to do. By halfway through the film, i knew only the ending could save it. It had gotten repetitious and undeserving of this title. Most French directors even seem to come in Duo's now. This couple also being responsible for the beyond horrendous unnecessary remake of The Eye. It seems one persons vision of a film is not enough anymore. The single most powerful theme in the movie was the ending. Based on a true story, once it dawns on you, i promise your jaw will hit the floor. If you want the full effect of this film, it's best to not watch any of the trailers or clips. You know how American trailers love to throw every scare scene in a 2 minute mash-up, call it a trailer, and ruin every chiller moment.

SHAOLIN /& WU TANG

Gordon Liu Chia-Hui (1983)

I'm a big fan of modern martial arts films. As tacky and contrived as they are, I still squeeze everything out of them and relax while taking in the amazing cinematography with the stunning choreography. In fact, nothing pleases me more than a Tony Jaa film. The man can fight, jump, fly, and kill. He is a mortal Thai Terminator. In my childhood, I dabbled a bit in the classics of old Chinese martial arts but never was enthralled by what I was witnessing. Years later, I picked up Shaolin & Wu Tang for two reasons. 1. Wu Tang Clan. This dynamic rap group has not only changed the face of time itself, but also the business of music and myself. It has opened me to broader horizons in the face of challenging musical interests and granted me immunity within the Negroes. 2. Xenon Pictures. This is the same company that has released the Dolemite collection, so ultimately I can dig it. I honestly didn't know what to expect besides aged fighting moves and horrible dubs presented on a presentation which feels like a once recorded over VHS. The film instantly starts out with a breathtaking introduction of a lone fighter training in a room full of monks amidst a vast sparring arena covered with beautiful hanzi scattering the room- both painted on the wall and suspended from the ceiling. The choreography of the past is unmatched even by our contemporary martial arts. Most of these "Actors" actually believed in the laws and rules of their chosen styles. Religion played a huge role in training and real fighters didn't have trailers and multi-million dollar budgets. The merits and honor of being a true fighter has all but evaporated. Shaolin & Wu Tang has risen the bar for martial arts films worldwide. To go along with the film, is Wu Tang Clan's debut album Enter the Wu Tang (36 Chambers). The RZA has taken his single passion - Kung Fu films - and formed an entire dynasty of music and memorabilia around a Chinese theme. After kicking the music industry's ass, he resided in making music for Tony Jaa's The Protector and Afro Samurai. I even hear rumors of an Eli Roth produced grisly splatter fest incorporating the RZA and Wu Tang. It is a vast epic, depicting two rivaling clans warring over which fighting style is better - Shaolin or Wu Tang. In the end, friendships will be challenged, traitors will be unearthed, people will die, and I will feel a whole lot better about witnessing the greatest Martial Arts spectacle to ever grace my home theater system.

Gordon Willis (1980)

Despite the fact that it is no secret that a remarkably large number of violent female criminals and prison inmates are estrogen-deprived bull-dykes, politically organized carpet-munchers feel the need to go out of their way to obscure this unspoken fact that all crime statistics confirm, as if it will compromise the fact that a good number of prominent feminist leaders and theorists are also emotionally glacial clit-hoppers. Indeed, heterosexual murderers typically use more inconspicuous and passive-aggressive means of murder as the countless female serial killers who utilized arsenic and other poisons on their unwitting victims demonstrates. Notably, even as far as back as 1980 way before the release of Paul Verhoeven's lesbo-inciting neo-noir Basic Instinct (1992), organized gusset-nuzzlers become quite pissy over the pseudo-artsy-fartsy thriller Windows (1980) directed by Gordon Willis because of its depiction of a stuttering socially retarded bourgeois broad becoming the love obsession of a lethally loony lesbo with a rather raspy voice who is murderously jealous of men and their members. Starring the somewhat strange guidette Talia Shire—the sister of filmmaker Francis Ford Coppola and 'cinematic wife' of Rocky Balboa of Rocky fame—as a sexual assault victim who also happens to be the object of insane infatuation of a deranged dyke who hired a sleazy taxi driver to molest her beloved 'friend' so she can use an audio recording of the molestation as an extra intimate masturbation aid, the film is also notable for being the first and last film directed by cinematographer turned one-time auteur Gordon Willis, who was responsible for the striking cinematography of such classics as Coppola's The Godfather trilogy (1972-1990), as well as Woody Allen's Annie Hall (1977) and Manhattan (1979), among various other notable works. Featuring a vaguely arthouse style that seems to attempt to blend Hitchcock with the La Nouvelle Vague, Windows was a five time nominee of the less than coveted Golden Raspberry Award (including Willis for 'Worst Director,' which Kubrick was also absurdly nominated for his as a consequence of his work on the now-classic film The Shining (1980)) and was later more or less disowned by the director, though not because he succumbed to Sapphic outrage as one would probably suspect, especially nowadays where everyone is afraid to offend the pink gestapo and gynocentric misandrists. While the closest thing to a dyke equivalent to William Friedkin's killer cocksucker cult classic Cruising (1980) in terms of its themes and the controversy surrounding its release, Windows ultimately feels like a shallow celluloid tourist guide of late-1970s/early-1980s NYC and its landmark that had the potential to be great but hardly goes anywhere and never rewards the viewer in any way. Indeed, the film is just another example of how great cinematographers oftentimes make ludicrously lousy film directors, hence why Willis never directed another single film but instead wisely opted to spend the rest of his career shooting works for other directors. Like an aimlessly voyeuristic Hitchcock's Rear Window (1954) meets the aesthetics of Woody Allen's Interiors (1978) meets a retarded smidgen of Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976) and a weak impotent Maniac (1980), the film is basically a less than seamlessly synthesized hodgepodge of cinematic references with a mis-used score by maestro Ennio Morricone that ultimately adds up to nothing aside from an unfortunate wasted attempt to make a classic cult film about a crazed killer carpet-muncher.

Emily Hollander (Talia Shire) is a fiercely frigid and annoyingly soft-spoken introverted female who in the process of divorcing her pansy intellectual husband and unbeknownst to her, her raspy-voiced crypto-dyke friend and fellow assumed Jewess friend Andrea Glassen (Elizabeth Ashley) is completely infatuated with her to the point where she is willing to kill to send a sort of insanely eccentric esoteric message to her beloved in the form of sleazy sexual violence. In fact, Andrea is so decidedly deranged that she hires a ludicrously low-class white trash taxi driver to sexually assault Emily so she can have an audio masturbation aid source of sorts. Notably, Andrea has the unsavory molester use a tape recorder while he defiles Emily so that she can have an amorous audio gift that keeps on giving. Indeed, Andrea gets all hot and bothered listening to Emily moan in pain and distress, thereupon demonstrating she is a sadomasochistic Sappho. As a strange and introverted woman who stutters when she gets afraid and even owns an entire bookshelf worth of books on how to train yourself to stop stuttering, Emily certainly seems like a sort of mousy carpet-muncher and her seeming growing resentment for men only makes matters worse, so it is ultimately a sort of blessing in disguise in the end that she becomes the victim of a fierce fairy lady. In a most arrogant fashion, Andrea even attempts to coerce Emily into not telling a police officer about the circumstances of her attack and attacker by arguing, "You don't have to tell him anything, you know...He's never going to catch who did it." Andrea also has the taxi driver come by Emily's place again so that she can pretend to be the protagonist's savior by smashing the molester's arm into door when he attempts to break in while acting as if she is as brave and as strong as a man or something absurd like that. Naturally, after being maliciously molested, Emily unsurprisingly decides to move to a new apartment on the other side of town and also soon starts a romance with an uncommonly empathetic and handsome police detective named Bob Luffrono (Joe Cortese), thus causing Andrea to become all the more insane with bloodlust and murderous jealousy. Of course, Andrea decides to secretly rent a flat across a bridge from Emily's new apartment and uses a telescope to spy on her every move in a creepily voyeuristic Rear Window-esque fashion. While Andrea regularly goes to a psychiatrist to get much needed psychological help, her shrink Dr. Marin (Michael Lipton) seems to make her all the more deranged and resentful. Indeed, no amounting of talking and confessing can calm Andrea's rising rug-muncher rage.

In a rather convenient instance of happenstance, Emily ends up taking a taxi that is driven by her attacker whose name is Leonard Obecny (Rick Petrucci) and who only seems to subconsciously realize that he is driving around his victim, who makes the mistake of being not so nice to thus exposing the same exact gutter-grade tone of voice that he used when assaulting the protagonist. Ultimately, Emily begins to realize that the taxi driver is her attacker after he gets mad at her and violently screams at her for calling him 'Leonard,' rather rudely remarking to her, "Why do you keep calling me Larry? Lawrence is my name. Larry is bullshit." After coercing the taxi driver into pulling over she can use a payphone, Emily manages to get Leonard arrested and when he is in custody, he confesses that he has an accomplice but he absurdly tells the cops that he won't tell them who his partner is unless they promise to let him go free. Needless to say, Andrea eventually begins to completely lose it due to Emily's new relationship with cop Bob and begins murdering people, including her crush's elderly Jewish neighbor Sam Marx (Michael Gorin). Emily also gets quite the scare when she opens her freezer and finds her precious orange kitty cat frozen-to-death inside. When Andrea's psychiatrist wisely attempts to have her committed, she violently slaughters him and heads to her secret loft so that she can plot to make Emily her sexual plaything.

Of course, Andrea eventually has Emily come to her apartment and it does not take the protagonist long after finding the crypto-carpet-muncher's telescope to realize that she has spying on her and that she is the deranged stalker killer that killed her kitty cat and elderly friend. After Emily realizes that the telescope is pointed right at her apartment window, aberrosexual psycho-cunt Andrea appears out the darkness like a truly ghoulish gay gal and scares the shit out of the protagonist with her creepy lezzy lurker behavior. After scaring the hell out of Emily by smashing the telescope, Andrea becomes deleteriously delusional and cries "You can never love me...don't lie to me. I couldn't bear it if you lied to me," so the protagonist lies and says she can learn to be a fairy lady. Ultimately, Emily ends up staying up all night with Andrea and the next morning the loony lesbo even admits to having hired taxi driver Leonard to molest her, bragging, "I could have hurt you but I didn't. I kept it from happening." Eventually, Andrea begins demanding that Emily take her shirt off just like Leonard did when he molested her while stating pathetic things like, "lift up the sweater" and "show me what you showed him." When Emily continues to refuse to take off her sweater, Andrea suffers a violently pathetic and hysterical spastic attack as a result of feeling rejected, so the protagonist smacks her in the face and tells her to stop, thus causing the deranged dyke to cower and cry, "Don't hurt me. Please, don't hurt me," as if she is an innocent victim and not a deadly sapphic she-bitch. Of course, policeman Bob and his comrades eventually show up and arrest Andrea and assumedly send her to a prison where she will undoubtedly be able to cure her latent lesbianism. In the end, Emily states to Bob regarding Andrea, "She would have never done anything to me." Indeed, although a mad murderer, Andrea is a prisoner of lady-lover love and would not dare to personally physically hurt the object of her desire as she lacked the gall, hence why she hired a dirty half-retarded cabbie to do it for her.

While the idea of a film where an ambiguously Jewish and superlatively sexually repressed lesbo lunatic begins slaughtering people because she is too cowardly to confess her delusional love to her friend surely sounds intriguing, Windows is an absurdly aimless celluloid abortion that is as anti-climatic as pussy-on-pussy penetration. Notably, director Gordon Willis would later state about the film, "One of the mistakes I did in my life was to make that movie," curiously adding, "The Germans and Swedes like it, though, for some reason," thus indicating that the Germanic world might have a surplus population of sadomasochistic bean-flickers. Apparently, Willis more regretted having to deal with the mental problems of high maintenance actors/actress than dealing with the theme of lunatic lesbos, or as he stated, "I've had a good relationship with actors...but I can do what I do and back off. I don't want that much romancing. I don't want them to call me up at two in the morning saying, 'I don't know who I am.'" Ultimately, to appease his LGBT attackers, Willis would deny that the film was even actually about dykes, arguing, "WINDOWS is not about homosexuality – it's about insanity," as if the two things are always mutually exclusive. Of course, the insanity depicted in the film is of the unequivocally deranged dyke sort, with the villainous fitting various carpet-muncher clichés in her perturbing mental pathologies, as she seems like some sort of frigid feminist leader who did not get her fair share of lecherous lady-loving. In the end, Windows seems like a botched cautionary tale that attempts to warn quasi-autistic and otherwise socially retarded women who have become disillusioned with men due to their own inadequacies about what might happen if they give up on heterosexuality and opt to convert to lily-licking. While Windows certainly demonstrates why Willis earned the nickname 'The Prince Of Darkness' due to the oftentimes dark and shadowy style of his cinematography, directing a film takes more effort than merely being able to immaculately frame a shot in appropriate lighting, which is something the cinematographer seemed to learn the hard way as the director of what is arguably the most banal lesbian thriller ever made. Indeed, Hungarian-German auteur Fred Kelemen is also a master of dimly lit cinematography yet the films he shot for Béla Tarr are far superior to anything he has ever directed himself. Additionally, Dutch cinematographer Jan de Bont managed to help contribute to what is arguably the most strange and fiercely foreboding cinematic atmosphere of Dutch cinema history when he shot the Willem Frederik Hermans adaptation De blinde fotograaf (1973) aka The Blind Photographer directed by Adriaan Ditvoorst, but he ultimately sired one of the biggest and most horrendous Hollywood horror turds of the 1990s when he directed the

The Haunting (1999). Admittedly, Windows is effective in one way in that it fills the viewer with a sense of revulsion for lesbians, especially those of the ostensibly cultivated NYC-bred Jewess sort, thus I can almost understand why gay groups would protest the film. After all, at least William Friedkin's Cruising gives a certain dark romanticism to the S&M leather-fag realm, which certainly cannot be said of Willis' film, which makes dykes seem like the most bat-shit crazy yet paradoxically banal and lonely people around.

MRS. MEITLEMEIHR

Graham Rose (2002)

Probably no other contemporary actor has portrayed Adolf Hitler and various other Nazi leaders more times, at least in such a stoically campy fashion, than unambiguously gay German character actor Udo Kier (Blood for Dracula, Nárcisz és Psyché), with his role as a sort of scatological 'Asshole Shitler' in Christoph Schlingensief's spastic satire 100 Jahre Adolf Hitler - Die letzte Stunde im Führerbunker (1989) aka 100 Jahre Adolf Hitler - Die letzte Stunde im Führerbunker being one of the most devastatingly deranged depictions of the Führer in all of cinema history. While Schlingensief's Hitler flick is not exactly well known, it is certainly better known the 29-minute British dark comedy short Mrs. Meitlemeihr (2002) directed and co-written by successful advert man turned would-be-filmmaker Graham Rose, co-penned by English actor Jeff Rawle (Billy Liar, Drop the Dead Donkey) and starring Herr Kier as Big H in old hag drag. Indeed, a work of degenerate historical fantasy, Graham's film depicts a decidedly desperate Hitler disguised as a woman and hiding out in late-1940s rubble-ridden London amongst assorted human rabble. Needless to say, Mrs. Meitlemeihr is in the timeless British tradition of being resentful regarding the Second World War and thus features a one-dimensional depiction of Hitler as an intolerable and intolerant raving buffoon, albeit this time wearing a granny wig and dress. Undoubtedly, the big twist of the film is that a perverted old Jewish widow becomes obsessed with attempting to get inside Hitler's granny panties, not realizing that he is trying to fuck the great Führer himself. Keeping that dubious and easy-to-botch premise in mind, it is easy to see why Mrs. Meitlemeihr, which was originally intended as demo piece to entice prospective investors for a bigger and more elaborate production, was never made into a full-length feature film as was originally planned by Mr. Rose. If there is any group that hates Hitler and the Germans more than the Jews, it is indubitably the Brits, and with good reason. While the Jews at least got their first official nation in thousands of years out of the holocaust, the Second World War not only cost the Brits their empire and domination of the world, but also their pride and dignity. As revealed in the great German documentary The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money (1998) directed by Hermann Vaske and hosted by Dennis Hopper, like the Jews, the Brits adopted comedy as a way to relieve their pain and naturally Uncle Adolf became the incessant butt of the jokes for countless hack England comedians and has remained so for no less than over half a century. With the somewhat recent tabloid rumor that Hitler went into hiding after the Second World War, died in South America in 1984 at the age of 95, and even had a negress girlfriend, I felt a little bit eager about watching a film as seemingly as stupid and insipid regarding the National Socialist leader's imaginary post-WWII years and Mrs. Meitlemeihr certainly fit the bill as a work that also once again demonstrates that the English have an unhealthy obsession with men wearing dresses.

It is April 1945 and Adolf Hitler (Udo Kier) has decided to opt out on his part of his suicide pact with his long-term companion Eva Braun (Tara Ward), who he married only less than 40 hours before she put a bullet in her brain. Indeed, bloated bastard Martin Bormann (Hendrik Arnst) has a transport ready for Hitler to escape to Argentina, as they plan to start building a Fourth Reich from scratch once they get settled in their new adopted homeland. To fake big H's death, a SS man shoots a nerdy man that vaguely resembles the Führer in the head and uses his corpse as a body double for the Allies to find. Flash forward to November 1947 and somehow Uncle Adolf did not make it to scenic Argentina, as he is now stuck in an impoverished white ghetto in London, even complaining in a letter to his boy Bormann: "My struggle to exist here is becoming intolerable. Still no papers! Every day I wait, but nothing. Since our last communication, the money is all but gone. I'm starving. And have been reduced to filth and squalor. How much longer must I endure this humiliation? This room where I must remain prisoner is a living nightmare. I fear, above all, that my identity will be revealed. I dare not venture out, but I must! My health is deteriorating by the day. You're my only hope and salvation. In the name of the Fatherland, I beg of you, Bormann...Communicate!" The fallen Führer is so poor that he does not even have a stamp to send the letter, so he has to go to the post office to buy one with what little money he has left. To hide his identity, Hitler decides to dress in drag and use the alias Mrs. Meitlemeihr. Unfortunately for Adolf, there is an exceedingly annoying Jewish widow that lives in London that has a thing for somewhat masculine Fräuleins.

On the way to the post office, some rotten little sub-literate Brit boys playing with a rugged dummy with a Hitler mask make the mistake of begging Hitler for money, but the cross-dressing Wagnerian Übermensch is not amused by the lads' crude cardboard caricature of him, so he states in German, "What insolence. You ought to be locked up." When Hitler finally gets to the post-office, the elderly clerk, who is hard of hearing, has a very hard time understanding what the lapsed Nazi messiah is saying, so he states under his breath, "I hate zee handicapped." After leaving the post office, Hitler is followed by a Jewish widow named Lenny Veldermann (John Levitt) who, for whatever reason, is rather attracted to the world's most infamous anti-Semite. It turns out that Lenny—a stereotypically sleazy, pushy, and wisecracking Hebrew—lives in the same dilapidated apartment building as Uncle Adolf. Needless to say, Lenny invites himself over to Hitler's apartment for dinner without actually getting permission, as he hopes to get lucky with Herr Hitler. While Hitler complains, "I've been betrayed...forgotten. FORGOTTEN! Hated!" during the dinner, the Jew self-righteously states that the Germans must "accept their guilt" for the holocaust. Needless to say, Hitler becomes infuriated and hatefully shouts, "The Germans will rise again” and then states in German, “The German spirit...will be the world’s salvation.” When the two men get drunk and Hitler passes out, Veldermann attempts to take advantage of the unconscious Führer, but when the Jew reaches up his dress to cop a feel, he screams “a cock” and a brawl breaks out between the two born adversaries. After strangling the Jew and stating “Jewish bastard pig,” Hitler has a bottle smashed over his head and some sort of broom shoved up his rectum. In an act of would-be-poetic-justice, the Jew attempts to gas Hitler by shoving his head in a gas oven, but the two men pass out before the final solution can be fully carried out. The next day, Veldermann realizes that Mrs. Meitlemeihr is actually Hitler after noticing a stain of dried blood covering Uncle Adolf’s upper lip that resembles the great dictator’s iconic Charlie Chaplin mustache. After the Jew goes back to his room, a postal worker attempts to deliver a letter to Hitler from Martin Bormann and presses extra hard on the door bell to get the mysterious tenant’s attention, thus causing the entire apartment to blow up in the process after a spark from the poorly wired door bell ignites the gas from the stove that filled up the apartment the previous during the sissy Aryan versus Hebrew slapstick brawl. Indeed, in the end, Adolf Hitler ironically dies in a literal holocaust.

Undoubtedly, in terms of subversive British Hitler humor, Mrs. Meitlemeihr is nothing new. On top of the never released black comedy Son of Hitler (1978) starring Bud Cort as the eponymous lead and Peter Cushing as a neo-nazi leader, the short-lived British sitcom Heil Honey I’m Home! (1990) portrayed Hitler and Eva Braun living next door to a Judaic couple named the Goldensteins. Of course, Heil Honey I’m Home! was cancelled after the first episode, so it should be no surprise that Mrs. Meitlemeihr never developed into the extravagant feature film that director Graham Rose intended it to be. While I was not exactly impressed with the short, I must give props to Mr. Rose for siring such a preposterous film that is, if nothing else, in rather poor taste and would probably offend the likes of overrated kosher comedian Mel Brooks, who practically made a living off of poking fun at Hitler and the Nazis. Interestingly, it is revealed in the British documentary Hitler: The Comedy Years (2007) directed by Jacques Peretti—a work that goes into rather deplorable detail about why Uncle Adolf has become a mainstay of British comedy for over the past half-century or so—that McEnglish comedian Spike Milligan was obsessed with Hitler in such an unhealthy and all-consuming fashion that he suffered a mental breakdown in Italy and had to be hospitalized for a while. Without question, Mrs. Meitlemeihr also demonstrates this sort of post-WWII Hitler-mania, as another one of the countless examples as to why the British seem to suffer from sort of mass reverse Hitlerite psychosis. Unquestionably, the film’s greatest strength is star Udo Kier’s typically over-the-top camp-addled performance, thus making the film a somewhat worthwhile endeavor for fans of the queer kraut character actor. Of course, as a man who used to dress in drag while working as a transvestite prostitute (with his bud R.W. Fassbinder being his pimp!) during his pre-acting career years, Kier probably did not have to put much effort into his role for Mrs. Meitlemeihr. It should also be noted that Kier's very first acting role was in the British short film Road to Saint Tropez (1966) directed by English actor/auteur Michael Sarne (Joanna, Myra Breckinridge). More recently, Kier played a small role as a futuristic Führer in the patently pathetically politically correct multiculturalist sci-fi-comedy Iron Sky (2012). Of course a film featuring a cross-dressing Hitler being quasi-date-raped by a rather repugnant Hebrew is easier to digest than a cowardly miscegenation-saluting agitprop piece of celluloid scheid like Iron Sky where a blonde Nordic Nazi babe ends up falling in love with an American negro astronaut. One must also give credit to Mrs. Meitlemeihr for not concluding with a sickeningly sentimental and conspicuously cliché quasi-commie speech about the need for tolerance like Chaplin's The Great Dictator (1940). Apparently, Hitler, who was a cinephile of sorts, viewed Chaplin's film no less than two times, but no one actually knows what the Führer thought of the film. Personally, I would be interested to know what Hitler would think of thought of Mrs. Meitlemeihr. Of course, as a man who was once best buds with a beer-chugging and brown-shirted sodomite like Sturmabteilung commander Ernst Röhm, loved the work of German symbolist painter Franz von Stuck, and bought the rather sexually subversive painting "Leda and the Swan" by Paul Mathias Padua, which was exhibited at the Great German Art Show of 1937 in Munich, Hitler may have been many things, but he was no prude and I am sure he would have gotten a laugh or two out of Mrs. Meitlemeihr, even if he probably would have had director Graham Rose executed were he given the chance.

FREEZER BURN: THE INVASION OF LAXDALE

Grant Harvey (2008)

Any amount of "psychotherapy" will conclude with the discovery that I love every film that Crispin Glover has ever appeared in. I use the word "love" in a quite platonic context but the idea should be passed along that I enjoy most films featuring him, if not just for his role. When I had read the title card bearing two names which said "Tom Green and Crispin Glover", I couldn't believe it. First off, Tom Green seemed to have disappeared off the face of the earth save for his webisodes. Second off, two kings of depraved eccentricities have finally come together for a film that should loosely follow the type of construct that Evolution did. Let's face it, Evolution wasn't that bad(?) Freezer Burn is that one kind of film, a festival runner that seems to inevitably drop off the face of the planet. Any "Joe" could gather a small fortune and cast two actors that find themselves in the most uncomfortable of predicaments, and come out with a film. I feel sorry to say it but if the budgeting was divided in a pie chart for an easy visual aid, you'd see that Glover's and Green's monetary cut make up most of the film's production. That's not to say for the rare occurrence of CGI that has been applied in order to create the illusion that these are aliens that we are dealing with but 9 times out of 10, you will forget this movie faster than it forgot you. The small Canadian town of Laxdale is home to a hockey star (go figure) and it's up to him to convince the townspeople that a group of Dutch aliens are not in fact drilling for oil but rather going to microwave the earth so they can acquire our planet as a habitat to call their own (or something like that). Truth is, I wasn't really paying attention to this film. At times, I get hit by heavy doses of procrastination but none ever bore the hygienic tendencies of that fateful night. While watching Freezer Burn, I found myself walking away at times to do things that really didn't need to be done, for example - organizing my already organized DVD shelf. Crispin Glover's turn as an Aryan alien doesn't really turn heads. Normally, Glover's demeanor stands out with maniacal laughter or even just his cold presence but alas, the director instead decided to replace Glover's lines of dialogue with little clicks and whistles as to impersonate a "lost alien language". Cute. Not to mention the alien language sounds like it was made by a homosexual rave kid thanks to the freeware version of Frooty Loops. Even the deaths of the Martians were uninspired. Securing an homage to the Blob by making the aliens weakness be that of the cold, Tom Green gets together with an extremely ugly girl who appears to be stealing Brandy's (Joe Dirt) mojo and these two throw frozen confectionery treats at multicultural aliens, all the while enjoying the purified remnants of what is Canada. Freezer Burn contains zero to no humor and 30% more cholesterol than the leading competitors. There's almost no reason to go see this film. Hell, if Crispin Glover made any less body gestures (he moves his hand several inches), I'd refuse to even acknowledge this film even existed. Tom Green's always good for a laugh but Freddy Got Fingered is beckoning you from across the room. Blast that film all you want but Freddy Got Fingered will always have more artistic ingenuity than this science-fiction "disasterpiece". I think I might hate Freezer Burn.

THE DOOM GENERATION

Gregg Araki° (1995) SPOILERS

Gregg Araki's The Doom Generation is a hilarious apocalyptic road film. It is also probably the only road film to feature a young man jerking off then swallowing his seed. The number 666 is seen throughout the film in tribute to the all mighty Lucifer (probably a wuss CEO in real life). I guess you could say that The Doom Generation is a ride through hell. I just hope that if hell on earth occurs it will include talking decapitated Asian convenience store clerks heads. Rose McGowan stars as a tough and brutal sex vixen. Her performance in the film is very personal to me as she reminds me of my ladylove. Its rare to find a girl that is both extremely beautiful yet aggressive. She is a woman that knows how to take control, even if she can't seem to control herself. Gregg Araki is no doubt one sick individual. He's obsessed with sexual perversion and death in way that plays like a sitcom (obviously his intent). The Doom Generation has been compared to hack liar Oliver Stone's Natural Born Killers. I find it very offensive as Oliver Stone's film should only be compared to Nike commercials. My only complaint with The Doom Generation is the castration and death of the films pathetic romantic Jordan. His death was quite tragic as he had a quality to him of innocence (despite his many vices). Many know the actor that played Jordan (James Duval) as Frank from Donnie Darko. This fellow seems to die in a lot movies. Araki's style has evolved a great deal since his earlier films. I felt that Mysterious Skin was his best film. He is one of the few directors that is still able to disturb me. I will make it a goal of mine to view Araki's entire film lexicon. The American auteur is a rarity.

Gregg Araki° (1997)

Hailed as "90210 on acid", this initial assessment doesn't stray far from reality. Some form of reality that is. Nowhere consists of deranged teenage hallucinations, male sexuality crisis', lizard aliens, grotesque suicides, and an uncomfortable interracial child couple headlining with a young Mena Suvari. Nowhere isn't just the pinnacle of bisexual film making, it's also Araki's finest film effort coupled with the forced genius of Hunter S. Thompson, whose work seems contrived and drug-induced in retrospect. Sure, the finest genius can come up with something relevant to literature but a gossip journalist on mescaline can turn prose into desperation rather quick and surprisingly become heralded and looked up to cause of it. What a world, ladies and gentlemen. Gregg Araki conjoins facets from each of his other film to complete his tour de force of teen angst. The usual casting of James Duval lends much substance to Nowhere on the term of avant-garde cinema regulars. His role in the great American classic ID4 led to Donnie Darko, Nowhere, and the Doom Generation. The film opens up reasonably promising with Duval encompassing the very idea of a "Steamy shower sequence". He begins masturbating, collecting his thoughts in a process that involves awkward conversations, artfully composed sex scenes, and bi-curious affairs. All of this to a rousing shoegaze score nonetheless. Nowhere even seemed to set the stage for Araki's screen adaptation of Mysterious Skin which also dictates a code of sexuality livened by thoughts of space aliens. Through the eyes of Dark (Duval), we witness a stage being set as he decides that he isn't going to live much longer. It's the prophetic doom that gives Nowhere that vibe of terror as you never quite know what to expect and Nowhere will always surprise you, even after watching it again. Consisting of tons of cameos, many familiar faces will pop up here and there not limited to Heather Graham, Ryan Phillippe, Rose McGowan, Shannon Doherty, Rachel True, Debi Mazar, Christina Applegate, Jordan Ladd, and Guillermo Díaz. Nowhere is hard to track down at that. Its public domain lies within the market of Region 2 DVDs but is currently hosted up at YouTube (so that you may watch for free). Lord knows when Araki will decide to release his magnum opus [preferably in a box set].

If you've ever thought about The Doom Generation and found yourself disgusted at the pet project, you should give Nowhere a chance in order to redeem yourself. Not to say that you're in the wrong for hating on either of these two but the leading argument is from an offended party. This tires me to know end seeing as how Araki makes it very clear that his films are high-brow surrealist trash. Epic scenery and tinted lens coupled with neon lights flow steadily through the course of most of his films save for Mysterious Skin. A distinct scene that comes to mind is Bart's drug abode. His room's walls are plastered with lyrics in a hefty font. This might create a prestigious arthouse vibe but this, my friends, borders genius. When all is said and done, Nowhere will shock you to a certain point of intensity. You'll question the film to some extent, perhaps even wonder aloud what you just experienced but the answer will always be obscured. I'm not sure what Araki had in mind while creating Nowhere but whatever it is, I want more of it. If you can't handle ideas construed in a film, don't watch movies. But for depictions of drug abuse, teenage angst, apocalyptic surrealism, and Araki's personal blend of immature humor, Nowhere is the undisputed champion of trash cinema. We're all just waiting for this to be released commercially in the United States.

THIS IS HOW THE WORLD ENDS
THIS IS HOW THE WORLD ENDS

Gregg Araki° (2000)

Not so much a film about the apocalypse as Araki's previous effort Nowhere was, This Is How The World Ends was a TV Pilot episode for a series that was to be presented on MTV. I guess that the fine folks at MTV underestimated the power of Araki's homosexual film style. That might explain the corporations idea to promise 1.5 million but only deliver 700,000 dollars. The various countercultures presented in this short (44 minutes) are all various familiar instances in his normal feature length films. If for one second you were worried about censorship, you can honestly breathe a deep sigh of relief. Using blurred bars and family-safe words works wonders when Araki uses them. Maybe he should teach a thing or two to the pansy producers of Live Free or Die Hard or the upcoming Terminator Salvation: The Future Begins. Casper is an unnamed character living the big life. His gas money consists of crisp hundreds and he has friends of all shapes and sizes. His love appears in his dreams similar to a pseudo-Nowhere James Duval masturbation fantasy. Justin Pierce plays Zombie, a dread locked narcoleptic who finds himself in ridiculous situations. 2 years after the pilot, Pierce hung himself in a Las Vegas hotel. You will know Pierce from his role as Casper in Kids. Funny how the name Casper is shared in this film. Araki labeled TIHTWE as "A Twin Peaks for MTV" I cannot agree with this statement anymore. Dancing midget Sugar-Ray fans turn into gun wielding robbers. Things that aren't, are. A youthful acid trip for the new generation. I would like to imagine this series getting green lighted, but somehow, I think that it just passes over MTV's head. Pure genius is always denied. A grandeur exercise in post-homosexual surrealism. You won't forget these characters anytime soon.

MYSTERIOUS SKIN

Gregg Araki° (2005)

Judging by his gloriously morally retarded black comedies like The Doom Generation (1995), Nowhere (1997), and more recently, Kaboom (2010), Jap-American New Queer Cinema auteur Gregg Araki seems like he would be one of the most ill-equipped filmmakers for making a serious and responsible film about childhood traumas and the long-term effects of being molested as a pre-adolescent boy, yet he somehow made one of the best, most daring, and shockingly honest films on the subject, as if he himself was a victim of such abuse. Of course, as Araki's film, Mysterious Skin (2004)—a vaguely autobiographical work based on gay New England-based novelist Scott Heim's 1996 novel of the same name—audaciously reveals, many homosexuals were molested by older men as children, thus indicating that there is indeed a certain unofficial 'recruiting' subculture of queendom and that NAMBLA might not be a lunatic fringe of the fag world after all. Somewhat paradoxically, despite being quite unnerving as a work that features child molestation and a violent rape scene, the film also manages to be an aesthetically pleasing experience, which largely has to do with its ambient score, including songs by Slowdive (the film opens with their cover of the Syd Barrett song "Golden Hair"), Cocteau Twins, Sigur Rós, as well as various ethereal dream-sequences and 'fantasy' scenes. Like a coming-of-age story in reverse, Mysterious Skin tells the tale of two very different young men—an introverted and seemingly autistic asexual nerd and an exceedingly extroverted homo hustler—who are eternally united due to the fact that they were both molested a decade previously at the age of 8 by their pee-wee league baseball coach, with one of the boys even actively taking part in the molesting of the other. While the nerdy boy developed dissociative amnesia as a means to cope with being molested and now believes he was abducted by aliens during those hours from the past that he cannot remember, the young prick-peddler remembers the events vividly and rather sickly sees them as a sort of sexual awakening as opposed to child abuse. Featuring a truly horrifying Halloween scene where a young boy molests another boy with the misguided belief that he will not tattle, as well as references to zombie flicks like George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead (1968) and J.R. Bookwalter's The Dead Next Door (1989) and ultra-kitschy scenes of UFOs and alien abductions, I thought re-watching Araki's film would be a more unconventional way to get in the spirit of All Hallows' Eve. Indeed, if you're looking for a film that might give you nightmares and are tired of devouring brainless celluloid zombie shit, Mysterious Skin makes for a most preternaturally disturbing experience like no other, as a work that takes an un-sentimental look at the tragic long-term effects of losing one's innocence while still just a vulnerable wee lad.

During the summer of 1981 when they were both just 8 years old, Kansas country boys Neil McCormick (Joseph Gordon-Levitt) and Brian Lackey (Brady Corbet) were molested by their little league baseball Coach (Bill Sage), who is a considerably masculine man that looks like he walked off the set of one of sado-masochistic sodomite Fred Halsted's films (somewhat notably, like the director of LA Plays Itself, the coach also has a rather repellant fist fetish, albeit of the boy-oriented sort). Both boys came from badly broken homes, with Neil being the bastard son of a whorish dipsomaniac single mother (Elisabeth Shue) and Brian being the progeny of two parents that were about to divorce, thus making them the perfect prey for a predatory pedophile. While Neil enjoyed the experience of being molested and saw it as a sexual awakening of sorts (after all, as he describes, his molester resembled the sort of macho men that intrigued him in his slut mother's Playgirl magazines), Brian was so traumatized by those events that he cannot remember them and believes he was abducted by aliens due to the fact that he cannot remember five hours from his childhood and routinely bled from his nose and wet his bed for a good portion of his life, hence his Asperger-like obsession with all-things alien. Not surprisingly, Neil grew up to be a quasi-psychopathic hustler who enjoys being blown by middle-age men with mustaches for money, whilst Brian degenerated into a sexless nerd that lives in a fantasy world full of alien abductions.

While Neil makes a fairly decent living peddling his ass and acting as the announcer of local baseball games (where men give him blowjobs while he announces!), he cannot stand the homo-hating hicks of his area (or as he states himself, "I'm so fuckin' sick of this stinky little butcrack of a town!") and he has already "fucked every single guy and his ugly uncle" in his "podunk town," so, like many young fags that are looking to 'find themselves' and be around like-minded folks, he opts to leave his mother and racially dubious queer buddy Eric Preston (Jeff Licon) for the big city where he plans to live with his lifelong platonic soul-mate Wendy (Michelle Trachtenberg). Naturally, after arriving in the rotten Big Apple, Neil spends most of his time wandering the streets and selling his tiny twink tail to a much larger and more eclectic clientele that he is used to, including an athletic fellow who likes taking it from behind from scrawny twinks, as well as an old queen dying from AIDS. Upon arriving in New York City, Neil soon learns that he cannot be as sexually careless as he was in rural Kansas, as STDs are all over the place. Indeed, after having a date with an old queer named Zeke (played by perennial screen villain Billy Drago of Clint Eastwood's classic 1985 western Pale Rider and Brian De Palma's 1987 hit The Untouchables) whose body is covered in Kaposi sarcoma (KS) marks and merely wants a backrub from the boy because it has been so long since another person touched him, Neil is 'scared straight' and decides to quit peddling his man-pussy and gets a minimum wage job as a cashier. Despite quitting hustling, Neil is subsequently savagely raped by a vicious self-loathing shit-stabbing redneck, who forces his victim to snort some coke before being rectally reamed. The experience of being raped ultimately proves to be 'worthwhile' for Neil because, while he felt like he was in control when he was being molested by his coach when he was an 8-year-old boy, being violently buggered by a boorish pig makes him truly realize what it is like to be defiled against one's own will, thus enabling him to better empathize with Brian's precarious predicament when he meets him at the end of the film.

Meanwhile, 18-year-old banal bitch boy Brian contacts a crippled farm girl named Avalyn Friesen (Mary Lynn Rajskub) after seeing a documentary about her featuring her discussing how she was abducted and probed by aliens over twenty times. Being a weirdo country cripple that lives in the middle of nowhere who clearly has a hard time finding a good man, Avalyn immediately writes back to Brian and covers her letter in cheap perfume. While Brian soon develops a strong bond with Avalyn due to their mutually unhealthy obsession with space aliens, mutilated cattle, and crop circles, he abruptly decides to stop talking to her after she attempts to jump his seemingly impotent bones. If there is anything that is for sure, it is that being molested as a boy has totally destroyed Brian's ability to not only have sex, but to love other people. With Avalyn's help, Brian figures out that Neil, who has haunted his dreams since the fateful night when he was raped at the age of 8, was one of the players on his little league baseball team, so he goes looking for the young hustler in the hope that he will be able to help him connect the dots regarding his hazy childhood. Unfortunately, Neil is still in NYC, so Brian hangs out with his punk queer friend Eric and learns that the hustler will be back in Kansas around Christmas time.

Before Neil arrives in town, Brian spends a lot of time with homo punk-goth queen Eric, who proudly corrupts the autistic teen on his 19th birthday by getting him drunk. On Christmas Eve 1991, Brian wakes and declares, "this is the day." Indeed, Xmas Eve is the day that Brian learns that he was not abducted by aliens, but rather probed by his cocksucker baseball coach. When Brian meets Neil, he brings them to the house where the baseball coach who molested both of them used to live. After breaking into the coach's home, Neil nostalgically shows Brian around the place and explains how he was the child-fucker coach's "favorite" and how he "felt honored." As Brian explains to Neil, the coach would ply the boys with Atari games and other treats and would eventually coerce them into letting him go down on them, among other things. The coach used his 'favorite' Neil to lure the other boys in, including Brian, with both boys taking turns shoving their entire arms up the pedo's ass. Neil also describes to Brian how after being molested, his face looked like he had been "erased" and "empty inside." In the end, Brian collapses and breaks down after Neil tells him how he was molested. Needless to say, Brian would have probably preferred being abducted by asshole-probing aliens over becoming the victim of a charismatic baseball-loving pedophile.

ous works, Mysterious Skin is shockingly inoffensive, even if it features a number of haunting and disturbing scenes, which leads me to believe that the auteur had the most pure intentions and that he may have been molested himself. While Araki's most recent film, White Bird in a Blizzard (2014), is in a similar vein in terms of seriousness and its understated approach to drama, it is ultimately much less potent than Mysterious Skin, which is probably a work that the director will never top. Next to the distinctly dark and dreary films of gay Spanish auteur Agustí Villaronga whose debut feature Tras el cristal (1987) aka In a Glass Cage probably features the most disturbing depiction of a relationship between a pedophile and his victim ever committed to celluloid, as well as Michael Cuesta's L.I.E. (2001) starring Brian Cox as a pederast who develops an unlikely bond with a young Jewish boy played by Paul Dano, Araki's film indubitably features one of the most mature and intricately nuanced depictions of child molestation in cinema history, which probably does not say much considering the scarcity of such films, but there is no denying that Mysterious Skin is a uniquely unforgettable work that reminds one why pedos are probably worse than serial killers in terms of the malignant damage they do. Needless to say, Araki's film is not something you would probably want to re-watch often and I assume that it might make for especially traumatic viewing for real-life victims of sex abuse. As much as I cannot stand gawky heeb Joseph Gordon-Levitt and cannot think of another single decent film that he stars in, somehow he pulls off the whole psychopathic hustler role in Araki's film (interestingly, in the audio commentary for the TLA Releasing DVD of the film, Gordon-Levitt confesses that starring in Araki's film made him realize that, "acting and prostitution are kind of similar"). Certainly, one of the most brave and provocative aspects of the film is that it demonstrates that some molestation victims grow up to be very repugnant individuals who become just as eager to molest as their molesters, with Gordon-Levitt very aptly and eerily acting the part of such a distinctly deranged individual. A contra Lifetime channel film, Araki's dejecting movie offers a more than decent argument as to not only why it is probably not a good idea to raise a child in a broken home, but also why peddling your ass to middle-aged men with mustaches can only have nothing short of deleterious effects. More than an independent film about child molestation, Mysterious Skin is a work that also metaphysically molests the viewer.

Gregg Araki° (2010)

After watching the 2007 film Smiley Face, directed by renegade queer auteur Gregg Araki — I was left feeling cheated out of the total cinematic experience — at least in a manner comparable to how the ditsy dope smoking debutante in the film feels like after shotgunning the last bit of reef resin out of her $300.00 bong. Before watching Araki's 2010 film Kaboom, I anticipated that the Asian auteur would return to the libertine insanity that made his previous works Nowhere and The Doom Generation such adversely pleasurable experiences. Despite the cheap (yet charming) aesthetic of the film, I am happy to report that Kaboom is another wonderful excursion into the wicked Japanese-American mind of Gregg Araki. Like Araki's previous films, Kaboom combines unrelenting sexuality with science fiction elements, launching the viewer into a world of farcical humor and screw loose sexuality. Also, like Araki's past films, Kaboom follows a young aspiring film student as he encounters various sexual misadventures in a world vacillating nihilism. The film begins with a dream and concludes with a Kaboom, enrapturing everywhere in between. As mAQ also mentioned to me, Kaboom proves that Gregg Araki has still "got it."

Kaboom follows 18-year-old film student Smith as he explores his "undeclared" sexuality. It is apparent from the start of the film that Smith is a gay boi with a slight interest in AC/DC. Smith's best friend is a lipstick lesbian that enjoys getting her mouth wet on every moist meat curtain she can find. Upon eating a drug-laced cookie at a debauched college party, Smith has a series of re-occurring dreams involving two beautiful women, one with red hair and another with dark locks. To reveal anymore information about Kaboom's plot would ruin the staggering mystique of the film. I will, however, mention that Kaboom features an apocalyptic cult that slightly resembles (in a cheap plastic "user friendly" kind of way) The Process Church of The Final Judgment, which was originally a splinter client group of L. Ron Hubbard's Scientology. Despite being well into his middle age years, Gregg Araki proves he can still keep up with the degenerating times as exemplified in Kaboom, a cinematic time bomb gorged with contemporary societal ills, set to the soothing sounds of a modern soundtrack. When it comes to synchronizing opulent images with audacious audio tracks, Gregg Araki always delivers. I was thoroughly delighted to find out that Kaboom features a melodic neoteric soundtrack, including catchy numbers from bands like the Yeah Yeah Yeahs and Interpol.

Due to the film's nonexistent production values and less than stellar acting performances (not to mention the fact that Gregg Araki's favorite star — James Duval — only has a minuscule role in the film), Kaboom is not exactly Gregg Araki's greatest masterpiece. Aesthetically, Kaboom is comparable to earlier Araki low-budget films like The Living End and Totally Fucked Up, minus the vintage charm (only time will whether or not Kaboom also carries this quality). After seeing Araki's masterpiece Mysterious Skin, I assumed that the director would be utilizing larger budgets for his subsequent films. Of course, Gregg Araki is not the kind of film director that is willing to prostitute himself out to the pimps of Hollywood, hence his small, yet loyal fan base. Gregg Araki is an auteur in the truest sense of the word, an artist with a distinct and superlative vision. mAQ and I both agree that despite the film's schlocky style and tacked on ending, Kaboom is a worthy addition to Gregg Araki's director filmography. If there ever is a day when an imminent Armageddon scenario comes into play, Kaboom is the film to watch and kick back to, whilst this despairing world withers away. Until that day comes, I will be eagerly waiting for Gregg Araki's next cinematic feature.

DANCE OF THE DEAD

Gregg Bishop (2008)

This title is not to be confused with the Masters of Horror Dance of the Dead, but is rather a genius reinvention of the zombie film. With a script originally penned in 1998, one must find it hard to bash this loud-mouthed zombie comedy for predating most of the others in its flock. John Hughes meets Return of the Living Dead in what might be the most fun I've milked out of a zombie film in some time (Not counting re-watching Cemetery Man). Ghost House Underground has recently collaborated on bringing a collection of mixed horror films into distribution. A fruitful and appreciated effort, but many of the films range from bad to worse; The Last House in the Woods being the spotlight, that is until I saw Dance of the Dead. This entirely invigorating experience is sponsored by outrageous characters that you have no choice but to love entirely. Science fiction geeks and furious punk rock rednecks all come into play over a prom night fueled by a zombie massacre thanks to a power plant ala Class of Nuke 'Em High which leaves a wonderful gap that can be concluded with a sequel. Perhaps Afterparty of the Dead? It feels good to be a kid again, I'll tell you that much. This film brings to mind old memories of sneaking geeky horror films and appreciating all the gut-munching entertainment that was available. I expected something of the same out of German film Night of the Living Geeks, but I was too bored to finish the film. Maybe I can lend some time towards a round two. Words get jumbled when I try to pen down the emotions this film allowed to excrete. This is simply a no holds barred blast when it comes down to raw zombie entertainment. Considering that zombie films normally bore me, you should bite into this. While this might be towards the stoner crowd a tad bit, the anti-heroes present themselves as heroes and the geek gets the girl. In all entirety, this film is practically seamless and destined for a cult status, maybe even more so over the over hyped Shaun of the Dead (Which still holds some leverage over the latter films). Featuring a youthful cast of kids who actually look like kids and a Dellamorte Dellamore inspired caretaker roaming the rolling hills of the cemetery, I can't imagine enjoying this film anymore than I already do. All this, plus the rewatchability factor is off the scale.

NEW WAVE HOOKERS

Gregory Dark (1985)

Undoubtedly, New Wave Hookers (1985) is a porn flick with a reputation that is more (in)famous than the actual quality of its content, namely due to the fact that the original cut of the film was forever removed from distribution in 1986 after it was revealed that star Traci Lords (Black Throat, Kinky Business) was actually underage when she made the film. As someone who has managed to view the original version of the film featuring Lords as a salacious she-devil, I cannot say that the edited/abridged version of New Wave Hookers really suffered from the deletion of those naughty underage teen scenes. Admittedly, my interest in New Wave Hookers came from the fact that it is a punk/new wave porn flick that, like Alex Cox's cult masterpiece Repo Man (1984), features a score by the Latino punk band The Plugz, not to mention the fact that it features Hebraic hardcore superstar star Jamie Gillis (The Opening of Misty Beethoven, Through the Looking Glass, Water Power) in one of the lead roles as an over-the-hill punk pimp who speaks with a bogus oriental accent. Indeed, certainly a cream of the crop work when it comes to mainstream 1980s porn, New Wave Hookers was directed by Gregory Dark aka Alexander Hippolyte aka The Dark Brothers aka Gregory Brown (Let Me Tell Ya 'Bout Black Chicks, Sex Freaks)—a miscegenation-obsessed Anton LaVey-look-alike who is one of the few pornographers to successfully make the transition from the porn ghetto to Hollywood and who has been described as “the Steven Spielberg of the soft-core set” and “the Martin Scorsese of the erotic thriller”—so it benefits from having an actual aesthetic vision, if not a rather aberrant one. The surely sordid and thankfully politically incorrect story of an odd couple—a negro and a Jew—who both share the literal and figurative dream of becoming quasi-high-class punk pimps who whore out mostly Aryan new wave/punk chicks, New Wave Hookers works best as a racially-charged comedy that certainly could have benefited from less hardcore scenes and a more eclectic soundtrack. A porn flick that will probably most appeal to fans of old school punk films like Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982), Penelope Spheeris' Suburbia (1984), Cox's Repo Man, and even Surf Nazis Must Die (1987), New Wave Hookers also features racially-charged comic relief, especially of the oriental-parodying oriented sort, that is comparable to C-grade porn trash typical of the 1980s like Invasion of the Samurai Sluts from Hell! (1989). In short, New Wave Hookers has more to offer than merely Traci Lords' teenage titties and twat as a work that makes a great argument that Jamie Gillis certainly would have made for a more likeable, charming, and humorous mainstream ‘performer’ than most kosher comedians.

Goofy jigaboo Jamal (Jack Baker) and his Jew boy buddy Jimmy (Jamie Gillis) are watching an interracial blue movie and the latter remarks to the former that he looks just like the mandingo negro in the fuck flick. Jimmy also remarks how he used to play tennis with spade pimps when he attended Berkeley College and how he has always wondered about the profession. Magically, Jimmy and Jamal fall asleep while watching the porn flick and somehow awake as pimps with different personas. While Jamal is dressed like a poser member of Devo, Jimmy sports an idiotic anarchy symbol shirt and takes on the personality of a stereotypically racist egomaniac Jap. On top of everything else, the two obtain their own personal guard dog (Steven Powers) in untermensch white boy form. Out of all the girls the two could pimp out, Jimmy and Jamal deal in 'New Wave chicks' that can only become sexually aroused by the sweet and sensual sounds of New Wave music, or as the black pimp states himself, "programs bitches to music to fuck." Dressed quite similar to the Scottish duo from Strawberry Switchblade, the nubile and mostly Nordic new wave babes like riding on roller-skates and playing with shiny dildos. When not engaging in cross-species foursomes with their two bosses and their loyal yet seemingly stoned man-dog, the horny hookers sell their sex to a variety of sexually deprived losers, including a towelheaded Arab Sheik (Peter North) and two virginal and seemingly bi-curious dork college boys. When the cops bust Jimmy and Jamal for "subjecting our bitches to a plot" (aka white slavery), the pimps bribe the police with their busty bitches, thus evolving into a magical multicultural orgy in a scene that makes for a great metaphor for the wacked-out cultural and racial mongrel that is the United States of America. Rather bizarrely but nonetheless humorously, black brother Jamal masturbates and yells "come on white boys, do it to dem bitches" while watching the cops break the law with the new wave hookers. Of course, all good things must come to an end and both Jimmy and Jamal wake up to empty 40oz. malt liquor bottles and not a single new wave hooker in sight. Disturbed by the fact that he had the same wild wet dream as his homey Jamal, Jimmy leaves his friend's apartment and drives around fantasizing about the fantastic dream he had about being a pseudo-Japanese pimp.

Featuring great and highly quotable one-liners like, "Fuck you, Negro," "Deadhead, rat's ass, fool to boot," "No nigger music, strictly New Wave," and "Do you think a rat's ass is as good delicacy for a Japanese gentleman?" New Wave Hookers is certainly more funny and outrageous than the average scatological bromance flick defecated out by Hollywood each month, even if it has its flaws and tends to drag, especially during the lackluster pre-condom sex scenes. Indeed, New Wave Hookers was so popular that it would inevitably sire no less than six sequels (with the first three also being directed by Gregory Dark), as well as a reasonably stylish, if not innately inferior, remake entitled Neu Wave Hookers (2006) directed by artsy fartsy 'alt porn' auteur Eon McKai (Art School Sluts, On My Dirty Knees). While New Wave Hookers director Gregory Dark would later become a monetarily 'successful' mainstream music director (directing videos for mainstream pop trash like Britney Spears, Mandy Moore, Linkin Park, etc.) and even directed an episode for the popular HBO TV series Oz (1997–2003), he would ultimately degenerate into a Hollywood hack responsible for helming such celluloid garbage as the horror flick See No Evil (2006) starring WWE fake wrestler ‘Kane’ and the crap comedy Little Fish, Strange Pond (2009) starring Matthew Modine and Zach Galifianakis. Indeed, while an undeniably humorous and audacious porn flick, New Wave Hookers seems rather tame when compared to the avant-garde fuck flicks of Stephen Sayadian aka ‘Rinse Dream’ (Nightdreams, Café Flesh, Dr. Caligari). While the sex of Sayadian’s films is typically nightmarish, nihilistic, creepy, and even anti-erotic, New Wave Hookers is packed with outmoded orgies with generic plastic Barbie doll babes and seemingly inebriated men who seem to have a hard time obtaining erection, thus I would be hesitant to describe the film as a masterpiece—be it of pornography or otherwise—but it is certainly a tastelessly charming classic of the quasi-iconoclastic and sardonic stereotype-driven sort. Part New Wave minstrel show, part retrograde race comedy, part slapstick vaudeville-esque fuck flick, and 100% culturally and artistically irredeemable, New Wave Hookers ultimately manages to epitomize everything that was aesthetically, culturally, socially, and politically revolting about the 1980s yet somehow manages to enthrall and for that reason alone makes it essential viewing for anyone that thinks John Hughes’ films were bullshit and that The Last Dragon (1985) was one of the most bizarre Hollywood films ever made.

TWICE A MAN

Although a generalization, it seems to be the common consensus that most homos either have mothers they love a little too dearly or that they love to hate, with the common theme here being that gay boys have unhealthy relationships with their mommies that may have contributed to them developing into gynophobic sexual introverts. Indeed, from Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) to more recent works like Tom Kalin's Savage Grace (2007) and Xavier Dolan's I Killed My Mother (2009) aka J'ai tué ma mère, hysterical female hormones seem to be a major source of homo cognitive dissonance and sexual perversion in general in the cinematic realm. Unquestionably, one of the most innately bizarre, pathologically hermetic, unflatteringly vulnerable, and decidedly discombobulating, if not strangely aesthetically delectable, works of anti-Oedipal homo hysteria is the American experimental avant-garde work Twice a Man (1964) directed by rather reclusive Greek-American auteur Gregory J. Markopoulos (Psyche, The Illiac Passion), who, with the help of his disturbingly possessive boy toy Robert Beavers—a filmmaker with a similar, albeit strikingly inferior, 'transcendent' vision—made his entire oeuvre completely unattainable after moving to Greece in the late-1960s. Indeed, one of the most inventive and singular experimental filmmakers associated with the New American Cinema movement who also contributed his original film theories to Film Culture magazine and taught film at Art Institute of Chicago, Markopoulos—a strange and rather introverted fellow who, like many gay men, suffered a terribly debilitating form of paranoia—and his majorly megalomaniacal blowboy Beavers left America in 1967 for permanent relocation in Europa and shortly after that the filmmaker took all of his films out of circulation, refused to talk to the media, and even went so far as insisting that avant-garde film historian P. Adams Sitney remove a chapter on him from the second edition of the classic text Visionary Film. By the early 1970s, Markopoulos fell further and further into a fantasy world of his own making as demonstrated by the increasingly metaphysical nature of his writings and the fact that he would only screen his films in a ritualistic fashion at a special ceremonial theater in Lyssaraia, Greece (the homeland of his parents) in the hope of obtaining his ideal of 'Temenos.' Luckily, I managed to find a copy of Twice a Man because it was once screened on German television by the Cologne-based channel WDR (Westdeutscher Rundfunk Köln) and some gracious kraut had the keen foresight to tape it. A 49-minute work shot on 16mm color film stock by the director with a borrowed camera and with the help of a mere two assistants in and around New York City, Markopoulos' singular masterpiece is a darkly romantic, terribly haunting, and malignantly melancholy homoerotic reworking of the Phaedra/Hippolytos/Aesclepius myth that centers around an 'artist/physician' (supposedly, a stand-in for the director himself) who reminisces over attempting to save a suicidal young man who become his lover from his incestuous homo-hating mother.

If there ever was a film that was ridden with the soul-stirring sting of tragic memory and lovelorn regret, it is Twice a Man, which incorporates an incessantly spastic use of montage involving single-frame images to demonstrate in a quasi-subliminal way how the wounds of the past perennially bleed over into the present, or as the director himself described regarding his dream of creating a new cinematic language, he wanted to assemble: "a new narrative form through the fusion of the classic montage technique with a more abstract system." Of course, the director's abstract system is surely not for the uninitiated, as it is an arcane cinematic language that demands study. After the beautiful title sequence featuring what seems to be pagan architecture, a couple minutes of a completely blank pitch black screen is juxtaposed with the sound of heavy rain drops hitting concrete, thus inducing a feeling of dreary monotone melancholy in the viewer. From there, the film cuts to shots of tragic gay boy Paul (played by Paul Kilb, whose sole other film credit is for Paul Morrissey's classic 1971 Women's lib satire Women in Revolt) reminiscing over his loneliness while in the company of happy heterosexual couples dancing. After his lonely and less than nostalgic ferry ride, Paul heads to the roof of a building where he contemplates jumping off, but a handsome 'Artist-Physician' (Albert Torgesen), who is depicted in a previous scene looking on all forlorn on a ferry, that more or less looks like an older version of himself comforts the world weary twink by placing his hand over his shoulder, so he opts out of suicide, at least for now.

As demonstrated by a subsequent scene where he goes to his mother's home in Staten Island and she asks him, "Why do you keep seeing [him]?", as well as a montage where he is clearly being penetrated from behind while feeling the metaphysical scorn of his unpleasant progenitor, Paul is carrying on an affair with the 'Artist-Physician', whose memory the film seems to be recollecting, even though the work is mainly shot from the perspective of the young man. Essentially, Twice a Man is an archaic pre-Stonewall gay 'coming-out' film that viscerally depicts the foreboding angst that young man Paul suffers as a result of his pathologically prying mother's traumatic influence. Indeed, it is not without reason that the mother is depicted as both a young woman (played by mainstream Greek-American Academy Award winning actress Olympia Dukakis of Moonstruck fame in her first film role) and an old woman (played by English actress Violet Roditi in her first and sole film), as her damaging influence on Paul began during his critical years and lingers today. Likewise, Paul's subversive sexuality has destroyed his mother and she must live with the internal scars of his actions for the rest of her miserable bourgeois life as a lonely woman who will never be a grandmother. Unquestionably, the mother is the figurative cock-block in poor Paul's forsaken fag soul. Indeed, even while being buggering in the woods, Paul cannot get his mother out of his mind, thus she has more or less figuratively killed him as he is incapable of living as the person that he is really is. While Paul does die at sea, it is not clear as to whether or not he committed suicide or merely was a victim of accidental circumstances. After dying, Paul is reborn in a scene where his naked classically posed body is illuminated in a golden-white cosmic sphere of sorts, hence the title of the film. Of course, the viewer will not realize this unless they pay particularly close attention, as the film lacks any sort of discernible chronology and portrays the mind as it really is as a collection of sometimes vivid but largely fading memory fragments.

No doubt, after watching Twice a Man, one can empathize with Norman Bates to a degree when it comes to the metaphysical disease of mommy-mania. Indeed, while the mother in the film is largely responsible for the character Paul's aversion to women, she also dares to spite him for the gynophobia and androphilia that she, at least partially, induced in what amounts to a vicious circle of anti-Oedipal obsession among the perturbed protagonist. While largely cryptic, the film is riddled with homoerotic imagery and symbolism, which led me to conclude that the director learned to hide his homosexuality at a young age and found esoteric ways to express his homophilia, hence his mastery of the largely visually symbolic and allegorical medium of film. Unquestionably, one of the more revealing examples of the film's semi-hidden homosexual essence is a shot of Paul holding a copy of the book The Prince of Darkness & Co. (1961) by Canadian poet/translator Daryl Hine who, on top of being an arcane poetic poof of sorts, shared director Gregory J. Markopoulos' affinity for Greek mythology and classic European literature/poetry as demonstrated by the fact that he translated Homeric Hymns and works by ancient Greek poet Hesiod, as well as works by German Jewish poet Heinrich Heine. Markopoulos also incorporated various pieces of art in the film to highlight his homosexuality as demonstrated by a scene where Paul and the 'Artist-Physician' stand in front of a nude male statue, with the penis of the statue being in between their faces. In a scene in the se(a)men-fetishizing spirit of the director's cocksucker contemporary Kenneth Anger (Fireworks, Scorpio Rising), Paul stands next to a painting of a young sailor, with the face of the seaman staring at him if as he wants to defile the young lad after a long hard day of sailing the seas. With Markopoulos' utilization of ancient pagan imagery, one also gets the feeling that he longs for a bygone ancient utopia where 'boys could be boys' and be buggered by older men, hence the director's strong attachment to his Greek roots, self-imposed exile to Greece where he could be influenced by the ancient classical landscape, and his lifelong obsession of realizing his ideal of 'Temenos.'

While Markopoulos' work, especially his unconventional use of montage, has been somewhat rightfully compared to everyone from his contemporary Stan Brakhage (Dog Star Man, Mothlight) to French auteur Alain Resnais (Last Year at Marienbad, Muriel), I think that German New Cinema dandy Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Willow Springs) shares the most cinematic and poetic

'kindredness' with the equally arcane filmmaker. Indeed, aside from their mutual love of the Southern European Mediterranean, totally idiosyncratic style of 'queerness,' utilization of divas, love of classical art and ancient mythology, seeming hatred of chronology and linear plots, unnerving utilization of dissonant noise and obscured dialogue, and propensity for making some of the most esoterically personalized and impenetrable homo hermetic cinematic works ever made, Twice a Man seems like it could have been one of Schroeter's early films (notably, Schroeter was inspired by Andy Warhol, whose Italian-American Superstar Gerard Malanga briefly appears in Twice a Man). Of course, in creating his own fantasy world and idealized occult utopia as influenced by the ancient Greeks and focusing on beautiful Adonis-like men, Markopoulos also shares much in common with gay German Conservative Revolutionary poet Stefan George. Indeed, while Twice a Man may be an undeniably queer flick, its influences demonstrate that Markopoulos was a born traditionalist who eschewed any sort of deracinated cosmopolitan world inhabited by raceless and cultureless beings and looked to the past for his ideal of beauty, even if he was one of the foremost pioneers of American experimental cinema. While mere speculation on my part, one has to wonder if Markopoulos saw his self-imposed exile as a sort of rebirth in the spirit of Paul in Twice a Man, as both men ultimately escape from their backgrounds and identities. Indeed, while the 'Artist-Physician' character might be a stand-in for the director, Paul, who somewhat resembles Markopoulos as a young man, seems like a depiction of the filmmaker's younger and more naive self. Either way, there is no denying that Markopoulos poured out his soul for Twice a Man, as a film that is so distinctly dejecting, dreary, and disconnected from society as a whole that no man would dare to make it unless they felt the undying need to express their inner torment, thus it should be no surprise that the auteur eventually decided to sever contact with most of humanity and enter a fantasy realm of his own making a couple years after the film was released.

SLIME CITY

Gregory Lamberson (1988)

This odyssey that, of course, revels in slime, started as a selfless act of me finding a copy of Slime City for a friend to watch. I never had any initial intention to watch the film, much less give it a thoughtful review. This friend has, for some time, had a growing addiction and it's only right that his path be taken downtown, a city of effervescent and oft-runny ooze. After bestowing upon him a Ghoulies double feature, why, I should have foreshadowed this long ago but now that I'm at this point - I can stop bitching and attempt to mend the mold that Slime City has spread upon every nerve in my brain. Opening with a scene of unspeakable turbulence, a couple glance at an apartment complex but for only the male suitor. Unknown to us, the female is a dedicated full-time cocktease whose occupation borders maintaining chastity and driving the lead male, Alex, mad. This can include many activities as Lori's model is an advanced prototype of female warfare, visiting Alex's workplace, furthering the temptation with her always loaded innocence artillery cannon. Mary Huner portrays both Lori, unloving girlfriend, and Nicole, temptress Goth-Rock man-killer. For reasons unknown to us at the time, the paralyzing performance of Mary Huner digs much deeper into the flesh of Slime City than one would care to realize but for now lets stick to the Satanic scribblings at hand.

After Alex moves into his new apartment, the tenants prove his previous assumption of being among retirees wrong by displaying black leather and chains, clearly the height of 80s NY counterculture. After the stress finally buckles his will too far from the lack of intimacy from his girlfriend, Alex spends his dinner with a fellow tenant, Roman, which includes a strange Himalayan Yogurt and an unknown wine created by a deceased soul. Upon further revelation, the wine is clued to be an elixir created by a Satanic alchemist before his suicide in the very basement of the apartment. Down there, shelves are lined with the stuff and Alex's future transformation is beset in stone. For you see, once you consume this dark combination of questionable origin, you must kill or else the slime will consume you. Your skin puses and boils. Clothes give way to seep slime through your every pore and eventually you rot. This drags in a line of clear inspiration from the aforementioned Ghoulies, that tale of a wandering masculine identity falling at the heels of property horror while a bubblehead bounces around. Not content with just "apartment horror", never in the vein of Polanski, Slime City ups the ante with extremely practical and unnecessary slime, ooze, gunk, and mire, which is more of a monetarily-salvaged helping of Street Trash, if anything. Slime City rolls out the mildewed red carpet at this epiphany and reincarnation, dismemberment, and turgid synth take lead of this true "grindhouse" production.

Whether or not Slime City is of worth to be occupied with your precious time is mainly up to the three key aspects that might make for sparse enjoyment. If promising amounts of seepage, fully clothed sex, and nondescript Satanic occultism seem like any desirable way to spend an evening than Slime City will overcompensate your dwindling taste in filmic luxury. Picking up where I left off, the transformation of femininity in Slime City is a rather quirky one. Nicole plays succubus to Alex's only desire - sex. After all, he is a struggling artist whose hormones were the only unconditional aspect of their seemingly flawless relationship. Refusing to make love, spend the night, or give way from her parents hold, Lori not only sacrifices the life and the will of Alex but also condemns his soul in the process. Striking opposite, Nicole is the gloomy girl-next-door archetype par excellence, especially with her dominating candy stare and the crypt-like apartment that she resides in, complete with wooden boards protruding from doorways. The climax of Slime City reaches a boil all too fast, resulting in an obviously synthetic experience. It feels as if Greg Lamberson forced the script to swallow a bag of pop rocks then wash it down with a spent slug of a .45 to ease the pain and eliminate its coil thus severing expectation. In fairness, I understand his will to want to keep it canon in death. Slime City lives up to its title in some ways, some others, it doesn't. It's not so much a slime city as it is a slime suburb. Either way, Slime City is definitive barf material. Especially in my sickened state did the grueling nature of goop sway me.

HIGHWAY OF HEARTACHE

At long last have I've finally watched Highway of Heartache; one of the most absolutely batshit films I've seen in recent memory. After viewing Gary's Touch, I came to the realization that Canada has some of the greatest avant-garde psychosexual films that refuse to see distribution (for obvious reasons). Highway of Heartache is what you would expect between the 50s clashing with The Anal Birth of Bert. The film's unusual level of camp is derived from the Day-Glo sets that are constantly used and the cartoon-like props and surreal intermissions of animation. Point is, my mindset is as scattered as the surreal jurisdiction of this very clever film. Withering, chain-smoking female Wynona-Sue is the crash dummy of this story. She does nothing but continuously sink into worse and worse proceedings that bring life to her tale. It's such a fate that her downfall leads to our high spirits. A southern gal named Wynona-Sue Turnpike has dreams of becoming a Nashville country star and her only output for her emotional distress is in her lovely songs. After murdering her husband, she hits the road only to get venereal disease diagnosed by an Elvis Presley impersonating gynecologist and expresses her inner woes with very catchy tunes detailed with raunchy lyrics perfectly radiant of the overall theme of the film - "Itch in my ditch | Germ in his sperm." After this and more, Wynona-Sue regroups with her orphaned "nigger" child and evokes many bad memories of her promiscuous past. Highway of Heartache is best described as an trashy country musical of abstract integrity. Regrettably the best and only of its kind. It's film making like this that inspires the underground to aim for originality and quality rather than blind entertainment. It's no secret that this film never got proper distribution but in an event of counter-productivity, this film is an obscure secret shying away from a cult community that would be embracing its many perks as well as flaws. Perhaps the greatest moments of Highway of Heartache is its approach of racial acceptance or lack thereof. It really gives the film color, to see Wynona-Sue approach a Negro calling her special and dark-skinned - monotonously dismissing prejudice all the while calling them "niggers." White people who believe they must apologize to every Negro they meet because of their ancestors absolutely disgust me. As "parodied" in Fritz the Cat, it's this kind of impassioned racial ass-kissing that puts the "brothas" and the white race down. Just live and let live. Also, kill whitey. Big hair is a thing of the past. Cry-Baby tried to reintroduce this dead fashion but I find that film to be as filling as cafeteria food, in other words, I abhor that film's being. Highway of Heartache reinvents a retro schematic for a contemporary musical sans the contrived song writing and uninspired events that unfold. To call this film interesting would be underwhelming and to call this film underwhelming would be a damn lie. While the events and absurdity seem to die down 3/4's through, the finished product is still one of the most original products of discourse I've seen on terms of sheer inspired mania. Highway of Heartache might also be the most offensive musical ever produced. Any film brave enough to introduce Blackface, let alone drag-queen Blackface, is an absolute treasure in my book. If you can locate this film, don't let anything stop you from viewing this ridiculous title of surreal trash that follows a doctrine of misanthropy. This film speaks with its own language, with its own culture, and is glorified within the reality present, veiling a lucid adventure of country music stardom with an aesthetic comparable to watching Nickelodeon on acid.

JACK KETCHUM'S THE GIRL NEXT DOOR

Gregory Wilson (2007)

This film got the best of me. I went into this film expecting a literary port of celebrated whiny autobiography called A Child Called It to the TV screen but my expectations were ravaged. This film not only made me sob in disgust but made me vow to never watch it again unless condemning my mother to the same fate. One could call this film soulless or unmerciful, some could call it a damn good movie. This film is not art, no. It is a normal big budget thriller, albeit with a bit of a blood thirst. Complete with its own faults and uninspired imagery, but this film isn't about that - It's about Meg.

David is a grown man, too grown I might add. Too grown including the fact that he has his regrets in the past. What a horrible thing to feel. Not just normal regrets. The regrets that nightmares are made of. We are shown this story through David's eyes. When he is a boy in the 50's, he is caught catching crayfish by the incredibly cheerful Meg, whom he quickly develops a friendship with. Her parents died in a car accident leaving her with many scars and a crippled sister named Susan. After many encounters with her cousins who he is great friends with, he begins to notice horrible things from Aunt Ruth. Harrowing things, horrifying things, and appalling things. Things you wouldn't tell anyone and that is exactly what little David did. I dare not reveal too much about this film. Seeing as how many reviews give away vital information and how I went in knowing nothing, the effect is indeed grand. While being highly disturbing, the film does come short in necessary categories. The ending was missing a lot. It's one of those films that get caught up in the climax and don't give a shit about the resolution. The amazing thing about this film is how well it captures the heart of a child. Playing with bugs, focusing on childish violence and playing in the woods are only the physical depictions of this visual maturity. Perhaps Jack Ketchum is recalling a personal experience, similar to that of the director of Summer Scars. Games are the main thing at hand, and of course pornography. So curious, but children's minds are incredibly malleable. We soon find this out as David's closest friends become apart of this sick and twisted game. The Girl Next Door takes pride in watching you squirm. Do not expect a happy ending from this narcissistic, voyeuristic film. This is yet another film that seems to try to teach you how "ladies" should act. Of course, it is seen as the "wrong theme" of the film but it is pushed too much and too frequent". All in all, this is a good film that makes you feel a hell of a lot, but it doesn't make it an amazing cinematic achievement. Suburbia hell and hairspray hasn't been this fun since Blue Velvet.

NIGGER LOVER

Greydon Clark (1973)

To review this film under its intended title is my main priority. To point out its reverse bottlecap propaganda is my second. Given the nature of this film and its history, Nigger Lover, also lovingly known as Tom, The Bad Bunch, and The Brothers, is a film directed by a civil rights activist turned schlock maestro. As per his unusual occupation, Nigger Lover is a film that gets all too confused in conveying which message it supports. Consider the branching extensions of this film universal. You can plug and play this film into any meaning or racial ultimatum which also happens to do something for the swept sake at stake. This is the film that they didn't want you to see, with reason enough however. Nigger Lover is a film wrapped up in its own lost ideology and features a sympathetic look at the white man and dealing with many pig-headed and angry "niggas" as the "bad bunch" cavorts around the streets with intention to harm "Whitey." Nigger Lover surely is the pièce de résistance of Greydon Clark's expansive gutter career. I support independent idealism transgressed to film but the only thing Clark's created of social importance is regrettably this anchored look at the fabled "aggression gene" present in all blacks.

Restoring my faith within the cracked-black case of cassettes and the corroded picturesque look at materialism in the age of exploitation, Nigger Lover starts centering itself within the conversation of a black and white GI stationed in Vietnam (but is obviously shot in a neighbor's backyard). After discussing what they believe home to be like, the wise black man begins to say that the war is still going back home and that he knows the answer on how to stop ebony & ivory confrontations and bring peace to all sides. Lucky for us he is suddenly and humorously shot and utters a violent scream before he can whisper the secret vaccine for Helter Skelter. Bringing a letter back home for his fallen friend's family, he encounters a brother reeking of soul who approaches with incredible hostility. It's our dearly departed soldier's brother name of Tom. But don't call him by his slave name, his name is now "Makimba." Along springs his gang of groovy, white-women stealing soul brothers and after utilizing some heavy intimidation tactics, Jim decides to cut his losses and leaves. Makimba, having nothing to do with Jim's lack of confrontation, decides to assault him at an ethnic fair before two "corrupt" detectives break it up waving their pistols around and calling Jim a "Nigger Lover" after claiming Makimba is his friend, obviously to extinguish any more violence from the Negroes.

As you can expect, a campaign of disinformation is thrust upon the sexually-frustrated Jim. While the camera hops between an endless void of interracial nudity and forced repressed ethnic ideals, Jim brings around a heavy aura of indecisiveness while he hops between the love of his life, Nancy (I think I recall that they've been dating for "2 months"), and some barfly hooker named Bobbie.

To beef up the story devices of this film and the jolting ending, Clark sets out to humanize Jim but fails halfway and creates a socially incompetent Frankenstein of faults and idiosyncrasies. While drunk later in the film, he proposes to the bubble-headed Nancy out of reverse-engineered hostility towards her decision to not move in with him because of Sin as a deciding factor. So after the plans and arrangements are set, he makes a progressive decision to possibly not go through with the marriage, thus sparking a several minute long conversation with the priest about the sanctity of marriage. Necessary scene or a clever time divergent? Assessing the run time of Nigger Lover at a measly hour and thirteen or so minutes, I suppose this film could use every cutting room floor scene in a final last ditch effort to achieve feature length before a certain deadline.

When you take the poster image of a prone negro holstering a rifle at a fleeing white couple, you can no doubt theorize that this film image is one of the near end shocks of agonizing still-life and the unquestionable lives taken on account of ignorance. Although Makimba had the right to protest and attest the vicious beatings at the hands of the two "pigs", such wonderful lines came out of their confrontations e.g. "Niggers sure bleed!" Of course, no film countering the image of blaxploitation could be without its very own scenes of Jewish discretion! At a pool party, Makimba and his beasts patiently await the arrival of Jim, as they are visiting as his "friends." In the meantime, the bull Negro of the lot decides to mingle with the white women, topless of course. After stealing all the white women with his superior masculinity, the giant picks up a tiny white male and begins to have the females goad the inferior White's size calling him "little man" and "tiny." This infuriates Makimba as he sees this pool turn into a integrated cesspool of spoiled races mixing with such fervor that his devious pose & stare become all the more aggressive with each passing frame. In no time, as the party picks up and the whites become more settled with their chocolate counterparts, one grabs the arm of one of the militants, provoking an angry reaction. Fearing for his safety, he babbles "Is he anti-Semitic or something?" which garners the response "if he iss, we ALLL in trouble!"

What Nigger Lover accomplishes is providing a sleazy shell for some disturbingly true stereotypes. These soul militants provide excellent opposition to the weakling Vietnam veteran but to some degree, also dampen the credibility of the constant peace talks from Jim. Trying to take the higher ground dug this Honky in deeper trouble than he originally planned and by the time the credits roll with image and sound intact, we hardly mourn the fate of our white brother. It's yet another casualty of not doing something sooner and elongating the process of physical contact. For scenes of white police officers seeming unfazed by a mention of a murder plot against a white man, only to suddenly become enraged when hearing they were kidnapping white women, Nigger Lover provides many hilarious sociopolitical thematic elements and enough subversive VHS sleaze to keep a jaded blaxploitation treasure hunter at ease for the time being. If you can handle the atrocious and flimsy editing, that is. Might I add that this is not nearly as anti-white as the original intentions set out to engrave upon the face of exploitation. In the end, Nigger Lover stands triumphant as nigger kitsch.

THE YOUNG FRITZ

Grigori Kozintsev (1943)

Long before the arrival of Nazisploitation flicks, which were created mainly by money-grubbing Guidos and a couple sleazy American Semites (David F. Friedman produced Ilsa, She Wolf of the SS (1975) under the curious pseudonym 'Herman Traeger'), kosher commies in the Soviet Union were portraying German soldiers as savage beasts worthy of being exhibited in the zoo as demonstrated by the vaudevillian slapstick satire Yunyi Frits (1943) aka The Young Fritz aka Yunyy Frits directed by Soviet Jews Grigori Kozintsev (The Youth of Maxim, Don Quixote) and Leonid Trauberg (The Devil's Wheel, Dead Souls) and based on an anti-German agitprop pamphlet poem written by Soviet Jew poet/writer/translator Samuil Marshak. So unwaveringly hateful in its depiction of the German people that it was actually banned by the Soviet censors and never actually released, The Young Fritz is assumed to be lost but someone must have dug up a copy as I managed to see the film recently (I read somewhere that it is a mere 25 minute fragment but the film has a beginning and an end). Despite never having an official release, a non-film marionette version was purportedly a big hit with soldiers of the Red Army during kraut-hunting season at later stages of the Second World War when the pendulum of fate swung to the red side. Originally written by Samuil Marshak in 1942 as a mere satirical pamphlet for the Leningrad Puppet Theatre troupe, The Young Fritz eventually evolved into a slapstick puppet show which traveled to the Eastern Front to play for Soviet soldiers so as to inspire homicidal impulses against the dreaded 'Hun.' Indeed, with references to Germans preferring the purity of cattle (and comparing said Germans to said cattle) to the gigantic Judaic intellects of Heine and Einstein, The Young Fritz, more than anything, is a venomous, if not greatly goofy, assault on Aryans than any sort of serious commie diatribe. The totally tasteless tragicomic story (narrated by no less than a nazi anthropologist aka "famous nazi racist" to boot!) about a blond baby kraut boy who grows up to be a boorish buffoon of a SS man who senselessly vandalizes famous statues in Paris and turns Europa into his own personal campy concentration camp of sorts, only to be taken prisoner on the Eastern Front and put on display as a "German beast" and "mean-eating ape" in a Soviet zoo in the end, The Young Fritz is ultimately in the Hebraic hate spirit of Ilya Ehrenburg (who, during the Second World War, encouraged the murder of Germans and the rape German women aka "blonde hags" via the propaganda pamphlets he wrote that were distributed to Soviet troops) meets the philistine-inspired Yiddish slapstick The Three Stooges. Indeed, the sort of film Melvin James Kaminsky would have loved to have made but lacked the testicular fortitude to do so, The Young Fritz is a kraut-crushing kosher comedy that makes the melodramatic Yid-bashing of Veit Harlan's Jud Süß (1940) aka Jew Süß seem rather tame and classy by comparison.

THE YOUNG FRITZ

The Young Fritz opens with a stereotypically 'Herr Döktor' type German professor, who acts as the film's intentionally unreliable narrator and who pompously proclaims, "Everyone knows me...I'm the professor of anthropology...the famous Nazi racist. I can tell pure blood when I see it. I can tell you if your daddy and uncle are Aryan or not from the way their skulls can ring. I take at random the skulls of all races from my shelves. I get plenty of them from the Gestapo every day," and thus proceeds to tell the terribly tragicomic 'lecture' tale of 'Young Fritz'; or 'How to bring up a kid' in Nazi Germany. Beginning with six month old baby Fritz (depicted by then-middle-age Soviet actor Mikhail Zharov), who comes from a 'very ancient' German family, laying in his baby bed while his fat and boorish brute of a father drinks a mug of fine Bavarian beer and his politically fanatical and sexually frigid mother knits as a "Blut und Boden" (aka "blood and soil") sign hangs prominently in the background, one soon learns that the Aryan anti-hero is descended from a long line of secret agents (his father is described as a 'first-class Gestapo stool') and thus he is fated for a similar career. In between sewing petticoats for her little boy, Fritz's mom sings him Nietzschean 'bird of prey'-themed lullabies and eventually kicks her blond babe out of the house, declaring that he will "earn a cross of honor in battle" and become a "tough sergeant." While still just a wee boy, Fritz is given twenty tanks for his birthday and at grade school he learns to know "no division" in terms of sharing grape jam with others. When Fritz gets old enough to be an asshole with an Adorno-esque Authoritarian personality, he absurdly gives the names of his parents, granddad, and neighbors as conspirators to Hitler himself and the Führer rewards the enterprising young lad by sending him straight to prep school where he becomes an undercover Gestapo agent who spies on other kids. As the 'bully of all Nazi bullies' in prep school, Fritz emotionally torments young girls by lynching plush dog dolls, decapitating teddy bears, and threatening to send them away to an uncertain future in a concentration camps. After six years in the Gestapo, Fritz becomes a polygamist and marries brigade of Aryan babes (one of which has rather masculine shoulders and is missing an eye, but makes up for it by knowing how to crack a whip with sadist glee!) and at the wedding, the groom's father stoically declares, "We worship not the genius of Einstein or Heine, but our cows and oxen" and "Live like cows, love like cows, breed your pure line of offspring so that a son was like his father and mother – a real Aryan ox," thus demonstrating the Hebraic makers of The Young Fritz undying feeling of superiority over Germans as members of god's chosen internationalist gang.

When World War II breaks out, Fritz learns to be a "cowardly murderer" and travels all around occupied Western Europe, drinking beers in countries he cannot be bothered to remember the name of and threatening to shoot locals for "anti-fascist laughter." At the Louvre in Paris, Fritz gawks at Alexandros of Antioch's Aphrodite of Milos statue and criticizes the work of art for its lack of arms, dress, and underwear, etc., ultimately deciding to vandalize the piece by writing his name on it as if he were a grad school delinquent. Rather unfortunately, things begin to start going downhill for Fritz when he gets involved with the blitzkrieg on the Eastern front and his SS regiment is destroyed. In the end, Fritz is captured by the Soviets and put in a communist zoo where a brainwashed Bolshevik babe self-righteously declares, "Come and have a look, Soviet people! In this cage we keep a German beast. To put it short...his name is Fritz of Nazi family. This beast can talk like a man, wears man's clothes, uses a spoon to eat with and a cup or a glass to drink from, but he is still an ape! A man-eating ape! He killed for nothing. He murdered, burnt and carved! He killed babies in their cradles! He piloted the bombers and the submarines. He robbed, he killed and tortured the captives. We've killed a lot of Fritzes in our lands. But we took this one to the zoo. That man-like beast will survive and live to be studied by scientists as any other viper," thus summing up the perverse proclivity of Soviet Jewish writers/filmmakers towards Freudian projection. Not surprisingly, The Young Fritz concludes with the inter-title, "You've watched a movie featuring one of the great mysteries of our time: How a man can degrade to an ape," as if the Soviet Union was not a collectivist hellhole led by murderous self-appointed pseudo-aristocratic dictators who attempted to mold the masses (or at least those they did not execute or starve to death in man-made famines) into soulless killing machines and robotic factory slaves.

Featuring the warped Freudian sex stuff you would expect from Hollywood (i.e. Fritz kissing his father on the mouth, a SS officer smacking Fritz on the ass, Fritz and a buddies heads hovering suggestively under a commie officer's crotch), as well as the supremely stupid sort of uncultivated slapstick humor Tinseltown thrives on, The Young Fritz seems much less 'dated' than one would suspect considering its age, which certainly has a lot to do with the particular pedigree of people that made it. An absurdist agitprop work riddled with all sorts of conspicuous kosher comedy clichés, The Young Fritz is ultimately most insightful in that it reveals that the same sort of anti-German people that worked in the Soviet film industry before the Second World War are also the same sort of people that dominated Hollywood both then and now. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Hollywood producer Arnon Milchan (Natural Born Killers, Fight Club) recently arrogantly revealed that he is an Israeli spy who, among other things, obtained nuclear weapons materials and technology for the Israeli government, just as it is no coincidence that Ilya Ehrenburg—the leading Soviet propagandist of the Second World War—left all his papers and private archives to Jerusalem's Yad Vashem library and archive instead of the Soviet Union, despite the fact he was a lifelong Soviet citizen. Apparently, no less than 600 performances of the play version of The Young Fritz were given to Soviet troops during the Second World War, but one can only guess the influence the film version would have had had it been actually officially released. Of course, Mel Brooks and Woody Allen inevitably proved that a little anti-German/anti-Euro-goy comedy goes a long way as demonstrated by the fact that their anti-Nazi celluloid caricatures have become American cultural archetypes to the point where most Americans cannot hear the word "German" without thinking of goofy authoritarian goose-stepping oafs. Personally, I found The Young Fritz more visceral and authentic in its hatred of Aryans than, say, Brooks' The Producers (1967), and thus found this little Soviet agitprop flick much more enjoyable, if not reluctantly so. Like a number of Allied propaganda flicks of its time, The Young Fritz also confirms that the holocaust mythos was already long codified before the Second World War ever concluded and for that reason alone makes the film worth viewing, so put on your lederhosen, grab yourself a large overflowing mug of Kölsch beer, and watch what it arguably the most wonderfully warped piece of celluloid Teutonophobia ever schemed up by bloodlusting 'Soviet' Semites with a rather nasty and nefarious knack for crude comedy.

AFRICA ADDIO

Gualtiero Jacopetti (1966)

Action, adventure, horror, drama, tantalizing Technicolor, and real uncensored communist-sanctioned terror and exterminations are just a couple of the classic ingredients that make Africa addio (1966) aka Africa Blood and Guts aka Farewell Africa co-directed by the great Guido mondo movie masters Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prospero (Mondo Cane, Mondo candido) the authentic African epic and singular celluloid safari that it is. Indeed, forget the ethnographies of ethnomasochistic frog bastards like Jean Rouch and René Vautier, Africa addio is the real no bullshit deal in terms of depicting the rarely good, mostly bad, and uniquely ugly in regard to the reasons as to why post-colonial Africa is a virtual hell-on-earth that is plagued by rape, murder, poverty, starvation, and countless other tragic things that most people rather ignore (did the colonialists forget about the history of Haiti?). Condemned by exceedingly effete mainstream film critic Roger Ebert as “racist” because he felt it “slanders a continent” (since when do Africans have time to worry about petty pansy white liberal things like slander?), Africa addio depicts the horrors that ensue when blacks are left to their own devices when handed a European model for civilization and are expected to run it on their own. Needless to say, the results are not pretty. Arguably one of the most, if not the most, damning depiction of humanity ever shot in Technicolor, the film portrays, among other things, real depictions of genocide and extermination, collective racial and religious hatred, the mass slaughtering of wild life, the nonsensical destruction of imported foods in a place where one cannot afford to waste food, the exodus of affluent whites to their mother countries, the communist-ordained slaughter of white Christian missionaries and school children, and the destruction of legions of black Marxist-Leninist murder squads by a handful of white mercenaries. On top of featuring a uniquely unflattering depiction of humanity, Africa addio is a rare example in cinema history where real anarchy is depicted in the purist form, not to mention it is a work where the viewer bears witness to the very potential death of the filmmakers, who constantly carry rifles in plain sight. The film is also notable for being a rare instance where the filmmaker was arrested on a murder charge relating to the work, as co-director Gualtiero Jacopetti was accused of staging the much deserved execution of a Congolese Simba Rebel prior to the film’s release, though he was ultimately cleared of all charges. Indeed, as Jacopetti, who himself was a journalist, has described in interviews, he was the victim of a witch hunt executed by the left-wing press in Italy for obvious reasons (after all, as described in the film, most of the extermination squads, which the left-wing media depicted as morally righteous black liberationists, were backed by communist regimes), but in terms of documentaries on ‘The Dark Continent’ (a phrase that the viewer comes to realize has more than just one meaning after watching the film), Africa addio is as objective as they come as a work that criticizes whites just as much as blacks, ultimately blaming France and Great Britain's premature withdrawal from the continent for the savage depravity and full-blown social chaos that took place during the decolonization era of the 1960s and still lives on to this very day. Hated by leftists not just for political reasons, the documentary also dares to entertain with seemingly immaculate direction, witty and insightful narration, and music that acts contra to the anti-entertainment 'distancing' techniques of celebrated commie avant-gardists like Jean-Marie Straub and Jean-Luc Godard. In its lavish (yet literally guerrilla-style) direction and extravagant original musical score, Africa addio has the look of a big budget Hollywood production, albeit minus the phoniness, sappy sentimentalism, and tagged-on happy ending. Indeed, forget Zulu (1964), or any other mainstream Hollywood movie set in the Dark Continent for that matter, Africa addio is the work one must see to properly understand the Africa of today and why the continent will probably never get out of its precarious predicament as the rape, murder, slavery, and starvation capital of the world.

Right from the beginning, Africa addio prepares the viewer for what they are about to be in store for with the following introductory prologue: "The Africa of the great explorers, the huge land of hunting and adventure adored by entire generations of children, has disappeared forever. To that age-old Africa, swept away and destroyed by the tremendous speed of progress, we have said farewell. The devastation, the slaughter, the massacres which we assisted belong to a new Africa—one which if it emerges from its ruins to be more modern, more rational, more functional, more conscious—will be unrecognizable. On the other hand, the world is racing toward better times. The new America rose from the ashes of a few white men, all the redskins, and the bones of millions of buffalo. The new, carved up Africa will rise again upon the tombs of a few white men, millions of black men, and upon the immense graveyards that were once its game reserves. The endeavor is so modern and recent that there is no room to discuss it at the moral level. The purpose of this film is only to bid farewell to the old Africa that is dying and entrust to history the documentation of its agony." Indeed, the viewer is about to enter a perturbing, if not equally penetrating, place of no return, at least for about 140 minutes or so, where any semblance of civilization and sanity has been flushed down a Marx brand toilet that has become clogged and has caused shit to overflow everywhere.

For anyone watching Africa addio, it is quite apparent that post-colonial Africa is a real-life nightmare of rape, torture, and destruction, but who is to blame?! The director's offer the following speculation: "Europe is in a hurry to leave and on tiptoe even if, all things considered, it has given far more than it has taken. Europe, the continent that nursed Africa, can no longer manage this big black baby that grew too quickly, keeps bad company and what's more, hates it because of its white skin. And so it is abandoned, still cranky and immature, just at the moment when it needs Europe the most.” Indeed, the British and French, who are finally accepting the fact that they no longer have empires and barely have the time to waste on teaching savages how to be civilized pseudo-Brits and Frogs, have left civilization in the hands of people without civilization who, until relatively recently, ran around naked in hunter-gatherer tribes and had no interest in worrying about things like democracy, literacy, liberalism, badminton, rationalism, and clothing. Desiring their own independence and looking to blame whites for every single one of their misfortunes, many of the black liberationists find themselves enticed by anti-Occidental communist propaganda from the Soviet Union and China, who back their genocidal revolutions of extermination and anti-religious hysteria. As depicted early on in Africa Addio, the communist-backed Uhuru Movement, which wrecked havoc all across Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania and rid these areas of white rule, as well as a number of whites and black people with it, demands all black Africans adopt Pan-Africanism. On top of giving white property and farms to blacks (with many of the original owners being tortured and exterminated during the revolutions), Uhuru even made sure to rid Africa of white graveyards, even hiring Indians to carry out the dirty deeds of exhuming the corpses. The whites have been in Kenya for three generations, but now have to give up their rights and safety to blacks that hate their very being, so many of them naturally opt for leaving the Dark Continent and going back to the old country for good. Although the crimes relating to the Mau Mau Uprising are not depicted in the documentary, the aftermath is and one learns via trial footage how black nannies would take part in slaughtering white children that they had brought up since birth, among other countless atrocities that make those of the SS seem rather civil by comparison. One of the more heinous criminals on trial is convicted of cannibalism, which is now a fairly common occurrence today in places like the Congo and Liberia. After the Uhuru’s ‘liberation’ of Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania, senseless animal slaughterings, including the lynching of monkeys (!) and mutilation of cows (who have to be put down by white farmers), and poaching became all the rage and it even got so bad in the Uhuru countries that the blacks literally begged the French and British whites that they originally kicked out to come back to restore order, but it was short-lived, though privately funded Anglo-Saxon organizations did pop up to help save the animals (in one of the most breathtaking scenes of the doc, a baby zebra is airlifted out of a dangerous kill zone via helicopter right before sunset). Psychopathic rich whites also used the chaos as an opportunity to kill elephants and whatnot, with something called the “1/2 hour safari” becoming especially popular where wealthy whites would land in a helicopter, shoot and kill an elephant at close range like true cowards, and then take a photo of themselves with their effortlessly earned prize as a souvenir. Of course, although more murderous, blacks were much less proficient hunters, as while whites would only need two or three people and a couple rifles to take down an elephant, it was not uncommon for a giant mass of 10,000 spear-chucking negroes to occupy an area the size of a large city and kill animals collectively with archaic weapons. As the documentary reveals, the blacks had a special hatred for horses as they associated them with whites and saw them as “physically racist” due to their supposed aversion to negroes.

One of the more standout segments of Africa addio is the depiction of the Zanzibar Revolution, which involved the extermination of large segments of the Arab Muslim and Asian populations. Backed by the Soviets, a genocidal negro named John Okello overthrew the thousand year old government of the Sultan and ordered the extermination of Muslims, even dropping off 500 rifles and propaganda leaflets on one island demanding that the blacks kill all the Arabs because they were ostensibly ‘cursed slave traders.’ Rather nonsensically, the blacks mindlessly followed Okello’s demands, with Africa addio being literally the only live document of the genocide, which features thousands upon thousands of Arabs piled up in mass graves and sprawled out on the beaches in gruesome postmortem poses. The reason why the Zanzibar Revolution is so under documented is because killer Okello closed all communications and airports in the area, thus only a handful of brave Europeans managed to sneak in and bear witness to a most horrendous piece of history. In one rather disturbing scene featured in the documentary, directors Jacopetti and Prosperi’s German colleagues are taken hostage and have their helicopter burned by a Marxist murder squad, with the Italian filmmakers themselves barely getting away as they are being shot at while taking off in a helicopter. The documentary also depicts the war of the Bantu against the Watusi (aka Hutu), which is described as, “nothing more than racial persecution fomented for political purposes by the presence and propaganda of China in the state of Rwanda Burundi.” Over a two month period, the Bantu massacred 18,000 Watusi people with mere machetes, thus revealing that the sentimentalized revelations featured in phony Hollywood garbage like Hotel Rwanda regarding genocidal racial hatred in Rwanda is nothing new. Another hell on earth scenario depicted in the documentary involves Dar es Salaam, the largest city in Tanzania, after it went into complete anarchy when the military decided to mutiny and the president disappeared, with the filmmakers describing merely being there amongst all the society insanity as a, “nearly a suicidal endeavor.” The aftermath of the commie Simba Rebellion of 1964 in the former Republic of Congo is also depicted in graphic detail, with bloated, mutilated and dismembered corpses covering nearly every couple square feet of the area. The Simba ultimately had tortured and, in part, eaten 12,000 people during their 100 days of neo-bolshevik occupation, but luckily 100,000 Belgian/European paratroopers and mercenaries came in and saved the day. Among other things, the Simba burned children alive in their schools, participated in collective cannibalism, and raped and killed white Christian missionaries for the mere rare pleasure of defiling the white devil and his God.

Undoubtedly, my favorite scene of Africa addio is a segment on Tshombe's army of eccentric white mercenaries, who are aptly described as follows: "the last surviving soldiers of fortune from another century. They're former citizens of a world that kicked them out or that they're running from. Dead and survivors, all of them are or were ex-something. From a restless past, an uncomfortable present, a ruined adventure, lost faith." The white mercenaries are made up of every type of European race imaginable and represent the old school type of Faustian man of yesteryear that were responsible for conquering Africa and other parts of the world in the first place. Highly adept killers, it only takes 14 white mercenaries to kill 400 commie rebels from Kisala and only 40 men plan to execute an operation that 93,000 UN soldiers failed to do: the conquest of Boende. In one scene, the mercenaries save a group of overjoyed white Christian missionaries literally just a couple of seconds before they are about to be slaughtered. Indeed, as narrated in the documentary, "Simba propaganda teaches to strike the white man, especially at his God, a white-skinned God responsible for the centuries-long arrogance of his faithful." After recovering a booty of 50 million Congolese Francs (which was apparently going to be used by a fellow named General Olenga to send 3000 Mulelist warriors to ostensibly occupy America!), the mercenaries celebrate by getting naked and drunk. Indeed, even in war torn and corpse-covered post-colonial Africa, there are still ways to have fun, thus demonstrating that the white man is always at his greatest during moments of complete chaos.

Ultimately, Africa addio concludes quite aptly with a rather foreboding segment on the apartheid in South Africa, which is described as follows: "Racial separation, which is called 'apartheid' here, is a short-lived, provisional dam. It is the hysterical reaction to the hysterical situation that threatens to darken the smile of the new generations into hatred." Undoubtedly, South Africa is the only place featured in the entire documentary that has any sort of order and functional infrastructure, which, whether people want to admit it or not, is a direct result of apartheid. In the very last scene of the documentary, the narrator makes an excellent metaphor between Arctic penguins that long ago colonized the southernmost beaches of South Africa and the dubious future for western civilization in SA, stating: "At the end of the Ice Age, a warm current broke this little colony of penguins off of the glaciers of the south and carried them here on huge rafts of ice that then melted in the sun. Isolated and without the possibility of returning to their original homeland, they have for centuries been strangers in a strange land that is becoming more and more heated and hostile toward them surrounded by a sea that grows higher and more and more filled with rage. Perhaps a little peace will descend upon these waters sooner or later, before a wave stronger than the others tears them away forever from this last rock that forms the geographic end of the Dark continent." Of course, since the nearly half a century of time that has passed since the documentary was first released and the inevitable end of apartheid two decades ago, South Africa has more or less degenerated into a country just as corrupt and crime-ridden as the rest of Africa, with the rarely acknowledged extermination of the white population already well under way as demonstrated by the epidemic of Boer farmer murders committed by blacks. In fact, one of the most amazing things about Africa addio is that it demonstrates how eerily similar modern day South Africa is to how Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania were during the 1960s.

Undoubtedly, when everything is said and done, the white man's biggest crime in Africa was ever setting foot there in the first place, thus forcing blacks to adopt a European way of life that they were never fit for. Indeed, they might not have their homes, iPods, cellphones, rap CDs, sanitation, antibiotics and basketballs if it were not for white colonization, but they would probably be much happier and less resentful were they still living the hunter-gatherer way of life that they were used to before enterprising Europeans showed up on the Dark Continent and began carving up land, mixing together rival tribes, and creating countries. It should be noted that the perennial problem of starvation in many African countries is itself a direct result of western medicine because, like the rest of the third world, the introduction of antibiotics skyrocketed the survival rates among Africans, thus resulting in unsustainable amounts of mouths to feed. Of course, when white do-gooder philanthropists and so-called nonprofit organizations began providing these starving people with aid for rather dubious reasons, they only guaranteed that even more people would be starving in the next generation. As the history of Haiti clearly demonstrates, which involved the black population exterminating the entire white population, as well as the mulatto aristocracy that was setup by the French, negroes always revert back into the same behavior that they engaged before they adopted a "white mask" (as Fanon once called it), albeit in a degenerative form, as they have already been long robbed of their indigenous culture and do not have much to return back to. Notably, one of the major themes of Africa addio is the inability of blacks to accept whites as 'Africans', even if their ancestors have been there for 400 years. In a scene featuring idealistic Portuguese soldiers being killed by members of the FREILMO in Mozambique and MPLA in Angola during the early stages of the Portuguese Colonial War, the narrator rightfully states, "This is the destiny of a people who wanted to ignore the color of skin. This is Portugal. White or black, we're all Portuguese. But the rebels of Angola don't agree. This is Africa. Only blacks are Africans. White and black, a dilemma which is present, current, universal that is more and more being colored red." It should be noted that I watched the original Italian cut of the film (there are at least three versions of the film), which is less brutal than the American cut entitled 'Africa Blood and Guts,' which was condemned by the directors and features none of the scenes of nudity and 'comic' relief that give the viewer a little bit of time to digest all the blood, destruction, and racial hatred that makes up the majority of the film. Indeed, Africa addio features a real and uncensored depiction of the rotten fruits of engineered racial diversity in action, ultimately offering a taste of what is to come to Europe, America, Australia, and all the other white-majority areas if they continue allowing hostile aliens (be they legal or illegal) into their countries, for nature is the ultimate fascism and has no sympathy for ethno-masochistic bleeding heart pussies who hate reality and somehow think they can save humanity by throwing everyone into a melting pot that has never and will never melt, as demonstrated by the abject failure of multicultural entities of the past like the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia. In their masterful follow-up epic docudrama/documentary/mockumentary hybrid Addio zio Tom (1971) aka Goodbye Uncle Tom, directors Jacopetti and Prosperi would predict the largely unspoken war against white America that has transformed the United States into the hate-ridden, divided, and ultimately broken nation that it is today. With that being said, I think it is about time some new filmmakers pick up Jacopetti and Prosperi's torch and carry on their legacy of uncompromising and uncensored documentary filmmaking, as there is no better time than now, as the race-baiting news headlines demonstrate.

GOODBYE UNCLE TOM
GOODBYE UNCLE TOM

Gualtiero Jacopetti (1971)

Goodbye Uncle Tom is the ultimate shockumentary. People have often called the film a mockumentary due to its offensive material and their inability to live in reality. Goodbye Uncle Tom ignores all taboos associated with the historical facts of the United States. The film is also the most offensive of all the Mondo Cane documentaries. Mondo Cane filmmakers Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prospero really went all the way to expose the "dark" history of the United States. Goodbye Uncle Tom documents the history of American slavery and then concludes with a warning for the future. A determined black man is ready to start killing white families and collect some ancient dues. Goodbye Uncle Tom exposes the idiocy and degeneracy of white liberal hedonism that took place during the late 1960s (and still continues today). While pathetic white hippies dance naked in paint and talk about peace, a black man is watching their every move. He is getting ready for attack. Philosophical terrorist Karl Marx is exposed as having his years of "study" being funded by Jewish pirate Jean Lafitte in Goodbye Uncle Tom. Lafitte made a great deal of money during the New Orleans slave trades and sent it to Marx in Europe. The fact that Karl Marx was funded by slavery only confirms his cryptic intentions when coming up with his "theories." Goodbye Uncle Tom also features a Jewish doctor talking about the subhuman qualities of Africans. The doctor talks about the superiority of white Europeans and is eventually questioned about his Jewish heritage. As you would expect, he becomes very offended. This scene gives a closer look at the real reality surrounding the slave trades and real beneficiaries. Goodbye Uncle Tom also documents the weird sexual practices and fantasies of white slave owners. Young black girls were giving to visiting friends of slave owners for the night. The mammy made sure to check their vaginas before being used for aristocratic pleasures. A rich white bitch even has a mass lot of slaves used for sadomasochistic sex and torture. One of the most disturbing scenes involves the selling of young boys and girls by a vaudevillian style black dwarf. Apparently rich pedophiles have lust for 7 year old black boys with painted gold penises. A slave breeding plantation is also featured in Goodbye Uncle Tom. We find out that only a few studs were used as breeding slaves resulting in low genetic variance among slaves. The slave owners and crackers (indentured servants) are also shown adding to slaves genetic variance via brutal rape. Some slaves were even bred interracial to be sold at a higher price for having "part human" genetics. Don't expect any type of censorship in Goodbye Uncle Tom as everything is exposed. Goodbye Uncle Tom is the real story on American history and the African slave trades. All historical elements of the film are from historical letters and documents. You even get to see the role the catholic church played in slave owning (seems like they still practice slavery). Despite its powerfully and unapologetic offensive material, Goodbye

Uncle Tom paints a realistic portrait of American history that disinformation con artists like Michael Moore only wish they could have pulled out of their ass.

CREW CUT

Guido Pieters (1979)

Despite being regarded as the least best of the “Great Four” post-WWII Dutch writers following Willem Frederik Hermans, Harry Mulisch and Gerard Reve, Jan Wolkers—a man who was also a prolific sculptor and painter as his oftentimes autobiographical novels more than hint at—has the honor of being the writer with the most worthwhile films based off of his books. Indeed, the most popular and successful film of Dutch cinema history, Paul Verhoeven’s Turks fruit (1973) aka Turkish Delight—a work that was honored in 1999 with the truly one-of-a-kind award for ‘Best Dutch Film of the Century’ at the Netherlands Film Festival—was based on Wolkers’ 1969 novel of the same name. Of course, various other popular Dutch filmmakers have adapted Wolkers’ work, including Ate de Jong with Brandende liefde (1983) aka Burning Love, Theo van Gogh with Terug naar Oegstgeest (1987) aka Return to Oegstgeest, and even Turkish Delight female lead Monique van de Ven with Zomerhitte (2008) aka Summer Heat, but arguably the best of these adaptations aside from Verhoeven’s film is the rather underrated flick Kort Amerikaans (1979) aka Crew Cut directed by Guido Pieters (Dokter Vlimmen aka Doctor Vlimmen, Ciske de Rat aka Ciske the Rat). Set at the end of World War II during the German occupation instead of the ostensibly hip counterculture era like Turkish Delight, Pieters’ film is thankfully much darker and, somewhat surprisingly, no less salacious than Verhoeven’s classic. Indeed, instead of Swinging Amsterdam and a bodacious blonde beast Rutger Hauer, Pieters’ film features a forlorn Nazi-occupied Leiden and a somewhat demented dark-haired Derek de Lint as an obnoxiously antisocial artist who rather fuck headless and limbless statues than real living and breathing women. In other words, Pieters’ film can hardly be described as a love story, as love is nowhere to be found in the maniac microcosm that it less than flatteringly depicts. Almost apocalyptic and certainly culturally pessimistic in tone, Crew Cut is set in a decidedly dreary and decaying South Holland where most young people are away in Germany slaving away in factories and only manipulative weirdos like the antihero seem to be still around. A rare WWII flick that does not pathologically obsess over how evil the krauts are or even dwell on the fate of the Jews, the film ultimately seems like a less than nostalgic look at the old Netherlands before hyper hedonism and atheism practically become part of government legislation. In its depiction of a young artist/man-child who falls further and further into alienation to the point of coldblooded murder and violent self-annihilation, Crew Cut is probably best described as an anti-coming-of-age tale where the despairing antihero eventually has to confront the fact that he has literally no future in an almost perniciously playful film that could not have a more senselessly tragic and unhappy ending.

Lint of Fons Rademakers' De aanslag (1986) aka The Assault and Philip Kaufman's The Unbearable Lightness of Being (1988)) should be working in a German factory with most of young Dutchmen his age, but he has a totally untamable anarchistic spirit and never could be forced to do such a thing, thus he is hiding out in an attic away from his devout Catholic family, who he rather not be around in the first place. Unlike most people, the war seems to have had little, if any, effect on Erik's psyche to the point where he does not even seem to realize the precarious state of his occupied nation. Erik is highly self-conscious about a purplish scar that he has on the temple of his head, so he has inordinately long hippie-like hair to cover it. Erik got the scar as a result of a childhood accident involving a boiling kettle and he refuses to forgive his parents for it despite the fact that it was not really their fault. Of course, Erik's preoccupation with his scar lets the viewer know that he suffers from a sort of persecution complex, hence his general disinterest of people, including all of his family members. While Erik has a fiancée named Ansje (Cristel Braak of Wolf Gremm's Fabian (1980)), it seems like the only reason that he is with her at all is because she is a superstitious Catholic and he gets a quite obvious sadistic kick out of sexually defiling her while she literally cries like a traumatized child and begs from him to stop. Indeed, when Erik borderline rapes his lady friend and she hysterically cries, "You're hurting me. Let me go. I want to see my mother," he proceeds to pound her pussy even harder while sarcastically telling her that she is going to get pregnant. Of course, as a young man that lives in an ancient Dutch city featuring old signs on buildings that read "Rest Leads to Lust," Erik cannot help but delight in his unhinged debauchery, especially during wartime. Seemingly apolitical and certainly amoral, Erik has no problem studying at an old art academy that is headed by a much maligned fascist NSB leader named van Grouw (Bernard Droog), who compliments the protagonist on his "really Germanic profile" and "beautiful skull." Van Grouw also warns Erik that when the Judeo-Bolsheviks arrive in the Netherlands, he will lose his beautiful Germanic head and then proceeds to show him Nazi propaganda photos of dead white Russians that the protagonist jokingly describes as looking Jewish. As to why he is a National Socialist, van Grouw states, "Only a united Europe can stop the barbarians." Although his brother is a member of the resistance, Erik has no qualms about accepting the generosity of diehard fascists. While Erik tells van Grouw that he would like to study nudes, there are no models and the only other student left at the academy has no interest in such things. Indeed, the other student, Kees de Spin aka 'Spider' (Joop Admiraal of Heddy Honigmann's Hersenschimmen (1988) aka Mindshadows and Harry Kümel's Eline Vere (1991)), is an exceedingly eccentric four-eyed fascist supporter of the quasi-autistic sort with a deaf-and-dumb mother and he and Erik seem to get along in their own strange way since they are both social outcasts, but their friendship does not last long as death is coming to Leiden. As Spider reveals while on the verge tears, he killed his beloved dog because he wanted the animal, which was his only friend, to talk to him, so he started shacking it to the point where he ended up accidentally strangling it to death. Luckily for Spider, he will soon be reunited with his dead doggie.

When Ansje dumps Erik after he spansks her bare derriere and then fingers her and subsequently licks his finger, the protagonist decides to absurdly take out his rage on an innocent, if not creepy, bald middle-aged named Rozier (Ralph Wingers of Babeth Mondini's Kiss Napoleon Goodbye (1990)) by accusing him of being a cow-fucker and screaming in his face. To make ends meet, Erik paints 17th-century ships onto lampshades, which are apparently in demand because, "The worse people are off, the more they're interested in our glorious past." Although Erik is not a fan of his aristocratic boss Paul D'Ailleurs (Guus Ooster of Pieters' Ciske the Rat), who considers Germans to be more polite than his fellow Dutchmen, he certainly likes his much younger wife Elly (Tingue Dongelmans), who is a rather sexually aggressive woman that made the monetary-motivated mistake of marrying a cowardly and seemingly impotent cuckold. Paul seems more interested in masturbating to ancient paintings by Sandro Botticelli than sexually servicing his wife, so it does not take Erik and Elly to begin a lurid love affair. In fact, pansy Paul almost seems to get a kick out of the idea of Erik defiling his wife, as he attempts to get the protagonist to admit that he has been secretly messing around with her. When Erik's older brother Frans (Bram Jesserun) gets diphtheria while hiding at the home of an infected family after getting shot by a kraut while attempting to steal food vouchers as a member of the resistance and subsequently dies, it throws the protagonist over the edge and only pushes him further away from his already somewhat estranged family. While his family members are too upset to even look at Frans' corpse at the funeral, Erik curiously opens the casket and touches his dead brother's hair, as if he is a scientist that is coldly conducting some sort of experiment. Erik also decides to sneak into his boss' house late one night to fuck Ansje, who says upon look at his erect member upon examining it with a flashlight in the dark, "What a nice dick." The next morning, Erik gives himself away by opening the bathroom door without knocking and finding Paul curious 'reading' an art book while sitting on the crapper. Of course, any normal mensch would kick the protagonist's ass, but it is actually Erik that ends up laughing at cowardly cuck Paul.

With American troops beginning to make their way to the Netherlands, NSB officer van Grouw decides to abandon the academy with his Nazi art and he allows Erik to stay at the building under the condition that he fill the place up with some new paintings. Before leaving, van Grouw also gives Erik a letter to give to Spider, but when the protagonist goes to his house, he discovers that his classmate has already accepted defeat and has hanged himself. With Spider dead, Erik decides to open van Grouw's letter, which reads, "We fought in vain. Go to your family in the province [...] We're going to the stronghold. We'll fight until the end." Of course, poor Spider did not fight until the end, but of course he lost an internal mental battle before any enterprising commie resistance fighter could get to him. After spending a couple weeks completely by himself at the art academy, Erik actually becomes artistically productive and manages to create a number of ambitious paintings, including a portrait of van Grouw looking quite stoic in his beloved black NSB uniform and a sort of parody painting featuring his boss Paul and Elly as the titular figure of Botticelli's 'The Birth of Venus.' Meanwhile, Erik starts a lurid love affair with one of van Grouw's cement female torso statues even though it is not exactly anatomically correct (to Erik's credit, he does manage to caress the ass of the statue in a manner similar to Ansje's buttocks). After spending a number of weeks at the academy without leaving the building once, Erik decides to pay Elly a visit and attempts to coerce her into leaving Paul and moving in with him, even going so far as to mock his boss to his face, but the little lady declines as she refuses to ruin her bourgeois comfort, at least for now. Of course, wars oftentimes inspires people to do things that they would otherwise never dream of.

Despite initially rejecting his offer, Elly soon shows up at the academy with bags of luggage and moves in, but Erik is not as happy to see her as the viewer would expect. Indeed, that night Elly asks Erik about the purplish scar on the temple of his head and he goes on a resentful rant about how he blames his parents for it, stating regarding how it has effected his life, "... a child that age looks at its parents for protection [...] I've always felt abandoned and betrayed." To add insult to injury, Erik's father apparently forced him to always get 'crew cuts' (hence the seemingly nonsensical title of the film) since the family was poor and could not afford to get regular haircuts, thus everyone could always see the scar. While Elly tells Erik that she could care less about the scar and that she loves him for who he is, Erik continues to act bitchy and denies her rather flagrant sexual advances. Needless to say, when Elly wakes up the next day and finds Erik having 'sex' with the torso statue, she becomes enraged and berates the protagonist by stating in an almost gleefully sadistic fashion, "Now I understand why you don't need me. I should have known after those stories last night. You're just a coward. You're afraid of life. You're afraid of me...Because I'm alive...Because I'm a real woman...So you get on a piece of chalk. So you don't have to prove anything. She's too fat too. You know what you are? You're crazy. That spot on your head's not that bad. But you've got one in your head. You're rotten in there." Of course, like many assholes who talk tons of shit, Erik is good at dishing it out but cannot handle it when people trash talk him, so he replies to Elly while in a state of abject shock, "You shouldn't have said that. You can't say that." When Elly then proceeds to break the torso statue by dropping it on the ground and then jokes "She's hollow," Erik completely loses it, becomes homicidally enraged and strangles her to death with his bare hands. Not long after Erik kills Elly, the Americans liberate the Netherlands while Erik contemplates recent events and his non-future. Ultimately, cow-fucker Razier gets his revenge against Erik by pointing him out to armed members of the resistance and the protagonist more or less commits suicide by inciting the soldiers into shooting him after he pretends to pull a gun on them.

I have seen a number of Dutch films about the German occupation of the Netherlands during the Second World War, but none of them are as nearly dark, nihilistic, and apocalyptic as Crew Cut, which I would describe as a forgotten classic of sorts, as it seems largely unknown even in its native land despite starring big Dutch star Derek de Lint and being directed by a man whose work Ciske the Rat (1984) is regarded as a classic of sorts. Indeed, with more recent works like Martin Koolhoven's Oorlogswinter (2008) aka Winter in Wartime that romanticize WWII in a repugnantly mystifying and sentimental way as if more inspired by the juvenile fantasies of Steven Spielberg than the actual real Dutch wartime experience, Guido Pieters' film provides a nice and iconoclastic wake-up call that expresses in an almost aberrantly allegorical way that absolutely nothing good came out of the war for the Netherlands. While I certainly did not grow up in the Netherlands at that time, my grandfather, who was slightly older than the protagonist of Pieters' film, did and I know the entire experience left him and his brothers devastated enough to the point where they decided to regrettably immigrate to America. Of course, compared to most WWII films, whether they be from Hollywood or Germany, Dutch films about the war tend to be a lot more ambivalent about the entire experience, but certainly none is more strange and surprising than Crew Cut, which ultimately makes it seem like the Dutch were so collectively deranged and miserable in general that the German occupation was not that big of deal. Indeed, there are scenes in the film where the protagonist walks up to and teases an armed Wehrmacht soldier to the point where he is almost shot, as if such behavior was not uncommon among the demented Dutch. Additionally, the film thankfully does not hold back in depicting the extent of Dutch collaboration and why people collaborated in the first place (although seemingly forgotten today, as the film depicts, many of the NSB members felt it was only a matter of time before the Soviets invaded Western Europe and turned into a cultural wasteland). Despite its fairly steady dose of oftentimes graphic nudity, including various bushy beavers and de Lint's semi-erect cock, the film is, quite unlike Turkish Delight, rarely erotic aside from a scene or two. Undoubtedly, Crew Cut feels like what Turkish Delight would have been like had it been set during the Second World War and directed by Fassbinder, as it concludes in such a morbidly melodramatic fashion that I could not help but be reminded of The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979), which was released the same year (incidentally, Crew Cut star Cristel Braak would later relocate to Bavaria and work with Fassbinder's bud Wolf Gremm). While Pieters' film might not be warped to the point of depicting a love affair between a little Dutch boy like in Roeland Kerbosch's sappy pro-pedo flick Voor een verloren soldaat (1992) aka For a Lost Soldier, it certainly seems to be the most wayward and whimsical of the Dutch WWII flicks, which says a lot considering it comes from the same nation that produced Soldaat van Oranje (1977) aka Soldier of Orange, which, quite unlike Hollywood films, takes a rather cavalier approach to the entire war by portraying it as one big murderous adventure as opposed to taking a Spielbergian approach and portraying it as the ultimate historical battle between pure good and pure evil. Indeed, the Dutch have a special hatred for the krauts that began way before WWII, but as a film like Crew Cut clearly demonstrates, they are not so stupid or childish as to think of the Germans or even the Nazis as evil incarnate, hence the relative originality and 'objectivity' of their WWII films.

THE RESURRECTION OF A BASTARD

Guido van Driel (2013)

As far as I am concerned, a gangster flick is not a gangster flick without real live Guidos, so naturally I find Guy Ritchie flicks to be innately intolerable and find the idea of 'Nordic gangsters' to be somewhat absurd, even if such Aryan barbarian low-lives exist in real-life like the cocksucking Kray twins. Naturally, I find the idea of a Dutch gangster flick to be especially absurd and not something I would be particularly interested in indulging in, at least not until I came across the startlingly aesthetically pleasing and even transcendental film De Wederopstanding van een Klootzak (2013) aka The Resurrection of a Bastard directed by graphic novelist and painter turned filmmaker Guido van Driel and starring top Dutch actor Yorick van Wageningen (Oorlogswinter aka Winter in Wartime, The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo). Personally, I do not understand the interest in so-called 'graphic novels' (aka overlong comic books), so the premise of a graphic novelist cinematically adapting their own comics à la Frank Miller with Sin City (2005) and Sin City: A Dame to Kill For (2014) seems about as appetizing to me as hanging out with a bunch of autistic acne-ridden dorks playing Dungeons & Dragons or painting Warhammer miniatures for a future 'fantasy battle,' so there are more than just a couple reasons why van Driel's film should be something I would not want to touch with a ten foot pole, yet the film is far from your typical piece of socially retarded beta-male nerd escapism as a rare quasi-gangster flick of the simultaneously brutal yet beautiful, as well as perturbing yet poetic, sort. As director van Driel described at iff.com regarding the film: "I pitched the film to a producer as a mix of Tarantino and Tarkovsky. That might sound arrogant, but you shouldn't be modest if you want to sell your idea." Needless to say, as much as I think Tarantino is a culturally cuckolded turd whose name should never be mentioned in the same sentence with a singular cinematic master artist like Tarkovsky, I could not help but watch van Driel's film.

When I hear comparisons to Tarantino I typically think of a film with preposterous pop-culture platitudes, rather repugnant negrophilia, and frivolous beta-bitch-boy fantasies and fetishes, but van Driel's film features none of that sort of insufferable postmodern pseudo-sophistry, at least to any notable degree, as The Resurrection of a Bastard is a decidedly Dutch work set in the rural Friesland that combines magic realism and a darkly comedic take on contemporary socio-political issues that is by no means politically correct but is certainly shockingly artfully executed, as if the director wanted to see how beautiful he could make ugly people and repugnant human actions seem. Like a Friesland Heimat-cum-gangster flick as directed by the perturbed progeny of Martin Scorsese, Aad van Driel, and Gaspar Noé, van Driel's undeniably ambitious debut feature surely does not seem like the first cinematic offering of a novice filmmaker who spends most of his time drawing so-called 'graphic novels,' but instead demonstrates a keen sensitivity towards an eclectic view of cinema history from Pasolini to Scorsese and everyone in between. Indeed, for better or worse, you will never find a more darkly farcical fever dream featuring fucked gangsters than The Resurrection of a Bastard, which ultimately makes Jonathan Glazer's Sexy Beast (2000) seem like a cheap overlong music video con that happens to be inhabited by a couple great actors. Based on a graphic novel that van Driel was contracted to write on the occasion of the 1250 anniversary of the martyrdom of Saint Boniface, who was purportedly hacked to death with an axe when he made the major mistake of cutting down the then-pagan Frisians' sacred 'Donar's Oak' tree, The Resurrection of a Bastard also happens to be one of the most unconventional Germanic pagan flicks ever made. Indeed, in no other film will you find quirky references to Odin in the form of a one-eyed cat and mono-eyed negro drug dealer who lost his eye after having it vacuumed up by his comrades as punishment for stealing drugs and money.

Burly and beefy Amsterdam gangster Ronnie Bazuin (Yorick van Wageningen) is a bloody brutal bastard that has no problem smashing in the faces of children and beating women to death in front of their kids for the most minor of infractions, but after a near-death experience as a result of an assassination attempt, he becomes a completely different man, or as his rather talkative and strangely sensitive muttonchops-adorned bodyguard Janus (Juda Goslinga) states: "He's changed completely. Like...Bruce Willis in THE SIXTH SENSE is completely different than in DIE HARD. I think something has snapped inside of him. He's not the old Ronnie. He's just not the old Ronnie." The Resurrection of a Bastard opens with introducing the new and arguably spiritually improved Ronnie and his comrade Janus as they look around the Friesland town of Dokkum to find the former's would-be assassin. Unfortunately, like most areas of Western Europe, including Friesland, Dokkum has a so-called 'refugee' center which is home to a young eccentric Angolan negro named Eduardo Yondo (Goua Robert Grovogui). Rather coincidentally, Eduardo subscribes to an ancient Angolan religion that, not unlike the Germanic pagan faith that the Friesians followed before they assassinated Anglo-Saxon missionary Saint Boniface in 754 and began following Christianity, emphasizes the worship of trees. Although seemingly unconnected, both gangster Ronnie and negro mechanic Eduardo will be sitting in the same exact Friesland tree together by the end of the film after fate brings the two together.

Ronnie assumes his assassin is in Dokkum because he noticed he had a 'Dokkum Arms' tattoo on his forearm, but while in Friesland, the gangster seems more interested in helping other people than hunting down his would be killer. Indeed, while in the middle of a conversation with Janus, Ronnie gets out of a car and saves the life of a man who subsequently accidentally sets him on fire, as if he could foresee the tragedy before it actually happened. While hanging out at a restaurant, Janus notices the curious prevalence of foreigners in Dokkum and complains to his boss, "My God, not here too? They can send all those Turks back to Morocco as far as I'm concerned [...] Let me tell you something: They may integrate all the way into Volendam...and start cake biting and sack racing, I'll never trust them. We'll never trust them, right Ronnie? They've got centuries of Islam in their genes. They'll never accept our values. They shit on them," but Ronnie seems lost in his own world and does not pay his comrade any mind. Ironically, someone has written on the bathroom wall of the restaurant: "Foreigners, please don't leave us behind with just the Dutch." Of course, if most foreigners were like Eduardo, they would probably want to leave the Netherlands behind as the character seems plagued by an almost ominous metaphysical affliction that causes him to cry like a little baby for no reason and suffer bizarre panic attacks for the most petty of reasons. Eduardo's only source of solace is listening to ethereal music via his cellphone and reading through an extremely dated auto mechanic book, which he more or less treats as his personal bible. Like his father before him, Eduardo's dream is to own his own auto mechanic shop, but with the digitization of cars and being a poor negro prole in the Friesland, it seems more like a fantasy than something he can realize.

At about the 18 minute mark of The Resurrection of a Bastard, an intertitle appears reading "The Old Ronnie" and the viewer soon bears witness to the unhinged brutality of the eponymous antihero before he takes a bullet to the neck and becomes strangely positive and spiritually-inclined, as if his seemingly forsaken soul goes from being bearing an innately pagan essence to a Christian essence overnight. A negro associate named Stanley (Gustav Borreman) is attempting to flee town despite the fact that he owes Ronnie's boss James Joyce (played by Jeroen Willems, who the film was dedicated to since he died in 2012 before it was released) 250,000 euros worth of pills and cash. After Ronnie pulls a large dental brace out of Stanley's mouth in a fairly rough fashion, someone knocks on the door of the tortured drug dealer's apartment, which causes the gangsters' much warranted paranoia to seep in. According to Stanley, the person at the door is a woman who has come by to buy his couch and fridge before he leaves town, but Ronnie finds it to be somewhat dubious that the negro would stick around the area and face being potentially tortured and/or murdered for a mere 200 euros worth of shitty outmoded furniture. Ultimately, Ronnie has his goon Jaap (played by iconoclastic Dutch cartoonist Eric Schreurs, who previously appeared in Theo van Gogh's Charley (1986) and Terug naar Oegstgeest (1987) aka Return to Oegstgeest) slam the door on the woman's face, not realizing she has brought her small ginger son with her. When the rather annoying redhead kid, Marnix (Johan van der Pol), won't stop crying, Ronnie screams in his face, "Shut the fuck up!" and the rather strange and seemingly spiritually-inclined boy responds by esoterically stating, "There's a red butterfly coming from your throat," which only all the more infuriates the boorish gangster, who violently grabs the somewhat creepy child. At this point, Marnix's mother's maternal instinct kicks in and she nonsensically decides to jump on Ronnie and starts biting and punching him as if she hopes to tear him to pieces, so the gangster naturally fights back by brutally beating her to death with his fists, thus leaving the redhead boy a literally and figuratively poor bastard. After killing Marnix's mommy, Ronnie has Stanley's eye sucked out with a vacuum cleaner, which he films and sends to his boss James Joyce as evidence that the degenerate crook dope dealer has been properly punished for his rather moronic behavior. Unfortunately for Ronnie, little does he realize that keeping Marnix alive is the worst mistake he can make, as the little lad's Frisian grandfather will soon be coming to look for the gangster to avenge the death of his dear daughter.

Unquestionably, Ronnie suffers from a variety of peculiar pathologies that seem to make his life a living hell, but I guess that is what one should expect if they make their living regularly torturing and killing people. For example, Ronnie suffers a nightmare where a group of bald headed butchers with bloody aprons encircle around his pool while he is swimming in the rain one night and proceed to collectively attack him as if they are steroid-addled zombies. When Ronnie awakens from the sinisterly surreal nightmare in a lawn chair next to his pool, he inexplicably becomes convinced that there is a mark on one of the paving stones next to said pool, so he begins cleaning and eventually smashing the tile with a pitchfork until it is totally destroyed. Ronnie also violently attacks his wife Mara (Katrien van Beurden) for the most minor and petty of infractions. For example, when Mara forgets to squeeze the water out of a dishwater rag, Ronnie slaps her in the face and then yells at her, "Next time I'll rip out those silicone implants and kick you out with your A-cups," but she stuns him by replying, "I didn't even want those breasts." The only person that seems to scare Ronnie is his perniciously passive-aggressive and seemingly queer boss James Joyce, who at one point in the film intimidates the antihero in a semi-surreal scene by randomly shooting a bag with an undisclosed animal moving around in it. When Ronnie asks what was inside the bag, Mr. Joyce responds, "Who cares? First it was alive and now its dead." Apparently, Joyce is not happy with the fact that Ronnie made a scene by attacking Marnix and his mother, which the antihero describes as, "collateral damage." Ultimately, everything changes for Ronnie when he and his comrades attend a 'White Party' (which are typically for gays in the U.S.) and a fellow sporting a white KKK-esque mask begins following the antihero around in a suspicious manner like a predator attempting to stalk its prey. As a big burly bestial man with strong survival instincts, Ronnie knows he is being hunted, so he decides to begin hunting the hunter. After checking all the stalls in a bathroom, Ronnie takes a leak and absurdly waits to be attacked. After being mistaken for having gay tearoom sex with the masked man, Ronnie takes a bullet to the neck in what should have been a fatal attack. Unquestionably, getting shot in the neck seems like it is the best thing that ever could have happened to Ronnie as it completely humbles him and makes him appreciate every single little detail of life ranging from the strong scent of a plate of trout with pomegranate to blurry vintage photographs of waterfalls. Indeed, a hotel owner seems to sum up Ronnie's new mellow and intuitively metaphysical personal Weltanschauung when she remarks to him, "The mystery of life...is hidden in the visible and tangible. That's what I believe."

Eventually, the little boy Marnix whose mother Ronnie killed ends up living at the same farm where Angolan negro Eduardo works since the place is owned by the little lad's grandparents. When Marnix uses a pencil to outline Eduardo's head and hand on a piece of paper to create what seems like some ancient occult archetype featuring a hand coming out of a mouth, the Angolan mechanic becomes extremely hostile and accuses the boy of practicing black magic. Later, Eduardo, who seems to have developed a deep irrational fear of the rather strange ginger cracker kid, pours gasoline on a rat and goes to set it on fire in front of Marnix, but the boy's grandmother Sientje (Leny Breederveld) shows up before he can do it, so the whacky negro bashes the rodent to death in anger. Later that day, Marnix spots his mother's killer Ronnie at a grocery store, so he immediately tells his grandparents as he is naturally afraid that the big scary gangster will kill him. As it turns out, Marnix's grandfather Minne (René Groothof) was the one responsible for attempting to assassinate Ronnie at the white party and now that he knows that the gangster is in Dokkum, he decides to take a second attempt at assassinating his belated daughter's killer. Meanwhile, Ronnie has dinner with the fat blonde owner of the hotel he is staying at and confesses to her, "I came close to dying. When I woke up in hospital it was as if I crawled back into a wet and sandy sock." When the hotel owner asks him how he feels now, Ronnie responds, "like a peeled shrimp...with no shell." After dinner, Ronnie, who seems to be guided by some unknown sacred force, borrows a bicycle and heads to the sea for a transcendental scene where he will be confronted by Marnix's grandparents Minne and Sientje. In the end, after ironically saving Minne's life, Ronnie ends up sitting in 'Donar's Oak' aka 'Thor's Oak' with Eduardo, who somberly states, "When I feel bad...I've always got my music. It makes me feel closer to my father. I thought it was safe here...but now I know...that in the land of the Frisians...a tree is not a safe place."

Unquestionably, one of the most shocking things about The Resurrection of a Bastard is that it was auteur Guido van Driel's first feature as, while it might not be a completely immaculate work, it certainly shows an uncompromising vision from a mensch that wouldn't bow down to political correctness, cinematic convention, nor audience expectation. Admittedly, after I discovered that the film featured a side story about an Angolan refugee, I expected the work to be plagued by some conspicuously contrived and patently pathetic bleeding heart message typical of contemporary European arthouse films that is specially tailored to appeal to ethno-masochistic film critics and the Netherlands' hopelessly liberal-minded populous, but van Driel thankfully had the gall to portray the negro in an intricate and totally unpredictable way that makes it seem like foreigners from the Global South can only go spiritually and mentally insane by living in the decimated post-Christian Occident. Additionally, unlike the average Tarantino flick, which attempts to be 'edgy' and 'subversive' with its nauseating hodge-podge of negrophilia, cultural cuckoldry, and quasi-feminism, van Driel's film is actually subversive as reflected in dialogue like the character Janus' remark to Ronnie, "This whole advertising and fashion scene is full of gays. They're telling us what kind of women we should like. But what do they like? Boys. So what do they give us? Girls that look like boys. It makes sense. They're not interested in women with ample D-cups." Indeed, in my less than humble opinion, The Resurrection of a Bastard is the most audaciously ambitious, thematically subversive, metaphysically foreboding, and idiosyncratically aesthetically pleasing gangster flick since Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg's classic Performance (1970) and like the Mick Jagger vehicle, I think the startlingly transcendental Dutch flick will ultimately gain a loyal cult following, though it will probably most certainly remain under-appreciated and under-seen in the United States due to its lack of distribution, among other things.

Undoubtedly, van Driel probably said it best when he remarked regarding the film's decidedly Dutch character: "The magic realism is new in Dutch cinema. At the same time, the film also contains typically Dutch elements. That singularity is a plus for international viewers; we all watch art house cinema for a glimpse of another part of the world. If the plot is worth it, of course. It was this uniqueness that led to DE NOORDERLINGEN's success abroad. Idiosyncrasy is better than trying to work in an international style or copying Hollywood. You can't win that way." Indeed, the best Dutch films tend to be the most decidedly Dutch works as they tend to reflect a singular and highly individualistic Germanic people whose artistic vision has been like no other people in the world as van Driel's pleasantly preternatural gangster flick further confirms. Certainly, the best compliment I can probably pay to The Resurrection of a Bastard is that it proved to me that not only can graphic novelist creators be true artists, but also that graphic novels can actually be adapted into artsy fartsy metaphysical works that also manage to feature the lowbrow humor and ultra-violence that such books are well known for. While I have never read the comic since I am not literate in Dutch, I think I can take van Driel's word for it when he stated regarding The Resurrection of a Bastard, "The film is better than the book."

HELLBOY 2: THE GOLDEN ARMY
HELLBOY 2: THE GOLDEN ARMY

Guillermo del Toro (2008)

I don't think I've read a single bad review on this film yet. Concluding my viewing experience, I didn't have a willingness to even write on this film. "Let the people form their own opinions. Someone will just write what I feel anyways" I said, but dammit! Seeing all these gloating reviews almost infuriates me, so I must make my opinion known. Keep in mind I didn't really enjoy the first film. Maybe that's my problem. Hellboy 2 opens up with a retarded happy teenage Hellboy. I see a fatal flaw in this. If this bastard had such a happy life, why the hell is he so angry now? I apologize for being so cruel towards Mr. Mike's creation of sweat and labor, but the stories do not interest me at all. When I first saw the final theatrical trailer, I thought to myself "Wow! That looks action-packed and breath-taking!" Turns out I was right about one thing; action. That's about the only depth you will find in the film. That and the forest elemental scene. That really tugged at my heartstrings. Something so beautifully chaotic which was murdered in cold-blood. I've heard of anti-heroes but Hellboy takes the cake. So faeries exist with elves and trolls. This is the basis of the plot. It seems that talking fish, a post-Firestarter emo girl, and the son of Satan don't have the capacity to believe in such things. Ironic, eh? So this evil Prince guy, whose facial scars make him look like the reincarnation of Kakihara, hates humans so he wants to kill us all with an army of golden ED-209's. Terrifying? You bet. Guillermo Del Toro has always been known for his amazing creature designs and there is no doubt that he could fill the empty shoes Stan Winston left behind in his death. The bustling Troll Market scene which is indisputably similar to the Cantina scene in Star Wars features gorgeous creatures and everything that goes bump-in-the-night. He introduces some genius creations throughout the film such as the Tooth Fairy (Flying ants that eat teeth which is shown in a violent fashion) The creatures are the highlight of the film, but allow me to move onto the acting. Ron Perlman is Hellboy, no doubt about it. Hellboy's early self (Child actor.. shudder) presents one of the corniest openings to a film that tries to be serious. "Oh papa! Please read me another story!! Please!!" That isn't a direct quote, but it's close enough. Hellboy hits his mid-life crisis mid-film and demonstrates this by drinking beer a lot and acting irritable, which is alright. But then Abe gets mixed in. They then together, make the most horrifying "inebriation" scene ever filmed. And I thought I was stupid when drunk. The new agent is Johann Krauss. I remembered to put the SS at the end of his name due to Hellboy's fear of Germans. He also notes that there are two S's in the name. Quite an anti-German pun they had going on for a while. They used the over-used basis for evil Nazi necromancy and mutants in the first film, and rumor has it that Del Toro plans of incorporating the evil Germans in the last film. I also made note of Seth McFarlane's (Family Guy creator) voice work to be a parody of a German. I was about to have a shitfit had I heard him say "Und" one more time. Krauss is also a smoke man which is almost a worthy addition. I must admit to being head over heels in love with his abilities. Bumbling around singing Barry Manilow and talking about true love. A predictable ending plagues Hellboy and the cheeriness of the film is halted with a reminder from Death about Hellboy's destiny to fuck up the world. Since Hellboy is going to be a trilogy, I can only hope that the last film borrows heavily from the finale of Berserk. I demand death, sacrifice, and carnage. Hellboy 2 is a feast for the eyes but not the brain. It's depressing that I didn't enjoy this film more. Honestly, some scenes were kick ass, but the film just kind of flopped near the middle.

Gunnar Hall Jensen (2003)

Undoubtedly, contemporary Scandinavia is littered with tons of degenerate and ethno-masochistic cinematic works depicting a pathologically perturbed people who are addicted to Weltschmerz, existential crisis, nihilism, spiritual emptiness, xenophilia, meaningless sex, and pill-popping, but probably no other film from the deracinated Nordic lands depicts these many miserable untermensch things in a more flagrant and personal manner than the autobiographical documentary Gunnar Goes Comfortable (2003) aka Gunnar Goes Comfortable – A Personal Inquiry directed by Norwegian documentarian Gunnar Hall Jensen (Cathedral, Gunnar Goes God). A darkly comedic doc that features a lifetime's worth of home movies edited down to just over 70 minutes, Gunnar Goes Comfortable documents the confused life of angst-ridden auteur Gunnar Jensen; an alcohol, depression and diabetes-addled Norwegian narcissist, borderline psychopath, and 37-year-old man-child of the sometimes majorly moronic sort who makes a Hesse-inspired pilgrimage to India in the decidedly desperate hope that he can find peace with his majorly discombobulated mind, body, and soul. Featuring ambient footage of Gunnar burning his cock with a space heater, hanging out in a morgue with the corpse of the father he never knew, crying constantly like a little girl for seemingly no reason, deriving a grand delight in dumping his girlfriend (who he has been cheating on), and proudly showing off the naked body of his new pregnant wife, among various other things that no sane person would film themselves doing, Gunnar Goes Comfortable is as creepily candid as a colonoscopy as a sort of artfully edited celluloid defecation of the morbidly depressed director's lifelong fear and failure as the bastard son of an unloving ship captain whose emotionally-shattered mother used him as an emotional punching bag. A sort of wayward and wacky window into the perturbed psyche of a modern day middle-class Norwegian man living in a soulless socialist democracy, Gunnar Goes Comfortable depicts an exceedingly emasculated and eccentric fellow who would love nothing more than to kill his masochistic mind and personality, even if these are pretty much the only thing he cares about and bothers to discuss. Describing his first orgasm as having felt like he was "bleeding to death" and studying the misanthropic dipsomaniac literature of alcoholic Aryan-American author Charles Bukowski as a sad and senseless substitute for a living and breathing father figure, Gunnar still managed to have an inkling of the Faustian man in his soul as his restlessness led him to a spiritual pilgrimage that, although causing him to hit rock bottom with a beer can in one hand and an insulin needle in the other, ultimately leading him to realize that the grass is always greener on the other side and to just accept his shitty personality and mixed up mind.

As Gunnar states at the beginning of Gunnar Goes Comfortable, "It all started with a feeling of being scared. Then my father left me and my mother forever. Mom never got over it. She got sick.” Indeed, apparently Gunnar’s mom got so sick that she suffered “massive menstruations” and he was no different, ultimately developing a debilitating form of diabetes at a young age that would contribute to him not only being a physical cripple, but an emotional one as well. When discovering how he ran through a glass window as a wee lad, Gunnar—a major (sado)masochist who wallows in pain and suffering—has no problem admitting that he, “actually felt good being injured” and continued to seek solace in similar self-destructive behavior. When Gunnar grew up to be an adult man-child he realized that he would need to do dangerous activities to balance out his fear-stricken mind, ultimately opting for jumping off bridges, speeding on long, windy mountain roads and whatnot. Determined to be a ‘messianic auteur,’ Gunnar became a filmmaker, making nonsensical films, including a black-and-black noir-ish arthouse flick featuring men defecating on toilets in a pseudo-Lynchian manner, that he himself would more or less describe as being as messed up as his mind, but eventually he sold-out and began making goofy commercials to financially support himself. Including footage of his one-time hero Charles Bukowski stating, “The further I am from the human race the better I feel,” Gunnar made the wise decision to make a pilgrimage to India—the second most populated country in the world—to do a bit of soulseeking. On top of confiding in the crackpot texts of superlatively pseudo-scientific crazed kosher psychoanalyst Wilhelm Reich to learn better masturbation techniques (which he films himself practicing) and getting over his self-described ambivalence regarding women and pleasure, Gunnar studied under a fellow rootless Norwegian named ‘Vasant Swaha’; a racial Nordic turned pseudo-Indian Hindi mystic. Although he freely admits he has no idea what Swaha is talking about when he speaks of metaphysical mumbo jumbo, Gunnar learns from his master that his personality creates so much pain and misery because, “it’s false” and that “your whole life is built around the personality...that means everything is false.” Of course, neither Gunnar nor Swaha seem to realize the adopting an alien religion and form of dress is also ‘false.’

In terms of other heroes, Gunnar lists Japanese far-right novelist Yukio Mishima at the top, describing him as the “ultimate encounter with self-control,” as a gay man who created a virtual martial empire of art and who took his life into his own hand, quite literally, annihilating himself at the height of his physical and artistic prowess. Due to the fact that he also suffered a less than ideal childhood involving nagging and repressive women and had next to nil father figures (Mishima spent his early childhood as a virtual slave of his pseudo-aristocratic grandmother), Gunnar sees Mishima as a father figure, even going so far as glorifying the novelist’s ritual suicide by seppuku after a failed coup d’état as the “ultimate piece of masculine art.” If anything is for sure while watching Gunnar Goes Comfortable, it is that hero Gunnar is far too self-absorbed, ill-restrained, cowardly, and totally lacking in the capacity to commit to following through with something as serious and permanent as suicide, let alone leading a coup d'état with his own privately trained army, thus he must keep grudgingly treading on with his loser life. Gunnar also theorizes that he would have been a staunch Hitlerite had he been a Teutonic teen during the Third Reich era because, like many of those boys of that time whose fathers had been killed during World War I, he was looking for a father figure and someone like Uncle Adolf would have filled that void. Needless to say, Gunnar did not obtain many new insights in India and eventually went home to Norway to take respectable employment as someone who dubs bad movies from English to Norwegian, but luckily the neglectful father he never knew drops dead, thus creating a new sense of closure in his life. In what is easily the most morbid and disturbing scene of Gunnar Goes Comfortable, the hysterical hero goes to the morgue and films himself seemingly fake crying at the bedside of his estranged father's corpse in what is probably the longest and most intimate moment they ever spent together. Proudly admitting he never thought about his father ever again after his degenerate date with his dead daddy's corpse, Gunnar finally realizes his deep love for his mommy, stating although he has tried to avoid her for 25 years, he now misses her, realizing her love for him was stronger than her 'fucked up personality.' In the end, things seem to work themselves out for Gunnar as he marries a single mother with a handicapped child and even has a son of his own with her, thus thankfully continuing the cycle of post-Viking Nordic misery.

While essentially saying everything he has to say about his depressing life with the documentary, Gunnar followed up Gunnar Goes Comfortable with a quasi-sequel of sorts entitled Gunnar Goes God (2010), which takes a less intimate and Hebraic humor inspired approach to things. Indeed, while Gunnar is now a happily married father with two cars, a nice scenic home with a luxurious landscape, and a four compartment refrigerator, in Gunnar Goes God the filmmaker has a spiritual cramp of sorts and decides to take his film crew to Egypt to the oldest Christian monastery where, not unsurprisingly, he does not really learn anything about the void in his soul. Undoubtedly, compared to his first documentary, Gunnar Goes God seems like a halfhearted attempt of conspicuously contrived self-parody of the superficial softcore sort, as a man who has finally 'gone comfortable' enough to take on a bourgeois novelty of investigating god and life itself. Indeed, in its own way, Gunnar Goes Comfortable is a minor masterpiece of merrily macabre personal filmmaking as a keenly kaleidoscopic collage of one borderline psychopath's perturbing personality and how he comes to terms to accepting said positively perturbed personality. Considering Gunnar's less than artistic personal favorite films, which are featured throughout the documentary and include The Good, the Bad and the Ugly (1966), Mad Max (1979), First Blood (1982), and RoboCop (1987), and seeming lack of artistic pretensions, Gunnar Goes Comfortable is a shockingly artfully assembled and even strangely ethereal work that takes the viewer on a jaded journey that they will never forget, whether they want to or not. Featuring an eclectic soundtrack, including songs from Sigur Ros, D.A.F. (Deutsch-Amerikanische Freundschaft), Creedence Clearwater Revival, Granddaddy, and Will Oldham, among various others, Gunnar Goes Comfortable is, aside from the music and occasional film clip, an unadulterated 'auteur piece' in the truest sense as an embarrassingly incriminating personal portrait of a messed up mensch who is simultaneously ridiculously narcissistic yet pathologically self-denigrating. A sort of Norwegian equivalent to Jonathan Caouette's Tarnation (2003), except way less gay, hysterical, and spastically directed, Gunnar Goes Comfortable is a highly personalized depiction of the spiritual and psychological degeneration of the Viking man who, instead of a conqueror lands, has adopted xenophilia and is making pilgrimages to the third world to 'find himself,' which he naturally did not. Easily the most unintentionally humorous documentary I have ever seen as a work that even makes Timothy Treadwell of Werner Herzog's Grizzly Man (2005) seem sane by comparison, Gunnar Goes Comfortable is a film that proves that for at least once in director Gunnar Hall Jensen's life, his nauseating narcissism and general mental illness have been given a creative and even productive outlet, even if he screwed up a couple lives in the process.

HEINRICH

Günter Rätz (1965)

For a fierce far-left feminist filmmaker who even had the gall to denigrate the legacy of her own father as demonstrated in her most popular work Germany, Pale Mother (1980) aka Deutschland bleiche Mutter, German New Cinema auteur Helma Sanders-Brahms has always demonstrated a strange empathy for German male nationalist poets, including alpha-Romanticist Heinrich von Kleist, with her brooding biopic Heinrich (1977) and decadent National Socialist expressionist Gottfried Benn with My Heart is Mine Alone (1997) aka Mein Herz - Niemandem!, which is certainly something I can respect. In my opinion, Heinrich and My Heart is Mine Alone also happen to be Sanders-Brahms' greatest films and not just due to the fact that they prove the feminist auteur is not just simply a frigid feminist who is in desperate need of an orgasm like her less talented, pussy-power-pontificating kraut celluloid compatriots Helke Sander and Margarethe von Trotta. Once a student of gay commie Italian Renaissance man Pier Paolo Pasolini, Sanders-Brahms seemed to have learned from her talented teacher that one can have a lunatic leftist political persuasion, yet still manage to respect one's national cultural and history, at least to some reasonable degree. That being said, Sanders-Brahms' respect for 'proto-Nazi' poet Heinrich von Kleist seems genuine as the filmmaker also had previously directed Erdbeben in Chili (1975) aka Earthquake in Chile, a TV-movie based on the poetic nobleman's 1807 novella of the same name centering around two unlikely lovers caught up in the cultural chaos of the 1647 Santiago earthquake in Chile. Although somewhat more subtly depicted than in her other films, Sanders-Brahms certainly expressed her more-hate-than-love relationship for (Father)land Deutschland with Heinrich, stating quite ethno-masochistically in the documentary The Night of the Filmmakers (1995) aka Die Nacht der Regisseure regarding the vaguely allegorical biopic, "In the film Heinrich, I try to describe my apprehension about this nation that destroys the best people it has brought forth. That is the horrible thing that actually makes Germany into a nation...this ability to destroy people." Of course, Heinrich von Kleist, an eccentric bisexual in love with a fellow nobleman who killed himself via firearm in a suicide pact with a terminally ill woman whose musical and intellectual talents he respected enough to share his premature death with, ultimately destroyed himself, even if the krauts of his day were not worthy of his poetry and gave him some negative criticism that helped lead to his early demise. Largely based off of documents, letters, and other writings written by von Kleist himself, Heinrich is one of the most morbid and melancholy films based on the life of a poet ever made, but it also happens to be one of the best.

As reflected in a letter written to his sister on November 10, 1811 shortly before his suicide, Heinrich von Kleist (played by Heinrich Giskes) was a man suffering from all-consuming misery as expressed by his words narrated in Heinrich, "...But I swear to you it is quite impossible for me to live any longer. My soul is so injured that I, I'd almost say...whenever I stick my nose out of the window the daylight is hurtful to me that shines upon it. Some people might think this morbid and eccentric....By having been in constant contact with beauty and decorum since my earliest youth, in my thoughts and writings, I have become so sensitive that the slightest attack a person's feelings are subject to during the course of things are hunting me double and triply." Although an aristocrat by birthright, von Kleiſt received a meager education and would probably learn more about life when he joined the Prussian Army in 1792, which he would gladly retire from in 1799 with the rank of lieutenant. While in the military, von Kleiſt met his 'great love' Ernst von Pſuel, who would later become a Prussian general, then Prussian Minister of War, and eventually Prime Minister of Prussia. As depicted in Heinrich, von Kleiſt once wrote professing his undying devotion to von Pſuel, "I shall never get married. You be a wife to me, my children, grandchildren," which is a promise he seemed to honor, even if his last moments on earth were spent with a woman. Heinrich's sister Ulrike von Kleiſt (Grischa Huber), a mischievous tomboy who has a good laugh when their carriage crashes and their horses run away, is no less eccentric than her brother, even if she does not approve of his "Lebensplan" (plan for life) as that of a wandering poet and poor blueblood who had nil interest in 'legitimate' work. With his unconventional romantic views on German nationalism as a Prussian as well as his more than generous words regarding the French enemy, Austrian soldiers looked at Heinrich von Kleiſt as a kooky enemy and a traitor, though his true allegiances became clear when he was arrested by the French for being a spy during a pilgrimage to Dresden. Despite writing rather romantic love letters to an ostensibly special lady named Wilhelmine von Zenge (Sabine Ihmes), who eventually becomes his fiancé, von Kleiſt could not bring himself to see her in person and the wedding naturally fell through. When von Kleiſt meets a terminally ill woman named Henriette Vogel (Hannelore Hoger) whose singing and piano playing inspires him to passionately proclaim, "This is so beautiful one could shoot oneself," the hopeless romantic decides to conclude his lebensplan with a startling suicide that ends with two bangs and two bodies. As for his reasoning for leaving this world, von Kleiſt wrote, "I die because on earth, there remains nothing for me to learn or acquire." Unfortunately, the final letter von Kleiſt wrote to the Prussian State Minister will be responded to posthumously.

While a novice to the life and writings of Heinrich von Kleiſt, Helma Sanders-Brahms' Heinrich inspired me enough to want to dig deep into the suicidal scribbler's work. A sensitively and meticulously assembled piece of celluloid poetry of the unwaveringly pessimistic sort that truly expresses the perennial misery of a man whose pen figuratively bled blood and whose works are no less than what Cocteau called the "blood of a poet," Heinrich manages to bring ethereal allegorical images and soothing, if not saddening sounds, including music by Bach, Beethoven, and Mozart, to the timeless Teutonic writings and internally tortuous times of Heinrich von Kleist. A man who esoterically led the war campaign against Napoleon via the written word, Heinrich von Kleist was indubitably a misunderstood man who simply couldn't bare with the fact that his work was underappreciated during his time, which Heinrich makes vividly clear as a trying but never tedious tribute to the man behind the poetry. It seems I am not the only one that believes this as Helma Sanders-Brahms' Heinrich won the coveted German Film Award (aka Deutscher Filmpreis) in 1977, thus making her the first female filmmaker in history to win the prize. No piece of tastelessly cheap culture-distorting period piece nor hyperbolic hagiography as is typical of Hollywood, Heinrich has no simple happy ending, but, in fact, begins with a tragic ending, thus sending the viewer through a penetrating psychodramatic celluloid journey that uniquely unravels why a talented nobleman decided to end it all at the height of his singular creative powers. As much as I hate to admit it, just by judging by Heinrich alone, no other filmmaker is probably better fit for directing a biopic about Conservative Revolutionary Stefan George. Undoubtedly, the greatest irony of feminist auteur Helma Sanders-Brahms' filmmaking career is she is the foremost director of films about gay German male nationalist poets.

MALA NOCHE

Gus Van Sant° (1986)

Throughout his career, especially after his big mainstream success with Good Will Hunting (1997), American queer auteur Gus Van Sant (My Own Private Idaho, To Die For) has switched around from making uncompromising quasi-arthouse works like Elephant (2003) and Last Days (2005) to for-hire commercial swill like his senseless shot-for-shot remake of Hitchcock's Psycho (1998) to celebrated LGBT propaganda flicks like Milk (2008), as if the filmmaker cannot decide whether he wants to be a serious cinematic artistic, wealthy household (homo) name, and/or foremost filmic propagandist of the mainstream gay community, which leads me to believe he lacks a certain testicular fortitude and sense of stern and serious Weltanschauung, thus I have never been able to truly respect him as a director, even if he has assembled a celluloid masterpiece or two. Undoubtedly, Van Sant's first feature-length work Mala Noche (1986) aka Bad Night—a phantasmagorical poof piece shot on bold black-and-white celluloid—is far from a masterpiece, but it does give ample evidence that there was a time when the filmmaker was not cuckolded by Hollywood producers and had no problem offending the authoritarian abberosexuals of the mainstream gay left. Based on a semi-autobiographical 1977 novella of the same named written by Oregon-based pseudo-Beat writer Walt Curtis—a politically incorrect poof poet whose work has been compared to Allen Ginsberg and William S. Burroughs—Mala Noche is the sub-sleazy celluloid story of a debauched convenience store clerk who has a rather peculiar weakness for brown illegal alien boys, most specifically two teenage Mexican fellows who are rather wary of gringo fags, but ultimately find the beatnik bitch boy to be an easy target for cash and shelter. Unquestionably racially and culturally 'insensitive' in tone when giving one of his many voice-over narrations, the would-be-poetic protagonist of Mala Noche has no problem admitting his sense of intellectual superiority over the boys, matter-of-factly stating such sordid things as, "Every street Mexican on Sixth will think he can stick it in me. Well, they're wrong. But they never were too smart to begin with, or they wouldn't be here." The story of an unmanly masochist who derives decidedly dubious pleasure from having beaners stick their refried wieners in his man-taco, Mala Noche undoubtedly exposes the sort of warped xenophilia that inspires certain debauched individuals to become leftists and proponents of multiculturalism because, after all, it is much easier to fuck and/or get fucked by a dirty untermensch if you can pick one up off the street in your hometown. A queer film in the European sense in that it is not about some poor fellow 'coming out' nor some perverse pansy facing a good ol' fag-bashing, but instead, a work about a flagrantly faggy fellow who has nothing on his mind except criminally-inclined brown boys, Mala Noche is indubitably Van Sant's celluloid equivalent to Kenneth Anger's Fireworks (1947),

MALA NOCHE

Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Love is Colder than Death (1969), Rosa von Praunheim's It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971), and John Greyson's Urinal (1988) aka Pissoir in that it is the director's first big statement as an unabashedly gay filmmaker.

Walt (Tim Streeter) is a wanton gay store clerk that lives in a Portland, Oregon ghetto who intentionally seeks to lead a wild life, especially of the pseudo-sexual outlaw sort and lately he has a foul fetish for seemingly underage illegal immigrant Mexican boys of the ostensibly heterosexual variety. While Walt probably only makes minimum wage at his less than prestigious dead-end job, he certainly makes enough money to sweet talk a young and desperate anti-gay Mexican boy into sleeping with him. After running into two young and fresh immigrants from Mexico named Johnny Alonzo (Doug Coeoyate, who is actually an American Indian in real-life) and Roberto Pepper (Ray Monge), he becomes instantly infatuated with the former but will settle for the latter boy because at least he is willing to fuck (but not suck) for cash. After Walt and his female friend Betty (Nyla McCarthy) convince the two cholos-in-training to eat dinner with them, things take a sexual route when the poof Portlander offers Johnny $15 to have sex with him, but the macho Mexican rightfully declines. Looking to satisfy his undying desire for the seemingly unobtainable exotic primitive, Walt settles for less than homely homeboy Roberto, who ultimately reams him in the rectum in a manner the gringo finds uniquely uncomfortable and steals $10 from him. Throughout Mala Noche, Walt narrates his dubious feelings, stating regarding his short experience with spic sodomy and the theft of his money, "They need money...Johnny and him. I hope they got it. Though I was upset that I'd been fucked, violated and lost the money too...for a few moments, thinking about it, in the morning of the Mexicans gloating over having fucked the gringo puto and got his money too...talking about it and laughing, my ass was sore. And the more I think about it, the more I know I asked for a reckless evening." And, indeed, Walt undoubtedly got everything that was cumming to him and he was lucky he did not get his throat slit, so naturally he does not let up in his dangerous desire for obtaining Johnny and whilst pitying himself, confesses like a true cock-sucking cuckold, "Maybe when they're making love they can think about Roberto having fucked me. Roberto's cock fucks Johnny, fucked me. That's about as close to Johnny as I'll ever get." Despite worshiping their bodies, Walt has no problem belittling the boys in his own mind, stating of his lustful attraction to them, "The look on his face is pure ecstasy...incredible, beautiful, turned off face of an ignorant Mexican teenager." Since they seem obsessed with cars, Walt humors the Mex-boys by teaching them to drive in a feeble attempt to get in their pants. To his decided heart-stricken dismay, Walt can never get Johnny alone without one of his friends being around as the uneducated Mexican is at least wise enough to know that the sodomite store clerk is a weirdo white boy with only one thing on his mind. Eventually wonder-boy Johnny disappears, which severely saddens lovelorn Walt, but he develops a pseudo-romantic and ultimately sexually unfulfilling relationship with Roberto, who apparently has a tendency to “use his cock as a weapon” and act like a “macho fucking prick.” One day while giving Roberto’s driving lesson, Walt tells the Latino lad “you drive like you fuck” after the automobile-challenged boy crashes his car. Not unsurprisingly, Mexican boys like playing around with deadly weapons as proud proponents of machismo and on one rather unfortunate night after a cop shows up to Walt’s apartment after one of the female apartment tenants absurdly complains “a guy who makes Son of Sam look like Tweety Bird” was stalking her, Roberto is killed by the policeman by ‘accident’ after seeing the illegal alien brandishing a pistol. While slightly saddened by Roberto’s death, he still has his mind on Johnny and when the boy finally turns up, he learns that teen had departed, but managed to make his way back to Portland in no more than two weeks. In the end, Walt never gets any closer to Johnny. When seeing Johnny standing on a city sidewalk by chance one day, the store clerk yells “come down to the store and talk to me some time, alright?”, but the boy does not even acknowledge him, thus ushering in a rather anticlimactic end to a mostly aimless movie.

A lavishly directed low-budget flick with a lackluster story featuring totally unsympathetic characters of the crooked would-be-cool sort, especially in regard to the miscegenation-celebrating poofer protagonist, Mala Noche ultimately makes for a marginally redeeming work in that it makes no preposterous attempts to glorify nor propagandize a certain real-life gay man’s lifestyle, but instead portrays him as a pathetic and pretentious beatnik prick who goes to absurd lengths to obtain an underage Mexican boy’s prick. Considering the total browning of America since Mala Noche was released over a ¼ of a century ago, it is doubtful a film so brazen and ridiculously racially-charged would be made today, so it should be no surprise that some people (most specifically, some of the ‘enlightened’ reviewers at imdb.com) have described the work as racist. Indeed, in its depiction of a homo horndog who longs for immature Mestizo donges and its oftentimes unflattering depiction of said Mestizos acting like nitwitted petty criminals who have nil respect for American laws and customs, Mala Noche is certainly a softcore artsploitation flick and a rare queer cult flick, which is indubitably one of the cinematic work’s greatest appeals, which also can be certainly said of director Gus Van Sant’s later works My Own Private Idaho (1991) and Elephant (2003) as well. Undoubtedly, what ruins Mala Noche in part is stupid and vapid ‘exploitation apologist’ remarks from the lead character like, “I don’t want to interfere with their lives. A gringo like me has an easy life. A privileged life. And just because I see someone attractive like Johnny it doesn’t mean I should be able to have him, to buy him or whatever, just because he’s hungry and on the street. Desperate, good-looking. That wasn’t my intention exactly, but it could be misunderstood that way,” when, in reality, the protagonist’s sole desire is defiling and being defiled by Mestizo meat and using every dubious and groveling tactic to do so. In fact, slavish protagonist Walt even goes so far as confessing, "The plan is simple. I go to his room at midnight. He opens the door, sees that I want him that badly. I lay down at his feet like a dog. Or rather at the feet of Roberto and him. And after an hour or so when none of us know what to do anymore, I get up and I leave. My point is being made, that I want to see him badly, right? And that must mean something. How many gringos have acted that dramatically toward him ever? And whether or not he can respond in any meaningful way doesn't matter. He would think of it as a dramatic, macho act," thus admitting to his innate masochism and desire to be degraded by someone he openly sees as his intellectual inferior. A laughably failed attempt at fetishizing Mestizo machismo and romanticizing the magical 'noble savage' who illegally crawled and climbed his way to the USA from south of the border, Mala Noche ultimately makes for a sometimes unintentionally engrossing account of a discernibly degenerate dude that digs socially and sexually degrading himself and teaching two border-jumpers how proletarian poet poofs get down in the land of the homos and depraved.

DRUGSTORE COWBOY

Rather ironically, aside from his horrendous heeb-homo-martyrizing celluloid hagiography Milk (2008), queer auteur Gus Van Sant (Mala Noche, Even Cowgirls Get the Blues)—a man famous for, among other things, being America's first openly gay Hollywood filmmaker—has received his greatest success from quasi-sentimental fag-free films like Good Will Hunting (1997) and Finding Forrester (2000), with Drugstore Cowboy being the director's first major critical success. I would also argue that Drugstore Cowboy is the auteur's greatest non-gay film, as a rather quirky cult flick about the road to nowhere that is the Pacific Northwest's junky degeneracy. A sort of junky Rebel Without a Cause updated for the late-1980s (but set in the early 1970s) that is more about lowlife dark humor than inarticulate suburban teen angst, the film is based on the then-unpublished autobiography of career criminal James Fogle, who was incarcerated at the Washington State Penitentiary at the time of the release of the strangely charming cinematic work that would immortalize his loser life (he died in prison in 2012 at the age of 75 after being arrested in 2011 for robbing a Seattle pharmacy). Indeed, despite featuring junky literary outlaw William S. Burroughs as an old school junky priest named 'Tom the Priest' (the character is a reference to the Burroughs short story "The Priest They Called Him," which is featured in the 1973 short story collection Exterminator!) and a charismatic, if not morally retarded and even borderline psychopathic, pharmacy-robbing dope fiend as the protagonist (star Matt Dillion once confessed that playing the role of a junky led him to eventually breaking down and crying), Drugstore Cowboy is, at least in my opinion, one of the greatest unintentionally anti-drug films ever made, though auteur Van Sant once admitted regarding the work: "It's probably true that the movie will make a junkie want to go out and take drugs, but this isn't a political statement about drugs. I guess I do expect some sort of backlash." A tastelessly charming work of deadbeat deadpan comedy featuring druggy degenerate untermenschen with cool shades and leather jackets who think they are too good for heroin so they ritualistically steal "the best goddamn pharmaceutical dope money can buy" (aka Dilaudid), Van Sant's film proves that the life of a junky is about as appealing as an STD because, as Burroughs once noted, "Junk is the ideal product... the ultimate merchandise. No sales talk necessary. The client will crawl through a sewer and beg to buy." Indeed, while Drugstore Cowboy features no superficial anti-drug sermons, I would be lying if I did not admit that the film made me want to get on a strict weightlifting regiment and organic diet. A sort of neo-Beat film for a deadbeat generation that is far too illiterate, lazy, and uncultivated to devour the Burroughs mythos, Drugstore Cowboy ultimately makes Bonnie and Clyde (1967) seem like a sweet and sentimental work of celluloid nostalgia about the good old days when criminals had somewhat

The setting is Portland, Oregon 1971 and alpha-junky Bob (Matt Dillon) has just been shot and like William Holden's character from Billy Wilder's film noir masterpiece Sunset Boulevard (1950), he is going to spend 100 minutes or so explaining to the viewer how he got into such a precarious situation. Maybe it's the dope, but Bob is a strangely superstitious individual who has an unwavering fear of bad omens and being haunted by hexes and thus these irrational fears guide most of his major decisions in life. As Bob explains, "It's hard being a dope fiend. And it's even harder running a crew" and indeed, with his loser gang of dumb ass dope fiends, he has a lot of things to worry about, especially when it comes to finding his next big fix. Bob's sidekick and "muscle" is a major moron named Rick (James Le Gros) who, aside from being borderline retarded, does whatever his master tells him to do, including insulting his pretty yet rather annoying pixie-like girlfriend. While Bob's nymphomaniac wife Diane (Kelly Lynch) is a cool chick who loves stealing dope like just one of the guys, Rick's girlfriend young Nadine (Heather Graham)—a former counter girl that they picked up during one of their robberies—is somewhat of an annoying bitch that causes most of the strife among the group, as she cannot stand being the weakest link and she especially cannot stand not being the center of attention. While Bob loves the opium-addled outlaw life, he has to admit at the beginning of the film that, "... deep down, I knew we could never win. We played a game we couldn't win...to the utmost." In one of their more ambitious robbery attempts (the first one depicted in the film), Nadine pretends to have a seizure in the middle of a busy pharmacy so as to distract the pharmacist so that Bob can go behind the counter and rob the place of premium grade legal dope. Needless to say, Bob cannot wait to get home to shoot-up, so he injects himself with his latest narcotic steal while riding in the getaway car. While Bob's road-to-nowhere life is more or less a real-life nightmare where he is only seconds away from another lengthy prison stay, everything seems and feels perfect when he is high on opiates, as if he has reached nirvana via injection.

