gun. A woman of power some might say, a simple light of a to-be sex symbol others might claim. Either or, I believe she has a prominent and bright future ahead of her; hopefully not as bleak as the ones she partakes in. Fritt Vilt II is a masterwork on terms of hand-me-down reimagining on part of the cinematic horror medium. I'd second guess this film to metaphysical oblivion had I not seen something dim and special in the first film. The decision to not continue this series past the second is a brave and audacious move on part of Ingrid Bolsø Berdal. Her commitment to a solid quasi-franchise is a sign of blessing on behalf of "selling out" successes. Conceding upon this sequel will leave you in tattered shambles. With all cinema, continuity errors can be uncovered and motives can be strongly doubted. Fritt Vilt II is a force to be reckoned with. It will shock you, leave you in awe, and build on an already strong running series starter. This short horror catalog comes highly certified as one of the few Norwegian classics.

THE WITCH WHO CAME FROM THE SEA

Matt Cimber (1976)

If Andy Warhol's failed assassin Valerie Solanas—the bull-dyke author of the infamously moronic SCUM Manifesto (“Society for Cutting Up Men”) and would-be-filmmaker (indeed, one of the reasons she shot the pop-con-artist is because she believe he stole her script)—had been a fan of ‘fun in the sun’ and made an exploitation film before she died a deranged bum, it would probably resemble the vaguely artsy fartsy and hysterically melodramatic video nasty The Witch Who Came from the Sea (1976). Directed by Jayne Mansfield's Judaic one-time-husband/baby daddy Matt Cimber—a filmmaker who, among other things, dabbled in racially insensitive porn via Africanus Sexualis (Black Is Beautiful) (1970) and once directed both Orson Welles and Stacy Keach in the work Butterfly (1982)—penned by semi-talented Roger Corman screenwriter Robert Thom (Bloody Mama, Death Race 2000), and shot by Halloween (1978) cinematographer Dean Cundey (who would go on to shoot various other John Carpenter flicks like Escape From New York, as well as blockbusters like the Back to the Future trilogy), this rather curious piece of celluloid trash assuredly transcends the brazen banality of typical exploitation cinema, as a sometimes genuinely creepy tale about a crazed cunt with decidedly debilitating daddy issues who gets a kick out of castrating the cocks of unsuspecting musclemen and related alpha types. Featuring a pretentious reference to Early Renaissance painter Sandro Botticelli's iconic 1486 painting The Birth of Venus, heavy-handed symbolism, half-decent acting performances, and rather lacking in gratuitous sex and violence, The Witch Who Came from the Sea is certainly not the kind of work that will act as a quick fix to the sort of gorehound cinophile who gets a hard-on from seeing buckets of blood and guts Guido exploitation flicks, as it is a psychologically castrating flick where graphic murder and mayhem take a backseat to fierce female mental illness. Indeed, like what you might expect if Fassbinder suffered brain damage after snorting too much coke and penned a script that he had the slightly more talented heterosexual brother of Andy Milligan direct, Cimber's conspicuously crappy yet strangely captivating work is like a feminist flick for white trash female serial killers who have watched one too many soap operas (indeed, I can certainly see Aileen Wuornos masturbating to the film). Featuring an aberrant anti-heroine of the severely scatter-brained sort who literally and figuratively cuts men down to size (in fact, the film's tagline is: “Molly really knows how to cut men down to size!”), The Witch Who Came from the Sea is certainly not the seaside supernatural horror flick that one would probably assume it is due to its totally misleading title and absurdly sensational, if not somewhat aesthetically pleasing, poster art. Mixing elements of hagsploitation, the old school Hollywood ‘woman's film’ genre, bargain bin psychedelia, and pseudo-Hitchcockian thrills and chills, The Witch Who Came from the Sea might be one of the most grotesque dramas ever made, but it certainly seems like a Max Ophüls flick when compared to similarly themed filmic filth like I Spit on Your Grave (1978).

THE WITCH WHO CAME FROM THE SEA

30-something-year-old unmarried waitress Molly (played Millie Perkins, who is probably best known for playing the eponymous star of George Stevens' classic 1959 holy-caust propaganda flick The Diary of Anne Frank) loves telling her young nephews romantic stories about her sea captain father who she absurdly believes became lost at sea because, "He was perfect...too good to live on land," but there is more to her stories than she would care to admit. Molly's overweight and seemingly perennially disgruntled sister Cathy (Vanessa Brown) has slightly less nostalgic memories regarding their long dead father, as she describes him as a "drunk bum" and "evil bastard," among other not-so-nice things. As it turns out, Molly was routinely raped by her father when she was just a preteen child and she developed the whole fantastic 'sea captain' story to save herself from going completely insane. Of course, as a woman who fantasizes about the grizzly deaths of beefy body builders while having a nice day on the beach with her nephews, Molly is a ticking time bomb of murderous misandry and if there is anything she hates more than men, it is men's members. Indeed, Molly hates man-meat so much that after seducing two professional football players—a negro and equally braindead honky—and beginning a miscegenation-based ménage à trios involving weed and bondage, she slices off both of the unlucky athletes' dongs and gongs, thereupon resulting in their emasculating deaths. Of course, being a crazed little creature who unconsciously utilizes delusion and denial as a means of self-preservation, Molly does not remember fatally castrating the two football players, though a heavy burden seems to be weighing down on her forsaken soul. Due to her reasonably attractive appearance and petite body, Molly is told by her sister Cathy that she should become a stripper, but the batshit crazy broad refuses to because, as she aggressively states, "I'm not going to show my ass and tits for the sake of a tip." A fuck-up at virtually everything she does aside from castrating cocks and lying to herself and everyone around her, Molly is always late for work, but her swarthy old fart boss—a fellow with the quite fitting name 'Long John' (played by Lonny Chapman, who appeared in various old Hollywood classics, including Elia Kazan's 1956 Tennessee Williams adaptation Baby Doll and Hitchcock's The Birds)—is also her fuckbuddy/father-figure, so she gets away with it. Despite taking advantage of a clearly mentally perturbed not-so-young woman, Long John unquestionably cares very much for Molly and does what he can to deter her further derangement, but of course, as anyone knows who has ever had to deal with mentally perturbed people regularly, there is only so much he can do to keep the murderess at bay (after all, Molly is an ocean kind of girl).

When Molly somehow manages to crash a party inhabited by a bunch of pompous and superficial Hollywood snobs, she happens upon a reproduction painting of Botticelli's Birth of Venus, which she becomes completely entranced by. Molly is told by the man throwing the party regarding the image of Venus, "She's a witch...come out of the sea [...] Venus was born in the sea. Her father was a god...they cut off his balls...his sperm dropped into the ocean. The sea was knocked up. Venus was the kid." Of course, as someone who loves cutting off balls, Molly states to the party host regarding the Venus painting, "She's not a witch, she's beautiful." Naturally, before she knows it, Molly is trying to bite off the party host's boner. Surprisingly, the host manages to get away with his accoutrements intact, but the partygoers accuse him of attempting to attack Molly, as he had to smack her around a little bit while attempting to get away from her, thus slightly injuring her in the process. After Molly is injured, a dashing TV commercial actor comes to her rescue and pretends that he is some sort of hero. Of course, as someone who largely lives in a fantasy world of television, Molly becomes obsessed with the actor, especially when she sees him in a shaving razor commercial and schizophrenically believes she hears him say, "Why don't you shave me you hot sweet little bitch," as he begins to slit his own throat. Of course, Molly eventually kills the actor, but not before hacking off his naughty bits. Naturally, when Long John wakes up next to Molly and sees that she is covered in blood, he becomes more than a little bit suspicious of her dubious behavior. After being questioned regarding her actions, Molly eventually confesses to committing the killings, ridiculously stating regarding the belated hack TV actor, "I guess I did kill him. Why did I do that? He was so beautiful. I think, I don't know...Did he love me? He did...a little bit." As depicted in a flashback scene, Molly's father not only repeatedly raped her, but he also died on top of her at the end of coitus after suffering an orgasm-induced heart attack, thus ultimately causing the loony lady to equate sex with death. It is also revealed that Molly's father had the same topless mermaid tattoo as she does (which she gets about midway through the film from a creepy gypsy pirate dude whose face is covered in terrible tats). During the last scene of the film, Molly envisions herself being pulled out to sea in a wooden raft in an allegorical scenario reflecting her isolation from reality. Indeed, in the end, Molly's transformation from sullen sea bitch to schizophrenic sea witch is complete.

More psycho-whore-horror than mere mindless bargain bin exploitation, The Witch Who Came from the Sea is ultimately more offensive due to its low-budget kitschy handling of rather serious topics like incest, child abuse, post-traumatic stress, and mental illness than due to its depiction of a crazed cunt who gets her rocks off by cutting off cocks. Of course, it is also probably in poor taste that an actress best known for her debut childhood role as Anne Frank in the Academy Award winning film The Diary of Anne Frank (1959) is featured portraying a man-hating murderess of the cock-chopping sort who gets involved in threesomes with alpha-buck negroes (apparently, Millie Perkins agreed to star in the film to support her screenwriter husband Robert Thom), but that is also one of the film's greatest charms, as an exploitation film on steroids featuring Hollywood royalty. To add to the singular sleaziness, the film's casting director, George "Buck" Flower (who also plays a detective in the film), cast his own preteen daughter Verkina Flower to portray anti-heroine Molly as a child during the father-daughter rape scenes. Of course, as a film directed by Matt Cimber—a man whose greatest claim to fame is probably being responsible for directing the first American hardcore porn flick, He & She (1970), to receive national distribution—The Witch Who Came from the Sea was never destined to be a work of high celluloid art. Despite its decidedly dreary and disconcerting subject matter, the film also features a couple of moments of genuinely humorous comic relief, especially during a scene where a busybody white trash (non)babe remarks, "All football players are faggots... Closet queens." An aberrant (anti)Electra Complex piece that maliciously molests Hitchcock's Marnie (1964) and semi-cleverly cannibalizes the culturally confused Mishima adaptation The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea (1976) starring Kris Kristoferson, Cimber's trash-with-class 'masterpiece' is indubitably a provocative and reasonably original celluloid work lost in a cinematic sea of mostly forgettable exploitation and celluloid sleaze. Undoubtedly, if there is an exploitation film that can make you feel guilty about liking exploitation films, it is most certainly The Witch Who Came from the Sea. Indeed, for better or worse, Cimber's largely forgotten film is certainly a cream of the crop piece of work when it comes to video nasties, as a certifiably sick flick that will have lesser men grabbing their gonads in pain.

PUTRID SEX OBJECT

Matt McKay (2006) If at all, you've seen this as a shock site that your friends have linked you to. Funny, cause that's how I stumbled across it. Thistle Harlequin is a professional body piercer and the feverish star of a little known short film entitled Putrid Sex Object. This title doesn't skip around or toy with metaphors. It is exactly what it is. A lonely transvestite crawls around an abandoned house in search of something unknown. Instead, What he/she finds is a horse's head ripe from being skinned. The events that unfold are not for anyones eyes. He proceeds to skull fuck the poor animals head while covered in blood and pieces of decaying flesh. He begins to furiously masturbate using the goo from the decapitated head as lubrication for his forbidden pleasures. Meanwhile, we all stare at the screen in extreme disgust. The film itself is eerily close to that of Nekro; a film in which a woman is dragged through a lonely house only to be at the mercy of a serial killer. I feel that Putrid Sex Object is the superior vision with both films in mind. Nekro used the score and sound effects to an incredibly noisy and annoying use but PSO used heavy frequencies to pound our ears and leave us vulnerable for what was to come next. Depending on what this film is attempting to do, It either fails or becomes a landmark in extreme cinema. Putrid Sex Object could never be art for it is too audacious, but as a sexual piece of pseudo-anthro deterrent towards any form as sexuality, it works. Thistle H. has huge balls and a bear trap stomach for performing these lewd sexual acts on film. I honestly don't know whether I should congratulate him or fear him. Putrid Sex Object is an extreme exercise in unbridled filth. In other words; a must see. Interview with Thistle Harlequin

Matt Reeves (2008)

Cloverfield is a film in disguise. It is primarily known for the story, which is a creature ripping the living shit out of Manhattan, but it is much more than that. It is a beautiful love story. This is the part where i tell you not to judge it before you see it. Such an event would only create mass hysteria and that is exactly what we are treated to. Friendships will be challenged and normal socialites will be thrown into the middle of a chaotic environment with 0% survival rate.

This film is shown through first person. Rob is a douche bag. We know this. He is a pompous ass living in New York in his flat. He is a recently appointed Vice President of a company and is being sent to Japan. We meet such characters as his best friend Hud, who is a bit slow and brings a lot of humor to the film. Kind of charming actually. Hud is in love with Marlena and to be honest, so am i. Such a sweet pretty girl. I sympathize for her the most. What starts off as a going away party quickly turns into a nightmarish situation which had me on the edge of my seat. It would be an understatement to say that Cloverfield completely revived the monster genre. First there was King Kong and Godzilla, then there was The Host, and now we are presented with Cloverfield. This film is so far from any normal monster film. We have The Host which was almost similar due to its original creature design but did bring something new. Family dysfunction. Like this, Cloverfield brings paranoia, love, tragedy, and fear and blends it into a horrific smoothie of a horrifying nature. Going into the theater today, i didn't know what to expect. Hype definitely is a killer. It cause Snakes on a Plane to bomb and did so also with the American Godzilla. This film delivers all that is promised and more. Chances are that if you do not like the trailers, you won't like the film. You shouldn't even bother. Now being a film about an unstoppable love filmed with an American Eagle cast, we have the second obstacle. The Cloverfield monster. Well, it is truly a sight to behold. I refuse to give it away. Such fear can only be described in comparison of when we first see the killer shark in JAWS. It is big. It is bad. It has teeth. It has multiple appendages and it bites. Little creatures fall off of its back that resemble the Arachnids in Starship Troopers. Of course, no monster film is complete without its roar. This one's is ear shattering. Many reviews i have read claimed that it was too noisy or it was just a stupid film. I look at it this way. If you are going to watch a film about a monster destroying a city with military counter-attacks, you'll be sadly mistaken if you think it's going to be a "hush hush" film. Surrounding the viral marketing, there is two things at hand. One, J.J. Abrams is fucking with us, leading the masses of ignorant people into believing it is Voltron, Cthulu, Dodo, or a Slusho shirt that was a nod to his hit television show "ALIAS". Not many people realize this and they assume too much. Cloverfield is the most over analyzed film since Eraserhead. This film also touches down on political issues, such as all the great monster films of the silver screen and beyond do. So, we have a blossoming love story surrounded by a sugar coating that is unstoppable and he an incredible appetite for destruction. What can go wrong? Not much. This film's final moments are deeply heartbreaking and past that we hear horrifying news and a subliminal scene in the background that might hint where the monster comes from. What's even more horrifying? The fact that creatures like this could exist in the darkest depths of the sea. Cloverfield is a near perfect film. Think of it as the first Dogme 95 monster film. Lars Von Triers would be proud.

Matt Reeves (2008)

WARNING: THIS IS INTENDED ONLY FOR VIEWERS OF THE FILM ALREADY. MASSIVE SPOILER ALERTCloverfield is a very different sort of movie. Monsters grace the screen all the time and never leave such an impact, let alone one that can be viewed so extensively. This film is known for its viral marketing campaign and its feverish fan base spreading rumors about shit they heard from their cousin who works with Paramount. Spreading from the amount of letters in the title, Slusho, Cthulu, Dodo, or simply Voltron, there is no limit to how silly these seem. The one I immediately dismissed due to the nature of these claims turns out to fit like a mocking piece of a puzzle. Slusho, the faux-slurpee company based in Japan, was on Abram's hit show ALIAS. Being seen on Jason's shirt in the teaser, everyone went frantic. Claiming it was a lion or slurpee crazy beast going rampant in NY. I honestly couldn't figure out which was more exaggerated, the fact of a monster attacking NY or the rabid fan base. Many things struck me about the film. It opens with a DHARMA symbol. For those of you who don't know what that is, it is a symbol used with Abrams' other hit show LOST. This show has to do with unexplainable things happening to the crew of a downed ship. Could this be a link to the disturbance in NY with the creature? Another thing I noticed was the idea that there could be two monsters in NY. When Hud is filming the TV, we see the monster at the same time in different looking places, one having a fin-like back and the other having a slender tail. It would also explain the noticeable distance the creature traveled in such a small amount of time. Being in Midtown and destroying a bridge at the same time would even make The Flash exhausted. Due to the fact its body lice wasn't falling off everywhere and its many different limbs, one can come to the conclusion that there are more than one, or it is evolving fast. Adapting to oxygen must be a bitch. On the official flash site of Cloverfield here <http://www.1-18-08.com/>, we are given many pictures with hidden meanings. The newest additions show a fishing boat and dead beached whales, gored and mutilated. If you look at the time stamp, this would have happened near the morning. Leaving a new coming monster unnoticed while the government prepares the attack. Another thing I noticed was how you sometimes see claws and in other scenes you see its suction cup like fingers. Notice the claw marks in the Statue of Liberty. Weird, much. Reeves stated in an interview regarding the monster this. "The key to it is that the monster was a baby. The monster was suffering from separation anxiety and was absolutely disoriented and pissed, "where's mommy?" and terrified. That was the most important aspect of the creature. Not only was he furious and in a rage but he was scared, because to me there's nothing scarier than something huge that's spooked. If you're at the circus and the elephants are going nuts you don't want to be near them. We talked with Neville about the idea of how when a horse gets spooked you see the whites under the bottom of its eye. He fleshed out those sorts of details. We talked about wanting the monster to be different in that it was white. All these different aspects, which were important to us. It developed in many different ways and it came down to what Neville was doing which was amazing.” This could explain many things. It could explain there being two monsters (I.E: Mother and Son/Daughter). Separation anxiety. That sort of thing. It can easily be disproven but I love to imagine that during all the commotion, another creature could easily sneak around. The other topic is Slusho and the mysterious falling craft at the end of the film. Well, Rob works for a company in Japan (Hence his going away party) and it is obvious he works for the company responsible for Slusho. Enter Tagruato <http://tagruato.jp/>, the Japanese company responsible for the drilling of the deep-sea nectar used in the popular drink. This could mean a couple things. One view of this means that Rob knew about the creature’s existence. Sort of far fetched, but if you are the Vice President of a company, you would have a high enough pay grade for such information. Another link to that is the new four part manga series only been released in Japan now. At the end of the first volume, we are given this haunting last still. A Tagruato ship dragging something.... with eyes. I’ll be the first to admit that Rob seemed a little bit unphased by the appearance of a monster. The fact that the story of a baby being disturbed by a deep sea drilling operation fits the monster genre perfectly. We got the politics. Dueling companies Tagruato and the anti-terror Tidowave Company. <http://tidowave.com/Wow>, danger to our environment. Seems to all be coming together. Way to get raped by Mother Nature though. Tidowave’s last entry before being shut down was on 01-17-08 Coincidence? Next thing is the falling object in the background near the end. Many people claim it is the creature, coming from space. This is theoretically impossible. Something of it’s size would create massive tidal waves all across the Atlantic ocean and result in the immediate expedition to discover what it was, leaving preemptive time to evacuate once noticing meteor containing the hell beast. Tagruato’s website stated their satellite was destroyed and crashed to earth, thus filling more of the gap in this viral timeline. “Did you see the thing in the last shot? In the final shot there’s a little something, and I don’t wanna say what it is. The final shot before the titles. The stuff at Coney Island, there’s a little something there and I don’t want to give it away ’cause the fun is sort of to find it, but I will say this: there’s a funny thing, you look at the shot and until you see it you don’t see it and you really don’t see it and obviously you don’t ’cause none of you have seen it, but once you see it you’ll never stop seeing it.” At the end credits, if you reverse the recorded message, you hear someone barely get out the words “It’s Still Alive”. So the creature did not die. Many people are probably wondering why the hell it won’t die. Well, if I was housed in a deep-sea crevice and withstood thousands of pounds of pressure, I could imagine being able to withstand a beating. I’m starting to actually feel bad for this creature. So there you have it. Two murder beasts and all. This is just my way of looking at this. You can easily tell there is more than meets the eye. Ending Voice: <http://boomp3.com/m/bd034dfca370>

JOHNNY SUNSHINE: MAXIMUM VIOLENCE

Matt Yeager (2008) Ah, what do you know? A surprise Brain Damage film. When I read the plot and saw the cover art, I felt some sort of promise wash over my body. Half way into hating the film, I discovered that it is a Brain Damage film so my disappointment is instantly explained. It doesn't make me want to cry anymore. Rather than having an interesting vision, the director tries to fuse elements from Carlton Mellick III novellas and The Running Man. Johnny Sunshine is a female snuff performer and zombie killer who entertains her boss Max, with snuff films . The city was walled up three years after a zombie epidemic and the scum is on the outside of the walls. After filming a couple of horrible implausible torture scenes, the tables turn when her boss conspires to put an end to Johnny for the ultimate snuff film. Johnny Sunshine opens up very stylishly with animated caricatures that litter the screen. If they were aiming for a comic book feel to the opening, they succeeded, but that's all that really works other than the occasional brutal effect and the wonderful scarce nudity. I think this is the first Brain Damage film I've seen that has nudity. For a company specializing in "UNRATED" films, you'd think they'd exercise that freedom a tad bit more. My main problem, other than the horrible cinematography, is the main character Johnny. The dialogue is forced to sound like a neo-noir dame from hell and fails miserably. I don't mind the occasional female warrior, but I'd like the essence of stage presence, let alone a decent actress. Johnny Sunshine could have been better played by Will Ferrel in drag. At least then the character would fit the retarded spasms of generation X techno. I chose not to finish this film for several reasons. The very idea of life existing outside a shelled in city is hard enough to believe, but for them to have working power and a very nice desktop in which they frequently smoke and enjoy many other luxuries is beyond me. Now I know, "You can't expect a film to be realistic. Especially when it has to do with zombies!" You're right. But I hated 10,000 B.C. for the same reasons and look how better off I am. Johnny Sunshine: Maximum Violence is a failure as a bizarro film in general. It is bacteria in a cesspool, converging other ideas into some scum fuck film project that probably could be directed by a 12 year old with a taste for Friday the 13th films. Other than the random breast shot, this film is completely worthless and a waste of time. I went past my tolerance at the 45 minute mark. I for one fear that you will beat my high score. Avoid this film like the plague.

KICK-ASS

Matthew Vaughn (2010)

I have never understood the fascination with comic books and superheroes, especially with people over the age of 10. One must be very desperate for complete and utter escapism if they fantasize about being some flying ubermensch that sports homoerotic tights. After all, if one is truly looking for escapism, why not fantasize about a dream that could actually come true, like being the next Vincent Gallo or Klaus Barbie. In the recent film Kick-Ass, a four-eyed virgin weasel named Dave decides to make his superhero dream come true by wearing an aesthetically repulsive costume (to match his equally repulsive body) and fighting a bunch of criminals that end up deservedly kicking his self-righteous fanboy fanny. Despite being a limp-wristed pussy, a bystander records Dave aka “Kick-Ass” in a moment of dubious heroism that helps make him an internet phenomenon and local superhero.

Potential Sodomy Victims

Hollywood is very big on promoting philistine escapism and Kick-Ass certainly delivers in that regard. Like most Hollywood films, Kick-Ass manages to combine the petty problems that Americans have (in this case, a virgin who always gets his ass kicked) with wacky and absurd solutions to these problems. For example, whilst being beaten by a large Negro, a little white girl (Hit-Girl) magically saves dilettante superturd Kick-Ass from certain death. Also, like many Hollywood films (a legacy that ultimately began with Shirley Temple), Kick-Ass sexualizes the prepubescent Hit-Girl. Not only can Hit-Girl single-handedly beat up a room of barbaric Negro criminals but she can also seduce grown men with her mini-skirt. Hit-Girl's Father Big-Daddy (I am sure this name is supposed to have a typically Hollywood Freudian connotation) has no doubt trained her well.

This little girl has grown a deadly phallus

Kick-Ass is certainly another sick and clever attempt by the degenerate perverts at Hollywood to demoralize children at a very young age. Despite most young children being punished by their parents for even reciting the title of the film, Kick-Ass is no doubt a film geared towards the youngest of viewers. The Shrek films are full of somewhat subtle sexual innuendos but Kick-Ass goes all the way with a little girl yelling “Cunt” and literal Kleenex-filled masturbatory fantasies. Perversion aside, why would anyone want to see a little girl and a high school weakling as superheroes in the first place? I have fond memories of watching Tim Burton's Batman in elementary school as I saw Batman as an admirable superhero that as a child I could look up to. Do contemporary grade school children really look up to little girls and high school nerds as real heroes with strong moral principles? I guess it would be considered ageism and sexism for young boys and girls to look up to a large muscular man as a superhero.

On the Left: The Ugliest Villain in Film History

When it comes down to it, Kick-Ass is an expensive pile of cinematic garbage expertly concocted and executed by the culture-distorting globalists that manufacture films in Hollywood. The message of the film is that criminals are bad but even a little girl and a teenage loser (who pathetically pretends he is gay as a way to get close to a girl) can defeat them if they have a strong enough will to moral power. Personally, I found Kick-Ass ultimately lacking in fulfillment as the sickly-looking Israelite from Superbad, who plays the Villain Red Mist, did not die a miserable death via gassing or being burned alive (this death was reserved for everyone's favorite Hollywood psycho: Nicholas Cage). Instead, one can expect another chapter in the phantasmagorical-schlock Kick-Ass franchise.

THE FREE WILL

Matthias Glasner (2006)

I have certainly seen more fucked flicks in my relatively short lifetime than in the combined lives of everyone in an extended Catholic Mexican family, so I do not feel like I am exaggerating when I state that the contemporary German film Der Freie Wille (2006) aka The Free Will directed by Hamburg-bred auteur Matthias Glasner (This Is Love, Gnade aka Mercy) is easily one of the most, if not the most, authentically dejecting, disturbing, and emotionally displeasing films ever made. While the masters of German New Cinema like Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Helma Sanders-Brahms, Wim Wenders, Werner Herzog, and Peter Handke revolutionized post-WWII Teutonic cinema by directing decidedly dark, depressing, pessimistic, and oftentimes cynical works with uniquely unhappy endings that would probably influence less stronger viewers to commit suicide, Glasner has done the unthinkable by taking cinematic weltschmerz, melancholia, angst, and hatred to even more forbidden and forlorn realms that make one think that contemporary Germans have to be the most uniquely unhappy and emotionally disturbed people in the world. Thankfully, unlike the self-satisfied cinematic horror shows of Austrian director Michael Haneke, The Free Will has a certain empathy and ‘humanity’ to it that reminds the viewer that it was not directed by some sneering megalomaniac auteur who merely uses cinema as a platform to express his bourgeoisie-bred sense of superiority and misanthropy, as well as cold and detached cynicism. A nearly 3-hour-long art-house rape epic shot mostly from the perspective of a misogynistic serial rapist (what Germans call a ‘Triebtäter’) who attempts to reintegrate into society after spending over 9 long years institutionalized in a psychiatric rehabilitation center, Glasner’s work dares not only to force the viewer to empathize with one of the most hated sorts of human monsters, but also makes them take a deep and darker look at themselves. Shot in a voyeuristic realist fashion (many of the ‘extras’ are actual real people) on digital video yet at the same time considerably ‘cinematic’ in terms of its essence and rhythm, the somewhat ironically titled work demonstrates through random everyday circumstances and situations that one’s free will can only go so far when internal demons and pernicious pathological impulses prove to be much stronger. A tragic dark romance starring (as well as co-written and co-produced by) popular mainstream kraut actor Jürgen Vogel—a proud proletarian with rather fucked up teeth who, like his buddy Glasner, started on in the independent cinema world and has gone on to star in ethno-masochistic Hollywood-like agitprop pieces like Margarethe von Trotta’s Rosenstraße (2003) and the big celluloid turd Die Welle (2008) aka The Wave—The Free Will is a potent reminder that Germany can still produce dark masterpieces, even with big stars playing the lead role, as a work that makes the urban sexual savagery of Gaspar Noé’s Irréversible (2002) seem hopelessly contrived by comparison. The unnerving and ultimately exhausting story of a 'reformed' sexual predator who hates women that starts a steamy love affair with an assumed victim of sexual abuse who hates men, Glasner's film demonstrates that even the most fucked up of perverts can find a 'soul mate' of sorts, as the victimized are oftentimes looking for new victimizers.

Theo Stoer (Jürgen Vogel) is a perennially pissed off and slightly overweight young man who has very little tolerance for 'laidback' people and after he is called back inside to work while taking a cigarette break at the beachside restaurant that he works out and notices that his coworkers are doing nothing but screwing around and talking about frivolous bullshit, he flies into a violent rage, physically assaults a young comrade, smashes a bunch of glasses, and storms out of the building while hatefully saying to himself regarding co-employees, "butt-fuckers." While driving away from his work in his old car, Theo notices a young lady (Anna Brass) in body-accentuating spandex riding her bike, so he passes her, parks his car, and waits for her so he can release all of his anger by sexually pillaging her. Indeed, upon catching up to her, Theo violently knocks the woman off her bike, gives her a couple brutal blows to her face, ties her hands and legs together, strips off her clothes, rapes her violently while calling her a "cunt," gives her a couple more blows to the face, and continues to rape her all the more violently until he reaches the sexual and psychological relief that he was looking for. Ironically, it is Theo's concern for the young lady when she attempts to escape and hurts herself that gets him caught because, after going to get a first aid kit to attend to her wounds, the rape victim is rescued by a good sanitarian. Unable to escape after the police discover his car, Theo hides out in the woods that night like a scared animal being hunted, but he is eventually caught and beaten by the cops. Of course, being in liberal Germany, Theo is not sent to prison to get his rectum reamed, but to a psychiatric rehabilitation center. Of course, as The Free Will ultimately demonstrates, there is no such thing as true sexual rehabilitation.

Flash forward 9 years and 4 months later and a much thinner and older Theo is standing before a parole board who he successfully convinces that he is 'rehabilitated' enough to be given back his freedom and to be reintegrated back into mainstream society. Although freed, Theo is forced to live under probation in the Mülheim-based apartment of a lanky and somewhat 'used-up' looking guy named Sascha (André Hennicke), who ultimately becomes the only friend and mentor of the 'lapsed' rapist. Naturally, Sascha warns Theo right from the get go, "This is gonna be fucking hard for you. So prepare yourself." When not going to the mall to buy really uncool clothing, Theo attempts to suppress his warped sexual urges by regularly practicing strict exercise regiments, as well as getting involved with karate with Sascha at a local gym where he eventually finds himself in a awkward situation while sitting naked in a sauna with an equally unclad chick with big bosoms (who was apparently played by a sound assistant of the film). Eventually, Theo goes job hunting and despite revealing to his prospective employer, Claus Engelbrecht (Manfred Zapatka), that he has spent over 9 years in psychiatric detention for committing “rape in conjunction with grievous bodily” on three different occasions, he is hired to work at a printing warehouse. Of course, if Claus realized that his new employee would eventually be starting a romantic relationship with his beloved daughter Netti (Swiss actress Sabine Timoteo), he probably never would have hired him in the first place. In the meantime, Theo becomes dangerously obsessed with a waitress at a pizzeria, confessing to Sascha, “The problem is, I think something’s brewing. It isn’t so strong, but...” and “Sure, I like her [the waitress], but somehow I don’t like her either. Understand?”

Meanwhile, it is revealed that Theo’s employer Claus has a rather dubious relationship with his daughter Netti, with incest being hinted at more than once during the film. Naturally, Claus becomes rather upset when Netti, who does bookkeeping for her father’s company, moves out of his home and into a new apartment. Just having broken up with her boyfriend and living on her own for the first time, Netti has just started a new stage in her life and her creepy father Claus cannot handle it, as he weeps like a little girl upon his little girl’s decision to fly the coop for good (in fact, she eventually breaks off all contact with him). As for Theo, he finds himself in trouble when his only friend Sascha decides to quit his job to move to Berlin, as he loses the sole psychological support that he so desperately needs. One day, Netti approaches Theo, who she once met at her father’s printing factory, at a grocery store to borrow some money to buy some corn, thus beginning their rather strange relationship. Indeed, that same night, Theo meets Netti at a café to get paid back the money he lent her and she immediately confesses to him, “I don’t like men. I don’t want anything to do with ‘em.” Needless to say, Netti is taken aback when Theo responds to her bitchy remark by saying, “That’s convenient. I’m not very fond of women either.” While Netti accuses Theo of using tricks on her, she realizes he is not joking when he tells her it is no joke, zips up his jacket, and walks away without saying anything else to her. A somewhat strange girl of the innately introverted sort, Netti hunts down Theo’s phone number and gives him a call even asking him, “Am I disturbing you?” after admitting she searched information for his phone number. For their first ‘official’ date together, Theo and Netti go to see a movie together, but their relationship takes a more ‘passionate’ turn when the little lady intensely beats the rapist while he gives her a karate lesson, as you can tell she has a lot of pent up hatred and really gets off to hurting men. After the karate lesson, Netti confesses that she is “going away for a while” to seaside Belgium to do an internship at a “terrific chocolate factory,” thus putting their not quite blossomed relationship in indefinite limbo.

to Belgium to visit Netti, who is overjoyed by his arrival, though she has a hard time showing it. While it does not take long for them to have sex and begin bonding, Netti is disturbed by Theo's overwhelming loneliness and detachment to the point where she breaks down and starts crying hysterically. After going to a big empty church and hearing a random woman singing "Ava Marie," Theo and Netti more or less fall in love and begin doing banal things that people in love do like shopping at Ikea and eating breakfast together, but all good things must come to an ugly end. When Netti calls Theo one night while she is drunk and says that she will not be home until late because she is hanging out with a male co-employee, the lapsed rapist becomes enraged and eventually ends up violently raping a young chick, who dared to honk her horn at him while he was minding his own business, in her parking garage. Needless to say, things between Theo and Netti take a turn for the worst after that, even though the rapist initially attempts to hide his crime by washing off his dick and pretending everything is normal. Eventually, Theo decides to come clean and tells Netti that "It won't work" and "it's over" because he is a serial rapist. Indeed, after telling her, "I don't love you. You don't know anything. You don't know a single thing!" Theo reveals to Netti that he was locked up for 9 years because, as he states himself, "I raped 3 women. First I beat 'em up, and then I fucked 'em." Needless to say, Netti does not take it well, especially after Theo says, "I don't love you. I hate you!" so she physically attacks her rapist bastard beau while screaming like a wounded wild animal, but he merely kicks her away and heads back to Deutschland.

For the final 30 minutes or so of The Free Will, the film takes a different course and the viewer sees everything from the perspective of Netti, who dedicates her time to lurking around and stalking Theo just as he once stalked his victims. After temporarily going back to her father (who she originally cut off all contact to) and sleeping with him in his bed(!), Netti comes up with the absurd idea to meet one of Theo's victims, a discernibly deranged blonde named Anja Schattschneider (Judith Engel). While Anja initially refuses to talk to Netti, she eventually agrees to go with her to a restaurant because she assumes that she is also one of Theo's victims. When Netti absurdly confesses that she is a "friend" of Theo, the conspicuously crazed bitch rape victim follows her into the bathroom, brutally attacks and beats her, pulls down her pants, and sexually assaults her by violently shoving the handle of a toilet bowl brush in her vagina in what is ironically the most disturbing scene of the entire film in a surely sickening scenario where a rape victim becomes the most visceral source of untamed hatred (notably, Glasner has claimed that during his research for the film, he learned that such behavior is not atypical of rape victims, as they develop a lot of pent up hatred as a result of their experiences that they have no outlet for). Of course, being raped with a toilet brush by a meta-bitchy blonde beastess of a rape victim does not stop Netti on her quest to find her rapist lover. Upon learning that

Theo is living in Berlin with Sascha, Netti heads to the German metropolis and stalks her lover around the city, even sleep outside the door of his apartment building and eventually breaking into his apartment when he is not there. At one point Netti picks up a pair of scissors as if she intends to stab Theo, but her intentions could not be more different. In the end, Netti finds Theo sitting on a beach and tries in vain to stop him from slitting his own wrists, but of course he succeeds and dies in her company as she cries hysterically to the point where snot is gushing out of her nose. Though Theo is dead, Netti stays and holds his corpse as the sun rises, as if her love will bring him back. Of course, in the end, Netti was Theo's last victim, even if he did not actually rape her.

A work with a somewhat ironic yet surely fitting title, The Free Will depicts a forsaken yet contemptible man suffering from truly intolerable inner turmoil and plaguing pathologies who knows that his actions are completely sick and perversely preternatural yet lacks the psychological strength and self-control to prevent such savage and unhinged behavior, hence why he opts for suicide, which becomes the one instance where he demonstrates true "free will." Needless to say, Glasner's film is not a naïve piece of liberal swill that expresses that there may indeed be hope for rapists and other sexual perverts, but a flick that takes an uniquely unflattering look at humanity and demonstrates that, although free will might exist, it is, at best, rather limited. Notably, in the audio commentary for the Benten Films DVD release of The Free Will, auteur Glasner stated regarding the film: "We felt that we had to make this film. It's not a film you want to make...it's a film you have to make. And you hope that you're rid of it then. We often asked ourselves why we were doing this. Why us? Sometimes I think we [Glasner and Vogel] met so we could make this film." Indeed, Glasner and Vogel had already been working together for a well over a decade before making the The Free Will, with the dark no-budget Theo van Gogh-esque crime comedy Sexy Sadie (1996) aka Komm zurück, sexy Sadie showing no evidence that both men would ever be capable of creating such a uncommonly brutal yet strikingly mature work of drastically dark and devastating cinema. Unquestionably, Vogel was just as much of an 'auteur' of the film as Glasner, as his singular acting performance and co-writing certainly guided the story to the point where the idea of another actor playing the lead role seems totally unthinkable, as his performance is just an innate ingredient of the film as Kurt Raab's was in The Tenderness of Wolves (1973) aka Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe. In fact, Vogel was so deeply wrapped up in the dark and depraved world of rapist Theo that he forced Glasner, who did not want the character to die at the end, to conclude the film with the character's suicide, stating in the Benten Films DVD audio commentary, "I had to let Theo die because I couldn't stay with him any longer. I had to get him out of my life. It was the right thing to do [...] I won't forget this movie for the rest of my life." Indeed, a piece of malignantly melancholy realist romance-horror that puts the sick post-Auschwitz sadomasochistic love affair between an ex-SS officer and his ex-victim featured in Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974) to shame is terms of its decidedly disconcerting depiction of lunatic love, The Free Will ultimately proves that even the most damaged, detached, and deranged of people can find true love, though whether it ends positively or not is a completely different story. With the original cut apparently running at about 6 hours in length (the director originally hoped that the German TV channel WDR would screen the rape epic in four parts for the mainstream general public!), Glasner's work is certainly a sort of Berlin Alexanderplatz of rape films. While Glasner may not be the next Fassbinder, Herzog, or even Hauff, he certainly made a contemporary masterpiece with The Free Will that proves that true Teutonic cinema did not completely die with the capitulation of German New Cinema in 1982 as a result of Rainer Werner's premature death. Of course, unfortunately, Glasner's film also demonstrates that the German collective unconscious is no less foreboding than it was 25 years before, as The Free Will is clearly the expression of an absolutely accursed Volksgeist that still feels the physical and psychological rape of the Fatherland by the Red Army in 1945.

THE DESIGNATED VICTIM

Maurizio Lucidi (1971)

As an always easy-to-recognize fellow that starred in groundbreaking cinematic works by such top Occidental arthouse filmmakers as Luchino Visconti, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Liliana Cavani, Franco Brocani, Adriaan Dittvoorst, Philippe Garrel, Peter Fleischmann, Étienne O'Leary, Costa-Gavras, Dusan Makavejev, Miklós Jancsó, and Bernardo Bertolucci, French-Corsican actor and sometimes-experimental-filmmaker Pierre Clémenti (The Leopard, Belle de Jour) was certainly one of the most important and prolific European actors of the mid-1960s through early-1980s (though his career did not stop there) whose resume few other actors could touch in terms of starring in such an eclectic collection of distinguished arthouse masterpieces, so it seems somewhat strange that he would bother to star in a stereotypically sleazy yet stylish Italian Hitchcock rip-off at the height of his career, but he did and naturally I could not help but watch it. Indeed, The Designated Victim (1971) aka La vittima designata aka Slam Out aka Murder by Design is a decidedly decadent yet paradoxically thematically 'reactionary' and less than ambiguously gay Guido molestation of Hitchcock's Patricia Highsmith adaptation Strangers on a Train (1950) starring Clémenti as an eccentrically effete psychopathic aristocrat that makes Oscar Wilde seem butch in terms of refined effeminacy who attempts to coerce Cuban-American leading man Tomas Milian into "swapping murders." Directed by a relatively unknown and undignified genre hack named Maurizio Lucidi that sometimes used the Hebraic-sounding pseudonym 'Mark Lender' who got his start working as an assistant director on Pasolini's The Gospel According to St. Matthew (1964) and who went on to direct the senseless Django clone Halleluja for Django (1967) and even a Hebrew-language Italo-Israeli Zionist agitprop piece entitled Hamisha Yamim B'Sinai (1969) aka Five Days in Sinai, the film is basically Strangers on a Souped-Up Gondola in Venice as a work that attempts to combine Strangers on a Train and Visconti's Death in Venice (1971) in a almost completely bloodless yet sometimes visually stunning quasi-giallo form. An inately uneven and sometimes poorly paced work that glaringly drags at the end but ultimately concludes with a provocative twist-ending that even Hitchcock might have admired (though I doubt it), The Designated Victim is a tale of sexual and psychological schizophrenia where Clémenti completely steals the entire show as the corrupting killer Count and ultimately makes Mr. Milian seem like a witless hack with nil acting chops by comparison. In fact, aside from the aesthetically soothing scenes of Venice and melodic yet melancholic score by Luis Bacalov, Lucidi's work is ultimately only worth seeing for Monsieur Clémenti's fiercely flamboyant performance as quite possibly the most devastatingly decadent and depraved aristocrat in all of cinema history as a character that makes Helmut Berger's Mad King Ludwig II in Visconti's Ludwig (1972) seem rather restrained. Indeed, in spite of hopeless hack Lucidi's superlatively sophomoric direction and the fact that most of the other characters in the film are not much more than pretty yet plastic ciphers, The Designated Victim carries a sort of curious charisma that borders between the unintentionally humorous to the patently pathetic in the form of Clémenti, who completely carries the film as a young cultivated blueblood queen who has a totally preposterous and intangible dream that he ultimately charms and blackmails a weak beta-male designer into carrying out for him. While both the male characters in the film have lady friends, the film ultimately depicts a dark and dysfunctional romance between two very different goombah guys who are both missing something vital in terms of their masculinity (or lack thereof).

Stefano Argenti (Tomas Milian) is an unhappily married workaholic advertising designer from Milan who long ago made the mistake of marrying a woman that he did not love simply because she was rich. Naturally, since he has made a fairly successful career for himself, Stefano no longer needs his fiercely frigid heiress wife, who rather resents her husband's self-earned success. Indeed, Luisa Argenti (Marisa Bartoli) is a soulless rich bitch and she no longer loves her hubby because he is now an increasingly enterprising designer who plans to make millions by starting up his own business. A rather cold and seemingly latently Sapphic Ice Queen, Luisa is different from most women in that she seems to get off on men that are submissive and completely dependent on her and she can't seem to handle being with any fellow that is in the least bit competitive with her. Unfortunately, to start his dream business in Venezuela, Stefano needs to cash shares that he owns, but they are all in his wicked wifey's name and she won't let him cash them, as she wants to keep him a weak and meek cuckold. On top of everything else, Stefano is carrying on a hot and heavy love affair with a much younger French babe with a delectable derriere and equally enticing tits named Fabienne Béranger (Katia Christine). Stefano oftentimes takes his mistress Fabienne on lavish vacations so that they can be completely alone together without the threat of Luisa catching them and during a trip to Venice, the protagonist randomly meets an eccentric longhaired young aristocrat named Count Matteo Tiepolo (Pierre Clémenti) who is as shockingly thin as an anorexic coke-addled French runaway model and who is sporting a creepily colorful weirdo wardrobe that would give Rothschild pawn Russell Brand (who seems like a retarded version of Clémenti's character) a hard-on that includes a purple silk scarf, grey gloves, red beanie, and various pieces of girly jewelry that makes him look like he was given a makeover by a colorblind gypsy tranny. Count Matteo is with a seemingly mute blackhaired babe with a completely blank stare that superficially resembles Morticia A. Addams who looks like she suffered a LSD-induced lobotomy and she is more or less the aristocrat's sex slave, though he has little, if any, real sexual interest in her, especially after Stefano comes into his cockeyed gaze.

THE DESIGNATED VICTIM

While Stefano soon says goodbye to the Count upon initially meeting him after the two both find themselves eying the same piece of jewelry sold by a Venetian street vendor, the protagonist finds himself bumping into Matteo again a couple more times that day, as if he and his mentally vacant Morticia-esque muse are following him. Upon the third time of bumping into one another, the Count invites Stefano and his mistress on his boat, though he makes Fabienne sit inside the watercraft with his girlfriend so that he can talk privately with the protagonist. Like many unhinged queens, Matteo soon reveals that he is a superficially witty yet also mentally feeble and rather superstitious man that believes in numerology who is addicted to trying new perverse things just for the kick since he is rich and spoiled and thus terribly bored with life. For example, Matteo describes to Stefano how he loaned out his slave “girlfriend” to another man for fun, though it ultimately proved to be just a “passing fancy” that he did “just for the experience.” As the decidedly debauched and superlatively spoiled Count explains in a sassy fashion, “I’m one of those who likes to try everything...for pleasure, for enjoyment” and when Stefano quips, “perhaps the only pleasure you got left is murdering someone,” Matteo gets an idea that will evolve into a murderous obsession. When Matteo learns about Stefano’s problems with his wench of a wife, he offers to kill her in exchange for the protagonist killing his abusive brother. As Matteo explains, his brother thinks he is a “worm” and that “there is only one purpose in his life...preventing me from living mine. He wants to destroy me,” or so he says. While Stefano seems somewhat attracted to Matteo’s proposal, he is too much of a beta-bitch pussy to actually go through with the plan, so the Count begins regularly stalking him around Milan and incessantly brings up his plan. When Stefano still will not budge, the rather pushy Count decides it is time to use more perniciously persuasive means that ultimately turn the protagonist into a semi-reluctant widow who is suspected of coldblooded uxoricide, among other things.

While he has his own personal servile female sex slave, Count Matteo is indubitably a wide receiver on the pink team and his obsession with Stefano clearly has a somewhat overt psycho-sexual dimension that causes the aberrant aristocrat to act in completely desperate and pathetic ways that are typical of lovelorn teenage girls. For example, like a scheming girly girl who wants to have some handsome man come to her ‘rescue’ and flatter her with attention, Matteo comes to Stefano while in a state of anguish and cries about scratch marks on his chest that were apparently caused by his mysterious evil brother, so the overly empathetic protagonist finds himself cleaning his bizarre blueblood bud’s wounds like a husband comforting his wife. Of course, Matteo is merely carrying out a well thought out charade and he has big plans for unwitting pawn Stefano, who clearly underestimates the unhinged Count. Since his wife refuses to cash her shares, Stefano decides to forge her signature so he and his mistress can make their getaway to exotic Venezuela so that they can start a new life together.

While the protagonist does not tell the Count of his intentions, Matteo figures it out on his own and decides to inform Stefano's wife Luisa about her conspiring husband's escape plans and secret mistress. When Luisa confronts Stefano about his mistress and forging her signature she makes sure to rub it into her husband's face that he is a coward who always does things in 'half-measures' (to his credit, Stefano decides to leave his wife some of the money he has stolen, which is evidence to her that he is a weak man) and that if she actually still loved him she would have him arrested. Indeed, unlike a woman and or an exceedingly effeminate faggot like Matteo, Stefano suffers from a 'moral dilemma' regarding murder and that is the main reason why he refuses to "swap murders" with Matteo. At one point in the film, Luisa even gives Stefano the opportunity to kill her but he predictably pussies out. Ultimately, Matteo takes it upon himself to strangle Stefano's wife Luisa to death and then blackmails the protagonist into having to kill his brother by framing him for the crime. To make sure that Stefano has no reasonable alibi for the time when Luisa is murdered, Matteo hires a young German whore named Christina Müller (Alessandra Cardini) to seduce the protagonist and keep him busy for a while. Of course, Matteo has Stefano exactly where he wants him to be, especially after a police inspector named Finzi (Luigi Casellato) becomes convinced that the protagonist is the culprit in the death of Luisa due to the nature of the murder, as well as due to the fact that he had forged his wife's signature so that he could runaway with his mistress to Venezuela.

Undoubtedly, the last half an hour or so of The Designated Victim is fairly banal and largely revolves around the mostly unsympathetic protagonist Stefano attempting to find various ways to prove his innocence in regard to his belated wife's death. Ultimately, Matteo, who is largely absent for the last thirty minutes of the film, tells Stefano that he will give him the evidence he needs to clear himself of the killing if he assassinates his brother from an ancient church balcony. Somewhat symbolically in a scene that blatantly contrasts the morality of old school Catholicism with the decadence of the modern aristocracy, Matteo wants Stefano to play sniper from an ancient Venetian Church and shoot his brother while he is standing next to a window in his luxurious art-adorned palace. Of course, Stefano does not want to carry out of the assassination, so he decides to pull a gun on Matteo instead, but as the Count demonstrates by stating, "I adore melodrama...but I detest comic opera," he is not afraid of a petty threat from such a weak man. In the end, Stefano finally gives in and decides to kill Matteo's brother just as the police are arriving via boat to stop him. In a fairly intriguing, if not poorly executed twist, it is revealed that it was not Matteo's evil brother that was murdered, but the Count himself. As it turns out, the Count never had an abusive brother, but instead an internal 'evil twin' that he wanted to kill in himself.

In its somewhat histrionic depiction of a crazed crypto-colon-choker Count

from Venice who is so morally degenerate that his psyche has split and he has ultimately developed an evil alter-ego, it almost seems like The Designated Victim is a thinly-veiled attack against maestro Luchino Visconti who, aside from being a gay Italian aristocrat, released his pederast-themed masterpiece Death in Venice the same year as Lucidi's film. What makes Lucidi's film all the more provocative is that the protagonist assassinates the decadent aristocrat from a Church in what is ultimately a rather allegorical scene where the posh pervert is righteously stricken down from the house of God. Interestingly, the boy-obsessed pederastic protagonist of Death in Venice also perishes as an inadvertent consequence of his repressed yet increasingly uncontrollable homosexual vice after deciding to stay in cholera-ridden Venice because he becomes infatuated with a preteen boy who is ultimately the last person he sees before he succumbs to his illness. Ultimately, in the end, Clémenti's character goes from seeming like a hyper-hedonistic homo psychopath to seeming like a terribly tragic figure that was a victim of his own privilege and is ultimately more sympathetic than the protagonist, who is not much more than a failed opportunist. Indubitably, another tragic aspect to The Designated Victim is that it had the potential to be a rare cult-worthy giallo-arthouse hybrid that transcended the line between high and low Guido celluloid art. The fact that they cast Clémenti—a man who starred in works by some of the most revered Italian arthouse filmmakers of that time, with Visconti not being the least notable of these directors—for the most imperative role of the film tells me that the makers of The Designated Victim were certainly shooting for something more than just another cheap throwaway Hitchcock-flavored giallo. In terms of other Visconti connections, the film was shot by cinematographer Aldo Toni who not only shot the blueblooded Milanese maestro's directorial debut Ossessione (1943)—a work regarded by some as the very first Italian neo-realist film—but also Roberto Rossellini's Amore (1948) and Europe '51 (1952), Federico Fellini's early masterpiece Le notti di Cabiria (1957) aka The Nights of Cabiria, Marco Ferreri's early work La donna scimmia (1964) aka The Ape Woman, and John Huston's underrated Reflections in a Golden Eye (1967) starring Marlon Brando as a repressed gay U.S. Army officer, among various other notable works. It should also be noted that both the production design and costume design was done by Enrico Sabbatini, who previously worked on goombah cult classics like Piero Schivazappa's seductively stylish psychedelic softcore flick The Laughing Woman (1969) aka Femina ridens and Mario Bava's beautifully brutal proto-slasher flick Reazione a catena (1971) aka A Bay of Blood aka Twitch of the Death Nerve and would go on to work on Hollywood works like Jean-Jacques Annaud's Seven Years in Tibet (1997) starring Brad Pitt. It is just a guess on my part, but I am going to have to assume that Sabbatini and cinematographer Toni were more responsible for the film's reasonable aesthetic pleasantness than director Lucidi, who seems to be the true Achilles heel of the work. There are many things that can be said about The Designated Victim, but I think the most important is that, despite its glaring flaws, the film is nothing short of mandatory viewing for Clémenti fans, as the Corsican bohemian dandy most certainly gives one of the most flamingly flamboyant, internally tormented, suavely goofy and just plain gay performances of his rather fruitful acting career.

A WOMAN IN BERLIN
A WOMAN IN BERLIN

Max Färberböck (2008)

In America, atrocities that were committed against Germans during World War II are virtually unknown. After all, Americans are very fond of the simple dichotomy of “Good” and Evil.” Hollywood has done their job well in convincing Americans that Germans during the Nazi era personify the complete and utter epitome of evil. For the average American to recognize that some (let alone millions) Germans were victims during World War II might put them into a stupefied state and could possibly shatter their Hollywood produced moral compass, a potential tragedy, no doubt. Of course, in the creative world, some of the atrocities have seen the light of day, even with the Hollywood blinders so carefully covering American eyes. German-American author Kurt Vonnegut’s science-fiction novel Slaughterhouse-Five semi-autobiographically tells the author’s experiences as an American POW during the Anglo-American firebombing of the city of Dresden, an act of government executed terrorism with the sole agenda of killing civilians. Naturally, with around ¾ of the German military occupying the eastern front during World War II, the Germans committed most of their atrocities against the Soviet Union, something the Red Army would payback with blood covered interest when the course of the war changed and German defeat became inevitable. In the German film A Woman in Berlin directed by Max Färberböck, the viewer is exposed to the true story of one woman’s account as a victim of the mass raping of German women during the occupation of Eastern Germany by the Red Army.

At the conclusion of World War II, the mass raping of German women had practically turned into Soviet war policy. The Soviet Jewish propagandist Ilya Ehrenburg boasted to the advancing Red Army troops, “that blonde hag is in for a bad time.” With sadistic Judaic vengeance, Ehrenburg also wrote in a leaflet addressed to Soviet soldiers “...the Germans are not human beings...nothing gives us so much joy as German corpses.” Unfortunately for Ehrenburg, he did not get to witness firsthand the mass rapes that he would help promote. Unlike the holy holocaust number of six million, the exact number of German women raped during the initial Soviet occupation has yet to be exactly quantified, ranging between tens of thousands to two million. In the film A Woman in Berlin, we see through the eyes of one woman and her friends the repeated raping of individual women (each victim was raped as many as 70 times). Apparently, the Soviets were so rape-crazy that they also raped Soviet and Jewish women, surely an expression of the Marxist commitment to diversity. A Woman in Berlin is set from 20 April to 22 June 1945 in a Germany that laid in ruins. The film’s protagonist Marta Hillers (played by the beautiful Nina Hoss) goes from idealistic bourgeois Nazi to a woman using her body as a plaything for Soviet soldiers (in an desperate attempt at survival) in just a matter of a couple of months.

Like starving children locked in a candy store, the Red Army soldiers featured in A Woman in Berlin rape German women with a guiltless thirst and pride immediately after occupying Berlin. With certainly no pun intended, the German women don't know what hit them as they are raped by barbarian-like Soviet troops. After being raped a couple times, Marta Hillers soon realizes that if she is going to be raped, it is going to be a man of her choosing. Despite being victims of rape, the German women featured in A Woman in Berlin are not portrayed in the most angelic of lights. Being the most beautiful woman in her area, Hillers soon has a Soviet officer wining and dining her and a group of her friends. To save her exquisite German body, Hillers goes from bedding a Nazi officer to a Soviet officer without a second thought, eventually falling dubiously in love with her Russian gentleman. For the best argument against feminism, one just has to look at the position of women during war as the truest argument against gender equality. Like freshly cut meat and German cigarettes, the woman of A Woman in Berlin become property (albeit, conspiring property) used by the victorious the Red Army for whatever they see fit.

Marta Hillers must have been very happy that she was born beautiful as her Russian rapist is quite the romantic and falls in love with the enemy. To the credit of women, Hillers is able to manipulate her Russian officer into even siding with her over his own people. Of course, the Russian officer's romantic allegiance to a German woman soon leads to his deluge; truly an expression of the power one woman can have over a man's life. Ultimately, A Woman in Berlin is a film about the absurdity of humanity. The Red Army starts out raping and pillaging in the film but by the end display kindness and friendship with their German enemies. It must have been a sight to see a bunch of intoxicated (with Vodka, the holy water of Russia) Russian soldiers and German women dancing together at a party in a bombed out German home as shown in A Woman in Berlin. The film is like a less melodramatic and less artsy version of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun. Like the lead lady of Fassbinder's film, the female protagonist is determined to restore her dignity, even if involves ruining the lives of a couple men in the process.

MESHES OF THE AFTERNOON

Maya Deren (1943)

Early art house filmmaker Maya Deren came to the United States after a series of “anti-Semitic” (translation = Anti-Bolshevik) pogroms in Russia. Deren’s “intellectual” father was a fan of Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky who was a man responsible for deaths of millions of people mainly due to their social class. Apparently Deren’s greatest film Meshes of the Afternoon was made to get the attention of her father. I guess Daddy didn’t give daughter Maya enough love. Meshes of the Afternoon is about as “auteur” as American films get. Maya was influenced by the early short works of Luis Buñuel and one can only assume Jean Cocteau’s The Blood of a Poet. Although Nazi filmmaker Leni Riefenstahl is without a doubt the greatest female filmmaker of all time, Maya Deren certainly carried her own weight. Meshes of the Afternoon is a surrealist journey into the subconscious mind and its dirty hidden secrets. Who says that all early American films are embarrassingly formulaic? Maya Deren stars in Meshes of the Afternoon as a woman always reflecting on herself. She sees another woman many times throughout the short with a mirror on her face staring back at her. No matter how hard Deren chases the mysterious woman, she can never catch up. After all, no one can truly confront their past. Maya Deren has given up her subconscious soul for those to interpret through the art of cinema. The impossibility of catching up with one’s true “reflection” already lets the viewer know that Meshes of the Afternoon can never be truly complete. Towards the end of Meshes of the Afternoon, Maya appears wearing futuristic looking sphere spectacles and carrying a dangerous looking knife. This predates and is much more “scary” than any subsequent cold war sci-fi film ever would be. Deren also steps from beach to swamp to concrete within seconds. She has been on a journey into a dark past that has left a lot of questions open. At the end of Meshes of the Afternoon, Maya’s assumed lover becomes a horrible mess. Maya is dead and pieces of a mirror surround her. I guess Maya didn’t have such a wonderful past.

I SPIT ON YOUR GRAVE

Meir Zarchi* (1978)

I Spit On Your Grave is a feminist exploitation film directed by perverted Israeli Meir Zarchi. The film follows a young female novelist as she attempts to write her first masterpiece in a secluded cabin in the woods. Little does the young novelist realize that a group of young rednecks want to rape and ravage her just for kicks. Unrealistically, the emotionally deranged young woman plots a killing spree of the Hebrew looking rednecks. I Spit On Your Grave is a film of female empowerment.