Upon arriving home, Bob and his crew are visited by a spastic little philistine turd boy named David (played by Max Perlich, who would later depict a wacky degenerate who pimps out a chick with Down syndrome in Van Sant's friend Harmony Korine's 1997 debut feature Gummo), who trades the gang some crystal meth for some dope. While Bob treats David like the shady little scumbag dullard that he is, little does the career criminal realize that the little mensch will have his revenge in the end. That night, Bob's house is raided by a goofy golf-loving cop named Gentry (James Remar) and his gestapo-like policemen, who wreck the junky's humble abode. Unlike most junkies, Bob has no hard feelings when it comes to Gentry and cops in general, remarking, "Man, I love cops. If there were no hot shit cops like Gentry around, the competition would be so heavy there'd be nothing left to steal." Due to a prank-gone-wrong in regard to the cops and a large pissed-off redneck with a shotgun, the crew decides to head out of town, shipping their loads of drugs separately by bus (which they pick up from time to time, so as to not suffer withdrawal), as they cannot risk being busted while driving across the Pacific Northwest. Also, after Nadine makes the major mistake of mentioning dogs (once, Bob and Dianne went to jail after their poor pup 'Panda,' who was later euthanized by the police, led the cops back to their home), Bob and Diane become convinced they have been given a 30-day hex and naturally they want to "outrun" it by traveling. Unfortunately, after a successful robbery that earns the crew $8,400 worth of Dilaudid (enough dope to last the crew three weeks), Nadine goes and decides to overdose on junk, which she more or less threatened to do only hours before, stating to her boyfriend Rick, "You're just goin' out with them tonight. When you come back, I'll show all of you." When Bob sees Nadine's pretty little pale corpse, he calls her a "conniving little bitch" and berates her boyfriend Rick by stating, "She beat you. Your own woman beat you out of your cut on a score. She got what she deserves." Of course, being a dimwitted cuckold of sorts, Rick does nothing to defend his postmortem girlfriend's honor aside from nonsensically punching a hole in the wall in what can only be described as impotent rage.

Needless to say, after Nadine's death, among various other problems (a sheriff's convention has come to town), Bob decides to "go straight" and get on a 21-step methadone program, but Diane and Rick are not interested in the plan, so the lapsed opium-addled outlaw heads back to Portland all by his lonesome and gets a job working in a metal factory. Bob also moves into Portland's sorry answer to the Beat Hotel and starts hanging out with an elderly junky guru named 'Tom the Priest' (William S. Burroughs), who reminisces over the good old days when one could get free morphine in prison by merely sticking their arm out of the bars of their jail cell and having a jail guard inject them with some good old school smack. When Diane randomly comes to visit Bob, she gives her husband a large brown paper bag full of junk, but she also gives him the bad, if not inevitable, news that she is now dating his best friend Rick. Though Bob tries to get in her panties one last time, Diane states, "I might have been a lot of things, but I never was a tramp" and he says to her, "I wish I could win you back." Done with dope, Bob gives the brown paper bag full of assorted opiates to Tom the Priest, who is so overjoyed by the rather thoughtful gift that he thanks his young ex-con comrade by stating, "God bless you my son...may you go to heaven." Not long after committing his act of kindness, Bob is beaten and shot by dullard boy David and his equally dumb sidekick, who refuses to believe that the ex-junky no longer has the dope on him that they were planning to rob. Indeed, in the end, Bob seemed to be right about that 30-day hex..

Undoubtedly, the greatest and most thoughtful lines featured in Drugstore Cowboy are delivered with a sort of autistic American Anglo-Saxon elegance by junky sage William S. Burroughs (whose lines were apparently written by his bibliographer/literary executor James Grauerholz), who offers the following all-too-true insight during the film: “Narcotics have been systematically scapegoated and demonized. The idea that anyone can use drugs and escape a horrible fate is anathema to these idiots. I predict in the near future right-wingers will use drug hysteria as a pretext to set up an international police apparatus. I’m an old man and I may not live to see a final solution of the drug problem.” Indeed, drug war or not, junkies are always going to shoot junk no matter what, or as antihero Bob soundly states to an old negress: “Well, to begin with, nobody, and I mean nobody, can talk a junkie out of using. You can talk to ‘em for years but sooner or later they’re gonna get a hold of something. Maybe it’s not dope. Maybe it’s booze, maybe it’s glue, maybe it’s gasoline. Maybe it’s a gunshot to the head. But something. Something to relieve the pressures of their everyday life, like having to tie their shoes.” Indeed, more than anything, Drugstore Cowboy manages to, somewhat unwittingly, make a mockery of the post-WWII American rebel, as Matt Dillon’s character, who is more or less sexually impotent (his nympho girlfriend always tries to screw him, but he always disappoints her, as he is more in love with dope), seems like a patently pathetic parody of Marlon Brando’s iconic character in The Wild One (1953) and countless other teen outlaw films. Indeed, Van Sant’s film demystifies the American screen rebel yet, somewhat paradoxically, creates a new sort of nihilistic untermensch rebel whose only charm is his lack of charm and whose only real enemy is himself, thus acting as a sort of anti-rebel who signifies the death of the whole film subgenre. Unquestionably, My Own Private Idaho (1991)—a work where the director utilized Burroughs’ ‘cut-up’ technique in regard to the script—is Van Sant’s magnum opus, with Drugstore Cowboy being like the film’s sub-literate and too-cool-for-school junky older brother. Indeed, unlike Alison Maclean’s similarly-themed work Jesus’ Son (1999) and Hebraic pseudo-arthouse hack Darren Aronofsky’s grotesquely moronic and would-be-romantic piece of counterfeit celluloid art Requiem for a Dream (2000), Van Sant’s film demonstrates that there is no hope for the young and hopeless, especially in regard to junky ex-cons, so you might as well let them have their fun until they end up dropping dead in some lonely vomit-covered gutter.

MY OWN PRIVATE IDAHO

Gus Van Sant° (1991)

My Own Private Idaho is an independent homosexual classic directed by Gus van Sant. Although being a bourgeoisie gay, Van Sant has a thing for homeless male prostitutes. I guess that could be comparable to contemporary rich whites impersonating illiterate blacks. River Phoenix and Keanu Reeves star in My Own Private Idaho in their prime as young actors. Reeves previously had several roles in which he played a stoner already under his hemp belt before acting in My Own Private Idaho. Sadly, River Phoenix wouldn't live much longer after the release of My Own Private Idaho. My Own Private Idaho is a fairly odd and unconventionally structured film. Some parts of the film border along the lines of cinéma vérité, while other scenes resemble modern day Shakespearean (the character Scott is based on Prince Hal of Henry IV) theater scenarios. The film also features random aesthetically rugged flashbacks of the character Mike (played by River Phoenix) with his mother as a child. Mike is a gay narcoleptic with a serious Oedipus complex. The only problem is that he assumes his brother is his father. I guess losing your mother and constantly longing for her can turn one perverted. The character of Scott is a spoiled rich boy who decided to sell his ass to spite his disappointed father. Scott's father is the mayor of Portland and believes that he has been cursed by the heavens because of the son that has been bequeathed upon him by the holy one. A homeless criminal and charismatic slob by the name of Bob taught Scott everything that he knows while also taking sexual rewards from the young boy. Scott states that Bob is more important to him than both his biological mother and father. Scott proves that you can truly find love in the most strangest of places. Legendary Gay German actor Udo Kier stars as a German car parts salesman named Hans. Hans attempts to pick up Mike up on the road and causes the boy to have a narcoleptic episode. I guess Germans with a certain femme in their voice can be quite frightening. Scott and Mike later join Hans in a hotel for some disturbing hedonistic episodes. Afterwards, Hans becomes aroused by the stolen motorcycle he has obtained from Scott. I don't think I have ever seen a man stroke a motorcycle in the obscene way Hans does in a trance-like state. I would have to say that My Own Private Idaho is the most classy film I have seen with such a variety of perverts. I also never thought that barns falling from the sky and crashing onto asphalt could be so beautiful. My Own Private Idaho is easily Gus van Sant's greatest and most ambitious film. The film is the gay American Odyssey that one cannot help but get lost in upon viewing. Apparently River Phoenix started using Heroin during the production of My Own Private Idaho to get into the role of a drug addicted street hustler. What an unfortunate end this decision would prove in the near future.

EVEN COWGIRLS GET THE BLUES

Gus Van Sant° (1994)

Long before banally molesting Hitchcock's proto-slasher masterpiece Psycho (1960) by making a soulless shot-for-shot remake in 1998 featuring grade A Hollywood asshole Vince Vaughn masturbating while acting like an autistic peeping Tom, queer auteur Gus Van Sant (Drugstore Cowboy, Elephant) directed a big budget (or at least big budget from him at that time) lesbo-feminist western/road movie hybrid of the 'quirky' queer sort that failed miserably both critically and commercially. Based on the 1976 'hippie' novel of the same name written by Tom Robbins (who narrates the film), Even Cowgirls Get the Blues (1993) is undoubtedly the most consciously degenerate quasi-western since Andy Warhol and Paul Morrissey's Lonesome Cowboys (1968), as well as the most pervert-plagued road movie since Van Sant's own previous work My Own Private Idaho (1991), and thus the film is not of total disinterest as a work that is the director's most 'Lynchian' celluloid creation to date. Ostensibly a feminist flick, Even Cowgirls Get the Blues ultimately comes off feeling like a cynical satire of disgruntled bull dykes, pseudo-aristocratic queer queens, and the sad sort of all-too-common moronic white folks who romanticize oriental philosophy and Amerindians. Starring the lanky and long-limbed virtual Nordic alien actress Uma Thurman (Kill Bill, Nymphomaniac)—the daughter of Nena von Schlebrügge, a former fashion model of German aristocratic stock—in a strangely fitting role as a perennial hitchhiker who became a master of her 'trade' due to her abnormally long thumbs, Van Sant's film is also notable due to its eclectic all-star cast, which includes Grace Zabriskie, Crispin Glover, Udo Kier, Rosanne Barr, Sean Young, Lorraine Bracco, alpha-Beat writer William S. Burroughs, and River Phoenix (who the film was dedicated to) in his last film role in a brief uncredited cameo. Van Sant's interest in adapting the source novel goes all the way back to the 1980s when he was finishing up his first feature Mala Noche and had the opportunity to meet author Tom Robbins at a book-signing where he told the writer that he hoped to adapt his book, even though he was only making about $100.00 a week at the time and surely did not have the money to buy the rights to the work, so one can certainly say Even Cowgirls Get the Blues is a true labor of love, if not a rather convoluted and curious one. When once asked about his interest in the source novel, Van Sant stated, "I think my attraction to COWGIRLS is that it's a kind of New Age novel [...] It seemed Robbins was using the form of the romance novel to write a new fiction. He has the lead character going in and out of different sexual situations to create this very grand, GONE WITH THE WIND type of journey." Although I have not read Robbins' novel and don't plan to, Even Cowgirls Get the Blues is anything but like Gone with the Wind, as a work centering around a rather naïve protagonist who may be many things, including a bi-curious virgin who is coerced into a variety of sex acts with numerous perverts, but she is as far away from being a conniving aristocratic confederate bitch as female characters come. A rather odd and anti-orgasmic odyssey featuring carpet-munching cowgirls, a gynophobic tranny pseudo-aristocrat, a hyper horny old hermit sage who goes by the name 'The Chink' even though he is a Jap, and a distinctly unflattering depiction of loony Women's liberationists who use their long unwashed and apparently pungent nether-regions as a nasty means to wage war against a tyrannical tranny dictator, Even Cowgirls Get the Blues is undoubtedly one of Van Sant's most underrated works, if not for all the wrong reasons as a film of accidental anti-politically incorrect camp featuring countless memorable scenes and characters that are just too marvelously moronic to be associated with the dry cunt cuntiness of feminist cinema.

As narrator Tom Robbins states at the beginning of Even Cowgirls Get the Blues regarding the film's thumb-endowed protagonist Sissy Hankshaw (Uma Thurman), "The surprise of Sissy Hankshaw is that she did not grow up a neurotic disaster. If you were a small girl in the low-income suburb of Richmond, Virginia as Sissy was and your own daddy makes jokes about you being "all thumbs," then you toughen up or you shatter." While a little girl, Sissy's hysterical mother (Grace Zabriskie) was afraid that her daughter would never be able to find a man due to her long thumbs and her suspicions were right as her daughter remained a virgin well into her adult years, even after becoming a glamorous model for feminine hygiene products. When Sissy was a little girl, her Mother took her to a fortuneteller named 'Madame Zoe' (Rosanne Barr) to see if her daughter would ever get married and it was foretold that the thumb-handicapped little lady would see "men and lots and lots of women" in her life. Determined to make the most of her hand-based handicap, Sissy developed a talent for hitchhiking while still just a young girl as a born master for thumbing a ride and considering the first person to pick her up was driving a Pontiac—a car named after the Ottawa war chief of same name—she also developed an unhealthy fetish for American Indians (or what she describes as a "pleasure in Indianhood"). From 1965 until 1970, Sissy had the honor of being the "only young feminine hygiene Dew girl" and even resembled Edie Sedgwick, but ever since her career ended, she has been a homeless hitchhiker who has made hitching a "way of life" and who has crossed the continent 400 times and passed everyone twice. One day, Sissy gets a letter from her benefactor/mentor 'The Countess' (played by an exceedingly queenish John Hurt)—an aging transvestite with his own pet Asian houseboy who owns a feminine hygiene empire and loathes the smell of vaginas—asking her to come to NYC as s/he has a male companion s/he wants her to meet. Upon arriving in NYC, the Countess is somewhat annoyed by Sissy's unbecoming negativity regarding her freakish thumbs and hilariously states, "All of use are freaks in one way or another...try being born a male Russian countess born into a white middleclass Baptist family in Mississippi and you'll see what I mean." The Countess also goes on a notably bitchy tirade against vaginal aromas, stating, "I loathe the stink of females...their so sweet the way god made them...then they start fooling around with men and soon their stinking like rotten mushrooms...like an excessively chlorinated swimming pool...like a tuna fish's retirement party...they all stink, from the Queen England to Bonanza Jellybean, they stink." After going on a number of rather hysterical and even histrionic rants, the Countess sets Sissy up on a date with a successful "full-blooded Indian" watercolorist named Julian Gitche (Keanu Reeves), but the pansy artist is so overcome with anxiety upon meeting her that he has an asthma attack, thus the Hitchhiker is forced to mingle with her would-be-date's perverted artist friends. Before she knows it, Sissy is almost forced to engage in a threesome with Julian's perverted yet pompous pseudo-intellectual friends Howard (Crispin Glover) and Marie Barth (Sean Young), but she manages to escape relatively undefiled.

Since Sissy's romance with Julian was aborted by unfortunate circumstances, the Countess decides to send his protege to his 'beauty ranch', Rubber Rose Ranch, which is named after the aberrosexual aristocrat's best-selling designer douche bag, for her first modeling gig in years. Before Sissy goes on her journey, the Countess warns her to stay away from lesbian cowgirls that are stirring up a rebellion at the ranch, as well as an elderly Japanese-American philosopher/mountain man with the somewhat misleading name 'The Chink' (Noriyuki "Pat" Morita of Karate Kid fame), who is well known for defiling young girls. While masturbating to the thought of asthma-addled artist Julian Gitche while lying on a log outside in public somewhere near Rubber Rose Ranch, Sissy is rudely interrupted by a lady who wears so much makeup that she looks like a drag queen named Miss Adrian (Angie Dickinson), who runs the ranch and warns the hitcher of a "plague of cowgirls" that involves militant dykes having infiltrated every single sector of their beauty program, with corrupt cowgirls Debbie (Victoria Williams), Bonanza Jellybean (Rain Phoenix), and Delores Del Ruby (Lorraine Bracco) being the leaders of the sinister Sapphic revolt. Upon arriving at the ranch, Bonanza immediately attempts to ply Sissy with 'road food in bed' as the cunnilingus-inclined cowgirl has an obsession with the hitchhiker's large thumbs, which can assumedly do much damage to a dirty dyke's meat curtain. The ranch is famous for being the last place in the world to feature a reservation of whooping cranes, so Sassy dresses up like one for a modeling shoot that is being done by an exceedingly effeminate queer kraut director (Udo Kier). Of course, hardcore carpet-muncher Bonanza Jellybean eventually manages to get into Sissy's panties, thus creating a less than ideal situation for the hitcher due to her loyalty to the Countess and her new found friendship with the drag queen dictator's eternal enemies, the cowgirls. Indeed, one day the cowgirls decide to lead a revolt against the Countess, who mocks them by snidely stating, "You pathetic little cutesy poos...You actually believe this exhibition of childhood-like melodrama is advancing the cause of freedom.” Proclaiming that the Countess owes them the entire ranch as “token payment for disgusting exploitations,” Bonanza Jellybean leads an attack of odious aroma against the feminist hygiene product queen by having her cowgirls drop their pants and panties and declaring, “not one of these pussies has been washed in weeks” while charging their adversary, who holds his little fairy nose in abject disgust.

Totally torn between her longstanding relationship with the Countess and new friends among the cowgirls, Sissy leaves the ranch during the frantic feminist coup d'état and heads to the mountains where she meets the less than charming Chink, who deflowers her that night. Apparently, the Chink has sexually ravaged a number of the cowgirls and respects them, but complains regarding their dubious methods of female liberation, “I love those cowgirls...but...I just can't be a party to their utopian dreaming.” Ultimately, the cowgirls take the Countess' whooping cranes hostage and get the rare birds high on peyote to ostensibly 'literate' their minds. Meanwhile, Sissy gets in an argument with the Countess over the cowgirls involvement in the bird kidnapping that results in the hitchhiker slapping her benefactor so hard she knocks his dentures out. After learning that her thumbs might have caused the Countess brain damage, Sissy decides to have one of her thumbs amputated, with her childhood doctor Dr. Dreyfus (Buck Henry)—an exceedingly eccentric man who constantly quotes painters like Paul Gauguin and who has retired after being sued for medical malpractice after botching a nose job performed on a little boy—being the fellow who 'de-thumbs' her. Needless to say, Sissy's hitchhiking talents are severely weakened after her thumb is surgically amputated, but she still manages to hitch a ride back to Rubber Rose Ranch to reunite with the cowgirls, who are now in a standoff with Federal agents over the kidnapped whooping cranes. After the group's spiritual leader, Delores Del Ruby, has an epiphany after taking too much peyote, the girls agree to give the whooping cranes back and surrender, but when Bonanza Jellybean attempts to make peace with the government agents by dropping her guns, she is shot and a full-blown gun battle breaks out. In the end, Bonanza Jellybean succumbs to her wounds, the peyote-addled whooping cranes finally withdraw from drugs and fly away, the Countess hands over the deeds for the ranch to the cowgirls who rename it 'El Rancho Jellybean' (with Sissy becoming its main overseer), and the hermit chink, who was injured in the shootout and subsequently started a ménage à trios with Sissy and Delores, heads to California.

Despite being easily his biggest failure as a filmmaker, Gus Van Sant actually regards Even Cowgirls Get the Blues as his favorite cinematic creation, stating of the film, “Sometimes you like the more enfeebled child best. It's the most loved child.” Van Sant also revealed that he could care less about how the critics and the general public responded to the film, remarking, “I can't explain why it didn't work. We all thought it was off-kilter enough to be interesting, and

I can't explain the reaction. But you can waste a lot of time trying to figure it out, and in the end, they either get our material, or they don't. I make these films for myself, anyway." Undoubtedly, out of all the comments I have read Van Sant make about the film, the most interesting one is in regard to the director's personal speculation as to why the work was hated by critics, which is as follows: "Actually, I think a lot of critics didn't like the previous films, but they felt obligated to give them a good review. . . .COWGIRLS offered critics the opportunity to give me the bad review they wanted to give before." Indeed, with this quote Van Sant more or less admitted that the only reason his films were ever critically revered in the first place is because he was the first big mainstream 'openly gay' filmmaker and the critics merely lauded his work as a means to push their authoritarian neo-bolshevik LGBT agenda. Of course, in its depiction of effete homos as mean-spirited misogynists who exploit women due to their self-consciousness regarding their vaginal odors, portrayal of lesbians as peyote-addled and rather grotesque criminals who endanger the lives of both people and endangered species to further their dubious political cause, and inclusion of a old white-girl-defiling Japanese man named 'The Chink' that is certainly more odious than the Chinaman of D.W. Griffith's 'Yellow Peril' era work Broken Blossoms (1919), Even Cowgirls Get the Blues is not exactly the sort of film that would have benefited the gay agenda, even if it is an innately queer-spirited work full of campy cocksucker clichés that would even make John Waters chuckle with depraved joy. Next to his putrid piece of mainstream gay agitprop Milk (2008), which makes a martyr out of a Hebraic homo who was a known pederast and absurdly depicts Harvey Milk's killer Dan White as a closet-homosexual even though it's a totally libelous fabrication based on not a single inkling of fact, Even Cowgirls Get the Blues seems like an unsung masterpiece created by a still-then-subversive filmmaker who had yet to sell his soul to the gatekeepers of poof political correctness in Hollywood. While not exactly a masterpiece or anything resembling one, Van Sant's film certainly deserves a cult following of sorts as arguably the director's most humorous film to date as a loony lesbo equivalent to My Own Private Idaho. For those that ever wondered what Tony Soprano's psychiatrist's beaver looks like, Even Cowgirls Get the Blues might also be worth your time.

TO DIE FOR

Gus Van Sant° (1995)

To Die For is a satirical film directed by everybody's favorite mainstream homosexual art film director Gus Van Sant. The film follows a seemingly dumb yet cunning blonde by the name of Suzanne Stone as she attempts to become a popular news anchor. On her way to her career goal, she ends up marrying an Italian American rock drummer named Larry Maretto who has fallen for her. The Italian Stallion even ends up selling his beloved drum set for Suzanne. Suzanne Stone decides she would rather go by her maiden as a news anchor. I guess Mrs. Maretto has some issues with taking an Italian surname because of the negative connotations it comes with. Larry's family owns an Italian restaurant and his family is also involved in some illegal activities. Essentially, Suzanne Stone marries Larry for his mob family as she believes it will help her with "connections." Instead, Larry is interested in starting a family with his WASP ladylove to her dismay. Suzanne thinks that Larry's interest in a family will screw up her mindless news casting career so she decides to screw a drugged out loser named Jimmy. After some sex and other romantic activities Suzanne seduces Jimmy with, a murder plan is set-up. For some reason, Suzanne believes that Jimmy and his two equally pathetic friends can murder her husband and get away with it perfectly. Unfortunately for Suzanne, Larry's Italian American family is not as dumb as she thinks. Joaquin Rafael Phoenix does as an incredible job portraying 1/2 retarded and sympathetic yet pathetic high school student Larry Emmett. Metal head Larry is a lovely character that doesn't have much to look forward to in life. This all changes when he meets Suzanne who Larry puts on a pedestal higher than you would expect the young man to put busty Elvira on. When Larry "scores" with Suzanne, you almost feel glad for him that at least at the moment he feels like someone. Gus Van Sant assembled a variety of cinematic techniques when directing the unconventional To Die For. The film features everything from documentary style on-camera monologues to scenes of perverse drama. Van Sant succeeds in directing a film that distorts emotions to such an exaggerated level that he gets his point across about media exploitation in a more than obvious (but still appropriate) way. To Die For, like many of Gus Van Sant's films, is a successful experiment with a moderate Hollywood size budget. Very few directors can say they have accomplished the same in regards to art and business success as Van Sant. Psychoanalytic horror director David Cronenberg almost makes an appearance in To Die For as a mafia hitman. That being said, it is now obvious that To Die For has more than one thing to offer for those interested in viewing the film. The film is a black comedy in the truest sense. Suzanne Stone finally gets her wish of having her face all over News television. A woman that has concocted a murder plan against her husband and has seduced a few high school students, she is one of the greatest conspirators to make day time

TV. I have always wanted to see one of those annoying weather girls involved in a murder.

ELEPHANT

Gus Van Sant^o (2003)

Queer auteur Gus Van Sant (Drugstore Cowboy, Even Cowgirls Get the Blues) has directed a lot of sickeningly sentimental, liberal feel-good slave-morality-addled movies and has received a great deal of commercial and critical success from doing it, thus proving his wholesome upper-middleclass upbringing did not fail him after all, even if he became a subversive sodomite filmmaker who fetishizes poor young male hustlers as demonstrated by his early works Mala Noche (1985) and My Own Private Idaho (1991), yet he has also used his success as a means to continue making experimental arthouse works that would only appeal to more cultivated (and pretentious) audiences, with his post-Finding Forrester (2000) 'Death Trilogy' (Gerry, Elephant, Last Days)—three artsy fartsy works loosely based on true stories revolving around death—being arguably the most artistically fruitful point in the director's career. Undoubtedly, the best film in the trilogy is the second work, Elephant (2003), which takes a largely fictional, if not realistic and almost cinéma vérité-like, approach to the events of the 1999 Columbine High School massacre when two degenerate high school comrades, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, killed 12 students and one teacher and then proceeded to blow their defective brains out in the school library. Van Sant decided to take on the project after being approached by actress Diane Keaton and HBO to make a film about the Columbine massacre (incidentally, trash filmmakers William Hellfire and Joey Smack had already made a film about the event, Duck! The Carbine High Massacre (1999), which ineptly satirized the media frenzy surrounding the massacre) and he ultimately gave birth to a beautiful little celluloid beast that, although offending certain tight ass viewers due to the film's lack of pseudo-moral sermonizing and rationalizing of the killer's crimes, would ultimately win the top prize (the coveted 'Palme d'Or') at the 2003 Cannes Film Festival. A poetic piece of cultivated Teensploitation that would rise well above the level of the 1989 Alan Clarke film of the same name that heavily inspired its aesthetic and minimalistic observational style, Elephant, at least in my opinion, makes all American teenagers—be they bitchy and bulimic cheerleader sluts or bi-curious mass shooters—seem like emotionally and intellectually stunted mini-monsters who cannot see past their own patently petty existences, thus making the work a sort of art-addled antidote to the sorry sentimental teen angst of John Hughes' Brat Pack flicks. Indeed, while the 'bullied' kids of Van Sant's film certainly get their revenge against the big bad bullies in the end, rather ironically, their first victim is the most conspicuously nerdy, intolerably introverted, and most consistently bullied girl in the entire school, thus demonstrating the futility and irrationality of their actions. Featuring a homoerotic pre-massacre 'love' scene between the two killers before they go thrill killing, Elephant ultimately follows in the marvelously sexually masochistic tradition of Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) in terms of its unflattering depiction of fagdom and considering Van Sant's lifelong hero worship of junky queer literary outlaw William S. Burroughs and his imaginary 'wild boys', one can almost see the director sympathizing with the killers to an extent, albeit in a romantic fantasy-driven sort of fashion. Indeed, Elephant is the sort of Columbine film that only a half-autistic homo could get away with and thus represents a rare piece of American mainstream cinema that makes no artistic compromises, at least for the most part (the film does feature a token negro 'hero', although said hero fails when attempting to take down the homicidal honkies). Comprised of a series of long and voyeuristic scenes shot mostly on a Steadicam and starring mostly non-actors that used their real first names for the characters they played, Elephant is a film that ultimately puts the viewer right in the shoes of the unsuspecting teen victims (as well as the killers), only to blow their brains out once you have become accustomed to them in what amounts to a nasty neo-Brechtian Afterschool Special from high school hell that flings dung on Dogme 95 in terms of its delightful diletantism.

Androgynous albino skater boy John McFarland (John Robinson) is being driven to school by his goofy father (played by Timothy Bottoms, who is probably best known for his role as Sonny Crawford in Peter Bogdanovich's 1971 hit The Last Picture Show), but since his daddy is a dipsomaniac and already drunk, he has to act as a sort of parent for his pathetic progenitor and forces him to allow him to drive the car. At the high school, a charming young photographer named Elias (Elias McConnell) takes some snapshots of a young punk couple for his portfolio and promises to give them a print, though he will never actually get the opportunity to make good on his promise. Meanwhile, on the high school football field, a nerdy Jewish-looking girl named Michelle (Kristen Hicks) stares up into the sky as if gazing into the bowels of heaven, which she will soon ostensibly enter. Also on the field is popular jock lifeguard/football player Nathan (Nathan Tyson) who, after playing ball with his bros, meets up with his beloved girlfriend Carrie (Carrie Finklea). When John is caught crying by his female friend Acadia (Alicia Miles) in an empty room at the school, he is given a rather sympathetic kiss in what is easily the most tender scene of Elephant, but the girl soon leaves to attend a gay-straight alliance meeting where its members discuss whether or not you can tell if someone is a homo by their appearance. While exiting the school, John runs into his two friends Alex (Alex Frost) and Eric (Eric Deulen), who are dressed like 'goth' mercenaries and give their friend the following warning, "Get the fuck out and don't come back! Some heavy shit's going down!," in a rather aggressive fashion. Although John will try to warn other students not to enter the school, his actions are ultimately in vain. As demonstrated in the next scene, Alex is a sensitive nerd who has suffered routine bullying from philistine jocks with a propensity for throwing spitballs during science class. Like Harvey Keitel's eponymous character from James Toback's Fingers (1978), Eric is a sensitive artistic type with a seemingly split personality who finds solace in playing compositions by Ludwig van Beethoven on piano, but has a lot of pent up hatred that he has no true outlet for, not to mention the fact that he is a virgin. Alex and his comrade Eric, who has a much lower IQ and is a physically frail wigger who dresses like Eminem, somehow magically buy a assault rifle (Bushmaster Carbon 15 Type 21 semi-automatic varmint rifle) online, which they practice using by shooting at firewood in a garage so they can prepare for their dream massacre. When footage appears of the Third Reich, including a scene with Leni Riefenstahl (Van Sant's archenemy?), on television, the two friends have the most mundane conversation ever, with the one asking, "Can you still buy Nazi flags?" and the other responding, "Sure, if you're a nut," thus proving that these young men were not inspired to kill by the ghost of Uncle Adolf and his undead army. In fact, Eric is so uneducated that when Hitler appears on screen, he asks, "Who's that Guy?" (indeed, if kids learn anything in public schools nowadays, it is about how eternally evil Hitler and the Nazis were).

Before going on their killing spree, Eric gets in the shower with Alex and says, "Well this is it. We're gonna die today. I've never even kissed anyone before, have you?" and the two proceed to kiss (for the record, Van Sant has stated in interviews that these two fucked friends are somehow not homos). For about the last 15 minutes of Elephant, the terrible teenage twink twosome carries out their reckless reign of impotent terror, with Alex stating to his comrade before they carry out their crimes, "Most importantly, have fun, man." The first place the crazed comrades go to is the library, with bullied nerd Michelle quite ironically being the first victim, with her brain splattering all over a bookshelf sitting behind her. In a scene of seemingly unintentional comic relief, Elias takes a photo of Eric and Alex a second before they start shooting. In a female bathroom, Alex assumedly guns down a trio of annoying bulimic girls, Brittany, Jordan and Nicole, with one of them ironically stating how cool it would be if bombs were going off in the school as it would result in no homework (indeed, Alex tried to explode propane bombs but they did not work). Meanwhile, a negro athlete named Benny (Bennie Dixon) passively (using one hand, which barely touches her body!) helps Acadia escape out of a window after a member of the gay-straight alliance is killed and proceeds to attempt to be a hero by sneaking up on Eric from behind, but he is ultimately gunned down a second or two before he goes to attack the school shooter. From there, Eric begins to torment the school principal, Mr. Luce (Matt Malloy), stating, "You know there's others like us out there, too. And they will kill you if you fuck with them like you did me and Jared." While Eric pretends to spare Mr. Luce, he ends up sadistically shooting the principal while he is running away, thus demonstrating his innate ruthlessness. When Alex and Eric meet in the school cafeteria after killing the majority of their victims, the former shoots and kills the latter while he is discussing his dirty deeds. In the end, Alex finds popular couple Nathan and Carrie hiding in a walk-in freezer and plays the children's counting rhyme "Eeny, meeny, miny, moe" with them before shooting one of them, though it is never revealed who was actually shot.

With the mastermind of the massacre, Alex, resembling Van Sant's much beloved actor Keanu Reeves (who appeared in both My Own Private Idaho and Even Cowgirls Get the Blues) and the other killer, Eric, resembling the sort of pedomorphic and seemingly anorexic sort of young twinks that dominate gay pornography, Elephant ultimately resembles a sick fantasy film on the director's part, albeit a somewhat inconspicuous one. It should be noted that the film also features a spoken word track ("Meeting of International Conference of Technological Psychiatry") by the director's hero William S. Burroughs, who wrote a series of novels about homicidal homo teen boys (especially his The Red Night Trilogy (1981-87)) and who appeared in two of Van Sant's films, Drugstore Cowboy (1989) and the anti-American short Thanksgiving Prayer (1991). As Van Sant explained in the French featurette About Elephant, all of the characters featured in the film are more or less archetypes for high school students and indeed, the film has a certain authenticity in its intentionally mundane depiction of teenagers that is quite a relief from the moronic scat-obsessed 30+year-old frat boy philistines that typically appear in corny coming-of-age films and teen sex comedies. Indeed, compared to the other films based on the Columbine massacre, including Duck! The Carbine High Massacre, Uwe Boll's Heart of America (2002), Ben Coccio's Zero Day (2003), The Only Way (2004), and We Need to Talk About Kevin (2011), Elephant is the only film that does not seem like a total piece of putrid exploitative garbage, superficial moralizing, and/or vapid sentimentalism. In an interview with Gerald Peary, Van Sant stated the following regarding why he decided to take a more detached and observational approach to directing the film, "It's not that I don't want you involved in the characters, but I want you involved by watching them, an observation, the way documentarian Frederick Wiseman sits back and lets things occur. We could have invented a more traditional psychological narrative. I have my ideas why Columbine happened, but that's not this film. I wanted a poetic impression rather than dictating an answer. I wanted to include the audience's thoughts." Indeed, Van Sant may have been arrogant enough to direct a remake of Hitchcock's Psycho starring a rather repugnant Hollywood comedian like Vince Vaughn, but he does not have his head so far up his ass to go as far as dictating to the audience the answer as to why two teenage upper-middleclass degenerates shot up their school. While not exactly an exciting and action-packed work, Elephant apparently did inspire at least one school shooter, Jeff Weise—an Ojibwe Indian that the media painted as a neo-Nazi (just like they did with the Columbine killers, despite the fact that Klebold was part Jewish and even practiced Jewish rituals) who killed 9 of his fellow native Americans at his high school (located on Red Lake Indian Reservation) before blowing his brains out—to carry out a shooting spree on March 21, 2005. Of course, anyone who is inspired to kill a bunch of people after watching any film, let alone a slow-moving arthouse film like Elephant, was already insane to begin with.

GUS VAN SANT'S LAST DAYS
GUS VAN SANT'S LAST DAYS

Gus Van Sant° (2005)

Undoubtedly, Nirvana frontman Kurt Cobain was one of the last people that should have been rich and famous, let alone a hero and icon for an entire generation. I say this not in a cheap and pathetic attempt to belittle Cobain's output as a musician, but in regard to his character and behavior as a tragic individual who failed his entire life, only to destroy everything he had, namely his own life, when he achieved something that most people can only dream of. Indeed, as a man who came from a broken home that ruined his outlook on life at a young age, suffered debilitating mental illness (he was apparently diagnosed as suffering from bipolar disorder as an adult), once wrote a song entitled "I Hate Myself And Want To Die," and had such a warped mind that he once stated, "I am not gay, although I wish I were, just to piss off homophobes," Cobain was essentially a raving vagrant who became rich and famous and, somewhat unwittingly (when it comes down to it, it was the record company executives and MTV scumbags that peddled his degeneracy), poisoned countless minds, ultimately inspiring an entire generation to get into hard drugs and fetishize suicide. The fact he killed himself (or at least died young) seemed inevitable and in Gus Van Sant's experimental arthouse flick Gus Van Sant's Last Days aka Last Days (2005), one sees a perturbing portrayal of the metaphysical torture and all-consuming loneliness Cobain was suffering from leading up to the days before he decided to end it all and blow his brains out. The third and final film in Van Sant's experimental "Death Trilogy" (following Gerry (2002) and Elephant (2003)), the film was a decade in the making and was originally intended as a 'straight' biopic, but Cobain's control-freak widow Courtney Love—a whacked out woman that is hated by legions of Nirvana fans for obvious reasons—put a stop to that. Probably the most anti-romantic yet strangely poetic depiction of a rock star ever made, Last Days essentially follows the emotional wreck of a rocker as he moves around quite uncoordinatedly like a wounded animal about to take its last gasp. Starring pretty boy Michael Pitt (Funny Games, Boardwalk Empire) in the lead role (this must have been Pitt's dream as his self-professed favorite film is Van Sant's My Own Private Idaho (1991)), Last Days is a decided 'downer' (which is incidentally the name of one of Nirvana's more punk tunes) as a movie that viewers typically either love or love to hate. Personally, as a minor Gus Van Sant and Michael Pitt fan, I was quite disappointed with the film when I first saw it, as I was expecting it to at least top Elephant in its visceral approach to the moments leading up to the subject's death, but of course, this film does not feature a climactic school massacre scene. After rewatching Elephant recently, I decided it was about time to give Last Days a second chance after having almost a decade for the film to digest in my mind. A transcendental realist nightmare that takes the viewer on a experience that, try as they might, will not be shaken from their mind anytime soon, Last Days is penetrating psychodrama of the voyeuristic sort where it seems as if Pitt's body has been corrupted by Cobain's half-dead soul. Tripping and falling down small hills, sitting on the ground in a fetal position while wearing a dress, and pissing in a river in a rather slobbish manner, the 'Kurt Cobain' (the writer/director opted for naming the character 'Blake' instead of Kurt) of Van Sant's film is a metaphysically dead soul barely grasping on to life, but he has just enough life in himself left so that he can end said life and rid himself of the parasites that have feasted on his fame and the debilitating drug addiction that has devoured his purity and very being. Like John Cassavetes meets Béla Tarr (like with Elephant, Van Sant cited Sátántangó (1994) as having a huge influence on the film) as channeled through the 1990s grunge scene, Last Days is undoubtedly the most melancholy and foreboding yet strangely detached suicide-themed film since Fassbinder's In a Year with 13 Moons (1978). Of course, Cobain makes for a less interesting subject than that of a butcher turned tranny who cut off his cock to impress a psychopathic holocaust survivor.

Morbidly depressed rock star Blake (Michael Pitt) is so mentally out of it that he trudges through the woods as if he is about to drop dead at any moment. When he reaches a river, Blake decides to strip off all of his clothes aside from his underwear and proceeds to piss in the water in an awkward manner as if he is some redneck lowlife who has had one too many cans of cheap beer. That night, Blake somehow manages to figure out how to get a bonfire going and sits by the fire all by his lonesome, as if involved in some sort of private ritual. The next day, Blake walks back to his home and mumbles to himself such nonsensical things as, "Cause I'm afraid... You can't do anything. You can't do anything. I can't. I don't know what I'm—God, it's just—I don't know. Just a—I Just," as a man that is truly and literally at a loss for words. Various people are looking for Blake and his friend Donovan (played by Ryan Orion in a role modeled after Cobain's real-life friend Dylan Carlson, who lent the Nirvana singer the shotgun he would kill himself with) has even hired a fat and goofy private investigator (played by Ricky Jay in a role based on real-life PI Tom Grant, who believes Cobain was murdered) to help find him. Meanwhile, a group of parasites led by a fellow named Scott (played by Scott Patrick Green in a role based on Cobain's drug dealer/Courtney Love's ex-boyfriend Michael 'Cali' Dewitt who some suspect killed the rock star) occupy Cobain's house and attempt to prevent anyone from seeing him, including Donovan and the PI. At one point, Blake enters the room where Scott and his compatriots are sleeping and puts his shotgun to their heads in a somewhat joking manner, as if he would love to rid them from his life but lacks the testicular fortitude to do so. Somewhat strangely, Blake finds the shotgun after finding a note in his fridge reading, "The gun is in the bedroom closet" as if someone is attempting to bait him into killing himself. When an overweight negro salesman from Yellow Pages named Thaddeus Thomas (played by a real Yellow Pages salesman playing himself) knock's on Blake's door, the Rocker lets him in and entertains his sales pitch. Apparently, Blake posted an ad in the Yellow Pages the year before for a locomotive parts company (?) and Thaddeus convinces him to renew the advertisement. While speaking in a rather contrived salesman-like manner, Thaddeus senses there is something wrong with the strange and seemingly stoned dress-wearing white man that he is talking to and even asks him if he is OK. After Thaddeus leaves, he remembers he forgot some books and goes back in Blake's house, only to find the Rocker passed out, so he tiptoes around his body as if in fear for his life. When two Mormon recruiters (twin brothers who are both named Elder Friberg) drop by the house, Scott listens to their religious spiel and mocks their claim that they talk to god. When one of Blake's friends, Asia (played by Italian actress/auteur Asia Argento in a role modeled after Cali Dewitt's then-girlfriend Jessica Hopper), finds him passed out on the floor after getting in a weird trance while listening to R&B group Boyz II Men (the sort of negrophile garbage that would replace Nirvana/Grunge in popularity after Cobain committed suicide), she merely moves him aside as if he is a piece of furniture. When Scott and his friends temporarily leave the house and see Donovan and the PI driving up to the home, they yell obscenities at them like "fucking asshole" and "dickhead Don." When Blake hears Donovan calling his name, he runs away into the surrounding woods as if scared for his life. Indeed, Blake does not want to be found.

In what is easily the most trance-like and meditative scenario of Last Days, Blake goes back home and has a one-man band jam session in an exceedingly long dolly shot scene where the camera moves away from the outside window of the room. When a rock executive (played by Kim Gordon of the band Sonic Youth in a role modeled after Cobain's Jewish manager Danny Goldberg) comes by the home, she berates Blake and sarcastically asks him if he has told his baby daughter that, "I'm sorry that I'm a...rock and roll cliché?," adding, "If you stay here you're just gonna..." as if she knows that the Rocker is about to drop dead. Later that night, Blake plays with kittens while Scott and his crew listen to the Velvet Underground song "Venus in Furs." When one of his parasitic friends, Luke (Lukas Haas in a role modeled after Dewitt's friend Rene Navarette), attempts to ask for Blake's advice regarding a song he is writing, Scott gets pissed and says, "Leave him the fuck alone and come upstairs with me, all right?" and the two proceed to go upstairs and have gay sex while the grunge rocker plays some songs on acoustic guitar. Not long after mumbling to himself, "Everyone is treating me like a criminal," Blake is approached by Scott, who complains about how he needs money for a plane ticket and a heater and instead of asking his friend to borrow some money, he merely takes it out of the Musician's pocket without asking, thus signifying the innately abusively and parasitic nature of their relationship. From there, Blake leaves the home and goes to an underground punk show where he bumps into an ostensible friend (played by Gus Van Sant's filmmaker friend Harmony Korine), who tells a story about how he played Dungeons & Dragons with members of the Grateful Dead and how great Jerry Garcia is at playing a 'Dungeon Master.' Korine attempts to offer Blake a hit of acid, but the Rocker merely walks away without saying a single word. The next day, a 'Tree Trimmer' (Chip Marks) finds Blake's corpse lying in a greenhouse. Magically, Blake's buck naked spirit leaves his body and assumedly enters 'Nirvana.' Of course, after learning of Blake's demise, Scott and his crew decide to make a quick getaway to LA so they are not implicated in their friend's dubious death.

Undoubtedly, one of the more interesting aspects of Last Days is that Cobain's death is neither depicted nor explained (aside from a scene where he assumedly writes a suicide letter), thus leaving it to open interpretation for the viewer, which is interesting considering the fact that many people, especially his fans, believe that he did not commit suicide but that he was actually murdered. Notably, Cobain's Widow Courtney Love, who director Gus Van Sant developed a friendship with a number of years before the film was made (after making various attempts to get a Cobain biopic made), is not depicted in the work. It should also be noted that Love's own father, Hank Harrison, who has written two books on Cobain's death, believes that his daughter might have been involved in a conspiracy to kill the Nirvana singer and even says such in British documentarian Nick Broomfield's controversial work Kurt & Courtney (1998). Additionally, musician 'El Duce' (the drummer and lead singer of the self-described 'rape rock' band The Mentors) made the claim that Love offered him money to kill Cobain and in Broomfield's doc he even mentions that he knew who killed the Grunge King, but that he would "let the FBI catch him." Two days after conducting the interview, El Duce died in an exceedingly dubious manner after being hit by a train in the middle of the night. While Van Sant's Last Days does not exactly accuse anyone of Cobain's death, it certainly points the finger at psychopathic drug addict fiends that were feeding off his soul. Luckily, Last Days does not attempt to make Cobain seem like a hero/martyr, but instead portrays him as a pitiable individual who was in over his head and had virtually no one to reach out to. While not exactly a masterpiece, Last Days is probably the closest a film will ever come to paying any sort of 'objective tribute' to Cobain's death, even as a largely fictional work, as Van Sant did not seem to have much of a real agenda with the film aside from attempting to get inside the grunge musician's mind during his 'last days' and inserting one of his random signature gay sex scenes. As Van Sant stated in an interview with Film Threat in response to the fact that the viewer is unsure as to how Blake actually dies, "You see it from the tabloid point of view, just from the hillside and you're not really part of it." A film about a man who was arguably the worst role model in human history (at least, the worst white one) and who, against his own will, acted as "the spokesman of a generation" and was ultimately even more exploited after his death than when he was actually alive (I remember distinctly seeing a store selling 'Kurt Cobain Death Certificate' t-shirts immediately after he died), Last Days is probably the only mainstream depiction of Kurt Cobain that the Nirvana frontman himself would have appreciated (after all, he was a huge fan of My Own Private Idaho) and for that reason alone makes the film worth seeing. Of course, if you're considering blowing your brains out, Last Days is probably the last film you should see.

PARANOID PARK

Gus Van Sant° (2007)

Gus van Sant seems to be going the route of Larry Clark in adoring young skater boys. This odd trend of obsession still has me perplexed. I hope that van Sant is not a member of NAMBLA. He is one of my favorite Hollywood directors. Gus is a director that has managed to bring interesting subversion to the mainstream. Drugstore Cowboy, My Own Private Idaho, and Elephant are all films that I have come to enjoy over the years. I grew up as a skater in a small redneck county. My skateboarding obsession lasted for over 8 years. Skaters were the most despised group subculture (and probably the only real subculture). Like the skaters in Gus van Sant's Paranoid Park, we were always in trouble. The teachers had blacklisted us essentially as future criminals (which many of my former friends ended up). We never ended up killing a security guard. I couldn't imagine if I saw a crawling torso heading towards. I probably would have found it very cool. Paranoid Park is sort of a trip down nostalgia lane for me. I couldn't help but enjoy the film. It brought me back to the days when my skater friends and I would make gritty skate videos. Everything was about skating. Paranoid Park's slow motion skate sequences were very mellowing and dare I say poetic. The film featured a lot of slow motion scenes which actually worked to the advantage of Paranoid Park's very soothing flow. I can already hear people calling Paranoid Park pretentious a mile away. If they can't enjoy a beautiful film than they can enjoy the commercial like "qualities" of a film directed by Craig Brewer. Last Days was a disappointment for me and a good number of Van Sant fans. The director has now redeemed himself with Paranoid Park. The film opens up with beautiful music composed by Nina Rota which was originally in Federico Fellini's masterpiece Juliet of the Spirits. Nina Rota was one of the greatest (if not the greatest) music composer for films. Paranoid Park also features music from Elliot Smith (which can be heard in Van Sant's Good Will Hunting among other films). The music perfectly compliments Paranoid Park's scattered and flowing feel. Paranoid Park features various kids quoting popular TV shows and movies (South Park, Napoleon Dynamite, etc.). Gus van Sant brings up the staleness of American life. American's grow up (including myself) living their lives through television and film. The skaters of Paranoid Park learned more values from watching television than they did from their own parents. Skateboarding is a loner sport (if you want to call it that) and its participants confirm that. Gus Van Sant is not as perverted as Larry Clark. Clark's Ken Park, I suspect fulfilled many of the directors dark fantasies. Although Gus van Sant obviously has a thing for skater boys, he at least respects them. Keep in mind I am a fan of Ken Park. Gus Van Sant acted as an executive producer on Larry Clark's first film Kids. I hope that Clark won't call Van Sant a theft like he basically called Kids and Ken Park screenwriter Harmony Korine. Paranoid Park owes nothing to Larry Clark.

MILK

Gus Van Sant° (2008) There is no doubt about it, gay has gone mainstream. Lindsay Lohan has her own Jewish dyke girlfriend while Ellen Degenerate has her own show where straight women worship her (the ultimate lesbian fantasy?). Special laws now protect gays from “hate” crimes. Crimes against gays always make front page news. Talk about “progress,” now grade school students even learn about how being gay is completely normal. Gay revolutionaries such as Harvey Milk paved the way from mainstreaming the gay “community” and giving them special protection against evil homophobes. It is no surprise that gay filmmaker Gus Van Sant has decided to cinematically immortalize the homosexual martyr with his film Milk. Gus Van Sant is a filmmaker I have mixed feelings about. I am no doubt a fan of his films such as Drugstore Cowboy and My Own Private Idaho. Van Sant has also directed repulsive trash such as the Psycho remake and Last Days. Hell, the commercially and financially successful Good Will Hunting isn’t nearly his worst film. Milk is a film that combines Gus Van Sant’s notorious Queer New Wave artistry and his knack for mainstream productions. It makes me wonder whether Gus Van Sant is more proud of his gay art films or his gay power films. I wouldn’t be surprised if Milk was Van Sant’s proudest achievement yet. I never wanted or expected to ever see a make out session in a film between Sean Penn and James Franco. I watched Milk with a special lady friend and she couldn’t help but cringe. It makes me wonder whether the two popular actors agreed to be in Milk for subversions sake (Penn is a Commie sympathizer) or to prove they feel secure with their sexuality. Teenage girl favorite Emile Hirsch also stars in Milk as a smart ass disgruntled gay nerd. Unsurprisingly Penn, Franco, and Hirsch have no problem pulling off “gay.” Protesters are Gay. Gus Van Sant took it upon himself to make up a little historical fiction with Milk. The man that killed Harvey Milk, Dan White, is portrayed as a self-loathing gay in Milk. Was this fictional portrayal of Dan White an attempt by Gus Van Sant to show that gay repression leads to murder? Maybe Van Sant’s next film should be the ultimate Jeffrey Dahmer bio-pic. It could have been the pervert killer film that Gus Van Sant wished Psycho could have been. Gus Van Sant had no problem having school massacre shooters in his film Elephant have a gay shower moment.

Is Milk the best gay mainstream film since Brokeback Mountain? Probably. Is Milk worthy of all the hype and praise that the credits keeping giving it? Probably not, but Milk is better than most of the films that Hollywood pollutes the world with. Milk has its moments and is well acted, but it’s more a film about power. As brought up in Milk, is gayness really responsible for the breakdown of the nuclear family? Probably not, as there are a lot worse subversive “movements” going on that are completely hostile to the western family tradition. I just wonder if Gus Van Sant decided to name his Harvey Milk film “Milk” for more than just after the subject of the film. Something tells me that Milk is not the only white substance on Gus Van Sant's mind.

THE MIRROR

Guy Hamilton (1980) Andrei Tarkovsky's The Mirror (1975) is an Oedipal stream of consciousness masterpiece. The film utilized a combination of varying scenes (even Soviet News Reels) to recount memories that become distorted overtime. The Mirror is probably the closest attempt at putting the mind's eye on screen. This works effectively as the scenes interweave in perfect rhythm. The Mirror makes Sergei Eisenstein's editing techniques look like that of a Burger King commercial.

The actress that played Tarkovsky's assumed Mother also plays his wife (Margarita Terekhova). Tarkovsky's not trying to hide his deep love for his Mama. Pier Paolo Pasolini also loved his Mother enough to direct his own version of Oedipus Rex. Commies sure do love their Mommies. Artistic Soviet propaganda wouldn't be complete without newsreel propaganda of Hitler's dead doppelganger. Why Tarkovsky incorporated this in The Mirror is beyond me. Random photos of Leon Trotsky and Josef Stalin cover the walls of a decaying Soviet factory. Tarkovsky's mother is a slave to this system. The Communists are staunch Feminists and proponents of "equality." 100 million dead to confirm that equality. Tarkovsky's Mother and Father also lend their artistry to The Mirror. His father's poems are narrated throughout the film as well as his mother's voice. This is obviously Tarkovsky's most personal film and in my opinion his best. The Mirror is a true "auteur" piece. The slave masters of the USSR were very angered by The Mirror. I don't think it benefited the collectivist society that funded it. It's fairly amazing how a country that gives no rights to its citizens could produce such an intimate film. I doubt the USSR had any idea what Tarkovsky's were about.

TALES FROM THE GIMLI HOSPITAL

Guy Maddin (1988)

I would not exactly call myself a staunch Guy Maddin fan, even if I like some of his films and respect his influences because he seems to be someone who knows too much about film, most specifically silent and early talkie works, for his own good, thus many of his works, including Dracula: Pages From a Virgin's Diary (2002) and Cowards Bend the Knee (2003), seem like cleverly conceptualized postmodern fanboy jerk-off pieces assembled by a degenerate dilettante with way too much time on his hands. Sort of like a much more cultivated and less aesthetically barbaric Quentin Tarantino, except with relatively decent taste in film, Maddin is essentially like an archeologist/anthropologist auteur who exhumes long dead cinematic conventions and style and mixes them with traumatic experiences and anecdotes from his own life and Icelandic background, thereupon concocting sort of anachronistic celluloid Frankenstein monsters featuring mismatched parts thus oftentimes resulting in aesthetic tragedies. Undoubtedly, aside from possibly his kaleidoscopic incest-themed neo-mountain film Careful (1992), Tales from the Gimli Hospital (1989) is my personal favorite Maddin movie. Originally intended as a short, Tales from the Gimli Hospital would ultimately evolve into Maddin's first feature-length film and a work that would get the attention of film exhibitor/producer Ben Barenholtz—the man responsible for creating the concept of the “Midnight Movie” and promoting/popularizing cult masterpieces like Alejandro Jodorowsky's El topo (1970), John Waters' Pink Flamingos (1972), and David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), among countless others—thus virtually guaranteeing the campy Canadian auteur a certain degree of fame and artistic merit among cinephiles in the cinema underground overnight. “Set in no particular time period” (as described by Maddin himself) but inspired by a smallpox epidemic around 1874 that ravaged the fishing community of Gimli, Manitoba, Canada (once known as “New Iceland”) and wiped out around 80% of the population, Tales from the Gimli Hospital is a sort of sardonic and aberrantly absurdist (anti)love letter to his Icelandic heritage, as well as early talkie pictures of the 1920s. Featuring tales of necrophilia, 13-year-old girls disguised as flapper-like nurses, a mocking appreciation of Icelandic language and culture/customs, and bawdy Eddie Cantor-esque blackfaces minstrels, Tales from the Gimli Hospital is a rare and aesthetically/thematically radical example of the North American Nordic neurosis as directed by a rare man of European descent who actually embraces his heritage, even if he disgraces it in the process. In fact, Tales from the Gimli Hospital upset members of Gimli's Icelandic-Canadian community due to its less than sensitive portrayal of the historical smallpox epidemic in New Iceland and was even rejected from the Toronto Film Festival, yet in this day and age of excessive and seemingly suicidal ethno-masochism among Europeans and people of European descent, Maddin's fiendishly farcical approach to human suffering seems more than fitting. Utilizing a beauty salon run by his aunt that occupied the bottom floor of his childhood home as a sort of true Icelandic-Canadian peasant film studio, Maddin ultimately assembled with Tales from the Gimli Hospital what is arguably the most 'world famous' piece of Canadian Nordic cinema ever made.

Tales from the Gimli Hospital, although entirely black-and-white (aside from a pink-tinted dream-sequence towards the conclusion of the film), begins at the present in Gimli, Manitoba hospital where two rather young children (played by Maddin's niece and nephew) are watching their mother die as she listens to 'esoteric noise' aka music on her deathbed. While the dying woman apparently has time to drink a Big Gulp (which rather ridiculously sits by her side), the children's grandmother decide that the kids should leave their momma alone so she can enjoy her music. The Icelandic grandmother decides to tell the children the story of 'Einar the Lonely' (an intrinsically cowardly character that Guy Maddin has admitted is a stand-in for himself) who also stayed at the same hospital long ago in "a Gimli we no longer know" after contracting smallpox. Einar (played by Kyle McCulloch, who, on top of starring in a couple of Maddin's other early films, later went on to become a writer for South Park), a lowly peasant fisher who uses fish guts as shampoo and became deathly ill after carelessly cutting his finger with a pocket knife, succumbs to small pox and is forced to stay at Gimli Hospital, where he meets his large and in charge neighbor Gunnar (Michael Gottli), who has also become badly bedridden due to the illness. The hospital is essentially run by three beautiful and make-up-ridden young nurses (all of whom were actually played by 13-year-old girls) and features a Svengali-like doctor (played by director Guy Maddin himself, who grew a faggy Little Richard-esque mustache for the role) who gives creepy puppet shows (as a sort of sad substitute for morphine and/or anesthesia) while operating on patients, as well as a pseudo-Negro in blackface (also played by Kyle McCulloch) who has a dandy old time blasting away birds with his rifle that happen to be flying around the building. Naturally, Einar becomes a little bit jealous when Gunnar grabs the attention of the cute nymph-like nurses by telling stories from the "Gimli Sagas" (apparently a real book, which was also the original working title for Tales from the Gimli Hospital) involving morbidly merry stories about the corpses of sisters floating on makeshift coffin-rafts and whatnot. To the glee of the nurses, Gunnar also has a keen talent for carving pieces of birch bark into the shape of fishes, so Einar attempts to mimic his neighbor's talents in vain, but no one notices him as if he is a lonely corpse who does not realize he is already dead.

Naturally, things take a turn for the worse when Gunnar borrows Einar's distinctly decorated fish-carving shears and realizes that they are exactly the same pair that he buried his beautiful blonde wife Snjófríður (Angela Heck) with. Gunnar tells Einar the story of his courtship and eventual marriage to Snjófríður, who died after contracting smallpox from her chubby cuckold hubby. Despite the large but smallpox-stricken widow's objections to an an aboriginal death ceremony, Gunnar's native Indian friend John Ramsay (Don Hewak) gave Snjófrídur a traditional Indian burial, which included laying a pair of fish-carving shears next to the corpse. Einar tells Gunnar about how he happened upon the shears, which were at the burial ground of a body of a angelic dead woman who he ultimately had sex with against the cute corpse's will. Of course, the corpse Einar committed necrophilia with was that of Snjófrídur and when Gunnar realizes this he is not too happy, but is far too weak to exact his rightful revenge, but if anything is for sure, it is that the two men have now become enemies. Not long after a fire breaks out at the hospital and is put out with milk, which drips down on Gunnar and somehow blinds him. Meanwhile, the jolly black-faced fellow drops dead and Einar considers slaughtering Gunnar with the same shears buried with Snjófrídur so as to save his own skin from an assumedly brutal revenge. Gunnar also threatens Einar in a superlatively sinister yet strangely homoerotic manner by standing over his bed and grazing his stomach with the same fishing shears. Both Einar and Gunnar, who seems to be both in somnambulist states, exit the hospital for what will be a final showdown between the two enemies. A certain Victorian aristocratic fellow named Lord Dufferin, who was the third Governor General of Canada and who Einar hallucinates is a mythical Fish Princess, is giving a speech and the Shriners Highland Pipe Band are playing a song thus acting as the film's inconspicuous soundtrack, while Gunnar hallucinates various curious images while in a hopelessly hostile and jealous state in a surreal scene that was inspired by a scene from Fritz Lang's film noir classic Scarlet Street (1945) of Edward G. Robinson's character devolving into a homicidal green-eyed monster of sorts. Einar finally gets the testicular fortitude to approach Gunnar when he sees the big bulky beast's shadow, which resembles the iconic scene from F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922) of Count Orlok's shadow climbing up the steps, approaching an innocent little blonde girl in a most malevolent manner. Rather absurdly, Einar and Gunnar engaged in the quasi-homoerotic "Gimli Wrestle" (apparently a real form of Icelandic wrestling), which involves the two men literally playing grab ass and lifting each other until one of the two collapses, and the two men ultimately paw each other's own buttocks until they are bare and bloody as if they were victims of prison rape. In the end, Einar gets well and returns to his fisherman shacks, where he is visited by Gunnar and his new fiancé. Of course, Einar is jealous of his friends new romance because he will forever remain "Einar the Lonely." Tales from the Gimli Hospital returns to the present, where the two children are informed their mother is dead, but luckily their Icelandic grandmother has another old historical story to tell them regarding New Iceland.

In an audio commentary for a DVD release of Tales from the Gimli Hospital, director Guy Maddin stated regarding contemporary Gimli and the decline of Icelandic culture and customs in the community, "The Icelandic gene pool has been watered down to next nothing. When a person with a non-Icelandic surname like me gets to be one of its/this ethnic group's biggest spokespersons you know your ethnicity is in trouble." Indeed, in terms of cinematic and ancestral influences, Maddin thankfully reluctantly lives in the past, thus acting as a sort of last cinematic gasp for both dying/dead cinematic conventions and the Icelandic-Canadian people. To his credit, Maddin refrained from wallowing in philistine sentimentalism with Tales from the Gimli Hospital, neither pretending to truly understand his ancestor's struggles nor glorifying them in a silly and sapless Spielberg-esque manner. Most potent in its fixedly foreboding yet farcical atmosphere, Tales from the Gimli Hospital does certainly deserve the incessant comparisons it has gotten to Lynch's Eraserhead, but Maddin's film more resembles a phantasmagorical fable with tragicomic overtones (as opposed to a mostly dead serious psychological horror piece like Lynch's film) as a work directed by a man who, losing his brother to suicide when he was still a wee lad and losing his father while still a young man, has learned to find absurdity and humility in the most stark and life-changing of human tragedies. Notably, Tales from the Gimli Hospital was actually inspired by a rivalry Maddin had with a friend who dated the same woman as him, later remarking regarding the ordeal that he, rather ridiculously, found himself "quite often forgetting the object of jealousy" and ultimately becoming "possessive of my rival" instead, which the film poignantly portrays in an uniquely unhinged way in regard to the characters Einar the Lonely and Gunnar, two mixed-up men who fight over a dead woman. Like David Lynch with his first feature-length film Eraserhead, Tales from the Gimli Hospital is arguably Guy Maddin's purist and most visceral cinematic work to date as a hallucinatory and hypnotic Heimatfilm of the soul that ultimately acts as probably the most extreme and eccentric example of the director's Icelandic-Canadian peoples' collective unconscious and a rare example of North American Nordic kultur in the age of so-called multiculturalism and American cultural hegemony, where blood and geographical borders are being all the more maliciously despoiled with each passing day. If I never see another Guy Maddin flick that I like again, I will always respect the filmmaker just for Tales from the Gimli Hospital, a postmodern völkisch work that somehow manages to reconcile Weimar-esque cultural degeneracy, traditional oral Icelandic lore, Riefenstahl-esque 'aesthetic fascism,' and Hebraic Vaudevillian minstrel shows, which is indubitably something that had never been achieved, nor will be achieved again by any filmmaker ever again. Probably the only film ever made featuring a bizarre love triangle between two men and a female corpse, Tales from the Gimli Hospital also acts for an audacious (and probably accidental) allegory for not only the death of Icelandic-Canadian culture, but also the Occident in general. Indeed, it is quite telling in regard to the dubious state of contemporary cinema when a modern-day director decides to adopt European cinematic conventions and aesthetics that are well past half a century old as Guy

Maddin did with Tales from the Gimli Hospital, the only film that has managed to make me laugh at a late nineteenth-century smallpox epidemic.

ARCHANGEL

Guy Maddin (1990)

After watching the Canadian auteur filmmaker's extra bizarre and surprisingly gay and pornographic short The Little White Cloud That Cried (2009)—a kaleidoscopic tribute to compulsively campy homo auteur Jack Smith (Flaming Creatures, Normal Love) featuring trannys sucking cock and engaging in surrealist orgies, among other things—I felt it was about time to reexamine some of the earlier and more gritty works of Guy Maddin (The Saddest Music in the World, Brand Upon the Brain!). Considering Maddin's debut feature Tales from the Gimli Hospital (1988) is unequivocally my favorite film directed by the auteur, I naturally decided to re-watch his second feature Archangel (1990), which I found to be equally as obsessively oneiric as obscenely incoherent and convoluted when I first saw the film about a decade ago. Of course, like most of Maddin's films, which are exploding with countless strikingly and singular images and instances of hyper hermetic humor, the film becomes much more coherent and thoroughly enthralling upon subsequent viewings. Naturally, as a work where the central theme is amnesia, the film is an intentionally confusing work that actually manages to induce amnesia and delirium in the viewer, or as auteur Maddin himself once even stated, "ARCHANGEL is a film literally directed by an amnesiac delirious from the strangeness of directing a film." Maybe I have developed a high tolerance for cinematic hermeticism as a result of watching one too many Werner Schroeter flicks, but I found absolutely nothing about the film to be inaccessible upon my recent second viewing. Initially imagined as what Maddin once described in the book Kino Delirium: The Films Of Guy Maddin (2000) by Caelum Vatnsdal as "the most irritating pro-war movie since THE GREEN BERETS," Archangel would ultimately only offend Germans due to its depiction of the Teutonic race as a group of literally bloodthirsty and cannibalistic child-killing 'Huns' and bratwurst-fetisizing sodomites (in fact, in one scene in the film, a creepily kraut soldier forces a bratwurst down another kraut soldier's throat whilst bugging him in the bum). Of course, Maddin's film does not so much feature Teutophobia as it mocks the sort of patently absurd anti-Germanic sentiment featured in Bolshevik flicks like Alexander Dovzhenko's classic anti-kraut agitprop piece Arsenal (1929) and largely forgotten Erich von Stroheim vehicles like Allen Holubar's somewhat gruesome D.W. Griffith rip-off The Heart of Humanity (1918) and The Unbeliever (1918) directed by Alan Crosland (who is probably best known today for The Jazz Singer (1927) starring Al Jolson in his iconic blackface performance), Howard Hawks' Sergeant York (1941) and various films directed by Lewis Milestone (real name Leib Milstein) like All Quiet on the Western Front (1930) and The North Star (1943) aka Armored Attack. Set during the winter of 1919 at the end of the First World War in 'Arkhangelsk' in northwestern Russia in a place where the populous suffers from collective amnesia and is still fighting sinister Huns and poorly dressed Bolsheviks, Maddin's film is a sort of absurdly dark war-romance hybrid featuring an exceedingly eccentric approach to humor that makes the anti-Aryan satire of Charlie Chaplin's The Great Dictator (1940) seem both asinine and philistine in its commie-symph (meta)political satire. Indeed, if one learns anything while watching Maddin's film, it is that Westerners, especially North Americans, seem to have collective amnesia when it comes to not only the anti-German sentiment in cinema (which surely still lives on today in 'Jew porn' like Tarantino's Inglourious Basterds (2009) and David Ayer's Fury (2014)), but the Great War in general.

As one can expect from a Maddin film, Archangel is patently politically incorrect, but due to the director and his co-writer George Toles' obscenely obsessive idiosyncrasies in terms of themes, humor, and aesthetics, very few people, including highly irritable social justice warriors, would have the gall to criticize the film. On top of making a mockery of the way old school Soviet and Hollywood films mocked Germans, the film is also riddled with the filmmaker's various dubious fetishes, including half-naked children in compromised situations. Of course, arguably the most offensive aspect of the film is Maddin's sort of passive-aggressive cynicism when it comes love and death, which are portrayed as things that are no more significant than taking a shit or going to the drug store. Apparently most influenced by the somewhat obscure and certainly strange Pre-Code era flick International House (1933) starring W.C. Fields and featuring Bela Lugosi, which is (in)famous for a scene where scat maestro Cab Calloway sings a song entitled "Reefer Man" in tribute to weed, Maddin's film is nothing if not one of the most absurdly arcane comedies ever made. As described in the film's very first inter-title regarding the time and place of Archangel, "The Northernmost tip of old Imperial Russia. Winter of 1919. The Great War has been over for three months, but no one has remembered to tell those who remain in Archangel." Meanwhile, one-legged Canadian soldier Lt. John Boles (early Maddin regular turned South Park screenwriter/voice-actor Kyle McCulloch) is an amnesiac who is all melancholy because the woman he loves but can barely remember is dead. Boles is on a ship carrying an urn holding the ashes of his lover Iris and right after saying, "Goodbye Iris," the ship's captain grabs the vase and throws it overboard before the protagonist can. It seems the captain thought the urn was a bottle of alcohol, as he is depicted in a previous scene taking a couple bottles of liquor from some passengers and throwing them overboard. Instead of getting mad at the captain for destroying a highly personal 'ceremony,' Boles salutes the man, thus setting the sort of madly mirthful yet melancholic tone of the film.

After opening 'The Dirge of Lt. John Boles' sequence, the film features an intentionally morally outmoded montage on the subject of 'love' that degenerates into considerably hilarious anti-German propaganda featuring an elderly Prussian officer with a giant totenkopf hat surrounded in 'Satanic' flames, a cannibalistic kraut commando chomping on the throat and drinking the blood of an enemy soldier, a couple German soldiers violently destroying ancient paintings and Christian icons, and an Aryan firing squad liquidating a prepubescent Aryan boy that looks like he would make for a satisfactory member of the Hitler Youth. Indeed, while beginning with shots of cute babies juxtaposed with sappy narration like, "Love—what do we know of love? We know a baby loves with all its tiny heart...and is loved in return by hearts as simple and as pure. We know a growing child thrives on love...and with its generous limbs apportions that love to the rest of the world," the montage cuts to shots of genocidal German berserkers juxtaposed with lines like, "Then there is pride or self-love—a malignant vanity, insatiable—the pride of the Teuton [...] Why should such a belligerent urge ravage all that is lovely and right. One must forgive, but a crime against humanity is a crime against god. One must have the discipline to fight for what is right in the Lord's eyes. We must restore peace to his earthly garden...For the love of god." While he barely remembers what country he is from or why he is fighting, Boles is a virtual automaton when it comes to his patriotic soldierly duties, which he will ultimately provide to both the White Russians and a small Russian peasant family.

As described in an inter-title, "Chance leads Boles to billet with a family in need." Indeed, not long after arriving in Archangel, Boles wanders into a random home featuring a Cocteau-esque life-size statue of the Holy Virgin with only eye sitting outside the front door and manages to save the life of a young boy named Geza (David Falkenburg) that has just suffered a seizure by rubbing his body with a horse brush (!) After Boles gets the boy's entire family to rub down the poor lad, the protagonist recommends to his mother Danchuk (Sarah Neville of Madden's Careful (1992)) and "cowardly father" Janning (Michael Gottli of Tales from the Gimli Hospital) that they feed their son horse hair because he thinks the boy might have worms. As a reward for reviving her son, Danchuk gives Boles a prosthetic leg which he proudly describes as being, "An almost perfect fit." When a fairly beautiful nurse-cum-actress named Veronkha (Kathy Marykuca) randomly shows up, Boles mistakes her for his dead beloved Iris and faints. Veronkha was married to a Belgian aviator named Philbin (Ari Cohen of Bruce McDonald's The Tracey Fragments (2007)), but he, not unlike Boles, suffers from amnesia and unwittingly cheated on his wife on their wedding night so she had their marriage annulled. While he forgot the fact he got married on his wedding night, Philbin now thinks everyday is his wedding night (which is described as the, "happiest day of his vague existence"), which greatly pains the terribly lovelorn Veronkha, who complains when he arrives at her home, "Why do you torture me with your presence?" As the film progresses, Boles will not only continue to mistake Veronkha for his dead lover, but the latter will also mistake the former for Philbin.

ARCHANGEL

While he is told by Danchuk and her family that Veronkha is not Iris while chunky coward Jannings gives him a sponge bath, Boles becomes convinced that the Russian beauty is his soulmate and states, "Then I'm saved. She's not dead after all." When Boles is informed that Veronkha will be performing at a White Russian propaganda play that night, the protagonist declares, "I must look like a prince" and has Danchuk's entire family dress him up like a literal prince for the big event where he will be ostensibly reunited with Iris. Before leaving, Boles becomes quite disturbed upon seeing Danchuk beating her son Geza's bare back with a stick after catching him fiddling some war medals, so the protagonist berates the boy's father Janning by asking him, "Isn't it the man's place to discipline a wayward child?" and proceeds to beat the boy himself after asking his mother, "I'm not used to seeing a woman doing a man's job. Would you mind?" After ruthlessly beating Geza like a rabid dog, Boles tells his mother, "He's a good lad. You should be proud of him." As an assumed result of the fact that he is heroic and handsome unlike her much loathed hubby Jannings, Danchuk falls in love with Boles, who seems to reciprocate her feelings to some degree, though she does not compare to Iris or Veronkha. As does oftentimes happen in real-life, the characters in Archangel are hopelessly in love with people they cannot have, with the film's amnesia theme being arguably symbolic for the forgetfulness of the heart when it comes to love.

When Boles arrives at a theater called 'The Illumination,' he is happy to see Veronkha playing 'Mother Russia' in an absurd agitprop adaptation of the ancient Battle of Weseberg of 1268, which is notable in that both sides, the Teutonic Knights and a coalition of Russian princes, would later designate themselves as the victors. Rather absurdly, during the performance, an actor complains, "I'm sorry. I refuse to portray a German," so gentle giant Jannings is recruited to replace him in the role of a "slavering hun" after an announcer calls for "another blonde beast." During the middle of the performance, Philbin, who still thinks it is his honeymoon, goes up on the stage, repeatedly declares, "We'll bait the Huns with our guns and watch the Kaiser roll," and attempts to embrace Veronkha, who violently rejects him. When the announcer requests that a representative of the "Dominion of Canada" come up on the stage, Boles naturally obliges and soon busts Philbin's face in with a rifle butt after he manhandles Veronkha, who he still believes is Iris. While Boles and Veronkha have a short romantic rendezvous with one another where the former asks the latter, "why did you leave me?," because he has mistaken her for Iris, the two never meet the audience's expectation by making love or even making out. After confessing that she kissed him when he passed out earlier in the film, Veronkha hands Boles a large archaic map that Philbin previously gave her and claimed was their marriage certificate. Before leaving his presence, Veronkha encourages Boles to find both her and Iris using the map, which the protagonist most certainly plans to do.

After Boles' somewhat uneventful late night stroll with Veronkha, he walks back to Danchuk's house like a somnambulist, walks on top the roof, and ultimately falls through a window and injures himself. Needless to say, since she is deeply in love with him, Danchuk immediately comes to Boles' aid and embraces him while her coward husband cries like a little baby in bed because he knows that his wifey is in love with the heroic Canadian amnesiac. Of course, with the barbaric Bolshevik hordes soon arriving in Archangel, everyone in the town has to put their obsessive heartbreak on hold and prepare to fight to the death. In a rather bizarre and even somewhat crappy scene that one could only find in a Guy Maddin flick, Boles sleeps naked in bed with Geza, who wakes up in the middle of the night after becoming disturbed to find dozens of (animated) spiders crawling on his little unclad body. The next day, Boles tells Geza to protect his grandma aka 'baba' from the Bolsheviks and when the boy asks what they look like, the protagonist replies, "Oh, they are terrible creatures. Half-man, half beast. They have great big eyes, great big ears, and great big claws." When everyone eventually goes to battle against the Bolshevik beasts, many of the soldiers, including a Congolese negro and Orthodox priest, fall asleep. Naturally, Boles ends up mistaking these sleeping warriors for corpses.

When a couple Bolsheviks break into Danchuk's home and attempt to steal her baby, lard ass sissy Jannings barely has time get up after waking up from a deep sleep before having his large gut slit open by a red savage. While succumbing to his fatal wound, Jannings manages to shed his cowardliness and strangles a Bolshevik with his intestines, thus saving his baby from being eaten by a rabid Marxist maniac. Meanwhile, Boles uses the map given to him by Veronkha to find her and while walking around, he finds various soldiers making love in the snow. When Boles eventually finds Veronkha on the battlefield, she seems to have more of a lust for blood than him (as expressed in comments like, "Your face is so bloody. I feel so alive"), but she eventually comes around and falls in love with protagonist. Indeed, after once again marrying Philbin and heading to a place called Aerodrome airport, Veronkha states to her hubby during mid-flight, "He struck that hateful head of yours in blood, but not enough. You're still alive." Out of anger, Philbin strikes his bride and, as detailed in an intertitle, "As a result of the shock, Veronkha joins her two lovers in forgetfulness. Total amnesia. Boles now has his Iris." Indeed, Veronkha falls for Boles and the two even steal Danchuk's baby thinking it is their own. Meanwhile, little Geza is killed in battle and his ghost is reunited with his father Janning's ghost, who informs him that he died a hero and not a coward after strangling a Bolshevik with his own intestines. As ghosts, father and son have finally developed a deep bond in what is indubitably one of the more 'sweet' and 'sentimental' moments of the film.

Upon seeing her hubby Philbin, Veronkha regains her memory and complains to Boles, "My husband. What have you done? You've made me a prisoner [...]" if you ever touch me again, I'll kill you," thus leaving the protagonist totally destroyed. After his own heart is broken, Boles breaks Danchuk's heart by giving her baby back and making it quite clear to her he has no romantic interest in him. After a kraut blows him up with a bomb reading "Gott Strafe Kanada" on the battlefield, Boles nearly dies and states while melodramatically spitting up blood, "My name is John Boles. I'm in Archangel...fighting a war. I'm trying to find the woman I love. IRIS!" Luckily, a Swiss soldier manages to refurbish Boles' body with some sort of quirky machine, but the protagonist is too late to reunite with Veronkha, who has once again married Philbin and is flying away with him in a plane out of Archangel. In the end, a gang of gorgeous gals kiss Boles, but he is too forlornly lovelorn to give a damn.

In an audio commentary track for a DVD release of Archangel, auteur Guy Maddin describes how the amnesia theme of the film was influenced by his own tendency to forget marriages, promises he made, people that died and other personal things in his life that he probably preferred to forget. As far as aesthetic influences on the theme of amnesia, Maddin names Hitchcock's Vertigo (1958), the romantic melodrama Random Harvest (1942) starring Ronald Colman and Greer Garson, and the Henry Green novel Back (1946). Of course, in terms of imagery, the film owes a lot to pseudo-aristocratic Hebrews Erich von Stroheim and Josef von Sternberg, with the latter's 'evil Hun' archetype being quite prominent throughout the film. In fact, certain Germans found the film to be highly offensive, or as Maddin recounted in the book Kino Delirium, "The movie had its very first screening in Munich, and there's some really good anti-German propaganda in there. I remember a couple of blond beasts at the back of the room putting up their hands in a very rigid manner to get my attention, and asking me if I didn't like Germans very much. I told them 'No, no. I love Germans!' It seemed the prudent thing to say. I was waiting for years for a question about the minstrel [in GIMLI HOSPITAL], but instead here I was getting questioned by Aryans who wanted to know if I liked them or not. I had a more ready answer for any angry minstrels out there than I did for the Aryans."

I got the sense while watching the film that, like most of Maddin's work, Archangel is the expression of a Nordic degenerate who feels completely out of touch with the modern world yet cannot quite truly understand the past 'Eurocentric' world in any innate way, hence his propensity for mocking and satirizing film styles and events of the past while simultaneously paying a strange sort of fan-boy tribute to them. Either way, in his own sort of self-loathing and comically idiosyncratic way, Maddin is arguably the most Nordic of the filmmakers today, but then again, there are not really any other filmmakers who make films with titles like Odin's Shield Maiden (2007) or phantasmagoric yet fetishistic pieces of offbeat postmodern Icelandic folklore like Tales from the Gimli Hospital. Aside from his love of von Sternberg and the classics, as well as seeming disillusionment with romance, Maddin shares a lot in common with the great late Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid due to their seemingly innate rejection of the modern world (notably, while he was still living in Germany with his pal Fassbinder, Schmid was one of the only filmmakers who vocally rejected the counter-culture movement and other vapid 'liberation' movements). Despite Maddin's seeming love of European culture and tradition, Archangel makes not a single reference to the fact that the so-called Russian revolution, which was started mostly by Jews and other 'minorities,' more or less marked the beginning of the end of Old Europa. Indeed, one of the greatest aspects of Maddin's films is that they demonstrate a certain naivety regarding the modern world and all its ugliness, even if his works reflect a certain cynicism when it comes to issues of romance and interpersonal relations. As a work that sends me to a completely otherworldly cinematic universe and helps me forget about the sad joke that is the contemporary Occidental world, Archangel certainly features the sort of amnesia that I and many other old souls need. Undoubtedly, one of Maddin's greatest talents is that he is a true master of escapism and nowhere else in his oeuvre is this more apparent than in his second feature.

Guy Maddin (1992)

Guy Maddin's Careful is no doubt the directors fantasies and obsessions shot on film. I don't think many filmmakers would be interested in making a contemporary German mountain film (genre from the 1920s and 1930s). I couldn't imagine someone taking the genre and adding incest. Only Canadian auteur Guy Maddin would attempt such risky conquests. Careful for me is a very soothing film. Beautiful cinematography, sets, and lighting makes for a dreamlike experience. Various mountain climbing silhouettes are also featured echoing back to the days of Arnold Fanck and mountain films like Holy Mountain (starring master art propagandist Leni Riefenstahl). Guy Maddin is the only filmmaker capable of utilizing almost century old film techniques and giving them new life (Soviet Montage in McDonalds commercials doesn't count). Hand-tinted color sequences also add to the films already vintage aesthetic. Assumed Germanic Alpine village of Tolzbad is where this masterpiece takes place. All animals in this town no longer have their vocal chords as loud noises can (and have) cause deadly avalanches. The actors of the film keep their vocal levels to a quite whisper complimenting their proper linguistic etiquette. Guy Maddin has a very distinct sense of humor. One that would most likely offend most. Careful features a very memorable and complimenting soundtrack. This "jingle" got me excited for each new scene. The overall sound of Careful is low-fi and cracking. Guy Maddin is very specific with each little detail in his films. Thankfully the Canadian government helped Maddin finance the film as very few filmmakers could get away with how personal his films are. Incest, suicide, skinny dipping, snow flurries, and fatherly ghosts are all found in Careful. The film is by far my favorite from Maddin. Careful is a surrealist dream of luscious colors that radiate warmth (in contrast to the films snowy setting). The film makes me wish I grew up in the mountains of Germanic Switzerland 100 years ago.

THE HEART OF THE WORLD

Guy Maddin (2000) A compelling and hectic narrative delivered flawlessly in 6 minutes. Wait, What? Guy Maddin's ode to German Expressionism is starkly one of the best short films of our time. Maddin honors the sanctity of the classic Soviet propaganda films, German Expressionism, and Russian silent films. Brief title cards explain the very thick plot in words and much symbolism is to be poured over. Thanks to the amazing song Time Forward by Georgi Sviridov, the film is complete with a "rushed" feeling of apocalyptic urgency. The odyssey portrayed is one basically left up to interpretation. What I garnered from it - Two rivaling brothers with extremely different career paths both share a love for the same woman. A female scientist, she stares into the core of the earth and notices a metal flesh-pod which has a withering heartbeat. Making the conclusion that the world is dying, she herself must announce it. Chaos explodes. Towns people start conducting orgies and mass alcoholism. The one Brother Osip (Had an acting role as Jesus) becomes a messianic figure to half of the population while the other side factions against him. The two brothers begin a fierce rivalry before the end of the world. In between their feuding comes a Soviet banker who woos the beautifully dead-looking Anna off her feet in a paralyzing trance of greed. Realizing what she's done after giving herself up to him, she kills Capitalism (the banker) and burrows into the center of the earth and becomes the Earth's new heart. Osip's effort to win her stand-alone love was converting the masses into his followers. A bold attempt, I might add. Humble Nikolai's attempt is creating phallic statues erupting from coffins of the dead. A young mortician - he defaces the dead in his version of love expression. Soon the dead appear to come to life after the sacrilegious effort. The world has really gone to hell. Soon after, cinema reigns king as the word KINO is chanted over and over again, announcing a time in which cinema rules all as the new "heart" is projected on everyone's bodies. The principle concept of the woman falling for bags of coins and not love strikes a chord with most women in society. The commentary representing the fact that it's "just a phase" is there, but doesn't make me respect "gold diggers" anymore. Eventually, she sacrifices the idea of "love" in general, denouncing the fact that women can change and are born to be corrupted into puppets. She would just rather not hurting either of the men she loves so much. The styles of film-making Maddin expresses are the best of all eras. He takes a bit from all classics to create a new wave silent propaganda expressionist film; A working bastard fusion attempt at creating art. This film features stunning editing and effects along with an accurate yet gorgeous viewpoint on feminism. The Heart of the World represents a male perspective of the experimental style Maya Deren used. A sure-fire symbolic classic.

BONDAGE GAME
BONDAGE GAME

Hajime T. (2003)

When you think of the words disgusting or brutal in association with film, chances are you are thinking of the Guinea Pig series or Irreversible. After watching this rough and extreme two-chapter hentai, I am now pretty haunted by the display of forbidden sexualities and these images will not leave my head. This animated series has all the anti-virtuous fetishes displayed in the most vulgar and vile of ways. Due to the extreme content of this film, it is impossible to find any appropriate screen shots. When Yuu awakens in a mysterious mansion, she discovers she has no memory of anything and discovers herself in a house of slavery and sodomy. Several females are there with the same situation. Yuu soon realizes that she either pleases every whim of the master or even the men he prostitutes her out too or meet horrific consequences. Part Salo, part Bloodsucking Freaks, this series' intentions is only to disturb and please. There is no doubt that you will feel something while watching this. You will either be aroused by some deep desire, or disgusted and appalled by the events on the screen. Do not expect a discernible ending. You will be left with questions and you will still feel like shit. The fetishes are various and revolting in matter. We have extreme scatology including a scene with the toilet hooked up to various tubes throughout the house hooking in a mouth harness, pumping every bit of defecation into these young girls mouths. We have butt plugs and diaper fetishes. Urination galore and sexual mutilation is the placeholder of most commonly used fetish. The women are eventually given a penis in a sex operation. Some of the fetishes are sarcastic and exaggerated such as when a male customer injects a females breast with something that causes them to grow enormously in size, thus allowing them to fuck her nipples. Tit fuck was never a phrase to be taken seriously. People are bound to be offended. Bondage Game is a bastard orphaned child of Jess Franco's films. Women in Prison has never been filmed so atrociously. Expect about an hour and ten minutes of pure rape and degradation. A film like this is hard to rate per say. I can't say i enjoyed it, but it wasn't bad for what it was, a severe rough misogynist porn. I have no choice but to recommend you to not see it, due to the highly graphic content and ill-fated women being used as a tool; an object.

Hal Ashby (1975)

By most accounts, it seems that Warren Beatty was the most masterfully manipulative male whore working in Hollywood during the 1960s through 1980s, so it is only fitting that one of his greatest acting performances would be as a super slutty stud that knows how to tell women what they want to hear in a film project that he produced, co-penned, and was largely in control of. Indeed, Shampoo (1975) directed by Hal Ashby (The Last Detail, Being There) stars Beatty as a curiously rampantly heterosexual male hairdresser that fucks virtually every single women in his life yet, despite being a flagrant man-whore that probably puts a Thai tranny to shame in terms of moral bankruptcy, the character somewhat ironically has the total opposite mentality as the actor that portrays him as he is a somewhat passive and self-destructive male bimbo that is routinely sexually used by women as opposed to being the scheming user and abuser like the legendary Bonnie and Clyde star. In fact, despite the film being a sexually-charged farce that lampoons the epidemic lechery of Los Angeles bourgeois during the beginning of the end of the so-called sexual revolution, Beatty portrays one of the most pathetic and tragic characters of his career as a perennial pretty boy player that may incessantly pound premium grade posh pussy but he is ultimately too much of a weak and intemperate fuck-up to ever maintain a lasting and meaningful relationship, thus resulting in the sad stud coming to the bitter realization that he will be forced to wander from needy uptight twat to needy uptight twat for eternity. While most other men need lots of cash if they want grade A Hollywood gash, the film's haplessly horny hero does not even need to hunt for cultivated cunt, as he constantly has women practically incessantly rubbing their asses and pussies in his face. Of course, being a virtual gigantic walking and talking hard-on has its quite glaring negative sides as it means most women see you as nothing more than a disposable dildo that can simply be thrown away or washed and used again every so often. As a film set on November 4, 1968 during the election eve before Tricky Dick took the White House, the film naturally has the sort of lame ass mainstream Hollywood white liberal message that one has come to expect for a political retarded hypocritical celebrities like Beatty who seem to believe that getting involved in shallow and superficial dogooder activism will somehow exonerate them for their sinful lives of debauched hedonism and greed, yet thankfully its political message is, at least artistically speaking, secondary to its sardonic assault on the counterculture zeitgeist and sexual liberation. Indeed, instead of blaming the Manson Family for the death of free love and hippie (anti)values like the mainstream media, the film marks the election of Richard Nixon as the date when finally began to give up on their unhinged utopian delusions, though thankfully it also rips vogue bohemian mores to shreds. Somewhat curiously, it should also be noted that one of the most sympathetic characters of the film is a middle-aged conservative businessman who wants to trade in his whore of a wife for a much younger and fresher piece of high maintenance female flesh.

Undoubtedly, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, aspect of Shampoo is its fiercely farcical critique of the so-called fairer sex, which is depicted as trading in motherhood and marriage for senseless hedonism and unofficial prostitution, among other less than noble things that tend to be typical of many contemporary post-feminist broads in the West. Indeed, not only does the film make women seem more sexually voracious and shameless than men, but it also takes place in a sort of Hollywood high-dollar whore microcosm where every single female character engages in hypergamy and is with a man simply because of the size of his bank account, with the lead protagonist being innately incapable of keeping a woman around because he refuses to settle down and make something out of himself. Despite the film's sometimes absurd tone, it was actually based on various real-life characters in Hollywood, as co-writer Betty and Robert Towne based the story on Ashby's then-wife Joan Marshall's Hollywood friends (considering how recklessly lecherous the women in the film are, it should be no surprise that Marshall died of AIDS related causes in 1992). In fact, Marshall, who has a small role in the film, was so upset about how her friends were depicted in her hubby's flick that it more or less ruined her marriage with Ashby and friendships with Betty and Towne. Of course, as Shampoo clearly demonstrates, marriages in Hollywood are about as sacred as a bowel movement, so I doubt that Ashby—a lapsed Mormon and pathological pothead that had a curious fetish for tall and flat-chested blondes—considered it much of a loss.

Somewhat charitably described by puffery-plagued fangirl Pauline Kael—a well known starfucker that was regularly courted by Betty and Towne at the time (as Betty's bud Buck Henry once stated, "Towne had Kael wrapped around his finger")—as a sort of reworking of both Jean Renoir's classic comedy of manners The Rules of the Game (1939) and Ingmar Bergman's arthouse sex-comedy Sommarnattens leende (1955) aka Smiles of a Summer Night, Shampoo is a sort of satirical tragicomedy disguised as a risqué counterculture romp where so-called 'free love' is ultimately revealed to have a hefty emotional and even metaphysical price, even if you're a morally challenged male bimbo. Borrowing its general storyline from William Wycherley's anti-puritan Restoration comedy The Country Wife (1675) about a rake that pretends he is impotent so that a group of married gentlemen will not be suspicious of the fact that he is fucking their wives, Ashby's film follows a lovably dopey and compulsively charismatic yet hopelessly dysfunctional and self-destructive dimestore Don Juan that works as a hairdresser who pretends he is a homo so that a potential business partner does not suspect that he is screwing his wife, mistress, and even daughter, among various other lecherous ladies that make up a conspicuously cunt community of rich Los Angeles bitches that think it is perfectly fine to engage in adultery to get the much needed sexual thrills that their opulent yet less than orgasmically sound sad-sack-of-shit cuckold spouses lack. In short, the wicked yet wanton women featured in the film use their cunts like currency and the only man that gets to penetrate their pussies for free is a buffoonish Beverly Hills male bimbo who knows how to satisfy a woman with his famous gravy-giver. As if he has some sort of magical erotic powers that distinguish him from all other men, the hairdresser protagonist merely has to touch a woman's hair to let her know that he can cause various eruptions of ecstasy in her spunk-pot. Indeed, the character might be a piece of shit who has no qualms about fucking men over by routinely fucking their wives, but he also might be the only flagrant womanizer in cinema history that the viewer comes to feel sorry for, thus underscoring Beatty's singular talent for emotional manipulation and seduction.

As Paul Schrader once stated regarding Beatty and his mastery of manipulating females, "If she was a twenty-two-year-old starlet, he would get her in one way. If she was a sixty-year-old film critic, he would get her another way." In that sense, Beatty is a lot different from the character he portrays in Shampoo, as the protagonist has a fairly one-dimensional agenda and is pretty much interested in only one thing: warm, wet vagina. While the less than heroic hairdresser claims that he dreams of owning his own beauty salon (which might as well be a one-man gigolo brothel), one suspects that he is not even really serious about that, or at least that is what the viewer is led to believe as a result of his incessantly reckless behavior. Notably, the film stars Beatty's then-longtime-girlfriend Julie Christie in an unforgettable performance where it is quite clear that her chemistry with her lover was still quite intact, even if the actor dumped his beloved for Mamas & the Papas member turned actress Michelle Phillips during production. As a proud feminist of sorts, Christie naturally loathed the film's script and only agreed to star in the film as a favor to her best beau. While Beatty was used to everyone kissing his ass, Christie had no problem telling him he was a hack that created garbage films, or as Peter Biskind reveals in Easy Riders, Raging Bulls (1998) in regard to what the actress said to her ex-beau while they were filming an important scene in Heaven Can Wait (1978), "in the film, romantic music is swelling up on the soundtrack, drowning out their conversation, wherein Christie was saying, in her clipped British accent, 'I can't believe you're still making these fucking dumb movies when, I mean, there are people all over Europe making fabulous films, about real things, Fassbinder and so on, and you're still doing this shit,' and then she'd smile at him as if she had honey on her tongue."

As far as I am concerned, Christie was completely right as Beatty is more of a devilishly charming opportunist than a serious artist and the films he later personally directed (e.g. Reds (1981), Bulworth (1998)) reveal him to be the worst sort of deracinated and clinically narcissistic WASP white liberal traitor who has led the way for the cultural, moral, and racial decline of the United States, yet

Shampoo is the one film where I will give him his due as a true auteur, even if he was not actually credited as the director. While he originally planned to direct the film himself, he was concerned about the fact he had no directing experience, so he eventually opted to contract a passive director-for-hire that he could control, or as Biskind speculated as to why the actor ultimately chose Ashby, "Beatty knew him slightly, and liked him. Ashby was a stoner; he smoked dope morning, noon, and night. Not only did this not bother Beatty, it may have been a plus, since it would quickly become apparent that he did not intend to let Ashby do much in the way of directing, anyway." Indeed, Beatty had so much control over the film that there were times during production that he actually kicked Ashby off his own set, but of course it all worked out in the end as Shampoo is easily one of the Harold and Maude director's greatest and most iconoclastic films. While the film might not feature an eccentric love affair between a young wealthy suicidal wuss and an eccentric elderly Holocaust survivor like in Ashby's overrated cult flick, it features more irresistible ingredients like Ms. Christie talking about how great of a cocksucker she is and Carrie Fischer accusing Beatty of being a fag, among other things.

As a man that has penetrated an eclectic assortment of famous fancy-bits, including those belonging to Natalie Wood and her elder sister Lana, Isabelle Adjani, Cher, Twiggy, Madonna, Brigitte Bardot, Princess Elizabeth of Yugoslavia, Vanessa Redgrave, Daryl Hannah, Jane Fonda, Margaux Hemingway, JFK's widow Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, Brigitte Bardot, Maria Callas, and Liv Ullmann, among countless others, Beatty does not exactly seem like he has the appropriate credentials for what might be described as a stereotypical misogynist, but Shampoo certainly indicates otherwise and reveals the actor turned auteur to be a fellow whose contempt for the minds and habits of women is only transcended by his love for their cooters and hooters. Indeed, arguably the closest thing to a cinematic equivalent to German-American sage H.L. Mencken's classic ironically titled text In Defense of Women (1918) in terms of being a magnificent piece of satirical American misogyny that takes a rather suave and stylish approach to mocking the vainest, most materialistic and morally bankrupt of female creatures, the film manages to expose many rather unflattering aspects of the so-called fairer sex via a seductive brand of satire that demonstrates why Beatty is one of the most talented glorified hustlers to have worked in Hollywood. While annoying mischling Jewess Carly Simon may have been able to get her revenge against Beatty with the uniquely obnoxious song "You're So Vain," the actor-cum-auteur effortlessly assaults every-women-he-has-ever-fucked-and-then-some with Shampoo, which is a film that ultimately reveals that women are just as untrustworthy and duplicitous in the bedroom as they are in pretty much every other aspect of their social lives and that, if it were up to them, women would have at least two male companions: a happily cuckolded perennial bank to pay for stupid shit like shoes and a sort of human-dildo to satisfy insatiable sexual needs. Of course, as the film rather rudely and crudely yet nonetheless somehow eloquently reveals, most women prefer to marry an old and sexually pathetic cuckold than a handsome hunk with big junk, as material wealth and security always trumps true love and sexual satisfaction for most chicks, especially glacial bourgeois broads. In short, Shampoo depicts a world where women are fully exposed and not wearing their very carefully applied figurative makeup.

To go back to Mencken, he once delightfully defined a 'misogynist' as, "A man who hates women as much as women hate one another," though there are a couple scenes in Shampoo, namely a feud between character played by Julie Christie and Lee Grant (as well as Grant versus by a rather nubile Princess Leia, who portrays her busty yet bitchy daughter), that hint that women actually hate each other more than any heterosexual man ever could. Naturally, a Hollywood Casanova like Beatty that spends a lot of time in the company of needy hot chicks that are used to getting whatever they want is likely to form some sharply negative opinions of women as a whole, or like the great Viennese anti-Semite semite Otto Weininger once noted, "No men who really think deeply about women retain a high opinion of them; men either despise women or they have never thought seriously about them." Undoubtedly, Beatty and his kosher co-writer Towne (who was the actor's longtime bitch and was even described by mutual friends as Beatty's "shadow" since he followed him around everywhere) spent a lot of time philosophizing on the curious habits and psychology of female kind during the eight long years that they spent writing (and constantly rewriting) the screenplay and thankfully the results are devastatingly hilarious, especially in regard to their incendiary insights in regard to the power of pussy and the oftentimes preposterously petty behavior of those individuals that have one. For instance, in its depiction of a group of women who only seem to think about fucking and/or hating a certain fellow that they believe has fucked them over, the film recalls Weininger's keen observation, "Woman is neither high-minded nor low-minded, strong-minded nor weak-minded. She is the opposite of all these. Mind cannot be predicated of her at all; she is mindless. That, however, does not imply weak-mindedness in the ordinary sense of the term, the absence of the capacity to 'get her bearings' in ordinary everyday life. Cunning, calculation, 'cleverness', are much more usual and constant in the woman than in the man, if there be a personal self end in view. A woman is never so stupid as a man can be." Unquestionably, Beatty's character personifies this specific male stupidity that Weininger speaks of, as he has the potential to totally reinvent his life and become very rich yet lacks the self-discipline it takes to keep his pecker in his pants long enough not to fuck the wife, mistress, and daughter of the nice and generous businessman that could give him everything he needs to achieve his goals. Likewise, the conservative businessman played by Jack Warden suffers from his own form of male stupidity, as he is somehow totally oblivious to the fact that his wife is carrying on a lurid love affair with the protagonist even though he himself has a mistress and thus should be aware of some of the general warning signs of adultery. Unflattering depictions of both genders aside, Shampoo also demonstrates that men and women truly cannot live with or without one another, especially when the pesky crippling emotion of love is involved.

Beginning with a nearly pitch black domestic lovemaking scene that would later be put to abject shame by Aryan Kaganof's nihilistic romance The Mozart Bird (1993) in terms of lack of visual clarity where the viewer listens as a cheating rich bitch named Felicia Karpf (Lee Grant) forcefully tells protagonist George Roundy (Beatty) how to move his member so that she can best reach sexual climax, Shampoo immediately establishes a biting raunchy yet delicious romp tone that is made all the more joyously humorous by its inclusion of the classic Beach Boy song "Wouldn't It Be Nice," though this same tune will be put to ironic use when it appears again during the film's surprisingly sad and bitterly melancholic conclusion. Marvelous man-whore George—a character that was apparently inspired by real-life Hollywood hairdresser Jay Sebring who, with his ex-girlfriend Sharon Tate, was infamously brutally slaughtered by the Manson Family during the summer of 1969—is a seemingly lucky man with a distinctly unmanly job who has a steady flow of premium grade posh pussy, even though he is technically in a relationship with a borderline braindead blonde bimbo model named Jill (Goldie Hawn), who is so dumb and childlike that she is fully willing to accept all of her serial cheater boy toy's rather lazy lies and cheesy compliments. In fact, at the beginning of the film, George is so preoccupied with pussy that he has to bullshit his way out of leaving his own apartment just so that he can see his girlfriend because hyper horny human feline Felicia seems to suffer the delusional that she is the only one that he is currently fucking. While Felicia seems like a dumb bitch that only cares about her hair and her hairdresser, she is certainly right when she remarks to George that his "problem" is that he "knows too many sick ladies." Of course, George is sick too, but that is just not a fact that he is willing to recognize because if he has anything to be proud of in his life, it is that he has fucked every single woman he knows, or so he proudly explains to his girlfriend after he is forced to come clean about his debauchery towards the end of the film.

Although it is never made exactly clear why George and Jill are even in a relationship with one another since the two are never even depicted fucking, the viewer suspects that the protagonist is with her simply because she is too dumb and naïve to even consider that she is in a relationship with an unrepentant womanizer that has literally nothing to offer her except phony shallow compliments like "you're great" and ludicrous excuses about how he one day plans to get his shit together and open up his own super chic beauty salon. Indeed, as the film clearly reveals, George was dumped by past girlfriends due to his incapacity to settle down and get serious about his life. In fact, Jill's best friend is George's ex-girlfriend Jackie Shawn (Julie Christie), who states regarding her reason for dumping the protagonist and later getting with an old and less than sexually appealing businessman, "It's really great to wake up in the morning with your rent paid. I'm afraid George was just too much of a gypsy for me." After wising up and realizing that intense multiple orgasms do not pay the bills, Jackie got herself a rather conveniently unwitting conservative businessman sugar daddy named Lester Karpf (Jack Warden), who also happens to be the much resented husband of George's MILF mistress Felicia. Ultimately, the main plot of the film is ignited when Felicia makes the unwittingly foolish mistake of offering to hook up her fuck-boy George with her hubby Lester as a potential business partner for a beauty salon, thus leading to the protagonist being inadvertently reunited with his great old flame Jackie. Of course, as soon becomes quite clear to the viewer, George and Jackie are still very much in love with one another. Indeed, if there is one pussy that George would be willing to settle on for the rest of his life, it is Jackie. As for Jackie, she is a rapidly aging beauty that values security most and thus seems to love money more than George, but that does not stop her from potentially risking everything by riding the protagonist's seemingly world famous fuckstick.

As many other ordinary men would also probably assume, Lester assumes George is a gay boi upon first meeting him since he is a fashionably dressed longhaired hairdresser who asks him for money to start his very own hair salon. Since it is November 4, 1968 on the eve of the presidential election, businessman Lester plans to attend a Republican Party election night soiree and he wants ostensible homo George to escort his mistress Jackie to the event since his wife Felicia will also be attending. As demonstrated by her venomous remark, "Oh, I just can't wait to see Lester with me and that cunt in the same room," Jackie seems especially excited about the Nixon party as she will finally get the opportunity to confront her equally connivingly cunt rival, but of course the event turns out to be a abject disaster for all those involved. Before the big night, George reacquaints himself with Jackie and makes it quite clear that he is not happy with her new beau by remarking, "I don't fuck anybody for money. I do it for fun," thus underscoring the innate differences between the sexes in general. When the two finally get done expressing their long festering post-breakup resentment towards one another, George eventually agrees to go to Jackie's house to do her hair since it makes her look like a "hooker." As can be expected from two ex-lovers who are still very much attracted to each another, it does not take long before George and Jackie proceed to reacquaint their genitals with one another, but Lester unwittingly cock-blocks the protagonist by randomly showing up at his mistress' humble abode with a present. While George pretends to act extra faggy so that George is not suspicious since the businessman walks in on them while his mistress is wearing nothing but a small towel, the ex-lovers will be considerably less lucky after they both get drunk later that night. Needless to say, it will not be the last time George and Jackie risk getting caught literally with their pants down.

Naturally, as a considerably cute young woman whose boyfriend never fucks her and is constantly hanging around other women, Jill begins having serious doubts about her relationship with George. At one point, Jill even casually expresses an interest in having children by randomly remarking, "You know what I read in COSMOPOLITAN? If you don't have a baby before you're 30, you'll have a Mongolian idiot," but George simply ignores what she says and changes the subject. When Jill is offered an important photo shoot job that will require her to be away in Egyptian for weeks, she cannot decide if she wants to accept the assignment since it would mean that she would have to be away from George for such a long period of time. Needless to say, when George expresses total disinterest with the fact that she might be away for a couple weeks, Jill serious doubts about their rapidly stagnating relationship only get worse. Unbeknownst to Jill, George has similar concerns about the future of their relationship, as he confesses to Jackie in a somewhat pathetic fashion, "I don't know... I can sense these things. She needs to be with somebody that can take care of her." When Jill eventually decides to verbally berate George for his incessant immature behavior and lack of reliability, the protagonist completely breaks down and confesses to her while on the verge of tears, "You're right. I just want us to have a normal life, like everybody else. Jesus, I just can't take it anymore. All I want is to get up early, run my own business...take you out to a movie on the weekend. I'm trying, honey. I just can't get out of my own way." While Jill is moved by George's rare moment of impassioned vulnerability and attempts to comfort him by lovingly caressing his body, her attitude soon changes when she subsequently finds a female earring in his bed and thus assumes her beau is banging some other dumb babe. At this point, Jill begins considering dating a dorky commercial director named Johnny Pope (actor, director, and producer Tony Bill) who will conveniently be working on the same Egyptian photo shoot that she has been offered. Indeed, Jill may be a hopelessly infantile shit-for-brains dingbat with the emotional and intellectual maturity of a hyper sensitive toddler, but like many women she is already preparing the way for a new boyfriend before she even dumps her current one.

Before the big Republican party, George stops by the luxurious Karpf mansion for a quick fuck with Felicia and he finds himself mounting her extremely nubile (and assumedly underage) daughter Lorna (Carrie Fisher in her film debut) instead. Indeed, almost immediately after first meeting little Lorna, whose nipples are noticeably quite hard, she begins baiting him by asking him highly evasive questions like "Are you gay?" and "Are you queer?" and by stating extremely degrading things like, "Do you have a thing about older women? That's sort of faggoty, isn't it? [...] Beverly Hills hairdresser. You might as well be a faggot." Of course, being a perennial peacemaker that avoids conflict at all costs, especially when it comes to delectable dames, George practically begs Lorna like a sensitive toddler, “Can’t we just be friends?” to which the inordinately feisty teenage replies after thinking for a moment, “Ok. You want to fuck?” Naturally, George cannot turn down those large teenage titties, so he engages in a little bip-bam-thank-you-ma’am lechery with Lorna in her bedroom. Needless to say, when Felicia finally gets home and realizes that her big bosomed daughter has just gotten banged by her personal fuck toy, she decides to get her revenge against her pernicious progeny by immediately fucking George while the doors to her bedroom are open so that everyone in the house can hear their inter-generational humping. Now that he has already fucked his wife and daughter behind Lester’s back, it is only natural that George eventually concludes the day by screwing the businessman’s prized mistress.

In what ultimately proves to be a majorly moronic move that reveals that he does not really care about his beloved, George agrees to allow Jill to bring Johnny Pope as a date to the Republican dinner, thus giving his girlfriend the opportunity to bond with the mensch who will soon be her new boyfriend. As soon as they arrive at the event, Jackie immediately begins drinking and hitting on George, who tries his damndest to keep the peace while acting like a pathetic little groveling ponce. When Lester finds himself in the supremely awkward situation of having to introduce his mistress to his wife, the negative feminine energy practically engulfs the entire room and both Jackie and her rival Felicia begin individually expressing their hatred for the hapless businessman while the protagonist tries in vain to keep the almost murderously jealous women happy. When the dinner eventually begins, an elderly Jewish businessman of the shamelessly sleazy sort named Sid Roth (Hebraic schlockmeister William Castle) attempts to hit on Jackie by telling her that he could get her whatever she wants. Naturally, the sleazy semite is somewhat taken aback when Jackie points to George and states, “Most of all...I’d like to suck his cock.” At this point, Jackie demonstrates that she has lost all control by asking George, “Who’s the greatest cocksucker in the world?” and then proceeding to attempt to prove that she is the international champion of cocksucking by going under the dinner table and beginning to suck the protagonist off in front of all of the party guests. Naturally, when Lester notices this, he tells George to immediately escort Jackie from the building, but before he can the horny heroine informs her sugar daddy that he is a “phony asshole.” Rather absurdly, Lester somehow does not realize that George is not actually gay even after Felicia gives him head under the dinner table, but luckily the protagonist will make it quite clear that he is far from a limp-wristed cum-guzzling queer later that night.

After the decidedly disastrous Republican dinner, George and Jackie head to a gigantic Bacchanalian orgy of a party that is full of voluptuous unclad hippie chicks covered in crude body-paint, super fly dope-smoking Jimi Hendrix wannabes, exceedingly effeminate white hippie wimps, and other counterculture rabble that seem to think that listening to the Beatles while smoking and drinking is a revolutionary act (indeed, during this scene, "Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds" rather fittingly plays loudly in the background). After mutually admiring the legs and asses of some nude chicks, Jackie reveals to George that she always used to get mad at him when they were together because, as she confesses to the somewhat surprised protagonist, "you're always so happy...about everything. I found it rather unrealistic." Upon entering a small guest house away from the party, George breaks down and states to Jackie, "We're kidding ourselves. You know, last night I had a dream. I was 50 years old...and I was supposed to meet Jill at the shop. Boy, it scared the hell out of me. I can't imagine being with Jill when I'm 50 years old. I can't imagine not being with you." Needless to say, the two begin to make love in what is undoubtedly the most passionate sex scene in the entire film. Unfortunately, Lester, Jill, and Johnny end up going to the same party and all three of them happen to catch George and Jackie sharing carnal knowledge. Indeed, when Lester sees George and Jackie having sex, he initially does not realize who they are, so he gestures for Jill and Johnny to watch while crudely remarking, "That's what I call fucking. Am I right or am I right?" Of course, the three eventually realize it is George and Jackie and Jill reacts by immediately leaving the party with her new beau Johnny, but not before throwing a chair through a window and hatefully calling her (ex)lover a, "bastard" and "son of a bitch." After trying and failing to chase Jill down, George ultimately leaves the party alone on his motorbike after Jackie also leaves without him. Had George not betrayed her by leaving her naked and vulnerable in the guest house while he was chasing after Jill, Jackie might have possibly considered getting back with the protagonist, but he is an eternal fuck-up and loser that somehow manages to always make the wrong decision in every single situation.

The next morning when George finally gets home to his dirty apartment, he is quite startled to find Lester and two thug bodyguards in fancy suits waiting for him. Somewhat surprisingly, George manages to get out of the potentially highly deleterious situation without getting his ass beat after coming clean and more or less telling Lester the truth. While Lester fears that he has something personally against him or that he is some anti-establishment degenerate that hates businessmen, George manages to calm most of his fears and insecurities by explaining that he did not plan to fuck Jackie. In fact, in the one insistence during the conversation where the protagonist seems to be lying, George even foolishly tells Lester that Jackie genuinely cares about him and that she is not just some cheap tramp that is simply using him for his money, thus giving the old businessman the incentive to rekindle things with her (indeed, Lester may be cheating on his wife, but he does seem to greatly love and care about Jackie, hence why he is willing to believe George's lie). George also gives Lester so much needed advice about women and how all they think about his how some guy fucked them over, stating, "That's all that's on their minds. That's all I ever hear about [...] Face it, we're always trying to nail them and they know it. They don't like it. They like it and they don't like it." At this point, it becomes quite clear for the first time that George does not exactly love and respect women as the viewer might have originally assumed. Indeed, George may be a sexual stud, but he is hardly an authentic alpha-man, as he is essentially a weak pussy-addicted moron that is not beneath groveling to members of the opposite sex who long ago realized that catering to female insecurities was the quickest way to get a woman in bed. While somewhat goofy, Lester, who is indubitably George's exact opposite, is a real alpha-male as a self-made businessman and born go-getter who is not afraid to grab life by the balls and achieve his goals, hence why he, and not the all-too-passive protagonist, ultimately walks away with Jackie in the end. When George decides to pay Jill a visit, she predictably tells him that their long disintegrating relationship is over and then sternly demands to know how many women he cheated on her with since she believes it will help her "help" because she'll then know for sure that he's "incapable of love." After stuttering for a brief moment, George gets the gall to triumphantly boast to Jackie, "Let's face it. I fucked them all. I mean, that's what I do. That's why I went to beauty school. I mean, they're always there, and [...] I don't know what I'm apologizing for. So sometimes I fuck them [...] It makes me feel like I'm gonna live forever [...] I don't have any regrets [...] maybe that means I don't love them. Maybe it means I don't love you, I don't know. Nobody's gonna tell me I don't like them very much." While George does not seem particularly heartbroken about his breakup with Jill, he unfortunately does indeed seem to love Jackie. When George randomly shows up at Jackie's house, she begs him to leave and then decides to get in her car and drive away when he refuses. In what is indubitably one of the weakest and most lackluster yet strangely passionate and heartwarming chase scenes in cinema history, George speeds after Jackie on his motorbike until the two eventually symbolically end up at a dead-end on a small cliff overlooking her neighborhood. While George immediately emotionally declares his love and devotion for Jackie and explains how he will do anything for her, she tells him in a sincerely somber fashion that "It's too late" because she is leaving very soon to go to Acapulco with Lester and that they plan to be married since the businessman has finally left Felicia. At this point, George begs while on the verge of tears, "Please, honey. I don't trust anybody but you," but Jackie simply embraces him for a second while crying and then quickly leaves to go meet Lester back at her house. In the end in what is a somewhat surprisingly melancholic lovesick conclusion, George stands on the edge of the cliff overlooking Jackie's house and watches as his great love leaves with Lester. Of course, if one considers that George was apparently partly based off of real-life Manson Family victim Jay Sebring, the conclusion of the film seems all the gloomier and disheartening. It should also be noted that the film comes full circle in the end and concludes with same exact Beach Boys song that it begins with. Of course, considering the merry optimistic lyrics of “Wouldn’t It Be Nice,” the image of George staring into what seems to be eternity as he bitterly confronts his harsh reality of his midlife despair seems all the more poignant, as he will never be able to achieve what these seemingly simple and old-fashioned desires express: “Wouldn’t it be nice if we were older, Then we wouldn’t have to wait so long...And wouldn’t it be nice to live together, In the kind of world where we belong [...]Wouldn’t it be nice if we could wake up, In the morning when the day is new...And after having spent the day together, Hold each other close the whole night through [...]We could be married, And then we’d be happy.” Indeed, in the end, George finally comes to realize that his life has reached its peak and that the best he can hope for is that he will be able to maintain his position as a virtual bourgeois gigolo for another decade or so before his handsomeness evaporates and his sexual potency fizzles.

While nowhere near as popular and influential nowadays, Shampoo was so popular and successful upon its release that it inspired a typically pathetic blaxploitation rip-off entitled Black Shampoo (1976) aka Sex at the Salon directed by exploitation hack Greydon Clark (Without Warning, Skinheads). Considering its almost shockingly unflattering depiction of women and various sleazy Jewish caricatures (e.g. William Castle as ‘Sid Roth’), there is certainly no way that such a playfully incendiary and iconoclastic film could be made in Hollywood nowadays and, in that sense, I feel it is more important (not to mention more clever and thoughtful) than popular ‘American New Wave’ classics like The Graduate (1967), Head (1968), Alice’s Restaurant (1969), Easy Rider (1969), and even *M*A*S*H* (1970), and I say that as someone that generally loathes Beatty. In fact, before watching the film, I assumed it would be the most insufferable sort of mindless and would-be-hip celluloid counterculture crud, yet it ultimately proved to be one of the most mirthfully misogynistic films ever made and a rare example where Beatty’s shameless and seemingly sociopathic charming talents have resulted in something truly positive and artistically merited. As a special added bonus, the film also manages to highlight the fact that the dubious spirit that inspired the so-called ‘Summer of Love’ had completely burned out and that the only thing left of that zeitgeist were the self-destructive qualities like meaningless sex, drug addiction, and vulgar fashion senses. Of course, with his largely shallow and soulless Mercedes Marxist movies like the epically banal pseudo-Lean-esque bolshevik melodrama Reds, Beatty would ultimately prove that he was more interested in narcissistic virtue signaling and phony political posturing than actually contributing something new and intriguing to the art of cinema. Considering Beatty’s greatest talent was conning extremely rich, beautiful, and powerful women into helping him further his career and allowing him to invade their naughty bits, it is only natural that his greatest artistic achievement would be creating a film that proves that women are just as shameless and sexually voracious as men, though the fact that their greatest currency is their cunts means that they have to use it wisely lest they get stuck in a relationship a man who can only offer them orgasms and lazy excuses. To Beatty's credit, quite unlike his character in Shampoo, he eventually gave up womanizing, married and had four children with Annette Bening, and unequivocally demonstrated that his family was more important to him than his singular career in Hollywood.

Considering her shallow feminist pretenses and initial moral opposition to even being in the film (notably, when her career began to fizzle out, she appeared in Sally Potter's low-budget feminist experimental drama The Gold Diggers (1983)), I find it especially satisfying that Julie Christie gives arguably one of the greatest performances in her career in Shampoo and that her real-life ultimately proved to be similarly soulless to that of her character. Indeed, like so many brainwashed beauties of her era, Christie is barren childless woman who decided having a career and various unreliable boyfriends like Beatty was more important than reproducing her clearly excellent genetics. While I might be a man and thus lack maternal instincts, I find very few things sadder than when a beautiful, intelligent, and/or otherwise talented woman neglects to reproduce and pass on her legacy, especially considering the fact that we live in a decidedly dysgenic world where corrupt Western government subsidize the existences of alien untermenschen that breed like rats and only exist largely due to Occidental medicine and the involuntary generosity of mostly white taxpayers that typically cannot afford to have that many kids themselves. In that sense, Christie's role as the highly successful yet severely unhappy eponymous sexpot who suffers the eternal regret of having an abortion and cannot seem to find a decent man in John Schlesinger's scathing satire Darling (1965) seems to have been eerily prophetic. Of course, one must also give credit to Beatty for getting his proud feminist girlfriend to savagely salaciously state that she wants to suck his cock in a movie that millions of people would ultimately see. Not surprisingly, Beatty did not just exploit his then-girlfriend as he was prone to suavely harass all of the women he worked with, including sensitive virgins, or as revealed in Biskind's Star: How Warren Beatty Seduced America (2010) in regard to the Hollywood star's behavior on the Shampoo set, "Carrie Fisher had her own problems [...] She remembered that as the producer, Beatty would do whatever he wanted with her, ask her to try on this bra, that bra, no bra. She felt he was just messing with her, treating her like a doll. Even though she felt objectified, she found it hard to be offended because Beatty's manner was so playful. He was having fun, if she wasn't. Beatty teased her for being a virgin in front of the crew and cast, embarrassing her, making her feel like a moron. She recalled, 'He offered to relieve me of the huge burden of my virginity. Four times.'" Although I am not a professional psychologist, the above description of Beatty suggests that he might suffer from some serious form of narcissistic personality disorder, but of course that is ultimately what makes him so intriguing and what makes Shampoo especially enthralling. After all, while it is obvious to anyone that has a brain and is not a social justice warrior that Beatty's insufferably lame pseudo-altruistic leftism activism was nothing more than moral posturing and a patently pathetic publicity stunt to obscure the fact that he is one of the most supremely self-centered and narcissistic leading men of cinema history, the film is a rare look at the real man, whose womanizing goes hand-in-hand with his covert misogyny. As Shampoo reveals, not all woman-haters are virginal wimps that jerk off to Sapphic Hentai in their grandmother's basement, as there is a somewhat rarer pedigree of misogynist of the alpha-stud oriented sort that has no problem exploiting female weaknesses and insecurities just so that he can get to that special warm and wet place in between her legs.

As the great Teutonic philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer once wrote in his classic essay On Women (1851) regarding the innate immaturity of the fairer sex, "The nobler and more perfect a thing is, the later and slower it is in arriving at maturity. A man reaches the maturity of his reasoning powers and mental faculties hardly before the age of twenty-eight; a woman, at eighteen. And then, too, in the case of woman, it is only reason of a sort – very niggard in its dimensions. This is why women remain children their whole life long; never seeing anything but what is quite close to them, cleaving to the present moment, taking appearance for reality, and preferring trifles to matters of the first importance [...] In their hearts women think that it is men's business to earn money and theirs to spend it – if possible during their husband's life, but, at any rate, after his death. The very fact that their husband hands them over his earnings for purposes of housekeeping strengthens them in this belief." Of course, things have gotten much worse in the West since Schopenhauer originally wrote these words, as women still expect their husband's earnings but are less apt to clean the house or plop out a kid or two, as man-made (emphasis on "man") technology and birth control have given them the power to artificially survive on their own without the need of a man, thus instilling them with a completely delusional sense of independence and self-confidence (which of course is further compounded by feminist brainwashing) that has influenced them to make greater demands of men while at the same time completely neglecting traditional female duties, hence the surplus of single childless women in their mid-20s through 40s who have fucked too many men and who have become too insatiable in their material greed and quest for optimum personal comfort to ever become decent wives or mothers. While Schopenhauer, who had no problem carrying on carnal affairs with street urchins and prostitutes despite his intellectual prowess and cultivated background, paints a rather unflattering portrait of women in his essay, Shampoo more or less makes women seem like sexually savage social parasites that, whether it be sex or wealth, see men as a means to an end and nothing more. In short, one should not feel too bad about fucking another man's wife or girlfriend, as the woman certainly does not, but then again, if you're like me, you would avoid such lecherous ladies at all costs. In fact, if you are interested in a woman and want to audit her for moral defects, it might be a wise idea to have her watch Ashby's film and then have a conversation with her about the characters and their behavior. Needless to say, if she describes Beatty's character as a "stud" or Christie's character as "chic" or "empowered," run for the hills!

THE SIMPLE-MINDED MURDERER
THE SIMPLE-MINDED MURDERER

Hans Alfredson (1982)

Undoubtedly, if any Nordic nation has all but totally turned its back on Allfather Odin and replaced him with innately alien slave-morality-driven atheistic humanism and has ultimately been hit the worst by the terminal metaphysical disease of liberalism, it is Sweden. With their most popular contemporary films being the superficially sadomasochistic man-hating crime film trilogy based on the "Millennium series" written by commie feminist cuckold Stieg Larsson, it is quite apparent that Sweden is a spiritually sick country that makes the ethnomasochism of the filmmakers of German New Cinema seem rather benign by comparison. Maybe it all started with the melancholy melodramas of Ingmar Bergman (Through a Glass Darkly, Persona) or the cynically class conscious and culturally pessimistic feminist flicks of Mai Zetterling (Älskande par aka Loving Couples, Nattlek aka Night Games), but few national film industries have been so thoroughly and lunatically liberalized and culturally Marxified as that of the Swedes and there are few better examples of this perturbing phenomenon of both cultural and cinematic self-flagellation than Den enfaldige mördaren (1982) aka The Simple-Minded Murderer directed by Hans Alfredson (Egg! Egg! A Hardboiled Story, P & B) starring a rather young Stellan Skarsgård portraying a half-retarded fellow with an unflattering harelip. Sort of like a Swedish Forrest Gump, except relentlessly and stoically somber in the manner only Swedes know how to do and minus most of the humor, The Simple-Minded Murderer is an anti-fascist, anti-heimat film of sorts set during the 1930s in rural Skåne, Sweden, that quasi-operatically depicts the tragic events that occur after an Aryan handicapped young man's mother dies and he is forced to become the virtual slave of a stereotypically evil Nazi factory owner who makes his life a living hell. Winning three Guldbagge Awards from the Swedish Film Institute, including Best Director (Hans Alfredsson), Best Movie and Best Actor (Stellan Skarsgård), as well as the Silver Bear for Best Actor (Stellan's role as the protagonist) at the 32nd Berlin International Film Festival, The Simple-Minded Murderer is undoubtedly considered an unmitigated masterpiece of Swedish cinema, with alpha-auteur Ingmar Bergman even praising the flick, describing it as, "A deep indignation, turned into a powerful fairy-tale. Hasse Alfredssons resources seem unlimited and my admiration for his creativity and the wealth of his ideas is absolute." However, the film also has the sickening stench of post-WWII self-loathing, which has become a sort of quasi-kitschy cliché of Swedish cinema as demonstrated by internationally revered works like The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo (2009) and its equally aesthetically and thematically repellant sequels based on far-leftist Larsson's Millennium series. Directed by a man known for his idiosyncratic brand of "humorist humanism," The Simple-Minded Murderer is an undeniably powerful and entrancing work largely aesthetically inspired by the composition Requiem (1874) aka Messa da Requiem by Italian romantic composer Giuseppe Verdi, but it is also a superlatively sad reminder that one of the most iconic figures of Swedish cinema is a violent and vengeful retarded killer.

Opening with mentally-challenged and harelip-adorned protagonist Sven (Stellan Skarsgård, himself a proud and vocal atheist humanist) driving his paraplegic girlfriend Anna (Maria Johansson) to the middle of nowhere in rural 1930s Sweden and hiding in an old house, The Simple-Minded Murderer—with its rather literal title—makes it quite clear from the very beginning that the protagonist has just committed a violent killing and is evading justice, especially after he throws a large bloodstained blade into a well, as the rest of the film provocatively unravels how the vengeful crime came to be. The only images he has seen of his father being that of a völkisch-like painting at the local museum of his dead daddy riding a horse on the beach nude and a small wallet-sized soldier portrait, Sven—a uniquely unlucky lad born with a cleft palate and suffering from both a glaring speech impediment and a lack of intellectual prowess—only had a mother growing up, so when she dies, his life is turned into a virtual hell after he is forced to live with cows and work for free at the farm of an evil fascist factory owner named Höglund (played by director Hans Alfredsson), a superlatively sadistic man that beats his chauffeur, taunts and terrorizes his wife, and takes great personal glee in burning the last bit of rent money given to him by a tenant on Christmas who could not afford to give him the money in the first place. Although giving Sven a sense of dignity for a moment or so by allowing him to act as his personal chauffeur and driving him to debauched aristocratic parties with drunk naked chicks, Höglund eventually goes too far when he forces the halfwit Aryan boy to dress in drag for the entertainment of the local National Socialist party that the factory owner belongs to, thus ushering in an unlikely and ultimately murderous rivalry between a poor retarded fellow and a nasty Nazi aristocrat that concludes in tragedy for all parties involved.

Deciding enough is enough, Sven escapes Höglund farm and takes residence with the Andersson family, who are somewhat successful tenant farmers who lease land from 'fascist pig' Höglund. Under the roof of the kindly Anderssons, Sven develops a sense of dignity and worth he never felt before, even falling in love with the family's crippled daughter Anna, which the girl's parents encourage, but things take a turn for the worst when high-class heathen Höglund, who is quite angered by the family's genuine charity to a mentally-challenged man that he sees as his own personal slave, demands his harelippered serf back. Refusing to argue with peasants (as he states himself), Höglund wages a war of physical and psychological terrorism against Sven and the Anderssons, even attempting to impoverish the family, which, with his monetary prowess, he does quite easily. It is not until Höglund has his callous and perverted (he reads ebony porn magazines while working) chauffeur destroy Sven's fancy motorcycle—a special item that the special boy worked hard to buy and get a license for—that the disabled young man begins to see red and decides to take aggressive action of the ostensibly holy homicidal sort. A deeply devout Christian in the ‘true believer’ sense not unlike the crazed character Johannes from Carl Th. Dreyer’s Ordet (1955) who went so insane that he thought he was Jesus Christ himself after reading too much Søren Kierkegaard, Sven, who is initially too sensitive and childlike to drown a rat (which he fails doing early on in the film), believes he has angelic homicidal powers after supposedly being visited by three angels and believing the sacred seraphim want him to take revenge and join them in heaven, the outsider hero with a harelip grabs a large blade (with the supposed angels following him behind), goes to Höglund in broad daylight in front of a number of witnesses and maliciously murders the proletarian-exploiting fascist factory man in cold blood in what is indubitably the most therapeutic revenge scene in all of cinema history. In the end, Sven takes his limp limbed lady love Anna with him out to the middle of nowhere so they can assumedly start a new fairytale life together without being discovered by the police. In a rather unhappy twist, Anna, spotting police and her father closing in on them at their forest hideout, shoots both Sven and herself in a sort of handicapped take on Romeo and Juliet.

Indeed, while contemporary Swedish cinema certainly demonstrates the Swedes have become spiritual cuckolds and eunuchs of sorts, that does not mean these degenerated descendents of Vikings have become totally passive and pathetic people as one of the most common and potent themes of modern cinema in the Nordic nation is good old unadulterated revenge, albeit of the fashionable anti-fascist/anti-capitalist fashion, with The Simple-Minded Murderer being arguably the greatest of these films. Of course, aside from the more bitchy and bitter than sweet feminist-fueled work The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo and its equally overrated sequels, the Guldbagge-Award-winning flick Evil (2003) aka Ondskan—a work based on an autobiographical novel written by treacherous Swedish journalist Jan Guillou who worked as a spy for the Soviet KGB—is also a highly viscerally vengeful anti-heimat work set during the 1950s about a young man who single-handedly destroys the ‘fascist’ aristocratic classic structures and politics of a private boarding school. Even Swedish horror films, most notably the vampire flick Let the Right One In (2008) directed by Tomas Alfredson—not by coincidence the son of The Simple-Minded Murderer director/actor Hans Alfredson—also focuses on revenge, albeit of the supernatural coming-of-age sort where the boy protagonist sides with an ancient eunuch vampire who helps him literally slaughter his child enemies. Indeed, a sort of degenerate Odin archetype might live on today in the collective unconscious of the Swedish people as demonstrated by contemporary Swedish cinema, but too many centuries of Christianity and decades of anti-fascist communist/feminist/multicultural propaganda have turned these lapsed Vikings into a bunch of slave-morality-sanctioning metaphysical slaves who, as demonstrated by The Simple-Minded Murderer, prefer filmic folk heroes of the deformed and rather retarded sort to heroic knights in shining armor and virtuous kings of the enemy-exterminating sort. A carelessly cliché work set in the 1930s at the rise of fascism that assumes in the Trotskyite sense that fascists and factory owners are one in the same and that all the masters derive grand pleasure for perniciously poking and prodding at the figurative wounds of morally virtuous slaves, The Simple-Minded Murderer is a cinematic work that would be great if it were not for its redundancy in self-righteous quasi-red revenge politics. Of course, just as the Germanic races Aryanized Christianity, so have they done the same with commie politics and there is probably no greater cinematic example of Odinic bloodlust meets Nordish Christianity meets Nordic far-leftism than The Simple-Minded Murderer, a work of uncompromising celluloid vengeance that is ultimately compromised in terms of pseudo-moralistic redundancy of the hopeless holocaust-atoning variety.

WIENER BRUT

Hans Fädler (1985)

While there is a long and 'rich' history of queer German cinema that had its peak during the 1970s through early 1980s yet dates all the way back to the silent era with works like Richard Oswald's Anders als die Andern (1919) aka Different from the Others starring Conrad Veidt and co-penned and featuring a cameo from kosher cockucker sexologist Dr. Magnus Hirschfeld and Carl Theodor Dreyer's bizarre bisexual love triangle Michael (1924) starring Häxan: Witchcraft Through the Ages (1922) director Benjamin Christensen in the last acting role of her career, Germany's more traditionally conservative Catholic neighbor Austria does not have as nearly an extensive and eclectic aberrosexual film history, though that does not mean it is of total disinterest when it comes to fag flicks. Indeed, as an Austrian comrade told me, in comparison to Germany, "Our degeneracy is saucier and has more style... Austria's Baroque-Catholic heritage at work here." Also, for whatever reason, Austrian queer cinema seems to be dominated by highly idiosyncratic and disturbingly aggressive carpet-munchers as demonstrated by absurdly wayward Super-8 cyber-dyke flicks like Rote Ohren fetzen durch Asche (1992) aka Flaming Ears co-directed by Ursula Puerrer, A. Hans Scheirl, Dietmar Schipek and the surrealist Sapphic celluloid experiments of Mara Mattuschka like Der Einzug des Rokoko ins Inselreich der Huzzis (1989) aka The Rise of Rococo in the Island Kingdom of the Huzzi People and the rather bizarre Godzilla parody S.O.S. Extraterrestrica (1994), which features the director as a truly monstrous, gynocentric erotomaniac that uses the Eiffel Tower as a sort of makeshift dildo while members of the German Wehrmacht blow her away with a storm of bullets. Luckily for self-respecting Austrian Catholics everywhere, the Germanic nation is better known for producing Übermensch beings like Arnold a Schwarzenegger than raging kraut queens like Rosa von Praunheim, thus there really is not many cocksucker cult classics to choose from aside from a couple obscure films like Wiener Brut (1985) aka Sounds of Snow aka Vintage Vienna directed by one-time auteur Hans Fädler. A sort of punk-tinged sub-high-camp tragicomedy featuring Viennese punk queer squatters and outstandingly arrogant cocaine-addled aristocrats as portrayed by feisty fags in drag, Fädler's somewhat respectable debauched debut certainly demonstrates that the director could have potentially been Austria's answer to von Praunheim had he not perished a couple years after the film was released as a result of gay cancer. From the von Praunheim and Lothar Lambert school of gay Germanic filmmaking, Fädler's flick is nothing if not great fag filmic fun that will appeal to both politically incorrect poofs and the sort of more discerning heterosexual cinephile who enjoys the films of the Kuchar brothers and the early pre-Hairspray cinematic works of John Waters. While Austria is not exactly best known for its campy cult cinema, Wiener Brut is unequivocally a work that manages to be just as intemperately zany, jovially absurd, and shemale-saturated as classic Cockettes vehicles like Michael Kalmen's Elevator Girls in Bondage (1972) and Milton Miron's Tricia's Wedding (1972). Sardonicly advertised as a "Heimatfilm," Fädler's farcical flick naturally attacks the Austrian monarchy, Catholic Church, and, quite predictably, the country's infamous National Socialist past, albeit in such a pathologically campy way that is ultimately homos, drag queens, dykes and punks that seem the most ridiculous in the end. Indeed, while watching the film, you would never suspect that a grotesque narcissistic mutant freak like Conchita Wurst would become the most world famous Austrian figure just 21 years later, thus reflecting the deluge of malignant degeneracy that has completely consumed Europa over the past two decades. In other words, Wiener Brut was made at a time when it still took some testicular fortitude to be a prancing fairy or a chick-with-a-dick, thus it has a crude charm about it that reminds one how obnoxious, anally retentive, and just plain bourgeoisie fags have become since the softcore authoritarian mainstreaming of aberrosexuality in the Occident.

In what might be described as an act of tongue-in-cheek aesthetic irony (or, more realistically, a lack of funding), Wiener Brut was shot in a sort of gritty 'social realist' style typical of far-left New German Cinema works from the late-1960s and early-1970s like Christian Ziewer's Liebe Mutter, mir geht es gut (1972) aka Dear Mother, I'm All Right. Of course, considering it was partially shot at a real gay punk squat (which apparently still exists today) and stars real-life punks and homos that look genuinely depraved and even sometimes AIDS-ridden, the film does have a certain quite literal 'social realist' dimension to it that is part of its cheap charm. Additionally, with its depiction of such absurd culture-besmirching scenarios as a sexually depraved punk twink sporting lederhosen, the film follows in the (anti)tradition of the overtly silly Heimat satires of Walter Bockmayer like Flammende Herzen (1978) aka Flaming Hearts and especially Geierwally (1988). Beginning with a headshot of a slutty looking blonde tranny diva singing an extra kitschy pro-pot ballad with lyrics like, "Dürnstein Gold! Grass for good times! You don't have to be a Marlboro Man to enjoy it!" and then putting the stem of a pot leaf in between her teeth in a provocative pseudo-sexual fashion, the film then cuts to a satirical prologue that reads: "It is the year 1984! Everywhere in Europe and almost all over the world people are living in grueling slavery. Wantonly addicted to power and possession, sex and drugs and desires of every kind, more dead than alive they are eagerly awaiting a nuclear holocaust or a total ecological breakdown to release them from their drudgery." As indicated by an excerpt from a news program, a dozen queer punk degenerates have taken over an old abandoned building in Vienna that is fittingly located at a place called Grass Street and have turned it into their own little slice of hyper hedonistic homo heaven where men can fuck men while sporting jockstraps while high on heroin and weed without the threat of being gay-bashed. Unfortunately, trouble arises when a pesky and hopelessly naive social worker of the fat and homely goes by the squat and begins threatening the squatters' god given sodomite rights.

When a fat, short, stubby, and extra homely social worker of the meek and glaringly socially awkward sort named Hilde Urbanek shows up at the punk squat and dares to ask about the whereabouts of a short blonde teenage babe named Angelika Kotschnik, she is disturbed to discover that the inside of the building is completely pitch black and a weirdo with a commie Red Army hat named 'Ferdl' (Franz Brendinger) is having a hyper histrionic "psychotic fit." When Hilde informs Ferdl that she is a social worker, he proceeds to go on a nonsensical spiel about how he regularly goes by the local unemployment office to look for work and then scares her by absurdly stating, "I'm a cancerous sore on the face of this earth and you are nothing but scumballs." Naturally, Hilde is no less disturbed when she investigates the various eclectically themed rooms in the squat and discovers a demented bull-dyke in lingerie riding on top of a pantless middle-aged bourgeois dork like she is bull-riding, a jaded junky shooting junk into his arm, and two naked poofs spooning each other on a bed with leopard print sheets, among other unsavory things. When Hilde walks in on a topless blonde in the process of beginning a hot and heavy threesome with two gay twinkles and realizes that the girl is actually the teen Angelika Kotschnik that she is looking for, she becomes so shocked that she tells the girl that she plans to report her to the authorities and then abruptly runs out of the room like a petrified toddler. Upon running out of the room, Hilde overhears one of the punks saying, "Well, we can't let her get away like this. Let's grab her" and then has a delusion vision of her strangled corpse inside a telephone booth. In a sort of intentionally ersatz-ominous chase scene that mocks horror genre conventions in a somewhat Schlingensief-esque fashion, Hilde is followed in the woods by a sinisterly chuckling Ferdl and eventually passes out upon running up to a car for help and then suffering the shock that it is actually full of the punks, including the savage little slut Angelika. Luckily for the terribly naive social worker, the punks, especially Ferdl, decide to get Hilde addicted to opium tea and brainwash her with a moronic punk Weltanschauung instead of actually killing her.

As can be expected from such a proudly anarchistic low-budget punk (anti)Heimat flick that wallows in its own technical ineptness and narrative incoherence, Wiener Brut has various subplots that either go nowhere or end quite anticlimactically. Since virtually all of the characters are either blond Nordic fags or decadently dressed drag queens (not to mention the fact that some of the actors play multiple roles), it is sometimes hard to tell who is who in the film, at least the first time you watch it. Certainly, one of the characters that you cannot mistake or forget is 'Her Royal Highness Maria Carolina' (Johannes Weidinger, who later partially funded the gay agitprop doc Paragraph 175 (2000) co-directed by American homo Hebrews Rob Epstein and Jeffrey Friedman), who is the supposed niece of the ex-empress of Austria and is naturally portrayed by a minty mensch in drag. After supposedly suffering the dual tragedy of receiving an internal abdominal injury after falling off an horse and having her valuable jewels stolen as is broadcasted on a special news report, Baroness Maria Carolina is visited by her all the more bitchy cousin with the somewhat fitting Proustian name Baroness von Guermantes (played by Kurt Freimüller, who also co-penned the script), who bitches at Her Royal Highness, “Ma chere cousin, I have always warned you of your fatal desire for wild young studs. You should have known what delicate and painful consequences it could have.” Indeed, while apparently reporting to the media that she was the victim of a horse accident, it seems that Maria Carolina actually fell prey to a violent thieving hustler. Unfortunately, despite her aristocratic cultivation, Maria Carolina has a softspot for seedy male sluts and she ultimately finds herself in a very intricately precarious situation when she decides to hire one of the punk poof squatters as her new butler-cum-whore.

When a certain Baroness Putpus (Rudi Katzer) shows up at her lavish countryside estate, Frogville Castle, Maria Carolina becomes highly agitated, at least until her faithful frenemy whips out some high-grade cocaine and declares, “Virgin snow from Colombia.” Indeed, like all of her blueblood shemale sisters, Maria Carolina is a voracious coke fiend and she will even go so far as to semi-tolerate mere bourgeois buffoons and lumpenprole peasants if the rich man’s candy is involved. After hiring a young punk squatter named ‘Lyn’ (Artur Singer) who she rechristens ‘Bela’ as her new butler after an extensive selection process that involves inspecting the muscles and members of the job applicants, Maria Carolina and her wealthy friends face potential tragedy when their tranny drug dealer aka ‘court coke supplier’ Alfonso (Erna Frühgeburch) is arrested by the cops. Naturally, Maria Carolina eventually orders her new bitch-boy Bela to cop her some coke. As a quasi-bisexual blond beast that fucks dykes (indeed, while fucking one particularly aggressive lily-licker, he compliments her by moaning, “You make John Wayne look like a sugar-plum fairy!”), screws random men in telephone booths while a group of confused Arabs watch, and wins that butler position by proudly showing off his “darkie dicky” and “chocolate balls” to Maria Carolina and her friends, Bela is an unscrupulous opportunist and shameless slut that will do literally anything to get what he wants. While Bela starts out simply sporting lederhosen and being the Baroness’ 24/7 royal fuck-boy, he soon begins driving Maria Carolina around in her Mercedes convertible while hunting for Cocteau’s kick, but things naturally do not stop there as the gay gigolo has uniquely unsavory personal connections that might prove to be quite useful for his employer’s aristocratic ambitions. Indeed, after failing to procure coke, Maria Carolina becomes more ambitious and comes up with the wacky idea to get Bela to convince his punk squatter friends to run a revolution that she names “The Black Friday” (notably, the baroness and her friends mock the Red Army Faction by rightly describing them as, “Political amateurs”) so that she and her family can restore the monarchy and once again control all of Austria. As the baroness states regarding her supposed moral right in regard to the revolution, "Since the bourgeoisie cheated us out of our well-earned inheritance, the lumpenproletariat has to serve us in getting our innate rights back." Luckily, Maria Carolina's pedophile cousin is the local Catholic cardinal, so she easily gets the unholy holyman's support for the cocksucker coup. Unfortunately for Maria Carolina, Bela and his punk pals not only make for rather lousy and unreliable revolutionaries since they are dope-addled degenerates who probably lack the intellectual capacity to tie their own shoes, but also have ulterior motives.

As time passes, kidnapped social worker Hilde eventually develops Stockholm syndrome and begins falling in love with punk freak Ferdl, who manages to convince her that work is bad and anarchy is good because, as he absurdly states, "Sure, 'Working frees you', that's what was written at the gates of the Auschwitz concentration camp." Ferdl also rationalizes his particularly pathetic pot addiction by stating to Hilde, "The Turks are to blame. When they tried to conquer Vienna in 1683, they left the cellar full of 100 kilo sacks. All hashish." Of course, when Hilde catches Ferdl making out with a hot blonde at a punk show, she decides to dump his sorry ass. Meanwhile, the punks decide to go to a "legalize weed" concert called "INHALE!" (aka INitiative HAsH LEgal!) at a place called the Metropol that is curiously owned by the local conservative party. Not unsurprisingly, bald middle-aged cops show up at the concert in disguise in less than inconspicuous punk garb because they rightly believe it is a "terrorist's nest." During the concert, the lead singer of one of the bands sings super moronic lyrics that epitomize the senseless nihilism of punk like, "Chaos is much better! Chaos I prefer!" and "Fuck yourself! Chaos is much better!," amongst other verbal swill. During the concert, two homo-hating cops decide to gay-bash Bela and even consider raping him, but luckily the seemingly latently gay policemen are scared away when about half a dozen menacing looking punks walk by. As can be expected in such an obnoxiously chaotic film like Wiener Brut, the planned revolution never even happens. Indeed, a large group of the punks end up showing up at Maria Carolina's castle unannounced and make a series of absurd demands to the blueblood drag-queens like how they want to turn the Vienna Opera House into a rock club after the revolution, but the fairly stupid would-be-revolutionaries ultimately give up on pursuing their aims when singing aristocratic ghosts (!) randomly appear out of nowhere and cause them to literally run out of the ancient estate while screaming in terror. In the end, three cops attempt to raid the punk squat, but are scared away when they happen upon junkies shooting up dope, gay orgies, and a political prisoner in a gimp mask and bondage.

With the uniquely undeserved fame of creepy and seemingly half-braindead bearded drag queen Conchita Wurst as a result of winning the the 2014 Eurovision Song Contest as Austria's entrant and subsequently becoming dubbed the “Queen of Austria” by the anti-Occidental culture-distorting international mainstream media, it seems that the corrosive cocksucker kultur has reached an all-time high in the once great land of legendary Übermenschen like Otto Skorzeny and Schwarzenegger. Indeed, I hate to say it, but I think Russian nationalist leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky was right when stated in regard to the wretched Wurst phenomenon, “Fifty years ago the Soviet army occupied Austria. We made a mistake in freeing Austria. We should have stayed,” but I digress. In terms of German-language poof punk squatter flicks, Michael Stock’s ultra gritty debut Prinz in Hölleland (1993) aka Prince in Hell makes Wiener Brut seem like a low-budget Jason Friedberg and Aaron Seltzer flick in terms of sheer of subversive artistry and depravedly debauched idiosyncrasy, yet I still regard it is mandatory viewing for fans of kitsch and camp, especially if you enjoy the early works of Rosa von Praunheim (who was incidentally Stock’s mentor). In its tragicomic satirizing of both the decadent aristocracy and all the more decadent youth subcultures, Fädler’s flick features many similarities Hans-Jürgen Syberberg’s rather loose Heinrich von Kleist adaptation San Domingo (1970). One of the most interesting aspects of Fädler’s film for me is that all the punk fags and drag queens in it ultimately seem fairly tame and banal in comparison to real-life suburban folk featured in the documentaries of Austrian auteur Ulrich Seidl like Tierische Liebe (1995) aka Animal Love and Im Keller (2014) aka In the Basement, thus reflecting the decidedly debasing effect that globalization and Americanization have had on everyday Austrians (indeed, many of the subjects in Seidl’s films look and dress exactly like the sort of people I can find at my local Wal-Mart). Surely, in many ways, ostensibly transgressive figures like Conchita Wurst—a totally deracinated and vapid creature that would be totally forgettable were he not sporting the aesthetically revolting combination of a beard, makeup, and a dress—are the ultimate conformists as they represent the sort of model testosterone-free world citizen that certain scheming globalists, who do not want to have to deal with another Uncle Adolf, count on in their campaign for world domination. After all, what could be better for Zionist globalist types like George Soros for easily enslaving a nation than a place that is plagued with a decidedly defective youth population like the sexually and emotionally disturbed and spiritually vapid punk squatters featured in Wiener Brut. While punks like to think that they are uncompromising anarchists that are above all forms of law and authority, they are really just the unwitting metaphysical slaves of Marcuse, Abbie Hoffman, Daniel Cohn-Bendit, Fat Mike and other phony Hebraic ‘heretics’ who see Europeans and white Americans as nothing more than stupid goyim. Luckily, Fädler’s film manages to make punks seem like shallow drug-addled losers of the emotionally and sexually dysfunctional sort who should probably be all forced to live together in dilapidated old buildings just like in the flick. In its satirizing of a subculture of sexual cripples and dope fiends with stupid haircuts, Wiener Brut is probably the closest thing to an Austrian equivalent to Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982), albeit sans the sci-fi elements and synthesizer score, thus making it essential viewing for any serious semi-offbeat cinephile.

RAPE ON THE MOOR

Hans H. König (1952)

Although completely unknown outside of German-speaking nations, the Heimatfilm (“homeland-film”)—a mystical Teutonic film genre typically filmed outdoors in rural settings with a somewhat sentimental tone centering around old fashioned morals, tight knit families, and a quasi-völkisch and mystical infatuation with nature—was quite a popular film genre in Germany, Switzerland, and Austria from about the late 1940s to the early 1970s as the only popular kraut film style that followed in the footsteps of films from the Third Reich era, so it should be no surprise that a number of filmmakers of German New Cinema, including Volker Schlöndorff, Werner Herzog, Herbert Achternbusch, and even Rainer Werner Fassbinder, started a fashionable anti-Heimatfilm genre that was somewhat trendy during the late-1960s/early-1970s depicting the Germanic countryside as an absurdly backward place full of bloodthirsty lynch mobs, racist and fag-bashing rednecks, an uneducated and superstitious general populous, and smelly cow turds and mutilated animal corpses. Of course, the far-leftist filmmakers of German New Cinema were not the first people to play with and distort the conventions of the Heimatfilm genre, as demonstrated by the little known (at least anywhere outside of Germany and Austria) and criminally neglected gothic horror Heimat film Rape on the Moor (1952) aka Rosen blühen auf dem Heidegrab aka Roses Bloom on the Grave in the Meadow aka Dorothee written and directed by German auteur Hans H. König (The Little Town Will Go to Sleep, Jägerblut). While only a film director for about a half a decade (he would later work as a TV writer before disappearing entirely), Hans H. König managed to subvert and tweak many conventions of the Heimat genre, while sticking to the general plot structure where a good guy and bad guy fight over a girl, with the good guy winning in the end and everyone ends up living happily ever. Indeed, whilst Rape on the Moor essentially follows the typical Heimat plot structure, including the standard romantic subtext, the film does not conclude on a positively positive note as a fiercely foreboding cinematic work that depicts how some things, including boorish rapist kidnappers, that stay the same in the Teutonic countryside are not exactly the most ideal, but nonetheless unavoidable, sort of like cancer. Set in a small Nordic North German village (the film was shot in Bremen (Worpswede Teufelsmoor) and Diepholz (Wietingsmoor)), Rape on the Moor depicts how history has a way of repeating itself when the old Germanic legend of a young beauty named Wilhelmina, who disappeared in a marsh after she was raped by a Swedish soldier during the Thirty Years’ War, is eerily repeated in the modern day when a husky hoghead of a man who will not take no for an answer becomes morbidly infatuated with a young girl who wants nothing to do with him. Featuring swamp scenes that look like a peasant’s take on those featured in F.W. Murnau’s post-expressionist masterpiece Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927) and a sexually predatory villain who is sort of the proletarian equivalent of the bulky bastard baron featured in Effi Briest (1974) directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Rape on the Moor acts as a sort of celluloid missing link between the pre-Nazi 'grandfather generation' and the filmmakers of German New cinema.

While strolling down a dirt road on her bike, Dorothee Aden (Ruth Niehaus) is approached by lecherous lurker Dietrich Eschmann (Hermann Schomberg)—a boorish and belligerent beast of a farmer that is as tall and heavyset as he is vulgar and unpleasant, thus making quite the apt person for subduing and assaulting fragile young women—who demands to know why the young debutante is avoiding him. Aside from the fact that Dietrich is a married man and she finds him rather repulsive, Dorothee is in love with a young and promising architect named Ludwig Amelung (Armin Dahlen), who will do anything for the woman he loves, even if he must constantly leave town to attend to his job duties. Dietrich, on the other hand, has a rather miserable marriage with his lonely wife Fiete (Gisela von Collande), so much so that when he tells his beloved “I will kill you,” she simply responds with, “Do it” as if she is longing to be put out of her misery. Instead of killing Fiete, Dietrich ends up maliciously molesting his wife, thus demonstrating the sadomasochistic nature of their miscarriage of a marriage. Like a pissed puppy with rabies, wherever Dorothee goes, degenerate Dietrich follows, so the little lass describes him rightfully as being “like an animal” and, like a beast, the bloated ogre has virtually nil control over his sexual urges or so he will prove. During a splendid day while roaming the countryside with her Teuton boy toy Ludwig, Dorothee spots two crows and describes them as being, “The souls of Wilhelmina and the Swede.” According to local folklore, during the Thirty Years' War—a time when, according to Dorothee, “one had to be friendly to the strangers who came from the North or South”—a young and beautiful maiden named Wilhelmina made the mistake of leading a Swedish lieutenant through a moor, where he raped her, so as revenge and, “out of the misery and desperation of her heart,” she later led him to the wetlands where they both disappeared into the earth, never to be seen again. Undoubtedly, Dorothee has a sort of metaphysical feeling that she and Wilhelmina are kindred spirits, which proves to be true in the sense that she is soon raped by Dietrich and she seeks revenge by taking him to the moor, with the goal of killing him and herself, albeit things do not turn out as perfect as planned as her loyal lover Ludwig comes to the rescue in the end. Unfortunately, while Ludwig, with the help of a rescue team (who sport what looks like World War I era German helmets), manage to rescue Dorothee from being forever swallowed up by the earth in just in the nick of time, the emotional damage as a result of the rape and near death/suicide/murder experience may have caused irreparable damage that may or may not destroy the two lovers' relationship in the end. Whether Dorothee and Ludwig ever manage to move on with the traumatic events is questionable, thus making the kraut countryside seem like a curious and accursed place plagued by blood, soil, and semen.

Although I may be overestimating his love of the Teutons, maybe if he had seen Rape on the Moor and the various other subversive Heimat films directed by Hans H. König, Austrian-Jewish-American cineaste Amos Vogel might have thought twice about describing heimat films as “those insufferable, sentimental” kitsch” prosodies to Fatherland, Soil, and Family,” in his book Film as a Subversive Art (1974). Indeed, Rape on the Moor takes a more unsettling look at völk history and folklore than probably any others of the 300+ Heimat films made during the 1950s as a work ultimately demonstrating that—aside from love, family, spirituality, and nature worship being a part of folk history—lovelorn jealousy, barbarian invasions, and violent sexual pillaging also came into play because for every happy couple there is a desperate and sometimes deranged third person looking to split them apart who is willing to do anything to achieve their aberrant aims. Unlike anti-Heimat films like Hunting Scenes from Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdscenen aus Niederbayern and Der plötzliche Reichtum der armen Leute von Kombach (1971) aka The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach, which portray Teutonic rural areas as backwards hellholes with a borderline retarded populous of the superlatively superstitious sort, Rape on the Moor does not wallow in contempt for the kraut country, but portrays it as a beautiful yet brutal place where both man and nature have the capacity for the most ungodly and unmerciful of atrocities. If Rape on the Moor accomplishes anything that is original that makes it stand out from not just Heimat films but horror cinema as well, it is in depicting the countryside as an oneiric and ominous haunted house/graveyard of sorts that has the propensity for literally possessing its inhabitants, especially the character Dorothee, who is summoned by the moor, whispering “The... moor... is... calling” to herself while in an entranced state of wayward ecstasy. Sort of the Rebecca (1940) meets Carnival of Souls (1962) of Heimat films, Rape on the Moor is indisputable proof that Teutonic mysticism and Gothic horror can make for an immaculate combo, but rather unfortunately, aside from Niklaus Schilling’s killer kaleidoscopic work Nachtschatten (1972) aka Nightshade, I cannot think of another film that has attempted this devilishly delectable celluloid formula.

LUDWIG'S COOK
LUDWIG'S COOK

Hans Jürgen Syberberg (1973)

After discovering the high-camp films of kraut dandy Werner Schroeter (Der Bomberpilot, Deux) and facing scorn from West German film critics due to his criticism of the far-left counter-culture movement with his second feature San Domingo (1970), Prussian auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Scarabea: How Much Land Does a Man Need?, Parsifal) totally reinvented his aesthetic with his third narrative feature Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King (1972) aka Ludwig - Requiem für einen jungfräulichen König, which was the filmmaker's first film in his masterful 'Germany Trilogy' (preceding Karl Mary (1974) and Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977)) and his first attempt at creating a celluloid neo-Wagnerite 'Gesamtkunstwerk.' In between Ludwig and Karl Mary, Syberberg decided to temporarily go back to his minimalist documentarian roots and directed a strange little film entitled Theodor Hierneis oder Wie man ehem. Hofkoch wird (1973) aka Theodor Hierneis or How to become a former royal chef aka Le cuisinier de Ludwig aka Ludwig's Cook. A sort of companion piece to Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King that Susan "The white race is the cancer of human history" Sontag once described as, "an austere Brechtian melodrama of ninety minutes with Ludwig's cook as its one character—it anticipates the valet's narrative in Hitler, a Film from Germany—and was inspired by Brecht's unfinished novel on the life of Julius Caesar narrated by his slave," Ludwig's Cook is a quirky one-man show starring and co-written by stereotypically Bavarian actor Walter Sedlmayr (Volker Schlöndorff's Baal, Welt am Draht aka World on a Wire) following the marginal historical figure Theodor Hierneis, royal chef at the court of Ludwig II of Bavaria, as he fondly reminisces about his past life appeasing the rather idiosyncratic appetite of the mad 'Fairy Tale King' as he walks around rural Bavaria, as well as the mysterious monarch's castles, Linderhof and Neuschwanstein, and royal cabin, Schachen. Essentially one long monologue taken largely directly from Hierneis' memoir, Ludwig's Cook attempts to fill in some blanks left by Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King by painting a truly 'picturesque' (indeed, one cannot deny that rural Bavaria and Ludwig's lavish homes are most aesthetically pleasing in a fairy tale sort of way) portrait of the 'perfect Wagnerite' from the perspective of a lowly servant who tends to the needs of a decidedly decadent king who rotted out all his teeth by eating too many sweets and who forced his servants to wander the countryside during the overnight and early A.M. hours. While undoubtedly one of the filmmaker's more minor works, Ludwig's Cook is also indubitably an important work in Syberberg's oeuvre in that it acted as a building block for his magnum opus Hitler: A Film from Germany, as it would also feature obscure nobodies like Heinrich Himmler's personal astrologist and Uncle Adolf's personal valet retelling history in a highly personalized anecdotal fashion, thereupon presenting a true 'volk history' that obfuscates the historical documentary record.

Beginning at the age of 14 in November 1882 as an apprentice in the royal kitchen of the court of King Ludwig II, Theodor Hierneis would become the 'royal chef' in 1884 and his reign would last until 1886 when the monarch died under dubious circumstances that same year. As Hierneis (Walter Sedlmayr) states of the experience, "For four years, I belonged to the household of an unusual king." While describing Ludwig II as 'unusual,' Hierneis' respect for the man is undeniable, even if he was paid only one to two marks a day. On first meeting the king, the chef found him to be, "tall, noble, handsome, pale, a ghost-like apparition with big dark and incredibly luminous eyes...A mysterious king...that's how I saw him the first time." Indeed, Hierneis seems to view Ludwig II in a mystical manner typical of the Bavarian peasants who celebrate the monarch's aesthetically pleasing legacy to this day. Rising from the rabble to the level of royal culinary artist, the chef rightfully describes his personal motto as such: "Laughed at as an apprentice, honored as a master." Of course, Hierneis viewed Ludwig II from a servile class-based distance, and while the King tended to treat his visitors to remarkably lavish gifts, the loyal chef was never once treated to a single one. Instead, Hierneis had the honor of becoming a witness to great history from the sidelines, as a man that got to see The Fairy Tale King interact with 'völkisch avant-garde' poet Felix Dahn and Hungarian-Austrian actor Josef Kainz. One of the things Hierneis enjoyed most about working for Ludwig II was learning that he was just like any other ordinary person, stating of his experiences, "I found this comforting that he too had to suffer pain, like all of us. Later, in my time, the King was almost completely toothless and he always held a perfumed lace handkerchief in front of his lips and kept people at a distance." Indeed, Ludwig II was a terribly temperamental individual of the rather whimsical sort as indicated by Hierneis' remark, "his taste and appetite depended very much on his actual mood," so the chef made a special menu for the monarch and prepared his meals in a manner so that they were soft enough for a new born babe to eat.

Although a King, Ludwig II also had his heroes, with Louis XIV aka 'Louis the Great' being such a major hero that he designed his royal bedroom after the French monarch's bedroom and had a statue of the man that he would greet each day. Of course, Ludwig's Francophilia was not limited to hero worship, as he had his cook him French cuisine even though the Berlin royals dined on Anglo-German dishes. Hierneis also unwittingly hints at the King's homosexuality, stating, "The King did not like female servants. His valet Rutz received him from the bath with two towels," but more importantly he understood that Ludwig II was a fanatical aesthetician who financially supported great artists like Richard Wagner (Ludwig settled all the composer's debts and provided him a lavish villa in Tribschen, Switzerland) and whose, "ideal was to have the most beautiful things from all over the world...buildings and plants, birds, deer, peacocks, birds of paradise and all that...if he could have gathered it all in one place and perhaps some people too. Well, he wanted to build a paradise...it could have happened in Bavaria." Demonstrating a certain loyalty that is virtually unknown nowadays in the Occident, Hierneis states on the subject of the King's famously curious mental state, "that the King might be ill or mad, this idea would never have occurred to us. We wouldn't have dared anyway. We've loved him far too much for that. We looked upon his character as a sort of luxury of being, he was the King after all. Direct orders of government...we saw very little of that here. In fact, none of it." As Hierneis reveals, when his master Ludwig died, the distinguished culinary artist went on to work as Prince Regent Luitpold's chef from 1886 to 1890 and then went to Berlin to volunteer in the royal kitchen of Kaiser Wilhelm II, eventually becoming court chef. Of course, like any true citizen from the Bavarian free state, Hierneis became homesick and eventually came home in 1901 and with his savings, opening a delicatessen shop in Munich as a man who ultimately "founded a bourgeois existence" as a distinguished cook with an aristocratic clientele who was eventually appointed "Royal Bavarian Court Supplier." Indeed, like Bavaria in general with its ancient fairy tale castles that have proven to become very profitable tourist spots in the long run, Ludwig's wayward reign ultimately proved to be quite a worthwhile experience for chef Theodor Hierneis.

Not all that unlike King Ludwig II, actor Walter Sedlmayr, who was also a gay Bavarian in kraut Catholic land, died a rather bizarre death that adds a certain mystery and intrigue to his character. Found dead in his Munich apartment on 15 July 1990, Sedlmayr was apparently tied up, stabbed in the gut, and beat in the head with a hammer by two of his former business partners, half-brothers Wolfgang Werlé and Manfred Lauber, with a biopic about the actor and his murder entitled Wambo (2001) directed by Jo Baier starring Jürgen Tarrach in the lead role being released a decade later. Despite being a rather small film, Ludwig's Cook ultimately earned the Deutscher Filmpreis for 'Best Non-Narrative Film' (Film Award in Silver) and 'Best Actor' (Film Award in Gold) at the 1973 German Film Awards. I enjoyed Ludwig's Cook enough that I kind of wish Syberberg directed a companion piece to Hitler: A Film from Germany of a similar meta-history spirit as the famed Führer apparently had a Jewish chef named Fräulein Kunde on loan, or so the Jewish author M. Hirsh Goldberg would claim in his book The Jewish Connection (1976). It seems British auteur Mike Leigh must have saw some merit in Ludwig's Cook as well as his short A Sense of History (1992)—a one-man show written and starring Jim Broadbent about a fictional aristocratic fellow named '23 Earl of Leete' who discusses his 900+ year family history while giving a tour of his rather lavish homestead—takes virtually the same aesthetic approach, but ultimately fails to be as interesting as Syberberg's film. In short, Ludwig's Cook is an aesthetic achievement as it is discernibly Brechtian yet still manages to have a soul, not to mention the fact it pays tribute to German kultur as opposed to besmirching it like the kosherphile commie playwright had such a proclivity for (During his Stalinist days, Brecht wrote to a friend regarding the Moscow trials and his countrymen, "The more innocent they are, the more they deserve to die."), which is no small achievement for a little film about a peasant discussing a toothless monarch's strange eating habits.