City folk really like to throw around the word “xenophobe” when referring to whites from rural areas. I guess that’s what happens when you are afraid someone who can kick your ass. Israeli director Meir Zarchi made sure to present the rednecks of I Spit On Your Grave as evil scheming rapists. If Zarchi actually knew anything about rednecks and saw Deliverance, he would know that rednecks rape men. After all, Women are much easier to physically dominate and put up a pathetic fight. What better way to emasculate a city fag than by showing rural love? The vaudevillian fellows that play the rednecks in I Spit On Your Grave aren’t believable for a second. With their Woody Allen accents and Asiatic features, they could only fool a couple of disillusioned lesbian feminists. In real life, I can only assume that the young woman in the film could beat up all of these Long Islander types at the same time. When all of the rednecks finally meet their untimely death, I can imagine a group of angry feminists rejoicing. I personally found the killings entertaining.

The young woman kills a few of her rapists in a sexual manner. One man loses his genitals in a bubble bath that turns red. Another redneck is hung in a tree as his genitals hang. These scenes offer gratuitous pleasure to those looking a little more in the way of deranged cinema. They also happened to discredit I Spit On Your Grave’s feminist agenda which I am sure most sane people can appreciate.

I Spit On Your Grave is a masterpiece of the American exploitation genre. Like Thriller - A Cruel Picture, I Spit On Your Grave is an “eventful” female revenge film that makes Quentin Tarantino’s Kill Bill look weak in comparison. Revenge films are meant to be gritty and crude. Tarantino’s style seems more influenced by Honda commercials. I hope that I Spit On Your Grave makes its way to appear in women’s studies college classes.

SWEET SWEETBACK'S BAADASSSSS SONG
SWEET SWEETBACK'S BAADASSSSS SONG

Melvin Van Peebles (1971)

I would call Melvin Van Peebles Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song the Citizen Kane of blaxploitation films if I actually thought that it was an exploitation film. The truth is SSBS is a serious and culturally important film. The black panthers even promoted the film fiercely as a revolutionary picture. SSBS was the first film in which black Americans became rowdy and stuck it to "the white man." The only people exploited in SSBS are the white cops that are looking to do Sweetback in. Of course, SSBS features a variety of sex, nudity, and violence. But these things aren't in the film for exploitation. Melvin Van Peebles just wanted to make a film to stick it to the white man. Following the unexpected monetary success of SSBS, Hollywood decided it was their turn to cash on the blacks that they so consciously denied (or parodied) in the past. Some were also used as propaganda pieces to agitate blue collar whites around the United States. Larry Cohen's Bone is an especially hateful Sigmund Freud style attack on Bourgeoisie honkies. SSBS is a serious film as it takes a realistic look at racial issues that affect(ed) the black community and presents them in an unsentimental (yet undeniably entertaining) manner. I recall having a discussion course with a group of "open minded" white liberals a few years ago about SSBS and they were unanimously appalled by the film (keep in mind these people are pussies). It was obvious that they felt the film was an assault on their aspirations of universally collective racial pacifism. White liberals have a fear that black people will gain power and strength on their own. They prefer blacks being socialized to the point of being physical and mental slaves of the state. Sweetback won't have any of that weak ass cracker shit. The opening of SSBS has a scene that borders on child pornography. Melvin Van Peebles had his pre-teen son Mario simulate nude sexual acts with an older woman. This middle aged virginity thief gave him the name "sweetback." Sweetback's sexual potency made his career choice easy. He became a jive ass cop killing hustler. SSBS also features a variety of other awkward and bizarre scenes. I especially liked the scene where Sweetback's goofy friend takes a shit walk talking to him. The structure of SSBS is very odd. The editing is spliced together in an almost soviet propaganda montage style. Many of the catchy and unforgettable theme songs appear out of nowhere. SSBS even features acid colored shots to appeal to acid dropping hippies of that time period (one of which being Van Peebles best friend Bill who was involved in the film). It is a shame that SSBS hasn't been studied as much as revolutionary films of it's kind. I can only assume that white liberals are so offended by it that they wouldn't even consider writing a scholarly book on the film. SSBS deserves a contemporary movie theater revival campaign. Films featuring probably "the worst role model in world history" 50 cent, just disgust me (not that I have actually seen any of them).

VROOOM VROOM VROOOOM

Melvin Van Peebles (1995) The very same director that created a genre with his films Sweet Sweetback's Baadaassss Song and Watermelon Man brings you a short (1994) included in a pack of 6 short erotic films with a genre twist to them. It's obvious that Melvin is getting senile in his old age with the release of the cantankerous short film that has me holding my gut in shame for watching this fermented filth. A down-on-his-luck hillbilly acne-plagued Black boy named Leroy is surrounded by not white trash, but black trash. Disgusting locals who slop their tongues around screaming about barbeque's while Leroy pines for attention. His pop constantly pokes fun at his sons lack of girl communication or "getting some" The virility is often challenged by the duo of father and son which leads to uncompromisingly awkward bonding scenes. Fueled by a southern bluegrass and Jazz soundtrack, it adds to that Kentucky Fried Chicken feel that is present along with every other Black stereotype. He soon saves the life of a witch who dresses like a Tusken Raider from Tatooine. The befuddled Leroy believes in magic; not voodoo which could be canon to the Negro folklore, but we're treated to a bullshit Genie approach. He wishes for two things - a motorcycle and a woman. In the vein of Goosebumps and the classic phrase "Be careful what you wish for!" his wish turns into a motorcycle-morphing woman who is sweatier than a professional wrestler. Toad. This short tale is not thrilling but disgusting and goofy. The sex scenes are PG-13 at best and feature some of the most disgusting situations, faces, and sexual advances I have ever witnessed. I rather found myself to be permanently turned off from sex as a whole. Eventually, when the film begins to slow down, the ending is one of those "Broke the early warning" endings. I can't relate to these characters who get a wish only to void it. Vrooom Vroom Vrooom is a very amateur sketch for a seasoned director. This idea doesn't even look good on paper. Someone with the taste of black culture should be ashamed to direct a film that regards itself as using "state-of-the-art morphing technology." You sir, Melvin Van Peebles, might burn in hell for creating this disgusting piece of trash from which I couldn't muster the ability to harvest any "cinematic nutrients" from.

OVER THE TOP

Menahem Golan (1987)

This is a film of undecidable cult status. When you view this film, you are almost exorcised of most Hollywood standards and are completely baffled. After the success of Rambo and Rocky, Stallone attacked the "extreme sports" genre of the 80's and created Over the Top. Instead of racing, football, snowboarding, or mountain-climbing, he tackles the illustrious subject of arm wrestling.

As outrageous as this sounds, does it work? I must admit, the film gave me a run for my money. While having an incredible cheesy and incredibly queer side-story of getting his estranged son to love him and an evil family member trying to prevent this at all costs. Big explosions were eradicated from the script due to the formulaic plot of "arm wrestling" so instead, they just had several car crashes and called it even. Lincoln Hawk is a bad enough dude. He arm wrestles at dirty rural bars and drives trucks. This lifestyle is known for being rough and tough and is even presented this way in children's cartoons (Spongebob Squarepants) After enduring gripping workouts using a sophisticated weight set in the middle of this "cockpit", he has become the "best of the best" Only way to prove this is by entering the world tournament. Over the Top is the name and it stays pretty close to that. Whether he turns his hat like a similar Ash Ketchum from Pokemon or gets his whiny son into arm wrestling young punks hanging out in an arcade, Stallone goes along with the ride. This Italian Stallion refuses to be put down and in turn, has churned out some damn ridiculous movies in his lifetime, and for that, I thank him. (Somehow, this action play set does not excite the inner child in me) American rock music decorates this melodramatic silly little film. I couldn't find anything to distinguish this from the piles of cult trash that Stallone acts in. Some refuse to like Stallone, but for that matter, I refuse to enjoy Bruce Campbell's on screen presence. The same can be said about both men. Both are way past their prime, but at least Stallone is still kicking ass and not writing books dictating his love for Richard Gere. Over the Top isn't by any means a classic, but if you feel like watching a film that screams Steppenwolf's Born to be Wild, then you will never go wrong with this choice. I'll say it once and I will say it again; Stallone is like a foreign delicacy. I will guarantee a climax that isn't really worth mentioning any time soon. It's film like this where I wish the adults would man up and punch their children in the face.

Michael Almereyda (1989)

It seems rather unlikely that an outstandingly vapid no-talent douche like Dylan McDermott would have ever appeared in an underrated cult classic about a dysfunctional Kansas-based family featuring Crispin Glover, Harry Dean Stanton, and junk-ridden literary outlaw William S. Burroughs, but such is the superlatively strange case of Twister (1989) directed by seemingly pseudonymous auteur Michael Almereyda (Nadja, Hamlet). Not to be confused with the famously moronic 1996 film of the same name directed by Dutch cinematographer turned Hollywood hack director Jan de Bont and starring Helen Hunt and Bill Paxton, Almereyda's debut feature is based on the 1981 novel Oh! written by minimalist writer Mary Robison and shot by none other than Swiss cinematographer Renato Berta, who not only shot important works for noted European arthouse auteur filmmakers like Louis Malle, Jean-Marie Straub/Danièle Huillet and Alain Tanner, but was the lifelong cameraman of Swiss high-camp auteur Daniel Schmid and was responsible for filming virtually every single one of his films, including Heute nacht oder nie (1972) aka Tonight or Never, La Paloma (1974), and the Fassbinder-penned Shadow of Angels (1976) aka Schatten der Engel, among various other neglected masterpieces. Indeed, it is only fitting that Berta shot Twister, as if auteur Almereyda—a man who seems to have adopted his name from the pseudonym of the father of French poetic realist filmmaker Jean Vigo (whose Spanish/Catalan militant anarchist padre adopted the name 'Miguel Almereyda' because it is an anagram for "y' a la merde," which translates as "there's the shit")—knew that the film would be, at least commercially speaking, an abject failure that, not unlike the work of Schmid, would only appeal to a special select yet loyal few. A dark comedy in the most idiosyncratic sense that, despite its PG-13 rating, makes most of Wes Anderson's oeuvre seem like the cinephiliac posturing of an autistic poser who has seen one too many French New Wave flicks, Twister is quirky in a completely uncompromising and preternatural sort of way that, unlike superficially similar works, did not give me the impression that it was directed by some sort of bleeding heart humanist hipster that I could only find funny if they were hit by a handicap bus or gang-raped by a South African tennis team. A rather whimsical and largely plot-less work with a rural Kansas setting that brings new meaning to the regional phrase "There's no place like home," Twister depicts in a playfully pernicious fashion the rotting degenerate adult broad of a wealthy yet fairly dejected patriarch who made the mistake of marrying and impregnating a self-centered Irish-American bitch who passed on her dysgenic genetics to both of their marvelously misbegotten children. Featuring Suzy Amis as a violently frigid dipsomaniac anti-diva with a young grade school daughter who is more mature than her, Crispin Glover as a 'tragically misunderstood' proto-Goth dandy and high kultur dilettante who seems to suffer from Asperger syndrome and thus pronounces words in a strange rhythmic fashion, and Harry Dean Stanton as the former's long-suffering millionaire capitalist cowboy father who is just not cut out to deal with the peculiar problems of his two grownup children even though he has enough money support a small shitty South American country, Twister is somewhat typical of most of Almereyda's work in the sense that it centers around a decidedly dysfunctional family with a glaring genetic taint yet at the same time it is in many ways the director's most 'accessible' and least 'esoteric' film as a sort a scathingly sardonic and singular celluloid sitcom from posh post-frontier Midwestern pandemonium.

When a reasonably well-meaning, if not somewhat unintelligent, young man named Chris (Dylan McDermott in one of the most sympathetic roles of his career) wearing a goofy t-shirt reading "Big Blue Butt-Kicker" comes back from a six-month pilgrimage to Canada in the hope of 'saving' his estranged common-law (ex)wife Maureen (played by Suzy Amis, who later starred in Almereyda's David Lynch-produced postmodern experimental vampire flick Nadja (1994)) and their young daughter Violet (Lindsay Christman) from their exceedingly wealthy yet wayward family, he ultimately has a greater life-changing effect on the family than a town-devastating tornado that hits their home around the same time. Despite the fact that his ex is fairly ugly on both the inside and outside, Chris is willing to do anything to get her back, including regularly suffering Maureen's malevolent misanthropic alcoholic wrath. Maureen is a somewhat demented, uniquely unpleasant, and sub-homely dipsomaniac bitch and self-described "24-year-old failure" who is such a superlatively shitty self-absorbed mother that she complains to her young daughter, "It's tiring and exasperating to watch someone littler than you" and even attempts to convince her little girl that she has no father. Maureen's brother Howdy (Crispin Glover in arguably the most underrated performance of his career)—a serious 'artiste' that writes mundanely melancholy dirge-like songs with insufferably self-pitying lyrics like "daddy was mean"—may show more self-restraint in terms of not having to rely on narcotics to get through the day, but he is no less unhinged as a perennially 'misunderstood' would-be-dandy with goofy longhair who resents his family, especially his father, due to their lack of cultivation and absurdly believes that he is going to marry a hot blonde lumpenprole babe named Stephanie (Jenny Wright of Kathryn Bigelow's Near Dark (1987)) who does not even like him and whose father works as a gardener for his family's company. Indeed, both of his kids may be cracked losers that suffer from hopeless cases of arrested emotional development despite having genius 150+ IQs, but Eugene Cleveland (Harry Dean Stanton in a fairly understated performance) is a self-made multimillionaire who got rich off of soda pop and mini-golf courses. Unquestionably, the only mistake Eugene ever made in his rather simple yet eventful life was marrying and impregnating a crazy McBitch who ultimately sired two crazy bastard broods that inherited their mother's mental instability and debilitating sense of self-destructive narcissism. When Howdy was only three and Maureen was six, their crazed mother abandoned them and their father Eugene for good and never attempted to get in contact with them ever again. Unfortunately for Eugene, neither of his immature adult children have any intention of ever growing up, starting a career, or leaving home for good, thus he must forever face their wrath, unless someone else has what it takes to take his place.

As Chris states regarding his ex Maureen to her unsympathetic brother Howdy in regard to what he apparently did to fall out of favor with his bat-shit crazy beloved, "I'll tell you what I did, I did nothing. Your sister was just so god damn spooked all the time, I mean, she imagines that I've done something. I don't know, she assumes it." Indeed, aside from being a pathetic drunk and pathological pill-popper, Maureen is a neurotic nutcase who never has anything nice to say and cannot accept a single damn compliment from her beau, who really tries his best to be there for his deranged ex and poor daughter. Maureen is so mentally incapacitated that she describes her greatest fear in life as follows, "You know one thing that would be deadly right now? For me to lay down. I think if I laid down I'd just be lost forever. It's a problem my mother had all the time...And I have to lookout for it." As Chris stoically tells patriarch Eugene upon seeing him for the first time in about six months since he originally left for Canada, "I came to save Violet and Maureen from this loony bin." Unfortunately for Chris, while Eugene is well aware that his daughter is deranged and would love nothing more than to see her move out, Maureen (or 'Mo' as he lovingly calls her) is more than just a little bit afraid of leaving the loony bin. When Maureen absurdly accuses Chris of being the source of all her recent misfortune by complaining, "I believe in my heart of hearts that you're the cause of everything," he retorts in an insightful fashion, "You know what I believe...what's going on with you? And I'm talking about your whole life...is that you don't want to grow-up. You know, you want to be like a little kid." The only person Eugene even remotely respects is his young negress maid 'Lola' (Charlayne Woodard of Louis Malle's considerably crappy Big Deal on Madonna Street remake Crackers (1984)), who clearly resents spoiled bitch Maureen and her brazenly bitchy bourgeois behavior. Unlike Maureen, Lola busts her ass working full-time while going to college, but as she complains regarding her dubious academic career, "... I don't have time to do all the reading, you know, and all last week Professor Riley jumped all over me for being black."

When the titular tornado finally hits Kansas and ultimately kills no less than fifteen people in the surrounding area, less than proud patriarch Eugene is so dejected that he manages to sleep like a baby through the entire ordeal, as if he was subconsciously hoping that the twister would wipe-out his entire family while he was asleep. To the chagrin of his queen bitch daughter Maureen, Eugene is engaged to get married to his puritanical and pathologically positive girlfriend Virginia (played by fashion model turned Bond girl and Creepshow 2 (1987) star Lois Chiles), who is the host of a kitschy Evangelical Christian children's TV program called 'Wonderbox' where she dresses and acts like an unintentionally campy over-the-hill Dorothy from The Wizard of Oz. Needless to say, Virginia is far too pure and optimistic for the Cleveland family and the special engagement eventually falls apart. Indeed, after Virginia tells Eugene that his entire family has "lost the habit of thinking" and then insults his soda-pop/mini-golf empire, he hatefully remarks, "Well that sure as hell beats running around dressed up like a gingerbread girl on a goddamn TV box on a Sunday morning when nobody is watching except the mentally bankrupt." After packing her bags and leaving the maniac mansion for good, Virginia tells Eugene that she will pray for him and his children, so he sarcastically responds, "That's just what I need." Naturally, Maureen has no problem telling her father that she thinks Virginia is a "bitch" and that she is glad that the engagement fell through.

After Howdy's relationship with his ostensible fiancée Stephanie falls apart after her rowdy redneck (ex)boyfriend Jeff (played by Tim Robbins in arguably the most 'butch' role of his entire career) beats him up and kicks his ass and Maureen becomes so annoyed with Chris' incessant pleas to marry him, the Cleveland kids put all their hopes into attempting to hunt down and reunite with their estranged Irish-American mother who vaguely resembles Amelia Earhart in both appearance and character (as Howdy remarks, "she just vanished"). After Howdy finds an old letter with his mother's address, he writes her a letter but she never writes him back, so he, his sister Maureen, and Violet visit the country home where they believe she might be living at. Upon talking to an old fart engaged in a hardcore game of target practice played by alpha-Beat junky William S. Burroughs, the Cleveland kids learn that their mother moved away nine years ago and was apparently planning to relocate to Ireland, so the two siblings decide to visit the homeland of their ancestors. After a nasty dinner fight where Howdy goes on a rant about leaving with Maureen and Violet to go live with their mother in Ireland after their father pours out their bowls of gazpacho soup in disgust, Eugene finally reveals that their mother died years ago in a mental institution after suffering from a fatal case of stomach cancer that was compounded by "not being right in the head." When Maureen asks her father why he didn't inform her and Howdy about their mother's death, he responds regarding their belated progenitor, "She was a vain and selfless woman and she was just never a factor in your lives is all. And if you had gone to see her after they took her away, she would have just asked for a Pepsi or Hershey bar is all. Those were the things she cared about and not either of you." Needless to say, what little hope the Cleveland children had before is completely destroyed after their father completely demystifies their idiotically idealized view of their negligent mother.

In the end after realizing that there is no hope for his kin, Eugene Cleveland decides "I'm out of it" and immediately gives Chris complete control and responsibility over his house and family, stating, "You have to take care of them now, my family. You're in charge now." Although Chris flipped out earlier that same day and burned down a tool-shed after concluding that he will never be able to get back with Maureen and start a normal nuclear family, he does not think twice about accepting Eugene's less than generous offer to become the new patriarch of the crazed Cleveland family. Unlike Eugene, Chris is at least motivated enough to bring love and order to the fiercely fucked family. Not long after Eugene relinquishes his control of his kin and hands them over to Chris, mad Maureen asks the new patriarch to marry her and the two make love for the first time in the entire film, thus hinting that they plan to have more kids. Without even saying goodbye to his kids, Eugene abandons his family and somewhat strangely leaves with his negro maid Lola to an undisclosed location. Whether or not Eugene plans to carry on a romantic affair with Lola remains to be seen, but he does double her pay and vacation time and even gives her three hundred shares of his company's stocks. During the final couple minutes of the film, the entire family sans Eugene and maid Lola mindlessly watch trashy TV images involving negress gospel singers, mullet-adorned WWF wrestlers, and stun guns, among other things, in a fiercely farcical scene depicting the absurdly sick joke that is the modern American family.

While Twister was an unequivocal commercial failure due to the fact that the film's distributor, Vestron Pictures, went out of business only a couple weeks before it was scheduled to be released in movie theaters, it is doubtful at best that such an insanely idiosyncratic filmic family feud would have ever been popular with the masses, who would probably not appreciate a film that goes to great pains to satirize their highly domesticated TV-and-beer-narcotized way of life. After all, none of director Almereyda's later films, including his Hamlet (2000) adaptation starring Ethan Hawke, were particularly popular with the mainstream, so it is almost a miracle that the filmmaker is still able to get films made. Of course, Twister did have its proponents, including Midnight Movies (1983) co-author Jonathan Rosenbaum and The New York Times star critic Vincent Canby, who managed to see the work when it was given a "second lease on life" (to quote Rosenbaum) after the New York's Anthology Film Archives gave it an extended run in early 1990. In its screen-stealing role by Crispin Glover, who notably also provided his own quasi-darkwave song to the score (which, unlike the music by Hans Zimmer, goes perfect with the work), as an outstandingly autistic weirdo who says even the most mundane words and phrases in the most bizarre and uncomfortably entrancing ways, Almereyda's debut is the sort of film that needs to be actually seen to be even remotely properly understood or appreciated. As a work where the eponymous cyclone is never even depicted and where virtually none of the characters are in any way empathetic, Twister is surely as audience-antagonistic as borderline mainstream American films come as an anti-family affair that ultimately does for late-1980s Kansas what Alex van Warmerdam's The Northerners (1992) aka De noorderlinge did for 1960s small-town Holland. In terms of its depiction of two siblings that have a romanticized view of the cold and cunty estranged mother that abandoned them when they were just small children, the film is like a Midwestern take on East of Eden, albeit more evil and humorous and minus any sort of redemption (ultimately Almercyda's film concludes with a farcical false 'happy ending' where the forlorn family is united by a TV). Notably, Almercyda would later utilize the theme of Irish inter-generational dipsomania and mental derangement in his similarly underrated druid witch/mummy themed 'arthouse horror' flick Trance (1998) aka The Eternal: Kiss of the Mummy aka Michael Almercyda's The Mummy. In its pathological idiosyncrasy, Twister might be marginally comparable to a handful of works of its time like Alex Cox's Repo Man (1984), music video director Mark Romanek's Static (1985), and Keith Gordon's Robert Cormier adaptation The Chocolate War (1988) but ultimately it is a one-off work with no contemporaries that could have only been directed by Michael Almercyda who is, for better or worse, one of America's only real true auteur filmmakers.

After many years of passively searching, I have finally discovered an experimental postmodern vampire flick that does not compel me to fantasize about breaking the jaws and eye-sockets of bearded hipster fags with pseudo-sophisticated black-rimmed poindexter glasses. Executive produced and presented by David Lynch (who also appears in the film in a cameo role as a morgue receptionist), Nadja (1994) is a work that many falsely believe was ghost-directed by no other than the Eraserhead auteur himself. With its excessive phantasmagorical imagery and sometimes schlocky experimental camera work (pre-dating Inland Empire by over a decade), it is not hard to fathom why one would assume Nadja was directed by tastefully loony Lynch, but for anyone who has seen Michael Almereyda's previous efforts Twister (1989) and Another Girl Another Planet (1992), it should be plain to see that the underrated American auteur filmmaker's metaphysical fingerprints are all over this wildly idiosyncratic vampire flick. Beginning his career in film as a screenwriter, Almereyda wrote a screenplays for the post-apocalyptic Scifi cult flick Cherry 2000 (1987), Wim Wenders' Scifi epic Until the End of the World (1991) and an unreleased David Lynch project before ever having the supreme dictatorial honor of sitting in the director's chair. Starring the beautiful Romanian Jewess Elina Löwensohn (the sole Hebrewess that I would bequeath such an unbecoming compliment to) in the starring vamp role and WASP wimp Martin Donovan as a beta-male boxer with female trouble, Nadja also has the situational semblance of a Hal Hartley film, had the Henry Fool (1997) director digested an equal amount of Bram Stoker and George Sylvester Viereck (The House of the Vampire certainly comes to mind) with his readings of Jean-Paul Sartre as a young man. Shot on rich black-and-white neo-noir-ish celluloid for scenes of melodrama and traditional horror, and a children's toy Fisher-Price Pixelvision camera for segments of inter-species lesbian sex and blotchy bloody murder, Nadja is surely a neo-gothic trip of sorts that offers an onliest sensory overload without the aesthetic advantage of an Argento-esque kaleidoscope of killer colors. Indeed, most people associate blood with the color red, yet the absence-of-color hemoglobin featured in Nadja is more than suitably potent as it takes on a fetishistic ejaculatory quality that acts as the main part and parcel for determining the dichotomous struggle between lust and love, impotency and vitality, and – ultimately – life and death.

Admittedly, I had to watch Nadja three or four times before I could soak up the integral plangency of the film's storyline and various subplots. Like the films of Guy Maddin, Nadja features a weird and wayward thunderstorm of aesthetic and thematic wankery that is indubitably reflective of the filmmaker's encyclopedic understanding of vampire film history, but unlike most films by the goofy Nordic Canadian director – when one examines the quality and flow of the work as a whole – it is quite apparent that Michael Almereyda is largely successful with his lucid and luscious cinematic love letter to the vampire subgenre. Nadja focuses on a wealthy yet patently dysfunctional bi-species vampire family (the human matriarch of the family died long ago after giving birth to her two mongrel children) from Romania that is currently living a life of cosmopolitan and hedonistic degeneracy abroad in modern day New York City. As she explains during the beginning of the film, Nadja adores NYC because it offers a vibrant nightlife that is nonexistent in most European metropolitan areas. After Dr. Van Helsing (played by Peter Fonda) kills the patriarch (also played by Fonda) of the already decomposing Dracula family, two fraternal twins squabble over the dubious fate of their family's mostly infamous legacy. Nadja, being an uncompromising and ferocious femme fatale of the entrancing bloodsucking kind, would like to see the family reinvent itself, but her passive brother Edgar (played by Jared Harris) – who is barely a vampire (he feeds off of exotic shark embryos instead of human blood) and is in love with a mere mortal – rather see the irrevocable extinction of the more-than-human half of his peculiar pedigree. After his girlfriend Lucy (played by Galaxy Craze) is put under the all-consuming spell of undead lesbo Nadja, archetypical beta-male Jim and his notably nimble Uncle Dr. Van Helsing chase the virulent vampiress half-way around the world with the central goal of driving a wooden stake through her exceedingly cold-heart, thus freeing the souls of the she-beast's victims. Naturally, Van Helsing and his cowardly nephew prove to be a pathetic match for cunning creature Nadja's nefarious supernatural powers, but fortuitously for them, she is a true blue quasi-suicidal Goth girl at heart with an impenetrable desire for tragic transcendence and total rebirth. If you think the average premenstrual female is hopelessly erratic and wholly intolerable, you have yet to see blood-addict Nadja after she has been drained of her vital bodily fluids.

I must admit that I never expected to see a vampire film containing songs by Irish alpha-shoegaze group My Bloody Valentine, but Nadja does indeed offer such a delectable and unrestrained diacritic aesthetic mix. A scene of Bela Lugosi from Victor Halperin's White Zombie (1932) also appears in the film as a nostalgic flashback of young Dracula during his prime. A number of scenes also pay blatant tribute to the ruined Eastern European castles of F.W. Murnau's vampire masterpiece Nosferatu (1922). These sorts of anachronistic ingredients contribute to a film that, although shamelessly postmodern and ardently artsy, is not the least bit pretentious, but it is surely a work for those individuals that are obscenely vampire-film-literate. Of course, Nadja is not the sort of film I would recommend to people who masturbate to ultra-sleazy softcore lesbian vampire flicks, even if it does feature an intensely pulchritudinous, carpet-munching cold-cunt bloodsucker. Nadja is also ultimately a work that poses sensible questions about life and death in a steadily deteriorating post-industrial and pre-apocalyptic world, but not in the superlatively mundane and emotionally barren my-name-is-Sofia-Coppola-and-my-bourgeois-life-is-unchallenging-and-I-want-to-die sort of way. After all, who would make a more suitable existentialist philosopher than a singularly worldly, ancient aristocratic vampire? Forget manic-depressive Maddin's uneven (yet admittedly ambitious) undead-Chinaman-ballet Dracula: Pages From a Virgin's Diary (2002) and instead bask in the beautiful beaming bright white light of Elina Löwensohn's immaculate pale skin in Nadja. Nadja gets more pussy than pretty boy Edward Cullen, yet only puts forth about 1/100th of the effort to do so, which is beyond a shadow of a doubt the hallmark of a truly hip yet classic strigoi creature.

THE ETERNAL: KISS OF THE MUMMY

After radically reinventing the vampire film with Nadja (1994), auteur Michael Almereyda subsequently attempted to do the same thing with the mummy movie via The Eternal: Kiss of the Mummy (1998) aka Trance with almost equally favorable results. Further declaring his unwavering assiduity towards deconstructing a classic horror subgenre and rebuilding it with new and often improved ingredients (while disposing of others), The Eternal features a mummy that also happens to be an ancient shape-shifting druid witch. Instead of being the typical pimped-out and gold-chain-sporting materialistic mummified Egyptian royal, the mummy of The Eternal is a “bog-women”; a freshly preserved corpse unearthed from the sphagnum bogs of Northern Europa. Of course, like most monster movies, the mummy of The Eternal is not the protagonist, but a hostile sphinxlike force with cryptic intentions and a mostly ferocious disposition comparable to the mummified succubus beauty of Curtis Harrington’s worthwhile Thelema-esque TV-movie The Cat Creature (1973). Instead, an Irish-born American woman named Nora (played by Alison Elliott) acts as the film’s lead protagonist/semi-anti-hero. After falling down the stairs (in an admittedly hilarious and hairbrained manner) during a belligerent night of drinking with her equally unstable co-alcoholic husband Jim (Jared Harris), the terrible twosome decides that it will be in their best interest if they (with their nerdy young son Jim Jr.) move to Ireland; the great land of exceedingly poor and destitute drunkards. Of course, it turns out to be a catastrophic mistake on their part, but not for the typical blackout-drunk-in-the-gutter reasons. Upon reaching Ireland, Nora decides that the family should visit her grandmother’s secluded Gothic mansion. Little does Nora know that her crank professor Uncle Bill (played by a very Brooklyn-accented Christopher Walken) has the mummified remains of a distant ancestor stored in the basement of the maniac mansion and he is quite adamant about re-animating the charming little corpse. Upon her reawakening, the menacing mummy-witch takes an instant liking to Nora, so much so that she attempts to steal her body, soul, and identity. Naturally, such sinister supernatural happenings prove to be indomitably stressful for Alison, a woman that is already suffering from acute alcohol withdraw and eerie head-injury-related hallucinations. Needless to say, I doubt The Eternal is a work that one would want to screen at an Alcoholics Anonymous meeting for motivational/inspirational purposes, but it does seem to capture the miserable soul-disintegrating metaphysics of alcoholism. To add to the Celtic pagan allure that is The Eternal, the film is narrated by a Delphian little Irish girl that seems to hold a seemingly unfathomable degree of hermetic knowledge.

Like Nadja and the majority of Michael Almereyda’s work, The Eternal features various scenes of fluctuant experimental filmmaking and deathly dry humor that is bound to thoroughly turn-off the majority of everyday filmgoers and mainstream horror fanatics. Unlike Nadja, The Eternal was shot in color and does not feature the peculiar pixilation of the Fisher-Price PXL2000 camera, thus the film is slightly more accessible than Almereyda's earlier vampire flick, at least in the aesthetic sense. Ultimately, The Eternal is a vastly vague and strikingly spiritual work that is quite in contrast with the all-but-hopeless aristocratic nihilism of Nadja. Admittedly, I know next to nothing about ancient Celtic paganism yet The Eternal seems to more than aptly ascertain and resonate the essence of these arcane spiritual themes in a way that, like the mummy herself (as well as most other characters in the film), transcends the Christian view of good and evil. Admittedly, as long as I can remember, I have always been repulsed by nearabout anything and everything that is regarded as Irish, at least in a modern day context, especially in respect to their cult of victim-hood (the Irish may be the only European diaspora whose history parallels that of nonwhites) and cultural influences in American (from country music to the western film genre), yet Almereyda's The Eternal brings some much needed culture and class to the eternally unlucky northwestern Celts, as the film echoes the early works of Irish occult poet W. B. Yeats in terms of both potent possessing poetry and esoteric meanderings. On top of featuring the ethnic stereotype of the Irish as unrepentant alcoholics, The Eternal features the perennial cliché of the absent Irish father. Aside from American Jim-Beam-loving Jim and nutty Uncle Bill, not a single male elder (be it father or grandfather) is featured in the film. Unsurprisingly, most of the young male adults featured in The Eternal are (seemingly) symbolically killed off in fairly absurd scenarios by the wicked wench as if the the whole male gender of Ireland was eternally accursed due to one immortal woman's ancient failed love affair and subsequent seething scorn, henceforth lending evidence that the title of the film is an unintentionally humorous and saucy double-entendre of sorts. Incidentally, an middle-aged Irish-American women (whose entire family was Irish/Irish-American) once told me that Irish men were essentially ignoble drunkards (referring to her own father as such) as depicted in Alan Parker's Angela's Ashes (1999) and it was up to the mother to raise the children and continue the legacy of the family. The Eternal certainly portrays such a scenario of amaranthine generational family dysfunction where it is altogether up to the matriarch to lead the battle and shield her family's compromised future. Fundamentally, The Eternal is a fantastically demanding celluloid work where magical and mystical primeval Ireland-before-alcoholism-and-English-persecution meets the innately imbibed and culturally-comatose Ireland of today, except disguised as an ostensibly incoherent B-grade mummy horror movie.

I cannot think of a single mummy-related film that I have ever fancied to any notable degree, so I guess it is only natural that I would appreciate the intrinsically abstract and acroamatic anti-mummy film essence of The Eternal; a work that brings life to a seemingly postmortem horror subgenre. Leave it to Michael Almercyda to be the person to do it, but, of course, like most of his films, The Eternal is not for everyone, especially those individuals that found themselves especially enthralled by Stephen Sommers' emotionally and aesthetically barren CGI-corpse The Mummy (1999) starring Brendan Fraser. Like most of Almercyda's work, The Eternal demands at least more than one viewing, but works best with incessant re-visitings. Not unlike Nadja and Happy Here and Now (2002), The Eternal is an inordinately hip flick with a modern avant-garde soundtrack and intense inaugural imagery that is bound to satisfy most exploratory cinephiles to some noteworthy degree, yet leave most archetypical horror fans flustered and possibly homicidal. Admittedly, many of the actors and actresses featured in The Eternal are less than sexually alluring in appearance and character (unless you have a fetish for drunk girls falling down the stairs), as the film certainly does not feature the sort of kitschy pseudo-eroticism that the cover-art of the American dvd release misleadingly advertises, but then again, when I think of Ireland, I generally think of homely (and often short like a leprechaun) white ladies with hard-as-nails, contra dainty constitutions. Of course, the presence of delightfully dorky Brit Jared Harris does not help this predicament, but despite the film's lack of pulchritudinous lead actors, The Eternal is, in consummation, an elegant work in of itself that can only be understood by fully experiencing it, as a mere inactive superficial glance at the film will not suffice. One can only hope that Michael Almercyda will give the werewolf and Frankenstein that same thorough and idiosyncratic treatment that he has so vivaciously bequeathed upon Dracula and the mummy, but judging by the commercial and critical failure of The Eternal, it is quite implausible that we will see the emergence of such clamorous horror works. Regardless of where Almercyda's filmmaking career might lead, we still have The Eternal, the only film where a plastered American beta-male smashes a wine bottle over a equally drunk druid alpha-mummy-witch's head.

Michael Almereyda (2014)

I do not generally like to say that I have guilty pleasures because I do not really feel guilty or ashamed about any of my interests, but I do somewhat uneasy about confessing that I have watched every single episode of both FX's Sons of Anarchy (2008-2014) and HBO's Game of Thrones (2011-present), so naturally I was somewhat intrigued when I discovered that an auteur filmmaker that I somewhat appreciate had just released a quai-arthouse work starring a bunch of popular Hollywood stars that was cleverly advertised as a 'mashup' of both TV shows. Indeed, Cymbeline (2014) aka Anarchy directed by semi-mainstream auteur and sometimes documentarian Michael Almereyda (Twister, Experimenter) is a modernized adaptation of the somewhat obscure late period tragicomic play of the same name by William Shakespeare and as the various amateur and professional film reviews I have read on it clearly reveal, it seems that most Sons of Anarchy and Game of Thrones fans absolutely hated it, which certainly does not surprise me (after all, I do not think I have ever met anyone that appreciates Almereyda's films). Directed by a rare contemporary idiosyncratic auteur who has, among other things, adapted D.H. Lawrence using a children's Fisher-Price Pixelvision camera for his short The Rocking Horse Winner (1997) and got David Lynch to produce and appear in his shoegaze-driven semi-Sapphic black-and-white postmodern vampire flick Nadja (1994) featuring Romanian-born Jewess Elina Löwensohn as Dracula's dyke daughter and Hollywood counterculture burnout Peter Fonda as Van Helsing, Almereyda's film is certainly a work that would probably offend and/or annoy fans of both the Bard of Avon and trash TV as an unintentionally absurd anti-American Shakespearean melodrama of the tragicomic sort that features dope-dealing leather-clad bikers speaking in Elizabethan English, a murderously jealous emo fag skater that cries hysterically because some unscrupulous conman tricked him into think he sexually defiled his angelic wife, and super stoic blond Aryan brothers who cannot seem to figure out that their noble negro father is actually a banished warrior who stole them from their monarch father when they were just wee lads, among other captivatingly bizarre and completely culturally mongrelized scenarios that highlight the degeneracy and cultural retardation in the context of Shakespeare's non-classic work. A proudly rude and raunchy redneck soap opera that was obviously heavily influenced by Shakespeare's Hamlet—a work that Almereyda also previously adapted (in fact, Hamlet (2000) starring Ethan Hawke is easily the filmmaker's most popular and well known work)—Sons of Anarchy is indubitably openly yet strangely respectfully mocked in Cymbeline, which replaces the Harley-riding hick histrionics and gratuitous Whiskey-drenched sex and violence of the TV show with provocative preternatural tableaux, understated art-trash poetics, and esoteric (socio)political subtexts in a sort of post-industrial crypto(anti)western that is set in a decidedly decadent and morally and culturally decayed post-empire America that acts as a somewhat fitting substitute to the historical pre-Roman England of the somewhat maligned source play.

Featuring a NY-based biker drug kingpin that is in control of an east coast organized crime operation called Britons Motorcycle Club instead of an early Celtic British King that is control of Ancient Britain like in Shakespeare's play as the eponymous ruler, Cymbeline is undoubtedly one of the most elegant and labyrinthine (anti)biker flicks ever made, which probably does not say much but it does more or less confirm that most biker film fans will absolutely hate it, which certainly seems to be the case as reflected by the user reviews at imdb.com. Like its source material, the film features a number of recycled Shakespearean themes and motifs (e.g. deceptive cross-dressing, a drug cocktail that makes people appear dead, a young hero that talks to the ghost of his dead father, a young romance that is violently rejected by family members, etc.), yet strangely it is the very first film adaptation of Shakespeare's original play (though British Hebrew Elijah Moshinsky directed a lackluster version for BBC Television Shakespeare in 1983 that was somewhat visually inspired by Rembrandt and various other Dutch Golden Age painters), thereupon making for a fairly fresh and rarely derivative flick that does not seem like another insufferably modern adaptation of the bard's work like Baz Luhrmann's flashy piece of botched big budget bile Romeo + Juliet (1996) and Michael Hoffman's fairly tacky A Midsummer Night's Dream (1999), among countless other examples. In other words, Almereyda's Cymbeline is, not unlike Laurence Olivier's Hamlet (1948) and Derek Jarman's The Tempest (1979), one of the rare cinematic adaptations that actually made me feel more interested in the work of Shakespeare. Indeed, Almereyda's film somewhat feels like what might happen if the bastard brood of Fassbinder and Cocteau attempted to direct a misanthropic anti-American melodrama disguised as a mainstream biker-themed crime-drama-thriller. Intentionally set during Halloween as a somewhat subtle way to connect the present with England's death-obsessed pagan past, as well as to underscore the increasingly paganistic essence of American pop culture (or so Almereyda described in an interview), Cymbeline also demonstrates in a crude yet strangely simultaneously cultivated fashion that, in a strange and decidedly degenerate way, dope-dealing bikers are carrying on the torch of their Germanic viking ancestors in a post-Christian pre-apocalyptic multicultural age where the Occident seems like it is on the brink of complete capitulation.

Opening with the film's fairly catchy yet kitschy theme song, which initially strangely sounds somewhat like Fabio Frizzi's classic main theme in Lucio Fulci's Zombi 2 (1979) aka Zombie, juxtaposed with introductory shots of all the main characters as well as the imperative prologue, "For years Cymbeline, King of the Briton Motorcycle Club, has maintained an uneasy peace with the Roman Police Force. The Queen, Cymbeline's second wife, has her own agenda. But she's losing hope that her son will pair up with the King's only daughter, Imogen. Without consulting her royal parents, Imogen decides to marry Posthumus, Cymbeline's penniless protégé. The marriage triggers the King's rage, setting in motion a series of disastrous events. But fortune brings in some boats that are not steered..." Cymbeline will almost immediately leave most viewers lost and confused if they have not bothered to at least read the general synopsis of Shakespeare's play. Additionally, the viewer would most certainly benefit from watching the film with subtitles (luckily, unlike the bare bones Miramax Lionsgate DVD for Almercyda's Hamlet, Lions Gate's DVD/Blu-ray release of Cymbeline thankfully includes optional English subtitles). A film where all the death, destruction, and bodily dismemberment happens as a direct result of the two main male characters' inability (or, more like willful naivety and ignorance) to see their female counterparts for who they truly are, Almercyda's truly timeless tragicomedy ultimately demonstrates why it is never ever a wise idea to put pussy on a pedestal, especially if said pussy seems a little bit too infatuated with her own pussy. Indeed, titular King Cymbeline (Ed Harris) is so deludedly enamored with the chiseled pulchritude of his second/current wife, 'The Queen' (Milla Jovovich), that he has no idea that she is a crazy conspiring cunt who actually loathes him and only married him for his power as she hopes that her no less demented son from a previous marriage, Cloten (Anton Yelchin)—a sado-masochistic spoiled rich kid who hopes to wed his stepsister Imogen (Dakota Johnson) despite the fact that he absolutely repels her—will eventually become the new ruler of the illustrious Britons Motorcycle Club. Likewise, Posthumus (Penn Badgley)—a young man whose name derives from the fact that his father, the King's comrade Sicilius Leonatus, died before he was born—looks at his new bride in a fairly vain and idealistic fashion to the point where he trusts the dubious word of a ruthless Roman rival over what he should know is true about his beloved Imogen, thus leading to completely avoidable consequences of the rather cataclysmic sort.

At the beginning of the film in a scene fittingly featuring whacked-out homo anarchist avant-garde composer John Cage's 1948 composition "Dreams," recently secretly wed lovers Posthumus and Imogen meet at night at the site of empty bleachers where they embrace and exchange symbolic wedding gifts, with the young husband giving his bride a bracelet and the young wife giving her hubby a diamond ring that she inherited from her deceased mother. When the King encounters the lovers embracing, he almost becomes murderously enraged, less than delicately declares, "Thou basest thing, avoid hence, from my sight," and then proceeds to grab Posthumus by his broken cast-covered arm and declare while shoving a gun under the petrified young man's chin in an exceedingly threatening fashion, "If after this command thou fraught the court with thy unworthiness... thou diest. Thou art poison to my blood." From there, Posthumus hightails it of town on his skateboard while the King tells his less than trustworthy wife the Queen to imprison Imogen in her room so that she cannot see her beloved husband. Despite the fact that he is his virtual adopted son, Cymbeline refuses to accept a poor sap with peasant blood like Posthumus as the husband of his sole daughter. When the King describes Posthumus as a, “beggar wouldst have made my throne a seat of baseness,” Imogen rightly retorts, “It is your fault that I have loved Posthumus. You bred him as my playfellow.” Unfortunately for Imogen, Posthumus is not the “eagle” that she believes him to be and Cymbeline does have good reason to believe that he would make for a less than ideal husband.

Posthumus is if nothing if not a pathetic posturing little bitch whose insufferably glaring pride is just an ill fitting mask for his biting insecurities, which have their origins in being a literal poor bastard who was raised by a wealthy ruler of pure noble stock who he could never dream of living up to as far as masculinity and leadership qualities are concerned. Seeing as Posthumus’ insecurities are blatant to anyone with working eyes, it is only a matter of time before an unscrupulous schemer exploits them for his own greedy personal gain. Shortly after being banished from town and crashing on the couch of his swarthy ‘Roman’ friend Philario (played by James Ransone, who is arguably best remembered for his unsimulated autoerotic asphyxiation scene in Larry Clark’s Ken Park (2002)), Posthumus encounters a proudly sleazy and uniquely unsavory older rival named Iachimo (Ethan Hawke in his second Shakespeare collaboration with Almercyda) who mocks the lovelorn skater for bragging about his young wife’s purity with arrogant remarks like, “Even if you buy ladies’ flesh at a million a dram...you cannot prevent it from tainting.” A sort of megalomaniacal Machiavellian opportunist who would never dare to spoil an opportunity at destroying a young Brit’s pride for profit with the added bonus of potential unspoiled teenage flesh, Iachimo makes a wager with Posthumus to prove that he has the killer charm and sex appeal to fuck such a virtuous young wife as Imogen. With his pride seeming to be more important to him than his beloved wife, Posthumus offers Iachimo that truly priceless diamond ring that his spouse has just given to him as a prize if the Roman conman can provide sufficient evidence that he “enjoyed the dearest bodily part” of Imogen. If Iachimo fails to despoil Imogen, he must pay $10,000, or as the young husband more eloquently states, “If you make your voyage upon her...and give to me directly you have prevailed...I am no further your enemy. She is not worth the debate. If she remains unseduced, for your ill opinion...and the assault you have made to her chastity...You will answer my sword.” After the two men sign a contract that Posthumus written up a contract on a notebook paper and then proceed solidify their wager by shaking hands, Iachimo somewhat absurdly grabs and shacks one of Philario’s breasts and then exits the room, as if he is snidely demonstrating to his rival what he plans to do to his wife.

Under the pretense of being a refined Roman gentleman who has befriended

Posthumus, Iachimo shows up at the King's large manor (but hardly a castle) where Imogen is imprisoned and proceeds to woo the lovelorn princess with shallow and flowery compliments that highlight his innate phoniness and deceptiveness. After handing Imogen a package containing a print of a woodcut created by Posthumus featuring her and her husband as a skeleton with the somewhat ironical inscription, "Fear No More," Iachimo then proceeds to bombard the princess with lies about how her hubby is an insatiable party animal that has been nicknamed "The Reveler" due to his ostensibly exceedingly extroverted ways. When Imogen remarks regarding Posthumus, "When he was here he did incline to sadness...and oftentimes not knowing why," Iachimo seems somewhat offended and replies, "I never saw him sad." From there, Iachimo shows Imogen various dubious staged photos of Posthumus, proceeds to accuse her husband of being a Don Juan of sorts, and then attempts to convince her to seek revenge, arguing, "Diseased ventures...and such boiled stuff as might well poison. Be revenged or she that bore you was no queen...and you recoil from your great stock." Ultimately, Iachimo less than smoothly attempts to coerce into Imogen into fucking him so that she can be "revenged" against her supposedly unfaithful husband by stating in a disgustingly groveling fashion, "I dedicate myself to your sweet pleasure. More noble than that renegade from your bed. And will continue fast to your affection still close as sure. Let me my service tender...on your lips," but of course the princess is of true noble stock and refuses to be a cheap whore who allows her main vein to be stabbed by dubious foreign strangers. In fact, Imogen is so offended by Iachimo's salacious proposal that she proceeds to whip out her cellphone and threatens to call her father the King so that he can serve royal punishment to the Roman sleazebag. Since she is a remorseful princess who is quite modest in terms of executing her power, Imogen decides to pardon Iachimo when he desperately begs for forgiveness, but unfortunately she makes the mistake of agreeing to store a large chest in her house at the request of the Roman. Imogen should not have agree to store the chest because Iachimo emerges from it when she is asleep and then proceeds to take photos of her when she is scantily dressed in bed as proof that he managed to debase her. In fact, Iachimo goes so far as to lift Iachimo shirt and take a photo of her tit, though he has some guilt over what he does and even thinks to himself during a fleeting moment of personal insight, "No more. I have enough. I live in fear. Though this a heavenly angel...hell is here." Upon noticing a "mole cinque-spotted, like the crimson drops I' the bottom of a cowslip" on Imogen's left breast, Iachimo naturally feels he has enough evidence to prove to Posthumus that he fondled the flesh of the princess.

When Iachimo brings back the somewhat questionable proof that he has fornicated with his wife and declares like a grotesque braggart, "Your ring is won. Your lady being so easy," pathetic pussy Posthumus totally believes it and completely breaks down to the point where he is crying hysterically like a little girl, even though if he truly knew his wife and understood what she was capable of he would never believe such a thing. In fact, Posthumus is so upset about Imogen's supposed sexual deceit that he decides to immediately travel back home to kill her, declaring, "Oh, that I had her here...to tear her limbmeal. I will go there...then do it in the court before her father." Although Posthumus commands his loyal servant Pisanio (John Leguizamo) to slaughter Imogen with a buck knife, the saintly servant refuses to kill the princess and instead decides to help her fake her death by sending her husband one of her shirts soaked with her blood. Pisanio also convinces Imogen to disguise herself by demanding that she cut off most of her hair, dress in drag, and adopt the identity of a young boy. Naturally, Pisanio also convinces Imogen to leave town by herself, which is not exactly easy for a pampered princess who has no idea how to fend for herself. Meanwhile, at the influence of his scheming wife and her equally unsavory son Cloten, King Cymbeline provokes a war between Britain and Rome by refusing to pay tribute to Augustus Caesar. Indeed, when Roman ambassador Caius Lucius (portrayed by black Hollywood hack filmmaker Vondie Curtis-Hall, who is responsible for directing such truly grotesque flashy Afro-kitsch as Glitter (2001) starring Mariah Carey)—a stoic middle-aged black cop—shows up at the King's house to pick up the "tribute money," Cloten goes to great pains to insult him by obnoxiously pouring a bag full of hundreds of Hershey kisses onto a table instead of the money that they usually pay and then self-righteously declares, "Why should we pay tribute? If Caesar can hide the sun from us with a blanket...or put the moon in his pocket...we will pay him tribute for light. Else, sir, no more tribute." Although Caius respects the King and vice versa, he must declare to Cymbeline, "I am sorry, Cymbeline, that I am to pronounce...Augustus Caesar thine enemy." Of course, if were not for the Queen, who plans to kill the Imogen via poison, Cymbeline would have never even considered provoking such a pointless war, but such are the senselessly tragic things that can happen when you're a powerful man with a covertly wicked wife who uses her cunt as tool of manipulation.

Unbeknownst to Cymbeline, his two long lost sons that were kidnapped from him when they were just babies are alive and well and have been brought up to be stoic fighters of high moral fiber by a negro warrior named Belarius (Delroy Lindo), who stole boys as revenge against the King after being banished from Britain for a crime that he was apparently framed for, or as he states states to himself in a quite moody fashion, "Villains, whose false oaths prevailed...before my perfect honor...swore to Cymbeline I was confederate with the Romans. O Cymbeline, heaven and my conscience knows...thou didst unjustly banish me...whereon, at three and two years old, I stole these boys. And this twenty years this rock has been my world...where I have lived at honest freedom...paid more pious debts to heaven...than in all the fore-end of my time. These boys know little they are sons to the king...nor Cymbeline dreams that they are alive.

CYMBELINE

They think they are mine; and though trained up thus meanly... Their thoughts do hit the roofs of palaces." Indeed, despite being blonde Nordic men, Cymbeline's sons Guiderius (Spencer Treat Clark) and Arviragus (Harley Ware) believe that black brother Belarius is their father and have adopted his revolutionary attitude and disdain for the mainstream America and corporations, hence why they all live off the grid as recluses in a secluded cabin in the middle of the woods (in Shakespeare play, Belarius lives in a cave). Additionally, poor would-be-lumpenprole Guiderius, who has no idea that he is of royal stock, proudly sports a Che Guevara t-shirt. By happenstance, Imogen wanders into Belarius' cabin while looking for food and is unwittingly reunited with her long lost brothers. When Guiderius and the boys catch Imogen in their cabin, she tells them her name is 'Fidel' after looking at Guiderius' Che t-shirt and thinking of Cuba (in the play, Imogen adopts the name 'Fidele'). Needless to say, Guiderius and Arviragus have no idea that Imogen is not only actually a woman, but also their little sister, so they fail to see the relevance when Cluton, who is dressed as Posthumus (who he plans to slay in an absurd attempt to win his stepsister's heart), randomly shows up near their cabin. Ultimately, without even knowing it, Guiderius manages to protect his sister by swiftly dispatching Cluton, who is such a sadistic sexual degenerate that he masturbates while fantasizing about killing Posthumus. As Cluton states in regard to his patently preposterous plan to win the heart of his stepsister, "With the suit upon my back I will ravish her. First, kill Posthumus...and in her eyes...There shall she see my valor...which will then be a torment...to her contempt."

After Guiderius gets in a fairly brief brawl with Cloten that concludes with the real future king decapitating the would-be-king with his own sword, Belarius and the boys go back to the cabin and assume Imogen is dead as a result of the fact she will not wake up due to the fact she has drank a potion that Pisanio supplied her with at the behest of the Queen, who wants the Princess dead. While the potion was intended to kill the Princess, the dope chemist that supplied it, Dr. Cornelius (Peter Gerety), assumed that the Queen had unsavory intentions and designed the drug so that it would only induce the temporary appearance of death in the drinker. Thinking that Imogen is dead, Belarius and the boys bury both her and her stepbrother Cluton side-by-side under some rocks. Naturally, when Imogen eventually awakes, digs herself out of the rocks, and discovers a headless corpse next to her that is wearing the same clothes as her beloved Posthumus, she assumes the worst and mentally breaks down. Meanwhile, Posthumus, who has reached such an all-time low as a result of wrongly believing that he killed Imogen that he has befriended his enemy Iachimo, goes crazy and goes on a nihilistic suicide mission where he shoots and kills the King's right-hand man during a car chase and then turns himself into Cymbeline's men while declaring with his arms raised, "Is it enough I am sorry? For Imogen's dear life, take mine." Meanwhile, at the request of his 'adopted' sons Guiderius and Arviragus, Belarius decide to join Cymbeline as warriors in his fight against Rome, thus killing a virtual army of cops and helping the motorcycle monarch win the war in the process. While the final battle between Britain and Rome is being waged in the streets, Posthumus, who is strapped to an embalming table, is visited by the ghost of his dead father Sicilius Leonatus (Bill Pullman) who more or less apologizes to him for ruining his life as a result of dying before he was born. When Posthumus is asked by one of Cymbeline's bikers, "ready for death?" he confidently replies "I am merrier to die than you are to live." Of course, life will be worth living again for Posthumus when he discovers that his precious Imogen is alive and well, even if she has a dyke haircut.

Despite all the senselessly tragic death and destruction in the film, Cymbeline could not conclude in a more absurdly ideal fashion. Indeed, aside from the fact that Cymbeline obliterates Rome and all the bad guys die, both sons and fathers and husbands and wives are reunited in the end. Indeed, right after the King wins the war and declares to his men, including Belarius and his sons, "Stand by my side...you whom the gods have made preservers of my throne. Knights of the battle...I create you companions to our person...and fit you with dignities befitting your estates," Dr. Cornelius abruptly arrives in an ambulance with the royal maids and Queen's corpse and informs Cymbeline that his wife has committed suicide as a result of the intolerable grief she had suffered upon learning about her son's grisly death. When Cymbeline asks the good doctor about the circumstances surrounding his wife's death, Dr. Cornelius replies in a regretful fashion, "With horror, madly dying...like her life, which, being cruel to the world...concluded most cruel to herself [...] First, she confessed she never loved you...only affected greatness got by you, not you...married your royalty, wife to your place...abhorred your person." At this point, Cymbeline finally comes to realize that his whacked out wifey saw him as nothing more than a mere means to an end and is ultimately the true source of all the death and destruction that has plagued his empire. After talking to the doctor, Cymbeline proceeds to prepare to liquidate his surviving enemies and in the process notices that Iachimo, who was captured with Posthumus, is wearing his daughter's ring and asks him how he got it. At this point, Iachimo decides to repent for his sins and confesses, "I returned with proof enough...to make the noble Posthumus mad." Naturally, Posthumus is quite upset upon hearing this as he finally realizes that he was duped and that he had underestimated his loyal wife. At this point, Imogen emerges and runs to her husband to embrace him, but Posthumus does not realize that it is his wife since she is disguised as a boy so he elbows her in the face and knocks her out (somewhat humorously, Pisanio remarks after Posthumus knocks Imogen unconscious, "You never killed Imogen...until now"). Of course, Posthumus finally realizes it is Imogen and they kiss and embrace after she regains consciousness while Cymbeline watches on without even the slightest hint of hatred, even though he knows that his stepson tried to kill his daughter. CYMBELINE a second twist happy ending, Belarius comes forward, declares his true identity to the King, and then reveals that Guiderius and Arviragus, who have no idea about their true paternity, are his long sons. Luckily, Cymbeline is so happy with the good news that he not only pardons all of his surviving enemies, including Iachimo and Belarius, but also tells Caius Lucius that even though he has won the war, he will once again pay tribute to Rome. As a sort of bittersweet viking-esque farewell to his treacherous wife, Cymbeline has the Queen's corpse set on fire while it is sitting on a stretcher in a body-bag. In a quasi-gynocentric conclusion that hints that Almereyda does not wear the pants in his relationships with women, Posthumus and Imogen leave together on a crotch-rocket, with the princess driving the motorcycle while her emo fag hubby meekly holds onto her back.

As I discovered in one of the few positive reviews I have read on Cymbeline, Irish playwright and eugenicist George Bernard Shaw apparently once described Shakespeare's original play as, "stagey trash of the lowest melodramatic order" (though he later changed his mind about most of the play aside from the ending, which inspired him to write the play-fragment Cymbeline Refinished (1937)), which is also a pretty way to describe Sons of Anarchy. While Almereyda's film might feature John Leguizamo naked and locked in a dog cage, Ethan Hawke taking selfies of himself with a sleeping young girl who he wants people to believe that he fucked, Milla Jovovich singing a sorrowful Bob Dylan song about a hooker to a room full of drunken bikers with huge beer guts, pube-headed Jew-boy Anton Yelchin delectately fondling himself like budding a preteen who has just discovered her clit, perennial wuss Bill Pullman portraying the ghost of a tough dead biker who recites an Emily Dickinson poem to his pansy uxoricidal son, and Fifty Shades of Grey (2015) star Dakota Johnson getting high off of the fumes of her banished boy toy's lucky red sweater, among other rather ridiculous scenarios, it would probably be better described as, "stagey artsy fartsy stuff of the most ludicrously understated order," as a carefully calculated work with a sometimes almost hieroglyphic style approach to storytelling where love, sex, and death are treated in a strikingly stylized, as opposed to sensational, fashion, hence why the film seems almost unanimously hated among both regular filmgoers and film critics alike. Somewhat ironically, despite taking a similar subversive approach to adapting Shakespeare, Almereyda's film is the total opposite of British arthouse auteur Derek Jarman's high-camp late era Shakespeare adaptation The Tempest (1979) as a cinematic work that is about as playful and campy as a Michael Haneke flick, thus highlighting the versatility when it comes to cinematically adapting the bard's plays. If Sons of Anarchy exploited the timeless tale of Hamlet to make a biker TV show seem like something more than a degenerate hodgepodge of boobs-bikes-boots-blood-beer-and-barf, Cymbeline ultimately returns the favor by exploiting the popularity of Sons of Anarchy to celebrate one of Shakespeare's least loved plays (notably, the film was even originally entitled 'Anarchy' until Almereyda thankfully put a stop to it). If Almereyda has proved anything with both his Shakespeare adaptation and his experimental (post)modernist monster movies like Nadja (1994) and Trance (1998) aka The Eternal, it is that he has a very distinctive and quasi-sagely talent for bringing new lifeblood to ancient archetypes, genre conventions, and themes.