JONATHAN

Hans W. Geißendörfer (1970)

Between F.W. Murnau's German expressionist masterpiece Nosferatu, eine Symphonie des Grauens (1922) aka Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror and Bavarian adventurer auteur Werner Herzog's 'remake'/re-adaption Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979) aka Nosferatu: Phantom der Nacht, Germany isn't exactly lacking when it comes to masterful vampire films, especially in regard to adaptations of Bram Stoker's classic horror novel Dracula (1897), and the Fatherland certainly has some vintage vamp flicks that are in dire need of being unearthed. Although largely forgotten today, Jonathan (1970)—a politically-charged vampire film only very loosely based on Stoker's Dracula—was a hit of sorts upon its release over four decades ago as it won its director Hans W. Geißendörfer (Carlos, Der Zauberberg aka The Magic Mountain), who had never directed a feature film previously, the coveted Film Award in Gold at the Deutscher Filmpreis for Best New Direction and would ultimately take a 'modernist' approach to the outmoded horror genre while simultaneously paying homage to classical Germanic art. The son of a Bavarian clergyman who studied both German literature and African languages before developing an interest in filmmaking, Geißendörfer, while having a romantic vision of sorts that recalls Heinrich von Kleist and a keenness for landscapes that echoes Caspar David Friedrich, was most certainly typical of his generation in his political leanings, at least if one were to judge him simply by his debut work, Jonathan, a film advertised upon its release as an anti-fascist vampire flick of sorts. Set in the 16th century and utilizing Heimatfilm, Gothic horror, and quasi-völkisch aesthetics, Jonathan is an intrinsically idiosyncratic sort of anti-fascist/anti-capitalist kraut bloodsucker comedy where the vampires, being immune from sunlight, make up a pernicious and parasitic aristocracy and where the peasants—led haphazardly by a certain Jonathan Harker—attempt to lead a quasi-Bolshevik revolution against their undead overlords. Advertised with the patently pretentious tagline "The First Adult Vampire Film," Jonathan is for the most part an arthouse flick that takes a sardonic approach to genre conventions including Teutonic slapstick, sociopolitical satire, and sadomasochistic Gothic horror, thus making it more a work that is ultimately as uneven as it is intriguing. Featuring vampires in love with humans committing suicide, nuns hanging from nooses, farms full of dead barnyard animals and the real-life killing of a rat, phantasmagorical class warfare, and enough inverted crosses and blasphemous imagery to put a Norwegian black metal band to shame, Jonathan was unquestionably an iconoclastic vampire flick upon its release, but not unlike like Margarethe von Trotta's career jumpstarting good looks, the film has not aged as gracefully as one would hope, even if it deserves to be regarded as a minor kraut cult classic of sorts. Like the sort of aesthetically eloquent vampire film one would accept from Werner Schroeter's rampantly heterosexual and politically-retarded Bavarian brother, Jonathan is a striking example of how far-leftist politics distorted the minds of the filmmakers of German New Cinema to the point where even a classy Bosch-esque vampire flick is tainted by the ideas of psychic Yiddish vampires like Marx, Trotsky, and Adorno.

It is the 16th century in Teutonic Transylvania and sun-tolerant vampires of the blueblooded variety rule the roost and use their finely dressed fascist soldiers to invade small villages and drain the precious blood of the peasantry. The vampires are led by a charismatic fellow that goes by the name "The Count" (Paul Albert Krumm) and who bears a close resemblance, both in appearance and speech, to Adolf Hitler, albeit minus the signature mustache (naturally, it would be quite hard to make a vampire villain serious who sports both a Charlie Chaplin mustache and a gay cape). As the Count tells his compatriots after having a fellow vamp killed who tried to leave his Gothic castle fortress, "All of you know...none of you are alone here. If you try to leave...it's dangerous for us. Be careful. Your betrayal can cost you dearly. Be forewarned. This could also happen to you," as the alpha-bloodsucker wants to avoid compromising his undead kingdom's rule over civilization and humanity. Meanwhile, somewhere not that far away, an elderly anti-vampire professor (Oskar von Schab) of the old school leftist sort gives the following speech to his pupils, "We did our job. We have come to the conclusion...we aren't getting anywhere this way. Although all of us know what's going on...we aren't doing anything to fight against it. We must protect ourselves against the power...of this bloodsucker, who grows stronger...day by day. We must fight against him...not only by stopping the rituals...nor by killing them one by one. The only solution is obvious...the total elimination of the vampires. And now is the best time to strike." Apparently, when all the vampires plan to gather at a castle near the sea, the professor hopes to "push the vampires into the sea" as "they cannot survive in the water," thus wiping out the undead menace for good. Playing from the Bolshevik handbook, the Prof states the entire vampire aristocracy must be exterminated and he sends a not particularly special gentleman named Jonathan (Jürgen Jung), his assistant, to scout out the castle and relay back the information he discovers so that the anti-fang-cist revolutionaries can make their move, which also involves freeing the Count's peasant prisoners who the teacher believes will vengefully help in destroying the Hitler-esque Dracula and his SS bloodsuckers. Rather unfortunately for the vampire-hunters, one of the Count's associates sat in on the Professor's speech, so the alpha-vamp is more than ready for Jonathan when he arrives. While the Count is most certainly a bloodsucker who takes precious sanguine juices from victims whenever and wherever he wants, he is also an empathic 'gift-giver' who allows beautiful babes to drink blood from a perennial Christ-like wound in his side, thus, like Uncle Adolf, he is not a totally bad guy, but a man looking out for the interests of his people, which any thinking person

Whilst sleeping like a wee babe in his carriage, Jonathan's anti-anti-Christ/vampire-exterminating paraphernalia is stolen and the coachman is killed, so the novice vampire-hunter must make his way to the vampire palace on foot and on the way he is joined by a dubious gent named Joseph (Hans-Dieter Jendreyko), who more or less helps the revolutionary tread through the countryside in one piece. Scared and superlatively superstitious, the peasants, whose villages have been ravaged by ravenous vamps and their snake-like soldiers, goes so far as even attacking Jonathan in fear of retribution from the Count and his men. Indeed, the vampires seem to have a stern scorched earth policy in which entire town populations are exterminated, churches are reduced to ruins and holy men executed, buildings burned, and farm animals killed as if a SS Einsatzgruppen took a time-machine to 16th century Transylvania. After killing Joseph via dagger after the curious fellow attacks him while sleeping, Jonathan stops by a house to ask for directions to the Count's castle and is greeted by a rather desperate girl who tells him, "You're the last person I'll talk to" and the two inevitably proceed to get hot and heavy in a haystack. Beforehand, the girl shows Jonathan a room where the remaining villagers ritualistically watch one another have communal sex in the hope of repopulating their towns. Although initially petrified like a bashful boy, Jonathan also contributes to the village's lurid Lebensborn program by sharing his amateurish carnal knowledge with the hyper-horny peasant girl and then proceeds to make his way to the Count's castle at night, where he climbs up a wall, entering the luxurious vampire lair through an upstairs window. During an anti-Christ church session where all the vamps at the castle are adorned in blood red robes and are communally draining blood from human slaves, the Count declares, "There is someone in the castle who may be dangerous to us. He is outside in the hallway" and Jonathan is captured literally seconds later, though the vampire Führer takes a strange liking to the young vampire hunter, even welcoming him as a guest and inviting him to enter any room of the castle he wants to, except those locked rooms where vamps drain their victims blood and where human slaves are boarded. Jonathan becomes an object of adoration among a group of debauched vampire whores, but the Count wants him for himself, so he gives the lethally lecherous ladies an infant peasant baby instead so as to appease their appetites. Meanwhile, Jonathan's comrades, led by the elderly Professor, make their way to the Count's castle to carry out their bolshevik-esque revolution. When Johnny boy makes the almost fateful mistake of breaking into a room holding badly malnourished human slaves, who he luckily warns to prepare for the upcoming revolution, he is naturally violently tortured by Gestapo-like vampires in a sadomasochistic and almost homoerotic fashion, even being branded like a farm animals in the process. Luckily, the Professor and his men, with the help of peasants and slaves, take over the Count's castle fortress, killing all his Satanic soldiers in the process and rounding up all the surviving vampires.

In the end, the Count and his undead aristocracy are merely mercilessly forced into the sea, where they die instantly in a rather anti-climatic fashion. As for the Professor, Jonathan, and the rest of the revolutionaries, it is rather dubious whether they will install the humanist utopia of their dreams as vicious vampire-hunters do not exactly equate to great leaders.

Featuring a sort of dually kitschy/classy aesthetic not unlike Fantastique filmmaker Jean Rollin, the politically allegorical vampirism of They Have Changed Their Face (1971) aka Hanno cambiato faccia, a Teutonic and ultimately superior and sacrilegious take on Hammer horror, the surreal sensuality and kaleidoscopic colors of Valerie and Her Week of Wonders (1970), psychosexual and ethereally eerie romantic elements similar to Count Yorga, Vampire (1970) and Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973), the left field genre-smashing of Grave of the Vampire (1972), and tasteless yet cultivated genre-inspired comic relief that transcends Roman Polanski's The Fearless Vampire Killers (1967), Jonathan is undeniably an idiosyncratic and iconoclastic vampire flick and for that reason alone, it is mandatory viewing for fans of the horror subgenre. Of course, politically speaking, Jonathan is rather redundant in its cliché commie message of 'fascists/aristocrats = vampires,' but one can respect director Hans W. Geißendörfer for trying something different and ultimately creating what is undoubtedly the greatest anti-fascist vampire flick ever made. Despite being a blueblood blood-sucker who feeds infants to vampire whores, I actually found the Count to be the most interesting and sympathetic character in the entire film as a melancholy monster with a great eye for aesthetics. In fact, the lead protagonist Jonathan is not much more than an empty and oftentimes annoying robotic vassal who only displays emotions while crying during sex with beautiful busty peasant broads and who follows the orders of his annoyingly idealistic bloodthirsty professor like a mindless slave. Ultimately, at least symbolically speaking, Jonathan works the opposite way as Nosferatu (1922) in that while in Murnau's silent masterpiece the monster is a Judaic-like bloodsucker with a hook nose who invades from the East like Jewry and ravages a pure Aryan village like the plague (something that was historically blamed on Jews), the vampire of Geißendörfer's film is essentially Uncle Adolf without a mustache and it is not a bourgeois Nordic village that is destroyed, but the classically European castle of the Nazi undead. In the end, the proto-bolshevik revolutionaries of Jonathan are not much different than the vampires, as they completely exterminate the vamps with extreme prejudice like it's a walk through the park. In that sense, one could argue that Jonathan is also a critique of communism, albeit a mild one that portrays it as the lesser of two evils. Featuring stunning cinematography by Dutch master cinematographer Robby Müller, who must have deeply studied the landscape paintings of his countrymen Hieronymus Bosch and Pieter Bruegel the Elder in preparation for shooting the film, Jonathan, like most of Geißendörfer's films and not unlike the films of fellow Bavarian filmmakers Werner Herzog and Herbert Achternbusch, is a sort of post-Nazi völkisch flick that, although the director is clearly reluctant about his heritage, culture, and nation's history, cannot but help make a typically Teutonic romantic work, albeit of the culturally cynical and slightly ethno-masochistic sort. Indeed, while Jonathan might seem like outmoded Kulturscheisse when compared to Murnau's Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror and Bavarian adventurer auteur Werner Herzog's Nosferatu the Vampyre, it also happens to be not only one of the best 'horror' films of German New Cinema, but also one of the most the delightfully diacritic vampire films ever made that reminds the viewer that the vampire subgenre is not dead, but undead.

Hans W. Geißendörfer (2005)

Since I am in the process of viewing German auteur Edgar Reitz's mammoth 11 episode and 925-minute magnum opus Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984) aka Heimat - Eine deutsche Chronik, I have been in the mood to watch other 'unconventional' neo-Heimat/anti-Heimat films, which eventually led me to discovering the somewhat recent work Snowland (2005) aka Schneeland directed by Bavarian auteur Hans W. Geißendörfer (Carlos, The Wild Duck aka Die Wildente). Not unlike Reitz, Geißendörfer was a filmmaker associated with German New Cinema who had a series of failures with feature films and, as a result, would become mostly a television auteur who directed a number of ambitious TV miniseries, including Der Zauberberg (1982) aka The Magic Mountain, which is an adaptation of Thomas Mann's highly influential 1924 novel of the same name. Additionally, Geißendörfer is responsible for producing and partly directing the first real Teutonic soap opera, Lindenstraße (1985), which celebrated its 20th anniversary on 11th December 2005 with its 1045th episode and still airs to this day. Before viewing Schneeland, I had only seen Geißendörfer's award-winning debut feature Jonathan (1970) aka Vampire sterben nicht—a rather loose and sardonic 'anti-fascist' adaptation of Bram Stoker's Dracula (1897) of the idiosyncratic Gothic 'anti-Heimat' variety—and I was fairly impressed, even if the film suffers from the sort counter-culture contamination typical of German films from that era. Undoubtedly, Geißendörfer has matured a lot as a filmmaker since he originally directed his first film Jonathan over four decades ago, as Schneeland is easily one of the most emotionally brutal and aesthetically/thematically stark yet paradoxically solacing films I have seen all year, as a work comparable to the malignantly melancholy 'melodramas' of contemporary kraut auteur Matthias Glasner, a filmmaker that managed to make a pathological serial rapist seem sympathetic in his devastating 'rape epic' Der Freie Wille (2006) aka The Free Will starring Jürgen Vogel. A neo-Gothic (anti)Heimat film set in the icy Nordic north about a morbidly depressed Swedish writer who decides to kill herself after her hubby dies tragically in a car accident and goes to the snowy Laplands to carry out her self-annihilation, only to happen upon a frozen elderly female corpse in the snow and discover a dark romance from the 1930s that involved said elderly female corpse, Schneeland is a horribly hopeless and majorly morbid melodrama that ultimately manages to find 'hope' in the most unlikely and unnerving of places and circumstances. Based on the novel Hohaj by Swedish author Elisabeth Rynell, Schneeland is an uncommonly angst and despair-ridden work about dark Nordic souls, redemption, and the will to survive and prevail under the most pathologically pernicious of circumstances, as a work that ultimately makes Noi the Albino (2003) aka Nói albino seem like a soulless pseudo-quirky hipster flick.

SCHNEELAND

As her loving husband Ingmar (Martin Feifel) describes her, Swedish writer Elisabeth (Maria Schrader) is an emotionally plagued woman who finds it “easier to love than be loved.” Of course, when hubby Ingmar dies tragically and unexpectedly around Christmas time in a car wreck, Elisabeth develops an absolutely hysterical and decidedly debilitating level of anguish and melancholy, so she quickly decides to leave her young children with relatives and heads to the Laplands—a sparsely populated winter wonderland where she originally met her deceased husband—where she plans to end her life prematurely. On the way there, Elisabeth’s car breaks down in a blinding snowstorm, so she seeks help in the only cabin in sight, only to find that the elderly occupant has frozen to death and that all the animals on the farm have starved to death as a result in a horrifying scene that resembles a ‘Heimat Apocalypse.’ Upon entering the dead woman’s cabin and reading her old letters/diaries/etc., Elisabeth begins to piece together the life of the frozen dead woman, whose name was Ina (played popular German actress Julia Jentsch, who looks like a German equivalent to Anna Paquin, albeit much prettier). From there, Schneeland mostly focuses on a unlikely love story between peasant girl Ina—the true protagonist of the film—and a young and stoic stranger who is uncommonly handsome for a homeless man. Flashback to the 1930s, Ina’s life is forever changed when a wayfaring stranger named Aron (mainstream German actor Thomas Kretschmann) and his loyal dog Lurv mysteriously show up in the Laplands after traveling from an island halfway to Iceland (Aron speaks the Insular Nordic language of Faroese). Before meeting Ina, Aron is taken in as a lodger by husband and wife, Salomon (Oliver Stokowski) and Helga (Ina Weisse), but after the lady of the house becomes discernibly infatuated with the rather handsome stranger, it is decided by a handful of townspeople that he become a herdsman and live outside with the horses. Meanwhile, young lady Ina lives with her parents, who are subsistence farmers, not far from Aron’s new outdoor residence. When her mother drops dead, Ina becomes the brutalized sex slave of her incestuous father Knövel (Ulrich Mühe of Michael Haneke’s Funny Games (1997) and Florian Henckel von Donnersmarck’s The Lives of Others (2006), among countless other popular German-language films), who is a disfigured and demented hunchback who regards “life as his worst enemy” and who is fittingly nicknamed “Old Satan” by locals. Since Ina refuses to have sex with her creepily cold and callous father, he beats her into it, but she always resists and sometimes manages to get away. Of course, it is only a matter of time before Ina takes revenge against her insanelly insidious devil of a daddy and Aron will be the sort of human archangel that will give her the strength to do so.

When Ina notices handsome Aron while frolicking around the cold countryside, she becomes infatuated and begins leaving him anonymous presents, thus ushering in their unconventional yet deeply romantic relationship. Not only is Ina obsessed with Aron’s rather masculine handsomeness, but she sees him as a savior and redeemer who will save her from her miserable monster of a fucked father. Somewhat autistic and socially retarded due to her exceedingly 'eccentric' upbringing as a forsaken girl deflowered by her own father and nurtured with incest, Ina decides one day to get totally naked in the freezing cold and offers herself to Aron. Instead of becoming sexually aroused by her unclad display, Aron is somewhat disturbed by Ina's senseless sensual offering and immediately bundles her up in a blanket, thus demonstrating he is a true gentleman and protector and not some sick and craven sex fiend like Knövel. Meanwhile, Knövel gets his head busted in after a failed attempt at sexually pillaging his daughter, so Ina is forced to care for the now-bedridden old devil, which includes using hay to wipe excrement from his satanic shit-covered ass, among other aberrant things that no daughter should be expected to do, but she perseveres due to her love for Aron. Whilst making love, Ina proclaims her love to Aron by stating "You healed me... You've cleaned me..." and he responds by stating "You've redeemed me." And, indeed, Aron is not merely bullshitting to get a piece of Swedish tail because, as he confesses to Ina, his real name is not 'Aron' but 'Kjartan Holt' and he killed a man as a teenager who been using his widowed mother and has thus wandered somewhat aimlessly ever since as a form of self-ordained penance for his sins. After receiving Ina's unconditional love and affection, Aron feels like he has finally reached atonement and the two decide to marry. Knowing her fiend for a father will attempt to impede on her upcoming marriage, Ina decides to take preventive action and murders 'Old Satan' Knövel, but unfortunately something tragic happens to Aron aka Kjartan around the same time. Emotionally shattered, Ina still manages to tread on as she is pregnant with Aron's unborn child. Flashback to the present, Elisabeth becomes completely inspired by Ina's story of being able to live on after the death of her beloved and decides against killing herself. In the end, Elisabeth decides to return back to her children and they assumedly live happily ever after, or something approximating that.

A sort of Nordic neo-Gothic It's a Wonderful Life (1946) from Heimat hell, Schneeland is, among other things, easily one of the most dispiriting and gruesome yet strangely inspiring films I have ever seen, as if director Hans W. Geisendörfer found a small gleam of hope from the homelands and decided to reinvent the Heimat film for the pre-apocalyptic age in a totally trying celluloid work that, despite its daringly dark and disconcerting storyline, ultimately has a positive message about the ability to persevere with life, even under the most debasing and soul-sucking of circumstances. Beautifully shot (the film won "Best Cinematography" at the Deutscher Filmpreis aka German Film Awards in 2005) yet fiercely foreboding and 'coldly' ominous in most of its tone, Schneeland is ultimately more of a Heimat film than an anti-Heimat film in that it demonstrates one can learn priceless lessons from the past, especially when comparing it to the petty problems of the present day. Indeed, although protagonist Elisabeth loses her husband in a car accident, her concerns seem almost frivolous when compared to the unspeakable trauma and tragedy that Ina suffered, thus giving her the ability to cope with the pain and suffering that life has dealt her. Indeed, a popular Hollywood drama like Prisoners (2013) seems like epic pseudo-emotional counterfeit celluloid gibberish when compared to the melancholic majesty of a true unsung, albeit slightly unhinged, masterpiece like Schneeland; a virtual naked expression of the Germanic geist in the deracinated postmodern age of globalization and cultural mongrelization. Although auteur Geissendörfer failed to gain the international fame and prestige that Fassbinder, Wenders, and Schlöndorff did, he is probably the only filmmaker associated with German New Cinema who has evolved as a filmmaker over the past four decades ago or so. Additionally, Schneeland also demonstrates a sense of maturity, spirituality, and unwavering passion that the contemporary works of Wenders and Schlöndorff certainly lack. The sort of Heimat film aberrant-garde auteur Marian Dora might have directed had he had the budget, religious background (Geissendörfer's father was a Bavarian clergyman), and over four decades of experience fiddling with Heimat genre conventions, Schneeland is an audaciously unadulterated expression of the 'white iceman's' soul that never wallows in cheap and petty Americanized sentimentalism, but goes straight to the gut with the sort of unfazed artistic fortitude that one would expect from an ancient Berserker running through flames. That being said, If you're morbidly depressed this Christmas season and thinking about offing yourself, watch and bask in the gorgeously grotesque glory of Schneeland so you can come to the important realization that you're a spineless pussy living in a soft era of emasculation and self-pity and that a early-twentieth-century farm girl has more balls than you do.

SCARABEA: HOW MUCH LAND DOES A MAN NEED?

Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (1969)

While the figurative ‘heart’ of New German Cinema, emotionally erratic and singularly manipulative enfant terrible Rainer Werner Fassbinder, oftentimes went to great pains to mock and ridicule the insatiable greed of kraut fat cats in post-Wirtschaftswunder West Germany as is especially indicated by Mario Adorf’s character in his keenly kaleidoscopic Josef von Sternberg homage Lola (1981), the tragic auteur’s blueblooded Wagernite nemesis Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Hitler: A Film from Germany, Parsifal) directed what is arguably the most bizarre, grotesque, and oddly oneiric cinematic assault on post-WWII kraut capitalism of the greedy fat fuck oriented sort. Indeed, Syberberg’s Scarabea - wieviel Erde braucht der Mensch? (1969) aka Scarabea: How Much Land Does a Man Need?—the auteur’s first narrative feature following a number of totally Teutonic documentaries, including the Romy Schneider doc Romy. Porträt eines Gesichts (1967) aka Romy: Anatomy of a Face—is a strange little celluloid beast of the quasi-counterculture krautploitation persuasion that seems like what might happen if a German crypto-nationalist attempted to reconcile the world classic guido exploitation of Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prosperi à la Mondo Cane with the visceral and primitive prole poetry of cinematic poet Pier Paolo Pasolini. As the film’s title hints, it borrow its major motifs from Leo Tolstoy’s classic short story How Much Land Does a Man Require? (1886), though, more importantly, it also features references to writings from figures ranging from National Socialist Expressionist poet Gottfried Benn to decadent Italian fascist dramatist Luigi Pirandello. Not unlike many of Syberberg’s cinematic works, Scarabea is a curious combination of high and lowbrow art, albeit in a somewhat different way. Indeed, instead of the high-camp kitsch of his classic features like Hitler: A Film from Germany, Syberberg’s debut basks in the viscerally grotesque and genetically deformed. Shot over the course of seven weeks when the auteur was only 32 years old, the film is certainly a noble effort in Syberberg’s oeuvre. In fact, Syberberg would proudly describe how the film “completely satisfies” him after completing it in an interview in Der Spiegel. Of course, little did Syberberg realize that he would eventually reinvent Teutonic cinema and start a virtual one-man aesthetic renaissance that demonstrated that Germans did not have to be afraid of making innately Germanic films.

Syberberg before Syberberg actually became Syberberg, Scarabea was made when the auteur was still a work-in-progress as a cinematic artist before he discovered the operatic films of Werner Schroeter, completely revamped and refined his entire cinematic aesthetic, further embraced his Aryan birthright, and directed the first film in his celebrated ‘Germany trilogy’ Ludwig - Requiem für einen jungfräulichen König (1972) aka Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King. More like Jacopetti meets Herzog on acid and heroin than Wagner meets Brecht like his later films, Syberberg's first feature—a film about a fat and sloppy middle-aged Teutonic lecher that makes a bet for a large piece of land that involves him taking a dangerous odyssey in the Italian bandit island of Sardinia—features unsimulated animal killings and dismemberment, retarded and/or crippled guido peasants, rotten maggot-covered carcasses, low-key bum fights, ecstatic primitive Goddess Nenia breast milk rituals, and various other memorable scenarios that blur the line between the real and surreal in a manner not unlike unhinged heeb Harmony Korine's debut feature Gummo (1997). Featuring an original quasi-psychedelic musical score by Eugen Thomass, who later composed music for Syberberg's three-hour biopic Karl May (1974), and cinematography by Petrus R. Schlömp (Johannes Schaaf's Tätowierung (1967) aka Tattoo) that ranges from primitive cinéma-vérité-like garbage to highly stylized celluloid majesty, Syberberg's first feature is indubitably an uneven experiment in eccentricity that sometimes feel like it was directed by an autistic pothead with a BS degree in Teutonic literature yet it is surely one of the more intriguing German films of the late-1960s. In short, the film is certainly no cinematic 'Gesamtkunstwerk' like Syberberg's later great cinematic masterpieces, but it does arguably hold the distinction of being what can be described as the first (and arguably the last) proto-Alt-Right artsploitation flick. Indeed, featuring hilarious real-life racial 'caricatures,' goofy snickering retards and sneering cripples, and a genuinely subversive metapolitical right-wing Weltanschauung of the abstractly expressed sort, Scarabea features the sort of aggressive anti-liberal spirit that is comparable to a contemporary Pepe-saluting internet troll army.

Notably, long before Syberberg was accused of being a sinister anti-Semite and virtual neo-Nazi after the publication of his script for Hitler: A Film from Germany and especially after the release of his still-untranslated book Vom Unglück und Glück der Kunst in Deutschland nach dem letzten Kriege (1990) aka On the Misfortune and Fortune of Art in Germany after the Last War, the filmmaker was attacked by a certain popular German left-wing film critic for supposedly being a tad bit culturally insensitive. Indeed, in a review featured in his New Left film journal Filmkritik, Enno Patalas—a film historian and film preservationist that was heavily influenced by kosher (anti)kraut commie Siegfried Kracauer—unsoundly complained in regard to Scarabea: "Syberberg shows us a German . . . tourist on Sardinia, who eats like a pig, is loud, chases women, is ignorant about Gottfried Benn, and drinks too much wine . . . Thus prepared, it should come as no surprise that Syberberg has the same arrogant attitude to Sardinia and its people as his protagonist." Of course, anyone that carefully watches Syberberg's film can see that Patalas' claim is nothing if not patently absurd, not least of all because the bungling and boorish kraut protagonist is portrayed as a bigger buffoon than a bunch of illiterate and sometimes mentally retarded dirty Sardinian peasants. In fact, it is ultimately the protagonist's absurd arrogance and unwarranted pride that leads to his somewhat predictable yet nonetheless poignantly pathetic downfall. While I am just speculating, I have to assume that left-wing pansy Patalas was offended by the fact that the film quotes the poetry of a one-time-Nazi like Benn and features a less than flattering depiction of flower children, but then again the film also critiques both Hollywood and capitalist exploitation, thereupon making it appeal enough to the average left-wing lemming that they might get a slight momentary hard-on by watching it.

A walking and talking racial caricature that embodies virtually every negative stereotype that is associated with Germans, Scarabea protagonist Georg Wilhelm Bach (Walter Buschhoff of Clive Donner's Babes in Toyland (1986) starring Drew Barrymore) is a fat, red-faced, and alcohol-addled kraut blockhead businessman that, not unlike many post-WWII Germans, suffers from a sort of semi-unconscious materialistic nihilism where he lives and breathes solely for the pursuit of acquiring land, capital, and fancy food, even though none of these things seem to bring him any sorts of happiness. Childless but married to a frigid woman he does not love, Bach clearly lacks any sort of emotional support, hence his nihilistic worship of materialism. After all, as a Heimat-less mensch whose nation was both physically and spiritually annihilated when he was just a young chap, Bach has nothing else to live for. A World War II veteran that became a semi-successful businessman after inheriting a hotel from his father, Herr Bach has come to Sardinia to procure some land because he dreams of building a thriving resort spot on the primitive goombah island. Upon arriving in Sardinia in a lame convertible that he clearly feels 'cool' and 'hip' driving, Bach clearly feels he has power simply because he has wealth and immediately begins hitting on an inordinately statuesque eponymous beauty named Scarabea (Nicoletta Machiavelli, who, as her surname reveals, was indeed a direct descendant of sociopathic Renaissance philosopher Niccolò Machiavelli), who is a sort of subtly sinister flower child femme fatale that seems to get a sadistic kick out of leading the protagonist along a pernicious path of transcendental self-destruction. A girl with a French passport but two German parents that seemingly loves wandering around aimlessly and engaging in artsy fartsy leisure activities like photography and acoustic guitar playing, Scarabea is surely a cosmopolitan kind of gal, though that does not stop her from basking in the pleasantly perverse poetry of naughty one-time-Nazi Gottfried Benn. In fact, Scarabea recites the following lines from the Benn poem "What's Bad" to Herr Bach: "Not reading English, and hearing about a new English thriller that hasn't been translated. Seeing a cold beer when it's hot out, and not being able to afford it. Having an idea that you can't encapsulate in a line of Hölderlin, the way the professors do. Hearing the waves beat against the shore on holiday at night, and telling yourself it's what they always do. Very bad: being invited out, when your own room at home is quieter, the coffee is better, and you don't have to make small talk. And worst of all: not to die in summer, when the days are long and the earth yields easily to the spade.” While Bach does not know anything about Benn or his poetry, he will die in the summer during a long day in a fashion worthy of a Benn poem.

After meeting with a somewhat refined old chap named ‘The Count’ (played by real-life part-Jewish Count and Roberto Rossellini collaborator Franz von Treuberg), Bach is able to make a clearly too-good-to-be-true bet with the local peasants and their mayor to acquire a very large piece of land, including a scenic beach spot, if he manages to personally hike through said land before sunset during a single day. If Bach loses the bet, he will have to give away 10,000 marks and his car to the winners. For the local Sardinians, especially the Mayor, it is more or less a win-win situation since they want Bach to build up the area and turn it into a thriving resort spot, thus they welcome his success. After all, to the piss poor peasants of Sardinia, most of the land is worthless and riddled with animal carcasses. Ultimately, Bach becomes the main attraction of a large folk festival where he is inevitably unwittingly sacrificed to his own greed in a doubly ironical fashion where he croaks after passing the finish line. Indeed, while Bach proudly proclaims to be as “tough as Rommel” when it comes to business, he has the physique of a Jewish pawnshop owner and surely was never worthy of being even a mid-level commander like a SS-Hauptsturmführer, let alone an amateur hiker-cum-mountaineer. Still, somehow some of the local yokels seem to have faith in Bach in being successful in his journey, even though a couple locals severely embarrass him at the beginning of the film before the bet is even made by forcing him to drop his pants in front of Scarabea during a mock armed robbery. Of course, no kraut is a match for the lowbrow Machiavellian madness of island guidos, including a greedy buffoon with a busted moral compass like Bach.

While the film more or less features a simple coherent storyline for about the first 30 minutes or so, things get a little bit inexplicable once Bach starts his journey and is eventually engulfed in a sort of anti-paradisical psychodrama of the highly hallucinatory sort that might be best described as a Mediterranean mix of heaven and hell where the protagonist is the unwitting guest of honor. Indeed, not long after seemingly dying while trying in vain to climb hot mountain rocks, Bach falls into a ocean and somehow magically ends up on a beach with Scarabea where he expresses absolutely ecstatic orgasmic delight while gluttonously feasting on a lavish buffet that could feed a small African nation. While a twink-like teenage peasant boy lubes up Scarabea’s lush unclad tanned bod, Bach chows down on lobster tails and tropical fruit like a rabid starving animal while asking his seemingly half-autistic female consort questions that she does not bother to answer. After the feast, Bach and his would-be-babe have a merry time playing in the ocean with fancy translucent inner tube chairs in a semi-surreal scene that seems to mock the idea of a bourgeois utopia. Needless to say, as a somewhat fat and stocky fellow, Bach is not exactly the most mobile of men, so he mainly watches Scarabea as she demonstrates her great propensity for good and hearty child's play. Before parting company so that the protagonist can finish his journey, Bach and Scarabea go on a deceptively joyous boat ride, but not before the former massages the latter's completely naked body in a scene that is more absurd than it is sensual. While on the boat, Bach expresses his disillusionment with life and even his big hotel plans while Scarabea does not even bother to pretend to listen in what is the one moment in the entire film where the male protagonist is honest with himself. Although a seemingly unimportant throwaway scene, Bach's confession is a crucial moment in the film as it reveals both his pathetic humanity and hidden disillusionment with life in general, thus making his tragic demise at the conclusion of the film seem all the more tragically fitting in the end.

While Bach is finishing up his journey, an exploitative film crew led by a grotesquely fat slob of a director with an ambiguously Hebraic essence arrives in the area and begins documenting the locals in a fashion that puts Jacopetti and Prospero to shame in terms of sheer sleaze and unscrupulousness, but of course as the Count notes in regard to the appetite of mainstream audiences, "The people don't actually want to see documentaries. SEX, CRIME, VIOLENCE!" Indeed, locals are so desperate to be in the film that friends stab friends for posterity and regular peasants attempt to personify the legendary bandits that Sardinia is best known for. When a filmmaker sees Scarabea sporting sort of commie-chic revolutionary garb and shooting an image of Leonardo da Vinci's drawing Vitruvian Man (1490) that somehow manages to bleed in a symbolic scene that represents the pathological urge of the counterculture generation to mindlessly destroy all of Occidental culture and history with great self-annihilating glee, he is so impressed that he offers to make her a "big star." While more or less maintaining her somewhat unsettling flat affect, Scarabea takes up the filmmaker's Faustian offer and begins shooting scenes that seem more like a Sardinian take on the Hollywood western genre than any sort of documentary. Meanwhile, bloated bad boy Bach becomes possessed by horrifying hallucinations involving dung beetles playing with dung and seemingly gallons upon gallons of freshly squeezed human breast milk. Indeed, Bach has so much breast milk squirted on him that he looks as if King Kong busted a load on his face after a rough inter-species blowjob. In what seems like a bad omen towards the end of the film, Bach passes a lynched bird hanging from a tree while a lame multicultural psychedelic rock band plays in the background. When Bach gets near the finish line, he curiously decides to sit down and rest to look at some of the photos that he has taken during his journey using a camera that he borrowed from Scarabea. When Bach hears peasants cheering his long waited arrival while examining the photos, he finally decides to get off his fat ass and reach the finish line, but soon drops dead while disappointed peasants look on and somberly state things like "he won so much land." In terms of the position of his lifeless corpse and even his clothing, Bach's freshly dead carcass strangely foreshadows the highly publicized assassination of Theo van Gogh, which is certainly fitting considering the anarchic and anti-politically-correct nature of Scarabea. As for Scarabea, she is quite visibly unmoved by Bach's rather pathetic ironical death, though she circles around his body and carefully examines photographs that were taken by the forsaken protagonist with her camera. Of course, it certainly could be argued that Scarabea's flagrant apathy in regard to Bach's demise is symbolic of post-WWII German alienation and the state-sponsored antisocial tendency of contemporary Germans to not care for each other or the survival of their nation (in that sense, the film is certainly more relevant today than when it was first released nearly half a century ago). After all, auteur Syberberg is (in)famous for once stating regarding his nation, "We live in a country without a homeland." As for Herr Bach, he only finds death upon attempting to find a new and hardly improved Heimat, but of course he never realized that no amount of land would fill the void that a lack of culture, spirituality, and family had left in his sad forsaken soul.

SCARABEA: HOW MUCH LAND DOES A MAN NEED?

Described by auteur Syberberg himself as a "surreal fairy tale," Scarabea is certainly a strange and eccentric cinematic work of the sometimes esoteric sort where the auteur demonstrates his keen contempt hippie scum, kraut capitalist pigs, and smug pseudo-documentarians and exploitative Hollywood hacks, as well as love of classic kraut literature, ancient Occidental kultur of both the low-brow and highbrow sort, and hot guido bitches with fancy surnames like Machiavelli. While the film is indubitably aesthetically subversive, especially compared to the films of other hot Teutonic filmmakers of the time like Alexander Kluge and Volker Schlöndorff, it is unmistakable 'culturally' conservative in terms of sentiment, even if it is not as apparent as in Syberberg's later cinematic (after all, even Syberberg's second feature, San Domingo (1970), also features a severe critique of the counterculture generation and their ethno-masochistic fetishization of militant black nationalist negroes and miscegenation). It should be noted that American left-wing Judaic film critic J. Hoberman once described Syberberg, as well as Andrei Tarkovsky and Stan Brakhage, as a "conservative avant-gardist" and even dared to criticize his films for being supposedly "terminally German," thus underscoring his characteristic kosher Teutophobia. Although I guess it does not say much considering the shamelessly Wagnerian essence of his later cinematic work, but I think it is safe to say that, due to its guido island setting and eclectic collection of grotesque Sardinian peasants, Scarabea is Syberberg's least "terminally German" film, though it is certainly more innately Teutonic than anything that trendy left-wingers like feminist hag Margarethe von Trotta, half-Hindu commie Harun Farocki, or Mercedes Marxist Volker Schlöndorff has ever directed. Also, while the film might not be an obvious 'Trauerarbeit' ("work of mourning") piece, it certainly expresses the Syberbergian themes of 'freudlose Gesellschaft' ("joyless society") and 'Auslöschung' ("extinction"), especially as far as the tragic spiritually and culturally moribund male protagonist is concerned. Unlike most of the left-wing German filmmakers and the quite insanely immature neo-Marxist rock stars of the Baader-Meinhof Gang, Syberberg had at least enough maturity and empathy to understand that the capitalist pigs of his Fatherland were oftentimes tragic individuals that had sold their souls to nihilistic materialism and thus were doomed to live a patently pointless existence plagued by insatiable greed and social alienation.

Out of all the films I can think of, Scarabea somewhat ironically reminded me the most of the agitprop artsploitation pieces of underrated iconoclastic Italian auteur Alberto Cavallone (Spell – Dolce mattatoio aka Man, Woman & Beast, Blue Movie). In terms of its anarchic storyline, exotic locations and/or extras, entrancing dreamlike essence, obsession with the grotesque, arcane references to art and politics, deconstruction of Hollywood genre conventions, and statuesque quasi-autistic women, Syberberg's debut certainly has much in common with Cavallone (anti)classics like Le salamandre (1969), Quickly, spari e baci a colazione (1971), Afrika (1973), and Zelda (1974), among others. Additionally, in terms of being a hallucinatory psychedelic cult flick about terribly naive and decadent bourgeois foreigners wasting away on a primitive Mediterranean island, Syberberg's flick shares many similarities with the bizarre Spanish Dennis Hopper vehicle Bloodbath (1979) aka The Sky Is Falling aka Las flores del vicio directed by Silvio Narizzano. Of course, the flick can also be compared to a couple German films like Roland Klick's Deadlock (1970) and Veit Relin's counter-culture Friedrich Schiller adaptation Chamsin (1972), but neither of these films are considered part of the New German Cinema movement that Syberberg belonged to (To be fair, Syberberg's film does share some superficial similarities with Werner Herzog's debut feature Lebenszeichen (1968) aka Signs of Life in terms of its exotic Mediterranean setting). Indeed, it is certainly a humorous irony of New German Cinema history that one of the movement's oldest and most conservative and aristocratic filmmakers was also responsible for some of its strangest and most subversive films. Somewhat strangely, especially considering his reputation among serious and not-so-serious film critics and historians and trendy leftist-wing intellectuals like Susan Sontag, Gilles Deleuze and Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe, there is not one single mention of Syberberg in Amos Vogel's would-be-authoritative text Film as a Subversive Art (1974). Notably, New German Cinema's most famous and legendary filmmaker, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, was more or less Syberberg's greatest arch nemesis and wasted no opportunity to besmirch both the filmmaker and his films. In fact, in his 1981 'Hitlist of German Films,' Fassbinder named Scarabea and Syberberg's later film Karl May (1974) as two of 'The Most Disgusting' films of New German Cinema. While the film does feature tons of animal corpses and slaughtering, animal feces, and saucy Sardinian titty milk and thus can be described as, by definition, 'disgusting,' Scarabea is disgusting in a preternaturally delightful fashion. Additionally, none of the scenes in Syberberg's film is as unnerving as the slaughterhouse scene in Fassbinder's morbid avant-garde melodrama In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden (1978) aka In a Year of 13 Moons.

In a 2008 speech entitled Hans-Jürgen Syberberg: Leni Riefenstahl's Heir?, the late great British artist and intellectual Jonathan Bowden noted in regard to the filmmaker's singular (meta)political importance in terms of being the one and only post-WWII German filmmaker to figuratively pass on the Teutonic cultural torch, "Syberberg's politics is less important than the spirituality of the artistry that he represents. As with all extremely visual artists like him, describing what he's done makes a lot more sense if you've actually seen the material, but of course very few people are entirely aware that this material exists, even though probably a lot of that comes up on the internet almost instantaneously in English. But the reason for this is because people understand what he's doing. He's positioned himself to be the repository of the sort of sensibility, which didn't come to an end in 1945, that certain forms of German classicism that are not particularly redolent of it. There are certain forms of German medieval art that don't really relate to it. There's something rather trans-German and quasi-Catholic and German in the European sense, in Nietzsche's sense of being European as against German, about him. And there's not very much Protestant in my view about his art aesthetically, for example. But he is the repository of the Romantic völkisch sensibility which people know is quintessentially German and yet is largely denied apart from tourism and a few prissy things now. But it is ideologically denied in contemporary Germany." As Bowden's remarks indubitably reveal, Syberberg's films are certainly less accessible to American audiences, yet they contain a perennial spirit that should be celebrated by the growing Alt-Right movement, which thirsts for a true cultural inheritance. I certainly think it is a happy coincidence that Alt-Right animator Emily Youcis looks like a more busy yet eccentric version of Scarabea heroine Nicoletta Machiavelli, which makes sense considering they are both of half-Italian extraction. Interestingly, what no one seems to have noticed about Syberberg is that, not unlike Youcis, he is a very able troll as the subversive subtexts of his film reveal, albeit a rather refined one. Indeed, no other filmmaker in history can be said to have come up with brilliant ideas like allegorically depicting the rampant cultural philistinism of post-WWII 'democratic' Germany via a fat kraut pig that has no idea who Gottfried Benn is. Similarly, only Syberberg could have 'tricked' kosher carpenter-muncher Susan 'the white race is the cancer of human history' Sontag into declaring that he is one of the great masters of cinema history and even stating, "Syberberg belongs to the race of creators like Wagner, Artaud, Céline, the late Joyce, whose work annihilates other work. All are artists of endless speaking, endless melody—a voice that goes on and on." Needless to say, due its relative lack of cultural richness and subtextual significance compared to the filmmaker's later films, Scarabea is probably a good start for Syberberg novices, even if it almost like an exercise in advancing trolling when compared to the aesthetic and intellectual majesty of an unrivaled masterwork like Hitler: A Film from Germany.

SAN DOMINGO
SAN DOMINGO

Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (1970)

Not unlike Herr Heimat Edgar Reitz with Mahlzeiten (1967) aka Lußt For Love and Rainer Werner Fassbinder with Love Is Colder Than Death (1969), among countless other auteur filmmakers of German New Cinema, Prussian conservative auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Karl May, Parsifal) demonstrated with his second feature San Domingo (1970)—a modernist (anti)counter-culture update of German Romantic poet Heinrich von Kleist's novella Betrothal in St. Domingo aka (1811) Die Verlobung in Santo Domingo—that he was still in his formative years as a film director and was heavily inspired by the films of French New Wave, as well as various neorealist works. Indeed, Syberberg did not really become Syberberg until after discovering the high-camp kitsch epics of queer kraut dandy Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Salome), digging into his nation's past and myths, and releasing the first film in his 'Germany Trilogy', Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King (1972) aka Ludwig - Requiem für einen jungfräulichen König, yet San Domingo reveals that the auteur had already formed a subversive anti-leftist/anti-counter-culture Weltanschauung and had an affinity for the documentary form that he would never abandon, even utilizing such elements in his monolithic magnum opus Hitler, ein Film aus Deutschland (1977) aka Hitler: A Film from Germany. Based on a then-controversial work by von Kleist about an interracial relationship between a white man and black woman set during the Haitian Revolution of 1804 when, to quote the novelist, "the natives were murdering the white men" (pg. 71), San Domingo depicts an exceedingly disillusioned, ethno-masochistic, and spiritually patricidal Fatherland where young adults of all stripes want to overthrow the government, recreation drug use is rampant, young girls are willing to bare it all for porn films for just a couple bucks, and stupid hippie hairdos are the norm. Centering on a sort of hopelessly naïve Aryan Christ from a wealthy family who becomes the perfect pawn of a socially ostracized Viennese mulatto and her cracker commune comrades that want to steal the blond Bobo's money, San Domingo depicts how the counter-culture movement was so proficient at destroying the minds and lives of normal people from well bred families. A black-and-white psychedelic micro-epic of the anti-anti-Heimat variety that acts a sort of kraut equivalent to Dennis Hopper's Easy Rider (1969) and Monte Hellman's Two-Lane Blacktop (1971) featuring a highly complimentary award-winning score by krautrock founders Amon Düül II, San Domingo demonstrates like no other film that Marlon Brando's performance in The Wild One (1951) had a decidedly devastating influence on West German youth.

A true believer in the absurd myth of the 'noble savage,' hippie philistine nobleman Michael König (played by Michael König, who would go on to play the hippie lead in the two early Fassbinder flicks, The Niklashausen Journey (1970) and Rio das Mortes (1971)) emerges from the wild jungles of West Germany after fleeing his posh parents' nice big home with virtually nothing to his name, hitches a ride from a taxi that he does not have enough money to pay for, and ends up at a Munich-based rocker commune inhabited by hash heads and other discernibly unclean untermensch rabble. Upon learning that Michael is rich, the scheming anti-social rockers, who cannot bother to work nor earn money in any even remotely honest way, come up with the bright bohemian idea to have one of their whores, a mulatto named Alice (Alice Ottawa), pretend to fall in love with the rich boy and then send a letter to his parents claiming that he has been kidnapped demanding a ransom. Somewhat reluctantly, Alice agrees after being offered $10 grand of the ransom money. A proud negrophile who states, "It must be beautiful there...Jungle...Desert...It's warm... and wild animals. The people...I'd imagine they are way nicer. San Domingo," yet not realizing that San Domingo is the former name of Haiti where the black population exterminated the entire white population, Michael finds himself instantly infatuated with Alice and follows her during her various failed job attempts around Munich. When attempting to get a modeling job, Alice is denied because of her un-Aryan persuasion and told that the "white majority, average Joes" do not fancy negroes because "they haven't realized yet that black is beautiful." When Michael finally gathers the courage to ask Alice about her ancestry, she unsentimentally states, "My father was a real black-blooded mother-fucking nigger and I'm his daughter. My mother was a nanny. She was a junkie and sold me to a circus when I was five. My grandmother got me out there... My mother died when she was 30. Speaking of...my grandfather was an aristocrat. A knight. I have blue blood in me," thus demonstrating the degeneration of Teutonic blood in the post-WWII/post-empire age. On top of revealing that her American Negro father has the humorous name of 'James Mason' and lives in Virginia, Alice discusses how she was married to a pimp who tried to whore her out and beat her up (she has seven large scars across her body), but she later joined a Brazilian ballet company whose members would later beat her husband up and he never bothered her again.

Failing to find work, Alice barely says yes to playing a token Negro in a porn flick directed by an arrogant degenerate named Sigi (played by Sigi Graue, who starred in Volker Schlöndorff's adaptation of Baal (1970) starring Fassbinder) and ends up being reduced to tears after starring in a sleazy scene where she shows off her pussy while playing with a couple pussycats. Meanwhile, the members of the rocker group get in a verbal 'gang fight' with a rival group of communist student activists called the 'Red Cells,' which results in a pansy fight between a member from each group. While the leader of the Red Cell group pompously states, "We've proven that we're not just talking. At the university we stopped the professors from teaching their crap. We actually did it...we obstructed the system a bit" as proof of superiority to their slightly more barbaric contemporaries, the leftist intellectuals are just as deluded as the uneducated rockers in their unhinged utopian dreams and their senseless desire to destroy West Germany. Undoubtedly, the most debauched yet laidback member of the rockers is a fellow named Schorsch, who absurdly confesses to Alice and Michael, "I declared myself a German poet because I think they deserve it again. Germany either gets World Wars or Poets, so I gave them a Poet. I intend to revolutionize the film business. I want to shoot a German comedy." Meanwhile, Michael's wealthy yet feeble and emotionally vacant aristocratic parents (with the mother being played by Werner Schroeter superstar Carla Egerer, who is around the same age as lead Michael König) are getting all moody and broody at their mansion after agreeing to pay the ransom money, with the father declaring, "Disgusting. There are terrible people in this world." Ultimately, the terrible people get their money, but the problem is that Alice ends up falling in love with Michael. When the Rockers reveal to Michael that they used him for his money and that they want nothing to do with him, he flips out and stabs Alice to death. While sitting beside her lifeless corpse, Michael is approached by one of the more sophisticated rockers, Hasi (Wolfgang Haas), who states, "It was serious. She never loved someone like you before. Stupid boy." Seconds after learning of his mistake, Michael decides to commit Seppuku and drives the same knife he killed with Alice into his lovelorn hippie heart. Ultimately, San Domingo closes with the rockers driving away on their motorcycles and the following quotes from serial rapist/early Black Panther leader Eldridge Cleaver: "We shall have our manhood. We shall have it or the earth will be leveled by our attempts to gain it."

Naturally, since San Domingo was probably the only film of its time to be unwaveringly critical of the counter-culture movement and leftwing utopianism in general, the work was venomously attacked by German critics, thus inspiring Syberberg to give up on contemporary events (or as he stated himself, "After this film [San Domingo] there remained only the possibility of a radical new beginning") and instead immersed himself in his Fatherland's dark and mystical past, which was ultimately for the better as he sired his masterful and totally singular 'German Trilogy' (Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King, Karl May, Hitler: A Film from Germany). Despite its failure to appeal to culturally cuckolded film critics, San Domingo did manage to snag the 1971 Deutscher Filmpreis for 'Best Cinematography' and 'Best Music.' While not up to par with Syberberg's subsequent heterosexual 'high-camp' Gesamtkunstwerk films, San Domingo is important simply because it provides a voice of sanity at a time when Germany had been seduced by neo-bolshevik baloney, cultural retardation, philo-Semitism, feminism, infantile utopian ideals, and a will towards destruction for destruction's sake. Cleverly utilizing kraut commie Bertolt Brecht's technique of knocking down the fourth wall against the left, San Domingo, which mainly featured non-actors 'playing themselves' (aka hippie degenerates acting like hippie degenerates), goes so far as featuring lead Michael König going completely out of character and stating directly to the audience as himself: "People, listen up. I need to tell you something. In this movie I play a part. The others don't, but I do. I was paid for it. The thing is this. The guy I'm playing has a consciousness that's not mine. It's like that: The people smoke, take drugs. I've done that too, 'til about half a year ago. I was able to make use of it in a specific way. It gave me revolutionary impulses. Through LSD, for example, I've realized the possibilities of mankind. That there is matter, something we know nothing about. And this matter, you know refers to the future...to something we could experience...to a change, to something great, awesome, and different." Indeed, not unlike self-described 'conservative' auteur Paul Morrissey's films with Warhol, Syberberg wasted no effort in assembling the most miserable and unwitting motley crew of deluded debauchees he could find for San Domingo, as if they had no idea they were starring in a film that was meant to mock their very existence and wayward way of life. With mindless morons who spout gibberish slogans like "destroy that which destroys you," "Capitalism needs to be destroyed by any means necessary. There are no bad means, everything is valid to destroy capitalism," and "Crazy! The most beautiful word," San Domingo is best looked at today as a quirky 'New Right' comedy created by a true cinematic great during his formative years. Indeed, as a film that invokes the conveniently forgotten genocide of whites (i.e. French frogs) by savage negroes with its very title, not to mention its inclusion of sleazy communist pornographers (with Lenin and Rosa Luxemburg posters adorning their walls), a mischling noble-negro leading lady, and dumb ass drugged-out kraut rockers, San Domingo is a Teutonic tragicomedy with Prussian teeth that sinks deep into the fat of urban counter-culture Bavaria.

SEX-BUSINESS - MADE IN PASING

Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (1970)

With his second narrative feature film San Domingo (1970)—an updated adaption of the story Betrothal in St. Domingo (1811) aka Die Verlobung in Santo Domingo by German romantic poet Heinrich von Kleist set in a hippie hellhole commune that acts as a warning of sorts to the kind of cultural degeneracy that would engulf Germany as a result cancerous counter-culture ideologies—Prussian master auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (Hitler: A Film from Germany, Parsifal) basically announced to the world that he was not a loony far-leftist bent on destroying the Fatherland like most of his kraut cinematic comrades of German New Cinema and naturally he became a favorite target of film critics thereon afterward. Of course, despite being heavily influenced by kraut commie philo-Semite Bertolt Brecht, Syberberg's 'nationalistic' persuasion can be seen in his films predating Santo Domingo, with the director's documentary Sex-Business - Made in Pasing (1969)—a cinéma vérité-like work centering around Bavarian pornographer Alois Brummer—being a thinly disguised indictment of the degradation of both Teutonic cinema and kultur as a work that demonstrates that artless erotic films had eclipsed art films in Germany in terms of popularity and monetary profit. Centering around a rather rotund slimy and sleazy Aryan degenerate who is the German equivalent of a Jewish caricature straight out of National Socialist propagandist Julius Streicher's Der Stürmer newspaper who states regarding his main interest in making films, "Well...if it's not business, what else could it be?...It can only be for business," Sex-Business depicts an era when the most superficially 'nationalistic' form of cinema was of the low-camp comedic pornographic sort. Essentially softcore pseudo-erotic spoofs of the Heimatfilm ("homeland-film") genre—a völkisch film style that was popular in Germany, Switzerland, and Austria from the late 1940s to the early 1970s and was typically set in rural areas that gave a mystical 'blood and soil' appreciation for the land and promoted traditional family values—Bavarian porn flicks mainly appealed to the post-WWII generation who bought into the lies of the sexual revolution and counter-culture movements. Like its liberal ideological counter-part, the anti-Heimat (i.e. Hunting Scenes From Bavaria (1969), The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Korbach (1971)), the Bavarian porn flick sought to undermine the traditional Heimat film by mocking and satirizing the conventions of the genre. In Sex-Business, Syberberg deconstructs the Heimat porn flick by revealing the vulgar and parasitic nature of its central figure Alois Brummer—the main producer and sometimes director of Bavarian porn with no real interest in the art of cinema who got in the movie business after selling his truck business and buying four movie theaters. A proud braggart of a sleazebag who proudly admits his knack for pornography as a result of his "primitive instinct," the belligerently boorish Brummer unwittingly reveals in Sex-Business that pornographers are typically nothing more than odious opportunists who proudly profit off of targeting man's basest and most archaic instincts, thereupon degrading man to the same level as the farm animals in his films. A documentary made a couple years before Syberberg discovered the films of Werner Schroeter, reinvented his aesthetic, and directed his first 'celluloid Gesamtkunstwerk,' Ludwig: Requiem for a Virgin King (1972) aka Ludwig - Requiem für einen jungfräulichen König, Sex-Business is a discernibly stripped and minimalistic doc of next to nil aesthetic value that derives the majority of its potency in sociological study of the post-WWII counter-culture phenomenon of Bavarian pornography.

As revealed in an inter-title at the very beginning of Sex-Business, "Financially, Graf Porno und seine Mädchen (1969) aka Count Porno and his Girls, produced by Alois Brummer, is ranked third in the first quarter of 69 among all films shown in Germany at the time, including foreign." By the conclusion of the documentary it reveals that the film's central subject, porn producer/director Alois Brummer was awarded the German "Golden Screen" award for selling 3 million movie tickets in a single year for one of his bawdy Bavarian porn flicks. Despite initially facing trouble from the FSK (German motion picture rating system) and German film industry as the "black sheep" of Teutonic cinema, Brummer's latest film Graf Porno und die liebesdürstigen Töchter (1969) was cleared on the same day he won the Golden Screen, thus demonstrating that pornography had finally become mainstream in krautland. In the first scene featuring Brummer, he is documented refusing to increase an assistant cameraman's wages despite the fact his latest film has made millions, stating like a proud miser, "It's like that...if one film was a success...I can't just increase the fee 50%. I don't do that and I never will. He can look for something else...not with me! Plain and simple." As for his 'performers,' Brummer preys on young, self-conscious blonde girls with low self-esteem who are willing to strip their clothes for next to nil. Apparently, "Nice, folksy naive sex" is the "best and most interesting" sort of porn in Germany as nothing is more delectable than a wholesome farm girl from a proud Catholic family who is willing to get naked in a barn and be buggered like an animal while cows with big udders stand in the background. According to Brummer, "Vulgarity and the Mediterranean type, that's not in demand here" as even Teutons in the post-Nazi era prefer blonds. As for why Italians are not in demand, Brummer states, "Take a look at the Mediterranean type, the dark moustache...The strange skin tone...It doesn't appeal to Germans...Blondes are more appealing..." and that even regarding foreigners, "If anything, they like the German mentality even more." Despite using a somewhat passive and skittish fellow named Günter Hendel (So Much Naked Tenderness, Erotic Center) to direct some of his films, Brummer is essentially the 'auteur' behind all of his pornographic works as demonstrated by the fact he can be seen throughout Sex-Business dictating over his film sets like a slave-driving fuck film Führer, threatening to kick any girl off the film if she refuses to bare all. When Brummer shoots some nude scenes in a barn, he and the film crew are attacked by the lady of the farm who believes “the whole mountain will be talking about us” due to the somewhat unconventional debauchery going on around the home, but that does not stop the woman from allowing her baby boy to be totally exposed to the profane display of Southern Teutonic degeneracy at the porn shoot. In the end, the irked farm woman attempts to shovel cow shit on Syberberg for filming her freakout. As revealed at the beginning of Sex-Business, 50% of all German films made in 1968 did not earn their production costs back, but Alois Brummer is laughing all the way to the bank.

As Syberberg would later state of Sex-Business in his book Syberbergs Filmbuch (1979), “For the first time [critics] could see the world of cinema in which they lived as it actually was: practical, proletarian art, commercialized, unimaginative, perverted, clean German sex made in Bavaria. The opposite of blue movies and international porn – witlessly funny, an unintentional joke...Alois Brummer, the genial, harmless Lower Bavarian as the most cogent joker symbol of the inhuman wheeler-dealer cinema in its currently lowest stage,” thus demonstrating his keen cultural pessimism in both the German cinema and political world. Indeed, in no other film aside from Sex-Business can I think of a film that so cynically yet oddly objectively demonstrates the mockery that was (and still is) the modern cinema world and the sad thing is that the figure of Alois Brummer seems rather benign when compared to the sick kind of pornography pumped out around the world today. Undoubtedly, now people, including Germans, are no longer able to get turned on just by some blonde babes doing a silly slapstick routine as demonstrated by the proliferation of miscegenation, cuckold, scat, tranny, foot fetish, amputee fetishism, sadomasochism, feederism, gerontophilia, paraphilic infantilism, rape fantasy fetishism, and various other films of mental illness-based digital video degeneracy that the porn industry pumps out like an overflowing sewer. Described by German New Cinema scholar Thomas Elsaesser as a “sarcastic, deadpan deconstruction of this deconstruction” due to its biting demystification of Bavarian pornography’s debauched demystification of the Heimat film, Sex-Business fits perfectly into Syberberg’s oeuvre in that it uses Brechtian techniques against the left itself in its up-close-and-personal portrait of Alois Brummer—the mastermind of the porn genre and a true ‘people’s director’ who produced the sort of films the proletariat really wants to see as opposed to the soulless pseudo-intellectual celluloid commie crap defecated out by directors like Alexander Kluge and Jean-Marie Straub. Indeed, Bavarian left-wing auteur Peter Fleischmann would also attempt to satirize German porn (albeit this time focusing on the pseudo-sexual educational skin flicks that were popular in Germany at the same time) with his work Dorothea’s Revenge aka (1974) Dorotheas Rache, but unlike Syberberg’s Sex-Business, it is just as debauched and aesthetically repellant as the pseudo-sex educational films it haphazardly attempts to mock, albeit featuring less aesthetically pleasing chicks. A sort of anti-anti-Heimat film in crude yet captivating cinéma vérité-like form, Sex-Business may be one of auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's least aesthetically ambitious works, but is also another work that once again proves that the filmmaker was one of the few voices of reason and sanity of post-WWII German cinema as a man who once stated of modern German art that it is, "filthy and sick... in praise of cowardice and treason, of criminals, whores, of hate, ugliness, of lies and crimes and all that is unnatural."

LUDWIG - REQUIEM FOR A VIRGIN KING
LUDWIG - REQUIEM FOR A VIRGIN KING

Although he had directed a number of films before, the majority of which being experimental documentaries, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg – probably the only filmmaker of 'German New Cinema' to describe himself as being, "conservative in a Prussian sense, of the classic school, without chewing gum and pinball, not for nothing raised in the age of Stalin," – would first make his cinematic declaration against the cosmopolitan liberalism popular among his filmic compatriots, as well as his one-man war against Hollywood with Ludwig - Requiem für einen jungfräulichen König (1972) aka Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King; the first film in the radical auteur's 'Germany Trilogy' of Teutonic myths. An unrelenting blitzkrieg against the Fourth Wall of theatre and a tight Teutonic tsunami of hermetic and operatic tableaux centering around the myths and mystique of 19th century King Ludwig II of Bavaria aka "The Swan King" aka "The Fairy-Tale King" aka "Mad King Ludwig," Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King was described by cinematic soldier Syberberg as, "a declaration of war against the dominant forms of the cinema of dialogue and the entertainment film in the tradition of Hollywood and its colonies...It was also a declaration of war against psychological dribble, plots based on gags and action, the philosophy of continuity editing and its shot/countershot technique, its metaphysics of the automobile and the gun, its excitement of opening and closing doors, and its melodramas based on sex and crime, in short, against the domination of narrative cinema in principle." Ironically, Syberberg – who came-of-age in communist East Germany, thus becoming untainted by the deleterious effects of American cultural homogenization – began his lifelong passion of synthesizing theatre and film at the age of 17-years-old when Marxist playwright/poet Bertolt Brecht gave him the opportunity to film some of the far-left stage director's Berliner Ensemble productions. Syberberg would go on to be what is probably the only filmmaker in the world to turn cinema into "Gesamtkunstwerk" (a "total work of art" in the Wagnerian sense which strives to include all artistic mediums) with Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King – a 140-minute film epic featuring an innately abstract and arcane synthesis of elements of Germanic myth, cinema, theatre, opera, poetry, documentary, musical, and metaphysics – but it would be with his 442-minute cinematic epic Hitler: A Film from Germany (1977) aka Hitler - ein Film aus Deutschland that the German filmmaker would inspire leftist Jewess Susan Sontag (who once infamously wrote, "The white race is the cancer of human history," to the glee of her racial compatriots and ethno-masochistic white liberals everywhere) of all people to write he had created, "one of the great works of art of the twentieth century," as an 'aristocratic postmodernist' of sorts who, "belongs to the race of creators like Wagner, Artaud, Céline, the late Joyce, whose work annihilates other work." Essentially, the film Syberberg needed to make so he could experiment with ideas he would take to 'Spenglerian' proportions with Hitler: A Film from Germany – arguably the most thoughtful, insightful, and eclectic approach by anyone, kraut or otherwise, in accessing Adolf Hitler's place in German history – Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King is also a masterpiece in its own right as a work that makes Luchino Visconti's 235-minute depiction of the Mad King, Ludwig (1972) starring Helmut Berger in the lead role, seem like it was directed by a for-hire hack in Hollywood who was solely hypnotized by his subject's homosexuality and royal costumes.

A man who once famously stated, "I wish to remain an eternal enigma to myself and to others," Ludwig II of Bavaria (25 August 1845 – 13 June 1886) is a man now better remembered today through myths than reality, not least of all due to all the extravagant castles he built around Bavaria (through which tourist revenue has partially enabled the state to be the richest in Germany), his financial support of Richard Wagner, dubious sexuality and sanity, and mysterious death. Like with all the other films in Syberberg's Germany trilogy, Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King meticulously massages, mutilates, and molests its subject from the perspective of a 'pomo classicist.' Beginning with a prophecy from Lola Montez (played by Fassbinder's ex-wife Ingrid Caven) – mistress of Ludwig II's grandfather – that due to incest and unruly masses of proletarians, among other things, that, "King Ludwig has no chance," Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King establishes from the very beginning that the "King of Kitsch" lived a terribly troubled and ultimately tragic life plagued by social isolation (aside from his servant 'lackeys' and favorite artists), rotten teeth, and family treachery. A funny fellow of rather refined taste who loves, "the mountains, the forest air, horses...Richard Wagner...Edgar Allan Poe...Friedrich Schiller...the night, the mystic and inexplicable" and "believes in the immortality of the soul," Ludwig II (played by Fassbinder's right-hand man Harry Baer, who mutinied against his master when he decided to work with Syberberg) would seem like a happy-go-lucky monarch were it not for his subsequent remark describing his hatred for pollution caused by English industry, so-called 'progress,' the Prussian empire, nationalism, socialism, and last, but certainly not least, "mass meetings of people." In short, Ludwig II is a reluctant ruler who has nil interest in Realpolitik and his royal duties, thus he escapes into a fantasy world of compulsive castle building, the more than generous financial support of his favorite composer Richard Wagner, among other royally blessed artists, and wandering like a child through the night like a phantom in a fairytale. Naturally, his fellow royals were more than a bit concerned over his abandonment of his kingly duties, incessant borrowing and spending of monarch money as a loyal but loony art patron, and his selling of the Kingdom to Germany for a hefty sum so he could finance fantastic castles, so, as Syberberg more than subtly hints at in Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King, Ludwig II was likely assassinated by his own people and possibly his own uncle Luitpold who later maintained the regency. As stated by Ludwig II's detractor

Graf Holnstein (played by Fassbinder's one-time boy toy, black Bavarian Günther Kaufmann), the Kitsch King once, "gave an opera singer expensive jewelry and didn't even sleep with her," which is certainly the sign of a less than sane man, at least among more masculine and power-driven men who seek to conquer and gain power and not waste money on art of all things. As Syberberg wrote, "My Ludwig film begins with the first E-flat major chords of the Rhinegold and ends with the conclusion of the Götterdämmerung, in whose last ray of light little Ludwig, old and bearded, steps out of the mist of Erda's grotto as a sadly smiling child. The myth of the Nibelungs presents the frame for my film. In the film the interrelations between allusions to Ludwig and to Wagner shuttle back and forth, creating an inextricable associative deepening of an epic cosmos in which we can recognize ourselves and perhaps celebrate ourselves in the tragic mode. For the theme is the destruction of a utopia in the face of a person looking for a lost or artificial paradise."

Oftentimes labeled a filmmaker of German New Cinema, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg is indubitably the only German filmmaker of his generation to not only embrace his nation's rich (yet now taboo) cultural legacy, but also a rather idiosyncratic blend of 'Prussian conservatism' that somehow manages to reconcile Richard Wagner and Karl May with the likes of cosmopolitan 'leftist' German cultural producers like Bertolt Brecht and Werner Schroeter. In fact, during the second, more apocalyptic and anachronistic second half of Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King, the character of Richard Wagner (who is played by two different actors of different genders, the female portrayal being the composer's Jungian 'anima' of sorts) as played by actress Anette Tirier (who appeared in both Schroeter's Der Tod der Maria Malibran aka The Death of Maria Malibran and Tag der Idioten aka Day of the Idiots) makes the culturally insightful statement (people forget that like Hitler, Wagner was a rebel despite how he is perceived nowadays as an archaic racist), "Save me from these old women with their cream cakes and moneybags. I have belonged to youth and revolution since 1848. I succeeded against the philistines, with my own theatre and 6-hour performances, in forming a 19th century musical underground... Only when Niki de St. Phalle, Jim Dine, Werner Schroeter, Magdalena Montezuma and Ernst Fuchs produce the "The Ring" will I be free again." Of course, Syberberg was the only one who made any serious attempt to make the 19th century rebel genius "free again" with, among various other films, his 255-minute epic Parsifal (1983) – an epic and aesthetically 'Nazified' postmodern adaptation of the composer's opera with the Grail being represented by Bayreuth Theatre – but as the audacious extra-avant-garde auteur depicted in Hitler: A Film from Germany with Uncle Adolf's allegorical rise from Richard Wagner's grave, it would be next to impossible to rehabilitate Ludwig II's favorite artist, as well as any other element of pre-1933 German history, after the defeat of the Third Reich in 1945. As the man who metaphysically inspired Hitler, who wrote in his infamous autobiography "Mein Kampf," "At the age of twelve, I saw ... the first opera of my life, Lohengrin. In one instant I was addicted. My youthful enthusiasm for the Bayreuth Master knew no bounds," Richard Wagner's legacy will forever be tainted by its association with its innate influence of National Socialism, despite the fact that his most loyal patron, King Ludwig II of Bavaria – the "Perfect Wagnerite" who vehemently despised politics, nationalism, socialism and especially, "mass meetings of people" – funded the composer so he could create a complex, if not totally imaginary and mystical, utopia where realpolitik and real people were nowhere to be found as esoterically depicted in Syberberg's Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King.

Indubitably, the most truly Teutonic filmmaker and artist of his generation and uniquely unabashedly so, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg was essentially the ideological adversary of far-left Frankfurt school auteur Alexander Kluge – one of 26 signatories to the Oberhausen Manifesto of 1962, which marked the launch of the New German Cinema against 'Papa's Kino' and the deep cultural traditions of the Fatherland, so it is no surprise that the Wagnerian auteur would write, "Yes, this land has become brutal and materialistic. Tolerance has degenerated into denunciation, and mediocrity into cultural conformity. Cinema is misunderstood as a practiced mass art, as the fast-food stand of show business—cinema as the smallest common multiple of the leisure industry. Why? For an entire generation, Germany's children learned the statistics of Auschwitz, the virtues of revolution, no matter how misunderstood, from an admittedly puny German tradition without the courage of its convictions, which they promptly "demythified" as hero worship...An intrinsic morality was born (or what they regarded as one), the bulwark of a new rationality; for feelings and ideals lead to disaster, so they had been told." Of course, whereas Alexander Kluge's films mark the height of sterile and soulless rationality and an intrinsic loathing of national identity as especially reflected by him and his fellow far-left filmic compatriots (including would-be-Frenchman Volker Schlöndorff and the master of melodramatic group psychotherapy Rainer Werner Fassbinder) omnibus film Germany in Autumn (1978) – an ethno-masochistic cinematic work Syberberg described as being, "without a concept...without aesthetic, metaphysical control and responsibility" – Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King announced the rebirth of German myths and irrationalism, or as the only "master of celluloid Gesamtkunstwerk" concluded himself upon completing in German trilogy, "If my films Ludwig, Requiem for a Virgin King and Karl May can be understood as positive mythologizings of history through the devices of cinema, and filtered through the intellectual controls of irony and pathos, for our glory and for use as a response to the reality of our days, what can we do with a historical subject like Hitler? That was the question from the very outset, before making this last film. This epitome of our deepest guilt and reflection of our vast grief and turning away from the face of a man such as we understand him, and nevertheless accepting here too the title as a motto for all three films of my trilogy: in search of paradise lost here as well?" Of course, Syberberg was the only filmmaker of his generation to truly face Hitler and the troubled history of his fractured Fatherland, so it should be no surprise that the most famous and successful director of German New Cinema, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, would list Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King as one of the "The Least Important" films of the movement in a 1981 "Hitlist of German Films" because while he merely 'cinematically reacted' to the more painful periods of Teutonic history with positively pessimistic, naked melodramas, but never went to the trouble of deciphering Aryans myths and their historical influence, the director of Hitler: A Film from Germany brazenly basked in it and accepted his fate as a child of Ludwig II, Richard Wagner, Karl May, and – last but not least – Adolf Hitler.

Near the conclusion of Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King, protagonist Ludwig II sits in a state of aggravated perennial melancholy in his royal chamber, which resembles a sort of apocalyptic Teutonic purgatory featuring nude Nordic succubi holding torches and candles, after learning of Richard Wagner's death as flame-toned contemporary documentary footage of tourists visiting one of his castles is screened in the background, in what is probably the most potent allegory in the film for The Fairy Tale King's legacy as a long obfuscated historical myth that has degenerated to the point where it makes for one of Bavaria's best selling products. Francis Parker Yockey – a Euro-American far-right neo-Spenglerian intellectual and revolutionary – once wrote in his short political tract Enemy of Europe (1953) that if Europe did not unify under a "Prussian-ethical Future" (the sort "Prussian conservative" Syberberg would probably support), then, "the Europe of 2050 will be essentially the same as that of 1950, viz. a museum to be looted by barbarians, a historical curiosity for sightseers from the colonies; an odd assortment of operetta-states; a reservoir of human material standing at the disposal of Washington and Moscow; a loan market for New York financiers; a great beggars' colony, bowing and scraping before the American tourists." Of course, as recent history has proven, Ludwig II, Syberberg, and Yockey's nightmare has become more than a dystopian nightmare of slavery to a culturally and racially mongrelized former colony (United States) with a scant history, malignant multiculturalism, Hollywood cultural hegemony, indigenous population decline, and authoritarian political correctness in what is now a cultural graveyard with virtually no potential for rebirth. Syberberg warned Germany with Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King and his subsequent cinematic works, but it seems everyone was too busy atoning to Judea and the rest of the aggressive and unforgiving Tschandala for the sins of their grandfathers to take notice.

Of course, Syberberg would later write regarding the art of his anti-nationalistic nation that it is, "filthy and sick... in praise of cowardice and treason, of criminals, whores, of hate, ugliness, of lies and crimes and all that is unnatural." As for his reasoning, Syberberg revealed that not all Germans have passive, dead souls when he wrote, "The Jewish interpretation of the world followed upon the Christian, just as the Christian one followed Roman and Greek culture. So now Jewish analyses, images, definitions of art, science, sociology, literature, politics, the information media, dominate. Marx and Freud are the pillars that mark the road from East to West. Neither are imaginable without Jewishness. Their systems are defined by it. The axis USA-Israel guarantees the parameters. That is the way people think now, the way they feel, act and disseminate information. We live in the Jewish epoch of European cultural history. And we can only wait, at the pinnacle of our technological power, for our last judgment at the edge of the apocalypse.... So that's the way it looks, for all of us, suffocating in unprecedented technological prosperity, without spirit, without meaning... Those who want to have good careers go along with Jews and leftists [and] the race of superior men [Rasse der Herrenmenschen] has been seduced, the land of poets and thinkers has become the fat booty of corruption, of business, of lazy comfort." After all, in what other kind of sick, Semitic world would Roland Emmerich be the world's most famous German director and Steven Spielberg the most famous of all?! Something tells me that after watching clips from Spielberg's Lincoln (2012), the superstar of Shoah business has never seen Ludwig - Requiem for a Virgin King, but I guess one should not expect anything less from a man who has gotten rich on destroying national film industries, appealing to grade school children, and reinventing Occidental history where the Second World War resembles a story from Brothers Grimm fairy-tales. That being said, maybe Syberberg has exaggerated the death of German myths.

HITLER: A FILM FROM GERMANY

Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (1977)

Without a doubt, aside from being the most hated person in contemporary history, Adolf Hitler – the Austrian-born Führer of the infamous Third Reich who settled for a more serious career in revolutionary nationalist politics after failing as an artist – is also one of the most cinematically depicted figures of film history, which is quite ironic considering he was a cinephile of sorts who had his own little theatre and personal film projectionist where he would apparently watch two or three films a day, with half-Jewish Austrian auteur Fritz Lang's two-part silent Wagnerian epic Die Nibelungen (1924) being one of his favorite and most-watched films. Indeed, while Hitler is still portrayed in movies of all sorts, including mainstream Jewish Hollywood scat-comedies, such as Little Nicky (2000) starring neo-vaudevillian philistine Adam Sandler in which Hitler is dressed in a female maid's outfit and is repeatedly anally penetrated with a pineapple by Satan himself while in hell, as well as modern mainstream German epics like Downfall (2004) aka Der Untergang where the dead dictator's last days on earth are dramatized in a fairly objective manner, few films have taken the time to examine the effect he had on the nation, people, and culture he claimed to love so dearly yet ultimately destroyed in an apocalyptic fashion, but if there is a film that does to attempt this arduous and ambitious task and then some, it is most certainly Prussian auteur Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's 442-minute avant-garde 'biopic' Hitler: A Film from Germany aka Hitler, ein Film aus Deutschland aka Our Hitler – a four part Franco-British-German co-production that was produced by 'Germany's most successful producer' Bernd Eichinger (The Neverending Story, The Baader Meinhof Complex) and co-produced by the BBC. A strictly conservative work of the Teutonic romanticist persuasion, a circus announcer in pancake make-up states early on in Hitler: A Film from Germany that, "this is no left wing opportunist death-camp sex film. This is a film for us. It's about war and genocide. Auschwitz as the battlefield of race war. Who does the world hold guilty? And what would Hitler be without us?" Of course, the more important question asked by Hitler: A Film from Germany is what is Germany without its historical myths, innate irrationalism, dark romanticism?! As director Syberberg quite lucidly yet epically and arcanelly reveals with his Hitler: A Film from Germany, Germany is nothing without its myths and traditional culture and it was Adolf Hitler, the supposed 'savior' and Wagnerian Hero that Germans had always dreamed of since the beginning of their history – who literally rises from Richard Wagner's tome in the film – who incorporated all the myths and traditions of Teutonic kultur in his propaganda and war campaign, thus ultimately irrevocably tainting them for subsequent unborn generations to come after the Fatherland's defeat after the Second World War. Indisputably one of the most ambitious cinematic works ever made and one of the few examples of cinema as “Gesamtkunstwerk,” Hitler: A Film from Germany is a work where Syberberg did the seemingly aesthetically and politically inexplicable; or as he wrote himself, “I sought an aesthetic scandal: combining Brecht’s doctrine of epic theater with Richard Wagner’s musical aesthetics, cinematically conjoining the epic system as anti-Aristotelian cinema with the laws of a new myth.”

Where German prophet of Occidental decline Oswald Spengler left off with his final work Hour of Decision (1933) – a best seller that was eventually banned by the Third Reich, in part, due to its prediction of Germany’s destruction as a result of naïve optimism for National Socialism – Syberberg continues in Hitler: A Film from Germany – a work innately in tune with the Teutonic traditions that the allies sought to destroy and the Germans themselves did not think twice about throwing away because, after all, they were spared total extermination and you know what they say: “if you can’t beat them, join them.” And, indeed, Germany, at least the western side, decided to adopt the cosmopolitanism, globalism, Hollywoodism, McWorldism, rationalism and all the other ‘isms’ that make the world mundanely ‘one’ as envisioned and foretold by great men of Jewish history ranging from Leon Trotsky to Henry Kissinger, but Herr Syberberg, a man who once stated about himself that he was, “conservative in a Prussian sense, of the classic school, without chewing gum and pinball, not for nothing raised in the age of Stalin” and a man of minor noble blood who had the good luck of growing up in Eastern Germany, thus missing the narcotizing effects of American mass-culture and capitalism, was able to forego Uncle Sam’s influence, which is quite apparent in Hitler: A Film from Germany – a work of postmodern pastiche Prussianism and post-Auschwitz high-camp Hitlerism that quite indisputably aesthetically exterminates any and every celluloid portrayal of Hitler that came before and after it. In many ways, Syberberg’s film is a cinematic manifesto on an epic scale that pleads with the viewer to move on in regards to the infamous legacy of Uncle Adolf – the main point arguably being that he exploited the Germanic myths from Goethe to Karl May and every kraut genius in between – because as the director wrote himself, “We know about the glory and misery of irrationalism; but without it, Germany is nothing but dangerous, sick, without identity, explosive—a wretched shadow of its possibilities. Hitler is to be fought, not with the statistic of Auschwitz or with sociological analyses of the Nazi economy, but with Richard Wagner and Mozart.” In Hitler: A Film from Germany, Syberberg reactivates the myths with a vivacious vengeance that blitzkriegs the “fourth wall” to let the audiences know he is speaking directly to them so they cannot weasel their way out confronting Hitler and the irreplaceable culture that he has helped to throwaway by making a central ingredient of his regime. Featuring Syberberg’s young daughter, Amelie Syberberg, in the opening and concluding scenes (with her and a puppet representing “Germany” and “democracy”), the director ties his own child to the future of Germany, which is quite telling considering Fassbinder, a homosexual who never had children and the central figure of German New Cinema, only foresaw and accepted pessimism and death for the future of his nation, while the director of Hitler: A Film from Germany was arguably the only strong link between Germany's rich cultural past and its dubious future.

A fundamentally nonlinear work featuring a number of long monologues, Hitler: A Film from Germany is essentially divided into four main segments including: Part I: Der Gral ("The Grail"), Part II: Ein deutscher Traum ("A German Dream"), Part III: Das Ende eines Wintermärchens ("The End of a Winter's Tale"), and Wir Kinder der Hölle ("We Children of Hell"). Part I is arguably, with the possible exception of the final segment, the most important part of Hitler: A Film from Germany and largely deals with Hitler's cult of personality as disseminated through National Socialist propaganda. Utilizing gigantic cut-outs of German expressionist classics like The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920), Algol: Tragedy of Power (1920), and Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror (1922), Syberberg recounts Frankfurt school leftist Jew Siegfried Kracauer's argument in his popular work in neo-Marxist pop-psychology From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film (1947) that the early works of Teutonic silent horror foretold the 'cultural insanity' and the rise of a mad men like Hitler. We also see Fassbinder superstar Harry Baer philosophizing on the death of the Occident while holding a King Ludwig II of Bavaria doll, a parody of Chaplin as Hitler from The Great Dictator (1940), Uncle Adolf performing cunnilingus on a blowup doll, Hitler as Napoleon, a lycanthrope with a nazi armband with human bodies in its mouth, and a variety of National Socialist propaganda images, including caricatures of Jews from Julius Streicher's tabloid magazine Der Stürmer and images of Eva Braun going for scenic nature walks. Sado-masochistic fetishism is an intrinsic element of many images, thus illustrating both the S&M obsessions of both Hitler and the German people themselves, thereupon linking love and death – a theme taking to its fullest extreme in the no-budget arthouse splatter flick of aberrant Aryan auteur Jörg Buttgerreit (Nekromantik, Der Todesking). One of the most iconic elements of Hitler: A Film from Germany, especially during the first segment, is the utilization of grotesque Nazi puppets that makes for the gross exaggerations of Hitler, Himmler, Goebbels, Eva Braun, and Göring's essences. Unlike the hysterical Hebrew in Hollywood and the ethno-masochistic leftist krauts in the German film industry, Syberberg makes no attempt to disguise the sheer and utter subjectivity of his work, especially when dealing with Hitler and his gang.

As film scholar Anton Kaes wrote in his academic study From Hitler to Heimat: The Return of History as Film (1992), "Syberberg acknowledges his debt to Wagner not only through numerous musical quotations, in particular from Rienzi, Hitler's favorite opera, and from Götterdämmerung but also through the overall structure of his film: like the Ring cycle, Hitler consists of four parts. Given also Syberberg's fascination with German mythology, it is not farfetched to regard his film as a continuation of Wagner's project in the age of technical reproducibility." Keeping Kaes' words in mind, it is not a stretch to say that Syberberg could also identify with Adolf Hitler – the Wagnerite and the artist – as the director even went so far as once admitting he 'could understand' being an SS man at Auschwitz who 'made himself hard' to fulfill a history mission, thereupon making Hitler: A Film from Germany what is quite arguably the closest attempt a filmmaker had made at understanding from every angle, thus antagonistically going against the grain of the over-quoted Friedrich Nietzsche quote, "Battle not with monsters, lest ye become a monster, and if you gaze into the abyss, the abyss gazes also into you." Indeed, Syberberg's film in many ways resembles a Wagnerian scale Germanic holocaust of the audio-visual sort. One could also say one needs a certain 'hardness' to watch a film like Hitler: A Film from Germany – a virtual uncensored Faustian bachelors degree in not only everything related to Hitlerism and the mad mensch himself, but also German cultural history in general. With references to obscure events of National Socialist history, including Himmler's sending of his personal astrologists to concentration camps, Hitler's favorite films, the torture of Hitler Youth leader Baldur von Schirach's toddler son by American GIs, how Hitler earned his beloved Iron Cross in the First World War after he was recommended for it by a German-Jewish superior officer named Hugo Gutmann, and other seemingly odd and contradictory anecdotes from history. In its eclectic portrayals of Hitler, from the perspective of characters both real and fictional, Hitler: A Film from Germany is the rare sort of film that would inspire both hatred and interest from both Zionist terrorist and Esoteric Hitlerites as a work that says just about what everyone would say about the fallen Führer – a man who went from being a Viennese hobo to being voted "Man of the Year" in 1938 by Time Magazine and would go on to be the most hated and reviled person in the world.

In its utilization of actors of Syberberg's ideological adversary Rainer Werner Fassbinder, including Harry Baer (Fassbinder's right-hand man who oftentimes worked as his assistant director), Peter Moland, and the rather rotund Peter Kern, as well as Austrian Jew André Heller, Hitler: A Film from Germany, quite ironically, takes a rather iconoclastic approach to promoting the restoration of German culture, Teutonic irrationalism, and Faustian myths. In fact, Syberberg goes as far as using quasi-pornographic S&M of elderly naked women grasping a 'scale of justice' (one side of the scale holding large dildos and the other, doll heads) in a 'last judgement court' against Hitler to get his point across because, while he may be a Prussian, he is certainly no prude because in his view it is the mainstream leftists who are callous, cowardly, and impenetrably close-minded. As he once wrote, "Germany was spiritually disinherited and dispossessed; anything that could not be justified by sociology and social policies was hushed up. But how can they comprehend Hölderlin if they have relocated him as a revolutionary between Lessing and Marx, how could Novalis survive as a model for the American road movie; and without irrationality, no Die Räuber [The Brigands] by Schiller and no fairy tales and no folk songs and no Runge. Give everything to Hitler and Goebbels? And is Caspar David Friedrich right-wing and fascist? Is irrationalism right-wing or left-wing? Have they forgotten that their venerated Ernst Bloch was the man who, in the last line of his The Spirit of Utopia, spoke of homeland (Heimat), the word banished from Germany? And that it was he who, in those days, when faced with the Nazis, warned about undernourishing the mass imagination? What would Judaism be without its Cabbala? Merely Einstein? And what would Einstein be without music, without German Romanticism and Classicism? We live in a country without a homeland.”

In the final segment of Hitler: A Film from Germany, Syberberg satirizes the post-WWII cult of Hitler where both ex-Nazis and Jews in Hollywood ironically cashed in on the Third Reich. Indeed, for all of Steven Spielberg’s hatred of Hitler and promotion of the Holocaust, he certainly made a killing off those Nazi killings and were not for Hitler, he might not have as many vacation houses or even his beloved holy land, the Jewish state of Israel. Hitler: A Film from Germany is, most importantly, a film about the Germans for once and not the Jews, who are certainly not doing too bad nowadays, but the Aryans are a decidedly dying race, who have become a group of freedom-fetishizing pacifists and hedonists with the sort of slave-morality they used to accuse their enemies of having. Towards the conclusion of Hitler: A Film from Germany, one hears Thomas Mann’s melodramatic statement from New Year’s 1938, “God help our darkened and misused land and teach it to make its peace with itself and its world.” The narrator then retorts to Mann’s quote with, “What would he say today? Or our children tomorrow? Seeing what we have done with our freedom and ourselves: Soulless dwarf people in the dead plastic womb of an empty doll face are the mirrors of our cities and our language; and they created gods in this image. The end game of our existence today, a new Family of Man, in the inhuman ready-made face of our freedom, which we have gambled away. Freedom without a face....Hitler, here is your victory!” Indeed, World War II was Judea’s victory with the Aryan apocalypse and if the Germanic goy can learn anything from the Jew, it is that guilt is unnecessary and debilitating baggage of the decidedly defeated and dead kind. After all, when was the last time you heard a Hebrew apologize for the doings of a mass murderer of their own ilk, such as failed bourgeois Trotsky or a Mongol apologize for the sins of Genghis Khan?! While it takes the confirmation that Mr. anti-Semite Adolf Hitler really had Jewish ancestry and/or was a homo, or that modern day Zionist Jews are “National Socialist” engaged in ethnic cleaning for modern day Germans to shed their guilt? As a certain totenkopf-obsessed neo-folk group used as the title of their first full-length album: The Guilty Have No Pride!

In his posthumously published work Diary of a Man in Despair (1947) – a rather unconventional journal of the writer's hatred of the Third Reich – Fritz Reck-Malleczewen, a personal friend of Oswald Spengler and a good Prussian like Syberberg who was executed at Dachau concentration camp via a bullet to the neck on February 16, 1945, wrote the following words, “Nationalism, no matter how loudly defended today, is almost finished, and the coup de grace will come in this most mob-like of all wars. Tomorrow it will be behind us, an ugly, sweaty dream. The idea of a united Europe was not always upheld by me, but I know now that we can no longer afford the luxury of considering it a mere idea. Europe must either make any further wars impossible, or this cradle of great ideas will see its cathedrals pulverized, and its landscape turned into a plain.” Indeed, Europe is united today in technocratic and economic slavery as a passive cuckold of America, its cultural vitality and spirit were all but destroyed in the Second World War, and cultural ingredients and cultural producers are virtually nonexistent there today, thus making Syberberg's plea for a return to seem rather futile, especially in a strictly German context. In the final paragraph he wrote for the introduction of his screenplay for Hitler: A Film from Germany, Syberberg stated, “The final silence of childlike melancholy in a starry tear with a distant freedom fanfare beyond the mountains. That is the end of this Hitler, who is now a film. But how far we have gone in these seven hours of cinema, what things we have gone through and what things we have had to see and hear...” Indeed, if any film could have inspired the same passion that Wagner's opera did for Hitler in dreaming of the Third Reich, it is most certainly Hitler: A Film from Germany, but it seems that few people had the eyes, ears, and soul to properly listen. Like most modern day European nations, Germany is a sparkling Teutonic toilet for nations of the third world, which actively promotes supplanting its native population with dusky-skinned unterschlecht, and whose indigenous German women are far too concerned with their careers rather than child-bearing, just as German men are too interested in Asian whores to spawn any children. From Spengler to Syberberg, Hitler: A Film from Germany is more of an elaborately epic elegy of an Gesamtkunstwerk for Germania than a call for rebirth in Germany, especially when watched over 35 years after its release. Even Syberberg seems to have changed, although where his cuckold kinsmen have only become all the more ethno-masochistic and self-denigrating, the filmmaker seems closer to Hitler than ever, at least judging by a statement in 1990, “Whoever joined the Jews and the leftists was successful, and it did not necessarily have anything to do with love, or understanding, or even inclination. How could Jews tolerate that, being that these others only wanted power.”

As for old Uncle Adolf, Syberberg makes the final judgment via Hitler: A Film from Germany: “You are the executor of Western civilization, democratically self-elected, voluntarily, with the victory of money, of materialism over us. The plague of our century. The wretched artist as a hang-man degenerating into a politician, voluntarily, cheered as no man ever before. How can I make this clear to you and to me, and me and all the children and grandchildren, who didn't know all this, this previous life, which they have all forgotten by now, corrupted by the new legacy of your time... The words "magic" and "myth" and "serving" and "ruling," "Führer," "authority," are ruined, are gone, exiled to eternal time. And we are snuffed out. Nothing more will grow here. An entire nation stopped existing, in the diaspora of the mind and the elite. The New Ones were designed, developed, the New Man is here. The plague of materialism has won out in East and West! Congratulations!" Of course, with MTV aesthetic garbage like Run Lola Run (1998) directed by Tom Tykwer – a multicultural-friendly work of crack-laced cinematic ADHD featuring swarthy krauts that would be at home in Iran and the sort of anti-kultur/anti-race audio-visual grotesquery that would wet the panties of a raver whore in heat – I think it is safe to say that even fewer Germans will understand Syberberg's message in Hitler: A Film from Germany today. Undoubtedly, if Europe and its colonies (as well as the rest of the world for that matter) were wiped out in a nuclear holocaust tomorrow, it would most certainly not be that big of a loss, at least culturally speaking. As Syberberg teaches us in Hitler: A Film from Germany, a people and nation is nothing without its culture, its myths, its irrational, its essence...

Indeed, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, as far as today is concerned, is the last true 'German filmmaker,' a man who, unlike his cinematic compatriots of the German New Cinema, basked in the operas of Wagner, the writings of Nietzsche and Schiller, the paintings of Franz von Stuck and Caspar David Friedrich, the poetry of Heinrich von Kleist and Stefan George, and the ancient Norse mythology of the ancient Germanic people. Indeed, while German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder found his self-destructive Weltanschauung in the writings of modernist German Jew Alfred Döblin, barely bothering to scratch the surface of his forsaken Fatherland's history, Syberberg dug deep and found the hole in the collective soul of Germania and tried to fill it by creating such celluloid masterworks as Hitler: A Film from Germany – a work that even Susan Sontag – a woman who once wrote, "The white race is the cancer of human history," – had to admit, "is on another scale from anything one has seen on film. It is work that demands a special kind of attention and partisanship; and invites being reflected upon, reseen. The more one recognizes of its stylistic references and lore, the more the film vibrates. (Great art in the mode of pastiche invariably rewards study, as Joyce affirmed by daring to observe that the ideal reader of his work would be someone who could devote his life to it.) Syberberg's film belongs in the category of noble masterpieces which ask for fealty and can compel it. After seeing Hitler, a Film from Germany, there is Syberberg's film—and then there are the other films one admires. (Not too many these days, alas.) As was said ruefully of Wagner, he spoils our tolerance for the others." Indeed, such a cinematically and culturally epic work like Hitler: A Film from Germany almost ruins the works of Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Werner Schroeter for me and if it was not for the former's 15 1/2 hour film Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980), I would have no problem stating that the whole of German New Cinema is totally irrelevant when compared to Syberberg's achievement in porno Hitler-hating of the rather rare right-wing Prussian Wagnerite sort. With no great philosopher and poets in the "the land of poets and thinkers," Syberberg and his celluloid magna opera Hitler: A Film from Germany make for a worthy substitute as a work that combines all the cultural ingredients of Teutonic history that preceded Hitler and prove that the damn krauts were racially and culturally superior, but made the blasphemous mistake of bragging about it via an Austrian untermensch of the far from blond beast (but certainly Faustian) sort. Indeed, Syberberg's Hitler: A Film from Germany is nothing, if not one of the most traditionally Germanic films ever made, thus making it in total and violent opposition to what everything Hollywood stands for, and, in turn, making a truly noble piece of high art.

CHETAN, INDIAN BOY

Hark Bohm (1976)

While not that well known, a number of German New Cinema alpha auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's actors also tried their lot at being filmmakers with mostly disastrous results. Indeed, from Fassbinder's musical composer Peer Raben (Adele Spitzeder, Heute spielen wir den Boß) to producer Michael Fenger (Output, Petty Thieves) to leading man Ulli Lommel (Haytabo, Adolf Marlene), many of the filmmaker's collaborators seemed to think they could build a film making career due to connections with R.W., but of course, most of them more or less failed. Probably one of the more bizarre and somewhat disturbing examples of this is character actor Hark Bohm who starred in a number of Fassbinder flicks as an annoying nerd, effeminate bureaucrat, and even a cowardly cuckold, starting with Der amerikanische Soldat (1970) aka The American Soldier and concluding with the director's 40th and antepenultimate film Lola (1981); what is little known, however, is that he was also directing films of his own throughout this entire period with his directorial debut being the minimalistic 'Bavarian western' Chetan, Indian Boy (1972) aka Tschetan, der Indianerjunge starring the director's much cooler and more famous brother Marquard Bohm (Deadlock, Beware of a Holy Whore) as a lone cowboy who saves and raises a young Indian boy from the Lakota Indian tribe, as well as the filmmaker's Mongolian foster son Dschingis Bowakow, who starred in a number of his foster father's films before going on to be a producer and production manager for various films, including Leos Carax's early New French Extremity work Pola X (1999) and Sandra Nettelbeck's popular German-Italian-Austrian-Swiss romantic comedy Mostly Martha (2001) aka Bella Martha. If Bohm's weirdo western Chetan, Indian Boy has anything in common with the films that Bohm would later direct aside from starring Bowakow, it is the director's dubious obsession with preteen boys. Indeed, for better or worse, Bohm was the foremost German filmmaker of coming-of-age films starring sexually ambiguous bad boys with long hair that are somewhat in the spirit of William S. Burroughs' pederaastic cut-up novel The Wild Boys: A Book of the Dead (1971), albeit more bourgeois. While I hate to jump to conclusions on such a revoltingly taboo subject, Chetan, Indian Boy and the director's various other films have led me to speculate that Bohm may have pedophilic predilections and be a potential boy buggerer. Unquestionably, in Bohm's quasi-revisionist western, like many of his films, gratuitous shots of exotic prepubescent shirtless boys are quite prominent and, probably to most viewers, quite strange and unsavory. Of course, Chetan, Indian Boy is not just what appears to potentially be a playful pedo-fantasy but a work that illustrates the more positive view of American Indians that Germans have held in comparison to their American counterparts. Dating back to the adventure novels of Karl May, which were later used by the National Socialists for anti-American propaganda purposes during the Second World War to demonstrate the savagery of Americans against the Indians, and even during the Third Reich era in films like Luis Trenker's Der Kaiser von Kalifornien aka The Emperor of California—the sole western made during the Nazi period—the krauts have always been more sympathetic to the plight of Injuns than, say, the plots of John Ford films. In a work predating Quentin Tarantino's Django Unchained (2012) by four decades, a brave kraut comes to the aid of a young redskin boy who has been by caught stealing by a proto-redneck farmer/Indian exterminator in a work where auteur Bohm demonstrates his seeming fondness for Mongol boys in thongs.

The time and place is Montana in 1880 and a brave, young hippie-like kraut boy named Jacob 'Alaska' Precht (Marquard Bohm) has just landed in the area with his herd of sheep and beloved mutt Hector because he plans to stay in the region until the winter passes. One of the reasons the area is so safe is that virtually all of the Indians have been exterminated, especially those of the Lakota tribe. After killing and cooking a cute bunny rabbit, Alaska is approached by a rugged redneck farmer named Ben Johnson (Willy Schultes), who has two young preteen blond beast sons, Erick (Erich Dolz) and Edy (Edy Endorfer), and brags about liquidating all the local Indians, even showing off his latest prey, a Lakota boy named Chetan aka 'The Falcon'—the last surviving member of his tribe—and describing the little savage lad, who is tied to a horse, as a "rustler." Although demonstrating his hospitality by providing big Ben with some hot coffee, Alaska soon finds himself a new enemy after revealing he plans to stay in the area for the rest of the winter. Despite the fact that he does not own the land, Ben thinks it is his and resents the fact that Alaska wants to stay in the same area where he plans to have his cattle stay, complaining, "I risk my scalp clearing the neighborhood of the Indians...and there comes a shepherd...who wants to steal the winter pasture from me!" Of course, Alaska makes things worse when he decides to trespass on Ben's property at night and free Chetan, who does not exactly trust the young white man. Indeed, despite the fact that Alaska freed him and ultimately saved his life, Chetan attempts to kill his savior with a machete and escape. Chetan injures Alaska's hand so severely that the cut reaches all the way to the bone, thus leaving him incapable of using it for the rest of the winter. After Alaska has his dog Hector watch Chetan so that he does not escape, the Indian boy, who called the canine "white man's dog," develops a bond with the animal. A true wild child, Chetan immediately strips out of the white man's clothes that Alaska has given him to wear and prefers to sport his Injun thong. Needless to say, Alaska has a hell of a time attempting to train the savage boy how to work, as Chetan only seems interested in playing with animals, attacking white men, and attempting to kill his master's sheep by having them drink poisonous water.

Despite Chetan's inability to learn how to work and violent rascal-like behavior, Alaska continues to provide shelter for the boy, which ultimately proves to be mighty dangerous from the lone cowboy. Indeed, eventually, Ben Johnson's sons, Erick and Eddy, accuse Alaska of harboring Chetan and threaten him by shooting one of his sheep if he does not return the boy. Meanwhile, Chetan finds the corpses of his parents, who somehow have not begun to rot, and he gives his mother a proper Lakota burial. When Alaska finds Chetan at the Indian settlement with his deceased parents, the boy attempts to shoot the kraut cowboy in a cute but pathetic attempt to protect his dead family. Eventually, Chetan warms up to Alaska enough to reveal to him that he knows English because he and his family were put on reservations where many of them starved to death after being promised food and shelter by lying whitey. Chetan also reveals that the white man not only slaughtered his entire tribe, but also the bison population, the Lakotas' primary source of food. In terms of spiritual values, the Lakota believe that all living things, including plants, have souls and one must beg for forgiveness after killing them, though some animals, like eels, have 'bad souls.' Although he never outright says it, one gets the feeling that Chetan believes the white man might also have a bad soul, though Alaska will ultimately prove him wrong. Eventually, evil Aryans Erick and Edy spot Chetan tending to Alaska's flock of sheep and attempt to hunt the young Injun down, but being a magical Indian, he seems to disappear into thin air. Of course, Ben Johnson and his two sons eventually show up at Alaska's cabin for a showdown, so Chetan dresses in traditional Indian garb and pulls out his trusty bow-and-arrow with which he shoots Edy Johnson while he is attempting to set fire to a shack containing Lakota horses. Ultimately, Alaska and Chetan win their battle against the Johnsons, but Ben Johnson threatens that he is coming back for revenge, so the cowboy and his Indian head for the mountains. With Alaska now a 'horse thief' (which is apparently a honorable status among the Lakota, especially in regard to stealing an enemy's horse) for taking the Johnsons' horses during the stand-off, the two have even more of an incentive to leave. While in the mountains, Alaska is ambushed by two Ogalala Indians, which is a sub-tribe of the Lakota, who steal the cowboy's rifles. Luckily, Chetan arrives just in the nick of time to save Alaska, though the Indian boy opts for leaving with the Ogalala, stating, "I go with my brothers...to the land of the great mother." Chetan offers Alaska the opportunity to go with him and the Indians, but he decides to stay behind, though he changes his mind at the last second and heads with the three Injuns to Canada.

Personally, the western is one of my least favorite film genres and the idea of a kraut western, especially from German New Cinema era, is just absurd to me, thus Chetan, Indian Boy ultimately proved to be an innately unnerving experience which was only heightened by auteur Hark Bohm's seeming pederastic predilections. Still, I liked that the film featured a real Mongolian boy as a Lakota Indian because American Indians are essentially archaic Mongols after all (despite the politically correct left-wing phrase 'Native American,' which has only been relatively recently adopted by younger Indians and the mainstream media/academia, as no race is indigenous to America, with their even being proof that the white European Solutrean man was in America long before the Indians ever arrived via the Bering strait). Bohm's film also takes a more realistic, even anti-Ford approach to the western genre, as a work that features real animal births and what seems to be unsimulated animals deaths, including the shooting of a rabbit. While more sympathetic to the plight of the American Indian than Golden Age westerns, Chetan, Indian Boy certainly does not resort to the exceedingly ethno-masochistic lows of Kevin Costner's putrid piece of xenophilic celluloid excrement Dances with Wolves (1990), even if it does feature a white protagonist who fights members of his own race to help a savage Indian boy that attempted to kill him. Aside from possibly Mongol or Indian boys, it is dubious as to whether Bohm's film would make for an enthralling coming-of-age flick for young boys. Undoubtedly, with his subsequent, more subversive efforts Nordsee ist Mordsee (1976) aka North Sea Is Dead Sea and Moritz lieber Moritz (1978) aka Moritz, Dear Moritz, Bohm improved his craft as the unofficial meister of kraut coming-of-age flicks. Whether actually a pederast or not, Bohm seems to have a genuine interest in youth as a sort of Aryan Spielberg, albeit slightly less Asperger-addled. If you are looking to see the best German westerns of the 1970s, Roland Klick's Deadlock (1970) starring Bohm's bro Marquard and Fassbinder's Whity (1971) certainly beat the boy-based battles of Bohm's Chetan, Indian Boy. While Bohm's western might be tame for a work associated with German New Cinema, I can not help but feel it features a darker meta-secret subtext that is not unlike Spielberg's Hook (1991). Indeed, I don't know about other people, but I always find it rather dubious when an extra geeky guy like Bohm or Spielberg takes a special interest in young boys and dedicates their career to making films about them. Certainly a NAMBLA-worthy work, Chetan, Indian Boy is ultimately only one small step away from being a 'Boysploitation' flick in the sickly sensual spirit of Ralph C. Blum's Robby (1968) and Anthony Aikman's The Genesis Children (1972). For those looking for a more tasteful boy-based German New Cinema work that can be enjoyed by the entire family, Das goldene Ding (1972) aka The Golden Thing—a reworking of the Greek myth of Jason and the Argonauts co-directed by Alf Brustellin, Nicos Perakis, Edgar Reitz, and Ula Stöckl and featuring children in most of the lead roles—is certainly your best bet. Needless to say, Bohm's Chetan, Indian Boy demonstrates that kraut westerns have come a long way since the days of Karl May.

MORITZ, DEAR MORITZ

Hark Bohm (1978)

It is hard to believe now, but when I was like 10 or 11 years old, I thought that the Cameron Crowe penned teen coming-of-age sex comedy Fast Times at Ridgemont High (1982) directed by Amy Heckerling was one of the most subversive and delightfully delinquent films that I had ever seen, but nowadays I can only find such a film mildly entertaining, even if only for the fact that one is supposed to believe Sean Penn is a pot-addled Aryan philistine beach bum as opposed to a pot-addled Judeo-Catholic commie with a temper problem. Although I rarely watch coming-of-age films nowadays as I came-of-age what seems to be a rather long time ago, I recently decided to take a chance on the crazy kraut teen ‘comedy’ Moritz, Dear Moritz (1978) aka Moritz, lieber Moritz directed by Hark Bohm (North Sea Is Dead Sea, Für immer und immer). Admittedly, until rather recently, I had no idea that Bohm – a Fassbinder actor whose brother Marquard Bohm (Deadlock, Beware of a Holy Whore) was a somewhat popular German cult actor – was an ‘auteur’ in his own right who has directed some of the most anarchic and raunchy coming-of-age films in cinema history that put those churned out by Hollywood, especially the so-called ‘Brat Pack’ flicks, to shame. As someone who tends to play scrawny skidmark of characters, including a stupid hippie bastard in Rote Sonne (1970) aka Red Sun directed by Rudolf Thome who thinks he can wage a leftist revolution against weather and the Waylon Smithers-like character “Senkenberg” in Fassbinder’s The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979), I must say I was rather shocked to learn Hark Bohm directed a film in which a teenager cut out his teacher’s tongue and brutally beats a cat to death, but such is the world of the darkly comedic coming-of-age flick Moritz, Dear Moritz – a teen flick made for adults about a slightly disturbed fellow named Moritz who loves staring at his positively pulchritudinous aunt through a peephole and fantasizing about the many methods by which he can voyeuristically observe and/or sadistically torture his arrogant adult enemies in a variety of highly imaginative scenarios that surely must have inspired the deranged dream-sequences in Berlin auteur Jörg Buttgerit’s arthouse splatter flicks.

Coming from a nice upper-middle class family, enfant terrible teen Moritz Stuckmann (Michael Kepschull in his first of only two movie roles) is naturally the laughing stock of his particularly posh and pretentious high school because his father (Walter Klosterfelde), who ran his family’s 200-year-old business out of business in record time, is currently unemployed and spends all his free time studying American Indians. During the beginning of Moritz, Dear Moritz, Moritz is run over by a car while showing off for a girl on his bike. On top of establishing the fact that Moritz is far from the luckiest of young men, the boy also calls that man who ran him over an “asshole,” thus proving he does not take shit from anyone, especially bald bourgeois bastards whose lives revolve around upgrading their Mercedes. Although Moritz resents his pestering mother (Kyra Mladeck), he has a special love for his sardonic and terminally ill grandmother (veteran Hungarian-Jewish actress Grete Mosheim, who starred in Carl Theodor Dreyer's early 1924 gay silent film Michael and pro-Jewish propaganda flicks like Dreyfus (1930) directed by Richard Oswald) – a feisty elderly woman who shares flasks of liquor with her teenage grandson and even tries to convince him to bring extra sleeping pills next time so she can commit suicide and do away with her miserable life. Moritz has special 'sensual' feelings for his statuesque aunt and makes sure to peep through the keyhole every time she goes in the bedroom or uses the bathroom. At school, Moritz is a laughing stock among his posh peers, who describe him as a "spastic" and tease him about his failure of a father, and his own teacher even says he is probably more suited for doing 'manual labor.' Disgusted with his own prissy peers, Moritz unites with some cool proletarian youth who ride skateboards and have a rock 'n' roll band, which he joins as a saxophonist. Herr Moritz also spends a good amount of his time stalking a blonde and voluptuous Christian girl around town.

Like Fast Times at Ridgemont High, Moritz, Dear Moritz has a number of dream-sequences, but the difference being that instead of featuring fantasies about girls taking off their tops and winning surfing contests, Bohm's films have more to do with S&M splatter and horror films, even if these sometimes sickening scenarios are meant to be farcical. An exceedingly eccentric and slightly autistic young man, Moritz is the constant object of persecution and discipline and the only way he can seek revenge is daydreaming such things as his bitchy mother's tit being mangled via a rabid cat and performing a surprisingly sadistic surgical procedure on his defenseless and naked math teacher who is tied to a table that involves cutting up his tongue with scissors and cutting opening his stomach, placing live honeybees in his organs, and sewing him back up while his whole class watches. Of course, Moritz has a violent side and wastes no time brutally beating a cat to death against a tree that killed his pet rat in a scene no less brutal than the callous kitty killing scenes in Harmony Korine's Gummo (1997), thus proving the wealthy just make for more sophisticated killers. Of course, Moritz also has a couple less disturbing daydreams, including visualizing a group of grade school children playing with guns and actually killing one another. Needless to say, if there ever was a film that could have prevented the unhinged young men who committed the Columbine killings from going on their rather pointless rampage, it is most certainly Moritz, Dear Moritz – a titillating and seemingly therapeutic film to help those sometimes unhealthy young men suffering from an acute case of angst and pubescent sexual repression.

Undoubtedly, with one look at director Hark Bohm, I think 100% of people will agree that he is an archetypical nerd with a particularly pathetic physique, a more than gulky face with four-eyes, and a high voice and sniveling essence that would probably lead some to believe he was a pedophile and his adolescent-obsessed films do nothing to help this very potential assumption. Personally, I do not think Bohm is a pathetic pedo, but a man who suffered a misspent youth due to his overwhelming geekiness and his films are just a way to live vicariously through his characters the teenage years he never had. Easily surpassing Clu Gulager's kiddy arthouse short A Day with the Boys (1969) in terms of its subversiveness, albeit executed in a more tongue-in-cheek fashion, Moritz, Dear Moritz is a rare coming-of-age flick that everyone from jaded gorehounds to art-house princesses can appreciate, sort of like François Truffaut's The 400 Blows (1959) meets Buttgereit's Hot Love (1985). Indeed, if you have an angsty adolescent son and want to give him some proper early life lessons as he transitions into manhood, then it is probably best for you get him to watch Moritz, Dear Moritz, and sadistically fantasize about dismembering such depressingly droll and vapid characters as Justin Bieber and Miley Cyrus, as opposed to fetishizing them (and ultimately transitioning into a rampant homosexual, or worse yet, changing his name from "Tony" to "Tonya").

JULIEN DONKEY-BOY

Harmony Korine* (1999)

Julien Donkey-Boy is a Dogme 95 film that seems to have broken its “vow of chastity.” One of the contemporary auteur filmmakers worth mentioning, Harmony Korine directed the film. The film was inspired by Korine’s real-life schizophrenic uncle Eddie. Scottish actor Ewen Bremner stars as the schizophrenic teenager Julien who seems to have a hard time even walking without have some type of disturbance. Legendary Bavarian New Waver Werner Herzog stars as Julien’s deranged German father. A father that calls his daughter both a “diletante” and a “slut.”

Julien Donkey-Boy opens with an angered Julien committing a ghastly crime due to his denial by a young boy for a turtle. Julien has Jesus in his heart and preaches the gospel every time he is in a situation of anguish. In an imagined visit with Adolf Hitler, Julien mistakes das fuehrer for Jesus Christ. Was Hitler a Jew like Christ that called out his own kinsman? Maybe Harmony Korine knows. Julien makes sure to let Hitler know he doesn’t want his relatives to know he’s friends with a Nazi. Julien also has a brother named Chris who wants to be a “winner.” Father Herzog attempts to train Chris by hosing him down in the streets during the winter season. Unfortunately, Chris does not take it like a man and Father Herzog becomes enraged. Chris killed his mother during child birth and his father seems to have it out for him. He even attempts to pay Chris $10.00 to wear his mother’s dress. Apparently, a man that works in a field for a month in Bangladesh only makes $10.00 for his strenuous efforts.

Julien and his sister have a special kind of relationship. A relationship that is undeniably incest as the young woman is pregnant. One has to wonder what the young lady found attractive in her schizo brother Julien. I can only image it was his gold front teeth and his ability to pull off a mismatch bikini during wrestling matches. Father Herzog becomes enraged by his daughters amateur harp playing and attacks her about her lack of ability. Being the ladies man that he is, Julien defends his sister by slapping his own face.

Near the conclusion of Julien Donkey-Boy, a disturbing event occurs at a ice skating rink. Aside from the loudmouth verbal abuse of a Hasidic Jewish child and his threat to curse at Julien in Yiddish, things seem pleasant at the ice skating rink. Julien’s sister smiles with beauty as she glides across ice. The unimaginable occurs and Julien reacts in a manner that will have most art fag viewers in a state of shock. On a side note, a young lady I know said she wishes she was a man so she could, “beat up retards like Julien.”

Above the Below is a documentary directed by Harmony Korine on street magician David Blaine. In this somewhat artistic documentary covered in Korine's auteur signatures, Blaine starved himself for 44 days while being suspended from a 30 foot Plexiglas case. The documentary features the street magician talking about his reason for the huge stunt and a few small magic tricks. Blaine is quite the character so it is no surprise that Harmony Korine acted as director for Above the Below. The two Neo-Vaudevillian showmen also happen to be good friends. David Blaine decides that taking blows from an eager and muscular black man is a magic trick worthy of Above the Below. This scene reminded me of Korine's own aborted American comedy feature Fight where Korine would start fights with large individuals and get his ass kicked. Unfortunately for Korine (and fans like me), the beatings were so brutal that he couldn't finish the film. David Blaine takes his blows to the stomach like a man. The shirtless black man seemed infuriated by Blaine accepting such blows and still being able to stand up afterwards. Mr. Blaine also found himself in the company of a group of silicone implanted naked women. A segment of the Above the Below that really has nothing to do with magic but compliments the fluidity of the documentary as a whole. I also thought I would never see the day that Harmony Korine would shoot an image that looked like it came out of trashy rap video. I guess David Blaine also would like to play the role of a pimp. Above the Below features a few sequences that once again demonstrate Harmony Korine's obsession with the aesthetically abnormal. A few of the scenes feature some odd looking English people staring at the camera in ways that were also prevalent in Korine's Gummo. I truly believe that Harmony Korine has an admiration for these people as Korine seems to be a lost soul. These type of individuals would be very appealing to a lost soul. David Blaine is an interesting character thus warranting Above the Below as a documentary worthy of viewing by fans of Harmony Korine. David Blaine has been called a modern Harry Houdini and it is true the man is a dangerous showman. After Blaine emerges from the Plexiglas case after 44 days, he breaks down emotionally and states, "I love you all!" Whether Blaine is a madman or just passionate about his profession (I suspect both), he's quite the character.

Mister Lonely is the long awaited third film from director Harmony Korine. Former straight-edger Harmony Korine has had some problems with heroin addiction over the years, which also resulted in the dissolution of his relationship with actress Chloe Sevigny. One could say that over the past few years, Korine has been extra lonely. I don't think that it would be far fetched to say that the Michael Jackson impersonator featured in Mister Lonely is modeled after Korine and his own life.

A Michael Jackson impersonator meets a Marilyn Monroe impersonator after one of his performances at a French old folks home. Despite being in France, this pseudo-MJ could care less about learning the language of a bunch of over pretentious frogs. Naturally, Michael feels alone in France so being an impersonator is not a bad way to make a living. The Marilyn Monroe impersonator soon invites MJ to her home full of other impersonators. Her husband impersonates Charlie Chaplin (but acts more like Uncle Adolf) and the couple has a Shirley Temple impersonator for a daughter. A feisty and borderline belligerent Abraham Lincoln impersonator is the strongest of impersonators. A young black boy who sings about his love for women's breasts and chickens stars as Buckwheat. Other notable impersonators are the three stooges, Madonna, Queen of England, Little Red Riding Hood (how can one impersonate her?), and of course the pope. It would be interesting to know why Harmony and his brother Avi decided to pick these individuals to be impersonated. Harmony Korine deciding to have a Michael Jackson impersonator for a protagonist was no surprise to me.

It is quite apparent that Harmony Korine has mellowed out over the years. Whether it's just age or too many euphoric drugs is unknown, but I suspect a combination of both. After viewing Mister Lonely, I can easily say that Gummo is still Korine's masterpiece. Like David Lynch's Eraserhead, Gummo is a debut from a director that needed to unleash his artistic urges. Gummo is also easily Korine's most ambitious film. For Korine, Mister Lonely is a lighthearted and dare I say sometimes dull film. Mister Lonely is certainly Korine's most intimate film in the director's analysis of self. But is that always a good thing?

Mister Lonely also has a subplot featuring Werner Herzog as a "holier than holy" priest out to save the world. He takes a group of multicultural nuns on a flight to drop rice down for starving third worlders. One of the nuns accidentally falls out of the plane and somehow manages to land on the ground without a mark to her body. Due to this miracle, priest Herzog promotes other nuns jumping out of planes. The sequences featuring the skydiving nuns are beautiful to say the least. In typical Jewish tradition, Korine mocks the catholic church which is never a bad thing.

Mister Lonely features quite possibly the most heartbreaking scenes of all

MISTER LONELY

Harmony Korine's films. Although heartbreaking for the Michael Jackson impersonator, he realizes that he is an individual and should live as that individual. For Harmony Korine, I think Mister Lonely is a film about hope. I just wish I could have seen priest Werner Herzog have a beer with the Bavarian pope.

TRASH HUMPERS

Harmony Korine* (2009)

Admittedly, I used to regard Harmony Korine's first feature-length cinematic work Gummo (1997) as one of my personal favorite films and a true masterpiece of American avant-garde cinema, yet while I still rank it relatively quite high, I have gradually lost faith in the filmmaker behind it, not least of all because I feel his patently pretentious and platitude-ridden fourth feature Trash Humpers (2009) is a glaring garbage-garnished sign that the confederate Jewish-American auteur may have lost his arthouse trash touch after a decade or so of soul-destroying heroin addiction. Undoubtedly, in the subversively stylized spirit of the short film Massage the History (2010) directed by Cameron Jamie – a work comprised of internet-found-footage from YouTube of amateur Negro rappers in a ritualistic trance-like state raping bourgeois furniture ever so gently inter-spliced with home-video excerpts of burning Christmas trees and skateboards – which Korine himself described as being one of his favorite films and even going so far as stating, "This shit is fucking mind-blowing." Like jaded Jamie's strangely soothing and spiritual shit-aesthetic short (gyrating jigaboos and the sounds of Sonic Youth have never been so solacing and well synchronized before), Trash Humpers features a group of seemingly insane individuals humping animate objects, but what makes Korine's work quite different is that it features a "loser-gang cult-freak collective" aka ghoulish geriatric white Southerners that bare a strikingly resemblance to the incapacitated Grandpa from Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) fornicating with furniture, among countless other seemingly less than erotic objects as opposed to a bunch of puerile pillow-penetrating pickaninnies in a post-Harlem paradise all of their own making (with their parents' affirmative-action-activated career footing the bill for furniture, of course). Shot entirely on the thankfully dead VHS format and assumedly edited in an absurdly archaic linear fashion, Trash Humpers unsurprisingly seems more like a terribly contrived and half-spirited Giuseppe Andrews trailer-park-art video like Touch Me in the Morning (1999) or Trailer Town (2003) than the much anticipated fourth feature from the mischievous little man behind Gummo – a curious collage of positively penetrating rustic renegade redneck refinement – which is quite odd considering I always assumed that Korine influenced the Hollywood-actor-trailer-park-auteur and not the other way around, hence my general dismay regarding the ridiculously recherché trasho-phile flick. Indeed, having first seen Trash Humpers around the time it was initially released, I was less than impressed and hardly inspired by the Korine effort, hence why I was reluctant to review it a couple years ago, but having given it a second viewing recently, I must admit that I found it so banal that I fell asleep more times watching it than I care to mention. Needless to say, I was quite thrilled to learn that Korine is now completely embracing his ancestral roots by exploiting a bunch of famous goy gals (as well as his own kosher wife) – pedomorphic Disney stars no less – for his wigger-fried upcoming film Spring Breakers (2013); a comparatively mainstream movie that will probably remind viewers to what extent the filmmaker’s kosher kinsman in Hollywood have almost singlehandedly contrived what is now consider ‘American kultur’; the true opiate of the American masses, otherwise known as ”Trash Humpers.”

Featuring heretical hobos humping trees, elderly elders eroticizing bushes via maniac auto-erotic masturbation, handicapped homo-haters starved for attention, sorry Satanic sods slaughtering Southern cross-dressers, and grotesque old-timers trading in their shriveled members for large and in charge didos, Trash Humpers – not unlike many of Korine’s previous efforts – is a nefarious and mostly improvised neo-vaudevillian act of the rascally and raunchy sort with an assortment of ghaſtly ghouls who moſt likely spent their high school years sodomizing their neighbor’s sheep. An ostensibly unlucky Judaic who had the seemingly fathomless experience of coming of age in the totally alien sub-Aryan untermensch realm of Nashville, Tennessee, Korine ſtill managed to see a number of eclectic films ranging from Buſter Keaton’s hammy silent comedies to classic New German Cinema works by Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Werner Herzog during his adolescent years, hence the schizo-Semite filmmaker’s peculiar proclivity towards artiſtically embracing realiſt yet abſurdiſt white trash film settings and real-life crackheads/methheads as wacky yet undeniably wonderful film ſtars (although for Trash Humpers, Korine opted for caſting his wife, himſelf, and some friends in the roles) for his exceedingly eccentric arthouse films. To fully underſtand where Korine is coming from as an individual and artiſt, eſpecially in regard to Trash Humpers, I believe it is imperative that one watch the episode of the German-French Arte show Into the Night with... (TV Series 2002–present) where the feral Israelite filmmaker hangs around Tennessee with Argentinean auteur Gaspar Noé (I Stand Alone, Enter the Void). On top of cynically blaming white people for “ruining everything” and claiming random individuals don’t like him because he is Jewish as if every goy has a built-in Jew-dar ſyſtem in their brain to poſitively detect his racial persuasion, Korine also ſeems ſeverely diſappointed when he finds out that Noé is no authentic Hebrew as he long aſſumed and claimed to have read in a random film magazine. Seeing as his own innate Judaic ſupremacism and anti-white hate ſeems to be the topics Korine keeps bringing up randomly during Into the Night with..., one can only aſſume that he looks through the world through a hys-terical Heeb lens of lurid Reform Judaism lunacy, albeit an abſolutely aberrant and culturally-mongrelized one as a reſult of his ſocialization with Southern Baptiſt folks in the deep South (Korine once mentioned his childhood Rabbi wore a cowboy hat), which makes his film Trash Humpers – a work featuring raging and murderous wild white trash mutants who erroneouſly attempt to reproduce with literal trash – an all the more coherent, if only ſuperficially deranged, video art work. In other words, Trash Humpers, much like Gummo, is an exceedingly eccentric expression of the Hebraic collective conscious by a marginalized Hebrew unlucky enough to have grown up in the sunburnt, bloated-beer-belly of decidedly dirty Dixieland. Unfortunately, the film is nowhere as fucked nor fun as the fun-loving, filth-fucking characters in Trash Humpers would lead one to assume as a sort of softcore Semitic nightmare of a Southern dream dreamed up by a tiny post-methadone-entranced mensch who blacked-out on black tar heroin one too many times.

As I have mentioned in the past, I'd rather hump trash instead of watching another movie about the holocaust, yet Trash Humpers seems like a horror flick for second and third generation shoah survivors on dope and Prozac and a rather hideous yet equally mundane trip through one rather psychosis-ridden anti-Rabbinic Hebrew's mismatched maze of a mind than a film that can also be appreciated by good little goy boys and girls. Naturally, I assume something has gone awry in the film artist's creative mind when he creates a work that seems to be even less creative than the found-footage horror anthology V/H/S (2012); a clearly ambitious nostalgia piece that itself is far from being worthy of being described as a minor masterpiece, even amongst the banal bowels of the ever so slapdash horror genre. Like Korine, I grew up devouring a steady diet of obscure VHS tapes, but more importantly, the anarchic sort put out by subversive and mostly anti-social skateboard companies that had no problem breaking the law using copyrighted music without paying royalties and exposing teens to the esoteric anti-culture and customs of the then-marginal skateboarding world; a place for completely crude carny criminals who see stylishly savaging private and public property as a truly postmodern art form, amongst other mindless yet magical things and Trash Humpers certainly reflects this idiosyncratic influence, if not in a most loony yet longwinded, hopelessly humdrum, and intrinsically hysterical Hebrew sort of way. With his previous feature Mister Lonely (2007) – a work plagued by bureaucracy and a relatively huge budget at $8.2 million (at least for a Korine flick) – being both a commercial and artistic failure of sorts, Korine seemed to have made a rather extreme decision to head in the opposite direction and go back to his humble yet once-honorable roots with Trash Humpers, but as many junkies will tell you if they are not nodding out mid-sentence, it is virtually impossible to go back to normalcy after catching an aimless ride on Cocteau's kick, thereupon causing the lapsed enfant terrible auteur filmmaker to lose himself as an artist during his more rebellious formative years and arguably the most imperative point of his life as a developing filmmaker. As Rob Nelson of Variety Magazine remarked, one can only wonder if Trash Humpers would have any fans if it were not for Korine's already developed "hipster celebrity"; which in itself is a bad sign of an artist's decline to a soulless and superficial status of art fag fandom, thus putting the once-infamous filmmaker in putrid company with fairy Francophiles, pseudo-Semites, and/or Philo-Semites like

TRASH HUMBERS

Wes Anderson, Michel Gondry, Spike Jonze, and Sofia Coppola. Of course, at least Korine is not one for self-censoring via pathological political correctness like most of his compatriots, thus contributing to why Trash Humpers is not a total waste of time, but a terribly tiresome test in accidental self-parodying by a once ambitious auteur that seems to have fallen from heretical Hebrew grace, which makes it all the more tragic considering the United States of America has never been a place known for an ample abundance of audacious avant-garde auteur filmmakers. Maybe Korine should take heed of his own antediluvian scum-sucking-and-fucking characters collective chant, "make it, make it, don't fake it," as the seemingly apathetic artistry behind Trash Humpers is a big of a sham as the sentimentalism in Steven Spielberg's shallow cinematic shoah show-case Schindler's List (1993).

ACT DA FOOL

When you're black, one must be a fool or at least act da fool, for the world expects it. Little swarthy Jewish auteur filmmaker Harmony Korine was searching for cinematic truth(s) when he directed the short Act Da Fool starring a unconsciously charming debutante Negress and her home girls. Despite being one the best moving picture pieces Harmony Korine has ever directed (surely better than the entire film Mister Lonely), he made this Negrophile short film for the Woman's clothing and accessory company Proenza Schouler, known for making deals with high-priced Hollywood cunts like Kirsten Dunst, Julianne Moore, and Korine's ex-girlfriend Chloe Sevigny. One can only wonder whether or not Korine decided to direct a group of 40oz. malt liquor drinking and horsehair-weave-wearing black girls sporting ultra-hip femme wear in hopes of tainting the name of Proenza Schouler and those ladies (especially Sevigny) who just happen to dress in that kind of crucial corporate-gal clothing. If Harmony Korine were to be critiqued solely in regards to his ability as a creative advertiser, he has given Proenza Schouler a certain authenticity that seemed next to impossible and has given evidence that a true artist can make good use of even the most dubious of projects.

One of the things that makes Harmony Korine a standout auteur is his ability to capture American truths and trends in places most Americans, especially film directors, consciously (and subconsciously) ignore. Whereas some bigwig blockbuster filmmaker hack like James Cameron puts tons of money into an aesthetically-synthetic film to make it look "out of this world" usually resulting in a movie that is unrelentingly boring, Korine takes the most common and realistic subcultures of America (especially rural America) that are so bizarre they border on the surreal, creating true Americana art on a welfare budget. In the short film Act Da Fool, we are introduced to a black girl who talks about aspects of her day-to-day life. She and her skinny black girlfriends have very long legs, like those of a doe deer that are further accentuated by a pair of high-heeled shoes that resemble hooves. This girl proclaims, "I like the way animals hangout in the trash in parking lots," and she does the same with her friends, representing a true display of walking-the-talk.

Despite acknowledging her admiration and respect for the way animals hangout in trash in parking lots, the black girl also states negatively of herself and friends, "We can act like wild animals, we can do some messed up shit." To the girl and her friends credit, they do not kill people or smoke crack in the parking lot, they merely drink 40oz. Malt liquor and tag graffiti on the side on dumpsters, making use of the few very things they have in life and creating their own postmodern nihilistic (not even knowing what the word means) realities. Despite what some spineless whites see as negative stereotypes in Act Da Fool, one would have to be a fool not to see Korine's objective neutrality, if not total respect towards these black girls. Personally, I have never found any black girl to be appealing in my life but in Act Da Fool it is apparent that Korine made sure to find the best crème of the crop Negro genetics, the kind of healthy Negroid phenotypes a person can only find in rural America. I am afraid it seems that most city blacks have ruined their gene pools by partaking in crack, social welfare, government housing, and the worst junk foods imaginable (or at least more so than their rural brothas).

Harmony Korine has certainly followed in his Jewish Godmother Diane Arbus's legacy of capturing the wonderful and vibrant realism that is often ignored in America. Not that I can say I am a connoisseur of Rap/Hip-Hop videos but with Act Da Fool Harmony Korine has given the ultimate justice to the young Negress and her own distinct beauty, especially when one considers that not one gigantic shaking ass (like your typical Rap video) is shown in the short film because Harmony Korine ain't no fool but a documenter of a world very few people have a personal perceptive lens for and that is harmful Harmony's greatest gift as one of America's greatest modern auteur filmmakers. Apparently, the black church used to be the backbone and support network of the Afro-American community, as the great black Reverend James David Manning has stated time and time again. The female narrator of Act Da Fool states passionately, "I ain't goin' to church no more, church can suck it." Instead of the Church, these blacks girls now have a parking lot and instead of holy water they have the liquid golden calf of malt liquor. These Negresses may be living in the time of collective Negronihilism and regressive degeneration but as the young narrator states, "The stars ain't never gonna leave us."

UMSHINI WAM

It seemed like a match made in degenerate art heaven when I found out that Nashville's greatest Jewish filmmaker Harmony Korine and Cape Town's greatest white rap group Die Antwoord collaborated on the short film Umshini Wam. After watching the short, I was left aghast by this touching tragedy-turned-triumph regarding wheelchair-bound white Negros Ninja and Yo-landi Vi$$er. I make no lie of the fact that I am completely repulsed by all forms of Rap music, especially the kind featuring white-bred-play-thugs, yet Die Antwoord seems to be something different; or as the homeboyz say, "they bee real." Umshini Wam may not be a conventional biopic regarding the turbulent trials and tribulations of a group of proletarian white rappers from South Africa, but this short film seems to be the most intimate and realistic portrayal of the real personalities behind Umshini Wam. Ninja and Yo-landi Vi$$er would never claim to be true connoisseurs of high Kultur; be that as it may, they are certainly fresh with zef, mixing disposed and previously rejected cultural ingredients, ultimately concocting the highest grade chronic of white trash flavor. In Umshini Wam, Ninja and Yo-landi Vi$$er ride around in pimped out wheelchairs and enthusiastically unleash bullets from their fully automatic firearms. To fit in within the wild habitat of Afrikkka, the free-styling duo sport colorful animal costumes whilst passin' a phat joint that is larger than a baby elephant trunk.

My home-Nigga Jescie felt the following rap lullaby by Yo-landi in Umshini Wam carried the best zef, "I'm old enough to bleed/I'm old enough to breed/I'm old enough to crack a brick in your teeth while you sleep." I have to concur with Jescie, especially when I consider the sweet manner in which Yo-landi unleashes such loathsome words. In Umshini Wam, Ninja seems to have lost all of his new zef flow, even acting aloof from his baby momma ho Yo-landi. Unlike his audacious music videos and live performances, in the beginning of the short, Ninja acts like a down and out white boi that mopes around in a way that seems like he was drained his Faustian soul. Of course, as shown so eloquently by a pretentious South African Bourgie, Ninja is despised by his own racial brothers. After being told by an uptight white South African that he is "A waste of a white skin" and a "white nigger", Ninja and his homegirl Yo-landi unload their pistols on the middle-aged man and steal his designer wheelchairs. Now owning what is considered "the Rolls-Royce of wheelchairs," Die Antwoord rises triumphantly in a gangsta state of fleeting self-confidence. Near the conclusion of Umshini Wam, Ninja mentions that he once had a dream where he was the greatest rapper in the world. Although Die Antwoord is far from the most revered rap group in the world, the group has already gained international preeminence, which is not bad considering they are a group of white degenerates playing Negro music in an African homeland.

UMSHINI WAM

Umshini Wam is an artsy (yet not too artsy) metaphor for the rise of Die Antwoord. Just as Ninja and Yo-landi kill a group of whites in the film, in real life they have rejected the fruits of their own racial forefathers culture. The German philosopher Oswald Spengler once wrote something along the lines that if the white race were to become collectively passive, certain whites who still contained the fighting spirit would join the nonwhites and help them take over the world. I certainly see what Spengler described in the spirit of Die Antwoord; a group that brings true organic Nordic flavor to a style of music that is Negro to the core. When Ninja raps, his rough hyperactive rhymes sound like a Germanic tribesman calling out in preparation for a tribal war. Apparently, "Umshini wami" is the name of a popular Zulu "struggle song" that was commonly used by the military wing of the African National Congress during the battle against Apartheid in South Africa. Now in post-Apartheid; racial discrimination has been reversed. Black South Africans brutally rape and murder white Afrikaan boer farmers everyday, yet the mainstream media (in both South Africa and the U.S.) totally ignores it. In post-white-power South Africa, Die Antwoord raged a cultural war and won. At the end of Umshini Wam, I felt like saluting Ninja and Yo-landi as they gallantly rode across a dark South African road in their pimped-out wheelchairs (featuring alien head and pot leaf holographic rims). With Umshini Wam, Harmony Korine has created an innovative work that will indubitably be revered as one of his greatest cinematic efforts. Forget Eminem's 8 Mile, Umshini Wam is the most eminent hard-knock-life-white-rapper-turned-Negro-approved-freestyle-champion story ever told.

SPRING BREAKERS

When I discovered that degenerate Judaic auteur and nihilistic neo-vaudevillian Harmony Korine (Gummo, Julien Donkey-Boy) was going to direct a relatively mainstream film featuring Hollywood heartthrob James Franco as a wacked out wigger, not to mention whoring out a couple of Disney mini divas, I was admittedly quite excited, especially considering his seemingly artistically contrived, subsequent post-junky features Mister Lonely (2007) and Trash Humpers (2009) were monumental disappointments of the first order that made me more than question the once ambitious and seemingly unstoppable filmmaker's artistic integrity. As someone who still regards his directorial debut Gummo (1997) as a delightfully debauched kosher carny comedy masterpiece of the intricately goy-hating sort, I did not want to accept that Korine is a one-hit arthouse wonder who put everything he had to give in a single film at the mere age of 24, but it seems that after a decade lost to heroin/methadone addiction and his recent marriage and becoming a father, Korine lost the sort of untamable energy that made him one of the most loved and hated, as well as idiosyncratic and iconoclastic, independent filmmakers of his generation. Unfortunately, it seems that the time he spent directing music videos for hipster bands like Sonic Youth, Cat Power and Will Oldham had a radically negative effect on Korine's once anarchistic vaudevillian directing style as his latest feature Spring Breakers—a pseudo-farcical look at a cutesy quartet of girls from the culturally and racially mongrelized iPod generation going on the nihilistic and hedonistic 'rite of passage' known as spring break—seems like one ceaselessly ugly, fiercely filler-filled, and aesthetically vacant music video banally depicting the sheer and utter worthlessness of a decidedly decadent and wanton yet worthless generation of Americans whose sole aspiration in life is pleasure for pleasure's sake at any cost and nothing more. If Spring Breakers is another one of Korine's celluloid pranks/jokes, the joke is certainly not funny anymore as his latest work is, at best, a sub-softcore flick for pathetic men (Korine included, as his much younger wife is one of the stars of the film) who swoon after pedomorphic teenage girls of the totally untalented and racially ambiguous sort and, at worst, a sign that the director has finally grown up and turned into the typical Hollywood Hebrew, who revoltingly slobbers over and cinematically defiles youthful shiksa chicks, especially of the ostensibly innocent and virginal sort, while also pushing all the most deleterious untermensch pseudo-kultur ingredients that reflect the racial, cultural, moral, and spiritual nightmare that is the seemingly apocalyptic, post-European United States of America. Like a vaguely heterosexual post-Finding Forrester (2000) Gus van Sant flick as directed by the ungodly hate child of Paris Hilton, Eminem, Hype Williams, and Howard Stern, Spring Breakers is a banally bacchanalian depiction of the post-counter-culture American dream where a fucked foursome of morally devoid and equally naïve bourgeois gals get a lesson from a loveable white trash wigger in what it takes to rise to the top of the sociopathic and cannibalistic American plutocracy in a film so stupid, artificial, and feckless in its storyline that it could have only been directed by an American Jew of the post-holocaust generation. Described by countless film reviewers as a so called “fever dream,” Spring Breakers features virtually every reason why America is the most infectious metaphysical disease the world has ever known as a putrid piece of phantasmagorical and kaleidoscopic celluloid anti-art, insipid nihilism of the needless and heedless sort, and cutthroat kosher capitalism. If you ever wonder why medieval-minded towelheads from the Middle East have described America as “Great Satan,” look no further than kosher Korine’s totally tedious exercise in girls-gone-recklessly-wanton materialistic excess and pseudo-ecstasy, Spring Breakers.

The whorishly named Faith (Selena Gomez), Brit (Ashley Benson), Candy (Vanessa Hudgens), and Cotty (Rachel Korine) are four childhood friends and rather naïve college students from a small town who hope to “find themselves” via spring break vacation, but the problem is that they do not have the cash to fund their fun. Out of all the girls, Faith, the only one to not have trashy and unnaturally dyed hair, is also the only with any sort of moral compass due to her semi-serious dedication to Christianity, but her friends are a bunch of soulless sinners who take massive bong hits to forget their complete and utter lack of intrinsic values and spirituality. To fund their trip to the sunny and superlatively superficial sunny beaches of Florida, Brit and Candy nonsensically rob a family fast food restaurant with hammers and squirt guns and Cotty drives the getaway girl, thus figuratively making their pact with the devil. Although baby girl-like Faith is disturbed by her criminally-inclined friends’ senseless, if not monetarily fruitful, actions, she agrees to join them on their all-expenses paid spring break vacation in the dirty Southeast. Upon arriving on the sunny beaches of Florida, the frisky foursome immediately begins engaging in degenerate Dionysian spring break partying, which includes flashing and waving their twats and tits in front of random strangers’ faces, partying hard with fetus-like wimpy wiggers snorting lines of coke off flat-chested breasts, taking countless gigantic bong hits and shot gunning cans of beer, and various other forms of ecstasy-striving forms of momentary mental derangement. Unfortunately, the cops show up at one of these parties and busts the four girls, as well as two identical twin wigger gangstas known as the “ATL Twins” (played by quasi-incestuous degenerate skaters Sidney and Thurman Sewell, who also go by the name the ATL twins in real-life and are known to share the same girlfriend) for narcotic possession. Luckily, a superlatively loathsome yet paradoxically likeable white trash named fellow “Alien” (James Franco), the gang leader of the negrophiliac criminal outfit that the ATL twins belong to, takes an instant liking to the girls and bails them out of jail and hopes to make them special femme fatale-like members of his culturally retarded and proudly illiterate crew of spring-breaker-robbing and extraterrestrial dope and arms dealing philistine thugs with patently putrid pomo style. Not unsurprisingly, the only religious member of the curiously cutesy quartet, Faith decides to stick with her faith and bails on her friends and takes a bus home after being surrounded by Alien's mostly Negroid, gun-stroking, four-wheeler riding, and drug-addled friends, but Brit, Candy, and Cotty take an instant liking to the out-of-this-world gang leader and become honorary half-naked members of his colorful crime ring. A true blue entrepreneur who achieved the American dream by going from rags to riches as the only white boy from an all-black neighborhood and the only member of his family to live to adulthood, Alien is proud to admit while showing the girls around his schlock-ridden and terribly tasteless mansion that: "This is the fuckin' American dream. This is my fuckin' dream, y'all! All this sheeyit! Look at my sheeyit! I got... I got SHORTS! Every fuckin' color. I got designer T-shirts! I got gold bullets. Motherfuckin' VAM-pires. I got Scarface. On repeat. SCARFACE ON REPEAT. Constant, y'all! I got Escape!" and, indeed, he lives a sort of Negro-fried postmodern take on the anti-hero of De Palma's overrated 1983 mob flick, but that all changes when reality smacks him in his ugly gold-plated grill.

Although his former protégé and best friend, Alien now has a major beef with a seemingly half-braindead and beefy black gang leader Archie (real-life criminal rapper Gucci Mane), who feels the jaded white boy is steppin' on his turf and proving to be bad for his black, black market business. In an essentially failed drive-by shooting meant to take out Alien and his girls, archenemy Archie's associate wounds Cotty in the arm, so she comes to the realization that things are no longer fun and are getting dangerous, so her spring break has reached its dramatic conclusion and she decides to go back home, thus proving that Brit and Candy—the two girls who committed the seemingly insane robbery to get the money to go to spring break in the first place—are the two alpha-chicks among their clique. To show their solidarity with his capitalist cause, Brit and Candy engage in a threesome with Alien in his luxurious pool in a ritualistic manner and not long after they head to Archie's neon-colored mansion estate for one final showdown for taking over the criminal underground of St. Petersburg. Rather absurdly, Alien is shot dead with a single bullet to the head before he barely makes it onto his negro nemesis' flamboyant rainbow-colored property, but his two girls Brit and Candy, sporting their signature pink ski masks and bikinis, come in unloading a storm of bullets and killing everyone (no less than ten people) on the big-time crook's property. While leaving Archie's crib, the two lurid and seemingly loony lethal lasses plant a kiss on the head of Alien's cadaver, thus thanking their ghetto guru for schooling them in cannibalistic cutthroat capitalism that they will ultimately utilize after graduating from college and entering the corporate world.

While Faith proved to be too weak and meek to fully embrace her spring break and Cotty eventually quit when things got dangerous, ballsy yet brainless bitches Brit and Candy proved to be all-American business women and post-modern feminists as the only two of the foursome that could juggle business and pleasure, the two materialistic ingredients post-racial/post-cultural 'successful' Americans aspire for. Neither truly an indictment nor parody of Generation Y, Spring Breakers is essentially a cynical joke on the part of auteur Harmony Korine at the expense of a valueless generation of Americans—the very same zeitgeist of youth his film was marketed towards—that his racial kinsmen in heeb Hollywood, MTV, and the mainstream spiritually defiled with their anti-kultur bogus materialism, xenophilia, and unwaveringly glorification of crime and corruption. Of course, considering the film ending up grossing $31.7 million at the worldwide box office against a mere $5 million production budget, Korine is undoubtedly laughing all the way to the bank and has finally established himself as a mainstream Hollywood director to be reckoned with. Not unsurprisingly, Korine went so far as to even whore out his young wife and the mother of his daughter, Rachel Korine, who on top of flashing her little ass and tits, making out with anonymous buff bros, and acting like a tyrannical teen tramp, sings “you’re never gonna get this pussy” while grabbing her naughty bits in a terribly tasteless scene in Spring Breakers that proves the director has finally whored himself out to Tinseltown and has taken his spouse and a couple ex-Disney dames along for the pseudo-risque ride. Featuring James Franco giving a sensitive wiggerfied performance of Britney Spears’ “Everytime” on his angelically white poolside piano, soulless tracks by Skrillex and Nicki Minaj, the most emaciated holocaust survivor-esque looking white niggers in the history of filmmaking, a pseudo-hot hodgepodge of the stupidest scantily clad college kids in American history, and an apocalyptic candy-colored anti-aesthetic that once again proves that Korine is a magnet and worshipper of all that is ugly and stupid in this world like his kin in Hollywood as a people who derive almost spiritual satisfaction from destroying beauty and bringing physical and metaphysical disfigurement to the world, Spring Breakers is vivid proof that the director no longer has jokes/pranks worthy of telling, but has settled for recycling the same old Semitic gags from the Israelite bargain bin. The fact that Korine recently announced he planned to release a remix of Spring Breakers proves all the more that it is nothing more than one big and overly expensive music video of the supremely soulless, racially mongrelized, and culturally retarded sort that does more than enough to conform that what a certain German nationalist party from the early twentieth century said about the director’s people. Apparently, Korine was partially inspired to write the script for Spring Breakers to makeup for the fact that he missed out on such MTV-addled degeneracy when he was attempting to become a professional skateboarder during his early adult years and it certainly shows as a work that seems like an ADHD-ridden middle-life crisis piece directed by a curious kosher crackhead with an unhealthy fixation for pedomorphic ladies lacking in curves. Still, I wish Korine well on his unintentional quest to help speed up the decline of Judaic America with his future films and I have a feeling that Spring Breakers is just a small taste of the cultural decay and social malignancy that he will bring to Hollywood in upcoming years.

THE BEACH BUM
THE BEACH BUM

Harmony Korine* (2019)

As of late, it has become quite trendy among certain circles to hate the so-called 'Baby Boom Generation' (aka people born between 1946 and 1964) and—considering the current super sorry pre-third world state of the United States—rightly so. Sure, subsequent generations like Generation X and Millennials are certainly not much better, but it was ultimately the Boomers—the most spoiled and, in turn, narcissistic and materialistic, generation in all of recorded human history—that was responsible for gleefully disposing of the ostensible 'everyday fascism' of traditional values and embracing so-called 'free love,' feminism, abortion, xenophilia/multiculturalism, and pretty much every single other social ill that has led to the steady decline of the United States, especially among the nation's increasingly dwindling white majority. Needless to say, the stereotypical boomer mentality is innately insufferable but of course Hollywood—the innately anti-Occidental social engineering system that regularly churns out infantile agitprop disguised as mindless entertainment that is responsible for brainwashing these people their entire lives, hence their total devotion to glaringly socially deleterious things ranging from the counterculture movement to greasy fast food—has rarely dared to openly outright mock its greatest supporters, at least until relatively recently in a somewhat unexpected form. Indeed, with his latest feature The Beach Bum (2019), (ex)junky auteur Harmony Korine—a Judaic director that has demonstrated a somewhat strange but not unexpected lifelong disdain for white people in general both in interviews and cinematically—has directed what might be the anti-boomer film par excellence to the point where he even managed to get boomer icon Jimmy Buffett to appear in the film. More than just an assuredly absurdist assault on boomers and their spiritually hollow pseudo-pagan hyper hedonistic tendencies and asinine aesthetic interests, the film also makes a mockery out of various other white American (pseudo)cultural trends since then, including negrophilia, JNCO jeans, lame mainstream rock like Creed, cracker-safe pop rap like Snoop Dogg, soulless extravagant weddings (that soon predictably end in divorce), beach party chic metrosexualism, and the most uniquely uncultivated form(s) of libertinism, among various other ludicrously loathsome things that remind one just how painfully culturally and spiritually retarded the United States really is.

As I regrettably predicted well over a decade ago, Korine seems to have suffered the same auteur curse as Orson Welles in terms of being unable to top his debut film Gummo (1997)—the lapsed junky filmmaker's indubitable magnum opus—though I would argue that his latest couple more-mainstream-friendly films are certainly an improvement from where his career was headed for a while. Indeed, while his second feature Julien Donkey-Boy (1999) was a worthwhile experiment that highly benefited from an unforgettable acting performance from

Werner Herzog, his third feature Mister Lonely (2007)—his first flick in almost a decade of sad dope-addled stagnation—was mostly a contrived bore and fourth Trash Humpers (2009) seemed like a half-hearted kosher con and rip-off of the organically grotesque aberrant-garde camcorder excursions of Hollywood actor turned true lumpenprole auteur Giuseppe Andrews like Trailer Town (2003) and Period Piece (2006). While Korine demonstrated some promise with the occasional interesting short like the jungle bunny fever dream Act Da Fool (2010) and Umshini Wam (2011) starring zany South African wigger rap group Die Antwoord, it was only with Spring Breakers (2012) that Korine refined his new aesthetic and managed to make a relatively mainstream film that knowingly and winkingly (and, some might say, cynically) mocks the mainstream. Undoubtedly, The Beach Bum, which features a somewhat similar nasty neon Florida aesthetic to Spring Breakers, goes even further and takes a humorously hypnotic approach to what can probably best be described as hyper hokey hyperrealism. Indeed, featuring sun-soaked hick hobos and preposterously wealthy and equally effete negro dope dealers in their own totally tasteless and tacky vision of heaven, Korine's latest cinematic effort is a surprisingly feel-good-flick that paradoxically manages to inspire a magnificent misanthropy, as if the glistening sunny shots featured throughout the film are a sort of slyly sardonic foreshadowing of the apocalypse. The film also manages to reinvent the stoner film in the sense that it will probably completely dumbfound the average stoner and completely ruin their much undeserved 'good vibes.'

Virtually borrowing its ostensibly seductively sleazy melodramatic shell from the hit David Duchovny Showtime TV series Californication (2007-2014) in its degenerate dramedy approach to a hedonistic once-popular struggling writer (or, in this case, pothead 'poet') with a similarly fucked family life that includes a reluctant soulmate and a sassy daughter, Korine's undeniably visually flavorsome flick also winks at (or, probably more accurately, goofily mocks) such classic pothead pictures as Richard Linklater's Dazed and Confused (1993) also starring Matthew McConaughey, the Coen brothers' The Big Lebowski (1998), and Terry Gilliam's Hunter S. Thompson adaptation Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas (1998). Indeed, just as Korine seemed very much stuck in the late-1990s MTV realm when he directed Spring Breakers (in fact, in interviews, Korine explained that he was at least partly inspired to direct the film due to personally missing this rather retarded rite-of-passage as a kid), The Beach Bum feels very much like the result of the auteur getting the idea for the film after binge-watching classic 1990s pothead flicks while high on weed, LSD, and/or Pabst Blue Ribbon (which, rather fittingly, is featured prominently throughout the film). Ironically (or not so), the film is also just as re-watchable as the most re-watchable of these classic cult stoner films, as if Korine wanted to ensure that the film would also become a timeless THC-tinged classic for the dope fiend filmgoers that it so merrily mocks. Considering that the boomer generation seems hopelessly stuck in the past (as marijuana abuse tends to do that to people), it is only fitting that the titular antihero portrayed by McConaughey is an exceedingly emotionally immature and infantile culture vulture that is like a virtual shit-magnet for virtually every superlatively shitty fashion and cultural trend from the late-1960s to late-1990s. In that sense, it makes perfect sense that the film stars such outmoded Afro-American pop culture figures as Snoop Dogg and Martin Lawrence alongside lame boomer 'yacht rock' favorites like Jimmy Buffet and Bertie Higgins. In short, like with his greatest films, Korine reveals with The Beach Bum that he is a sort of Talmudic alchemist by turning radically rancid goy shit into strangely refined kosher comedy gold. Despite being indubitably Korine's most ludicrously lowbrow cinematic effort to date, there is a certain meta-tacky genius to the processions that really underscores the auteur's particular pathology-ridden 'genius.'

As pretty much everything about it, most notably its title and the character's appearance, demonstrates, the film's antihero is supposed to be a lovable-piece-of-hyper-hedonistic-hippie-white-trash-shit that is strangely traditionally American due to his somewhat dubious underdog status and shameless lack of cultivation and pretense, but an early scene in the film unequivocally exposes the fact that 'Moondog' (Matthew McConaughey)—a deceptively merry man that seems to bask in the idea of living in a modern-day Sodom of sun, surf, and semen—is a much more malevolent and malefic figure than his 'hippie hobo chic' persona and 'perennial party' lifestyle hints at. Indeed, while at a less than jamming Jimmy Buffet gig where he is a sort of low-key guest of honor, Moondog gets on stage and engages in a little self-described "poetic foreplay" and declares with a sort of sordid sinister smirk and understated foreboding menace, "One day, I will swallow up the world [laughs] And when I do, I hope you all perish violently," thereupon demonstrating with one easy-to-miss line of dialogue that he is actually a very evil, albeit lazy, man the fetishizes a sort of savage Armageddon and ultimately the extermination of mankind as a whole. Undoubtedly, what becomes immediately obvious about Moondog is that, despite apparently having a legendary reputation as a poet, his ostensible poetry basically ranges from incoherent gibberish to pornographic swill and he even prides himself on stealing great lines from great poets of the past. For example, Moondog brags to his best friend 'Lingerie' aka 'Rie' (Snoop Dogg)—a pathetically pot-plagued drug dealer and rapper whose ghetto-flavored arrogance is only transcended by his effete excess—that he once plagiarized D. H. Lawrence for a 7th grade poetry contest and proudly "won that motherfucker." Despite his relative lack of pretense, Moondog—a sort of severely sun-tanned Shmendrik boomer king—is also not beneath berating his hobo homies for not immediately recognizing the decadent poetry of Charles Baudelaire. Despite usually being so stoned and/or drunk that he can barely stand properly on both feet (in fact, the character has a peculiar posture and similarly goofy gait in general), Moondog is also not beneath putting up a preposterous tough guy front and stating unintentionally humorous things to wimpy Hebraic lawyers like, "I write poetry you little bitch." In short, Moondog is like a modern-day American equivalent to French decadent Symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud if Rimbaud kept writing poetry well into middle-age instead of quitting at age 21 and sans the poesy prowess. Of course, even as a young teenager, Rimbaud never wrote anything nearly as retarded as Moondog self-satisfied words, "I was thinking about you. And I got up at about 4:00 a.m., and I had to take a piss, as guys do, and I looked down at my dick...and I had such affection in my heart when I did. Knowing that it had been inside you twice today...made me feel beautiful." Notably, Rimbaud, who was also heavily influenced by Baudelaire, did seem to live by a personal poetic philosophy at the age of 16 that is quite similar to Moondog's as indicated by his words in a letter to his benefactor Georges Izambard: "I'm now making myself as scummy as I can. Why? I want to be a poet, and I'm working at turning myself into a seer. You won't understand any of this, and I'm almost incapable of explaining it to you. The idea is to reach the unknown by the derangement of all the senses. It involves enormous suffering, but one must be strong and be a born poet. It's really not my fault." Of course, while Rimbaud knew when to quit and decided that being a wandering merchant would be a much more preferable trade to scribbling lines before dying at a fairly premature age, Moondog is essentially a whacked-out wastrel living on borrowed time, or so he discovers after being forced to confront the complete and utter unsustainability of his particularly parasitic existence after his sugar momma unexpectedly croaks.

Not unlike many self-described 'artists' and 'poets' in the United States, Moondog is, above all else, an all-consuming lecherous leech that is only able to maintain his hippie dip-shit poet lifestyle because he is wealthy; or, more specifically, he is very much the piss poor product of misguided generosity and lives off the wealth of his wanton mud shark wifey Minnie (Isla Fisher), who is actually deluded enough to believe that her serial philanderer hubby is a 'genius' and 'great man.' In other words, the only reason that Moondog is able to posture as a poet instead of a bum and maintain an extravagant lifestyle of unhinged bacchanalian buffoonery is because he lives off his would-be-hot-and-hip whore heiress wife, so naturally the antihero is placed in a somewhat precarious situation when his spouse tragically dies in a car crash and he is forced to fend for himself in what ultimately proves to be his own sort of softcore sativa-driven 'mein kampf' and the central (non)plot of the film. Indeed, for the majority of the film, the viewer watches as Moondog wanders around aimlessly and recklessly while he attempts to finish "the next great American novel" so that he can obtain his inheritance, which is frozen in escrow. Wisely (and, ultimately, quite prophetically) fearing that Moondog would "piss away her family fortune," Minnie put a special clause in her will that her husband would not be able to obtain his inheritance until he cleaned up his life and finished his latest book. As can predicted in an anti-

THE BEACH BUM

Hollywood film disguised as a Hollywood film that devilishly plays with mainstream genre conventions to the point of practically projectile-vomiting these mostly negligible narrative ingredients onto the viewer's face, Moondog naturally accomplishes this relatively simple task with a certain grotesque burn-out gusto, but not before going on an absurdist odyssey of magnificent idiocy to pot-head purgatory that involves arrests, court-ordered drug rehab, escaping from rehab with the help of pyromaniacs, degenerate dolphin tours, and dauntingly dumb drug-smuggling flights with old blind negro pothead pilots, among other moronic missions. Needless to say, Moondog naturally kind of just falls into certain situations as he is a high time preference moron that seems incapable of planning ahead and instead just goes with the flow, especially when he has a steady flow of pot and booze as fuel. In fact, even Moondog's new book is nothing more than recycled crap from his various drunken readings at seaside dive bars, as he is not the sort of guy that expends too much energy on anything, including his great 'gift' of the written word. Rather humorously and in a fashion that makes a grand mockery of the entire positively positive happy endings of hollow Hollywood films, Moondog even manages to secure the coveted Pulitzer for his latest collection of infantile scribbling, but then again Tyehimba Jess also once won one thereupon making the prize seemingly worthless nowadays.

There are many less than noble traits that epitomize boomers and the conclusion of The Beach Bum is certainly quite symbolic of the most loathsome of boomerisms. Indeed, after finally securing his inheritance of $50 million, Moondog buys a big boat that he idiotically names "success" and has the rest of the money placed on boat for a huge party involving fireworks, or as he states, "None of that sparkler bullshit that impresses lesbians, pregnant women and babies. No, no, no, let's-let's Valhalla this motherfucker." Needless to say, Moondog, who is no Nordic god, destroys the money by setting it on fire in an allegorical scene that echoes the boomer propensity towards mindless consumerism and wasting money in general whilst refusing to plan for the future (hence why so many boomers are unable to retire and/or do not plan on leaving their children any sort of inheritance despite their relative financial success in life). Like the eponymous bum played by Michel Simon in Jean Renoir's classic subversive frog comedy Boudu Saved from Drowning (1932)—a film that clearly had an imperative influence on The Beach Bum—Moondog merely drifts away on a raft in the end and, to quote the classic frog comedy, the antihero is, "back to his old vagrancy, a free spirit once more."

Admittedly, I lost a lot of respect for Korine after seeing him on a 2010 episode of the show Into the Night with... where he routinely complains about "white people" and even becomes noticeably dejected when Gaspar Noé informs him that he is not of the Hebraic persuasion as the Judaic director had long assumed. Undoubtedly, such sentiments hint that he was merely mocking the hopelessly hapless honkies in his magnum opus Gummo and Trash Humpers was nothing more of a grotesque continuation of such keen kosher supremacist sentiments, as if the aberrant auteur saw elderly Caucasian confederates as the most horrific (subhuman) beings in the entire world. Despite these glaring Hebraic hostilities, Korine has unequivocally demonstrated a sort of playfully savagely sardonic contempt for people of various races and creeds, including his own. Indeed, in the film, Jonah Hill—arguably the most insufferable young kosher comedic actor working today—portrays Moondog’s superlatively sleazy (and covertly kosher) agent ‘Lewis,’ who reveals himself to be the ultimate walking-and-talking Der Stürmer-esque stereotype by bragging with a certain awe-inspiring combination of hubris and chutzpah, “You know what I liked the most about being rich? You can just... be horrible to people, and they just have to take it.” Indeed, lecherous Lewis, who apparently once attempted to molest Moondog’s (then-underaged) daughter, looks and sounds like the mud-dwelling Cajun wigger nephew of Harvey Weinstein in what is probably the sole tolerable performance of Hill’s mostly radically repugnant career. Korine also playfully mocks the stereotypical bourgeois Jewish nuclear family unit in the form of the less than lovable Lipschitz family, who have their own atonal theme song that is proudly sung by their fat and bald doctor patriarch that seems like the sort of physician that would have secret cameras hidden around their practice. Luckily for the lovely Lipschitz family, they have enough money to go on an ostensible ‘dolphin tour’ where they pay witness to the fact that sharks like dark meat after a negro named ‘Captain Wack’ (Martin Lawrence)—a singularly inept (supposed) Vietnam War vet and dolphin tour guide dude that, despite accidentally causing the deaths of a number of his previous patrons, somehow always manages to get his permits reinstated (or so he gleefully brags)—has his foot bit off by a shark in a scenario that provides Moondog great grotesque giggles. Undoubtedly fulfilling various highly negative racial stereotypes, Captain Wack not only feeds his pet parrot cocaine and has had only license revoked numerous times due to the deadly nature of his sub-amateur dolphin tours, but he is also so supremely and surreally stupid—to the point of savagely mocking similar beloved black characters from stereotypical semitic stoner flicks—that he sincerely believes he that loses his foot as a result of dolphin with sharp teeth as opposed to a gam of sharks, but of course no character is more patently pathetic and insipidly idiotic as the titular antihero.

While The Beach Bum superficially depicts Moondog as a mostly harmless fun-loving Florida Keys freak whose ludicrously lurid ‘laissez-faire’ approach to life is supposed to be admired, the film gives the viewer enough clues to make it quite clear that the protagonist is nothing if not a putrid piece of shit of the ludicrously lonely and sorry sort and his hyper hedonism is nothing more than a pathological coping mechanism for such innate internal misery. Indeed, at the beginning of the film, Moondog not only frankly admits to his wife that, “I’m a bottom-feeder. I got to go low to get high. You know that,” but he also rather revealingly confesses in a rare candid non-clownish moment of pathetic self-reflection, "I don't have any friends." Indeed, while Moondog is almost always depicted with other degenerates and debauchees, these supposed friendships are nothing more than displays of mutual parasitism and exploitation where they merely encourage drug abuse and mindless/loveless sexual savagery. Arguably most revealingly, despite presenting himself as a sort of tie-dye Don Juan that is down to drive his dick into any wet and wild hole, Moondog is a literal emasculated cuckold whose wanton wife carries on a long-term affair with his supposed best friend (also, rather revealingly, Moondog is depicted simply performing lifeless cunnilingus and slavish foot fetish shit on his wife, as if he is simply incapable of asserting himself on her like a real man). Naturally, the same best friend, Lingerie—a dope-dealing gangster with his own personal thug mercenary force—not only talks Moondog into making a total fool of himself by encouraging him to wear drag (notably, it is ultimately for no reason, as the anti-hero's drag garb is almost indistinguishable from his everyday colorful crap kitsch costume), but he also gets him involved in possibly deadly behavior, including smuggling drugs in a plane flown by an elderly and nearly-blind Rastafarian negro in what seems to be Korine's ironic nod to the Snoop Dogg celluloid turd Soul Plane (2004). Undoubtedly, virtually all of Moondog's behavior ultimately demonstrates that he has very little concern for human life, especially his own, but of course such is the natural result of the pathetically outmoded "Turn on, tune in, drop out" Weltanschauung that he so slavishly abides by.

While The Beach Bum can certainly be compared to such prestigious films as Boudu Saved from Drowning and the rare bawdy guido cult flick like Pasolini's protege Sergio Citti's Casotto (1977) aka Beach House, it also manages to be quite comparable to some of the worst celluloid trash in film history, including the somehow-sometimes-entertaining celluloid turd National Lampoon's Last Resort (1993) starring Corey Feldman and Corey Haim. Also, if the eponymous corpse of Weekend at Bernie's (1989) was reanimated as a dope zombie that fed on cheap beer, expensive weed, and piss poor untermensch pussy instead of human brains (which he could surely use), the creature would not be far off from Mr. Moondog as such a soulless scum-sucking sod barely carries any qualities that can admirably be described as human. In short, the sort of Sunshine State surrealism of The Beach Bum makes for an insanely ironical aesthetic when one considers the sheer and utter blackness that is indelibly marinated into Moondog's sad little forsaken heart, subtly splenetic psyche, and cobwebbed abyss-like soul. Of course, one should not expect anything less from a film where slapstick humor is derived from the senseless abuse of elderly women and the brutal beating and robbery of paraplegic boomers by JNCO-sporting-and-Creed-loving evangelical pyromaniacs. When Moondog literally burns his entire fortune at the end of the film, it almost seems like a moment of great allegorical purity as if to symbolize the complete and utter incineration of the plastic post-hippie pseudo-culture that pretty much epitomizes every single generation since the boomers, though that would be too generous of an interpretation, especially considering that the protagonist—like so many (self)destructive white trash types—survives the ordeal. Instead, Moondog's coastal cash holocaust more symbolizes the all-consuming and all-destructive force that is demonic boomer plague than any sort of 'Baptism by Fire.' Undoubtedly, the cultural, aesthetic, and racial retardation of this plague is probably best highlighted in a scene where Jimmy Buffett and Snoop Dogg sing a song together in what is arguably the most accursed and cringe-worthy duet in all of human history. In that sense, Korine has certainly further refined his aberrant anti-aesthetic since Spring Breakers, as no one could dream up such dauntingly disgusting audio-visual vile with a sound mind, thus confirming the auteur's place as America's greatest and most artistically ruthless Judaic troll. Indeed, Korine does for his tribe what Sam Hyde and Million Dollar Extreme do for good goys and gals in terms of his anarchistic use of anti-humor, including the implementation of lovably grotesque racial caricatures that rape and ravish the soul with a twisted smile.