In its depiction of a decidedly decadent and corrupt world where a 'virtuous' druglord with a discernible moral code is able to freely run his drug empire by paying off the police, Cymbeline ultimately manages to make an interesting connection between the pagan Britons and their somewhat mongrelized and less spiritual American descendants. Personally, I have always seen bikers as sort of modern day Vikings, just as I see black street-gangs like the Bloods and Crips and Latino international gangs like Mara Salvatrucha (MS-13) as examples of non-Europid races reverting back to primalism and atavistically returning to their pre-Christian tribal ways, albeit in a highly degenerate and largely materialistic way that would probably disgrace their forebears. Indeed, the eponymous lead played by Ed Harris is more or less the Führer of a degenerate modern-day Männerbünde empire, though what is somewhat curious is that many of his various biker underling are Mestizos, which can be seen as a sign of the feminization of white males and rise of Hispanic machismo culture in America (as is depicted on Sons of Anarchy and is true with most real-life biker gangs like the Hells Angels, outlaw motorcycle groups tend towards racial segregation though, over the past couple decades, white gangs have been more accepting of Mestizos). While I doubt it was Almereyda's intention, the fact that Cymbeline's very Aryan-looking sons were kidnapped by a negro and brainwashed to the point where they hate the Occident so much that they sport t-shirts featuring an image of commie third world icon Che Guevara (who, as his book The Motorcycle Diaries demonstrates, was no fan of negroes) can be seen as symbolic of the pathetic deracinated state of younger generations of white Americans who, brainwashed with everything from cultural Marxist style public school indoctrination to illiterate honky-hating rappers on MTV to a race-hustling double-bastard mulatto president, have become hopelessly lost orphans to both their own race and kultur. Of course, the mass marketing of Che's readily identifiable swarthy image speaks for itself in terms of the triumph of capitalism over communism (considering Almereyda's name seems to be a pseudonym that he borrowed from the anarchist turned communist militant father of French auteur Jean Vigo, one can only guess what the filmmaker's intent with the use of the Che shirt), so it is fitting that literally cutthroat capitalist Cymbeline's long lost sons completely embrace him in the end.

Like Shakespeare being lovingly sodomized by Jean-Pierre Melville, Michael Mann, and the lead bike boy of Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964), Cymbeline is ultimately a notable yet far from immaculate experiment in cinematic dramaturgy by a rare talented contemporary American auteur who unfortunately seems to have suffered spiritual castration as a result of attending one-too-many college courses on feminism and deconstructionism, among other things. Indeed, had Almereyda attended more viewings of works by Fassbinder and Peckinpah instead of Godard and Akerman, he would have surely assembled something with more meat and less pomo pedantry, though the film admittedly does have some memorable and even poetic, albeit all too brief, murder and torture scenes (after all, who can forget a scene featuring the extra dark corpse of a burnt dead black cop sitting in the passenger seat of a patrol car while Dakota Johnson is dressed in drag in the backseat?!). Additionally, disgustingly sulky heartthrob Penn Badgley is intolerably irritating in the role of Posthumus, as he comes off seeming like a sort of culturally and socially confused crybaby preppy-emo-skater-fag hybrid who was raised by a slutty single mother, but then again that makes the character somewhat typical of contemporary heterosexual males, who oftentimes seem no different from their homo counterparts. While Dakota Johnson certainly pulls off the somewhat unbelievable role of a completely morally pristine and faithful virginal beauty (considering that she is the daughter of a Botox-ridden screen bimbo like Melanie Griffith, this makes her angelic performance seem all the more incredible), she is considerably less effective when portraying a boy as she is just too damn innately feminine and delicate to ever make for a halfway believable fag (in fact, when I first saw a shot of her from the film with short hair, I had no clue she was in drag). While clearly directed by a beta-boy who has no problem letting people know that he thinks less of men than women, Cymbeline ultimately an important reminder that no knight should take his shieldmaiden for granted, as she might be a psychopathic Salome in disguise.

Thunderheart is a fairly corny American crime film about a self-loathing half-caste Native American FBI agent named Ray, who is forced into investigating a murder on a Native American reservation. Upon arriving on the reservation, Ray is disgusted and offended by the way of life of the defeated Native Americans. He makes to stay as faraway to a close relationship with the Native Americans as possible. The tribal police officer of the reservation, Walter Crow Horse, is equally disgusted (but showing it in a more comical way) by Ray. Thunderheart is your typical Hollywood liberal propaganda portraying the Native American as still a "victim" of white oppression. Despite being on a reservation, whites continue to exploit the unlucky and somber Indians. Over time Ray begins to pickup on this "oppression" and sides with the Native Americans. It seems that "cool" ray is finally feeling the Native American blood flowing through his veins. Ray even has a "vision" of being chased down by a group of old time redneck cowboys.

Thunderheart also has another agenda that I found a tad laughable. The film has an "empowering" message to Native Americans to start becoming militant and to take back land. With the recent wave of illegal immigration in American, Indians from the America's have been flooding into the country. Myth driven groups like the Mexican Movement demand that all whites be expelled from the America's to make way for their new Indian "Empire." Thunderheart would make for a great motivator and recruit film for prospective members of the Mexican Movement. Val Kilmer plays the role of Ray and does a fairly good job playing a pseudo suave FBI agent. Ray doesn't like Native Americans because his father was the stereotypical Native American alcoholic. It seems that Ray's father had lost his "Indian spirit" which unfortunately led to his demise. Thunderheart can also be seen as an anti-alcohol film for Native Americans as well. Hollywood really does tell heartwarming and positive stories.

Genius Propaganda by the "Mexica Movement"

Sadly Ray doesn't get even close to "hooking up" with his Native American love interest. Due to the sadist behavior of the scheming white man, Ray's chance at love is forever gone. Thunderheart has a rebellious message to both Native Americans and other "minorities" to adopt a false sense of pride. When Ray realizes his Native American soul, he develops a horrible attitude. Maybe Hollywood wants minorities to fail?

Michael Armstrong (1967)

While I am typically rather repulsed by people that mourn dead celebrities that they never knew, I have encountered David Bowie some many times as a result of my cinephilia that I could not help but be somewhat startled by his death, at least to the extent that I know I will never again see a bizarre cameo performance from him in some random future cult film. Indeed, it would have been nice to have seen Bowie appear in a Nicolas Winding Refn or Edwin Brien flick, but I guess fate had different plans. While Bowie only seemed semi-serious about his film career since it was clearly secondary to his work as a musician, he still managed to appear in more notable films than most full-time Hollywood actors do in a lifetime, hence my somewhat unlikely sense of respect for him (admittedly, I also have respect for him for collaborating with artists like Steve Strange and Klaus Nomi, but that is a different subject). After all, only Bowie could have written a song in tribute to Andy Warhol (which, in my opinion, is one of his darkest and most underrated tunes), only to later portray his quasi-autistic contemporary in a quite memorable way a quarter century later in degenerate Hebraic (con)artist Julian Schnabel's debut feature Basquiat (1996). Additionally, only Bowie could pull off both Pontius Pilate (as he did in Martin Scorsese's The Last Temptation of Christ (1988)) and an aristocratic Egyptian deathrock chic vampire (as he did in Tony Scott's debut feature The Hunger (1983)). I also admit that I do not think I have ever dated a girl that did not admit that she had the hots for Bowie as a little girl as a result of seeing him in Jim Henson's Labyrinth (1986), which is somewhat curious since he is also the man that managed to connect Eastern and Western queers together via his strangely iconic performance as a self-sacrificing kiwi sod soldier in Nagisa Oshima's Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence (1983). Indeed, if there ever was a mensch that had an eclectic talent for seducing and molesting all sort of filmgoers—whether it be old Jap fags or little white girls—with his mere presence, it was Mr. Bowie, so it is only fitting that his very first acting role was as a handsome young ghost-like figure that literally haunts an artist who may or may not be suffering from with LGBT propagandists describe as 'internalized homophobia.' Shot over the course of a mere three days in the winter of 1967 only a couple months after the belated international superstar rechristened himself 'David Bowie' in tribute to 19th-century American frontiersman Jim Bowie (as well as the knife that the knife-fighting yank frontiersman popularized) and released his less than successful eponymous debut album, The Image (1967) directed by Michael Armstrong (Horror House aka The Haunted House of Horror, Mark of the Devil) is a little known but considerably worthwhile black-and-white avant-garde horror short that features the then-unknown rock legend when he was only 20-years-old portraying a sort phantom twink who haunts an assumed self-loathing closet queen (played by Michael Byrne of Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade (1989) and Mel Gibson's Braveheart (1995) in one of his very first film roles) that is curiously painting a portrait of said phantom twink.

Notable for being one of only a handful of British shorts films to ever receive a certified 'X' Rating, The Image might be a sensual and sensitively constructed work with a striking oneiric quality, but it also features David Bowie being brutally murdered no less than five times by a deranged young lapsed twink who seems to embody the line from Oscar Wilde's poem The Ballad of Reading Gaol, "Yet each man kills the thing he loves." Not officially released until around two years after it had been completed, the short was somewhat bizarrely advertised alongside the Hollywood propaganda flick All Quiet on the Western Front (1930) directed by Lewis Milestone, which had recently been acquired by Border Films (which had also produced Armstrong's film), and screened sandwiched in between foreign sex films after eventually opening at the Jacey Cinema in Piccadilly Circus in 1969. According to auteur Armstrong, before ever collaborating together on The Image, he approached Bowie about writing the songs and score for an ultimately never-realized film comedy based on Greek mythology entitled A Floral Tale that would also feature the then-relatively-unknown-rocker in the role of Thracian singer Orpheus. As much as I would enjoy seeing Bowie portraying Orpheus, I think I prefer artsy fartsy horror to silly British comedic takes on ancient Grecian mythology. While Bowie had yet to have any experience doing any film acting, he did have experience studying avant-garde theatre and mime under queer actor Lindsay Kemp, whose 1967 theatrical production Pierrot in Turquoise he appeared in. Clearly his mime training with cocksucker Kemp (who notably later appeared in Robin Hardy's The Wicker Man (1973), as well as a number of films by Ken Russell and Derek Jarman) paid off, as Bowie more or less portrays a sort of phantasmagoric gay hustler-cum-schoolboy specter of unrequited sod sensuality who never speaks but instead merely displays a sad and tragic yet sensual and seductive facial expression that reeks of hopelessly melancholic sexual desperation. Described by auteur Armstrong as, "a study of the illusionary reality world within the schizophrenic mind of the artist at his point of creativity," The Image is like an abstract homage to Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray as directed by a filmmaker that seems like he was obsessed with pre-Stonewall American queer avant-garde cinema, especially works like John E. Schmitz's The Voices (1953) and Gregory J. Markopoulos' Twice a Man (1964), thereupon making it all the more poignant that it stars iconic gender-bender Bowie, who probably did more than any man of his generation to popularize and legitimize queer culture and male androgyny, even if he was arguably not actually on the pink team himself. Sort of like the Un Chien Andalou of late-1960s British horror, Armstrong's short is nothing if not a welcome exception to the outmoded formulaic banality of Hammer Films horror.

THE IMAGE

It is fairly apparent before the nameless blond Artist is even introduced that he is not quite right in the head, as his dilapidated house is covered with so much trash that it seems like a homeless guy is camping on his floor. After all, the Artist is a handsome and carefully groomed man with a toned physique who hardly looks like a lazy slob. When we first encounter the Artist, we see he is turned around from a distance in a seemingly symbolic scene that makes it seem as if he is a deeply alienated individual that is lost in his own sad and lonely introverted world. Upon seeing a close-up shot of the Artist, the viewer realizes that he is painting a portrait on a canvas of a handsome young man with his arms raised as if he is inviting someone's warm embrace, thus hinting that the painter longs for the warmth and touch of a healthy young twink. It is raining outside and when the Artist thinks he sees someone walking outside of his house, he naturally becomes somewhat alarmed and does not even notice when he accidentally gets paint on his sweater. Needless to say, when the Artist sees the very same young man from his painting pressing his face against his window, he becomes quite petrified, drops his paintbrush, and runs upstairs, only to find the same exact twink staring at him in an upstairs window. Of course, the Artist immediately runs back downstairs, only to get the shock of a lifetime when he sees the young man standing next to his painting and making the same exact inviting pose as the figure on the canvas. At this point, the Artist attempts to flee from his house, but the door is chained shut and he soon finds himself being cornered by the young man, who clearly wants his love and is willing to do just about anything to get it, including dying a number of violent deaths. With little time to think, the Artist picks up a small bronze bust that he has conveniently lying on his quite messy trash-covered floor and violently bashes the omniscient twink over the head with it, thereupon killing him instantly. Of course, the poor phantom is far from dead, at least in the Artist's clearly troubled mind.

After kicking the young man's lifeless body to see if he is still alive, the Artist drops the bust and slowly walks up the steps where he enters a small and claustrophobic upstairs bathroom and proceeds to wash his hands, as if making a vain attempt to wash away the figurative blood from his hands. Of course, the Artist is quite startled when the young man randomly begins caressing his neck while he is washing his face in the sink. Matching ostensible like with like, the Artist opts to use his hands to strangle his ghostly caresser to death, only for the young man to subsequently awake from his slumber and once again proceed to approach his petrified 'victim.' Luckily for the Artist, he has a knife in his pants pocket, which he uses to stab the young man in the gut. After the Artist stabs the young man, the wounded specter falls forward and leans against his stabber in a manner that almost makes it seem as if the two men are sharing an intimate loving moment with one another, which Armstrong underscores with close-up still shots of the faggy fellows' slightly touching faces and waists. Of course, there are also sexual overtones to the stabbings, as the Artist penetrates the young man's flesh with a fierce yet fetishistic degree of savage sensuality, as if passionately buggering him with the blade. Eventually, the Artist begins slowly walking down the steps backwards while waving his knife at the young man, who still has his arms wide open as if expecting the painter to finally accept his embrace, even though he is covered in blood and is suffering from seemingly fatal stab wounds. When the young man finally gets the gall to come down the stairs, the Artist wastes no time in brutally stabbing multiple times, most notably and symbolically in the back, until the twink completely collapses and does not get back up. At this point, the Artist completely mentally deteriorates and unleashes his remaining strength on his painting, which he wrestles to the ground. While lying on his painting, the Artist puts his hands over his head and sobs like a toddler suffering from a temper tantrum. Somewhat intriguingly, the film concludes with a shot of a framed photograph of the young man as a schoolboy, thus hinting that he is someone that the Artist used to know and is an unrequited love and/or someone he ultimately betrayed.

While David Bowie obviously had a singularly successful career after The Image, the film's relatively unknown auteur Michael Armstrong was not so successful and spent the majority of his fairly uneven filmmaking career involved with horror and exploitation oriented hack work, though with some slight notable exceptions. Indeed, while the filmmaker had some minor commercial success with his proto-slasher The Dark (1969) aka The Haunted House Of Horror aka Horror House starring gregarious guido teen idol Frankie Avalon and even more successful with the West German production Hexen bis aufs Blut gequält (1970) aka Mark of the Devil starring Udo Kier and Herbert Lom, both of these films were taken away from him and completely butchered (in fact, some argue that the producer, Austrian Heimatfilm star turned Fassbinder superstar Adrian Hoven, was the true auteur of the latter film, as he more or less treated Armstrong the same way Francis Ford Coppola treated Wim Wenders on Hammett (1982) by reshooting scenes and excising others). Aside from penning and appearing in trashy sex comedies like The Sex Thief (1973) and Eskimo Nell (1975) and writing Pete Walker's horror-comedy House of the Long Shadows (1983) starring horror legends Vincent Price and Christopher Lee, Armstrong also did some uncredited writing on Tobe Hooper's somewhat underrated Colin Wilson adaptation Lifeforce (1985). Arguably, most notably, at least as far as his screenwriting credits are concerned, Armstrong also penned Ian Merrick's much reviled and maligned arthouse-ish crime-thriller The Black Panther (1977), which, despite being a delightfully dark film, was essentially consigned to the celluloid dustbin of history upon its release because it was ruthlessly attacked by the British media due to featuring a fairly historically accurate depiction of the kidnapping and murder of heiress Lesley Whittle by deranged armed robber Donald Neilson. Judging by the fact that virtually all of his projects were either butchered and/or abject commercial failures, one might argue that Armstrong was the single most accursed British auteur of his era, especially when once considers that he actually seemed to have talent as is quite apparent in The Image, which is seemingly immaculate in its stunning simplicity. Somewhat strangely but not surprisingly, Quentin Tarantino is apparently such a huge fan of Armstrong's badly butchered feature The Haunted House of Horror that he screened his own personal print of the film in 1997 at the first semi-annual Quentin Tarantino Film Festival (aka 'QT-Fest') in Austin, Texas as an example of a movie that had an imperative influence on his own work.

Somewhat ironically, Armstrong's first film was also his most pure, unadulterated, and auteur oriented as his only cinematic work where his own personal vision was more or less left completely untainted by scheming producers and monetary-motivated studios. Indeed, despite the fact that Armstrong only got the opportunity to shoot "barely half" of his script for The Image because the producers refused to fund further shooting time (in fact, the production company, Border Films, even briefly took the project away from Armstrong and had an in-house hack editor assemble a botched 7 ½ minute cut of the film, only to beg the filmmaker to come back when they realized they had a problem), the filmmaker still managed to construct a striking work that was wholly his own, hence the relatively idiosyncratic essence of the film, which I would compare to the pre-Night Tide (1961) avant-garde shorts of Curtis Harrington (who, incidentally, also had many of his features butchered by studios and producers when he began directing semi-mainstream horror films). Notably, due to the fact that he was unable to shoot his entire screenplay, Armstrong had to get extra creative with the editing and, in the end, he ultimately "expanded the thematic line of the film even further than had existed in the original screenplay," thus resulting in what probably turned out to be a more potent and immaculate work that feels like the cinematic equivalent of being briefly molested by death. Personally, I was quite shocked when I put two and two together and realized that The Image and Mark of the Devil were directed by the same man, as the latter is essentially folk-horror exploitation trash that was made to capitalize on the success of Witchfinder General (1968) aka The Conqueror Worm, which was especially successful in Deutschland. Although Armstrong would jokingly refer to the short as his "art film," I would also say that it is unequivocally his greatest and most provocative film. I also think that it was the perfect cinematic debut for David Bowie, as a short and almost sadistically bittersweet slice of foreboding psychosexual celluloid that demonstrates that Ziggy Stardust was already oozing charisma and androgynous sex appeal long before he ever became Ziggy Stardust. Of course, it is only fitting that a man that portrayed himself as gay and bisexual for decades before 'coming out of the closet as heterosexual' would make his filmic debut as the most ambiguously faggy yet nonetheless seductive of phantoms. Surely, Bowie's performance in The Image also makes a nice counterpoint to his bizarre cameo in David Lynch's Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (1992)

as a long-lost FBI Agent.

While he certainly had dubious taste in women (to say the least) and, in my opinion, wrote more shitty songs than good ones, Bowie unquestionably had a strikingly singular career as an actor, which might be the result of being a man that had more charm, charisma, tenacity, and lust for life than artistic prowess. Indeed, from portraying a melancholic dipsomaniac extraterrestrial in Nicholas Roeg's The Man Who Fell to Earth (1976) to playing himself in the kraut teen junky cult flick Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981) to his somewhat fitting performance as the eponymous rebel poet in Alan Clarke's Brecht adaptation Baal (1982) to his quirky performance as the great Serbian-American inventor Nikola Tesla in Christopher Nolan's otherwise banal feature The Prestige (2006), Bowie has certainly secured his place as the most eclectic part-time actor in cinema history, which is not too bad for a petite Brit with stereotypical bad teeth who got his start playing a gay ghost in an obscure avant-garde short that was only seen by a handful of people (unfortunately, aside from the fact that Armstrong's film was only briefly in British theaters, it has never been released on VHS or DVD). Undoubtedly, watching The Image now, it is almost more hard to believe that the handsome and exceedingly youthful chap in the film is now dead than the fact that he would go on to become one of the most famous and readily identifiable figures in the entire world. In that sense, Armstrong's film is probably more haunting today than when it was released nearly half a century ago, thus making it mandatory viewing for both cinephiles and/or anyone that is even vaguely interested in Bowie. I also have to admit that The Image was a rather refreshing experience for me in that was it was like seeing Bowie totally stripped, as the viewer gets to see him without the makeup or one of his carefully contrived personas, which is arguably the most evocative aspect of the short, thus underscoring the completely unintended and unpredictable ways that a film can evolve over time in terms of both meaning and potency.

YEAR OF THE DRAGON

Michael Cimino (1985)

Imagine a crime thriller starring the young, angelic face of Mickey Rourke and add a touch of a belligerent dose of terrible violence. Not the accustomed violence we're given through modern media in that pampering and stylized manner that we're subjected to on a daily basis. No smoke and mirrors here, Year of the Dragon features a stark and in-your-face style of dealing with death and injury. Close-up shots of fatal wounds and selfish tragedy are given by Michael Cimino using his sleight of hand acquired from the Oscar-winning Deer Hunter and such adds the illusion of a neon-lit gangster epic set in Chinatown. With epic as the term I use to describe this film, know that the running time and the pacing conjures the thought of this being an epic and not what consists of the actual underlayings for the film. From my hiatus of writing was born a love of the way classic films were created and in this, and not to play devil's advocate, I find the classic aesthetic of crime capers to be consistently more fulfilling than the bravest structured contemporary film around. Mickey Rourke, as per usual, grabs the attention of all who view this film. There is no supporting cast or honorable mentions, there is only . Your gaze will be transfixed on a 30 year old Rourke playing a 50-something year old Vietnam vet. Analyze this, Harley Davidson & the Marlboro Man without Mickey Rourke would be as caring for a child that isn't your biological spawn. Sure, the instinct for parental nurturing would still exist as would the film Harley Davidson but the passion and excitement from the adventures of a former A-list actor would be void. Face it, it would harness the credibility of a recent Dolph Lundgren Straight-to-DVD title (Sorry, Dolph.) For a film of its nature, you'd think that press, no, even cult film lovers could approach this film open-armed but it appears that Year of the Dragon has been shunned into obscurity because of "an offending portrait of Chinese-Americans." Never mind the blurb at the opening of the film disregarding all "stereotypes" portrayed in this film. Since then, Year of the Dragon has never sat well with the chinks and please, disregard their portrayal of the "white demon." For once I wish I could write something as loud and angry as Cimino's Year of the Dragon. Rather, Rourke's Year of the Dragon.

Audience discrepancies will linger after the foul approach of showing the Chinese-Americans as being the soulless parasites they are. Moving over to our country and adopting their thousand year old traditions in a place of law and justice. This doesn't sit well with Captain Stanley White as he endangers his own life and the life of all who care for him as Year of the Dragon explodes into a rip wave of unexplainable bloodshed and shocking climaxes at every turn. Captain Stanley White is the most bizarre of protagonists. Layered plentifully, the more we learn about his character, the more solace we garner and the more trust we put in his judgment. Then when the proverbial shit hits the fan, we find ourselves reaching out to silence his continuing mistakes and realize that he isn't the great guy we thought he was, over and over again. And that is just one of the reasons that I feel Year of the Dragon is a marvelous film for what it is - an effervescently chaotic scripture of backwards racism and the perfect amount of needed misogyny. I occasionally dine at Chinese/Japanese buffets and sit baffled wondering where in context could the harmonic, yet infuriating, mandarin music could be properly squeezed into its soothing and proper effect. Year of the Dragon sporadically incorporates these similar sounds while perusing through the extensive Chinese crime families while heavy percussion accompany most of the Polack-American scenes of brutal detective work. A gripe comes to mind when assessing the Chinese half of the film, it's not so much as a gripe with Year of the Dragon but my own inability to maintain memories on which Lee-Hung family belongs to which Triad while Johnny Cho is out with Walter Wang. Since Tremors debuted some time ago and devastated the rental market, I've found myself lampooning the similarly named Chinamen. As I stated, my problem but my personal fulfillment as well. Ariane's performance didn't help my intolerable Oriental condition either, with her performance as wooden as my love for Legally Blonde spinoffs. (Pictured left to right, Lone, Woo, Chin, Wong, Wang....or something) In conclusion, Year of the Dragon is a rousing and voracious view into stereotyped crime syndicates. So much may be true while the rest lingers upon notations hidden in books long forgotten but that's the problem with adaptations and their "contemporary redesignings," so you'll see little complaint from me. To call Year of the Dragon "racist" is to say Tom Hanks has too much screen time in Cast Away. These media vultures love digging for subversion and uprooting it into some big fiasco. Attention whores, all of them! Year of the Dragon isn't an intelligent film per say, but an emotional one for sure. Many times throughout this gem I found myself appraising Captain Stanley White for being such a cool cat while the other times I felt as if a similar tragedy were shared psychically. That right there is one of the many definitions of movie magic.

JACK FROST 2: REVENGE OF THE MUTANT KILLER SNOWMAN
JACK FROST 2: REVENGE OF THE MUTANT KILLER SNOWMAN

Michael Cooney (2000)

Jack Frost is an incredibly cheesy and ridiculous horror film concerning the ensuing massacre created by mutant snowman killer aptly named Jack Frost. The first film acted as a horribly flawed horror film but none-the-less provided an hour and a half of entertainment thanks to a wise-cracking snowman that predated the exploits of the Gingerdead Man by five years. I'd pick Gary Busey over Scott MacDonald any day. I've heard through the grapevine that this film was awful but I mysteriously found myself loving it. As a sequel to the already insane Jack Frost, It ups the kill count, evolves the humor, and adds some really cute elements of baby killer snowmen. If anything, Jack Frost II is the perfect sequel. Much as Gingerdead Man 2 was infinitely better than it's predecessor. Jack Frost II features illustrious killing methods such as an ice anvil, tiny snowmen - same idea in Tremors II: Aftershocks, and relentless one-liners and incredibly funny cinematography. The characters are intensely memorable, namely Captain Fun!, who steals the show as the Ritalin-infused vacation counselor of sorts. Jack Frost needed to skimp on the implied violence and stick to the humor aspect more seeing as how ridiculous the film is. Jack Frost II makes up for the originals shortcomings and strengthens the film evenly. Sure, It's a horrible horror film and a better comedy, but that's no reason to not watch this film. If I were to watch this film as a child, I might have hated it. But watching it with my present mindset, I find this outing in frozen terror to be more of a frozen treat. The deaths are radical and the plot is loony, and I couldn't have found more fun in this film had it been a film sticking to the original formula of trying to scare and humor simultaneously. Jack Frost II is just what the holidays ordered - corny humor and those great practical effects we all love. It's only brutal irony that actor Christopher Allport died in January 08 of an avalanche. It seems that Jack Frost finally got the best of him.

It was set in stone. Runaway was going to be the smash sci-fi hit of the 80s, that is, until James Cameron's The Terminator devastated the market for "cyberpunk" action films. Runaway is a film that is very bizarre in concept. Imagine a script with the some of the virtues of I, Robot but set in the 80s with an incredibly aged look that makes you stick your tongue out in disgust. Tom Selleck leads the late Michael Crichton scripted & directed film, with an exuberant Gene Simmons (of KISS fame) as the villain equipped with DNA seeking missiles. I could be a genre whore and dub this a cyberpunk film but alas, there is no punk aspect of Runaway. Perhaps Cybergeriatric is a far more fitting tag for Runaway. Tom Selleck is a flawed character. Revel in that for several seconds because that's what the entire film is going to barrage you with. Early on, you learn that Selleck has a fear of heights, so for the next 60 or so minutes, you will see Selleck expressing his immediate distaste for heights and his hatred for rogue robots. While a semi-similar film Demolition Man created a new Utopian playground and clever electronics, you will stare confoundedly at the same acid spitting spiders and bleeping cardboard boxes for quite some time. Since the passing of Michael Crichton, the literary world will forever be shadowed by the titanic impact he made, on both mediums of film and literature. His novel Jurassic Park was adapted into one of the largest groundbreaking blockbusters of all time. His film Westworld was wacky, thrilling, and genius. With Crichton gone, I'd like to see his novel Prey faithfully adapted into what we can mindlessly label "nanopunk." Runaway was just one of Crichton's films that has spoiled from exposure. All is not lost though, there is chemistry between the two partners and the script isn't that bad. It's a precise clone of what made the 80s so eighty's. Runaway is entirely watchable. If you can manage to look past its many flaws; there is even charm hidden under the clam shell of my VHS case. With an erratic soundtrack scored by Jerry Goldsmith, Runaway is almost memorable, but falls short of being a definitive classic of entertainment.

Michael Cuesta (2001)

L.I.E is a disturbing film following a fifteen year old boy named Howie Blitzer and his relationship with a pederast named 'big John.' Young Howie lost his mother on the Long Island Expressway and it seems to have confused his emotions. He is friends with a group of young criminals that take pride in robbing homes for kicks. Howie and his friend Gary also seem to be a little bit too close. A kid named Kevin also brags about how he has sex with his own sister. Howie gets in trouble when he decides to rob the house of 'big John' with his friend Gary. Big John manages to snatch Howie's jean pocket. Howie is eventually confronted by a cunning 'big John.' The old pedophile seems more interested in Howie's body than receiving his stolen guns back. Instead of molesting him, big John ends up being a surrogate father of sorts for Howie. What a heartwarming film. Howie Blitzer is played by a young and unknown Paul Dano. Dano recently wowed audiences with his powerful performance as the false prophet Eli Sunday in There Will Be Blood. Despite it being one of his first roles, Dano's performance as Howie Blitzer is nothing short of amazing. Dano has no trouble playing a confused kid with a constant aura of melancholy surrounding him. Paul Dano will no doubt be one of the greatest actors of his time. Donovan's song "Hurdy Gurdy Man" adds a haunting feel to L.I.E. Seeing a pederast driving around with children running around outside is as realistically dark as films can get. Hurdy Gurdy Man touches a similar nerve as the chilling scenes found in L.I.E. The odd distorted colors of the film also add to the its overall feel. L.I.E. is maybe the only film that features a "likeable" pedophile. Due to the loss of his Mother and the jailing of his asshole Zionist father, Howie is alone in the world. An old pervert by the name of 'big John' is the only one that can truly comfort Howie. Howie thought he could trust his friend Gary but he soon finds out he is wrong. L.I.E. is a distressing film not because it features an evil pederast, but a pederast that has deep emotions and cares for a young man. I think director Michael Cuesta is the only director to perform such an unsettling feat.

12 AND HOLDING

Michael Cuesta (2006)

I can only imagine that youth nowadays have a hard time finding a decent coming-of-age film. Hollywood seems most interested in sexualizing youngsters as well as indoctrinating them with a slave morality where the weak is looked at as good (especially poor, modernly mythical ghetto Jews and disenfranchised Negroes) and the strong as evil (and don't forget usually "racist") rather than providing them with quality entertainment. No longer will there be films like Monster Squad where kids call other kids "faggots" for such words are borderline hate speech. Also, one should not expect many kids movies with strong Nordic heroes wiping out dark and slimy scum. If one wants to see a quality coming-of-age films nowadays, it is going to have to be subversive and borderline morally bankrupt, the kind of film that kids probably should not see. 12 and Holding, directed by Michael Cuesta, is such a film; a sin-filled and not-so-sunny motion picture featuring kids killing other kids. Cuesta is probably best known for his hurdy-gurdy masterpiece L.I.E., a film featuring a young teen who takes on a Pedo named Big John as a father figure. With 12 and Holding, Cuesta once again proves he is proficient at directing films about juveniles that no parent would want to see nor think about.

The children in 12 and Holding are a group of young and upcoming degenerates. Jacob has a disgusting birthmark on his face and a recently deceased twin brother who his parents loved more, Leonard is an obese lump of turd, and Carla is a 1/2 Asian girl who has a thing for adult men. It seems all these 12 year old kids are united by their early disdain for life and most of humanity. All of these preteens also suffer some type of existential crisis with some of the children more conscious of their problems than others. All the children also take extreme measures in attempting to correct their problems. For example, young Carla thinks that breaking into an adult male friend's apartment and surprising him in the nude would be the best way to correct her father-less void. Lardo Leonard thinks by locking his disgustingly obese mother in the basement and forcing her to eat fruit/vegetables that he will force Miss Piggy to lose some weight. I guess children sometimes have ridiculous solutions to their problems, but one must respect them for their passionate audacity.

12 and Holding was shot on Super 16mm film which certainly adds to the film's realism. The scenarios featured in the film may sometimes seem exaggerated and unheard of, but I am sure similar situations play out more often in American society than one would want to admit. I believe a lot of kids in the city start pushing crack around age 12 and the girls start shooting out worthless eaters around the same age too. The somewhat prudish preteens of 12 and Holding are not yet keen on the same recreations as their fellow city youth but they certainly have their own poison of abuse. Chances are if you're 12 years or younger the film will likely give your nightmares but then again, so will Anne Frank and Barney.

THE BET

Michael Dunn (2007) Going into The Bet, i didn't know what to expect. I was thinking of something along the lines of a avid gambler gets chased by a bunch of mafia guys looking to lop off some fingers, but what i got was a film that started off enigmatic and slowly metamorphosed into something abstract and beautiful. This poster horrifies me. To explain the plot would only limit the overall effect of the film. All i can say, is it is about a game between two people; the stakes being your life. When it started out i was confused, also annoyed. Not annoyed because of the directing, sound, or cinematography. I just wanted to know exactly what was going on. Things that we cannot understand are always the most sought after pieces of information. Cryptzoology is proof of this. The Bet unfolds like a magnificent eclipse of the cinematic kind. Wonderful and abrasive, Director Michael Dunn ensures that you will be entertained and be thinking in a wider manner. If you are looking for a headscrew of a short film, look no further. The Bet does in its under 20 minute runtime, what "art-house" film makers have been trying to do for decades. The film is an entirely open film, perfect for discussion and analysis. To call The Bet "Lynchian" would be like supporting Post-Modernism and if this true, then the world might be dead. While the film has the atmospheric tone to it and the imagery to kick, this doesn't show it's influences easily. Perhaps on another layer. The Bet is a great short if i have ever seen one, and i will surely be looking forward to Michael Dunn's future projects. Hopefully he keeps his inspirations in place and doesn't become another Mathieu Kassovitz.

KILL DADDY GOOD NIGHT

Michael Glawogger (2009)

Last year, three days after Uncle Adolf's birthday on April, 23, 2014, Austria lost one of its few great contemporary auteur filmmakers, who tragically succumbed to an unexpected illness while he was doing what he loved best in a most hostile and disease-ridden land. Indeed, while working on his latest film in the real-life hellhole known as Liberia, Michael Glawogger (Workingman's Death, Slumming) was incorrectly diagnosed with typhus and ultimately died of malaria four days later, thus bringing a tragic premature end to a singular filmmaking career that arguably had yet to reach its peak in terms of artistry. Although Glawogger worked as a cinematographer for fellow Austrian 'gritty realist' filmmaker Ulrich Seidl on works like Tierische Liebe (1996) aka Animal Love and the somewhat bizarre anti-Haider agitprop piece State of the Nation: Austria in Six Chapters (2002) aka Zur Lage: Österreich in sechs Kapiteln, he had been directing his own films since the mid-1980s. Somewhat strangely schooled at the San Francisco Art Institute before finishing the rest of his academic education in his hometown of Vienna, Glawogger learned at an early age to appreciate the experimental filmmaking of avant-gardists like Stan Brakhage and his fellow countryman Peter Kubelka, whose influence would be apparent throughout his career, albeit in a subtle and inconspicuous way so as not to annoy people that are not interested in experimental cinema. While ultimately becoming best known as a sort of 'wandering documentarian' (or as he called himself, a "traveling filmmaker") in the spirit of Werner Herzog who was willing to live in and document the world's worst third world metropolises and their decidedly degraded inhabitants as demonstrated in notable works like Megacities (1998), Workingman's Death (2005), and Whores' Glory (2011), Glawogger also directed a number of fictional features, including raunchy yet culturally and socio-politically astute regional comedies like Nacktschnecken (2004) aka Slugs, Slumming (2009), and Contact High: The Good, the Bad and the Bag (2009), as well as a couple more serious works. Arguably, Glawogger's most serious, mature, and ambitious feature is Kill Daddy Good Night (2009) aka Das Vaterspiel, which is based on the 2000 novel of the same name by Austrian writer Josef Haslinger. The somewhat strange story of a swarthy patricidal Viennese beta-male nerd who has dedicated his life to fine-tuning a videogame that he has created about killing his political minister father that ultimately finds himself renovating the Long Island basement apartment of an elderly Lithuanian Nazi war criminal after receiving a random phone-call from his hairless Alopecia-plagued college crush, Glawogger's pathologically eccentric yet melancholic anti-daddy drama is quite possibly the most strange, quirky, and, quite thankfully, least sentimental holocaust-themed film ever made. In its stoic cynicism and complete and utter lack of sapless sentimentality, Kill Daddy Good Night ultimately lets the viewer now more about the reality of the holocaust than blockbuster 'shoah classics' like Schindler's List (1993) ever could despite the fact that it does not depict a single atrocity scene, but more importantly the film is a story about the cultural plague of the death of masculinity and the resentment of fathers in the Occident, especially in the German-speaking world. Set on two different continents and telling two different yet ultimately inter-twinned stories that merge together in the end, Glawogger's work ultimately demonstrates how fathers and grandfathers can sometimes unwittingly seal the fates of their kids and grandkids in a most cataclysmic fashion that in no way can be foreseen.

The reasonably swarthy and unkempt computer nerd protagonist of Kill Daddy Good Night has the nickname 'Ratz' (played by director Helmut Köpping, who also starred in Glawogger's Slugs and Contact High) because he looks and sometimes acts like a rat, or so he reveals in a self-denigrating absurdist dream-sequence where he starts gnawing like a rabid rodent. Although he never really gives a good reason why, Ratz has more or less dedicated his life to hating his politician father 'Kramer' (comedian Christian Tramitz in a rare serious role) and has been assembling a videogame for some time that centers around killing his daddy in a rather violent gore-filled fashion. In fact, Ratz is so obsessed with his game and his hatred for his father that he oftentimes imagines his daddy in videogame form following around, especially anytime he attempts to leave Vienna, as if to demonstrate that the protagonist may be able to physically runaway from his progenitor, but he will never escape his mind and influence. As a less than handsome and rather socially awkward beta-male with a rather repellant attitude who spends most of his time on his computer 'virtually killing' his daddy, Ratz is not exactly a lady's man, hence why he became the cuckold of a girl named Mimi (Sabine Timoteo of Matthias Glasner's modern classic Der freie Wille (2006) aka The Free Will) when he was in college. A girl of Lithuanian stock who was born in Helsinki and eventually landed in Vienna after living in various different places, Mimi is a true cosmopolitan chameleon and like any good deracinated citizen of the world, she has a completely artificial personality and is not much more than an attractive cipher with a character that is not that much more intricate than that of one of the characters from Ratz's videogame. Since she suffers from Alopecia, which she later fully reveals to Ratz in a flashback scene where she gets completely naked and reveals that she has no fur on her beaver, Mimi likes to wear a different wig every single day, which can be seen as symbolic of her vapid existence as a constantly changing rootless cosmopolitan. Indeed, in the modern world where no one has any true sense of individuality, physical appearance becomes a means to a sort of pseudo-individuality and Mimi's wigs probably make her feel like a bonafide individualist. When she first met Ratz in college, Mimi managed to convince him to paint an entire large room for her even though they were not dating, thus making her realize that she could trust the pathetic protagonist to do anything for her. Flash forward to November 1999, Mimi calls Ratz out of the blue after having not talked to him for years and asks him to immediately fly to New York City to refurbish her grandmother's basement apartment. Unbeknownst to Ratz, Mimi's Nazi war criminal grandfather is living in the basement and the protagonist is the only one she trusts to not let the cat out of the bag in regard to his big family secret.

Flash back to Ludwigsburg, Mai 1959, a Lithuanian-born Jew named Jonas Shtrom (Ulrich Tukur) that works as a journalist for the Chicago Tribune is giving recorded testimony regarding the extermination of his father and tons of other Jews by an ex-classmate named Algis Munkaitis who went to the same German language high school as him in a town the German-speaking majority called Memel. While Algis was apparently originally a Lithuanian nationalist who respected Jews, Jonas eventually lost contact with him after he changed schools and did not see him again until he came to his apartment years later and rounded up his father and various other Jews to be exterminated. Jonas himself was later rounded up and put in a ghetto where he would see Algis again machine-gunning Jews down during the so-called 'Grossaktion.' As the viewer eventually discovers, Algis is Mimi's grandfather and he has been going by the name Lucas (Itzhak Finzi) ever since fleeing Europe after World War II and moving to the United States where he started a fairly successful fishing business. Unfortunately for 'Lucas,' Jonas spotted him on a TV special about successful Chicago immigrants who had contributed much to their communities and has been trying to get him arrested ever since. Needless to say, Lucas has been hiding ever since Jonas revealed his true identity.

Due to the fact that all the flights from Vienna to NYC are full, Ratz must drive to Munich to catch a flight at a different airport, but before he does, he drops off his cat Alexander—a feline named in tribute to Lenin's Czar-executed bolshevik revolutionary brother—at his alcoholic mother's home. Clearly, one of the reasons Ratz hates his father so much is because he divorced his mother, who turned to dipsomania as a result, and married a vapid whore. Ratz also seems to hate his father because he is jealous that his slutty sister (Franziska Weisz) cares more about their dad than him. As revealed in various repellent scenes, Ratz has deep incestuous feelings for his sister as demonstrated by the fact that he proposes having sex with her and even makes out with her, which she allows for a couple minutes before get thoroughly disgusted. Ironically, despite the fact his grandfather is a Dachau survivor, Ratz will ultimately find a father figure in the form of Nazi war criminal Lucas who, unlike his real father, is not a lying politician, but a man who fully confesses to personally liquidating about a thousand Jews and shows not the least bit of remorse about it.

When Ratz eventually arrives in NYC, he initially refuses to refurbish Mimi's grandfather's room after learning that the man he is supposed to help is a Nazi fugitive and all, but he eventually agrees when his ex(pseudo)girlfriend promises to use her influence to sell his "Kill Daddy, Good Night" videogame. Unfortunately, when Ratz meets with the prospective buyer of the game, the guys reject it and gives the protagonist the rather insulting but oh-so true advice: "I know your generation, you grow up with dross and all that shit...programming all night, smoking weed and cracking code...lonesome cowboys. Get yourself a second life!" adding, "You bring me a game about genocide. A nice fabulous wonderful game about genocide with blood and gore [...] I can package it up all nice and pretty and sell the shit out of it. But your father, come on." Ultimately, a sleazy porn-addicted Hebrew that works at the company that rejected Ratz's game digs a demo copy of "Kill Daddy, Good Night" out of the trash at his work and gives the protagonist a call. Somewhat reluctantly, Ratz agrees to release his game on the guy's website where it soon becomes a hit.

When Ratz first arrives at Mimi's grandparent's house in Long Island, Lucas refuses to talk but once he grows accustomed to the protagonist, he begins chatting him up. By the time Ratz finally finishes renovating the room, the protagonist and Lucas are good friends. Unfortunately, Mimi is not happy with this friendship and reveals to Ratz that she hates her grandfather and then hands him a thick dossier that includes a transcription of Jonas' testimonial regarding Lucas' war crimes. After reading through it and learning his pal apparently killed tons of poor innocent Israelites, Ratz confronts Lucas, who has no problem coming to terms with his past. After stoically confessing that he personally gunned down about a thousand Yids, Lucas proudly states, "I did it of my own free will" and "I believed our extermination of the Jews was part of our struggle for survival...That was my conviction. I wanted to take responsibility for my convictions." When Ratz asks Lucas if he still believes in the National Socialist worldview, he replies, "Yes...but history has decided against us. History has no remorse." After making his confession, Lucas asks Ratz to do him the favor of finding his old Anton Diabelli record and playing it for him since it is Christmas time and he believes the Austrian Romantic composer was responsible for creating the most beautiful Christmas music of all the time. Unfortunately, Ratz soon has to fly back to Vienna because his much hated father has committed suicide. From his stepmother, Ratz learns that his father rarely talked about his emotions but that he once broke down and cried, "I've lost my son." Needless to say, Lucas becomes ashamed of the fact that he is making tons of money off a videogame about killing his father, but being a pansy man-child, he does not even have the testicular fortitude to tell his slimy NYC business partner to take the game offline. In the end, it is obvious that Ratz did not resent his father simply because he was his father but because he was not 'fatherly' enough in that he was a weak and vain man that made a living bullshitting as opposed to living by real masculine principles and ideals that he actually believed in. Apparently, part of the reason Ratz's father killed himself was because he was in so much debt despite giving off the appearance of being filthy rich, thus revealing he was a lying fraud. During the last scene of the film, Ratz changes his "Kill Daddy,

KILL DADDY GOOD NIGHT

Good Night” game into a “Kill Ratz, Good Night” game and then proceeds to virtually kill himself.

Unquestionably, Kill Daddy Good Night is an important and intriguing cinematic work in the sense that it is only one of a handful of films that attempts to explain why the progeny of so-called Generation X and subsequent generation are such weak and pathetic slackers that never quite seem to reach true adulthood. Rather revealingly, the protagonist of the film respects his grandfather and the Nazi war criminal because, unlike his father and himself, they are real men who live by their word and have strong ideals. Although it might not have been the director’s intention, the film depicts the death of masculinity of Europe, especially in the German-speaking world, as a direct result of the defeat of the Third Reich, which is especially made clear in a scene where Nazi war criminal Lucas states, “History has decided against us. History has no remorse.” Notably, the film also makes light of the fact that Jew Jonas lied about some important facts, with the most obvious being that his father was executed from being a Bolshevik and that it was only later that they started killing the rest of the Jews, thus reflecting how world Jewry has reinvented history to fit their own narrative of what is ‘good’ and ‘evil.’ Surely, had Germany won the war, so-called war criminals like Lucas would be considered heroes and certainly no one would care about who Anne Frank was. After all, one man’s genocide is another man’s fight for survival, as reflected in the Israeli’s belief that their ethnic cleansing of Palestinians is a wholly righteous act and that they are the true victims of towel-head terrorism. Ultimately, Jew Jonas is symbolic of not just of how history always manages to catch up with someone, but also the persistent manner in which world Jewry hunts down its enemies until they are destroyed and their ancestor’s are so disgraced to the point of committing suicide or living a loser lifestyle. Indeed, the protagonist of Kill Daddy Good Night might not know it, but his rather misguided ‘quirky’ tendency to name his cats in tribute to Judeo-Bolshevik mass murderer Lenin and his pathological patricidal feelings are the direct result of an anti-European system that seeks to induce such feelings, just as Nazi War criminal Lucas never thought about the people he killed until people started accusing him of being a mass murderer. As indicated in the scene in the film where the videogame company representative tells the protagonist that games about genocide are hot and games about patricide are not, both morality and history are relative and Kill Daddy Good Night is ultimately a rare work that has the glorious gall to highlight that fact. After all, if Uncle Adolf had won the war, it is dubious as to whether the Grand Theft Auto series would exist and that large legions of exceedingly emasculated Occidental men would be lurking in their parents’ basements while wasting sixty hours or more a week playing such morally retarded videogames.

THE SEVENTH CONTINENT

Michael Haneke (1989)

As the years pass, I grow even more disillusioned with the films of Austrian auteur Michael Haneke (Funny Games, Amour) and cannot decide whether or not I hate his work more than I enjoy it, but, at the very least, his cinematic works—for better or worse—act as an ominous and foreboding expression of the (dead) Germanic soul and collective unconscious, which was already quite apparent in the filmmaker's debut feature-length film The Seventh Continent (1989) aka Der siebente Kontinent. To be fair, Haneke already had worked in theatre and made a number of TV movies before his theatrical debut, yet one must admit that The Seventh Continent is a rare example of a novice filmmaker who had already developed a cinematic Weltanschauung for all his films to follow in his decided disdain for bourgeois life, condemnation of the Hollywoodization of Europe, acknowledgement of the existential crisis of the Faustian soul, and uniquely unsentimental and uncompromising depiction regarding the cultural, religious, and social stagnation of the world. Whereas the scatological subversives of Viennese Actionism made it their innately iconoclastic goal to destroy all traditional mores, culture, and religion of Austrian society, Michael Haneke's works act as sort of minimalistic and materialistic postmodern postmortem celluloid autopsies of Austrian society, thus it is only fitting that the filmmaker's first feature The Seventh Continent stagnantly chronicles the slow and grating suicide of a middle-class Austrian family. Taking its title from Australia—the seemingly luxurious and magical continent the ill-fated Austrian family lies about moving to in a letter (they opt for suicide instead)—The Seventh Continent is based on a true story that director Michael Haneke read about in the newspaper. An alarmingly audience-antagonistic film from its intentionally banal beginning to its quasi-anti-climatic climax, The Seventh Continent is essentially a paradoxically penetrating yet prosaic piece of anti-bourgeois aesthetic terrorism created by a self-loathing member of the bourgeois that was carefully crafted to infect the viewer with the same sort of metaphysical misery that eats away the film's characters and, quite arguably, the director himself. A fundamentally anti-Hollywood work that acts as a sort of anti-escapism to the celluloid escapism of capitalistic culture-distorters like Steven Spielberg and even Quentin Tarantino, The Seventh Continent is essentially semi-abstract celluloid preaching without words that somewhat sadistically slaps the viewer across the face with the more than bitter and never sweet taste of reality, but never offers answers for the crisis of the modern Occidental world. The first chapter in Michael Haneke's "Glaciation Trilogy" (which was followed with Benny's Video (1992) and 71 Fragments of a Chronology of Chance (1994)), The Seventh Continent is nothing less than the first big statement by the filmmaker on the Austrian apocalypse, which was essentially prophesized by Austrian commie-feminist Jewess novelist/playwright El-friede Jelinek and followed by associated filmmakers Franz Novotny (Exit... But No Panic, Die Ausgesperrten aka The Excluded), Paulus Manker (Schmutz aka Dirt, Weiningers Nacht aka Weininger's Last Night), Ulrich Seidl (Dog Days aka Hundstage, Import/Export), and Michael Glawogger (Slumming, Whores' Glory).

Divided into three chronological parts (1987, 1988, 1989), The Seventh Continent follows the slow burning and marvelously monotonous self-destruction of the Austrian middle-class Schober family from Linz comprised of a husband Georg (Dieter Berner), wife Anna (Birgit Doll) and young grade school daughter Evi (Leni Tanzer). By the end of the film, the entire family will be dead after the parents decide to kill their daughter—a brunette Heather O'Rourke-look-alike—and subsequently themselves after existence becomes unbearable for these individuals suffering from sort of ungodly and all-consuming existential hell of no return. They may hate their lives but the Schobers are certainly not losers but an upstanding and seemingly normal middle-class family, as George is an engineer and Anna is an optician who co-owns an eye doctor business with her brother. Like most Haneke films, The Seventh Continent begins with a slow start where the viewer rarely gets a glance of the characters face for about the first 30 minutes of the film, only focusing on the banality and robotic-like nature of their devastatingly ordinary day-to-day lives, including riding through car washes (the very first scene in the film), brushing their teeth, making/eating breakfasting, doing homework and other daily rituals. The signs of familial meltdown are illustrated in minor moments of melodrama, including mother/wife Anna having an emotional breakdown while riding in a car through a carwash and daughter Evi lying to her teacher that she has randomly turned blind in what is undoubtedly a cry out for help to her optometrist mother that ultimately ends in further distancing and coldness between mother and daughter. After Anna learns about Evi's lie, she confronts her daughter, asking her, "Look at me. Come on, tell me, did you pretend to be blind? Come on, tell me. I just want to know the truth. Come on. Don't be afraid, I won't hurt you. Is it true? Did you pretend to be blind?" but when the little lady admits the truth, her mother maliciously smacks her in the face, thus further dividing the two. In another telling family moment, Anna's brother Alexander (Udo Samel), who has previously stayed at a mental institution due to his debilitating depression, eats dinner with the family and, for seemingly no reason, begins to cry in what seems to be, aside from a cry out for help, an impotent expression of a man who knows something is not quite right with his sister's family and feels totally powerless to help. Undoubtedly, powerlessness, impotency, and soullessness in the face of a contrived and seemingly pointless bourgeois existence ultimately seem the biggest contributing factors for the characters' inevitable self-designated date with death.

In the third segment of The Seventh Continent, which is set in 1989 and comprises the largest segment of the film, the Schober family leaves husband Georg's parents' house and proceeds with the narration of a rather strange letter written by Georg the next day regarding him and his wife's whimsical decision to quit their jobs, empty their bank accounts, sell their cars, and to ostensibly head to Australia to live a life of luxury. Of course, the letter is really a suicide letter and instead of going to Australia, the family eats a rather large feast in possible tribute to Marco Ferreri's La Grande Bouffe (1973) and proceeds to destroy everything they have worked their entire lives to earn, including shredding all their records/LPs, smashing a large fish tank and killing the fish in the process, and flushing all their money down the toilet (including pocket change), thus demonstrating how all these material possessions were ultimately meaningless to them in the long run and that they could never fill the spiritual/emotional void that is a comfortable bourgeois life. Since daughter Evi admits to her parents that she is not afraid, the parents decide to end her life as well (although she does not take the killing of the family fish well), with Georg writing to his father in the suicide letter, "There's only our little Eva left and we wondered for a long time if we'd take her with us or if it was better to leave her with you. As you can imagine, Mom, and certainly you too, dear Dad, our decision caused us both heartache and headaches because even though we're sure of what's best for us, it's something else entirely to decide the fate of the one we love above all else..." While (symbolically?) watching a concert performance of Amero-Kraut-Jew Jennifer Rush's "The Power of Love," Evi's parents feed her poison in a cup and the poor little girl states, "Dear Jesus, let me be a good girl so I can go to heaven" before she dies in a fashion not unlike that of the Goebbels children. After that, Anna kills herself the same way (ultimately going out with a death rattle) and fallen family man George follows, but scrawls on the wall names, date, and time of death of all three family members before he seals the deal on the family's freakish collective self-slaughter. The Seventh Continent concludes with the following 'post-game wrap up': "The S. [Schober] family was found on January 17, 1989. Subsequent to a request from the wife's worried brother, the door of the apartment was knocked down. On February 20, the family was buried. In spite of the letter left for the parents, they refused to believe it was a suicide and filed a murder complaint against Parties Unknown. The police investigation following up on this suspicion was without results. The matter was filed as an unsolved case."

In describing The Seventh Continent and his rationale for creating it, director Michael Haneke stated the following, "Every day we read stories about family tragedies. Every day families take pleasure in their alienation, contenting themselves with information and a life on the cheap. Every day they have less to decide about and hate themselves for their fear. Every day they suffer more from their lives. Every day many of them wear themselves out fighting this fact. Every day they speak less and laugh louder. Every day they become more perfect."

Every day the gap widens between human beings. Every day they feel they need to make a decision in order to be able to breathe. This film is a chronicle, an account of these decisions. It does not intend to bear any judgment. It knows no answers. It questions the causes.” Indeed, luckily Haneke does not have any sort of outmoded Marxist answer, even if the ‘causes’ were probably similar to those that inspired West German students to rebel in 1968 and terrorism to become vogue not long after. Personally, I do not think Haneke is willing to accept why Austria, like much of Europe, has become such a culturally vapid and soulless place that inspires people to commit suicide because it would force the director accept the fact that Germanic national kultur, customs, and religion essentially ended in 1945. In the filmmaker’s later anti-Heimatfilm The White Ribbon (2009), Haneke stereotypically portrays a traditional religious Germanic upbringing as exceedingly evil, but such cultural ingredients were the things that made things worth living for people in the past. Like the Hollywood films and bourgeois culture Haneke cinematically condemns, the director’s films, not least of all The Seventh Continent, are lacking in soul and spirituality, thus making them every bit a symptom of the same degenerate cultural malaise, albeit minus the entertainment value.

It is very telling regarding a filmmaker and his outlook on his native middle-class when his characters only become interesting and remarkable when they opt for committing suicide, as if only in their tragic deaths do the Schober family of The Seventh Continent derive meaning from their pitiful lives, but I guess that is Haneke’s message (or lack thereof). Featuring a number of (intentionally) unbearably long scenes, including a still shot of the Schobers flushing their money down the toilet (sorry Haneke, but I did not find the scene to be taboo/terrifying, but just banal), The Seventh Continent is essentially Haneke’s would-be-ingenious way of letting everyone know that he has more insights about the capitalist west than any Hollywood director as a morally superior nihilist prophet who surely knows how to criticize in an exceedingly smug manner, but ultimately has no answers as he has stated himself in his quote, “My films are intended as polemical statements against the American ‘barrel down’ cinema and its dis-empowerment of the spectator. They are an appeal for a cinema of insistent questions instead of false (because too quick) answers, for clarifying distance in place of violating closeness, for provocation and dialogue instead of consumption and consensus.” Of course, Rainer Werner Fassbinder did not have many answers either, but he had many insights and certainly knew how to entertain, even when driving a figurative stack into the viewer’s heart, which I certainly cannot say the same about Haneke. Compare The Seventh Continent to the similarly themed Der Kopf des Mohren (1995) aka The Moor’s Head (which Haneke wrote the screenplay for and was originally supposed to direct) and one gets a good idea of Haneke’s innate soullessness as a heckling yet paradoxically pedantic auteur who thinks he knows the truth, but probably knows less about life and human nature than the average cop, serial killer, or failed Austrian artist turned politician.

Michael Haneke (2001)

Over the years, while my appreciation for Austrian auteur Michael Haneke (Funny Games, Amour) has waned, my respect for Isabelle Huppert has steadily increased to a degree I would have though unimaginable before, so I decided the other day that there was no time better than now to re-watch La Pianiste (2001) aka The Piano Teacher, which I had somewhat mixed feelings towards when I first watched the film about a decade ago or so. After re-watching the film just the other day, I now realize that I did not originally like Huppert because she is so believable in her portrayal as a fiercely frigid bourgeois bitch that it actually made me develop a dislike for her as a person (which is certainly a good indication of how talented she is as an actress), but after seeing her in a variety of eclectic roles in films directed by master filmmakers like Marco Ferreri's Storia di Piera (1983) aka The Story of Piera, Werner Schroeter's Malina (1991) and Deux (2002) aka Two, Benoît Jacquot's Yukio Mishima adaptation L'École de la chair (1998) aka The School of Flesh, and Claire Denis' White Material (2009), among various other different works, my opinion has changed drastically. As for Elfriede Jelinek—a Viennese mischling playwright and novelist whose work Die Klavierspielerin (1983) Haneke's film is adapted from—I find her to be an insufferable bitch whose life and work would surely make for a great case study in Richard von Krafft-Ebing's classic text Psychopathia Sexualis, thus it is intriguing to see Huppert more or less channel her in The Piano Teacher. Indeed, Jelinek, who is a commie feminist that once petitioned for the release of misogynistic Austrian serial killer/Ulli Lommel lookalike Jack Unterweger (who was released and subsequently went on a murdering spree), based her novel on her own personal experiences as a failed pianist with a deranged mother who pushed her to become a musical wunderkind of sorts. Undoubtedly, after watching The Piano Teacher, which is apparently much tamer than the novel, I can certainly see why Jelinek is so screwed up that when she was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 2004, she refused to accept the prize in person due to suffering from agoraphobia, social phobia, and related anxiety issues. Additionally, Jelinek has been married for over thirty years yet strangely she is childless and has never lived with her husband (who lives in Munich). For better or worse, Haneke's film features one of the creepiest and most grotesque mother-daughter relationships in cinema history, not to mention the fact that Ms. Huppert has never looked so brazenly bitchy yet simultaneously disturbingly pathetic. While oftentimes described as an 'erotic thriller' or 'dark romance,' The Piano Teacher is anything but arousing, unless you get off to botched orgasms, middle-aged momma girls mutilating their labia and barfing during blowjobs, and sadomasochistic mother-daughter incest, among various other forms of sad and debasing sexual dysfunction. I have to confess that after my recent viewing of the film, I have more pity than hatred for its source writer because if the film is even marginally accurate in its depiction of Jelinek's life and psyche then one would be just plain cruel to hate her, even if she has retarded political beliefs and uses her influence as a literary figure to taint her homeland's reputation on an international level.