Undoubtedly, it is hard for me to imagine any intelligent person watching Korine's film and not coming to the logical conclusion that the success of Snoop Dogg—both the real 'man' and his clearly quite autobiographical character 'Lingerie'—symbolizes the height of clown world absurdity and mass cultural retardation in that that someone so decidedly dope-addled, dimwitted and delinquent could be so rich and famous to the point of being an ostensibly wholesome household name, which is one of the things The Beach Bum (seemingly unintentionally) really underscores in its hyper hokey hyperrealist hysteria. Of course, whereas Snoop Dogg epitomizes every negative stereotype of the 'successful' American negro as a self-centered snake that has gotten wealthy off promoting various forms of degeneracy to his own people (not to mention that various white philistines that love him), Moondog—a racially deracinated dooper that is ruthlessly cuckolded by his beloved wife and supposed best friend—is a sort of anti-Faustian man as a proudly aimless anti-mensch that represents that antithesis of every great quality of white European men of the past. In short, Moondog is a spiritually castrated pile of dog shit that has even eclipsed Nietzsche's last man in terms of abject worthlessness and passivity. While Moondog seems to be mindlessly striving for a completely intangible state of immaculate Ataraxia, he really just enjoys basking in the nefariously necrotic asshole of Sunshine Sodom, especially since it requires the least bit of physical and mental exertion to embrace such a licentious loser life. An excremental expression of the moronic mongrelized Hollywood joke of American (anti)alchemy, Moondog is human manure preposterously elevated to the level of a sort of great literary aristocracy that lives a hedonistic lifestyle worthy of ten debauched kings; or, in short, Korine's most ambitious joke yet. Unfortunately, it is still no Gummo—joke or no joke.

While it is well known that Korine is an (ex)junky, his pothead status seemed slightly more dubious, at least until he released Spring Breakers and especially The Beach Bum, the latter of which could have only been misbegottenly conceived by a full-fledged ganja glutton. Notably, out of all the Hebrews that I have ever personally known, every single one of them was a full-fledged pot-head, including accountants, social workers, robotic students, and self-loathing anti-Zionists far-left wankers (notably, one chosenite I briefly befriended, whose father was apparently a bigwig at the Smithsonian Institution, claimed his entire family smoked, including an elderly uncle that was some sort of ‘weed scientist’ that hooked up all his other family members with high-grade pharmaceutical dope). Of course, the pathetic proliferation of cannabis-crufted kosher comedies reveal that there is a sort collective reefer madness among the tribe and Jewish film scholar Nathan Abrams has highlighted this less than flattering fact in his book The New Jew in Film: Exploring Jewishness and Judaism in Contemporary Cinema (2011). For example, when discussing Hebraic hack Judd Apatow’s miscegenation abortion Knocked Up (2007), Abrams notes, “Rogen plays another schlubby (Yiddish: clumsy, stupid or unattractive) Jewish stoner, Ben Stone [...] Unemployed, his Jewish and homosocial daily life is characterized by routine drinking and smoking weed [...] Apatow is unapologetic about Stone’s stoner qualities, lovingly detailed in the opening sequence. Indeed, the film celebrates Stone, as he, somewhat surprisingly but entirely in keeping with cinematic tradition, sleeps with an attractive blonde, professional shiksa.” In short, the United States has become such a glaringly semitic stoner dystopia and kosher cultural wasteland that hydro-laced Judeocentric fantasies, especially of the considerably insufferable Apatovian ‘Jew Tang Clan’ variety, are even the norm for the dumb (and probably stoned) white goy majority. Thankfully, Korine manages to at least transcend the sorry cinema of bong breath banality by taking it to such a sickeningly surreally silly extreme that one can only hysterically laugh at—as opposed to with—the rasta rabble and space cowboy untermenschen it depicts, though apparently that was not really the auteur’s true intent.

Apparently suffering from his own idiosyncratic onset of Trump Derangement Syndrome is what largely influenced Korine to make The Beach Bum, or as the filmmaker told IndieWire while seemingly possessed by the retrograde spirit of his kinsman Bob Dylan, “I started to feel like the times were changing, things were darker, everything was feeling more intense. I thought, maybe it’s time to laugh. I figured I’d just go for it and make my version of a comedy.” In short, the film is, like virtually all stoner comedies, a piece of inelegant excess-ridden escapism, albeit with an obvious meta-autistic Korine-ian touch. Of course, as everything from his debut acting role as the date-rape-drug-dealing club kid ‘Fidget’ in Larry Clark’s Kids (1995) to his various vaudevillian appearances on Late Show with David Letterman to his experimental ‘novel’ A Crack Up at the Race Riots (1998) to 2000 black-metal-inspired art exhibition The Sigil of the Cloven Hoof Marks Thy Path demonstrate, Korine is and has always been the 'badken.' A Yiddish word for "a professional fun-maker, jester, entertainer, verbose Jewish jokester and showman," 'badken' certainly better describes Korine than auteur at this point in his career and the titular antihero of The Beach Bum indubitably acts as a sort of sociopathic boomer gentile equivalent to it. As to how Korine went from directing films featuring gay black dwarfs and Burzum to washed-up mainstream black comedians and Jimmy Buffet, one is certainly more than a little tempted to speculate that it was one-too-many bong hits. After all, weeds has especially deleterious effects in terms of lowering one's standards and causing one to tolerate, well, crap, which explains how Korine has gone from citing great auteurs like John Cassavetes and Werner Herzog to insipidly stupid and soulless shit like the moronically merry multicultural marijuana movies of swarthy dip-shit duo Cheech & Chong as cinematic influences (indeed, Korine has referenced the films of the colored Cannabisseur partners as an imperative influence on The Beach Bum).

Notably, in a 1999 interview with Sean O'Hagan, Korine expressed rather high hopes in terms of his future place among the greats of cinema history, or as he explained in regard to his natural evolution as a cineaste, "I'd see a Fassbinder film, then go and get a book about him out of the library, and find out that he was into melodrama and Douglas Sirk. Then I'd go and seek out all of Sirk's work. That's how I figured out there was a continuum in cinema and directing that, hopefully, I'm part of today." Unfortunately, it has been over two decades since Korine directed his masterful debut Gummo and none of his subsequent works are even in the same universe in terms of unbridled idiosyncratic majesty, unhinged unforgettably, and grotesque comedic gold. After finally kicking Cocteau's kick, getting married, and becoming a father, Korine seems to have been finally tamed and The Beach Bum is the unequivocal proof that he is now a sort of 'spiritual boomer' as opposed to the perennial enfant terrible most of his fans hoped he would forever be. Still, The Beach Bum provides enough raunchy retarded fun to make for an aesthetically autistic double feature with The Big Lebowski (1998). From Gregg Araki's embarrassingly stale stoner girl odyssey Smiley Face (2007) to the positively putrid anti-white multiculturalist agitpop of the heeb-helmed Harold & Kumar Go to White Castle (2004) to the beta boy buffoonery of Kevin Smith's Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back (2001), the stoner comedy is arguably the most insufferable and aesthetically worthless subgenre of all-time so for there to be a film like A Beach Bum that is actually highly re-watchable is almost a miracle of sorts. Also, Matthew McConaughey deserves credit for a singular acting performance that is like a modern-day Charlie Chaplin on LSD after being raped by a pack of crack-ridden rasta negroes. As to why one should loathe stoners and everything they represent, I think Teutonic philosopher Oswald Spengler said it best when he wrote, "The common man wants nothing of life but health, longevity, amusement, comfort—'happiness.' He who does not despise this should turn his eyes from world history, for it contains nothing of the sort. The best that history has created is great suffering.” In short, nothing good comes out of mindless happiness, especially of the artificial drug-induced sort. Of course, Moondog—a man that cannot even muster a tear when his great love dies probably because he is too inebriated and is no longer in touch with normal human feelings—is a shitty poet because he does not know what it means to suffer. Likewise, Korine’s artistic stagnation seems to also be the result of his lack of suffering as the auteur seems to now be at his most stable and least self-destructive as a result of becoming a drug-free family man. Luckily, Korine does not seem to be pot-free, which has resulted in two of the ‘greatest’ pothead flicks of all-time. Indeed, it is kind of good to know that, as the fiery climax of The Beach Bum demonstrates, there are a couple films one can watch and laugh at while the world is in flames. After all, while Hollywood and its films are harbingers-cum-symptoms of clown world, Korine’s films at least bask in clown world and remind one that one is not insane to recognize that the modern world is simply insane and that there is no harm in sharing the occasional laugh from it. In fact, it can certainly be argued that the fact that Korine’s films even exist are a sure sign of end times and, even more than sad Slavs like Tarkovsky and Żuławski, they represent an apocalyptic aesthetic. Judging by Korine’s latest film, the world seems to end with nervous laughter as opposed to a whimper. As for boomers, it is quite unfortunate that most of them will probably not live long enough to see the apocalypse that their nasty combination of narcissism, materialism, hedonism, and cosmopolitanism helped to ignite and accelerate. On the bright side, thankfully John Lennon was assassinated long ago before he could perform an updated version of “Imagine” with Snoop Dogg. In short, when Ludwig Klages decried the ascent of, “the post-historical mankind of the merely pseudo-living larva,” he still never could have foreseen a creature as wretchedly rakish and ruthlessly reprobate as the titular antihero of The Beach Bum.

Harry Bromley Davenport (1982)

This theme of extraterrestrial life has sprung up on several occasions recently. After hearing rumors for the new J.J. Abrams teaser to be anonymously attached to all Iron Man 2 prints, speculation abound with the rumor mill churning at full speed. With a wild spinner pointing towards Cloverfield canon, Super 8 turns out to be another Abrams cock-tease trailer effort with an exaggerated train accident and an unidentified creature beating at the inside of a heavily armed door. Mentions of Area 51 led me to finally visit the strange world in which Xtro takes place. Xtro is particularly notorious for it's brief stint as a video nasty after a scene in which a woman gives graphic birth to a full grown male. While this scene does not fear reproach in extensively detailing on afterbirth and gore leaking out of her vagina, it's nowhere near as bad as many of the other acts of violence depicted on celluloid at this current place in time.

To simply chalk up my opinion on Xtro would be for me to explain that it is by far one of the greater science-fiction horror films that I've ever seen; not to mention Event Horizon, as that film contained trace elements of a different horror caliber. Xtro is a film about a father who was abducted in front of his son while vacationing up at "the cabin" some odd years back. Wistful wife, Rachel, firmly believes that Harry ran out on her leaving young Tony at the cabin to fend for himself. But Tony knows the truth for he's haunted continuously by terrifying nightmares of the ominous light effect that Harry Broven Davenport uses to great effect as it blinds both the characters and the audience. It's not long before his father returns with "black magic from deep space" as the trailer defines it and he wants Tony. If you know nothing of Xtro before viewing it, the greatest surprises of all will be a vast reward. Pockets of bloody surrealism are tucked under many corners of this film with excruciatingly painful-to-watch prosthetics and bubbling pod-skin and other miserable body-horrors. What Xtro borrows from the genre isn't much to it's own avail. With the alien arc in tow, it builds layers upon this story creating both sublime surrealism of daunting clown entities and layers of emotional and terrifying depth which leaves for one of the most serene and silent endings in science-fiction history. At the moments of the credits rolling, I found myself silent and respectful for the characters fates and that is simply something I don't do unless we are talking about Martyrs. One thing about Xtro that startles me is how frequently this film is panned; one reviewer even stating that the film "falls flat." Now I realize the existence of personal subjective classification but Xtro takes a stale tale and re-wraps the lore of an extraterrestrial entity and encrusts itself in a manic-depressive cocoon of extreme violence, sadistic psychological warfare, and a beautiful french woman who gets eaten out like the dirty tramp she is. In all the films I've seen, I don't think I've seen anything quite like Xtro. If I had to pick the source of Xtro's power I'd circle the soundtrack of what Davenport called "screaming synthesizers." During the scene in which the "father" silently rediscovers his earthly rights off a backwoods road, his startling appearance marks the start of an increasingly delirious soundtrack that will appease any fan of avant-garde or sharp noise. Imagine Façtums at the basic, stripped of its rock core and the only thing left is the space synth with bleep twerps and the grinding ambiance of which I can only describe as looming. Xtro is an incredible sci-fi experience that makes up for what it loses in its inexperienced (at the time) directors hands with its broad perspective of the black beyond and relentless finale. Davenport doesn't care about your feelings towards his characters. He created these people and as a tactful god of his own fiction, he bestows upon whomever with whatever fates he desires. Xtro is merely his puppet and he works the strings fairly damn well. Say what you will about the film but in the end...Xtro > You

XTRO 3: WATCH THE SKIES

Harry Bromley Davenport (1995)

The original Xtro was such a splendid surprise with its dazzling mixture of science-horror and somber surrealism. Setting my eyes on Harry Bromley Davenport who directed all three entries in the Xtro trilogy as well as the low-budget low-quality Mockingbird Don't Sing, I scoured a comment he made about the quality of his films. Turns out the third film in the series was always his favorite and with this recommendation alone, I set out to find and view these post cursors and delve into what genius the man behind Xtro must offer. Fast-forward to present time; I learned something today. I discovered that the fabled "accidental" director is not just a myth but a frightening reality far more terrifying than any film about vengeful aliens or marines without proper haircuts. Xtro must have been a fluke because I refuse to believe the talented man who combined screaming synth with inner-clown persona's created this godawful abomination that insults the quality of Brain Damage films. The plot centers around a marine lieutenant who gets assigned a mission with a team of rambunctious misfits. Their task? Simple reconnaissance and a bit of demolition..., or so they thought. As soon as they unearth a strange alien artifact the mishaps begin to occur. Each one with special effects worse than the last. Only in one scene does the second sequel barely resemble the original. A silhouette inked in darkness twitches to extraterrestrial life as a spurting white fire sprays out behind this figure. It shames me to appreciate something about this film and it certainly does not excuse any of this garbage but it's endearing to see that Davenport might still have what it takes to make a great science-fiction film. Let's hope he does justice with his newest Xtro film. Back on topic, these marines discover a classic "it came from the top" government cover-up cliché that should be known as a classic mistake and not some propelling force for a story. After they find a hermit living on the island who survived all the bloodshed that happened so 50 (40) years before, they attempt to get information of what really went on previously. This is where I note the misuse of the deus ex machina. Yet another film technique ruined in the hands of Harry Bromley Davenport. This primitive survivor with his pepper-gray wig and contrived eccentricity proves this character is nothing more than an Encino Man facsimile whose only use in the film is to lead the crew to some old Super8 films which document the convenient story behind the antagonist alien's rage. In faux-Roswell fashion, we watch an autopsy scene with no scientific clout as the other caged alien wails on behind his bars. After the female alien is butchered and has its baby removed and put in a surgical dish, the male alien bends the bars and uses his psychokinetic ability to kill everyone off screen with a tempestuous regurgitating power. So not only is Davenport inspired by braindead classics like Encino Man but it also appears that he's seen Orca. It's too obvious for it to be just a dupe on his part. Borrowing or being inspired isn't necessarily a negative thing but when you borrow shamelessly from classics and manage to make a film utterly prosaic. Well, . . . I just don't know how to respond other than to eject the disc and stare at the static until my eyes become overwhelmed. Xtro 3 is a unsubstantial failure on all sides; this is a two-sided coin of cantankerous and belligerent film making. How someone can direct the cast which would obviously lead to disastrous results and a lack of artistic integrity is beyond me. For someone who created one of the most daring and essential science-fiction films to suddenly become a bottom feeder is truly a waste of youthful prowess. This film is not only anti-climatic but it renders itself as the best in the series which gives me absolutely no hope for the future of the Xtro saga. Xtro 3: Watch the Skies is pedestrian at best and my last wish before I wash my eyes out with whiskey is to be able to omit this travesty out of my head completely.

MOCKINGBIRD DON'T SING

Harry Bromley Davenport (2001)

The value of a tragedy on film can be somewhat redundant at times. When a film is made to showcase an incident "based on" some event that shocked a small number of people, the result is normally a soulless exercise in directing minimalism. To create an independent "tear-jerker" is a sucker punch for film festivals as most fans of drama love to cry. I don't blame them. Sadness is a much more poetic and poignant emotion than happiness. Happiness is generally hollow. As Robert Downey Jr. so succinctly put it in Tropic Thunder - "Never go full retard" For those who haven't heard of Genie; the modern Feral child, Mockingbird Don't Sing follows the true story of a child raised from near birth strapped to a chair/toilet hybrid. This fabulous piece of carpentry is where Genie (Katie in the film) spent all her time during the day, up until she was rescued months before her 14th birthday. What better way to bring a story of a divine innocence than the director of all three Xtro films - Harry Bromley Davenport. Maybe I'm of a cold heart but this film didn't quite form the visceral assault that it promised. Rather than accepting this as a whole-blooded film, this seemed more like a dignified Lifetime reenactment. To watch a child actress play dumb and pretend like she lacks linguistic capabilities doesn't constitute awards and praise. In news of more postmodern feral children, thanks to the discovery of Josef "Dungeon Keeper" Fritzl's Pink Flamingos-esque cellar, many more of the "Pepsi generation" have begun to catch on to how cruel life is. I could catch up on some of the case details, but this is a film review highlighting the highs and the lows of this film, which there are many. My convictions allow me to digress the fact that my thoughts may be deemed unhealthy towards the lower class or handicapped, but I just really loathe pointless cinematic excursions in telling a story that has been told time and time again with no new visions in directing. If you've ever read A Child Called It, you already know the procedure. There's both rhyme and reason for the fear of feminization depicted by Katie's father. Before he commits suicide, he leaves a note saying "The world will never understand". In many ways, he is correct. The world will never understand why this film was made. While it resonates some emotional distress in some scenes, the rest proves to be entirely inaccurate and too provoked. It would be best to skip this crowd pleaser and just pick up the book. Call me heartless but I got a grip on humanity.

DAUGHTERS OF DARKNESS

Harry Kümel (1971)

In terms of 'chic' post-WWII European actresses, no one can touch French blonde Nord Delphine Seyrig (Last Year at Marienbad, The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie), who worked with many of the greatest and most idiosyncratic filmmakers of her strikingly singular and totally unrivaled multi-era career, ranging from Spanish alpha-surrealist Luis Buñuel to French New Wave master François Truffaut to Austrian-born Hebraic Hollywood Academy Award winner Fred Zinnemann to French commie feminist Marguerite Duras to Teutonic dyke adventurer auteur Ulrike Ottinger. Indeed, what other actress can claim the distinction of starring in both Klein's Mr. Freedom (1969) and Ottinger's Freak Orlando (1981)?! Additionally, Seyrig was a sometimes filmmaker who directed socio-politically charged doc likes Sois belle et tais-toi (1981) aka Be Pretty and Shut Up where she interviewed an eclectic collection of famous actresses like Shirley MacLaine, Jenny Agutter and Jane Fonda about how they were (mis)treated in the film industry. Interestingly, despite her strikingly singular resume as an superlatively sophisticated and dignified screen diva with somewhat repugnant quasi-feminist airs, Seyrig apparently credited the neo-Gothic lesbian vampire flick Daughters of Darkness (1971) aka Les lèvres rouges aka Le rouge aux Lèvres aka Blood on the Lips aka Children of the Night aka The Promise of Red Lips aka The Redness of the Lips aka The Red Lips directed by Belgian auteur Harry Kümel (Malpertuis, De Komst van Joachim Stiller aka The Arrival of Joachim Stiller) as her absolute most favorite of all the films that she ever starred in, which is rather ironic considering she originally did not want to play the somewhat unflattering role of Countess Bathory due to her prestigious reputation as an actress and only accepted the project after being convinced by her then-boyfriend, French auteur Alain Resnais, who loved graphic novels and somewhat rightfully imagined the film would be in a graphic novel-like style. In fact, Resnais apparently like the finished film so much that he said it was better than anything he had directed, or so said auteur Kümel, who certainly did not concur with his cinematic comrade's rather flattering assessment of his film. Indeed, Kümel never wanted to make the film in the first place and has described it as "trashy," even stating in a DVD commentary regarding the work, "I found it a bit trashy for me...it has been a long time since I have accepted it...I had this silly idea that my parents would be looking at all this pornography [...] I didn't really like it for different reasons," though he is proud of its success, as a work that would prove to be the very first internationally successful Belgian flick (indeed, it was the only really successful film of his career and even obtained cult status in the United States shortly after it was released).

A Belgian-French-German co-production that has the delightful ear-solacing distinction of being a rare 1970s "genre" production where all the actors spoke their lines in English as opposed to having their voices horrifically dubbed in post-production despite the fact that most of the actors were Belgian, French, and German and only spoke English as a second or third language, Daughters of Darkness is the post-WWII vampire flick at its most exceedingly elegant and refined as a beautiful baroque bloodsucker piece of the subtly yet forebodingly erotic sort. Indeed, to compare the best of Jean Rollin and Jesús Franco to Kümel's Sapphic vampire flick would be like comparing shit to gold. In that sense, Kümel is a cinematic alchemist because, despite his resentment towards the genre (in fact, he has denied it is even a horror film, stating, "This is not a horror movie...this is a style exercise...this is not meant to frighten.") and mixed feelings towards the film, he still managed to assemble a masterpiece of the exquisitely erotically macabre that is big on style and low on sleazy sensationalism that is typical of so-called 'Euro-sleaze.' Directed by a man from the same puny low country that produced Roland Lethem (La Fée sanguinaire aka The Bloodthirsty Fairy, Le Sexe Enragé aka The Crazy Sex aka The Red Cunt), Thierry Zéno (Vase de Noces aka Wedding Trough aka The Pig Fucking Movie), Rob Van Eyck (The Afterman, Blue Belgium), Benoît Poelvoorde/Rémy Beaulieu/André Bonzeland (Man Bites Dog) and Fabrice Du Welz (Calvaire aka The Ordeal, Vinyan), Daughters of Darkness is a ridiculously entrancing example as to why Belgians, especially the Germanic Flemish, are arguably the foremost masters of making the most artful, cultivated, and hermetic works of superlatively sick stomach-churning celluloid sleaze. Of course, compared to the aberrant-garde films of Lethem, Kümel's hyper-hypnotic vampire flick seems like a high-camp melodrama.

While newlyweds Stefan (played by Polish-American Dark Shadows star John Karlen) and Valerie (played by French-Canadian actress Danielle Ouimet who, incidentally, started her acting career by playing the eponymous lead of Denis Héroux's 1969 quasi-artsy exploitation flick Valérie) seem like the young perfect couple, at least upon a superficial glance, their relationship is based on lies, hypocrisy, resentment, and contempt. Indeed, despite marrying beautiful yet somewhat dumb virgin-like blonde Valerie, Stefan is secretly a sadomasochistic sodomite who gets aroused by violence and murder and who is the 'kept man' of an opulent yet odious and exceedingly effete fat middle-aged English sugar daddy with a fetish for exotic plants. Unfortunately for her, stupid little girl Valerie is hopelessly in love with Stefan and does whatever he says, no matter how degrading, even though he treats her like a contemptible little child. At the beginning of Daughters of Darkness in a scene that was rather risqué and unconventional for its time, the mismatched newlyweds, who are on their honeymoon, make love on a train, and afterwards Valerie asks Stefan if he loves her, to which he replies with a firm, "no." To go along with her bastard of a beau's rather vicious wishes, Valerie lies and also proclaims that she does not love Stefan, to which he sardonically replies, "apparently, we were made for each other" regarding their ostensible mutual unlove for one another. To Valerie's disappointment, Stefan refuses to tell his 'aristocratic' mother about their unholy marriage. As Stefan confesses to Valerie regarding what his mother apparently routinely said to him when he was a young child: "Stefan, we are different. That is God's gift to us, and we must never debase it," hence the character's unwarranted narcissism, rampant callousness, and all around controlling nature. Indeed, it is more than just a little bit apparent that Stefan feels superior to his new wife, but of course it is quite glaring that his sense of superiority is clearly a self-defense mechanism designed to help him cope with his seemingly split personality and ignore the ugly truth about his confused sexuality.

For their scenic honeymoon, the newlyweds stay in the royal suite of a lavish hotel located in seaside Ostend, Belgium, but unbeknownst to them, a cold-blooded killer with a thirst for blood is running around loose in the local area and is responsible for the deaths of a number of blonde Nordic babes that look a lot like Valerie. When Stefan learns of the killings and walks by one of the murder scenes by accident while doing some sightseeing with Valerie, he becomes discernibly sexually aroused and even hatefully smacks his wife when she gets in the way of his view of a dead chick. A local retired police officer (played by Belgian actor Georges Jamin, who died a couple months after the film was completed) also seems somewhat 'aroused' by the deaths and he plans to discover who the killer, though it will ultimately cost him his life. Meanwhile, in a scene consciously stolen by the director from the famous scene of Marlene Dietrich making her big entrance in Ernst Lubitsch's classic Angel (1937), ancient Hungarian lesbo vampire Countess Elizabeth Bathory (Delphine Seyrig) arrives at the Ostend hotel with her flapper-like Louise Brooks-esque muse Ilona Harczy (German actress Andrea Rau) and she immediately becomes entranced upon spotting Stefan and Valerie to the point where her ancient aristocratic sensibilities are not irked by the fact that the newlyweds have already occupied the royal suite that she hoped to stay in, even stating her girlfriend regarding the couple, "look how perfect they are." The front desk clerk of the hotel, Pierre (played by German actor Paul Esser, who is probably best known for his roles in Wolfgang Staudte's Rotation and Der Untertan aka Man of Straw), is immediately disturbed upon seeing the Countess as he remembers seeing her at the hotel four decades ago when he was just a boy and he cannot fathom how she has not aged a day since then. Of course, poor Ilona is immediately jealous of the newlyweds, especially Valerie, and somberly confesses to the Countess, "I wish I could die." Luckily for Ilona, she will get her wish, but not before whoring herself out for the Countess, who has a new love interest in the form of a buxom blonde newlywed.

While Stefan and Valerie intended to leave the hotel the next morning so that they can catch the cross-channel ferry to England so the former can introduce the latter to his supposedly rather bitchy mother, they decide to make the ultimately fatal mistake of staying a couple more days after meeting Countess Bathory and her cutesy sensual-lipped lesbo lover. A perversely penetrating psychopath of the wholly sensual and incessantly sinisterly smiling sort (as the director has confessed, it was Seyrig's excellent idea to play the role smiling) who can give one an agonizing orgasm with her mere erotically-charged words, Countess Bathory is a lethal lady-licking lesbo yet she has a warm and inviting persona that would not scare a fly, though her red/black/white wardrobes tell otherwise (the director had Seyrig wear these colors to conjure up feelings of the Nazi Schutzstaffel (SS), who of course wore the same colors). Indeed, on top of being a supernatural Sapphic bloodsucker, the Countess is a masterful 'psychic vampire' of sorts who preys on people's minds and emotions, which is certainly a trait she shares in common with crypto-homo Stefan, who will ultimately prove to be her rather weak rival in terms of vying for the affection of Valerie. In a somewhat hilarious if not equally awkward scene, Stefan makes a call to his supposed 'mother' in front of Valerie, but as the scene soon reveals, he is really talking to his old fag lover/sugar daddy (hilariously played by great Dutch auteur Fons Rademakers(!), who is probably best known for directing low country classics like Mira (1971) and The Assault (1986)). After telling his 'mother' that he has done the unthinkable by getting married to a young woman, the snide old queen responds with: "Whatever in the world will we do with her? Well, now, think of it—You working at whatever it is you can do, and that poor little, uh, Valerie, the day she hears about us—Oh, I hate to think about that. And you too! Of course, that's why you called [clicks tongue] Surely you don't really believe you would ever, ever do such a—such an ungrateful thing. I can't wait for you to see our newest Laelinae, Cattleya Violacea. And by the way, Stefan, be sure to tell that young woman...that Mother sends regards" (it should be noted that the connection between flowers and homosexuality is a subtle tribute to Marcel Proust). Rather enraged by the conversation with his so-called 'mommy,' Stefan unleashes his deep-seated internal rage and sexual frustration on Valerie by brutally beating her with his leather belt and subsequently assumedly raping her. While Valerie sneaks out of the hotel the next morning and attempts to get away on the next train out of town, the Countess uses her charms to convince her to stay. To keep Stefan incapacitated, the Countess sends Ilona to his hotel room to seduce him. Of course, things do not exactly work out completely as the Countess planned.

While Ms. Bathory attempts to flatter Valerie by calling her "little Edelweiss" (a reference to dumb European blondes, especially Swiss girls) and complimenting her ravishing good looks, the now-hysterical young wife eventually freaks out on her, abruptly stating, "I despise you. You're disgusting," and walking away, but of course the carpet-munching Countess follows her like a stud canine shadowing a bitch in heat. When Valerie defensively remarks that her husband loves her after the Countess mocks the genuineness of their relationship,

DAUGHTERS OF DARKNESS

Bathory makes the stereotypical dyke feminist misandristic argument: "Stefan loves me, whatever you may think." Of course he does. That's why he dreams of making out of you what every man dreams of making out of every woman—a slave, a thing, an object for pleasure." Meanwhile, Ilona seduces Stefan and they have fairly passionate sex. Unfortunately, a freak accident involving a shaving razor leaves Ilona dead after Stefan scares her by carrying her into the shower (whether Ilona dies as a result of the razor or due to her hinted aversion to water as a vampire is never made completely clear). Right after Ilona dies, Valerie and the Countess walk in on Stefan, who is staring at the dead vamp's naked corpse while in a state of abject shock. When Valerie remarks that she will call the police, the ever quick-witted Countess says to her, "Are you out of your mind? No one will ever believe it was an accident. You are out of your mind," and subsequently kisses her on the lips in an erotic fashion. At the Countess' recommendation, the three head to the beach during the early A.M. hours and Stefan digs a hole and buries Ilona's corpse in it, though he almost buries himself in the process, thus demonstrating his weakness as a man who is not match for Queen Bitch Bathory, who ironically saves his life.

After driving back to the hotel, the Countess convinces Stefan to take a nap and uses the opportunity to seduce and 'turn' poor unsuspecting Valerie into a lesbo vampire. Naturally, Stefan becomes obscenely jealous when he finds out that the Countess has turned his darling into a member of the undead, so he attempts to take Valerie away, but the scheming bitch Bathory blackmails him by threatening to go to the police about Ilona's dubious death. While both of them are 'psychic vampire' of sorts, Stefan seems like an autistic and emotionally crippled little boy compared to the ancient bloodsucking undead blueblood being that is the Countess. Of course, it does not take long before the Countess kills Stefan and feeds on his blood with baby vamp Valerie, who enthusiastically helps her new lesbo lover murder her hubby. After wrapping Stefan's body in black plastic bags, they dump it into a polluted creek like it is trash in what amounts to, like much of the film, a strangely humorous scene that is typical of Flemish/Dutch humor. While mutually deeply infatuated with one another as a sort of figurative quasi-incestuous 'mother-daughter' duo, their lurid 'lady-lickers of the night' love affair is ultimately cut short when Valerie uses her driving skills (or lack thereof) to accidentally crash the Countess' luxury automobile after the sun burns her pale baby vamp skin and she loses control of vehicle. Indeed, after losing control of the car, Valerie crashes into a tree, which causes the Countess to be ejected from the car via the windshield where she is ultimately impaled after her body lands on a large protruding tree branch. After taking a stake to the heart in a cruelly ironic moment of pure happenstance, the Countess is subsequently burned alive when the totaled car explodes, thus leading the viewer to suspect that Valerie also perished in the tragic crash. Flash forward a couple months later in what amounts to a bittersweet twist ending, and Valerie has developed a satanically seductive persona just like her master the Countess, even parroting her look and voice, so that she can lure in young couples, thus continuing the vicious circle of hetero-hating lesbian-based vampirism.

While Daughters of Darkness is a truly exceedingly exquisite and extra-erotic example of 'magical realism,' auteur Harry Kümel would fine tune his talents for his somewhat superior and obscenely overlooked subsequent arthouse efforts Malpertuis (1973) and The Arrival of Joachim Stiller (1976). Additionally, Kümel's early avant-garde shorts Anna la Bonne (1959), which is based on a poem by Jean Cocteau, and Pandora (1960), as well as his decidedly bleak Bergman-esque debut feature Monsieur Hawarden (1969), are regarded as some of the greatest masterpieces of Flemish cinema, even if the director has always been an outsider in his native homeland, especially after Daughters of Darkness was a big international success. Indeed, despite being what is arguably the only internationally successful Belgian film in all of cinema history, at least at the time of its release, Kümel found himself marginalized by the Flemish film community for a work he really had no interest in making, or as Belgian film scholar Ernest Mathijs wrote in the book The Cinema of the Low Countries (2004): "Of all the Belgian films of the early 1970s, a boom period in Belgian cinema culture, Les lèvres rouges (Daughters of Darkness, 1971) is probably the most talked about, yet least known. Although it still stands as one of the most commercially successful and academically referenced Belgian films, it is hardly screened today, and even its DVD and video distribution has been hampered by a series of difficulties, ranging from legal to aesthetic objections. This dual status is perhaps the most typical characteristic of the film, being both a high-profile example of Belgian cinema at its most international, and a consciously ignored part of a nation's cinema heritage."

Somewhat light on blood and bare boobs, Daughters of Darkness is a perfect example of subtly yet elegantly executed suggestive potency in the cinematic realm, thus it is almost an absurdity to describe the film as a work of 'exploitation' (unquestionably, 'artsploitation' would certainly be a better label). On top of being one of the most eloquent European 'genre' films of its time, the film is also a cryptic tribute to the great auteur filmmakers of European cinema history, as a formalistic flick that pays homage to everyone from Carl Th. Dreyer to Ernst Lubitsch to Josef von Sternberg to Georg Wilhelm Pabst to Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger to star Delphine Seyrig's beau Alain Resnais. Indeed, in terms of its entrancing atmosphere, oneiric tone, nuanced pacing, lavish 'sets,' and hermetic eroticism, Daughters of Darkness is like the Last Year at Marienbad (1961) of vampire flicks, albeit minus the impenetrable essence, as well as the European cinematic cousin of Richard Blackburn's criminally underrated Lovecraftian lesbo bloodsucker flick Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973). The happy horror accident of a man who spitefully declared "we are going to do something nasty" and reluctantly decided to direct a film for a genre he had no interest in after his directorial debut was poorly critically received, Daughters of Darkness is indisputable proof that a pretentious 'auteur' will always direct better genre films than the average horror hack, even if he has little interest in directing them. As Kümel insightfully stated in the audio commentary track for the Blue Underground DVD release of the film: "I'm like Paul Verhoeven, you know...the films he doesn't like to make are good movies and the films he likes to make are not so good." Of course, the film also owes a great deal of its endlessly entrancing erotic magnetism and perniciously alluring atmosphere to frog diva Delphine Seyrig's singularly dignified performance as a lethally lecherous undead lady of the night. Apparently, the actress was so confident with her performance that she reassured Kümel regarding his concern that the two young leads were too old and not talented enough for playing the newlyweds by stating to him, "Don't worry, they [the audience] will only look at me." Indeed, as someone that has always found female vampires, especially those of the lesbo sort, to be oftentimes hopelessly nonthreatening and a rather blatant sign that the film was made for largely pornographic reasons, Seyrig proved that middle-aged broads can pull off brutally beautiful and superlatively sensual bloodsuckers in a fashion that no male actor can compete with. Of course, Seyrig was a vampire in the sense that she had the power to glamor any man, woman, or child that saw her on the silver screen, thus all she had to do was play herself in Daughters of Darkness. I, for one, can certainly not think of another feminist that was so innately captivating, cultivated, and carnally beguiling.

THE CHASER

Harry Langdon (1928)

This later imagining of the Korean thriller had been optioned for a remake and hadn't even been released. For all the venomous insults being directed at the Hollywood machine, you got to respect productivity while its in plain view and this is just that circumstance. As normal, the "generic" thriller is taken from a foreign vantage and crafted into something enjoyable fresh. The Chaser is a film that lives by its name and spotlights many chase scenes through the misty and thin streets of a darkly lit Seoul during its annual rainy season and if you know one thing about Korean cinema, it's that rain has never been captured as the mystic force that it is outside of the Korean medium of cinematography that is also known as the film core in their native land. Now to creep past the introductory paragraph without the illusion of me adoring this film for its flaws, know that most Korean thrillers re inventions of a reinvention so the blessing is fading fast. In order to explain the elements that do make this film, I'll need to set the scene. In A-typical Western format, we meet an ex-cop turned pimp who lacks a certain trait known as humanity. After pining over lost prostitutes that were "sold" to other pimps, he sends a sick mother to please a man known only to him by the last digits of his phone number - "4885." Soon thereafter, Jung-ho ascertains to the possibility that this creepy man was the one who auctioned his girls so after a rigorous and highly edited phone comparison montage, he makes the shocking discovery that this man is in fact the last person to see his missing girls. Oblivious to the cold truth, he doesn't even ponder the idea of murder so as to is surprise, Mi-jin has been kidnapped and stored in a basement slowly dying while a cat-and-mouse game is being divided by three parties. Incompetence is a normal and noticeable trait in all detective movies. But for one to exceed formalities and slope into blatant incidentals against police inefficiency is another thing that is perfectly paraded by The Chaser. In an attack on subjective sensationalism, two events are juxtaposed by the media within the world of The Chaser; a crazy individual throwing feces at the mayor's face and the capture of a serial killer. Guess which one gets proper coverage and the best of peoples sensibilities. Don't worry, I couldn't believe it either. The outrage is placed into high priority and you find yourself soon scowling at both man's flaws and the basic outline of the human condition. No character is written free from vice, mistakes, and grisly flaws. Speaking of grisly, that's about one of few words that can properly sum out the quota of suspense/violence. In light of recent action scenes, I've discovered that a vast majority of Korean combat scenes of fairly life-like to the actual homicidal counterpart in humanity. The swift punches are fierce and awkward but still packed with a vehement compassion for the ideals of being. During the course of several weeks, I've been exposed to film after film proudly giving emphasis to pathetic male characters that are at the top of the story's hierarchy of figures; prominently Wakamatsu's The Embryo Hunts in Secret and this, The Chaser. To even begin expressing the details of Jung-ho's descent into self-emasculatation would spoil many touching surprises. For being blended post-Se7en material, the prize still tastes genuinely fresh. Upon second-guessing the motives of such directors depicting harmful stories, I realized that these harmful stories are all apart of harmless film making. These are films, Korean that is, that are made with style over substance but you will, at times, appreciate plot aesthetics as well as savoring the set theme and gristle of a Hollywood film. The Chaser has won many awards and is being led through several festival circuits but seems out of place with the artistic crop. Paired with Truck, a recent Korean graduating of Western ideals, The Chaser is the kind of film a family could appreciate for hostile ethics and foreign do-good. Expect nothing three dimensional other than the fallibility of law enforcement and an odious approach to misogyny and impotence. The most terrifying side-effect of The Chaser is that Yeong-Min makes me think of prostitutes as a lesser species without an earnest attempt as fleshed as it is in contemporary suspense. His stoic demeanor truly is disquieting. The femme fatale is unofficially dead.

THE CHASER

THE THIRD GENERATION

Harry Solter (1913)

After watching the 2008 German film The Baader Meinhof Complex directed by Uli Edel - a work that romanticizes the German left-wing extremist terrorist group Red Army faction (RAF) - I figured it was about time for me to watch Rainer Werner Fassbinder's The Third Generation (1979); a black comedy that lampoons a fictional German left-wing terrorist cell. Unlike The Baader Meinhof Complex, The Third Generation simply portrays its subjects as degenerates, buffoons, and irrational tools of German capitalists. Fassbinder directed The Third Generation right after The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979); a film that earned the German New Wave auteur critical and commercial acclaim on an international level. Although The Third Generation was championed by critics in American and France; the film was hated by critics and general audiences in Germany - probably due to its sadiistically playful and less than flattering portrayal of German left-wing terrorism. In fact, during a screening of The Third Generation in Hamburg, Germany - a projectionist was beaten unconscious, and various other theaters in the Fatherland received death threats. German leftist terrorists would later be stigmatized in the Hollywood blockbuster classic Die Hard (1988) directed by John McTiernan; a film that presents the German terrorists as traitors to their own political cause; trading in their political idealism, ergo becoming their greatest professed enemy: greedy capitalists. In The Third Generation, Fassbinder attacks left-wing terrorists with a clever array of situational theatrics skits, thus making for a hilarious romp into the imbecilic idealist froth of soulless Marxist materialism.

Despite fighting for the worker and the proletariat; virtually all of the leftist revolutionaries featured in The Third Generation are from the bourgeois class. In fact, one of the revolutionaries is an aristocratic who regrettably carries the noble name: Bernhard von Stein. Although the cannibalistic class consciousness of these upperclassmen may seem to be strikingly odd and downright irrational; it is undoubtedly historically accurate. In apolitical Italian philosopher Vilfredo Pareto's revolutionary work The Rise and Fall of Elites; the inspirational thinker (who influenced Benito Mussolini's fight for power) proves through historical trends that virtually all bygone political elites played imperative role(s) in their own destruction. Over time, individuals from the aristocratic and bourgeois classes become passive due to their leisurely and pampered existences, thus eventually (out of a feeling of nihilistic worthlessness) fighting for the lower classes. As Pareto explains in his book (providing examples from Ancient Greece to modern Italy), it was, indeed, members of the bourgeois who originally published Marxist anti-bourgeois literature and it is always the self-loathing bourgeois failures (Karl Marx was a failed bourgeois and Lenin was a failed nobleman) who have historically led genocidal revolutions against their own people. In The Third Generation, the leftist terrorist group is made up of the following individuals: Musical composer (the group leader), a quasi-lesbian feminist history teacher, a banker and his housewife, and a record store clerk. Obviously, none of these individuals have ever done a second of real working-class labor in their entire lives, yet they are leading a pathetic nihilistic revolution for the proletariat. Naturally, the funniest aspect of the left-wing terrorist group is that it is secretly funded by Lurz: a capitalist who wants to boost sales for his security computers, thereupon funding the leftist extremists to commit terrorist attacks. In fact, August, the leader of the leftist terrorist cell is a double-agent for Lurz. Indeed, Rainer Werner Fassbinder certainly assembled a vicious satire with The Third Generation; a film where leftist terrorists become unsuspecting capitalist pawns. As the once influential German philosopher Oswald Spengler once wrote, "There is no proletariat, not even a Communist movement, that has not operated in the interests of money, and for the time being permitted by money - and that without the idealists among its leaders having the slightest suspicion of the fact."

THE THIRD GENERATION

The secret code for the terrorist group's campaign is: "The World As Will as Idea" - which is taken from The World is Will and Representation; one of the most important works written by the great German pessimist philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer. During the beginning of Fassbinder's The Third Generation; the Grandfather of terrorist Edgar Gast tells his grandson that Schopenhauer once stated, "Man's existence is no more important than that of a stone." Grandfather Gast goes on to insult Schopenhauer and he eventually says to Edgar in an idealistic matter-of-fact manner, "Every generation needs a war." Whether they realize it or not, Edgar and his terrorist friends have contrived a war in the form of left-wing terrorism, thus fulfilling Grandpa Gast's (who Edgar constantly mocks) dream of generational war. It is no secret that many of the real-life German left-wing terrorists were inspired to wage class war as an act of rebellion against their Nazi parents/grandparents. Despite attempting to reprieve Germany from Nazi infamy, these German terrorists would go on to further taint the name of their homeland, as so vividly expressed in Hollywood films like Die Hard. After meeting aristocratic terrorist Bernhard von Stein, Grandpa Gast mentions to the young man that ever since he was a little boy, he wanted to be an aristocrat. Being a self-loathing aristocrat, von Stein tells Grandpa Gast that the title is nothing special nor is it worthy of admiration. Through their regretful, yet unintentionally comedic interaction, Grandpa Gast and Bernhard von Stein symbolically express that values have been turned upside down and have reached total inversion in post-World War II Germany.

The Third Generation may not feature the aesthetic prowess of Fassbinder's final work Querelle, nor the erotic melodramatic depth of The Marriage of Maria Braun, but the film is manifestly the German auteur filmmaker's most witty and humorous effort. Like Fassbinder's Whity, The Third Generation is a brutal and unflinching indictment on a totally hypocritical and impotent upper-class. Also, like Whity, The Third Generation features Fassbinder's ex-lover and acting regular Günther Kaufmann (the Mulatto Bavarian), who plays Franz; the best friend and protector of candy-ass aristocrat Bernhard von Stein. Out of all the communist terrorists featured in The Third Generation; Franz is the only one that expresses authentic human emotions, as opposed to soulless, yet fanatic, nihilistic left-wing idealism. When a junkie girl living with the terrorists accidentally overdoses on big H - Franz is thrown into tears and resembles a sad teddy bear - as he and the girl had recently started a romantic fling. Unfortunately, Franz will eventually pay the ultimate price for his down-to-earth personality and selfless empathy. By the conclusion of The Third Generation, the capitalist is still on top (albeit as a hostage of the terrorists) and most members of the original left-wing terrorist cell are six feet under. Fittingly, the remaining members of the terrorist cell dress up as circus clowns at the end of the film. As so hilariously expressed in The Third Generation; anyone looking to lead an unpredictable life of aimless left-wing terrorism is bound to make an inevitable blunder, therefore never fulfilling the impossible and ultimately ostentatious dream of founding a classless Utopia. Despite being a leftist himself, Rainer Werner Fassbinder proved he was an equal-opportunity offender with The Third Generation; a work that is patently the greatest satire ever made on German left-wing extremist groups (and leftist extremism in general).

MIDNIGHT HEAT

Harvey Frost (1996)

Without question, if there is any pornographic equivalent to Martin Scorsese's somewhat nihilistic urban 'crime drama' Taxi Driver (1976), it is Midnight Heat (1983) directed by exploitation auteur turned auteur-pornographer Roger Watkins aka 'Richard Mahler' (The Last House on Dead End Street, Spittoon) and starring iconically unhinged porn chic era leading man Jamie Gillis (Water Power, New Wave Hookers). Indeed, despite being a true blue fuck movie that was made to capitalize off of the more archaic instincts of pathetic old horny geezers who cannot get a taste of real pussy, Watkins' nihilistically wanton work is even more nasty and pessimistic than Taxi Driver in terms of its uniquely unflattering and oftentimes depraved depiction of post-civil rights era New York City urban decay. Majorly misanthropic to the marvelously mean-spirited core, Midnight Heat is a rare fuck flick where the fucking seems to enhance the pleasantly pernicious plot in a rather aesthetically seamless sort of way, as a work about a philosophical hitman of the pathologically melancholy variety who screws his boss' wife and daughter and thus must go into hiding and be extra weary of the wanton women he purchases from sub-upscale escort services because some of them are truly killer cunts. While not Watkins' greatest porn effort as a work that just cannot compete with the Wagnerite wantonness of Corruption (1983), it is pretty damn close as one of the most aesthetically malevolent blue movies ever made. Unlike with Corruption, the filmmaker had to make a compromise or two on the film, or as Watkins confessed in an interview with David Kerekes featured in Headpress 23: "CORRUPTION and AMERICAN BABYLON are two I had absolute, total control over. MIDNIGHT HEAT is good, except for a really stupid sex scene at the beginning because I felt you needed it. I figured if the audience is stupid, then we got to do this to hold them." Featuring slow-motion footage of real-life hobos, winos, and crackhead negroes that dwell in cardboard boxes, Midnight Heat is a porn film for pessimists who could care less about seeing some old slag's gaping gash and are much more interested in seeing the sort of forsaken mentality it takes for one to resort to becoming a pornographer in the first place. In that sense, one could argue that it is Watkins' most autobiographical work. Indeed, directed by a man who was a friend/protégé of Hollywood auteur Nicholas Ray (Rebel without a Cause, Johnny Guitar) and Austrian-born auteur Otto Preminger (Laura, The Man with the Golden Arm) and whose debut feature The Last House on Dead End Street (1977) aka The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell showed much promise as far as nasty and nihilistic exploitation cinema is concerned, Midnight Heat is ultimately the debasing celluloid hate piece of a disgruntled artist who utilized a film style that is usually specially tailored for lonely losers to wank-off to as an outlet for his own lingering resentment, angst, and misanthropy. A conspicuously corrupt and culturally cynical chamber piece from the bowels of the Bowery, Watkins' work reminds one why NYC is a dirtier hole than that of any ghetto-dwelling crack whore.

Alan (played by Jamie Gillis in the same $39 suit he wore in Corruption) is a hitman who was probably an associate of Arthur Schopenhauer in another life, as he only kills when he has a good philosophical reason to do so (or if the price is right) and spends most of his time staring out windows and thinking about why life and humanity sucks. When Alan has sex with his wife (Sharon Mitchell) and then proceeds to act all moody broody while staring out a window, his lady love complains to him that he is too "cold" and introverted and threatens to leave him, but he could seriously care less and replies in the following jaded fashion: "Do what you want...I can't stop you." Alan may not give a shit about his bitchy wife, but he cares enough about screwing both the daughter (Tish Ambrose) and wife (Dixie Dew) of his employer (Frederick Rein) to quite literally risk his life just for the mere cross-generational familial carnal pleasure. Of course, Alan's boss inevitably catches him in the act, kisses him on the lips in what can be described as an intimidating figurative kiss of death, and makes the following cryptic threat: "I'll be seeing you in the streets." Of course, Alan knows he's a marked mensch and despite being a rather self-destructive dude with what seems to be a death wish, he does opt for going into hiding in a sleazy dilapidated motel located in a hobo, junky, crackhead, and wino inhabited area of the Bowery. While Alan is able to occupy most of his time staring at the window and admiring all the human filth that plagues the streets, he eventually gets bored enough to hire not one, but two call girls. Of course, little does Alan realize that one of the cash-for-gash gals has been sent to kill him, though it does not take long for his murderous hunter intuition to kick in for him to realize that the rotten whore has homicide on her messed up mind.

When the high-priced hookers get to his motel room, Alan, who has been having random bouts of erectile dysfunction, decides to have the girls screw together while he looks on passively. While pussy-peddler Diane (Champagne) is a tall and swarthy Mediterranean broad, Shirley (Joey Karson) is a short buxom bleach blonde that has just gotten into the prostitution profession. Though Alan eventually has little Shirley leave as she does not have much to offer, he has Diane stay at his room as he finds something rather provocative about her. Of course, Alan soon begins sharing his personal philosophies with the hooker, stating regarding the hobos and winos around the Bowery, "Ever think what separates us from them? One morning they just woke up and said, "fuck it." Precious little separates us." Of course, Alan is also on the brink of saying "fuck it" and throwing his life down the drain, but he still has enough of a sense of self-preservation to know that there is something not quite right about Diane. While Diane has nightmarish flashbacks about being more or less anally pillaged by her hitman husband Tom (Michael Bruce), Alan recalls being cheered up by his hooker friend Nan (Susan Nero), who could not give him a hard-on but certainly could make him happy in other ways. If anything is for sure, Alan and Diane are both majorly melancholy individuals who are involved in debasing sexual relationships. When the two finally decide to share carnal knowledge, Alan screws Diane from behind and during mid-coitus asks her if she was “sent by someone.” With penetrative pleasure clouding her judgment, Diane confesses she was indeed sent to kill him, so Alan strangles her to death while he reaches sexual climax. In the end, Alan once again stares out of his miserable motel room window as if looking into eternity from his own metaphysical prison. Undoubtedly, I recommend that the viewer stick around until after the credits end, as a final free-frame shot features a wrinkled newspaper with the haunting headline, “EIGHT DIE IN HOTEL FIRE,” thus hinting that Alan may have intentionally burned down the place and killed himself in the process.

Beginning with the Henry Miller quote, “Sex can become a weapon,” Midnight Heat is certainly a work that demonstrates that sex is a fatal weakness that leads both men and women to the slaughter. Of course, with its fiendishly foreboding tone, unnerving weltschmerz, abrasive third world-esque set-design, and slow-motion shots of staggering bums and dumpster-dwelling dipsomaniacs roaming around the Bowery as if trapped in some sort of post-industrial pandemonium, Watkins’ work is more about existential crisis in the (post)modern age than it is about mere fucking, for the flick is far too decidedly dreary and disconcerting to give any truly healthy heterosexual man a significant hard-on. As Watkins would reveal in an interview with David Kerekes, star Jamie Gillis’ real-life situation was no less dark and disturbing than that of his character in the film, albeit to a more pathetic degree. Indeed, as Watkins stated, “I like Jamie, he’s alright. I like Vanessa. But they’re in a different world [...] all they do is fuck and nobody cares anymore. We were always trying to think of new ways to fuck or do something. Jamie was telling me he was living with Seka [...] She is this big, blonde porn star. He says to me, “Man, I think I’m losing my mind... Lately, to get off she gets on her knees and I put her head in the toilet and just keep sticking her head in the fucking water while I jerk off. And when I fucking cum, I flush the toilet.”” With random literary references to T.S. Eliot and Henry Miller and a strangely atmospheric and obscenely oppressive theatric chamber piece style, Midnight Heat may be the Taxi Driver of porn flicks, but more importantly it is an aberrant-garde work that nihilistically delegitimizes art by molesting it with sleazy pornography, thus indicating Watkins’ rather conflicted character as a true artist who whored himself out to the lowest bidder. Indeed, the forgotten prodigal celluloid son of Nicholas Ray and Otto Preminger, Watkins may not have achieved much during his erratic and sporadic filmmaking career, but he achieved more than most by adding an element of danger to cinema, which is something that I, for one, can appreciate.

FORTUNE AND MEN'S EYES

Harvey Hart (1971)

Despite ostensibly being the greatest and freest nation in the world, America also has the largest number of people incarcerated out of any other country in the world (in fact, in a 2014 report published by the National Research Council, it was revealed that just under ¼ of the world's prisoners are held in American prisons). Indeed, while the population of America has grown 2.8 times since 1920 to 2006, the number of inmates has grown over 20 times over that same period of time, thus indicating there is something seriously screwed up with the American criminal justice system, among other things (i.e. non-European immigration, liberalism). Indeed, in the glorious United States of America, a person can be imprisoned for selling a soft drug like weed and have the distinct honor of being beaten and sodomized by violent and largely mentally ill murderers, rapists, and other quasi-human rabble. Undoubtedly, as many films and TV shows demonstrate, rape has practically become synonymous with American prisons, yet the general public was not aware of such sickening circumstances until rather recently. In his prison memoir Men Into Beasts (1952), German-American poet/Nazi sympathizer George Sylvester Viereck depicted gay sex in prison as a mostly consensual affair and not as the sort of sexually savage plague that goes on today. Of course, with the desegregation of prisons, flooding of America with third world citizens, and the phony crime-creating drug war, things have certainly changed in the prison world. One of the first films to deal overtly with prison rape and sex slavery was the Canadian-American production Fortune and Men's Eyes (1971) directed by TV hack Harvey Hart (who is probably best known for the mini-series East of Eden (1981) based off Steinbeck's 1952 novel of the same name) and based on the hit 1967 off-Broadway play of the same name written by Canadian playwright John Herbert (who borrowed the title for his play from Shakespeare's Sonnet 29). Interestingly, in 1969, Sicilian-American Rebel Without a Cause (1955) star Sal Mineo, who was bisexual and rather prideful about that fact, directed a stage version of the play in Los Angeles starring a then rather unknown Don Johnson (who was, at that time, a gay icon of sorts) that was much more violent and sexually provocative than Herbert's original play. In fact, Mineo hoped to direct the film version of Fortune and Men's Eyes, but Herbert refused to sell him the rights because he eventually became agitated with the Guido stage-director's alterations of his original play. Based on playwright Herbert's own personal experiences in the Canadian prison system (like the character of 'Queenie' in the work, he was known to dress in drag while behind bars), the film is a sometimes unsettling tale of sexual savagery that probably deserves some minor cult status, but would have probably been an all the more intriguing work had it been directed by Mineo, who had no qualms about taking a graphic and even S&M-inspired approach to the material. A somewhat troubled production where the original director, Jules Schwerin, was fired after 9 weeks of shooting, Fortune and Men's Eyes has a rather unimpressive aesthetic and even sometimes resembles a TV movie, yet it still manages to be a sometimes disturbing and even comical work with a number of memorable performances that might scare someone straight out of a life in crime lest they get their brown-eye invaded.

Separated from his beloved girlfriend after being sentenced to 6 months in prison, Smitty Smith (played by Wendell Burton of The Sterile Cuckoo (1969) starring Liza Minnelli) is a baby-faced young man with a neat little boy's haircut who has no idea that he is about to enter a living hellhole of sexual sodomy and slavery where prison guards look the other way when young men are gang-banged and beta-males have to find an "old man" just to survive. Smitty was "busted for grass" after his well meaning old man turned him in and little did his unwitting father realize he would be sentencing his prodigal dope fiend son to forced sodomy. Upon entering prison, Smitty is put in a cell with a flagrantly queer queen named 'Queenie' (played by gay cult film icon Michael Greer of The Gay Deceivers (1969) and Messiah of Evil (1973)), a Jew-y dork named Mona (Danny Freedman), and a "third-rate hustler"/wop-ish James Dean wannabe named Rocky (Zooley Hall of the c-grade horror flick I Dismember Mama (1972)). Like Smitty, Mona was sentenced to 6 months and during his first day in prison he was gang-raped by a group of eight men and naturally had trouble walking for an entire week after suffering the superlatively degrading experience. When a dirty dago attempts to rape Smitty at lunch, Rocky, who seems to have taken a strange liking to the young man, comes to his defense, so another young man gets his rectum reamed instead. When Smitty asks why no one is attempting to rescue the young man who is getting anally pillaged, Rocky remarks, "Ain't nobody gonna' mess with a man gettin' his oats." Of course, the only reason Rocky helped Smitty in the first place is because he wants to make him his bitch and after the two smoke some weed out a shaving razor (!), the former rapes the latter in the shower room. Needless to say, Smitty has learned a lot during his first day in prison and if he ever hopes to be recognized as a man again, he will have to learn how to fight.

As one would suspect, rape victim Smitty becomes Rocky's bitch boy and is not only forced to bend over for his new anti-homo homo master (indeed, like most men in prison who rape other guys, Rocky denies he is a fag and even goes on a series of anti-fag rants), but also has to roll his cigarettes and make his bed, as if he is his loyal wife. Of course, Rocky is not exactly an alpha-male himself as a failed ex-hustler who used to be the personal bitch of a tall, dark, and handsome prison trustee named Screwdriver (Larry Perkins). Like any half-intelligent inmate, Rocky eventually learned the poof politics of prison and eventually became a player himself. Since Rocky is not very bright and fairly small, it is only a matter of time before Smitty smashes his face and ends his own sexual servitude. Meanwhile, a swarthy Guido prisoner named Catso (Lázaro Pérez), who previously attempted to rape Smitty, is beaten to death by some sadistic prison guards after he makes an accusation to a prison guard that Rocky and Screwdriver stole his lighter. Indeed, Rocky stole the lighter and gives it to his bitch boy Smitty, but the punk is rather tired of being a punk and does not want it, or so he says like a grumpy child whose parents have forced him to eat vegetables at dinner time. After Queenie offers to create a diversion for Smitty while he is in the shower room while ostensibly getting raped, the babyfaced punk punks Rocky and loses his second-rate status in prison. Indeed, Smitty beats Rocky unconscious and the entire prison soon finds out about this rather humiliating fact. At a prison Christmas show where dorky untermensch Mona reads Shakespeare and Queenie does a cabaret show in drag, super macho trustee Screwdriver formally 'disses' Rocky and recognizes Smitty as an alpha in front of the entire prison population. At the same Christmas show, Queenie is thrown into solitary confinement for flashing his penis to the entire audience after becoming enraged when his cabaret performance is cut short due to its provocative nature. Not long after the Christmas show, Rocky pulls a shiv on Smitty and ends up in 'permanent segregation' where he ultimately commits suicide. In the end, Smitty becomes like Rocky in terms of criminal degeneracy and even attempts to rape Mona, who he previously befriended, but the young nerd talks him out of it and the baby-faced prisoner comes to realize prison has turned him into a monster who now likes having sex with men. In the end, Smitty is stripped of all his clothes and thrown into solitary confinement after Queenie, who tends to transform into a violent psychopath when he does not get his wayward way, starts a bitch fight with him upon learning of Rocky's suicide. As the ending hints, the degenerative cycle of turning men into beasts in prison continues, with the whole 'rehabilitation' angle of incarceration being a joke that only naive liberal morons believe in.

While I clearly never saw Sal Mineo's stage adaption of Fortune and Men's Eyes as it was performed long before I was born, I suspect the actor was right when he stated in an interview with Boze Hadleigh regarding his opinion of the film version: "Flop time. Unh-unh. Nothin' like my play—my version. Less integrity." Indeed, aside from the fact that the gay element of the film feels exceedingly contrived, Fortune and Men's Eyes seems especially outmoded compared to the martial forced sodomy of the HBO prison series Oz (1997-2003), which more or less put every single prison film ever made before it to shame in terms of brutality, nihilism, and all-around nastiness. As for films that depict the obvious anti-rehabilitation first-time prisoners experience in jail, the German flick Die Verrohung des Franz Blum (1974) aka The Brutalisation of Franz Blum directed by Reinhard Hauff makes Fortune and Men's Eyes seem like some sort of impotent ABC Afterschool Special in terms of its depiction of a somewhat level-headed fellow degenerating into a psychopathic predator as a result of his experiences in the pig pen. Ultimately, Fortune and Men's Eyes is a mostly continuously entertaining, surprisingly claustrophobic, and reasonably well acted, if not somewhat blatantly flawed, footnote in prison rape cinema history that would probably have a much larger following if people actually knew the film existed. In terms of educational value, the film is a reminder to prospective criminals to never be a bitch in prison or you might end up being a lapsed man that has to wear tampons on a daily basis.

KISS OF THE SPIDER WOMAN

Héctor Babenco (1985)

Kiss of the Spider Woman is easily my favorite “Brazilian-American” production. The film follows two prison cellmates who do not have very much in common aside from being unlucky. Valentin Arregui is some sort of Marxist revolutionary who has been jailed due to his subversive political activity. He shares his jail cell with Luis Molina, a womanly homosexual man who has been charged with playing with little boys. The character of Molina is played by a very out of character William Hurt. Kiss of the Spider Woman is a notable film in that it features a “film within a film.” The character of Molina constantly tells the story of one of his favorite movies to the unimpressed Marxist Arregui. The film Molina speaks of is a fictional Nazi propaganda film called Her Real Glory. When Arregui finally finds out that the film Molina refers to is a Nazi propaganda film, he goes on later to talk about how Nazis put “faggots in ovens.” Eventually, Arregui goes to enjoy Molina’s storytelling. Arregui is your typical hypocritical Marxist guy. He admits to Molina his love for a woman of the bourgeoisie class which he also seems to be a part of. His new proletarian girlfriend is semi-literate as Molina identifies while reading one of her letters. Arregui even seems to be embarrassed of his working class girl. Kiss of the Spider Woman has an interesting “analysis” of Marxist revolutionaries whether intentional or not. I hope no one interprets the film as “borderline fascist” as the Her Real Glory Nazi footage is also shot in a fairly beautiful light. Kiss of the Spider Woman is a film full of strange melodrama worthy of Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s approval. The exaggerated melodramatic nature of the fictional Nazi propaganda film Her Real Glory only helps to setup the drama between the two lead characters of Kiss of the Spider Woman. William Hurt’s acting performance is nothing short of amazing. Whenever I think of the dirtiness and inhumanity of Brazil’s fine prison cells, I tend to reminisce of Kiss of the Spider Woman.

MINDSHADOWS

Heddy Honigmann (1988)

Somewhat recently, a Soiled Sinema reader from the Netherlands recommended to me a number of notable female-directed Dutch films about mental illness, thus leading me to discovering the tragically hopeless and mostly melancholic cinematic work Hersenschimmen (1988) aka Mindshadows aka Mind Shadows directed by Heddy Honigmann (El Olvido aka Oblivion, Forever). Technically a Dutch-Canadian production that is in both Dutch and English, the film is in many ways typical of Honigmann's other works in that it is a cross-cultural piece but what distinguishes it from most of the other flicks in the director's oeuvre is that it is a fictional feature based on a popular novel as opposed to a documentary. Not unlike Suriname-born filmmaker/producer Pim de la Parra (Frank en Eva, Wan Pipel aka One People), Honigmann is not actually Dutch but a South America Hebrew (her grandfather was a Polish Jew that relocated the entire family to Lima, Peru just a month before Uncle Adolf invaded Poland) who moved to the Netherlands where she established her filmmaking career and eventually gained Dutch citizenship. In fact, Honigmann is the widow of belated Dutch avant-garde auteur filmmaker Frans van de Staak (Rooksporen aka Traces of Smoke, Kladboekscènes aka Waste Book Scenes) who, although championed by filmmakers like Jean-Marie Straub and Aryan Kaganof, is little known even among seasoned cinephiles, especially outside of the Netherlands. Although Honigmann is a noted documentarian who has received many awards and much critical acclaim for rather unconventional docs like Metaal en Melancholie (1994) aka Metal and Melancholy and O Amor Natural (1996), one would not be able to tell this from watching Mindshadows, which is a carefully crafted piece of perturbing yet poetic narrative cinema featuring various somewhat oneiric flashback scenes about a retired white collar Dutchman living on the outskirts of a snowy northeastern Canadian coastal town who is suffering from the onset of dementia as brought on by the chronic neurodegenerative nightmare of Alzheimer's disease (AD). Based on the popular 1984 Dutch novel of the same name by pseudonymous author J. Bernlef, Honigmann's film probably offers the most realistic depiction of age-related mental deterioration ever committed to celluloid. Indeed, as someone who saw their own grandmother's mind deteriorate from dementia as a result of late-stage Parkinson's disease (PD), it was surely refreshing to see an artful depiction of the degenerative mental illness that does not succumb to senseless Hollywood-esque sensationalism or sentimentalism. Featuring a retired Dutchman going from complaining about the snow to his dog to burning all of his family photos and not realizing he has soiled himself as a direct result of his progressive mental degeneration, Mindshadows is one of those uniquely unpleasant arthouse works that might inspire you to kill yourself if you find yourself in the same superlatively sorry situation as the forsaken protagonist.

Retired protagonist Maarten Klein (Joop Admiraal) may have a surname that is typically associated with German Jews but he and his wife Vera (Marja Kok) are as stereotypically Dutch as can be in terms of appearance and demeanor as modest and highly individualistic people who lead fairly simple and quiet lives, though now they reluctantly call Canada home after living there for about two decades. Indeed, Maarten hates the seemingly perennially snowy weather in his rural seaside Canadian town on the outskirts of Halifax as demonstrated by remarks like, "Maybe it comes from the snow...that I'm already tired in the morning. Not Vera...She loves the snow. For her there's nothing like a snowy landscape. When everything turns white" and "I long for spring." Aside from the snow, Maarten has recently had other problems, especially in regard to his memory. Indeed, only four years after retiring after working his ass off for virtually his entire life doing boring as hell bureaucratic office work, Maarten begins to suffer from senility as brought on by early stage Alzheimer's disease, which not only causes him to lose his short-term memory but also causes him to think that he is living in the past to the point where he mistakes waitresses for old lovers and the bathroom in his own home for one that his old boss committed suicide in. Undoubtedly, it is a scary experience for Maarten as he not only succumbs to senility but is also forced to confront repressed memories of less than nostalgic events from his life that include being yelled at by his Dutch elementary school teacher and failing to come to the aid of a suicidal friend who ultimately offed himself. Maarten's wife Vera first becomes aware that there is something not quite right about her hubby when she finds him fully clothed at the kitchen table in the middle of the night while talking to the dog in the dark and he strangely says to her when he asks what is wrong, "Nothing. Only my head is transparent. Like ice or like glass. Totally clear, but I'm not thinking at all." To help him sleep, Vera recommends that Maarten work on a crossword puzzle, but that only reinforces his foreboding fear that something odd is happening to his mind.

While working on the crossword puzzle, Maarten becomes stumped upon trying to figure out a six-letter word that means "refusal," which is somewhat ironic considering his incapacity to fully accept that his mind is becoming feebler and feebler with each passing day. When Maarten finally figures out the word he was trying to think of for the crossword puzzle is "denial" while taking a stroll with his dog, he triumphantly jumps up and down while yelling, "Of course, DENIAL! Of course, DENIAL! Another word for refusal," as if he has just come up with the cure for cancer. To celebrate his belated conquering of the crossword puzzle, Maarten walks into a bowling alley and absurdly attempts to order some alcohol, which they obviously do not serve, so he settles for a soda while wondering to himself why the waitress does not remember him. Indeed, Maarten thinks the waitress is a Dutch girl with a bushy beaver named 'Lotje'

MINDSHADOWS

(Inge Marit van der Wal) who he lost his virginity to when he was 'just a boy.' Of course, the waitress is not Lotje and when Maarten finally comes to terms with this, he absurdly leaves her a $20 bill for the soda and abruptly leaves. After leaving the bowling alley, Maarten heads to a bookstore owned by his friend who asks him if he read the copy of Graham Greene's The Heart of the Matter (1948) that he recently bought there, but the protagonist does not remember buying the book. To appease his friend and make it seem like he is not totally feebleminded, Maarten purchases a copy of Greene's Our Man In Havana (1958) and discusses Carol Reed's 1959 film adaptation of the same name starring Alec Guinness. After leaving the bookstore, Maarten's wife Vera spots him and yells at him for disappearing and leaving the dog to wander around. On the awkward drive home, Maarten manages to make things all the more uneasy by confusing Vera with his young love Lotje.

The next morning, Maarten confuses his own bathroom for that of the one where his Slavic boss and best friend killed himself, stating to himself of his confusion that it is, "as if someone inside of me remembers a different house." Maarten's ex-boss Karl Simmitich (Peer Mascini) liked him especially because he was the only person he knew that could properly pronounce his surname. While remembering the tragic event of seeing Simmitich's corpse in a bathtub full of blood as a result of a suicide that involved slitting his wrists, Maarten thinks to himself, "I never should have left him alone that evening" and proceeds to cry. As it turns out, Simmitich committed suicide on his birthday not long after he had practically begged Maarten to stay with him, thus causing the protagonist to suffer repressed guilt which has flooded his mind ever since suffering dementia. After shaving, Maarten and his dog take a bus to the protagonist's old workplace where he gives a speech that he completely botches to an imaginary audience. When a janitor abruptly walks in on Maarten while he is giving a speech that is half in Dutch and half in English on the pointlessness of speeches, the protagonist panics and runs out of the building while his loyal dog follows him from behind. Of course, Maarten has forgotten the fact that he retired four years ago. When Maarten gets home, he unwittingly reveals his terribly faulty memory to his wife by asking her if the book she is reading is on Cuba upon seeing her looking at the copy of Our Man In Havana that he bought the day before. Needless to say, Vera breaks down and confronts Maarten about the fact that he seems to forget the fact that both he and she retired four years ago and that his father died all the way back in 1956. When Vera begins crying hysterically and shouts, "You're hurting me. You're hurting me," Maarten attempts to comfort her while being seemingly completely oblivious to the severity of his mental affliction or the dubious future that he has with his wife.

While staring at a traditional white and blue Dutch Delftware vase, Maarten thinks to himself, "A present from mama to Vera. For someone else, it's just a souvenir. He doesn't see it. Without memory, you can only look. I have to remember this...in order to explain a lot to Vera.” Undoubtedly Maarten’s remarks on the vase is the only time where he seems to be fully cognizant of his precarious situation in life and mental decline. Maarten also soon remembers how he once cheated on his wife with a French chick named Sylvie (Catherine ten Bruggencate) while on a trip in Paris. As his mind further deteriorates, Maarten will unwittingly reveal to Vera that he once cheated on her after confusing his own living room for a Paris ballroom and mistaking her for Parisian babe Sylvie. While Vera initially attempts to deal with Maarten’s mental deterioration by going along with his delusions, it eventually becomes too much for her and she hires a young and attractive live-in blonde nurse with the curious male name Phil Taylor (played by Canadian singer Melanie Doane) to take care of her hubby. Maarten suffers the paranoid delusion that Vera and Phil are part of a conspiracy against him, stating to himself, “Too much is happening behind my back just like at the office.” Meanwhile, Maarten’s memory gets so bad that he forgets what he looks like and angrily yells upon seeing his own reflection in a window, “Go away, you. Go away, you. I see you. Go away. Go away, you.” Upon subsequently finding a photo album with old pictures of himself, Maarten states “There he is. That man must go” and then proceeds to burn every single one of the photos in his fireplace. When Maarten wakes up one morning and complains, “It sure stinks here. My ass is ice cold. God damn it, I shat in the bed. What do you think about that? After a while, one can’t hold anything inside anymore,” it becomes quite apparent that he has now reached an infantile state and needs special professional care. Indeed, Maarten is placed in a nursing home where he suffers the delusion that the nurses want to deport him back to the Netherlands and says bizarre things like, “I’m the only survivor of my own language.” In the end, Maarten mumbles to himself one night whilst lying in his hospital bed in the dark, “Don’t fall asleep. Don’t fall asleep. Really want to. But I won’t.”

Undoubtedly, Mindshadows is one of those rare films that I rather enjoyed but would never be interested in seeing again, as it offers a decidedly dejecting experience that reminds one how truly eclectically miserable old age can be, especially if one contracts one of the various mental ailments that oftentimes plague old farts. Indeed, as someone that personally witnessed my grandmother’s mind deteriorate as a result of dementia about a decade before she actually died, Honigmann’s film gave me a bit of nauseating déjà vu. Like the protagonist of the film, my grandmother would oftentimes confuse me and other family members with long dead people from earlier points in her life, including her early childhood. By the last couple years of her life, my grandmother had completely lost touch with reality and could not remember a single one of her family members, thus I found it completely pointless to even visit her anymore, with her death ultimately being a sort of bittersweet relief as it ended her seemingly endless suffering. Towards the end of Honigmann’s film, it becomes disturbingly clear that there are few things that induce such a forsaken sense of physical and especially metaphysical loneliness in the sufferer than late-stage dementia. Unquestionably, one of the most interesting aspects of Mindshadows is the way that Honigmann decided to portray the protagonist's wife, who ultimately seems more concerned with herself and her own future than that of her dementia-ridden hubby, who she barely takes care of and eventually throws in a nursing home after a live-in nurse proves to be not sufficient enough. Indeed, it almost seems as if wife Vera resents the protagonist, as if she feels cheated in that she always expected him to take care of her and not the other way around. Of course, Vera was put in an impossible situation that is arguably worse than losing a loved one to an unexpected death like a car wreck, or at least that's how Honigmann's film makes the situation seem. Ultimately, Mindshadows is a film about the tragically merciless and seemingly senseless character of nature and fate and the impossibility of dealing with and confronting such things, especially when you're mind is deteriorating. Indeed, if anyone is wondering why someone like Flemish novelist and sometimes filmmaker Hugo Claus would opt to end his life via euthanasia after learning that he was suffering from Alzheimer's disease, Honigmann's work gives you more than enough reason why.

OSTERMONTAG

Imagine, if you will, an angry German man in a tie running through a complex room structure that summarizes as an almost circular pattern. Now add fury in his step and incapacitated females in every room. To finalize this scene, precipitate this furious man beating all of these women with an empty soda bottle given a forced sound effect of glass "clinking". What you have is one of the most misogynistic films of all time and a completely hilarious work of underground German splatter. This magnificent film is titled Ostermontag and the title is the dividing of bone and the removal of a deformity. This deformity is woman kind and through Flipper's eyes, is the biggest parasite to society. Ostermontag is yet another film from Heiko Flipper. His other film, Das Komabrutale Duell, may sound incredibly familiar after a recent release from Unearthed Films. Das Komabrutale Duell marks the second release in the German Splatter series following the tedious and tepid Hunting Creatures. It seems Unearthed Films is definitely saving the best for last. Ostermontag is in no way a fashionable exercise of quality film making, but the effects are horrendous and the humor is unintentional and misplaced so the overall experience is something to gain from. I can see Heiko Flipper being a closet homosexual blaming females for their wrong-doings. If only he could channel his hatred into a stronger attempt at creating an commendable medium. Gorehounds can find something to squeal about. Spanning from horrific effects such as a scene in which a head is comically smashed to a scene including a man taping a knife to his groin. As you form a mental image, allow me to haze your mentality by forcing the image to take a horrific turn as the evil German rapes a female from behind with his blade-dick. You might wonder which orifice he is penetrating. I can honestly say that the bridge between both has been severed and collapsed into a deep chasm of stringy flesh and blood flow of all putrid degrees. Of course it doesn't show this as this is considered "low budget" but it is a step above implied violence and effective in what it does. The plot follows as such and this wouldn't be known cause the film lacks subtitles currently. "Heiko is in love with his stepsister Fabiane, but Fabiane is not in love with Heiko. Therefore, she sends her twin sister Nicole to visit Heiko. One day Heiko decides to stop this stupid game by killing Nicole. But he makes a terrible mistake - Instead of Nicole, he kills Fabiane! Some years later Heiko has his sights set on Nicole for revenge...incredible and brutal violence starts" Execution is a must and this film has none of that. Named after the character himself, Heiko films his undeniable exorcism of woman-hating genes in the form of a laughably-bad splatter film. Ostermontag is simply a look at the deteriorating infrastructure of a low budget film maker indeed. Posed as a snuff film, nothing actually makes sense with that genre implication. There's no one behind the camera and only a small amount of scenes actually indicate an idea of snuff as Heiko shows his victim tapes of him torturing females. Ostermontag owes it to the incredibly bad production values for the maligned humor behind the film. Is it dark and brutal? Sure, but only as dark and brutal as smashing a balloon filled with V8 would be. This is a must-see for fans of both gore and extremely awful splatter films. I must admit this film is leagues ahead of most of German splatter. I also applaud the comedic misogyny that views anyone that has used an Easy-Bake oven as a child as an enemy of man. Plain and simple, Ostermontag is pure insanity.

D'ANNUNZIO'S CAVE

Heinz Emigholz (2005)

While I'm sort of a novice in regard to his life and work, decidedly decadent dago dandy and 'proto-fascist' poet Gabriele D'Annunzio (1863-1938) is certainly someone I can respect as a true Renaissance man who, not unlike Japanese novelist Yukio Mishima, was one of the few artists to be a true master of pen and sword. In other words, D'Annunzio was not merely a sedentary scribbler of flowery bullshit nor passive dreamer, but an active artist whose art far transcended the written word and real-life Übermensch who managed to go from being a mere literary figure to a national war hero whose style, aesthetic, and politics Benito Mussolini ripped off (indeed, among other things, D'Annunzio became the 'Duce' of the short-lived nation Italian Regency of Carnaro in Fiume between 1919 and 1920). After someone tried to assassinate him in 1922 via defenestration, D'Annunzio permanently relocated to the villa in Gardone Riviera overlooking Garda lake in the province of Brescia, Lombardy where he would create what was arguably the crowning achievement of his life. Indeed, with the help of his architect Giancarlo Maroni, D'Annunzio would spend the rest of his life (17 years!) meticulously pimping out his Villa Cargnacco and building a museum, 'The Vittoriale degli italiani' (aka The Shrine of Italian Victories), which he would donate to Italy and what would ultimately become an official Italian national monument (the poet's birthplace in Pescara would also become a museum). Naturally, when I discovered that a German filmmaker directed a documentary about D'Annunzio's Villa Cargnacco, I could not resist, even with a title so brazenly derogatory as D'Annunzios Höhle (2005) aka D'Annunzio's Cave. Directed by a seemingly stereotypical ethno-masochistic German intellectual named Heinz Emigholz (Schindler's Houses, Goff in the Desert) who specializes in experimental documentaries about architecture and who is a Professor of Experimental film at Berlin University of the Arts and at European Graduate School (in Saas-Fee, Switzerland), D'Annunzio's Cave is essentially a failed pseudo-avant-garde agitprop piece that juxtaposes cockeyed shots of the Villa Cargnacco with intentionally annoying and dissonant computer sound effects. In short, D'Annunzio's Cave makes for an unintentionally dichotomous work that demonstrates the stark contrast between D'Annunzio's exceedingly elegant architecture and priceless knickknacks and the unhinged ugliness of a particularly pompous left-wing filmmaker who would not know true beauty if it buggered him in the bum like a Red Army grunt in post-WWII Berlin.

Part of Emigholz's 'Architecture as Autobiography' series (the director has also made films on Bruce Goff, Adolf Loos, Robert Maillart, Rudolph Schindler, etc.), D'Annunzio's Cave is the seemingly aesthetically autistic result of what happens when a little man goes in a dead big man's home and thrusts his impotent jealousy and scorn all over the place with the sort of inane irrationality one would expect from a kindergartner throwing a temper tantrum after not being allowed to watch their favorite TV show. On June 24, 2002, director Heinz Emigholz and three of his filmmakers buddies—Irene von Alberti (a xenophile filmmaker/producer who likes directing films about brown people, Elfi Mikesch (a lesbian cinematographer/filmmaker who is best known for shooting Werner Schroeter's films), and Klaus Wyborny (an old school experimental filmmaker who Werner Herzog once paid tribute to by using some of his footage in The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974))—go to the Villa Carnaccio and separately shoot footage in fifteen different rooms of D'Annunzio's singularly lavish and delectably decadent home. Despite utilizing four different cinematographers with handheld cameras (Emigholz only opted taking the four-camera 'cinematographic jam session' approach so he would not have to pay location fees for multiple days of shooting), the documentary seems like it was shot by a single seemingly stoned/spastic tourist who has yet to learn how to use their camera properly before going on vacation. Indeed, while it is impossible to tell which cameraman is which, virtually all of the footage in D'Annunzio's Cave was shot in an intentionally erratic and waywardly framed manner so as to induce abject disgust in the viewer. Fortunately, the glorious aesthetic majesty of D'Annunzio's fascist poet pleasuredome is too aesthetically pleasing to be completely molested by shoddy, limp-wristed left-wing camerawork. Ultimately, the most grating and equally redundant aspect of the documentary is asinine atonal sound effects and computer-generated voices, which quote the words of D'Annunzio, Mussolini, Joseph Conrad, kosher commie Joseph 'Red Roth' Roth and apparently some pissy film producer. Indeed, while Emigholz attempts to elicit cognitive dissonance and metaphysical horror in the viewer as if he was attempting to mimic the sound design of a David Lynch flick, the whole thing comes off as a patently pretentious, if not preposterously pathetic, joke as if he wants to conjure evil where evil does not reside. Overall, I do not think it would be an exaggeration to say that D'Annunzio's Cave makes an infinitely more interesting and captivating documentary with the sound turned off and some neofolk music playing in the background.

Among other strategically calculated tidbits, one learns while watching D'Annunzio's Cave that the decadent Duce indulged in degenerate jazz, especially songs sung by Josephine Baker. Of course, Emigholz attempts to establish a link between fascism and murder/evil by including the following D'Annunzio quote, "I have created this alcove in purple, beautiful color of blood." Undoubtedly, my favorite quote included in the documentary is, "I imagine the dead feel no animosity against the living. They care nothing for them," as it expresses what D'Annunzio would think about a loser like Emigholz, who is not even fit enough to shine the shoes on the poet's corpse. Of course, nothing is more intrinsically fascist than mother nature, so I could not help but smile after hearing the following quote, "A hill so green with small meadows with plain trees—cypresses, laurelin chestnut oaks—while help the Latin race rediscover her past greatness.” In a scene shot in the most esoteric and religiously-themed room of D’Annunzio home, Emigholz demonstrates his respect for the dead by including a sound clip of some less than eloquent vulgarian yelling things like, “fuck you” and whatnot. The last five minutes or so of the documentary features the Brian Eno & David Byrne track “The Jezebel Spirit”, which features a sound clip of an actual exorcism. Indeed, leftist true believer Emigholz goes so far as to attempt a cinematic exorcism of atheist D’Annunzio, thus demonstrating the quasi-religious perspective he is taking in his rather corny crusade against the ‘demonic’ decadent poet. If nothing else, D’Annunzio’s Cave proves that Francis Parker Yockey was right when he wrote, “A moment’s reflection shows that Liberalism is entirely negative. It is not a formative force, but always and only a disintegrating force,” as left-wing choirboy Emigholz’s documentary only attempts to defile and negate that which is beautiful, yet it even fails in that regard, as the shitty camera work and calculatingly contrived sound effects of the documentary are no match for D’Annunzio’s classic aesthetic prowess.

Despite auteur Heinz Emigholz’s metapolitical intentions with the film, D’Annunzio’s Cave only made me respect Gabriele D’Annunzio and his irreplaceable legacy all the more. Had Emigholz actually constructed an artistically interesting film out of D’Annunzio’s Cave with the same cliché anti-fascist message still intact, I would give credit where credit is due, but ultimately the documentary—with its contrived computer noise, pseudo-disturbing heavy breathing, and pathologically crooked camera angles—seems like an overextended power electronics music video gone awry. Another glaring flaw of D’Annunzio’s Cave is that even Emigholz’s hatred seems rather misguided and even contrived, as if he made the documentary to impress his academic buddies and wanted to prove that antifascist sentiments can still be ‘edgy’ and ‘provocative.’ Of course, Emigholz was not the first Teutonic filmmaker to direct an experimental documentary on the aesthetics of fascist architecture, as German auteur Alexander Kluge’s first film Brutalität im Stein (1960) aka Brutality in Stone—a poetic 12-minute short co-directed by Peter Schamoni (No Shooting Time for Foxes, Hundertwasser’s Rainy Day) that takes a sort of contra Riefenstahl approach and utilizes montage as a means to critique some of the neo-classical architecture of the Third Reich—predates D’Annunzio’s Cave by nearly a century and is infinitely more effective. The only crumb of credit I can give to Emigholz is that he did not attempt to obscure his hatred nor complete and utter lack of objectivity regarding D’Annunzio, as an agitated little man who even went so far as posting the following words on the official site for D’Annunzio’s Cave, “Gardone, June 24, 2002. An abyss of the state of the art. Considering this spectacle, my hate began to recede, covered by my satisfaction at the dust that had settled like acid on everything and the chatter of the guide who had taken over D’Annunzio’s empire and had to present culture to astonished tourists. I felt as if I were on the inside of an embalmed corpse whose intestines and brain had been shunted away because they had begun to stink. Now the state has to take care of this empty husk, because the poet wants to communicate with us through it. What the collection shouts out is the recognition that museums are useless and only a method of doubly losing life. The fate of modern art, which begs for patronage, is inscribed in it. Every kind of aimless filth would be prettier than this treasurehold of loot owned by one who, in the name of art, robbed people of language and flushed it as lotion into his own mummy. The thousand-year empire of house dust; house dust mites and those in flakes of skin take command." Indeed, D'Annunzio's villa might have a little dust, but D'Annunzio's Cave is infected with a metaphysical disease that glorifies grotesquery and slavishly mocks aesthetic majesty, as if the film was directed by a jealous lumpenprole who lacks the cultivation to take in what he sees, with his philistine brain overheating as a result. Ultimately, D'Annunzio's Cave is a piece of inverse fetishism where the director projects his irrational hostilities on D'Annunzio, though it is quite clear that the director is hopelessly infatuated with his subject, sort of like how Spielberg is obsessed with Nazis. As for D'Annunzio's villa, I think the Poet said it best when he stated regarding the legacy of his museum that it is "not a fat inheritance of lifeless riches, but a naked heritage of an immortal spirit."

BEFREIER UND BEFREITE

Long before the release of the relatively mainstream German war-drama A Woman in Berlin (2008) aka The Downfall of Berlin: Anonyma (2008) aka Anonyma - Eine Frau in Berlin directed by Max Färberböck—a work based on the autobiographical 1954 novel of the same name (known as Eine Frau in Berlin in Germany) about the author (who originally had the book published anonymously but was later revealed to be journalist Marta Hillers) and her real-life hellish and positively pitiless experiences as one of the many Teutonic women raped during the invasion of Berlin by the Red Army—kraut communist/filmmaker Helke Sander (Break the Power of the Manipulators, The Trouble with Love) would release what would be arguably the most controversial and strangely politically correct film of her career, BeFreier und BeFreite (1992) aka Liberators Take Liberties, a two-part 192-minute documentary about the collective pillaging and despoiling of Berlin's female population by the Slavic and mongoloid Soviet Red Army soldiers. Divided into two distinct yet overlapping documentary parts, Liberators Take Liberties first starts by interviewing the victims, as well as male and female members of the Red Army, and the second part focuses on the now-grownup ½ Russian bastard children who were conceived when a commie entered their mommie against their will. What makes Liberators Take Liberties especially interesting, unconventional, and seemingly wacky is that far-left feminist director Helke Sander attempts to argue these rapes were worse than the average gang rapes because they were acts of “genocidal rape” aka “sexual genocide” due to the fact that the victims were racially pure Aryans brought up on National Socialist ideology, thus the fact that intermensch/subhuman Slav communists committed these acts made it all the more devastating, so it should be no surprise that over 90% of the women that unfortunately got pregnant this way decided to abort the bastard babies, but as the second half of Liberators Take Liberties shows, some of these bastard ‘hate children’ survived and have now filed for “damage caused by occupation.” Unfortunately, but rather unsurprisingly, it seems that very few ex-Red Army veterans want to take credit for their own prized pussy pillaging, but considering the Germans also damaged Russia and Eastern Europe as the Bolsheviks did before them during and after the revolution (and the various man-made mass starvation following it), it is quite understandable that they would engage in such savage behavior as their God given right as vengeful victors who had been dreaming of revenge for decades.

As explained in Liberators Take Liberties, the Wehrmacht (Germany army) ran around 500 of their own brothels during the Second World War and each prostitute would service around 30 German soldiers daily. Of course, the Soviets were less accommodating to their soldiers' sexual needs, but luckily they had a psychopathic Teutonophobic Jew propagandist by the name of Ilya Ehrenburg who, aside from promoting kraut-killing and the extermination of Germanic peoples with lunatic lines like, "We shall kill. If you have not killed at least one German a day, you have wasted that day... Do not count days; do not count miles. Count only the number of Germans you have killed," promoted the rape of Aryan women and relished the fact that largely due to his kosher hate campaign, to quote his own propaganda, "that blonde hag is in for a bad time," and indeed she was with upwards of 2 million individual women being raped in Berlin alone between the ages of roughly 7 to 70 years old, with at least 10,000 women dying in the aftermath of said sadistic sexual pillaging. Of course, the Russians, including the female members of the Red Army, do not exactly remember it that way and, like many rapists often do, actually go as far as blaming the victims for what happened to them. For example, a Soviet painter who fought in the Red Army as a wee boy claims that Teutonic femme fatales with STDs would aggressively approach Russian soldiers because with their venereal diseases, "one German woman could put 15 Russian men out of action." Of course, with popular and catchy rape revering jingles like "this is my rifle, this is my gun, one is for killing and the other is for fun," it was hard to imagine that rape was anything other than a joyous experience for the sexually repressed Soviet soldiers, many of whom had not seen women in years, let alone fornicated with them. The rapes were so bad in some areas, that one victim in Liberators Take Liberties, herself a communist who was imprisoned by the Third Reich, explains that out of some 28 or 30 girls she went to school with, around 16 or 18 of them had ultimately committed suicide after being viciously vaginally ransacked by members of the Red Army. Just to give an idea of how absurd and 'normal' rape had become, one German woman, whose family members were forced to watch, was raped no less than 128 times continuously, but luckily she passed out after the 15th time and somehow survived the absolutely odious ordeal. As one of the more honest Russian gents explains, rapists oftentimes "queued up" in lines of 5-6 fellows to get their turn at pillaging a woman. Naturally, any woman who resisted rape or any German man that attempted to stop it was shot on the spot. These mass rapes were far from a temporary sort of thing and lasted until about the winter of 1947-1948 when the Soviets finally decided to separate the soldiers from the local residents and had them confined to guard posts and camps.

Not unsurprisingly, many of the children that were born out of these Slavic-on-Aryan rapes did not seem especially disturbed by their unholy background as it is the only thing they knew. Quite absurdly, one woman, who is apparently the spawn of a German mother who was raped by a French officer, admits that her family members were not that outraged nor distressed by the rape as the frog rapist was from a cultivated background, unlike many of the ruski men of the Red Army. One of the rape bastards, who was initially told that he was the product of a consented romance between his mother and an American soldier, was quite disillusioned to learn at age 40 from his elderly mom that he was really spawned from a Russian rapist, so it becomes all the more absurd and ironic that he has gone on to becoming a card-carrying communist who admits he has committed acts of 'sexual violence' against women. Despite the popular portrayal of American troops during the Second World War as being perennial noble liberators who saved Europa from National Socialist barbarism engulfing the continent, GIs were only second to Russians in rapes committed against German women. In fact, German fashion model turned singer/actress Nico (born Christa Päffgen), whose father died in a concentration camp after suffering brain damage as a soldier, was apparently raped at the mere age of 15 by a GI in the U.S. Air Force who was later executed for his crimes. Of course, as briefly mentioned in Liberators Take Liberties, it was only typically negroes who were punished for their vaginal pillaging by the U.S. military, which is no surprise as it would be quite obvious what happened if a bunch of little Günther Kaufmanns (himself the product of a Bavarian mother and black American father) ran around as opposed to conspicuously kraut 'pure Europid' Amero-mutts.

Indeed, while Helke Sander portrays other groups as victimized in the documentary, when it comes down to it, Liberators Take Liberties is a cinematically and academically vapid 'pussy power' propaganda piece that goes so far as to associate sexual intercourse as a form of violence, with even one of the victims of Russian rape summing up the entire film with the remark that "violence is connected with sexuality" and that she absolutely loathes having sexual intercourse. Quite honestly, I wanted to like Liberators Take Liberties, even in spite of the fact that I knew beforehand that it was directed by a humorless femi-commie, yet this two-part documentary could have easily been half as long as it devotes far too much time to interviewing subjects about seeing irrelevant topics as opposed to sticking to facts. While I can appreciate the fact that Sander documented the victims' stories before they died, the filmmaker's almost pathological obsession with women as perennial victims and men as eternal pigs makes Liberators Take Liberties a patently prosaic document that will only be tolerable, let alone enjoyable, to those rather unfortunate individuals that had the tortuous task of studying so-called 'women's studies' at the undergraduate level.

UNDER THE PAVEMENT LIES THE STRAND

Helma Sanders-Brahms (1975)

To me, there are few things more repugnant in the cinematic realm than feminist filmmakers, as they actively debase the artistic medium of film and seem to think that spreading some sort of innately incoherent and rarely concrete message about 'female power' is all that one needs to do to make a film, as if aesthetics and entertainment value are totally insignificant matters that are, at best, of secondary importance. One of the few self-professed feminist filmmakers that I actually I have a degree of respect for is German auteur Helma Sanders-Brahms who, despite being a feminist, was not afraid to direct films about quasi-fascist poets (i.e. Heinrich, My Heart is Mine Alone aka Mein Herz – niemandem!) and even went so far as to defend her cinematic mother-figure Leni Riefenstahl by lauding her work Tiefland (1954) as an anti-Hitler allegory of sorts and rhetorically asking regarding the film: "How is it possible that after fifty years the fear of dealing with this film is still so great that just the refusal to view it is considered a correct attitude for German intellectuals?" With Sanders-Brahms' rather recent death on May 27, 2014, I decided it was about time that I watch her first feature Under the Pavement Lies the Strand (1975) aka Unter dem Pflaster ist der Strand aka Under the Beach's Cobbles aka Beach under the Sidewalk starring Grischa Huber (The Serpent's Egg, Malou) and Heinrich Giskes (Heinrich, Bang Boom Bang - Ein todsicheres Ding). Created when Sanders-Brahms was totally unknown and had yet to have any meaningful involvement with any sort of feminist movement, Under the Pavement Lies the Strand is a black-and-white low-budget avant-garde work that went on to become "a cult film in the German feminist movement" and rightfully earned its lead Grischa Huber the Deutscher Filmpreis (Filmband in Gold) at the 1975 German Film Awards. A melancholy work about two stage actors/left-wing activists who were involved with the German "68er-Bewegung" student movement yet have now become somewhat disillusioned with the cause and further find their ideals tested when the female protagonist becomes pregnant amidst a new abortion law in West Germany that they had previously actively protested, Under the Pavement Lies the Strand is a thoughtful and relatively nuanced work that ultimately asks more questions than it answers, thus making it quite different from the idiotically idealistic philo-Semitic/man-hating Hollywoodized agitprop pieces of Margarethe von Trotta and the aesthetically sterile celluloid manifestos of Helke Sander. Indeed, like her Austrian celluloid compatriot Valie Export (Unsichtbare Gegner aka Invisible Adversaries, Menschenfrauen), Sanders-Brahms clearly took cinema serious as an art form and demonstrated with Under the Pavement Lies the Strand she had a keen talent for assembling a realistic modern romance film set during a degenerate zeitgeist when young men and women were increasingly confused about their place in German society.

Grischa (Grischa Huber) and Heinrich (Heinrich Giskes) are stage actors involved in a feminist reworking of a Greek tragedy that is being shot for German television (indeed, during this time, filming theatre for TV was not uncommon in Germany, with Fassbinder directing no less than four of these TV plays). As the narrator (Helma Sanders-Brahms) states of a scene featuring an eclectic group of female actresses: "These actresses act out the rule of women, as it was thousands of years ago, and its abolition ordained by men." Like all the actresses, Grischa rehearses for the play during the day and thinks of her 'role as a woman' during the night, but that is about to change when genuine human feeling gets in the way of cold and abstract political idealism. During one of these nights, Heinrich, who is wearing nothing but a cock-shaped codpiece and has brought his two dogs along with him, visits Grischa in her dressing room after practicing for a play. Assumedly rainwashed by pinko-hippie ideas of communal living, Grischa complains to Heinrich, "I'd like to see an end of the separation of private life and job. What I do on the stage is what I need, you see. What I say comes from deep within me, and, of course, it comes out stronger on stage." Ultimately, the two get locked in the building and after Heinrich describes to Grischa how she resembles his dead sister who was murdered (he was 4 and she was 15 at the time, thus hinting she was murdered during the Second World War), so naturally they make love. As Grischa states of Heinrich and their relationship: "In Heinrich's mind always the hope...that remained unfulfilled with the many...because they were too few and not tenacious enough; hope of fulfillment with one person, taking up the struggle, with love a revolution for two." Indeed, Heinrich complains about how everyone was united in 1968 during the time of the student movement protests, but now everyone has splintered off into smaller groups, which has created a sort of rivalry amongst former comrades. It seems Heinrich has finally grown up and realizes having a family is more important than any sort of abstract political idealism, telling Grischa, "I will give you a baby," though he seems somewhat immature in other regards, as he cannot stand it when his girlfriend does not give him 100% of her attention and acts out as a result. Of course, being more concerned with her acting career and political activism and resenting more than anything the idea of living a "domestic life" as a housewife with children, as if that is somehow beneath her, Grischa tells Heinrich more than one time that she does not want to have a child. Obsessed with feminist ideas that she has clearly been brainwashed with, Grischa begins actively interviewing proletarian factory workers about motherhood and abortions, as if she has been contracted by some feminist think-tank to carry out a study. Virtually every woman that the actress ends up interviewing confesses to having had an abortion at some point in their life as a result of necessity and none of them seem particularly proud of it, though they have no problem stating these things in front of their children.

Meanwhile, 'Heini' (as Grischa affectionately calls him) begins getting all

moody and broody about his girlfriend's refusal to be pregnant, so he mopes around his apartment while reading Friedrich Engels' The Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State (1884)—a work that absurdly argues that the proletariat is free from 'moral decay' (i.e. prostitution, extramarital affairs, etc.) because they lack the monetary means to have an inheritance-based bourgeois marriage, which forces people to marry for monetary reasons and not out of love, thus causing them to seek prostitutes—as if such an outmoded feminist communist text will provide him with inspiration for being a husband and father. Heini is also a fan of the Persian fairytale Majnun Layla aka Lelia and Madschnun, which he describes as having essentially the same message as Engels' work. Fed up with Grischa's seemingly pathological activism (at one point, he asks her: "Why not let me rot?"), Heinrich begins hanging out with a cute blonde chick and complains to her about he is tired of "play acting," adding: "I'm not so stuck on politics. I think it's arrogant for an actor to go and tell workers what it's all about. I'd like a kind of folk theatre, something like I've seen the French doing. Like "Théâtre du Soleil." [...] something people get a kick out of." When Grischa calls Heini and states, "I understand you wanting your freedom. I want mine, too. But you won't be freer by being alone. It's something different. You just have...to discover a new way of life, right? I know I've made mistakes but we can change that. If we separate for a few days, it'll be all right perhaps," he says nothing, even though she begs him to. Since Grischa has just recently stopped taking birth control after 7 years of continuously using them after hearing they cause sterilization, she naturally ends up getting pregnant, but she is too afraid to tell Heini, so she attempts to get the courage to do so by practicing what she plans to say to her boyfriend and recording it on her tape-recorder (which, is ironically the same tape-recorder she uses to interview prole women about abortions). Eventually, Grischa goes to a feminist rally to look for a feminist gynecologist named Dr. Siebert and while she is there she hears a bunch of hilariously deluded feminist folk musicians singing the following loony lyrics: "We are women and we fight fearlessly for the revolution...With all comrades for communism...United in struggle we are strong." When Grischa finally finds Dr. Siebert, she complains about her worries regarding her pregnancy and asks whether or not she should keep the baby due to her dubious relationship with Heinrich and her concerns about the future of her career. Grischa also complains about how Heinrich suffers a "mother complex" and has no realistic means to become a father. Ultimately, Dr. Siebert gives Grischa advice on how to get an abortion, recommending that she fake being suicidal if she wants a legal abortion. After talking to the gynecologist, Grischa goes by Heinrich's apartment and attempts to reconcile with him, but he complains to his girlfriend that, "You're too strong for me" and claims he has an incapacity for tenderness because, "I was brought up by Nazis, I'm a fascist. I have visions of beating you to a pulp." In the end, Heinrich says he would rather screw his dog than Grischa and even threatens suicide, though the two seem to more or less reconcile, though the future of their relationship seems dubious at best.

As German novelist Peter Schneider, who was a spokesman for the German student movement, noted regarding his generation and the failure of 68er-Bewegung movement to achieve anything of value: "It is now clear...that the protestors were terribly naïve and unself-conscious in their anti-fascism. There has probably never been a movement at once so obsessed with language and so incapable of articulating its ideas and desires." Indeed, the protagonists of Sanders-Brahms' Under the Pavement Lies the Strand certainly seem like they have no clue what they are doing, as if their political activism is merely a truly reactionary response to some sort of inner void, as well as a nonsensical means to atone for the supposed sins of their parents' generation, with Heinrich's remark, "I was brought up by Nazis, I'm a fascist," completely highlighting this hysterical post-Hitler/post-holocaust phenomenon of collective guilt and ethnomasochism. Of course, instead of evolving into morally pristine humanist heroes, these student activists essentially became perennial children who denied themselves of adulthood and maturity, with their activism being a mere pathetic substitute for a real life that involves marriage, children, and a fruitful career. As Sanders-Brahms would demonstrate with her most popular film, Germany, Pale Mother (1980) aka Deutschland, bleiche Mutter, which is highly autobiographical in nature (the director even cast her own daughter to play herself as a baby), she seemed to have not completely forgiven her father for how he treated her mother, hence the director's unsurprising adoption of a feminism Weltanschauung. Ironically, at the same time, as Under the Pavement Lies the Strand, as well as Heinrich, Germany, Pale Mother, My Heart is Mine Alone, and Geliebte Clara (2008) aka Beloved Clara demonstrate, Sanders-Brahms seemed to have a strange empathy and attraction to weak and mentally disturbed men, so I would argue that her feminism was less a result of feminist brainwashing than her natural reaction to being a truly strong and independent woman who was attracted to weak men, hence her respect for Riefenstahl (who, when she was 60 years old, started a lifelong romance with her cameraman Horst Kettner, who was 40 years her junior!). Indeed, very rarely do women make good filmmakers and the only thing most women have to do to get critical appraisal is simply directing a film, no matter how horrendous it is, and they will touted around as geniuses and the most important voices of their generation. While one can argue that most of Sanders-Brahms' work has some feminist themes, she never followed any sort of artistically-stifling misandrist dogma and was not afraid to branch out by making period pieces about gay proto-fascist poets and rather dark semi-surreal work like No Mercy, No Future that somewhat grotesquely depicts literal and figurative schizophrenia in post-WWII Berlin. Although the director's first and most innately feminist-themed work, Under the Pavement Lies the Strand proves that Sanders-Brahms was first and foremost a serious filmmaker who had a rather idiosyncratic obsession with idiosyncratic men who seemed less masculine-minded than she was. Indeed, when the great Austrian philosopher Otto Weininger wrote in his masterpiece Sex and Character (1903) aka Geschlecht und Charakter that there was a small percentage of the female population that had what it took to be truly emancipated in society despite their gender, he was speaking of women like Helma Sanders-Brahms. Arguably the greatest 'Trauerarbeit' (aka "working of mourning") film ever made about the Teutonic student movement of 1968, Under the Pavement Lies the Strand reveals in an understated and totally serious fashion that melancholy did not die with the Hitler generation, but was passed on to the subsequent generation, who quite arguably found it harder to cope with German history than their parents who had actually lived through it.

GERMANY, PALE MOTHER

Helma Sanders-Brahms (1980)

If a kraut feminist were to remake Rainer Werner Fassbinder's masterpiece The Marriage of Maria Braun (1978) and, in the process, suck out all the lifeblood, charismatic character, and entertainment value, and replace it with highly personal resentment of males, it would probably resemble the West German film Germany, Pale Mother (1980) aka Deutschland bleiche Mutter written and directed by Helma Sanders-Brahms (Laputa, My Heart Is Mine Alone) – a woman who apparently learned the trick of the cinematic trade by training under Italian maestros Sergio Corbucci (Django, The Great Silence) and Pier Paolo Pasolini (Accattone, Salo, or the 120 Days of Sodom). Unfortunately, it seems that neither of these delightful dago directors' cinematic genius left any impression on Sanders-Brahms, but she did develop into her own individualistic 'auteur' herself and her fiercely feminist, albeit highly personalized, flick Germany, Pale Mother – a work that blames the sons and fathers of the Fatherland for physically and psychologically degrading the female population – is a vaguely audacious semi-fiction/semi-autobiographical work about the director's personal family experience during and immediately following the Second World War. Although originally made under the working title "For Lene" (in tribute to her own mother), Sanders-Brahms ultimately decided to the title the film Germany, Pale Mother after the kraut communist playwright/poet Bertolt Brecht's 1933 poem of the same name, an allegorical work that essentially holds National Socialists (the "sons") males wholly responsible for the corruption and debasement of Germany via Nazi terror. Somehow transsexualizing the Fatherland into a figurative "Motherland," Germany, Pale Mother holds the 'Nazi father' responsible for the dastardly degradation of the German woman and the German nation in a manner Sanders-Brahms described as follows, "I am telling my parents' story because I am familiar with it, because it affects me deeply...and because this story is both individual and collective." And, indeed, the ambivalent-Aryan auteuress, while incorporating sensational fictional elements, uses Germany, Pale Mother to depict the mostly melancholy story of her parents' early marriage, as well as the her war torn coming-of-age as a child who was literally brought up amongst debris and family depression and where Weltschmerz is passed internally via family as a result of Germany's apocalyptic defeat during the Second World War and how such physical destruction sired familial destruction. Using her own 2-year-old daughter to play herself as a young child, Sanders-Brahms stated, "I am the daughter of my mother and the mother of my daughter," thus placing the after-effects of the war on three generations of German women from the same family. Although a fatalistic feminist feature of the exceedingly vagina panegyriizing variety, Germany, Pale Mother is one of the first German World War II films to focus on more than the stereotypical Allied version of history, which was Sanders-Brahms' main objective and why she dedicated the film to her daughter because, as she told a French interviewer, she wanted her child to know that the era was more than just Hitler, concentration camps, and battles.

During the very beginning of Germany, Pale Mother, Helma Sanders-Brahms attempts to absolve herself of any guilt relating to her dysfunctional family and the infamous legacy of the Third Reich with the following off-screen narration: "I can't remember anything of the time before my life. I am not guilty for what happened before I was born. I wasn't around then. It began when my father saw my mother for the first time." We also learn that the director's father Hans (played by Ernst Jacobi), "was not the Nazi. That was the other one, his friend," in an opening shot of the two sub-Nordic pals paddling in a boat. During this same scene, Hans spots a darkhaired woman named Lena (Fassbinder graduate Eva Mattes who looks more like Mongolia, Pale Mother) and seems to fall in love at first sight, but he also notices a dead black cat floating in the water, thereupon allegorically symbolizing the decidedly doomed nature of their future relationship. Needless to say, Hans and Lena have the good fortune of being married the day before World War II begins, so at least can delight in one special night together before hubby goes to fight in the Wehrmacht and be involved with killing Slavic women, one (also played by Mattes) of which bares a striking resemblance to his wife and could be her untermensch doppelgänger. As a man who refuses to take free condoms from the army because he "love his wife" and refuses to cheat on her, and is, in turn, made the butt of a joke by his comrades (who play a prank on the man by putting a pile of used rubbers lined up spelling out the word "love" on his bed), Hans is a super sensitive gentleman, so naturally he cries hysterically at the sight of the executed Lena look-a-like, thus ushering the slow but steady unhooking of his delicate mind. Meanwhile, Lena has a baby while bombs are dropping and soon her house is decimated and turned to rubble. Suffering from some sort of post-traumatic stress syndrome, Hans finally becomes convinced of the importance of the National Socialist cause and during a curiously cold temporary reunion with his wife, he declares to Lena that Germany must accept either "victory or destruction." Of course, the land of the Teutonic Knights is destroyed, but Lena manages to find childish adventure and romance amongst the rubble and forges a deep maternal bond with her baby daughter. When the war finally ends, the now-destitute family is finally permanently reunited, but a second war begins at the home because the head of the family is no longer right in the head as a virtual walking and talking totenkopf of the terribly traumatized type, belligerently beating his young daughter for calling him a "weirdo" and throwing his wife into a perennial depression. Naturally, the ultimate defeat for Hans is when precious Lena is gang raped by two drunken American G.I.s. As Lena tells her daughter after she witnesses the pudgy American victors' pillage her pussy, "That's the right of the victors, little girl. They take things and the women."

A Trümmerfrau turned diseased and suicidal alcoholic, Lena becomes a dubious archetype for all German women who survived and tried to thrive after the war, whereas the Father is a fallen family Führer that is no longer fit to rule, thus he lunges his failure and resentment at his family. Of course, unlike Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun, Germany, Pale Mother fails to acknowledge the fact that many German women earned a new sense of integrity and financial independence as a result of the Second World War and the virtual destruction of men which still lives on today, hence how a female filmmaker as artistically and intellectual vapid as Helma Sanders-Brahms, as well as fellow feminist German New Cinema directors like Margarethe von Trotta and Helke Sander, could have any influence on kraut kultur in the first place. Indeed, to describe Germany as a "pale mother" as opposed to the Fatherland that it always was before is the most obvious sign of the death of the German man. The most cowardly and misleading aspect of Germany, Pale Mother is that the film attempts to diminish total responsibility for women's role and support of the Third Reich, as if they were victims of the patriarch who in no way benefited from nor supported Uncle Adolf. When it comes down to it, women love winners and German men lost the war and acquired the burden of shame and defeat, and one can certainly assume had they won the war, the world would have never seen films like Germany, Pale Mother – a one-woman pity party that glorifies German gals at the expense of the guys who risked their lives and oftentimes died in Stalingrad, North Africa, and various foreign lands around the world, only to later have a stocky and boorish broad like Angela Merkel as the Chancellor of the Fatherland. Indeed, modern day Germany might be an effeminized and cosmopolitan place where women are purportedly taken seriously as artists, but it is awfully ironically that they have yet to produce a filmmaker as great as Leni Riefenstahl – a woman who apparently lived during a misogynistic time. But then again, as Germany, Pale Mother inadvertently demonstrates, female emancipation is always the result of male degeneration and decadence and not some imaginary sort of 'progress' and seeing as Riefenstahl was held to a higher standard, a male's standard, she was able to totally transcend the sort of narcissistic mediocrity that feminist filmmakers like Helma Sanders-Brahms wallow in, where everything that women are incapable of doing proficiently (i.e. waging war, conquering nations, displaying physical strength, philosophizing with a hammer, etc.) is portrayed as innately evil. Needless to say, the day Germany became mother was the beginning of the end for of the once great Germania.

NO MERCY, NO FUTURE

Helma Sanders-Brahms (1981)

At the beginning of her independently financed arthouse effort Die Berührte aka (1981) No Mercy, No Future, New German Cinema feminist auteur Helma Sanders-Brahms (Germany, Pale Mother, My Heart Is Mine Alone) provided the following disclaimer: "This film began with a letter: Make a film of my story! The woman who wrote it is regarded as schizophrenic. Today, she is almost cured, according to the doctors. The various film boards and TV channels... were not prepared to participate in this project. It was realized never the less... through the enthusiasm of those involved... and with the means at my disposal." Indeed, with the central protagonist of No Mercy, No Future, who is based on a real-life woman simply credited as "Rita G.," being a young and vulnerable nymphomaniac schizophrenic girl who swaps sexual secretions with random strangers of dubious motives, including old men, wheelchair-bound cripples, and Negroes and Arabs, because she firmly believes they embody Christ when she is not attempting to commit suicide in a variety of bloody and/or unflattering fashions, one can see why West German producers would be a bit hesitant about funding such a melancholy and even sometimes macabre melodrama. Rarely plodding and pedantic like the majority of Helma Sanders-Brahms' films yet just as challenging (if not more so), No Mercy, No Future also stands out among the filmmaker's oeuvre in that it is not a period piece nor biopic, but a work set in the present in a divided post-industrial Berlin that is a seemingly miserable and abhorrent bottomless abyss of alienation and societal capitulation where so-called foreign 'guest workers' feed on the putrefying corpse that is the Occident, national culture has become deracinated, and family ties are all but irreparably broken. Featuring music from kraut synth musician Harald Grosskopf, who has played with Wallenstein, Ash Ra Tempel, and Klaus Schulze, among others, No Mercy, No Future is a thematically and vaguely aesthetically audacious work where Sanders-Brahms actually confronts the cold Teutonic cadaver that is the German present, using a sad yet sickeningly sensual schizophrenic who, despite all the traumatic experiences in her life indicating the opposite, cannot help but fanatically believe that she is "God's favorite daughter," even if, as she so eloquently states, "We're all assholes." The innately delusional and deranged victim of pathetic men who have a weakness for taking sexual advantage of a girl who literally believes God is coming inside of her as they fiendish bust their unsavory load behind her maniac meat curtain, No Mercy, No Future is certainly a film where one is left with the impression that everyone is an asshole looking to invade the asshole of someone else.

Veronika Christoph (played by Sanders-Brahms' regular Elisabeth Stepanek, who looks like a Slav and has a Slavic name) has some serious problems and it is not just due to the fact that she is emotionally and mentally schizophrenic, but also due to the unfortunate fact that people, especially weak and pathetic individuals, regularly take advantage of her due to her mental incompetency and general passivity. Early on in No Mercy, No Future, Veronika assumedly loses her virginity (her thigh is covered in blood) after a sleazy middle-aged office worker type quasi-rapes her and, being a passive and compliant individual who is totally ignorant to the unsavory intentions of others, she accepts the feebly executed attack of forced entry without much of a real fight. After she realizes she has been irrevocably deflowered, Veronika cries out, "Christ, my Lord!" repeatedly in a hysterical manner as her perverted anti-playboy of a predator makes a rather pathetic attempt at apologizing, stating in a less than sincere manner, "There's nothing wrong. It's not so bad... You're a woman... I can't undo what's been done. I'm so sorry, but it's happened now." And, indeed, the rapist could not have said truer words as Veronika is forever changed and comes under the spell of her own cognitive dissonance as a disturbed woman obsessed with Christian iconography who now sees Christ in every creepy man who wants to get in the virtual paradise on earth that is in her panties. The prodigal daughter of socially proper and emotionally sterile wealthy parents, including an elderly father with a complete and utter lack of testicular fortitude, Veronika's guardians see it fit to help their damaged daughter by having her routinely institutionalized after a number of suicide attempts, including laying naked outside in the snow so as the freeze to death and slitting her wrists. When not strapped down to a hospital bed, Veronika attempts to seek solace by sharing her paltry but developing carnal knowledge with a variety of pathetic men, including an old magician who is depressed about giving his last performances that she attempts to 'cheer up,' a physically repulsive Tunisian gentleman with a Jewtastic afro, a spastic paraplegic, and an obese sub-Saharan African. Veronika also briefly joins an anti-individualistic cult called "Children of God" run by a messianic megalomaniac that, like any wack-job pseudo-religious order, attempts to force its members to abandon their families, but her stint with the deranged group does not last long, even if she goes into a transcendental trance-like state during one of their group rituals. Veronika also becomes pregnant by one of the number of men who have taken advantage of her neurotic nymphomaniac tendencies and she pays tribute to her beloved God by having an abortion. Not long after murdering the child in her womb, Veronika meets a chubby and effeminate man from Ghana named Demba (Jorge Reis) that looks like a rather repellant cross between Jesse Jackson and Ron Jeremy. Despite the fact that she could become infertile if she engages in sex immediately following her abortion, Veronika decides to have the old in-and-out with Demba after he pathetically complains that he has not been laid in over 18 months, thus resulting in a bloody and grotesque mess of miscegenation that thankfully does not sire any children. Veronika and Demba attempt to get married on a whim, but the little loony lady is stopped by her father, who pays off the poor and treacherous African and has his daughter once again committed to a mental institution, where she is strapped to a bed so she can no longer hurt herself. In the end, an imaginary crucifix burns brightly behind the bedpost of Veronika's bed in the mental institution.

Despite featuring superlatively sordid and sickening scenes of Islamic ritual slaughter, joyless sex involving hymen-broken hemoglobin and gorey post-abortion jungle fever, passionate spiritual insanity, and the slow but steady mental deterioration and sexual abuse of a tragic young woman with a complete and utter estrangement from the real world, No Mercy, No Future is indubitably director Helma Sanders-Brahms' most enthralling and penetrating film and probably the only work by the German arthouse auteur that is accessible to people other than frigid and fuming feminists suffering from psychosis and leftists who hate life and love banalistic 'new left' films celebrating illegal aliens, Marxist terrorists, and other 'marginal' works. Of course, Helma Sanders-Brahms portrays religiousness, especially of the Roman Catholic persuasion, as a sign of mental illness and perturbing pathology, not to mention the fact that No Mercy, No Future portrays the bourgeois and men in general as the harbingers of mental illness, thus it would be a lie to say the film does not have themes and sociopolitical undertones that are similar to the director's other films. Exploring the themes of hysterical female mental illness and German-Ausländer relations that were typical of Rainer Werner Fassbinder films, including the Sirkian melodramas Martha (1974), Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974), and Fear of Fear (1975), as well as the surrealist and heretical Catholic iconography of Werner Schroeter, Helma Sanders-Brahms ultimately takes its aesthetically salacious and sadistic subject matter to more grotesque and unsettling themes, thus anticipating Lars von Trier's Antichrist (2009). Like anti-hero Hazel Motes from Wise Blood (1979) directed by John Huston, Veronika of No Mercy, No Future develops a sort of spiritual asceticism out of necessity due to her overwhelming inner pain, Weltschmerz, and abject isolation from the outside world. With all the bat-shit crazy white broads in the West, who now recklessly and nonsensically engage in miscegenation, not thinking twice about the fact that their baby, like the president of the United States, will more than likely be born a double bastard, one could argue that the Occident and its colonies are now suffering from collective schizophrenia, as the sort of self-destructive behavior displayed by the race-mixing protagonist of No Mercy, No Future certainly seems to be becoming the norm, albeit in a slightly less melodramatic and Catholic fashion. Paradoxically, it was the Frankfurt school fetishizing 'new left' types like Helma Sanders-Brahms and their pathological ethno-masochism that led to such a spiritually and culturally mongrelized world, but I am sure she sees her film No Mercy, No Future as another xenophiliac tale about a "strong woman" who has suffered immensely under the misogyny of wicked Aryan men.

MY HEART IS MINE ALONE

Helma Sanders-Brahms (1997)

As far as I am concerned, the blacklisting of countless artists, poets, painters, philosophers, and other cultural creators due to their political allegiances was one of the most disastrously deleterious effects for Germany after the Second World War, especially considering many of these important individuals were either fundamentally in contradiction with National Socialist ideology and/or they would later change their political persuasion, and German expressionist poet Gottfried Benn – a nationalistic libertine of sorts who later wavered in his support of Nazism after the fratricidal Night of the Long Knives – was certainly a incidental victim of such cultural barbarism, despite the fact he was essentially an introverted nihilist who, as a physician of medicine, was plagued by the biologically macabre and, even more curiously, bedded an aged Jewess – the Zionist poetess Else Lasker-Schüler who would be one of the first high-profile Jews to be buried in the Jewish Holy Land. Luckily, Benn's pleasantly perverse poetry and 'infamy by association' has been semi-immortalized by kraut feminist auteur Helma Sanders-Brahms (Heinrich, Germany, Pale Mother) of all people, who depicted his discordant life, poetry, and relationship with Lasker-Schüler via her audacious arthouse effort My Heart Is Mine Alone (1997) aka Mein Herz - Niemandem! – a surprisingly objective cinematic work that manages to depict the once close but ultimately tragic relationship between Germans and Jews via two subversive poet lovers who also happened to be ideological and racial enemies. Like the bisexual-nudist-Satanist-drug-addict author Hanns Heinz Ewers – a rather eccentric and excess-ridden mensch who, on top of having Jewesses as lovers, considered both Germans and Jews to be two equal master races – Gottfried Benn ultimately faced persecution from his National Socialist compatriots and his expressionist poetry was even described as “degenerate, Jewish, and homosexual” in the May 1936 issue of the SS magazine Das Schwarze Korps. A physician by profession, Benn, not unlike German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's father, treated prostitutes and was a venereal disease specialist, so he was quite familiar with the more unflattering aspects of man and his putrid flesh, which would ultimately find expression in his poetry, with his lover Lasker-Schüler once describing his strangely seductive, if not sweetly sickening, style as follows: “Every line a leopard's bite.” As factually depicted in Sanders-Brahms's My Heart Is Mine Alone, Lasker-Schüler bequeathed Benn with the curious pet names “Giselher,” “The Nibelung,” and “Barbarian,” which are more than apt titles for a jaded Jewess to bestow upon her Germanic goy toy, yet quite ironically, as the film also demonstrates, the naughty National Socialist scribbler found a greater kindred spirit in a radical racial alien than his own Aryan kinsmen. In the end, Lasker-Schüler died in Jerusalem during the final year of the Second World War and Benn would live on to see his poetry banned by both the Nazis and the Allies, as well as the suicide of his young Aryan wife, thus proving that loves does not always conquer all, even if remnants of the two ill-fated lovers' romance survive today in the form of their mutual romantic poetry.

Told through the narration of both poets' actual poetry, intentionally theatrical and expressionistic tableaux, and vintage stock and documentary footage, My Heart Is Mine Alone is a postmodern celluloid collage that depicts the complexity and subjectivity of history via a love affair destroyed by bad timing and circumstance. Beginning with their radically different childhoods, with Else Lasker-Schüler growing up in a consciously Jewish family with a brother who is adamant about assimilating into a Christian and Gottfried Benn growing up as the son of a Protestant pastor/scholar who taught noblemen and put a premium on Germanic blood and brother loyalty, My Heart Is Mine Alone establishes early on that it is rather remarkable that the poet lovers would ever go on to develop such a deep love and understanding for one another in terms of both aesthetic and emotional kindredness. As Lasker-Schüler's mother tells her brother Paul (Leonard Schnitman), who wants to convert to Christianity, "You can't shed your Jewish faith as if it were skin... You were born with it. You are circumcised." Paul believes that the anti-Jewishness of Christians no longer exists, stating, "That was in an age of darkness. We are now safe and secure," but little does he realize that in the modern world, race trumps spirituality among new age anti-Semites, or to quote proto-Zionist communist Jew Moses Hess, "Even an act of conversion cannot relieve the Jew of the enormous pressure of German anti-Semitism. The Germans hate the religion of the Jews less than they hate their race - they hate the peculiar faith of the Jews, less than their peculiar noses." Despite being an apparently true blue Aryan by the grace of Odin, Gottfried Benn (played by Cornelius Obonya) is libelously attacked for the supposed 'Jewishness' of his poetry, with his medical professor even stating, "The newspapers praise you as an infernal snob, a rugged roué, a Jewish half-breed." While Benn states, "I swear to my professor, I have no drop of Jewish blood in me," his teacher certainly has a point when he adds, "You see that as an advantage. Then you and those coffee-house poets must be kindred spirits. They're exhibiting those daubs now, those colored animals... The rabbis with the crooked noses." Of course, as My Heart Is Mine Alone progresses, it is revealed that unfounded rumors of Jewish blood will continue to haunt Benn for the rest of his life, with one rival poet even falsely claiming his surname ("Ben" apparently means "son" in Hebrew) was of Jewish origin, but as he once wrote himself in his autobiographical essay The Way of an Intellectualist (1934) regarding the apparently Wend origin of his name and his mother's Swiss Calvinist bloodline, "So, what happened was mixture, not miscegenation, producing crossbreeds, not mongrels, and in any case it was an Aryan mixture..." Unfortunately for Else Lasker-Schüler, her bloodlines were not as strictly Aryan in origin.

As quasi-expressionistically depicted in My Heart Is Mine Alone, Gottfried Benn and Else Lasker-Schüler were to fall in love at the “Café Megalomania” – a place in Berlin where literary outlaws traded verses and sins of the flesh. Lasker-Schüler (played by Lena Stolze of Michael Verhoeven’s The White Roses (1982) and The Dirty Girl (1990)) was the ‘high priestess’ of the café, but her beau Benn described her as a “Queen of the Night,” and, indeed, in My Heart Is Mine Alone, she certainly rules over her male counterparts with a hyper-horny Hebraic fist. Nearly two decades older than her lover, Lasker-Schüler was essentially to Benn what Lou Andreas-Salomé was to Bohemian poet Rainer Maria Rilke and like the famous white Russian muse, the Jewish poetess had been with a number of men before her little Nazi poet and suffered much heart break during her life, including the death of her son in 1927, which led to a deep depression that she would arguably never recover from. Indeed, until the rise of National Socialism, Benn acted as one of Lasker-Schüler’s greatest sources of solace, thus the German poet’s political proclivities came as a major blow to her. While Benn’s ‘static’ poetry was promoted by mostly leftist subversive types who were often of Jewish blood, and he apparently engaged in homosexuality, he still promoted the Reich, even with his romance with Lasker-Schüler being one of the most passionate points in his life up until that point. When Lasker-Schüler, who won the prestigious Kleist Prize in 1932, learns of Benn’s support of National Socialism she is terribly shocked. He also ends up marrying a Wehrmacht typist and attempts to live the stoic life of a good German while Lasker-Schüler hightails it to the Jewish Holy Land. Sanders-Brahms concludes My Heart Is Mine Alone with the ghost of Lasker-Schüler laying next to Benn staring into a mirror in a somnambulist state that is clearly a tribute to the iconic scene of Jean Marais doing the same in Orpheus (1950) aka Orphée directed by Jean Cocteau. Lasker-Schüler leaves her lover with the following words, “They dug up my bones to build a freeway to Jaffa... So the oranges will reach the sea much faster. Now I have a grave in the sky above the holy city... and all the way to you.” For a Helma Sanders-Brahms film, My Heart is Mine Alone undoubtedly ends on a ‘positive’ note, especially when considering Benn’s personal struggle after Lasker-Schüler and the conclusion of the Second World War.

Despite what Helma Sanders-Brahms may have portrayed of his miscegenation-based love life in My Heart Is Mine Alone, Gottfried Benn himself regarded the period in 1943 he spent in Landsberg (now Gorzow in Poland) with his young typist wife after his area of Berlin was evacuated as the greatest period of his life, writing, “these eighteen months were the quietest and happiest in my life.” Of course, Benn’s wartime ecstasy was short lived because by the end of the War, he was in Soviet occupied area and his wife, who he had sent away to spare her from the Russian hordes, had committed suicide. As Benn told his friends in 1947, “Though I think every day of my wife and her pitiful end, I just got married again.” Possibly thinking of his romantic past with Else Lasker-Schüler,

MY HEART IS MINE ALONE

the Wend-descended widow wrote a friend regarding his new wife – a dentist who was only 34 years old (while he was 61) at the time of their marriage – that, “She is sorry she isn’t non-Aryan; it was always her dream, and to her patients she brazenly pretends to be Jewish. She regards that as a distinction...” Indeed, Benn may have fornicated with Jewesses and homos, but his pride never waned, writing, “I will not have myself de-nazified.” To a somewhat ‘noble’ extent, Sanders-Brahms de-nazified Gottfried Ben via My Heart Is Mine Alone to a degree as a man who was more than a just a born-again Aryan, but it seems the reality of the two poets’ relationship was more one-sided than as portrayed in the film, as if the director personalized the film in a romantic manner, thus living vicariously through the life of a Jewess as an ethno-masochistic kraut feminist who has the incapacity to put her herself in the unkosher shoes of an Aryan artist (like Leni Riefenstahl) of the same era.

While probably not her greatest film, My Heart Is Mine Alone is indubitably my favorite Sanders-Brahms flick and for a number of reasons, including the director’s relatively objective portrayal of Gottfried Benn (thankfully, she refrains from depicting him as a one-dimensional ‘nazi semen demon’) and her aesthetic choices, as the film seems to be a Teutonized, albeit feminized, take on what Paul Schrader attempted with Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985) in its aesthetically eclectic pomo collage approach and utilization of the subject’s own written words, albeit executed in a more minimalistic and avant-garde manner. Combining expressionist tableaux, an improvised experimental score, authentic stock footage, and readings of Benn and Lasker-Schüler’s own poetry, My Heart Is Mine Alone is as good as ‘biopics’ get, especially in regard to depicting the seemingly inexplicable and irreconcilable – a lurid yet aesthetically fruitful romance between a tragic Zionist Jewess with a highly conscious sense of Judaism and a naughty National Socialist degenerate of a similarly tragic background who enjoyed a curious cocktail of morphine, men, and mystical Jewish poetesses.

2ND WAR HATS

Henri Plaat (1986)

Not unlike Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Pentimento) and to a lesser extent his student Paul de Nooijer (N.E.W.S., Nobody Had Informed Me), albeit in his own particularly idiosyncratic way, Dutch experimental auteur filmmaker Henri Plaat (I Am an Old Smoking, Moving Indian Movie Star, Postcards) seems to be totally cut off from any sort of film movement, style or trend, even in his homeland of the Netherlands, to the point where he is not even mentioned in Amos Vogel's relatively authoritative cineaste text Film as a Subversive Art (1974). In a sense, also not unlike Zwartjes and de Nooijer, Plaat is the ultimate auteur as the idea of a film crew is completely alien to him as he is the sole person that works on his films, which he shoots on his various handheld 8mm and 16mm cameras that he has acquired from around the world. Indeed, most of Plaat's films, which oftentimes transcend the usually fine line between documentary and absurdism, were shot in various third world shitholes, with the director oftentimes hiding the fact he was filming members of the indigenous population. An eclectic artist who works in various mediums, especially painting and watercolors, Plaat first received a Eumig-camera in 1966 and would ultimately describe his experimental cinematic art as nothing more than, "an exploded hobby," yet he has managed to assemble a totally singular oeuvre with a distinct cinematic language that seems foreign to every except the director himself. The first film I saw by Plaat was Fragments of Decay (1983) and it amazed me how Plaat was able to make such things as a dirty rotten dog corpse, a recently dug grave, a retarded Greek boy, and a mostly skeletal horse corpse in a Turkish river, among other various morbid and grotesque things, seem quite magical and beautiful. As Plaat remarked regarding his own work in the documentary Cadavre Exquis: On Dutch Experimental Filmmaking (2004) directed by Anna Abrahams, "They are films that perhaps...have more to do with a dream world. Sometimes they tend to lean towards surrealism. But they always start out from reality." Undoubtedly, out of all of Plaat's films, the most overtly oneiric, absurd, arcane, and just plain bizarre is the mere 3-minute short 2nd War Hats (1986), which was made in collaboration with the filmmaker's artist friend Theo Jeuken and is indubitably the director's closet and most flagrant attempt at making a high-camp work. A 'war film' in sort of the same sense that Werner Schroeter's compulsively campy tragicomedy Der Bomberpilot (1970) is a war film, Plaat's perversely playful piece features a cameo from the director in quasi-drag and turns World War II into an absurd fashion show where Nazi officers burn, drag queens vainly show off their latest vulgar hats while sporting equally goofy smiles, and a Slavic city is reduced to smoldering rubble. One of the director's few films that has actually been recognized in any way as the winner of the 1989 L.J. Jordaan Prize, 2nd War Hats is ultimately a wonderfully ridiculous remainder of how unforgettably potent short films can be, as sort of celluloid bombs that, although brief, have lasting effects on the mind of the viewer that long and plodding feature-length works with linear narratives oftentimes lack. Not unlike with Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou (1929) aka An Andalusian Dog and the shorts of Zwartjes, Gregory J. Markopoulos, Kenneth Anger, and James Broughton, I could probably watch Plaat's micro-epic thousands of times and it still would not lose its impact. Indeed, like the greatest of short films, 2nd War Hats is a virtual celluloid dream that was generously shared with us by its dreamer, who certainly demonstrates that, like most things in life, some dreams are greater than others.

Although opening with the inter-title, "Somewhere in a bombed city...", 2nd War Hats is set in Warsaw, Poland where the apocalyptic destruction of the metropolis is ultimately trumped by the aesthetic majesty of fiercely flamboyant headwear that is modeled quasi-shemales who don't seem to realize that the most deleterious war in human history is going on despite all the ashes falling from the sky and covering their oh-so fancy 'diva' hats. As if symbolic of the fact that fashions are 'rooted' in cities, virtually all of the people featured in the film are imprisoned in the ground, with only their hat-covered heads poking out of the seemingly smoldering asphalt. In between featuring shots of various sexually dubious models modeling off their hyper hokey and all-around aesthetically repugnant hats, a collage featuring the portraits of dozens upon dozens of German Wehrmacht and Luftwaffe officers burns to the point where only a couple of the men's photos are not reduced to ash. Ultimately, this naughty Nazi collage seems to not only be symbolic of the destruction that the German military brought to Warsaw, but also Germany itself. Notably, one of the models sports a red 'phallic' hat that has a banana sticking out of the end of it. Later in the short, another model takes the banana in their mouth as if they are literally hungry for cock. Eventually, the model with the banana hat goes underground and a model with a silver bullet-like hat appears from the ground, though their head is protected by glass. Meanwhile, sullen hat-less women become quite happy after hats magically fly onto their heads, as if to reflect the rejuvenation of the city after the war. During the final scene of the short in a scenario that seems symbolic of the post-WWII butchering of Europe into the rivaling Americanized liberal capitalist west and enslaved Soviet communist East, a fence featuring a sign of a typical 1950s America advertisement model drinking a bottle of Coca-Cola on it appears. If one thing is quite apparent by the conclusion of 2nd War Hats, it is that both war and fashion are rather whimsical phenomena that ultimately end with the destruction and replacement of the previous social model. Of course, the National Socialists were indubitably the kings of both war and fashion and those that replaced them were surely innately inferior, especially in terms of aesthetics.

While I can only guess auteur Plaat's intent with the short, 2nd War Hats seems to be an allegory for the 'changing fashions' that occur as a result of war, especially the Second World War, which destroyed Europe's control over the world as a whole and split the continent into two opposing, albeit if not similarly materialistic and anti-cultural, entities that were controlled by largely alien elements that hardly had Faustian man's best interests in mind. Notably, about 85% of the buildings in Warsaw were destroyed during WWII, thus the city surely made an apt, if not initially seemingly strange, choice for the subject of Plaat's film. Why Plaat did not use the Dutch city of Rotterdam, which was also all but completely destroyed as a result of German bombing, instead of Warsaw is questionable considering the filmmaker is Dutch and all, but I am glad he did because it allows the film to be interpreted in a different way. Indeed, due to the fact that it has survived various wars and catastrophes throughout the centuries, Warsaw has earned the nickname of 'phoenix city,' thus 2nd War Hats adds more credence to my theory that the film is an allegory for the perennial changing essence of not just Warsaw and other cities, but humanity in general. Whatever Plaat's intent with the film might have been, there is no denying that it is a strangely potent and insanely idiosyncratically jovial work that manages to reduce one of the most apocalyptic and culturally deleterious events in human history into the world's most aesthetically absurd, patently pointless, and pathetically pretentious fashion show, with the unequivocal best dressers—the Nazis—being figuratively burned alive and turned into a representation of 'hardcore fashion' and, in turn, total evil. As indicated by the fact that both a SS officer and a photograph of Adolf Hitler appear in his later film A Fleeting Dream (2004), it seems that Plaat, not unlike many Dutchman of his generation, was haunted by the ghosts of the Second World War, which the Netherlands has arguably never fully recovered from (on top of the trauma and devastation that the Dutch people suffered as a result of the war, they still suffer from a sort of undying collective guilt as a result of what happened to the Jews of their country). Notably, Plaat stated in the doc Cadavre Exquis regarding his experimental documentaries, "I traveled extensively in South America. Maybe four or five times. The first time I went there...the front pages were always filled with horrible accidents...heads cut off, people hauled from graves...by the police. I felt that it was part of that world. That cruel absurdity." Of course, there was no greater "cruel absurdity" than the Second World War and that is made abundantly clear in 2nd War Hats, which is arguably the most inexplicably wayward and eccentrically esoteric WWII flick ever made. Indeed, in its own patently peculiar and absurdly awe-inspiring way, Plaat's short says more about WWII and its aftermath than classic Dutch war flicks like Paul Verhoeven's Soldaat van Oranje (1977) aka Soldier of Orange and Fons Rademakers' De aanslag (1986) aka The Assault ever could.

THE WILD DUCK

Henri Safran (1984)

Before overdosing on barbiturates at the pretty premature age of 40, American actress Jean Seberg (Breathless, Airport) would come full circle with her acting by concluding it the same way she started by appearing in an adaptation of a classic play. Indeed, beginning her career in the eponymous lead role of Saint Joan (1957), which was a British-American adaptation of the 1924 George Bernard Shaw play of the same name directed by Otto Preminger, and concluding her career with Die Wildente (1976) aka The Wild Duck, which is an adaptation of the 1884 Henrik Ibsen play of the same name directed by underrated German auteur Hans W. Geißendörfer (Jonathan, Die gläserne Zelle aka The Glass Cell), Seberg certainly demonstrates a proclivity towards playing tragic characters. Unfortunately, in her cinematic swansong The Wild Duck, Seberg was upstaged by a little girl and a morbidly obese Austrian queer named Peter Kern in a film that is easily one of the greatest and most underrated films based on a play by the Norwegian 'Father of Modern Drama.' Like with her debut acting performance in Saint Joan, film critics criticized the director for (mis)casting Seberg, with Films and Filming going so far as describing the actress as the virtual Achilles Heel of The Wild Duck, writing, "The director makes a few minor errors of judgement, including the uneasy stylization of the scene in the loft, and his admiration for Jean Seberg results in the film's single miscasting... The other players are admirable." In general, The Wild Duck was met with wide critical acclaim, with The New Yorker writing, "Geißendörfer has just made one of the best film transcriptions of this play... The film is astutely acted, especially by Kern," and The Los Angeles Times, writing, "...splendid film...By concentrating on his people and resisting all trite devices used by film makers to 'open up' a play on the screen, Geissendoerfer has succeeded in making THE WILD DUCK a genuine movie and not just a filmed play." Indeed, Geißendörfer even managed to show up the Teutonic master of melodrama Rainer Werner Fassbinder, who adapted Ibsen's A Doll's House (1879) as a BBC-esque television play under the title Nora Helmer (1974), with The Wild Duck. Made at a time when Seberg, who despite having a perverse proclivity towards brown and Jewish men, apparently felt "much too European" (her words), The Wild Duck is nothing short of a lost minor masterpiece that is quite fittingly just as tragic as the forsaken American actress who starred in it. A pathologically claustrophobic chamber piece of unrelenting weltschmerz that opts for shedding virtually all of the comedy of Ibsen's tragicomedy (though any film feature Kern is in is bound to have some hum, The Wild Duck is a statically directed yet innately intense work about skeletons in family closets and the failure of cold intellectual idealism in an emotion-driven world of irrationality and unpredictability.

Professional photographer Hjalmar Ekdal (Peter Kern) is the married father of an inquisitive 11-year-old daughter named Hedwig (Anne Bennet, the sister of David Bennet of The Tin Drum fame) and a beautiful blonde wife named Gina (Jean Seberg), yet he is always depressed and scolds his daughter for awakening him while he is 'working.' Hjalmar uses Hedwig's poor vision as a ridiculous reason to keep his daughter out of school and while the father promised he would teach her himself, he is far too lazy to put forth such effort. One day, daughter Hedwig brings Hjalmar a telegram from his estranged friend Gregers Werle (Bruno Ganz) inviting him to a party hosted by his father Consul Werle (Heinz Moog, who appeared in the Luchino Visconti films Senso (1954) and Ludwig (1972)). Gregers hates his father and has been in self-imposed exile for some time and at the party he learns some family secrets from Hjalmar that will make him even more of a hateful prodigal son. Upon learning that his father paid for Hjalmar to learn the photography trade and hooked up his friend with Gina, he decides to seek revenge against his father. Gina was previously a maid for the Werles who had an affair with the Consul who, to Gregers' Chagrin, cheated on his belated wife. Needless to say, Gina got pregnant and Consul Werle got the wise idea to pawn his mistress off to Hjalmar, who has no idea that Hedwig is not really his biological daughter. In fact, Hedwig is Greger's bastard half-sister. On top of that, Consul Werle and Hjalmar's Father (Martin Flörchinger), who was an officer and renowned hunter, were business partners and the latter went to jail over purportedly building on federal forests. Seeing his father as a cunning criminal who gets away with the most degenerate of deceptions, Gregers comes up with the self-absorbed quixotic plan to let Hjalmar know that his marriage is a sham and that his dear Hedwig is not really his daughter.

After moving in to the Ekdals' large home, which has a built-in photo studio, Gregers cannot help but look in disgust at what he sees as a counterfeit family sown in lies and sin. In the attic of the Ekdal home is a sort of makeshift 'forest' full of animals, including rabbits that Grandfather Ekdal and Hjalmar 'hunt', as well as a wild duck. Saved from the teeth of Consul Werle's dog, Hedwig nursed the wild duck and, aside from her mother and father, it is what she loves most. Gregers also discovers that Hjalmar has big plans to invest something so as to clear the family name and to restore his father's once-dignified reputation. Of course, Gregers, who proclaims to want to save his friend from a "web of lies," crushes Hjalmar after revealing to him that his wife was Consul Werle's lover and that his daughter is probably not his. Ultimately, Gregers aggressively approached Hjalmar's doctor friend Dr. Relling (Heinz Bennet, the father of Anne Bennet and star of Andrzej Zulawski's Possession (1981)), who reveals that he put the idea into Hjalmar's head to create an invention, so as to give some power to the fat man so he would have something to live for. For Hedwig's birthday, Consul Werle, who is getting married to his housekeeper Frau Sörby (Sonja Sutter), gives the little girl a trust fund, which confirms to Hjalmar that his daughter is not really his daughter. Hjalmar decides he no longer wants anything that was 'given to him' by Consul Werle, including the wild duck, which rather depresses Hedwig. Meanwhile, little Hedwig somehow manages to speculate that her father has found out she is not his biological daughter. A hopeless idealist, Gregers put the moronic idea in Hedwig's head that she should commit a 'child sacrifice' and kill her pet duck in a declaration of her love to her father. In the end, the 11-year-old instead opts for killing herself instead by putting a revolver to her chest in a rather symbolic act of self-slaughter. Despite everything, Gregers is as idealistic as ever, proclaiming regarding Hedwig's death, "The pain is making him great and noble," but Dr. Relling smashes his idealism by stating, "That's the way it is with most people when they are with a dead body. How long do you think that will last with him? In one year, little Hedwig will be nothing to him but a pleasant opportunity to hold forth about her in moving phrases. You'll hear him lamenting about the child taken too soon from her father. You'll see how he pickles himself in sentiment and self-pity."

In its decidedly disconcerting depiction of a loving and sensitive young girl being driven to suicide, The Wild Duck makes for a rather fitting way for Jean Seberg to conclude her career, as she, like little Hedwig, came from a seemingly wholesome Nordic American Lutheran middle-class background but ultimately gave in to self-slaughter (although evidence indicates she may have been murdered) after too much emotional distress. Of course, in terms of her naïve idealism as a supporter of the Black Panther Party and marriage to a sleazy Yiddish scumbag hack filmmaker like Dennis Berry, Seberg had a lot of common with Gregers, as if were not for her ethno-masochistic political activism, which resulted in her being a target of the FBI COINTELPRO project, she probably would not have went down the quite 'dark' road she did. Undoubtedly, in The Wild Duck, Seberg looks rather used-up and hopelessly melancholy, as if she is trapped in some sort of metaphysical hell, which she most certainly was. Assumedly blacklisted from Hollywood, Seberg seems to have been planning to become a full-time arthouse superstar, which is indicated by her reasons for starring in The Wild Duck: "Hans Geißendörfer came to me in Paris and told me about his plan to film THE WILD DUCK. He spoke about his work with such passion and commitment that I was immediately won over for this project. I hadn't even seen the earlier movies of Geißendörfer before I accepted the role. I don't need to, I'm not much concerned about what a director had done previously: I decided to participate if I have a good feeling and a good impression of the director, and if the things he has told me about his movie have convinced me. I have been making movies for twenty years now, and yet only worked three or four times with people who loved their work and took it seriously. Today I would rather not work at all than be involved with something I don't believe in."

As for Peter Kern, he gave one of his greatest and most unflatteringly sensitive performances in The Wild Duck. Indeed, aside from Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid's high-camp masterpiece La Paloma (1974), nowhere else does Kern give the sort of elegantly pathetic performance that he did in Geißendörfer's masterpiece. While Bruno Ganz is also memorable as the disgruntled idealist, the second best performance in The Wild Duck is most certainly given by little Anne Bennent in what is easily one of the most heartbreaking child roles in cinema history. In fact, director Hans W. Geißendörfer would go on to say, "Anne Bennent is Hedwig," thus demonstrating her imperative role The Wild Duck, which could have easily been laughable had it been performed by a less talented actress. While I have yet to check out his entire oeuvre, Geißendörfer is certainly one of the most overlooked filmmakers of German New Cinema, as a sort of 'Bavarian Volker Schlöndorff', albeit much darker and more soulful. Indeed, only in his more recent Nordic masterpiece Schneeland (2005) aka Snowland would Geißendörfer rouse family skeletons in closets to a more unsettling degree.

THE BELIEVER

Henry Bean (2001)

In terms of the most damning films about Jews and Judaism, I believe it was not the National Socialists nor Islamists who were responsible for greatest and most provocative celluloid examinations of the Jewish question, but cinematic works penned and/or directed by the Jews themselves, with The Man in the Glass Booth (1975) directed by Arthur Hiller, Weininger's Last Night (1990) aka Weiningers Nacht directed by Paulus Manker, and Henry Bean's The Believer (2001) being some of the most notable examples. What all of these films have in common aside from featuring great anti-Semitic rants is that all three works feature a self-loathing Jewish antihero with a split-personality who ultimately dies in the end as a result of circumstances relating to their diseased Hebraic mind. Undoubtedly, Bean's The Believer is the freshest and most modern of these films, as a work that stars Hollywood heartthrob Ryan Gosling (Drive, The Place Beyond the Pines) during his pre-fame days in an insanely intense and totally unforgettable role as a Jewish neo-Nazi skinhead who finally loses control of his unhinged mind. Loosely based on the true story of Daniel "Dan" Burros—a former member and propagandist of Yankee Führer George Lincoln Rockwell's American Nazi Party and, later, a recruiter for the KKK, who had a purported genius IQ of 154 and who committed suicide on October 31, 1965 by shooting himself in the chest and head while listening to Richard Wagner only an hour or so after an issue of The New York Times had been released that uncovered that he was 100% kosher. A rather conflicted fellow who supposedly derived great pleasure from drawing elaborate images of Jews being tortured yet at the same time would do curious things like bring Knish for his neo-Nazi friends to eat and would say things like "Let's eat this good Jew food!" Burros was apparently heavily influenced by the neo-Spenglerian tome Imperium: The Philosophy of History and Politics (1948) written by Francis Parker Yockey (who is rumored to have been ¼ Jewish himself), which argued against the 'racial materialism' of the Third Reich and made the dubious claim that the 'spiritual' element of race was more important than the biological, hence why the work would appeal to a Jewish Nazi (incidentally, Leo Felton, a neo-Nazi criminal of both black and Jewish ancestry, was also influenced by the book). A sort of postmodern theological approach to Judaism written by two assimilated reform Jews, Henry Bean and Mark Jacobson, that exposes to the Goyim why it is not all that strange that a Jew might turn into a neo-Nazi, The Believer is like a thinking man's take on American History X (1998) that is less about skinhead culture than a serious attempt to portray Judaism's place in modern America in an age where true so-called 'anti-Semitism' has become an anachronism and where the religion itself has begun to lose meaning among its people, who typically consider themselves culturally kosher more than anything else. Once described by co-writer/director

Henry Bean as being “embarrassingly philo-Semitic,” the film was nonetheless described by Rabbi Abraham Cooper of the Simon Wiesenthal Center as “a primer for anti-Semitism” and because of this, the The Believer was doomed to the deplorable fate of being released straight to cable TV, even though it had won the Grand Jury Prize at the 2001 Sundance Film Festival and the Golden St. George at the 23rd Moscow International Film Festival. To the Rebbe’s credit, Bean’s work has more philosophical ammo against the Jews than the infamous Nazi propaganda film Der ewige Jude (1940) aka The Eternal Jew directed by Fritz Hippler (who was ironically 1/8 Jewish himself) and thus can be seen as one of only a handful of films that will intrigue both rabid Zionist and National Socialists alike.

During the first couple minutes of The Believer, Jewish yeshiva student turned neo-Nazi skinhead Daniel Balint (Ryan Gosling) stalks a young Orthodox Jew wearing a yarmulke through a NYC subway and eventually smacks a book out of the young Yid’s hand, hands the book back to him, and then smacks and beats the shit out of the young bookish Heeb for not fighting back like a real man. Most interestingly, Mr. Balint begs the Jew to hit him back, stating, “Do me a favor...why don’t you fucking hit me, okay? Hit me. Hit me! Hit me, hit me, hit me. Fucking hit me. Hit me, please! You fucking kike!” but the cowardly ‘kike’ naturally does nothing. Indeed, Daniel Balint hates the Jews due to their innate cowardliness and pacifism, as he associates Abraham’s obedience to God’s command to kill/sacrifice his son Isaac in the Bible with the fact that most European Jews refused to fight back during the holocaust. As a young yeshiva student, Danny would argue with his teachers over scripture by interpreting it in a rather unorthodox way, but now as a neo-Nazi, he wants to kill Jews and believes he has found true comrades in the form of philistine skinheads who have no idea who Adolf Eichmann was. When Danny and his motley crew of skinhead dumb asses attend a small gathering hosted by intellectual fascists Curtis Zampf (Billy Zane) and Lina Moebius (Theresa Russell), he proposes randomly killing rich and successful Jews, including an investment banker/philanthropist named Ilio Manzetti (Henry Bean). Zampf considers Danny’s anti-Semitism and brute tactics outmoded, but Moebius, who “doesn’t care about the Jews one way or another,” sees a bright speaker and visionary in the young Jewish Nazi, as he reminds her of her ex-husband, who was a fascist revolutionary that went insane and now lives in a mental institution. Moebius’ daughter Carla (portrayed by 1/2 Jewess Summer Phoenix) also takes an interest in Danny and when he gets arrested the same night after getting in a brawl with some savage nig-nogs, she bails him out of jail and the two make somewhat violent sadomasochistic love (Carla is left with a bruise around her mouth). When Danny goes home, it is quite obvious that he resents the fact that his Father (Ronald Guttman) is a weak and sickly Jew. While at home, Danny gets a call from a journalist named Guy Danielsen (A. D. Miles), who flatters the kosher Nazi by telling him that he has heard that he has “interesting ideas” and that he wants to interview him. Unbeknownst to Danny, the journalist knows he is Jewish and his life as he knows it is about to change forever as a result.

When Danny meets journalist Guy Danielsen at a cafe, the postmodern Stormtrooper goes on a number of highly sophisticated and articulate anti-Jewish rants, including one in the spirit of self-loathing Austrian Jewish philosopher Otto Weininger where he argues that “the Jew is essentially female,” stating, “Real men—white, Christian men—we fuck a woman. We make her cum with our cocks. But the Jew doesn’t like to penetrate and thrust—he can’t assert himself that directly—so he resorts to perversion.” In his most impassioned speech, Danny makes his most damning attack against God’s chosen tribe most cherished geniuses, arguing: “Take the greatest Jewish minds ever—Marx, Freud, Einstein—what have they given us? Communism, infantile sexuality, and the atom bomb. In the mere three centuries it’s taken these people to emerge from the ghettos of Europe, they’ve ripped us out of a world of order and reason. They’re thrown us into a chaos of class warfare, irrational urges, relativity, into a world where the very existence of matter and meaning is in question. Why? ‘Cause it’s the deepest impulse of a Jewish soul to pull at the fabric of life till there’s nothing left but a thread. They want nothing but nothingness. Nothingness without end.” At this point, the journalist seems rather impressed, but he catches Danny off guard by asking him, “How can you believe this when you’re a Jew yourself?” thus inciting the Hitlerite Hebrew to whip out a Glock pistol and put it in pansy journalist Mr. Danielsen’s mouth while threatening to kill himself if the writer dares to print an article revealing his Judaic origins. Danny ends up going to a training camp setup by Zampf and Mobius with his skinhead comrades and during the first couple minutes upon arriving there, he beats up the biggest and most muscular neo-Nazi after he picks a fight with him, thus demonstrating he is far from an archetypical Jewish wimp. Danny also befriends a dorky explosives expert and a skilled marksman/possible fellow Jewish Nazi named Drake (Glenn Fitzgerald). Meanwhile, Danny attempts to rekindle his sexually violent relationship with Carla, but he soon realizes that Mr. Zampf is also carrying on an affair with her, even though he is in a relationship with her mother Lina Moebius. When Danny and his friends start a fight with the owners of a Jewish deli, they are sentenced to ‘sensitivity training’ by the courts where they must listen to the experience of Holocaust survivors. When one elderly Holocaust survivor tells a story about how his 3-year-old son was impaled with a bayonet right before his eyes by a German sergeant, Danny calls the man a “piece of shit” for not fighting back and protecting his son. Undoubtedly, the turning point for Danny comes when he and his friends wreck a synagogue and plant a bomb in the pulpit of the building. Danny’s racial/political schizophrenia becomes rather pronounced when he yells at his friends for messing up a Torah scroll, which is more or less the only holy object of Judaism. Danny decides to take the Torah, as well as a 'tallit' (a Jewish prayer shawl), back to the camp with him and comes to realize that being a Nazi alone is not fulfilling and that his Judaism has never left him. After learning the bomb that he planted at the synagogue malfunctioned (the timer stopped at 13 minutes, with the number 13 being a mystical number in Judaism), Danny begins repairing the torn Torah and even does fascist salutes while wearing the tallit and singing a Jewish prayer. When Drake asks Danny, "Do you wanna kill a Jew?," the Judaic neo-Nazi reluctantly agrees. Drake reveals that he has already killed four Jews and when Danny asks him how he knew that his victims were Jewish, the marksman responds by stating, "I can tell. I was a Jew in a previous life." Ultimately, Danny intentionally misses while attempting to assassinate the Jew Ilio Manzetti (the very same Jew he previously fantasized about killing) and Drake soon notices he is wearing the tallit, so a fight breaks out between the two, with the Jewish Nazi wounding his comrade, who later disappears.

When Danny arrives back in NYC, he is asked by Lina Moebius and Zampf to start fundraising for their fascist organization, which they hope will go mainstream, but the tough Hebraic National Socialist is so disgusted by the thought of doing such Jewish work as attempting to con companies out of their money (after all, he drives a forklift for a living) that he vomits, but Carla makes him feel better by licking the barf off his lips in a sick, if not highly sensual, fashion. Rather absurdly Danny begins teaching workshops on hating Jews during the day while teaching Carla, who is a dilettante of ancient languages, how to read the torah during the night. When Danny attempts to get funding from the head of a corporation, he is told, "Forget the Jewish stuff. It doesn't play anymore. There's only the market now, and it doesn't care who you are." Danny accuses the CEO of being a Jew and he replies somewhat strangely by stating, "Maybe I am. Maybe we're all Jews now. What's the difference?" Needless to say, Danny becomes disillusioned with the whole fascist movement and when he gives a speech arguing that anti-Semites should love Jews because it would cause the entire race to disappear into a sea of assimilation, Lina Moebius fires him from his job as a glorified fascist salesman of sorts. Meanwhile, Drake assassinates Ilio Manzetti and Danny is naturally blamed for the crime. Ultimately, Danny gets back in contact with his old classmates from the yeshiva school and decides to go out in a blaze of Christ-like glory. Danny convinces his friend Stuart (Dean Strober) to allow him to take his place reading from the torah at the bema on Yom Kippur. The night before he reads from the torah, Danny places a bomb in the pulpit of the synagogue. On the day of the big event, Danny notices Carla in the synagogue and forces her and everyone else out after telling his friend Stuart that there is a bomb in the building. Of course, Danny, as a suicidal Semite, refuses to leave and is blown up. In the last scene of the film during an ethereal mystical vision of sorts, Danny aimlessly ascends the stairs of the yeshiva school he once attended while being told by his old teacher that "There's nothing up there.” Indeed, in the end, Danny—the only really ‘believer’—learns that the Jewish (non)afterlife is truly “nothing but nothingness. Nothingness without end.”

In describing the real-life Jewish neo-Nazi Daniel Burros, The Believer director Henry Bean curiously stated, “He was a rabbi manque. Antisemitism is a form of practicing Judaism. He’s sort of a rabbi after all. A Jew by day, a Nazi by night. . . . He was desperately hiding something and compulsively trying to bring it out at the same time. People are drawn to contradiction. He undergoes a conversion, but not back to the Torah.” Bean, who is racially Jewish but never really seriously studied the religious aspects of his religion until working on the film, also confessed that by making a film about a Jewish neo-Nazi, he “began to understand what Judaism was.” Indeed, as The Believer demonstrates, unlike Christianity, Judaism is a self-critical religion about constantly questioning things, so it is only natural for a devout intelligent Jew to question the very religion itself, which protagonist Danny Balint did from the very beginning as depicted in his fights with teachers during his early yeshiva days. Although largely forgotten nowadays, some of the greatest intellectuals in the German-speaking world during the late-19th century/early-20th century were ‘self-loathing Jews,’ including the tragic philosopher Otto Weininger (who committed suicide at age 23 by shooting himself in the same room that Ludwig van Beethoven died in), philosopher/historian/actor/theater critic Egon Friedell, Austrian journalist/satirist Karl Kraus, and even one of the most important philosophers of his time, Ludwig Wittgenstein, who once wrote: “My thoughts are 100% Hebraic” and “Amongst Jews ‘genius’ is found only in the holy man. Even the greatest of Jewish thinkers is no more than talented. (myself for instance.) I think there is some truth in my idea that I really only think reproductively.” Although Ryan Gosling seems far too Aryan in appearance and demeanor to portray a suicidal heeb, his performance in The Believer is nothing short of so amazingly visceral and fiercely impassioned that one almost comes to believe he is the real self-loathing Jew deal. While a discernibly low-budget work featuring a couple plot-holes and sometimes amateurish direction (it was Bean’s directorial debut, after all), The Believer is ultimately not only one of the most sophisticated films to ever deal with the Jewish question, but also a dark and primal examination of the Jewish collective unconscious that exposes an entire people in their most vulnerable and incriminating form. Indeed, for those that ever wondered why some people, including Jews, think Uncle Adolf may have had some Hebraic blood, The Believer is the film to see. Undoubtedly, the fact that a powerful rabbi managed to suppress the film and caused it to miss the mainstream attention it deserved just goes to show how important of a work The Believer is, especially in a post-European-dominated age where a largely Hebrew-run entity known as Hollywood is poisoning the world’s brains with its insipid high shekel filth, not to mention the fact that all of the wars in the middle east are a direct result of Zionist warmongering, among countless other contemporary kosher societal ills.

Ironically, Zionism (which was described by Karl Kraus as a form of “Jewish anti-Semitism”) itself was born out of Jewish self-loathing, as its founder Theodor Herzl was originally a German nationalist (he was even a member of the German nationalist fraternity Burschenschaft, which many future Nazis, including Heinrich Himmler, were also members of) who started Zionism after realizing that Jews would never be accepted as real Germans among the indigent German population and saw the movement as a way to make world Jewry strong (indeed, the early Zionists promoted eugenics and even collaborated with the Nazis during WWII). When director Henry Bean received the Grand Jury Prize at the Sundance Film Festival for The Believer, he stated during his acceptance speech for the film, “this is truly a story of love and hate. I love the provocative aspects...the notion of being a Jew and a Nazi at the same time.” Undoubtedly, in those couple sentences, Bean demonstrates the innate strangeness of being Jewish and being from a paradoxical religion where love and hate are not mutually exclusive because, as history demonstrates, Jews thrive on hatred (as Bean’s film mentions, there would be no Israel without Auschwitz) for Hebrews would cease to exist without such hatred, thus making the Jewish neo-Nazi, in a bizarre way, the ultimate and most deeply devout Jew. Indeed, while being one of the most unwaveringly Jewish movies ever made, The Believer is also one of the most cleverly and eclectically anti-Semitic, as a work that puts Uncle Adolf’s best-seller Mein Kampf to shame. That being said, Bean’s film is more or less the contemporary celluloid equivalent to Otto Weininger’s masterpiece Sex and Character (1903) aka Geschlecht und Charakter. Of course, it is surely a sign of our socially and morally inverted times when the most cleverly quasi-anti-Semitic film was directed by an actual Jew.

A SAFE PLACE
A SAFE PLACE

Henry Jaglom (1971)

Although it might sound like something straight out of a dystopian sci-fi flick, there are actually special rooms (or other special designated areas) called 'safe spaces' on some college campuses where certain mental cripples that are usually female and/or non-white can go to indulge in happy things like ice cream and footage of puppies if they feel 'triggered' by something that hurts their super special feelings like a so-called 'microaggression.' Indeed, if a mulatto tranny freak gets freaked out because a mean evil white boy in his class questions how someone can be a woman if they have a cock and Y chromosome, they can seek sanctuary in a safe place where pesky things like facts and reality will not hurt them. Long before society became completely spiritually and socially castrated and safe places became a sad and pathetic reality, Hebraic hipster auteur filmmaker Henry Jaglom (Tracks, Venice/Venice)—a sort of failed Woody Allen type, albeit slightly less neurotic and more Zionist—made his directorial debut with what might be best described as the cinematic equivalent of such outstandingly absurd anti-reality rooms. A complete and utter commercial and critical bomb upon its less than auspicious release, Jaglom's highly personalized first feature A Safe Place (1971) was made during the New Hollywood (aka 'American New Wave') era when auteurist cinema had become vogue in America as a result of the unexpected big commercial success of works like Bonnie and Clyde (1967) and Easy Rider (1969). Produced by wealthy dope-addled Judaic (pseudo)bohemians Bob Rafelson, Bert Schneider, and Steve Blauner's production company BBS Productions (which was previously called Raybert Productions before Blauner joined and was responsible for creating both the successful situation comedy The Monkees and the initially imaginary band of the same name), both Jaglom's film and Jack Nicholson's rarely-seen quasi-arthouse flick Drive, He Said (1971) would mark a sort of turning point for the fairly lucrative company, which had great success with its previous works like Easy Rider (which Jaglom played a role in reediting), Five Easy Pieces (1970), and The Last Picture Show (1971). According to Jaglom, BBS head Schneider sobbed upon first seeing A Safe Place and told the filmmaker that he had absolutely no clue what the film was about and felt it would be an abject failure at the box offices but opted to release it anyway since he was a rare producer of his time who was committed to the artistic freedom of the auteur. A conspicuously convoluted and incessantly fragmented doped-out psychodrama that centers around a decidedly dumb and equally morally retarded blonde woman-child that lives in a pathetic fantasy realm that revolves around her nostalgia for her seemingly largely imagined childhood, Jaglom's film follows in the post-WWII Jewish American male tradition of Philip Roth, Norman Mahler, and Woody Allen in that it grovelingly fetishizes the tall, blonde Aryan Shiksa.