The Piano Teacher begins with the eponymous quasi-anti-heroine Erika Kohut (Isabelle Huppert)—a failed piano virtuoso who teaches at the Vienna Conservatory—coming home from a night out and having her exceedingly invasive mother (Annie Girardot of Luchino Visconti's Rocco and His Brothers (1960) and Marco Ferreri's Dillinger Is Dead (1969)) grab her bag and self-righteously declare "Magnificent... Exactly as I thought" upon finding a new dress inside. In no time, a bourgeois bitch fight that involves the pulling of hair ensues after Erika's mother senselessly tears her much cherish new piece of clothing. Practically a minute or two after the fight has ended, things go back to normal for the two discernibly co-dependent dames and they act as if there was never was a fight, with Erika's mother proclaiming, "That's how it is... We're are hot-blooded family," as if their mutually abusive behavior is normal and completely justifiable. As hinted throughout the film, Erika's mother, like many women who have lost their husband, has completely taken over her daughter's life, turned her into a sort of surrogate spouse, and uses her as both an emotional punch-bag and security blanket. Despite the fact she has her own private room, Erika sleeps in her mother's bed as if she is her lover/husband, thus hinting at an incestuous lesbian relationship that seems all the more confirmed by the fact that neither woman has a lover. A whacked out woman who practically carries around her daughter's pussy around in her purse, Erika's mother forced her to devote her entire life to becoming a great pianist and still suffers the delusion that her not-so-little-girl will become famous one day even though she is already in her late-30s and makes her living teaching and performing at lame parities for annoyingly banal wine-sniffers and other upper-middleclass rabble who both women clearly loathe. Indeed, because of her mother's lifelong control over her, Erika has no life of her own as a barren and assumedly virginal middle-age woman of the rather sexually repressed sort who has nil friends or romantic partners. Needless to say, when a handsome young man comes into her life and will not take no for an answer after her incessant rebuffing of his romantic gestures, Erika's begins to feel deep passion for one of the first times in her life, but of course things eventually take a nasty turn for the worst in the end that confirm that the protagonist is condemned to a loser life of perennial loneliness and cuckoldry to her similarly miserable mommy.

When Erika performs at a party for a pedantic musical instrument collector named Dr. George Blonskij (Udo Samel of Haneke's The Seventh Continent (1989) and Martin Walz's Ralf König adaptation Killer Condom (1996)), she finds herself to be the object of unwanted adoration from the host's handsome 17-year-old nephew Walter Klemmer (Benoît Magimel of Mathieu Kassovitz's La Haine (1995) and Claude Chabrol's The Flower of Evil (2003)), who is a rather talented dilettante pianist who rather respects the protagonist's talents, even if he also has a compulsion to get in her panties. After Erika performs, Walter immediately approaches her and asks, "I hope it's not too forward of me to kiss the hand that plays such Bach," but his lips barely touch her skin before she pulls her hand away and asks him in a rather bitchy fashion, "You can stop now. Where do you get such unfashionable enthusiasm?," to which he enthusiastically replies, "I'm delighted the tradition of recitals lives on. It was practically extinct. The masters die, then their music. People today only ever listen to pop or rock." Aside from Franz Schubert, Erika's favorite composer is Robert Schumann who, like her father, ended up in a mental institution. When Erika brings up a quote by kosher commie Adorno about Schumann's descent into madness and Walter replies, "You talk about things as if they were yours. It's rare... And I think you know it," the protagonist defensively replies, "Schubert and Schumann are my favorites, that's all. Since my father died completely mad in Steinhof asylum, I can talk easily about the twilight of the mind, can't I?" Unfortunately for both of them, Walter does not take the hint from Erika's remark that she is not exactly quite right in the head and instead decides he will stop at nothing to sexually ravage her. As a handsome and highly extroverted young mensch of the tall and blond-haired sort, Walter is not used to getting rebuffed and seems to enjoy the challenge of attempting to swoon a woman as frigid, passive-aggressive, and seemingly soulless as Erika, but he really has no clue what he is getting into.

THE PIANO TEACHER

While Erika might not have anything resembling a real sex life, she gets manages to get her carnal kicks in a variety of radically repellant and even sometimes horrific ways that include sniffing cum-covered tissues while watching four-screen porno flicks in peepshow booths, mutilating her vagina with a straight razor, and performing particularly perverse exhibitionistic acts like squatting down and urinating while watching young couples have sex in their cars at drive-in movie theaters (notably, a young man catches her doing this while he is making love to his girlfriend and attempts to chase her down while screaming, "Stay there, you cunt"). Of course, Erika's foul fetishes indicate that it is less than likely that she will be sexually compatible with a suave gentleman like Walter, who will inevitably discover that his crush is a carnal creep who repels him. Ultimately, Walter decides to put off his studies as an engineer major to try out for the exam for the piano master-class that Erika teaches. While her words and facial expressions certainly say otherwise, it becomes apparent that Erika begins falling for Walter during his exam performance, as his talent and charm arouse her, though she is somewhat turned off by his arrogance. While every single one of her colleagues is impressed with Walter's performance during the exam and vote for his acceptance into the program, Erika complains, "...frankly, I find his histrionics suspicious or even unpleasant" and shocks her co-worker by voting against him. Of course, Walter is accepted into the master-class and during his first private lesson with Erika he confesses that he had no interest in the program and only tried out because he is in love with her, stating to her, "I fought to win your attention. Give me a chance. I know you're not as indifferent as you pretend." While Erika threatens to end their session if he does not stop attempting to vie for her affection, the protagonist literally stalks Walter after class and watches him as he plays hockey with a team he belongs to. Indeed, it seems that, as far as sex and romance are concerned, Erika is completely autistic and a hopeless case, as she obviously yearns for love and affection but lacks the capacity to accept and embrace these things. Indeed, as the daughter of a decidedly deranged and institutionalized daddy and a hateful and highly abusive unhinged monster, Erika only knows emotional negligence and torment and surely has a hard time accepting the fact that a handsome and charming fellow who is young enough to be her son wants to jump her bones.

In a subplot that was not in the source novel that is meant to emphasize the sick relationship between the protagonist and her mother, Erika teaches a young dorky/Jew-y teenage girl named Anna Schober (Anna Sigalevitch) who clearly reminds her of herself when she was younger and even has a mom that is just as ruthless as her own in her pursuit to make her daughter a musical wunderkind. While Erika initially seems somewhat empathetic to Anna's pathetic plight due to their shared love of Schubert and mutual slavery to their malicious megalomaniac mothers, that all completely changes when the protagonist becomes jealous of the sub-homely teen when Walter dares to display kindness to the ugly duckling and comforts her during a rehearsal where she suffers an emotional breakdown due to a bad case of diarrhea. As punishment for wallowing in Walter's attention, Erika smashes a glass cup and then places the broken pieces in Anna's coat pocket, thus causing the rather neurotic teen to cut her hand up so bad that she has to temporarily give up playing piano. Ultimately, Walter realizes what Erika has done and why and instead of being disgusted with her behavior, it turns him on as it demonstrates to him that she has affection for him, so he follows her into a women's bathroom and then forces her to kiss him after putting his head over the bathroom stall. While Erika reciprocates Walter's passionate kisses, she soon demands that she be in control of the situation by not allowing him to touch her while she jerks him off while making demands like, "Look at me, not your penis." Needless to say, sexually aroused extrovert Walter finds the entire situation totally intolerable, especially after Erika tells him that she will write him letter describing what she wants him to do to her instead of allowing him to plow her puss right then and there during the heat of the moment. After giving him some less than pleasurable seeming head, Erika refuses to allow Walter to relieve himself by masturbating and instead treats him like a bad little boy. Still, Walter is glad knowing that he will finally get the opportunity to defile Erika and he celebrates by skipping up and down out upon exiting the women's bathroom like a happy school boy.

THE PIANO TEACHER

The next time Walter comes to his lesson, Erika acts as if their recent botched make-out session never happened and spends a good portion of their time berating his piano schools while resentfully mocking his good looks and piano-playing, sadiſtically ſtating, “Schubert’s dynamics range from scream to whisper not loud to ſoft. Anarchy hardly ſeems your forte. Why not ſtick to Clementi? Schubert was quite ugly. Did you know? With your looks, nothing can ever hurt you.” When Walter attempts to kiſs her, Erika ſuffers ſome ſort of terrible psychosomatic cough and then hands her ‘beau’ a letter containing the ſexual acts ſhe wants him to perform on her. After claſs, Walter follows Erika back home like a loſt puppy and lets her know that he will not take no for an answer, ſo the protagonist reluctantly brings him in her apartment while her busybody bitch of a mother complains and attempts to aſk a bunch of invasive queſtions. After entering her room and blocking her door with a piece of furniture ſo that he mother cannot get it, Erika demands that Walter read her letter, which is many pages long, after he attempts to fuck her. Needless to ſay, when Walter reads the letter and diſcovers that Erika wants him to, “gag me with ſome ſtockings I will have ready. Stuff them in ſo hard that I’m incapable of making any ſound. Next, take off the blindfold, pleaſe, and ſit down on my face and punch me in the ſtomach to force me to thruſt my tongue in your behind,” he iſ left ſpeechleſs and finally aſks her, “Iſ this ſuppoſed to be ſerious? You’re juſt making fun of me, aren’t you?” Erika replies by ſimply pulling out a ſmall box from under her bed and pulling out objects from it, including a maſk and rope, that more or leſs amount to a rape kit. Erika iſ ſo clueleſs about the dubious nature of her perversity that ſhe thinks Walter iſ more concerned with the literary quality of her letter than her ſexual derangement, ultimately defending herſelf in a ſomewhat aſurd manner by ſtating, “I am a pianist, not a poet. After all, love iſ built on banal things.” At this point, Erika becomes deſperately pathetic, telling Walter that ſhe iſ willing to be his ſlave by ſtating, “For now on, you give the orders,” but the only thing he can ſay iſ, “You’re ſick. You need treatment.” When Erika requeſts that Walter hit her, he hatefully reſponds, “No one would touch your ſort, even with gloves on,” throws her letter on the floor, and then adds, “I ſwear I loved you. You don’t even know what it iſ. Right now, you repulſe me.” After that, Walter ſays “fuck it” like ſome lowlife wigger and leaves the apartment.

After Walter leaves, Erika reaches an all-time low in terms of her ſexual inſanity and beſtially attempts to ‘rape’ her own mother that ſame night while they are in bed together, aſ if ſhe has deluded herſelf into believing that her mommy iſ the only one that will poſſibly fuck her ſince ſhe was turned down earlier that night. Like with Walter, Erika fills her mother with ſenſe of revulſion and diſguſt. Of course, the miſerable old woman fails to realize that her daughter’s ſexual derangement iſ largely the reſult of the way ſhe raised her through her hatred towards men (eſpecially Erika’s father) and physical and emotional abuſe. Although it ſeems ſomewhat aſurd that Erika deſperately ſeeks the attention of her sadistic mother after being rejected by Walter, the protagonist's deep desire to receive love and affection from her abusive progenitor is actually quite typical of socially dysfunctional individuals with romance problems as they oftentimes go back to the parents that are directly responsible for their self-destructive behavior and relationship problems. After her failed attempt to get in her mother's panties, Erika disturbingly brags like a toddler, "I saw the hairs on your sex," thus reflecting her infantile sexuality. The next day, Erika creeps Walter out by showing up at one of his hockey matches unannounced and embarrassing him in front of his friends. No longer the perennially callous cunt that everyone knows her as, Erika becomes pathetically desperate and repeatedly declares her love to Walter while trying in vain to get him to screw her in a locker-room closet but he is disgusted by her. Eventually, Walter gives and inserts his cock in her mouth and fucks it like it is a pussy, but Erika cannot handle it for some reason (maybe she is allergic to dick?) and proceeds to vomit all over the place, thus inspiring the teen to tell her, "You know, you really stink? Sorry, you stink so much, no one will ever come close to you. You'd better leave town until you don't stink so bad. Rinse your mouth more often, not just when my cock makes you puke." Needless to say, at this point Erika decides to flee the hockey rink and even humorously runs across the ice to get out as soon as she can.

Just as she requested in the letter, Walter decides to come by Erika's apartment late that night to rape her, but the piano teacher ultimately proves she was all talk and too much of a coward to embrace her masochistic tendencies. Indeed, after locking Erika's blabbering mother in a room, Walter proceeds to slap his lunatic 'lover' around while quoting from her letter to reassure her that he is doing everything that she asked him to. Instead of enjoying the slaps and kicks that she so obsessively fantasized, Erika immediately cries and begs Walter to stop, which only infuriates the teen as he cannot understand what he is doing wrong. Ultimately, Walter slowly 'deflowers' (the viewer assumes she is still a virgin) Erika while she lies on the floor like she is dead. While Walter even attempts to be gentle, sensitive, and caring with Erika while they 'make love,' she maintains a face of abject horror as if she is in a quasi-comatose state as a result of a traumatic experience, like being gang-raped by a group of outlaws bikers. When Walter finally finishes what is quite possibly the most awkward and anti-erotic sex scene in all of cinema history, he borderline threatens Erika to tell anyone about the quasi-rape session by stating, "I'd appreciate it if you tell no one. Anyhow, it's for your own good. You can't humiliate a man that way and...it's not possible." The next day, Erika sees Walter with his family and friends at a concert hall where she is scheduled to play and he acts as if nothing has happened between them, stating to her while smiling in an exceedingly enthusiastic fashion, "My respects, Professor. I can't wait to hear you play." In a darkly hilarious scenario that seems to reflect the protagonist's pathological protective need to hurt herself before anyone else can hurt her worse, Erika reacts to Walter's remark by making a goofy face of abject disgust and then stabbing herself in the shoulder with a butcher knife when no one is around. Instead of performing, Erika leaves the concert hall alone while blood is seeping through her shirt.

As far as I am concerned, Isabelle Huppert and her young co-star Benoît Magimel deserve most of the credit for the potency and intensity of The Piano Teacher, which stands in stark contrast to Michael Haneke's mostly banal directing techniques, lackluster pacing, sterile shot composition, and overall 'antimise-en-scène' approach to filmmaking. In fact, I would go so far as to say that Haneke's 'glacial' direction helped to underscore the quality of the acting, which is totally unrivaled as far as repression-based female neurosis is concerned. One can only assume that Haneke belongs to the Jean-Marie Straub school of filmmaking where he considers anything even remotely entertaining to be supposedly 'fascistic' (which is the way Straub absurdly described Fassbinder's later films). Undoubtedly, The Piano Teacher is just one of Haneke's many films where he demonstrates his undying hatred for his own social class in a sort of self-righteous sneering fashion that intentionally seeks to discomfort and disturb the viewer, hence the implementation of humor during rather dark and disgusting scenes. Of course, somewhat ironically considering the nature of her character, it is only through Huppert and some of the actors' performances does the film have any degree of humanity. Admittedly, I once knew a girl with serious 'mommy issues' and she, not unlike Huppert's character in the film, had such extreme fantasies that she was pen pals with various incarcerated rapist serial killers and even once coerced her boyfriend to break into her house at a random time, beat the shit out of her, and 'rape' her. Whether she enjoyed this 'mock rape' or not, I am not sure but it was clear to me that this friend's self-destructive perversity was the direct result of a cold and negligent mother who warped her sense of sexuality at a young age. Any way, I bring up this friend to illustrate that, at least as far as I am concerned, The Piano Teacher is fairly authentic in terms of its uniquely ugly depiction of the long-term fruits of matriarchal abuse on a woman.

It should be noted that The Piano Teacher is not the first (and probably not the last) Elfriede Jelinek cinematic adaptation. In fact, I would argue that the rarely-seen made-for-TV work Die Ausgesperrten (1982) aka The Excluded directed Austrian cult auteur Franz Novotny (Exit... But No Panic, Exit II - Transfigured Night), which is not only based on Jelinek's novel Die Ausgesperrten (1980) aka Wonderful, Wonderful Times but also features the novelist in a somewhat humorous cameo role as a school teacher in what would ultimately be her first and last screen performance, is more faithful to the book than Haneke's film. On top of that, Jelinek penned the script for Werner Schroeter's Ingeborg Bachmann adaptation Malina (1991) starring Isabelle Huppert. Of course, I am sure that both Jelinek and Haneke had Huppert in mind for The Piano Teacher after watching Schroeter's film, which also deal with female neurosis and sexual dysfunction, albeit this time depicted from the perspective of a woman with deleterious daddy issues instead of mommy issues. Any way, I have to confess that I now regard The Piano Teacher as one of Haneke's greatest accomplishments and I say that as someone that is disgusted by the idea of a German-language novel being adapted into a French-language film, which was ultimately a small price to pay to have Huppert play the eponymous lead in what is arguably the crowning role of her entire career.

FUNNY GAMES

Michael Haneke (2008)

I usually get disgusted when I find out that a foreign director had decided to remake his own film so that illiterate Americans can watch a film without the difficulty of having to read subtitles. Usually the product is a cheap imitation of the director's original work that loses most of its original artistic integrity. Michael Haneke's remake of Funny Games is an exception to the rule. The 2008 version of Funny Games is a shot-for-shot remake of Haneke's 1997 Austrian film. What makes the remake of Funny Games interesting is the new cast for the film. Funny Games opens up with a cliché and stale upper middle class family driving on their way to what one can assume to be an outdoors vacation. This scene looks like some sort of car commercial to convince some bourgeois that to have the ideal life they need the ideal car. The family in the car looks content, clean, and without worry. The family lives a life that is ultimately contrived. Despite their happiness, something seems not quite right with the family. Finally, the title "Funny Games" appears on the screen and very deranged music plays. It becomes obvious that this family is about to have their ideal life taken off course. Anyone that has seen the original Austrian version of Funny Games will obviously know what to expect with the remake. However, the acting performances in the remake were much more effective for me. Unlike a lot of people, I am not put off or offended by the German language. The fact that the original Funny Games was an Austrian (Uncle Adolf's homeland) production and in German might scare some. I found the less aggressive American English accents to be more effective with Funny Games. What better killers than two young soft-spoken men such as Michael Pitt and Brady Corbet. Pitt and Corbet were possibly the best choice as the two charming killers featured in Funny Games. I found the lead killer in the Austrian version of Funny Games to be a believable killer. He has a certain ugly look about him that made me believe that he could have been some type of guard at a Bolshevik Gulag. Michael Pitt and Brady Corbet, on the other hand, look like they should be teaching grade school children at some summer bible camp. The fact that these seemingly harmless and weak young men could easily play with and kill a sheltered bourgeois family can be very unsettling for most people. Michael Haneke demonstrates that in their soulless lives, the ideal "American" family doesn't even have the ability to put up a fight against two weak and mild mannered young men. With the Funny Games remake, Michael Haneke was able to do some fine tuning with a change of actors. Every fellow American I have talked with about Funny Games showed an irrational hatred of the film. Although they cannot articulate why they hate the film, they show their hatred by waving their fists and yelling obscenities. I feel that Funny Games is a good film for America and one that should be studied by the bourgeois. After all, Tyrone and Jose aren't nearly as nice as Michael Pitt and Brady Cornet.

THE WHITE RIBBON
THE WHITE RIBBON

Michael Haneke (2009)

After what seemed to be endless postponement, I finally grabbed the devil by the horns and watched Michael Haneke's black and white masterpiece The White Ribbon. Indeed, only 5 minutes after watching the film, I can say without doubt that The White Ribbon is Haneke's cinematic masterwork. For once, an undeniable masterpiece has also been critically acclaimed on an international level. The White Ribbon won the Palme d'Or at the 2009 Cannes film festival, on top of winning the Best Foreign Language Film at the 2010 67th Golden Globe Awards. Michael Haneke had been working on The White Ribbon for over a decade, originally intending to produce the project as an Austrian television mini-series. Thankfully, Michael Haneke decided to direct The White Ribbon as a feature-length film, especially when you consider the bold and traditionally European aesthetic it ingeniously radiates, which would have probably been lost in a made-for-television format. One of my main issues with Haneke's earlier work is that most of these films are aesthetically dull. After all, I love both Funny Games films because of the psychological warfare Haneke stuns you with, as well as the brilliant acting performances; not because they are beautiful (far from it) films. In The White Ribbon, Michael Haneke once again returns to violence, but this time with a classic and charming twist.

Kiss the hand that beats you.

The White Ribbon cinematographer Christian Berger was nominated for Best Cinematographer at the Academy Awards. Although Berger did not receive an Academy Award for the rich and breathtaking cinematography that he painstakingly contributed to The White Ribbon, the Austrian cinematographer would later receive the award from the American Society of Cinematographers. It was no revelation for me to find out that Christian Berger carefully studied the work of Ingmar Bergman's greatest cinematographer Sven Nykvist in preparation for shooting The White Ribbon. Shot in time-honored black and white 35mm film, The White Ribbon permeates the keen kind of artistic integrity that is commonly associated with the European masterpieces of yesteryear; without feeling like another failed postmodern period piece. Taking cues from Stanley Kubrick's Barry Lyndon, various scenes in The White Ribbon were shot merely using oil lamps and candles. The White Ribbon, being a film full of brooding intrigue and a dark metaphysical underbelly that lurks throughout, touches you in a way comparable to the devil evoking a tingling in your soul. My only complaint with the film is that it should have concluded with a title card featuring both the director and cinematographer of the film, the two true artists of this grand cinematic achievement. After all, the artistic partnership of director Orson Welles and cinematographer Gregg Toland was candidly recognized at the conclusion of Citizen Kane.

The White Ribbon is set in a fictional protestant Northern German village named Eichwald, right before the first World War. From the onset of the film, one realizes there is something of a Luciferian character hiding amongst the shadows of this seemingly pleasant village. The White Ribbon is narrated by an unnamed elderly tailor who reluctantly recollects his memories as an idealistic young school teacher that taught the children of Eichwald. The unquestionable dictators of Eichwald are three men: The baron, the pastor, and the doctor. After all, Germany is the Fatherland and these three men are symbolic of how the Germany empire was run. Of course, the three leaders of Eichwald are tyrannical authoritarians that reject all forms of criticism and severely punish disobedient offenders. Being a post-World War II Austrian filmmaker, Michael Haneke follows in the typical contemporary fashion of negatively portraying the father figure, as well as brandishing the violent nature of male supremacy. I recently read German sociologist Klaus Theweleit's two volume Magnus Opus Male Fantasies, a psychoanalytic assault on the position and traditions of German men. Just like Theweleit purports in Male Fantasies, the German alpha-males featured in The White Ribbon treat their women as objects used only for reproduction and pleasure. For example, during a very symbolic scene in The White Ribbon, a baroness expresses her desire to leave her husband. After expressing her love for another man, the Baron simply asks his wife if they have had sex, completely ignoring the Baroness's wholehearted admittance of venerating someone else. The small village in The White Ribbon is like Nazi Germany in a vacuum; symbolically foreshadowing the supreme dictator that will one day rule Germany - the "father of fathers" - Adolf Hitler. Like the people of Nazi Germany, the villagers featured in The White Ribbon are willing to look the other way in regards to murder and brutality, as long as the father (Uncle Adolf) impetrates such demands.

The White Ribbon has another quality that is quite rare in any movie; brilliant acting performances by talented intuitive children. Not since I first saw The Night of the Hunter, have I been exposed to a group of children that exhibit such depth and range in their acting performances as the kids featured in The White Ribbon. I especially enjoyed a heartwarming scene in the film where an inquisitive 4 year old boy asks his sister about death and what it means. This same happy 4 year old later blazingly expresses his sadness when he realizes his perverted father is abusing his sister. Throughout The White Ribbon, the behavioral influences of the father is shown in the cruel behavior of their children. The bestial punishment given by a puritanical pastor is later passed on in another form by his deranged progeny. The cold stares and vindictive attributes of the pastor's children put Macaulay Culkin's ridiculous performance in The Good Son to shame. In Benny's Video, Michael Haneke banally captured the absurdist homicidal ramifications that can occur after being desensitized via a pig slaughtering home video; certainly something that I did not buy, hence why

THE WHITE RIBBON

I felt the film was a failure. With The White Ribbon, Michael Haneke was finally able to capture the very real and tenable origin of violence in most young children; authoritarian corporal punishment. After all, those children needed to be hardened during their critical years so they could eventually fight in both World Wars. Nowadays, the Israelis and Arab terrorists teach their children from virtual infancy to love battle and highly regard war. Who knows, maybe the collective passivity that now reigns in the Occident is a direct result of contemporary European parents abstaining from domestic corporal punishment. The parent inflicted violence featured in The White Ribbon may be pastiche, but it was also the traditional order that held Germany families together, even before the days of Tacitus's Germania. At the most fundamental level, The White Ribbon reveals that the good old days were not exactly the apt of days, but at least they delineated some kind ordnung.

ELEVATOR GIRLS IN BONDAGE

Michael Kalmen (1972)

The exceedingly putrid psychedelic drag queen troupe The Cockettes are indubitably one of the most aesthetically displeasing collectives of quasi-humans in humanoid history, but members of the culturally malicious group did manage to star in a couple worthwhile flicks, including the spoof Tricia's Wedding (1971), which spoofed Richard Nixon's daughter's wedding ceremony by adding LSD and flagrant fags to the mix, as well as the Kenneth Anger-esque arthouse flick Luminous Procuree (1971) directed by Steven Arnold (The Liberation of Man-nique Mechanique, Messages, Messages), yet Elevator Girls in Bondage (1972) directed by Michael Kalmen is indubitably their most accessible cinematic work, even if it is not their greatest. An absurdly amateurish celluloid work that wallows in its own cinematic incompetency as part of the 'big joke' that is its celluloid low-campiness, Elevator Girls in Bondage, as one would probably infer from the rather ridiculously risqué Meyer-esque title, is an exploitation work that actually transcends to the level of stupid surrealist pornography, featuring a number of ambiguous genitals in various states of arousal, including swarthy cocks busting loads on famous paintings. An aesthetically abhorrent tranny Marxist spoof of capitalism and heterosexuality, Elevator Girls in Bondage (1972) is also the virtual cinematic adversary to Women In Revolt (1971) directed by Paul Morrissey and produced Andy Warhol, and as members of the Cockettes admitted in the somewhat recent documentary The Cockettes (2002) directed by Bill Weber and David Weissman, the West Coast weirdoes in drag were not exactly too keen on the Factory trannies as they found their attitudes to be a bit too prissy, pompous, and less than positive. With its curiously crude commie cock-sucking and cast of radically retarded Trotskyite trannies, Elevator Girls in Bondage is thankfully a celluloid work so lecherous and ludicrous in its poofter political persuasion that it manages to marvelously discredit any sort of scathing sociopolitical message it autistically attempts to make, but not in such a penetrating fashion as self-described 'right-winger' Paul Morrissey's intentionally anti-leftist work Women In Revolt, a farcical film where "leftist liberation" ends in scatological self-sacrifice of the excess-ridden enslaving sort. Like the ungodly hippie homo celluloid hate-child of Andy Milligan and John Waters, Elevator Girls in Bondage is campy celluloid excess on anti-orgasmic overload that reminds the viewer how truly ugly and vulgar certain members of humanity really are on both the inside and outside. Featuring countless hairy beavers, skinny unshaven asses, and tiny titties, Elevator Girls in Bondage is a rather odd and semi-straight flick for a campy celluloid work featuring the Cockettes in that it features more cunts than cocks, but they are just as intrinsically unappetizing all the same.

The boney, boner-loving girls of Elevator Girls in Bondage are feeling rather oppressed living during the so-called "depression 1972" as sub-erotic 'elevator girls' who spend all day and night going "up and down" for the low-paying customers of a superlatively seedy, semen-soaked hotel. When not working or hardly working, the elevator girls powder their pussies and take unglamorous bubble baths together as they are lascivious lesbos of the ultra unglamorous sort. Of course, when one of the girls, Trish (played by Johnny McGowan, a female fellow that was described as "The prettiest one" of the ugly drag troupe) is hogtied and 'bound for pleasure' by one of the pernicious patrons of the hotel and the fascist Divine-esque owner of the hotel, bald-headed Sally (Kreemah Ritz) refuses to get the 'pigs' involved, the elevator girls begin to reconsider their jobs and ultimately agree that revolutionary pussy politics is the answer. While one of the girls, Rita La Rantz (Reid Larrance), decides to quit and work at a 'soy sauce factory,' the feisty Führer of the oppressed elevator girls, Maxine (played by Rumi Missabu, an alpha-Cockette), decides to form a campy comic club to trample persecution as persecuted proletarian perverts. Luckily, a seemingly autistic blond-haired revolutionary named Bun E. Hug (played by director Michael Kalmen), a faggy flowerchild Maxine describes as follows, "He's brilliant. He knows all about Karl Marx and The Grapes of Wrath... a stunning weirdo," schools the sassy gay gals in political and social subversion and they form a maniac Marxist union, "The Pussy Protection Club." Before the girls know it, they have an iconic portrait of the Marxist messiah himself, Karl Marx—the famous photo where he looks like a Talmudic negro, like a more bloated version of slave-turned-sage Frederick Douglass—hanging on the hotel wall and begin singing crude and campy renditions of commie propaganda songs like "Bread and Roses – Dump the Bosses Off Your Back." Not long after, the elevator girls are maliciously manhandled and anally probed via a phallogocentric gun for being pinko poofs by a corrupt cop. Additionally, the perverted policeman tears up the elevator girls' beloved Karl Marx poster and when the girls complain about their property being destroyed the officer of the law makes the extremely valid point of rhetorically stating, "since when do you believe in private property?!" Realizing they make cruddy commie intellectuals, the elevator girls get their revenge by gang rapping the fellow who hogtied Trish and the guy busts an ample amount of saucy semen on the 1871 oil-on-canvas (and now cum) painting "Arrangement in Grey and Black No.1" aka "Whistler's Mother" by American-born painter James Abbott "art for art's sake" McNeill Whistler, thus 'battling bourgeois art' in the process. Maxine is ultimately arrested for her misguided Marxist shenanigans and the rest of the elevator girls threaten to strike as members of the disenfranchised rank-n-file who have "the right to strike." In the end, the elevator girls plan to buy the hotel and pay for Maxine's bail, but a couple gigantic iguanas wearing tophats nonsensically appear and thankfully destroy San Francisco and all the putrid people in it, including the evil capitalist bitch Bald-headed Sally, who is devoured by one of the radical reptiles.