Based on a play by Jaglom that he originally performed in NYC in 1964 with his then-girlfriend Karen Black in the lead role and himself portraying a character that would eventually be played by Jack Nicholson for the silver-screen, A Safe Place was mainly aesthetically influenced by both improvisational theater and European arthouse films by Fellini, Godard, John Schlesinger, Ingmar Bergman, etc., among various others. Thematically speaking, the film was mostly influenced by Jaglom's desire to stay a perennial child, or as the auteur stated himself in the Criterion Collection featurette Henry Jaglom Finds 'A Safe Place' (2010), "I had the character I wanted to explore, which was this amalgam, as I said, of a lot of women I had known and parts of myself...and this resistance to growing up, which was very endemic to [...] that period. A lot of us did not want to grow up in the 60s, you know, when I wrote it. By the time I made it in 1971, I still did not want to grow up and I was still, like, not understanding what that was about [...] and there was a death attraction. A kind of, sort of romance of suicide. A lot of aspects of the popular culture, which I was [...] certainly a part of. And ummm, in A SAFE PLACE I just really wanted to tell the truth emotionally up onscreen. There was no question for me that what I had to try to do was make films that, in my sense of things, told the emotional truth about life as I perceived it and I still don't want to grow up. Absolutely, the Peter Pan thing is profound [...] Luckily, I haven't had to grow up and that's kind of the amazing thing about this and I think Anaïs Nin had a whole lot to do with that." Indeed, Jaglom's debut is a proudly masturbatory film culled from a whopping fifty hours of seemingly randomly shot footage that depicts infantile young adults doing infantile things, with the brain-dead blonde lead being exceedingly upset about the fact that she believes that she was able to fly as a child yet no longer remembers how to do it. Featuring the novelty of a rather bloated and broken Orson Welles in a role that Jaglom gave him a color TV to do as a sort of phantom magician with a grating Eastern European Yiddish Jewish accent who pops in and out of the protagonist's life throughout the entire film, A Safe Place is like a cross between Ambrose Bierce's classic short story An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge (1890), Federico Fellini's psychedelic classic Juliet of the Spirits (1965), and Jean-Luc Godard's Masculin Féminin (1966), albeit nowhere near as ambitious and spectacular as it sounds. Directed by the proud great-great-great-great-great-great-grandson of German Jewish Haskala philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, Jaglom's debut is a work that is ultimately quite typical of the sort of neurotic racial schizophrenia that many contemporary Judaic men suffer from as a film that simultaneously celebrates Hebraic kultur and the singular beauty of blonde Nordic women. In that sense, A Safe Place is like a hippie art fag equivalent to Elaine May's The Heartbreak Kid (1972).

At the very beginning of the film, Orson Welles gives a good indication of the film's helically oriented narrative structure by slowly stating in a quasi-poetic fashion, "Last night...in my sleep...I dreamed...that I was sleeping. And dreaming in that sleep...that I had awakened...I feel asleep.” Welles portrays an imaginary character that Jaglom hilariously described as a “lapsed wander rabbi” who tells Hasidic stories “that have no meaning” that were written by an eccentric Orthodox rabbi named Nachman of Breslov and who is also a failed magician of sorts whose sole trick is making things, including money and a silver ball, levitate. For whatever reason, Welles, who acts as a sort of paternal figure (Jaglom has hinted that he is actually her father), watches over protagonist Susan aka ‘Noah’ (Tuesday Weld of Frank Perry’s Play It As It Lays (1972) and Richard Brooks’ Looking for Mr. Goodbar (1977)) as she makes stupid decision after decision in her patently pathetic life of mindless self-indulgence, self-destructive hedonism, and delusional nostalgia worship. Protagonist Noah—a character named after Noah’s Ark that auteur Jaglom has described as being “1/3 Tuesday, 1/3 Karen [Black], and 1/3 me”—lives in a perpetual dream realm of sappy sentimentalism and careless sensuality where she does everything she can to block out the less than happy events from her waste of a life. At the beginning of the film, a somewhat Jew-y dork named Fred Sapier (Phil Proctor, who is best known for his voice roles in Pixar films like Toy Story, A Bug’s Life, Finding Nemo, etc.) bumps into Noah and more or less immediately decides to dedicate his life to her, thereupon eventually becoming a pathetic cuckold in the process. Unquestionably, Fred is what hippies would call a ‘square’ but because he is completely infatuated with Noah and her plastic pulchritude, he decides to make a valiant attempt at adopting her bohemian way of life by hanging out with drugged-out naked degenerates that babble on about nothing. Unbeknownst to poor Fred, Noah’s troubled heart is owned by a suave and stoic player named Mitch (Jack Nicholson in a largely improvised role where he more or less plays himself) who swings by the protagonist’s apartment anytime he feels like fucking her, even though he is apparently in love with a chick named Rita (which was apparently the name of the girl that Nicholson was dating in real-life at that time). Needless to say, heartbreak is a malignant metaphysical affliction that virtually every single character in the film seems to suffer from to some degree or another.

Throughout the film, protagonist Noah and her hippie friends are incessantly depicted doing childish friends like riding rocking horses and merry-go-rounds, holding broken baby dolls (undoubtedly symbolic of their traumatic childhoods and arrested development), and lying around naked while doing nothing like over indulged babies that are happy to play in their own feces and vomit. As she tells to a somewhat baffled Fred, Noah demands that her television be on at all times, even though she has the sound turned off, as if she needs a constant state of both stimulation and escapism. Noah also shows Fred a special wooden box where you apparently put something that “means something very special to you” and then you make a wish “for something that you really need to happen,” thus reflecting the lead heroine’s completely childish wishful thinking, as if she is afraid of taking actual action in her life and making things happen through work and determination. For what might be described as their first date, Fred takes Noah to a natural history museum that makes the protagonist somewhat upset and inspires her to complain, “They’re not natural. [It is] supposed to be the Museum of Natural History. Well, there’s nothing natural about it. All those space things and switches. You know, when I was a little girl, we used to go there all the time on school trips. It was all natural then.” Needless to say, Fred is somewhat confused when Noah states in all seriousness, “When I was a child, I flew. I know it sounds crazy, but I did. I did fly. I just can’t remember how.” At this point, Noah becomes considerably upset and complains, “sometimes it hurts” because “if I could just remember it, then I’d be able to fly again.” Of course, when Fred questions if she really had the ability to fly, Noah becomes fairly hysterical and begins sobbing like an irrational child that hates the fact that reality does not conform to her wishes. Naturally, poor cuck Fred is hopelessly pussy-struck and thus reduces himself to dealing with the increasingly nonsensical behavior of a grown woman that acts like an emotionally erratic retarded child with ADHD, but of course it is only a matter of time before a woman as beautiful as Noah gets with a man that does more than just act like a passive doormat.

When her ‘dream lover’ Mitch randomly shows up on her roof and asks while smirking in a knowing fashion, “Well, is it alright – is it all right that I came at this – this time?,” Noah replies like a naïve schoolgirl with wet panties, “Yes, it’s more than all right,” even though she is in a relationship with Fred. Since he knows that she worships his cock, Mitch has no problem insulting Noah and telling her that he misses her because, as he states to the philistine protagonist in a less than flattering way, “...you’re very simpleminded. Do you know why I like simpleminded because? Because it’s real easy to make them do whatever you want them to.” Indeed, it is quite apparent that Mitch can get Noah to do whatever he wants, including fucking him on the roof even though she is in a relationship with Freddy boy, who walks in on the two while they are spooning yet does not have the testicular fortitude to confront his girlfriend about the fact that she is blatantly cheating on him with another man. While Fred hangs out with some naked hippies that are discussing “psychic self-defense” and rapist hobos, alpha-mensch Mitch plows Noah’s pussy in a montage sequence that really epitomizes the moral bankruptcy and degeneracy of the counterculture generation. Meanwhile, lapsed rebbe magician Orson Welles attempts a magic trick where he tries in vain to make Mitch disappear, as if he is Noah’s bargain bin guardian angel and knows that she is on the brink of destroying her relatively ‘healthy’ relationship with Fred.

While playing a mere secondary role, a fairly Aryan-looking Jewess with blonde curls named Gwen Welles (real name Gwen Goldberg) ultimately upstages the lead as a drug-addled hippie named ‘Bari.’ A real-life junky that died in 1993 at the fairly premature age of 42 as a result of anal cancer that she refused to get properly treated (incidentally, her younger sister died of colon cancer a decade later), Welles still managed to acquire a somewhat eclectic variety of film roles ranging from the eponymous lead of Roger Vadim's Hellé (1972) to a cute no-talent country singer that gets an audience's attention by doing a striptease in Robert Altman's Nashville (1975). In A Safe Place, Welles gives a totally improvised and considerably impassioned yet somewhat degrading performance where she recalls being stalked by a number of dirty old men and eventually hints while sobbing that she was once date raped after swallowing one-too-many sleeping pills. Indeed, while sincerely crying to her hippie comrades as a lone tear drips down her fairly adorable face, Welles declares, "I mean, I felt completely apart from anything that doesn't resemble – doesn't resemble being miserable," thereupon unwittingly foretelling the tragic course her life would ultimately take. Dyke filmmaker Donna Deitch would ultimately document Welles' final days in the doc Angel on My Shoulder (1998) where the deathly ill actress does not even vaguely resemble her former self.

At a certain point in the film, Fred takes Noah to a fancy apartment (which was actually owned by Jaglom's wealthy parents) that is filled with various authentic degenerate quasi-Expressionistic paintings that was apparently the male protagonist's childhood home (thus hinting that pussy Fred is indeed a stand-in for Jaglom). Not surprisingly, Noah decides to hide in a closet (which was, rather revealingly, actually Jaglom's own mother's closet) and ultimately gives a clue as to why she is such a dysfunctional young dame. Indeed, after proclaiming to Fred, "Some people have a light that seems to come out of the center of their eyes. There's – There's something that's so alive in them. You know, it's a quality of hopefulness, of love. People who can love have those lights. You've got them. Little lights that are always on, sparkling and warm," Noah proceeds to describe in a decidedly depression fashion how she has dead eyes. Naturally when Noah states, "In some people...In – In my father, the iris...has a milkiness to it. And they're flat. There's no light. They look, um – They look glazed over and dead. I'm terrified that...I'm all dead in my eyes, like my father. That I inherited an – [nervously laughs] inability to love," it becomes obvious that she has a dubious relationship with her daddy and that he might have done something to her that completely destroyed her inside, hence her current childlike state.

When Nicholson's character Mitch stops by for what he proudly describes as a "late nighttime drop-in" at Noah's apartment, it ultimately ushers in the beginning of the end of the protagonist's fairly prosaic relationship with sad pathetic beta-bitch Fred. Indeed, as soon as Mitch shows up, Noah immediately attempts to get Fred to leave so that she can have enough privacy to be meticulously defiled by her dream lover. While Noah eventually convinces Fred to go in a back room and stay there, the cuckolded boyfriend is more than aware of what is happening and decides to barge back in under the pretense of sharing some fine wine with his less than faithful girlfriend and her super suave fuck-buddy. Of course, this totally annoys Noah, who is discernibly horny for marvelous Mitch's man meat and cannot tolerate being cunt-blocked, so she firmly tells Fred to leave immediately. Like many men in such a situation, Mitch becomes somewhat uneasy and complains to Noah, "I can't do this...I can't do this...I can't do this. I feel bad about this person coming in and out like this. You know, I mean, I just – I identify with the position, you know?," but the horny heroine reassures him by stating, "Maybe sometimes you should just take what you want when it's there." Indeed, even when her fuck-buddy Mitch demonstrates that he has a large enough of a heart and conscience to attempt to dissuade her from cheating on her beau and ultimately destroying her relationship, Noah cannot help but cheat on Fred in a most overtly emasculating and ultimately soul-destroying fashion. Of course, Mitch cannot turn down free premium pussy, no matter how awkward the situation gets. As for poor pathetic cuckold Fred, he decides to grab all the meaningful mementos that he has collected during his relationship with Noah and then proceeds to burn them in a fireplace in a scenario that seems like it was stolen from a similar scene in Dimitri Kirsanoff's masterful silent short Brumes d'automne (1929) aka Autumn Mists starring Nadia Sibirskaja. Upon exiting the apartment in a pathetically melodramatic fashion, Fred resentfully shouts to Noah and Mitch "I'm leaving" and "you've won," but they barely acknowledge his presence because they are in the middle of a heated pre-fuck foreplay session. After Fred slams the door like a pathetic sore loser, Noah celebrates by declaring "We won" and then she and Mitch proceed to laugh while continuing to make out.

In an unintentionally hilarious montage sequence towards the end of the film, Fred is featured looking directly at the camera and crying in regard to his bitter breakup with Noah, "These feelings are like...f-feelings of love [...] It's like the confusion of love, you know? Does love hurt, or is it something that makes you feel happy? Well, I guess it's somewhere right in between, just kind of on a tightrope." Of course, it is nearly impossible for any self-respecting man to have sympathy for a character that is as weak and ineffectual as dumb fuck cuck Fred, who ultimately loses Noah because he is a pathetic bore and pedantic pansy who acted in a groveling manner towards the heroine during their entire terribly mismatched (non)romance. In the end, Fred seems to make a desperate attempt to get back Noah by randomly swinging by her apartment, but she is nowhere to be found (indeed, as the film hints in the end, she has probably already committed suicide). Meanwhile, Noah is depicted sobbing in a bubble bath and when Orson Welles tells her to "disappear," she cries "no." In a scene that hints that Noah was molested by her father, she states while sitting in the bathtub, "He loved me as a little girl. I could tell, when the lights came on, when he looked at me." Of course, at this point in the film, there is no question that Noah—a perennial little girl that lacks the capacity to love or have a serious meaningful relationship—has become the way she is as a result of some serious daddy issues that she never resolved, hence her love of escapism and various imagined childhood memories, which she seems to have created as a self-defense mechanism to block her real memories out. After some children yell "Time to go now!" and Orson Welles proceeds to levitate a ball, Noah proceeds to commit suicide in her bathtub by swallowing some unmentioned substance in what is undoubtedly the most soft and flowery self-slaughter sequence in cinema history. After overdosing on whatever fatal cocktail that she decided to off herself with, Noah is depicted as a little girl in the bathtub juxtaposed with her adult self declaring, "I remember." Indeed, as one ultimately learns from A Safe Place, spoiled girls with serious daddy issues make for terrible girlfriends and tend to be attracted to shitty men. Naturally, the so-called sexual liberation movement gave such damaged dames as Noah a virtual license to speed up their inevitable self-destruction.

Despite my less than positive opinion of the film, I find it absolutely amazing that a cinematic work like A Safe Place was ever made in Hollywood, as it is so anti-linear and thematically degenerate that it ultimately makes Terrence Malick's Badlands (1973) seem like George Lucas' American Graffiti (1973) by comparison. After watching the film, I was not surprised to learn that Jaglom has described his fan base as being, "70-80% women and mostly women who are interested in examining the lives of women." Indeed, Jaglom (as well as his much more successful fellow Hebraic contemporary Woody Allen) undoubtedly proves that Viennese philosopher Otto Weininger was certainly on to something when he theorized in his magnum opus Geschlecht und Charakter (1903) aka Sex and Character that Jewishness and femininity are one and the same. Notably, Weininger was certainly prophetic when it came to foreseeing the collective moral and cultural degeneration of the Occident, especially in regard to the zeitgeist depicted in A Safe Place, as reflected in his words, "Our age is not only the most Jewish, but also the most effeminate of all ages . . . an age of the most credulous anarchism, an age without any appreciation of the state and law . . . an age of the shallowest of all imaginable interpretations of history (historical materialism), an age of capitalism and Marxism, an age for which history, life, science, everything, has become nothing but economics and technology; an age that has declared genius to be a form of madness, but which no longer has one great artist or one great philosopher; an age that is most devoid of originality, but which chase most frantically after originality; an age that has replaced the idea of virginity with the cult of the demivierge. This age also has the distinction of being the first to have not only affirmed and worshipped sexual intercourse, but to have practically made it a duty, not as a way of achieving oblivion, as the Romans and Greeks did in their bacchanals, but in order to find itself and to give its own dreariness a meaning." Of course, all the sex depicted in A Safe Place is completely soulless and meaningless, not to mention oftentimes downright self-destructive, thus the film ironically ultimately criticizes the very same counterculture movement and hippie chick type that it attempts to glorify, thereupon underscoring the innate nihilism of that particularly pathetic zeitgeist. Indeed, while I find Jaglom to be a particularly repugnant fellow, I can at least respect the fact that he acknowledges that he and his entire generation suffered from Puer aeternus, with his debut film arguably being the most blatant and literal example of this in cinema history, albeit from the curious perspective of a woman as opposed to a man like the filmmaker (who, as I mentioned before, claims that the character is partially based on himself).

Aside from his second feature Tracks (1977) starring Dennis Hopper as a deranged Vietnam War veteran, virtually every single one of Jaglom's films focus on women and specifically women themed issues, with Eating (1991) centering around female food obsession, Babyfever (1994) focusing on child-craving chicks that are struggling with their biological clocks, and Going Shopping (2005) depicting the feminine vice of jovially wasting tons of time and money on worthless junk. Of course, I guess that is what one should expect from a man who once stated in regard to his mother's disturbingly gynocentric influence on him, "I had this very enormous influence of femininity in my childhood and I was allowed to be a girl to some extent, which boys weren't. She gave my access. I'm sure that's why I am so connected to women. She never said you can't cross this line, so I got to try on the new lipsticks and be the girl in the family." Going back to Weininger, Jaglom's oeuvre indubitably demonstrates that the Austrian philosopher was right when he wrote, "No men who really think deeply about women retain a high opinion of them." Naturally, considering Jaglom's films present women in a realistic and, in turn, rather unflattering fashion, it should be no surprise that feminists tend to either love or loathe his work (notably, lecherous quasi-feminist Anaïs Nin was one of the few vocal supporters of Jaglom's debut when it was released and even actively promoted it by penning a rave review and showing it to women on college campuses). Personally, I found A Safe Place to be a singularly torturous experience due to the fact that I not only felt a bit of Fremdscham as a result of seeing a rather bloated and broken Orson Welles being reduced to portraying a babbling kosher clown with a terribly phony Yiddish accent, but also because I had to be reminded that countless Jewish men like Jaglom have a peculiar propensity to prey on Aryan (anti)goddesses with serious daddy issues that no sane or self-respecting white man would ever dare tolerate. Indeed, while Jaglom once proudly stated, "I'm a Jew because of Hitler. More than anything, anti-Semites try to make you not a Jew. So self-respect requires you to be a Jew," he has demonstrated with both his films and actions that he has a curious case of racial schizophrenia (in fact, he has only married and reproduced with goy gals with traditional Nordic features), but then again that is just one of the many reasons why he is one of the most innately Jewish filmmakers of his generation. Aside from validating Weininger's theories on Jewishness and femininity, A Safe Place also demonstrates that even the most women film oriented gay Aryan filmmakers like Rainer Werner Fassbinder seem fairly macho when compared to heterosexual Hebrews like Jaglom.

Henry Jaglom (1994)

Although a relatively prevalent phenomenon that affects many women, especially of the educated white middleclass sort, Hollywood seems to be totally petrified to touch issues relating to what is oftentimes colloquially described as ‘baby rabies’ when a woman who is approaching middle-age becomes desperate to get pregnant and have a child before her ovaries expire and she is doomed to live the sad and pathetic non-life of a perennially lonely spinster who has failed to accomplish the one thing indisputable thing that all members of the so-called fairer sex are put on this world to do. Of course, in an increasingly spiritually castrated post-feminist world where girls are practically taught from birth by both public schools and television that establishing a successful career and pretending to have a penis is infinitely more important than supposedly outmoded things like getting married and having children, it is easy to why the culture-distorting degenerates in Hollywood would ignore this rather relevant social issue as it would not be in the interests of the kosher clowns of Tinseltown to expose this pathetic yet perturbing trend, for it is arguably just one of the many natural intended results in their culturally corrosive campaign of post-holocaust anti-white hatred. After all, it is no coincidence that Hollywood also incessantly promotes so-called multiculturalism, miscegenation, homosexuality, xenophilia, and practically every other form of degeneracy, but I digress. Somewhat not surprisingly considering his fetishistic obsession with distinctly female issues that no man would ever give a shit about as well as his tendency towards exploiting estrogen-charged excremental emotions, Hebraic quasi-arthouse auteur Henry Jaglom (Tracks, Venice/Venice) is one of the few filmmakers that has dealt with the absolutely horrifying phenomenon of hormonally imbalanced women in their 30s and 40s that are dying to get knocked up, though he focuses specifically on bourgeois left-wingers of the largely Judaic sort. Indeed, Babyfever (1994)—a work that was advertised with the tagline, “For Those Who Hear Their Clock Ticking...,” which hints that Jaglom felt there was a sizable surplus of kid-craving women on the brink of sterility that the film would appeal to—is a nearly completely plotless piece of emotionally grotesque pseudo-philosophical gynocentricism where a bunch of hyper hypocritical hens of the largely professionally successful sort bemoan the fact they do not have kids because they have dedicated their lives to both their careers and weak male partners in what ultimately proves to be a great example of the seeming incapacity for most women to take personal responsibility for their actions. Indeed, Babyfever might best be described as the yapping barren yenta show and naturally it is as aesthetically horrifying and radically revolting as it sounds.

Starring Jaglom’s Shiksa second (ex)wife Victoria Foyt, who was also credited as co-penning and co-directing the film (not surprisingly, she has no other directing credits, thus hinting that Jaglom gave her a token credit), in a role she probably now finds quite embarrassing since she married and had two mischling children with the 'auteur,' only for him to divorce her for a younger woman about twelve years later, Babyfever is a vapid film about vapid spoiled spinsters of the nauseatingly narcissist yet neurotic sort who more than clearly demonstrate why most heterosexual men cannot stand to be in a room full of yapping chicks. Indeed, the film features women that are such loathsomely shameless navel-gazers that they act like getting some stupid chump to cum in their festering cunts and impregnate them is an insanely important issues worthy of deep philosophical discussion. Directed by a self-described "male lesbian" whose own brother, actor Michael Emil, resents him because he is proud of the fact that he's an exceedingly effeminate wuss that loathes masculinity, the film depicts an insufferably insecure heroine who is terribly obsessed with becoming a progenitor yet cannot decide whether she wants to get knocked up by the lame 'safe' corporate asshole boyfriend that she doubts she even loves or a self-centered old flame of the tall, dark, and handsome persuasion who can wet her panties simply by staring into her weary eyes. Not surprisingly considering it is a Jaglom whine epic, Babyfever also contains a sort of outstandingly obnoxious quasi-docudrama style film-within-a-film where the fourth wall is less than elegantly broken down and the actresses suddenly play themselves by staring directly at the viewer and candidly revealing their true thoughts on being melancholic barren women who feel extremely empty and discontent because they have wasted their entire lives on worthless careers instead of churning out progeny. Indeed, the only thing I could think about while watching these half-rotten hags excreting gallons upon gallons of fuming verbal diarrhea is how much they need some burly sub-literate bohunk to violently shove his purple-headed monster down their all-too-proper throats and give them a nice hearty wad of high grade baby batter.

As anyone that is even vaguely familiar with Jaglom and his singularly self-involved oeuvre knows, he is a filmmaker that likes to style himself as an actor-liberating 'passive auteur' who gives his poor performers plenty of room to improvise and deliver erratic explosions of masturbatory histrionics (indeed, as he once proudly stated, "As a filmmaker, I don't direct. I take away. I extract. Orson [Welles] said I was like an old Eskimo carving away at a walrus tusk, trying to find what's inside."). Personally, I think Jaglom is really just an inordinately lazy psychic vampire who does not want to be bothered with writing a script or created a truly cinematic mise-en-scène and instead relies on his friends' pathology-ridden emotional outbursts for ostensibly enthralling film material (though I must admit that the director got a great performance out of Dennis Hopper in Tracks (1977)), which is no different in Babyfever where the viewer is forced to endure the largely verbal melodramatic gymnastics of superlatively shallow bourgeoisie Jewesses and Shiksa skanks who all seem to suffer from a sort of pre-menopausal psychosis as a result of the fact that they are too weak, self-centered, cowardly, and/or stupid to accomplish something that even the most mentally retarded of crackhead negroes can accomplish by getting knocked up and popping out spawn. Like virtually every single Jaglom celluloid circle jerk, Babyfever is first and foremost a vulgar vanity piece where the filmmaker tries in vain to convince the viewer just how important and deep the issues in his life are. Indeed, while the film might be about a self-indulgently neurotic chick whose vagina is starting to dry up, it is ultimately really a quasi-covert self-congratulatory tribute to the fact that, out of all the rich and successful men in Hollywood, gorgeous goy gal Victoria Foyt opted to despoil her genetics by practicing miscegenation and having a child with a whiny Hebraic wuss like jack-off Jaglom, who ultimately makes Woody Allen seem like a stoic and highly self-disciplined SS-Sturmbannführer by comparison. Indeed, Babyfever unintentionally demonstrates that it takes a special kind of neurotic woman with low-esteem to succumb to the irrevocable racial sin of Blutschande.

At the very beginning of Babyfever, reasonably attractive brunette spinster Gena (Victoria Foyt, who only really appeared in her Hebraic hubby's films) is depicted looking quite melancholy while spying on little kids playing at a playground in a fashion that would probably inspire a concerned parent to call the police if she were a middle-aged man instead of a woman. Of course, as her visibly decaying physical pulchritude demonstrates, Gena's biological clock is running out and the only thing she can think about is having a baby, even though she is constantly coming up with absurd reasons in her own mind as to why she should not have one. Unfortunately, Gena does not really love her talk, dark, and hokey preppie boyfriend James (played by overrated novelist J.D. Salinger's somewhat less swarthy son Matt Salinger), who has more than enough money to buy a large house and provide for a fairly large family. At the beginning of the film after the two have seemingly lackluster sex, Gena accuses James of attempting to "trap" her "into getting pregnant," even though she is the one that was responsible for refraining to tell her boring beau that she is ovulating and curiously neglected to wear her diaphragm. James is fairly eager about having a child with Gena and attempts to coerce her into being his baby-momma by saying to her in an insufferably sentimental fashion, "...you bring out the best in me and I bring out the best in you, and it would be a crime if we didn't share that with a child." Of course, Gena does not see things that way, as she finds James to be too damn lame and tame to keep her interest for a lifetime as he is a mediocre man that uses golf metaphors when discussing the maturity (or lack thereof) of their sapless sham relationship. As is hinted throughout the film, Gena is only in a relationship with James because she has suffered great heartbreak in the past and sees her boyfriend as someone that she can count on, even if he is a hopeless bore. In fact, she much prefers her emotionally neglectful and proudly arrogant Hollywood actor ex-boyfriend Anthony Thomas (Eric Roberts in a cameo-like one-scene role), who pays her an unexpected visit at her place of employment under the pretense of needing her “financial wisdom” since he apparently suffers from “financial foolishness” in a shameless attempt to get her to have his baby, even though he has not seen or spoken to her in a number of years. Indeed, after describing how he began to develop an affection for children after being in a relationship with a woman that had a young daughter, Anthony states to Gena, “It made me realize I want a child more than anything in the world. When I thought about the reasons I wanted I child, I only thought about you. It’s not like wanting a motorcycle or wanting a horse; it’s wanting a life.” As Gena states to a friend in regard to Anthony and the sort of carnal spell that he has over her, “He’s got this strange kind of effect on me. I see him and I feel myself ovulating,” but unfortunately she cannot trust him since he treated her like trash in the past. Ultimately, Gena must decide whether she wants to let James or Anthony to impregnate her with their seed. Naturally, as a navel-gazing neurotic, it makes for an impossible decision for Gena to make.

Undoubtedly, the ‘centerpiece’ of Babyfever is a baby shower for Gena’s dumb blonde co-worker Diane (Jackie Moen, who had a small role in the Troma turd Class of Nuke ’Em High Part II: Subhumanoid Meltdown (1991)) where about a dozen or so pseudo-intellectual careerist chicks that wasted their most fertile years on college and work go on hysterical self-centered rants about their seemingly intangible dreams of pregnancy, disillusionment with weak and ineffectual men, and mixed thoughts on being the first generation of women to be seduced by the largely lesbian-led anti-male movement known as feminism, which a couple of these women criticize for not emphasizing the importance of motherhood. While the baby shower is supposed to be a joyous occasion where the guests celebrate the gift of life while acting like catty preteen princesses, the experience ultimately pushes Gena over the edge to the point where she routinely cries and even begins screaming hatefully at a brainwashed Christian negresses who proudly proclaims that her faith in the lord savior Jesus Christ will ultimately lead her to finding the right sort of god-fearing mensch to have children with. Indeed, like many barren women her age, Gena’s mind seems to be slowly but surely deteriorating to the point where she has developed her own idiosyncratic nihilistic Weltanschauung that seems change by the minute, so listening to the candid yet oftentimes contradictory thoughts of both mothers and spinsters naturally only compounds her progressive mental derangement. While Anthony has yet to try to contact Gena since he visited her at work, James is so keen on having a child with her that he offers to buy her a large house if she agrees to start a family with him. As James argues to Gena as to why they should get married and have children together, “We’ve talked about children. We’ve talked about marriage. We’ve talked about love. We’ve talked about commitment. We’ve talked about our lives together. I mean, hell, if you wanna be a yuppie, our careers even mesh.” Of course, like psychopaths, women are easily bored and Gena finds James’ perfectly planned proposal to be sterile and passionless and thus cannot imagine herself spending her entire life with such a patently prosaic pussy. Somewhat ironically, as their emotionally erratic rants during the baby shower segment indubitably demonstrates, many of Gena's friends would love to have a beta-bitch like James. Somewhat humorously, when Gena less than passionately describes his offer to buy her a home as "sweet," James becomes fairly upset and complains in regard to being an accursed beta, "Sweet? The girls in school always used to call me 'cute.' I hated that word just as much."

Among other things, the seemingly unending baby shower segment demonstrates why there has never really been any great female philosophers as the viewer is bombarded with rant after rant by ostensibly intellectual college-indoctrinated spinsters who seem to be finally coming to terms with the fact that they were tricked out of their birthright of reproduction by the resentful feminist dykes and commie agitators of the so-called 'New Left' who began destroying universities during the late-1960s. Undoubtedly what virtually all of these women have in common is that they are admittedly unhappy, even though they seem to have achieved all of their professional dreams, thus underscoring the idiocy of idealism. The only woman that does not seem totally miserable is a vain and vapid happy-go-lucky blonde who proudly proclaims while maintaining a stupidly smug smile, "I think that it's really important for someone like myself to have babies because I have good genes and I think that genes are very important in the world. And all my brothers and sisters have very good features. And I'm bright. I was in all the advanced classes in school." Of course, as her words rather clearly reveal, this dopey dame only wants to have children for selfish and superficial reasons and not because she has the undying urge to be a mommy. In another scene that hints that many women want to have children for largely selfish reasons, a less than fertile-looking dyke-like dame states, "I have four nieces and when I play with them or change their diapers, I see my family in their faces. And then it becomes very personal for me because it makes me realize I might not see my face reflected back." Somehow how I doubt that this woman would be doing the world a favor if she sired more people with her sub-homely face, but I digress. Naturally, the estrogen-driven egomania does not end there, as an attractive dirty blonde is depicted ranting, "I thought for sure by now I would have at least one or two children and the fact that I haven't makes me feel like I have been left out of the secret society; the society of mothers," as if the sole reason to have children is so that you can fit in with other catty conformist cunts.

In a scene that seems to epitomize the quasi-sociopathic mentality that many modern women have, Gena shamelessly attempts to coerce her redhead friend Rosie (Frances Fisher of Clint Eastwood's Unforgiven (1992) and Brad Furman's The Lincoln Lawyer (2011)) into intentionally getting pregnant without her unsuspecting long-term boyfriend's knowledge. Luckily, Rosie is somewhat more morally sane and responds to Gena by stating in an angry fashion, "There's two types of women in this world that get accidentally pregnant: idiots and liars."

Clearly Gena does not care if she is an idiot and/or liar, as she is a slave to the to the curse of her seemingly perennial spinsterdom, thus making it seem all the more absurd that she will not allow her fairly wealthy boyfriend to impregnate her, but such is the perennial paradox that is the innately irrational female mind. Notably, towards the end of the baby shower, a wop-like chick with an oh-so chic goofy little boy hat states while seeming extremely desperate, "When I think about how the body's natural response to a wound is to heal, it reminds me of how I feel that a woman's urge to have a baby, or her desire to have a baby, is a way of the body healing itself. And I feel that it's so strong and powerful and that, in some ways, that's why we feel that we're not whole, or I feel that I'm not whole, by not having a baby. It's as if I've been wounded and if I get to have the baby, I'm gonna be healed." Ultimately, the woman with the atrocious hat on her head seems to be quite right, as the film concludes abruptly with an astonishingly absurd tacked-on happy end where a glaringly happy Gena is depicted caressing her unclad pregnant stomach while proudly declaring with a self-satisfied smile, "I guess you're wondering how this happened [...] I met someone wonderful, you know, and it just happened." As I have certainly noticed in regard to women I personally know, becoming a mother certainly seems to help to cure various forms of female neurosis. In the very last scene of the film, lead actress Victoria Foyt is depicted frolicking around a pool while holding her real-life baby daughter Sabrina Jaglom. Not surprisingly, a title reading "For my daughter, Sabrina" scrolls up the screen during this motherly scene, thereupon confirming that Jaglom largely made the film as a sort of celluloid baby shower.

While Babyfever seems like a sort of cinematic love letter to Jaglom's wife and her struggle to find the right man to get pregnant (notably, when Foyt is featured at the end of the film pregnant and stating, "I met someone wonderful," she is clearly talking about Jaglom in what ultimately proves to be a vomit-inducing scene of pseudo-sentimental masturbatory self-indulgence), the film feels like a cheap con packed with phony pathos and kitsch melodramatics when one considers that the auteur would eventually divorce the mother of his children for a redheaded Shiksa actress named Tanna Frederick that is young enough to be his granddaughter and bears a strikingly resemblance to his own daughter Sabrina. Somewhat humorously considering Jaglom's ultra-left-wing politics (as revealed in the book My Lunches with Orson (2013), Orson Welles would oftentimes rebuke him for being such a hysterical "bleeding heart liberal"), Foyt, who has reinvented herself as an adult fiction sci-fi writer, was accused of 'racism' because her dystopian novel Save the Pearls: Revealing Eden (2012) depicts an inverted world where negroes make up a pernicious ruling class called 'Coals' who came to dominate the world because global warming has killed off most whites as a result of their melanin-deprived skin being too sensitive to the averse environment. In fact, Foyt was so ruthlessly hounded by pathetic social justice warrior types that the new politically correct owners of the long running American fantasy and horror fiction pulp mag Weird Tales decided to renege on their plans to publish excerpts from her novel after these resentful slave-morality-ridden pansies threatened to boycott the magazine (naturally, these same parasites of puritanical racial justice have also flooded book review sites with hysterical negative reviews). Of course, as a beautiful white woman that decided to commit Rassenschande and procreate with the proudly effeminate great-great-great-great-grandson of Jewish enlightenment philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, it is dubious to say the least to accuse Foyt of being a racist propagandist who writes novels to promote the survival of Europids (but then again, considering how her marriage ended with Jaglom, she might have finally wised up). Somewhat curiously considering her mating habits, the eponymous heroine of Foyt's novel is a self-loathing girl that believes she is ugly because she has white skin.

Personally, I see it as a fairly tragic and soulless thing when a beautiful woman that is desperate to get knocked up decides to hook up with a 'safe' but prosaic beta-bitch because he provides her with security, but such sad scenarios seem increasingly common, especially in our abstract technocratic world where physical strength and masculinity are becoming increasingly obsolete in the eyes of many women, who seem to have lost their maternal instincts and never seem to consider that reproducing with a weak, ugly, and/or racially hostile fellow can have catastrophic consequences in terms of the progeny she sires. Indeed, while Babyfever somewhat depicts otherwise, most women will always choose a wealthy man that they are not attracted to over a middleclass man that they are madly in love with, as they are cold and calculating and have special archaic instincts to control their emotions, or as Esther Vilar wrote in her classic text The Manipulated Man (1971), "We have already mentioned woman's lack of emotional capacity. The fact that women make every attempt to suppress man's ability to express his emotions is a certain indication of this. Yet she still contrives to create the myth of feminine depth of feeling and vulnerability [...] Women really are callous creatures – mainly because it is to their disadvantage to feel deeply. Feelings might seduce them into choosing a man who is of no use to them, i.e., a man whom they could not manipulate at will [...] What an advantage a man would have if only he realized the cold, clear thoughts running through a woman's head while her eyes are brimming with tears."

Of course, while Babyfever is full of emotionally grotesque women crying, the only sincere tears shed are those of self-pity. Indeed, I think Jaglom's identifies with woman because he can relate to their tools of emotional manipulation, which is indubitably the director's most glaring 'talent' as a singularly vainglorious filmmaker who has made a career out of shamelessly whoring out his and his friends' toddler-esque temper tantrums and pity parties. Although Jaglom likes to think of his films as "Rorschach drawings of his emotional condition," they have no more depth than the petty phony tears a woman will shed when she has betrayed a lover and wants him to forget that he is mad at her. After all, normal individuals who are genuinely miserable do not go around flaunting their misery as if it is a glorious badge of honor, yet Jaglom thinks that is an act of sheer artistic brilliance to make a film like Always (1985) where he immortalized his first divorce by casting himself and his first Shiksa wife in the lead roles and reenacted some of the moments leading up to the disintegration of their marriage. If one learns anything from watching Babyfever, it is to stay clear of clear of childless women in their mid-30s to early-40s, especially if you're a dignified male that values your sanity, as baby rabies make PMS seem like child's play by comparison and will inspire women to decidedly desperate things that might include destroying your life, not to mention the fact these sort of women tend to carry tons of emotional baggage and rarely stay with their partners. Although a sort of quasi-rom-com, the only humorous aspects of Jaglom's film seem to be accidental, including grotesque Jewish caricatures (e.g. real-life Jewish real estate developer Zack Norman portraying a super sleazy fictional real estate developer who is so desperate for money that he upsets his wife by neglecting to tell her that he has taken a painting that was hanging on the wall of their family home to get it 'appraised') and the largely ridiculous tears of spoiled lapsed beauties who refuse to accept the fact that they long ago reached the peak of their pulchritude. Ultimately, watching Babyfever felt like spending nearly two hours in a sort of early-1990s Hebraic Hollywood spinster hell where a strategically multicultural cast of dumb and obnoxious dames in obscenely outmoded clothing demand that the viewer endure their incessant whining and complaining about problems that they are largely responsible for, thereupon making the film the perfect audio-visual torture device as well as something that can be utilized to clear out an entire room of people during a party.

CORALINE

Henry Selick (2009)

Coraline is a 3D adventure brought to the screen by the mind that has delivered us James and the Giant Peach, The Nightmare Before Christmas, and the under appreciated Monkeybone. However, you wouldn't know this because Tim Burton's name has been put on two out of three of his masterworks. Henry Selick is a man who does every bit of slave labor and it treated with the idea of being generally unknown. Hell, until a couple years ago, I'd thought that Tim Burton actually directed both James and the Giant Peach and The Nightmare Before Christmas. Shame on me for not recognizing the talent that could never be the same director as of The Corpse Bride. Coraline is a film released marketed solely as a three dimensional motion picture blowout. On each of the 3D films being released, a slew of animated film trailers accompany the print promoting the new escapades of the theatrical experience while spilling out of the screen. It's a form of oblivious shameful promotion for something that can only do magic for certain genres. Coraline, in question, is a marvelous film but as previously pointed out by Fox, the "depth" adds annoyance to the visual splendor and only impedes the dark, morose effect of Neil Gaiman's horror tale of puberty. Coraline would best be viewed in a home theater of choice rather than a dark auditorium filled with sniveling brats talking aloud, denying the influx of manners. This fairy tale follows a girl who's just bored with it all after moving into an apartment with her dreary mother and father. Like most children, Coraline is blind to the fact that she is loved and seeks out counsel in another world that she discovers through a miniature door. Like Alice, she discovers marvelous wonders but the truth is that it's all a facade put on upon a witch of sorts. The witch aspect of the film comes on upon as a tedious afterthought that's never exploited to an acceptable level. You'll hear mention of her, her purpose, and her legacy, but you'll get nothing more than that. Concerning my reception to the film, Coraline is an animated blend of Silent Hill and Alice in Wonderland. To provide raw support, figuratively and metaphysically, a sidekick called Wybie is introduced early on sporting a mask reminiscent of Tim Burton's Batman Returns goon's. It's only revealed at the end that he is in fact black, by sight of his crusted Aunt Jemima lookalike grandmother. He puts up as a good supporting character and defeats the purpose of such by having his own unequivocal charm and his uncanny ability to deal with the nagging personality of Coraline. Seeing as he doesn't appear in the story by Neil Gaiman, he revealed that this character was needed or else Coraline would have spent the duration of the film talking to herself. In Mike Leigh's Naked, there was a line that reminded me greatly of Coraline's struggle to cure boredom. Louise: So what happened, were you bored in Manchester? Johnny: Was I bored? No, I wasn't fuckin' bored. I'm never bored. That's the trouble with everybody - you're all so bored. You've had nature explained to you and you're bored with it, you've had the living body explained to you and you're bored with it, you've had the universe explained to you and you're bored with it, so now you want cheap thrills and, like, plenty of them, and it doesn't matter how tawdry or vacuous they are as long as it's new as long as it's new as long as it flashes and fuckin' bleeps in forty fuckin' different colors. So whatever else you can say about me, I'm not fuckin' bored. Repeat after me - Coraline is not for children. In no way, shape, or form, has this movie been created to appease the hungry eyes of voracious dwarfs. This film highlights phantasmagorical carnivals and stage plays featuring rabid mice, naked obese ladies, dead children that have been kidnapped by a foreign power (i.e. sexual trafficking), and many other meandering surrealist touches. Coraline is a worthy experience for those who enjoy stop-motion or even just the presence of her devoted martyrdom for her parent's sake. It's still a bit disappointing to discover that the hell her parents went through wasn't remembered. If you enjoy every bit of animation and surrealism as you can swallow, as well as appreciating amazing voice work from Keith David, then Coraline is a knockout and no exception from Selick's other works. This comes highly recommended as both a film and a message promoting anti-materialism.

Henry Weintraub* (2008)

In the generation of low-budget shorts, only several are honestly worth mentioning. The cinematic genius of Broadstone's shorts 3 Dead Girls! being the most influential of which I've seen. When involved with low-budget films, it's easy to become astray with ideas and try to soar to high, only to fall back down to the ground. Henry Weintraub's short film Depraved follows a paraplegic killer. Killer in the sense of vengeance and self-defense, mind you. Edith is a beautiful woman who is catatonic (In a "play dead" sense) and wheelchair bound. Show through a series of vignettes, we learn why she won't eat or speak, and why she is crippled. Together with her backpack of tools of vengeance, she begins a slow quest to smite those who have ever wronged her. Perhaps this film's most recognizable scene is the house invasion scene complimented with a wheelchair or it's scintillating use of Lloyd Kaufman as a mild-mannered doctor on a house call. Indeed, Lloyd Kaufman is in it, and he has an entirely new stage presence. He speaks in a normal low voice which actually hints a sign of intelligence rather than his goofy get-up where he's normally surrounded by naked "Tromettes" When you bring up these revenge films, most of them incorporate rape as the catalyst of these ironic and justful deaths which usually end with castration or a family left behind by a cheating, raping husband, this seen in I Spit on your Grave. Similar to Nicholson's Torched, Depraved features gruesome bloodshed and a nihilistic atmosphere, creating a raw and tense foreground. The only difference between the two is the lack of a horrible soundtrack and great acting. Weintraub captures the clever malleability of the shadows and provides excellent lighting. Depraved features some amazing acting followed by manipulated gestures that bring the overall force of the film down. While many might scowl at the two bumbling detectives in this film, I appreciate the rudimentary characters. They offer a terrific throwback to when cops weren't given 13 types of personality disorders in order to make it "arthouse depth" Rural America is always to blame in these films. Filthy white trash rednecks are always the people depicted in film to never associate with. I'm sure if a Negro were to play the raping villain that would be considered racist. Depraved is a short film that works within it's own constraints. It offers a glimpse into a mind that really has no other options but to kill and to avenge. After all, Edith really has nothing left to live for except for her final piece of art; a blood-splattered canvas.

BEER CHASE

Herbert Achternbusch (1977)

Once again paying penetrating anti-homage to the South German state he loves to hate, rural Bavaria, absurdist arthouse comedian Herbert Achternbusch's Bierkampf (1977) aka Beer Chase is a film about the collective hyper-hedonistic mass hysteria that is the distinctly Bavarian Oktoberfest – a 16-day festival celebrating the krauts' greatest vice; beer – in all of its gutter-level glory. Starring Achternbusch himself in the rather ridiculous role of an unloved, unlikeable, and disrespected roguish police officer who gets his kicks by kicking people and acting like an all-around Bavarian buffoon, Beer Chase is the sort of quasi-gonzo-style mockumentary/documentary/narrative hybrid that psychopathic Sacha Baron Cohen would later seemingly mimic with his Semitic slapstick scat pieces like Borat (2006) and The Dictator (2012), although on a somewhat less personal and insightful level. To say that arthouse agitator Achternbusch seems to have a great sense of shame and disdain for his Bavarian friends and family would be an unsound understatement as his films, especially Beer Chase, feature the same sort of ethno-masochistic mockery of kraut kultur that would predominate in the artistic works of German Dadaist George Grosz – a supposed true blue heinee who created curious and callous caricatures of German figures as subhuman untermensch – albeit to a more realistic, intimate, and obnoxious degree. Featuring a self-loathing Afro-Bavarian, an authentic Bavarian in blackface, a theology student who has lost the faith and now hocks cigs and cigars like a Pakistani street merchant, an elderly man who lost his dream of being able to compose orchestras after catching frostbite on his fingers during his tour of Stalingrad, and a slew of sexually repressed authoritarian wives and emasculated, embittered men, Beer Chase is the sort of anti-völkisch and peasant-parodying piece that is contra to everything National Socialism was all about, aside from the bodacious barroom beer-chugging of the brownshirts, yet without the Hebraic hate of Unholy-Wood to taint the tomfoolery of this distinctly 'German comedy' with the sort of mundane Mel Brooks-esque mumbo jumbo of the kosher conman persuasion that has been beaten to death since the Second World War. In other words, Beer Chase was sown in the banal backwoods of Achternbusch's Bavaria as opposed to Vaudeville or some Polish shtetl and for that reason alone makes Beer Chase worth the price of admission.

I would be lying if I did not admit that I hate all forms of alcohol, especially beer, as well as bar-dwelling drunkards, novice teenage alcoholics, inebriated vagrants, crypto-alcoholic soccer moms, belligerent bee-bopping black drunks, piss drunk punks, muddled heavy metal morons, pissed preppy pompous asses, bourgeois beer connoisseurs, wine-sniffing wimps, and just about every other dipsomaniac dipshit disposition, but I have slightly less animosity for drunken rednecks, at least of the patently pathetic and, in turn, unintentionally humorous kind, which is luckily the sort of debauched drinker type that is most prominent in Beer Chase; an unlove letter to the Bavarian everyman, the bumpkin barfly whose only source of solace in life is enjoying a cold glass of brewsky with his equally pitiable compatriots. In Beer Chase, movie-masochist marvel Herbert Achternbusch – a man that prides himself on getting in trouble on and off camera – stars as anti-hero ‘Herbert, Polizist’ who pits himself against these poor peasant and pisswater-possessed souls as a hysterical human-punching-bag who goes from table to table inciting individuals by using a variety of moronic and boorish antagonizing tactics at a large ‘Oktoberfest’ festival in Bavaria. As a swarthy police man with large black curls and a matching mustache, Achternbusch – the master of German arthouse disguise in a role that is typically contra to his true character – seems most authentic as a despairing fellow that is fed up with life and especially his nagging wife who, like everyone he knows and doesn’t know, treats him like pure scheiße, but to a more extreme degree because as she tells her hubby, “with me – life sentence”; a very real hell that neither will dare escape from as it would be far too taboo for such conservative blue-collar types to dissolve their ill-fated marriage. Crestfallen cop Herbert also seems quite apathetic towards his job, so much so that he allows an upside-down naked man, obviously in great distress as he is furiously kicking at the air, to sink to his demise without lifting a finger to help. Herbert is not the only miserable fellow in town, as a handsome yet humorless theology student turned cigarette-peddler who may or may not be the police officer’s brother believes quite seriously that, “There is no salvation in the world, yet. There cannot be salvation in the world because there is no world, yet. What you see here cannot be the world.” But, of course, the miserable existence these Bavarian proletarians call life is their world and a rather real yet redundant one at that, hence why they celebrate inane inebriation for 16 liver-busting days every October to escape from this world and the dreariness of their horribly humdrum lives.

Totally blurring the line between fiction and reality, especially during the second half of the film, Beer Chase ironically gets the most interesting and unbelievable during the real-life scenes at Oktoberfest where the contrived character of policeman Herbert literally bumps heads and beer mugs with the real world for the most ridiculous and looney of consequences, as if the silent humor of Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton was to meet the absurdist realism of a Werner Herzog film. Of course, some of the scenes set during the Oktoberfest are contrived, including a conversation with a black Bavarian who states, “I always say, I prefer a Negro to a woman...A Negro has a brain too...How are things in Uganda?” in a most bizarre manner as if this Negro – who has a striking resemblance to Ugandan dictator Idi Amin (who was still in power during the time of the film’s production) – has fully assimilated himself into a banal Bavarian way of life, so much so that he has consummately forgotten his Bantu roots, yet other scenes are totally indistinguishable from reality and fiction, hence the low-brow comedic genius of Beer Chase. At the conclusion of Beer Chase, policeman Herbert goes on an insane rant as if he is experiencing some sort of pornographic psychological break, stating to countless people that "Today I will kill his sod meat! Adieu!....Adieu!" after proclaiming that he has sexually ravaged and impregnated 100 Frauen, thereupon signaling the beginning of the end of the Oktoberfest festivities.

In the end, the drunken policeman lays face down in an undignified manner among trash and other debris left by the seemingly barbarian Bavarian beer devotees, an eventful event that his compatriots remark was the natural result of "a zero" who "wants to be something. A policeman, of all things" that has "killed him, the zero." In a display of what is surely a parody of stereotypical female narcissism, Herbert's mistress also remarks, "How can someone I like kill himself!" and his widow, in a separate scene, similarly declares that their life together amounted to "nothing" in a decidedly cold manner. Like most of Achternbusch's films, the memory of National Socialism is sprinkled throughout Beer Chase such as Herbert mistaking the sound of a brass horn instrument for the Wehrmacht marching band, which is especially interesting when one considers that during World War II, from 1939 to 1945, Oktoberfest was discontinued and Oktoberfest beer (which is 2% more alcohol than normal beer) was banned, thus it seems rather ironic that the backslider Bavarian auteur would depict the festival as the height of South German imbecility, especially when considering his hatred of all things associated with the Third Reich. Thus, one can only assume that Achternbusch – who was born and raised in the land he can't just seem to forget, let alone depict cinematically – hates just about everything and anything distinctly Bavarian, even more so than the Nazis. Ironically, Beer Chase is probably the only film directed by the kaiser of avant-garde German comedy that would be accessible to peasants, especially of the Bavarian brand, and one of the very few truly "proletarian" cinematic slapstick pieces. Say what you will about bacchanalian hillbilly folk, but they are usually the people that are the least inhibited about laughing at themselves and I would not be surprised if Beer Chase is considered a clodhopper cult classic of sorts in Bavaria. I, for one, as an adamant opponent of alcohol, cannot think of another film that made drunken debauchery with homely women and frenzied fists over spilled beer mugs seem like a delectable affair.

THE LAST HOLE

Herbert Achternbusch (1981)

Admittedly, any respect that I once had for Charlie Chaplin as both a man and comedian was virtually all but totally annihilated when I witnessed his lame ass Fremdscham-enducing speech at the conclusion of The Great Dictator (1940) where he acts like a slave-morality-ridden and Adderall-addled bleeding heart autist suffering from an acute social justice seizure. Indeed, it was no so much Chaplin's plastic left-wing politics that I found revolting, but his pathetic pseudo-humanistic American-politican-esque pandering, as if he would eat the rotten kosher cunt of Emma Lazarus's corpse to prove that he is the kind of super duper morally righteous humanist hero that was born to wear a nice and shiny Zio-approved 'good guy badge.' While Chaplin might have once proudly stated, "I remain just one thing, and one thing only, and that is a clown. It places me on a far higher plane than any politician," he certainly demonstrated with his fairly philo-Semitic Uncle Adolf satire, which was heavily influenced by his viewing of Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph des Willens (1935) aka Triumph des Willens and unsettling personal obsession with the fact that he and the Führer has many personal similarities (aside from their superficial physical similarities and being born four days apart in April 1889, both men were self-made individuals that had risen to international fame from abject poverty), that he would have made for a most successful democratic political prostitute due to his unrivaled groveling prowess (though I must admit that both politicians and comedians need to be fairly proficient at self-degradation and self-exploitation if they hope to be even remotely successful). While anarchistic kraut clown Herbert Achternbusch (Bierkampf aka Beer Chase, Hick's Last Stand) might have (meta)political beliefs and ideals that I find to be somewhat dubious, I have nothing but total respect for him as an artist and filmmaker, as he is a true iconoclast that would never degrade himself to the level of doing some super sentimental speech like some cheap Baptist preacher. Arguably the greatest example of both Achternbusch's uncompromising transgressiveness and incendiary idiosyncrasy as a filmmaker is his rather grim black-and-white 'holocaust comedy' Das letzte Loch (1981) aka The Last Hole where the truly audacious auteur portrays a psychosis-ridden professional dipsomaniac, fiancée-killer, and private detective who incessantly drinks schnapps in the hope of forgetting about the Jews that were killed in the so-called shoah and who ultimately decides commit his own one-man-holocaust by jumping into a guido volcano after realizing that he will never be able to escape the Hebraic phantoms that haunt his malevolently morbid mind. A killer with a curious conscience, Achternbusch's character is so horrifyingly confounded and bizarrely nihilistic that, despite the fact he kills his fiancée for showing him love, he is deeply emotionally invested with and totally traumatized by the miserable fate of millions of Jews.

THE LAST HOLE

A vocal enemy of kosher commie Theodor Adorno's famously insane statement, "Writing poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric," Achternbusch notably once rightly declared, "It must have been then [during the early 1960s] that a German philosopher claimed that one could not write poetry after Auschwitz—which I thought was outrageous, and I replied that after Auschwitz one could only write poetry." Undoubtedly, The Last Hole is Achternbusch's most blatant celluloid assault against Adorno's patently absurd statement as an exceedingly eccentric piece of esoteric post-Nazi ethno-masochism where the auteur eventually commits suicide by throwing himself into a volcano because, to quote the character's rather preposterously poetic suicide letter, he wants to "...belong to the death mound of the victims. I do not want to belong to the death mound of the self-righteous Germans." Like virtually all of Achternbusch's cinematic works, the film belongs to the 'anti-Heimat' subgenre, which was somewhat popular during the late-1960s through late-1980s among filmmakers of the New German Cinema movement because it ruthlessly mocked the once highly popular 'Heimat-film' (aka 'homeland-film') genre. Since Heimat films romanticized sentimental Germanic rural living, many filmmakers of Achternbusch's generation saw it as 'fascistic' and thus deconstructed and defiled the genre for their own purposes, with The Last Hole representing one of the most extreme, ruthless, and unforgiving assaults against 'cinéma de papa.' Of course, not unlike Volker Schlöndorff with his anti-Heimat piece Der plötzliche Reichtum der armen Leute von Kombach (1971) aka The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach, albeit in a more scandalous and scathing fashion, Achternbusch's film dares to pour salt on old wounds by reintroducing the Jewish question in an obnoxiously ironic way. Needless to say, as a work that mediates on Teutonic alcoholism and the infamy of the Nazi holocaust, Achternbusch's film is hardly endearing towards the Aryan homeland, especially the director's southeastern German state of Bavaria, which is portrayed as a grotesquely gothic anti-fairytale realm full of boorish beer-chugging buffoons, sexually-repressed waitresses, and cheap and emotionally dead whores.

Following in the footsteps of the director's first feature Das Andechser Gefühl (1974) aka The Andechs Feeling, which depicts a schoolteacher portrayed by Achternbusch who slowly drinks himself to death whilst flies drown in his mug of lager, The Last Hole is indubitably the most morbid and vulgarly melancholic comedy that I have ever seen as a seriously sick celluloid work about a perniciously passive-aggressive monster who lacks the capacity to love and instead kills his lover while obsessively dwelling on dead Jews. Rather fittingly, Achternbusch, not unlike the late great belated auteur Christoph Schlingensiefel, has been oftentimes described as a comedic heir to avant-garde comedian Karl Valentin—a fellow Bavarian who has been called the "Charlie Chaplin of Germany" and whose preternatural brand of humor has been loosely linked to Dadaism, social expressionism and the degenerate modern art movement known as 'New Objectivity' (aka Neue Sachlichkeit)—though his work is ultimately much more extreme and iconoclastic, albeit in a sort of insanely ironical fashion that will have the viewer questioning whether they should laugh or put a bullet in their brain. Indeed, despite incessantly mocking and satirizing Germany and especially Bavaria, Achternbusch's films are shamelessly Bavarian to the core to the point where he was ridiculed by Australian novelist and sometimes filmmaker Peter Handke (Chronicle of Current Events, The Left-Handed Woman) due to the patently peasant oriented essence of his work, or as the writer wrote himself: "Achternbusch ought to know better than any other writer. Why then does he content himself with fantasies taken from the pages of the local paper? The result: slavish – or in Achternbusch's case, simulating slavish – adherence to the culture cliché that nobody can be represented as an individual anymore, that we have all become damaged, perforated foils for anything and everything already illustrated and pictured: formless beings, ventriloquist existences. Does Achternbusch offer more than merely rhetorical, literally 'sub'-cultural challenge to the world of the newspaper . . . ? Or are his travesties of plastic mythologies a kind of resistance?"

To answer Handke's question, I would describe Achternbusch's films as Grosz-esque anti-folk flicks directed by a man that—whether consciously or subconsciously—seems to realize that he is a very product of the culture and people that he so absurdly loathes, like a schizophrenic Jewish neo-Nazi who likes to spend his free time chowing down on lox and watching David Duke videos on YouTube while sporting a yarmulke on his freshly shaven head. Indeed, a film where Achternbusch puts on a Wehrmacht helmet only moments before committing suicide in solidarity with the Hebrews that were killed by his family members and countrymen during the Second World War, The Last Hole is arguably the most preposterously potent expression of the singularly nihilistic and self-destructive absurdity that is the post-WWII German Volksgeist. Like a putrid post-Auschwitz motion picture mockery of the pastoral Aryan utopias dreamed up by Symbolist artist Fidus in his paintings and illustrations, Achternbusch's grotesque anti-folk gothic might technically be a comedy, but it is ultimately more haunting and disturbing than humorous, as if the auteur merely uses his keenly passive-aggressive form of comedy as a therapeutic means to attempt to expel some of the metaphysical poison from his seemingly forlorn soul. Indeed, while I would not exactly call myself a shoah movie connoisseur, I must admit that The Last Hole is easily the most disturbing, dejecting, and debasing holocaust film that I have ever seen. In other words, I certainly experienced more pain and discomfort from 5-minutes of Achternbusch's film than in over ten hours of Claude Lanzmann's anti-polak doc Shoah (1985). If there is any film that could make a Jew feel sorry for the German persecutor (and I doubt there is), it is most certainly Achternbusch's film, which ultimately demonstrates that German comedy is no less ruthless than the interrogating tactics of SS-Hauptsturmführer Klaus Barbie.

THE LAST HOLE

In short, if Schlingensiefel once candidly stated in the doc Christoph Schlingensiefel und seine Filme (2005) aka Christoph Schlingensiefel and His Films directed by Frieder Schlaich that he thought he would make a great concentration camp guard, The Last Hole demonstrates that Achternbusch is the Josef Mengele of clowns, albeit with more bizarre fetishes.

Beginning in just as an abrupt fashion as any Achternbusch flick, The Last Hole starts with a woman with a fairly unflattering physique named Susn (Achternbusch regular Gabi Geist) watering her attic (!) while wearing nothing but panties and a bra. Susn is terribly sexually repressed and trying in vain to appeal to her seemingly spiritually castrated fiancé 'The Nile' (Achternbusch), who merely stares at her in a less than admiring fashion while sitting in a chair like a tired elderly grandfather who cannot be bothered to get off of his old crusty diabetes-ridden ass. While Susn yells, "Get your clothes off, I can't wait any longer! Always waiting...Let's wait afterwards if we can do it a second time!" the Nile—an emotional cripple that seems to enjoy nothing about life, including sex and romance—is hardly impressed by her salacious nagging and proceeds to ruthlessly berate his fiancée every chance he gets. Indeed, when Susn demonstrates that she is a proud peasant by bragging that she works with her hands, the Nile rather rudely replies, "Don't talk rubbish...you're a waitress, and you live so poorly because you drink 20 cognacs a day." Of course, flattery also fails to work with the Nile, as he is only agitated when sex-starved Susn pseudo-seductively states to him, "Without you I live in the desert. Without you I am a desert! A piece of desert [...] Flow through me." In fact, the Nile cannot even tolerate having Susn anywhere near him as indicated by his misanthropic remark to her, "I can't understand people who always have to be so close to one another, when there's so much room in the world! People who have to be so close to one another remind me of car drivers." After curiously cleaning his fingernails with a knife in a fairly menacing fashion, the Nile threatens to stab Susn if she dares to try to kiss him (according to him, "When some Jews were making drawings in Auschwitz, that is a kiss for me!"). Needless to say, the Nile eventually makes good on his perverse promise and stabs and kills Susn when she desperately attempts to kiss him. Of course, he is hardly heartbroken about his fiancée's death because, as he states to her regarding their engagement before mindlessly killing her, "Everyone knows it's just for show. All except the ones I am engaged with." Indeed, as the film eventually reveals, the Nile has started various sexless romances with a number of beat-up bar whores around Bavaria.

The Nile loves playing word games, especially ones involving the timeless phrase "6 million." Indeed, when the quasi-protagonist mentions that he has "6 million" during a flashback scene, Susn assumes that he has "six million marks" and brags to a male co-worker at the bar she works at about her beloved's imaginary wealth. While the Nile "lives on beer" and is a self-described drinker by trade, he is also a highly specialized private detective that investigates cases of treacherous Jews screwing over their Jewish friends during the holocaust, as if it is a source of solace for him to know that not all Jews killed during WWII were killed by Germans. While the Nile drinks to forget about dead Hebrews, he also believes that after having four drinks he will develop the capacity to feel some sort of sexual arousal for Susn. When Susn begs for the Nile to slit her throat in a flashback scene, he replies, "Your blood may come upon me some other time. I will retire for today. I live in the last hole with my 6 million. And I hope I will not dream of 6 million dead Jews again tonight." Indeed, the Nile lives in an eponymous hole in the ground in the middle of a grassy hill and after emerging from said hole one morning after killing his fiancée, he is given somewhat of a shock while shaving by a lake when Susn's ghost appears, declares she is pregnant, and then states, "I'm dead. I bequeath you my art: a bloodstained dress." Like with the Jews, the Nile clearly does not want to remember Susn's death, so he immediately decides to dig a hole like a dog with her bare hands and bury the bloodstained dress. Luckily for the Nile, he has more than one Susn in his life.

As an assumed result of the fact that he has murdered Susn, two cops that resemble burly beatnik bikers, 'Stupid Cloud' (Franz Baumgartner) and 'Green Asshole,' begin a manhunt for the Nile and opt to start a literal "scorched earth" operation to burn him out of his hole. Rather absurdly, Stupid Cloud opts to shoot and kill his comrade when they are in the middle of hatching their scorched earth campaign. Indeed, for whatever reason, Stupid Cloud has decided to betray Green Asshole and join up with the Nile. Of course, both men, like virtually all of the characters in the film, have a tragic haunted essence about them, as if they are possessed by the accursed ghosts of their ancestors who froze to death on the Eastern Front during the Battle of Stalingrad (incidentally, in his film Heilt Hitler! (1986), Achternbusch would portray a German soldier who thinks he is still fighting in Stalingrad after randomly waking up from a long slumber 40 years after WWII has ended). While awkwardly carrying Green Asshole's lifeless corpse, Stupid Cloud spots the Nile, so he decides to drop his friend's body and pick up the protagonist instead, even though said protagonist has no problem walking on his own. While carrying the Nile across a field, Stupid Cloud mentions to him how his grade school teacher forced him to learn "six million foreign words." When the Nile remarks that it is "six million Jews" and not "six million foreign words," Stupid Cloud humorously replies, "Sure... but what's the difference? Of those 6 million foreign words I remember only three. But I couldn't tell you if I still know three Jews." Stupid Cloud also informs the Nile that his teacher used to pass by Auschwitz concentration camp every single day during WWII and noticed that it was always quiet there, thus leading the educator to come to the natural conclusion that no Jews could have been killed there. Despite their minor disputes, Stupid Cloud and the Nile ultimately decide to make a "getaway" together since they are both murderers that are evading justice. Naturally, being fugitives of the law does not stop the Nile and Stupid

Cloud from hanging around Bavaria for another day while getting good and drunk at various local bars. Of course, before leaving, the Nile must be reunited with the woman that might be described as his one true love.

Upon going to a doctor (Wolfgang Ebert of Uwe Brandner's Ich liebe dich, ich töte dich (1971) aka I Love You, I Kill You) with a fetish for Buddhist religious icons and being informed that he has diabetes, the Nile replies, "I need beer. With one pint of beer I forget 500,000 Jews. But at night they all come back. And when I had 12 pints then 6 million Jews come to me. But the 40 pints I have to drink each day bring me 20 million at night. And that's not even half of those who met their death in the last war. That's just the Russians slaughtered by the Germans." While the Nile then proceeds to beg the doctor to kill him, the physician replies, "Drink schnapps. Beer confuses the memory. On schnapps, you can forget. I'll prescribe schnapps for you." Unfortunately, things get a little nasty between the protagonist and doc when the latter reveals that his father admitted to him on his deathbed that he spared a Jew during the holocaust after coercing the Hebrew into attacking his kosher comrade. Indeed, at this point, the Nile reveals that he is a private detective that looks into the "murders of Jews that had been friends." After the Nile calls the doctor's dead father a "German pig," the physician tears up his prescription for schnapps and throws him out of his office. Unfortunately, it seems that the Nile will have to stick to bars if he wants to forget about kosher corpses. Notably, before being kicked out of the doctor's office, the Nile expresses minor interest in killing a Jewish barber so that his alcohol intake will match up with the number of murdered Israelites that he has on his conscience.

While Susn is dead, the Nile has another fiancée named 'Last Susn' (Annamirli Bierbichler) that works at a strip club called 'Pee Piss' that he can confide in. Unfortunately, when the Nile goes to see Last Susn, she is being mechanically fucked by a random guy, so the protagonist picks up the man during mid-coitus and tosses out of a window. Before defenestrating the stranger, the Nile calmly states to him, "If you can screw, you can also fly." Naturally, the two lovers decide to catch up with each other and Last Susn reminds the Nile how he once said to her, "... I will be your Nile. The Nile that refreshes you in the middle of the wasteland." Last Susn also describes to the Nile how her co-worker Wurmin is regularly held upside down by two men while five others "pour beer into her pussy." Needless to say, as a man that is regularly haunted by six million dead Jews, the Nile seems hardly effected by Last Susn's bizarre sex stories. Ultimately, Last Susn joins the Nile and Stupid Cloud for a pilgrimage to Stromboli Volcano, Italy that they take via train. During the train ride, Stupid Cloud becomes deeply offended when a waiter attempts to serve him a bowl of spaghetti, so he dumps the food on the goofy server's head and then proceeds to trim the noodles that are lying on the man's head with scissors as if he were giving the poor fellow a haircut. While the Nile drinks shot after shot of schnapps on the train, Laßt Susn exposes her broken heart to him by somberly stating, “I do accept your right not to love me. It’s even my duty to accept it.” Laßt Susn also reveals that she does not want forgiveness from the protagonist for whatever reason, stating “Forgiveness? Why should you forgive me? I’m dead to you. But because you didn’t kill me I wished a little Hitler on you for two days, who would send you through the chimney.” Indeed, it seems that the Nile’s lack of love and incapacity for affection haunts Laßt Susn in a fashion not unlike how the dead Jews haunt the perennially perturbed protagonist. Somehow, the train ends up in the ocean, thus inspiring Stupid Cloud to state, “Dammit, now the rails have ended! And what now? And what now?”

Upon arriving at beaches of Stromboli, the Nile states to himself, “Now I see the lily pad again and the frog on it and the water lily at it. The water lily is the Laßt Susn and the frog is me.” The Nile is wearing a necklace with a flesh-like medallion that looks like a mold of a rectum that he describes as a letter, which he ultimately has Laßt Susn read. As the viewer soon discovers, it is actually a suicide letter and the Nile has come to Stromboli to jump into the volcano to sacrifice himself to the glorious six million. While on the beach, the three friends encounter a fat elderly woman named Barbara who seems disturbed by the fact that the Nile randomly puts on a German helmet. As Laßt Susn tells Barbara, the Nile wears the helmet, “Because he’s afraid [...] Of the Germans.” When Laßt Susn reads an excerpt from the Nile’s letter that reads, “Panzer after Panzer drove over my mind’s eye. Teachers and masters hated me minding my mind’s eye,” Barbara remarks that the protagonist has, “a tumor inside his head instead of brains.” Ultimately, Laßt Susn decides she “can’t go on” with finishing the letter after reading the Nile’s words to her, “I ate jam only out of sympathy for you. Without hope for you I wouldn’t have opened any can [...] That’s why I had become a private detective after all, because I was searching for you, everywhere and in everything. Under the pretense of fornication and infidelity, which to investigate someone had give me the assignment, I snooped around in the houses that had been torn open by the war and blocked up again too quickly, or in others that regrettably had been spared by the war, or in those that were misguidedly built after the war, expecting you behind every door. In the thirty-year-long brutality of post-war Germany, I searched for you, you, the tenderness, the insight, the effortlessness, the modesty, and the pride to endure this life with dignity.” Of course, Laßt Susn eventually opts to finish reading the rest of the suicide letter.

When Stupid Cloud asks the Nile why he is carrying around two tennis rackets, the protagonist astonishes his friends by proceeding to use the preppie sports instruments to dig up a Jewish skull that is hidden under some rocks near the volcano. After the Nile unearths the Hebraic skull, Laßt Susn proceeds to read more of the protagonist’s suicide letter, stating out loud in a somber yet monotone fashion, “every German has his own example [of Nazism] in his family, even the still unborn. And the Jews? Everybody was against the Jews, and they're still against them today, they just don't dare to say it anymore, because back then they were allowed to kill the Jews. Susn, I had to find out what's inside the Germans, and I'm telling you: Murder. Most diligent murder. But this murder made them the most famous people of all mankind." At the very end of the Nile's letter, Laßt Susn reads, "I commit suicide, for as a suicide I belong to the death mound of the victims. I do not want to belong to the death mound of the self-righteous Germans. Farewell . . . I'll jump into the volcano." Clearly, self-loathing kraut the Nile did not see the irony in his self-righteous declaration against "self-righteous Germans." As an assumed result of the flattery that she receives in part of her beau's letter where he alludes to Romanian-Jewish poet Paul Celan's poem Todesfuge (1948) aka Death Fugue and describes her hair as being pretzel-colored, Laßt Susn decides to follow the Nile's lead and jump into the volcano too. Of course, it is rather revealing that the suicide letter alludes to Celan's anti-German poem (which notably features the line, "Death is a master from Germany, his eyes are blue"), which features the line, "you'll rise to the sky like smoke, you'll have a grave in the clouds," and thus foretells the Nile's pathetic self-prophesying fate of self-slaughter via virtual one-mensch-holocaust.

A sort of culturally apocalyptic Teutonic Joe Versus the Volcano (1990) where there protagonist actually goes through with his morbidly zany plan of self-obliteration via volcano, The Last Hole is the rare sort of film that offers the viewer the sort of insight as to why contemporary Germans are so gleefully suicidal and inordinately ethno-masochistic that they would actually welcome hostile towelheads from the world's worst Islamic desert shitholes to come into their country and establish Dhimmitude so that thoroughly brainwashed self-loathing and self-flagellating kraut automatons can begin paying penance for the supposed crimes of their long dead Nazi ancestors. Considering the recent New Year's Eve untermenschen rape epidemic committed by swarthy so-called migrants that occurred in every single major German city in late 2015 (not surprisingly, the German police and media attempted to cover up what happened up), it seems that Achternbusch's dream of collective German punishment is finally well under way as it seems none of those "self-righteous Germans" that value self-preservation and self-determination that he mocked in his film are alive anymore. Of course, the great irony behind Achternbusch's film is that it is so thoroughly, intricately, bizarrely, and fanatically Germanophobic that it could have only been directed by an actual German, which is an identity that the auteur even attempts to reject in the film, even though his cinematic works are so radically regional in persuasion that he has had very little success outside of his native Bavaria (in fact, Achternbusch once mocked his Bavarian comrade Werner Herzog for being successful outside of Germany, stating that he is, "the best detergent salesman Germany has ever had, because he is the only one who believes in his product"). Indeed, while Achternbusch's character even pathetically declares in his suicide letter, “Unfortunately, I am too stupid to be a Jew, but I don’t include myself among the Germans,” he practically bleeds of archetypal Bavarian buffoonery, just like Woody Allen and Todd Solondz reek of Jewish neuroticism and Spike Lee stinks of American negro resentment. Notably, Achternbusch would later write in his novel Hundstage (1995), “My sympathy for Jews is only sentimentality, only compassion. I don’t want to be a Jew, and I have rid myself of their belief in one God without, however, being able to cope with the consequences,” thus confirming that he is thankfully not as racially schizophrenic as degenerate German artist Anselm Kiefer, who seems to have dedicated his life to shitting on German culture and transforming himself into a sort of spiritual holocaust survivor. In his later color feature Heilt Hitler! (1986) aka Heal Hitler!—a sort of anti-Heimat Back to the Future where Achternbusch portrays a German soldier who wakes up 40 years after WWII believing that he is still fighting in Stalingrad—the auteur would present a somewhat more personalized and nuanced take on his thoughts regarding the legacy of National Socialism.

Oftentimes feeling like a sort of ‘Southern Kraut Gothic’ as a starkly and grotesquely yet oftentimes beautifully shot feature that owes much of its strikingly look to cinematographer Jörg Schmidt-Reitwein—a man responsible for a number of Werner Herzog’s pre-Hollywood masterpieces, including The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974), Heart of Glass (1976), and Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979)—The Last Hole is probably best looked at as a piece of modernist absurdist folklore that does for Bavaria what Flannery O’Connor’s writings did for the American South. Indeed, in that sense, Achternbusch’s film, despite seeming so hopelessly bizarre and absurdly alienating, is not all that different from John Huston’s underrated O’Connor adaptation Wise Blood (1979) starring Brad Dourif, which was incidentally released in West Germany under the names Der Ketzer and Die Weisheit des Blutes. As someone that has suffered more holocaust-themed films than I care to admit, the Achternbuschian cinematic realm strangely seems to be the most fitting setting for six million Ashkenazi phantoms. Quite unlike Spielberg’s Schindler’s List (1993), which more or less uses black-and-white cinematography as a cheap pseudo-poetic gimmick to remind stupid Americans of vintage American WWII propaganda newsreels in the hope that they will eventually not be able to differentiate between Hollywood fiction and carefully contrived wartime nonfiction, the lack of color in The Last Hole ultimately compliments the film’s unwavering doom and gloom as a cinematic work with a protagonist that is so terminally lifeless that he could only be properly portrayed in a completely colorless world.

I have to admit that, for at least partially personal reasons, The Last Hole probably had a bigger impact on me than it would probably have on most American cinephiles, who would probably find it totally inexplicable and hopelessly arcane for more than just a couple reasons. For instance, one of my ex-girlfriend’s had two paternal grandparents that had emigrated from Germany to the United States and both of them were horrible alcoholics that sired a number of equally self-destructive alcoholic children and grandchildren. While my ex-girlfriend's dipsomaniac German grandfather resembled a sort of alcoholic troll when I first met him, I once received the shock of a lifetime when I encountered an old black-and-white photograph of him from when he was in his 20s and discovered that he used to be a strikingly handsome Aryan man with sharp features that clearly totally destroyed his looks and health as a result of his undying weakness for cheap beer. Aside from my ex-girlfriend's family, I know no less than two other German-American families, including a friend whose Danube Swabian grandfather was killed on the Eastern Front during WWII, that are accursed with cross-generational alcoholism, which is clearly a direct result of World War II. Of course, my own Dutch grandfather, whose country was at least partially destroyed by Germany during the war, also succumbed to alcoholism as a result of his decidedly dejecting wartime experiences, thus I think the collective dipsomania among Germans has less to do with the dead Jews than the misery of WWII in general. While The Last Hole engages in shameless heeb humoring and shoah-saluting, it is also ultimately a film that appeals to people like myself who enjoy tasteless holocaust jokes. In other words, for a completely humorless and obnoxiously anally retentive Judaic culture-distorter like Mark Potok or Barbara Lerner Spectre, viewing Achternbusch's film would probably be like attending a screening of Kurt Gerron's The Führer Gives the Jews a City (1944) at Auschwitz with Herr Döktor Mengele behind the projector. Indeed, after watching The Last Hole, I could not help but feel that the collective plague of Bavarian alcoholism was much more tragic than the holocaust. After all, six million dead Jews seems like nothing more than the faint ghost of an abstract idea in the film, yet Bavarian dipsomania, lechery, and ethno-masochism seem like a very real nightmare that become all the more perturbing and penetrating as a result of Achternbusch's uniquely unnerving passive-aggressive approach to angst and Weltschmerz. While The Last Hole might be an exceedingly eccentrically esoteric cinematic work that takes provincial filmmaking to ungodly extremes, no one can watch it without feeling like they have been imprisoned in some sort of highly personal pandemonium where all hope for the future has been squashed under the heel of Sturmabteilung jackboots. In Achternbusch's singularly morbid mind, there is not chance for Vergangenheitsbewältigung, thus one must accept death and self-destruction lest they belong to the ostensible "death mound of the self-righteous Germans." Of course, what Achternbusch and many other white people fail to realize due to decades of brainwashing is that empathy only works when it is mutual and reciprocal and that it is insane and self-destructive to invest emotions in people that are hostile to you, hence the steady moral, cultural, and economic decline of the Occidental as a result of so-called multiculturalism where groups of hostile aliens (e.g. 'Syrian migrants') that lack empathy for their hosts strategically use emotional blackmail as a parasitic means to get infidels to subsidize their pathetic existences and primitive vices (e.g. rape). Indeed, the protagonist of The Last Hole should have been more dejected with the fact that he was so obsessed with dead Jews than the dead Jews themselves. If Achternbusch actually cared to understand Jews, he would realize that they owe their survival and perseverance to the fact they have nil empathy for their enemies to the point where they literally celebrate the destruction of said enemies via holidays, but I digress. In the end, The Last Hole ultimately demonstrates that there are few things that are more humorous in the contemporary Occidental world than the phrase "six million" being repeated over and over again in a deadpan fashion by an artsy fartsy kraut who seems so emotionally comatose that one might suspect he was the victim of a multicultural gang-rape.

THE GHOST
THE GHOST

Herbert Achternbusch (1983)

Assuredly his most well known and infamous film, Herbert Achternbusch's aweless yet astral anti-Catholic romp Das Gespenst (1983) aka The Ghost – a work of bodacious and biting black-and-white blasphemy that would be the prolific Bavarian auteur filmmaker's tenth film in eight years as a sin-saluting cinematic artist – featured an audaciously aberrant and surprisingly singular depiction of God's only son Jesus Christ that is comparable to no other before nor after the film's ill-fated release despite the proliferation of Christ-bashing propaganda featuring uncountable Hollywood films and mainstream TV shows. With its portrayal of Jesus Christ as a boorish and ineffectual waiter with beastly baloney nipples and a large, untamable, and perverted tongue, it is no surprise that The Ghost was temporarily banned by the FSK, a 'voluntary' yet semi-official German government film regulation organization that also withheld a promised subsidy payment to Achternbusch, and filed charges against the film's distributor because the work was accused of "injured religious feelings and human dignity" against audience members after numerous complaints from various Roman Catholic and Christian organizations in Germany. Although the charges were eventually dropped, the ban on the film was lifted (although the film is still banned today in Austria) and Achternbusch's received his well deserved payment because the court ruled that the work was "to weak" to be worthy of artistic merit and being taken serious, the controversy surrounding The Ghost inspired German Federal Minister of the Interior Friedrich Zimmermann – a Roman Catholic and fellow Bavarian like the filmmaker, as well as an ex-NSDAP member – to dramatically cut government funding for all future film productions in the Fatherland, which would now only cover 30% of total production costs and be quite detrimental to idiosyncratic 'arthouse' filmmakers like the anti-Christ auteur himself. Achternbusch's unexpected cinematic crusade led to 50 filmmakers protesting the charges against the film at the 1983 Munich Film Festival and over 150,000 spectators watching The Ghost in theaters due to the controversy surrounding the film, which would prove to be by far the Bavarian folk-anarchist's greatest commercial success as a filmmaker. It has been nearly three decades since the release of The Ghost yet the film is as silly, sardonic, sacrilegious, and scathing as ever and certainly does not feature the sort of beaten-to-death Hebraic Hollywood mockery of God's bastard son one can expect to see quite frequently just by turning on their TV.

During the beginning of The Ghost, "Mother Superior" (played by Annamirl Bierbichler) aka "Oberin" ("waitress") remarks to the living, breathing, crucified Christ on her church wall that he is the "42nd God in our convent...the last God in this building," which is quite interesting because apparently there are 42 generations (names) in the Gospel of Matthew's version of the Genealogy of Jesus and that for 42 months the Beast will hold dominion over the Earth (Revelation 13:5). Whatever the significance of the 'natural number' in the film, it is quite apparent that the crooked and kooky Christ (played by Herbert Achternbusch himself) of The Ghost, who goes by the name "Ober" ("waiter"), is a rather unholy fellow who like the prince of darkness himself the devil, can turn himself into a snake, albeit only when he is scared for his eternal life, but sucks at just about everything else, including collecting stool samples. The obscene ober is not exactly an optimist and overachiever either because he feels that people can't, "expect me to change myself into shit" even if he can morph into a snake, but he does inspire two cops (one of which is played by Fassbinder Superstar Kurt Raab of Satan's Brew fame) to attempt to achieve a miracle by defecating into a shot glass; an event that spawns bodily fluids, but not of the terribly toxic and fowl fecal sort. Mother Superior "rather carry" Ober "in the flesh" because in her "womb there's a nest prepared for every snake" but the Catholic church – the "model for all sterility" – does see such biological pure acts as sinful so she recommends he leave the convent with her and became a waiter because he already has given "mountains of his body" and "whole lakes of...blood" for food and drink to his feckless and feeble followers, thereupon making it a fitting position for the foul and frail phantasm. Indeed, Ober can walk on water but such a low-fi carny routine – which was also performed by Christ-like idiot savant Chance (Peter Sellers) in Hal Ashby's similarly satirical but less sardonic cinematic effort Being There (1979) – pales in comparison to Mother Superior's wild and woolly water sports activity, which comprises of the callous and crude Catholic lady lifting her dress and revealing a grotesque wig where her genitals and pubic hair are supposed to be. Infinitely wiser and more practical than the oftentimes oblivious and oafish Ober, the good Mother lets her feral-like 42nd god know that without his crown of thorns, he is a "nobody" yet he still finds it to be a rather trying task to be the king of babbling Bavarian peasants, even if said peasants drop 10 marks in his crown, let alone king of the Jews.

To top off all the rather charming yet crass anti-catholic camp of The Ghost, German New Wave dandy auteur Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Der Tod der Maria Malibran) – who was a chain-smoker in real-life and whose recent death due to complications revolving around cancer were probably in part caused by the vice – is featured in a standout role in the film where he seems to care more about having enough cigarettes on tap than doing his sanctified churchly duties. Such is the rather ridiculous realm of anarcho-folk folly and frolicsome avant-garde absurdity that is The Ghost; a film that, like his cinematic efforts before and after, proved that the blasphemous Bavarian iconoclast Herbert Achternbusch – a man who writes, stars, and directs his films and does his own "stunts" – followed in a rich legacy that was propelled by silent comedians like Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton, albeit the German funnyman took his comedy routines to a greater and more arcane, if less physically involved, extremes; the sort that guaranteed he would never have an audience any greater than a small and mostly domestic cult following. For an antagonistic auteur who mixed memories of the holocaust with guilt-ridden alcoholism (Das letzte Loch aka The Last Hole (1981), Bavarian Kultur with belligerent barbarian beer-chugging (Bierkampf aka Beer Chase (1977)), and Hitlerism with a legacy of countryside inbreeding and sexual promiscuity (Heilt Hitler! aka Heal Hitler! (1986)), it should be no wonder that Achternbusch will probably go down as the greatest anti-völkisch filmmaker who ever lived, at least by those unfortunately few that remember him.

Where Italian poet-filmmaker Pier Paolo Pasolini (The Decameron, Salo, or the 120 Days of Sodom) – an unrepentant homosexual, atheist, and communist – once stated, “If you know that I am an unbeliever, then you know me better than I do myself. I may be an unbeliever, but I am an unbeliever who has a nostalgia for a belief,” in regard to his respect for the religion of his family and nation, Achternbusch only had slapstick scorn and playfully perverse pooh-pooh for the faith of his ancestors as depicted in the Gospel of Herbert Achternbusch; otherwise known as The Ghost and a most unfriendly and foul phantom at that. A pleasantly profane fable for foul-mouthed grownups and rural rejects, Achternbusch, as a sort of atheistic and antagonistic “Fidus of the left” and walking contradiction of the Bavarian boonies, was quite ironically and intriguingly able to find a common ground between rooted folks of the countryside with political beliefs that are often associated with deracinated cosmopolitanism. If I did not know better and The Ghost was not a work of degenerate art, I might have assumed Achternbusch was inspired by the anti-Catholicism/neo-pagan philosophies featured in National Socialist philosopher Alfred Rosenberg’s magnum opus The Myth of the Twentieth Century (1930). That being said, I cannot think of another filmmaker who epitomized the often cited and inconvenient truism that people often hate what negative qualities they see in themselves. After all, Achternbusch may have attempted to say “Bye-Bye Bavaria!” in his 1977 film of the same name but looking at his films, one can only conclude: you may be able to take the loony anti-Aryan Aryan Bavarian out of his lederhosen, but never the lederhosen out of the Bavarian.

HEILT HITLER!

Herbert Achternbusch (1986)

A couple years ago, I had the distinct pleasure of speaking with an elderly German mensch named Dieter who came of age during the rise and fall of the Third Reich. To this day, this kindhearted – if often thoroughly inebriated – Teuton, is an unrepentant true believer of the long vanquished National Socialist cause. During one of our talks, he told me how, "Hitler would be in the American White House" had history gone in the direction he thought it would as a young Hitler-Jugend recruit from Frankfurt. Naturally, his American-born children and grandchildren found his nostalgia for Nazism to be a tad bit bothersome due to growing up in a nation that places Steven Spielberg films as the height of cinematic perfection and thus write-off the aged Aryan's hysterical Hitlerism as a sign of mere elderly eccentricity and naivety. Recently, I had the opportunity to watch the fiercely farcical German arthouse epic Heilt Hitler!: A German Motion Picture (1986) aka Heal Hitler! directed by Herbert Achternbusch (Das Gespenst aka The Ghost, Servus Bayern aka Bye-Bye Bavaria!); a film that – somewhat peculiarly but not unsurprisingly – reminded me of my seemingly surreal conversations with the unusually charismatic German old-timer. Heilt Hitler! follows a German soldier with a Little Richard/John Waters mustache named Herbert (played by director Herbert Achternbusch) who has become so disgruntled with the war effort in the Battle for Stalingrad that he rather turn himself into a human statue than waste time combating endless swarms of untermensch russkies. Forty years later, Herbert wakes up at a war memorial in Munich thinking he is still in Stalingrad and that the Thousand Year Reich has secured final victory. Like the Dieter I knew personally, Herbert is a living relic trapped in a world he is not mentally (and to some extent, physically) equipped for. At over 2 hours in length, Heilt Hitler! is an absurdist super 8 saga that is like Back to the Future Part II (1989) meets the consciously and satirically German films of Christoph Maria Schlingensiefel (Terror 2000, The 120 Days of Bottrop). Seemingly plot-less in structure, Heilt Hitler! takes an anti-nostalgic and less than sentimental look at twentieth century German history in the structure of a freeform cinematic poem. In Achternbusch's Germany, Aryan women become quite jubilant at the prospect of offering their minds and bodies to American G.I.s in return for cartons of cigarettes and even attack one of their own men to protect an exotic enemy soldier (aka American Negro), yet such seemingly deplorable scenarios are portrayed in such a curiously caricatured and pleasantly preposterous fashion that one can only respond by smiling jovially; be the viewer a German nationalist or second-generation holocaust survivor.

Despite its many incessant esoteric digressions, nonsensical poetic ramblings, and satirical situationist scenarios, Heilt Hitler! is ultimately a film about family and everything it entails (e.g. incest, bickering, philandering, etc), most specifically Herbert Achternbusch's own dysfunctional rural Bavarian kith and kin. In the film, the female characters have quite a hard time discerning who the father of their child is. One genius of a Bavarian peasant even convinces an American Negro that he should breed with racially pure German woman so they can, "tell their kids apart. If one of them has a little of your color....these women have looked alike for generations.....No one can tell them apart. Not even the authorities. There's got to be some form of order." Indeed, in Heilt Hitler!, the rationalization for miscegenation comes down to the stereotypical Germanic love for order. As much as I disdain dysgenic and nihilistic race-mixing, I think most Fassbinder fans will agree that the world would be a better place with a couple more mulatto Bavarian fellows like Günther Kaufmann (R.I.P.). One can only assume that Heilt Hitler! is Achternbusch's own kooky way of discrediting National Socialism and the generation that passionately and unwaveringly supported it. Bastard babies or not, one cannot argue that the illegitimate children of Heilt Hitler! are the product of racial mingling and thus – to Achternbusch's blatant and hypercritical disgust – are in league with the National Socialist ideology of Blut und Boden. When Herbert is transported into the future, he is lucky enough to be just in time for a wedding that may or not be for his own child. Although some things have changed in the peasant countryside in Heilt Hitler!, other things, like incest and family secrets, are perennial, henceforth leading the viewer to believe that the blood-on-the-hands of previous generations is innate and passed on through the blood with each new generation of Germans. Like fellow German pessimist Arthur Schopenhauer over a century before him, it seems that Herbert Achternbusch is a staunch antinatalist.

At the war memorial in Munich's Hofgarten, the inscription "They Will Rise Again" is engraved. In Heilt Hitler!, a Munich couple mocks the memorial and remark that the soldiers died for nothing. Undoubtedly, after viewing the film there is quite clear that Herbert Achternbusch concurs with this ostensibly cynical sentiment. Ironically, Herbert does rise again, but only to eventually realize that the familial discord that plagued his personal life before the war has only been compounded and that Germany has been dealt the ultimate defeat; being conquered by semi-Asiatic Slavic hordes. While wandering around Munich in a daze, Herbert is quite startled to realize that the world no longer has Kotzis and Nazis, but only money; too much money or not enough money. Like the old German man named Dieter that I conversed with a couple years ago, Herbert is a man from a despised generation that time has forgotten. Not even his own progeny (whoever they may be) are interested in honoring his legacy, even if he has been quasi-supernaturally resurrected in a fantastic sort of way. It is most apparent while watching Heilt Hitler! that Achternbusch has no empathy for the pain and struggle suffered by his fellow Bavarian countrymen of the past, thus the film comes across as an especially sardonic tragicomic romp that takes no prisoners; blood relative or not. With jocular lines like, "just imagine how boring it is in a concentration camp? Dead Boring,” it is not hard to see why Heilt Hitler! is an exceedingly facetious family affair of the most meretricious and batty kind that proves that the international tribe that was Germany’s enemy during the Second World War are not the only Kings of Comedy. As for Dieter, he went on to produce five or six different children with four different women (one being of the non-Aryan sort), although most of his family members seem to agree that one his sons – who is apparently really his grandson – was the product of a borderline incestuous relationship between his eldest son and his second wife.

EGON SCHIELE - EXZESSE
EGON SCHIELE - EXZESSE

Herbert Vesely (1980)

Without question, my favorite degenerate painter is Egon Schiele; the young protégé of Gustav Klimt who – like Jesus Christ himself – was publically crucified (in the symbolic sense) and would never live to see his thirtieth birthday. When I describe Schiele as a degenerate artist, I mean it not in a derogatory manner but in a literal sense as the early Zionist leader Marx Nordau described the Austrian painter as a pornographer in a later edition of his infamous tome Degeneration (1892); a work that blames Europe's cultural decline on so-called artistic degenerates (including Friedrich Nietzsche, Richard Wagner, Oscar Wilde and Leo Tolstoy) yet totally disregards (while condemning "antisemitism") the wealth of wretched subversive anti-European works created by his fellow Asiatic kinsmen. In fact, if it were not for Nordau's libelous work (in a way, he was the "Tipper Gore" of his time) stirring up the European intellectual world, it is doubtful that Schiele would have ever had to face trial in the first place. Needless to say, when I discovered the somewhat forgotten film Egon Schiele – Exzesse (1981) aka Egon Schiele Excess and Punishment directed by Herbert Vesely – a work that chronicles the life of Schiele from his criminal trial to his early death as a result of contracting the Spanish flu (which also killed his wife Edith and their unborn child) – I made it my priority to watch it. Of course, like any other film about a real-life historical figure, I had many doubts in regards to the factual authenticity of the work, especially considering the potential for heavy-handed eroticism and exploitation due to the keenly sexual nature of the Austrian artist's work. Indeed, like the paintings of Egon Schiele; the film ambiguously blurs the line between art and pornography, thus the work makes for a worthy tribute to the artist and his somewhat small body of work. Unfortunately, like Egon Schiele, Egon Schiele – Exzesse seems to be a "work in progress"; a piece that could have been a masterpiece but lacks the refinement and cohesion so commonly associated with artistic and aesthetic greatness. At times the film seems like it uses the oversexed life of Egon Schiele as a mere pretense for close-up beaver-shots and seemingly underage nudes but at other times the work feels like a brilliant piece of cinema that documents an imperative period of groundbreaking change in European art. If one thing is for sure, Egon Schiele – Exzesse will keep the viewer wholly engaged like they are in a sexual act from the foreplay-ish beginning to the lonely climax.

In Egon Schiele – Exzesse, German actor Mathieu Carrière plays the role of anti-hero painter Egon Schiele. One of Carrière's first film roles was as the lead in Young Törless (1966) directed by Volker Schlöndorff; the cinematic adaptation of the Robert Musil's novel of the same name. Like his portrayal of Thomas Törless in Young Törless, Carrière gave an extremely notable performance in Egon Schiele – Exzesse. Not only does Carrière bear a striking resemblance to the real Egon Schiele but he also exhibits a subtle intensity that one would expect from a serious artist who has totally deracinated himself from the general population and has suffered great loss. The real-life Egon Schiele was a protégé of the somewhat controversial Viennese Symbolist painter Gustav Klimt but the student would prove to break his own new ground as one of the earliest subversive expressionist artists. Of course, Schiele's audacity as an artist would prove detrimental to his personal life as so vividly expressed in Egon Schiele – Exzesse. Schiele was arrested and charged with seduction, abduction, an exhibiting pornography to minors; the latter being the only "crime" he was ever convicted of. As so vividly portrayed in Egon Schiele – Exzesse; Schiele was charged under false accusations given by a teenage girl that the artist had become obsessed with. Of course, Schiele's real crime was offending the mores of polite conservative Austrian society, henceforth foretelling the libertine expressionist and Dada artists that would become quite popular in Europe during the early twentieth century. In fact, had it not been for Egon Schiele, it is undoubtedly quite dubious whether a film like Egon Schiele – Exzesse could have ever been made.

Both the artistic works of Egon Schiele and the film Egon Schiele – Exzesse are a testament to the refined and tasteful manner as to how Europeans have handled nudity and eroticism when compared to American and Hollywood's handling of similar subject matter. With the virtual destruction and cultural degeneration of Europe after World War II came a flood of erotic European films. In a sense (and a somewhat glaring one), Europe became a virtual prostitute of America. For mostly monetary reasons, Europa churned out a wealth of adult arthouse films (Bernardo Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris (1972) is probably the most popular example of this phenomenon) during the second half of the twentieth century; Egon Schiele – Exzesse being a more subtle example of this somewhat depressing but equally stimulating trend. In fact, if it were not for its somewhat popular cast (including Golden Globe Award winner Christine Kaufmann, Serge Gainsbourg's muse Jane Birkin, Gainsbourg himself, and filmmaker Marcel Ophüls), soundtrack (featuring tracks from Brian Eno and Felix Mendelssohn), and abstract drama, I would lump Egon Schiele – Exzesse in the same category as films directed by erotic auteur filmmakers like Radley Metzger and Tinto Brass. I would be lying if I did not admit that the film would probably be of interest to those individuals who have no clue as to who Egon Schiele was, as the film features enough nude beauties to appease your typical perverted cinephile, thus Egon Schiele will be of interest to two different types of viewers; pervs and pretentious art-fags (and a combination of the two). Out of all the nudity featured in the film, I found the scene where Egon Schiele is inspected by the military upon being drafted into the Great War to be the most unsettling.

EGON SCHIELE - EXZESSE

Although convicted of corrupting a minor, Schiele's deeds pale in comparison to his virtual molestation via a group of clearly enthusiastic Austrian military elders. I think most Egon Schiele fans will agree that Egon Schiele – Exzesse will remain the definitive cinematic work about the prematurely deceased Austrian artist. Despite its many flaws, Egon Schiele – Exzesse is certainly more delectable than anything Hollywood could ever hope to vomit up about the infamous painter.

CARNIVAL OF SOULS

Herk Harvey (1962)

Carnival of Souls(1962) is one of the most important horror films (or film in general) that America has ever produced. Industrial filmmaker Herk Harvey was the man that made the gothic and eerie American cult classic Carnival of Souls. Harvey would also play the main ghoul that haunts the films female protagonist Mary Henry. Harvey intended Carnival of Souls to have the “look of an Ingmar Bergman film” and the “feel of a Jean Cocteau film.” The film certainly had the feeling of a Cocteau as if the poet had directed his own horror film for American audiences. Like many fans of the horror genre, George A. Romero’s Night of the Living Dead left a big impression on me at a young age. It wouldn’t be till many years later that I would see Carnival of Souls, a film that would inspire NOTLD. I can say without hesitation that I consider Carnival of Souls a superior film to NOTLD, despite my nearly lifelong admiration for Romero’s film. Carnival of Souls is a short ride following a woman in a trance that is only recognized at the film’s conclusion. Many films and filmmakers have borrowed a lot from Carnival of Souls. The most obvious being M. Night Shyamalan’s ”masterpiece” film The Sixth Sense, in which he borrowed a very large element from Carnival of Souls. Of course, Shyamalan’s been sued for plagiarism on more than one occasion. But then again, Carnival of Souls would be the film to steal from. Despite it’s cinematic quality, the film has yet to truly get that recognition that it deserves. Too good to be just a “B” horror film and too cult like to impress art fags, Carnival of Souls is a film that is in it’s own league. Not since the days of German expressionism has a film been so atmospheric yet horrific. Carnival of Souls is a film that showed serious promise a revival in artistry in the horror film. It makes me wonder how an educational and industrial filmmaker like Herk Harvey could make a film like Carnival of Souls without any prior feature-length experience. It is a shame that Harvey would never make another horror film (or feature length film). Despite the low-budget quality of Carnival of Souls, it gets across as a serious film for serious horror fans. Carnival of Souls follows a lonely woman who only finds company that she doesn’t really appreciate. A ghastly ghoul and his ball of dead dancers find Mary Henry. She never knows what this rotting dead man is trying to tell her till the end. Carnival of Souls is one of those films that you just have to experience as to articulate it’s power into words would be useless. I felt as if I was touched by something that no other film has ever done after viewing Carnival of Souls.

TAXI HUNTER

Herman Yau (1993)

To enlighten those who are just now introduced to Herman Yau's work by way of The Legend is Born: Ip Man, Yau is also the fellow known exclusively in the "cult" circuit as the man who offered us generous doses of greedy-like gore with his two CAT III hits Ebola Syndrome and The Untold Story. Previous to those two Anthony Wong vehicles was what many could consider the precursor to Wong's perfected art of ignorance meets derangement and Yau's eventual transcendence into shocking violence. The film was Taxi Hunter starring Anthony Wong as a workaholic insurance salesman whose wife is expecting a child until a fateful night with a taxi driver that results in her squirmy death via asphalt challenge. This, with other incidents concerning selfish and rude taxi drivers, is what sparks Ah-Kin's (Wong) bloody rampage as he plays with the idea of murder as a tool for bettering society. Well, that's how Yau planned it but Wong only can represent the charitable executioner for so long until the "hero's" development hits a speed bump and leaves us wondering if we really could root for this respectful monster at all. Unlike the other classic examples of excellence in this particular genre, Taxi Hunter is rated CAT IIB (equivalent to "R" rating) but even without the brutality this remains a film that does not disappoint. If you're familiar with Red to Kill, Run and Kill, or Her Vengeance, then you are aware of precisely what you are getting yourself into; a chop-socky brawl featuring karate cops and ubiquitous violence with that antique HK feel. One recurring theme in these Hong-Kong exploitation pictures that I couldn't help but notice is the inclusion of "Fatty", a character that appears in most everyone I've seen. Whether he is the main character, supporting cast member, or police officer, I can recall scratching my head and wondering whether or not the Asiatics take humorous prejudice to our tubby kinfolk or just plain lashing out at obesity and the disgusting effects of over-consumption. For the matter of repeating thematic elements of film crossing over to similar kind, Taxi Hunter is also laden with jazz-pop lullabies that draw a more-than-savory approach to highlighting and tuning into all moods this film has to offer; tragedy, madness, and the giving spirit. When Taxi Hunter kicks off into its second gear, the film takes a curious charge in representing the same methodical structure behind 2006's Korean hit No Mercy for the Rude, in which a hitman only "cleans" disrespectful targets. Another comparable topic is Michael Douglas's stellar role in Falling Down, the story of a man who seemingly had it all until his sanity dissipates. These two films pasted together create the core of Taxi Hunter; which will most likely be seen as Taxi Driver from an alternate dimension. There isn't much to report on Taxi Hunter as it's effortlessly a splendid "revenge" film, if you could call it that. While Ah-Kin denounces vengeance I'm not so easily fooled. His entire murderous charade was using his wife's death as a crutch for the means necessary to expel his rage.

Taxi Hunter might be one of my more brief reviews but I still find much to applaud and support as this is a great film that sizzles into an extended car chase scene. Just as quickly as the credits roll, I too will make this my exit strategy from my affliction of pandering braindry.

THE FINE ART OF SEPARATING PEOPLE FROM THEIR MONEY

Hermann Vaske (1996)

When I was in high school, I completely stopped watching television because, aside from most of it being soulless garbage and degenerate trash as far as entertainment is concerned, I could no longer bear watching TV commercials and having worthless products and cultural Marxist propaganda rammed down my throat. A couple years later, I completely stopped going to movie theaters largely because most mainstream movies are nothing more than absurdly expensive filmic excrement, but also because I felt I should be the one being paid to watch Coca Cola and shampoo commercials at the beginning of screenings and not be the one paying my hard-earned money so some pornographer of consumer products can attempt to brainwash me and profit from it. In the epic and ridiculously overlooked German documentary The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money (1998) aka Wie man die Leute von ihrem Geld trennt directed by investigative Teutonic documentarian Hermann Vaske (The 10 Commandments of Creativity, Invasion of the Ideas) and hosted by none other than Hollywood actor/auteur Dennis Hopper (Easy Rider, Out of the Blue), the viewer is exposed to the 'art of advertising' and sometimes not so fine line between cinematic art and TV commercials. Indeed, featuring candid interviews and commercials directed by some of the greatest (as well as not so great) auteur filmmakers of the late 20th century, including David Lynch, Federico Fellini, Wim Wenders, Spike Lee, Tony Kaye, Abel Ferrara, Alan Parker, Julian Schnabel, Ridley Scott, and Tony Scott, The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money demonstrates that in virtually every artist there is an advertiser and in any advertiser there is an artist. Divided into three segments (Art, Humor, and Shock) that take a look at the power and effectiveness of advertising from an aesthetic perspective (as opposed to in the equally worthwhile BBC documentary The Century of the Self (2002), which takes a psycho-historical approach to explaining how psychoanalytic techniques were implemented by Freud's nephew Edward Bernays to subconsciously brainwash people), The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money discusses, among other things, how Hebrew humor has been implemented in commercials as it brings peoples' defenses down and tricks them into being sold to, how featuring homo pop(con)artist Andy Warhol and big American Negro boxer Sonny Liston in a Braniff Airways advert together was an act of advertising 'chutzpah,' why Jews and Brits purportedly make better humorists due to their distinct histories, how Spike Lee was able to develop a long-term friendship with his favorite basketball player, Michael Jordan, via directing Nike commercials, and why Tony Scott felt he botched his first feature film The Hunger (1983) starring David Bowie because he was used to directing overly-stylized but non-narrative 30 second commercials. Worth seeing simply due to its inclusion of rare commercials directed by David Lynch and Federico Fellini, among countless others, The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money is also a shockingly politically incorrect 'no bullshit' doc that demonstrates that Jews dominate advertising, how art and advertising are almost indistinguishable due to the lack of spirituality and organic national culture in the post-WWII Occidental world, and that even great auteur filmmakers don't mind making a quick buck by whoring themselves to a company whose products they would never use in a million years.

Beginning with Dennis Hopper hopping on a small trampoline and saying, "Hi, I'm Hopper" in what is clearly a goofy and intentionally moronic parody of the 'cutesy' and 'quirky' essence of so many bad American TV commercials, The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money immediately establishes a tone of cultural cynicism that might offend couch potatoes and philistine commercial connoisseurs. From there, Hopper, who is sitting on a fancy sofa in what seems to be mountains in Bavaria, proceeds to tell a number of anecdotal tales about successful (con)artists, with the following story being a great example of the monetary-motivated joke that is modern post-national/post-traditional art: "Marcel Duchamp once said that the artist of the future would be able to just point his finger at something and say it was art and it would be art, so he picked out a bottle rack and he sold it for $5000. Someone came and asked him, "What's the different between your bottle rack and the one I can buy for $5?," and he said I'm an artist and I chose it. Now, was he a true visionary artist or just a fucking dork?" Undoubtedly, like his fellow culture-distorting comrade Picasso (who Hopper also tells an absurd story about), Duchamp was a fucking dork who used to dressed in drag under the persona 'Rose Sélavy' for his bud Man Ray and his only talent was juvenile iconoclasm that is typical of modern art, yet he made a ton of money doing it. From there, Hopper introduces director/interviewer Hermann Vaske, who is on a mission to uncover the link between 'feature films and advertising' and how a number of British advertising directors, like Alan Parker and Adrian Lyne, have turned into major Hollywood filmmakers, with belated director Tony Scott (Top Gun, True Romance) being the first person he interviews. Scott confesses that his first film The Hunger, which I think is his best work, was a mess because he was only used to directing 30-second adverts and was a novice when it came to feature-length storytelling. On the other hand, a number of already established filmmakers later decided to get into advertising for mostly monetary reasons. For example, David Lynch had free reign to make an 'avant-garde' commercial for Adidas where the only rule he had to follow was depicting a man running out of hell and into heaven. Needless to say, Lynch's commercial is quite curious, if not totally incoherent, to say the least, as if the Eraserhead director was intentionally attempting to make the product he was advertising the most unappealing thing in the world. When director Vaske asks Spike Lee (Do the Right Thing, Jungle Fever) what attracts him about commercials, the all-American Negro auteur stoically responds, "money...it most enables me to do what I do and that is direct. It doesn't have to be films, you know. I enjoy directing commercials and music videos." German auteur Wim Wenders (Paris, Texas, Wings of Desire) sees directing commercials as a necessity, stating, "And as we're living in a time where one cannot say anymore that advertising is imitating movies or art or whatever...but as we move and more advance to an age where it is the other way around I think it's important and to know how they are done and to know how to do them. And you cannot any longer have an attitude where you say, 'Well, I'm doing this and this is a whole different field and profession and I'd rather not touch it.' Maybe that was a possible attitude during the 60s or 70s, but things are changing." Indeed, as The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money readily demonstrates, Hollywoodization, globalization, and 'democracy' have destroyed anything that was once sacred of the artistic medium of cinema.

During the second segment of The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money, host Dennis Hopper hilariously states, "In the next section we're going to be looking into such questions as: 'Why were all the really great New York creative teams made up of a Jewish copywriter and an Italian art director? Was it because the Jews got the brains and the Italians got the style? If so, what would happen if you had an Italian copywriter with a Jewish art director?'" While it is never really answered as to why it is that most NYC art directors are supposedly of Italian extraction, the Jewish question is beaten to death like a Judeo-Bolshevik revolutionary in a concentration camp. American art director George Lois, whose work for Esquire magazine has been exhibited at the Museum for Modern Art, goes on to discuss how in 1958 or 1959 he got the brilliant idea to "sell a Nazi car to a Jewish town," stating of his successful advert for Volkswagen, "If there ever was a miracle advertising story, it was Volkswagen. We took this German car designed by Hitler and Porsche and sold the hell out of it. It is the magic of advertising." When Lois is asked what the criterion is for good advertising, he states, "Jewish humor...New York humor, which basically derives from Jewish humor, which became American humor." American Hebrew sex therapist 'Ruth Westheimer aka 'Dr. Ruth' backs Lois' claim up, remarking, "I know the value of humor because in the Talmud, in the Jewish tradition, it says, 'A lesson taught with humor is a lesson retained.'" As to why members of the Hebraic faith are so good at comedy, a rabbi named Henry Sobel speculates, "I'm convinced that there is a Jewish humor as a consequence of our own history. We had to laugh. Sometimes we had to laugh at others. More often than not we had to learn to laugh at ourselves in order to survive." A British advertising executive gives a similar reason for the prevalence of British humor and its value in Brit society, stating, "In the Victorian times, there was very little humor at all in this country. Queen Victoria said in her famous line, 'We are not amused.' There was very little wit, but it was a very serious country of serious business middle-class aristocracy basically fulfilling their duty to god by running the world [...]" they had this responsibility, they conquered the world, and they better run it. I think what happened then was Britain started to lose the opportunity to run the world...people left, we had wars, and we've got no money, and suddenly we weren't very powerful. The only mechanism we could find to cope with the loss of power was to laugh at ourselves because otherwise we of cried, so we started to tell jokes, started to make fun of ourselves. It's much easier to, as Jewish people do, to make fun of ourselves than someone else to make fun of you because that you can live with."

In the final section of The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money, the value of shock in humor is discussed in decidedly degenerate, if not insightful, detail. One of the more humorous scenes from this segment is when a British art director gives the following rant regarding a scatological piece of art by the gay concept artists Gilbert & George: "This is one of Gilbert & George's 'naked shit' paintings. Some people find the representation of the turd shocking. They don't find it shocking that there is more goodness, more vitamins, minerals, and protein in a single everyday turd than a starving third world child gets in a week. All the millions of third world children are dying cause they don't even get as much goodness as the everyday turd that we flush down the toilet [...] people find the picture of an everyday turd more shocking than the fact our four biggest High Street banks make millions of pounds of profits from these deaths. Maybe people treat children in the third world the same way they treat their turds; they pretend don't exist." Indeed, the bitchy Brit ad-man is certainly right regarding humanity's lack of concern for other humans as it is revealed in a very popular commercial for the 'tough clothes' company Kadu; featuring a killer shark eating a surfer, the commercial concludes with a photo of the dismembered entrails of said killer shark revealing that the eaten surfer's swimming trunks survive the shark attack. Of course, sex also sells as demonstrated by pornographic sexual contraceptive ads, including an image of a black cock in the shape of a gun (the message being: black cock = AIDS), as well as a 'vagina dentata' picture of a vicious vag with wolf fangs. Of course, sleazy degeneracy also sells as demonstrated by the fact that British Jewish art director Tony Kaye directed a cinema-vérité-like Morrissey-esque 'PSA' of a real-life deranged junky shooting up and talking nonsensical mumbo jumbo while high, which led to the director getting noticed by producers and ultimately getting the opportunity to direct American History X (1998), which he later regretted (he was denied the final cut, while dork Edward Norton was given more screen time). Quentin Tarantino's dubious influence on pop culture is also discussed, with Wim Wenders remarking regarding the recent prevalence of ultra-violence in TV commercials, "Seeing PULP FICTION is a great experience...but seeing the imitators is painful." Indeed, it is probably impossible to quantify how negative Tarantino's influence has been not only on cinema and pop cultural, but society in general.

In the end, Dennis Hopper closes The Fine Art of Separating People from

THE FINE ART OF SEPARATING PEOPLE FROM THEIR MONEY

Their Money by stating with his tongue placed firmly in cheek, "No matter what you thought of this program...at least it was not interrupted by commercials...yet." Undoubtedly, Hermann Vaske's documentary is the most fun I have ever had watching commercial after commercial and talking head after talking head, as if The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money was a MTV documentary with some actual food-for-thought and lacking the usual loony LGBT-Cultural Marxist-miscegenation-propagating bullshit. Featuring a superficial score by Malcolm McLaren, who ironically almost single-handedly invented punk rock by contriving the 'boy band' the Sex Pistols and utilizing sensational advertising techniques via his anti-aesthetic fashion trends, The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money is a virtual unintentional manifesto for artists living in the postmodern world, where superficial/sensational images and messages are everything and anything requiring the use of gray matter is considered an abject bore. With the industrial revolution, the rise of the mass man, and globalization, art has been taken out of the hands of cultivated aristocratic patrons and has become proletarianized, thus turning 'art' into something that is mostly special tailored for human rabble and the lowest common denominator. And, of course, the ultimate ideal in a liberalized multicultural world where no one has anything in common is wealth, with the modern artist's 'greatness' and worth being judged by his net worth, as the dubious legacies of Picasso and Warhol certainly demonstrate. Ultimately, The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money tells the viewer that serious art does not sell, but humor and shock do, thus one can only assume that advertising will continue to influence people into turning into Judaized philistines who are addicted to mindless violence and pornography and lack any sense of seriousness, cultivation, and intellectual aptitude. During one especially telling scene during the documentary, a Jewish advertising creative remarks, "Not taking yourself serious or, you know, being honest about your shortcomings is again a sort of very American thing that I think Americans find very appealing," which is most certainly true as demonstrated by the anti-reality, humor-added, and fantasy-driven essence of Hollywood. Of course, one of the most important things that The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money reveals is the power of humor as a weapon, as it enables certain hostile aliens that work in Hollywood to create certain misguided stereotypes/pseudo-archetypes (i.e. inbred redneck racists, Negro-lusting trailer park nymphets, sexually repressed white conservative Christian assholes) in a cultural/spiritual war against the American white majority. Indeed, the Harold & Kumar films, which were all directed and produced by neo-Vaudevillian Jews, certainly put Veit Harlan's National Socialist classic Jew Süss (1940) to shame in terms of their anti-Europid hatred, but because these pieces of celluloid excrement utilize toilet humor to get their putrid points across, no one suspects they're watching cinematic hate diatribes that have less aesthetic value than Julius Streicher's Nazi tabloid Der Stürmer. Sadly, as a work made over 15 years ago, The Fine Art of Separating People from Their Money makes it quite clear that the aesthetic metaphysical plague that is American mongrelized toilet kultur has only become all the malignant as time has passed, thus making the documentary mandatory viewing for anyone that takes art and/or cinema seriously. Let's just hope that director Hermann Vaske decides to make a sequel.

HIDESHII HINO'S THEATER OF HORROR: BOY FROM HELL

Hideshi Hino (2006)

Hideshi Hino is mostly known for his excellent work on the only good Guinea Pig films, namely Flowers of Flesh & Blood and Mermaid in a Manhole. He is a manga artist by trade, drawing ghoulish and violent horror stories. For this, he gets respect, so I can only remember being happy for these Twilight Zone-esque episodes. This one in particular is titled Boy From Hell. I can see you already know the plot. Daio is a wonderful son to a gorgeous mother. She is a surgeon with a reputation that fits in her 4-or so story house. We see him being rascally and sticking his head out of the back seat window of the car that is being driven by the misses butler/assistant. After some really horrible scenes involving the shittiest green screen ever depicted in a budgeted film, he turns and the boy gets decapitated by a truck. Seriously folks, the effects can't get anymore worse than this film. After seeing her decapitated son walking through the streets looking for his head. She then screams very loud and they all cry and bumble around like the Three Stooges. She doesn't tell anyone apparently and buries him in a wasteland. There we meet a crazy Jap lady with a horrendous wig. She tells the destroyed mother to slit a child's throat with a plastic fang she hands her and let the blood spill on the grave. Doing so will result in the resurrection of her beloved son. She kidnaps a dying cancer patient at the age of 12 and hangs him upside. This will sound malevolent of me, but watching this kid cry and the moment leading up to his arterial severing demise was quite hilarious in an often demented way. That happens, and her son comes back to life...only not as cute. For the most part, his illustrious artistry is used well but with a receding budget which doesn't allow him to paint the blood red canvas he wishes. This monster-boy has a taste for blood and rampages around a drawn city at night and devours people in cases of stupidity. These people deserved to die for lacking any sense. On the case is the only good thing about this film; A crazy detective. Seeing these films make me wish our local law enforcement were this colorful. Most of this film is dumbed down by hideous effects and drawn scenery. While I am a fan of Hino's work, the cartoon-esque doesn't fit like it does in "Who Framed Roger Rabbit?". Not to mention the obvious midget playing Demon Daio. Too hilarious for words. This film is only worth a hearty chuckle.

DETROIT METAL CITY

Hiroshi Nagahama (2008)

Organizing Japanese weirdness is easy enough. From a country where you can purchase used underwear in vending machines, no topic is sacred from getting befouled with quirky Japs in "fashionable" clothes all the while mocking something that their culture has no place in doing so. For an elaborated and clever title, Toshio Lee took the existing Detroit Rock City and made it into Detroit Metal City. Get it? The story is simple and charming enough. Closet homosexual Soichi leaves his farm life to become a Swedish pop singer. He finds himself in a rut when he becomes the front man for a death metal band called Detroit Metal City, all the while hiding his identity behind a wig, face paint, and donning the name "demon emperor" Johannes Krauser II. For Krauser's "mask," the traditional death metal approach is taken which aids the non-stop sarcastic viewpoint of metal. Stab a dead dog repeatedly, why don't you? Like Metalocalypse before it, Detroit Metal City just shows how ridiculous and unsavory the effect of Metal is on both social and physical aspects of life. Representing this claim is DMC's choice of lyrics. Such classic verses as "I'm a terrorist from hell. Yesterday, I've raped my mother" are prominent in the philosophy of DMC and thus brings in a youthful, rebellious teenage crowd. Unbeknownst to the fans, Johannes is actually a giggling, bubbly fashionable ex-farm boy who has a perfect mushroom cut and an attitude that can extinguish fire out of fear of homosexuality. This isn't his dream so where did it go wrong? With most tales of inspiration, this one caters to the motives of giving dreams to others and explodes into a heavy metal face off against the legendary Jack III Dark (Gene Simmons). The scintillating versus match plays out like a self-loathing foreign idealist cover of a Tenacious D act. For fans of Japanese cinema, be it cult, horror, or quirky adventures in bubblegum land, DMC coddles to the needs of fans of eccentric comedy. I'd be lying if I denied Detroit Metal City's marvelous ability to make me chuckle, laugh, and grin to no end. For an exclusive and exaggerated view at Japan's culture, Detroit Metal City is a comical touring through the busy streets filled with women that all look the same, super sentai performances, and the arrogant lot of "fashionable males" that stroll through. And just to think, this amusing film was brought to you by a hit Japanese manga. It seems that while we're adapting Japanese horror films to our American market, they're taking their own comics and adapting them to the screen. We perpetrate upon the same soil but normally with foreign works of literature. No "culture" is sacred enough from Hollywood's disheveling blood thirsty scalpel. Just like the many masks adorned in Detroit Metal City, this film will suit any to all demographic unless you're disgusted by romantic comedies detailing the escapades of an aspiring pre-op tranny that completely redefines the term "flamboyant." For a film with revolving ethics sermoning the values of goals, Detroit Metal City is damn near perfect and a shining light of an absurd comedy. To bogart upon a film that near everyone should see is hard enough as it is. Should I throw in several "quotables?" Detroit Metal City is slam-bang fun? A rocking good time? No, these are just silly word-smithing's that equate to a flaccid discussion. If an idiosyncratic eye with razor sharp wit seems endearing to you, see Detroit Metal City at all cost. Like the source material, the result is incredibly entertaining and sports a fleshy comic feel to boot that will appraise you over and over again.

MUSCLE

Hisayasu Satô (1989)

While I am not even marginally interested in the 'Pink film' (aka Pinku eiga aka Pink eiga) aside from the occasional oddity like Aryan Kaganof's uniquely unhinged cross-cultural curiosity Shabondama Elegy (1999) aka Tokyo Elegy starring Dutchman Thom Hoffman as a western criminal with a unquenchable thirst for cleanly shaved yellow snatch, I certainly could not turn down seeing a film belonging to the Japanese exploitation 'movement' that pays tribute to Pier Paolo Pasolini and features a highly complementary soundtrack by the English post-industrial group Coil, including their greatest song "Ostia (The Death of Pasolini)." Indeed, Kurutta Butokai (1989) aka Muscle aka Lunatic Theatre aka Kitami aka Mad Ballroom Gala aka Asti gesshoku eiga-kan aka Asti: Lunar Eclipse Theater directed by celebrated Pink film maestro and 'V-cinema' auteur Hisayasu Satô (Widow's Perverted Hell aka Look Into Me, Splatter: Naked Blood aka Nekeddo burâddo: Megyaku) is the fiercely fucked and quintessentially Japanese yet at the same time ultimately universal tale of a gay muscle mag photographer who goes to prison for a year after cutting off his sadistic male prostitute boy toy's arm with a samurai sword, only to get out of the slammer and become all the more determined to be with his one-armed beau while simultaneously attempting to track down a copy of commie cocksucker Pasolini's infamous cinematic swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975). Indubitably, had Yukio Mishima been born into a later generation, he would have directed a film like Satô's poof Pinku piece, which features a near perfect marriage of sexually perverse poetry and sadomasochistic cinematic schlock, albeit with a sense of romanticism that is rather rare for such works. Indeed, I would go as far as saying that Muscle is the all the more aberrant, if not more artless and hardly nationalistic, cinematic son of Mishima's sole celluloid effort Yûkoku aka Patriotism aka Rite of Love & Death. A fellow known as a sort of 'Jap Cronenberg' who once gave real-life cannibal turned Japanese celebrity Issei Sagawa a cameo role in one of his films, Satô is notable for being the first major Pinku auteur to deliver a queer themed work via Kamen no Yuwaku (1987) aka Temptation of the Mask, which is about a boy that is routinely raped by his sick sod stepfather and grows up to be a sexually confused arsonist who is chased by a gay detective. Muscle is Satô's second piece of sadomasochistic sodomite celluloid and, despite its considerably unflattering and oftentimes downright depraved depiction of homosexuality, the film managed to win the grand prize at the Berlin Gay and Lesbian Festival in 1993, thus hinting that both the krauts and Japs inherited some of the same pesky vices after the Second World War. While a wayward work of the homo S&M sort, Satô's film is also dripping with unhealthy obsession, which is certainly something many people, including myself, can relate to. Indeed, Muscle features a protagonist whose love for a young male prostitute drives him to homicidal lunacy, grisly self-mutilation, and a nasty P.P. Pasolini obsession. Despite my general apathy towards Pinku, when I learned about the plot to Satō's nasty little piece of work I knew I would love it and after watching the film I can happily state that I wallowed up every second of it. A film made during a time when western fag filmmakers were only making films about AIDS and other sterilely banal topics, Muscle is thankfully a provocative stab in the gut that never succumbs to superficial sermonizing or senseless sentimentalism as a work marinated in 'mad love' that demonstrates that in every sadist there is lurking a secret masochist and vice versa.

Muscle opens with a super gay montage of a muscleman in a pink thong flexing and posing in a shadowy room juxtaposed with heavy male breathing as if someone is beating off or getting slowly butt-fucked. As fairly introverted protagonist Ryuzaki (Takeshi Itō)—a man who snaps photographs for a Tom of Finland-esque fag rag—narrates in a quasi-film noir-ish somber monotone fashion, "It began when he gave me the flyer for the contest. Back then, I was the editor of the magazine, "Muscle." From there, the viewer is introduced to Ryuzaki's prostitute-cum-performance-artist lover Yukihiro Kitami (Simon Kumai), who the protagonist seems to have fallen in love with at first sight, but as he somberly narrates, "Our beautiful days were brief. Kitami began to get sadistic." Indeed, while the two started out their relationship ball-dancing with one another in the protagonist's cramped apartment and worshiping one another's thong-covered dongs, Kitami eventually got rather sexually sadistic with Ryuzaki and began doing extra naughty things to him like biting his balls and slicing him up with a knife during sex. Ultimately, Ryuzaki eventually decided to hack off Kitami's right-arm during an S&M photo shoot, with his reason being, "I couldn't take it. Something inside crumbled and exploded at the same time." As punishment for his somewhat strange crime, Ryuzaki was sentenced to one year in prison, but it seems that ultra-violence and hard prison time only reinforced his sado-masochistic love for cruel cunt Kitami.

Upon getting out of prison, Ryuzaki takes a leak in a public urinal and a random fag goes up to him and says, "Welcome back. Let me suck it," but the protagonist is a rare monogamous queer who is only interested in finding and being with his beloved one-armed beau Kitami. Unfortunately for the protagonist, finding a mono-armed muscleman hustler is not as easy as the protagonist assumed it would be. During his first night as a free man, Ryuzaki suffers what most normal people would call a nightmare that involves Kitami biting his balls, covering his body with what looks like cream cheese with a knife (!), and savagely raping his bunghole. The next morning, Ryuzaki wakes up with a copy of Muscle Magazine on his face as if he fell asleep while masturbating and soon receives a call from his boss, who informs him that they will have to temporarily stop publishing because they lack funds. Clearly, Ryuzaki is disappointed as he is not only out of the job, but also because he is rather sentimental magazine, stating, "It was really good; an excuse to look at hard bodies." To the annoyance of his boss, Ryuzaki demands to know about Kitami's whereabouts, pleading, "I dreamed of the man," but the only thing he can tell him is that, "I've heard there's a one-armed man walking the streets." Ryuzaki has such a kind and thoughtful boss that he went to the effort of watching all of his belongings while he was in jail, including Kitami's dismembered arm, which the protagonist has on display in a phallic-like jar and which he seems to worship as a sort of religious icon. Of course, in Ryuzaki's mind, the arm pales in comparison to the real living and breathing man that it once belonged to.

Aside from his obsession with finding his beloved bastard of a beau, Ryuzaki develops an unhealthy fetishistic fixation with Italian poet and auteur Pier Paolo Pasolini, who he seems to feel that he is tied to in a sort of spiritual fate as reflected in his remark regarding the filmmaker, "He was killed the same time I cut off the arm." Indeed, both Ryuzaki and Pasolini faced much pain as a result of their masochistic love for young gay gigolos, but unlike the filmmaker, the Jap photographer fought back and now he is fighting for love. Since he is out of the job, Ryuzaki finds new employment as a ticket collector at a bizarre arthouse theater called "The Lunatic Cinema," where he only charges the viewer if they like the film that they see. Naturally, Ryuzaki begins looking at the seediest fag bars in town for his missing boy toy and in one of these places a quasi-tranny man-hooker greets him and states, "Welcome. This is the entranced to paradise. It can also be the exit from hell. We both love to slip in through the back entrance. Around the world, French, Greek, take your pick." Ryuzaki reluctantly agrees to buy the sickening shemale's time in the hope of plying him for info about Kitami, but the sexually confused streetwalker is more concerned with using his self-described "first class" sexual technique, so the conversation goes absolutely nowhere. Meanwhile, Ryuzaki writes to a Japanese friend living in Italy named Sugisaki to ask him if he can track down a copy of Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom since they are not screening the film at any of the theaters in Japan. It almost seems like Ryuzaki believes that Salò reveal to him sort of hidden spiritual truth, but fate ultimately has different plans for him.

When Ryuzaki hangs out with his mustached buddy Tschida (You Suzuki), he is rather annoyed upon witnessing the exceedingly fucked relationship his friend has with his sadistic girlfriend 'Yoko' (Kiyomi Itô), who introduces herself to the protagonist by stating in a misleadingly soft fashion, "Yoko for flower. Ko for child. Flower-child. Hello!" and then proceeds to stare at him like a virginal schoolgirl with an innocent high school crush. Of course, Tschida is agitated by his girlfriend's less than polite staring, so he slaps the shit out of Yoko, but she is not as passive and innocent as she looks as demonstrated by the fact that she immediately throws soda in her boyfriend's face, knocks him on his ass, drives her heel into his cock and stomach, and then begins fucking him right in front of Ryuzaki, who seems rather unimpressed with the entire scenario. As it turns out, Yoko is turned on by Ryuzaki's coldness and decides to show up at his work when they are screening Pasolini's Porcile (1969) aka Pigsty. Whilst attempting to use stereotypical female deception by pretending to be a 'damsel in distress' even though she is anything but, Yoko pleads to Ryuzaki regarding her boyfriend, "Help me, please. Tschida will kill me," but the protagonist knows her game and does not fall for her pathetic bullshit as expressed in his stoic response, "I don't think so. Tschida's the one who's going to get killed [...] By you." Instead of denying that she might kill Tschida, Yoko then asks Ryuzaki, "Are you.....S...or M?" and he shows he can be quite the sadist by knocking her on her flat Jap ass after she starts biting him. When Ryuzaki begins handing out flyers the next day reading, "I'm looking for you. The one who lost your right arm" to people around the city, Yoko approaches him and attempts to seduce him by stating, "You're cold as ice. But I like your cold eyes [...] Your eyes were ice cold when I was fucking Tschida [...] You got yourself caught in my web. The spider's web. I won't leave you alone." Luckily for Ryuzaki, he's 100% queer and will not have to go through the ordeal of becoming the lover of a psychotic bitch, but then again, his true love is no less deleterious.

While Ryuzaki manages to receive a VHS copy of Pasolini's Salò from his comrade in Italy, he has to convert the tape since it is in PAL format, but when he goes to the conversion place, they refuse to do it since it is 'uncensored' (after all, Japs hate pubic hair and Guidos have tons of it). After leaving the conversion place, Ryuzaki is approached by Tschida, who attempts to talk him out of looking for his one-armed man Kitami by remarking, "I want to turn you into an upright citizen. You're not a criminal. It was self-defense," but the protagonist wants nothing to do with what he is talking about and retorts, "That doesn't change the fact that I chopped off his arm." Rather creepily, as Ryuzaki and Tschida argue, Yoko stalks them. Later that day, Ryuzaki heads to a pier to hand out flyers where he runs into a leather-clad hustler that claims that he and his friends recently hung out with Kitami remarking in an almost fiendish fashion, "Everyone made fun of him because he was so creepy. We were actually afraid of him, because he was indescribably charming and had a divine body." As Ryuzaki and the dubious hustler continue their conversation in a bathroom, the latter remarks, "You've got a big one" while the former takes a very long leak. When the hustler tells an extravagant story about how a man came to live with his family and seduced every single person in the house in a salacious scenario that caused his sister to turn into an insomniac, his mother to sexually degenerate into a nympho that chased "anything with a dick," and caused his father to run out the door naked and never come back home, Ryuzaki becomes exceedingly enraged and spitefully states, "Stop talking shit. Don't steal stories from movies." Indeed, the hustler merely regurgitated the basic storyline from Pasolini's Teorema (1968) and pathetically attempted to pass it off as a tragically intriguing anecdote from his own life. When the seemingly sociopathic hustler steals Ryuzaki's VHS copy of Salò from his hands and smashes it on the ground, the protagonist naturally completely loses it and beats him to death with a metal rod. After all, what better way to avenge Pasolini's legacy than to beat a young hustler to death?!

When Ryuzaki receives an envelope containing a fancy blood red invitation for a masquerade ball and a pair of black pantyhose, he knows that his cocksucking comrade Kitami wants to meet him for a fateful event that will decide the future of their unfinished unhinged sadomasochistic romance. Rather curiously, the masquerade is taking place at the some movie place where the protagonist works. Undoubtedly, Ryuzaki's date with fate at the masquerade initially vaguely feels like something out of Arthur Schnitzler's novella Traumnovelle (1926) or Kubrick's adaptation Eyes Wide Shut (1999), but what ultimately erupts is much more morbidly modern, not to mention quite flamingly and melodramatically, if not quite violently, gay. When Ryuzaki arrives at the theater, a ticket collector sporting pantyhose over his head tells him that him that the place has been rented out for a "private party" and that he must show his invitation and cover his head with pantyhose, which he immediately does. When Ryukazi walks inside the theater, a man with pantyhose walks him onto a stage with a spotlight where they dance to the soothing sounds of Coil. Eventually, various other men wearing different colored pantyhose get on the stage and start pushing the protagonist around in a rather rough fashion until the protagonist yells, "Kitami." After that, the music stops, the lights come on, and everyone takes their pantyhose off their head, including Tschida and Yoko, who were clearly involved in a plot against Ryuzaki from the very beginning but immediately attempt to warn him about Kitami who, to delight of the protagonist, soon reveals himself. Rather absurdly, Ryuzaki attempts to give Kitami his dismembered arm back, but he knocks it out of the protagonist's hand and then gives him a royal beating when he acts like a sentimental pussy and tries to pick it up. As Kitami states to Ryuzaki like a true deranged braggart, "I knew you came here. That's why I chose it as the execution ground. I'm the matador. If you don't attack me, your torture is going to have to wait." Of course, Ryuzaki has no problem enduring torture for love but he is wholly unwilling to fight back, as he feels that he has already hurt Kitami enough and does not want to open old wounds.

Naturally, Ryuzaki fails to fight back and instead declares his undying love to Kitami, passionately stating in regard to his reason for cutting his arm off, "Back then, I couldn't stand the pain. My nerves were shot. Something was wrong with me, even though I needed you. I loved you." When Ryuzaki attempts to embrace his decidedly demented beau after making his impassioned declaration of love, Kitami kicks him to the ground and contemptuously states, "You only love yourself." After describing in a histrionic fashion how he was bedridden for two months and suffered insomnia for another four months because, "My severed arm was trying to find me," Kitami asks Ryuzaki if he "killed the queen on the pier" and then goes on to described how "no one will cry" and "no one will care” about the forsaken hustler’s brutal death. Ryuzaki defends himself by saying, “He lied to me. He told me about his family, like it was from some screenplay” and Kitami’s long-haired friend remarks, “it’s true! But it’s Kitami’s family story. He started working out to get over it. Everything is an illusion...like in the movies.” Ultimately, Ryuzaki desperately begs his lover to stay with him by stating, “Please stay with me. If you want to torture me, you can do it until I die” and, somewhat surprisingly, Kitami agrees, but under the stipulation that he demonstrate his devotion to him by allowing him to chop off his right arm so that they will be “50/50” in terms of the abuse and disfigurement that they have bestowed upon one another. Right before Kitami goes to hack off his arm, Ryuzaki yells “Wait! I’ll do it my own way” and proceeds to blind himself with the sword. As blood drips down his face, Ryuzaki states while in a state of completely deranged ecstasy, “Now I’ll see your body the way it was when we me.” In the end, in a most morbidly romantic scene juxtaposed with the quite fitting Coil song “Ostia (The Death of Pasolini)” in a semi-surreal scenario that truly demonstrates that love conquers all, Ryuzaki and Kitami literally dance into the night like two old dapper queens.

Although I probably should not admit it, Muscle touched me in a way that no gay S&M exploitation film has ever done before, as it potently depicts in a simple, albeit highly effective and aberrantly allegorical, way the sort of perennially (self)destructive hold that a great love can have over a person. I know personally that I thought I had been in love various times before until I met a certain girl who completely changed how I looked at the world and who I tolerated things from that I had never tolerated from anyone else before. In that sense, as the protagonist of Satō’s film learns, love can have a refreshing humbling effect that helps put things in one life’s into perspective, even if it comes at the price of much metaphysical pain and suffering. By the end of Muscle, the protagonist rather chose death than be without his beloved and rather symbolically, he opts to brutally blind himself to save his romance. Indeed, it might be some patently perverted cheapo Pinku fag-fest, but Satō’s work ultimately exposes great truths and insights about love that the seemingly soulless and sociopathic dream-defilers in Hollywood would never dare touch. Another interesting aspect to the film is that it is innately anti-Hollywood in its almost mystical portrayal of arthouse cinema, namely the works of Pasolini. For instance, when the protagonist is asked by the female sadist Yoko if Pigsty is interesting, he replies “That depends on you,” thus alluding to the fact that Pasolini’s work is only for a select few who have the eyes and minds to appreciate it. Of course, to fully appreciate Muscle, one must be more familiar with Pasolini than Pinku films. As the protagonist also states to Yoko regarding Pasolini’s film, “If you don’t like what you saw, you don’t have to pay. That’s the principle of the Lunatic Cinema,” thereupon indicating that such idiosyncratic arthouse works are not made for mere monetary reasons and should not be forced on the uninitiated or art-adverse, as it would like be attempting to teach the blind how to read. After all, like with lovers, taste in cinema is a highly subjective matter and my experience is that people that like banal movies are typically banal people. Of course, my great love and I also have similar taste in cinema as we do in the bedroom and it does not involve tiny muscular Jap men in pink thongs. Ultimately, Muscle is more successful than Ang Lee's Brokeback Mountain (2005) in terms of depicting a gay romance in a universal way that can be understood by heterosexuals, which is no small accomplishment considering the film features sleazy hustlers, degenerate queens, queer bondage photographers, man-on-man ball-biting and countless other depraved sexually inverted ingredients that would surely cause kraut poof pig Rosa von Praunheim to giggle with glee like a Japanese schoolgirl.

NAKED BLOOD

Hisayasu Satô (1996)

I don't take much heart in exploitation films. I frequently enjoy the fruitful violence and depravity they offer, especially in a world so quick to judge, but the same formula is applied over and over again. Blood this. Sex that. It's overused in all sense of the word. Hisayasu Sato's film Naked Blood is a CAT III exploitation movie with some intelligence. Eiji is the only son of a widowed mother who is also a scientist. His father was lost at sea and never found. Eiji is an aspiring scientist who just invented a new pain killer dubbed "My son". It's the recipe for eternal happiness, turning pain into pleasure (As demonstrated in Flowers of Flesh & Blood). Before his mother runs tests on 3 women, Eiji sneaks My son in with the drug his mother and intends on viewing them to watch for side effects. He runs into trouble when the women start mutilating themselves creating ecstasy out of delectable tortures.

The film itself travels through many genres and features many noticeable scenes. One being a sex scene the seems like it inspired some of Demolition Man or Tsukamoto's A Snake Of June. The most surprising element is the character development. Eiji's mother watches old reels of his father and through some interesting flashbacks, we witness the problem at its core. Sato filmed his vision of the transgression of pain and ecstasy deliriously creating an intelligent, yet nihilistic masterpiece.

Many bizarre situations accompany the scenes in this film. Rika suffers from an extreme case of insomnia and because of this and probably also due to some freakish accident with the scribes personal life, she has hyper sensitive hearing and can hear the plants talking. Her philosophy is that cactuses are always sleeping and for that, she shares an intimate bond with a cactus. Since she cannot sleep, she sits in a chair with a VR headset connected to the cactus which relaxes her into dreamlike situations. The film is a gore extravaganza. Nipples are cutten off and consumed. Vagina's sawn off and eaten. Arteries slashed, gruesome piercings, and even the entrails exposed. This Japanese film has enough blood to please most gorehounds. This is a very solid psychological film with many disturbing scenes, a wicked twist ending, and frequent bloodshed. A great film that should be seen eventually although it does suffer from the casual imperfection.

ZORN'S LEMMA

Hollis Frampton (1970)

I hadn't updated myself on the consistency of this avant-garde/experimental piece from one of Peter Greenaway's favorite auteurs - Hollis Frampton. I went in a complete virgin to the ideas and anti-synopsis that Zorn's Lemma embraces, or even Hollis Frampton for that matter. The curious title of Zorn's Lemma is the equivalent of the Axiom of Choice. You've heard of the musical genre Math Rock, now witness cinema propelled by the theory of mathematics.

A fan base for this type of material is certainly hard to find. Many viewers will get bored, tired, irritated, and irrational after a small time dealing with Zorn's Lemma. This is a prime example of one of the harder films to get through. I'd personally like to view Frampton's Lemon. I've heard of the techniques he dabbles in, such as dissecting light. Once your eyes and mind adjust to the creeping attack of structured mathematics, you will become accustomed to this. Perhaps, you can open your mind up enough to allow films like this and La Jetée to convince you that a slide show effort isn't fruitless.

Hollis Frampton conjures up a sixty minute slide show scored from static and weird glitch blips. Billboards and signs continuously make up a very clockwork alphabet. The pattern soon drills in your brain, absorbing the boredom you may have acquired like a sponge. Pretty soon, your motor skills will eventually cease and a form of a hypnotizing trance will take hold. At least, that's what happened to me. Zorn's Lemma is an experience that is unrivaled. With no stars, no narrative, and no sound, this is a film that is unequivocally one of a kind.

EASY TO GET EASY TO GET

Howard Bretherton (1931)

In Woody Allen's Love and Death, there is a scene with Russian rookies receiving a morality play about the dangers of sexually transmitted diseases. The United States Army takes many precautions to alert America's young troops about the dangers of foreign slutty women who moonlight as filthy succubus's who pose a huge threat to our soldiers whilst on their leave. In the presumed 40's, an anti-VD film was created by the Army entitled Easy to Get which encompasses an afro-centric view on the syphilitic victims. We soon meet a young Negro. To better fit the film, I'll name him Tyrone. Tyrone's a swell soldier fighting for our country. While on leave, he meets a swell black female in an all black bar. He takes her home and becomes very close to her over the weak, culminating in them making sweet sweet love in a Cadillac or something. A white US doctor tells warns him of filthy Negro women and the dangers lurking behind every female mask. Easy to Get centers around the theory that Africans acquire the disease easier, therefore issuing them a vulnerability card. Even behind the most innocent face lurks a da'stardly she-devil who just aims to ruin aspiring men's lives. The novelty of Easy to Get is intimidating, good fun, and always present. This 22 minute short features a miniature lecture from a black Reverend warning "his kind" about the dangers of catching syphilis. Just to break the ice rather crudely, you are given surprise close-up shots of diseased and flaccid Negro penises. I don't know what's more revolting while being humorous - the twitching rotten libido's of the displayed "weaker race" or the cow fetus pseudo-Eraserhead looking babies whom the narrator said should have rather been put to death. After Tyrone, we meet a new protagonist. I'll name this one Leroy Jones. He suffers a similar fate from a prostitute in a bar. This training video makes dutiful time to display women (all archetypes and social statuses) as venomous creatures to sap the soul of men by unleashing a plethora of bacteria inside their urethra. Once Easy to Get is over, you'll sit there and let it dawn on you that you just watched racial and sexist propaganda in the guise of a training video to promote healthy soldiers. Easy to Get is a film that is "easy to get". It's more entertaining than you'd be led to believe. It's available on the special features of the Heavy Petting DVD. It's definitely worth a view for the fans of an ignorant America circa 40s. I haven't enjoyed a piece of propaganda in quite some time and needless to say, it's very refreshing. Easy to Get is crude, disgusting, free-formed, and filmed incredibly well. The general message conveyed here is "All Negroes gots AIDS".

SERGEANT YORK

Howard Hawks (1941)

Sergeant York is an American World War II (set during the first war) propaganda film directed and produced by Christian Scientist, Howard Hawks. It is a biographical film about Medal of Honor winner Alvin York. Hailing from Tennessee, York made the ultimate hero story for someone from the middle of nowhere. York epitomized the hillbilly and redneck stereotypes America has about Southern Americans. The irony is that he became a hero and role model for all.

Sergeant York is excellent propaganda in that it could make the poor Southerner feel like he could be a hero. Like World War I, America needed a reason to convince Americans to get into World War II. After the first war, Americans had enough. The depression also did not help with American patriotism. Southerners have always made great soldiers due to being underprivileged, backwards, and working class. At least in this point in American history, Southern soldiers' contributions to America were acknowledged. Most contemporary films dealing with Southerners generally take a derogatory or defaming route. Directors (or should I say showman) like Steven Spielberg have utilized the formulas and conventions of American World War II propaganda films for contemporary propaganda films like Saving Private Ryan. Each film features various characters from around the United States. The newer films add a larger collection of characters such as blacks, hippies, and surfers (in anti-Vietnam films like Platoon and Apocalypse Now) to represent a more diverse and changing America. Sergeant York is where you would probably want to start if searching for the birth of the contemporary War film. Although masterworks such as Birth of a Nation set up the model, Sergeant York filled in the little details that made the war film much more entertaining and sentimental. Directors like Steven Spielberg have just taken these conventions and formulas to extremes (especially with sentimentalism). It is a shame that American War films haven't advanced much in comparison to European War films which take endless different approaches. Films like Sergeant York confuse me in my feelings on war and the war film. No one completely wins the war. At the end of each millions are left dead and for what? Alvin York was a hero in his own right. He did what he believed was honorable and important. The real question is whether or not the global bankers, politicians, and countries did the right thing. It is doubtful as human nature has always been one focused on self-destruction. Sergeant York almost makes me feel as if Alvin York was exploited for the use of propaganda. Either way, the film and Alvin York have made history.

SERGEANT YORK

After watching countless European war films I can only look at War for what it is; barbarianism. Whether it be Elem Klimov's Soviet classic, Come and See, or documentary filmmakers Sebastian Dehnhardt, Christian Deick and Jörg Müller's Stalingrad, War is hell. It will be interesting to see what the future has for the American war film with the failure and disaster America has gotten itself into, in the Middle East.

THE WHITE LIE

Howard Hickman (1918)

While working in a video store, i had the chance to view a lot of independent horror which stretches over every sub-genre. This is a short film from Ron De-Caro and is apart of a trilogy. The Gateway Meat is the last film and is expected to be finished soon. For a film that is only ten minutes long, it is pretty good. The director knows how he wants things to appear and it is pretty shocking.

The plot revolves around Tyler Steadman. He lives in a house with a family but is addicted to drugs. While his wife is arguing with him, he gets a phone call from an anonymous person who he owes a hundred dollars. Of course he hangs up on him and because of that, the man appears at his house and begins a descent into a grotesque art of humiliation. While hitting Tyler with a hammer, the madman hears a baby monitor makes noise. That is when the suspense turns up. The killer walks up the stairs and along the way steps on a toy which starts talking. The talking of the toy starts humming at a noticeable level and mixes with the screams of the baby well. When you hear the babies last scream, it is the most authentic scream i have ever heard from a child. The acting in this short film is so-so. I had no expectations whatsoever so it wasn't a huge letdown. Tyler seems to be too forced with his role and the make-up is painfully noticeable. The madman plays a decent role. Sometimes appearing too fake. His hat bill is so low i dont think you ever see his eyes. I consider that a smart move. Some of his angles i didn't really care for; such as when the camera seems to be on the tip of the killers gun. I have seen the same mistake over and over again in indie cinema. The hammer effects looked really nice though. We hear loud cracks on the head that really remind you of the good days of torture film. The sound effects for the rain are some of the best i have ever heard. Quite childish to love, but it sets the mood up real nice. It carries the tagline "The most brutal 10 minute short film ever!". It certainly isn't but damn if they didn't try. I am really looking forward to his new film.

100 DAYS BEFORE THE COMMAND
100 DAYS BEFORE THE COMMAND

Hussein Erkenov (1991)

Undoubtedly, one of the greatest and most biting ironies of the modern world is that, instead of attempting to appeal to the nationalistic anti-communist white mainstream and rabid rednecks in spewing hatred against the Russians as was done constantly during the Cold War era, the mainstream media and mulatto president now target queers and leftists in propagating totally propagandistic hatred against ruskis because the Slavs, who still have testicular fortitude and common sense ideals, do not buy into poof cultural Marxism and logical fallacies like 'equality' and whatnot. After all Russians have more important things to care about than allowing men who penetrate other men's rectums with their penises to be allowed in the military or whether homos should be allowed to be in charge of Boy Scout troops comprised of prepubescent boys. That being said, it should be no surprise that the Russian anti-communist cocksucker flick Sto dney do prikaza (1994) aka 100 Days Before the Command—certainly an ominous and one-of-a-kind celluloid soldier's story if there ever was one about the state sanctioned dehumanization of Red Army recruits—was banned by the Soviets upon its release. In fact, although completed in 1990, director Hussein Erkenov (Kholod, Ne strelyayte v passazhira aka Don't Shoot the Passengers) was not even able to get the film screened until after starting his own sales company and eventually having it premiered at the 1995 Berlin Film Festival. On top of that, to mislead Soviet authorities, Erkenov, with the help of screenwriters Yuri Polyakov and Vladimir Golodov, had to create two fake screenplays on top of the real one to even get 100 Days Before the Command made so as to mislead the fine folks at the Gorky Film Studio, a film studio named after a man who ironically stated "eradicate homosexuals and fascism will disappear." Unfortunately, Soviet literary propagandist Maxim Gorky did live to see not only the fall of his commie utopia, but also a film so homoerotic and critical of the Red Army as 100 Days Before the Command, a film that takes a rather delightfully degenerate approach to Socialist realism. A hyper hallucinatory and sometimes even surreal cinematic work that has no real beginning nor end but instead wanders aimlessly in a sort of charismatically creepy celluloid Soviet purgatory, 100 Days Before the Command is a mystifying metaphysical fever dream that alternates between heaven and hell, but mostly hell, in terms of the daily routines of boyish soldiers whose sole source of solace is homoerotic tomfoolery and day-dreaming. Depicting the Marxist military manner of molding innocent boys into murderous machinelike men who act as slavish lost souls of the Soviet state, 100 Days Before the Command makes allegorical references to Christian icon Saint George and his slaying of a dragon at the bottom of a lake that ate babies that were sacrificed to it, the serpent in the film being the Soviet Army. Utilizing real-life soldiers for virtually all the film roles as well as real army barracks, 100 Days Before the Command is cinematic realism at its most flagrantly fragmented and forebodingly transcendental as a film that is totally unforgettable, even if it has nothing resembling a discernible storyline nor plot.

Beginning with the Psalm 22:6 quote, “But I am a worm, and no man, a reproach of men, and despised of the people,” which certainly describes how the characters in the film must feel, 100 Days Before the Command soon cuts to Red army recruits goofing around gayly, but after a mysterious man appears, they are depicted laying in grass in seeming ecstasy, but also as what could also be seen as cold corpses on a battlefield. If anything is clear, it is that doom is in the air as echoed by a failed war in Afghanistan and premonitions of the collapse of the Soviet Union as 100 Days Before the Command certainly translates the dreadful atmosphere of its particular zeitgeist. Although featuring dozens of recruits, 100 Days Before the Command only focuses on five of them as they try in vain to maintain dignity and hope in a hopeless and undignified realm of physical and emotional brutality and 24 hour video surveillance. In terms of fun, the boy soldiers give each other baths and soap one another’s buttocks, which was apparently a common practice among the Soviets. Of course, in between homo-style bathhouse rubdowns, some soldiers bully and beat other soldiers in a somewhat S&M-inspired fashion. Visions, real or imagined, of Red Army corpses appear randomly. A female soldier named “Death”—the girlfriend of a degenerate commander—is the sole ‘bright’ light at the army barracks and she is introduced swimming unclad in the indoor army swimming pool. After discovering one of the boys, who is naked and in despair, imprisoned in a dark room, she complains to a supervisor, but her empathy is simply disregarded because in the Red Army realm, all emotions and innocence must be smashed and mutilated with a hammer and sickle. Another young soldier, working as a guard, imagines lady Death, who is wearing nothing but a rifle over her soldier, coming up to him while he is on watch and he reacts absurdly, assumedly out of fear for human comfort and pleasure, by threatening to kill her, but he eventually accepts her warm embrace, thereupon letting his guard down in a world where such a human luxury cannot be afforded. In one particularly disturbing scene that will rock the cocks of masochists, an elderly commander catches a soldier naked and smoking and assumedly brutally beats the boy (one only hears his horrific screams), but not before staring at his genitals in a rather unsettling manner. Of course, fellow soldiers are no less cruel as demonstrated by a comrade who urinates on a compatriot while he is asleep. Undoubtedly, if 100 Days Before the Command demonstrates anything, it is that political dissidents are not the only people in Siberian labor camps as the film depicts the Soviet Union as a cold and harsh gulag of the soul where even death seems preferable to drudging on.

If 100 Days Before the Command is even remotely accurate in depicting the apocalyptic atmosphere of the Soviet Union, especially among soldiers, then the Russians would have been probably been better off had the Third Reich annihilated them during the Second World War. While surely similar in its oneiric and ominous atmosphere, 100 Days Before the Command is a virtual nemesis film to Elem Klimov's masterpiece Come and See (1985) aka Idi i smotri in its depiction of the Soviets being in league with Satan. Aesthetically, 100 Days Before the Command manages to, rather deceptively, dream up visions of Tarkovsky, Sokurov, and Parajanov using cinematic techniques no more lavish than that of Soviet realism. Only so gay as showing naked young men and a couple scenes showing torture and sadomasochism that might turn on some more debauched sodomites, 100 Days Before the Command is more anti-Soviet and anti-authority than anything, depicting boys being sacrificed to a figurative Soviet serpent of sorts, hence the film's references to Saint George, who is nowhere to be found in the film. More than anything else, 100 Days Before the Command seems like a Slavic spiritual horror film set in a pre-apocalyptic red regime whose populous had been physically and emotionally raped by a monolithic atheistic authoritarian monster of the soul-draining sort. Featuring phantom nude corpses on autopsy tables, the seemingly demonic surveillance of characters at all places and all hours on a neon green computer monitor, the following of a young boy on a haunting path of corpses to his bed where he sleeps with his adult aged brother, the complete and utter grimness and decay of ruined and dilapidated post-industrial Soviet barracks and swimming pools, and the spooked and possessed somnambulist-like movements of the soldiers, 100 Days Before the Command is undoubtedly a potent and perturbing collection of petite vignettes that paints a phantasmagoric portrait of Perestroika in an aesthetically allegorical form. A more poetic and esoteric Slavized version of what Claire Denis attempted with Beau Travail (1999) set to the Baroque Teutonic melancholy of Johann Sebastian Bach, 100 Days Before the Command reminds the viewer that every once in a while, an anti-war film cannot only be free of putrid preachiness of the hopelessly contrived sort, but can also be absurdly artistic and atmospheric to the point where it deconstructs and reinvents the entire subgenre. That being said, one could argue that the repression of homosexuals in Russia is a good thing as it forces artists and filmmakers to be more creative and less conspicuous as was clearly the case with 100 Days before the Command, a film featuring flagrant homoeroticism without the lips, shallow clothing and personalities, and other limp-wristed Glee-loving philistine American aberrosexuals.

OUTRAGE

Ida Lupino (1950)

Takeshi "Beat" Kitano returns to sleeved form with Outrage, yet another pivotal outing of Yakuza bloodlines. This excursion into the oft-darkly comic world of shifty kinship is led by Kitano but sustained by the many other incredible characters, although variably disturbed, as a simple gesture of severing an allegiance with a drug dealing family goes far beyond the intended effect. Not at all like his debut feature Violent Cop, Outrage is the latest stasis of his cinematic evolution which seems to barrage with exquisite examples of "cops & robbers" till you feel the jarring sensation of whiplash. As per Kitano's motif in his more serious and gritty performances, occasionally both lead star and director, Kitano constantly explores many cinematic caverns of critical violence, always consequential. Never does something at all superfluous happen just for the sake of entertainment. Kitano's films have been, for me, a test of cinematic endurance. His films are much harder to stomach than most of any in a similar degree of story, from the curdling climax of Violent Cop to the systematic execution of many a friend within Outrage. Again, this answered calling is unforgettable as it is a film that allows you time to digest what you had just witnessed. At first I was unsure of exactly how much I enjoyed Outrage but it was only a couple days later that I realized I couldn't shake this film from my head, and neither will you.

No incendiary take on a criminal underworld would be complete without the superimposed head mafioso character. In the Japanese culture, this position is filled by the family boss or sometimes known as chairman. In Outrage, our chairman is a strange looking fellow whose thick cheeks almost bring to mind Kim Jong-il. His prime involvement is what Outrage focuses on - the cause and effect coupled with his issuing of orders. Much of Outrage is dizzying as clans are being turned on each other and no one is safe from the quite literal backstabbers. The only fault I call on Outrage isn't a fault of the film's as it was an interference on my behalf. Since my induction into Eastern films many years ago, I've slowly become accustomed to the behavioral traits, language patterns, the nationality of characters in writing, and even being able to distinguish nationality from appearance. That is, until I viewed Outrage. Once the narrative of Outrage reached a boil, the names and faces of the many characters along for the journey began spinning and trading faces and alliances, even identities. Granted, being overwhelmed by a film is truly an awe-inspiring act but Outrage had an entirely foreign effect. It took hold up until the hour mark. It is then that I finally had a grip on the characters. Having since toed the line of Kitano's impressive body of work, Outrage has greatly inspired me to delve deeper into his world of theatrical treachery. With examples such as Outrage and Violent Cop (Hana-Bi, up next for me), it's clear that these can only be the works of a stark visionary - a man known for being both a quipster and cinematic nihilist.

OUTRAGE

A fine trait of Kitano's is his ability and often persistence to manipulate both the camera and production of the film as well as his character. Kitano is a director who knows exactly he wants from his actors and instead of relying on an unknown to lead an artistic vessel often blindsided by inexperience, he lends his divine acting chops to portray characters personalized by himself. A wild scene brought immediately to mind is the soon-to-be infamous dental reworking scene in which Kitano steps the competition of retaliation up several notches. This scene in particular also happens to be one of the few scenes I've seen in a while that offers an excruciating peek into torture, albeit fresh and vivid with the sick sounds of twisting, tearing flesh against teeth and bone. The small portions of savagery within Outrage are always surprising and visceral, never redundant or seemingly stapled on. For a new breed of Kitano, the flourishing technological culture of Japan is quite evident as Outrage is simply gorgeous, from the smooth, organized asphalt of city streets to Kitano's threads teeming with textures you can practically taste.

More importantly, Outrage itself isn't a slow orbit around a single character. No, many clans feature characters as important and progressive to the film itself. Kitano's character, Ôtomo, isn't the only soul whose actions turn the escalated cascade of violence into a raging rapids, leaving many, many dead in scenes that would normally fall into a category of a mental body count but instead wind up tragic and unfortunate. As much as Ôtomo would despise his current standing, being a pawn of the chairman's wicked ways, the fellow hasn't a choice but to play the game until the subtle climax. The kaleidoscopic cast makes up the grand picture of Outrage, a film so busy with actions and reactions that you'd anticipate utter failure but as Kitano has shown, dominates a modestly timed gangster epic. Outrage simply distinguishes consequential karma out of a genre that has until recently been reserved for silly shoot outs and characters not worth a damn. No one is safe from the judgment of a bullet, not acquaintances or even brothers. We certainly aren't safe, that's for sure.

Igor Shavlak (2007)

"A dreadful foreign slasher film from Russia". That should be the plot synopsis for this lame attempt of creating scares. Most American horror films have become garbage, incorporating jump tactics and shitty remakes. When I saw the poster for Trackman, I was hooked. Boasting dark colors and wicked weaponry, it seemed like a bashful blast in painfully executing Russian teenagers.

The water-thin plot follows a pack of bank robbers receding into the tunnels under Moscow to escape from the police and make their getaway. Armed with guns and two hostages, it seems like nothing could go wrong. They talk of rumors of a creature living down here affected by Chernobyl. This creature in fact plays victim as well. Victim to an unpredictable yet retarded twist that gives shame to all involved in creating the storyboard for nails-on-chalk film.

What they don't realize is that it is actually the lamest attempt at creating a villain ever. My hopes normally stand tall for foreign movies because they do most things right such as creating an Eastern atmosphere, the mood, and setting the character development up a notch. The only thing I applaud this movie for is the set design and partial cinematography. They indeed got the look right for this film but it dragged on and on. The villain, who looks like some failure-casting role for Hellboy, is armed with a cork opener (?) and a bad ass pickaxe. He barely uses the pickaxe and plays with the corkscrew to remove eyes. Didn't I see this in See No Evil? In a scene halfway through the film, Trackman actually picks up an automatic weapon and open fires, instantly destroying any fear you might have felt. The only tension you feel during its hour and a half running time is a bit of tangent claustrophobia. These are not even the worst parts. The absolute fatality to this film was: 1) Complete lack of appreciated violence except for a couple eyeballs here and there. 2) The worst twist ending I have ever seen in my life.

These are the ingredients to make a dodgy, bland Russian slasher film. If you are looking for claustrophobic horror, rent Creep or The Midnight Meat Train.

SUMMER WITH MONIKA
SUMMER WITH MONIKA

Ingmar Bergman (1953)

Over half a century before the rise of the somewhat pathetic internet culture M.G.T.O.W (aka 'Men Going Their Own Way')—a group that has legitimate grievances against modern women yet is becoming the spiritually castrated mirror image of feminism—Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman (The Seventh Seal, Scenes from a Marriage) directed an understatedly sexy yet considerably dejecting melodramatic masterpiece depicting many of the loathsome and just downright insufferable qualities of modern Western women. Indeed, Sommaren med Monika (1953) aka Summer with Monika could be described as the very first M.G.T.O.W arthouse flick, but of course that would be selling such a thematically nuanced and aesthetically rapturous film insanely short to associate it with such a depressing movement of forsaken fellows. Starring Bergman's then-lover Harriet Andersson in a less than flattering role that was specially tailored for her, the film is quite genius in the sense that, like the hapless and hopelessly naïve male protagonist, the viewer finds themselves falling in love with the heroine despite the fact that she is a hyper hysterical, emotionally immature, histrionic, and corrosively narcissistic cunt that never thinks twice about ruining a man's life for the most petty and self-centered of reasons. In short, Summer with Monika is the kind of film that reminds you why women lived under coverture and were not allowed to vote, own property, or make any real important decisions in the Occident until relatively recently. While I do not want to sound like some defeated misogynist that simply hates all women due to bad personal experiences, I would be lying if I did not admit that the eponymous (anti)heroine is like a composite of all the bad qualities of every girlfriend that I have ever had and I suspect many men, not least of all auteur Bergman, would agree. Quite comparable to Rainer Werner Fassbinder's somewhat underrated flick Ich will doch nur, daß ihr mich liebt (1976) aka I Only Want You to Love Me in terms of its depiction of a somewhat naïve but well meaning young man learning the hard way that women have no gratitude when it comes to a male sacrificing everything for his wife and family, Bergman's film is a delectable downer that reminds male viewers while most men typically want nothing to do with women if it does not relate to sex. Of course, the fact that the film was made over 60 years ago yet features such an insufferably 'liberated' modern woman makes it crystal clear why Sweden is probably the mostly collectively feminized, emasculated, and cuckolded nation in the entire world.

Undoubtedly, the largely forgotten British Nietzschean philosopher Anthony Ludovici could have also been talking about the female lead of Bergman's early cinematic masterpiece when he wrote in his classic text Woman: A Vindication (1923), "Whether we appeal to folklore, to the proverbs of the unions, or to the earliest legends of mankind, we invariably encounter the traditional wisdom of humanity judgments upon woman which are more or less unanimous in condemning her bad temper, her disloyalty, her vanity, her malice and her indolence.” Following in the tradition of the similarly themed Hon dansade en sommar (1951) aka One Summer of Happiness directed by Arne Mattsson in terms of fueling Sweden’s dubious reputation as a sexually liberated nation, Summer with Monika also contributed to auteur Bergman’s own questionable personal sexual liberation in the sense that he abandoned his journalist wife Gun Grut and young son Ingmar Bergman Jr. for female lead Harriet Andersson after starting what was ultimately a relatively short-lived romance during the production of the film. Naturally, it should be no surprise that Bergman had very happy memories regarding the making of the film as revealed in his inordinately sentimental remark, “It’s close to my heart and one of my films I’m always happy to see again.” Of course, anyone watching the film can see why it would be so easy for both the lead character and Bergman himself to fall in love with Andersson as she radiates a somewhat idiosyncratic pulchritude that is just as entrancing as it is potentially dangerous, thus making it all the more amazing that the viewer is completely disgusted with the very same dame by the film’s less than comforting conclusion. Indeed, the genius of Summer with Monika is that Bergman manages to trick the viewer into falling in love with and eventually hating the female lead in what is ultimately the cinematic equivalent of a 90-minute romance where the audience experiences the ecstatic highs and crushing lows of young love from the convenience of their sofa without the long lingering effects of lovesick emotional baggage. Aside from possibly Nicholas Kazan’s debut feature Dream Lover (1993) starring Mädchen Amick, you will not find another movie with another lovely lady that you so eagerly learn to love to hate.

While Bergman once (in)famously stated regarding Godard, “I’ve never gotten anything out of his movies. They have felt constructed, faux intellectual, and completely dead. Cinematographically uninteresting and infinitely boring. Godard is a fucking bore. He’s made his films for the critics,” the overly intellectual frog filmmaker was a great fan of the subversive Swede and paid Summer with Monika a great compliment by describing it as “the cinematographic event of the year” when it was commercially reissued in 1958 in his native France. In the same review, Godard would also rightly note regarding Bergman’s film, “Ignored when it was first shown on the boulevards, SUMMER WITH MONIKA is the most original film by the most original of directors. It is to the cinema today what BIRTH OF A NATION is to the classical cinema. Just as Griffith influenced Eisenstein, Gance, and Lang, so SUMMER WITH MONIKA brought to a peak five years before its time that renaissance in modern young cinema whose high priests were Fellini in Italy, Aldrich in Hollywood, and (so we believed, wrongly perhaps) Vadim in France.” Indeed, aside from Vadim’s cocktease classic ...And God Created Woman (1956), it is hard to imagine that many of the lovelorn arthouse melodramas of Godard and Woody Allen would have ever been made were it not for Bergman's film. As for Bergman, he arguably paid the film the greatest compliment himself when he wrote in regard to it in a publicity piece upon its original release, "I didn't make Monika. [Source novel author and co-screenwriter Per Anders] Fogelström bred her in me and then, like an elephant, I was pregnant for three years, and last summer she was born with a big ballyhoo. Today, she is a beautiful and naughty child. I hope she will cause an emotional uproar and all sorts of reactions. I shall challenge any different person to a duel!"

Although directed by a man that was usually vocally against adapting novels, Summer with Monika was actually adapted from a book by Stockholm-based modernist writer Per Anders Fogelström. Despite its literary origins, the film is indubitably an auteur piece that practically bleeds ravishingly grim Bergmanesque black-and-white as a cinematic work that was clearly directed by a mensch that was hopelessly in love with the hot twat heroine. Indeed, despite only featuring one single nude scene that can hardly be described as pornographic, the film is surprisingly electrifyingly erotic, at least until the heroine turns into an insufferably treacherous bitch and literally cuckolds her beloved in the most cruel and craven of fashions. In fact, the film was deemed so erotic when it was released that American exploitation hack Kroger Babb—a less than charming chap that is probably best known for his scandalous promotion of the pseudo-sex-ed piece Mom and Dad (1945) aka The Family Story directed by William Beaudine—purchased the US rights to the film in 1955, had it edited it down to a mere 62 minutes, and then had it re-titled Monika: the Story of a Bad Girl. Of course, the Monika of Bergman's film is more of a dumb bitch and morally retarded modern witch than a lovable bad girl.

Undoubtedly, Summer with Monika male protagonist Harry (Lars Ekborg) probably would have done well to read Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard's wise words, "There are two ways to be fooled. One is to believe what isn't true; the other is to refuse to believe what is true," as he is eventually fooled in both manners. Indeed, right from the get go, it is obvious that the film's heroine Monika (Harriet Andersson) is the loosest young lady in Stockholm and she lacks the capacity to stay faithful to any man as she is a self-centered and relatively stupid little girl that literally lives to have fun, yet Harry immediately finds it easy to lie to himself about her lack of virtue upon more or less instantly falling in love with her. In fact, it is only when Monika essentially emotionally abandons their baby and fucks various other men in their mutual bed that Harry—a young man that, despite his youth, is totally willing to sacrifice everything for his family—is no longer able to deceive himself and thus confronts the pathologically shifty she-bitch. Of course, it does not start out bad, as Harry can only see the good in Monika when they start dating at the beginning of spring after the latter invites the former to a movie date to see the Robert Schumann biopic Song of Love (1947) starring Paul Henreid and Katharine Hepburn. A deceptively cutesy extrovert with borderline grotesque histrionic tendencies, Monika's a predatory chick that initially approaches poor pussy Harry, as she can sense he is an authentic 'nice guy' type and thus can be easily manipulated. A poor white trash girl that just happens to be blessed with a pretty face and relatively banging body, Monika is not even really worthy of bourgeois boy Harry, but he lacks self-esteem and simply cannot deny the advances of a cute chick that practically throws herself at him.

As a dude with a long dead mother and emotionally remote father with chronic health issues, Harry is somewhat vulnerable and surely easy prey for a low-class tramp like Monika. Indeed, as the eldest child of a less than cultivated lumpenpole family headed by an abusive alcoholic father that has no qualms about beating his own young adult daughter when she dares to run her big mouth, Monika naturally wants to flee her pathetic living situation ASAP and she sees meek virgin-boy Harry as the best tool to achieve that fairly realistic goal. Indeed, when her drunken father slaps her one day after she runs her mouth, Monika decides to flee her home with her belongings and then strategically waits outside Harry's house while sobbing so that she can use emotional sympathy as a means to get what she wants. Despite Harry's better judgement, Monika manages to convince him to both quit his job and steal his father's boat so that they can spend the summer basking around the otherworldly oceanic fairy tale realm that is the Stockholm archipelago. In short, Harry and Monika eventually become completely immersed in an inordinately romantic bucolic fairy tale of sorts where they are able to forget all the problems of the worlds and discomforts of being adults, as they have enough food supplies and sexual chemistry to keep each other happy, at least for the length of the summer (apparently, summer only really lasts a maximum of eight weeks in Sweden). Undoubtedly, Monika's love of the exotic and quite ethereal archipelago becomes quite obvious early on when she impresses Harry by stripping off all of her clothes on a rocky coast and then goes skinny-dipping. Of course, the area and its open oceanic spaces make the young lovers feel completely free in both the literal and figurative sense, but their freedom is really just a fleeting illusion as the two are in for a rude awakening when the ruthless reality of adulthood and personal responsibility sets in. Naturally, unexpected pregnancy and a lack of basic resources eventually causes the romance to come to a swift and terribly bitter end. Unfortunately, poor Harry never sees it coming.

For most of the summer, it is all fun and games for the two Swedish lovebirds, at least until Monika's bitterly jealous ex-boyfriend 'Lelle' (John Harryson) shows up, destroys most of their belongings, and then sets their boat on fire. On top of everything else, Lelle manages to give Harry a pretty bad thrashing, at least until Monika hits him over the head with a pan. Unfortunately, nice guy Harry shows mercy and stops Lelle from drowning after he is knocked out face-first into the water. With the revelation that Monika is pregnant and their supplies all but nonexistent, Harry wisely recommends that they head back home, but like a petulant toddler the heroine adamantly refuses and states, "No, I'm not going back. I want summer to go on just like this." When they are left with only mushrooms to eat, Monika complains in a hysterical fashion, "Fried mushrooms, boiled mushrooms, mushroom soup. If we go on like this, Harry Junior will be a mushroom. We have to think of something." Instead of going back to get food, Monika, who naturally craves special food due to being pregnant, comes up with the less than sound idea to steal culinary items and even gets caught by a bourgeois family upon attempting to steal a roast from their cellar. While the family prepares to call the police, Monika, who has about as much class and self-restraint as a crack-addled ghetto negress, mocks their daughter and then manages to escape with the roast in her hand when the stressed out bourgeois family man goes to get a beer. Rather notably, Monika stops in the middle of escaping from the bourgeois family to chomp down on the roast while crouching down like a wild animal in a forest scene that really underscores her bestially hedonistic character and incapacity to defer self-gratification. When Monika finally catches up with Harry, she berates him for not helping her with the theft, continues to eat the roast like a starving beast (without offering her beloved a single bite), screams like a wild hog being butchered, and then starts crying hysterically like a violent harpy when he recommends that they go back home. Luckily, due to running out of kerosene and other supplies, Harry eventually gets his wish and the two are forced to go back home.

While sailing back home, the film develops a rather grim and ominous tone that signals the beginning of the end of the young couple's magical storybook romance. Undoubtedly, Monika is the sort of insipidly shallow sort of chick that would love the retarded Marilyn Monroe quote, "if you can't handle me at my worst, then you sure as hell don't deserve me at my best," yet Harry somehow manages to tolerate her at her worst and she still senselessly decides to betray him in the most stonehearted of fashions. Indeed, while the two get married and Monika gives birth to a daughter that they name 'June Monika,' these things only depress the superlatively self-centered heroine, who lives for fun and excitement and not much more as a disastrously shallow dame that lives vicariously through phony movie heroines. As for Harry, he has fully committed himself to providing for his family by working hard labor while putting himself through school so he can eventually become an engineer and provide greater comforts to his family. While Monika does not even work, Harry finds himself constantly attending to the baby at night when she cries. Indeed, Monika sees the baby as a great pestilence and clearly has no maternal love for the child. When Harry is forced to leave town for work, he even has to get his aunt to babysit baby June because Monika is simply too lazy to. Before leaving, Harry gives Monika money to pay for the overdue rent, but she ultimately decides to use the hard-earned cash to buy herself a new coat and movie tickets. In fact, as soon as Harry leaves town, Monika begins cheating on him with guys at a local bar, including her lowlife ex-boyfriend Lelle. Naturally, Monika is nowhere to be found when Harry gets back from his trip and it does not take the protagonist long to realize that his beloved is an unfaithful whore.

After discovering that Monika has been cheating on him with various different guys and blown all their money on frivolous junk, Harry wisely wants to get a divorce so that he can spare what is left of his personal dignity. Of course, like any slutty self-centered bitch that seems to suffer from narcissistic personality disorder, Monika blames Harry for her cheating and the failure of their marriage, even complaining, "You don't care about me, just your studies." While Harry soundly states, "I'm studying so we can be better off," Monika is a small-minded twat that simply cannot bear to defer gratification or plan for the future, let alone concern herself with the future well-being of her child. Not surprisingly, Monika also blames Harry for getting her pregnant and bitches that "I'm all ugly now." Indeed, as if Harry has not already suffered enough emotional abuse, Monika keeps repeating the same nonsensical self-centered bullshit and stating some version of, "You don't care about me, just you and your studying. I want to have fun while I'm still young." When Harry actually gets the balls to yell at her for cheating on him with her ex-boyfriend Lelle, she gets an evil smirk on her face and proudly boasts, "I was in love," thus leading to the protagonist smacking her around while she cries and predictably plays the poor victim. Notably, while all of this is going on, Monika symbolically carries around an old baby doll, thus underscoring the fact that she has the emotional maturity and intellectual prowess of a little girl and thus should not have gotten married or had a baby in the first place. In the end, the couple predictably breaks up for good and the two go their separate ways, though Harry still has the joy of his baby daughter and his memories of his sole happy summer with Monika. Rather fittingly, in the very last shot of the film, old drunks can be seen stumbling around in a background in a scene that hints that these poor old forsaken farts degenerated to such a sorry state are after suffering the abuses of other female mental midgets like Monika just like Harry did.

While it is quite dubious as to whether or not one could force the average football-loving and cheap-beer-chugging American male to watch an old European arthouse film with subtitles, I think Summer with Monika should be mandatory viewing for every single teenage boy and young man that has yet to have a serious relationship with a girl. Indeed, the film surely demonstrates that great Aryan pessimist Arthur Schopenhauer was certainly on to something when he declared that women "are big children all their life long" and, not unlike children, they will tolerate anything, no matter how morally dubious, so long as they are not bored as boredom is the ultimate sin as far as most women are concerned. After all, it is ultimately boredom that causes the titular twat of Bergman's film to ruthlessly cheat on her faithful hardworking hubby and abandon her baby daughter. Undoubtedly, the same heroine would have probably stayed with her hubby if he degenerated into a STD-ridden bisexual junky hobo where she able to keep up a steady coke and cock intake as she would at least not suffer from the dreaded metaphysical affliction of boredom. Of course, with the adoption of so-called 'no-fault divorce' in the United States that enables a woman to divorce her husband for the most dubious of reasons while also allowing her to rob said husband of his wealth (especially if they have kids), an entire generation of screwed up adults that are incapable of maintaining normal romantic relationships have been brought as a result of their mothers breaking up families over sheer boredom (indeed, the far majority of divorces are filed by women, as the law is almost always on their side). Undoubtedly, the titular cunt of Summer with Monika would have surely wanted to keep her baby if the film was set in contemporary Sweden, as she could use the child as a virtual hostage like so many modern Western women do so that she would have a perennial piggy bank via court-ordered child support. Indeed, the sick irony of Bergman's film for contemporary viewers is that male protagonist Harry comes out of the situation fairly unscathed as he, quite unlike a modern Swedish male, no longer has to deal with his ex-wife or subsidize her hedonistic degeneracy.

In what seemed like an insistence of cinematic kismet, I recently happened to watch Summer with Monika the same day as the vaguely similarly themed and absurdly underrated dark romance Rapture (1965) aka La fleur de l'âge directed by French-British maverick auteur John Guillermin. While a somewhat different love story involving a seemingly autistic teenage girl played by Patricia Gozzi and a young male fugitive played by Dean Stockwell, Rapture, which is also set on a scenic coast, is comparable to Bergman's film in the sense that it is also good old fashioned visceral feminine irrationalism that leads to the tragic end of the love affair. Indeed, upon watching these two great films, one might come to the conclusion that early Christian writer Tertullian was on to something when he described women as "the devil's gateway," as a vagina more often than not seems to be the source of most men's downfalls. Female lead Harriet Andersson certainly proved to be a devil in disguise for Bergman, as she inspired him to throwaway both his wife and son without a second thought, or as he nostalgically recounts in regard to Summer with Monika in his autobiography The Magic Lantern: An Autobiography (1987), "I was at once overcome with euphoric light-heartedness. Professional, financial and marital problems fell away over the horizon. The film crew lived a relatively comfortable outdoor life, working days, evenings, dawns and in all weathers. The nights were short, sleep dreamless. After three weeks' endeavour, we sent our results for developing but, owing to a defective machine, the laboratory managed to tear thousands of metres of film and nearly all of it had to be shot again. We cried a few crocodile tears, but were secretly delighted at our extended freedom." Indeed, one of the world's greatest filmmakers was thrilled to learn a good portion of his film had been destroyed and had to be reshot because it meant he would have more special time with his beloved. If that is not true love, I don't know what is! Of course, Bergman's various love affairs were imperative to his work, as he often-times modeled his characters after these women, thus it would be somewhat unfair to criticize him too much in regard to his serial philandering and child-abandoning.

I have never seen broody and moody Bergman as ever having been a particularly erotic filmmaker, but apparently making Summer with Monika was like one long extended orgasm for the auteur, or as he stated in his autobiography, "Film work is a powerfully erotic business; the proximity of actors is without reservations, the mutual exposure is total. The intimacy, devotion, dependency, love, confidence and credibility in front of the camera's magical eye become a warm, possibly illusory security. The strain, the easing of tension, the mutual drawing of breath, the moment of triumph, followed by anticlimax: the atmosphere is irresistibly charged with sexuality. It took me many years before I at last learnt that one day the camera would stop and the lights go out." Somewhat ironically (or not so considering the two's sexual romance fizzled out long before their professional relationship did), Bergman would go on to direct Andersson in various less than sexy and sometimes even somewhat grotesque roles, most notably Through a Glass Darkly (1961) where she portrays a schizophrenic and especially Cries and Whispers (1972) where she is literally on her deathbed while succumbing to cancer. Of course, Andersson's drastic change of appearance between her iconic youthful performance in Summer with Monika and Cries and Whispers reveal that a woman's greatest assets, her beauty and fertility, do not last very long and the cunt titular character of the former film is ultimately in for a rude awakening when she no longer has anything desirable to offer men (in short, like many modern young women and their rejection of faithful beta-provider types, heroine Monika would later end up begging for someone like Harry). As for Bergman flicks with likeable young female characters that most men would love to keep around, the director's early classic Sommarlek (1951) aka Summer Interlude features a tragic beauty played by largely unsung beauty Maj-Britt Nilsson that makes a nice antidote to Andersson's loathsome character. In fact, Summer with Monika and Summer Interlude make for an immaculate double feature, as they are not only somewhat aesthetically and thematically similar as beauteous black-and-white flicks that depict tragic young love in a scenic seaside setting, but are also the first two truly important works of a cinematic genius.

THE VIRGIN SPRING

Ingmar Bergman (1960)

In terms of Ingmar Bergman's most brutal and modern work, The Virgin Spring (1960) aka Jungfrukällan, like Persona (1966), seems to be one of the Swedish master auteur filmmaker's 'least dated' (not that many of his works have become outmoded) and most timeless films, which is all the more ironic considering it is a period piece set in post-Viking Age medieval Sweden when the country began to develop as a Christian nation yet still with paganism lingering in the background. In fact, The Virgin Spring was later ridiculously remade by a then unknown Wes Craven as the totally tasteless trash exploitation flick The Last House on the Left (1972), a nauseatingly nihilistic work that really reflects how the Occident has degenerated as the decades have passed, especially when compared to Bergman's original arthouse film. Somewhat loosely adapted by screenwriter Ulla Isaksson from the 13th-century Swedish ballad "Töres döttrar i Vänge" (aka "Töre's daughters in Vänge"), The Virgin Spring is ultimately a more pessimistic work than its source and certainly demonstrates how Bergman, who was the son of a Lutheran minister and lost his faith at the mere age of 8, was quite cynical regarding Christianity and its influence on the Swedish people. With various references and allusions to the one-eyed Pagan God Odin—the central God of Norse mythology and the Allfather of the gods—The Virgin Spring is a film that depicts a people that who, although they have adopted the alien Judaic desert religion of Christianity, still have the old religion embedded in their souls and which expresses itself in many different ways, especially through nature and violence. Arguably the greatest 'Odinist-themed' film ever made, The Virgin Spring at various points depicts Christians as self-righteous know-it-alls whose smugness leads to their own demise, as well as the worship of Odin as, although innately 'evil,' much more visceral and natural as the sort of dark and deeply hidden soul of the Nordic collective unconscious, which reaches its most potent expression in acts of murder and violence, but especially revenge as demonstrated by Max von Sydow's cold, calculating, and vengeful act towards the end of the film. Set in fourteenth-century Sweden, The Virgin Spring is a modern fable in a mystical setting about what happens when the virginal teenage daughter of a wealthy Christian family is nonsensically brutally raped and murdered by some demon-like goatherders and the perpetrators make the unwitting mistake of taking overnight sanctuary in their victim's family home, only to share a fate similarly as brutal yet deserved as the blonde angel they senselessly slayed. Winner of Best Foreign Language Film at the 1961 Academy Awards, The Virgin Spring is a paradoxically aesthetically paradisiacal yet spiritually piratical, seamlessly assembled period piece depicting a Northern race in spiritual limbo who have yet to shed their Viking ways, but are willing to make a number of senseless sacrifices, often in vain, to understand and adapt to an alien religious creed that they now call their own.

Karin (Birgitta Pettersson) is a boastful and beateous, yet proudly pious and virginal teenage girl who belongs to a reasonably wealthy medieval Swedish family. Undoubtedly, Karin's opposite is the family's dark-haired servant girl Ingeri (Gunnel Lindblom), who, on top of being pregnant with a bastard baby out of wedlock, secretly worships almighty Norse god Odin and wishes that perennial good girl Karin was dead out of sheer and utter jealousy. When Karin is appointed to take candles to a local church, she does not take her mother Märeta's (Birgitta Valberg) advice that, "the devil seduces the innocent and seeks to destroy goodness before it can blossom," as the naïve girl is nice to everyone and eventually makes the mistake of talking to the wrong strangers. Ingeri joins Karin on her journey to the church, but when the closet-Odiniſt spots a raven—a bird associated with Odin—while walking through the forest, she begs her Christian teenage master to head back home in fear. Not long after, Karin and Ingeri run into an elderly one-eyed man, who is undoubtedly a stand-in for Odin, living in a dilapidated shack next to a creek. While Karin treads on, Ingeri has some sort of metaphysical attraction to the mystery man and joins him inside his dark home, which is adorned with statues of the one-eyed God. When Ingeri asks the elderly fellow his name, he states "nowadays I have no name" as a God who has been forgotten by his people. The mono-eyed man goes on to say, "I hear what I want to hear and see what I want to see. I hear what men whisper in secret and see what they think no one sees. You can hear it yourself if you wish. Just listen.." and displays some human body parts, including a finger, and also states while touching a particularly odious old statue of Odin, "here is the power." Of course, the elderly wise man's offering of power and knowledge completely petrifies dilettante Odiniſt Ingeri, who runs off in the woods in a state of total terror. Meanwhile, Karin continues her journey and is approached by three herdsmen: a thin man (Axel Düberg) who acts a sort of the leader, a mute herdsman (Tor Isedal) who apparently had his tongue cut out, and a little boy (Ove Porath). Karin offers the trio of herdsmen to join her for lunch and they return the favor by viciously raping her and bludgeoning her to death with a large tree branch, all of which is witnessed by Ingeri, who watches the whole ordeal like a coward (she goes to throw a boulder at them, but hesitates) while hiding from afar.

Undoubtedly the three unluckiest men in the world, the herdsmen make the unwitting mistake of seeking shelter at Karin's home after being offered to stay and eat dinner by the girl's supremely stoic father Töre (Max von Sydow). After eating dinner, the herdsmen are absolutely terrified when they hear the foreshadowing words of a poetic Beggar also lodging at Töre's home who states, "A day can start out beautifully yet end in misery. Rarely have I seen a morning so full of promise as this morning. The sun shone in all its fairness and made you forget winter's rages." While sleeping, Märeta hears the herdsman boy scream and when she goes to investigate, one of the herdsmen makes the mistake of stupidly attempting to sell to her the clothes, which are soiled with blood, that he stole from Karin's body to the already suspicious mother, thus incriminating himself and his comrades. After Märeta tells her husband Töre what has happened, he finds Ingeri and asks her what happened, thus causing the guilt-ridden lapsed Odiniſt to beg to be executed and recount her passiveness while watching Karin's grizzly death at the hands of true heathens. Wasting no time, Töre cuts down a little birch tree with a sword and self-flagellates himself with the branches (an ancient pagan purification ritual once common in Sweden during the spring) so as to prepare himself for battle as if possessed with the will power of Wotan himself. With his wife by his side, Töre enters the den where the herdsmen are sleeping and coldly and calculatingly examines their belongings before slaying the men with a dagger with pagan iconography carved into the handle. Despite his wife Märeta's passionate attempt to save the child, Töre even murders the boy herdsman, who he merely picks up and throws against the wall, thus demonstrating that his actions were stirred by pure and unadulterated hatred of the vengeful Odiniſt sort. Afterwards, Ingeri leads Töre and Märeta to Karin's corpse, where a 'miracle' occurs after the dead girl's body is picked up and a pure and clear stream (hence, "The Virgin Spring") is magically sired where the maiden's head once lay. Töre breaks down and confesses, "You see it, God. You see it. The innocent child's death, and my revenge. You allowed it. I don't understand You. I don't understand You. Yet, I still ask your forgiveness. I know no other way to live. I promise You, God... here on the dead body of my only child, I promise you that, to cleanse my sins, here I shall build a church. On this spot. Of mortar and stone... and with these, my hands," thus admitting the unnaturalness he feels towards Christianity but using it as a tool to repress his 'inner Odin' as another blonde beast who was ultimately tamed.

In his now-controversial 1936 essay Wotan, pioneering psychoanalyst wrote regarding the Nordic/German people and the influence of their pre-Christian god Odin aka Wotan as a perennial archetype of the race's collective unconscious, "It was not in Wotan's nature to linger on and show signs of old age. He simply disappeared when the times turned against him, and remained invisible for more than a thousand years, working anonymously and indirectly. Archetypes are like riverbeds which dry up when the water deserts them, but which it can find again at anytime," and such is the case in Bergman's The Virgin Spring. Indeed, it is no coincidence when the one-eyed man in the film states "nowadays I have no name" as his name and identity may not still be acknowledged by his own people, but his legacy lives on through said people's actions as demonstrated by Töre's ritualistic revenge and even the herdsmen's rape and murder of Karin. On the other hand, German race researcher and eugenicist Hans F. K. Günther went so far as writing in his work The Religious Attitudes of the Indo-Europeans that, "Thus late on in their period of pagan development the Teutons had accepted much that was contradictory to the Indo-European nature. What non-Indo-European or non-Teutonic characteristics have been imparted to the Teutonic God Odin (Wodan, Wuotan)? Odin, with his strange blend of “loftiness and deception”, is undoubtedly no longer the ideal example of an Indo-European or Teutonic God, and his worship is no longer characteristic of the Indo-European or the original Teutonic religion. Already one perceives in him the voice of an alien, Non-Nordic race.” Günther further added in the same book, “The figure of Odin-Wodan does not belong to Indo-European religious history. He is the special God of the loosely-rooted expanding Viking Folk, and his composite personality stems from the late period of Teutonic paganism,” which as Bergman depicted in The Virgin Spring, Odin had a distinct influence on his own people that never seemed to die, but was during violent and unpredictable atavistic bursts, especially among the resentful (Ingeri) and revengeful (Töre) as a sort of inverse of Christian ‘good.’ While acknowledging the inability of Swedes to totally deracinate themselves from their Viking/Odinist heritage, The Virgin Spring ultimately seems to argue that Christianity has at least enabled the blood-thirsty blond beast to keep his less than flattering tendencies in check and has gone to develop great cities and culture as a result, which is symbolized by Töre’s promise to God to build a church to repent for his homicidal sins.

With the exception of the British neo-pagan horror masterpiece The Wicker Man (1973) and Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn’s ambient Viking art-house flick Valhalla Rising (2009), The Virgin Spring is the only Odin/Euro-Pagan-themed film I have seen that has proven to not be worthless, as it neither features a deluded romantic glorification of the Norse war god nor a totally tainted Christianized depiction of the one-eyed god and his esoteric essence. As someone who recently attended a modern day Odinist event featuring everyone from obese Hitlerites to jaded Dungeon & Dragons fans to discernibly nonwhite individuals chanting “Hail Odin” while in various stages of degenerate drunkenness, I cannot say I respect contemporary individuals who proclaim to be living as Odinists, but I am sure, as C.G. Jung recognized, that the one-eyed God lives on and can be seen in the spirit of certain National Socialists, outlaw biker gangs, and Anders Behring Breivik just as there is a bit of Huitzilopochtli in Cholo gang bangers. Undoubtedly, what the Christians call the devil can be seen as one in the same as Odin and Huitzilopochtli, as the universalist religion of Christianity has always sought to kill the old of the indigenous people, thus making The Virgin Spring all the more an important work as it names and depicts an archetype that is arguably lurking inside all Nordic peoples, but especially those of Viking heritage. In a formerly Viking nation now thoroughly infected with the mind virus of cultural marxism, whose most famous author is cultural cuckold Stieg Larsson—an exceedingly emasculated feminist Trotskyite who seems to get off to the idea of a woman vengefully raping a man with a dildo as depicted in famous novel The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo (2005) aka Män som hatar kvinnor (which literally translates to “Men who hate women”)—one can only hope that Odin, who seems to have totally disappeared, will soon make a much needed appearance. Undoubtedly, Sweden needs less Stieg Larssons and more Töres, at least if the nation and especially its people expect to survive another century in the pre-Ragnarök age of nation-destroying multiculturalism, fecund-free feminism, steadily declining birthrates of the indigenous Swedish population, and the cultural and racial homogenization of globalization.

PERSONA

Ingmar Bergman (1966)

Undoubtedly, it is hard to think of an avant-garde film that is more immaculate, elegant, foreboding, and unpretentiously poetic than Persona (1966) directed by Swedish master auteur Ingmar Bergman (The Seventh Seal, Wild Strawberries). It is also hard to think of a quasi-horror film that is so ‘modern’ (and, indeed, I mean that in a good way), sophisticated, psychologically penetrating, and unrelentingly visceral, as if Bergman was able to reach into the most dark and forlorn depths of the Nordic collective unconscious, namely in regard to the feminine and irrational side, and transfer that untameable and chaotic energy to the screen. A sort of metaphysical lesbian vampire flick without lesbo sex and fangs, Persona is also a work of metacinema that immediately lets the viewer know that they are clearly watching a movie, albeit not in a banal and pretentious Brechtian distanciation fashion, but as German film scholar Thomas Elsaesser recently argued in his recent essay The Persistence of Persona: “Bergman does not keep the spectator merely guessing or at a (Brechtian) distance. On the contrary, Persona has an almost hypnotic pull; it draws the spectator in and never lets go.” Indeed, Bergman’s work is a rare piece of celluloid deconstruction with a soul, as if the director’s very being was run through a rabid film projector and screened at an arthouse theater in purgatory. Vaguely resembling Swedish playwright August Strindberg’s micro chamber play The Stronger (1889) aka Den starkare in its depiction of a power game between two women, Persona depicts the spiritual schizophrenia that occurs when two very different women—a nurse and an actress—become one to the point where the two beautiful women’s faces literally merge into one. Taking its title from a Latin word that originally meant the masks worn by actors in classical dramas and would later be used by psychoanalyst Carl Jung to describe the artificial personality that people use as a mask to hide their true self, Persona is a work that wallows in the idea of the double and the Jungian ‘shadow aspect,’ yet has so much more to offer. Written by Bergman in a mere 14 days under a number of different working titles, including Cinematography, Sonata for Two Women, A Piece of Cinema, and Opus 27, Persona is such an elusive and esoteric work that even the Swedish auteur himself did not even completely understand it, writing in the preface to the published screenplay, “On many points I am unsure, and in one instance, at least, I know nothing,” thereupon demonstrating the truly transcendental nature of the work. A work so important and influential that masterpieces like Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg’s Performance (1970), Robert Altman’s 3 Women (1977), and David Lynch’s Mulholland Drive (2001) would be unthinkable without it, the film was also described by auteur Bergman as follows in his book Images: My Life in Films: “Today I feel that in Persona – and later in Cries and Whispers – I had gone as far as I could go. And that in these two instances, when working in total freedom, I touched wordless secrets that only the cinema can discover.” Indeed, arguably more importantly than anything else, Persona achieves the seemingly intangible in terms of abstract emotional articulation, thereupon proving that cinema is not only a genuine artistic medium, but a rather distinct one where things can be communicated that cannot be communicated in any other medium.

Right from the get go, Persona makes the viewer clearly conscious of the fact that they are watching a film by beginning with a montage featuring bright lights, camera equipment, film reels and a projector. The film also immediately makes it quite clear that they are watching a Bergman film, as the montage features a number of the director’s typical motifs, including god-as-spider, brutal Christian imagery (i.e. crucifixion, lamb being slaughtered), and a cold and impenetrable mother (as depicted in a scene where Jörgen Lindström of Bergman’s The Silence (1963) reaches out for a distant, faded, and seemingly intangible image of his assumed mother), as well as clips from the filmmaker’s early work Fängelse (1949) aka Prison. The montage also features a brief clip of a then-controversial erect cock, with the cock arguably representing the source of all human catastrophes (i.e. humanity itself). The film centers around two women—a nurse and a mute actress—who are in some ways quite the opposite, but in other ways, including their appearances, quite similar, like opposing doubles. While the nurse Alma (Bibi Andersson) is engaged and lives a fairly conventional life, actress Elisabet Vogler (played by Norwegian actress Liv Ullmann, who the director fell in love with during the filming of the work, in her very first Bergman film) lives the life of an artist. Of course, both of these women are hiding dark secrets and unflattering personality traits behind their outward personas. Elisabet fell silent and confused in the middle of a performance of Electra and was subsequently found bedridden, mute, and unresponsive the next day. Naturally, Elisabet was sent to a hospital and young nurse Alma was assigned to her case. Alma is told by the head Doctor (Margaretha Krook) that the actress has been in a mute state for 3 months despite the fact that she shows no signs of physical or mental illness. When Alma takes a look at Elisabet, she notices the pretty patient has a soft, childlike face yet seemingly angry and mean eyes. Alma later confesses to the mute actress that she loves film and theater, stating, “I have a tremendous admiration for artists. I think that art is of enormous importance in people’s lives, especially for those who have problems.” Little does Alma realize that, as is hinted at by the head Doctor, Elisabet is more or less ‘acting’ and ‘playing a role’ in terms of her mental illness.

A young 25-year-old who, just like her mother, plans to quit her job as a nurse upon marrying and having children with her fiancé Karl-Henrik, Alma literally talks to herself while she is alone, as if she has to convince herself that she is happy about her life and future, stating to herself while applying makeup in a ritualistic fashion, “All of this is predestined. It’s inside me. I have nothing to think about. It's a safe feeling. I have a job that I like and enjoy. That's good too...but in another way. But it's good. Good." Ultimately, Alma and Elisabet are heading to the head Doctor's seaside cottage (shot at Fårö Island, which is just a few miles down the coast from where Through a Glass Darkly (1961) was filmed just 5 years before), so that the former can nurse the latter back to health. Although seemingly catatonic, Elisabet has a rather horribly hysterical response to seeing the iconic footage of Vietnamese Buddhist monk Thích Quảng Đức committing self-immolation on television and later she even laughs at Alma's favorite radio soap opera. Before leaving for ostensible fun in the sun, Alma reads a letter to Elisabet from her husband, who also included a photo of her young son, and the patient seems rather perturbed by the situation, as if it is the source of her psychosis. Almost immediately upon arriving at the seaside cottage, the roles of doctor and patient are almost entirely reversed, with Alma doing all the talking about her life and problems while Elisabet listens in a seemingly inquisitive fashion. Although Alma first discusses banal subjects like the books she is currently reading and other totally trivial matters, she soon opens up and pours her wounded soul out to Elisabet, discussing how her fiancé Karl-Henrik thinks she lacks ambition, stating, "though not with my career, I suppose in some greater way," as if the nurse is not doing what she really wants to do in real-life. Rather strangely, if not unsurprisingly, Alma begins comparing herself to mute Elisabet, as if she is the woman whose life she has always dreamed of living.

One night, after drinking some fine wine, Alma confesses to Elisabet that she once cheated on her fiancé by getting involved in a ménage à quatre on a beach with her friend Katarina and two underage teenage boys. Although Alma confesses that the orgy resulted in the best sex she has ever had in her entire life, it also resulted in her getting pregnant and, in turn, an abortion that was carried out by her fiancé Karl-Henrik's colleague. Naturally, like any sane woman, the abortion left Alma with some mental hang-ups that she does not know how to process. After telling the orgy/abortion story, the two women sit at a table and Elisabet speaks for the first time, stating, "Go to bed. Otherwise, you'll fall asleep at the table," which Alma repeats, as if the two are sharing the same brain. The next day, Alma drives to town to deliver some letters written by Elisabet, but on the way there she decides to read what her patient has written. Naturally, Alma is quite disturbed when she reads the following words that Elisabet has written in the letter: "Alma takes care of me, spoils me in the most touching way. I believe that she likes it here and that she's very fond of me...perhaps even in love in an unaware and enchanting way. In any case, it's very interesting studying her. Sometimes she cries over past sins—an orgy with a strange boy and a subsequent abortion. She claims that her perceptions do not correspond with her actions." When Alma gets back to the cottage, she is so distraught and anxiety-ridden by what she has read in the letter that she accidentally breaks a glass and intentionally leaves shards on a small path for Elisabet to step on. When Elisabet notices her foot is bleeding after stepping on the shard of glass, she begins to stare at Alma in a knowing fashion and Persona as a film begins to break apart just like the characters, with scratch marks appearing up and down the screen to the less than soothing sounds of hissing, though the scene concludes with another nightmarish dream-sequence similar to the one featured at the beginning of the film (including more footage from Bergman's Prison and crucifixion scene).

Naturally, when the film resumes, Alma tells Elisabet that she is deeply hurt by what the actress has written in the letter and demands that she finally speak. Alma also venomously says to Elisabet: "You can't know how I feel. I thought that great artists had great compassion for people...that they created through a great compassion and a need to help. That was stupid. You have used me. For what, I don't know. Now that you don't need me anymore, you throw me away." Of course, when Elisabet refuses to speak, Alma becomes quite enraged and chases the patient around the cottage, though she is ultimately left with a bloody nose after the actress gives her a nice hit across the face. In retaliation for the bloody nose, Alma picks up a pot of boiling water and goes to throw it at Elisabet, but the actress cries "No!" thereupon temporarily breaking her silence and proving that she does indeed fear death, as the nurse mentions. After Alma cleans up her bloody face, she once again confronts Elisabeth, telling her she is more or less a psychopath who is merely playing another role, remarking: "You are inaccessible. They said you were healthy, but your sickness is of the worst kind: it makes you seem healthy. You act it so well everyone believes it, everyone except me, because I know how rotten you are inside." After that, Elisabet attempts to walk away on the beach and Alma pursues her and attempts to apologize by begging forgiveness in a groveling manner, as if pleading to an upset lover. That night, Elisabet becomes obsessed with a holocaust photo (taken from the Strop Report) of a SS man pointing a gun at a Jewish boy in the Warsaw ghetto. Later that night, Alma hears a man shouting outside and discovers that it is Elisabet's husband Mr. Vogler (Gunnar Björnstrand), who mistakes the nurse for his wife despite the fact she keeps telling him, "I'm not your wife." After Mr. Vogler delivers a monologue about their relationship (stating, "We must see each other as two anxious children," which he also wrote in a letter to Elisabet that is read at the beginning of the film) and how she is the mother of his child, Alma finally pretends to be his wife while Elisabet stands right next to her. In fact, Alma plays the role so well that she and Mr. Vogler have sex together while Elisabet sits by the bed with a noticeable state of panic on her face. Naturally, Alma cries afterwards. The film climaxes the next morning when Alma psychoanalyzes Elisabet, accusing her of having everything but "motherliness." Alma also accuses the actress of always acting due to her fear of her son, husband, "swelling body," degenerating acting career, and virtually everything else in her life. In fact, Alma even goes so far as accusing Elisabet of hoping that her son had died in the womb or was stillborn, stating, "You wanted a dead child." After her son was born, Elisabet apparently prayed for his death. After Alma does her scathing analysis of Elisabeth, both women's faces somehow merge into one single face. Eventually, Elisabet falls into a fully catatonic state and Alma develops an unsettling mood that inspires her to cut her own arm. After that, Alma forces Elisabet to lick the blood from her gash like a vampire and then proceeds to smack the shit out of her patient. In the end, Alma packs all her things up and leaves the cottage alone, with the camera eventually turning away from the nurse and revealing a camera and director filming a scene. Indeed, at the conclusion, Alma rejects Elisabeth as the 'other' so her ego is not destroyed and she puts her nurse outfit back on, thus putting her persona and, in turn, sanity (or semblance of such) firmly back in place.

An immaculate example of what I like to call "Nordic deconstructionism," Persona is a rare example of the modernist technique being used in a totally soulful and deeply emotional way, as opposed to the overly intellectualized and audience-alienating approach used by French/Jewish artists, intellectuals, and filmmakers. Penned by auteur Ingmar Bergman in early 1965 while he was hospitalized due to double pneumonia, penicillin poisoning, and related psychosomatic symptoms, Persona was dreamed up while the filmmaker was in a decidedly debilitated state, as he "found it almost impossible to shape words and sentences" and was "interrupted by attacks of fever, disturbances of equilibrium, and the fatigue of hopelessness." Luckily, Bergman's state of delirium gave birth to "not a film script in the normal sense" but something, "more like the melody line of a piece of music, which I hoped with the help of my colleagues to be able to orchestrate during production." Indeed, Persona is the hellishly dark yet singularly beautiful and even ethereal result of a cinematic poet reaching into the deepest abysses of both his conscious and subconscious and literally and figuratively projecting it onscreen, in a work of metacinema that makes the viewer completely conscious of the fact that they are watching a movie yet is simultaneously a rare example where a filmmaker pours everything—both spiritually and artistically—he has to give on screen, as if he and the film had become one just as the characters Alma and Elisabeth become one. Like the actress character Elisabeth, Bergman was notorious for being a horrible parent/spouse, but what he lacked in emotion regarding being a father/husband, he transferred onto the screen, thereupon using cinema and theater as an apt place to channel his misplaced empathy and 'humanity.' Indeed, as contemporary Hollywood filmmaker Todd Field (In the Bedroom, Little Children) once eloquently expressed regarding Bergman's legacy, "He was our tunnel man building the aqueducts of our cinematic collective unconscious." Like most of Bergman's great films and great art in general, Persona unmask the 'persona' of the artist by showing him at his most vulnerable, conflicted, and guilt-ridden, albeit in a semi-esoteric sort of fashion that does not make it easy for the viewer. Of course, at the same time, the film reveals the 'vampiric' quality of the artist (aside from Elisabet drinking Alma's blood, a vampire appears during the second dream-sequence), who not only preys on the soul of his actors, cameraman, and crew members, but also the viewer as well, as no one can get through watching Persona without feeling absolutely metaphysically drained, even if they have already seen the film countless times. Of course, one of the things that makes Bergman's film so great is the endless interpretations it offers to the viewer, as a celluloid work of art created by a man who once tellingly confessed, "A limitless, never-satisfied, ever-renewed, unbearable curiosity drives me forward [...] It never leaves me in peace." Indeed, Persona is certainly not a work that will allow the viewer to find some sort of inner peace, but it will certainly inspire them to find some inner truth, so long as they are willing to peel back their persona and investigate a part of their self that might come at the price of their sanity, just as the film almost cost the director his.

HOUR OF THE WOLF

Ingmar Bergman (1968)

While suffering a minor yet artistically fruitful nervous breakdown in 1965, Swedish auteur Ingmar Bergman managed to churn out a most distinguished script that would eventually evolve into two very different (albeit equally personal) films: Persona (1966) and Hour of the Wolf (1968). Both of these extremely intimate works would prove to be among Bergman's greatest work, but only one would be from a genre the director had yet to work within: the very rarely artistically serious horror film. Of course, Hour of the Wolf is not your typical horror flick and it is certainly the sort of horror film one would expect Ingmar Bergman to bring to the mostly schlocky, cheap shock genre. Instead of dealing with real anthropomorphic hellions lurking amongst the shadows, Hour of the Wolf protagonist Johan Borg (played by Max von Sydow) – a psychologically unstable artist with a dubious and incessantly pestering past – falls prey to the tragic instability of his own mind and the Jungian archetypes that inhabit it. On top of suffering insomnia, most especially during the vargtimmen ('the hour of the wolf'), Johan is constantly approached by taunting and peculiar beings he believes to be demons. The wholly devoted support of Johan's beautiful, pregnant wife Alma (Liv Ullmann) seems to be only in vain as even she – a noble woman who stays up and comforts him during the vicious vargtimmen – cannot bring an inkling of solace to his petrified soul. Johan and Alma call a small cottage on a quaint secluded island with an ancient castle their home. This island setting, a virtual microcosm of monotonous metaphysical madness, only adds to Johan's caustic claustrophobia and unflinching feeling of impending doom. Essentially, Hour of the Wolf is a fresh and new take on the gothic horror story that is full of bold Bergmanian phantasmagorical imagery and typically stark Nordic isolationism and self-imposed alienation.

Ingmar Bergman has made no lie about the fact that Hour of the Wolf is one of his most personal and autobiographical works. Knowing this unsurprising fact (as all of Bergman's films are to some extent autobiographical) makes the film all the more macabre and authentically confounding. Of course, anyone that knows anything about Bergman's life knows that he was not the easiest man to like (as expressed most vividly by his own children), but one must certainly respect the Scandinavian filmmaker's brutal honesty, especially in regard to using the idiosyncrasy of his own internal pain as a proper and constructive outlet to the push the envelope of filmmaking. In Hour of the Wolf, through the character of Johan, Bergman attempts to come to terms with alienation from one's lover, an irretractable past, homoerotic demons (resulting in the most deplorable of crimes), and the personal validity of one's art among critical spectators. Unsurprisingly, a couple years before he passed away in 2007, Bergman openly admitted that he could not even watch his own films as he found them intolerably disheartening. In Hour of the Wolf, the cinema spectator can easily see why the Swedish filmmaker found his art to be so emotionally repellent, but, of course, just like any other horror flick, most viewers have the advantage of not fully identifying with the reality of these distinct psychological horrors. Hour of the Wolf is a film about a man on the verge of total, but somewhat unpredictable, self-annihilation; and therein lies the true terror of the film. Johan is a man that has an impossible time dealing with himself, let alone his fellow human beings; a thought that, to a degree, scares even the most fully committed of renegade recluses. In fact, one could easily make the argument that Johan makes the aggressively misanthropic, wolf-like protagonist Harry Haller (also played by Max von Sydow in the 1974 film adaptation) from Hermann Hesse's novel Steppenwolf (1927) seem like a dandy puppy with too much free time on his hands. The 'hour of the wolf' featured in Hour of the Wolf is when Johan is at his most lycanthropic and vehemently anti-social; the time where he feels most susceptible to turbulently transcending his flimsy humanity. The real 'monster' of Hour of the Wolf is undoubtedly Johan, but he is a strangely sympathetic monster nonetheless and even monsters have emotions.

As per usual, Swedish cinematographer and longtime Bergman collaborator Sven Nykvist produced some of the greatest scenes ever committed to celluloid for Hour of the Wolf. If any cameraman can be said to have refined and perfected the art of 'Gothic' filmmaking, it is most certainly Nykvist; a man who only minutely worked within the genre. In my humble opinion, Hour of the Wolf also features the most brilliant Gothic castle scenes ever featured in a film before and after it. Like many classic horror stories and films, Hour of the Wolf features nefarious aristocrats whose cold, astringent souls are only rivaled by the brutality of stone that holds together their empty, dark dungeons. In Hour of the Wolf, Bergman manages to combine a realistic psychological portrayal of perniciousness bluebloods who are guided by their conspiring idle hands with mythical elements one has come to expect from classic horror films, which is further consummately complimented by Nykvist's bold, naturalistic (yet strangely somehow supernatural as is the case in Hour of the Wolf) filmmaking. Possibly Nykvist's greatest achievement with Hour of the Wolf was his ability to make scenes set during daytime seem almost as apocalyptically foreboding as those shot during the dead of night, especially during a scene where a small boy is consumed by an oceanic tomb in what is easily one of the most eerie and memorable scenes in all of cinema history.

Ingmar Bergman described 'the hour of the wolf' as follows, "the hour between night and dawn. It is the hour when most people die, when sleep is deepest, when nightmares are more real. It is the hour when the sleepless are haunted by their deepest fear, when ghosts and demons are most powerful. The Hour of the Wolf is also the hour when most children are born." It is also in-dubitably true that Bergman's marvelous melancholy masterpiece Hour of the Wolf was painfully begotten during this seemingly untimely hour. Just as German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche stayed wide awake in state of indefinite internal despondency while in an opium trance during 'the hour of the wolf' as he codified his timeless philosophies, Bergman channeled his extremely personal anvil chorus into one of the most adept and ominously sublime horror films (and films in general) that could not have been more ideal for classic black-and-white film stock. Antonin Artaud once said something along the lines that, "no one creates except to get out of hell." If Hour of the Wolf is not an expression of personal perdition than I do not know what is. Not only is Hour of the Wolf one of the greatest horror films ever made, but it also one of the most gallant and uncompromising artistic expressions from an artist on the infernal internal demons that possess one – and what one must possess – to create great works.

THE SERPENT'S EGG

Ingmar Bergman (1977)

Undoubtedly, every master auteur filmmaker directs a dud at some point in their career and singular Swedish cinematic genius Ingmar Bergman (The Seventh Seal, Persona) is certainly no exception to the unwritten rule, with his pre-Nazi quasi-neo-Expressionist work The Serpent's Egg (1977) being an excellent, if not rather unfortunate, example of this. Indeed, as much as I wanted to love The Serpent's Egg—a work set in 1923 Weimar era Berlin over a week-long period during the inflation crisis—the film proved to be an absolute abject artistic failure of the aesthetically asinine, culturally mongrelized, and horribly miscast sort that seems like it was directed by a random Hollywood hack and not by the unrivaled Nordic master. Not surprisingly, The Serpent's Egg was Bergman's first and last Hollywood-produced project and even though the film was actually shot in West Germany, it might as well have been directed on a studio lot as the work is about as authentically Teutonic in its essence as an Israeli turd. Made when Bergman was in self-imposed exile after suffering a nervous breakdown after being charged with tax evasion and proclaiming that he would never return to Sweden ever again, The Serpent's Egg was also the filmmaker's 'biggest' production at that point in his career in terms of the size of the crew and budget, as well as the filmmaker's greatest commercial and critical failure in what amounts to a 'dark' spot in a singular and nearly immaculate oeuvre. Starring autoerotic asphyxiation victim David 'Kill Bill' Carradine (Kung Fu, Absolute Evil – Final Exit) in a glaringly miscast role as an exceedingly annoying and unlikeable out-of-work American Jewish circus acrobat, The Serpent's Egg is a deranging psychodrama that is not actually deranging enough to actually penetrate the viewer in a poignant manner, but instead simply agitates and disgusts. Purportedly inspired by Fritz Lang's M (1931) and Josef von Sternberg's The Blue Angel (1930), The Serpent's Egg, not unlike Steven Soderbergh's Kafka (1991) and Woody Allen's Shadows and Fog (1991), is far too conspicuously calculating and contrived in its attempt to revive the German expressionist aesthetic and thus is rather hard to take seriously, which is only all the more compounded by Carradine's carelessly lackluster acting. On top of everything else, The Serpent's Egg features the sort of innately irrational and quasi-spiritual anti-Nazi venom that ranks with the kosher-approved blockbuster agitprop movies of Steven Spielberg and Bryan Singer, which is rather odd (or maybe not so considering Bergman's possible post-WWII guilt) that it was directed by a man who once revered Uncle Adolf as a boy and even attended a National Socialist rally where he saw Hitler speak. Indeed, aside from the actual scene of perverse celluloid poetry, The Serpent's Egg's only saving grace is that it manages to make the Warsaw ghetto seem like a posh picnic.

Born to Jewish parents from Riga, Latvia, Abel Rosenberg (David Carradine)

is an angst-ridden alcoholic American circus acrobat and after he discovers that his brother has blown his brains out, he no longer has a partner for his circus routine, nor a reason to live. Since Abel is currently living in Berlin in 1923 when a mere pack of cigarettes costs four billion marks, he is kind of screwed in terms of money, but he has a little bit of American money given to him by his ex-boss Herr Hollinger (Georg Hartmann) and he is a thief so he manages to get by. Hebrew Hollinger attempts to get Abel to leave Germany due to the rise in hatred of Jews and National Socialism and even reads an article from an Aryan newspaper proclaiming, "Terrible times are at hand when circumcised anti-Christian Asiatics on all sides are lifting their gory hands to strangle us. The massacre of Christians by the Jew Isaskar Zederblum, alias Mr. Lenin, was enough to make a Genghis Kahn blush. A Jewish terrorist pack, trained to murder and assault, is prowling through the country, butchering honest citizens and farmers on portable gallows," but Abel shrugs it off by responding with: "I don't believe in all this political crap. The Jews are as stupid as everybody. If a Jew gets into trouble, it's his own fault. He gets into trouble because he acts stupid. I'm not gonna act stupid, so I'm not gonna get into trouble." After finding his brother's brains splattered against the wall, Abel goes to visit said brother's naively loyal and nice beauteous ex-wife Manuela (Liv Ullmann), who is a cabaret singer that moonlights as prostitute, for shelter and the two begin a non-relationship of sorts. Despite the fact his ex-sister-in-law provides him with room and board, Abel decides to seal Manuela's lifesavings and subsequently goes crazy after being brought to a police station for questioning and suspects he is the victim of Aryan anti-Semitism from a certain Inspector Bauer (Gert Fröbe), who insinuates the American Jew may be a serial killer (Bauer brings Abel to the local morgue and shows the corpses of seven of his acquaintances who have all died under grizzly circumstances ranging from suicide to a poisons needle to the heart). While Manuela bails Abel out of jail, Inspector Bauer confiscates the money that the ex-acrobat stole from his lady friend, thus causing the two non-lovers to go broke. On top of that, Manuela loses her apartment after Abel acts like a decided dick to the elderly busybody landlord. On top of everything else, a rather strange and sinister childhood 'friend' named Hans Vergéus (Heinz Bennent), who once performed vivisection on a cat and showed off its still beating heart to his friends while a child and who is now is some sort of scientist, keeps pestering Abel and it is later discovered the sadist is carrying on a romance with Manuela.

Abel's suspicions regarding Vergéus are right, but being broke and desperate, the destitute Jew decides to take a dubious job as an archivist at the Professor's clinic where he is rather bizarrely locked into his workspace as if he is interned to slave labor at a concentration camp. In between watching degenerate blackface-adorned jazz bands, picking up underage prostitutes, and getting drunk and defacing stores, including a clothing store owned by a fat rich Jew with the same surname as him, Abel's paranoia begins to grow and his sanity begins to wane. In one scene of quasi-comic relief, Abel asks an ostensibly gay American negro if he is able to screw a female prostitute in front of him and said spade does get his exhibitionistic miscegenation on, albeit in a rather anti-climatic fashion that contradicts the myth of black sexual potency. Abel also discovers that his friend Hollinger's claim that Jew-hate is rising in Germany is true after witnessing a group of naughty stormtrooping Nazis wrecking a degenerate cabaret and literally knocking the teeth out of the Jewish owner's mouth. Of course, as Abel will soon discover, he has much more disturbing and deleterious things to worry about than the Aryan threat. In a rather absurd twist, it is later discovered that both Abel and Manuela are the unwitting guinea pigs of Mengele-esque medical experiments carried out by vainglorious mad scientist Vergéus. After Manuela loses her apartment, she and Abel take up a new residence given to them by Vergéus. Unbeknownst to Abel and Manuela, their new apartment is really a disguised laboratory with one way mirrors and Vergéus experiments on them by releasing toxic chemical gasses that induce psychotic states in the victims. In the end, Manuela is killed and Abel finally uncovers Vergéus' sinister, if not ridiculously unbelievable, plot. While Abel is initially institutionalized after being saved from Vergéus by Inspector Bauer, he later manages to escape and never goes back to Deutschland ever again. Borrowing its name from a line spoken by Brutus in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, The Serpent's Egg's title is a superlatively sensationalized allegorical reference to the birth of National Socialism in Germany as the film concludes with Hitler's failed Beer Hall Putsch. Indeed, just as a serpent egg has a translucent membrane through which can see the creature forming, Bergman's The Serpent's Egg portrays a foreboding pre-Hitlerite period where death and human depravity were at the height in the Fatherland and would ultimately give birth to the National Socialist revolution. Of course, the poisonous gasses that Vergéus secretly unleashes in Abel and Manuela's prison-like apartment are an obvious and exceedingly overdone reference to the holocaust.

Rather fittingly, German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder would utilize the leftover sets of The Serpent's Egg for his cinematic magnum opus Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) and would ultimately achieve what Bergman failed to do in depicting the Weimar Republic as an apocalyptic hell-on-earth where the average man became a crook/pimp and the average women a prostitute, and where a dead body here or there was not out of the ordinary. Indeed, assumedly not used to working with so many extravagant sets and such a large film crew, Bergman truly seemed to lose his focus with The Serpent's Egg; a work comparable to Fassbinder's horribly uneven big budget international production Despair (1978), which also chronicled the rise of Nazism in the Weimar Republic, featured an unhinged racial/cultural outsider in the lead role, and was absurdly shot in English. As Liv Ullmann revealed in the featurette Away From Home, while Bergman apparently became rather depressed having to work in an alien environment, he would later remark that he was rather proud of The Serpent's Egg. In the audio commentary for the MGM dvd release of the film, star David Carradine theorizes that Bergman largely made The Serpent's Egg in an attempt to be close with Liv Ullmann, who he had a daughter with. Really more reminiscent of a curious cross between Peeping Tom (1960) and Orson Welles' The Trial (1962) meets Bob Fosse's Cabaret (1972) than a purist attempt to create a modern German expressionist film, The Serpent's Egg has its moments of movie magic, but ultimately seems like a callous production of the carelessly cynical sort created by a master who had too much money and melancholy to create the sort of uncompromising celluloid work that typically seemed to pour out of his wounded soul. Bergman's sort of pseudo-Teutonic take on Hour of the Wolf (1968), The Serpent's Egg ultimately seems like a politically correct tribute to kosher commie film critic Siegfried Kracauer, who is best known for his reductionist-oriented and venomously anti-German work From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film (1947), which, among other things, argued that the films of German Expressionism were prophetic and reflected a warped and nightmarish Teutonic collective psyche that would inevitably erupt into Nationalism and the holocaust. Indeed, as far as I am concerned, The Serpent's Egg is an aborted aesthetic tragedy that could have been an unrivaled masterpiece had they hired a different lead actor and had Bergman not sold his soul to the art-sacrificing bureaucracy of Hebraic Hollywood. In many ways, The Serpent's Egg is a like Bergman film for those with the incapacity for watching a Bergman film and should be viewed as such as it is nearly impossible to enjoy if one dwells on the master responsible for directing it. Arguably Bergman's most ugly and superficially unhinged work, The Serpent's Egg stands as a semi-interesting example of how a master auteur can go wrong, but still succeed in making something with a handful of memorable scenes.

THE INVASION OF THUNDERBOLT PAGODA
THE INVASION OF THUNDERBOLT PAGODA

Ira Cohen (1968)

It should be no surprise to readers of SS that I find hippies repugnant and Hebraic ones even more so, so it probably seems somewhat dubious that I would watch a film directed by a man of such a 'preternatural' persuasion. Nonetheless, after I discovered that Judaic Beat generation hippie Ira Cohen's cine-magic 'magnum opus' The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda (1968) was influenced by the films of Kenneth Anger and Sergei Parajanov, as well as the Alchemical theories of 'Aryan Christ' Carl G. Jung, I decided to give it a chance. Although absurdly advertised as "the only psychedelic film ever made," the keenly kaleidoscopic short (although originally only 22-minutes, Cohen decided to add a pretty pointless 8-minute prologue section to the film featuring himself playing naked in the mud for when it was re-released on DVD in 2006) plays more like a poor occultnik's Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954) than 'thee' ultimate work of celluloid psychedelia, though it is certainly no waste either, as a sort of brother film to works directed by the director's cinematic compatriots like Jack Smith's Normal Love (1963) and Ron Rice's Chumlum (1964), which incidentally both star underground superstar Beverly Grant. Directed by a comrade of none other than John McLaughlin, William S. Burroughs and Jimi Hendrix who created "mylar images" and considered himself a "mythographer," The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda also demonstrates a certain fetishism for mylar in a work where mylar combined with mercury are utilized in a transcendental fashion to depict the "ever-flowing river" that is nature and creation. A plot-less and wordless piece of oneiric and phantasmagoric psyche-cinema as dreamed up by a Hebraic pseudo-messiah on hallucinogens and his equally inebriated comrades, Cohen's film is one of the rare examples where drugs have a positive, if not somewhat superficial, influence on the film as if it is an aesthetically hypnotic daydream that is made all the more entrancing by the musical score of Angus MacLise, who is probably best known as the original drummer of The Velvet Underground. Indeed, if you're looking for real dirty hippie/beatnik cinema, you can probably do no better than the short but somewhat sweet celluloid trip that is The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda.

After opening with a largely senseless recently added 8-minute sepia-tone sequence involving, among other things, auteur Ira Cohen rising from the mud naked and hanging around with a fellow that looks like a Christ-like holocaust survivor, as well as a couple less than homely hippie chicks acting all 'entranced' and whatnot while they roam around like dejected flesh-eaters and born again junkies, The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda, which is a film with three different acts, finally begins in the fashion it did in 1968 with a keenly colorful yet fittingly hazy opium smoking scene where a chick smokes some in a room of bendable-mirrors and enters a demented dream featuring green elves, a white snake (Peter Birnbaum), 'death' (played by the director), and a "maker of mayhem" (also played by the director), who hands out gifts like sea shells and rubber lizards. In terms of iconoclastic imagery, there's a green elf with pointy goblin ears waving around a white baby doll lynched on a stick, as well as an icon of Christ with batwings instead of a cross. Basically, the film feels exactly like what director Ira Cohen described it as in the DVD audio commentary, as a film where a couple friends got together and filmed each other by passing the camera around to one another. In a scene using a extra-use of mylar, Cohen is married during a Jungian 'alchemical wedding.' Towards the end of the film, a scene is shot through a prism inspired by the "Snowflake syndrome" concept featured in the sci-fi novel Wolf Bait. During the final scene, while standing in front of the sky (aka "heavenly vault"), Cohen 'plays magician' under his 'Majoon Traveler' persona using a magic wand to dictate the "ever-flowering river" that is nature.

In the audio commentary for the 2006 DVD release of the film, auteur Ira Cohen describes how he and his friends were just merely "winging it" and not putting much real thought into the production of The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda, as a work where they were merely "acting out" their "real lives." While I am not exactly accustomed to the lifestyles of Hebraic hippies during the late-1960s, somehow I am not surprised that they might get high on opium, create sacrilegious images of Jesus, and use red devil candles to light the 'cock' of a mural, as depicted in a somewhat goofy but nonetheless strangely entertaining way that, while it may only vaguely resemble the campy Crowleyite charisma of Anger's Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome, nonetheless makes the film mandatory viewing for fans of vintage experimental cinema. Indeed, while Cohen's film might be inferior to similar works of celluloid psychedelia like Smith's Normal Love, Federico Fellini's Juliet of the Spirits (1965), and Steve Arnold's Luminous Procuress (1971), it is also idiosyncratic enough to stand out on its own as a piece of heretical Hebraic hippiedom that demonstrates that the so-called 'flower children' were not just about peace and love, but also metaphysical subversion, deluded drug worship, and moronic pseudo-neo-pagan customs. Featuring a mostly less than homely looking collection of individuals and borrowing from a hodgepodge of religions and spiritual practices, The Invasion of Thunderbolt Pagoda probably features enough 'esoteric excess' and eccentric people attempting to 'find themselves' to make the average person snicker in ridicule, but it is also surely a strange enough celluloid affair to appeal to the most obsessive of cinephiles, be they hippie-haters like myself or not.

YOUNG SOUL REBELS

Isaac Julien (1991)

With the recent grizzly and strikingly savage murder of a white British soldier by black Islamist terrorists, I decided it was about time I checkout homo negro auteur Isaac Julien's racially-charged melodrama Young Soul Rebels (1991), a lurid interracial romance and murder mystery story set during the pre-Thatcher year 1977 about what happens when a butt-boy of a black DJ hooks up with an ethno-masochistic white punk in a chaotic multicultural setting full of neo-nazi skinheads, racist Rastafarians, West Indians, and racially ambitious 'mystery meat' of all sorts. A work directed by a faggy fellow who has created cinematic works on figures ranging from African Marxist/pseudo-scientist Frantz Fanon to British arthouse alpha-auteur Derek Jarman, Young Soul Rebels is a work that I expected would feature an extremist leftist slant, yet I had no clue that the film would be full of politically correct, cookie cutter caricatures where every indigenous Brit, aside from race-mixers and anarchistic fairies, is portrayed as positively pernicious, if not downright evil in the blackshirt Mosleyite sense. In short, Young Soul Rebels portrays everything that is traditionally and classically British as absolutely odious and outmoded, while portraying interracial Dorian love as the indisputable height of progressiveness and human perfection, thus being a celluloid work that—rather unfortunately—is more relevant today than when it was originally released over two decades ago. Winner of the coveted "Critic's Award" at the Cannes Film Festival, Young Soul Rebels certainly has a 'colorful' aesthetic prowess of European high-camp meets hip-hop vulgarity, which was indubitably utilized by the filmmaker to disguise the surreally retarded sociopolitical bullocks that plagues the film. Part half-ass murder mystery, part pomo period piece, part racially risqué romance, and all agit prop, Young Soul Rebels is a curious celebration of "Anarchy in the U.K.," but not like the sort of song of the same name by the Sex Pistols frontman Johnny Rotten, but rather the radically racially apocalyptic sort that reminds one that colonizing a rather large segment of the nonwhite world was one of the now-dead British empire's biggest mistakes, especially if a racial alien can cinematically defecate and culturally debase an adopted nation that has enabled him to get rather rotund and practice his sexual debauchery in safety as opposed to starving to death or being executed for sodomy in some sub-Saharan hellhole. Comparable to William Friedkin's Cruising (1980) in its depiction of a homicidal homo who has stricken fear in the fairy underground and Spike Lee's Summer of Sam (1999) in its libelous portrayal of the white devil and its decidedly degenerate disco soundtrack, Young Soul Rebels is a great example as to what happens when the colored world uses whitey's art, technology, and kultur against him in what is undoubtedly cultural debasement.

The year is 1977 and during a rather dubious trip to a local park for a good old anonymous suck and fuck, a closeted gay black man with a ghetto-blaſter boom-box named TG (Shyro Chung) tries to get a blowjob from some cocksucking cracker but instead he is brutally murdered by the faceless cocktease of a homicidal homo honkey. Needless to say, TG's childhood friends, the rather effete yet straight Chris (Valentine Nonyela) and the more masculine yet man-loving Caz (Mo Sesay), who run a pirate radio ſtation together, are rather disheartened by the morbid mysterious murder but their minds soon go elsewhere because, like moſt young black men, they dream of getting rich and famous and they believe fiddling with vinyls and a turntable will be the way to get there. While Chris, who is a mulatto with a trashy British mudſhark mother who ſmokes joints with her half-caſte ſon, ſoon falls in love with a taller girl, high-yellow named Tracy (Sophie Okonedo, a woman of half-Nigerian/half-Aſhkenazi-Jewish extraction) who works for a major music producer, pure melanin-rich black man Caz falls in love with a naughty and nihilistic white punk named Billibud (Shakespearean actor Jason Durr) who bares a ſtriking reſemblance to homosexual English musician Douglas P. (who was once in a Trotsykite punk group called Crisis) of the neofolk group Death In June. Being a poor black playa, Chris is hassled and questioned by blatantly faſciſtic cops in Geſtapo-eſque uniforms, the predictably hate-filled leader of whom even calls him a "coon" and makes fun of the fact he wears bright pink ſocks. Simply because they are ſadiſtic bigots who ſtrut around brazenly like martial leather-fags and brandiſh badges, at leaſt according to director Issac Julien's logic, the cops attempt to convict Chris of the crime of TJ's death, but, of course, it was really a weirdo white dude and he has a recording of the killing to prove. Of course, the beautiful black brothas' are also hassled by nefarious neo-nazi ſkinheads and member of the ultra-nationaliſtic National Front because they be hating and discriminating on the beautiful black ſouls brother as ſoulleſs Nordic beaſts with an intolerance for marijuana and jiga-boo funk. Naturally, in the end, lavender love conquers all and the ſoul brothers keep ſtrutting. Clearly, Issac Julien's ideal for a UK utopia is a place where white and black twinks engage in miſcegenation and drug-addicted British ſlag ſluts produce baſtard mulatto children with green eyes and without fathers. Clearly, ſuch a world would be highly preferable to a place where ſtoic white men in ſharp uniforms walk around protect and ſerve.

All ſtyle and no ſubſtance, Isaac Julien's Young Soul Rebels is a melodramatically mundane piece of pseudo-sociopolitical homophiliac afrocentricism that is even leſs ſophiſticated than American Hiſtory X (1998) in its one dimensional depiction of culturally mongrelized race relations of the poſt-colonial variety, thus making it the celluloid prototype for multicultural-friendly films like This Is England (2006), a ſimilar melodramatic mix of punk, ſkinheads, and raſtas. Undoubtedly, the moſt intereſting and curious aſpect of Young Soul Rebels is director Isaac Julien's rather dubious depiction of the white policemen who, although depicted as evil raciſts who calls young mulattos "coon," are clearly eroticized and fetishized as some sick fag-bashing fantasy on the donut-puncher director's part, sort of like how homocore auteur Bruce LaBruce depicts skinhead-negro relations in Skin Flick / Skin Gang (1999), albeit in a less honest fashion. Considering Julien's depiction of explicit white-on-black leather-faggotry of the Tom of Finland-esque persuasion in his sexually-charged sodomite surrealist short The Attendant (1993), I think it is safe to say that Young Soul Rebels also fetishizes evil whity in a sick sadomasochistic sort of way that makes the films loony leftist political message just seem like a pretext for depicting unattainable white male virility of the ostensibly Occidental white English variety. Undoubtedly someone who was influenced by English arthouse auteur Derek Jarman (War Requiem, The Angelic Conversations), hence why he directed the documentary Derek (2008) about the deceased arthouse superstar auteur, Isaac Julien assembled an 'aesthetist' work with Young Soul Rebels that is first and foremost a piece of racially confused 'aesthetic fascism' from the perspective of a Negro fairy than an honest and serious look at anarchic relations in the UK. The fact that Young Soul Rebels won the critics prize at the 1991 Cannes Film Festival is nothing short of cinematic affirmative action because, had a white man directed the same film, it would have not been so critically acclaimed, hence why the film has fallen into relative obscurity today. Indeed, Young Soul Rebels looks like it was directed by a flaming fashion designer, like a gay Spike Lee, who had more of an interest in getting close-ups of the bulge in a young man's pleather red pants than telling a serious and sophisticated story cinematically. Indeed, one can only wonder what kind of film Issac Julien would assemble if he made a cinematic work about the recent savage slaughter of Drummer Lee Rigby by two Negro Islamic terrorists, but I am sure it would featuring a coon copulating with a cracker and a butch British bitch with a brown baby.

GOJIRA

Ishirō Honda (1954) The epitome of a sympathetic post-war tragedy in a rubber lizard suit. Gojira is single-handedly one of the most important pieces of cinema out there. Few other films have tackled such a ridiculous niche of film owned by industry titan Harryhausen and made such a claustrophobic vision of intimate peril. At the heart of this film lies a sweet confection; a complicated love story. Gojira was created by a passionate independent Japanese company named Toho. From the birth of Godzilla, they have created numerous Giant Kaiju battle films and other quirky works such as Lupin III. Who would have thought that an intelligent monster film would produce animated shows, underwear, backpacks, trading cards, and non-stop adaptations into books? The cinematography present in the original film is a non-stop train ride of extremely misty environments alluding the melancholy score from Akira Ifukube. The original Japanese masterpiece is superior in every form to the chopped & screwed Raymond Burr American edition. Physically the same film, but ideally two separate titles. The American resembles more of what Cloverfield was with the documentation of an attack. The original was more of a portrait painted by Tokyo subjecting poor citizens to an extreme at-first unexplained terror. Gojira was terrifying at the time of its release. While I watch it, I can feel remnants of that feeling. The generation may wither, but the poignancy of this fine piece of cinema stands strong. The original is a beautiful work. The ending is dreary and features a similar fate to the 1998 Godzilla (But that film never really happened). This film is wholly joyless and a brief memory frozen in time. Gojira is a legend and this is his Sistine Chapel.

GODZILLA, KING OF THE MONSTERS!

Ishirō Honda (2019)

Two years after the release of the original Gojira, Hollywood had the right mind to take the film and Americanize it. How else but to digitally crop in Raymond Burr from Rear Window fame and trash most of the already existent story line. The result was a blurred vision of what the original film was, but still retained some of the classic moods and action scenes, although the byproduct love story was initially cut and butchered leaving an experience you never knew you were involved with. This needs no introduction. Godzilla is the spawn of the horrors of nuclear testing. I have recently devoted my time to tracking down all 29 Godzilla films so I can cover all of these epic Kaiju films. What was once a startling look at the horrors of humanity was resurrected as a all-out monster smashbang where the Giant with the biggest balls wins, and it is always Godzilla. Godzilla incorporates an effect which will later be used by Steve Oedekirk for the love-it or hate-it Kung Pow: Enter the Fist. Photo manipulation and translation problems are at the heart of this bastardized version. While I wish to expunge all my hatred on this film and the studio for diluting the amazing score from Akira Ifukube, I cannot bring myself to it. During my childhood, this was the only way I was able to have seen the "original" in a nutshell and I'm grateful to that. Raymond Burr remains in a comatose state most of the film and brushes the way of a monster rumor. Once he encounters the legend, he simply stares devoid of any emotion or personality. Now that I think about it, he doesn't really have a character, He's just a reporter named Steve Martin. Lethargic to boot, he just spends his time off camera with the crowd and requests for translations. As the story holds up, well, The film's eerie shot of two men underwater looking up at a ghostly silhouette of a massive creature resulting from a by-product of mankind still remains, and this remains one of the few classic scenes in any monster film. Godzilla and Gojira have it all, the tension, the sound, the suspense, and the earth-shattering destruction scenes that have made Godzilla so iconic. A masterpiece; simple as that.

CUTTER'S WAY

Ivan Passer (1981)

I have to confess that, nowadays, there are very few films that I can truly relate to in terms of sheer nihilism, pessimism, and cynicism, especially in regard to the Reaganite 1980s when Spielberg was king and the promotion of collective fantastic infantilization was the name of the game among the neo-Vaudevillian shysters, hucksters, and culture-distorters in Tinseltown. Don't get me wrong, the 1980s produced some great dark films including David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986) and Tim Hunter's River's Edge (1986), but I think Ivan Passer's Cutter's Way (1981) aka Cutter and Bone—a film based on the 1976 novel of the latter name by Newton Thornburg—is the only cinematic work of its era that goes all the way in terms of pure and adulterated cultural pessimism in regard to the state of the United States and its increasingly disenfranchised white working-class majority. Of course, the film has more in common with the aesthetically and culturally subversive films of the American New Wave of the late-1960s and 1970s than most films of its era. Indeed, as Charles Taylor explained in his rather readable yet hopelessly boomer-esque book Opening Wednesday at a Theater Or Drive-In Near You: The Shadow Cinema of the American '70s (2017), “WINTER KILLS also calls up the closing days of a decade that has proven to be the richest period in American moviemaking. There were still remarkable movies being made, and wonderful poplar movies that were yet to come, like E.T. THE EXTRA-TERRESTRIAL and THE EMPIRE STRIKES BACK. But, more and more, daring and gusty pictures went unseen. Two years later Jeff Bridges would star in another of them, Ivan Passer's CUTTER'S WAY, and would see it, like WINTER KILLS, yanked from theaters after a week (in this case because United Artists was still reeling from the disaster of HEAVEN'S GATE—which Bridges also appeared in—the previous month.)” In terms of its cynical conspiracy theme, Passer's film certainly has much in common with a number of great 1970s flicks ranging from Francis Ford Coppola's Antonioni-esque The Conversation (1974) to Arthur Penn's decidedly dark post-Watergate neo-noir Night Moves (1975) to John Schlesinger's post-shoah Judaic thriller Marathon Man (1976), yet it manages to transcend all of these films in terms of both aesthetic and metaphysical prowess. Like a distillation of the darkest and most nihilistic elements of Roman Polanski's Chinatown (1974) and Paul Schrader's American Gigolo (1980) and featuring a miserable ménage à trios that really demystifies such socially sick romantic arrangements as reflected in such absurd bourgeois cinematic depictions ranging from François Truffaut's Jules and Jim (1962) to Oliver Stone's Savages (2012), Cutter's Way is indubitably one of the oh-so rare idiosyncratic neo-noir flicks that manages to rival the great classic film noir masterpieces like Nicholas Ray's In a Lonely Place (1950) and Billy Wilder's Ace in the Hole (1951) in terms of depicting the worst of the worst of the particular

CUTTER'S WAY

American zeitgeist that they represent.

While he would eventually degenerate into a for-hire hack that would helm forgettable TV movies, Czech auteur Passer originally received international critical acclaim for his association with the Czech New Wave and directing Intimní osvětlení (1965) aka Intimate Lighting and co-penning the classic early Miloš Forman flicks Lásky jedné plavovlásky (1965) aka Loves of a Blonde and Hoří, má panenko (1967) aka The Firemen's Ball. After defecting to the West with the aid of sleazy guido producer Carlo Ponti following the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968, Passer made his way to the United States and made his American debut with the rather gritty and nihilistic ghetto black-comedy Born to Win (1971) aka Addičt aka Scraping Bottom starring alpha-Jew George Segal as a superlatively sleazy Hebraic junky and hobo that lives to lie, cheat, and steal so that he can get his next big fix in between attempting evade the cops and other dangerous gutter-dwelling scum. Based on a story by Hebraic playwright David Scott Milton—a consciously kosher writer that also penned mundane screenplays for fellow chosenites like Peter Bogdanovich, Sidney Pollack, and Irvin Kershner—the film is notable for featuring one of the most shameless and morally bankrupt Jewish characters since the Third Reich era films of Veit Harlan. In short, the ironically titled film, which features a fairly early young Robert De Niro in a small role, is like a Jewish and more cynical equivalent to Paul Morrissey's Trash (1970) in terms of depiction of the virtual purgatorial lifestyle of an east coast dope fiend. While Passer indubitably has an uneven and inconsistent oeuvre, Born to Win is undoubtedly part of the same cinematic lineage as Cutter's Way as a film that seems to take savagely sardonic delight in ruthlessly murdering what is left of the great myth that is the American dream. Notably, Passer rightly regards both of these films as his greatest achievements as a filmmaker, or as he described in a 2016 interview with Film Comment, "I don't have a favorite. I like BORN TO WIN, but I think its blend of European and American sensibilities disoriented many critics at the time. It's now considered one of my best films. Maybe CUTTER'S WAY, which is perhaps my most American film. It is a damaging account of a nation that has lost its final illusions in the Vietnam War and of a society eaten away by corruption."

In some ways, to describe Cutter's Way as anti-American would be a gross understatement but, at the same time, it is also, despite its Slavic director, shamelessly American, at least in terms of depicting everything that is uniquely ugly about the considerably bastardized nation. Indeed, H.L. Mencken might as well have been writing a sort of philosophical synopsis for the film when he wrote in his essay The Libido for the Ugly (1926), "Here is something that the psychologists have so far neglected: the love of ugliness for its own sake, the lust to make the world intolerable. Its habitat is the United States. Out of the melting pot emerges a race which hates beauty as it hates truth." A film that only contains pulchritude in its potent putridity and understatedly morbid melancholia, the film depicts a metaphysically sick, culturally and racially deracinated, and morosely materialistic coastal microcosm where the technically physical beautiful are downright ugly due to their attitudes and personalities and where every sunny beach is despoiled due to its loathsome inhabitants. A sad and pathetic yet undeniably darkly humorous film depicting a failed dime store gigolo and his unhinged crippled Vietnam War veteran pal playing virtual Russian Roulette with their own lives by trying to prove that a powerful local cutthroat capitalist was responsible for the brutal rape and murder of a local teenage cheerleader, Cutter's Way is a true antihero's tale where true justice seems all but totally obsolete, as the society it depicts is so innately and irrevocably corrupt that there is no hope for the common man to prevail, at least in any big or meaningful way. As for love and romance, they are nothing but a distant memory as the characters are too sick and internally wounded, drunk, and impenetrable to act on their own conflicted emotions. As the end of the film ultimately demonstrates, only death and revenge can provide these pathetic lost souls with any real sense of personal catharsis. A sort of West Coast buddy flick equivalent to Taxi Driver (1976), albeit with protagonists that are slightly more sane and sympathetic, the film will almost unequivocally be regarded as a masterpiece by any serious cinephile that is willing to see American for what it really is; a cultural and spiritual void that is beyond redemption. In fact, despite their glaring flaws, the characters are almost too sympathetic as they force the viewer to confront their own most shameful and unflattering flaws, vulnerabilities, and weaknesses; or at least their own personal capacity for said flaws, vulnerabilities, and weaknesses. After watching the film, one should certainly reconsider Arthur Schopenhauer's words, "The most effective consolation in every misfortune and every affliction is to observe others who are more unfortunate than we: and everyone can do this. But what does that say for the condition of the whole?"

While Cutter's Way is certainly, to some extent, an allegory for the disillusionment many Americans felt as a result of the Vietnam War, assassination of JFK, and failure of the so-called Civil Rights movement, among other things, it transcends these themes and acts as a sort of exercise in Sehnsucht, angst, and a specifically American 20th-century form of Mal du siècle. Depicting a rather pathetic situation where two best friends love the same perennially doped up dipsomaniac dame, who also seems to love both of them yet is similarly hopeless in expressing said love, the film ultimately presents an unapologetically forlorn world where love is not enough to establish permanent solid interpersonal bonds and perpetual misery seems more desirable to happiness because the latter only seems like a sick joke due to its scarcity and lack of longevity. While Richard Bone (Jeff Bridges) is a rootless wanderer that cannot commit to anything aside from lacklusterly boning old blonde bourgeois bitches for a couple shekels (not unlike Joe Buck of Midnight Cowboy (1969), he is also somewhat bashful when it comes to asking for payment for his sensual services), his best friend Alex Cutter (John Heard)—a sardonically disgruntled Vietnam War veteran that is missing a couple limbs and sports of an eye patch that fittingly makes him look like a pirate-cum-biker—has more or less declared total war against the entire world as a man that is plagued with fuchsteufelswild. Although Cutter is married to her, Bone clearly loves the female protagonist Maureen 'Mo' Cutter (Lisa Eichhorn) and the three live together like one supremely fucked unhappy (anti)family where nil children naturally are roaming around (after all, degenerates tend not to reproduce, or so once wrote early Zionist leader Max Nordau in his infamous text Entartung (1892) aka Degeneration). While both Cutter and Mo seem to be longing for death to some degree, Bone is just too damn passive, cowardly, and infuriatingly indecisive to embrace something of such patent permanence, so it is only fitting that both of the former die in the end while the latter finally gains some degree of testicular fortitude. As Cutter complains in regard to attempting to get Bone involved in something important, "It's like trying to seduce a eunuch." While they all seem to be alcoholics to some degree, Cutter is a belligerent drunk and his wife Mo seems to be slowly but surely drinking herself into death in between taking bong hits. Undoubtedly, in some alternate reality where they both were not so screwed up, Bone and Mo seem like they could make the perfect loving couple. Of course, Mo is a supremely bitter bitch as demonstrated by her welcoming remark to Bone, "...you're home awfully early, aren't you? Couldn't you find a matron with a taste for gutter squalor?" In fact, Mo has no problem rubbing it into Bone's face that she is married to his best friend Cutter as demonstrated by her gleefully savage remark, "Really must be tough playing second fiddle to a one-eyed cripple." Indeed, while Cutter might be a cripple that seems to suffer from a perpetual state of fahne, he's certainly got more swag and machismo than his best pal, who at least partly owes his lack of masculine prowess to the fact that he went to college instead of the Vietnam War. On the other hand, had Cutter not been physically and emotionally crippled in the war, it would not be hard to imagine him as the ultimate pussy-magnet alpha-male, but instead he is a self-destructively bitter and resentful quasi-suicidal renegade that lives life in the most miserable and misanthropic, albeit charismatic, fashion imaginable. As pathetic as they are all, the trio needs each other, so naturally things begin to fall apart when one of them dies.

Although more focused on character development, mood, and atmosphere, Cutter's Way centers around Cutter and Bone's somewhat misguided yet nonetheless respectable mission to expose a local capitalist hotshot named J. J. Cord (Stephen Elliott) for the brutal rape and murder of a beautiful blonde high school cheerleader; or, more accurately, the film focuses on the eponymous antihero's attempt to get his pathologically passive male prostitute pal involved in the exposing of said local capitalist hotshot. The trouble starts when Bone is arrested after he unwittingly witnesses the dumping of the teenage girl's corpse into a back alley dumpster during a nasty rainy night. While Bone—a man that epitomizes the antithesis to Nietzsche's concept of the Will to Power—initially wants nothing to do with the murder mystery, Cutter and the dead girl's older sister Valerian Duran (Ann Dusenberry) make it their mission to get involved and force the hapless man hooker to tag along. Indeed, as is fitting for a film set in a nihilistic post-Vietnam War America, the friends develop a degree of obsession and paranoia that rivals some of the most single-minded investigations into the JFK assassination conspiracy. Despite seeing Cord at a local parade and being initially completely convinced that he is the same killer that he saw before, Bone later tries to reject or contradict any of Cutter's arguments as to why the tycoon is their man. In fact, they even find a newspaper article where Cord more or less sadistically brags about his sinister deeds, stating in a creepily cryptic fashion, "I like to pickup hitchhikers. Especially young ones. I like their input." Of course, as demonstrated by the fact that semen is found in the dead girl's mouth, Cord is actually the one that likes giving input.

When the group conspires to create a "pretend blackmail plan" to see if Cord will reveal his guilt by actually paying the money, Mo, who wants nothing to do with the entire charade, ruthlessly rebukes the group for even considering getting involved in such potentially dangerous criminal activity. Indeed, aside from sarcastically telling Valerie to, "get fucked, sweetie," Mo gets so exceedingly enraged with her hubby Cutter that she even mocks him for being a cripple, stating with the sort of rage that one can only expect from an agitated female lover, "You're not some saint avenging the sins of the earth, you know, Alex. And if you are, what am I doing here? Oh, I know. I'm like your [missing] leg. Your leg! Sending messages to your brain and there's nothing there anymore." Needless to say, Bone is not too happy when his ladylove is smacked by Cutter due to her rather rude verbal indiscretions. Rather ironically, it is ultimately Mo that is the first victim of the group's dubious detective work, as she dies in a rather horrific fashion after someone burns their house down. To make matters more morosely emotional, Mo cheats on Cutter and sleeps with Bone the very same night she is killed. In fact, while having sex, Mo even breaks down crying and says to Bone "I love you," but the pathetic gigolo ultimately lets her down in the end. While Mo makes a rather emotional plea for Bone to stay the night with her and he obliges, he later secretly slips outside and abandons her not long after she falls asleep, thus unwittingly saving his own life in the process. Of course, as someone that is as hopelessly miserable as Mo, it almost seems fitting that she dies, especially during an emotional night where she actually reveals her loving tender side but is ultimately betrayed by the very same weak man that she lovingly confides in. Naturally, Cutter is enraged when Bone admits that he had sex with Mo by meekly confessing in a half-hearted fashion, "That night I left . . . She was pretty depressed, you know, things got kind of heavy." Not surprisingly, Mo's horrendous death makes Cutter and even Bone all the more determined to bring Cord to justice. Unfortunately, two perennial fuck-ups make for a poor match against a seemingly all-powerful tycoon that seems to practically own all of Santa Barbara, but luckily Cutter is on a suicide mission and thus willing to go all the way lest he fail the memory of his beloved self-described "wifey."

During their intense investigation, Cutter and Bone discover that Cord has a long history of murdering people and getting away with it. For example, the father of Cutter's friend-cum-boss George Swanson (Arthur Rosenberg) was apparently killed by Cord a number of decades before over a business deal. As a means to both covertly control and keep tabs on George, Cord paid for his college education and set him up as the boss of a boat shop, which Bone also incidentally works at. Despite the fact that George is totally petrified of his tycoon boss, Cutter goes ahead and steals an invitation for a big party at Cord's house so that he and Bone can sneak in and confront the supposed killer. True to his pathetically passive nature, Bone attempts to talk Cutter out of even going to the party, stating, "Alex, what's this gonna prove? It's not like it's gonna change anything. It's not gonna bring her back. It's not gonna take away our guilt. It's not gonna make you whole again, you know that. Nothing's ever gonna do that," but the hardcore headcase vet merely responds by suggestively placing a pistol in his suit jacket and saying "I, uh... I gotta go, I go." Needless to say, not unlike the antihero of Sam Peckinpah's final masterpiece Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia (1974), Cutter is on a suicide mission of sorts as he has lost his beloved and has nothing left to lose. Assumedly out of a sense of obligation to both his best friend and dead lover, Bone reluctantly decides to join Cutter at the party, which proves to be a true shit show. Indeed, not long after joining the party, Bone is captured and beat up by Cord's bodyguards while Cutter rides around the large property on a stolen horse like a deranged bloodlusting berserker high on mushrooms. Upon meeting and talking with Cord, Bone encounters a seemingly reasonable man who states he is willing to discuss with Cutter the supposed "fantasy" that he has created in his head, stating, "I understand he's a veteran. Well, I've been in the war. I know what it does to some men. I'm willing to talk to your friend if you think it will do any good. Do you think it will do any good?" Not long after, Cutter fittingly crashes the horse he is riding through Cord's office window and receives a fatal wound via a broken piece of glass in the process. While holding Cutter as he is dying in his arms, Bone stares at Cord and states with a certain visceral intensity, "It was you," to which the tycoon shockingly and quite mockingly replies with a certain sickly self-assured arrogance, "What if it was?," and then proceeds to put on the same sunglasses that he wore the night the Duran girl was murdered. In a symbolic act where the two broken 'half-men' become one full whole as men in their dual vengeance against the man that killed the woman they both loved, Bone wraps his hand around Cutter's hand and pulls the trigger of the gun that his lifeless metacarpus is caressing in what is ultimately a fittingly ambiguous ending.

While Cutter's Way concludes on a somewhat ambiguous note with Bone shooting Cord, auter Passer shot a sort of epilogue for the film that he never used, or as he explained in a July 15, 1981 interview featured in The Soho News with Jonathan Rosenbaum when asked if it was possible that the protagonist could get away with killing the rich tycoon, "Actually, I shot what happens after that. He walks out of this huge mansion, and it's just before sunset; and he goes faster and faster and finally begins to run through the trees. And there's a scene on his sailboat, which he lives on. he's sailing out of the harbor, and he hears a laugh that sounds like Cutter's laugh. He stops and looks at where it came from, and he sees there are a few sailors on a small cutter. And one of them looks like Cutter; he's drinking a beer. And he laughs again. At that moment, Bone almost hits the coast and the Coast Guard; he almost brushes against this huge boat. But he avoids the accident, and soon gets on the open sea, and sails away. They very much wanted this ending, but it took away something. You know, this film is about pulling a trigger — what it takes — and we felt, the writer, producer, and I, that this would be just a tag that would dissipate the emotional impact of that last shot, and so we pleaded with them, and they finally agreed." While I find this potential ending intriguing, I am glad that Passer went the more arthouse route and left the film the way it is. After all, if I have any serious complaints about Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver, it is that I think it should have concluded right after Travis Bickle's bloody shootout and not with the somewhat absurd revelation that the deranged antihero has been hailed as a local hero.

While it could certainly be argued that the film has elements that can interpreted as everything from a quasi-Marxist critique of the evils of capitalist oligarchs to a pessimistic Buchananian Paleoconservative portrait of the social, cultural, and racial decline of the United States in an age where both sides of the pseudo-dichotomous American political system support globalization and disfranchisement of white lumpenproles, there is no doubt that Cutter's Way would never be made in Hollywood today simply because of its many moments of darkly humorous (and simply delightful) racial insensitivity. For example, early on in the film in his very first scene, Cutter pisses off a group of negroes at a bar after loudly stating in regard to a colored friend, "And last but certainly least, is Raustus, the court nigger." Instead of cucking out and denying he said the word, Cutter takes things a little further and remarks to the group of angry negroes that are surrounding him, "What? Do I detect some tension? Oh. Come now, gentlemen. It's a simple matter of semantics. What are we white, well-intentioned liberals supposed to call you cats these days, huh? Blacks? Coloreds? Negroes? Darkies?," thereupon eloquently mocking the legacy of so-called civil rights movement, racial equality, and white liberal ethno-masochistic do-gooder bullshit in the process. Of course, it would not be a proper California film without Cutter making some rather scathing remarks in regard to so-called Hispanics and their American injun brothers. Indeed, while enjoying the sights and sounds of a multicultural Mission of Santa Barbara parade, Cutter declares during a moment of great exuberance with unrivaled dipsomaniacal eloquence, "Look, our glorious past, the Mission of Santa Barbara. Happy padres, happy Indians. The blessings of the white man. Wiped out in less than 200 years by disease and forced labor. You can still get one to clean up your kitchen or you know, park your car. They died with Christ's blessing. Happy corpses, each and every one." A natural comedian that knows how to correlate miscegenation with bestiality without even literally saying it, Cutter attempts to squash his wife's worries by telling her when she asks him what he has been doing all night, "Minding my own business. Doing a little research. Oh, and I conducted a modest sociological experiment. Picked up several hitchhikers. Yeah. An Afro-American homosexual and two mestizas with a domesticated simian. Black cat and the two mez chicks weren't bad, but don't ever orgy with a pet monkey. The little fuckers bite." As his rather hilarious remarks and domestic violence against crazy women demonstrates, Cutter is, for better or worse, unequivocally the Jim Goad of disgruntled Vietnam War veterans.

Maybe it is the physical appearance of the characters, but to me Cutter's Way acts as a sort of unhinged cinematic requiem-cum-Ragnarök to American working-class whites—the real people that built America—that had their lives destroyed as a result of the largely Judaic and bourgeois counterculture movement, which introduced this forsaken (and clearly unwitting) generation to hard drugs, pacifism, miscegenation, negrophilia, and other garbage that the same sort of kosher culture-distorters peddled in the Weimar Republic. Indeed, when I see the characters of the film, I am reminded of my mother's hippie junky brother who had his skull crushed in a car wreck and the various uncles my ex-girlfriend had that either committed suicide or overdosed on heroin. Probably for different reasons than he intended them, the film bleeds Austrian mischling Hugo von Hofmannsthal's words, "The weariness of long-forgotten peoples hangs heavy on my eyelids." Of course, it is only fitting that Cutter's Way was an abject commercial failure as it was created in the same Hollywood that got wealthy romanticizing hippie hedonism with films like Easy Rider (1969), which is a deceptively culturally corrosive cinematic work that probably inspired more unintentional drug overdoses and hick-hating than any other. While the villain of the film is obviously supposed to be some sort of stereotypical rich WASP villain—a group that was already in steady decline at the time that was being rapidly replaced by members of the chosen tribe—I think it would be more historically accurate to see him as a sort of Bert Schneider figure or, at the very least, one of the Sackler brothers of Purdue Pharma infamy. As Emil Cioran once wrote in his classic text A Short History of Decay (1949), "A nation dies when it no longer has the strength to invent new gods, new myths, new absurdities; its idols blur and vanish; it seeks them elsewhere, and feels alone before unknown monsters. This too is decadence. But if one of these monsters prevails, another world sets itself in motion, crude, dim, intolerant, until it exhausts its god and emancipates itself from him; for man is free—and sterile—only in the interval when the gods die; slave—and creative—only in the interval when, as tyrants, they flourish.” Undoubtedly, the Christian god is dead in the world of Cutter’s Way but an “unknown monster” certainly seems to be a hidden ominous force that encourages a sort of collective nihilism where love is an impossibility, passivity a virtue, sex and drug addiction the driving force in life, and procreation a sin. Needless to say, it is no coincidence that when people like the eponymous protagonist of Passer’s film were losing limbs and their minds in the Vietnam War, the Bert Schneiders of the world were calling these drafted soldiers “baby killers” while sitting back and smoking weed, banging shiksa sluts, aiding and abetting Black Panther Party killers like Huey P. Newton, and producing comic agitprop trash like Hearts and Minds (1974).

Notably, Cutter’s Way is infamous for being the victim of internal politics at United Artists, which just suffered the virtual studio-sinking blockbuster bomb of Michael Cimino’s epic in auteur egotism Heaven’s Gate (1980) also starring Jeff Bridges (in fact, somewhat ironically, the studio apparently finally agreed to fund the film after Bridges got on board because they liked him due to his dailies from Cimino’s film). Although championed by various prominent film reviewers, UA spent virtual nil on advertising and promotion for the film, though, as a result of various positive reviews, the studio eventually decided to re-release it in 1981 under its United Artists Classics division and enter it into various film festivals under a new name (indeed, Cutter and Bone was later changed to the current title). Not unsurprisingly, auteur Passer, who seems to regard it as his greatest film, was left exceedingly embittered by the entire ordeal and stated in an article entitled ‘Passer’s Way’ featured in the July/August 1981 edition of Film Comment magazine, “You can assassinate movies as you can assassinate people. I think UA murdered the film. Or at least they tried to murder it.” Featuring deceptively warm and intoxicating cinematography by Jordan Cronenweth (Altered States, Blade Runner) and a characteristically idiosyncratically resplendent score by deranged musical genius Jack Nitzsche (Cruising, Starman), Cutter’s Way is probably the most criminally underrated project for every single artist involved in it, not least of all actors John Heard and Lisa Eichhorn. Of course, to quote the titular antihero of the film, “Great art demands a great audience, you know what I mean?,” hence the film’s failure in the early 1980s when Star Wars twaddle and mindless Spielbergian fantasy was vogue. While Cutter’s Way is a positively and patently pessimistic flick set in a world where heroes are nonexistent and virtually everything about life seems worthless, it does have one very important message in regard to the need to take a stand in life despite it seemingly pointless and futile. Indeed, as Oswald Spengler once wrote in his classic short text Man and Technics: A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life (1932), “We are born into this time and must bravely follow the path to the destined end. There is no other way. Our duty is to hold on to the lost position, without hope, without rescue, like that Roman soldier whose bones were found in front of a door in Pompeii, who, during the eruption of Vesuvius, died at his post because they forgot to relieve him. That is greatness. That is what it means to be a thoroughbred. The honorable end is the one thing that can not be taken from a man." Indeed, the eponymous antihero of Cutter's Way might have been a deranged drunkard and aggressively nihilistic shithead, but he at least died with something resembling honor, which is something that cannot be said of most people from the dreaded baby boomer generation. In short, forget emotionally counterfeit bourgeois bullshit like Hebraic hack Lawrence 'Star Wars' Kasdan's The Big Chill (1983), Cutter's Way is the ultimate 'feel-bad' boomer film as it does the seemingly impossible by redeeming the boomers, at least the forgotten white working-class ones.

There are many great works of reflexive cinema in respect to “movies-about-movies” and “films-within-films”, including such diverse cinematic works as Fellini’s 8 ½ (1963), Fassbinder’s Beware of a Holy Whore (1971), Truffaut’s Day for Night (1973), Watkin’s Last House on Dead End Street (1977), Burton’s Ed Wood (1994), Schlingensief’s The 120 Days of Bottrop (1997), and Kaufman’s Terror Firmer (1999), but none of these works quite compare to the stark, angst-ridden essence of the utterly unrivaled Spanish arthouse flick Arrebato (1980) aka Rapture directed by Ivan Zulueta; a metaphysical quasi-vampire flick where film itself (or in literal terms, a Super 8 camera) is the life-draining monster. Barely acknowledged upon its original release due to its pathetically brief theatrical run (lasting only a couple days at a mere Barcelona theater) and still relatively unknown today (despite obtaining a steady cult following over the past three decades), Arrebato was an absolute commercial failure that would ultimately lead to auteur Ivan Zulueta being restricted to the ignoble bottomless pit of television and movie posters (creating art for films by Pedro Almodóvar), henceforth never directing a single feature-length film again, which is most unfortunate when one considers the ingenious and wantonly intimate artistic tenacity he displayed with the formative work. Originally around 3 hours in length as a workprint, Zulueta decided to shorten Arrebato by 30 minutes, and with another 40 minutes of the feature being subsequently cut against his will, the film that exists today, although seemingly taintless, is hardly a director’s approved cut. Fundamentally, Arrebato is an avant-garde arthouse film disguised (quite nicely) as a ‘horror’ flick that is altogether cognizant of genre conventions yet wallows in cinematic experimentation, as it was designed especially with cinephiles and filmmakers in mind as indicated by its less than flattering portrayal of the more calamitous side of cinematic obsession where, in a similar vein to David Cronenberg’s Videodrome (1983), the contrived reality of the virtual image perpetually replaces reality itself. As the character José states in a matter-of-fact (but in reality, totally delusional) manner at the beginning of Arrebato, “It’s not that I like cinema...It’s cinema that likes me.” Like the steady dose of sex and drugs consumed by the three main characters in the film, cinema becomes a baleful, life-shattering addiction that steadily eats away at one’s soul. One only has to glance at the pitiful, frivolous, and platitudinous pop-culture-obsessed postmodern movies of philistine filmmakers like Quentin Tarantino, Kevin Smith, and Eli Roth to observe this relatively recent phenomenon progenerated by vaudeville and eventually Hollywood, but unlike the would-be-cool works of these three stilted middle-aged fanboys, Arrebato is a staunchly visionary and unprecedented expression of refined (as opposed to revoltingly regurgitated) style.

At the beginning of Arrebato, the viewer is introduced to the character of José

Sirgado (Eusebio Poncela), a hack horror director who is on the verge of completing his latest work; an overdue sequel to his debut vampire film. José lives and breathes celluloid as expressed by the many movie posters that act as wallpaper for his apartment and by his unmitigated ecstasy when he drives by movie theaters (playing works ranging from Michael Cimino's The Deer Hunter to Don Coscarelli's Phantasm) as if performing some sort of sacred religious ritual, yet despite all of his film fetishism, he is not exactly the most gifted auteur. Upon reaching home after a relieving day from work, José is bombarded with potent remnants from his past: the unexpected presence of his ex-girlfriend Ana (Cecilia Roth) lying on his bed in an opium-induced trance and a mailed package containing audio tapes and processed Super 8 film reels from his long lost protégé Pedro P. (Will More); an erratic, epicene young man suffering from celluloid-obsessed neurosis. José and Pedro act as dichotomous symbols of the two archetypal extremes pertaining to filmmakers: the former being an unambitious hireling who is too afraid to take chances as a filmmaker and the latter being a diehard maverick auteur that will do anything to realize his ever evolving vision as a creator of celluloid art. While listening to the tapes and watching the film footage sent to him by Pedro, José relives the bizarre bisexual love triangle (with Ana and Pedro) of decadent drug abuse, soulless (yet utterly erotic) sex, and cine-mania that consumed and almost destroyed his life a year ago or so. As Arrebato progresses, Pedro and his masturbatory experimental auteur pieces begin to become the lead character(s), as a sort of an out-of-control, all-consuming monster on the brink of self-annihilation. Like the psychotic and suicidal anti-hero Claudio from Alberto Cavallone's Blue Movie (1978), Pedro has a critical need to fulfill a personal internal void and he uses the creative, pseudo-godlike power of filmmaking to do so. As he explains via audio recording, "All my life, back then, was like a huge wank without cum. Although I, deep down, thought that was to come. How far was I from understanding the sense, the function, the part, the game, that making cinema represents." Indeed, Pedro's foremost goal with cinema is to reach the ultimate "high", "climax", "transcendence", and "rapture" (hence, the title of the film) and he firmly believes that, like a drug addict in denial and despite the deterioration of his physical body and voice (as expressed by his new raspy 'mad scientist' voice on the audio tapes), that his celluloid alchemy is truly messianic. Like all great auteur filmmakers (not that he is great but his films are certainly interesting) and unlike lazy filmmaker lackey José, Pedro is a dynamic and domineering eccentric who is never completely satisfied with his art, hence his monotonous productivity, increasingly nonexistent social life and dwindling health. Always a more dedicated and intransigent filmmaker than his filmic father figure José, it is finally Pedro who has the last laugh at both men's expense (which, unsurprisingly, the latter is happy to pay).

Displaying a true sense of restraint and humility, Ivan Zulueta stated of Arrebato, "It was not my intention to make an avant-garde, elitist film, because my deepest wish is to communicate with my audience the most intensely I can. I know this picture may be disquieting and bewildering at first, but that was absolutely unintentional on my behalf." More captivating and provocative than Orson Welles' Citizen Kane (1941) and over-and-above the psychosexual horrors of Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960), Arrebato is indubitably in a class by itself as a work of lucid and uncompromising cinema, thus the fact that Zulueta never got to direct another feature is nothing short of a tragedy; at least as far as film history is concerned. As an unrepentant cinephile always looking for the next cinematic high, I can honestly say I cannot think of another time a film has resonated with me so thoroughly and penetratingly as Arrebato – a rare and singular work about cinephilia that also manages to be a landmark cinematic achievement in itself – that is simultaneously hypnotic, erotic, distressing, and exotic yet startlingly intimate. Forget J.J. Abrams' groveling love letter to Steven Spielberg, Arrebato is an unfeigned Super 8 tribute to cinema and the art of filmmaking.

THE ORPHANAGE
THE ORPHANAGE

J. A. Bayona (2007)

There is nothing more terrifying than a child. The evidence lies in every single classic horror film such as The Shining, IT, Poltergeist, and last but not least, The Exorcist. The idea of something so innocent and pure carves way for the greatest achievements of horror in marble. Like the latest Spanish fantasy horror films, this one sets the bar even higher. The semi-recent Pans Labyrinth was the perfect foreign specimen. That film alone, proved that Spain has a more-than capable film industry and gave adults a wonderful fairy tale. With Del Toro presenting this film, I can safely say that this film might hold its own against Pans Labyrinth. Laura is a thirty something year old who bought her childhood orphanage with her husband and child in hopes of re-opening the orphanage for disabled children. When her son finds out he is HIV-positive and an orphan, he confides in his imaginary friends attached to the dark past of the orphanage. When her son disappear without a trace, she must solve the riddles left by the children to uncover the truth about the orphanage. Plot in a nut-shell; A headstrong woman tells the dad that he is no longer needed just to exercise the all-feminist motherly rights. We've seen it many times in film. The father figure is just a plot device and has no real involvement, whether it's work or a scandalous affair. This preposterous feminist front for horror films is the face of new horror. The survivors (if any) are all women who have been pushed to the edge of sanity. To illustrate my example, take a look at modern horror. The Texas Chainsaw Massacre The Texas Chainsaw Massacre: The Beginning The Descent Frontiere(s) Inside The Ruins Prom Night Feast Alien VS. Predator My list could go on. Point is, this facade is just the humble beginnings of a new style of horror. Survival instincts are out the door. There is no more manly lumberjack saving the day with an axe, the throne belongs to Tegan and Sara fans. Regardless of the misandric beliefs in today's horror, the film boils down to the formula of a failed American psychological horror film but with more "zazz". New horror in cultures present a large obstacle. When Japanese horror began to get noticed for it's originality, the style of film never developed and it soon became clear that even the Intuitive Japs were running out of ideas and recycling ideas and sequels. Just as every culture has done before that, Spanish horror films are beginning to dull down. The Devil's Backbone was damn near the same film as Pans Labyrinth and now Juan Antonio Bayona is starting to mold into a Del Toro copycat. Expect a copied and uninspired ending; albeit it still maintains emotion. Loaded with more chilling moments than your average horror film, It is clear that this is not average. The Orphanage manages to be a charming tale of separation anxiety and a woman's scorn towards ghastly ghosties. I was very glad to see a lack of jump-out scares and that they relied on tension being created by a horrifying baghead costume. It's not as beautiful as Pans Labyrinth or as aesthetically pleasing, but it fits in a nicer niche for scares.

10 TO MIDNIGHT
10 TO MIDNIGHT

J. Lee Thompson (1983)

While it can certainly be argued that an immaculate exploitation film is an innately oxymoronic concept, some fucked flicks, not unlike porn sluts or fast food joints, are certainly better than others, even those produced by the fine kosher smut-peddlers of Cannon Films. Indeed, despite my increasingly disillusionment with the value of virtually all forms of trash cinema, I recently saw two exploitation films, Gary Sherman's Vice Squad (1982) and J. Lee Thompson's 10 to Midnight (1983), that reminded me that sometimes you need the cinematic equivalent of a big sloppy juicy back-alley blowjob from a cheap worthless whore. While both films involve a deranged white villain that butchers wanton white bitches with a certain penetratingly uncanny tenacity, these sexually unsound murderers have quite different motivations and pathologies. Whereas Vice Squad features the grand delight of featuring Wings Hauser portraying a violently unhinged pimp that mutilates the genitals of mainly gutter-dwelling white whores (but also the occasional bumbling negro male), 10 to Midnight features a terminally pissed-off proto-incel of sorts that uses a knife as a sort of compensatory phallus against beautiful young babes that dared to make a mockery of his irreparably broken masculinity. Needless to say, the latter is easily the better of the two films, which largely has to do with Gene Davis' performance as the killer and director J. Lee Thompson's surprisingly competent directing abilities. While surely a hack of sorts that was responsible for directing such lame franchise sequel films as Conquest of the Planet of the Apes (1972) and Battle for the Planet of the Apes (1973), he also directed some quite notable cinematic works ranging from the WWII epic The Guns of Navarone (1961) to the campy Shirley MacLaine whore show What a Way to Go! (1964). Certainly more importantly, Thompson has demonstrated a talent for horror and thriller cinema with an inordinate sort of pathos and perversity, including the original Cape Fear (1962) starring Gregory Peck and Robert Mitchum, the spiritually incestuous The Reincarnation of Peter Proud (1975), and the slightly underrated canuck slasher flick Happy Birthday to Me (1981), among others. While I am not sure if I would cite 10 to Midnight as the director's single greatest achievement, it is unequivocally his most tasteless and, in turn, wildly entertaining film and surely a notable accomplishment in that the filmmaker only agreed to direct the film the night before shooting began after the original director was apparently let go (notably, Thompson previously worked with lead Bronson on films like St. Ives (1976) and The White Buffalo (1977)). A sort of super sod slasher on steroids that is big on the sensual and sensational in a largely unabashedly morally retarded fashion, the film oftentimes feels like it is set in the same sexually sociopathic universe as William Friedkin's killer cocksucker classic Cruising (1980) as both are pleasantly politically incorrect flicks featuring gay serial killers that never capitulate to bourgeois bitch taste. Additionally, both films star Eugene M. Davis—the somewhat lesser known (and seemingly gayer) younger brother of actor turned AIDS victim Brad Davis (Midnight Express, Querelle)—and surely benefit from it (notably, lapsed teen idol Leif Garrett also auditioned for the role in 10 to Midnight and luckily he did not get it).

While I am not sure if Davis was also sexually abused by both of his parents like his brother Brad apparently was, he certainly does demonstrate a seemingly innate proficiency for portraying patently perverse characters (which probably explains his fairly uneven and rather limited acting career that includes roles ranging from a virtual man-whore in Roger Vadim's obscure Night Games (1980) to Nicolas Winding Refn's somewhat underrated Fear X (2003)). Indeed, whereas Davis portrayed a bitchy leather-clad quasi-tranny hooker in Cruising that surely could never pass for a woman despite how unconventionally 'pretty' he is, he's especially believable as an autistic psychopath that likes making dirty phone calls and killing bitchy cunts that won't give up their cunt despite the fact that he seems about as straight as a circle. Made long before the LGBT monster shot its viral load on unhollywood, the film features what might be described as an 'ambiguously gay' serial killer that not only leaves queer porno mags on his toilet but who was also clearly modeled after Richard Speck who infamously gleefully spent his prison years as the tranny whore of a negro cocaine dealer (notably, this was not the first film inspired by the Speck murders as indicated by the curious exploitation flick Naked Massacre (1976) directed by Denis Héroux and starring German arthouse stars Mathieu Carrière and Eva Mattes). Just like Speck, the killer targets a group of nubile nurses. Unlike Speck, the killer receives quick and swift justice for his less than gentlemanly crimes. Despite being a reasonably handsome guy with a muscular body and sculpted physique, the killer is a glaring creep that could not smash a gash if he had a hundred horny ovulating hos begging to be banged standing before him as he lacks a certain organic masculine heterosexual assertiveness, hence his compensatory need to penetrate women with sharp inanimate objects while in the nude. Rather curiously, aside from the female lead, most of the ill-fated chicks that the psychosexual killer kills with his virtual metal prick are hardly likeable ladies, thus adding to his incel cred. Not surprisingly, the film was supposed to feature more homoerotic content, including a scene where the killer is hit on by a flaming fagola and another where Bronson was supposed to wrestle a very naked Gene Davis (also, not surprisingly, Bronson was apparently not up for grappling with an unclad pretty boy). While the film is not quite as hyper homoerotic as A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy's Revenge (1985) as far as 1980s genre cinema goes, there is no doubt that the killer is an involuntary member of the pink team, hence his miserably misguided homo-cidal rage.

Maybe it is simply because he has a less than aesthetically pleasing Asiatic appearance (he had Lipka Tatar roots), overall lack of martial charisma, and/or hardly intimidating stature/physique, but I have never been particularly fond of Charles Bronson, even if I can superficially appreciate the sentiments of a film like Death Wish (1974). Since I can't really back Bronson or the sort of philistine films he is best known for, I found it to the great benefit of 10 to Midnight that his shamelessly corrupt and callous cop character is fairly unlikable one. Indeed, I would go so far as to say that the character is so intrinsically unlikable that, in the end, I found myself rooting for the psychotic serial killer in all of his ambiguously gay naked glory. In fact, it even somehow comes as a genuine great shock at the end of the film when Bronson gets so high on his own unhinged self-righteousness that he puts a bullet in the brain of the mad muscular twink when he is not threat after being apprehended shortly after he massacres some nurses à la Richard Speck. In short, 10 to Midnight is a surprisingly sick (not to mention simultaneously gritty yet aesthetically slick) flick that some lame spiritually castrated LGBT film theorist could fairly easily argue has an identifiable anti-sod subtext in a sort of subtly hysterical homo-hating fashion to the point where one might believe it inspired a brief trend of fag-bashing in Kentucky. As a film drenched in gratuitous violence and nudity—and, quite nicely, combines the two—it is also the sort of the movie that would entice Gaspar Noé, even if it does not go quite as far as Gerald Kargl's endlessly entrancing serial killer fever dream Angst (1983) in terms of plunging the viewer's mind into the deep dark abyss that is the psyche of a raging renegade aberosexual.

Warren Stacy (Gene Davis) is an undeniably handsome yet strikingly autistic young man that is an abject failure when it comes to the ladies and he knows it, but now he has decided to take revenge against the wanton whores, sidewalk slags, and conniving cum-dumps that will not even give him a meager crumb of pussy. Indeed, pathologically obsessed (as indicated by spastic fragmented flashbacks that are inter-spliced with shots of his very feminine grooming habits) with a bimbo bitch named Betty (June Gilbert) that dared to throw coffee in his face after some sort of failed romantic advance, wayward Warren carries out a revenge plan that involves murdering both the girl and her beau at a local park on a nice sunny day. In what is surely symbolic of his sexual perversion, Warren kills Betty while he is completely naked and—rather fittingly—she also happens to be completely unclad due to being interrupted while in the middle of fucking her boyfriend in a car. Due to leaving behind no forensic evidence due to being naked (hence his reasoning behind his completely bare butchery) and creating the perfect alibi by talking to some bitchy babes at a movie theater, escaping throw a bathroom window unnoticed to carry out the murders, and then making his way back to the movie theater before the movie ends so the same bitchy babes can testify that he was there that evening, Warren is a fairly clever unhinged chap and that really pisses off hardened cynical cop Leo Kessler (Charles Bronson) who knows a guilty pervert when he sees one. As a broody old bastard that is clearly approaching retirement, Kessler clearly has little time for bureaucratic bullshit and a whiny weirdo like Warren proves to really get his goat, thus inevitably leading to an intense showdown between the two quite different (yet arguably equally, if dissimilarly, socially obnoxious) loner types. Indeed, when Warren comes under his radar, Kessler immediately knows that the agile autist is unequivocally guilty but he has to struggle with the annoying complication of working with a young idealistic cop named Paul McAnn (Andrew Stevens)—a handsome yet hopelessly normal young stud—that sincerely believes in law and order and does everything completely by the book as if his life depended on it. In fact, aside from catching bad dudes and bringing them to justice, Kessler doesn't really seem to care about anything, including his own unconventionally beautiful student nurse daughter Laurie Kessler (Lisa Eilbacher) who, rather conveniently in terms of the film's plot, is acquainted with Warren's victims. Needless to say, when his young partner Paul becomes romantically interested in his daughter Laurie, Kessler also does not seem to give a shit about that, but luckily wacko Warren eventually develops an obsessive interest with the police detective's daughter due to being constantly hounded by him to an almost fetishistic degree, as if the crusty old cop also has his own set of subconscious perversions that he is attempting to compensate for. Needless to say, the film concludes with Warren attempting to butcher Laurie while Kessler and Paul try to save her while simultaneously trying to bring down the ambiguously gay naked killer. Thankfully, despite its flaws, 10 to Midnight is not a film that pussies out in the end and instead closes on a shockingly politically incorrect note that reminds one that a single bullet can do so much more for humanity than a Talmudic Kafkaesque legal bureaucracy where a sort of neo-Sanhedrin reigns that caters to criminals and debases victims.

While crazed closet-case Warren Stacy is indubitably a bad dude that indeed deserves the bullet that ruptures his gray matter, I find it hard to not be at least superficially sympathetic to the savagely psychotic little sod as he is not totally delusional as clearly depicted in the film's deplorable dystopian realm of intrinsically irrational gynocentric terror where any dumb cunt with a room temperature IQ feels free to shame and debase any unfortunate male that does something she might find even the slightest bit unfavorable. In that sense, the film is strangely prophetic for what amounts to a seemingly immaculately polished piece of celluloid trash. In fact, Warren is certainly more sympathetic than, say, hopelessly hapless hapa incel messiah Elliot Rodger—a spoiled yet seriously self-loathing victim of miscegenation that, on top of being autistic, resented the fact his mom was Asian—who, unlike the film's protagonist, did not have enough testicular fortitude to even try ask a girl out yet felt he was somehow entitled to premium grade Europid pussy because his white daddy bought him a fancy Bimmer. Undoubtedly, if Warren simply started hanging out at the sort of savage gay clubs featured in Cruising, Jacques Scandolari's New York City Inferno (1978), or Fred Halsted's A Night at Halsted's (1982), all of his problems would be solved as he would have an outlet for his sadistic sexual violence and he would not even have to really deal with dreaded women again outside the dreary dames from his lame office job. In short, Warren is, not unlike many gay serial killers that include John Wayne Gacy and Jeffrey Dahmer, among countless others, a pathetic victim of his own self-denial and self-deceptions. Despite being handsome and in good physical shape, Warren inspires horripilation in women because of his intrinsically repugnant personality traits and complete and utter lack of instinctual male heterosexual qualities. Of course, the irony of 10 to Midnight is that, despite the filmmaker's best intent, Warren is no less repugnant than some of the women he kills, thus underscoring the all-around decidedly dysfunctional nature of the sexes in the post-sexual liberation America where many misguided young people feel completely obligated to embody some shallow (and oftentimes soul-destroying, especially for women) sexual (pseudo)ideal as if pornography and MTV are virtual guides to healthy living. After all, a fiercely fucked freak like Warren would probably feel less inclined to act homicidally as a closeted homo had he grown up in a pre-counterculture environment where there was less pressure on a man to prove his sexual prowess and penetrate as many worthless thots as possible, but I digress.

Undoubtedly, one of the most potent aspects of 10 to Midnight is the fact that the killer dispatches his victims whilst completely au naturel, which certainly has a particularly primal quality that transcends the sheer banality of serial killer genre convention. As to why unclad killing is interesting, degenerate Nietzschean anarchist Georges Bataille made the interesting argument in his text Eroticism: Death and Sensuality (1957) that, "Stripping naked is the decisive action. Nakedness offers a contrast to self-possession, to discontinuous existence, in other words. It is a state of communication revealing a quest for a possible continuance of being beyond the confines of the self. Bodies open out to a state of continuity through secret channels that give us a feeling of obscenity. Obscenity is our name for the uneasiness which upsets the physical state associated with self-possession, with the possession of a recognized and stable individuality. Through the activity of organs in a flow of coalescence and renewal, like the ebb and flow of waves surging into one another, the self is dispossessed, and so completely that most creatures in a state of nakedness, for nakedness is symbolic of this dispossession and heralds it, will hide; particularly if the erotic art follows, consummating it. Stripping naked is seen in civilizations where the act has full significance if not as a simulacrum of the act of killing, at least as an equivalent shorn of gravity. In antiquity the destitution (or destruction) fundamental to eroticism was felt strongly and justified linking the act of love with sacrifice [...] I must emphasize that the female partner in eroticism was seen as the victim, the male as the sacrifice, both during the consummation losing themselves in the continuity established by the first destructive act." Undoubtedly, the way Bataille describes simple nakedness also makes it seem strangely comparable to the art of bullfighting which, rather fittingly, is an obsession of whacked-out Warren's to the point where he has learned Spanish in tribute to his (assumedly second) favorite form of ritual slaughter. Indeed, Warren is the sort of guy that would probably jerk-off to Francesco Rosi's artful documentary The Moment of Truth (1965). Bullfighting aside, Warren's acts of unclad killing certainly have a ritualistic quality and ultimately betray his reputation as an insufferably uptight autist, as if stark-naked slaughters act as the sole relief he has from a loser life of involuntary celibacy and latent homosexuality. Needless to say, such a fucked fellow would never stop killing, hence why he grisly end almost seems mandatory, if not overkill.

Being what is essentially a glorified exploitation film on sleekly stylized sleaze steroids, 10 to Midnight does suffer from its fair share of problems, namely its tasteless tacked-on 'good guy badge/bad ass vigilante' ending where Bronson pulls-off a degenerate Death Wish-esque dispatching of the villain so that the audience can feel self-satisfied that the closeted cocksucker killer is as dead as Jeffrey Epstein's infamous libido. Indeed, in the end, deranged broken boy killer Warren—naked and pulsating like a thoroughly aroused cock that is about to blow a load that is so massive that it would impregnate the entire world with visceral hatred for vaginas—goes on a bitchy mocking rant to Bronson boy about how he is going to evade justice by using his mental illness as an excuse, there-upon inspiring the already-quite-infuriated no-bullshit cop to unload copper in his brain. Seeing as that, by the end of the film, Warren has completely transformed into a virtual modern-day Berserker—high on his own visceral hatred and seemingly immune to all attacks via his unclad body—and lost all contact with rationality and reality, it would seem more likely that he would fight to the death instead of allowing himself to be apprehended by his arch-nemesis. After all, his freedom and, in turn, life is over and such an inherently insane and individualistic individual would not fare too well inside any sort of government institution—be it a prison, mental institution, or otherwise. After all, as Bronze Age Pervert—a curiously shadowy and ambiguously gay individual that loves buff unclad bros—wrote in his manifesto Bronze Age Mindset (2018), "A beautiful death at the right time is the only key to understanding a life, its only hidden 'meaning.' It is a beautiful death to die after accomplishing a great feat for the glory of one's city, family and for the gods, but it's greater still to die in one's prime, at the height of your powers and at the acme of their discharge. A beautiful death in youth is a great thing, to leave behind a beautiful body, and the best study of this pursuit you find in the novels of Mishima, a real connoisseur." In short, Warren could have gone out like a sort of crazed killer cracker Mishima but instead he dies pathetically like a low-level negro gang-banger, but of course not many films tend to glorify the deaths of gay serial killers.

Notably, the life and death of the film's first murder victim, Betty (June Gilbert), somewhat parallels that of failed tragic actress Christa Helm who, not unlike the fictional character, left behind a detailed personal love diary of sorts regarding her personal sexual and romantic consequences, hence why some believe she was murdered to cover up certain unsavory facts about sleazy bigwig Hollywood types. Despite dating powerful men like Joe Namath and Warren Beatty, Helm suffered a rather brief and forgettable acting career that included a small debut role in successful porn auteur Gerard Damiano's non-porn horror turd Legacy of Satan (1974) and tiny cameos on tiresome hit TV shows like Starsky and Hutch and Wonder Woman. Immersed in the darker side of Hollywood, Helm also lived with porn auteur Jonas Middleton (Through the Looking Glass) and even apparently co-wrote the script for his second fuck flick Illusions of a Lady (1974), but quit the production when the filmmaker opted to make it a full-on hardcore film. While all this might seem like barely-related frivolous trivia in relation to 10 to Midnight, it all ultimately adds further context to film's overall malefic mystique and exceedingly evil essence, as if this virtual glorified exploitation film is really much more as a semi-esoteric expression of the post-counter culture zeitgeist and superlatively sick collective unconscious of Hollywood during that time. Of course, this explains the popularity of actors like Charles Bronson—a symbol of atavistic vengeance against such degeneracy—even if he physically resembled a sort of half-bourgeois Charles Manson. The fact that lead Gene Davis' brother previously starred in Fassbinder's S&M sod swansong Querelle (1982)—a film that, despite its certain camp qualities, is imbued with a sort of sexually apocalyptic essence that was clearly influenced by the Todestrieb-inclined spirit of its forsaken auteur—only a year before further confirms the hopelessly collectively necrotizing state of the Occident at that time.

Dubious ancestry aside, Bronson is ultimately a sad symbol of reactionary boomer impotence and nothing more, hence how Hollywood went from churning out films like Cruising and 10 to Midnight to Brokeback Mountain (2005) and Call Me by Your Name (2017) in a mere couple decades as homo-hating is no longer vogue and homos have been homogenized enough to make for sound subject matter in mid-brow films for sentimental grandmothers. In a dying civilization where even a fictional Warren Stacy seems more sympathetic to a real-life Elliot Rodger or Alek Minassian—two misbegotten creatures that, unlike the film character, did not even exhibit a warped masculinity as they are both devoid of masculine qualities altogether—and their impotent perennially blue-balled “Beta Uprising” campaigns, the film is ultimately a delightfully dejecting reminder that things can always get worse and that—no matter the circumstances—there's few things more patently loathsome than a man that cannot procure pussy of some sort. After all, Warren Stacy might have been a raging closest queen with insane standards, but there are always fat chicks with fat asses!

STREET TRASH

J. Michael Muro (1987)

Originally visualized as a 16mm short film directed by J. Michael Muro, Street Trash eventually bloomed into one of the greatest masterpieces of high-class-trash cinema. Showing his commitment to capturing the less-than-flattering examples of the American dream, Street Trash writer/producer Ray Frumkes stated regarding how he developed the film's script, "I wrote it to democratically offend every group on the planet, and as a result the youth market embraced it as a renegade work, and it played midnight shows." Indeed, leaving no group unscathed, Street Trash is a wildly creative indictment of the daft lifestyles (from castrated hobos to humdrum cops) that play imperative roles in the culturally-mongrelized American way. It was no revelation from me to find out that perverted Hollywood blockbuster director Bryan Singer (who had a lawsuit brought against him for taking unnecessary nude photos of adolescent boys during the production of his film Apt Pupil) had one of his first jobs in filmmaking working on Street Trash as a grip, as the film is dripping with unrestrained libertinism and packed with expertly calculated vulgar wit. After watching Street Trash, it will be no wonder to the viewer why Islamic fundamentalists felt it necessary to fly planes into the financial heart of NYC.

Street Trash is surely a film that lives up to its politically incorrect name - featuring a virtual army of delinquent alcoholic hobos who fall prey to a deadly drink - "Tenafly Viper" - a prohibition era vintage wine that melts the flesh of the unsuspecting drinker's body in what seems to be 60 seconds time. Street Trash is a wonderful combination of gritty urban horror and blacker-than-a-firebombed-Somalian comedy, guaranteed to give the viewer a gore-geous cinematic ride of the most subversively sinematic kind. Pretentious New York city intellectuals have always presented their own city as the cultural epicenter of the United States, completely ignoring the fact that the big rotted apple is probably best known for its diverse assortment of metropolitan trash contained within a virtual battlefield of crime. If you think Martin Scorsese has painted a bleak picture of New York City during his fruitful career in filmmaking, you have yet to experience the dire pandemonium world contained in Street Trash - a film featuring an apocalyptic vaudeville act starring totally dehumanized unintentional performers. Street Trash is the kind of film Troma founder Lloyd Kaufman has always dreamed of making, for it offers quality trash without totally degrading the viewer (like a Troma film always seems to accomplish) in the process. Street Trash features a megalomaniac wop mafioso, a charismatic hobo Negro shoplifter, and a junkyard Vietnam vet dictator: all of which make up the outstandingly outlandish ingredients which no other film can proudly flaunt.

I have no problem admitting most gore bores me nowadays, yet I was highly impressed by the Tenafly Viper wine induced bodily explosions featured in Street

STREET TRASH

Trash. Out of all the things a person sees in America on a everyday basis, few are more repulsive than a morbidly obese slob who feels no shame resembling the blob. In Street Trash, one gets to experience an undeniably therapeutic scene where an obese hobo's stomach boils to the point of a climatic gut-gushing explosion. Street Trash also features some of the most gruesome, yet frolicsome Vietnam flashbacks ever committed to celluloid. If Street Trash accomplishes anything besides the perversely jovial - it manages to capture everything that is intrinsically ugly about America - from the Third-Worldization of American cities to the public neglect of mentally unstable war veterans to the American obsession with committing any abhorrent crime just to make a buck - this is a film about America the unbeautiful - where the dishonorable are the most honored and benefit from the grandest of luck. At the most fundamental level, Street Trash is a raunchy celebration of America - the land of the morally-free and the home of the collectively mentally depraved. DISCO GODFATHER

J. Robert Wagoner (1979)

Rudy Ray Moore has had an exuberant life style - no doubt about it. With countless stand-up records and films under his belt, he has actually had a long-lasting impact on Urban society, inspiring rappers and black film directors around the world. If there is one black character that will forever be remembered, it will be Dolemite. Straying from his normal "Dolemite/Pimp" fare, he turns to an ex-cop turned disco dancer, nightclub owning bad ass motherfucker. I'll start off by expressing my shocked claims that this film manages being rated PG. While censorship wasn't nowhere near as lenient as it is now, the rating system was heavily deformed as it allows a film with insane scenes of terror, martial arts violence, gratuitous foul language, and frequent drug abuse to be rated PG. The film, Disco Godfather, is a horrid steaming pile of shit in every conceivable way, but Jesus fuck, did I have fun watching this blaxploitation gem. Arguably one of the worse blaxploitation films made, Disco Godfather gets no respect at all. Incessant ramblings of people flaying the film alive are featured everywhere. I take it that these are the same people who've never seen a blaxploitation film before. If so, they'd realize that it's just as bad, if not, more awful than the original Dolemite. Doesn't mean we don't love and cherish the film regardless of the intense cameo of the boom mic. The Disco Godfather AKA Rudy Ray Moore is typecast as a verbally cleaner Dolemite who demonstrates his ability to grin like a Cheshire cat and to attempt to dance. While the dance floor is covered in the "sore thumb nerdy whitey" and black people who can actually dance, Tucker (Disco Godfather) enters the stage, shakes his arms and the crowd goes wild. The same metaphor could be applied to drug rings. Power doesn't necessarily govern power. Where smart tactics come into play, one of those uber-powerful henchmen could easily overthrow the wimpy ringleader. After Tucker's nephew is given PCP (Angel Dust,) he decides to bring together "his people" from the streets to "attack the wack" or "crack the attack on wack" or "attack the crack wack with a smack from a black mack" You can choose which one you wish to use. I made the last three of them up, but none the less, they fit perfectly with the plot points. Rudy Ray Moore must base most of his acting from those extremely loud and annoying black preachers that scream about salvation but come off as an extremely aggressive and racist bunch. One thing that strikes me in the tactic of entertaining the audience is how well dance scenes translate on film. I remember watching Grease or Saturday Night Fever for the first time, and seeing John Travolta pulling off some amazing numbers. I was instantly hypnotized and couldn't peel my eyes from the screen. Disco Godfather is about as reckless as you'd imagine. In a rude scene, some guys had a pile of cocaine on top of a Saturday Night Fever vinyl to which Rudy Ray Moore discarded promptly. The dancing in Disco Godfather should be amazing considering that's the films fall back. When you watch a film about disco, you want to see dancing, am I right? Well, from Rudy Ray Moore's ..err... zealous entrance, the film is a barrage of horrible dance moves that can hardly register as walking. Then the extras bust a groove that can be labeled as talent, but the scene quickly escapes into more horrible urban moral scenes in which some random black person expresses his interest in preserving "his people" regardless of the excruciatingly high statistic in black-on-black crime."Haven't you heard, Godfather? Our children are dying!"When the stars do PCP, the effects are frenetic and surrealistic in a sense. Going back to the southern roots of Negro folklore and witchcraft, these charismatic characters have bizarre visions of Negro seaweed haired witches swinging swords cutting off limbs. Then we have artistic creations and weird squeals. The technicolor effect reminded me heavily of not almost similar film Awakening of the Beast. The racial impromptu dialogue implies heavily that the creation of Angel Dust was towards the annihilation of the black community. With such a ridiculous regard towards urban society, they fix the boo-boo but putting scenes of extremely horrible "martial arts."I don't even think it should be labeled as such, but for some reason, I love these horrific fight scenes. Seeing Rudy Ray Moore and his blatant inability to jump kick gets me laughing a riot. There's the deus ex machina guy near the end named Howard who has some ability in martial arts but his foot never gets a foot near someone. The hit detection choreography is horribly flawed at best. Disco Godfather's bodyguard also disappears later in the film, it's as if they just gave up and wanted the film to end - much like what I partly desired. This film coheres the fact that Afro martial arts might be the most amazing form to grace the screen. Rather than seeing goofy Asians flying off walls and doing awesome counters with scimitars or katanas, I'd rather see an uppity Negro with a pair of nunchuks, careening through white drug dealers screaming something about loving Jesus as he slaughters hundreds of people. Disco Godfather is a long ass Soul-fused Anti-Drug PSA. Or maybe it is promoting the drug? With such a down-beat ending, It's hard to tell if it promotes a drug-fueled revenge or not. Whenever Rudy Ray Moore skip-walks across the screen, It's obvious that he is his people's person. Even though "his children" have lost track during the generations, The black youth still need a positive role model, not some clown with baggy pants screaming about cocaine. Whether Rudy Ray Moore is offing a silly white cowboy hit man by catching his cattle-whip (What an ironic fate) or becoming a recipient of a nefarious psychedelic drug torture, he is always there to kick ass and scream extremely loud. If you don't enjoy early blaxploitation films, then you will hate this. It's something beautiful to see a polyester-suited Rudy Ray Moore discussing the finer points of life while trying to understand one of his greasy gutter "brothers" as the alcoholism and recklessness kick in. A film predicting the near-future, can ya dig it?

WINGS OF DESIRE

J.M. Kenny (2003)

It has been several years since I watched Wings of Desire, and my thoughts on the film have changed a little. Over the past few years I have read some of director Wim Wenders writings and I must say that he's quite the annoying little turd. Wenders seems like the German equivalent to a girly mouthed leftist American "filmmaker" like Michael Moore. Only, Wenders actually has artistic talent and sometimes something real to say. Wim Wenders seems to get "hung up" when his politics get intertwined with his artistry. Wings of Desire features a bunch of scenes in which Wim Wenders attempts to atone for the Nazi sins of the holocaust. One scene features an old German Jew recollecting on how Germans went from loving to hating him during the rise of Nazism in Deutschland. Wim Wenders also cuts in stock footage of evil Nazis and Germany in ruins. Last time I checked, the allies terror bombed the hell out of Germany, turning it into rubble. Wasn't that enough atonement for little Wim?

Photograph of a typical German citizen during World War II Wim Wenders shows his love for God's chosen by casting Peter Falk as himself. In Wings of Desire, Falk is shooting what one can expect to be another holocaust classic. On the film set of this "film within the Wings of Desire film," a new generation of Germans proudly wear Nazi regalia. One German young man even thinks to himself how cool the Nazi uniform is that he's wearing. I can only assume that Wim Wenders feels that Aryans don't have enough remorse for the sin perpetrated by their grandpappies. As can be expected, the neo ghetto Jews look miserable yet innocent. Wenders wants Germany to know, "BAD GERMANS, BAD!!!" The dirty girlfriend of Rob from Nekromantik, Beatrice M., makes an appearance in Wings of Desire as a girl looking to sell her tail. I think I prefer her performance in Nekromantik much more. In fact, I enjoy the film Nekromantik much more than Wings of Desire. Wings of Desire seems to lack a certain power that films like Nekromantik radiate (and I am not talking about necrophilia). I seriously doubt Nekromantik director Jörg Buttgerit feels like he owes any special group of people an apology. The best scene featured in Wings of Desire is when the fallen angel Damiel finally confronts the girl he has been stalking for so long. He does that while Nick Cave and the Bad Seeds are performing. The combination of climatic music go perfect with the overall intensity of the scene. That being said, It makes me wonder whether or not the next time I watch Wings of Desire, I should just forward to the end of the film.

THE VIRGIN SACRIFICE

J.X. Williams (2001)

Call me a proud anti-modernist and ardent reactionary, but I think post-modernism is one of the many malignant diseases of a dying civilization that has been extinguished of all vitality, organic-ness, authenticity, and soulfulness and nowhere is this more readily apparent than in contemporary cinema. From Woody Allen (who wishes he was the Jewish bastard son of Fellini and Bergman, yet lacks the originality to even come close to the majesty of the two European master auteur filmmakers) to Quentin Tarantino (whose personality seems to have been taken over by a horribly hokey 1970s Italian exploitation flick) to Jason Friedberg and Aaron Seltzer (who reflect the lowest of lows regarding this aesthetically terminal trend), Hollywood is a culturally apocalyptic garbage dump of superlatively soulless recyclization, regurgitation, and would-be-cute-and-quirky intellectual masturbation where nothing is taken seriously, perennial cynicism reigns with a limp kosher wrist, and where true beauty and soulfulness has been flushed down an Adorno-brand toilet. Of course, pomo pomposity is not just a strictly Hebraic Hollywood disease, but a favorite tool for the tools of academia and the cinematic underground, with the totally imaginary cult filmmaker 'J.X. Williams' (The 400 Blow Jobs, Peep Show) being an excellent, if not somewhat obscure, example of such artistic shallowness and phoniness. Although professing to be an obscure and even 'cursed' underground filmmaker who directed 54 feature films, wrote 78 screenplays, and was the subject of a 6,000+ page FBI file, Williams is really some particularly pathetic postmodernist dork and art school queen named Noel Lawrence who has dedicated his life to inventing the non-legacy of a fake filmmaker with a fake filmography. Taking his pseudonym from a common pen name used by various writers of gay pulp novels from the 1950s and 60s, Lawrence—a self-described “lapsed academic”—has even gone so far as to create an elaborate biography regarding the phony Williams that involves, among other things, conspiracy theories, Satanic curses, mafia and communist ties, and related sensationalistic attention-whore lies that demonstrate that the flagrant fabricator must have succumb to full-blown nihilism, probably suffers from Asperger syndrome, and lacks any trace of authentic artistic integrity, let alone an authentic personality. Indeed, utilizing clips from old forgotten movies and found footage, and artificially tampering said footage to give it a more vintage look (in fact, the counterfeit filmmaker peddles his services at his official website), Lawrence's filmic fabrications represent the non-art of an artistic thief to a most shameless and soulless degree. Out of all of Lawrence's little dilettante creations, the only one I could stomach without feeling like lynching the director is his short The Virgin Sacrifice (1974).

Described in a Canal+ Profile on J.X. Williams as follows: “a modern, Satanic masterpiece. All Hollywood flocked to the few secret screenings. Blending orgy and magic, Williams made use of sensational optical perspectives and framing. Many American critics swore this lost masterpiece was a secret Kenneth Anger film," The Virgin Sacrifice was purportedly originally 3+ hours in length, but the sole print of the film burned up and only 9 minutes of footage survived. Ostensibly funded by a high-profile member (Jewish negro Sammy Davis Jr.) of kosher conman Anton LaVey's atheistic Rand-esque Church of Satan, The Virgin Sacrifice is a work with a pseudo-history shrouded in silly conspiracy theories involving satanists and commies that will bore the hell out of anyone familiar with such things. Essentially, a sub-avant-garde hodgepodge of surreal Satanic horror imagery, Lawrence's film is what you might expect if someone edited out most of the banal parts of various 1970s horror-themed porn flicks (i.e. Kenneth Andrews' The Night of the Occultist (1973), Eric De Winter's Maléfices porno (1978)) and repackaged them in a pretentious post-structuralist format. Beginning with a typically banal scene that you would expect from some worthless 1970s exploitation flick of a mute girl going to see about an apartment and learning that the current tenants are Satanists that belong to a cult that "recognizes that the evil in this world far outweighs the good. And so, we believe that Satan is our true savior," The Virgin Sacrifice finally gets to business at the two minute and twenty second mark and evolves into a hallucinatory horror trip of surreal and quasi-psychedelic celluloid chaos featuring spinning Gothic castle staircases, seemingly decomposing skull collages, pentagrams, kabalistic symbols (including, a star of David with a naked women inside), Francis Bacon-esque face distortions, graphic surgery footage, animated flying skulls, and a cloaked woman entering a greenish-yellow dawn. Of course, any serious horror-exploitation fan will notice that many, if not all, of the segments are recycled from other films, including I Drink Your Blood (1970), The Brotherhood of Satan (1971), and various Hammer horror works.

Admittedly, The Virgin Sacrifice is the only so-called J.X. Williams film that I have managed to watch in its entirety, as the postmodern posturing of most of the pseudonymous director's work is just too plain prosaic and ultimately pointless to stomach without getting the urge to unleash a gang of well fed and well exercised skinheads with baseball bats at a multicultural liberal arts college. In a sense, the short is a sort of anti-horror film because, aside from the first two minutes or so, it is entirely comprised of climatic scenes with no build up or storyline, as a work that 'cuts the fat' off the genre and only shows the good stuff, thus making it an ADHD-friendly work. Indeed, The Virgin Sacrifice is more or less hysterical horror porn that treats splattering blood like cumshots, daggers like dildos, skulls like tits, and death like orgasms. The film is also a rather ridiculous example of blasphemy for blasphemies' sake, as a conspicuously consciously wicked work that seems like it was created by an armchair iconoclast who gets a hard-on from the thought of thinking about Christians squirming while watching his more-hokey-than-heretical porno projects. While it is unknown as to whether or not Lawrence is of the Hebraic pseudo-faith, the fictional J.X. Williams claims to be a member of god's chosen tribe. Indeed, Mr. Williams contributes articles to filmthreat.com and in one of these articles he wrote regarding Arnold Schwarzenegger and Lars Von Trier: "I don't care how many millions of dollars this loser dumps into the Wiesenthal Center. Believe it or not, Arnie, us Jews care about other things besides money...Speaking of which, you might have heard how Lars Von Trier got Canned after invoking the H-word at a press conference. He reminds me of the two-year old who misbehaves at the fancy restaurant. It's only a matter of time before Daddy yanks him out of his booster seat and locks him inside the station wagon so the adults can enjoy their dinner in peace." Indeed, Williams' remark certainly reeks of good old Semitic snideness. Personally, I hope Lawrence is Jewish, as few things are more patently pathetic than philo-Semitic postmodernists. An intentionally convoluted work of would-be-black-cine-magic that seems like it was directed by the dimwitted and distinctly less talented heterosexual bastard brother of Kenneth Anger, The Virgin Sacrifice is ultimately a glorified horror mix-tape that facetiously glorifies aesthetic nihilism and celluloid kitsch and steals from filmmakers of the past and fails miserably at passing itself off as some sort of lost cinematic gem. Indeed, if you ever wondered what kind of film Quentin Tarantino might make had he been an American-bred academic who fried his brain on too much critical theory and deconstructionism, did not know how to work a film camera, and had a massive collection of totally worthless exploitation films, The Virgin Sacrifice might give you a good idea.

JAAP HOOGSTRA - A PIECE OF MONOLOGUE

Jaap Hoogstra (1980)

Anyone familiar with the cinematic oeuvre of South Africa auteur Aryan Kaganof (aka 'the artist formerly known as Ian Kerkhof') knows that his early work The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man (1994)—a truly apocalyptic adaptation of French (anti)erotic Nietzschean novelist Georges Bataille's stories Madame Edwarda (1941) and Le Mort (1967) aka The Dead Man that was actually made as the filmmaker's final exam project at the Netherlands Film and Television Academy (NFTVA)—is one of the director's most immaculate, iconic, and beautiful yet dark, grotesque, and fiercely fetishistic efforts to date. It is pretty much a given that Kaganof himself thinks highly of this film as he has incorporated various scenes from it into some of his subsequent works, including "Nique ta mère!" (2004) and Guerilla Blues and Holy Ghosts (2012). Of course, anyone that has seen the film cannot forget the shocking nature of the final scene, which is arguably the most perversely potent piece of cinema that Kaganof has ever shot, where the elderly eponymous protagonist basks in a fountain-like stream of urine that is being quasi-ritualistically excreted on his head by a homely whore with a shaved gash who is standing on top of a bar table in what is indubitably the most aesthetically pleasing piece of unhinged urolagnia ever committed to celluloid. Naturally, the first thing that popped into my mind upon seeing this scene was how Kaganof was able to find an elderly man who would be willing to not only allow a woman to piss on his rather wrinkly face, but also allow such a uniquely unsavory image of himself to be immortalized in celluloid form. Upon doing a little bit of investigating, I discovered that the curious old fart's name was Jaap Hoogstra (1915–1998) and that he was almost eighty at the time of the release of The Dead Man 2, which would undoubtedly be the last important film role of his fairly long and somewhat eclectic acting career. Although best known for small roles on Dutch TV shows, Hoogstra's greatest contribution to the acting world was bringing the work of Irish avant-garde playwright Samuel Beckett to the Netherlands and the rest of the Lowland countries. Despite there being an age difference between the two of about half a century, Kaganof was friends with Hoogstra for the last couple years of the latter's life and would thankfully document one of their various infamous get-togethers about a year before the actor died. Indeed, in 1997 when Hoogstra was at the ripe old age of 82, Kaganof decided to document the elderly actor while he was rehearsing Beckett's fifteen-minute play A Piece of Monologue (1980) whilst smoking dope and taking incessant swigs of liquor, though he would not edit the footage together until a decade later after he had returned to South Africa. Indeed, in the 24-minute experimental documentary Jaap Hoogstra: Geboorte Werd Hem Zijn Dood (2007) aka Jaap Hoogstra – A Piece of Monologue aka Jaap Hoogstra – Een Stuk Monoloog, the viewer has the rare opportunity to spend some quality time with an ancient reefer-addled queen who is just as sassy as ever even though he already has one foot in the grave.

More than a mere portrait, Jaap Hoogstra – A Piece of Monologue is a strikingly ‘heartfelt’ (I hate to use that word, but this is one of the rare cases where it is actually merited) tribute from one friend to another. Notably, in a written tribute entitled Inside Nothing: An Afternoon with Jaap Hoogstra, Kaganof stated of their rather unconventional friendship, “We were friends. It was a strange and valuable friendship. I think he wanted to fuck me but he never said so. The occasional hand on my knee, nothing more obvious than that. We would get stoned and laugh a lot. Laugh at the stupidity of everything and everyone. Laugh at ourselves laughing. Laugh at Nothing.” Indeed, for the 24-minutes that the viewer sees of the actor, Hoogstra spends most of the time talking about being fucked as a little boy, hitting on a middle-aged man in a pirate-esque outfit, rambling like a dazed and confused grandmother while stoned out of his mind on consumer grade Amsterdam dope, and discussing in a dejecting manner how much it sucks to be old and weak. At the beginning of the doc, Hoogstra mentions how he recently received a phone call where he was informed that his comrade Jean Paul had just suffered a stroke, which is something he fears might happen to him. Despite his rapidly deteriorating body and mind, Hoogstra has mostly positive things to say about his life, especially his youth, which he describes in an almost utopian way. The son of a harbor master from Dordrecht, Hoogstra developed an early love of swimming and especially swimming with other boys, stating of his experiences, “What I found strange about myself, I always hung out with boys. Not consciously, actually yes...I’m a born homo.” According to the actor, he lost his virginity at the rather young age of ten and when asked if he was really deflowered at such a young age, he joyously replies, “Yes. An older boy. At the school. But... I enjoyed it so much I wanted to change schools. To the school that was known as a homo school. I got there by nagging my parents. I got my way. All the boys fucked each other [...] And I had a lovely youth.” Indeed, if we can trust Hoogstra, it seems that the Netherlands had a rather liberal attitude to sex even before the destruction of the country during the Second World War resulted in it becoming the sort of unofficial brothel of Western Europe.

With pictures of himself in an elegant dress and kissing another bald man sitting around Hoogstra’s rather kitschy apartment, it becomes quite obvious that nobody but an old sentimental queen could live there and he is quite proud of his lurid lifestyle. Undoubtedly, a morbid portrait of himself from Kaganof’s The Dead Man 2 sticks out like a sore thumb in comparison to the rest of the stuff lying around the apartment which includes, aside from goofy gay portraits, a large porcelain pig. It becomes quite clear that Hoogstra is growing more and more aware of his fragile mortality as especially reflected in his somber confession, “I am not somebody who is scared of dying. The way it happens scares me.

I hope it's not a stroke. I find that a terrible...departure. That way...But if it happens suddenly...or an accident. Then I think to myself, at least I didn't know. I also didn't search for it. I'll also have rest." Not unlike the surviving spouse of a heterosexual married couple, Hoogstra began to go downhill in terms of his health after the death of his longtime gay lover, or as he states in a discernibly melancholy fashion, "It actually started with the death of George. With whom I lived together for thirty years. Thereafter my memory deteriorated. I always had a good memory. I confuse things. And that has been this year...also because of the many deaths...of colleagues...it's been exacerbated. It's made me uneasy. No. But...that's life. You realize it when you get very old. That I'm now becoming. You notice that life...is increasingly less pleasant. At least for me." Indeed, it seems that, as the years past, Hoogstra was more and more able to identify with his eponymous character in The Dead Man 2.

Despite being on the brink of becoming a corpse, Hoogstra is absolutely shameless when it comes to hitting on a middle-aged man that is dressed a lot like a pirate who shows up at his apartment with the gift of about an ounce of weed which they both smoke together (if you look carefully, you can also see the cameraman take a drag from a joint). When Hoogstra attempts to ply the man with alcohol, the rather happy butt pirate turns him down as he claims to have already drunk six Calvados, though he does share a fat joint with the old-timer. While stoned out of his mind with a cat in his lap, Hoogstra jokes to the pirate, "My puss he said...Is available to you" and then comments about how strong the weed is. While thoroughly inebriated, Hoogstra talks in a somewhat nostalgic fashion about how handsome he used to be, stating, "I didn't know that I looked so young and handsome. If I see myself in photos I think "Jesus Christ!" How I've deteriorated. Also physically, wrinkles everywhere." Indeed, if Hoogstra used to be handsome, it is absolutely impossible to tell so now as he resembles a sort of elderly effete half frog/half gnome. Somewhat fittingly, the doc concludes with footage of Hoogstra from The Dead Man 2 juxtaposed with music by pseudo-Guido Dutch singer Willy Alberti. Indeed, as a fountain of urine drenches Hoogstra's gleeful face, Alberti hilariously sings, "Your head in the air, your noise in the wind. Not caring about what others may think. Keep your heart full of warmth and love in your chest. But be a Prince in your own space. What you search for no one else can give you. Man dare to live!" Indeed, as a fellow who got buggered at ten and allowed himself to be pissed on for a film when he was almost eighty, Herr Hoogstra certainly dared to live with gusto and grace.

While appearing in a number of notable Dutch films, including Paul de Lusanet's campy Gerard Reve adaptation Lieve jongens (1980) aka Dear Boys, Orlow Seunke's classic György Konrád adaptation De smaak van water (1982) aka The Hes Case, and Theo van Gogh's Return to Oegstgeest (1987) and Loos (1989), Hoogstra's greatest and most daring role was most certainly in Kaganof's

The Dead Man 2, thus Jaap Hoogstra – A Piece of Monologue acts as a sort of invaluable companion piece to the film as it warmly deconstructs the man behind the Kaganofian myth and gives him a sense of dignity that one would not expect from an old fellow that was so senile that he seemed to delight in being drenched with female waste fluids. While it is no myth that many gay men are extremely masochistic and are into acts of supreme sexual degradation, it certainly takes a singular sort of sod to allow a woman to initiate him into heterosexual water-sports during his golden years for the sake of a film. As for Hoogstra's sexual proclivities during the time of the shooting of the doc, Kaganof wrote, "We often talked about sex. He loved sex. Was paying a young Moroccan man quite substantial amounts of money every week for butt fucking. He loved to be butt fucked. Fucked in his rectum. His anus. His naught. His Nothing. Fucked inside his Nothing. Ass fucked inside Nothing." As his rarely seen early J.G. Ballard quasi-adaptation Crash (1990) unequivocally demonstrates, Kaganof is a rare heterosexual filmmaker that is able to approach hardcore homo material in an unflinching fashion and with Jaap Hoogstra – A Piece of Monologue he proved it is not for purely exploitative or sensational reasons, as the auteur seems to respect all forms of sexual transgression. As Kaganof wrote regarding Hoogstra's death, "I visited him once at the hospital. But the joy was gone from the visit. It was too much schlepp to take the tram all the way out to the West of Amsterdam. And he wasn't allowed to smoke weed or drink Jenever so what was the point? I never saw him again. I didn't go to his funeral." While Kaganof did not go to Hoogstra's funeral, I cannot think of a more beautiful and genuinely touching obituary than Jaap Hoogstra – A Piece of Monologue where the 'Dead Man' certainly gets his due.

BOSS NIGGER

Jack Arnold (1975)

"They roll into a White Mans town....with Black Mans law" An intense blaxploitation film with a spaghetti western outline, this film is teeming with racial tension and plenty of squibs. This film is a pretty decent non-violent violent movie. Fred Williamson plays Boss (Nigger, but don't let him hear you say that), a bounty hunter with a comical sidekick who are hunting down a man named Jed Clayton, a thief and womanizer who is their ticket to a high life. They stumble upon a town that is sheriffless. Taking lead, Boss fills the role and brings a young woman and gives her a job in a bar. They quickly take reigns of this town, spreading black mans law, placing fines on anyone who uses the word "Nigger" or disrespects them. Along the way, Boss seduces a schoolteacher, and kills a lot of angry white men. This film is surprisingly directed by Jack Arnold, Best known for Creature From The Black Lagoon, Tarantula, and many other science fiction classics. Fred Williamson wrote this film with his own production company in mind. He made this film to parody his many over-the-top violent films. Much like a plethora of Fred Williamson works, you won't find much on them. All cover art normally belongs to an entirely different film. See: Black Cobra, Warriors of the Wasteland, and G.I. Bro.

The design of the small town is near flawless. The town has its own slums littered with spanish mothers and other stereotypes. D'urville Martin is hilarious in his role as Amos. He is a fast talking uppity negro with a penchant for fat women. He has many quotable lines and a fast talking lip. A more noticeable role of his is Willie Green in fellow blaxploitation film Dolemite. He is also the director of that instant classic. What didn't work for the film is some of the camera angles and the opening. They decided to cut the opening title card and original song. Cutting it from "He's Boss Nigger" to "He's Boss..." and changed the title to Boss, while still keeping all the "Niggers" in the film intact. In many scenes, the camera would swerve around characters attempting to catch the action, but the camera always felt blocked. It did work for the feel of a shoot-out though. Perhaps my favorite thing about this film is its soundtrack. Blending old school funk with mellow beats that mix so perfectly with everyone's motion. Clearly a soundtrack with the film in mind. Boss Nigger is a perfect addition to the Blaxploitation genre as well as Spaghetti westerns.

STRICTLY FORBIDDEN

Jack Deveau (1976)

Forget the ridiculous fantasy-driven romantic-comedy Mannequin (1987) starring a pre-dried-cunt-cougar Kim Cattrall, the quasi-Eurocentric experimental gay porn flick Strictly Forbidden (1976) aka Le musée aka Dreamboy directed by prolific auteur-pornographer Jack Deveau (Left-Handed, Drive) is the greatest and most just plain bizarre sensual-statue-come-to-life flick ever made, even if it has been rarely seen since its original dubious release in France nearly four decades ago. Apparently, originally shot on location in Paris and briefly released in an unauthorized manner under the frog title Le musée in the mid-1970s, Strictly Forbidden was not officially released by Hand-in-Hand films (auteur Deveau's production company) until 1984 when it was reconstructed under the title Dreamboy utilizing the original shooting script written by failed French Renaissance man Jean-Étienne Siry. A French-American coproduction partly shot in the Musée Rodin and the Musée Grévin (a wax museum) in Paris, Strictly Forbidden is the eerily lecherous celluloid tale of a pansy American art student who travels to Paris to 'cruise' art museums, only to eventually discover a secret 'private collection' of erotic male statues that come to life and cum all over the turd of a twink protagonist. Described by auteur Deveau, who has a cameo in the film as a froggy fag freak, as follows in a 1977 interview with In Touch magazine, "An American student traveling in France finds himself one day in a Paris art museum. Wandering around, he comes upon an unlocked door to a private collection. A guard shoos him away, but his curiosity has gotten the best of him. He returns to the museum, managing to sequester himself there overnight. What he find sin the room is a collection of erotic male statues, which come to life and guide the boy from one sexual act into another. In the end, the boy becomes one of them, a statue. The film is seen from the boy's point of view, and takes on the feeling of one sexual act, an initiation into homosexuality," Strictly Forbidden is a hyper hallucinatory homo hardcore flick from the Golden Age of pornography that, at least aesthetically, simultaneously echoes the sinister shadowplays of German Expressionism, the 'body fascism' of Leni Riefenstahl and the homoerotic phantasmagoric cine-magic of Kenneth Anger. Indeed, if nothing else, the beyond porn chic Strictly Forbidden does the seemingly forbidden in regard to the erotic celluloid arts by being one of the most artsy fartsy fag fuck flicks ever made, as a sort of celluloid prototype for Michael Zen's Falconhead (1976) and Falconhead Part II: The Maneaters (1984) and the sort of neo-Hellenistic homo piece that could have been directed by National Socialist sculptor Arno Breker's gay son.

A young American art student named Allan (Thomas Jeffries) has traveled to the cultural epicenter of Paris and, not surprisingly, the so-called 'City of Love' seems like a pure transcendental and otherworldly heaven-on-earth to the little lad, but little does he realize that much more magical things are hidden under the aesthetically-pleasing metropolis' undeniably striking surface. While travelling around Paris, Allan is approached by a dirty old monsieur (director Jack Deveau) with ulterior motives who, although pretending to be the young Yank's friendly guide at first, soon propositions to buy the young Boy Scout-like boy's virginal bung-hole. Of course, Allan does not take too kindly to being thought of as pricey meat and merely runs off in a hysterical manner, and not long after, he discovers the entry door to a secret exhibit at a museum, but he is kicked out by a security guard with an American accent (!) before he can get a good look at its decidedly decadent displays. Like any living and breathing human being, Allan is absolutely allured by the forbidden, so he decides to take his chances and sneak into the mysterious museum at night. Luckily, for the bi-curious boy, the private collection not only features superlatively statuesque statues of men with unclad private parts, but said statues also come alive and give the sodomite novice Allan the raunchy supernatural ride of his life. After a handsome and horny statue comes to life and fittingly French kisses Allan, he is lured into another somewhat ominous room where the startling stone-cock orgies begin. While lying on an ancient aristocratic pedestal of sorts, Allan gets in on some mutual oral action with some statues in what amounts to not much more the foreplay. Later on in what seems to be a ritualistic rite of the rectal-reamer sort, Allan has a load busted on him by a beatnik-like degenerate with a bushy beard while he sits passively in a fancy ancient seashell-shaped bathtub. Before Allan knows it, he is involved in a full force five-statue orgy of the gay Ancient Greek variety that mainly involves some majorly masochistic fellow being anally invaded by a gigantic phallic statue. To assumedly initiate Allen into the sodomite statue order, the orgy concludes with all the living works of art shooting their antiquated yet viciously virile loads on the stupid American boy's bare body. In the end in what amounts to a sort of Twilight Zone-esque climax of the creepy colon-choker sort, another young American arrives at the private collection of the phantasmagorical museum and sees that Allan has been transformed into a stoically-posed stone statue, thus confirming the young American's magical man-loving metamorphosis as a work of esoteric European erotic work.

Undoubtedly, if Left-Handed (1972) is porn-auteur Jack Deveau's most cynical and aggressively anti-romantic work and Drive (1974) is his most unhinged and campy pornographic poof piece, Strictly Forbidden is indubitably the director's most conspicuously classy, classical, and aesthetically cultivated work as a pleasingly preternatural film that is not only a playful tribute to Paris, but all of Occidental kultur and art history in general. Indeed, the high-class hypnotic hardcore flick that the pseudo-Anger-esque work Night of the Occultist (1973) wished it was, Strictly Forbidden is a film that, seemingly unwittingly, questions the very purpose and inspiration behind art, as if every single statue and painting in human history was created by a perturbed individual suffering from sexual repression and a pathological obsession with the human body and thus used their respective artistic medium as a semi-cryptic means of masturbatory metaphysical release. Featuring nil sex scenes for almost the first 20 minutes and dangerously drenched in unwaveringly artsy to its absolutely aberrant cocksucking core, Strictly Forbidden will probably only interest diehard cinephiles nowadays as a rare wanton celluloid work where aestheticism trumps eroticism and poetry trumps penises. Featuring an exceedingly eerie and atmospheric synthesizer-driven soundtrack by somewhat mainstream French composer Didier Vasseur, who also composed the soundtrack for Deveau's Just Blonds (1980), and magical camera tricks recalling Jean Cocteau, Strictly Forbidden almost seems like a celluloid crime due to its completely curious cocktail of audacious avant-garde artsy and debauched dildo deviancy. Indeed, with a simple reedit, Strictly Forbidden could be easily transformed into a non-pornographic experimental film, but then again, that would also destroy the film's aesthetically sacrilegious appeal as the wanton arthouse-porn equivalent to the American horror-comedy Waxwork (1988). Featuring a nearly dialogue-less script penned by obscure French writer/actor/director Jean-Étienne Siry (And God Created Man, Snails in the Head aka Un escargot dans la tête), who is probably best remembered today as the poster designer of films like Bunny Lake Is Missing (1965) directed by Otto Preminger and Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Lola (1981), Strictly Forbidden is also a work that strangely proves that at one time in history there was some bizarre overlap between the arthouse and porno worlds. Paradoxically semi-impenetrable in its storyline but quite literally visually penetrating, Strictly Forbidden is poof porn as poetry as a sort of (unintentional) celluloid love letter to Jean Cocteau, Jean Genet, Georges Bataille, and Roland Barthes, yet with an appreciation for the European Übermensch form in the spirit of Riefenstahl and Breker.

DRIBBLE

Jack Hannah (1946)

Giuseppe Andrews's contemporary ultra realistic (to the point of bordering surrealism) short Dribble is a film of our times. The shorts (at around 30 minutes) follows a washed up ex-professional white basketball player (played by master method actor Bill Nowlin) who has dived into a vodka bottle and somehow forgotten how to get out. He reminiscences over the days of snorting cocaine and mounting sluts. "Those were the days," indeed. The old white ex-professional basketball player's rival is a jolly old black ex-professional basketball player who sports a mean and greasy mullet. His verbal fights with whitey provide a new type of American entertainment (real life?). Another black man befriends whitey in hopes that he will teach retarded tiny tots the skill of basketball. He also calls his penis a "JIGGABOO COCKAROO." Giuseppe Andrews has confirmed himself as a poet of the trailer park. He takes the most pathetic and dehumanized individuals and turns them into Wal-Mart existentialists. Old man Tyree "shakes his dick" for a twenty dollar bill. This scene is both traumatizing and mesmerizing. Tyree knows exactly what he's doing with his gift of laughter to the masses. I would buy him a bottle of Jack Daniels as evidence of my deep respect for. The old white man takes his rival (old black guy) as hostage during the conclusion of Dribble. He also orders a pizza in a very sadistic voice while emphasizing the pizza is going to have olives on it. This whole scene takes place in some shitty motel that most likely charges by the hour. Giuseppe loves utilizing dirty motels. They are the second best thing to the trailer. Giuseppe Andrews puts shame Lars von Trier's Dogme 95 movement. He has no interest in pretentious rules (used to hide pretentions) that stunt him as a filmmaker. Andrews has made all his films on a shitty sony camcorder with budgets capable of buying a couple cases of beer. Giuseppe Andrews is the true proletarian auteur.

Jack Lewis (2003)

As far as porno homo auteur filmmakers are concerned, probably none is more artistically and politically subversive than Canadian cocksucker John Greyson (Un©ut, Zero Patience), a politically incorrect yet equally degenerate far-left poof whose recent anti-Zionist political activism has given him some rather negative press, especially in the fiercely Philo-Semitic world of filmmaking. Indeed, in a world where fags can marry and one is supposed to accept the act of a man anally penetrating a man as totally normal and even liberating, homosexual 'culture', especially in the celluloid world, has become hardly subversive and just as banal as the bourgeois heterosexual world that ass-pounding abberosexuals once felt superior to. A queerly queer veteran who originally emerged in the Toronto film/fag scene in the late 1970s, Greyson has lived long enough to see the ideas he spread like a venereal disease via his poofster political activism to become mainstream and overwhelmingly socially acceptable, yet he has remained an uncompromising filmmaker whose cinema works tend to appeal to the most esoterically-inclined of cinephiles, be they homos, heteros, or otherwise, and his most recent feature-length narrative film, Proteus (2003)—a low-budget (at $500,000.00 despite being an international production with a large international cast) Canadian-South African co-production of postmodern historical revisionism of the audaciously anachronistic sort that was co-written/directed/produced by SA documentary filmmaker Jack Lewis (a man responsible for producing a series of educational documentaries for the Robben Island Museum in the late 1990s)—is no less perniciously provocative and socially deleterious than his early works Urinal (1988) aka Pissoir and Un©ut (1997). A sort of daringly degenerate cross between Nagisa Oshima's Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence (1983), Kiss of the Spider Woman (1985) directed by Héctor Babenco, Querelle (1982) directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, and Jean Genet's Un chant d'amour (1950) aka A Song of Love, Proteus is loosely based on the racially-charged true story about two South African prisoners on Robben Island (where anti-white terrorist turned Nobel Laureate Nelson Mandela spent 18 of the 27 years he was in prison), a gay Dutch sailor and a Capoid Khoi/Bushman Negro, who were both executed in 1735 for the unholy mortal sin of interracial sodomy. Undoubtedly a far-left fag-ciist flick of the militantly homosexualist sort that portrays sexual orientation as a more serious source of discrimination than racial differences, Proteus is assuredly incriminating on the director's part as a sometimes sickening and would-be-salacious but mostly sardonic sub-erotic arthouse flick directed by a man who was clearly heavily enticed by the fervently foul fantasy of a Nordic and a Negroid physically and metaphysically destroying racial and national barriers via blasphemous black-on-white and white-on-black buggery. A patently pretentious piece of race and sex hustling of the curiously carnal and even campy sort, Proteus, despite ostensibly taking place in the 18th-century, features ANC era prison guards as leather-fag-like fascists of the sadomasochistic sort, pancake make-up wearing Goth fags wielding electric guitars, gay orgies taking place on the streets of Amsterdam, and snarky 1960s style fag hag stenographers with beehive hairdos arguing over the middle Dutch origins of the word “fuck” and, indeed, Greyson’s digital video work is certainly a piece where the two persecuted poof protagonists fuck, get fucked, fuck each other, and get fucked over by the Dutch-run South African government.

Taking its name from the South African flower better known as “King Sugarbush” that was named “Protea cynaroides” by Swedish botanist Carolus Linnaeus in 1735 and was proposed as the National Flower of South Africa in 1964, Proteus uses the flower as a faggy ‘flowery’ allegory for the blossoming and eventual death of the romantic relationship between the two pansy protagonists. Claas Blank (Rouxnet Brown) is a rare bilingual black servant fluent in two European languages (Dutch and English) of Khoi Hottentot ancestry (although his father was a Bushman, thus making him still a 100% pure member of the dying Asian-like Negro Capoid race, which Nelson Mandela also symbolically belongs to), thus making him a racial ‘untouchable’ of sorts and a racial enemy of both blacks and whites. Lucky for him, a Scottish botanist named Virgil Niven (Shaun Smyth) of the latent homosexual variety takes Blank in as an assistant and uses him as a model for his homoerotic ‘scientific’ drawings. After receiving ten years of hard labor on Robben Island for the seemingly bogus crime of “assault and insolence on a Dutch citizen,” Blank starts an initially hostile but eventually romantic relationship with a debauched Dutch sailor named Rijkhaart Jacobsz (Neil Sandilands), who has no qualms about committing sodomy, especially when he is on the receiving end, thus volunteering to experience reversed racial subjection. Naturally, Blank’s master Virgil Niven is jealous of his black boy toy’s new fuck buddy friend, but he has his own problems to worry about as a married man who was found guilty of sodomy in absentia, a fate that inevitably led to his ex-lover/assistant’s execution. A crafty and shifty trickster, Mr. Blank lies about the Bushman words for certain South African flowers to his master Virgil Niven, absurdly replacing the real Bushman flower names with words “cunt” and “fart,” among other linguistic absurdities, thus highlighting the dubious research done by Europeans when recording African history. From Niven, Blank learns that his people, the Hottentot people, belong to one of the three subspecies of man, the “bridge between simian and homo erectus.” Of course, that does not stop Niven from lusting over his subhuman partner, but his bourgeois airs prevent him from acting on his impulses, which offends Mr. Blank, who taunts his sexually mixed-up master with the words “I see the way you look at me...I know what it means.” Being a humble sailor of the colonial proletarian prisoner sort with not even the slightest Dutch Calvinist inclinations, Jacobsz has no problem engaging in jungle fever with tribal twink Blank, but when the two men are caught literally with their pants down and engaging in multicultural mud-packing, they are convicted of sodomy, an uniquely unholy crime that is punished with death by way of execution, which the victim's family is forced to pay. After being tortured, wussy white boy Jacobsz, unlike his brave lover Blank who never gives in under the pressure of torture, cowardly caves in after being tortured via drowning torture device and admits he committed sodomy with a true blue spade. While Jacobsz is convicted of sodomy and sentenced to death, Blank only has to return to Robben Island as he never confessed to engaging in cocksucking, which the Dutch court requires when carrying out an execution. Displaying his true commitment to his cracker lover, Blank ultimately decides to admit to the Dutch court that he is a homo Negro, thus he and Jacobsz are allegorically chained together and dropped in the sea, thus demonstrating director John Greyson's conspicuous belief that homo-hating transcends racial lines, as cocksuckers of all colors are equally hated by the Dutch court.

With a blatantly queer colonial queen absurdly stating, "as they say, what's good for the motherland is good for the colony. Or rather, vice versa," John Greyson has certainly demonstrated with Proteus that his sardonic sodomite wit has yet to wane over the decades, as colonialism has been entirely deleterious to both the colonizers and the colonized and has been the true root of racial chaos and cultural mongrelization throughout the world. Of course, with South Africa now being in black hands and white South Africans facing very potential genocide as demonstrated by the savage black-on-white murders of white Afrikaner farmers, with Genocide Watch placing South Africa at level 6, "Preparation", remarking "we have evidence of organized incitement to violence against White people," race hate in the rainbow nation has reversed in such a remarkably radical manner of the genocidal sort that it makes John Greyson's criticism of colonial racism in Proteus seem rather trivial and absurdly outmoded. Of course, Greyson's main focus was portraying homosexuals as perennial victims who have it much worse than even blacks, while also portraying male-on-male buggery as something that was believed to only afflict Europeans as depicted in a scene in Proteus where a Dutch lawmaker remarks, "I thought the natives were immune to such unnatural deeds," as if even the apparently racial colonialists even regarded their own imperial way of life as deracinated and deluded, while seeing the savages as still pure and untainted by the anti-organic phenomenon of colonialism and multiculturalism, which has only gotten all the more apocalyptic since the centuries have past. In fact, it seems that Proteus depicts homosexuality as the only positive import to the dark continent, as if technology, medicine/antibiotics, cities, and civilization are totally negligible things.

Of course, in its totally negative depiction of the Dutch East India company—the very first multinational corporation—in regard to its exploitation of South Africans, Proteus ultimately has a nonsensical message of globalization = bad yet cosmopolitan cocksucking and international interracial sodomy = good. Featuring a contrived past where everyone seems gay yet also inexplicably anti-gay, Proteus is another great example of John Greyson's keen ability to cinematically sodomize history in a militant far-left homo manner that, in its intentionally belligerent anachronism and oftentimes disinterest in historical truths, is most importantly about today's globalized world and not the old colonial world it is set in. As Greyson admitted in an interview for the DVD release of Proteus, the real Claas Blank and Rijkhaart Jacobsz met each other when the former was only 16 years old and would maintain a romantic relation for two decades before they were actually convicted and executed for sodomy, which is quite remarkable considering it was nearly three centuries ago. In a nation where no less than ½ a million rapes are committed a year and child/baby rape (many HIV-infected South Africans believe if they rape a baby, it will cure them of their affliction) is at one of the highest levels in the world yet it also happens to be the first African country to legalize gay marriage, South Africa certainly has more things to worry about than whether the typical Joe Schmo negro tolerates buggery. Featuring the fetishization of quasi-fascist crypto-fag cops, a history lesson in old school European racial theories, the campy homosexualizing of the Dutch aristocracy (the old colonial men in stupid wigs are portrayed as hysterical yet sexually repressed old queens), unintentionally farcical glorification of the so-called "noble savage," and promotion of homosexual miscegenation, Proteus is a film that is ultimately far more humorous in its homo-centricity than it is genuinely 'romantic' and socio-politically potent as a sort of unflattering, if not totally accidental and pathology-driven, deconstruction of the degenerate queer artist and political activist. Described by co-director John Greyson himself as a "low-budget sodomy epic," Proteus is a proudly profligate piece of ridiculously risqué and pseudo-romantic fag historical revisionism that is sure to offend any self-respecting heterosexual, be they white or black, who has the gall to endure the abberosexual artsy fartsy essence of the film. Concluding with the 1964 Nelson Mandela quote "some of the things so far told the court are true and some are not true" regarding being sentenced to life imprisonment on Robben Island, Proteus is ultimately a film with the message that all history is subjective and written by the conquerors. Of course, with "peace keeper" Nelson Mandela on his deathbed and the looming threat of race war against South Africa's white population, one can only wonder the sort of bogus history black leaders will write in the future of ridding themselves of the culture-carrying and producing Caucasian menace.

MIDNIGHT MOVIE

Jack Messitt (2008)

In the all too similar vein of Demons, the greatest horror film ever created, comes a tale of a series of bizarre and unforeseen supernatural mayhem inside of a movie theater. I had somewhat high hopes for this cult throwback to grindhouse cinema of the 70's but I found that the Texas Chainsaw Massacre Spoof was the only thing to really hold this film up on terms of being a faithful rendition. That, and the accidental PSA this film served as regarding child actors. Never use them. A group of mixed archetypes arrange in a huge theater, though claim it's a shabby far cry from ones with stadium seating. Due to the condition of the theater I'm employed at, I don't take this environment for granted. That is, until I saw that the soda syrups were in the dingy, creepy basement ripe for all sorts of murderers to hide in. That is also until I saw the disheveled and grungy restroom that doesn't fit the schematics of the place at all. Need I bring the booth area to mind? Point is, Midnight Movie is as faithful to the doctrine of a theater as it is to a concept of horror film. On terms of iconic slasher figures, Ted Radford is at the bottom of the alleged barrel o' monkeys. His quarter skull mask is laughable, but hilarious once you hear him talk and see his face out of alignment with the mask's positioning. His weapon is a handled bizarre rendition of a corkscrew. He uses it to slice people and in one scene, he manages to remove a cinephile's heart out. Even though it defies every law of math (being of a science), I let it slide. I've always noticed that directors who make a film for the "horror enthusiast" always create a caricature of their demographic that is a pathetic and squirming creature that uses the word "cult" too much. When the film takes a believable turn of a director hellbent on a fanatical fixation of his own project thus going berserk, the film takes a ridiculous alleyway of creating a otherworldly cinema dimension and creating Radford as a film ghost(?). The end is one of those similar endings in which you believe some characters live but they are indeed trapped in a form of purgatory. Not one involving succulent tortures and over-the-top fire FX, but the kind where you are forced to be intimidated by a man in a goofy costume with a voice changer. I could recommend this film somehow to slasher fans. But even still, slasher fans aren't really fans of anything. There's no realism, no substance, and a strong undernourishment of a prime entertainment. Midnight Movie creates a likable environment with some agreeable characters, embarrassingly butchers them (hard enough for a PG-13 rating), and squanders any and all form of satisfaction. That, and I also have an incredible distaste for the symbiosis that heavy metal and horror films have mustered over the years. Brings a bad taste of Brain Damage Films to the surface.

DRIVE, HE SAID

Unbeknownst to most film fans, archetypal filmic psychopath Jack Nicholson—one of the few Hollywood actors that I think seems to have enough talent, character, and intelligence to become an ‘auteur’—has also worked as film director. Indeed, aside from being one of the five or so uncredited directors (which also included Francis Ford Coppola, Monte Hellman, and Jack Hill, among others) of the cheap Roger Corman-produced horror flick The Terror (1963) starring Boris Karloff and directing the forgotten cocaine-fueled comedy-western Goin’ South (1978), as well as the unsurprisingly inferior ‘too-little-too-late’ Chinatown sequel The Two Jakes (1990), Nicholson tried to jump on the post-classical Hollywood ‘American New Wave’ bandwagon and direct a counter-cultured-themed quasi-arthouse work of the decidedly dark yet equally humorous and teenage-angst-ridden sort with his first ‘official’ directorial debut Drive, He Said (1971). While Nicholson became one of the most integral actors of the American New Wave due to his less-than-handsome “everyman” looks, completely natural “fuck you” attitude, and genuine acting talents, he also directed one of the most ambitious, subversive, pessimistic, and—in my opinion—underrated, if not somewhat flawed, films of Hollywood’s most revolutionary, experimental, and auteur-emphasized era. Of course, Drive, He Said did not do for the seemingly half-crazed actor turned nihilistic auteur what his comrade Dennis Hopper’s Easy Rider (1969) did for him, hence the film’s relative obscurity today. Somewhat loosely based on leftist literary icon Jeremy Lerner’s 1964 debut novel of the same name about a confused counter-culture-brainwashed college basketball player who has become disillusioned with stardom and the American dream and who has a decidedly negative influence in the form of a commie revolutionary roommate who ultimately burns down their college, Drive, He Said was looked at as a reeking pile of bombastic anarchistic shit when it premiered at the Cannes Film Festival, received mixed reviews in the U.S., and did extremely poorly at the box-offices. Over four decades later, Nicholson’s misunderstood movie offers one of the most incriminatingly truthful depictions of its degenerate zeitgeist when a bunch of spoiled baby boomer brats brainwashed by The Beatles, Bob Dylan, Trotsky, and Marcuse thought they could change the world but ultimately debased the nation to the point where social disunity, race hate, loveless sex and bastard children, authoritarian educational institutions, gender disharmony, cultural impoverishment, political corruption, economic inequality, and spiritual retardation have become all the more malignant. A dark comedy that depicts the early stages of rot of a dying nation, Drive, He Said offers a great argument for the case that Jack Nicholson could have become more important as an auteur than an actor.

Hector Bloom (William Tepper) is a college basketball star who is suffering from increasing cognitive dissonance as a result of being brainwashed by his good-for-nothing beatnik Bolshevik roommate Gabriel (Michael Margotta), demanding coach Bullion (Bruce Dern), and dubious romantic relationship with his hippie leftist cuckold professor's beautiful wanton wife Olive (Karen Black) as well as his dread of being drafted into the Vietnam War. At the beginning of Drive, She Said, armchair revolutionary Gabriel—a swarthy babbling turd who seems to have raided the wardrobe of frog counter-culture actor/auteur Pierre Clémenti—stages a New Left publicity stunt at one of Hector's basketball games with his moronic Marxist theatre troupe by shutting off the lights in the stadium, pretending to be members of the U.S. military and mock executing a sexually androgynous gook hippie. Of course, Gabriel gets his gang of pseudo-socialist skidmarks to ritualistically chant, "My name is Gabriel... I am a visionary... You have no power," like acid-addled automatons while standing in a holding cell. When a Cop asks Gabriel, "How does it feel to be in jail buddy?" the brain-damaged pseudo-existentialist piece of untermensch excrement rather retardedly replies, "You're in jail buddy. You're in jail." Luckily, one-too-many acid trips eventually take their toll on contra archangel Gabriel.

Right in front of the frail face of his 'progressive' leftist college professor Richard (played by Chinatown screenwriter Robert Towne), who cares more about Gabriel's arrest than satisfying his undersexed wife, Hector carries on an affair with his cuckolded teacher's wanton wife, Olive. Hector claims to love Olive, but there is no way their relationship can go anywhere. After being told by Gabriel that basketball is "jive" and that he should give a shit about Maoist hippie bullshit, Hector also begins screwing up his basketball career by blowing off practice, getting injured by playing in a half-ass fashion, and getting kicked out of a game for fighting. Hector also intentionally screws up an important meeting with some basketball bigwigs by spouting senseless hippie gibberish about the price of hotdogs. Meanwhile, gook-loving goofball Gabriel falls into some sort of drug-induced psychosis after being drafted and destroys a television with a sword while screaming "Viva La Revolution" while in the company of a scared blond toddler boy and an unclad hippie dame. Upon discovering that he might be kicked off the basketball team due to his senseless delinquent behavior, Hector becomes all the more dejected after his MILF mistress Olive reveals to him that she is pregnant with a kid that is probably his and ends their relationship. For whatever reason, Gabriel decides to pay his roommate Hector's ex-mistress Olive a visit while wearing pantyhose over his head. After scaring Olive by letting loose birds around her house, chasing her with a knife, and screaming "you want me," Gabriel begins molesting the whorish housewife and gets her to confess that she loves him and that he is "right." After Olive manages to escape out the front door, Hector shows up in his fancy sports car and attempts to act like a hero, with cuckolded husband Richard showing up soon after. After Gabriel runs out of the house and makes some semblance of sense for the first time in the entire movie by stating regarding Olive, “She’s a bitch, man...She turns you on and then she backs off,” Hector and Richard get in an argument when the latter threatens to kill the former. In the end, Gabriel presumably achieves his dream of not having to fight in the Vietnam War after being institutionalized after showing up at his college completely naked and setting free all the animals, including snakes and lizards, in the science lab. Undoubtedly, it seems like Gabriel would have most likely suffered less brain damage and avoided spending his remaining years like Nietzsche did by mindlessly smirking like a buffoon in a mental institution had he grown some testicles, accepted the fact that he was drafted, and fought in the Vietnam War. As for disillusioned basketball star Hector, he learned the valuable lesson that it is best to stay away from acid-addled pseudo-philosophic draft-dodgers like Gabriel, who might ruin your life and/or influence you to spout inane hippie lingo.

A basketball flick that no self-respecting negro would ever watch, Drive, He Said ultimately makes for a strange synthesis of director Jack Nicholson’s love of b-ball and mixed feelings regarding the counter-culture movement he was a symbol of as a result of his iconic performances in Hopper’s Easy Rider and Rafelson’s Five Easy Pieces (1970). Of course, Nicholson’s film was meant to be the next big cinematic counter-culture hit, as a sort of spiritual brother film to Hopper and Rafelson’s films, but without the actor turned auteur starring in the film, not to mention its forlorn and patently pessimistic tone, it was almost doomed from the get go to be a celluloid bomb. Lead actor William Tepper, who never really went on to do anything notable after appearing in the film aside from appearing in Jim McBride’s 1983 remake of Godard’s Breathless, is one of the greatest weaknesses of Nicholson’s film, as he lacks charisma and charm and seems somewhat like a somnambulist merely sleepwalking through his seemingly confused and one-dimensional performance. Indeed, no charming leads and dejecting themes certainly make for unpopular films for the general public.

In the featurette, A Cautionary Tale of Campus Revolution and Sexual Freedom (2009), featured on the Criterion Collection DVD release of Drive, He Said, the film’s co-producer, Harry Gittes, states of the work and the decidedly degenerate zeitgeist it depicts, “It was about a very regretful time in history.” Most notably, at the end of the featurette, director Nicholson, who originally intended to make the film more scandalous with an opening featuring what he described as a “symphony of dicks” (the released film was stamped with an X-rating), states of the film, “The tragedy of the story is the problems in all free love.” Of course, there is nothing “free” about an aimless and nihilistic existence where you’re addicted to soulless sex, drugs, and shitty rock ‘n’ roll and Drive, He Said more or less lets the baby boomer generation know this, hence their bewilderment with the work. Indeed, with The Magic Garden of Stanley Sweetheart (1970) starring a then-unknown Don Johnson in his debut film, Nicholson’s film is most certainly one of the most undeservedly forgotten celluloid counter-counter items. After all, what other film features a cuckolded leftist college professor and a commie revolutionary who destroys his brain after one-too-many bad acid trips?!

A NIGHTMARE ON ELM STREET 2: FREDDY'S HOMOEROTIC REVENGE

Jack Sholder (1985) A Nightmare on Elm Street 2: Freddy's Revenge is possibly the greatest work of homoerotic horror cinema. The second time around in the Nightmare on Elm Street, Freddy really has his claws on one boy. The boy, Jesse, has angst and problems growing up as a teenager. He is awkward with his girlfriend that practically throws herself at him and likes to get extra close to his male friend Grady. Freddy Krueger wants Jesse to find him victims which include a few ambiguously gay men.

Freddy's Revenge opens with Jesse on a school bus with a group of young girls. The young girls look at Jesse and laugh. Jesse merely sits and looks awkwardly. There is something not quite right about Jesse and Freddy Krueger takes advantage of this. Jesse is the new kid in town and has a hard time finding close friends. During a baseball game, he makes friends with a guy named Grady. This happens after Grady pulls down Jesse's pants, exposing his ass and a jock strap. The school Gym teacher tells the boys to "assume the position" there afterward. Schneider is a somewhat odd gym coach. With a German surname and an Aryan profile, Coach Schneider would have made a great Nazi SA stormtrooper. Like the stormtroopers, Schneider can be found after school at a militant gay bar. One night Jesse happens to wander into the gay bar and is approached by Schneider. As can be expected, Schneider brings Jesse back to school for a few late night laps and finally tells him to "hit the showers." Freddy Krueger must have been jealous of Schneider as he kills him in the showers just after whipping his naked bare ass. There is more blood in this scene than at a mass prison gang rape. I always thought Freddy Krueger was a bit kinky.

Freddy Krueger also becomes jealous of Jesse's friend Grady. After failing to score with his girlfriend, Jesse runs to Grady's house. Grady tells Jesse that a "female is waiting for him" and asks him sarcastically "And you wanna sleep with me?" Unsurprisingly, Jesse fears for his friend's life and shows his deep concern. Sadly, Freddy decides Grady needs to go since he is getting in the way of their relationship. Phallicism is also prevalent throughout the film, and Jesse is also in the middle of it. In a science lab, Jesse is scared by a gigantic snake wrapped around his neck. I was also disturbed to see Jesse dancing with a phallic object over his crotch while pushing drawers in with his butt. When he says "how do you like that Dad?" while prancing around gaily, I thought that was one of the finest moments in horror cinema. Also while making out with his girlfriend, penises seem to keep getting in the way when his tongue essentially turns into one.

Gay rights groups might be offended by Freddy's Revenge. After all, when Jesse fought Freddy it was as if he were fighting his gayness. Only through the power of love for his girlfriend could Jesse beat Freddy. Jesse's girlfriend tells

A NIGHTMARE ON ELM STREET 2: FREDDY'S HOMOEROTIC REVENGE

Jesse, "you created him, you can destroy him." The message of the film being, if you fight your gayness, you can overcome it. I wonder if Freddy would look good in a pink striped sweater.

FLAMING CREATURES

You would be hard-pressed to find a film 'gayer' than Flaming Creatures (1963), at least when looked at within its historical context, but don't tell that to the thoroughly emaciated, AIDS-stricken ghost of director Jack Smith (Buzzards over Baghdad, Normal Love); an overtly outrageous outsider artist that denied his, indeed, blatantly flaming homophile persuasion had any influence on his fiercely flamboyant celluloid brainchild. Although virtually unknown nowadays, even among camp keen cinephiles, Flaming Creatures – a 43-minute satire of Hollywood B-movies and tangling tribute to once-popular 1940s Dominican-born actress Maria "The Queen of Technicolor" Montez – would inevitably be a crucial influence on works of 'high' and 'low' camp, including Federico Fellini's Juliet of the Spirits (1965) and Satyricon (1969), the patently perverse micro-budget works of Mike Kuchar (The Pervert, Sins of the Fleshapoids), the celluloid claptrap of Matthew Barney (The Cremaster Cycle), the early Dreamland movies of John Waters (Mondo Trasho, Pink Flamingos), and especially the primitive factory films of Andy Warhol. In fact, Warhol – who co-directed the assumed-lost film Batman Dracula (1964) with Smith – superficially aped and bastardized the 'cardboard camp' aesthetic essence invented by the now virtually unknown artist, so it should be no surprise that prolific jazz/noise musician John Zorn (Naked City, Masada) once stated, "Jack Smith was the real Warhol." Always more proficient at appropriating, selling and promoting art assembled by greater artists than actually forging it himself, Warhol also stole Smith's invention of the B-movie 'Superstar,' as the Flaming Creatures director was befriending and casting gutter-level, cum-guzzling drag queens, fickle fag hags, and heftily hung hunks long before the pompous pop-artist utilized them in an imperative, career jump-starting manner that would further contribute to the much undeserved quasi-mystical legacy of his hand-me-down fantasy factory. Described by Jack Smith himself as, "a comedy set in a haunted music studio," Flaming Creatures is an intrinsically incoherent avant-garde trash piece full of images of pesky flaccid peckers (appearing everywhere from inside wine glasses to firmly relaxing on the shoulders of drag queens) and massive mammary glands (the are constantly manhandled by anonymous hands), therefore one could argue it is a forerunner to 'body horror,' as it is certainly a film that reminds one how truly malodorous and consternating the human body can be, particularly when genders are brazenly blurred. Considered pornographic by certain authorities (a NYC criminal court) and later mentioned by name in contra-porn speeches by racist race-mixing senator Strom Thurmond, copies of Flaming Creatures were confiscated up its debut screening and the work was subsequently banned (and still is to this day), hence the extremely poor quality of most transfers of the film available today. John Waters may tend to exaggerate during his countless appearances on various TV shows and documentaries, but he wasn't puffing his perverted mentor when he stated that Jack Smith was, "The only true underground filmmaker" as it is a toilsome task to think of another filmmaker whose aesthetic influence was so pivotal and pioneering, yet only the most rabid and resolute of cinephiles have seen Flaming Creatures.

Unfortunately, Flaming Creatures – with its blatantly amateurish direction and nonexistent production values; and relatively tame homo-centricity (at least by today's standards) – is, lamentably, not as interesting as the story behind the film, thus the documentary Jack Smith and the Destruction of Atlantis (2006) makes for an essential companion piece to the infamous featurette. Although generally used as a slur against homos nowadays, Jack Smith used the word "flaming" as a positive adjective for his favorite things, hence the title Flaming Creatures; a very personal (and undoubtedly masturbatory) auteur project featuring some of the late director's favorite self-invented drag queens, including Mario Montez (a Puerto Rican Maria Montez-clone who later became one of Warhol's Superstars) and bountiful, boffo costume designs. Flaunting a number of unspeakable scenarios from mundanely masturbating trannys/hermaphrodites to a brutish and criminally aggressive "cunning linguist," Flaming Creatures is an ostentatious orgy of loopy aberrosexuality that demands the viewer to leave their moral compass elsewhere for 43-minutes or so. As a master photographer and subversive saint of scopophilia, Smith's greatest accomplishment with Flaming Creatures was dreaming up a variety of meticulously constructed mise-en-scènes (mainly composed of lavishly dressed/undressed bodies) as the autocratic auteur certainly had nil interest in developing any sort of cohesive narrative for the film. As a lifelong committed anarchist, Flaming Creatures is the artistic expression of a man who disdained gender roles, heterosexuality, cinematic convention, Judeo-Christian mores, and, probably most of all, mainstream America as depicted by pre-1968 Hays Code Hollywood. In our post-post-modern era where a considerable portion of the American populous shares Smith's sentiments, especially in regard to Hollywood and the 'artistic' world, it is easy to forget why Jack Smith and his celluloid chef d'œuvre Flaming Creatures – a decidedly undaunted work of Dionysian derangement – is such an important contribution to the progression of campy cinematic libertinage.

NORMAL LOVE

Despite being the director's only feature-length film and filmed in titillating Technicolor, Normal Love (1963) aka Normal Fantasy aka Tales of Cement Lagoon aka The Great Patsy Triumph directed by meta-campy cocksucker Jack Smith (Buzzards Over Baghdad, Scotch Tape) was never actually finished and what remains today is a curious collection of semi-high-camp tableaux with next to nil in the way of discernible plot. Featuring a number of old school art fag superstars (Warhol stole the idea of superstars from Smith) and off-off-Broadway degenerates, including Mario Montez, Diane di Prima, Tiny Tim, and Andy Warhol, among various others, Normal Love is more or less the sort of film you would watch if you want to overdose on kitsch and camp to the point where you never want to see a flaming fag in drag and/or haggard hag ever again. Apparently intentionally abandoned after Mr. Smith could not deal with the fact that his micro magnum opus Flaming Creatures (1963)—an odious and obscene vampiric orgy of the sometimes scatological sort that the director himself somewhat adequately described as “a comedy set in a haunted music studio”—was seized by the police at its premiere on April 29, 1963 at the Bleecker Street Cinema in NYC and ultimately declared “obscene” by a New York City as he believed if he never completed another film they could not be seized/banned by authorities, Normal Love is next to impossible to view today unless you're degenerate and/or aesthetically-disabled enough to dig going to modern art galleries, and thus the film now lies in the camp garbage can of underground cinema history as a work with all the ingredients of a masterpiece, but which somehow falls short of being such, as if the auteur foresaw he would die of AIDS and panicked, ultimately throwing away his very potential opportunity of becoming America's foremost fag filmmaker. The closest to an American Werner Schroeter, albeit with a less refined taste in art and aesthetics and a greater influence from Golden Age Hollywood, Jack Smith was once described by the 'Pope of Trash' John Waters as “The only true underground filmmaker” and, indeed, unlike Andy Warhol, he and his films are still in the underground, with Normal Love being the strongest confirmation that the auteur could have never dig himself out of the aberrant-garde netherworld. Part pomo homo Busby Berkeley tribute, part overly obsessive orientalist orgy, part killer camp catastrophe, part humorously hideous homage to “The Queen of Technicolor” Maria Montez, part dimestore drag queen diva debauchery, and part 1930s-style monster movie, Normal Love seems like it was directed by an autistic child poof on the verge of schizophrenia and having a DIY sex-change, which, at the very least, is not something you can say about many other films, including those of the unhinged aberrosexual underground.

Unlike the warped warehouse weirdness that is Flaming Creatures, Normal Love is set in a sort of poof pastoral pandemonium where every beautiful freak, fierce fag hag, histrionic whore tranny, and just about every other imaginable/unimaginable social and sexual misfit roams and comes out to play. Featuring crappy and cartoonish plastic spiders, gay men in pink spandex with unflattering man-camel-toes, pregnant chicks with pointy titty tassles, ashy Aunt Jemina-esque tranny negroes carrying around watermelons, Hispanic transman mermaids swimming in unsavory white liquid (played by Smith's muse Mario Montez, who is ostensibly swimming in milk), a shaved head mongoloid 'child' from homo hell, mundane mummies that are more merry than murderous and drink fine wine in a most dapper manner, a wackjob werewolf with a perverse proclivity toward spiritually defiling mermaids via Coca-Cola, and a green Cobra Woman with an unconscious talent for attracting mummy molesters, among various other radical rejects of sub-supernatural subhumankind, Normal Love is anything but what its innately idiotically ironic title advertises. Although far below in the underground and never officially completed, Normal Love would go on to inspire not just would-be-weirdo Warhol, but Italian maestro Federico Fellini, who was shown the film by avant-garde filmmaker Jonas Mekas (who was arrested in 1964 for screening Smith's Flaming Creatures) and whose first color film Juliet of the Spirits (1965) aka Giulietta degli spiriti, as well as his homoerotic epic Fellini Satyricon (1969) is suavely serenaded in Jack Smith's keenly kaleidoscopic camp imagery. Of course, no matter how self-indulgent critics claim Fellini's later films to be, they pale in comparison to the plainly plot-less, aesthetic preposterousness of Smith's Normal Love.

As revealed in a vintage soundclip in the documentary Jack Smith and the Destruction of Atlantis (2006), Jack Smith started regarding his intention with Normal Love, "After the sickeningly pasty reception in New York City of Flaming Creatures, I was not likely to make another movie that the people of my own city couldn't see...So I spent my summer out in the country shooting...a lovely, pasty, pink and green color, movie...that is going to be the definitive pasty expression," yet he ultimately gave up on his perverted pastoral pasty picture, hence one of the many reasons why it is virtually impossible to find today, which is rather unfortunate, if not a cinematic tragedy. Visually speaking, Normal Love is indubitably Smith's greatest work of esoteric high-camp ecstasy, though Flaming Creatures is his magnum opus of "raging" and "flaming." While Smith is known to constantly re-edit Normal Love, even during actual screenings, I managed to find a long 1 hour and 46 minute cut of the film that is probably the closest to a definitive cut and I feel vaguely blessed for that. A self-described anarchist who once stated "I want to be uncommercial film personified" and was described by his friends as the "real Warhol", Jack Smith once had the grand honor of George Lucas describing his film Normal Love as "a jumbled mess...even though the pictures themselves were flowing beautifully," which is one of the few things I can agree with Mr. Star Wars on. Interestingly, Andy Warhol, who once quite humbly described Jack Smith's influence on him as a filmmaker as follows, “Jack Smith was filming a lot out there and I picked something up from him for my own movies — the way he used anybody who happened to be around that day and also how he just kept shooting until the actors got bored,” also directed a documentary/newsreel of sorts entitled Andy Warhol Films Jack Smith Filming 'Normal Love' (1963) depicting the kooky cast and director of Normal Love, but it was unfortunately seized by the police who thought it was Flaming Creatures and is now presumed lost forever. Ultimately dying on September 25, 1989 from AIDS-related pneumonia after previously declaring to friends before actually receiving gay cancer that perishing from AIDS would be a so-called 'glamorous way to die', Jack Smith was unquestionably a debauched dude with a damaged brain, but at least it also gave him the creative capacity to direct a film like Normal Love.

THE BEING

Jackie Kong (1983)

Director Jackie Kong has created several horror films in the 80s but none of them are as synonymous with the terms "horror" and "bad" as The Being is. Hearing nothing but abysmal backtalk towards the DVD release of this film, I had to admit to myself that the poster art was quite impressive so I set out to queue this film just to witness how awful The Being really is. While unanimously maligned but far from under-produced, The Being is a film of filth, as its small Idaho town, Pottsville, hopes to stamp out. A dirty, unshaven detective discovers that the nuclear dumps scattered around the United States might not be as safe as they claim when a slime-covered creature begins terrorizing the townsfolk in traditional horror fashion. The set-up of The Being might seem familiar to you and that's because the schematic was lifted from Jaws. Juggle this: A quiet detective of a small historical town discovers a danger in the community and alerts the mayor, only to incite rebellion from the codger. After several more fall victim to whatever is out there, the mayor then hires a government specialist to debunk all rumors surrounding the event.

The Being might not be strong in either the monster's regard or the gore scale. There is an impressive decapitation in a drive-thru movie theater but that's about as violent as The Being gets, but for a purpose. Later in the film, it's heavily implied, never authenticated, that "The Being" was once a young boy named Michael, whose private hang out was near the dump site. To accompany this is the excellently eerie scenes of the boy's mother, walking the streets at night calling out her lost son's name. This lucid interference of creature feature provides a depth unknown of such a monster film. But this isn't the last of the morose MILF, no, she's later "greeted" by a group of neighborhood bullies. A young boy is pressured to sneak up her door step and slap mud on her pane glass window. It's such a tragedy, The Being. We also glimpse a first person perspective as the creature slinks upstairs, glances at his troubled mother in some psycho-slumber, then it visits Michael's room to allow the camera to wave from left and right. You'll know when the Being is nearby as it leaves a radiated slug trail. Quite disgusting if you ask me. Which brings to mind, you'd think the scientists would wear gloves, at least any form of protected gear when handling this poisonous matter.

As I explained, never confirmed but quite obvious, The Being concerns the typical (when applied) scared beast - the metamorphosis from human to an unsightly condition. Of course the creature is scared and at times it shows through the thick "B" skin of Jackie Kong's debut horror lampooning environmental injustice. To announce the co-star worthy of top billing, Martin Landau plays scientist Garson Jones. Landau's commitment to the film tips the scales in favor of the craft of acting as "Rexx Coltrane", the pseudonym for William Osco, also director Jackie Kong's ex-husband, dilutes the film with his general uncleanness. For further trivia, William Osco was convicted in 1991 of fraud with a maximum sentence of 51 years in prison. Perhaps "Mortimer Lutz" wouldn't have been such a repulsive character had he not been creeping on the attractive diner waitress or live by his lonesome in a seedy trailer. However, the fact that no evidence exists of him bathing probably would make up the better half of his unpleasantness.

The Being isn't the inane, tacky film you'd accredit it towards. Definite tongue-in-cheek humor is applied with zeal - for instance, the scene of the building condemned by the Christian community. Fear of hedonism for a massage parlor to take residence was reverberating throughout the uppity religious folks. What better way to combat sin than to advocate sin, in this case, arson. After a trio of men break in to set fire to the establishment, the ringleader finds a Playboy magazine. After ogling it for quite some time, he stashes it in his jacket. He never gets a chance to masturbate though as he is soon thereafter passed final judgment by the ravenous little boy's toxic conscious. With dashes of surrealism as indicated with Lutz's dream sequence, The Being isn't as mundane as you'd been lead to believe. While I'm not advocating the DIY horror boom and the willingness towards Karo Syrup, The Being is quite intelligent at times and is consistently entertaining. Coming from the same mold as Jaws, The Being didn't inspire my childhood as much as Jaws did (Writing quick shark attack tales laden with breasts & blood), but this film is certainly undeserving of the slander it has been subjected to since day one.

Jacques Baratier (1970)

After by chance discovering his penultimate high-camp quasi-Nunsploitation flick L'araignée de Satin (1984) aka The Satin Spider, I felt it was time to dig up more films by the somewhat wrongfully forgotten French auteur Jacques Baratier (La poupée, Dragées au poivre), which not surprisingly, turned out to be a tedious task, especially where English subtitles were considered, yet I did manage to track down a copy of the froggy filmmaker's blasphemous avant-garde flick Piège (1970) aka Trap aka Die Falle. Featuring a curious cameo by Spanish filmmaker/playwright Fernando Arrabal (Viva la muerte, I Will Walk Like a Crazy Horse) as a prophetic yet perturbing proprietor of an anti-vermin rat poison/trap shop in an exceedingly eccentric epilogue about how the devil used to be a fly but now is a pink pig, Piège is a sacrilegious and sadomasochistic surrealist black-and-white medium-length (running at just under an hour) 'haunted house' flick of the ghost-less expressionistic experimental sort that plays with horror genre conventions just as much as it wantonly wallows in S&M imagery, especially leather and whips. Starring French New Wave divas Bulle Ogier (The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, Maîtresse) and Bernadette Lafont (The Mother and the Whore, Out 1: Spectre) who are invited (or more like demanded to come) to the mansion of a perverse, posh young man and wreak hedonistic havoc not unlike the savagely sweet Slavic ladies of Věra Chytilová's Daisies (1966) aka Sedmikrásk, Piège is a work that falls somewhere in between Salvador Dalí and Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou (1929) aka An Andalusian Dog and Alain Robbe-Grillet and Jacques Rivette's 1970s 'games' films as a sort of satanic cinematic nightmare of fiercely fetishized illusions and delusions that ends in an apocalyptic manner resembling the aftermath of Europa after the Second World War. Featuring ominous rat trap demonstrations, busybody nuns riding bikes in classic nun regalia, safe cracking by way of femme blowtorching, lipstick lezzy BDSM, fetishistic face plastering, and various other forms of sexually-charged pseudo-existentialist eroticism, Piège is certainly a work of its time in that it is an exceedingly experimental work that has not aged as gracefully as other films typical of its time, yet still makes for an entrancing celluloid oddity of sorts. Featuring a delightfully dissident and haunting score by François Tusques (probably best 'remembered' as the man behind the soundtrack of Jean Rollin's The Rape of the Vampire (1968) aka Le viol du vampire) that bares a striking resemblance to some of the more instrumental tracks from the album Only Theatre of Pain (1982) by American deathrock/goth group Christian Death (the singer of the band, Rozz Williams, co-wrote/co-directed and starred in the S&M serial killer short Pig (1998) before committing suicide), Piège is a macabre yet merry modernist horror flick of the kinky Kafka-esque sort (Franz is even name-dropped!) that, when everything is said and done, is too kooky to be creepy, thereupon making it a cultivated carný sideshow that does not know whether it demands respect from the viewer or to offend them, which is certainly a specialty of wacked out maestro Fernando Arrabal, who steals the show as a sort of degenerate street philosopher with too much time on his hands.

A debauched bourgeoisie fellow simply credited as 'Le jeune homme' aka 'the young man' (played by circus performer Jean-Baptiste Thiérrée, whose sole claim to fame is that he married Charlie Chaplin's daughter Victoria Chaplin) walks into a shop entitled "Vermin" looking for traps to use on sexy young girls and gets a lesson or two by the somewhat sinister shop owner (Fernando Arrabal). Arrabal gives the young man a couple demonstrations regarding the efficiency of his traps by using an egg as the bait. Preaching a couple lesson from the commie playbook, Arrabal makes some absurd argument how material objects cannot be stolen, stating, "What can be stolen...Not material things anyway. So if it's not material things, then it's spiritual things...Perhaps, Perhaps...Because you'll have noticed, here we have all kinds of traps. But we don't have hog traps. I'm afraid there isn't something pig-like in this fear of theft." After prying for personal details from the young man and learning that he is a deflowered Taurus, Arrabal arrogantly states to his customer, "I apologize for being so frank with you. But there is a pig, a pink one, inside of you. I've set a trap for you. I told you: Take the machine to kill flies, because the fly is the devil but it was the devil of another era. Now the devil is a pig. A pink pig. Who will look like David Niven. Who will be very elegant. Who will be very, very chic. And that. It is inside of you," which the young twink seems to have no response to upon hearing, as if he is immune to incendiary insults. Meanwhile, two nosey nuns are riding bikes on the street, with one of the holy women stating regarding a girl they are both concerned about, "She's an angel who has too often been possessed by the devil. She's always mixed up in dirty business. There's never the impression, nor the truth besides, that she's told the truth. And what's even stranger is that she's found among thieves. And troublesome elements who aren't even thieves. The underworld who emerge more numerous each day, from the slums of Paris. And who are enraged. She prevents, they say, the students from studying. The workers from working. And they steal." The girl that the two nuns are speaking about is Bulle Ogier (credited as "La seconde voleuse" aka "the second thief") and when she randomly appears on the street as the two spiritual sisters blabber, she pays them no mind and joins her thief cohort Bernadette Lafront ("La première voleuse" aka "the first thief"). Not much later, the jaded young man appears and steals bubbles from a prepubescent little girl, blowing the bubbles in a pretentious manner than only a Frenchman could. While continuing to blow his heart out, the young man pompously and psychopathically demands Bulle and Bernadette's absolute attention, stating, "Listen to me, please. You must come to my place. You really must. I've loads of precious things. Jewels, stones, animals, lots of things. There are no guards there. I don't need, don't like them.

You must come to my place because... Because I want. It's urgent. You must both come. I don't like single women. Here is my card. Anyway, you won't find it. No one does" and then subsequently disappears just as abruptly as he first appeared.

Indeed, beautiful babes Bulle and Bernadette do find the house and instead of knocking on the door like normal people, they invade the place A Clockwork Orange-style and immediately start wrecking it like a bunch of juvenile degenerates who merely destroy for destruction's sake. The girls find a portrait of the young man hanging on a wall and cut out the eyes and his eyes magically appear where holes were cut, as if looking through the two gorgeous yet goofy thief gals' souls. The girls also blowtorch a safe and find a dismembered finger inside, which Bernadette sniffs (it must have smelled good as it seems to give her pleasure). Considering the only thing he does while the girls destroy every inch of his house is watch while hiding amongst the shadows, one at first assumes the young man is simply a masochist voyeur with so much time and money on his hands that he gets a kinky kick from seeing his personal possessions destroyed (after all, material things cannot be stolen, at least according to Arrabal), but he eventually joins Bulle and Bernadette, allowing the girls to make an exaggerated plaster of his face and even putting him in sort of electric chair, thus proving he is truly a masochist, but inevitably the tables turn. In no time, a sharply smirking Bulle is tied to the ground and receives major masochistic pleasure from a leather-bound female dominatrix, who whips the girl for the young man's pleasure. In the end, both Bulle and the young man die when a random explosion occurs, which leaves the two embracing one other in a normal S&M-free fashion that neither of them seemed capable of when they were living, thus making it a most ironically romantic death. In the end, film's unofficial narrator, Arrabal, concludes Piège by stating, "It's a story. You would think it ended badly. He tried to know and he was burned alive. It reminds us of Sodom imprisoned in the castle like Kafka. And the fire arrives. Whereas, he believed it was water, he thought he could fight the fire. It has not been possible. The pig that was in him died. With...the acolytes who had women's heads. Me, I consider this story as a premonitory dream. Although I know nothing of it since I never saw it, nor filmed, nor told it," thus providing an apt analysis for Jacques Baratier's celluloid excursion in sadomasochistic surrealism.

The pseudo-sinister yet stylishly sleazy sadomasochistic tale of two Catholic girls gone wild for the raunchy riches of a pretty boy Lucifer character with an unhealthy obsession with chicks with whips and who has an unshakeable fear of being robbed yet ultimately provokes two cutesy kleptomaniacs to execute that fear thus destroying not only all his material wealth but also himself in the process, Piège is ultimately preposterous enough in its story to be entertaining due to its calculatingly cliché anti-bourgeois sentiments and its rather shallow and stereotyped characters, but more importantly, it features enough exquisite phantasmagoric imagery to keep one's blood pumping until the brutal yet beautiful end. In its keen cinematic combo of the sexually and sacrilegiously absurd, Piège seems like the sort of proto-punk/goth flick Belgian auteur Roland Lethem (La Fée sanguinaire aka The Bloodthirsty Fairy, Le sexe enrage aka The Red Cunt) would have assembled had he decided to be slightly less pornographic in his choice of imagery. Additionally, I would find it hard to believe that director Jacques Baratier did not see the surrealist short La femme 100 têtes (1968)—a work based on Teutonic Dadaist Max Ernst's 1929 collage-novel of the same name that was directed by French auteur Eric Duvivier (son of filmmaker Julien Duvivier)—before directing Piège. If nothing else, Piège is schlock celluloid surrealism that is certainly second (or even third) rate when compared to the best of Luis Buñuel or even Fernando Arrabal, yet still makes for a sweet, cheap treat for the initiated. As I can only assume from watching two of his films, director Jacques Baratier, not unlike fellow froggy French filmmakers Jean-Pierre Mocky (L'Albatros, Litan) and Alain Fleischer (Zoo Zéro, Rome Roméo), is a would-be-master-auteur who manages to straddle the healthy medium between classy and trashy cinematic surrealism, with Piège being a perfect example of this as a work too discernibly derivative to be groundbreaking and too art-addled to be utilized as a cheap masturbation aid. For those that like the sexy celluloid mind games of Alain Robbe-Grillet, but are far too inebriated and/or lazy and need a break from “phenomenological” cinema, Piège makes for a pretty philistine delight that can be defecated out of one's mind just as fast it is swallowed, though some images will certainly stay with you forever. A sort of patently preternatural, apocalyptic parable for the post-WWII generation, Piège also makes for a great risqué romantic comedy for depressed Goths and born-again psychopaths.

THE SATIN SPIDER
THE SATIN SPIDER

Jacques Baratier (1986)

If Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid (La Paloma, Shadow of Angels aka Schatten der Engel) attempted to direct a sub-high-camp lipstick lesbian-themed Nunsploitation flick, it might have resembled the decidedly decadent dandyish dykefest L'araignée de Satin AKA The Satin Spider (1984) directed by French auteur Jacques Baratier and starring Ingrid Caven (who was incidentally Schmid's filmic diva/muse and Fassbinder's ex-wife) and Catherine Jourdan (The Girl on a Motorcycle, Eden and After). Co-penned by French feminist filmmaker Catherine Breillat (Fat Girl, Anatomy of Hell) and based on the marginal 1921 proto-surrealist play Les Détraquées written by Pierre Palau and Polish-French neurologist Joseph Babinski revolving around the murder of a young girl at an all girls school by the principal and her accomplice, which alpha-surrealist André Breton referenced in his iconic novel Nadja (1928), The Satin Spider is a pleasantly politically incorrect combination of sensual Sapphic sleaze, wacky and wanton pop-psychology, macabre diva worship, pseudo-spiritual surrealism, Dietrich-esque teenage drag king debauchery, and other tastelessly tasteful things that is more likely to interest fans of high-camp European arthouse cinema and sadomasochistic Sapphic Gothic girls than art-antagonistic fans of Women in Prison films (WiP) and other forms of Euro-sleaze and exploitation cinema. Although virtually unknown today, The Satin Spider director Jacques Baratier won the Jury Prize at the 1958 Cannes Film Festival for his celluloid fable Goha (1958) starring Omar Sharif and would go on to direct other notable avant-garde works like the campy and surreal sci-fi flick La poupée (1962) and the expressionistic gothic 'game' flick Piège (1970) starring Bulle Ogier and playwright/filmmaker Fernando Arrabal. Baratier's penultimate work before his death in 2009 at the well past ripe age of 91 years old, The Satin Spider is clearly the work of a man who had to sacrifice some of his artistic vision for sex appeal so as to get more perverts into theaters, but one must respect an elderly old school auteur who has the gall to direct a femme fatale-filled film about lethal and lecherous lesbians. A perversely poetic and pathologically phantasmagorical work crammed with lurid, sordid, and sensually sacrilegious themes typical of filmmakers/writers like Alain Robbe-Grillet, Georges Bataille, Walerian Borowczyk, Jean Cocteau, and Fernando Arrabal, among countless others, that unquestionably makes for the perfect double-feature with the abnormally good nunsploitation flick Killer Nun (1978) aka Suor Omicidi starring Anita Ekberg and Joe Dallesandro, but also makes for a bittersweet guilty pleasure for Werner Schroeter fans, The Satin Spider—a perverse period piece set in decadent France right after World War I centering around a kraut carpet-muncher-controlled French Catholic school for girls—brings reasonably superlative style, but not much substance, to lesbo pederasty, aberrant Catholic mysticism, morphine-inspired exorcisms, and molestation-based mental illness.

It is the early 1920s and Madame de Challens (Ingrid Caven) is the hot yet patently pernicious and perverted Aryan headmistress at the French Catholic Les Fauvettes School for Girls and she rather enjoys her job as it gives her the perfect cover for molesting beautiful young girls and converting them to the cock-less world of lipstick lesbianism. Solange (Catherine Jourdan) is the headmistress' semi-butch lover and the gynocentric gym/ballet teacher of the school who sports a bleach blonde dude cut reminiscent of Mia Farrow from Rosemary's Baby (1968) and has an unhealthy addiction to morphine and satin fabric, the latter of which has turned her into a reckless kleptomaniac who cannot help but steal any and every piece of satin she spots in stores. Due to her debilitating satin sickness, Solange has been arrested many times, which has led her to be put under the observation of a perverted psychologist, who wallows in parading around the luscious lezzy in front of his quack soul-doctor friends. When an ebony-haired and large-eyed teenage debutante schoolgirl named Lucienne (Alexandra Syclyna), who lost her Iron Cross-decorated Teutonic father during the Great War and has never been mentally the same since, runs away from the Les Fauvettes School for Girls, she brings back a peculiar police inspector named Levron (Michel Albertini), who questions principal Challens about the dubious suicide of a young pupil who apparently threw herself down a well. A callous and calculating cold cunt ice queen in existentialist hell who lost her 'great love' long ago (she ritualistically places flowers in a vase next to a portrait of herself and her dead girlfriend), Challens wears her innate emotional brutality and bodacious bitchiness on her sleeve, so the inspector concludes she might be a girl-killer when she chalks up the suicide of the child to mere "bad luck."

Things get rather risky in the already radically risqué world of The Satin Spider when a bizarre love triangle develops between principal Challens, gym teacher Solange, and pupil Lucienne, with the former two vying for the attention of the latter when not rubbing bushes with one another. While Challens is busy looking at pornographic portraits she has taken of her pupils, as well as attempting to get into the panties of as many said pupils as possible, Solange takes Lucienne to a magical island mansion via boat, where the two delight in decadent romance. After Lucienne dresses up in ancient knight armor, Solange declares the regalia to be the "perfect chastity belt" and proceeds to sexually "conquer" her "piece by piece." Whilst molesting young lass Lucienne in a melancholy morphine haze, Solange confesses her satin fetish is the result of being raped on a train as a young girl by a man (also played by Michel Albertini) with satin gloves, who ultimately died when the train crashed and whose presence (she constantly dreams/daydreams of him) and sexual prowess has haunted her ever since. Meanwhile, the rest of the girls from the Les Fauvettes School make their way to the mansion on the 'Island of Sand' for a naughty night of nympho hedonism. After Ingrid Caven as Challens gives one of her iconic diva cabaret performances in the merry yet melancholy vein of Schmid's La Paloma (1974) and Fassbinder's Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven (1975), a psychologist declares she has "an alarming urge for self-flagellation," thus associating lesbianism with self-degradation. After Challens' charming camp act, a number of the school-girls put on male suits and slick back their hair, and as debauched drag queens, dance with other girls, eventually (de)evolving into an all out Sapphic orgy of the non-penetrating sort. The next day, Lucienne, who has a propensity for acting erratically and running away, disappears and inspector Levron smells foul play. As later revealed, a quack of a Catholic priest who has an unhealthy obsession with Thomas Aquinas performs an erotic exorcism on Lucienne while the girl lay nude on the altar. While assuming the exorcism was successful due to Lucienne's spastic snake-like movements that eventually result with the melodramatic collapse on the unclad girl, the lost lesbo soul was actually fed an overdose of morphine by Solange and has simply dropped dead. While in an opium-addled psychosis, Solange mistakes inspector Levron, who as an officer of the law has no problems groping the lunatic lezzy with his satin gloves, as the man who raped her long ago, but she is in for a startling surprise when she is arrested for the murder of lovely fallen angel Lucienne. In the end, the Les Fauvettes School for Girls more resembles a lascivious loony bin for lipstick lesbians than a conservative place of Catholic studies.

In what upon superficial glance seems to a banal church scene during the first half of The Satin Spider, the school girls sing the symbolic song lyrics "husband of my soul" while with an icon of Jesus Christ superimposed in the background, thus assumedly insinuating that Catholicism breeds lesbianism while also making for the perfect cover for a cock-celibate crypto-carpet-muncher, thereupon making the film the inverse of the stereotypical homo priest pederasty. Like French auteur Alain Fleischer's phantasmagorical surrealist Zoo zéro (1979), which also starred Catherine Jourdan, and Jean-Pierre Mocky's absurdist horror flick Litan (1980), The Satin Spider is an idiosyncratic celluloid oddity that transcends the typically fine line between cultivated kitsch and cheesy Euro-sleaze, which also makes it a cinematic work with a very marginal audience. Aside from possibly its aberrantly amorous Sapphic sex scenes, The Satin Spider is also bound to offend lesbians, especially of the loony lipstick sort, as it portrays them as intemperate nymphomaniacs suffering from various forms of neurosis. For example, Solange became a Sappho sadist after being brutally raped, thus making her incapable of consummating coitus with men.

Rather surprisingly, the most politically correct book Images in the Dark: An Encyclopedia of Gay and Lesbian Film and Video (1994) gave The Satin Spider a reasonably favorable review, stating of the film, "this psychological suspense drama drips with lesbian sexuality... The plot revolves around the disappearance of a girl and the ensuing police investigation, but it is not the thriller aspect that will interest the viewer but rather its bold, sensuous depiction of women loving women.” Not surprisingly, my girlfriend, who is rampantly and unabashedly heterosexual, found seeing her hero Ingrid Caven groping young girls to be rather revolting and even grotesque, which I cannot blame her for, and one can only assume what the actress’ homosexual ex-husband Rainer Werner Fassbinder would have thought about it had he seen the film. Personally, I enjoyed The Satin Spider simply because Caven stars in the film in such an atypical role, even if she essentially plays the role she always plays; herself, albeit with a lily-licking twist. A gynocentric Gothic psychodrama dripping with Sapphic sensuality and sizzling diva juices, The Satin Spider is like the The Magdalene Sisters (2002) from pussy purgatory meets the retarded but more beautiful stepsister of Day of the Idiots (1981), even if it is not especially sexually explicit in its imagery as a Nunsploitation film like Walerian Borowczyk’s Interno di un convento (1978) aka Behind Convent Walls, but it certainly made me think wounded diva Ingrid Caven should have taken on more seductively Sapphic roles during her acting career.

LOVE ME DEADLY

Jacques Lacerte (1973)

There is no doubt that the death of a loved one and/or a family member can irreparably break someone. I know I have a family member who lost their brother in a car accident when they were a teenager that was so horrific that he had to have a closed casket funeral and this person seems to have never recovered from this tragedy and I say that as a person who was not even born when the tragic event took place. Needless to say, a film that attempts to make a connection between necrophiliac tendencies and the loss of a loved one during childhood is probably in poor taste, if not downright sick and disgusting, yet such a superlatively sleazy and mean-spirited cinematic work does exist. Indeed, the crypto-exploitation flick (I use 'crypto' because it seems that the makers were trying to peddle this as a serious film and not as the exploitation trash that it is) Love Me Deadly (1973) aka Secrets of the Death Room directed by the seemingly pseudonymous trash auteur 'Jacques Lacerte' (which literally translates as 'Jack the Certain') is such a wretched no-class work and on top of being about a young dumb blonde dingbat with fake tits who has a thing for dead dudes that resemble her dead daddy, the film is done in an ostensibly serious soap opera style and seems to target women with daddy issues in a manner not unlike Jonas Middleton's Lewish Carroll-esque hardcore arthouse horror fuck flick Through the Looking Glass (1976), albeit in a much more hokey and horribly kitschy fashion. Now, as a longtime fan of such cinematic corpse-fucking classics as arthouse-splatter flicks like Jörg Buttgerit's NEKRomantik (1987) and NEKRomantik 2 (1991) and Nacho Cerdá's Aftermath (1994), the darkly comedic postmortem-penetrating of Dominique Deruddere's Bukowskian arthouse epic Crazy Love (1987) and Michele Soavi's refreshingly ultra-cynical flesh-eater flick Dellamorte Dellamore (1994) aka Cemetery Man, the obscure Dutch horror flick Necrophobia (1995) co-directed by Frank van Geloven and Edwin Visserand, and even tasteless Euro-sleaze trash like Marijan David Vajda's Mosquito der Schänder (1977) aka Mosquito the Rapist and Joe D'Amato's Beyond the Darkness (1979) aka Buio Omega, I'm no prude and enjoy a good necrophile flick from time to time but a sappy and pseudo-melodramatic cinematic soap that is about as charming as an old fart's cancer-ridden scrotum about cadaver-copulating that was meant to appeal to fans of Dallas and Dynasty about a rather reclusive yet opulent pill-popping uptight bitch and walking-and-talking Barbie doll suffering from a nasty Electra complex set to the unintentionally unsettling über-upbeat retrograde sounds of an original musical by a no-name hack composer like Phil Moody (not to be confused with the one-time member of the rather revolting Brit shit anarcho-pop band Chumbawamba) is just too much aesthetic insipidity for one mensch to take. Indeed, while NEKRomantik 2 is a truly, if not admittedly rather idiosyncratically, romantic film for cinephiles who have read too much poetry by Gottfried Benn and other offbeat romantics, Love Me Deadly is about as romantic as a winter funeral for a prematurely born infant, as a sort of Valley of the Dolls (1967) of necrophile flicks, at least in terms of its grating melodramatic phoniness and obscenely unsympathetic lead, that make the viewer wonder how and why such an inexplicable celluloid abortion was ever so unceremoniously misbegotten on the world. Created by people who paid prostitutes and homo hustlers $50 a pop to do nude scenes and illegally shot around gay XXX theaters, Love Me Deadly is the sort of film that I seriously believe was created by psychopaths and parasites who do not even have a genuine thirst for the forbidden pleasures of the deceased.

Seemingly all-American girl Lindsay Finch (played by Mary Charlotte Wilcox, who not surprisingly appeared in small roles in horrid soap operas like Days of Our Lives and the occasional celluloid horror crud like Eddie Romero's 1971 miscarriage of a movie Beast of the Yellow Night) is a tall blonde North American Nordic beauty with a fancy white Mercedes, breast implants (apparently, the actress' husband was a plastic surgeon), and a bad Benzodiazepine addiction who is so independently wealthy that she need not work and even has a slavish Irish maid, yet she does not 'la dolce vita' because she has serious mental and sexual hang-ups as a result of witnessing her beloved father's tragic death when she was just a little girl. Since she does not have to work or do anything else, Lindsay spends all her time dressing up for funerals and visiting her father's grave. While she could have pretty much any man in Los Angeles, Lindsay prefers freshly embalmed middle-aged male corpses that resemble her daddy dearest. Instead of looking through the love classifieds, Lindsay looks through the obituaries in the local newspapers and attends funerals for dead dudes that seem to match her passed papa's profile where she waits until the funeral service is over to swap fluids with the corpse. When she is not making out with random postmortem men, Lindsay visits her father's grave and literally dances on it, nostalgically daydreams about playing with her father as a child, and denies the mildly aggressive advances of handsome young bachelors, including a blonde stud and born lady's man named Wade Farrow (Christopher Stone of The Howling (1981) and Cujo (1983)), who has his face violently clawed like a cat when he tries to share carnal knowledge with the posh and prissy crypto-necro debutante, as she is a compulsive cocktease who lures men in, only to leave them cold when things get hot and heavy. While calling her a "bitch" and storming out of her house after being so rudely clawed, Wade does not give up on attempting to bone the rich bitch, as his ego thrives on such a forbidden conquest. Unfortunately for him, Wade's obsessive campaign to get in Lindsay's panties will ultimately cost him his life, as his loony object of desire ends up getting involved with a coven of killer necrophiliac satanists and they don't like rampantly heteronormative men stalking around their mortuary.

Ultimately, Lindsay's life of meta-lurid loneliness changes dramatically when she is approached by a sexually morbid mortician named Fred McSweeney (Timothy Scott, who appeared in Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid (1969) and Terrence Malick's 1978 pastoral classic Days of Heaven) who has been spying on her and monitoring her dubious behavior at funeral processions for some time and he decides to confront her after one of the services and attempts to coerce her into joining his satanic necrophilic cult, stating of his cadaver-humping comrades, "they're quite normal people, just with different passions. Our drives and needs aren't understood by many people, so we have to keep them secret. You're not alone. In our group we have several members who...who participate...who enjoy together." Among other things, Fred enjoys cruising for cock-peddlers in the more seedy sides of town and bringing them back to his mortuary (which he tells his victims is a veterinarian hospital) where he embalms them while they are still alive (in a rare moment of comic relief, a homo hustler named 'Billy-Jo' screams, "You're not gay. He's not gay! You're a maniac!", after realizing he is about to die a painful death after being strapped to an embalming table). Luckily, for Lindsay, Fred can procure any corpse she might fancy, but her upper-class uptightness and sexual frigidness (Lindsay will only kiss corpses, not copulate with them) prevents her from initially joining the corpse-fucking convent. After Lindsay makes a failed attempt to join the cult that ends with her running away screaming from Fred's mortuary after she sees the satanic necros ritualistically standing around an unclad corpse in would-be-ominous The Process Church of the Final Judgment-esque hooded cloaks, she decides to attempt to start a normal relationship with Wade, but it does not last long after she meets a wealthy tall, dark, and handsome art gallery owner named Alex Martin (Lyle Waggoner of Wonder Woman starring Lynda Carter fame) whose brother's funeral she attended. Naturally, since he resembles her dead father, Lindsay develops an instant crush on Alex and even spies on him with binoculars, but she is initially too scared to accept his advances. When she does get the gall to date Alex, she and he seem to be genuinely in love, but her necrophiliac tendencies do not die and she ends up going back to Fred's mortuary where she accidentally gets her pal Wade killed via ritualistic necro-murder after he sees her driving down the road and decides to follow her to the building. Indeed, Lindsay is a sort of unwitting femme fatale, as virtually every man in her life ends up dying a grizzly death, so it is almost understandable that she is unhinged enough to bed the dead.

To block out the memory of Wade's gruesome death and ostensibly live a life of domestic normalcy as a housewife, Lindsay accepts Alex's hand in marriage after he proposes to her even though she is completely incapable of loving him and refuses to have sex with him. Needless to say, Alex is quite agitated with the fact that his wife, who he spends tons of money on, will not let him have sex with her, so he decides to spy on her to see if she is cheating on him and ultimately follows her to Fred's mortuary, but when he later attempts to ask Lindsay about what she was doing, she acts completely evasive and attempts to ply him with a new golf bag that she has bought. Upon talking to Lindsay's Irish maid Ms. Pritchard Fischer (Dassa Cates), Alex learns that his lady love has never had a single normal relationship in her entire life and ever since her father died when she was a little girl, she has religiously visited his grave every other day. Upon learning where daddy Finch is buried, Alex takes a drive to the cemetery and finds his wife dancing around her father's grave and singing children's nursery rhymes in a jubilant fashion as if she has the intelligence and self-consciousness of an autistic 4-year-old. Needless to say, Lindsay is horrified when her husband sees her acting like a childish buffoon, so she runs away whilst hysterically screaming "This is not your place, go away!", gets in her Mercedes and drives away in an erratic fashion. When Lindsay later finally agrees to talk to her husband, she calls her maid Pritchard a "prattling old bitch" and forces her husband to fire the old prole even though she has been working for the family for a number of decades. When a postal worker comes by with a certified envelope for Lindsay, Alex signs for it and opens the letter which reveals that Lindsay has been invited to come to the mortuary that night at 10pm by Fred. Instead of sleeping over at his mother's house that night as he originally intended, Alex decides to leave early so he can follow Lindsay to the mortuary to see what she's up to. Needless to say, Alex is quite shocked when he walks in on his unclad wife mounting a cold cadaver while in the company of a coven of naked longhaired hippie satanist degenerates and just after he cries "Oh, God!", Fred stabs him in the stomach and kills him. Now in a borderline comatose state due to her shock over Alex's brutal death, Lindsay remembers a repressed memory of how she killed her father when she was a little girl after she picked up his antique gun and accidentally shot him with it, hence her necrophiliac tendencies. Doubly guilty that she also unwittingly caused the death of the man she married, Lindsay takes out her seething rage and anguish on Fred, who she brutally bludgeons to death with a small statue after he thoughtfully prepares Alex's corpse so that she can copulate with it. In the end, Lindsay gets in bed with and assumedly has sex with her husband for the first time, though I doubt the sex is good because trying to insert a cold and limp corpse cock into a vagina is probably like attempting to shove a marshmallow into a keyhole.

Notably, the Code Red DVD release of Love Me Deadly features an audio commentary track with the film's producer and production manager Buck Edwards, who seems like a super sleazy scumbag but he also reveals a lot about the production. On top of mockingly muttering, "I've gotta think of my daddy now because I'm upset. Ohhhh, think of my daddy. My daddy understood, my daddy knew me," like a deranged toddler during a scene where the protagonist is grieving over her dead daddy even though he is an elderly old man, Edwards attempts to blame the director Jacques Lacerte's admittedly inept direction, as well as Gerard Damiano's porn chic classic Deep Throat (1972), which apparently premiered in theaters the same day as Love Me Deadly, for the abject commercial and critical failure of the film, as if the necrophilic melodrama ever had a chance of ever becoming a success in the first place. Edwards also brags about the various dubious ways he saved money on the production, including making a donation to Anton LaVey's Church of Satan so that some of its members would appear as extras during the funeral scene at the very beginning of the film (interestingly, Edwards, who appears in the film as one of coven members and even grabs lead actress Mary Charlotte Wilcox's unclad derriere at the end of the film, resembles a short and pudgy version of LaVey due to his similarly sleazy Semitic demeanor and devilish goatee), stealing shots in front of a XXX fag fuck theater, paying young male and female prostitutes $50 a pop to strip down for a satanic orgy scene, and conning a negress front-door attendant, who briefly appears in the film, at a real-life black mortuary into allowing him to film a scene there while an actual funeral was going on. Undoubtedly, after listening to the quite 'insightful' audio commentary, I have to say that the the film's production history and producer Edwards, who seems to be the real 'auteur' of the film (Lacerte was a high school theater teacher with no previous film directing experience who more or less worked on the production as a hired hack, hence the film's incessant use of banal medium shots), seem to be more creepy, evil, and revolting than all the satanic sexual rituals and necrophilia featured in Love Me Deadly.

Aside from Edwards, H. B. Halicki—the Polish-American stuntman who wrote, directed, produced, and starred in the original 1974 Gone in 60 Seconds (which Hebraic hack producer Jerry Bruckheimer later produced a singularly horrendous big budget remake of in 2000 starring Nicholas Cage and Angelina Jolie) and died while shooting a stunt during the aborted 1989 sequel Gone in 60 Seconds 2—acted as an associate producer for Love Me Deadly, though it seems his only involvement in the film was putting money up for it. Sort of like Alfred Hitchcock's Marnie (1964) meets Buttgerit's NEKRomantik 2 meets the bizarre 'blood horror' exploitation flick The Black Room (1983) co-directed by Norman Thaddeus Vane and Elly Kenner with a tinge of Nunnally Johnson's The Three Faces of Eve (1957) and Lynne Stopkewich's Kissed (1996), albeit not even marginally as interesting as it sounds, Love Me Deadly is excellent evidence of the cheap and pathetic parasitic lows that exploitation hacks were willing to go to during the 1970s to make a quick buck and thus makes for a vaguely entertaining lowbrow celluloid affair as a result. Of course, as Buttgerit's oeuvre readily demonstrates, when it comes to celluloid corpse-fucking art, a labor of love will always beat Semite-produced exploitation swill when it comes to creating a truly remarkable and aesthetically pleasing piece of cinematic necrophilia. Indeed, Love Me Deadly is hardly a work that demonstrates any sort of respect for the living, let alone the dead.

MERRY-GO-ROUND

Two and a half hour long improvised post-French New Wave flicks featuring live avant-garde jazz music and swarthy dorks with pervert mustaches are not exactly my cup of tea. In fact, such an aesthetic prospect seems downright dreadful to me, yet I recently managed to watch one such work, Merry-Go-Round (1981) aka L'engrenage directed by Jacques Rivette (Celine and Julie Go Boating aka Céline et Julie vont en bateau, Duelle), for admittedly rather superficial reasons. Indeed, my sole interest in seeing Rivette's free celluloid jazz anti-mystery-crime-thriller is because it stars lapsed Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro (Flesh, Blood for Dracula) and drugged-out bisexual bitch Maria Schneider (Last Tango in Paris, The Passenger) in the two lead roles of a film that was supposed to be a magical work featuring two arthouse counter-culture icons uniting for a special moment in cinema history but ultimately proved to be a bit of a nasty nightmare for virtually everyone involved with it, especially in regard to the two leads and the director. Aside from possibly Louis Malle's pre-apocalyptic Carroll-esque fantasy flick Black Moon (1975) and the rather obscure high-camp work Queen Lear (1982) directed by one-time Swiss auteur Mokhtar Chorfi, Merry-Go-Round is undoubtedly the strangest work Dallesandro has ever worked on, yet it also features the Italian-American sex icon at his greatest and most naturalistic in terms of where his certainly singular acting is concerned. Directed by arguably the most ambitious and hopelessly avant-garde filmmaker associated with the French New Wave who is noted for the exceedingly long running times of his films (his fourth feature, Out 1: Noli me tangere (1971) aka Out 1: Don't Touch Me, is nearly 13 hours long, though he released a 4 ½ cut under the title Out 1: Spectre in 1972), Merry-Go-Round was described by auteur Rivette as his "worst film," and indeed, it is certainly a curiously convoluted and ludicrously labyrinthine epic mess of a movie, yet it is a strangely captivating mess of a movie nonetheless that demonstrates that a failed film directed by a masterful filmmaker is almost always more worthwhile than an immaculately assembled work directed by a for-hire hack. A work that seems like it was edited in the style of the literary 'cut-up' technique used by William S. Burroughs (interestingly, one of the two jazz musicians featured in Merry-Go-Round, Barre Phillips, would later contribute to the soundtrack of David Cronenberg's adaptation of Burroughs' Naked Lunch), Rivette's shockingly enthralling filmic failure is a work that weaves in and out of fairytale-like dream-sequences without warning and features a series of triple-crosses, mysterious characters with dubious backgrounds claiming to be people they are not, and a tragic end that was only natural for an ultimately tragic film production that could have been a unique masterpiece of French cinema but is now nothing more than a peculiar footnote in one already mystifying filmmaker's history.

MERRY-GO-ROUND

While Maria Schneider was the one responsible for approaching director Rivette (who thought Little Joe was “magnificent in Morrissey’s trilogy”) and professing that she would love to star in a film with Joe Dallesandro, she was also the one that was probably most responsible for destroying Merry-Go-Round, which the mentally unstable French actress quit before it was even finished (a stand-in, Hermine Karagheuz of Out 1, was used to replace Schneider in the dream-sequences so that the film could be completed), though the director apparently started to lose his mind and began to suffer what would be his second nervous breakdown (the director suffered a breakdown in 1975 just a couple days into shooting his previous production Histoire de Marie et Julien aka The Story of Marie and Julien, which he would later successfully direct in 2003). Indeed, as Dallesandro revealed in the book Joe Dallesandro: Warhol Superstar, Underground Film Icon, Actor (2011) written by Michael Ferguson regarding the chaos of the production: “Rivette was going nutty, and Maria was attempting suicide, and so my crack-up [motorcycle injury] gave us a week to calm down and get it together. Rivette was trying to make this movie last forever—we shot a ton of footage—and it was turning out to be one of those twenty-four hour movies. In fact, when the producers wanted the film to end, because they thought Jacques had lost his mind, they came to me and said, ‘Joe, you gotta tell him it’s over.’ Maria had already walked off [...] I had to say I can’t go on making a movie in which all the other people have left and gone home and you’ve still got me in it. ‘It’s over, Jacques, We gotta stop.’” Indeed, as its title unwittingly reveals (there was originally supposed to be an amusement park scene, but it was never actually shot), Merry-Go-Round, which was shot in 1978 but not released until 1984, is an absurdly aimless work that literally goes around in circles, with a good portion of the film featuring Little Joe running around in the woods for seemingly no apparent reason in what prove to be dream-sequences. In fact, Dallesandro has less than pleasant memories of shooting those scenes, recollecting regarding his experience in Michael Ferguson’s biography: “We worked on the film for so many weeks, and they kept shooting these scenes where I was running. Running, running, running. It got so bad that I wasn’t even aware Maria had left the picture. She was so far away during these endless scenes that I had no idea they’d replaced her with a double. That’s when I really understood that this movie could go on forever. If they’d have replaced me with a double, they’d still be out there shooting.” An impenetrable story revolving around greed about an American crook who tries in vain to be a hero, his M.I.A. French girlfriend’s strange sister, the mysterious death of her father in a plane crash, and the dubious disappearance of $20,000,000 francs, Rivette’s mystifying celluloid misstep is a cognitive-dissonance-inspiring work that ultimately brings up more questions than answers as it progresses in a spastically non-linear fashion that defies cinematic-logic.

Benjamin Phillips (Joe Dallesandro) receives a telegram in the middle of the night from his estranged girlfriend Elisabeth/Lisa (Danièle Gégauff) telling him to fly out to Paris to meet her at a hotel called Sofitel Roissy, but when he gets there, she is nowhere to be found. Instead, Ben bumps into his girlfriend's rather peculiar sister Léo Hoffmann (Maria Schneider), who was also told by Lisa to meet her at the hotel, even though they have not seen each other in some four years. Not long after meeting each other for the first time, Léo takes Ben to a graveyard to see if Lisa might be visiting the grave of their father David Hoffmann, who may or may not have been killed in a plane crash and whose corpse is not actually in the ground. After missing Lisa by 15 minutes at the graveyard, Ben and Léo nonsensically receive a phone call from her at a pay phone in the middle of a seemingly abandoned train station. When the two meet Lisa at the two girls' deceased father's mansion, it becomes quite apparent that a criminal conspiracy is under way to steal patriarch David Hoffmann's large fortune. Indeed, Lisa tells her sister Léo that she believes that their father is not really dead and that she hopes to steal papa's fortune as she believes it is her birthright. After Lisa is hauled away to a loony bin at about the 30-minute mark of the film, Merry-Go-Round begins to degenerate into the sort of innate cinematic incoherency that could have only been artistically sired by a funny fellow suffering from a major mental breakdown as was clearly the case for Rivette while working on the film. Although nothing is as it seems, what is for sure is that Ben is involved in a conspiracy to get frog patriarch David Hoffmann's cash and he and his comrades apparently have the key to get it. Of course, Ben faces a moral dilemma when he has to decide whether he is more interested in the missing fortune or saving his girlfriend's Lisa's life. One of Ben's accomplices is a seemingly sinister and surely flaky lady with a rather unappealing dyke haircut named Shirley (Sylvie Matton), who is apparently the American crook's sister (though she may or may not also be David Hoffmann's ex-mistress and Lisa's best friend). As Léo confesses, she hates her ostensibly belated father and has essentially been emancipated from him since the age of 13 when her late mother died from a complication relating to diabetes, thus she knows less about her family's fortune than outsiders like Ben and Shirley. A virtual cuckold of his big sis, Ben confesses to Léo that Shirley lost all her "great respect" for him after he was once busted for car theft (incidentally, this happened to Dallesandro in real-life during his pre-Warhol years), as he proved to be a shitty thief, thus he wants to prove to his sibling that he can do much better now. Indeed, if there is a common theme in Merry-Go-Round, it is that all the characters have rather troubled and just plain bizarre relationships with their siblings/families, with greed being the main reason for familial disharmony.

For a good portion of Rivette's seemingly never-ending celluloid anti-amusement ride, Ben and Léo hang out in a variety of abandoned homes and mansions that range from luxurious and merely unoccupied to totally dilapidated abodes with wild plants growing inside them. While the viewer assumes that counter-culture sex icons Joe Dallesandro and Maria Schneider will eventually hook-up and engage in rather passionate and even otherworldly carnal pleasures, as it seems like the main point for such a strategically cast film, they never do much more than frivolously flirt and their relationship inevitably becomes as erratic as the film's increasingly incoherent (non)plot. Notably, while Dallesandro and Schneider got along splendidly before shooting the film, the actress began to hate her friend when shooting for Merry-Go-Round began, or as the Warhol Superstar later revealed in an interview with Ferguson: "Me and Maria were best of buddies before we started the movie. As soon as we started the movie, though, Maria hated my guts. Don't know where it came from. I did nothing to her. I'm the charming, wonderful person I always am. And I still kept the film going. She had a girlfriend at the time, which I never interfered with. She was never a love interest of mine. I just respected her as an actress, you know? I loved her work. I loved that she took my hero, Marlon Brando, and brought him back to life." Considering Schneider was wasted on drugs and probably had a jealous girlfriend (what dyke would not be jealous of the fact that their bisexual girlfriend is working on a film with Little Joe?!), there were probably a number of reasons for her seemingly irrational hatred towards her American co-star. Either way, this strange and distinctly female hatred certainly bleeds through the film in an exceedingly effective way that would make any male viewer feel very afraid of Schneider's womanly wrath.

Despite their troubled relationship on and off the set of the film, Dallesandro and Schneider certainly have a wildly idiosyncratic form of chemistry in Merry-Go-Round that is one of a handful of things that makes the film worth seeing. While Ben initially attempts to get in Léo's pants by doing childish things like taking his hair out of a ponytail for her, by the end of the film he is attempting to kill her, at least in his own mind (he shoots at her on a beach during one of the film's various dream-sequences). Indeed, the film features a number of seemingly nonsensical scenes that ultimately prove to be dream-sequences of Ben and his non-lover chasing each other in forests and on beaches, with packs of wild dogs, snakes, and medieval knights in shining armor attempting to kill them when they are not trying to kill each other. Back in reality, Ben becomes the unwitting victim of a number of double and even triple-crosses that make him seem like a small-time American philistine criminal who cannot compare to the grand majesty of frog-style white-collar gangster tactics. As Ben reveals to Léo, he has always dreamed of being an effete aristocrat who spends his evenings enjoying decadent candlelight dinners, as a fellow that, "always wanted much more...needed much more," but he lacks the psychopathy to obtain such an unbecoming goal for an uncultivated American. Ironically, Ben's lack of class and sophistication makes him seem like the only even remotely empathetic character in the entire film, as the other characters seem like calculating upper-class psychopaths who more or less reflect every negative character trait one can think of regarding posh and pompous frogs. In the end, Ben loses his lady love Lisa after she is killed via sniper, which infuriates Léo so much that she goes insane and kills a wacky psychic named Mr. Danvers (played by Maurice Garrel, French junky auteur Philippe Garrel's father), who is pretending to be her deceased father. Indeed, Léo has what some might call an anti-Eleçtra complex. Of course, Merry-Go-Round is the sort of film that demands an absurdly tragic ending where virtually every character has a hole burnt into their already forsaken souls.

Despite the handful of negative things that Joe Dallesandro had to say about working with the somewhat unhinged French director, Jacques Rivette had nothing but good things to say about the American sex icon, once stating in 2007 in an interview with Les Inrockuptibles regarding the difference between working with the ex-Superstar and dope-addled diva Maria Schneider on Merry-Go-Round: "Without going overboard, I felt like Billy Wilder waiting for Marilyn [Monroe] to get ready without ever being certain that she'd actually show up. Very quickly, Joe understood that he'd get nothing out of this film. The relation with the production was very tense, we had a lot of illness crop up at the onset of the shoot. But he had a kindness to him, and an impeccable seriousness. Total respect for Joe Dallesandro." Also, total respect for Monsieur Rivette as well, as he at least had the balls to admit where his film went wrong, or as he stated in the May-June 1981 issue of Cahiers du Cinéma regarding the legacy of the work: "With MERRY-GO-ROUND everything changed. It's an exaggeration to say that we placed Maria and Joe together in front of the camera and waited to see what would happen. We had a starting point, of course, and then we made up the beginning of a story, with a father who had disappeared, but all along we told ourselves, this is just a pretext for Maria and Joe to get to know each other [...] But since the relationship between Maria and Joe rapidly became hostile, we were forced to develop the story-line; from a mere pretext it took on a disproportionate importance. Maybe that gives the film a certain vagabond charm, I don't know, but it really is a film with a first half-hour that's quite coherent, and then it searches for itself three times, three times searches for a way out." Indeed, never have I heard an auteur be so honest and precise regarding why his film does not work, but then again, Joe and Maria's real-life antagonistic relationship gives Merry-Go-Round a certain distinctly delightful, if not rather bittersweet, flavor that manages to work in some way. Additionally, Rivette's film is also a rather aesthetically pleasing work that in parts, especially during the dream-sequences and the various scenes when Joe and Maria play around abandoned mansions like naïve children discovering love for the first time, seems like a sort of evil fairytale for adults directed by a mystical-minded mad man who attempted to direct a sexy crime-mystery-thriller and got lost somewhere along the way. Even with a cinematic misfire like Merry-Go-Round, it is easy to see that Jean-Luc Godard was right when he said of his cinematic compatriot: "someone like Rivette who knows cinema so much better than I shoots seldom, so people don't speak of him...if he had made 10 films he would have gone much farther than I."

BEYOND LOVE AND EVIL

Jacques Scandolari (1971)

Naturally, the philosophy of the Marquis de Sade and beatnik bullshit were bound to be mixed at some point during the 1970s in some sort of psychedelic/psycho-sexual movie miscreation and French fag pornographer Jacques Scandolari (Victims of Vice (1978) aka Brigade mondaine, Monique (1978) aka New York After Midnight)—a man who later direct a little film entitled New York City Inferno (1978) aka Cock Tales featuring men shoving their meat-poles in the meat-holes of other men as a large bloody animal carcass dangles above them—was probably the right man for the filthy froggy job. With his absurdly aberrant X-rated surrealist art-sploitation flick Beyond Love and Evil (1971) aka La philosophie dans le boudoir—a work extremely loosely based on de Sade’s work of literary philosophical eroticism Philosophy in the Bedroom (1795) aka La Philosophie dans le boudoir, which argued that post-revolution France would return to a monarchic state if it did not adopt a libertine ideology—Scandolari proved his delightfully deviant dedication to every and any form of mystifying sexual debauchery to the point where it puts the relatively passive sexual looseness of the hippie movement to shame in its loathsome libertinage, even if the film does not feature a single scene of real sexual penetration. Also cinematically adapted by Spanish sleaze-auteur Jess Franco no less than three times, including the cinematic works Eugenie, The Story of Her Journey into Perversion (1969), Eugenie de Sade (1970), and Eugenie: The Story of a Perversion (1980), as well as by Italian auteur Aurelio Grimaldi as L’educazione sentimentale di Eugenie (2005), Scandolari’s La philosophie dans le boudoir certainly rapes the crude competition as a loony libertine work of minor yet rather idiosyncratic aesthetic elegance that makes one wonder why the French filmmaker’s career stagnated over time to the point where, when not producing blue movies for sodomites, he was making third rate exploitation flicks of the surely forgettable sort. Sort of like Fellini Satyricon (1969) meets Beyond the Valley of the Dolls (1970) meets Luminous Procuress (1971) except more conspicuously and unwaveringly “evil” and decidedly decadent in its charming yet somewhat cheap celluloid excess, Beyond Love and Evil is indubitably a product of its particular cultural zeitgeist, to the point of being somewhat outmoded as an anti-authoritarian counter-culture work, especially considering its psychedelic special effects, repellently flamboyant cocksucker costumes and cosmetics, and incessant playing of the main guitar riff from Iron Butterfly’s 1968 hit “In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida,” thus the film almost acts as an unintentional parody of the Marquis de Sade’s philosophies due to its erratic extremeness, which is not exactly a bad thing, at least as long as you can handle bad celluloid trips of the anachronistic and anarchistic sort where lovely ladies please themselves by rubbing squids on their spunk-pots and depraved aristocrats derive grand pleasure from using the dirty bath water of hysterical hippie negresses. Indeed, there is not true love nor anything resembling a moral compass in Beyond Love and Evil—a celluloid tale of a bizarre love triangle in a grandiose neo-Grand Guignol gutter.

Posh pretty boy Zenoff (Lucas de Chabaneix), who looks like a slightly less effete version of pedomorphic Hollywood actor Ezra Miller, is a dandy-esque yet rather restrained dude who is in love with an older and much more debauched dame of the blonde beastess sort named Xenia (Souchka), who has moved on to bigger things and is planning to marry an intellectually pedantic, libertine megalomaniac/false messiah of the rather wealthy yet raunchy sort named Yald (Fred Saint-James). Of course, being unaware that his horny hag lover Xenia is about to be married to a psychopathic charlatan, poor Zenoff is in for quite the surprise when he shows up to the couple's mischievous mansion of madness—a perturbing and putrid palace of perversion where women merrily masturbate with slimy squids and fish, wild buck-naked negroes sic German shepherds on unclad and unhinged bitches, Neanderthal-like beast-men rape women for the pleasure of vicious voyeuristic party guests, lanky long-haired fag twinkles wearing nothing but fishnets are whipped by Negro fag drag queens, and countless other decidedly distasteful things that are apparently quite savory to sexual sadists looking for a new kinky kick. Needless to say, Zenoff is turned off by Xenia's strikingly sick salaciousness and her seemingly brainwashed mind, but he especially loathes yahoo Yald as the old geezer quite brazenly brags about his wealth and wild wantonness as a self-appointed nihilist prophet. As Yald tells Zenoff after the younger lad states his disapproval of his lecherous lifestyle, "I find you a victim of your stifling environment...totally unreasonable and without personal individual judgment. I'm past that and I don't care what others think of me. Their opinions are meaningless to me...Their morality a farce. I only care for what gratifies me. And the great point is I am able to afford it." A young man not willing to take no for an answer, especially after being told by Yald to keep his hands off his girl, Zenoff essentially rapes Xenia in the forest after wrestling with her in a pond, but she ultimately rather enjoys it and the two wander around the woods naked like a hyper-horny hippie Adam and Eve, thus making it seem like their past romantic connection has been restored, but the young man has no clue to what degree his would-be-soul-mate has been tainted by her soon-to-be hubby's wicked worldview where senseless sub-erotic excess always comes before true love.

Unfortunately, all good things must come to an end and Xenia ends up wedding Yald during a seemingly Satanic/Crowleyite marriage ceremony that concludes with the couple committing communal coitus before their disciples. For sexually ravaging his woman before the wedding night, Yald offers Zenoff to play a fateful game where he must pick out who Xenia is among a number of women hidden in Cocteau-esque masks, which he loses, thus forcing him to become the student of his archenemy. After submitting to Yald in a homoerotic game involving sharp knives and superlatively gay hippie pants, Zenoff drives a dagger into the elder man's gut, thereupon sending him straight to hell. A cold cunt who has just inherited a fortune and a aristocratic chateau full of sexual servants, Xenia does not seem too sad about Yald's premature death via phallogocentric penetration, yet she decided to carry on her short-lived husband's legacy and Zenoff becomes a spiritual cuckold of sorts as a slave of the deranged de Sadian pseudo-religion. Concluding in a fiendish and unintentionally farcical fashion that seems like a parody of the end of Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) in its assortment of extravagant torture scenarios, Beyond Love and Evil ultimately works great as a campy comedy of the carnally crazy sort, but is virtually impossible to take literally, although I must admit that I rather appreciated the cinematic work's rather rare and uncompromising 'evil and perversion conquers all' message. In the end, old Yald's legacy of sexual brutality reigns as his widow Xenia puts Zenoff through a libertine regiment that forever changes him and then kicks out the door, leaving the poor lover boy with her colder-than-a-sad-Somalian-in-Alaska words: "We played a game. You have lost and you will forever be conditioned by the principles Yald taught. Instilling them in you has been my revenge for his murder. You are full of cravings and desires that can never be satisfied anywhere else on earth except here with me. I don't want you...I despise you for your sentimentality. That weakness you call love. I have already forgotten you have ever existed...That I ever knew you. You will remember me with bitterness...everyday of your life." Indeed, Beyond Love and Evil—for better or worse—is certainly a film that goes 'beyond love and evil,' as erotic (or more like 'anti-erotic') excess triumphs over everything else, especially anything resembling conventional human emotion. Undoubtedly, Beyond Love and Evil is surely a film for those who think of the Manson family as opposed to Woodstock when they think of cultural highlights of the late-1960s counter-culture era, as the film may feature mass orgies and LSD-tinged debauchery, but certainly nothing as banal as commie peace and love.

Since the American English edit of Beyond Love and Evil, which was edited by a clearly non-French fellow named Stan Rosenthal, was the only version of Jacques Scandelari's film I could find, I can only wonder how the original French version differs, but judging by the absurdly inane and oftentimes mundane melodramatic dialogue of the Yank version, I assume it was butchered for the curious consumption of deadhead and braindead hippies and other Amero-mutt rabble. Since I did have the opportunity to view Jacques Scandelari's masterpiece of hardcore man-on-man mayhem and lurid leather-fag celluloid grit Cock Tales (1978) aka New York City Inferno—the virtual missing link between Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964) and William Friedkin's Cruising (1980), except all the more sexually explicit and sensually sadistic—which is totally uncompromising from beginning to end and does not wallow in ridiculous dialogue, I would assume that the English version of Beyond Love and Evil has been made more palatable for philistines and porn addicts. Of course, being a work that mainly focuses on foul fetishism and that features nil scenes of real unsimulated sex, Beyond Love and Evil will probably prove to be a major disappointment for virginal gorehounds looking for mere visual vice of the terribly trite variety. Featuring dismembered Hans Bellmer-esque pubescent doll statues and a variety of decadent surreal pop-art, on top of endless scenes of sophisticated sensual savagery, Beyond Love and Evil is undoubtedly an aesthetically penetrating, if not sometimes plainly passé, experience of pervasive psychedelic/psycho-sexual depravity that bows to no one's morals, not even the Marquis de Sade himself. With its antagonistic atheistic message of advocating one to exercise, as opposed to exorcise, one's demons, as well as its less than socially liberal message of master morality over slave morality, Beyond Love and Evil is also a virtual recruitment video for the Church of Satan, except with more interesting rituals and more elaborate and intriguing aesthetics. If there is anything to be learned from watching Scandelari's scandalous piece of surrealist cinematic sensuality Beyond Love and Evil, it is that stern ideologies, even those grounded in worshipping immorality, are radically repressive and can turn charming twinkles into slavish cry baby toddlers. If you're looking for a rare celluloid treat that manages to blur the line between arthouse and exploitative celluloid trash, few films compare to Beyond Love and Evil—the closest thing to a porn flick in the spirit of Friedrich Nietzsche, Charles Manson, the Cockettes (rather unfortunately) and, of course, the Marquis de Sade.

BRIGADE MONDAINE

Jacques Scandolari (1978)

If any filmmaker restored my faith in exploitation cinema, it is undoubtedly the assumedly pseudonymous French auteur Jacques Scandolari, a man who essentially turned cinematic sleaze, sacrilege, and sodomy into a vogue and seductive art form, at least for those few lucky individuals familiar with his work. Adapting a novel by the Marquis de Sade to a strangely fitting psychedelic setting with Beyond Love and Evil (1971) aka La philosophie dans le boudoir and concocting probably the most seedy and sleazy yet artsy sadomasochistic leather-fag flick ever assembled with New York City Inferno (1978) aka Cock Tales, Scandolari surely had a sharp, striking, and singular vision that stood out among his mostly artistically meritless cinematic compatriots. Amazingly, Scandolari managed to direct at least three of his greatest films—New York City Inferno (1978), Monique (1978) aka Flashing Lights aka New York After Midnight, and Victims of Vice (1978) aka Brigade mondaine—in a single year, but essentially quit filmmaking after that, only going on to direct the occasional short 'serious' documentary like Baryshnikov's Gaiete Parisienne (1988) for the BBC. Out of all of his films, Brigade mondaine—the first of three films featuring a soundtrack by popular frog disco producer Cerrone and based on a series of then-popular trashy crime novels of the same name—is probably Scandolari's most accessible and 'conventional' work, which is in part due to its lack of gay pornography and homoerotic imagery, as well as its incessant appearances by totally nude and under-the-influence women, but also because it is a fairly 'conventional' sort of 'Kojak meets Abel Ferrara meets Miami Vice' storyline. Like all of Scandolari's works, Brigade mondaine is almost virtually impossible find today and it is doubtful that it will ever be released in any form home format ever again, especially in North America (where it has never had a home media release). In fact, the 'hardcore disco' soundtrack by Cerrone is much more popular today than the film is. Opening with a blonde babe who is high as a kite being blown away with a shotgun by a mysterious individual of the seemingly feminine sort wearing a ski mask and a leatherjacket, Brigade mondaine is a totally titillating, thrilling, and tasteless yet suavely assembled cinematic tale set in Paris, France featuring quasi-corrupt cops into strippers and sadomasochism, voyeuristically debauched aristocrats who are into gazing at infantile modern art and pancake makeup and SS regalia-sporting prostitutes humping Scorpio Rising-esque motorcycles, designer drugs that heighten orgasms but ultimately enslave and brain damage the user, sneaky snake boyfriends who sell their girlfriends into sex slavery via drug/prostitution rings, and what is probably the only disco soundtrack in all of cinema history that does not inspire the viewer to want to jump out of a window in relief like anti-hero Alex from Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange (1971), Brigade mondaine is a virtual celluloid night club from late-1970s

During the first couple minutes of Brigade mondaine, a beautiful blonde chick wearing nothing but a raincoat is killed by a masked assailant in fetishistic black leather. When the ravishing victim falls down to her premature death, her raincoat gratuitously swings open and her blood-soaked and now-unclad body is exposed for the world to see in a scene of overwhelming vulnerability that sums up the essence of Brigade mondaine. To his rather strange over excitement, an oversexed and overworked police sergeant in the vice squad named Boris Corentin (Patrice Valota) is assigned to homicide to discover the dubious drug-related death of the shotgun bullet-riddled blonde. It must be a really personal case for Boris because he is a sadomasochist who is into strikingly rough sex, especially choking, and blonde 'sex workers,' and the wanton and drug-addled babe that was killed was just his type. Through his spectacular detective work, Boris learns a ecstasy-like drug has hit the streets that initially intensifies orgasms but eventually turns the user into a braindead zombie who "takes pleasure in his/her degradation," which makes for the perfect slave for a prostitution ring, which the blonde murder victim was part of. Meanwhile, a naive young girl named Micheline (Odile Michel in her second film role, who started her acting career quite differently with Diane Kurys' Peppermint Soda (1977) aka Diabolo menthe) starts a seemingly magical and heavenly relationship with a half-gay-like hairdresser named Patrick Morel (Patrick Olivier), a character who seems to be modeled after Manson Family victim Jay Sebring, a seedy Hollywood hairdresser that was deeply immersed in the drug/crime world. While promising her everything plus the world, Patrick soon has Micheline engaging in a unhealthy ménage à trois with his dyke hairdresser compatriot Peggy (Marie-Georges Pascal) and before she knows it, the terrible twosome make the formerly wholesome girl a druggie sex slave. Eventually, Micheline is forced by her kidnapers to take the name "Chloé" and she becomes the erotic plaything of a debauched and nearly elderly aristocratic and art collector named Count Paul-Henri Vaugoubert de Saint-Loup (Jacques Berthier). When Sergeant Boris finally discovers the pernicious involuntary prostitution of young girls by Patrick and Peggy, as well as Count de Saint-Loup's role, he absurdly asks his stripper/porn star girlfriend Anne (Florence Cayrol) to be his "goat" in the Hindi sense in a precarious plot twist that only gets all the more ridiculous as the film progress. A totally titillating temptress, Anne has no problem enticing de Saint-Loup, especially after doing some 'performance art' in the form of wearing nothing but a SS officer's hat and G-string while humping a motorcycle and animal furs. Quite infatuated with his new catch, the corrupt Count even gives his sex slave Chloé to Anne as a present, which ultimately leads to his demise and Mistress Micheline's inevitable escape from being a somewhat involuntary victim of vice.

to similarly themed Hollywood films, is the film's almost complete and utter lack of a moral compass as a wildly wanton and ridiculously morally reckless work that features a less than thin line between good guys and bad guys, hence the its porn-like alternate title Victims of Vices, which calls into question who are/is the victim(s) and whether or not they are a victim of vice and/or the victim of the police vice squad. Featuring a conspicuously corrupt cop who virtually prostitutes his stripper girlfriend, who herself seems to enjoy her uncover work a little bit too much, just to crack a criminal case, as well as a victim who enjoys the vice, including lesbianism and starring in pornography, until it gets a bit too spicy, Brigade mondaine works best as an ostensibly intentionally soulless yet succulently stylized piece of sexy celluloid sleaze that acts as one of the most unflatteringly honest depictions of its libertine post-hippie era. Created in the wake of the death of the so-called 'sexual revolution,' Brigade mondaine portrays the natural brutal byproducts of an intrinsically intemperate zeitgeist that tried to pass off self-indulgent hedonism and reckless 'romantic' sexual relationships as serious and liberating political idealism of the 'New Left' as schemed by hostile Hebrews like Herbert Marcuse. Of course, the cocaine and popper-fueled disco subculture that reached its peak in popularity during the late 1970s acted as the final nail in the coffin for the imaginary utopia of 'peace and love' and confirmed what the sexual revolution was really about: cheap and shallow sex, the death of the family and traditional romantic relationships, unquenchable materialism and lack of true spirituality, and all around mindless self-indulgence at any cost. Of course, like victim Micheline of Brigade mondaine, one inevitably becomes more deleteriously enslaved to sex, drugs and rock n roll (or in this case, disco) than they ever would be by religion. A forgotten minor master of cinematic libertinage, Jacques Scandelari, not unlike seedy celluloid surrealist Alberto Cavallone (Blue Movie, Blow Job), was an idiosyncratic exploitation filmmaker whose unfortunately rather small oeuvre is infinitely more interesting than revered exploitation hacks like Jesús Franco and Joe D'Amato, who for every decent film they made, have twenty more that have made a mockery of their trade. While not Scandelari's greatest effort, Brigade mondaine proves, if nothing else, that dark disco music and topless seductresses with totenkopfs emblems on their S&M SS hats can make for one hell of a cheap yet captivating celluloid cocktail. Forget Saturday Night Fever (1977), Brigade mondaine is rare and indisputable proof that not all disco music is gay, even if it was directed by a rampantly gay porn producer.

NEW YORK CITY INFERNO
NEW YORK CITY INFERNO

Jacques Scandolari (1978)

With Interior. Leather Bar. (2013) – Hollywood-actor-turned-homophile-arthouse-auteur James Franco and his cinematic compatriot Travis Mathews' reimagining of the 40 minutes or so of eternally lost footage cut from William Friedkin's sadomasochistic sodomite 'slasher' flick Cruising (1980) – it is a better time than ever for fetishistic French filmmaker Jacques Scandolari's heretical hardcore porn flick New York City Inferno (1978) aka Cock Tales aka From Paris to New York to be rescued from ostensible celluloid obscurity. Directed by the man (yet credited under the pseudonym 'Marvin Merkins') who brought the world Beyond Love and Evil (1971) aka La philosophie dans le boudoir – a super sensual and severe surrealist arthouse flick based on the memoirs of the Marquis de Sade – and penned by American journalist/historian Elliott Stein (who worked with Kenneth Anger on his 1965 tabloid masterpiece Hollywood Babylon), New York City Inferno is like a pornographic art-exploitation film from the prospective of one of the many real-life boot-and-ass-licking, shit-chowing homo-fascist leather-fag extras from Friedkin's Cruising and shot in a exceedingly seedy and glaringly gritty cinéma vérité style that makes it quite clear to the viewer that what they are witnessing is a boner-fide depiction of wild rectum ranger wantonness. Featuring an aberrant army of underground urinal urchins who – not unlike the poofter performers of Interior. Leather Bar. – had no qualms about being credited by their real-life Greenwich Village streets names, New York City Inferno is a foolishly filthy film that needs to be believed. Somewhat similar in theme to the fellow frog fag flick Johan aka Johan – Mon été 75 directed by Philippe Vallois – a work about a lonely Parisian lavender cowboy who enters the unsavory underbelly of various sod subcultures of anonymous sex and S&M sacrilege while waiting for his bent boy toy to get out of prison – New York City Inferno follows Paris-born pansy Jérôme (played by Alain-Guy Giraudon, but credited as 'Christopher Dock') as he travels to the horribly hostile human sewers of NYC to be reunited with his rebellious lover Paul (Bob Bleecker); a flaming fellow who has fallen hopelessly in love with the big rotten apple's leather-fag subculture. Featuring complimentary and highly stereotypical skin-diver tunes by queer musical icons the Village People, itself the brainchild of a fagola Frenchmen, as well as punk art noise performances in the same gay gutter garage where penetrating poofter orgies take place among the popper-possessed, ass-munching audience members, New York City Inferno is a positively potent remainder as to why AIDS is oftentimes described as 'gay cancer.'

If Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964) signaled in the arrival of militaristic libertine leather-fags in NYC, New York City Inferno announced the Sodomite SS world revolution where not a single anal or oral orifice is spared. Jaded gentleman Jérôme is quite curious as to why his cock-consuming comrade-in-asses Paul never returned from what was only suppose to be a week-long trip to the STD-stricken and semen-stained homo cesspools of New York City, so he decides to take a trip to the superlatively shitty city himself in the hope of finding his bugging beau. Through a series of letters he wrote to Jérôme each day, Paul cryptically detailed his hyper-hedonistic sex-capades in NYC, henceforth remarking in his final letter that he would never be returning to the supposed city of love. More resembling gutter auteur Andy Milligan – a sadistic scatman himself who derived immense pleasuring from sexually squandering his fellow fairies – than the archetypical swarthy Frenchman, Jérôme already looks the part of a 42nd street semen demon and he is about to find out that he fits right in with the fist-fucking bottomless pit of his most perverse pecker probing pipedreams. Jérôme wants to know why the sin-ridden city is “so magical” as he heard it was a “wonderful place for gay people,” so he ultimately has two objectives planned for his trip: to get fucked and to find his fuck-buddy. Upon arriving to NYC with Paul’s letters in his pockets, Jérôme speaks with a French-speaking taxi-driver who studied medicine in Belgium, thereupon learning about the various ‘cruising’ spots around Greenwich Village, including Christopher Street (home to 4 or 5 homo hang-outs), which he wastes no time visiting. During his first sexual encounter, the froggy fairy ritualistically packs a random man’s (with a matching mustache to boot) meat in a literal meat-packing plant while the mutilated carcass of a farm animal acts as a sick sex object of sorts. After meeting “a strange man, half-sorcerer, half-fortuneteller,” who eventually reads his fortune via his ejaculatory seed, Jérôme is finally on the true path to finding Paul, but he must prowl the streets for “good-looking boys” with “violent tendencies” and venomous but vital juices before reuniting with his sissie soul mate. As Jérôme learns after a number of ballum rancum bumfeſts and leather-laced ring-piece-licking man-jams, to get Paul back, he must become the “Master of his Master” or face Dorian love disgrace.

Most likely the film from where “Dutch Fassbinder” Edwin Brienen (notice the guy in the upper right corner of the poster/banner at the top of this review with the pink shirt and blue hat) developed his signature auteur look, New York City Inferno is indubitably a hardcore leather-fag flick with ferocious style and severely subversive spirit and certainly one of handful of man-meat movies that – not unlike the early films of Fred Halsted (The Sex Garage, LA Plays Itself) – that vanilla-sex-inclined heterosexuals can get hip with, if not for all the wrong reasons. The virtual missing celluloid link between Scorpio Rising and Cruising, New York City Inferno is an essential piece of leather-fag sinema history that deserves a larger cult-following; be it among copulating cock-suckers and/or otherwise. New York City Inferno is the film that Night of the Occultist (1973) directed by ‘Kenneth Andrews’ – a patently pathetic pornographic Kenneth Anger-wannabe directed by a man whose pseudonym is as transparent lack of artistic originality – wishes it was, as a strikingly salacious cinematic work where 'Scorpio' rises from hell and is sucked up and down by the most sordid and subversive street of NYC's secret Sodom. Created at a time before the total homogenization of homos via Hebraic Hirschfeld-inspired Hollywood, New York City Inferno is a fag flesh flick with a soul, albeit a surpassingly sleazy, seedy, and scatological sod one. More masculine than the bromide boys featured in contemporary Judaic Tinseltown 'bromance' movies like Wedding Crashers (2005) and I Love You, Man (2009), as well as anything that nauseating negrophile queen Quentin Tarantino has ever directed, New York City Inferno is a gay Grindhouse flick on steroids that, aside from a scene featuring an interview with a theology student who hopes to promote pro-gay propaganda among Christian churches, never demands shallow acceptance from the viewer, but, instead, a strong stomach of steel. Featuring both punk pansies and punk rockers (and a peculiar combination of both), New York City Inferno is a highly heretical piece of hidden homosexual film history that features more shadowy trick-turning than Francis Delia's Nightdreams (1981) and a more intricate narrative than Jonas Middleton's Through the Looking Glass (1976). If you ever doubted a horny homo's keen ability to fetishize and/or fuck billiard balls, meat-racks, defecating negroes, work boots, lonely police officers, fortunetellers, terrible tattoos, and over-educated taxi-drivers, look no further than New York City Inferno; a rare erotic French film with an actual pair of testicles, albeit covered in scabies, shit, semen, and sanguine fluids.

CAT PEOPLE

Jacques Tourneur (1942)

Considering underrated cult auteur Curtis Harrington's poesy and hypnotic art-horror-thriller Night Tide (1961)—a work about a lonely and seemingly melancholy sailor played by Dennis Hopper in his first leading who discovers phantasmagorical yet ultimately tragic love in the form of a mysterious miss who may or may not be a real mermaid but plays one in a seaside amusement park—is a personal cinematic favorite of mine, I felt it was about time that I got around to viewing the film that probably had the biggest aesthetic and thematic influence on it, Cat People (1942) directed by French-American dime-store director Jacques Tourneur (Nightfall, Night of the Demon) and produced by his RKO Studios collaborator Val Lewton, whose 1930 short story The Bagheeta the film was based on. In 1942, Lewton became the head of the horror department of RKO Studios and he was required to follow three artistically constraining rules for the films he produced: 1. All films had to be under a meager $150,000 budget 2. All films had to be less than 75 minutes in length 3. The monetary-inclined supervisors of the studio had the artistic honor of dreaming up the film titles. Despite these absurd but seemingly creativity-inspiring constraints, Lewton and Tourneur were not only able to create a rare, artsy and ultimately pioneering non-budget Hollywood horror flick with their first cinematic collaboration Cat People, but the film also made a relatively amazing $4 million in its first two years and saved the studio from financial ruin despite its patently pathetic budget of $141,659, thus proving there is no correlation between a film's budget and its artistic potential, at least when it comes to ostensible horror flicks. Utilizing recycled sets from big budget RKO productions, including Orson Welles' studio butchered period piece The Magnificent Ambersons (1942), The Cat People, as well as other Lewton/Tourneur RKO cinematic collaborations like I Walked With a Zombie (1943) and The Leopard Man (1943) and the films of James Whale (Frankenstein, The Old Dark House), are probably the closest Hollywood has ever come to directing a poetic horror work worthy of being compared to European art flicks like Carl Theodor Dreyer's ominous and oneiric celluloid horror poem Vampyr (1932) and the allegorical surrealist celluloid shadowplays of Jean Cocteau. Not just a piece of beautiful yet beastly B-grade celluloid art of the cinematically poetical variety, The Cat People is also a reasonably thematically intricate work that meditates on still relevant and 'controversial' dichotomies like race/culture (Slavic and Anglo-American), gender (male and female), religion (Christian and Pagan), and the intellect (rationality and irrationality) in its depiction of a darkly romantic cultural clash between a Serbian beauty with deep ancestral roots and the archetypal happy-go-lucky American philistine she makes the ultimately fatal mistake of marrying.

Park Zoo in Manhattan, NYC, Serbian-born fashion designer Irena Dubrovna (played by French actress Simone Simon) is approached by a would-be-suave American-born gentleman named Oliver Reed (Kent Smith), who must look and act dumber than he really is as he is apparently a marine engineer. The two hit it off and Irena immediately invites Oliver back to her apartment for tea, where the little lady shows off her prized statue of her hero King John of Serbia impaling a large cat with a phallic sword, which is essentially an allegorical symbol of rational and masculine Christianity triumphing over female and irrational paganism. As Irena proudly proclaims, she considers King John a hero because he defeated and drove out the Mameluks, whose occupation caused her people to spiritually degenerate to the point of becoming evil witches who bowed down to Satan and subscribed to a sort of hedonistic barbarism. King John also killed the spiritually lost Serbs, but “the wisest and the most wicked” among them managed to find sanctuary in the mountains. Although somewhat disturbed by Irena’s story, Oliver almost spontaneously falls in love with her at first sight (or so he believes) because, after all, she wears a potent form of arousing perfume that is “something warm...living” and she has an exotic accent and an unconventional beauty that one just cannot find anywhere, even in multicultural-friendly NYC. When Oliver buys Irena a kitten as a surprise present, he learns that his lover is the opposite of catnip and that she believes she is descended from the ungodly and lustful cat people of her village who can transform into vicious black panthers upon becoming simply sexually aroused. Like anyone hit with the irrational spell of love, Oliver ignores Irena’s superstitious and seemingly schizophrenic stories and passionately persuades her to marry him, which she somewhat reluctantly does as a woman who is afraid of love (and with good reason) and opening herself up to someone else.

During their post-wedding dinner at an authentic Serbian restaurant, Irena feels the supernatural subconscious of her soul stir when a fellow female Serb randomly remarks “~~XXXX~~a ~~XXXXXX~~a” (“my sister”) in a conspicuously cryptic manner that makes the woman seem like a member of an evil satanic cult. Afraid that it will not just be the pussy in her panties that will purr if she sleeps with her new classically handsome hubby Oliver, Irena keeps her physical distances, which is certainly no way to start a healthy marriage. Cock-blocked by what seems to be his wife’s seemingly insane spiritual blasphemy, Oliver naturally persuades his ostensibly half-insane spouse to see a psychiatrist named Dr. Louis Judd (Tom Conaway), a professionally unethical pervert hack with a god complex who seems to be a composite of rival psychoanalysts Sigmund Freud and Carl G. Jung—two men that were known to get more than intimate with their patients—that ultimately sees a sensual Serbian woman whose lack of sanity he will opportunistically exploit. Meanwhile, Oliver confides in his attractive assistant Alice Moore (Jane Randolph) about his marital qualms and she eventually admits her undying love for him, thus a siring bizarre love triangle where Irena slowly but surely falls out of favor, while her seemingly sociopathic psychiatrist plots to get his prick wet. After Irena learns of Oliver's quasi-extramarital activity when she spots him eating with Alice at a restaurant, the saddened wife stalks the home wrecker as she walks home like a carnivorous kitty cat playing with its mousy prey, but nothing happens. Later, Alice is also nearly scared to death after being stalked by an animal while taking a swim in an indoor swimming pool and Irena comes in looking for Oliver not long after, thus hinting at the seductive Serb's werecat ways. To her credit, Irena's husband Oliver and Alice are conspiring to get her institutionalized so they can marry and they plan to use degenerate Dr. Judd to carry out the scheme, but he has different plans of the more salacious sort that ultimately leave him dead after arousing the Serb's pussy. In the end, Irena accepts her fate as a perennial Slavic werecat and unleashes the panther at the zoo that takes her life, thus allowing archetypal moronic Americans Oliver and Alice to marry and live happily ever after.

Beginning with the fictitious quote "Even as fog continues to lie in the valleys, so does ancient sin cling to the low places, the depressions in the world of consciousness," (The Anatomy of Atavism) written by pernicious pervert psychiatrist Dr. Louis Judd, who ironically dies as a result of his own atavistic tendencies, The Cat People is a rare work of its time that seemed to side with the dark aspects of humanity, including paganism and irrationality, while also portraying the hypocrisy and pedantic nature of academic psychology and the unwavering arrogance and ignorance of Americans in regard to foreign peoples and cultures. It might be a bit of personal prejudice on my part, but the only character I found even remotely sympathetic and not suffering from a certain deracinated soullessness is Cat chick Irena Dubrovna as she has yet to be tainted by the culture-distorting uprooting force of American universalism, hence her ceaseless feeling of detachment and isolation from her husband and everyone else she comes in contact with, as well as her eventual and ultimately suicidal acceptance of who she really is and where she comes from. Husband Oliver never really seems to love Irena, but has a sort of irrational lust (He's viscerally "drawn to her" and she gives him a "different feeling" from the average American girl) of the metaphysical sort due to her exotic beauty and foreign background and when he finally realizes this, he seeks refuge in his 'safe', modest, and mundane assistant Alice Moore, a woman whose essence is as banal as American pie. Of course, culturally mixed marriages, especially of the miscegenation-based sort oftentimes reveal themselves to be novelties that produce mixed up and miserable children, something that Irena and Oliver thankfully avoid due to her vicious pussycat-like ways.

Followed by a barely related but apparently somewhat worthwhile (non)sequel entitled The Curse of the Cat People (1944), as well as an erotically-charged and even gratuitous but extremely loose and thematically lackluster 1982 remake of the same name directed by Paul Schrader and starring Nastassja Kinski and Malcolm McDowell, Cat People has certainly left its paw marks in the cinema world and rightfully so as a rare old Hollywood studio system horror flick with actual lifeblood and potent poetry that brought artistic merit to a most aesthetically meritless film genre. Interestingly enough, Cat People is one of only a handful of films in film history where the producer artistically contributed to the film to a notable degree where one could argue that Val Lewton—a novelist and poet—was the true ‘auteur’ of the film as its ‘creative producer’, which is further supported by the fact that most of the works he subsequently produced have a similar feel and essence, using shadow and symbols like only a natural artist would, which Curtis Harrington would take to more eerie and esoteric extremes in his debut feature-length work Night Tide (1961). Of course, trashy popular television shows like the HBO series True Blood (2008-present), a rather guilty pleasure of mine, would be almost unthinkable without Cat People, so naturally I felt it was my duty to praise this little film.

I WALKED WITH A ZOMBIE

As the largely pathetically plastic and aesthetically and artistically prosaic history of Hollywood—a virtual dream factory designed for dullards and dictated over by demons and devils—surely demonstrates, the producer-as-auteur is a most putrid prospect that, not surprisingly, reached its peak long ago during the first year of the Second World War with such preposterously plush proto-blockbusters as Gone with the Wind (1939) and The Wizard of Oz (1939). Needless to say, it is somewhat shocking yet somehow strangely fitting that during WWII a deracinated Judaic producer would be responsible for creating some of the greatest and most pleasantly poetic horror films of all-time. Influencing everything from Curtis Harrington's delightful debut feature Night Tide (1961) to Roger Corman's Poe Cycle (1960-1964) to Mike Nichols' sole unexpected horror effort Wolf (1994), Val Lewton—the introverted nephew of femme fatale Alla Nazimova who was behind the surprisingly artsy fartsy Oscar Wilde adaptation Salomé (1923)—never directed a single feature but to deny him the status of 'auteur' would be insulting to a man that produced films that were certainly weirder and more poetical than anything ever directed by James Whale. Indeed, as a producer at RKO Pictures during the 1940s, Lewton actually managed to rival the Teutonic masters of German Expressionism with a cycle of boldly beautiful and hypnotically haunting horror movies that, despite technically being low-budget quickies, brought artistic credibility to a genre that very few took/take seriously. While most of Lewton's horror films have something to offer, I can state without even the slightest degree of hesitation that I Walked with a Zombie (1943) is easily my favorite of these flavorsome fright flicks. Directed by Jacques Tourneur who helmed the greatest (and earliest) of the Lewton films, including Cat People (1942) and The Leopard Man (1943), and who would also direct the great British horror flick Night of the Demon (1957), Lewton's pre-Romero zombie flick is probably the single greatest artistic contribution to the flesheater genre and it does not even feature a single instance of flesh-eating. In short, I Walked with a Zombie makes for a great case that George A. Romero may have had a disastrous influence on zombie cinema, but of course that would be missing the point as the film is a piece of cinematic poetry that simply transcends any sort of genre ghetto and is imbued with a sort of warm melancholy and the uniquely uncanny that, not unlike the undead negroes in the film, leaves one in a trance.

While it might just be a mere coincidence, it seems that the most poetic works of horror cinema do not extend much past the 60-minute mark as demonstrated by Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920), Jean Epstein's The Fall of the House of Usher (1928), Carl Theodor Dreyer's Vampyr (1932), and Jörg Buttgerit's Schramm (1993), among various other examples. Of course, I Walked with a Zombie, not unlike Lewton's other RKO horror films, is no different as a 69-minute feature with a seemingly immaculate flow and pace that begs for frequent re-watchings. In fact, the first time I watched the film, I decided to immediately re-watch it and I felt no less effortlessly enraptured during this second viewing, which is not something I can say about many films, including many of my favorite ones. Clearly made before the zombie film became a ghettoized gallery of the unimaginatively gory and grotesque, the film—unquestionably the greatest collaboration between dual auteurs Lewton and Tourneur—demonstrates that sometimes taking narrative influence from a classic Charlotte Brontë Bildungsroman like Jane Eyre: An Autobiography (1847) can do a horror film good as a hallucinatory cinematic work that takes an almost somnambulist approach to the art of storytelling. Indeed, a quite literally titled flick less-than-loosely based on the story of the same name featured in American Weekly magazine by roving journalist Inez Wallace, it begins in a flashback form and even disseminates narrative bits in the form of a goofy negro calypso singer who seems almost literally possessed with a need to spread the anti-gospel of a romantically accursed white plantation family. A film that is somewhat in the racially-charged tradition of H.P. Lovecraft in terms of depicting the forsaken status of white European colonial types that made the mistake of colonizing exotic lands and mixing with non-Europeans, the film also wallows in the hopelessly hoodooed status of Faustian man and his sorry state in the postcolonial world. Needless to say, I Walked with a Zombie makes Wes Craven's particularly plodding The Serpent and the Rainbow (1988) seem like an artless exercise in zany xenophilia by comparison. Additionally, even the watchable second season The X-Files episode "Fresh Bones"—a racially confused tribute to the dubious horrors of Haitian Vodou—seems like a feckless fantasy compared to the pure preternatural poetry of Lewton's classic flick. Admittedly, the film also imbues the viewer with a sense that it makes no sense to fiddle with the old dark things of old dark peoples lest one suffer an indelible sort of spiritual miscegenation.

Although himself a mischling with tiresomely turgid prose, film scholar Chris Fujiwara makes a great point about the film in his text The Cinema of Nightfall: Jacques Tourneur (1998) when he argues that, "To try to synopsize I WALKED WITH A ZOMBIE is a peculiarly ridiculous task, since the film, more systematically than any other Tourneur film, abolishes narrative verisimilitude," yet Fujiwara then curiously proceeds to provide a synopsis, but I digress. While Fujiwara tends to puke-out prosaic puffery as is especially apparent in his obscenely banal Otto Preminger biography The World and Its Double (2008), he completely nails it when he states, "One of Tourneur's most beautiful films, I WALKED WITH A ZOMBIE is a sustained exercise in uncompromising ambiguity. Perfecting the formula that Lewton and Tourneur had developed in CAT PEOPLE, the film carries its predecessor's elliptical, oblique narrative procedures to astonishing extremes. The dialogue is almost nothing but a commentary on past events, obsessively revisiting itself, finally giving up the struggle to explain and surrendering to a mute acceptance of the inexplicable. We watch the slow, atmospheric, lovingly detailed scenes with delight and fascination, realizing at the end that we have seen nothing but the traces of a conflict decided in advance."

I have to confess that virtually every single nurse that I have ever personally known was a cold cunt and it comes as no surprise to me that an inordinately large number of female serial killers were members of the profession, but it would be a lie to say that I Walked with a Zombie lead Betsy Connell (Frances Dee)—a white Canadian chick that immediately lets the viewer know via voiceover that she once "walked with a zombie"—is unlikable, though one certainly sometimes questions her borderline cuckquean-like behavior. Although a Canadian nurse, Betsy somehow finds herself relocating to the Caribbean island of Saint Sebastian where she is hired by the severely cynical Paul Holland (Tom Conway)—a cultivated man that seems to hate everyone and everything, especially in regard to his seemingly accursed family and their dubious legacy—to take care of his wife Jessica Holland (Christine Gordon) who may or may not be a zombie. While Jessica's status as a member of the living dead is somewhat questionable, her past life as a wanton whore is unquestionable as she was responsible for bringing misery to Paul's family by starting a lurid extramarital love affair with his hunky half-brother Wesley Rand (James Ellison) who clearly has stronger feelings for the tragic voodoo floozy. Needless to say, Nurse Betsy, who eventually develops curious romantic feelings for Paul, finds herself getting stuck in the middle of the fucked family affair and even gets so desperate in her quest to cure Jessica that she takes her to a voodoo temple called a 'Houmfort' with the help of a titular undead colored gentleman named Carrefour (Darby Jones) with big bulging eyes that puts maestro Mantan Moreland to shame in terms of the unnervingly grotesque and racially caricaturely unfortunate. Naturally, Betsy is somewhat shocked when she discovers that Paul and Wesley's mother Mrs. Rand (who is strangely portrayed by Vincent Price's wife Edith Barrett in old fart makeup) is not only involved in the voodoo scene, but she also takes credit for turning Jessica into a zombie. Of course, it is hard to hate Mrs. Rand as Jessica is the hot twat harpy that ripped her family apart. While Mrs. Rand only makes her curious confession after a local commissioner opts to launch an official investigation into the living dead dame's (ostensible?) illness, her son Wesley decisively puts an end to all the madness by killing Jessica—with or without the help of less than divine intervention—and then drowning himself in a darkly dreamy scenario that rather conveniently takes place at very same time a voodoo ritual involving an effigy of Jessica is being carried out by the local voodoo negroes. While I Walked with a Zombie does not end on a happy note as potential lovebirds Betsy and Paul do not even start a romance (though such a scenario was rightly excised from the original script), it could not have ended any other way as a film that wallows in the racially apocalyptic legacy of colonialism and, in turn, (proto)multiculturalism. In short, Lovecraft wept.

Undoubtedly Lewton's greatest director, Tourneur apparently also shared his collaborator's 'progressive' outlook when it came to race as is so delicately depicted not only in I Walked with a Zombie, but also his later films. Indeed, as Tourneur once stated in an interview with Positif in regard to his then-atypical affection for Afro-Americans, "I've always refused to caricature blacks. I've never or almost never showed them as domestics. I've always tried to give them a profession, to have them speak normally without drawing any comic effect. Watch in OUT OF THE PAST the scene in the nightclub where there are only black people, look at the way they're dressed and filmed, the elegance of the young woman in responding to Mitchum. Several times I've been accused of being a 'n*gger lover' and for long months I was out of the studios for that reason. It was a sort of gray list." Undoubtedly, many of the colored characters in Lewton's/Tourneur's zombie flick have a sort of rare 'tragic nobility' that is thankfully not betrayed by the sort of rabid self-righteous resentment and racial hubris that is typical of ostensibly progressive modern-day Hollywood films, especially the sort of black bourgeois pseudo-art horror of Jordan Peele (who has rightly been described as the great Afro-American film critic Armond White as a "race hustler" and "charlatan"). Additionally, whether intentional or not, I Walked with a Zombie manages to make a mockery of spiritually castrated white progressive types, namely in a scene where the character Paul—the wealthy yet accursed descendant of slave traders—declares when describing a statue of Saint Sebastian named Ti-Misery that, "it was once the figurehead of a slave-ship. That's where our people came from." Indeed, like the stereotype of the sort of nihilistic self-destructive aristocrat described in Vilfredo Pareto's classic text The Rise and Fall of Elites: Application of Theoretical Sociology, degenerate rich boy Paul absurdly identifies with people of a completely different race and class over his own kin, but such is the forsaken fate of a fucked fellow from a unfortunate family that made the rather shortsighted mistake of getting rich off of slavery. Needless to say, Paul's curse is also now that of the entire modern Occidental world.

Notably, in his worthwhile text Val Lewton: the Reality of Terror (1972), Joel E. Siegel, who regards I Walked with a Zombie as the first of Lewton's two true masterpieces (the other being the delightfully deathly dark The Seventh Victim (1943) directed by Mark Robson) and a work somewhat rightly compared to Robert Bresson's Au Hasard Balthazar (1966) in terms of its technique and mosaic-like structure, soundly argues, "Lewton's strongest abilities are, as [James] Agee observed, poetic and cinematic and not literary or romantic. A very free adaptation of JANE EYRE, I WALKED WITH A ZOMBIE is particularly poetic in its equivocal, often inexplicable, interrelationships between characters [...] At no time in the film, even at its conclusion, do we have any idea of strong, single motivations determining the action and characters. Lewton cleverly sets up a series of perplexing relationships; the mystery of his complexly driven human characters leads us outward, gradually to accept the film's supernatural elements without disbelief. The film's central image, an emblematic crystallization of all this ambiguity, is the figurehead of St Sebastian which came to the island on a slave ship and now stands in the Holland garden. St Sebastian, who exists at the meeting point of paganism and Christianity, is a fit deity for the film, a mixture of the elemental and the tamed, the fleshly and the divine. The figurehead, which at times serves as a quick transition between scenes, is an emblem of the blending of love and hatred, beauty and terror, reason and superstition, at the heart of this complex, remarkable film." Indeed, aside from being a rare example of a film that does not utilize Saint Sebastian in a hokey homoerotic way à la Paul Schrader's dreadful Dominion: Prequel to the Exorcist (2005), I Walked with a Zombie is a rare horror film that manages to be just as effortlessly enigmatic as it is archetypically perennial.

Apparently, Val Lewton's own loving wife said in regard to the film that is quite arguably her husband's magnum opus, "I would never go to see a movie called I WALKED WITH A ZOMBIE unless somebody dragged me there." Rather fittingly, the film even opens with the heroine Betsy Connell mocking the title in a tongue-in-cheek fashion, but unfortunately the title at least temporarily acted as a curse of sorts on the ill-fated-filled film, or as Siegel explained, "It is perhaps characteristic of Lewton's career that this film, one of the rare pieces of pure visual poetry ever to come out of Hollywood, was seen by hardly anybody but the bloodthirsty chiller fans who frequented theaters like the Rialto in New York. Later, through the efforts of critics like James Agee and Manny Farber, readers of magazines like THE NATION and THE NEW REPUBLIC were altered to the very special quality of Lewton's productions." Personally, I am still pissed off at myself for not watching the film over a decade ago as I already regard it as easily in my own personal 'top ten films of all-time' despite only first seeing it this year. Indeed, while I now generally regard most of the zombie (sub)genre as being about as appetizing as undead excreta, I Walked with a Zombie is a potent reminder as to why I love cinema and spend so much time devouring cinema despite being routinely disappointed by a good portion of it. While I will always have a softspot for fine flesh-eating filmic feces like Lucio Fulci's Zombi 2 (1979) aka Zombie, Lewton's masterpiece is the only zombie film that I can think of that manages to be a virtual perfect poetic meditation on Eros and Thanatos, among other things. Needless to say, the film will probably not exactly excite the sort of genre sociopath that finds themselves effortlessly enraptured by the sight of brutal deaths and cheap sleazy sex. Likewise, the film fails to fulfill any sort of philistine fantasy about frolicsome flesheaters as the (un)dead seem truly (un)dead and hardly the compatriots of rancid Romero retards.

Rather admittedly, I used to feel that filmic voodoo zombies were the height of banality when I was much younger due to my childish reverence for Romero and sustained boredom while watching such would-be-classic as White Zombie and Wes Craven's The Serpent and the Rainbow, but I Walked with a Zombie has single-handedly shown me the error of my ways. In fact, as far as I am concerned, it is the only zombie film I really need, though I do not plan to completely abandon the horror (sub)genre despite the appearance of such lifeless flicks as Jim Jarmusch's prosaically pretentious pomo zombie-comedy The Dead Don't Die (2019) where the near-elderly hipster auteur demonstrates with a dumbfounding degree of detachment his lackluster love of Romero flicks and basic bitch genre trivia. Not surprisingly, I Walked with a Zombie has been remade at least twice and, even less surprisingly, neither of these films are quite as good as the original. The first, Casa de Lava (1994) aka Down to Earth directed by Portuguese Pedro Costa, is a virtual postcolonial Tondichtung sans supernatural horror where the zombies are replaced by a comatose Cape Verdean 'migrant worker' who is brought back to his decaying and racially (post)apocalyptic volcanic homeland by an attractive young white nurse that tries in vain to live like the natives (and gets fucked by them in process). Unfortunately, the second sequel Tales from the Crypt Presents: Ritual (2002)—a gleefully degenerate and equally dumb exercise in schlocky CGI special effects and shockingly stupid lowbrow racial fetishism directed by some Israeli hack and co-produced by genre directors Richard Donner and Walter Hill that is surely not worthy of the name of the hit HBO horror anthology television series that was quite cynically tacked onto it—is a total insult to the legacy of Lewton's masterpiece. While it is surely no surprise that a stupid and sleazy remake was made with kosher cash as it is a virtual tradition of the horror genre, the fact that a perplexing European arthouse auteur like Pedro Costa would seek to rework I Walked with a Zombie is certainly strong evidence of the film's perennial artistic potency and integrity.

Although I Walked with a Zombie is unequivocally the best voodoo zombie flick ever made, it was actually not the first. Indeed, aside from the languid yet watchable Lugosi vehicle White Zombie—a pre-Code independent film based on a story by writer, occultist, and purported cannibal William Seabrook—having the distinction of being the first feature-length zombie film, it was followed up by various rather racially-insensitive low-budget voodoo horror flicks, including the zombie-free Fay Wray vehicle Black Moon (1934) directed by Roy William Neill and Ouanga (1936) aka Love Wanga aka Drums of the Jungle directed by George Terwilliger (who also penned the somewhat similarly themed ‘race film’ The Devil’s Daughter (1939) directed by Arthur H. Leonard). While naturally also zombie-free due to being a documentary, Divine Horsemen: The Living Gods of Haiti (1954/1993) directed by experimental filmmaker Maya Deren makes for a nice double feature with I Walked with a Zombie. Although not altogether flattering in its depiction of Haitian voodoo, accursed auteur Richard Stanley’s doc The White Darkness (2002) does a good job of demystifying both the literal and figurative darkness of the sort of folk culture/religion that is depicted in I Walked with a Zombie. Of course, a love of Lewton’s film does not require an interest in voodoo, zombies, or even horror films. Indeed, just as Robert Bresson’s Pickpocket (1959) does not require one to sympathize with petty criminals, Sergei Parajanov’s The Color of Pomegranates (1969) does not require one to even be familiar with 18th-century Armenian poet Sayat-Nova, and Lucifer Rising (1971) does not require selling one’s soul to charming charlatan Aleister Crowley, I Walked with a Zombie does not demand one even appreciate horror or zombie films as a work of singular cinematic art that totally transcends its subject matter to provide the viewer with a virtual aesthetic high that maintains its potency on subsequent viewings. In short, the greatest film with a stupid name ever made and a cinematic work that even rivals Orson Welles’ Citizen Kane (1941) in terms of the greatest film ever produced by RKO Pictures. In fact, sorry Orson, but I have seen I Walked with a Zombie more times in one month than I have watched Welles’ masterpiece in my entire life and I do not feel the least bit ashamed of that fact. Undoubtedly, unless Gaspar Noé gets the great gall to direct a film inspired by Lothrop Stoddard’s classic text The French Revolution in San Domingo (1914), I doubt we will ever see a Caribbean-themed horror that is even vaguely as immaculately idiosyncratic as Lewton’s doubly dark masterpiece. Likewise, I doubt we will ever see a new Hollywood filmmaker that even approaches Lewton in terms of artistic integrity and great sensitivity. A rare enigma of a film producer that cared more about his art than money and made B-movies that were inspired by artists ranging from William Hogarth to Arnold Böcklin, Lewton also broke racial stereotypes and revealed a certain deep eternal darkness in Faustian man that is so elegantly expressed in I Walked with a Zombie. Needless to say, Faustian is more or less a member of the undead nowadays.

Jake West (2009)

For far too long has the genre of undead been weighed down by the nearsightedness of an aspiring director. The man responsible for the newest Pumpkinhead debacle, Jake West, topples the main convention of a blind toxin and instead allows for all the infected to be exclusively female. This proves to be the only charm within Doghouse, save for several amusing quotes that shy away from crossing over into full court misogyny. Starring Stephen Graham (Snatch) and Danny Dyer (Severance), this British "zom-com" serves a simple synopsis for the creativity of female objectivity. Vince is a down-on-his-luck divorcé whose friends organize a brotherly trip to the town of Moodley, rumored that women outnumber men 5 to 1. Upon arriving to find the town in ghostly shambles, the oblivious factor turns the knob to 11 as the men stumble and cavort beside severed appendages and blood splatter without realizing the dread. This leads to the emasculating situation of braindead wenches slowly killing off the tight-knit band of brothers. Though, without the movie magic glaze I slathered the synopsis over, that sheen of enjoyable horror would barely exist.

Aside from being plagued by flat characters and situational angst, Doghouse's failing point is when the gaping plot holes swallow what was left of the experience whole. Introduced early on in a subtle, propagandized flyers, Meg Nut was the local politician who is apparently a puppet in the scheme of biological weaponry. After her disconnecting and frying of their hijacked circuitry, she disappears along with the mysterious origins of the disease, never to be brought up again. Doghouse does have instances of entertainment, especially in the gents' montage of overwrought women in the opening. Only having Neil's encounter justifiable, the ball-and-chains are tucked away for this weekend as displayed with intertwining scenes of each males shedding of female manipulation as they boil to psychotic proportions. To be fair, Doghouse didn't fall into place as I expected it to. The puzzling escapades of these characters surpassed modern conventions of instinctual evolution. You'll notice that our leads never really adapt to their settings and remain as dimwitted as they opened with. However, with Vince's midlife crisis monologue near the end of the film, that shifts temporarily. But as any blank chav would, fall right back into the grand schematic of error.

Doghouse is all too simple, all too naive, and also happens to be a misnomer. The Doghouse tag was fit to designate the contradictory contagion code of Cathouse but the males never quite have a grasp on the unworldly situation they've been ensnared in. Efforts are made on their part to stencil depth, such as the frequent usage of an iPod loaded with stress-relieving motivational speakers or a character too late and his comically unlucky day shown in "Meanwhile..." sketches. Ill-equipped and unworthy of most domestic televisions and certainly any theatrical screens, Doghouse is an experiment in mediocrity that drowns before it can even lift off. The gross-out gags never transcend into asinine but all the while you feel as each quip becomes more painful than the last. Again, the only saving grace Doghouse utilizes is the unhampered negativity towards the callous remove of generalized females. Despite best efforts, Doghouse is just another film that should remain leashed and the inclusion of the cliché Evil Dead geek didn't help this useless "tribute" to horror.

FOXXY MADONNA VS. THE BLACK DEATH

Jakob Bilinski (2007) Imagine an award winning short film. I can, I've reviewed many. Just imagine watching one, where you are confused as to how it has a 9.6 rating on IMDB. That is exactly my emotions towards this film. To name off the things i disliked about this film would be most of my review. To start off, the film calls itself an "exploitation" film. Note this, Foxy Madonna doesn't exploit anything except maybe a mute, but he is the only thing worthy to talk about. This film is a brash, and juvenile attempt at making a blaxploitation film as well. I guess the director didn't realize that Foxy Madonna should have been black. The only character that could have brought any urban feel to this film was the token black character, "The Black Death". Of course, by making him urban, they just have him running around on camera with a gun calling Foxy a "Bitch". The film has been applauded for it's inventive action scenes. Does this include the horrible shot gunfight scene? Which lasted two minutes? No action at all. The plot is a mess as well. This would have been fit for a horrible film instead of a horrible short. In the beginning, we see Foxy Madonna (A renegade secret preacher agent) about to kill some vampire will-smith creature which resembles the Dark Seekers off of I Am Legend. She kills him with holy water, drinks it, then lights a cigarette. Yes, this is the only scene which could give her the "kick ass" feel as she is so notably given. To call Foxy Madonna badass would be like saying Wes Craven can still make a movie. It is a blasphemy to even mutter such. When the priest said "I Kick Ass For The Lord" in Dead Alive. That was awesome. When they try to make Christianity look stylish, it is insulting. The characters were all horrible. None of them could act except Jomar who played The Black Death. This is not exploitation. Putting cracks, grit, and hairlines in a film DOESN'T make it "Grindhouse". There is no nudity, drugs, sex, blood, or any real violence. Only the Chalk character is interesting and to top it all off, it has a forgettable soundtrack. The worst part is, is that it wasn't even entertaining. If you like watching people in their mid-thirties fire guns in a warehouse with empty boxes while moving at really slow speeds while smoking cigarettes, then this is your film.

RARE EXPORTS: A CHRISTMAS TALE

Jalmari Helander (2010)

Like many others, I consider myself a "late bloomer." To further evidence this notion, I will finally discuss my not-so intimate thoughts with Finland's finest, Rare Exports. You've heard of this film before, most everyone has. Imagine my surprise when unsuspecting family members were asking me if I had seen this film. Knowing their inability to stand anything that isn't English, they must not have known it was a Finnish presentation. The presence of Finnish directors is slowly becoming a bold force in Hollywood. Die Hard 2 director Renny Harlin hails from "Suomi" and became a pivotal figure in Hollywood. It's clearly only a matter of time before Rare Exports director Jalmari Helander is given the same treatment. Finnish natives have already conquered the Western musical interests, is cinema the next stop for Nordic assimilation? Back to the treatment of Rare Exports, my excitement for this film peaked some time ago with the unanimous praise that it had been showered with. Reminiscing of the last great Christmas movie, one to provoke the spirits of joy and holiday, I could only think of the masterpiece Jingle All the Way and how eager I was to share that spot.

The plot of Rare Exports is simple - a team of archaeologists unearth Santa Claus but not before vanishing. It's up to a young boy and his father, with a couple of friends, to discover the true nature of Father Christmas and prevent disaster. Rare Exports began in the form of two viral videos. The first addressing the hunting and detaining of the Father Christmases and the second being a safety manual for handling the beasts. Both exhibit clever tongue-in-cheek instances of an offbeat Kris Kringle but the continuity between both film and short predecessors is left splintered and obtrusive. Allow me skip forward a bit and point out some notable differences in the Rare Exports canon. Be warned that spoilers will be discussed following this sentence. Judging from the critical conflict in the motion picture, the archaeologists have just now discovered Santa Claus and unleashed what is thought to be the definitive Santa. Upon discovering that these malnourished bearded gents are actually Elves, the once-nervous boy summons leadership and tiny masculinity within and takes charge, destroying Santa and herding all the elves into an electric pen to be sold as "rare exports." Now that the instances of the film have been hashed over, it's safe to label the short films the sequels to the film, given the situation of rehabilitation. Many discrepancies are to be noted, however. In the film, Santa is never fully revealed, it is encased in a large chunk of ice with horns protruding. The many faces of Santa are researched early on in the film by the boy. He fails to read the text but observes the morbid pictures of he who is thought to be nice. Judge, Jury, and Executioner, rather. In Finland lore, the Santa Claus they used to have were known as "Joulupukki." This tradition involved younger males donning masks made out of the bark of trees with goat horns positioned on them. The idea was to travel door-to-door on the Eve of Christmas and to solicit food & drink. This legend undoubtedly inspired the horns that make up the mental image of this terrifying beast. It's a shame that Christianity and Coca-Cola tainted the once-Pagan country's holiday into the red, jolly visage that makes up the Western Claus. Another inconsistent principal is the short's labeling of the naked creature as Father Christmas, not the elf that the film leads us to believe. Unless Helander changed his ideology mid-course, there should be no reason for these conflicting miscalculations.

Regardless of the lack of continuity, Rare Exports is indeed directed with an impeccable eye. Like most foreign arthouse affairs before it, Rare Exports looks too good to be considered an independent film. The style and attention to snow, Finland's most recognizable facet besides underground metal, is an interesting and fresh aesthetic. Where S. Korea utilizes natural rainy elements to give their cinema a dreamlike discourse, Rare Exports does the same with snow, creating a winter wonderland without the chilly side-effects. So at your leisure, enjoy Rare Exports for what it's worth. Because of the gorgeous composition of the film, Rare Exports has been receiving incredible press, some critics making such a bold statement to refer to this film as the definitive Christmas movie - one to revamp the sub-genre. The ratio of Christmas films is almost disturbing though, as Rare Exports doesn't have to contend to any challenger but still acts as if it came ahead in a close race. Being as Christmas is only celebrated once a year, that's the equivalent of me riffing Leprechaun for being the best St. Patrick's Day film of all time. Do any others even exist? Am I even interested enough to research? Probably not.

So apart from the cinematography and the excellent effects, what does Rare Exports offer you in return for a ticket or video sale? Not much, sadly. Given such a build-up, you'd think that Rare Exports would deliver that yuletide evil that's been hinted in taglines adorning viral promotional posters plastered all over cinema sites. The only impression Rare Exports left with me was a mound of unanswered questions and a wasted aesthetic. The boy's transition from mousy introvert to general hard action hero is floundering and clumsy. Once the boy fires a shot into the air and leads his seniors into battle with an unwavering speech of motivation, my interest quickly dwindled into but an ember. It's such a shame though. Rare Exports is the film whose hype wouldn't deceive me, I refused to allow this much. Almost instantly, this awkward transfer of manhood had preceded the short films, leaving me puzzled. The shorts I mention are the ones in which the boy had reverted into an anti-social mess of female chromosomes, only to revert back into the "manhood" he discovered early on in the Rare Exports timeline. Am I the only one who didn't miss his reinvention? Apart from the wounds suffered at the hands of continuity and Helander's inability to commit oneself to a set idea, Rare Exports isn't a naughty film. It's charming and well-shot, with enough suspense to last you until the credits grace the screen. If you feel that void pulsing in your chest, don't worry. I felt the disappointment thrive as well. No hard feelings though, I'm used to being disappointed on Christmas.

SOME CALL IT LOVING

James B. Harris (1973)

Long before becoming an auteur of ostensibly classy softcore flicks like Two Moon Junction (1988) and Wild Orchid (1989), Zalman King (who was born Zalman King Lefkowitz, but decided to change his name when he started acting so as to obscure his Hebraic background) starred in a true lost gem of a film entitled Some Call It Loving (1973) aka Sleeping Beauty aka Dream Castle directed by James B. Harris (The Bedford Incident, Fast-Walking) that would teach him everything he needed to know about creating aesthetically pleasing and orgasmically oneiric works of celluloid erotica. Directed by a little known sometimes filmmaker who is probably best known nowadays for being the producer of early black-and-white Stanley Kubrick films like The Killing (1956) and Paths of Glory (1957), Some Call It Loving was apparently dreamed up by Harris while he was working on Lolita (1962), although it would take over a decade before the film started production, so one can only assume it was a dream project of sorts for its director. Based on the short story Sleeping Beauty by John Collier—a British writer/screenwriter whose works were adapted for a number of popular horror-themed TV series, including Alfred Hitchcock Presents, The Twilight Zone, and Tales of the Unexpected—Some Call It loving is a decidedly dark and even disconcerting yet elegant aesthetically exquisite romance of the dream-logic-oriented sort that falls somewhere between a Gothic Hitchcockian melodrama and the arthouse realm as a sort of anti-fairytale for adults and Last Year at Marienbad (1961) for people that cannot stomach French intellectual twaddle. Although virtually completely unknown today and totally unavailable in home media format, the film has been lauded by a number of highly respected film critics, including Jonathan Rosenbaum, who stated of the work in his classic text Midnight Movies (1983): “James B. Harris’s neglected and all but unknown SOME CALL IT LOVING, based on a John Collier story, “Sleeping Beauty”—a movie about the processes and consequences of erotic dreaming, with a swell score and a great early performance by Richard Pryor—would make a perfect midnight attraction. Like many other rare gems, it might even develop a cult, if given half an opportunity.” Of course, the film was never given a chance and remains just as obscure today as it was when it was first released over four decades ago. While Some Call It Loving was such a hit in Europa upon its release that director James B. Harris was invited to attend the quite honorable “Directors Fortnight” at the 1973 Cannes Film Festival and present the film, Some Call It Loving was naturally trashed by philistine critics in the United States and received next to no release in American theaters, hence the work’s undeserved obscurity. A work that apparently was an influence on Eyes Wide Shut (1999) and, in my less than humble opinion, is infinitely more interesting than Kubrick’s somewhat similarly themed work Lolita, Some Call It Loving is a (non)love story in quasi-fetishistic filmic fairytale form that was made for those individuals that have who have fallen in love, only to be demystified of such illusions when reality appeared in its typically ruthless fashion. Indeed, if you plan to watch the film so you can wank off to Tisa Farrow's tits, you might be in for a rude awakening and/or a ruined orgasm.

Robert Troy (Zalman King) is all by his lonesome at a carnival and finds himself enticed by an attraction advertising a 'Sleeping Beauty' of sorts. Indeed, a carny 'Carnival Doctor' (Logan Ramsey) claims that the sleeping beauty in question, Jennifer (Played by Mia Farrow's much more attractive, if not less talented, sister Tisa Farrow) has been supposedly asleep for 8 years. For one single dollar, patrons can attempt to awaken the slumbering angelic beauty with a big juicy kiss, but as the good Carnival Doctor warns, "To wake the Sleeping Beauty, you run the risk of being awakened yourself." The Sleeping Beauty certainly awakens something in Robert, as he offers the carny Doctor $20,000 on the spot for the living carnival attraction after spending some private time with her and realizing that he has more or less fell in love with her at first sight (when Robert initially asks the Carny to see the Sleeping Beauty in private, the Doc yells at him for making such a 'moral proposition', but when he offers him $50, that all changes, with the sleazy flesh-peddler saying he can do whatever he wants with her, "no questions asked"). Robert brings Jennifer aka 'Sleeping Beauty' home in a hearse and immediately tells his two girlfriends, Scarlett (British actress Carol White) and Angelica (Veronica Anderson), who are making love together in bed, that he has acquired a real live Sleeping Beauty and he plans to wake her up, as if that is an everyday occurrence. Indeed, Robert, who is a saxophone player in a degenerate jazz band, lives in a baroque mansion where he is in ménage à trios of sorts, but now the only thing he can think of is Jennifer, even though he knows nothing about her aside from the fact that thousands upon thousands of horny men have defiled her body over the past 8 years or so. Although he lives a life of luxury in a majestic mansion that seems like it was taken straight out of a classic storybook, Robert's only friend is a belligerent negro wino named Jeff (portrayed by Richard Pryor in a rather humorous, if not superlatively self-degrading role), who enjoys drawing hearts over urinals and whose liver is about to explode. Despite the fact that Robert does everything he can for Jeff, the jigaboo dipsomaniac is an ingrate, even making the following complaint after his friend attempts to give him a ride home: "I'm a man now, you wanna get down? Because you help me with some bills and took me to the doctor, I owe you something?! Huh, nigga?!"

Needless to say, when Sleeping Beauty finally wakes up and says "hello," Robert is in pure heaven and he immediately treats his new dream lover to an extravagant tap dance routine that is performed with pure Sapphic passion by Scarlett and Angelica. More than anything, Robert is deeply enamored with Jennifer's childlike innocence and purity, as if she is indeed a real living and breathing undefiled dame from a fairytale. To humor her curious childlike ways, Robert plays hide-and-go-seek with Jennifer around the mansion, though she has a somewhat hard time playing due to the fact that she is confined to a wheelchair as her legs are quite weak from being immobile for 8 years. Meanwhile, Scarlett and Angelica play erotically-charged role-playing games around the house, including pretending to be nuns in a monastery and a master-and-slave scenario (not only is Scarlett the master of the game, but she is also the real master of the house). Since Scarlett is in charge, everyone does what she says, including Robert, who is a sort of unofficial cuckold, though he is getting tired of the lifestyle. When Robert introduces Jennifer to Jeff, the black bum, who is like a virtual walking-and-talking minstrel show, makes a joke that the little lady is 'passing' for white and that she is a Siamese twin who "used to be connected to a black chick because you're black and tan." Over time, Robert begins calling Jennifer his little "jellybean" and even tells her that he loves her. Jennifer then reveals that she feels like "It's like a dream...like I'm not completely awake yet" and reveals to Robert how she was kissed and molested by countless old dirty men when she was asleep. Coming to the conclusion that Jennifer thinks he is someone that he is not and that he wants to do everything he can to preserve her purity and their relationship, Robert decides that he and his beloved will move out of the mansion, but when he tells queen bitch Scarlett about his plans, she makes the following typically female passive aggressive threat: "I don't want to lose you Robert, so whatever it is I have to do to keep you here...I'm going to do it." Of course, Robert ends up staying and Scarlett begins incorporating Jennifer in her perverted role-playing games, including a scenario where they trick the Jazz musician into thinking their engaging in lurid lesbo sex. Bummed out, Robert talks to Jeff, even telling the black bum he envies him because nothing surprises him, remarking: "you're not surprised if you piss your pants or don't piss at all. You wake up in the gutter instead of your bed...that doesn't surprise you either. In fact, you wouldn't be surprised if you didn't even wake up at all one morning, would you? You want to know why you wouldn't be surprised?...Because you don't have any choice and that's why I envy you." Needless to say, Jeff drops dead one day and Robert and his girlfriends are the only ones who attend his funeral. In a pathetic attempt to get over his fanatical obsession with Jennifer, Robert pays a barmaid a wad of cash to pretend to be a cheerleader and do some naughty naked cheers for him, but she does not exactly cheer him up and he walks out of the bar mid-performance. Ultimately, Robert gives up on love and decides to make Jennifer a sleeping beauty again by slipping something into her wine (the carny who sold her to him revealed he kept her asleep with some sort of liquid medication). Ironically, in the end, Robert becomes just like the sleazy 'Carnival Doctor' who sold Jennifer to him, offering strangers the chance to wake her up with a kiss, but warning them: "To wake the Sleeping Beauty, you run the risk of being awakened yourself."

SOME CALL IT LOVING

Undoubtedly, I could relate to Some Call It Loving protagonist Robert to some degree, especially in regard to his concern that the untainted Sleeping Beauty has no idea what kind of person he really is, as his love and infatuation has caused him to act in a manner that he never thought he was capable of, hence the warning from the Carny: "To wake the Sleeping Beauty, you run the risk of being awakened yourself." I have certainly fallen in love with a girl before that was so blinded by her love for me that she chose to see what she wanted to see and ignored the rest, only to eventually have the spell broken and come to her senses in the end. Indeed, with the film's inclusion of the Nat King Cole song "The Very Thought of You," Some Call It Loving lets the viewer know in a somewhat esoteric way how love, or even an obsession with the idea of love, can make a person do innately irrational things that they would never fathom doing had they not been intoxicated with amore. Like a more romantic and less autistic David Lynch flick meets a post-counter-culture take on The Twilight Zone, Some Call It Loving is certainly a singular piece of celluloid that is begging to be unearthed. A sophisticated and rarely silly adult fairytale that will appeal to casualties of love that is never sentimental or heavy-handed, Some Call It Loving is like a nostalgic film for the anti-nostalgic, as a work that reminds one what it feels like to be in love, but then smacks the viewer across the face with the bitter and soul-draining conclusion that comes with lost love. Needless to say, I have no desire to wake up a Sleeping Beauty and if I need a reminder why, I can just re-watch Some Calling It Loving and be also reminded why Kubrick's relatively unknown producer should have probably been the one who directed Lolita.

COP

James B. Harris (1988)

Undoubtedly, it is a sick yet rather fitting irony that mainstream Hollywood movie like, say, John Wick (2014), are oftentimes advertised with the line “From the Producers of...,” as if producers are the true auteurs and were not oftentimes behind destroying films and/or taking them away from their directors. As cinema history has demonstrated, producers are rarely artistic people. Sure, there are important historical film figures like D.W. Griffith, Alexander Korda and Stanley Kubrick that both produced and directed, but they typically did this as a means to maintain artistic control of their films and not simply because they were opportunistic producers that used their clout as a means to later establish a film directing career. Indeed, it is no coincidence that very few producers would go onto to become directors, though many have surely tried, including figures ranging from Bernd Eichinger to Richard D. Zanuck’s widow Lili Fini Zanuck to Denise Di Novi, but probably none of these individuals are quite as interesting and neglected as Kubrick’s early career producer James B. Harris. Indeed, as been mentioned by many people writing about the producer turned director, Kubrick once remarked to Harris, who collaborated with him on such classics as Paths of Glory (1957) and Lolita (1962), in late 1962 that, “You’ll never know complete satisfaction until you’ve tried your hand at directing,” which he ultimately accomplished only a couple years later with his little-seen Anglo-American Melvillian Cold War thriller The Bedford Incident (1965) starring Richard Widmark and Sidney Poitier. While Harris arguably achieved his greatest and certainly his most idiosyncratic artistic success with his second feature Some Call It Loving (1973) aka Sleeping Beauty—a sort of similarly esoteric counterpart to his former partner Kubrick’s somewhat uneven swansong Eyes Wide Shut (1999)—Harris’ fourth feature Cop (1988) probably best epitomizes his talents and signature traits as a filmmaker that perfected pulp during an era when the true grit of such tasteful trash had certainly fallen out of vogue.

Based on the dark crime novel Blood on the Moon (1984) by James Ellroy—the first book in the writer’s Lloyd Hopkins Trilogy—the film is a gleefully politically incorrect 1980s noir-ish crime-drama that acts as a sort of wonderfully venomous antidote to the fun, sun, and flashy neon multiculturalism of Miami Vice. Grittier and all-around superior to Curtis Hanson’s much better known Ellroy adaptation L.A. Confidential (1997), the film also arguably has a secondary auteur in the form of James Woods, who not only played the eponymous lead but also acted as its co-producer (notably, the actor also starred in Harris’ previous film Fast-Walking (1982) in a vaguely similar role). Of course, considering Woods’ relatively recent virtual blacklisting from Hollywood due to his right-wing political views and battles with liberals, communists, and antifa losers on Twitter, Cop—a film with a titular LAPD detective that is among the most radically 'reactionary' and culturally pessimistic police officers in cinema history—features, in many ways, the actor in what is arguably the most fitting and fully realized role of his entire rather singular career. In short, it feels like Woods was born to play the lead. Indeed, as much as I love William Friedkin's To Live and Die in L.A. (1985), it seems like Michael Bay's Bad Boys (1995) when compared to the uncompromising cynicism and misanthropy of Harris' film. Like an all the more morally dubious thinking man's Death Wish (1974) featuring an 1980s West Coast take on the completely cracked cop-driven cultural cynicism of The French Connection (1971), albeit with more respect for cops, the film makes nods to various crime sub-genres while also subtly commenting on said sub-genres without seeming even remotely pretentious or overly intellectual. In fact, I would go so far as to say that Cop is a cop's cop film, so long as the cop is not an uptight by-the-book type.

Notably, at the very beginning of his 3 out of 4 star review of the film, Roger Ebert—a man whose girth was only transcended by his tendency to get preposterously offended by films like some uppity queen—argued, "Anyone without a history of watching James Woods in the movies might easily misread COP. They might think this is simply a violent, sick, contrived exploitation picture, and that would certainly be an accurate description of its surfaces. But Woods operates in this movie almost as if he were writing his own footnotes. He uses his personality, his voice and his quirky sense of humor to undermine the material and comment on it, until COP becomes an essay on this whole genre of movie. And then, with the movie's startling last shot, Woods slams shut the book." Luckily for viewers, especially of the less than intellectually gifted sort, the film is certainly no academic study, let alone any sort of serious art film, yet it does bring a certain unrivaled refinement to cultural pessimism and social decay; ingredients that any real-life cop is all too familiar with. Probably unlike a large majority of viewers, I have a certain personal familiarity with police officers to distinguish the difference between tawdry Tinseltown buffoonery and a certain psychological realism and nuance of character that makes the film believable enough to those familiar with real-life men in blue. While films based on the works of real-life cop turned novelist Joseph Wambaugh like The New Centurions (1972) and The Onion Field (1979) also starring Woods, demonstrate a certain matter-of-fact respect for the law enforcement trade, Cop almost achieves a sort of almost metaphysical understanding of the sort of dispirited spirit that comes with spending many years cavorting with coke-addled hookers and dodging bullets from crack-addled renegade negro thugs. Indeed, in its no-holds-barred approach to depicting a Hollywood inhabited by corrupt cocksucking cops, quasi-autistic artsy fartsy serial killers, and low-rent crooks, the film is as anti-Hollywood as 1980s films come and in the tradition of the great nihilistic works of classic film noir.

Although it might seem like a peculiar theme for a neo-noir featuring a policeman as an antihero, one of the most potent central themes of Cop is that it takes a rather brutal approach to depicting the perils of Princess Syndrome (PS) and female entitlement and how these things have created a world of exceedingly unhappy women that sometimes grow up to be hookers or, even worse, feminists, due to the high expectations that society instilled in them as impressionable little girls. Indeed, the titular propagandist is so disgusted with the way that society lies to children about the reality of the world that, to the chagrin of his wife, he excitedly tells his daughter brutal police stories each night before bed as an entertaining way to expose her to the harsh realities of the world. In fact, he notably sums up his rather pessimistic worldview to his unsympathetic wife as follows, "Let me tell you something you should get through your head. They're all little girls, Jen. Every one of them. Every one of those pathetic souls who eventually does herself in is a little girl. Every neurotic who lies on a couch...and pays some asshole shrink good money to listen to her bullshit is a little girl. Every hooker out hustling her ass for a pimp...who winds up with a dyke, a habit, or wasted by some psychopath, is a little girl. All these little girls have one thing in common. You know what that is? Disillusionment. And it always comes from the same thing, expectations. The greatest woman-killer of all time. A terminal disease that starts way back when they're all just little girls. When they're being fed all the bullshit...about being entitled to happiness like it's a birthright. That's what you don't understand...when to stop perpetrating the myths that ruin their lives. Innocence kills, Jen. Believe me. It kills. I see it every fucking day of my life." While the antihero is a reasonably violent man that regularly kills criminals and cheats on his wife, the film reveals that he is completely right when it comes to female disillusionment. While the antihero is a sort of ruthless realist-cum-pessimist that can smell bullshit a mile away, it is, somewhat ironically, a romantic poet that is depicted as an unhinged lunatic and pathological serial killer in what can be possibly interpreted as director Harris' (possibly unconscious) view of 'artiste' types. In other words, in the world of Cop, only irrational women and psychopaths are crazy enough to believe that there is still romance and beauty in the world. Needless to say, the film also reveals that there is a very fine line between cops and criminals and that there is no such thing as heroes; just guys that are hard and tough enough to take out the subhuman trash. Indeed, James Wood's unforgettable eponymous character is less a hero than a rabid social watchdog that has developed a decidedly dehumanizing talent for hunting down sick and criminal minds. Indeed, if the antihero were not a cop, he would probably be some sort of hit man or organized crime leader.

You immediately know that Cop is not a movie for leftists, ethno-masochists, and pussies because the opening credits is juxtaposed with a laughably idiotic 911 call from some unseen gangster negro that bitches to the operator, "I should be home, like, watching THE FLINTSTONES, or some shit," and then nonchalantly confesses his criminal trade while reporting a murder, stating, "I was gonna hit this place in Hollywood until I seen what was inside. Heavy shit went down in there, man. Like something out of a Peckinpah movie. You better send some cops right away to Aloha Regency, Apartment B." The scenario that the nameless/faceless negro is talking about is less like something out of a Peckinpah movie than something out of Tobe Hopper's classic The Texas Chainsaw Massacre (1974), as the grisly scene in question involves a female corpse hanging upside from a ceiling like a gutted cow carcass. The film's antihero, LAPD detective Sgt. Lloyd Hopkins (James Woods), is the first people to arrive at the crime scene and he almost immediately comes to the conclusion that the victim was killed by some sort of art fag serial killer due a piece of poetry he soon finds addressed to her that reads, "You grieved me more than all the rest." As Hopkins soon discovers while looking around her apartment, the victim was a feminist journalist named Julia Niemeyer that owned feminist polemics with absurd titles like Rage in the Womb. Notably, Hopkins spends a great deal of time at the crime scene before contacting his police department, as if he needs to personally meditate on the madness of the murder by himself without any distractions, especially not the stupid theories of other cops. All these clues will ultimately lead Hopkins to hot babes that he fucks or wants to fuck, as the antihero is certainly a man that likes to both work hard and play hard, though it seems he actually prefers the former as 'workaholic' would be too bland and generic of a description for the fanatically enterprising antihero. Unlike the killer, who is some warped male feminist type, Hopkins really cares about women, or as his much despised Christian boss Captain Fred Gaffney (Raymond J. Barry)—an uptight asshole and bozo bureaucrat that prides himself on playing by the rules—complains to him, "Everyone knows you have a wild hair up your ass about murdered women." In short, Hopkins, who is a great cop that is not beneath fighting dirty, makes it his personal mission to catch the serial killer and he more or less destroys his entire life in the process, but such is the price of such uncompromising fanaticism.

Aside from his quite predatory desire to catch the killer, Hopkins does not seem all that worried about completely ruining his life because his personal life is pretty much in shambles. Indeed, after his wife Jen (Jan McGill) catches him telling their prepubescent daughter Penny about a personal police story about a "queen who did full drag" and "ripped off about $5,000 in cash and a shitload of pharmaceutical speed and heavyweight downers...in less than a month," the two get in a heated verbal dispute where the antihero discusses the deleterious effects of telling fairy tales like 'Goldilocks and the Three Bears' to little girls and how it can only end in bitter disillusionment. When his wife tells him, "Lloyd, I think you're a very sick man...in need of some real help," Hopkins, who seems to have nil sexual desire for his wife despite his overall virility, skips bed to go on a stakeout with his best friend 'Dutch' (Charles Durning). Hopkins is such good buds with Dutch—a fat, white-haired, and somewhat unintentionally goofy yet smart and loyal chap that is nearing retirement—that he hooks him up with hot hookers to hump, as the two have a natural intuitive bond despite being somewhat of opposites in terms of character. Indeed, quite unlike Dutch, Hopkins sometimes has a problem with self-control and tact, among other things, hence their natural chemistry as partners. Needless to say, Hopkins is more than a little bit upset when his wife steals their daughter and runs off to some unknown location in San Francisco, or as she describes in a quite condescending letter that she leaves for him, “I know that you and I have not communicated for a long, long time and I’m not sure that we can again, as our values are completely different. You’re a deeply disturbed person and I cannot allow you to pass your disturbance on to Penny. I’m withholding our address in San Francisco...until I am certain you will not try to do anything rash.” Clearly no longer in love with his frigid and seemingly perennially bitchy wife and not one to waste a good opportunity, Hopkins almost immediately starts an extramarital excursion after his spouse absconds to Sod Francisco. The sort of cop that cannot help but dwell in the gutter, Hopkins gets involved with a beautiful blonde 35-year-old failed actress turned hooker named Joanie Pratt (Randi Brooks)—a character that acts as a slightly more exciting spin on the ‘whore with a heart of gold’ trope—that is connected to Niemeyer murder. As she describes to Hopkins, Joanie is responsible for setting up scam-like “floating swingers’ parties” where rich swinger pay $200 a party to fuck and buy drugs and Niemeyer was attending these parties as an investigative journalist with the intent of researching for a book on the seedy scene. Luckily for Hopkins, Joanie is so happy to help that she practically begs for the antihero to fuck her, which he quickly does from the comfort of her kitchen counter. Rather unfortunately, it is not long before the serial killer violently mutilates and murders Joanie just to fuck with Hopkins. Indeed, unbeknownst to Hopkins, the killer is monitoring him at the same time the antihero is trying to uncover the puzzle of his identity.

While far from a cucked out male feminist that loathes members of his own sex, Hopkins—an all-around tenacious alpha-male that knows how to get a woman’s attention—has no problem enticing a painfully introverted male-hating feminist bookstore owner named Kathleen McCarthy (Lesley Ann Warren). Although Hopkins initially goes to see Kathleen about the book Rage in the Womb since she is the only local seller in town and she instantly acts quite combative with him and accuses him of trying to infiltrate her seemingly imaginary gynocentric movement since he is a member of law enforcement, the protagonist only needs a couple minutes to put her at ease and entice her to softly state, “I’d like to help any way I can. Really.” As for the book Hopkins is interested in, Kathleen states, “RAGE IN THE WOMB is an angry book. It’s a polemic...a broadside against many things, violence perpetuated on women in specific. I think I sold my last copy a month ago. I don’t think I’ve ever sold a copy to a man. Actually...I don't think I...I've had a single man in his 30s in here...Never." Adopting rather solitary feminist lifestyle after being gang-raped in high school, Kathleen—a clearly quite broken woman that seems to be afraid of making real human connections, especially with men—certainly intrigues Hopkins with her tragic past, though it is not until much later in the film that the antihero realizes that the killer is actually a warped male feminist that also happens to be a secret admirer of the mousy book dealer. Indeed, as it turns out in what ultimately proves to be an all-too-convenient coincidence, Kathleen, Hopkins, and the killer all went to the same exact high school. In between sending her flowers and poems, the killer kills woman out of a warped and deluded belief that they are the sort of chicks that abandoned her after she was raped. In high school, Kathleen led a court of female poets and these girls supposedly betrayed her after she was gang-raped, which the serial killer apparently personally witnessed, hence his pathological need for revenge against both males and especially females. For 15 pathetic years, the killer has been worshipping Kathleen from afar because, as he eventually confesses in a creepy soft-spoken fashion, "She's not like all the rest." Unlike the killer, Hopkins wastes no time in attempting to get into Kathleen's panties and almost does so the first night they are together, though the antihero rudely leaves her hanging while she takes a warm bath and smokes dope lest she "tense up" during coitus due to her post-rape anxiety issues. Indeed, somewhat absurdly, Hopkins absconds from Kathleen's home and thus loses his opportunity at premium grade misandrist meat curtain after he discovers a lead in the case involving a corrupt street cop and homo hustler that were part of her class.

As Hopkins eventually uncovers in a less than legal fashion, a corrupt street cop named Deputy Sheriff Delbert "Whitey" Haines (Charles Haid) and a poof prostitute named Lawrence 'Birdman' Henderson (Dennis Stewart), who were pals in high school, were two of the men responsible for gang-raping Kathleen in high school. Unfortunately, both men are killed before they can be brought to justice, as the serial killer conveniently murders Birdman and Hopkins is forced to kill Whitey after he dares to pull a shotgun on him after being confronted about his crimes. Of course, at this point, Hopkins is positive that the serial killer is someone that attended Kathleen's high school, but the feminist book peddler refuses to cooperate with him due to not only leaving her high and dry sexually, but also because he broke into her apartment while hunting for clues relating to her high school experiences. With the support of Dutch, Kathleen eventually agrees to look at old yearbook photos of various guys she went to high school with against a cross-reference of suspects, though she refuses to acknowledge any of them as potential suspects even though a dapper chap named 'Robert Franco' that is listed as a "Poet Laureate" clearly catches her eyes. Seeing as Kathleen suffers the delusion that she loves her longtime secret admirer and is unwilling to believe he is a serial killer, she naturally does not want Hop-kings to hound him. Not long after she leaves the interrogation room, Kathleen is caught by Hopkins talking to Franco on a payphone as she is attempting to warn her assumed secret admirer of the crooked cop's obsession with him. When Franco states to Hopkins, "Let her go, Hopkins. She's not like all the rest" after the protagonist grabs the phone and then proposes a "reunion" at their ex-high school, Kathleen gets the shock of a lifetime when she finally realizes that her secret admirer is indeed the killer. When Kathleen asks Hopkins if he plans to kill Franco, the corrupt cop, who has just been suspended due to his underhanded policing techniques, replies in a suavely sarcastic fashion, "I don't know. Maybe this time you'll get to send him the flowers." As for the reunion, Franco demonstrates a prowess for martial arts and killing gangsters, but he ultimately foolishly runs out of bullets for his MAC-10 machine pistol and thus is forced to suffer the grand indignity of having to 'surrender' to his hunter. Although Franco prepares to turn himself in by snidely remarking, "Aren't you going to read me my rights? Cuff me? Take me into custody? What's it to you, Hopkins? You're a cop. You've got to take me in," Hopkins is not the sort of fellow that likes to play games and reminds him that he is not a 'by-the-books' kind of cop by declaring, "Well there's some good news and there's some bad news. The good news is, you're right, I'm a cop and I have to take you in. The bad news is I've been suspended and I don't give a fuck!" just before unloading three shotgun rounds into the killer, thus bringing an inordinately satisfyingly fucked conclusion to one satisfying fucked film.

While I am not even sure it was a totally conscious decision on auteur Harris' part, I would argue that the greatest theme depicted in Cop is the timeless dichotomy between the extroverted alpha-male type and the introverted beta-male and how the latter is ultimately the more loathsome, repugnant, and pathetic of the two classic archetypal figures. Additionally, the film also similarly demonstrates that the masculine 'misogynist' ultimately loves and cares more about women than the feminist 'nice guy' archetype. Of course, the film is also features a less than favorable depiction of queers, as the second most loathsome character in the entire film aside from the serial killer is a closet cocksucker cop that has S&M leather-fag gear lying around his apartment. Undoubtedly, compared to Cop, director Harris' subsequent film and celluloid swansong Boiling Point (1993)—a mostly banal effort in politically correct casting the stars Wesley Snipes as an inordinately stoic colored super cop that takes down blond white sociopaths portrayed by Dennis Hopper and a very young and super Aryan-looking Viggo Mortensen—seems like a sad and pathetic artistic compromise meant to appeal the insipid cultural marxist socio-political agenda of Hollywood (notably, Harris has revealed in various interviews that the studio took the film away from him and butchered it). In fact, I do not think it would be a stretch to conclude that Harris directed Boiling Point simply due to its potential mainstream appeal because, as he admitted in a 2017 interview at MUBI in regard to his early success with Kubrick, "I think it ruined me. I was determined to produce projects of social importance. That's why you see large gaps in my filmography. There's a decade between SOME CALL IT LOVING and FAST-WALKING. I could have had a larger body of work, but I didn't listen to any of the agents who sent mainstream projects my way or offered to put attractive deals together with their hot clients." Of course, coincidentally, there is just as larger gaps in between films when it comes to Harris' buddy Kubrick's career.

Undoubtedly, if there is any underlying philosophy behind Cop, it is probably best summed up by German literary maestro Ernst Jünger words, "Today only the person who no longer believes in a happy ending, only he who has consciously renounced it, is able to live. A happy century does not exist; but there are moments of happiness, and there is freedom in the moment." Indeed, the film's protagonist has stoically accepted the world is an ever-degenerating shithole full of societal decay and misery yet he manages to squeeze in a couple ecstatic fuck sessions with rather ravishing bimbos in between kicking ass and taking names. In fact, I would argue that the titular antihero portrayed by James Woods is a sort of primitive blue collar equivalent to Jünger figure of the 'Anarch,' which is a sort of metaphysical ideal figure of a sovereign individual in the Teutonic 'conservative' sense. As Jünger argued in his novel Eumeswil (1977), "The partisan wants to change the law, the criminal break it; the anarch wants neither. He is not for or against the law. While not acknowledging the law, he does try to recognize it like the laws of nature, and he adjusts accordingly," which is probably a good way to describe the antihero's own preternatural thinking. Clearly, the film's protagonist has little concern for the law, which he constantly breaks to ironically bust lawbreakers, but instead completing his job and sticking to his own distinct moral code, thus he would probably understand Jünger's words, "I am an anarch – not because I despise authority, but because I need it," as he would probably be gunning down criminals 24/7 if he did not have some superficial legal guideline that he liberally followed. Likewise, "I am not a nonbeliever, but a man who demands something worth believing in," attests to the character's need for renegade justice in the face of injustice. Additionally, Woods' character certainly lives by the words, "The anarch wages his own wars, even when marching in rank and file."

While his wife and various other characters accuse him of being 'sick' due to his rather culturally pessimistic Weltanschauung, the titular antihero of Cop is nothing if not someone that has cultivated an appropriate attitude to a sick and savage urban jungle, or as the late great Colombian 'reactionary' writer Nicolás Gómez Dávila once profoundly argued, "Adaptation to the modern world requires sclerosis of sensibility and degradation of character." After all, one would have to be exceptionally sick and/or emotionally catatonic to be unresponsive to a world that is increasingly morally necrotic, racially and culturally apocalyptic, increasingly sub-literate, and mostly aesthetically bankrupt. While the film's protagonist sees little good in society, he would not be such an effective cop were it not for his low expectations for humanity in general because, as Dávila rather rightly argued, “Optimism is never faith in progress, but hope for a miracle.” The only real complaint I have about Cop is that it is not quite as dark and subversive as James Ellroy’s source novel Blood on the Moon (1984), which is somewhat curious when one considers that Tom Hanks of all people confessed in an October 13, 2017 New York Times interview that he would be interested in playing the novel’s lead Lloyd Hopkins on the stage or screen. For example, the protagonist is more overtly degenerate in the novel, which was apparently initially rejected by 17 different publishers, as demonstrated by the following hilarious multicultural blowjob excerpt, “He found a Negro prostitute at the corner of Western and Adams who was willing to do the deed for ten dollars, and they drove to a side street and parked. Lloyd screamed when he came, frightening the hooker, who bolted out of the car before she could collect her money.” As much as I am disgusted at the thought of fellatio involving an assumedly STD-ridden street nigger, this brief excerpt reveals the hardcore essence of the novel which, for obvious reasons, Harris was not fully able to cinematically disseminate. Not surprisingly, Harris was largely enticed to adapt the novel because of its less than politically correct tone, or as he explained in an interview with Nick Pinkerton at Film Comment, “I love the character of the cop who pushes the envelope, that could get suspended any time, works on his own, is so obsessed with successfully getting the criminal [...] And I liked the scenes. Some books you read and you don’t see anything you feel you can dramatize effectively. This book had real scenes—like the moment where the cop tells a crime scene bedtime story to his kid. We got a really young kid, so that it would seem outrageous for her to be hearing these stories about breaking and entering and murder. That’s what attracted me to the material, the potential of scenes, the arguments with the wife, Lesley’s character calling him a ‘police person.’ I wanted to make fun of all of that Women’s Lib shit that was so hot at the time.” As for what Ellroy thought of the film, he apparently was not initially happy with it but as Harris explained in the same interview, “We made the picture for very little. We got everyone to cooperate, to work for reasonable salaries. It was Ellroy’s first film, and I don’t think he knew how to handle it when he first saw it. He said he didn’t care for the film when he first saw it. But later he said everybody told him that the picture was terrific, and he went back and reevaluated it and said he liked it now, in fact I think he took the film on a tour to England, through several cities, and he screened the film as an example of a good adaptation. As it turned out, we had a good relationship, and I ended up acquiring THE BLACK DAHLIA from him as well.”

As far as I am concerned, Harris is a seemingly mostly unartistic yet highly intuitive and street smart individual that has managed to direct three great underrated films that almost manage to elevate pulp to the level of poetry. If

Harris learned anything from his buddy Kubrick, it was finding the right source material to adapt. Of course, Harris' choice of material also demonstrates he was more subversive and morally dubious than Kubrick, which is arguably his greatest strength as a filmmaker. Indeed, whereas Kubrick seemed coldly disgusted and pessimistic about humanity (notably, the director-producer team once planned to adopt the lost Jim Thompson novella Lunatic at Large), Harris seems to have wallowed in the grit, grime, and slime of humanity as demonstrated by the mirthfully mad essences of Fast-Walking and Cop. In fact, only in Some Call It Loving, which is undoubtedly both the director's most personal and perverse film, does Harris reveal a certain foreboding dejection and melancholy. A sort of never fully developed master of brutally honest cinematic art for proles, Harris' rather simple and unpretentious films arguably demonstrate that Dávila was right when he wrote, "Poetry has died, asphyxiated by metaphors." As to the value of so-called 'corrupt cops,' German-American sage H.L. Mencken arguably said it best when he wrote in 1931, "The curse of the cops, speaking professionally, is the sensitiveness of the district attorney's office to political and other pressure. Every day they see perfectly good cases fall to pieces in the courtroom. As a result of their most arduous labors, sometimes at the risk of their lives, go for naught, and they are naturally upset and full of woe. Not infrequently they beat up a prisoner because they fear that he will be able to escape any other punishment. They know that he is guilty, but they also know that he has a sharp lawyer, so they fan him while they have him. This fanning — or massaging, as they call it — is greatly dreaded by criminals." Aside from misguided liberal morons and certain types of sociopaths, serial killers, and serial killer fetishists, I think most people would agree with the titular antihero's final actions at the quite literally explosive conclusion of Harris' film. In a morally inverted world with an alien-owned mainstream media that incessantly transforms negro thugs into Christlike martyrs and constantly demonizes police officers as sort of pathologically genocidal neo-Gestapo demons, Cop is almost as refreshing as waking up to a sloppy wet blowjob, which is certainly something that Lloyd Hopkins could appreciate.

LANDSCAPE SUICIDE

James Benning (1987)

Like most people, I am, to a certain extent, intrigued by murderers and serial killers, especially in regard to their psychological makeup, but I also cannot stand phony films like overrated cinematic artisan David Fincher's Se7en (1995) and Hebraic hack Brett Ratner's Red Dragon (2002) that glorify bat-shit crazy 'manhunters' and more or less portray them as 'misunderstood geniuses' whose ostensible 'Übermensch' image somewhat absolves them of their aberrant actions. In short, I hate when films, be they big budget Hollywood trash or otherwise, attempt to less than cleverly manipulate me into feeling a certain way about something, especially when it is in regard to something as sensational as serial killers, who, along with black gangster thugs, Jewish white collar criminals, scatological Semitic frat boys, and scheming morally retarded whores, have become the ultimate cinematic antiheroes. Thankfully, I recently discovered what is arguably the most objective film ever made—be it fictional or documentary—on coldblooded murders and serial killers, Landscape Suicide (1987) directed by experimental sub-underground auteur James Benning (Him and Me, North on Evers), who is a rare, truly proletarian America avant-garde voice that does not need buckets of blood, tedious torture-porn scenes, or even a single murder scene to make a chilling point about manhunters. Described as a 'minimalist' and 'structuralist' by various reviewers and film theorists, Benning seems like a fellow who has never seen a single Hollywood film, let alone a horror flick, and has no interest in entertaining anyone except himself. Certainly no trust fund brat or autistic art fag, the filmmaker grew up in a rough German-American working-class community in Milwaukee, Wisconsin where sons were forced to fight their cousins, so it is only natural that the auteur would direct a film about fellow Wisconsin Amero-kraut Ed Gein, whose father was of German extraction and whose beloved mother was the progeny of Prussian immigrants. A man whose works have been heavily influenced by American realist paintings and photography, Benning's Landscape Suicide attempts to conjure up the atmosphere and physical environment that might have inspired Gein, as well as suburban California teenaged killer Bernadette Protti, who brutally stabbed to death her 'friend' Kirsten Costas in 1984, to kill. An avant-garde quasi-docudrama where the viewer is forced to act as an investigative reporter and sightseeing tourist in being confronted with two 'classic' murders that are as American as apple pie that took place about 30 years apart, Benning's demystifying doc is like a living postcard featuring excerpts from court transcriptions as specially chosen by the director, who seems to place a special premium on the killer's sexual hangups and mental illnesses. Psycho killer Americana in static 16mm form, Landscape Suicide is apparently the director's most 'accessible' work to date but I doubt that it would appeal to a single one of the sort of true crime fanboys that have serial killer calendars and sport Jeffery Dahmer t-shirts; yet, due to its 'idiosyncratic' and quite pathological structure and style, I would not be surprised if someone told me the film was directed by an actual serial killer. A work of seeming cultural pessimism and cynicism directed by a man that seems to hate the suburbs and sees rural Wisconsin as a cultural and spiritual void inhabited by the radio broadcasted noise of carny-like evangelist preachers and the malignant spread of pop-'culture' TV trash magazines like Rolling Stone and yellow journalism newspapers, Landscape Suicide ultimately makes murder seem like a temporary relief from the banality of American life.

Beginning in a rather banal fashion with a couple minutes of a woman playing tennis by herself that concludes with a shot of dozens of tennis balls lying on a tennis court, Landscape Suicide immediately gives the impression that life in the suburbs, as unbelievably banal and bourgeois as it is, is no way to live. From there, an off-screen narrator reveals that on June 23, 1984, a 15-year-old high school girl from a suburb in Orinda, California was stabbed to death on her neighbors' front porch by a teenage suspect that was "chunky but not fat with shoulder-length light brown hair driving a gold or yellow older model Pinto that appeared to be in poor running condition." The suspect was the girl's would-be friend Bernadette Protti, who killed her classmate after she rejected a ride home from her. As revealed by crime case records featured in the film, Protti had a "low frustration tolerance despite a higher than average intelligence" and "despite often misleading, overt heterosexual behavior, there may be evidence of unusual suppression of her sexuality." Stabbing Costas with an 18-inch butcher knife five times in front of at least one witness, Protti, who apparently "suffers from an inferiority complex" and "lacks remorse" in regard to her crime, was thought to have not committed premeditated murder due to "the lack of sophistication in the execution of the crime." In the 'docudrama' section of the Protti segment, a one-time actress named Rhonda Bell that looks more like victim Costas than her jealous executioner, portrays the teen guidette killer in a fashion that totally reeks of mundane mental derangement. Among other things, Protti seems hopelessly self-absorbed and only agrees to talk after the off-screen interviewer assures her that, due to being underage, her name won't be leaked to the press. As to how a teenage girl can deal with being a killer, Protti stoically states that she is, "really good at blocking it out of my mind and still am [...]...it doesn't feel real." After killing her comrade, Protti took her dog for a walk as if nothing had happened, stating of her incapacity to accept her dirty deed, "after, I was trying to get out of it by not saying it was me but I really feel it wasn't me. It was weird, it was the weirdest feeling I've ever had. It was exactly like I was watching it. I was hurting her but...then I was thinking, I wonder what happened to her...and that's when I got home. I didn't know if she was dead or alive." Although decrying "popularity" and "friends" as stupid, Protti attempts to blame her actions on "inferiority" problems as a result of not getting on the cheerleading team or being accepted into the yearbook club. When questioned about whether or not she has any lesbo tendencies, Protti flatly denies it in a fashion that seems somewhat suspect. After the interview, an off-screen narrator portraying Protti's mother reveals that everyone wanted to "strangle" Coŝtas' killer, but they had a change of heart when the real killer was discovered.

Like with the Protti case, the friends and family of Ed Gein were rather surprised when they discovered he was a 'cross-dressing' necrophiliac killer that liked to wear rotten vaginas over his seemingly virginal genitals. When he was asked by a fellow named Wilimovsky why he painted one of his victim's vaginas with aluminum paint, Gein replied, "It was getting a greenish color. I put the paint over to the see if that would preserve it." Gein also had no problem revealing to Wilimovsky that he castrated his own cock, hence why he draped a putrid postmortem pussy over what remained of his pecker. In what is probably the most glaringly and inexplicably 'anti-realist' segment of the film, Gein is portrayed as a rather robust and swarthy little man named Elion Sucher who looks more like a donut-addicted Israeli pawnshop owner than a deranged Germanic dude from rural Plainfield, Wisconsin with murderous mommy issues in a docudrama scene depicting the killer's February 20, 1968 court testimony in the Waushara County Courthouse in Wautoma, Wisconsin. While confessing to killing a woman named Mary Hogan who disappeared from her cabin in 1954, Gein does not own up to killing Plainfield hardware store owner Bernice Worden on November 16, 1957 despite the fact that her mutilated and decapitated corpse was found hanging in his shed upside down, with the victim's torso being "stretched out like a deerskin." Like with Hogan, Gein took a special interest in Worden because she superficially resembled his mother, whose death in late 1945 inspired him to dig up elderly female corpses and engage in "insane transvestite rituals" with them. In a rather cynical yet rather effective conclusion to Landscape Suicide that some might find to be in poor taste, a hunter commits an unsimulated butchering and disemboweling of a deer in a fashion quite similar to how Gein carved up and hung Mrs. Worden. I just hope Benning was not attempting to make some sort of heavy-handed PETA-approved "meat is murder" message in what ultimately makes for a grotesquely fitting conclusion to a darkly understated film. Indeed, I think this final scene emphasizes the brutality of cold rural midwestern living and the fact that slaughtering and gutting a deer would probably not be all that different from doing the same to a human.

Out of all of the films I have ever seen, the only one that comes even close to resembling the 'aesthetic' essence of James Benning's Landscape Suicide is South African auteur Aryan Kaganof's experimental feature Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers (1994), which takes a similar 'avant-garde docudrama' approach in featuring actors reciting the words of infamous killers like Edmund Emil Kemper, Ted Bundy, and Charles Manson. In its obsessive use of static shots of picturesque rural America and art fag style use of mixed media, especially magazines, the film also begs for comparison with the collage-based quasi-doc works of queer auteur William E. Jones, like Massillon (1991) and Finished (1997). Additionally, Landscape Suicide would certainly float the boat of fans of crippled American filmmaker/film theorist Stephen Dwoskin (Dyn Amo, Central Bazaar), whose approach to documentary filmmaking is at least equally thematically and aesthetically subversive, as if both men could not make a 'populous' film if their life depended on it. Indeed, for all those that have seen all the Gein-inspired films like Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960), Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), Alan Ormsby's Deranged (1974), Jonathan Demme's The Silence of the Lambs (1991), and the horrid In the Light of the Moon (2000) aka Ed Gein, Benning's flick is like a kick to the skull in slow-motion, as a work that not only deconstructs the Gein movie mythos, but demands that the viewer meditate on the most mundane aspects of the criminal case, which was clearly the director's intention. Indeed, as the docudrama comes to an end, an off-screen narrator recites the following words from a girl that grew up in Gein's town, "I was 14-years-old when Bernice Worden was killed [...] I was walking home from [...] junior high school when I saw the headline on the Milwaukee Sentinel: 'Cannibalism in Wisconsin.' Mrs. Worden's heart was found in the soft pan on the stove, but cannibalism was never substantiated," thus highlighting the senselessly sensational tactics of the media on what was already obviously a sensational story. Of course, Landscape Suicide does the opposite of the newspaper headline by dwelling on not only the mundane nature of murder, but life in general as depicted in the various long still shots of landscapes and seemingly endless scenes of people engaged in everyday 'suburban' activities like playing tennis and talking on the phone. One also cannot forget that the film features a shot of a Rolling Stone magazine featuring ostensibly pretty, fake Hollywood actors John Travolta and Jamie Lee Curtis on the cover, as well as an intentionally humorous radio sermon from Jerry Falwell where the good reverend bashes Carl Sagan, thus underscoring the fact that American (anti)culture is as cold, barren, and inhospitable as its landscapes. In that sense, Benning's film is as authentically 'American' as imaginable, as a work where the landscapes are the true characters and the void is penetrable. Indeed, after watching the film, I was not asking myself why Protti and Gein did what they did, but why there are not more people like them. Of course, like everything else, in America, murder is committed more so for monetary reasons, with people like Protti and Gein being the exceptions, hence their interest to people. For fans of Herzog's masterpiece Stroszek (1977), which was also shot in Gein's hometown Plainfield, Wisconsin and inspired by the Bavarian auteur filmmaker's interest in the German-American serial killer (notably, Herzog intended to dig up Gein's mother's grave with documentarian Errol Morris, but the latter chickened out and never showed up), Landscape Suicide also makes a splendid and somewhat sinisterly scenic companion piece as a strangely visceral yet paradoxically oftentimes boring work that attempts to enter the real 'heartland' of America that Hollywood has always seen fit to ignore.

PINK NARCISSUS

James Bidgood (1971)

I cannot for the life of me think of another film with such a suitable name as Pink Narcissus (1971). I discovered the film after watching an episode of the (unfortunately) short-lived film anthology series John Waters Presents Movies That Will Corrupt You. As one would most likely guess from the title, the film is about a narcissistic gay man but, fortunately, not in the violently cliché, sardonically shameless and repellant self-obsessed-Hollywood-drama-queen-tabloid-formula that is oh-so common and contagious today. At its worst, Pink Narcissus is a barely-feature-length silent surrealist arthouse journey through quasi-pornographic phallogocentric-purgatory that is worthy of being compared to the work of F.W. Murnau, Jean Cocteau, Kenneth Anger, Derek Jarman and Jean Genet but filmed on a budget (estimated at $27,000.00) one would expect from an ultra-gritty realist work directed by Paul Morrissey (it was originally rumored that Andy Warhol had produced Pink Narcissus). The history of Pink Narcissus is almost as strange as the film itself as no one even knew who directed the film (the film concludes with the inter-title "Produced by Anonymous") until the mid-1990s when a writer named Bruce Benderson, who was fanatically obsessed with the work, went on a stalker-like journey to eventually discover that it was directed by Manhattan-based photographer James Bidgood. Although featuring a variety of flesh-colored Netherworld realms worthy of any Kenneth Anger fan's total gaze, Pink Narcissus was almost entirely shot in Bidgood's small New York City apartment during a 7 year stretch (1963-1970). After watching Pink Narcissus and later discovering how it was made, I was nothing short of shocked and awed as the various magical worlds contained within the film left me nothing short of strangely enthralled. Although shot on consumer-grade 8 mm film stock, Pink Narcissus features a keen alpha-aesthetic all of its own that takes the viewer on a journey through scenarios that are more colorful than a mongrel circus performer jumping over a neon rainbow on fire.

Like F.W. Murnau's magnum opus Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927), Pink Narcissus begins with a long atmospheric shot in a seemingly organic wilderness setting, but, in fact, a completely contrived apartment set. After this breathtaking introductory shot, the viewer is introduced to a youthful prostitute who – like the Narcissus of Greek mythology – cannot help but look at his own reflection in a most satisfied manner. Eventually, the young gigolo fantasizes about a variety of subversive erotic scenarios where he is naturally the central figure. Not only is this prostitute hopelessly perverted but he is also a dilettante student of history who hopelessly fantasizes about traveling through various historical periods and places. For instance, the young man becomes a Spanish matador who finds himself antagonizing a young Aryan biker that resembles Scorpio of Anger's Scorpio's Rising (1964). The young prostitute also trancedly dreams of the prospect of being a slave who is routinely sexually manhandled by a sadistic Roman emperor and becoming the virtual dick-tator of a male harem. The film also features a gay urban street where pants-less perverts with exaggerated members wander like ghosts on the midnight prow. The downtown street scenes foretell the world Rainer Werner Fassbinder would create with his final work Querelle (1982), including a gay sailor who roams the streets in the hopes of satisfying wholly unsavory desires. Like Querelle, most objects (including messy hotdogs and slimy snails) are phallic in form. Despite its miniscule budget, Pink Narcissus is undoubtedly strangely more hypnotic and phantasmagorical than Fassbinder's infamous film.

Despite featuring surreal cumshots and a boner-swinging belly dancer, Pink Narcissus is barely pornographic, thus the film is not restricted solely to sexually inverted male audiences. In fact, I believe that Pink Narcissus is a film that every serious cinephile and aesthetic addict should see as it is a work that certainly brings withstanding scopophilic glee long after it concludes. Echoing back to the silent film era, Pink Narcissus features not a single line of dialogue but instead demands that the viewer refrain from blinking an eye so as to enjoy the thoroughly enamoring visual ride. Despite being over 40 years old, this delightful cinematic daydream is most certainly as potent and controversial as when it first appeared mysteriously in underground arthouse cinema theaters during the early 1970s. Like all great works of art, Pink Narcissus is indubitably the truest and most honest expression of a wonderfully self-indulgent filmmaker, hence the original anonymity of the film's clearly embarrassed creator (although Bidgood claims he removed his name from the film because editors "changed his vision"). Indeed, Pink Narcissus may be a figurative and literal work of cinema masturbation on the auteur filmmaker's part but that is to be expected from all truly great and authentic works of art. After all, it is not often that one is treated to such an adroit kaleidoscope extravaganza of killer colors like Pink Narcissus.

MIKE'S MURDER

James Bridges (1984)

With the vogue Me Too movement—an insufferably gynocentric witchhunt fueled by female narcissism that at least, quite thankfully, resulted in the destruction of singularly grotesque zio-pig Harvey Weinstein—the general public was exposed to the obvious fact that many of the bigwigs and movers-and-shakers in Hollywood are sick sexual predators (though, only Larry David had the balls to note, on SNL of all places, that most of these ‘white’ men are actually Jewish). Rather disappointingly, only a couple queers, including Kevin Spacey, were exposed as predatory perverts. Of course, Hollywood has a history of homo harassment, as the casting couch apparently has just as many male victims as female ones and the predators are not always out-of-the-closet poofsters like Judaic degenerate Bryan Singer. For example, as noted in Rainer Chlodwig von K.’s rather worthwhile tome Protocols of the Elders of Zanuck: Psychological Warfare and Filth at the Movies (2018), in 2012 a masseur sued John Travolta for $2 million after claiming that a $200-per-hour massage session concluded in a rather curious fashion with the Hollywood star stripping naked, rubbing the man’s leg and then touching his cock. Notably, as a totally hilarious and equally incriminating segment of the suit reads, “Defendant began screaming at Plaintiff, telling Plaintiff how selfish he was; that Defendant got to where he is now due to sexual favors he had performed when he was in his WELCOME BACK, KOTTER days; and that Hollywood is controlled by homosexual Jewish men who expect favors in return for sexual activity [i.e., expect sex in return for favors]. Defendant then went on to say how he had done things in his past that would make most people throw up.” Naturally, it should be no surprise to anyone that is not mentally feeble that “Hollywood is controlled by homosexual Jewish men,” but apparently Tinseltown even has had a couple alleged gay goy predators, including Hollywood auteur James Bridges, who notably directed Travolta in a couple films, including the hit Urban Cowboy (1980) and the big turd Perfect (1985).

Apparently, Bridges hosted infamous sodomite sex parties which were stocked with underage boys and attended by big household names in the entertainment industry, or so it was revealed after The New York Police Department and District Attorney’s Office launched an investigation in 1975 dubbed ‘Operation Together’ which looked into the mafia control of gay bars and underage boy sex rings (incidentally, the central S&M gay bar depicted in Cruising (1980) was mob-owned, or so William Friedkin revealed in his memoir Friedkin Connection: A Memoir (2013)). As exposed by The Mafia and The Gays writer Phillip Crawford Jr.—a retired attorney from the New York bar and “whistle blower”—in an article at his blog Friends of Ours, “The retired officer with whom I spoke stated that that while working on Operation Together he spent a lot of time undercover as a gay clone in the city's bars and did substantial surveillance including out on Long Island and Fire Island. In the course of his investigation the NYPD officer advised me that he learned about sex parties with underage boys that allegedly were being hosted at a place on the Island by Hollywood film director and writer James Bridges. Bridges had been nominated for an Oscar for THE PAPER CHASE which was released in 1973, and later directed THE CHINA SYNDROME for which he also received an Oscar nomination, URBAN COWBOY and BRIGHT LIGHTS, BIG CITY. He died at the age of 57 in 1993 from kidney failure after a cancer diagnosis according to his family. The officer staked out Bridge's place, and the attendees were obviously underage boys and household names in the entertainment industry to whom he referred as 'the child fuckers.' James Bridges was not the only name with which I was provided by the retired officer." Not surprisingly, Bridges was never actually charged, let alone convicted, for his alleged cocksucker crimes, but at least one of his films hints at such behavior.

Notably, although some of his films feature homoerotic imagery and gay subtexts, Bridges did not really contribute much to the history of queer cinema as he spent virtually his entire life in the closet, or as written in Images in the Dark: An Encyclopedia of Gay and Lesbian Film and Video (1994), "An unusual inclusion in this listing of gay and lesbian directors, James Bridges' (1935-93) filmography does not offer much evidence of queerness. As a matter of fact, with the exception of employing several gay stars in his films and the character of Mike in MIKE'S MURDER (who, despite the film's title, was only a peripheral figure), there are no gay themes or characters, major or minor, in his films [...] Interestingly, Bridges' gayness was not publicly known until the publication of his obituary." Indeed, while his vaguely semi-autobiographical film September 30, 1955 (1977) features a teen that strangely cares more about James Dean than having any sort of sexual contact with his bitchy girlfriend and Urban Cowboy includes its fair share of homoerotic imagery (namely, Travolta in cowboy garb and Scott Glenn sporting an ultra-faggy mesh shirt), Mike's Murder (1984)—a rather seedy yet quite sui generis and tastefully directed piece of largely forgotten cult cinema—is the only Bridges film that seems to take delight into dipping into the cocaine-and-cock-fueled swamp of depravity of the gay underground and associated chic degenerate criminal scenes. By no means a masterpiece and probably 20 minutes too long, the film is exactly the sort of film that you might expect from a relatively powerful gay Hollywood filmmaker-cum-producer that wanted to create his own cryptically confessional auteur piece, albeit featuring a popular female lead so as to provide enough plausible deniability in regard to the filmmaker's sexual orientation. Personally, I was not surprised to learn after watching the film that Bridges was involved in some seriously sick scenes, as the flick is unlike many others of the largely artificial Reaganite 1980s in terms of its authenticity in regard to depicting the radically repellent realm of coke-addled

Dorian love debauchery. A decided downer that never offers the the aid of comic relief from its fairly consistent paranoiac intensity, Mike's Murder is also a reminder the war on drugs is a sick and pathetic joke and many dumb queer addicts are paying the price while rich old horny queens are picking up the tab.

As far as I am concerned, male bisexuality is mostly a myth propagated by self-loathing gays that have not fully made the plunge into pure and unadulterated puffery, decidedly debased gay-for-pay masochists, and sociopaths (who, lacking real emotional connections to other people, are known to be sexually flexible). In Mike's Murder, the female heroine discovers the seemingly unthinkable in that the man she loves—a handsome and athletic fellow of the romantic and sexually potent sort—has not only fucked men, but he pimped himself out to a bitchy middle-aged negro queen. Indeed, the film tells the dejecting story of a likeable yet seemingly clueless chick with a girlish crush that discovers the rather repugnant hidden homo life of the man she thought she loved after he dies under quite brutal circumstances. While it is hard to know where exactly Bridges was coming from, the film sometimes feels like a mockery of women or, more specifically, a woman in love, as the hapless heroine suffers the great indignity of enduring the cold hard reality of her beau being not much more than a male bimbo boy toy for fags and dope fiends. Indeed, whereas Ken Russell's masterful adaptation D. H. Lawrence Women in Love (1969) respectfully depicts the need of certain men to have the love of another man despite already having the love of a woman, Bridges' film depicts a sexually nihilistic world where sex is not much more than a commodity and heterosexual love seems like an unhip anachronistic joke. But then again, Mike's Murder is arguably best interpreted as an example of gay jealousy in regard to heterosexual love, which becomes most obvious in a scene where a bitchy black queen proudly expresses to the heroine his pangs of lovelorn cynicism for the dead man that both individuals love.

Not exactly a hit when it was first released and barely a cult item today, Mike's Murder is a film that I first discovered while reading an article about independent actress Kate Lyn Sheil of all places. Indeed, after making the mistake of sampling a couple Joe Swanberg films and related lame mumblecore crap, I discovered Sheil and felt she was cute in a sort of autistic introverted hipster bitch fashion, so I looked her up on the internet and discovered an article where Melissa Anderson of The Village Voice remarks in regard to the actress, "But thanks to friendships she made in 2005 during a brief stint working at Mondo Kim's, that late, lamented cathedral of cinephilia on St. Marks Place, her interest in performing was revived. Employees at the rental redoubt ranked among the city's most movie-mad, as Sheil did (and still does, pulling out her phone, not impolitely, during our conversation to fact-check herself on the name of the director of MIKE'S MURDER, a little-known Debra Winger vehicle from 1984)." At the time I read the article, I had just watched Costa-Gavras' uneven yet nonetheless entertaining anti-white nationalist melodrama Betrayed (1988) and realized

I rather liked Debra Winger—a brunette Jewess with a certain delectable girl-next-door beauty—despite her ethnic handicap, so naturally I was enticed to see another film with her, especially after I read a somewhat enigmatic film synopsis on Bridge's flick that left me reasonably intrigued. After all, my favorite 1980s films are decidedly dark works like Ivan Passer's Cutter's Way (1981), David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986), and Tim Hunter's River's Edge (1986), so naturally I am always looking out for similarly bleak material. Rather unfortunately, Mike's Murder has yet to be released on Blu-ray and can only be bought as part of Warner Archive Collection's rather disappointing barebones DVD-R series, which is certainly fitting for a idiosyncratic fag flick that would probably be regarded as being 'homophobic' by many of today's overly pampered and brainwashed contemporary gays.

Mike's Murder begins in a rather deceptively traditionally romantic fashion with a montage involving various seamless dissolves of heroine Betty Parrish (Debra Winger) being delicately manhandled on a public tennis court by her bohunk beau Mike Chuhutsky (Mark Keyloun) and then lovingly penetrated in her bedroom by him. After watching the opening, one might assume that Betty is married to a man that she is deeply in love with, but the reality is that they only had a brief yet passionate fling as Mike is an aimless wanderer with the attention-span of a gnat who has been spending a lot of his free time running away from rivals as a petty drug dealer. To his minor credit, Mike sells drugs to merely support his coke habit and pay off old drug debts. In fact, the only reason Mike briefly reenters Betty's life after disappearing for six months is that he is in hiding and does not want to be caught by drug dealers that he pissed off as a result of making the reckless mistake of dealing on their home turf. Indeed, the two are only reunited as a result of happenstance when Betty hears Mike call her name while she is driving down the road. Needless to say, Betty wastes no time in picking Mike up and the two immediately catch up in a manner that you would expect from two lovers that have not seen each other in a longtime. While flirting with Betty, Mike has no qualms about making rather forward remarks like, "I'd like to get you naked again. It's been a longtime. What, like . . . six months at least?," but he also expresses great fear and paranoia about being stalked. Hopelessly smitten like an innocent teenager girl with a hopeless crush, Betty naturally completely embraces Mike and his proposed reigniting of their hot and heavy romance, but it never really happens as the titular male bimbo is about as reliable as an LSD-addled schizophrenic street bum. Instead of achieving her assumed dream of beginning a long-term relationship with Mike, Betty is sucked into a sort of lovesick hell involving a dead lover, bitchy queens, violently paranoid dope fiends, arrogant quasi-punk art fags, and shadowy negroid hit men.

Not exactly a scholar or even someone with an average IQ, Mike unwittingly accepts a death sentence when he mindlessly goes along with his insufferably spastic and seemingly sociopathic friend Pete (Darrell Larson) after he decides to steal a sizable amount of cocaine from the wealthy suppliers that provide them with drugs to sell. Needless to say, the theft leaves both Mike and Pete marked men and the former is brutally murdered in his small apartment after being surprised by negro enforcers the very same night that he mindlessly snags the dope. While Betty simply assumes that Mike once again stood her up like he had done to her so many times before when he falls to meet her that night as the two planned, the truth is much uglier and horrifying, or so the heroine learns the next day after getting a random phone call from an eccentric yet annoyingly passive gay middle-aged photographer named Sam Morris (Robert Crosson). Although she does not know him, Sam informs Betty that their mutual 'friend' Mike has been brutally murdered and then invites her to his apartment. After being somewhat shocked that Sam's apartment is completely covered with large posters of Mike, Betty discovers that her dead beau has a dubious connection to a rich and successful gay negro record producer named Philip Green (played by real-life gay negro Paul Winfield), so she decides to visit him to see if she can find out more about the mysterious murder. Rather unfortunately, Betty is in for a rather rude awakening as she discovers the uniquely undignified fact that Mike was once the personal white fuck toy of made spade Prince Philip, who even has a live-in white slave named Randy (William Ostrander). In between being entertained by Randy with coke-snorting and his insufferably gay tryout video for Chippendales, Betty scans old Polaroid photos of Mike as she waits to speak with Philip in what ultimately provides to be an extremely awkward couple minutes. An almost gleefully bitchy old queen that lives the rich hedonistic homo dream, Philip seems initially annoyed with Betty, but it is clearly because he is jealous of her and the real romantic connection she had with Mike. Indeed, Mike might have fucked old men, but he preferred relatively fresh pussy.

Naturally, Betty becomes somewhat upset when Philip tells her in regard to Mike's murder, "You want to know everything? Well... You don't. Believe me, you don't. This wasn't an enforcement killing. I mean, they were making a statement." While Betty seems to find it somehow curious that Philip was the one that was responsible for identifying Mike's corpse at the morgue, it certainly makes more sense to her when she discovers that her lover used to share a bed with the surly sod sambo. Arguably more upsetting is everything else that Philip tells Betty about Mike, including about their gay interracial romance, or as he explains with a certain degree of slightly hidden lovesick melancholy, "It was, however, a very brief physical relationship. It was born on a hot Ohio day. Lot of drugs, Jack Daniels. It was not, as they say, his true bent, as you well know. Well, whatever it was, it was certainly worth a First Class ticket to sunny California. He lived with me in this house just as long as he wanted. Then, what about two years ago, he met you. He liked you. He certainly talked about you enough." Although she clearly does not want to hear it, Philip also explains how his love affair began with Mike after he randomly picked him up while he was hitchhiking across country. As hinted by Philip's words, "He had all kinds of stories that he used on different people. He was always preparing a face for the faces he met," one also gets the impression that Mike was a happy-go-lucky sociopath of sorts, though he was a relatively benign one compared to his best friend Pete. At the very least, Mike was completely and irrevocably morally retarded. To Mike's credit, he openly acknowledged that Betty was "too good" for him, hence one of the reasons why he never attempted to pursue a serious relationship with her. Of course, by never getting serious with Betty, Mike unwittingly protected her from very potentially being murdered too.

While Betty is desperately running around town and attempting to find out everything she can about Mike and his untimely demise, her dead boy toy's friend Pete—a socially corrosive criminal and all-around degenerate—is lurking in alleys and hiding in friends' apartments as he tries in vain to evade the same negro enforcers that killed his pal. Hated by Philip (who he once called a "nigger" as revealed in a home movie that Randy plays for Betty) and undoubtedly an exceedingly erratic human parasite of the pathetically socially predatory sort, Pete eventually makes his way to Betty's house in the hope she will provide him with sanctuary from the shadowy spade brigade, but he makes the mistake of more or less holding her hostage in her own home and treating her in a most absurdly aggressive fashion. High on the very same cocaine that resulted in him signing his own death warrant and positively petrified to the bone, Pete the prick clearly strikes fear in Betty, who attempts to do her best to not frighten or provoke the dangerously paranoid and unhinged proto-tweaker. Although he claims that he only needs a "friend," Pete does not seem all that concerned about the fact that he completely scares the shit out of Betty. Also, like the stereotypical sociopath, little Pete has a terrible persecution complex and claims that the coke theft that got his best friend killed was nothing more than a simple "mistake," or as he hysterically states in his pathetic defense, "There was so much. We took so little. I just wanted my share. Do you know how much they have? How well they live? Do you know how much I have? How I live? [...] You think it's all my fault. He knew what happened. He was a part of it. He took his share. I have him his share." Of course, like Mike, Pete ultimately has to pay the price for his indiscretions. Indeed, luckily for Betty, a couple nameless and faceless negroes—the same gentlemen that killed Mike—show up at the heroine's house, grab Pete, and take him away in a van before he can do anything too drastic to her (among other things, Pete begins threatening Betty with a knife). In the end, the negro enforcers dump Pete's bound corpse, which includes a plastic bag wrapped around his head, at a remote construction site. As for Betty, she is featured in the final scene bittersweetly reminiscing about Mike after receiving photographs of her and him that were shipped to her by Sam. Needless to say, Mike must have been an absolutely otherworldly good fuck for a mild-mannered banker teller like Betty to go to homo hell and back in a rather desperate attempt to solve the puzzle of his grisly demise. In the end, Betty ultimately pays a high prize for rough trade and she does not seem to regret a second of it, even though she now probably suffers from posttraumatic stress and will probably have a hard time maintaining romantic relationships in the future.

Although just speculation, I think it is safe to say that Mike's Murder is a sort of masochistic gay fantasy disguised as a sort of dark romantic mystery, even if it is based on a true story. To support my conclusion, I sought out reviews of the film and was quite delighted to find a somewhat recent one from colored contrarian Armond White, who is undoubtedly both the most hated and well known negro film critic working today. Despite being both gay and probably the only (in)famous negro American film critic, White is actually hated by Jews and white liberals due to his trashing of overrated race hustler garbage like black Brit Steve McQueen's superficial sell-out flick 12 Years a Slave (2013) and Jordan Peele's big brown (pseudo)horror turd Get Out (2017). A rare American film critic that vocally values humanism over nihilism and does not subscribe to phony mainstream leftist narratives, White writes review for both the William F. Buckley Jr.-founded rag National Review (NR) and the cocksucker kultur mag Out, so naturally his review of Mike's Murder—a film that would certainly be decried as being homophobic nowadays by the more hysterical members of the LGBT ghetto—is something quite exceptional. Indeed, in his January 2, 2018 review for Out entitled MIKE'S MURDER: Revisiting the Complex, Erotic Tale of an '80s Hollywood Hustler, White somewhat predictably demonstrates his affinity for the film's gay negro record producer, arguing, "Bridges then shifts his attention to one of the deepest gay male characters in Hollywood history: Phillip, a wealthy, middle-aged music producer, tells Betty how he became Mike's sugar daddy. Phillip steals the movie. Played by late gay actor Paul Winfield, best known for his Oscar-nominated role as the sharecropper father in Sounder, he displays a subtle passion. This career risk and personal revelation by Winfield and Bridges was historic. Beneath his elegant kaftan, the older gentleman who procures trim young men reveals a gay man's fully recognizable inner life. Phillip is half-ashamed of the vulnerability indicated by his relationship with Mike (intimately remembered as 'Michael') when recalling their mutual exploitation. He asks Betty, 'Were you in love with him? So was I. In the beginning, I was just desperately in love...It was not, as they say, 'his true bent,' as you well know.'" Of course, despite only being briefly in the film, Philip is a strong and imperative character because he seems to be a sort of negrified stand-in for director Bridges. Also, one cannot forget the unintentionally absurd image of Paul Winfield strutting around in a large hippie-like robe like he some sort of all-powerful and all-knowing aristocrat in Sodom.

While the film is largely forgotten and not really regarded as much more than a strange and subversive artifact of 1980s (semi)mainstream gay cinema, Pauline Kael, whose second book Kiss Kiss Bang Bang (1968) incidentally played a crucial role in inspiring Armond White to become a film critic, actually wrote a short yet favorable review of Mike's Murder and especially Debra Winger's performance in The New Yorker. Although I am someone that has always appreciated auteurs over actors, I can certainly agree with Kael words in her June 30, 1986 review where she argues in regard to the lead actress, "Winger has thick, long, loose hair and a deep, sensual beauty in this movie. Bridges wrote the role for her after directing her in URBAN COWBOY, and you feel the heroine's expanding awareness in Winger's scenes with Keyloun and her scenes with Winfield. It's a performance that suggests what Antonioni seemed to be trying to get from Jeanne Moreau in LA NOTTE, only it really works with Winger—maybe because there's nothing sullen or closed about her. We feel the play of the girl's intelligence, and her openness and curiosity are part of her earthiness, her sanity. There's a marvelous sequence in which Mike calls her after an interval of three months and wants her to come to him right that minute. She says, 'How about tomorrow night?' He says, 'You know I can't plan that far in advance,' and gets her to talk to him while he masturbates. He says he loves her voice, and though we don't see him, we hear a callow sweetness in his tone; he wants to give her satisfaction, too. He talks hot, and she's sort of amused, and goes along with it. I don't know of anyone besides Winger who could play a scene like this so simply." Undoubtedly a rare screen Jewess that takes a rather refined and sophisticated approach to feminine sensuality, sensitivity, nurturance, and compassion as opposed to stereotypically wallowing in the neurotic, obnoxious, arrogant, and/or the ethnically bitchy, Winger certainly deserves credit for much of the film's emotion potency and pathos, even if Bridges was clearly more interested in hustler hunks and heartsick queens. Undoubtedly, Winger's range as an actress becomes rather clear when one compares her role in Bridge's film to her completely unrecognizable performance in drag in Alan Rudolph's somewhat underrated rom-com-fantasy Made in Heaven (1987).

Rather curiously but not all that surprisingly considering his sexual bent, Bridges gets the most radically retarded character in Mike's Murder—aspiring Chippendale dancer-cum-gigolo Randy—to act as his sort of socio-political mouthpiece. Indeed, in a somewhat preachy scene, the character states in between literally snorting lines of cocaine to Betty, "Well, they outta legalize everything in this country. That's what Philip says. Take it out of the hands of the criminals. You know...prostitution, drugs [...] But I guess there's so much money to be made. Philip has this theory, see, that, uh, the moral majority—whether they know it or not—is being funded by the mafia so that they can keep everything [that is] sinful illegal so that they can clean-up. Big business, you know. Thirty million Americans snort cocaine." Of course, as someone that apparently hosted Hollywood homo orgies, it is not hard to see why Bridges supported the legalization of drugs and prostitution as he personally witnessed the totally senseless demise of people like Mike and his friends in real-life. After all, it is no coincidence that Randy complains during the same scene, "It's been a weird week. I've known two people personally that got murdered this week. They were both drug related," just as it is probably no coincidence that Bridges got Mark Keyloun to play the titular character as the actor previously played alongside a then-unknown Kevin Bacon as a gay-for-pay hustler in Paul Morrissey's similarly underrated Forty Deuce (1982).

Not unlike Morrissey, Bridges was an auteur that was first and foremost a filmmaker and not a 'fag filmmaker' that emphasized a subversive socio-sexual agenda over an artistic one. In fact, the great irony of a marginal film like Mike's Murder is that it would have never been made had Bridges not received a great commercial success with his Travolta vehicle Urban Cowboy (1980). Rather unfortunately, the current cut of Mike's Murder that exists is not the film that Bridges originally intended as the studio Warner Brothers hated the director's original cut and refused to release it until the director made some drastic changes in regard to multiple aspects of the film. For example, the film apparently originally had a narrative structure comparable to Gaspar Noé's Irréversible (2002) in that events were depicted in a chronologically backward fashion. Arguably most infuriatingly of all, the eponymous murder scene was also cut from the film, or as star Mark Keyloun revealed in a 2015 interview featured at TVStoreOnline Blog, "And what happened to MIKE'S MURDER, basically, is that when it came time to test-screen the film, the studio put it in front of an audience in some upscale Northern California county. Because of the blood and sex—the film didn't receive a favorable review. I think, that Bridges and the producers ran scared. They went back into the editing room and cut out all of the good stuff. They cut out all the stuff that made the film great. They re-oriented the film, from a point-of-view that sanitized the whole thing. The irony of that—Pacino's SCARFACE (1983) had just come out. There's a scene in there with Pacino and some guys cutting up a person in a bathtub with a chainsaw. The producers and Bridges cut out my character's murder—where he was cut-up with a knife in a apartment with blood flying all over. They cut out the butchery, and the sex. There was a bunch more sex in the film that was cut out, and how do you sell a film without the violence and the sex? (laughing)." As far as what the murder scene was like, Keyloun also explained in the same interview, "Mike was stabbed in the chest. It was very graphic. There was cow blood being spewed all over the walls. Mike was stabbed and his throat is cut. He got stabbed multiple times and blood was spraying all over. That was the most-effective part of the sequence. They filmed me flailing around on the floor in slow-motion with blood squirting out of my chest." Rather sadly, aside from the murder scene being excised, a number of sex scenes were also cut, including Keyloun pounding Winger's puss doggy-style. Somewhat ironically, the film would probably be better known today had Bridges not followed the studio's demands and cut out all of the murder, mayhem, and mammary glands.

Also, less interestingly, the original musical score by English musician Joe Jackson was replaced with a score by English composer John Barry. Of course, both of these musicians seem rather banal when one considers that the film features an unintentionally humorous cameo from 'Spazz Attack' (real name Craig Allen Rothwell), who was featured in David Bowie's Glass Spiders tour of 1988, appeared as a 'demon alien' in Tony Basil's "Space Girls" music video, and is probably best known for his relationship with DEVO (aside from appearing in a couple of their music videos, he portrayed their iconic quasi-mascot 'Booji Boy' during one of their tours). Notably, during his brief appearance in the film, Spazz Attack states, "Art has always been an expression of the backs of people's minds—what they conceive life to actually be." Of course, Mike's Murder is, if nothing else, an expression of Bridges's mind and the unsentimental way he conceived life to actually be. In that sense, aside from September 30, 1955, most of Bridges's other films seem like well constructed hack work by comparison. After all, while his hits like The Paper Chase and Urban Cowboy are technically more immaculate in terms of their pacing and overall construction, they lack the authenticity and sincerity of Mike's Murder (though one must admit that most of these films have certain 'queer' sensibilities). As a filmmaker, Bridges can be seen as a sort of gay Robert Redford as purveyor of middlebrow (melo)drama that is meant to tickle the painfully average intellects of the largely culturally retarded American bourgeoisie. Naturally, what makes Mike's Murder stand out is that it transcends simple bourgeois bullshit and tells the sort of sickly sordid story that borders on hybristophilia. Additionally, the film features the sort of emotive hustler worship that is typical of early Gus Van Sant films like Mala Noche (1985) and especially My Own Private Idaho (1991).

In terms of films featuring the heterosexual horrors of a woman having to cope with the great shock of fact that her beau is also a cocksucker, the subgenre has very few entries and includes films as diverse as John Schlesinger's Sunday Bloody Sunday (1971), Jacques Scandelari's Monique (1978) aka Flashing Lights, Arthur Hiller's Making Love (1982), and Cyril Collard's Les Nuits Fauves (1992) aka Savage Nights, among various other examples. Undoubtedly, what makes Mike's Murder different from all these films is that it takes a more satisfying slow-burning approach to revealing the revelation that the heroine's lover was a prick-peddler (of course, the fact that a middle-aged negro was in love with him makes this reveal all the more awkward and disturbing). Interestingly, not unlike Fassbinder's cryptically autobiographical Sapphic melodrama The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), Mike's Murder is based on a true story where the genders of the characters were changed, or as actor Dan Shor explained in an interview, "MIKE'S MURDER was based on a real guy that [director] Jim Bridges knew. The film was an investigation into the gay community of Los Angeles of that time. Debra Winger was really playing a guy in the film, and Mike, Mark Keyloun, was essentially playing a male hooker [...] You got the sense that my character was unsuccessful with everyone, compared to the character of Mike—who was like the Brigitte Bardot of the film.” Indeed, there is no doubt that Bridges’ camera worships Keyloun the same way that Roger Vadim’s did in iconic Bardot vehicles like ...And God Created Woman (1956).

In fact, the facts revolving around the real Mike are eerily similar to the film as revealed by Bridge’s longtime lover and the film’s associate producer Jack Larson, who explained in an interview, “Mark was a terrific, eager, and dedicated young man. I think he may have been from Baltimore originally. Paul Winfield, years prior, had met Mark while he was in Baltimore shooting a film. They met, and Mark expressed an interest in working in films to Paul, but not as an actor. Both Jim [Bridges] and I knew Paul well, because he had been around town for many years, he had done a play that I had written, and also a play that Jim had written prior to the shooting of MIKE’S MURDER. So both Jim and I knew him fairly well, and through Paul, we both got to know Mark Bernalack. Paul had brought Mark out to Los Angeles from Baltimore, and he moved into Paul’s house. Mark was extraordinarily handsome, and indeed, he did start to get jobs on films as a crew member after he came out here. He stayed with Paul for a while, and after he had enough money to get on his feet, he moved out of Paul’s house and took an apartment in Brentwood—where Jim and I lived. It was in the heart of Brentwood near Sunset and Barrington. There was a tennis court around there, and when Jim and I would drive down Barrington we would often see Mark teaching tennis at those particular courts. In fact, those courts on Barrington are the same courts that we used to shoot the scenes with Mark [Keyloun] and Debra [Winger] in MIKE’S MURDER. Mark was a great tennis player. He was an ace. And he was obviously a locale Lothario to all the single girls in that area. And he would often have a bandana around his head while he was playing. He was very gallant looking [...] Mark had been savagely murdered at his apartment in Brentwood. It was all over the papers and on the television. It was a horror. Everyone that knew Mark, liked him. We were all stunned. The newspapers said that he was a drug dealer. He wasn’t. I mean, Mark didn’t ever have enough money at one time to buy himself a car. He wasn’t a drug dealer, but there were two guys, who were African-Americans, who I guess, were drug dealers—they confronted him at his apartment and Mark was murdered. Jim was very haunted by it. It was because of how Mark was called a drug dealer in the newspapers. That was very sad to him. The papers portrayed Mark’s murder as if it was a good thing because he was a drug dealer.” Certainly, one must salute Bridges for his racial realism in terms of staying true to the historical facts and depicting the killers as young negroes, which probably would not happen nowadays due to Hollywood’s commitment to propping up so-called minorities, especially blacks. Although gay, Mike’s Murder is certainly not plagued by political correctness, especially when it comes to gay characters. Indeed, from a middle-aged gay alcoholic photographer named Sam that creepily secretly takes photos of the young man he lusts after to the glaring white slave dynamic that seems to be the most defining trait of wealthy negro Philip's personal life, Bridges' film paints a particularly pathetic portrait of homo Hollywood.

Of course, more than a murder mystery, the film carries the simple yet important message that if you hang around shit long enough, you start to smell, hence the brutal demise of Mike and the precarious situation that his dubious personal relationships put his lover Betty in. In short, heterosexual Mike has his life completely destroyed as a result of entering the cocaine-driven cocksucking realm. Notably, Bridges' film is not the only movie of the 1980s that depicts such a scenario as Marek Kaniévská's uneven Bret Easton Ellis adaptation Less Than Zero (1987) stars Robert Downey Jr. as a self-destructive cokehead that eventually betrays his heterosexuality and begins giving and receiving head from fags as a means to fund his ultimately fatal drug addiction. Ironically, director Bridges' degenerate lifestyle and dubious personal relationships resulted in what is the greatest and most intriguing film of his filmmaking career, thus making it all the more tragic that the film only exists today in a butchered cut that both associate producer Larson (who apparently owns a copy of the director's cut) and star Winger agree is inferior to the original director's cut. Needless to say, the Criterion Collection needs to get in contact with Larson so that we can finally see the release of cinema history's greatest bisexual murder mystery as it was originally intended to be. A very, very long time ago in 1939, the American revolutionary Francis Parker Yockey wrote while still in college, "Appalling numbers of youth have been led into a cynical ultra-sophisticated attitude which regards drinking as a badge of social aptitude, which makes a fetish of sport and professes eroticism as a way of life. A perverted and insane pictorial art, lewd exhibitionistic dancing and jungle music form the spiritual norm of this sector of America's youth." Of course, even Yockey could not have predicted a titular character as stupidly tragic as the titular character of Mike's Murder. Undoubtedly, what makes the film so intriguing is that it has a sort of paradoxical morality that seems to both embrace and decry the sort of hyper hedonistic homosexuality lifestyle it depicts, but I guess one not expect anything less from the auteur piece of a closeted gay man. Either way, the titular character and his friends are certainly plagued with an all the more apocalyptically degenerate version of the nihilistic social attitude that Yockey warned of.

James Broughton (1972)

Contrary to common belief, free-love-loving hippie nudist pagans were not born in late-1960s southern California but in fin-de-Siècle Germany during the late-1890s/early-1900s among Teutonic Art Nouveau artists like Karl Wilhelm Diefenbach and 'Fidus' (aka Hugo Reinhold Karl Johann Höppener), as well as the overlapping 'Wandervogel' youth movement, who promoted various forms of 'Lebensreform' ("life-reform"), including vegetarianism, nudism, natural medicine, communitarianism, sexual reform, and various other forms of pagan-inspired social reform. Indeed, it should be no surprise that German novelist Hermann Hesse—a favorite writer among American hippies during the late-1960s—was a proto-hippie of sorts who got involved with the Wandervogel movement in 1907 after seeing four longhaired goofy krauts sporting Jesus sandals walking through his village on their way to Ascona, Switzerland who ultimately cured him of his alcoholism using natural methods. Between 1895 and 1914, tens of thousands of Teutons left the Fatherland for America and some Wandervogel types landed in sunny Southern California where figures such as Saxony-born proto-hippie Bill Pešter and husband and wife café owners John and Vera Richter imported their 'Naturmensch' and 'Lebensreform' philosophies, which were adopted by locals, including recently arrived Brooklyn-bred McJewish songwriter Eden Ahbez, whose song "Nature Boy", which became a No. 1 hit for eight weeks in 1948 after it was recorded by Nat "King" Cole of all people, promoted the Teutonic weltanschauung. Indeed, the iconic image of tanned longhaired blond surfer dudes that people associated with California was a direct result of the Wandervogel movement, which would also ironically influence National Socialism due to its romanticism, nationalism, and paganism, so it is quite depressing that it would take on a completely degenerated form in America like the 'new age' counterculture cocksucker group the Radical Faeries, whose early poet James Broughton's late-1960s/early-1970s films seem like the closest thing to a Fidus painting in celluloid form.

A proto-Beat poet descended from opulent bankers who actually shoved his cock inside of kosher film critic Pauline Kael (who, despite what some of her more queenish detractors have said, was a fag hag of sorts), even producing a mischling spawn that he would abandon before she was even born, Broughton, who once wrote regarding the importance of film in his life, "Cinema saved me from suicide when I was 32 by revealing to me a wondrous reality: the love between fellow artists," first made a big wave in the cinema world with his 38-minute 35mm short The Pleasure Garden (1953)—a work filmed in England that features British filmmaker Lindsay Anderson—which was awarded a prize at the Cannes Film Festival by none other than Jean Cocteau. Today, Broughton is probably best remembered, if at all outside of gay academic circles, among cinephiles for his counterculture short The Bed (1968)—a work that asks and then answers the question, “What can happen to and on a bed?” that features cowboys sleeping with their boots on, dope-smoking beatniks, Mammy-like ‘diva’ negresses with mammoth mammary glands, and various people whose dangling genitals betray their general appearances—which, despite being a mere 22-minutes in length, is notable for featuring quite arguably the most nudity in a single film at the time of its release (unsurprisingly, Broughton had to have the film developed at a lab used by pornographers and other smut-peddlers). Somewhat in the aesthetic tradition of The Bed due to its outdoor wooded setting, various unclad longhaired hippie types, and paganiſtic counterculture-inspired spirit, Dreamwood (1972)—a sort of Jungian celluloid trance featuring a hodge-podge of various ancient myths—is most certainly Broughton’s magnum opus and a work that, despite featuring unclad dyke-like chicks and a cross-dressing longhaired bearded fellow that looks like a member of the drag troupe the Cockettes, is probably the closest a film has ever come to capturing the aesthetic and spirit of the Wandervogel movement, thus also making it probably the only cinematic work that would appeal to both old school hippies and völkisch neo-Nazis who worship Wotan.

Before watching Dreamwood, I had no idea that it was directed by a man that banged Hebraic hag Pauline Kael, abandoned his wife and children at age 61 to get with a 26-year-old homo heeb homewrecker, and was a member of the dreaded Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence (SPI) whose alpha-vulgarian members dress up in radically repugnant low-camp nun drag getups mocking the Catholic Church (rather unfortunately, British auteur Derek Jarman is one of their ‘saints’). Indeed, aside from a moment of camp or two, Dreamwood seems to channel the neo-pagan romanticism that inspired the likes of Fidus, Jung, and Hesse. Originally intended as a variation on the Theseus myth, the film alludes to several classic myths, including Hippolytus, Apollo, Sisyphus, and Narcissus, but as P. Adams Sitney wrote in his groundbreaking work Visionary Film: The American Avant-Garde, 1943-2000 (2002) regarding these mythical references, “...these allusions become witty intrusions into the otherwise thoroughly personalized vision; they are, in fact, the only vestiges of the ironic self-mockery which abounds in all of Broughton’s earlier films. As a total work, DREAMWOOD occupies the space between the trance film and the mythopoeic cinema, much as Maya Deren’s RITUAL IN TRANSFIGURED TIME had, but from the retrospective rather than the anticipatory position.” Like Cocteau meets post-Wandervogel counterculture drunk on Jung and naked Riefenſtahl-esque bodies, Dreamwood arguably comes closer to any film in conjuring up a truly organic American folk spirit, even if it is totally imaginary and only existed in the director’s own mind. The esoteric story of a young ‘Nature Boy’-like poet who leaves the technocratic world behind and sails to a mystical forest where he must go through four initiations before his Jungian “anima” (the feminine inner personality of the male) is united with his body in a “sacred marriage” that is “blessed by sun and moon,” Dreamworld is a somewhat healthy reminder that hermetic knowledge can have a much greater influence on a person’s artistic creativity than any sort of psychedelic drug. Indeed, despite being directed by a gay over-the-hill hippie, Broughton’s film would more or less be perfectly understood by the followers of eccentric Chilean sage Miguel Serrano, who was not only a comrade of Jung and Hesse, but whose brand of ‘Esoteric Hitlerism’ is Jungian to the core.

As auteur Broughton narrates at the beginning of the film, “Somewhere there is a forest, somewhere at the center of the world, there is a forest of the dream, a sacred wood, a grove of initiation. Somewhere there is what has always been, the treasure hard to obtain, the lair of the great goddess, the bed of the ultimate rapture.” This exceedingly enchanted magical forest is called ‘Dreamwood’ and after enduring a spiritual crisis in his tower that results in him ‘throwing away’ his truly angelic ‘anima’ as portrayed by a beautiful brunette broad who resembles a sort of pagan princess, a poet travels there by sailboat with his doppelganger during a night sea journey. Indeed, the Poet hates the modern world and after seeing his anima appear in a post-industrial landscape, he cannot seem to get her out of his head. When the Poet sees the anima appear in a Wandervogel-esque poster of himself hanging on the inside wall of his shabby tower, he freaks out, tears up the poster, and throws the pieces out of his humble abode, but when they hit the ground, they turn into the living anima, who is abducted and escorted away in a car by two elderly old farts of the seemingly sinister sort known as the ‘First Parents.’ The Poet decides to follow his anima and sails to an island overnight with the help of a doppelganger-like dude. Upon arriving at the seemingly barren island, the Poet climbs a rocky mountain where he soon encounters an old wench known as the ‘Helpful Crone’ who gives him a bracelet and axe like some helpful character out of one of the various The Legend of Zelda videogames. The Poet uses the axe to chop up the mirror, furniture, and creepy body of a revoltingly effete, materialistic, and narcissistic tranny known as the ‘Terrible Mother-Father’ who tries to hold him back in his spiritual quest by offering him fancy jewelry and other spiritually worthless material trinkets (Broughton was known to have serious mommy issues as is especially apparent in his 1948 film Mother’s Day). From there, the Poet begins to enter the forest, but before he can receive complete entry, he must strip in front of ‘Mother Superior’—a rather manly and seemingly brazenly bitchy nun whose rather rough face betrays her feminine body—who also strips. After the nun strips and tosses her nun garb over the Poet’s head, he finally awakes in the forest and prepares for his four initiations.

Upon entering the forest, the Poet is violently attacked by a gang of jolly yet violent unclad children in a scene that is reminiscent of Louis Malle’s dark Lewis Carroll-esque fantasy flick Black Moon (1975), but that does not stop him. The Poet also encounters stunning naked nymphs bathing in a stream so he does the same and soon he encounters Artemis, but he makes the mistake of attempting to touch her and is subsequently nearly drowned after she dunks him under the water. After awakening from his near drowning, the Poet finds himself lying on a rock outside the forest again and he soon reenters, but not before whipping a leather-clad S&M she-bitch dominatrix named 'Hippolyta' with her own whip and then throwing it at her. In the forest, the Poet soon encounters Alchemina, who emerges from a rock with a gigantic sunflower in her hand and plays various games with him, including robbing him of his clothes. Ultimately, Alchemina leads the Poet to lecherous wench Lilith who is aided by two equally unclad homos sporting goofy face makeup.

While Lilith's man-slaves hold the Poet down, she mercilessly fucks him as a foggy haze engulfs his body. After being carnally manhandled to the point of losing consciousness, the Poet once again awakens outside of the forest and attempts to reenter it but his progress is temporarily deterred by a 'woodsman' that resembles a hippie lumberjack who is the protagonist's virtual doppelganger, albeit slightly more masculine. Although initially attempting to brutally beat the Poet, the rugged Woodsman soon realizes that he is his brother and then leads him through the forest where both men magically lose their clothes somewhere on the way. The Woodsman takes the Poet to a somewhat rocky area with dead trees where he encounters a creepy looking bitch with a translucent serial killer-esque mask covered in proto-Gothic bone jewelry named 'Old Queen Hecate.' Somewhat reluctantly, the Poet literally enters Hecate's cunt (!) during an inverse birth scenario and subsequently awakes deep in the forest aka 'Green Chapel' reborn. To consummate his love affair with the forest and the Goddess Mother Nature, the Poet disrobes and begins quite literally fucking the ground to the point of spilling his seed inside the soil in a scenario that would anticipate the 'ecosexuality' hardcore flicks of Semitic Sapphic porn star Annie Sprinkle, but not before blessing it with his urine and feces(!) in a completely unsimulated scene of scatological proportions. By fucking Mother Nature, he is finally able to accept his 'anima,' which enters his body in a "sacred marriage" that is blessed by the sun and moon as depicted in the following shot of the film where they enter his chest.

Unquestionably, avant-garde film historian P. Adams Sitney probably paid Broughton's Dreamwood the greatest tribute when he wrote that, "No single film in the whole of the American avant-garde comes as close as this one to the source of the trance film, Cocteau's Le Sang d'un Poète." Of course, in its graphic depiction of the poet protagonist urinating and defecating on the ground of a forest before sticking his cock into it, Broughton's film could be renamed The Poop and Piss of a Poet as a work that certainly reflects the "if it feels good, do it" counter-culture libertine pseudo-philosophy that was quite vogue at the time the work was made. It is interesting to note that while Broughton's work and brand of spirituality have been fairly forgotten, even with the rise of gay power bullshit, cine-magician Kenneth Anger—another west coast filmmaker who personally received support from Jean Cocteau—and his Thelema-themed films seem to have only become all the more popular over the past couple of decades. Somewhat recently, a couple queer documentarians did Broughton a great disservice with the superlatively sentimental poof-power hagiography Big Joy: The Adventures of James Broughton (2013), which is less about the filmmaker's films than about why he is a homo hero because he abandoned his wife and kids at 61 to start a lurid love affair with a nice 26-year-old Jewish boy named Joel Singer. Notably, the decidedly deluded doc makes no reference to Broughton's magnum opus Dreamwood and instead dwells on lesser works like Devotions (1983) featuring elderly queer couples naked in bed with their pet dog and a leather-fag couple having a romantic night out on the town, as well as the filmmaker frolicking around gaily with his much younger and assumedly more depraved boy toy Singer (who co-directed the film, as well as two of Broughton's later works, including Song of the Godbody (1977) and Scattered Remains (1988)). If you're interested in seeing the best of celluloid hippie homo hermeticism or, more importantly, want to see the sort of film that Fidus might have directed had he been a filmmaker instead of a painter, Dreamwood is nothing short of mandatory viewing and certainly a work that needs to be salvaged from obscurity before it is forever regulated to the celluloid trash heap of history like so many other American avant-garde works.

TERMINATOR 2: JUDGMENT DAY

If you have not seen this film, I want you to do either one of two things. 1) Kill yourself or B) Go buy this now. Without any doubt in my mind, T2 is one of the greatest action films, rivaled only by the likes of the original Die Hard and First Blood. Arnold Schwarzenegger has sealed his place in the action gods hall of fame. Not only is this man a governor, but he also beats women and other various illegal things! Yes! Following the events of the original Terminator film, the T-800 is sent back, but this time, to protect the young rebel John Conner (Played by a pre-pubescent Edward Furlong.) Not only does this prove to be infinitely challenging when a bad ass T-1000 (Robert Patrick) is sent to destroy him with a morphing body which challenges the kickass-itude of Carnage's ability in the Marvel Universe. I'm passionate about this film for several reasons. It is the very rare film that can be called an enormous multi-tasker. I laughed, I cried, I was on the edge of my seat, and much much much more emotions were present. T2 (That sounds so perfect) is that one film that was made with a perfect mind for merchandising. 12' Battle Damaged T-800 was among one of the greatest action figures I ever owned. Robert Patrick (Known for his amazing portrayal as Kogo Shuko in Double Dragon) is the "EVEN MORRRE POWERFUL" villain this time. It must really suck to be the Governator. He is always fighting shit heftier than him, sans Commando. Homosexual ex-partners don't put up much of a challenge. The entire craft of this film is built around several things. Whether it's the annoying as hell voice crackling of Furlong, the astounding soundtrack which perfectly compliments the action, or the menacing T-1000 in all his impaling glory, T2 was, and is, an instant classic. T2 did indeed win 4 Oscars which is still pretty bizarre to me. Then I watch Three Six Mafia win an Oscar, then it seems completely fine. I remember the nightmare scene of Sarah Conner horrifying me as a child. The instant when flames ravage the playground and incinerate Sarah Conner is enough to make any young child a temporary insomniac. The visual extravaganza that is T-1000 is executed brilliantly in several scenes. Among my favorite are his hook grips falling on the roadways only to morph into a blob to rejoin the host, and the infamous coffee grabbing security guard scene which made me want to stab people with my fucking arm. Speaking of arms, the props were simply amazing. The O.J. Simpson guy did a wonderful job at sweating and breathing really hard. That's all I can really applaud him on. T2 is in fact, a timeless film. Most things age well, like wine. I'd love to compare T2 to an aged yet exquisite wine, but T2 does not age. You can watch this film right now, and still be blown away by the effects and a time where action didn't include oriental choreographers teaching everyone Kung-Fu. As John McClane once put it, "Screw all this Kung-Fu bullshit" or something like that. I don't exactly remember cause that film was edited.

THE ALUMINUM FOWL

James Clauer (2006)

The Aluminum Fowl is a nice strange documentary about some bizarre rural and rambunctious Negroes directed by newcomer James Clauer. It seems junkie (or former junkie) auteur Harmony Korine has taken up the profession of producing. Korine with O'Salvation, unsurprisingly produced The Aluminum Fowl. Judging by its style, I wouldn't be surprised if Harmony Korine dictated to director James Clauer what to do with the film. The Aluminum Fowl is certainly a project that has many of Korine's odd but refreshing obsessions in it. The black brothers featured in The Aluminum Fowl love chicken. They love chicken so much that they are even willing to comb chickens feathers while laying in bathtubs. Sadly, some of the brothers aren't as keen on chickens and have them fight each other. Thankfully, due to the sometimes undecipherable dialogue spoken by the subjects of The Aluminum Fowl, the short features much needed subtitles. These subtitles come in handy as I was able to confirm that a young assumed mulatto stated, "Hell I'd fight anything just to see it killed." These are profound words coming from a fine gentlemen that looks like an overweight version of Steve Urkel.

The Aluminum Fowl features a trailer park fight sign that seems to remember the brother skinhead fight featured in Harmony Korine's Gummo. Like Gummo, The Aluminum Fowl makes it known that those that live in the impoverished South are extremely bored and have to invent dangerous activities for fun. Naturally, the brothers of The Aluminum Fowl have the same mother but different fathers. This brotherly biological diversity has created quite an eclectic family of brothers of the same mother. Being someone from a more rural area below the Mason Dixon line, I have met many different black brothers with different fathers. I recall three black brothers, all different ages, but all in the same grade. City fags from the North seem to lack a certain intimacy with the Negro than those from the South. Instead of sporting bling, a young black man named Travis sports Aluminum foil so as to obtain trailer park playa status. Travis also knows how to ride a bike like he just stole it successfully from the local K-Mart. Trash burning also becomes a local sport and favorite past time of these abstract black men. These brothers really know how to take advantage and destroy their natural habitat for their own pleasure. May Jesus Christ give them a hand for their accomplishments. The Aluminum Fowl is another example of art fags turning what would be considered the lowest point on American culture and turning it into art. The reality is however, the rural areas are where real culture (despite its "quality") exists and the city is where culture dies. Despite how backwards a southern rural area may be, it still has a sense of organic community and with that cultural fruits. From my experience, the city is a place of alienation and cosmopolitan materialism. It is no surprise that liberal "liberators" come from the cities as they don't believe in culture. If they have the slightest inkling that culture may exist, their materialist ways seek to stomp it out. The world of Harmony Korine's Gummo and James Clauer's The Aluminum Fowl, despite their backwardness, are worlds where "culture" still reigns.

AUTOMATONS

James Felix McKenney (2006)

Hollywood has been defecating out Armageddon and apocalyptic scenario films for decades now. The past couple years have seen an array of these anxiety promoting films. I personally find most of these movies to be complete trash and reflective of America's (and abroad) apathy towards the continuation of mankind. There seems to be an irrational excitement involved with knowing that the world is about to end. I finally came upon an refreshingly original apocalyptic themed film and it certainly did not come out of Hollywood. The title of this micro-budget film is Automaton. Automaton is a gritty black and white film that looks like it was actually shot in a bomb shelter after an apocalyptic event with the only available resources the survivors could find. The film has a similar aesthetic to Shinya Tsukamoto's Tetsuo: Iron Man. Automaton also features a cyberpunk-like score that you would expect to hear in a Japanese cyberpunk flick. Like Tetsuo, Automaton is also set in a postmodern world of technological equipment overflow. A world where technology has physically and mentally overwhelmed man. Phantasm tall man Angus Scrimm lends his charismatic linguistic talents to Automaton. Scrimm plays a scientist who has witnessed the dawn of "The Robot War." He speaks out through a grainy television screen with words of hope for human survival. Scrimm's wise words appear throughout the film allowing both the viewer and the film's female protagonist know that they are not alone. I personally wouldn't mind having Angus Scrimm's voice guiding me through such catastrophic times. Automaton is the kind of film that is a testament to one individual's drive to get their obsessive vision made. Writer, editor, and director James Felix McKenney can be considered an unconventional individual as Automaton's unique feel reflects. I don't think many filmmakers aspire to make films featuring small metal toy robots fighting, featuring special effects that have a similar look to store bought sparklers (maybe they were?). Automaton is a labor of love of the underground sci-fi geek kind. Automaton is like The Terminator with a low budget tin man's heart. Don't expect to be "wowed" with big special effects and nonstop action. Automaton's strengths lie in the film's somewhat hopeful message and bomb shelter aesthetic. It may be the end of the world, but you won't be lonely when you have Angus Scrimm guiding you through it.

INTERIOR. LEATHER BAR.

James Franco* (2013)

Fuck The Exorcist (1973), I think Cruising (1980) is easily the most aesthetically/thematically audacious and least monetary-motivated film Hollywood Hebrew auteur William Friedkin (The French Connection, Sorcerer) has ever directed, so naturally I was intrigued upon learning that the obscenely popular mainstream actor James Franco was purportedly directing a film based on 40 minutes of documentary-like S&M scenes cut from the infamous leather-fag slasher flick. Of course, like so many other people that heard about Franco's film, Interior. Leather Bar. (2013) aka James Franco's Cruising, I did not realize that it was not really actual straight interpretation of the scenes cut from Cruising, but a postmodern pseudo-documentary film-within-a-film about the Hollywood star turned auteur and his gay hipster co-director Travis Mathews (I Want Your Love, In Their Room: London) ostensibly 'playing themselves' and documenting themselves making a "re-imagined idea" about what the deleted scenes from Cruising might have been like. In short, Interior. Leather Bar. is a piece of patently pretentious pomo homo pseudo-intellectual posturing featuring a couple minutes of the re-imagined Cruising scenes co-directed by a hot Hollywood celeb who wants to prove he has no problem watching homos giving each other head and whatnot. Franco began his directing career with the crappy comedy The Ape (2005), which mixes a gorilla suit with a pseudo-Allen-esque tribute to Russian literature, and made a couple more forgettable/unseen non-gay-themed features since then, but ever since directing the homoerotic short The Feast of Stephen (2009)—a rather unfortunate tribute to Kenneth Anger featuring pedomorphic brown boys—he has almost exclusively focused on queer-themed material of the rather contrived sort. With his black-and-white feature The Broken Tower (2011)—a work that the auteur not surprisingly created as his graduate school thesis project at NYC—Franco portrayed the gay American poet Hart Crane and even gives head to another man (a prosthetic prick was used, of course) in what is easily one of the most aesthetically barren and eclectically vapid 'avant-garde' features I have ever seen. With My Own Private River (2012), he paid tribute to River Phoenix's role as a gay hustler in Gus van Sant's My Own Private Idaho (1991) by simply re-editing the film in a seemingly Asperger-addled fashion where Phoenix is the focus and Keanu Reeves is mostly cut out. Undoubtedly, what virtually all of Franco's films demonstrate is that he might know more about queer cinema than the average Brokeback Mountain (2005) fan yet he does not seem to have a personal vision nor original ideas of his own, so he simply caters to the preposterously politically correct LGBT-cuckolded sensibilities of mainstream film critics to prove he is an 'edgy' and 'open-minded' artiste and not a spoiled Hollywood superstar who has enough money to do whatever he wants whenever he wants. Indeed, at best, Interior. Leather Bar. seems like a fanboy film school project that goes so far as to liberalize, multiculturalize, and metrosexualize Friedkin's original film to the point where it lacks any of the true anti-p.c. gay grit of Cruising.

After beginning with an inter-title revealing that Cruising was plagued by protests (homos thought it was homophobic), that director William Friedkin received death threats, and 40 minutes of the film (which has never been publicly shown and is now assumed lost) was cut to avoid an X rating, Interior. Leather Bar. cuts to co-directors James Franco and Travis Mathews as they discuss 're-imagining' the long lost scenes of Cruising. Seemingly like a fidgety stoner who needs to smoke a bowl, Franco mentions how he was partly inspired to direct the film after reading his homo professor Michael Warner's book The Trouble with Normal: Sex, Politics, and the Ethics of Queer Life (2000) and coming to the realization that gay marriage might go against the original anti-bourgeois spirit of true queer politics. While I concur with Franco, Interior. Leather Bar. could not be any more politically correct and socially accessible. For their re-imagining, the filmmakers make the would-be-provocative decision to cast mostly heterosexual actors in the roles, including a seemingly gay but apparently married heterosexual fellow named Val (played by Franco's real-life friend Val Lauren who played the eponymous lead in Franco's 2011 Sal Mineo biopic Sal)—a man of dubious racial origin who seems to have as much testosterone as Richard Simmons—to play Al Pacino's character from Cruising. As the director wants the viewer to know, hysterical homophobia is lurking everywhere as demonstrated by the fact that Val gets an urgent call from a friend who demonstrates concern for his friend playing a leather-fag in a movie by stating, "I know you're at the Franco-fag project today and I gotta tell ya man, I don't know where your head is on this and I think we really need to talk about this right away." Homos are not the only ones who feel Franco's intentions with the film are dubious, as gay extras on the film question why a heterosexual would want to make a gay film. In a nice nod to Franco's unprejudiced narcissism, the extras also discuss how they hope the director gets naked in the film, which, of course, he does not do (in fact, Franco seems M.I.A. anytime gay sex scenes are shot). When star Val discusses his feeling of unease being around guys fisting each other in the ass and whatnot, Franco becomes pseudo-irate and goes on a rant where he complains: "Here's how I feel... I don't like the fact that I feel like I have been brought up to think a certain way. I don't like thinking that. I don't like realizing that my mind has been twisted by the way the world has been setup around me and what that is, is straight, normative, kind of behavior...and its fucking instilled into my fucking brain." Indeed, Franco seems to believe that bareback buttfucking, fisting, and gay orgies should be everyday images that should bother no one, especially heterosexual men who like big tits and asses. As a man brainwashed by the pink fascist LGBT beast, Franco cannot handle the fact that seeing a man plowing another man's bunghole is not 'normative' enough for him or something. In the end, two erect dicks are shown and the emotionally and physically debased Star Val gets all moody broody as a fellow who has ultimately been debased and has his masculinity undermined for the sake of pseudo-fag Franco's 'art.'

Admittedly, I wanted to like Interior. Leather Bar., but it ultimately felt like a piss poor premature ejaculation from two hipster fanboys with seemingly nil life experience and a pedantic understanding of queer cinema history. Featuring a largely effeminate multicultural cast and none of the naughty neo-fascist imagery associated with the clubs of Friedkin's film, Interior. Leather Bar. ultimately seems like a parody of what two politically correct poofs might calculatingly direct so as not to offend the ass-munching authoritarian gatekeepers of mainstream gaydom. Pseudo-Godardian behind-the-scenes banality of the redundantly reflexive and mind numbingly banal yet academically vogue 'meta-filmmaking' variety, Interior. Leather Bar. is certainly a film that will bore to death most of its target audiences (i.e. filmmakers, leather-fags, cinephiles, Francophiles, etc.), most especially loyal Cruising fans like myself. Not surprisingly, in April 2013, James Franco was awarded the so-called "Ally Award" at the 15th annual Miami Gay & Lesbian Film Festival, thus proving his servile celluloid ass-licking of the politically powerfully sodomite community has paid off. After watching Interior. Leather Bar., I decided to view Franco's most recent auteur piece As I Lay Dying (2013)—a jumbled mess that attempts to juggle Faulkner, the iconic spit-screen technique of Warhol and Paul Morrissey's Chelsea Girls (1966), and Hollywood Heebys playing hapless impoverished hicks—and it proved to be a totally unwatchable mess of a movie without any objective aside from demonstrating the director is classy enough to cinematically adapt classic American literature in a would-be-avant-garde fashion. A mockery of a mockumentary posing as chic postmodern queer theory swill co-directed by the sort of brainwashed morons that use made-up fag fascist words like 'heteronormative' in a sad slave-morality-driven attempt to molest and sodomize language itself to 'empower' the already preposterously empowered, Interior. Leather Bar. is a marvelously mundane manipulation of cinema as well that does not attempt anything that was not done half a century ago by Godard, Jean-Marie Straub, and other soulless and intellectually masturbatory pansy postmodernist filmmakers who get a pathetic kick out of alienating viewers. Indeed, if you're looking for real gritty and uncompromising celluloid leather-faggotry, make sure to skip Franco's failed film-within-a-film and hunt down Jacques Scandolari's New York City Inferno (1978) aka Cock Tales, which probably offers more than what you expect the 40 minutes of missing scenes from Cruising might be like as a recklessly wanton work that features real Greenwich Village-based sado-masochistic sodomites engaging in what they do best. Additionally, contemporary queer art-porn auteur filmmakers Todd Verow (Frisk, Bottom X) and Bruce LaBruce (Hustler White, The Raspberry Reich) have been doing what Franco and Mathew attempted with Interior. Leather Bar. for decades and I must admit they certainly do it much better. Of course, what should one expect from an actor who seems at his best playing degenerate stoners as demonstrated by his roles in Freaks and Geeks (1999–2000), Pineapple Express (2008), and Spring Breakers (2013). Indeed, at best, Franco's attempt at becoming a controversial avant-garde auteur seems nothing more than another scripted role played by the swarthy pretty boy actor and until he develops a real vision and complex Weltanschauung as all great filmmakers do as opposed to pandering to mainstream queers and leftist intellectuals, his cinematic works will never amount to much more than soulless celluloid exercises in poof puffery and shallow con-artistry.

CHILD OF GOD

James Franco* (2014)

For the past couple years or so, I have been passively watching the progression of A List star James Franco's career from dopey Hollywood pothead heartthrob to ostensibly serious self-funded arthouse auteur and thus far I have not liked much of what I have seen. Indeed, from his mundanely minimalistic Sal Mineo biopic Sal (2011) to his pathetically pretentious pomo homo piece of senseless sod-saluting shit Interior. Leather Bar. (2013), Franco has demonstrated he is an art film hack who is still making highly derivative formative works despite the fact that he directed his first feature The Ape (2005)—a horrendous hipster indie comedy featuring a 'cool' ape that would make Marco Ferreri cringe in disgust—nearly a decade ago. Of course, it is also rather pathetic that assumed heterosexual Franco has largely dedicated his directing career to pandering to poofs and queens, as if it will somehow make him more artistic and subversive, even though being pro-fag is arguably the most trendy socio-political persuasion nowadays. While it may be a tad bit presumptuous of me to say, I think it is safe to say that Franco is never going to be a Pasolini, Fassbinder, or even a Ferrara, but his latest feature Child of God (2013) at least proves that he has finally developed an inkling of talent and skill as a filmmaker. Based on the lesser known 1973 Cormac McCarthy novel of the same, Franco's latest effort is a sort of grotesque Southern Gothic (anti)Heimat flick as haunted by the spirit of Ed Gein. Indeed, drenched in blood, semen, and shit, Child of God is a sort of semi-scatological tale about a feral man in a feral land who becomes all the more murderous and sexually unhinged as he further self-segregates himself from an already secluded society to the point where he becomes a literal caveman and engages in nocturnal necrophilia. So, what does a nice Jewish boy like James Franco know about a confederate corpse-fucking and cross-dressing hillbillies?! Probably less than Steven Spielberg knows about sexual penetration, yet somehow the film manages to mostly work, which probably largely has to do with the fact that lead actor Scott Haze (who previously starred in Franco's 2013 Faulkner adaptation As I Lay Dying and will star in a number of Franco's upcoming films) was so committed to the role that he moved into a shitty remote cabin in Southern Bumfuck (Sevierville, Tennessee, where the original novel was set), lost 50lbs, and even spent some time living in caves to prepare himself for playing a uniquely unflattering role that tells me the actor is no limp-wristed pansy, but a deadly serious actor who has no problem ramming his rectum with a large tree branch if need be. A film in the degenerated Prussian-American proletarian spirit of sexually perverted serial killers like Ed Gein and Carl Panzram, Child of God is country fried black crypto-comedy where Franco seems to have attempted to make his very own version of Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977), as work that depicts pre-multicultural 1960s stars-and-bars America as an unholy breeding ground for some of the world's most misbegotten and decidedly dysgenic Europeans (of course, nowadays America not only has some of the most miserably mongrelized whites on this planet, but also an unsavory selection of genetically damned mystery meat). An absolutely poisonous celluloid American pie in three acts (just like McCarthy's novel), Child of God is an unwitting reminder as to why the land of the kultur-free and the daringly depraved has spawned some of the most idiosyncratic serial killers in world history.

As one of the film's various unnamed narrators states regarding meta-hick antihero (Scott Haze) at the very beginning of Child of God, "He was of German and Irish bloods. His name was Lester Ballard — a child of God, much like yourself, perhaps." A seemingly half-retarded and aggressively autistic 'adult orphan' whose mother abandoned him when he was a wee lad and whose father committed suicide via hanging when he was only nine or ten years old, Lester is ultimately condemned to an animalistic state of perennial homelessness and isolation when his family farm in Sevier County, Tennessee is auctioned off against his will. Of course, Lester tries in vain to keep the farm by screaming things like, "MOVE, MOVE, MOVE... THIS IS MY PROPERTY," at prospective buyers while menacingly brandishing his beloved rifle, which is more or less an extra limb, but a grouchy old fart soon gets tired of his violently juvenile antics and hits him in the back of the skull with the back of an ax, thus causing the antihero to scream hysterically like a freshly excreted newborn in what ultimately ushers in the beginning of his new life as a cracked country hobo. With nothing left to lose, Lester treks to no man's land and ultimately finds himself squatting in a shack owned by some old geezer. Not long after arriving in the area, Lester happens upon a rather unsympathetic half-naked slag (Elena McGhee) who has just been gang-raped and although the deranged loner does not rape her, he smacks her around a little bit (to Lester's minor credit, she deserved it). Out of spite and just to be an insufferable bitch who is starving for attention, the rape victim falsely accuses Lester of sexually pillaging her, thus resulting in his arrest by a certain Sheriff Fate (Hebrew Tim Blake Nelson portraying a hick) and his proud philistine deputy Cotton (True Blood star Jim Parrack). While in prison, Lester attempts to befriend a murderous negro named "Nigger John" who, as he states himself, is in jail for, "cutting a mother fucker's head off with a pocket knife." After singing a melancholy negro spiritual, Nigger John tells Lester that, "white pussy's nothing but trouble," which is certainly something the antihero will learn on his own, as a man that will develop a strong affinity for postmortem white cooch. After being released from prison and being warned by Sheriff Fate that if he does not straighten out his next crime will be murder, Lester goes back to wandering around aimlessly, though he does make friends with three giant stuffed animals that he won playing a shooting game at a local carnival. Lester also realizes he has an affinity for wild birds after he catches a pigeon with his bare hands and bites off its head in a scene that marks the end of the first act of the film.

During the second act of Child of God, Lester falls in love for the first time upon happening upon on a running car containing two dead young lovers who have assumedly made a suicide pact. With a lifeless babe (Nina Ljeti) who cannot say “no” or insult him being in front of his rather weary yet hopelessly horny eyes, Lester begins fondling the cutesy corpse’s sensual breasts and sniffs its underwear, but of course, he does not stop there, as he is a man of preternatural tastes who, being a rather bestial good ol’ boy, lacks self-control. Indeed, Lester does not think twice about committing necrophilia with the young nubile corpse, as he pounds the postmortem pussy so hard that the car begins to shake. Not a man to let something go to waste, especially in regard to a cold gash, Lester brings the corpse back to his house and makes it his girlfriend, even buying it an expensive red dress and making it dinner. Of course, all good things must come to an end and after a fire breaks out at Lester’s shack as a result of his own negligence, the aberrant antihero not only loses his shelter, but also his rotting lover and one of his “friends” (aka a big stuffed teddy bear). Now permanently homeless and completely isolated from the rest of humanity, Lester the corpse-molester completely loses whatever little bit of sanity he had left. Indeed, becoming increasingly paranoid, Lester accuses his only two remaining friends—a stuffed lion and a stuffed teddy bear—of betraying him and executes both of them with his rifle while crying and screaming hysterically, thus concluding the second act of the film. Needless to say, Lester plans to go on the hunt for some young teenage pootenanny and he is not going to let anyone stop him on his crazed crusade for crusty corpse cunts.

While only a novice necro during the second act of the film, Lester becomes a serial necrophile killer during the third and final act. Indeed, Lester begins to prey on teenage lovers who make the ultimately fatal mistake of driving out to the middle of the country to make love, as it gives the renegade redneck recluse the opportunity to murder and sexually ravage unlikely young dames in relative comfort without being caught by the cops. After killing the couples, Lester takes the female corpses with him so that he can get down and dirty for nights to come. Now a neo-caveman of sorts, Lester has turned a large mountainside cave into his own personal pleasure-dome where he keeps his various corpse concubines. Taking inspiration from the Ed Gein playbook of country style corpse-copulating, Lester also engages in necrophilic cross-dressing and even sports the scalp of a blonde babe who he had previously shot execution style. Indeed, one day while in his deranged tranny persona, Lester decides to start shooting at an old farmer he does not like, but the farmer shoots back and severely wounds the sexually confused lunatic. Of course, Lester adamantly refuses to confess to Sheriff Fate in regard to his dastardly deeds, so a softcore lynch mob, which includes auteur James Franco, decides to take the law into their own hands. Before putting a noose around Lester’s rather red neck, the mob of rightfully angry gun-totting hicks offer to spare the necrophile if he agrees to show them where he hid the corpses of his victims. Of course, as a lifelong loner and wilderness-rooted feral man with an uncanny talent for self-preservation, Lester manages to escape after leading the lynch mob to a cave where he makes his getaway via a small tunnel. As to what happens to the antihero after that is anyone's guess, but one can only assume he probably upped the ante in terms of his murderous necrophilic conquests.

A rare example of true Americana artsploitation cinema, Child of God is meticulously assembled celluloid trash with a little bit of curious country style class that is, for better or worse, easily the most subversive cinematic Cormac McCarthy adaptation ever made. Irrationally hated by both film critics and filmgoers alike, Franco's fiercely foul flick is certainly an unhinged exercise in (sub)human excess that is probably nothing short of aesthetic terrorism for most viewers, hence its strange charm. Indeed, undoubtedly the most poetic, aberrantly artful, and semi-cryptically misanthropic film about necrophilia since Jörg Buttgerit's two arthouse splatter flicks, NEKRomantik (1987) and its sequel NEKRomantik 2 (1991), Child of God offends people not only because it forces (or at least attempts to) the viewer to empathize with an illiterate corpse-fucking serial killer, but also because it depicts such abject human depravity in such an objective yet somewhat eloquently directed way that it reminds viewers that they too have the capacity to act like rabid animals that fiddle with their own feces, fucks corpses, and kill without remorse were they to face similarly less than ideal circumstances in their lives. Taking notes from Pier Paolo Pasolini's 1975 cinematic swansong Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom, which Franco himself reviewed about a year ago, the film even features an extended scene early on where the antihero defecates and begins roughly wiping himself with a girthy phallic-like tree branch, as if he is attempting to put his shit back into his bung-hole. Indeed, Franco clearly did not make the film for those preteen fangirls whose panties moisten at the mere mention of his name, nor did he make the flick to cater to the dubious tastes of mainstream film critics with patently pathetic neo-liberal/cultural Marxist political agendas, as the wickedly wanton work is confederate political incorrectness in blood-flavored and fecal-frosted form. Somewhat notably, Child of God is not Franco's first cinematic excursion in corpse-fucking art, as he previously directed a 14-minute short entitled Herbert White (2010) based on a poem by gay American poet Frank Bidart starring filmic crazy man Michael Shannon as a bourgeois family man who moonlights as a Edmund Kemper-esque serial-killing necrophile. Like John Boorman's Deliverance (1972) meets the director's buddy Harmony Korine's Gummo (1997), albeit minus the Semitic spastic slapstick, Franco's film may be somewhat derivative and sloppily assembled in parts, but it ultimately proves the actor turned auteur filmmaker's career may be worth following after all. Indeed, if Franco ever gets the gall to adapt something like D.H. Lawrence's The Plumed Serpent

CHILD OF GOD

(1926) or Jean Raspail's The Camp of the Saints (1973) aka Le Camp des saints, he will have finally earned my respect. Amerikkkan Heimat horror from hick hell, Child of God is also a rare film that makes me proud of being an American, which is certainly no small accomplishment, especially since Hollywood reminds me of everything I hate about America.

James Gunn* (2010)

The topic of vigilantism is often explored in subversive cinema. Taking a man with a vendetta and unleashing him upon street rats mostly leads to cinematic gems, cases in point - Harry Brown, Death Wish 1-3, Punisher: War Zone, and Death Sentence. A frequent factor in all of these mechanical murderers, rather, exterminators, is the loss of a loved one. Paul Kersey never had a choice, did he? His family was murdered over the length of two films. First his wife then his daughter, and after an extended bout of gang rape to add to the trauma. In James Gunn's Super, pathetic pushover Frank D'Arbo (Rainn Wilson) notices the subtle signs leading to abandonment left behind by his wife (Liv Tyler) but fails to retain his property. Once the smooth-talking Jacques (Kevin Bacon - genius) moves in on his lady-territory and gets her to relapse into heroin among other forms of abuse, Frank decides to take action. In his despair, Frank catches a glimpse of a television series starring The Holy Avenger who is laughably inspired by the ridiculous Bibleman show. After receiving a terrifying request of blood via God in his tentacled form, giving him a god-botomy, Frank finds inspiration in comic books, sadistic, subversive persuasion, and dons a red costume and pipe wrench to "shut crime up". What unfolds after this short origin story is trial and error as well as pure cinematic catharsis as the Crimson Bolt brutalizes Negroes and other ilk of society showing no mercy.

Part of what makes Super so enchanting is the bold and sinister nature of the Crimson Bolt's actions. It doesn't seem to be in Frank's form as his alternate personality bears the mark of judgment and Frank has only compassion and empathy towards his wife's dire straits. Utterly convinced, at first, that his wife has been kidnapped, a police investigator needed to talk Frank into realizing that this wasn't a case of kidnapping, rather, his (whore) wife fell back into hard habits of opiates and strange cocks all around - the likes of which I've witnessed third-hand. Later following comic protocol, Frank enlists the help of a spunky teenage comic retailer (Libby - Ellen Page) in his effort to fight crime and save the life of his wife. If there is one thing you won't find in Super, it is a shred of happiness. Other than the acerbic nihilism, Super doesn't offer any misguided tours into positive emotion. In fact, Super has one of the most down-beat, utterly defeating, endings in a somewhat-mainstream release that I have seen in quite a long time. The problem with Frank is that he demands to be taken advantage of, if not in the form of his wife using him solely as a crutch, then surely his coworker asking him to wait in the middle of a long line to a theater while he and his significant other take their time. Even Libby decides to use Frank to her own gain, what, fulfilling a strange fantasy of costumed premarital sex and attempted murder. In the end, no one is innocent in Super. After all, Super contains some

To call Frank D'Arbo a religious zealot would be a severe understatement. Most of the man's workout sessions take place under a crude sign surrounding the corner above his closet door reading "Some of his children are chosen", which could have favored a darker road had James Gunn decided to trail behind the even-darker motion picture Frailty, by all means relevant. By the half-way point of Super, Frank's delusions take reign and spiral him into frequent dances with death, if not for being shot, than for blasting men into a pulpy matter that spreads across the earthen ground. What was once a mission from God turns head to bad blood once Frank realizes that he has lost everything important to him. While watching the ending, I thought to myself, was it all worth it? The psychopathy exhibited by Rainn Wilson and Ellen Page is practically unmatched in terms of budgetary motion pictures. While Frank D'Arbo fights for fallacy, unlike the sagely Paul Kersey of Death Wish, he unknowingly creates a greater good for society, something he didn't intend at all. Sure, he posted street signs warning crime, but at the end of the day, Frank D'Arbo is just a sad, lonely serial killer who wanted to be loved and due to his selfish and psycho-fundamentalist acts, lost his only chance of companionship that was hidden there all along. Super is truly a portrait of the lengths man is willing to traverse in order to save a love that never really loved in return. I pity Frank D'Arbo and the ruination of his introverted character and look forward to more of the morally-bankrupt cinema of James Gunn.

THE GARDENER

James H. Kay (1974)

Before there was William Friedkin's The Guardian (1990), there was the rather obscure artsploitation horror-melodrama hybrid The Gardener (1974) aka Garden of Death aka Seeds of Evil directed by advertising director turned one-time auteur James H. Kay and starring counter-culture sex symbol Joe Dallesandro (Flesh, Blood for Dracula) in his first non-Warhol-related work. A somewhat campy (if not oftentimes unintentionally so) work that seems like it could have been directed by Curtis Harrington's even more effeminate yet less talented little brother, The Gardener was such an abject commercial and critical failure upon its original release that director Kay would never again get the opportunity to direct another film (though he apparently got Tennessee Williams' blessing to adopt the playwright's one-act play The Gnädiges Fräulein (1966), but the film was never actually made for whatever reason). In fact, Kay's nightmarish experience as a first-time director was chronicled in the documentary short The Distribution of Low Budget Films or The Gardener's Seeds of Evil Killed My Million Dollar Dream (1980), which was produced by the associate producer of The Gardener, Chalmer G. Kirkbride Jr., as his Master's Thesis in Public Relations at The American University in Washington, D.C. in 1980. The film also arguably destroyed the early career of Katharine Hepburn's niece Katharine Houghton, who previously received much critical acclaim starring alongside her aunt in Stanley Kramer's rancid piece of pseudo-comedic melodramatic miscegenation propaganda Guess Who's Coming to Dinner (1967), even if her character in that film was more or less nothing more than a cipher. A work in the tired tradition of the old school Hollywood Woman's Films disguised as a mystical supernatural horror flick, The Gardener is a sort of pseudo-counter-culture/tropic mod art flick that tells the oftentimes tedious and equally tasteless yet would-be-tasteful tale of a sexually repressed bourgeois housewife who becomes completely obsessed with her seemingly magical gardener, only to become intolerably hysterical and killing him in the end instead of simply engaging in the carnal pleasures she so pathetically longed for. A sort of modernist reworking of the Ancient Greek myth of the underworld goddess Persephone with vague shades of Pasolini's Teorema (1968), The Gardener is a work that seems like it probably looked good on paper, but was ultimately executed (or more like excreted) in the worst possible way, as if everything that could have gone wrong did and then some. Indeed, it is one of those films that will probably only appeal to Joe Dallesandro completists and faithful fans of failed celluloid art. Apparently made to appeal to the undersexed appetites of middle-aged middleclass women, The Gardener never quite found its target audience and later had the title changed to Seeds of Evil (which directed Kay described as being "over-the-top") by the crook distributor so it might wet the lips of the sort of degenerates that hung at 42nd Street in NYC during the early 1970s. Filmed in exotic Puerto Rico (though it was originally suppose to be set in the hellhole know as Haiti), The Gardener is like The Last Movie of obscure American horror films, albeit nowhere as interesting as it might sound. Featuring Latin 'spiritual negroes' and token voodoo references, hyper horny housewives who channel their sexual energy into homicidal hysteria, blacks and mestizos with aristocratic German names, Little Joe bossing around old brown men around like a boss, and such marvelously mundane melodrama that is so ridiculous that it degenerates into low-camp comedy, The Gardener is one of those films that is so blatantly bad and pretentiously yet prosaically directed that it baffles the viewer to the point where they wonder how it was ever made in the first place.

THE GARDENER

Beginning with a bedridden broad named Dorothy Burrows (Tanny McDonald) suffering from an intolerable bout of hysteria and then randomly dropping dead after a nurse brings her some tropical orchids, The Gardener immediately establishes a tone of innate ineptitude as far as horror and melodrama is concerned. Indeed, it takes a rather skilled director to make pretty flowers seem horrifying, yet would-be-auteur James H. Kay does not even seem competent enough to direct a credit card commercial, as a man who simply cannot decide whether he wants to be George Cukor, Federico Fellini, or Mario Bava, though his directing style more resembles that of Herschell Gordon Lewis à la Suburban Roulette (1968) on Valium. After non-babe Burrows drops dead in the hospital, her two catty/horny bourgeois housewife friends, Ellen Bennett (Katharine Houghton) and Helena Boardman (Rita Gam), meetup and chat like teenage girls about their dead friend's handsome and mysterious gardener Carl (Joe Dallesandro). Ultimately, Ellen—a properly trained housewife if there ever was one who certainly looks but does not dare touch when it comes to muscle men that get her panties all wet—takes home the wild long-haired wonder mensch Carl, who looks like a gay prostitute as a fellow wears nothing but a pair of butt-tight brown corduroys (notably, Dallesandro was forced to wear a ton of brown tanning make-up over his skin to make him look more 'exotic' for the role, thus his trademark 'Little Joe' tattoo is covered up). While the wife a rich and domineering, if not hopelessly dumb, fellow named John (James Congdon), Ellen cannot help but keep her longing eyes on super cocky Carl and his cock. Indeed, while Ellen may be in physical paradise, she is in metaphysical hell as the emotionally neglected and childless wife of a bourgeois brute husband. Naturally, John becomes immediately jealous of Carl, even though it takes a number of days before he even actually meets his exotic employee face-to-face, but when he finally does, his irrational hatred only grows all the more. Of course, while Ellen does not ask her pseudo-hunk hubby for much, she refuses to get rid of her meta-pretty pet gardener. Luckily for Ellen, John's golf friend talks him out of firing Carl, absurdly stating, "You know John, we have a pretty good life here...sometimes I think it's too good. Not enough big worries...so occasionally when the little ones come along they get out of proportion. Now you've got a gardener you personally dislike...so what, you don't have to like your gardener...as long as he does a good job and your wife's happy, forget it. What you need is some kids to absorb some of that excess energy." Meanwhile, Carl begins taking control of the social structure of the house in a rather elusive and cryptic fashion, even attempting to fire an old servant named Ralph (Roberto Negron), who he later has poisoned via his pernicious plants. As Ellen's friend Helena states of Carl, "He gets straight to work, doesn't he?," and, indeed, soon he will be getting busy being the Don Juan of Puerto Rico, though all the boobeise broads are too scared to touch him.

As The Gardener slowly progresses, flower king Carl begins to work his magic around the entire Bennett home, thus striking total fear into every single one of the brown servants, who are naturally closer to the natural world. When a superstitious negro servant named Liza, who is no novice to voodoo, attempts to warn Ellen that Carl is a wicked witch doctor of sorts, the horny housewife patronizingly replies, "Carl is not a witch doctor [...] Carl has a very unusual talent that some people don't understand, that's all" as if the maid is some sort of retarded child that is afraid of an imaginary monster in the closet. When Ellen decides to go against Liza's warning and wears some magical glowing flowers given to her by Carl as part of her costume at a bacchanalian 'Gods of Mythology' party, she becomes seemingly possessed and even injures her husband John with the costume despite the fact he is wearing armor. One darkly romantic night not long after the party, Carl seduces Ellen and kisses her near the swimming pool (where she oftentimes voyeuristically watches him swim naked) and she instantly faints, thus demonstrating the mysterious Gardener's super sexual power over her. After her niece Jane randomly disappears and she witnesses a plant killing a poor kitty cat, Ellen becomes suspicious of Carl and his hermetic plant powers, complaining to Helena that, "something horrible involving Carl," to which her friend replies, "I told you, its sex...Only you're so damn stiff you won't admit to yourself you feel it. That's why your nerves are shot." Not surprisingly, Ellen decides to get rid of Carl and Helena gladly takes him on as an employee/sex object. Meanwhile, Ellen and Helena do some research on Carl's previous employers and discover that most of the women who he used to work for are either dead or crazy. Ostensibly concerned for her friends welfare (but also because she is jealous that she now owns Carl), Ellen goes to check up on Helena and finds her friend entangled in plants and seeming like she has just been gang banged by an entire army platoon. In a horrendous would-be-homage to Hitchcock's Psycho (1960), Ellen attempts to slice up the plants that have entangled her friend in organic bondage, but it kills Helena as her veins are connected to the viridiplantae. Of course, from there, Ellen, who is suffering from homicidal hysteria at this point (she seems more pissed off about the fact that Helena got down and dirty with Carl than the fact that Carl is an evil supernatural entity of sorts), goes to hunt down Carl and when she finds him, she shoots him, but he runs away and his clothes magically get lost somewhere on the way. Ultimately, Carl morphs into a tree and Ellen continues shooting him. Not satisfied he is dead, Ellen decides to cover the tree with gasoline and set it on fire. Indeed, it seems that Ellen's sexual repression got the best of her and her irrational burning of Carl did little to extinguish her unquenchable sexual appetite.

You know a film is a mess when its own director states of it, "Actually, I think THE GARDENER is a brilliant concept that was never quite realized. I could remake that film and it would be a brilliant film," as James H. Kay matter-of-factly stated in the documentary The Distribution of Low Budget Films or The Gardener's Seeds of Evil Killed My Million Dollar Dream. As revealed in the same doc, The Gardener cost $800,000 to make but would only recover $50,000, with the sleazebag distributor apparently taking the money and running, thus leaving producer Chalmer G. Kirkbride Jr. (and his elderly father, who paid for a good chunk of the film) broke. Indeed, I have to agree with Kay, as The Gardener had all the ingredients to be an offbeat cult horror masterpiece, thus making it all the more of a celluloid tragedy that the film falls short on so many levels (with Dallesandro's lack of height not being one of them). For those interested in The Gardener and its troubled history, you can learn everything you could ever want to know about the film by checking out the out-of-print dvd release put out by the now-defunct cult label Subversive Cinema, which, among other things, features the first and sole full-length commentary track ever given by Joe Dallesandro, who reveals he has a hard time remembering a lot of aspects of the film (though he confesses to gambling a lot while working on the production), but he does tell his life story. Indeed, Dallesandro decided to star in The Gardener on the recommendation of his mentor Paul Morrissey in the hope that it would enable him to break into the mainstream and get away from doing arthouse films with the Warhol crowd. Admittedly, while I found The Gardener to be nothing short of an agonizing experience the first time I saw the film, it has turned into a guilty pleasure of sorts for me, as a work that only gets better on subsequent viewings. Instead of ominously orgasmic orchids, the film ultimately features an unintentional satire of the dreaded Woman's Film and the fact that the work features Little Joe as a human-tree hybrid does not hurt, even if his acting is a bit 'wooden.' If nothing else, The Gardener certainly offers an overall more enjoyable experience than similar works of the same celluloid species like The Kirlian Witness (1979) and Friedkin's The Guardian.

THE KING

James Marsh (2005)

No Christian is full of more shit than one of those that lead a life of “sin” and then decide it’s time to atone for their sins and become reborn. Instead of drugs or gangbangs, these born again Christians find their new “high” in the form of making an ass of themselves by promoting Jesus like some deranged civil rights campaign. The pastor David Sandow in the film The King has found Jesus to be the ultimate outlet for his con man campaign for Christianity. But what happens when pastor David gets a visit from a half-Latino young man claiming to be his bastard son? What would Jesus do? It seems as of recent that incest has been really hitting the mainstream. I guess if your ½ sibling is biracial it isn’t as bad as there is more genetic diversity. Elvis Valdez is not interested in telling his ½ sister that they are related. It doesn’t take long for this suave psychopath to get into the pants and into the hole of his holy sister. Like Jesus, Elvis is a rebel that is ready to breakdown social morals and barriers. Elvis is played by the charming Mexican actor Gael García Bernal. Knowing how Bernal is a heartthrob with the ladies nowadays, I found his role as Elvis to be quite refreshing. I always thought of Bernal as a sort of stupid model type, but his performance in The King leads me to believe that he’s a serious actor. The talented actor William Hurt stars in The King as the Christian pastor David. Hurt is a multidimensional actor that can play both flamboyant homosexuals like he did in Kiss of the Spider Woman or a dirty mick mafia guy like he did in A History of Violence. In The King, William Hurt completely pulls off his performance as pseudo-wise and holy pastor. Pastor David is your typical backwards Christian false prophet. A family con man that feeds off the idiocy of those rural peasant folk who still have superstitions about Jesus and his righteous. Pastor David is essentially one of last remnants of a dying faith. The disturbingly weak looking Paul Dano stars as pastor David’s spiritually impotent son Paul. Paul, like the putrid Saint Paul, spreads his Christian message for gentile dupes. Despite his “strong religious background,” Paul seems to be a soulless individual who has never lived a day in his life. It is as if Jesus drained him of his last pint of energy. Thankfully for Paul, his unknown ½ brother helps out with his desire to one day meet Christ. One could say that The King is a truly religious experience. The Antichrists of Hollywood have done a lot to mock Christ and his message in history. Whether it be the homoeroticism of Cecil B. DeMille’s biblical films or a priest getting stoned in Detroit Rock City, Hollywood has all Christ hating angles covered. The King is different in that it is a complete defilement of the “ideal” Christian nuclear family and its values. What better defiler than the bastard son (Jesus?) of a Latino mother?

ROME '78

James Nares (1978)

If Federico Fellini had been an autistic British queer with next to nil artistic talent living abroad in NYC during the late 1970s, and attempted to adapt Satyricon using his uniquely untalented dope-addled degenerate friends as actors and a couple East Village apartment and pseudo-classical landmarks as settings, it might begin to describe the unsurprisingly forgotten, ludicrously low-camp micro-epic Rome '78 (1978) directed by British painter James Nares (TV Faces, No Japs at My Funeral). Best remembered today as a footnote in American underground filmmaking history than a revolutionary piece of cinematic art, Nares' first (and last) narrative feature is considered a landmark work of the so called No Wave Cinema, which was a highly derivative and obscenely overrated NYC film movement that probably contributed less to the (de)evolution of the art of cinema than Robert Redford or Whoopi Goldberg. A virtual who's who of late-1970s dope-addled NYC hipsterdom, Rome '78 features actor/filmmaker Eric Mitchell (Underground U.S.A., The Way It Is), lecherous lard ass Lydia Lunch, musician James Chance (Teenage Jesus and the Jerks), actor and musician John Lurie (Stranger than Paradise, Down by Law), platinum blonde East Village diva Patti Astor, and homo proto-reality-TV star Lance Loud, among various other sub-popular figures of the then somewhat artistically incestuous 'No Wave' scene. Notable for being "the first and only No Wave epic," Nares' one-time excursion into Super-8 feature films is easily the most superlatively shitty and compulsively campy 'sword-and-sandal' flick ever made as a work that unequivocally proves that the (anti)aesthetic of Andy Warhol and the man that made his films, Paul Morrissey, can be utilized for making epic costume films. In fact, Nares would confess in an interview with The Village Voice regarding his glaring influences, "I think the films I was most thinking about then were the Warhol/Morrissey films—LONESOME COWBOYS, TRASH, that sort of thing." Indeed, like the shot-on-video Tennessee Williams adaptations of proud 'aesthetic nihilist' John Aes-Nihil (The Drift, Suddenly Last Summer), Rome '78 can be described as one of the true bastard (anti)cinematic bastards of the Factory brand of films. Like the early costume films of Derek Jarman (Sebastiane, The Tempest) stripped bare and lacking the high-camp aesthetic integrity and hyper homoeroticism, Nares' film is riddled with botched lines, obnoxious unintentional laughter, and the in-camera flash-frames that are a grating signature quality of the early Warhol-Morrissey projects like My Hustler (1965) and Bike Boy (1967). Despite featuring the aesthetic grace of wino vomit, Rome '78 is, for better or worse, one of the true 'classic' films of the almost wholly disposable No Wave Cinema movement and thus is a must-see film for any cinephile that is masochistic enough to endure it. Indeed, if you enjoy toothless art fags slurring marvelously moronic dialogue, posturing homo hipster man-children trying in vain to resemble heroic Roman soldiers, Lydia's Lunch's unclad thunder thighs, and non-fratboy oriented toga parties where the only ones probably giving head are the men, Nares' film is probably for you.

While seemingly ceaselessly stupid and senseless on the surface, Rome '78 ultimately features a triple-layer allegorical critique of the decadence of three different cultures, including (but probably not limited to) the ancient Roman Empire, the post-counterculture American plutocracy/pseudo-empire, and the No Wave movement itself, with the latter obviously seeming like the most hopelessly decadent and depraved of them all. Not featuring a single drop of testosterone during its over-extended 80-minute running, Nares' film is delightfully and distastefully tongue-in-cheek to the core in its flagrant, flaming American fag approach to Roman decadence, as a work that ultimately makes Tinto Brass' abortive Gore Vidal adaptation Caligula (1979) starring Malcolm McDowell seem like Stanley Kubrick's Spartacus (1960). While featuring a bodaciously bitchy and insanely infantile dictator antagonist that likes little boy dicks named Caesar, Rome '78 is clearly an aberrosexual cinematic molestation of the tragic story of Gaius Julius Caesar Augustus Germanicus (aka Emperor Caligula), who has always been the victim of ahistorical cinematic obloquy, but never to such a uniquely unflattering extent. Indeed, the so-called 'Caesar' of Nares' film is a literal motherfucker and prissy pederast portrayed by 'visual artist' David McDermott (of the duo McDermott & McGough, which is best known for using various archaic 19th-century style photography processes) who screams about realizing his deluded dreams which involve, among other things, Bolshevik-esque methods of genocide and theft. Partly filmed illegally on private property (Nares would pose as a potential renter and would unlock the windows in buildings so that he and his crew could break into the apartments later and film their scenes), as well as neoclassical tourist attractions in NYC like Ulysses S. Grant's tomb, Tribeca's American Thread Building, and a couple places that look too elegant and aesthetically pleasing to be located in the rotten Big Apple, Rome '78 is ultimately a particularly potent reminder that aesthetic autism has always been an innate characteristic of American underground cinema. Featuring a somewhat obvious combination of both scripted dialogue and wayward acting and inexplicable dialogue that was improvised right on the spot, the film was notably described by filmmaker Nares in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier as a work where, "I typecast my friends in roles where they could sort of act out what was going on in their real lives in a way." Indeed, it is quite apparent while watching Rome '78 that Nares had certain 'Superstars' in mind when he assembled the film, which bleeds a certain collective 'scenester' excess and all around degeneracy that one can only assume epitomized the post-punk No Wave scene.

A former slave turned glorious Roman soldier with a low IQ but lofty intentions named Metellus (Eric Mitchell) is scheming to overthrow the government and murder young degenerate Emperor Caligula (David McDermott) with the help of some campy conspirators, or as he brags to a comrade, "Just between you and me, I don't give a shit about Caesar. Nothing could be more convenient to me than the disappearance of that little brat." Metellus is fucking Caligula's wanton wife Lydia Lunch (who stoically states, "My marriage was just a formality"), but the emperor couldn't care less because, as the Roman soldier says, "Besides his sister, he only really likes boys." Indeed, proud widower Metellus cannot get enough of the Empress' "imperial ass" and she is more than willing enough to give it, so long as the philistine soldier feeds her grapes when not plowing her puss. When Caligula sees Metellus and his wife lying together, he is far from angered and instead cries like an autistic toddler, "No one likes me anymore" in the hopes of being comforted by his apathetic ladylove. Metellus uses the opportunity to berate Caligula for the decline of the Roman economy and then argues regarding his own plans to fix things, "We're thinking about going into the business of selling the Roman way of life." Assumedly stealing his ideas from the bolshevik playboy, Caligula argues that he plans to fix the economy by killing all Roman children and then forcing their parents to give the Roman Empire their inheritance, arguing, "They'll be so happy the emperor came to visit them and then they will die." Indeed, Caligula immediately begins carrying out the plan by rounding up children and slaughtering them, but it ultimately proves to be a bad idea because it just gives his people more reason to welcome his seemingly inevitable assassination. While having his soldiers arrest young children, including newborn babies, Caligula proudly declares he is the only one in Rome that is allowed to wear purple and then proudly states, "I'm the only baby in the room" when all the kids have been cleared out.

As a supremely infantile megalomaniac that loves hearing the sound of his own superlatively gay voice, Caligula likes standing outside and screaming things like "I am the Emperor of the universe" and that he is a "god" that "owns everyone" because he created them in a "dream." Unfortunately for him, no one seems to listen to Caligula, which probably has to do with the fact that he is an incest-inclined pederast who has been cuckolded by an ex-slave. When an eastern empress named Queen of Sheba (Anya Phillips) shows up with her own personal fuckboy (musician James Chance) and attempts to create a merger with Rome and her all the more backward nation, Caligula immediately blows her off, stating, "No one can join with Rome. Rome is too great," and then complains that slaves outnumber civilians and asks for troops. Apparently, Sheba is desperate to join Rome because her own nation is being overrun with a cancerously growing slave population, which absolutely disgusts Caligula as indicated by his remark to the empress, "Well, I have to admit a nation run with slaves would be most distasteful." Meanwhile, John Lurie, who thinks he is Jesus Christ, laments regarding the current sorry state of Roman art that it is certainly also true for the No Wave movement, "Our artists are the worst." Later, while hanging out with Mr. Lurie, Caligula goes on an insane tirade and screams while sounding like a lovelorn poof who has just discovered that his size queen beau has just cheated on him with an AIDS-ridden Puerto Rican, "If my fantasy does not rule, Rome will decay...And the trash and the filth and the garbage of the barbaric tribes will sweep into my city and everyone's civilization will end...And the beauty and the culture that has been handed down from century to century will be lost...Lost to idiots and morons." Of course, since Caligula's "fantasy" involves cross-dressing and bugging little boys, it is nothing compared to the moronic martial prowess of Metellus, who plans to take out the gutter queen posing as an eternal emperor for once and for all.

Needless to say, when Metellus is told by a stunning blonde beastess named Octavia (played by Patti Astor) that "someone...is after your blood" and "It seems that there is a price on your head," he decides he needs to take decisive action and carry out his Game of Thrones-esque coup d'état. Knowing that various factions want him murdered, Caligula decides to fake his own death by telling everyone in Rome that he was murdered in his sleep. Before faking his death, Caligula's brother attempts get him to runaway with him, pleading, "We can't die. If we die, we'll kill the empire ourselves. They're going to murder us now. We have to sustain the life of the empire. Somehow through it all, we are gods. We have to survive," but the Emperor refuses, stating, "Why didn't you tell me this when we were six years old? Why did you wait until I killed twenty million people to ask me to go live on a farm with you?!" After it is announced that the Emperor has died, Caligula appears in drag under the name "The Deity Venus" and then proceeds to have a couple of his enemies murdered, including John Lurie/Jesus Christ. Caligula-as-Venus also rebukes Metellus, bitching to him, "How dare you want to sexually abuse the emperor. How dare you, you piss. How dare you want to use the emperor like a woman [...] You can't have the emperor... You can't." Needless to say, macho Metellus is hardly impressed with Caligula's queen-ish spiel. After killing the Emperor's guard and virtually everyone else, Metellus asks "Who's next?" and proceeds to murder Caligula, who pathetically pleads, "I'm only six years old. I'm just a baby." Using his trusty sword, Metellus proceeds to slaughter Caligula and then shoves his weapon in his mouth like it is a giant cock. While taking the phallic sword in his mouth, Caligula cries, "I'm still alive," but Metellus makes sure to inform him, "You're dead."

Notably, auteur James Nares would brag in an article for The New York Observer regarding an audience response after a screening of Rome '78, "I heard laughter, which was good [...] I think I saw people leave and then they came back again. Very encouraging. This was not very well received and we intended it that way," thus reflecting his hopelessly hipster-like mentality when it comes to his intentionally lackluster style of filmmaking. Somewhat fittingly, Nares seems to consider the film to be nothing more than old news as indicated in an interview with The Village Voice where he stated, "It's my only attempt at a narrative film with actors. It has its moments—quite funny at times, quite beautiful at times, too. But it doesn't interest me so much now." Personally, I consider Rome '78 to be, at the very least, one of the 'masterpieces' of the No Wave Cinema movement. It should be noted that virtually all of the greatest films associated with the movement were directed by foreigners, including the campy WWII 'thriller' The Long Island Four (1980) directed by Swedish twink Anders Grafstrom and starring Klaus Nomi as a Nazi spy, as well as French-born filmmaker Eric Mitchell's Underground U.S.A. (1980) and The Way It Is (1985) starring a very young Vincent Gallo. Unlike the later works associated with the movement like those of Scott B and Beth B (who helped spawn the innately inferior 'Cinema of Transgression' movement), Nares and Grafstrom's films rely on attitude and gutter grade comedy as opposed to cheap and sensational sex and violence, among other banal beaten-to-death things. While Nares never directed another narrative feature, he did direct some video art work, as well as the fairly worthwhile and brilliantly titled documentary No Japs at my Funeral (1980), which features a candid interview with an IRA member. Despite being a decidedly decadent piece of innately amateurish celluloid swill that is ultimately as debasing as the dying cultures it criticizes, Rome '78 is ultimately of Spenglerian proportions as far as No Wave Cinema is concerned, thus making it a work worthy of following in the lo-fi cinematic tradition of its proudly conservative influence Paul Morrissey. While not exactly depicted from a flagrant conservative angle like Morrissey's film, Nares' micro-budget epic surely manages to express the worst of the worst in terms the particular zeitgeist it belongs to. Indeed, as a work that features homely perennial whore Lydia Lunch as an empress, a frog wimp like Eric Mitchell as the most macho and murderous of Roman warriors, a toothless raging queer queen portraying Caligula, and various deadbeat doped-addled NYC art fags standing around and talking about nothing while acting as the supposed movers and shakes of the Great Roman Empire, Rome '78 indubitably demonstrates that Sir Nares was quite right when he stated regarding No Wave Cinema in the documentary Blank City, "I do think that...the movies were somehow, all about New York...Even when they were about ancient Rome." I almost hate to state it but, despite being a totally tasteless piece of hipster trash, Nares' film is ultimately even more effective than Fellini's Satyricon (1969) when it comes to making parallels between the decadence of the Roman Empire and the contemporary Occident and especially NYC. Additionally, I not only had more fun watching Rome '78 than the obscure Fellini rip-off Satyricon (1969) aka The Degenerates starring Tina Aumont, but also Kubrick's Spartacus (1960) and virtually any other Hollywood sword-and-sandal or Italian peplum epic that I have ever seen. After all, when I see a man sporting a dress, it better be for comedic effect, even if he is portraying some sort of genocidal Roman dictator.

LOT IN SODOM

James Sibley Watson (1933)

Between 1930-1968, Puritanism indubitably reigned in American cinema due to Hollywood's self-censorship via the Hays Code. Of course, most of the big Hollywood movie moguls and stars were committed purveyors of sin but very rarely were such hedonistic and heretical lifestyles portrayed on the silver screen. Thankfully, a couple independent filmmakers had the audacity to produce libertine films that rivaled the most subversive of works found in comparably morally-free Europa. One of the most notable and greatest of these early American independent films is Lot in Sodom (1933); a silent Avant-Garde short full of surly sins and homoerotic sexual sadism. In fact, Lot in Sodom may be the only film ever made featuring a nude man being dangled upside down by two extremely militant yet androgynous sodomites. The short also features some of the first female breasts and buttocks ever committed to celluloid in the United States. Lot in Sodom was co-directed by Melville Webber and James Sibley Watson; the latter (somewhat strangely) being a Harvard University-educated medical doctor and philanthropist. Before collaborating on Lot in Sodom, the two filmmakers co-directed The Fall of the House of Usher (1928); a brilliant 12-minute-long hyper-surrealist adaptation of Edgar Allen Poe's short story of the same name. In a mere 28 minutes, Lot in Sodom manages to feature a variety of sacrilegious cinematic ingredients that are comparable to the biblical blasphemy of Häxan: Witchcraft Through The Age (1922), the phantasmagorical homoeroticism of Jean Cocteau's The Blood of a Poet (1930), and the majestic body-worship of Leni Riefenstahl's Olympia (1938). As one would expect from the film's title, Lot in Sodom is based on the Biblical story of Sodom and Gomorrah. Unlike most other films based on the story, Lot in Sodom is surprisingly faithful to the bible tale. In the short film, a character named Lot (who is featured in chapters 11-14 and 19 of the Book of Genesis) – an individual known for his dual-vice of drunkenness and incest in the Hebrew bible and as a prophet of Islam – is warned by an angel to leave Sodom so as to avoid having homo-sex with the sinful city's many shameless sexual deviants and horny homosexuals. Eventually, the Hollywood Babylon-esque metropolis is devoured by a holy holocaust and Lot's overly inquisitive wifey morphs into stone after making the deadly mistake of taking one last glance at her much cherished ex-homeland.

Despite the extremely religious nature of the short, Lot in Sodom is undoubtedly a tribute to comrade Satan and his celestial vacation spot Sodom. The fact that the film was directed by an ultra-altruistic doctor makes it all the more interesting. I hate to say it but Lot in Sodom even makes F.W. Murnau's Faust (1926) – another Satanic masterpiece that features nudity and Luciferian themes – seem rather tame by comparison. Aesthetically, Lot in Sodom is worthy of being compared to the greatest of early surrealist and expressionist works. I can only assume that Lot in Sodom has fallen somewhat into the realm of obscurity due to its relatively short length and its artsy fartsy "European-ness." Like Murnau's Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927); Lot in Sodom is surely a work that baffled the average hopeless American philistine filmgoer due to its abstract artfulness and blatantly erotic nature. Admittedly, upon first viewing the film, I assumed it was European. Of course, like the films of Kenneth Anger, Lot in Sodom is the kind of American film that could have only been produced independently. I would not be surprised if Melville Webber and James Sibley Watson created Lot in Sodom to fulfill their personal void for sadistic homoerotic pornography. Modern viewers would probably only find the film offensive due to its inclusion of stereotypically despicable hook-nosed Hebrews comparable to the caricatures featured in Nazi propagandist Julius Streicher's infamous newspaper Der Stürmer. Naturally, rainbow-power-bolsheviks will also most likely find Lot in Sodom to be quite objectionable due to its less than flattering portrayal of sexual inverts. Whether one finds the material featured in Lot in Sodom to be offensive or not, it will be hard for the viewer to deny that the short is one of the first and few examples of authentic American cinematic art. Lot in Sodom was made at a time when film was still in its infancy and the medium still seemed to have endless possibilities. Despite only churning out a couple short films, Melville Webber and James Sibley are certainly important (albeit mostly forgotten) pioneers of Avant-Garde filmmaking. In short, Lot in Sodom is mandatory viewing for all serious fans of cinema and truly transgressive art.

AFRO-PUNK: THE 'ROCK N ROLL NIGGER' EXPERIENCE

James Spooner (2003)

Afro-Punk: The 'Rock n Roll Nigger' Experience is a documentary following the rare subculture within a subculture, black punk rockers. Although I used to be a fan of punk music and still am to some degree, I have always thought punks, especially contemporary punks, are the biggest nihilistic losers around. Whenever going to a punk show I sometimes felt the urge to vomit seeing so many bourgeois punk "rebels" with strategically placed punk patches and ugly piercings in one room. Since the punk rock sub-"culture" is in itself small, it was very rare that I would see a Negro sporting a fro-hawk at any given punk show. Afro-Punk is a documentary featuring black punks and their experience in being part of what they call a "Eurocentric" movement.

The first black punk I ever saw personally was at a skateboarding contest. He had a spiked-Afro hairdo and an army jacket covered in The Misfits patches. Before the contest began, the rebellious homeboy grabbed a microphone and shouted, "I ain't no nigga!" I thought that was a profound moment in my life and it has stuck in my mind ever since. A lot of the black punks in Afro-Punk seem to have a similar attitude. Virtually all the individuals in the documentary reject gangsta black degeneracy. Politically, the individuals range from punk black supremacists (talk about oxymorons) to completely self-loathing blacks that don't even associate with their kinsman. All in all, I found all the perspectives interesting yet sometimes embarrassing. Afro-Punk also looks at how both blacks and whites have responded to the subjects of the documentary being black punks. I found it hilarious when some of the blacks make fun of whites for wanting a "multicultural" punk subculture that is "colorblind." Few things are funnier than when a Negro calls out a white liberal on their fake ass "we are the world" anti-racist idealist garbage. Unsurprisingly, some of the black punks featured in the documentary are your typical victims of cultural Marxism that plagues most modern day liberal arts colleges. One black punk brings up "white" privilege showing her own ignorance to the socio-economic situation of the average white American. Afro-Punk makes it clear that black punks face the most criticism from other blacks. Beatings that result in hospital visits from other blacks is one of the more extreme situations a young black punk faced. Being called "Satanic," "Dyke," and "wanting to be white" are verbal attacks some of these black punks face. It becomes apparent watching Afro-Punk that many of the subjects in the documentary obtained their "black identity" due to their lack of blackness. Being the odd-(black)man-out at punk shows, made many of the Afro-punks realize that they really have nothing in common with their people. Of course, a lot of these individuals overcompensate for their blackness by playing "black power" hardcore music which speaks of a "black revolution." Many prominent political blacks seem to use their own racial background as a tool in improving their career and/or power. President Barack Obama is the perfect example, a person of partial black descent, who has virtually nothing in common with the black collective, yet has relied on the black community (whether for white liberal guilt or black votes) to get where he is at. One of the black power punks in the documentary does say something that does stand true however. If a "revolution" does happen, blacks will have other black's backs just as any other race should support their own people. I guess that means white liberals will be the first dead in the gutter. Afro-Punk is a watchable documentary but has very amateurish production to say the least. Director James Spooner, who is himself a mulatto punk, has also directed another film White Lies, Black Sheep which looks embarrassing to say the least. This feature-length film follows a young black punk in the almost exclusively white punk scene. One could say that Spooner's film career is of an autobiographical nature. I get the feeling that despite making two films on race relations, James Spooner is even more confused about black identity and race relations than before he sought out to direct films.

FINGERS

James Toback* (1978)

In the 1978 film Fingers directed by James Toback - a young man named Jimmy Fingers (played by a youthful Harvey Keitel) - who is quick with both his fingers and mouth - struggles to maintain his split loyalties and his split personality. The unfortunate American son of a Guido loan shark and a typically nagging Jewish mother; Fingers is torn between a unpredictable life of petty crime and his desire to become a professional pianist. To help keep his sanity at equilibrium - Fingers incessantly blasts pop songs like "Summertime, Summertime" by the Jamies and "Angel of the Morning" by Merrilee Rush on a cheap portable radio that he carries at all times - ultimately annoying random citizens while traveling on foot around Manhattan. Despite his sensitive intuitiveness for masterfully playing the piano, Fingers has a barbarian-like knack for starting fights that could easily be avoided. Fingers also suffers from sexual frustration - as he is unable to assert himself with the WASP girl he wholeheartedly fancies, yet has no problem forcing himself upon a whorish lady that he doesn't even know. From beginning to ending: Fingers is a wild, yet tragic roller-coaster ride following a young man who came out of his mother's womb as a ticking time-bomb; set to explode as he ungracefully becomes of age in early adulthood.

For most of his filmmaking career, NYC auteur Martin Scorsese has borrowed Kenneth Anger's occult use of pop music as an ingenious tool to manipulate the emotions of the unsuspecting viewer. In Fingers, James Toback also utilizes this Anger-esque hypnotic musical tool in a most imperative manner for setting the mood and intense tone of the film. It is apparent from the beginning of the film that Jimmy Fingers is an unstable character who seems rather hopelessly confused, yet at the same time; vicious and dangerous. To control his mood, Fingers repetitively listens to the same repugnant pop songs over and over again - to the point where it becomes unintentionally humorous from the viewer's perspective. Anytime a random citizen expresses their annoyance to Fingers' public broadcasted radio; he unthinkingly lashes out - sometimes going as far as to physically assault them. Despite being a potential Manhattan Felix Mendelssohn; Fingers has developed the skills of a mafia brute from the streetwise teachings of his boastful and belligerent Sicilian-American loan shark father. Fingers has indubitably inherited his musical talents from his Levite mother, yet seems to favor simple melodic pop songs. If one wanted to make an excellent case against miscegenation; Jimmy Fingers would make for a perfect example.

A certain lady who reads Soiled Sinema mentioned that James Toback makes: "Jewish art porn." Although I can agree with that to a certain degree; Fingers is somewhat insulting to God's chosen man. I think most people will agree that Guidos are notorious pussy hustlers who have no problems obtaining ladies, yet half-Guido Fingers is lacking in the mackdaddy department, thus taking after his unassertive Judaic background; at least as far as romance goes. Despite his numerous attempts at bedding a pretentious artsy broad that he is obsessively fond of (even secretly spying on her at a careful distance), Fingers has a problem enticing and sexually spellbinding this loose lady. Towards the end of the film, Jimmy Fingers makes the mistake of following his love interest to her alpha-negro boyfriend's pad. Eventually, Fingers is embarrassed to learn that – not only is his would-be girlfriend obviously enamored by the black buck woman-beater, but she also falls helplessly into his muscle bound shoulders for security. In the beginning of Fingers, it is subtly hinted that Jimmy Fingers has homosexual tendencies – as he passes glances at an effeminate bartender. Ironically, despite his troubles with the ladies – Jimmy is an excellent street fighter who has no problem intimidating (and in some cases obliterating) men twice his size. It is no exaggeration from me to say that Fingers includes one of the greatest fight scenes ever committed to gritty celluloid. In the fight scene, Fingers squeezes a man's testicles to point of knocking out his greaseball opponent. I believe this is the first film that I have ever seen a film where a man literally busts a Guido's balls, yet it is a very common weapon used when men fight in such a brutal manner.

I must admit that I was surprised by how much I thoroughly enjoyed Fingers – as I expected the film to be another generic 1970s “gritty streets” picture. Although by no means an expertly crafted masterpiece; Fingers is a highly entertaining and shocking portrait of a everyday street-smart schizoid. Unlike silly films like A Beautiful Mind (2001) directed by Ron Howard, Fingers takes a realistic and typical approach to a man in the early stages of schizophrenia. It is more than likely that the majority of lower-middleclass individuals (from the 1970s) who suffered from schizophrenia were never diagnosed as such. That being said, one should not expect Fingers to be a sentimental portrait of a misunderstood genius suffering from a debilitating mental disorder. Fingers is a borderline exploitation flick that succeeds best in entertaining the viewer in a fantastically amoral fashion. Personally, I never felt sorry for Jimmy Fingers, but he did seem like someone who would be cool to hang out with. If Martin Scorsese and Abel Ferrara co-directed a film together in the late 1970s, I have a feeling that it would resemble Fingers. At the very least, one will have an entertaining time watching the fascinating Jimmy Fingers manhandle deadbeats – as well as embarrassingly failing to nail certain females that he admires. Fingers is just another example of why I consider Harvey Keitel to be one of the most interesting and strangely charismatic actors of his time. In 2005, Fingers was remade as The Beat That My Heart Skipped directed by French filmmaker Jacques Audiard.

LOVE /& MONEY

James Toback* (1982)

Undoubtedly, James Toback—a swarthy overweight gambler, sex addict, flagrant negropile and unrepentant female-defiler—is one of the most archetypically sleazy Semites working in the film industry today as a virtual posterboy for Julius Streicher's National Socialist tabloid Der Stürmer and that is exactly why I respect him as a filmmaker, as he clearly does not give a shit about what people think about him as a man who graduated 'magna cum laude' from Harvard yet makes degenerate films about wiggers, recreational drug abuse, so-called 'pick-up artists' (aka bitch ass beta-males who con women into sex), and his big black belligerent buddy Mike Tyson. Ever since making his debut masterpiece Fingers (1978), Toback has directed celluloid failure after celluloid failure, with none of these works quite matching the quality of his first feature (which is something he has acknowledged himself), yet most of these failures have at least something to offer, with the filmmaker's second feature, Love and Money (1982) aka Love & Money, being a perfect example of this. Like most of Toback's films, Love & Money had a troubled production history, as the screenplay was written with Warren Beatty in mind as the lead and film critic Pauline Kael as a producer, but both of them eventually dropped out of the production (though, Toback would later work with Beatty on Bugsy (1991), which he penned the screenplay for). After losing Beatty, Toback hired McGuido Ray Sharkey (Wise Guys, Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills), who later died of AIDS (but not before causing a scandal infecting a number of women with the disease) and who the director would later describe as being "the wrong actor" for the role. A film where a young Jewish banker of the exceedingly egotistical smart ass sort starts a steamy love affair with the extra exotic wife of an evil Aryan billionaire (as played immaculately by Klaus Kinski in a role where the actor radiates his typical stoic psychopathy, albeit in a James Bond villain sort of way) and reluctantly goes on adventure in Latin America after being offered $1 million dollars by said evil Aryan Billionaire to ostensibly try and talk his quasi-Trotskyite Castro-clone dictator friend out of being a repressive dickhead of a dictator, Love & Money is nothing short of a lavish degenerate celluloid 'fantasy' of the hopelessly Hebraic sort that demonstrates why Toback is the closest thing to a Philip Roth of the cinema world, albeit more debauched and adventurous. Starring old school Hollywood auteur King Vidor in his sole credited film role portraying a senile old Jewish man who is paranoid that he is going to be taken away in the night by Nazis, as well as Italian goddess Ornella Muti as a rather conflicted femme fatale who was traumatized as a young girl after seeing her father's naked corpse hanging from rafters, Toback's second feature is a quasi-literate political-thriller minus the thrills that demonstrates what happens when a morally righteous, wise-cracking Jew banker comes under the quasi-Satanic spell of a sensual Shiksa who has a cracked Polack-Kraut capitalist like Klaus Kinski for a husband. Sort of a strangely lively and always curious celluloid abortion that is slightly saved by its wit and a handful of performances, Love & Money is, if nothing else, one of Toback's more interesting botched celluloid wet dreams.

Jewish banker Byron Levin (Ray Sharkey) lives in a rather fancy Spanish style villa with his bibliophile/book dealer girlfriend Vicky (Susan Heldfond) and semi-senile ex-banker grandfather Walter Klein (King Vidor). Byron's life takes a dramatic change when he meets with a billionaire silver czar from a German background named Frederic Stockheinz (Klaus Kinski) whose main headquarters of operation are in the fictional South American country of Costa Salva, which is now under a communist dictatorship that styles itself as a nationalist 'people's movement.' Stockheinz knows that Byron wrote a paper on his silver empire for a seminar at Harvard and understands the banker understands his parasitic business model. Stockheinz also knows that Byron is an old friend of the new communist dictator in Costa Salva, Lorenzo Prado (Armand Assante), who is also the son of the kraut businessman's deceased political leader friend. Indeed, Prado is an archetypical prodigal son who wants to destroy his father's political legacy. Stockheinz offers Byron $1 million to go to Costa Salva to talk Lorenzo out of 'nationalizing' the silver business, explaining that his company is "not a corporation but a civilization" and that "Were not in 1949. Nation-states are dead...The future is just money, not the governments; they have no power now. They are owned. In ten years, multinationals will own 65% of the world." Stockheinz also claims that he loves Lorenzo like a son, but he "should not abuse my love, he must not steal my silver." Needless to say, not only does Byron turn Stockheinz down, but he also hits on his beautiful and much younger wife Catherine (Ornella Muti), even making the following absurd threat to the lady the first time he meets her, "If you ever touch him again, or any other man, I will kill you," which causes the sexy, if not seemingly pernicious, young woman to smirk with seeming satisfaction. Meanwhile, at home, Byron's grandfather Walter is beginning to lose his mind, as he forgets who his grandson is and even thinks phantom Nazis are coming to take him away. Grandpa Walter also begins singing negro spirituals like "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" and tells his grandson to call the Metropolitan Opera to book him a show. One night, Byron gets an unexpected call from Catherine asking him to meet her at a fancy bar in 15 minutes, but when he shows up there, she is nowhere to be found. The next day, Walter meets Catherine at her apartment and assertively states "Let's go," to which she seductively replies, "you're never going to make love to me." Naturally, Byron says a number of provocative things to entice Catherine, even proclaiming that it was as if god had shoved his elbow in his ribs when he first saw her, as he knows it is the fastest way to get into a girl's pants. When Catherine asks Byron if he loves his girlfriend Vicky, he says, "we get along," as if that is a remarkable achievement. When Byron and Catherine go to make love, the horny banker ironically fails to 'rise to the occasion,' so the young lady sucks him off while he sings the "The Star-Spangled Banner." After they make love (or something resembling it) and Byron admires his lover's naughty bits, Catherine later recounts how when she was a child she discovered her father's corpse hanging from rafters, with "his penis was sticking and his feet were blue," hence her rather peculiar relationship with men. Indeed, Catherine is an emotional wreck of a woman who is guided by irrationality, yet she is also playing Byron for the benefit of her husband and soon begins to regret her deceitful ways as she develops a soft spot for the Judaic banker.

After failing in love and then losing his job, Byron realizes he has nothing to lose and decides to reconsider Stockheinz's offer and thus immediately heads to Costa Salva via airplane with the kraut corporatist and Catherine, who taunts him during the plane ride by flirting around with her hubby. Upon arriving in Costa Salva, Byron and his friends are greeted by dictator Lorenzo Prado, who also develops a particular liking to Catherine. Upon hanging out with his old buddy Prado, Byron realizes his friend has dramatically changed and is quite fanatical, claiming he wants to establish, "a society built on impatience" in a half-joking fashion. Prado demonstrates his power over the proletariat by randomly having sex in public with a female 'worker' he spots walking down the road, thus symbolically demonstrating his total power over the people and the land. Of course, things turn ugly when Byron goes to a fancy dinner where Prado and Stockheinz confront one another, with the latter stating the following to the former, "Where did you pickup all this feeling for the people, on your yacht in Monte Carlo...? You don't care if your people starve." Naturally, things do not end well and when Byron leaves with Stockheinz in a limo, the silver tycoon tells his driver to kill the banker, but the driver attempts to kill his boss instead, as he is a double-agent who has been hired by Prado to do so. Rather absurdly, Byron saves the life of the man that tried to kill him and Stockheinz generously repays him by ditching him on the side of the road with the limo driver's bloody corpse, thus resulting in the banker's arrest and imprisonment in a neo-bolshevik dungeon of sorts. Ultimately, Byron is blindfolded and taken to an open field by a bunch of commie thugs where he is assumedly to be shot with a number of other enemies of the state, but Prado spares his life at the last second. When Byron accuses Prado of being just like Stockheinz, the semi-deranged dictator proclaims that the West is dead and that, "There is a new force on this earth and nothings gonna stop it." Byron is left at the killing field by Prado, who has just symbolically ended their friendship in a rather cold fashion, so the downtrodden banker is forced to find his way back home. In the end, Catherine ultimately causes Byron to lose everything as his girlfriend leaves him and he even has to get rid of his house after getting back from personal purgatory in Costa Salva. Upon leaving his house with his grandfather to move elsewhere and start a new life, Catherine magically pops up before they leave and asks if there is room in his car for three people, to which he replies with the following question, "Tell me the truth...do you really think we have any chance of lasting together?" Catherine says "No" and Byron replies "neither do I" and Love & Money concludes more bitter than sweetly with an ambiguous ending that will probably piss off most viewers. Ultimately, the film has an admirable message regarding how commies are typically more ruthless and greedy when compared to their materialistic counterparts, the capitalists. After all, whereas the capitalists thrive upon competition, communists want it all to themselves, with the interaction between Stockheinz and Prado demonstrating this.

Featuring classical musical compositions by Johann Sebastian Bach and subversive dialogues about politics, economics, revolution, and globalization, not to mention a memorable performance by Klaus Kinski as a sinister Svengali-like character, Love & Money undoubtedly has all the ingredients to be a cultivated cross-genre masterpiece, but falls more than a little bit short, as if Toback tried his darnedest to assemble the film without having all the pieces. In a way, the film is classic Toback in that it is clearly the work of a man who is a much better writer than he is a filmmaker. And, indeed, like the protagonist of Love & Money, Toback has always taken great risks for his dreams, but very rarely do things work out for him the way he hoped they would, with Fingers probably being the sole example where the film more or less matched the director's original vision (Toback once admitted in an interview that his only other film that is "free of mistakes" is his rarely-seen 1989 documentary The Big Bang). What makes Toback's film different from the average Hollywood political thriller trash is that the director's singular cynicism, pessimism, and iconoclasm bleeds through the film with a vengeance that only he is capable of. While Toback has never been anything even remotely resembling a handsome man, his shameless tactics for attempting to swoon women are not that far off the protagonist of Love & Money, even if he is a bit more pathetic about it as a rather foul fellow who is notorious for lying to underage women about ostensibly giving them acting roles in his latest movie so as to get in their lily white Lolita panties so as to appease his seemingly criminal bestial carnal yearnings. Not unlike his subsequent work Exposed (1983), Love & Money feels like the curious result of what happens when an American Jew attempts to make a European arthouse film. During the early 90s, the satirical magazine Spy would publish a piece on Toback depicting him as a drug-and-pussy-addicted degenerate who pathetically pissed away numerous movies he was working on due to his self-destructive depravity. In 1991 interview with Movieline, Toback demonstrated his equal doses of perversity and paranoia by complaining regarding the Spy article: "Spy hates Jews and sex. Is there ever anything in it that suggests sex is anything but an odious, creepy and vile activity? If they had their way, the human race would become extinct because nobody would fuck anybody. It's like, "Let's get anybody whom we think fucks." They were smart. They hired this very clever girl, [editor] Susan Morrison, who would be really vicious. It's an anti-sexual, anti-Jewish frenzy. Put sex and Jews together and they'd bring on Holocaust II. They're a very dangerous magazine." Undoubtedly, in a sense, Toback is right as the filmmaker's entire oeuvre could be used as a damning case against the Jews and the director's book Jim (1971) is no less incriminating, as he brags regarding his wild and seemingly quasi-homoerotic days living with negro NFL player Jim Brown, "Jim [Brown] is making his rounds ... Jane Fonda is there and Sharon Tate ... I drift into an old friend, a delicate girl of angled, Nordic beauty ... and embark with her on an orgy ... Jim joins." Indeed, maybe a better name for Love & Money would have been 'Shikhas & Shekels.'

James Toback* (1983)

The greatest flop of NYC provocateur auteur James Toback's rather uneven yet reasonably consistently interesting filmmaking career, Exposed (1983) starring Nastassja Kinski (Tess, Cat People), Rudolf Nureyev (Romeo and Juliet, Valentino) in his last feature film role, and Harvey Keitel (Mean Streets, Toback's Fingers), was certainly assembled with the grand and notable intention of being an international filmmaking masterpiece but was ultimately destined for the celluloid dustbin of history, with only a couple individuals, including alpha-fan-boy Quentin Tarantino, being an advocate of the film. A sleazy but suavely stylized coming-of-age turned pseudo-European crime-thriller about an ambitious Wisconsin farm girl (played by Nastassja Kinski, a woman not exactly fit to play the role of an American peasant) who becomes a high-profile international fashion model featured on the cover of Cosmopolitan and eventually the lover of a seemingly demented stalker violinist with an unhealthy hatred of both Nazis and Marxist-Leninist terrorists, Exposed was immaculately described by its director James Toback as follows: "Exposed is an especially significant title for a story that moves through different circuits of revelation. Elizabeth [Nastassja Kinski] learns about herself, and about the breadth of her capacities - which turn out to be wildly beyond her initial awareness - through a series of increasingly shocking events. But it is also a romance about the fatal attraction a charming, talented and obsessed musician has for the girl." Indeed, anyone watching Exposed for a mere second would never believe that Nastassja Kinski is the naive girl she is portraying yet she, Rudolf Nureyev, and Harvey Keitel give potent performances that make Toback's thriller thrilling, even if it is ultimately a marvelous celluloid abortion and total artistic failure with all the proper ingredients of a masterpiece that never seems to fully come together. To make Exposed all the more absurd, the film features a hollow holocaust subplot of sorts expressing James Toback's heated desire to exact heated Hebraic revenge against the anti-semitic goyim, which takes the form of a Jewish protagonist sexually debasing beautiful German-Polish Shiksa Nastassja Kinski, as well as killing an anti-Semitic terrorist (ironically, played by strikingly masculine alpha-Jew Keitel). A classic work of Tobackian cinema with a 'no bullshit' attitude that is marinated in gall and wit, Exposed features hysterical females with big balls, creepy stalker males of the ridiculously romantic persuasion, catchy 1960s pop music, miscegenation of the unadulterated Hebrew-on-goyim sort, and a tragic ending in the post-WWII European spirit of the dispiriting variety that most American audiences seem to love to hate, thus demonstrating why James Toback is the virtual Jewish Abel Ferrara.

Wisconsin farm girl Elizabeth Carlson (Nastassja Kinski) has big dreams and when her sleazy and stereotypically Jewish English professor/boyfriend Leo

Boscovitch (symbolically played by James Toback himself) slaps her in the face and calls her a “cunt,” she decides it is time to drop out of college and to move to the rotten Big Apple and fulfill her potential as a positively pulchritudinous young lady looking to make a big name for herself and possibly fall deeply in love in the process. During her first night in NYC, Elizabeth finds herself in for a rude awakening in regard to the shitty city when she is robbed by a nefarious Negro and his swarthy partner-in-crime, who steal the little money she has to live on. Although hoping to be a performance pianist (she has a knack for playing tunes by Bach), Elizabeth has to settle for a slave-wage waitress job, but luckily while working one day she is discovered by a prestigious fashion photographer named Greg Miller (Ian McShane), who guarantees to make her a worldwide superstar model in under three months in a big promise he ultimately makes good on. Due to her miserable existence in NYC and the seemingly endless swindlers and crooks she has encounter, Elizabeth finds Miller’s offer to make her a star model to be quite dubious to say the least and makes a sardonic remark about menstruation, but he proves good on his offer and before she knows it, she is a world-class model, eventually even landing on the cover of Cosmopolitan. Indeed, rather magically and absurdly, Elizabeth’s desire to be rich, famous, and glamorous is fulfilled, but she is missing one very important ingredient, Mr. Prince Charming. Luckily, a weirdo who also happens to be a professional violinist (thus sharing her love of classical music) named Daniel Jelline (Rudolf Nureyev) begins to stalk her, stating odding things like, “You’re very beautiful...but you should never wear make-up, especially lipstick...Your lips are full and generous without it...Don’t call attention to what is already lovely on its own” and then immediately disappearing just as he randomly appears. Despite knowing nothing about the mysterious man in black, Elizabeth begins to immediately fall in love with him. After Daniel breaks into her apartment, she finally begins to learn that he is a professional violinist who does dirty work for an independently wealthy holocaust survivor looking for revenge against evil Nazi goyim and anti-Zionist towelheads. Later, after Daniel convinces her to come to Paris with him, Elizabeth finds out the hard truth that Daniel’s name is not really Daniel Jelline and that he is indeed the holocaust survivor that he claims to work for and he wants to use her to get next to a terrorist he wants to kill, a fellow named Rivas (Harvey Keitel) whose character is modeled after Latino Marxist/Muslim terrorist Carlos the Jackal, who once made a failed attempt to assassinate Joseph Sieff, a Jewish businessman and vice president of the British Zionist Federation. Rivas uses beautiful female models and effeminate gay men to help him carry out his terroristic jihad and Elizabeth gets close to him by befriending one of his female soldiers, a beauteous Nordic blonde babe named Bridget Gormann (Marion Varella). Rivas takes an instant liking to Elizabeth, but he finds her motivations to be rather dubious. Of course, radical terrorist Rivas has reason to suspect everyone as one of his soldiers—a French fag named

EXPOSED

Vic (arthouse star Pierre Clémenti)—sells him out to an enemy, so the terrorist leader makes an example out of him by stabbing him to death with a dagger in front of Elizabeth, which greatly disturbs the Wisconsin wonder girl. Elizabeth runs to Daniel after witnessing the murder of Vic and not long after the holocaust man has a run in with Rivas and his girl model terrorist that ends rather tragically. In the end, Elizabeth is exposed to more than she bargained for, including gaining and losing her first love in the process.

During the beginning of Exposed, director James Toback's sleazy college professor character Leo Boscovitch states quite eloquently (in rather gross contrast to his grotesque appearance and character): "The Western world is breaking down. Socially, politically, economically, morally, aesthetically and psychologically. Really, if you look into your own lives there are only two routes of escape from this dark claustrophobic trap: art and romantic love." Indeed, Exposed attempts to be epic celluloid art of the apocalyptic sort containing an equally ambitious depiction of romantic love, yet, rather unfortunately, the film is no minor masterpiece like Toback's directorial debut Fingers (1978), but instead, a dauntless celluloid abortion with all the ingredients and gall of a masterwork that just does not make the cut. Of course, like most of James Toback's films, Exposed has a certain charisma and charm to it that makes it worth coming back to. For fans of either Nastassja Kinski or Rudolf Nureyev, Exposed will also prove to be a true celluloid favorite as both of the real-life sexual deviant stars deliver mystifying and mesmerizing performances that are rather hard to ignore, even if it seems like their full potential is never reached. Although Ms. Kinski might not have the acting chops of her depraved papi, she certainly has a wildly idiosyncratic allure that beautifully bleeds through every scene of Exposed. As a Harvard graduate and unrelenting 'pick-up' artist who has been known to hit on underage girls with the line "make them a star" (which the photographer character played by Ian McShane literally does in Exposed), James Toback undoubtedly made the same offer to Nastassja Kinski in regard to Exposed and unfortunately he was unable to deliver on it. A film featuring a vengeful eye-for-an-eye-driven Judaic who has a greater passion for bloodlust than beautiful women and his violin, Exposed, quite thankfully, does not resort to the sort of Spielberg-esque kosher clichés that are typical of similarly themed works. Unlike the high-profile Hebrews in Hollywood, Toback is a sleazy Semite with an unhealthy fixation with goy gals who has never been afraid to show it, hence why his works are highly entertaining art-sploitation pieces as opposed to mere superficial smut on monetary steroids. With Exposed, Toback displayed his fantasy of defiling Aryan beauties, exterminating murderous anti-Semites, and expressing himself through delightful degenerate art, which is certainly something I cannot blame him for. Undoubtedly, James Toback is a Hebrew fit for the front-page of National Socialist propagandist Julius Streicher's Der Stürmer as a fiercely foul racial specimen, but I doubt the Führer himself could fault him for Exposed, an enthraling piece of personalized Zionist propaganda with a seedy and salacious soul, but a soul nonetheless.

HEAVEN'S GATE INITIATION TAPE
HEAVEN'S GATE INITIATION TAPE

James Toback* (1997)

Heaven's Gate is the infamous cult lead by Marshall Applewhite who all committed suicide in order to ride a spaceship hidden behind a comet to escape earth, not before cutting off their genitals. This is the recorded tape used to induct all incoming members. As you can tell, this is a rare piece of film and has its own disturbing aura surrounding it. When you begin you watch Applewhite in his creepy glory, discussing about how he is the sanctioned reborn Jesus Christ and about how earth is going to be "recycled". He repeats this word over and over again, hinting that through the Heaven's Gate is the only way to evacuate a doomed planet. As you watch, his eyes begin to pierce yours. I can't tell which is more unsettling, his stare or the fact of his ramblings. The first tape was made 5 days before the suicides, in order to try to ease the theory of our shells being expendable. He calls his father (GOD) Te. He goes about offering the truth in his same fashion, discussing re-spading, or recycling the earth, a looming rapture. His rantings go from hard to believe to commenting on "attractive extraterrestrials". It's hard to look past his eyes. It seems that he never blinks. "I'm wearing a human vehicle because I have to wear one for this task" His rants are mostly misanthropic, denouncing genetics and the lust of the flesh. Must be the reason for the castration. He relates his UFO cult as the only religion and all others are ruined records of mankind. First he verbally massacres humanity, then Christianity. Apparently, God flies around in a spaceship. As he makes silly jokes, you hear his deranged followers behind the camera chuckling some viciously deranged laugh. Some of his talks mean a lot. For something as ridiculous as what he follows, he begins to crack up and begins to break down discussing the abortion of our "human vehicles". The tape clocks in at around 2 hours, and can be very hard to stick with. It's like one of those early morning aggressive preachers broadcasts. That of course plus the harrowing details added to the story. The tape is also served as a terrifying look into his mind. Saying that this is a personal thing for him would be an understatement. Apart from being mildly psycho, he has a beautiful mind. Aside from his ramblings, he begins to talk about how he is related to Judeo-Christians and how the only religion worth following is his own and Muslims. After these maniacal two features of introduction, we see archived news footage of the dead lying on cots. The mass suicide instructions were announced and several news stories are explored. We see beautiful people discussing how happy they are about their decisions, normal everyday people falling to a greater scheme of madness. "It is the beginning of the end." So with all this in mind, would you die for god? You can purchase this DVD HERE

TYSON

Out of all Negro athletes in American history, I have always found heavy-weight champion boxer Mike Tyson to be the most interesting. I would not say that I am exactly sympathetic towards Tyson's personal struggles, but I appreciate his struggle as an urban hoodlum who was able to achieve (for better or for worse) exceptional notoriety. In the 2008 documentary Tyson directed by James Toback, Tyson gives a personal and intimate look at his turbulent life, as well as his notable boxing career. Jewish auteur James Toback has always had a glaringly odd obsession with Negro sexual potency (starting with his directorial debut Fingers) and urban thugs, so it is quite fitting that he would direct a documentary about convicted rapist Mike Tyson. While watching Tyson, it was apparent to me that James Toback was attempting present Tyson as a misunderstood individual whose reputation had been permanently blemished by unfair media portrayals, but I couldn't help but notice that the boxer does a swell job incriminating himself in the documentary; saying things that would make most people suspect that he is a dangerous individual with an unstable disposition. Of course, despite its failed attempt at presenting Mike Tyson in an angelic light, Tyson is a highly entertaining documentary worth anyone's time. After all, one can't help but take interest in an individual who once stated, "I want to fight, fight, fight and destruct the world."

Despite his blatant ambivalence towards whites in Tyson, Mike Tyson largely owes his success to Italian-American boxing manager and trainer Cus D'Amato; a man that provided the fatherless black youth with a father figure. In the documentary, Tyson admits that D'Amato trained him like a "slave", thus conditioning the illiterate and impoverished boxer into the world heavyweight champion he would later become. When Cus D'Amato died in 1985 (the same year Tyson made his professional debut), Tyson was devastated. Many people have speculated that Tyson's road to criminality and instability was a direct result of D'Amato's death, despite the fact that Tyson started committing crimes during early childhood. Still, it seems that D'Amato would have been able to at least control Tyson to a degree, as he was the man that "tamed the beast." Although D'Amato speaks very lovingly of D'Amato, he does not hold back in admitting his utter contempt for former manager Don King. In Tyson, Tyson states in an agitated manner that he thought Don King was his "black brother" and that the eccentric white-afro-puff-sporting boxer manager would, "Kill his mother for a $1.00." Tyson would later have his revenge against King (who swindled a lot of money out of the trusting boxer); beating him up at a hotel and eventually receiving around $20 million (which Tyson describes as a "small amount" of money) in court. While talking about his physical altercation with King in the documentary, Tyson mentions that "old decrepit white women" stared at him like he was a common thug, but this a minor offense when compared to Tyson's verbal assault against a white spectator who yelled to the boxer that, "he needed to be put in a straight-jacket." In response, Tyson elegantly retorted whilst grasping his crotch in a repellent animalistic manner, "Put your mother in a straight-jacket you punk ass white boy. Come here and tell me that, I'll fuck you in your ass you punk white boy. You faggot. You can't touch me, you're not man enough. I'll eat your asshole alive, you bitch. C'mon anybody in here can't fuck with this. This is the ultimate, man. Fuck you, you ho. Come and say it to my face.... I'll fuck you in the ass in front of everybody. You bitch.... come on, you bitch. You're scared coward, you're not man enough to fuck with me. You can't last two minutes in my world, bitch. Look at you scared now, you ho.... scared like a little white pussy. Scared of the real man. I'll fuck you 'til you love me, faggot!" Although this incident is featured in Toback's Tyson, many other controversial incidents are ignored in the documentary (after all, it is only 90 minutes in length). Despite the homoerotic overtones of his emotional tirade against the white heckler, Tyson said the following about his sex life, "I may like fornicating more than other people. It's just who I am. I sacrifice so much of my life, can I at least get laid? Know what I mean? I been robbed of most of my money, can I at least get a blow job?"

In Tyson, Mike Tyson also discusses his rape conviction and prison sentence(s). In 1991, Tyson was arrested for the rape of 18-year old Miss Black Rhode Island Desiree Washington. As he mentions in the documentary, Tyson denies to this day ever raping Washington. In Tyson, Tyson describes Washington as a "wretched woman" and blames her for causing him to lose his humanity. Despite claiming his innocence in regards to the rape of Desiree Washington, Tyson freely admits that he has abused women in the past. The boxer also bashes his ex-wife Robin Givens due to an episode during their marriage where she attacked Tyson on live television. In a clip featured in Tyson, Givens describes Tyson (who is sitting right next to her) as a "maniac depressive" who turned her life into a "pure hell." While Givens is bashing Tyson on television, he sits speechless with a blank stare, as if everything his ex-wife is saying is going straight over his head (which it probably was). During the documentary, Tyson - in an unintentionally hilarious (like many parts of the film) moment in the film - describes what qualities he looks for in an ideal woman. Apparently, Tyson likes strong and intelligent women (like CEOs) that he can "sexually dominant." Considering Tyson's father abandoned his family when the boxer was a youngster and his mother died when he was 16, it is no surprise that the former heavyweight champion is quite dysfunctional when it comes to family matters. As Tyson explains in Tyson, one of his daughters is on her way to college and he hopes to provide his younger children with the same opportunities; no doubt many gigantic steps away from his impoverished upbringing.

Pigeon-Thug-Luv

Tyson director James Toback with Mike Tyson and his children

At the conclusion of Tyson, Mike Tyson states regarding the public's perception of him, "You can judge me, but never can understand me." I, for one, can find no common ground with Tyson. After all, I certainly cannot relate to a peculiar black man who went from being an impoverished criminal youth to an internationally renowned boxing champion that inevitably fell from grace. In the documentary, Tyson explains that it is a miracle that he lived long enough to be 40 years old, hence why he intemperately blows all of his money (which he describes as "paper blood") and has met bankruptcy despite his millionaire status. Even with fame and fortune, Tyson managed to serve multiple prison sentences. To show his disgust with the United States government (or at least that is what he says), Tyson got two tattoos of communist revolutionary figures (Mao and Che Guevara), as well as the infamous tribal (apparently modeled after an ancient primitive warrior tribe) tattoo that so crudely covers the side of his face. After biting a piece of Evander Holyfield's ear off during their second much anticipated rival boxing match (dubbed "The Sound and The Fury"), Tyson went home and smoked some weed and drank some liquor as a way to relax. I believe that the manner in which Tyson dealt with the Holyfield ordeal is very symbolic of his character – as it shows that he is an emotionally unstable man whose struggles just to reach an equilibrium in mood. I think of Mike Tyson as a real-life (and black) Terry Malloy (Marlon Brando's character from Elia Kazan's 1954 On the Waterfront) – as both boxers became entangled as pawns in a corrupt industry that neither could understand. Like Malloy, Tyson also has a strange fetish for pigeons. Although Tyson's boxing career is pretty much over, his legacy will indubitably live on. During Tyson, Mike Tyson unexpectedly recites a poem by Oscar Wilde; which sounds somewhat normal considering the boxer's unfitting high-pitch voice and lisp. In a way (as his various hilarious quotes attest to), Mike Tyson is an illiterate street poet whose brutal poetic punches and verbal barbarism will go to inspire many generations of black youth to come. After all, Mike Tyson has achieved (and somewhat lost) the seemingly impossible (for someone of his less than privileged background) by obtaining the much desired American dream. After watching James Toback's Tyson, my opinion of Tyson has not changed, yet I highly recommend the documentary as it is certainly better than a typical Hollywood bio-pic. I will end this review with these words of wisdom from Mike Tyson regarding his way of dealing with tragedy, "I don't react to a tragic happening any more. I took so many bad things as a kid and some people think I don't care about anything. It's just too hard for me to get emotional. I can't cry no more."

DEATH SENTENCE
DEATH SENTENCE

James Wan (2007)