A pure and unadulterated piece of impure celluloid psychedelic-exploitation

retardation, Elevator Girls in Bondage provides a better case for staying away from drugs than any after-school special and a more mocking attack of Marxism than any National Socialist propaganda movie, which was certainly not the intent of the commie cocksuckers of the Cockettes, thus making the work all the more unintentionally enjoyable in an ironic sort of way. With the terrorist trannies of the film interpreting Marxists maxim like “From each according to his ability, to each according to his need” as “you can do whatever what you want when you get what you need,” it is easy to see why the dildos dudes of the Cockettes subscribed to a hippie form of communism, even though Soviet icons like Maxim Gorky made such scathing anti-sodomite remarks as “Destroy the homosexuals—Fascism will disappear.” Of course, Elevator Girls in Bondage is certainly a somewhat accurate, albeit decidedly degenerate, depiction of the sort of slave-morality-driven debauchees that claim to subscribe to ‘the gospel according to Karl Marx’ today in the homophilic USA. A patently perverse piece of innately intentional celluloid trash that has as much artistic merit as a Polaroid of a turd taken by a toddler with Down syndrome that was directed by a feeble filmmaker with less skills than the average drunken frat-boy film school student, Elevator Girls in Bondage still manages to be a constantly entertaining exercise in campy cinematic excess, which probably is in part due to the fact that the film only has a 56-minute running time, as well as its all-morally-retarded cast. In fact, Elevator Girls in Bondage is more captivating than virtually anything ever directed by commie frog Jean-Luc Godard, but it is undoubtedly second to Luminous Procuress (1971) in terms of Cockettes cinema. A magnificently mediocre piece of Marxist moronism, Elevator Girls in Bondage has hopelessly saved at least one young man or woman, from adopting a worthless Weltanschauung like communism and/or trannyism. If you’re too much a victim of left-wing vice to understand Morrissey’s Women in Revolt, give Elevator Girls in Bondage a try and it might save you from contracting AIDS, wearing a $20.00 Che Guevara t-shirt, and/or going to a gay pride protest.

Michael Klier (1991)

I have certainly seen more kraut flicks than the typical uncultivated American slob and I can say without hesitation that Wolfgang Becker's Good Bye Lenin! (2003) is one of the most revoltingly contrived, sickeningly sentimental, and just plain intolerably kitschy and phony German films that I have ever seen, as if it was made specifically for American high school cheerleaders so as to trick them into learning about the reunification while they wet their panties for swarthy Teutonic mutt Daniel Brühl. I may not be German, but I do like an unhealthy number of malignantly melancholy Deutscher flicks and I can happily report that there are more than a couple of films about the German reunification (aka 'Die Wende') that, unlike Becker's conspicuously crappy kraut blockbuster, wallow in Weltschmerz and bleed bleakness. Indeed, in the late great Christoph Schlingensief's art-trash splatter flick The German Chainsaw Massacre (1990) aka Das deutsche Kettensägen Massaker, a cannibalistic family of West German kraut redneck capitalist Nazis kill, cook, and eat newly arrived krauts from the east. Additionally, in Aryan degenerate Oskar Roehler's quasi-neo-expressionistic flick No Place to Go (2000) aka Die Unberührbare—a work based on the director's own mother's final days—a Leninist novelist from the West finally realizes her dream of a commie utopia is nothing more than an absurd fantasy after the fall of the Berlin Wall, so she opts for killing herself by jumping out of a window, but not before buying an exceedingly expensive Christian Dior coat, attempting to buy speed from her son, and being institutionalized. Sapphic auteur Ulrike Ottinger's minimalistic yet nonetheless epic documentary Countdown (1990)—a work shot on both sides of the wall chronicling the weeks leading up to the reunification, hence the title—makes both sides of Berlin seem like one gigantic post-industrial cultural graveyards inhabited by scheming gypsies and haunted by the ghosts of German Jewry. Undoubtedly, the Teutonic neo-neorealist work Ostkreuz (1991) aka Westkreuz directed by Michael Klier (The Grass Is Greener Everywhere Else, Farland) also follows in the less than timeless tradition of decidedly dejecting reunification flicks. Sort of like a Germany Year Zero 2.0, albeit following a firecrotch teenage girl as opposed to a adolescent blond boy, Klier's film—a work advertised by its German distributor Filmgalerie 451 as telling, "the episodic story of 15-year-old Elfie, who literally and metaphorically inhabits a no-man's-land between the two Germanys during the Wende"—is just as much about the loss of 'Heimat' in Germany in general as it is about the oftentimes overlooked negative effects of the reunification. Directed by a Sudeten German that was born in 1943 whose family was expelled from Eastern Europe, landed in East Germany in 1947, and eventually fled to the West in 1961, Ostkreuz certainly depicts depressed and destitute Germans, but also features even more patently pathetic Slavs, especially Polacks, as if Berlin turned into a human toilet for the Slavic lands. Featuring great naturalistic performances from actors who have starred in works ranging from Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik (1987) to Krzysztof Kieslowski's A Short Film About Killing (1988) to Tom Tykwer's obscenely overrated Teutonic celluloid turd Run Lola Run (1998), Ostkreuz is an undeniably potent and important work, but it is also gratingly sad and culturally pessimistic flick that, although in color, could not feature a more colorless and expressionless world.

Elfie (Laura Tonke) is a 15-year-old redheaded teenage girl who lives the undignified existence of sleeping in a 'containerlager' (a sort of large metal storage container) with her single mother (Suzanne von Borsody) in Potsdamer Platz. Of course, they would like to live in an actual apartment but they need at least need 3000 marks for a security deposit, so Elfie tries to do various odd jobs to obtain the money, including cleaning storefront windows for 10 marks a job and selling assumedly stolen Jap car radios to people that live in the same containerlager ghetto as she does. Of course, Elfie becomes all the more inclined to want to raise the money when she notices that her mother is screwing a scumbag slob of a neighbor named Henry (Henry Marcinkowski). As for Elfie's father, he is never mentioned. One day, Elfie spots a blond Polack thief named Darius (Mirosław Baka) getting in a scuffle with a store owner and she snags the con's wallet when it falls out of his pocket. Of course, Darius catches up with Elfie and takes his money back, but their less than ideal meeting also sires a parasitic relationship between the two very desperate people. Needless to say, before she knows it, Elfie is peddling counterfeit cash for Darius (who strategically has the teen do his dirty work because she is underage and cannot get in serious trouble like an adult) and she is almost instantly caught, but she does not squeal to the pigs. Upon talking to Darius' rather bitchy (ex)girlfriend Karla (Beatrice Manowski of Buttgerit's Nekromantik), Elfie is warned, "you better be careful with Darius." Indeed, Darius is such a degenerate and morally vacant dude that he has no problem exploiting desperate women, even if it comes at the cost of their safety. Elfie is also told by Karla's younger brother Edmund (Stefan Cammann) that his sister and Darius were previously in Bulgaria but something went wrong after they committed some sort of crime, so they both landed in prison as a result.

At home, things are no better for Elfie, as she overhears her mom's boyfriend Henry talking about kicking her out. When Elfie's mom remarks that Henry plans to buy them a bigger container to live in, the angst-ridden teen snidely remarks, "So he can fuck you without being disturbed," thus resulting in the mouthy little lady being slapped in the face. Meanwhile, Darius proposes a dubious black market meat scheme to Elfie with a supposed markup of 1000%. When the meat finally arrives from Poland, Darius only receives a semi-rotting pig corpse which he is too lazy to carry, so he drops the beast carcass, kicks it like a weak pansy with a bad attitude problem, and walks away like the perennial loser that he is. Naturally, Elfie becomes rather disgusted when the pathetic prole Pole degenerate attempts to make out with her in a rather aggressive fashion. Ultimately, Elfie takes advantage of Darius' innate laziness and manages to sell the pig on her own after finding an ancient wooden cart and hauling it to a prospective buyer. Of course, Elfie's mom is somewhat creeped out when Darius shows up at her home and asks to wait for her daughter. Despite Darius' clearly questionable intentions, Elfie's rather negligent mother lets the Pole stay. When Elfie finally arrives home to the 'containerlager' find delinquent Darius in her room, she is more than just a little bit irked, but he hands her a fat wad of cash and coerces her into riding all the way to the bottom of Siberia with him and his sleazy middle-aged Polack comrade Guřtaw (Guřtaw Barwicki) to sell a shitty old beat-up used car. Since Elfie knows Russian, Darius plans to use her as translator when they talk to the car buyers, which include a Mongol and some sleazy Turkish-looking fellow. When the buyers arrive, they notice that Darius has not brought the car he advertised and a fight breaks out, with the Mongol even threatening Elfie with a gun. Though Elfie manages to escape, weak cowards Darius and his Guřtaw leave her behind, thus she must fend for herself and travel all the way back to Germany on her own, which proves to be an extra miserable experience as she has a wounded arm.

When Elfie arrives back at home, she becomes so agitated upon hearing her mother fucking Henry in the other room that she decides to runoff to her trashy taxi-driver grandfather's apartment. Rather pathetically, Elfie's grandfather is admired by the family because he at least has a job as a taxi-driver. Not exactly the most ideal granddaughter, Elfie decides to steal her opa's entire Meiřen porcelain plate set and abruptly leaves without saying so much as a goodbye. While walking around Alexanderplatz station, Elfie inevitably bumps into Darius, who absurdly remarks after noticing her valuable porcelain collection, "You'll always be cheated if you're alone," as if he has not cheated her a number of times already. Deciding that she does not want to get screwed over again, Elfie calls the cops on Darius and he is soon hauled away. After selling the Meiřen collection, Elfie has enough money to pay for the deposit for an apartment, but things do not exactly workout as perfectly as she planned. When Elfie shows her mother the money, she acts ungrateful and threatens to get rid of her if she continues to start quarrels. When they finally get a new apartment, Elfie decides to stay behind at the last minute, as she wants nothing to do with her mother's boyfriend and their seemingly parasitic relationship. Ultimately, Elfie hooks up with Karla's little brother Edmund and even buys the lad a large meal and beer at a fancy restaurant, though they are initially denied entry by the waiter due to their rather disheveled appearances. After Elfie waves around cash to prove she can pay, the waiter sets up a table for the two teens to sit at that is away from the regular customers, so as not to offend the other patron's sensitive bourgeois sensibilities. In the end, Elfie's future looks rather bleak, but at least she now has a (boy)friend and has developed a new sense of independence.

Out of all the German filmmakers that have dealt with gritty proletarian realism, Michael Klier is probably the most pessimistic and anti-aesthetically-inclined. Indeed, the works of (Roland Klick (Bübchen, Supermarkt), Uwe Schrader (Kanakerbraut aka White Trash, Sierra Leone), Uwe Frießner (Das Ende des Regenbogens aka The End of the Rainbow, Baby), East German documentarian Jürgen Böttcher (Jahrgang '45 aka Born in '45, Martha), Canadian-born Austrian auteur John Cook (Schwitzkasten, Artischocke), and Klaus Lemke (Rocker, Paul) seem almost 'upbeat' and 'optimistic' compared to the seeming pathological filmic forlornness of Ostkreuz, which makes the future of post-Wende Germany seem even more hopelessly horrid than most works belonging to the post-WWII Trümmerfilm genre. Indeed, while she may not be hooked on junk or peddling her gash for cash, the protagonist of Klier's film makes the eponymous anti-heroine of Christiane F. – We Children from Bahnhof Zoo (1981) seem like a decadent countess by comparison, as the thought of happiness has been totally extinguished from her forsaken soul. Needless to say, Ostkreuz is not exactly the sort of film that has great replay value unless you're the sort of person that has a thing for semi-homely teenage train wrecks who seem somewhat asexual. Unquestionably, one of the most entertaining aspects of the film for me was seeing pathetic Polack Darius—a sort of failed male femme fatale (or 'l'homme fatal') who is just too plain dumb and ugly to be successful with his calculating and conniving behavior—exploit protagonist Elfie in a somewhat 'psychopathic' fashion. Of course, Darius is just too decidedly dumb to be an actual psychopath. Indeed, Darius fulfills any Polish stereotype a person can think of and then some, as a majorly moronic small-time conman whose rather repellant exterior is only transcended by his craven character. A work deriving its name from an S-Bahn station in East Berlin linking the north, south, east and west, Ostkreuz ultimately makes it seem like there is no future in Germany no matter what route you take, but then again, the film also reveals that no matter how bad a German's life gets, it will always be better than that of a Pole, thus demonstrating that history has a way of repeating itself, even after nearly half of a century's worth of Soviet style repression and slavery.

HEINRICH HIMMLER: ANATOMY OF A MASS MURDERER

Michael Kloft (2010)

I have always been disappointed by the unimpressive appearance and equally banal character of Heinrich Himmler. For a man that ran the SS, a virtual private empire within the Third Reich, one would expect a stunning genius with a matching body of Teutonic steel. Instead, Himmler was a physically weak bureaucrat and former chicken farmer who resembled a half-caste Mongolian tax auditor. In the documentary Heinrich Himmler: Anatomy of a Mass Murderer, the viewer is briefly introduced to Himmler's unimpressive character and career as Hitler's #1 paper-shuffling killer. In Hannah Arendt's classic work of philosophy Eichmann in Jerusalem, the female German-Jewish philosopher devised the phrase "the banality of evil" regarding the desk-murderer career of Herr Eichmann. That being said, I think the phrase "the banality of a homicidal inferiority complex" would best sum up Himmler's life story. As revealed in the documentary Heinrich Himmler: Anatomy of a Mass Murderer, despite being a sickly child with the martial prowess of a pussycat, Himmler was always a strict German nationalist who romanticized war. Himmler grew up in a Roman Catholic household with a strict authoritarian father who demanded unwavering discipline from his sons. As described in the documentary, in his childhood, Himmler developed the ruthless cold psyche that would help him to efficiently run the SS in a most unsentimental manner.

Unsurprisingly, it is revealed in Heinrich Himmler: Anatomy of a Mass Murderer that Himmler truly believed in the National Socialist ideology and was completely obedient to Adolf Hitler. As the documentary briefly explains, Himmler attempted to create an anti-Christian neo-pagan order out of the SS, but ultimately failed. Although not revealed in the documentary, Himmler hired former mental institution patient Karl Maria Wiligut to be his virtual "Occult priest" at his castle Wewelsburg (which Himmler hoped would one day be the allegorical "center of the world"). Despite the fact that only a small fraction of Germans during the Nazi era were of pure Nordic Aryan stock (most were Alpine types), Himmler hoped to racially purify Germany and restore it to the racial character described in Tacitus' Germania. Interestingly enough, various Himmler biographers have stated that the SS Reichsführer might have had Mongolian and Jewish ancestry. Either way, I think most people will agree that Himmler certainly lacked the ideal Nordic profile he so stringently demanded in his SS men. Although Heinrich Himmler: Anatomy of a Mass Murderer does not go into much depth regarding Himmler's dubious ancestry, the documentary features the SS leader's great-niece Katrin Himmler, who is ironically married to an Israeli and only has contempt for her great-uncle. According to Katrin, in an attempt to hide their shame, the Himmler family went on to describe Heinrich as a "black sheep" after the second World War. As briefly mentioned in Heinrich Himmler: Anatomy of a Mass Murderer, Himmler's daughter Gudrun Burwitz would go on to be a Neo-Nazi sympathizer of sorts and still holds much love for her deceased father.

Despite having total control over the SS, Heinrich Himmler was unable to efficiently run it on his own. Reinhard Heydrich, who was described by the Nazis as the "ideal National Socialist," is known to have run the more crucial departments of the SS, especially those sectors responsible for the liquidation of Jews. I would have liked for Heinrich Himmler: Anatomy of a Mass Murderer to have gone in better depth regarding Himmler's relationship with Heydrich, but instead, the documentary only succinctly mentions it. At best, the documentary is an "okay" introduction to the life and killing times of Heinrich Himmler. Heinrich Himmler: Anatomy of a Mass Murderer is comparable to the kind of documentary you would find on the History Channel, as the film barely delves into the more interesting elements regarding Himmler and the SS. In the end, Himmler ended up killing millions of people for nothing, eventually betraying Adolf Hitler by attempting to make a deal with the allies in early 1945. Himmler met a very bitter and lonely end, having all his ranks stripped from him and eventually committing suicide the same way Hitler did. For those already familiar with Himmler, Heinrich Himmler: Anatomy of a Mass Murderer will offer you no new insights. For more info on the documentary, visit First Run Features.

BABYSITTER WANTED

Michael Manasseri, Jonas Barnes (2008)

Forgive me, father, for I have sinned. Matching strings with this Pro-Christian horror film wasn't easy. My curse has been laid upon for not finishing this film. I didn't even try. The burdening guilt weighed me down until the idea of successfully administering this film to myself made my mind dry heave. As evidenced by the previous sentence, I've turned into a selfish creature caring only for my prime self-being - sniveling and devoid of inner light. Maybe that was Babysitter Wanted's cause in life; to create chaos and upset this already diminishing balance between good and evil. I'll lay the plot on thick. Bourgeoisie Jesus baby Angie leaves her small town religious mother to go to the city and pursue college. Oh, the joys of city life and socialites. Upon discovering her roommate to be a lesbian "goth" who smokes pot and walks around in Fruit of the Loom panties, she brushes aside contraband and sets up a candle and rosary to pray to her official "God." Already this film sounds a lot like House (2009) and if you remember correctly, those Christian elements that are one-and-the-same in Babysitter Wanted was its benevolent [I use this word loosely] downfall from the beginning. Adored by slasher fanatics, I can't see what they say in this low-budget horror film. Talk about a one way mirror; the reflection is stale, absurd, and plain retarded. And people praise this twist for originality. scoff Hmm... I had first heard of this film on a P2P tracker. Looking at the plot and the DVD cover art, I decided to nab the film for a much later viewing. No way I was pushing back my schedule for cannon fodder begging to be viewed like a slut begging for another fix. While talking to my dear loved one, she told me she had just seen the worst film of her life. Curious, I inquired as to what it was. The bad taste was exchanged mouth-to-mouth as the title "Babysitter Wanted" slowly crept from her lips. A bomb dropped somewhere inside and I began mentally laughing more fervidly than Chuck Rock back in his hey days of 16-bit entertainment. I'd like to personally thank her for alerting me of this atrocity but at the same time condemn her to a lifetime of the sweetest tortures for piquing my interest further. The spoiler that she told me sounded exactly like a bittersweet rewrite of French ringleader Sheitan. But with no Vincent Cassel, how could this hold up? Upon putting it on, I realized that she was right. This film was as bad as described to me that fateful day. To prevent you, our readers, from purgatory, I will explicitly detail the plot including the spoilers. Well, as far as I watched. I eventually turned this film off, disgusted, and put in Robert Downey Sr.'s magnificent Chafed Elbows which is probably the greatest achievement in American underground cinema so my suffering wasn't extensive and I only received 2nd degree burns. Christian girl goes to city and looks for a job. Discovers babysitter job in the boonies. Goes to the country and gets stalked by a mysterious figure. Upon fighting and killing the stranger, you discover that he is a priest and in an accident, the girl knocks the Cowboy hat wore by the child she's sitting. Surprise devil horns. The kid's Satan. Watching this plot complexity unfold was like being audience to Haley Joel Osment hitting puberty with enhanced shutter speed. This "nubile women meet their doom" shtick is getting moldy. To wrap it up, I was too swayed by the effects of Babysitter Wanted to continue. Maybe this is the purpose of new horror; to "horrify" you to continue further. With that in mind, I guess Babysitter Wanted is exactly what horror films need now to continue a legacy that has slowly been dwindling over the years. Call me jaded but if you enjoyed Babysitter Wanted, don't talk to me. I don't really care how "well-acted" this film is or if you think that this is "low budget horror done right." Your opinions are as limp as this film's dedication to originality is. I will now take this moment to thank Devon for warning me of this obscene atrocity that I spite with every gram of my metaphysical being. If it weren't for her, I might have made the fatal mistake of going into Babysitter Wanted with expectations.

Michael Mann (1981)

Probably largely the result of the fact that I grew up regularly hearing firsthand crime stories that were more intriguing and disturbing than those featured in movies, I have never really given that big of a shit about noir-ish crime-thrillers, especially those regularly vomited out of Hollywood, so there is no doubt in my mind when I see one and come to the conclusion it is a masterpiece. To me, a good crime-thriller has nil 'filler' and puts just as much emphasis on every shot and scene as Bergman or Lynch would put into one of their films, albeit in a fashion that can be just as easily be digested by proles and philistines as pretentious art fags and cineastes. Although probably not completely immaculate, William Friedkin's To Live and Die in L.A. (1985) is what I consider to be the ideal crime-thriller as a cinematic work that more or less completely reinvents the (sub)genre and which I would regard as a piece of carefully constructed cinematic art that defines both the philosophy and aesthetic 'integrity' (or lack thereof) of its particular zeitgeist. If there is any film from the same decade that is on the same level as Friedkin's film, it is indubitably Michael Mann's debut feature Thief (1981) aka Violent Streets aka The Cracker: Midnight Outlaw, which I recently re-watched and came to the conclusion that it was a near perfect piece of cinema, at least as far as its genre is concerned. Not surprisingly, like Friedkin, Mann was the son of working-class Jews from Chicago and, also like his kosher kinsman, he is a rare example of a truly masculine-minded Jewish filmmaker. Additionally, Thief stars James Caan who, aside from also being from a Hebraic prole background (his father was a butcher), is arguably the most innately tough and manly Jewish actor of his generation and possibly in all of cinema history. Indeed, if there is any Jew that debunks Weininger's theory that Jewishness and femininity are one and the same and would make for a great Zionist propaganda symbol as the Judaic Übermensch, it is Caan. Like Friedkin with his first big hit The French Connection (1971), Thief is a gritty yet carefully stylized cinematic work where the auteur opted to incorporate an inordinate and arguably borderline dangerous degree of realism, including hiring real cops and croaks as actors, as well as hiring real professional thieves as technical advisors. A quite cynical and nihilistic cinematic work, Mann's film is also Friedkin-esque in its depiction of cops and cons as different sides of the same coin and absolute refusal to make any superficial moral judgements. Indeed, Mann hired real-life guido jewel thief John Santucci (who ironically portrays a sleazy police sergeant) to create real robbery tools and train lead Caan how to use them. In fact, the main heist featured in the film, which involves the use of a thermal lance (aka 'oxy-lance') to cut through a vault door, was modeled after a real robbery that Santucci carried out. Additionally, the film was loosely based on the novel The Home Invaders: Confessions of a Cat Burglar by pseudonymous author Frank Hohimer (real name John Seybold), who was also a real-life jewel thief that was apparently serving a prison sentence at the time of the film's production.

Of course, technical authenticity is only one of the many ingredients that make Mann's film so positively potent from beginning to end. Indeed, aside from also featuring an absolutely imperative soundtrack by German electronic group Tangerine Dream and mostly aesthetically pleasing nocturnal urban cinematography, Thief features one of the most unforgettable antiheroes of crime cinema history. Although he is not exactly a gay serial rapist and killer, the titular lead of the film is, at least philosophically speaking, like the Carl Panzram of movie thieves, as a sort of sociopathic criminal Übermensch who does not give a shit about anything and does not care about or listen to anyone. Like Panzram (who was gang raped by a group of hobos in a train car at the age of 14 after running away from home), the lead developed his uncompromising antisocial philosophy as a result of going through the life-changing ordeal of encountering humanity's most craven and depraved individuals, or to use Friedrich Nietzsche's overused quote to describe the tragic psychological state of the character, "Whoever fights monsters should see to it that in the process he does not become a monster. And if you gaze long enough into an abyss, the abyss will gaze back into you." The closest thing I have ever seen to a Hollywood equivalent to the spirit of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's magnum opus Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) in terms of its gritty and totally unromantic yet at the same time strangely 'humanistic' view of crime and criminals, Thief is ultimately a sad yet stoic, 'no bullshit' reminder as to the sort of foredoomed and forlorn individuals that become 'successful' career criminals. Of course, like real-life master criminals, the antihero of Mann's film might fulfill some of his rather ambitious dreams, but they are ultimately shattered and taken away from him in the end. Notably, what makes Mann's film different from most of its genre persuasion is that the lead consciously decides to literally destroy his own version of the American dream as a means to preserve his Weltanschauung and keep his personal sovereignty. As a man that lost over a decade of his life in prison, the antihero is determined to quite literally contrive a full life in a very short period of time that includes a bourgeois family and home, but he ultimately gets himself entangled in a very precarious criminal web in the process and must choose between everything he has recently built for himself or maintaining his personal freedom. Additionally, the eponymous lead of the film might be a 'thief,' but he is a man's man in the truest sense as an innately individualistic fellow who lives on his own terms and plays by his own rules, hence his truly epic and carefully calculated self-ordained downfall.

In a sort of 'neon neo-noir' opening scene full of beautiful shimmering city lights and almost celestial rainfall that does not feature one single line of dialogue, antihero Frank (James Caan) more or less effortlessly carries out a perfect diamond heist during a misty night in Chicago with his partner Barry (James Belushi in his first film role). After drilling through a safe with a custom-made power-drill that an elderly friend created for him, Frank goes through the drawers of said safe and only bothers to steal envelopes full of uncut diamonds, which is the only item he deals in because it is, relatively speaking, 'clean' and 'low-risk' compared to other stolen goods. As a front for his criminal enterprise, Frank owns a used car dealership and a bar. Frank's 'fence' is a grotesquely fat and effeminate fellow of the overtly Judaic sort named Joe Gags (Hal Frank) who, unbeknownst to the antihero, has been stealing money from a local bigwig mob boss. When Gags is killed after being pushed out of a 12th-story window as punishment for skimming off the top of mob collection money, Frank discovers that the owner of a plating company, Mr. Attaglia (Tom Signorelli), was responsible for the killing. On top of killing his fence, Attaglia pocketed Frank's $185,000 of the score money, which Gags had on him at the time of his death. Needless to say, Frank soon pays a visit to Attaglia under the false pretense of having a problem with a plating shipment and demands his money back. When Attaglia pretends to not know what he is talking about, Frank angrily remarks, "I come here to discuss a piece of business with you. And what are you gonna do? You gonna tell me fairy tales?" thus angering the plating company owner to the point where he demands that he get out of his office. At this point, Frank whips out a handgun, points it at Attaglia's face, and fiercely states, "I am the last guy in the world. . . that you want to fuck with. You found my money on Gags. Let us pretend you don't know whose money it is." Ultimately, Frank sets up a meeting for Attaglia that night to get his $185,000 back, but instead of the plating company executive, the antihero encounters a fat old four-eyed polack named Leo (Robert Prosky), who is as charming as the devil despite his fairly repugnant appearance. Unbeknownst to Frank, Leo wants to make a Faustian pact that will ultimately lead to his downfall, or at least temporary downfall.

THIEF

As Leo explains to Frank, he is a high-level fence and mafia boss who is in charge of over half of the crime in Chicago and he has been admiring the antihero's work from afar for some time. Naturally, Frank is somewhat taken aback by Leo's disclosure, as if he had been under the impression that he was a criminal phantom of sorts that no one was aware of. Leo also makes it quite clear to Frank that if he had not stepped in, Attaglia would have retaliated against him. While Frank attempts to immediately leave after he is handed the $185,000 and tells Leo he has no interest in working for him, stating, "I am self-employed. I am doin' fine. I don't deal with egos. I am Joe the boss of my own body, so what the fuck do I have to work for you for?" the rather rotund mob boss will not take no for an answer and begins making the antihero an offer he cannot refuse, even bragging to him like a virtual carny huckster, "I'll make you a millionaire in four months." According to Leo, he can give Frank all the resources he needs to carry out the perfect big score, including the best locations and whatever equipment and phony documents that he would require to get the job done. While

Frank agrees to give Leo a call about a possible temporary ‘no strings attached’ partnership for two or three heists, the lead does not seem too interested in the offer, at least until fate steps in and makes it seem like the antihero has the perfect opportunity to catch up on the time that he lost in prison. After all, Frank could be set for life if he does a couple heists with Leo, thus giving him the opportunity to soon completely retire from crime and devote his life to being a bourgeois family man, or so he thinks. Indeed, after his talk with Leo, Frank goes to a local club to meet up with his love interest Jessie (Tuesday Weld)—a woman that he intends to marry, even though he barely knows her and has yet to have sex with her—but when he gets there she immediately begins berating him for being two hours later, stating in a brazenly bitchy fashion, “What the hell are you doing here? [...] I do not need to be humiliated.” Determined to prove he had a valid reason for being late and that he has a serious interest in beginning a “big romance” with her, Frank more or less physically drags Jessie out of the club against her will and then shoves her inside his car. Although Frank owns a used car dealership and a bar as ‘legitimate’ front for his criminal operation, during the car ride he decides to reveal to Jessie his true background, stating to her like a painfully honest low-class braggart, “I wear $150 slacks! I wear silk shirts! I wear $800 suits! I wear a gold watch! I wear a perfect D flawless, three-carat ring! I change cars like other guys change their fuckin’ shoes! I’m a thief. I’ve been in prison.” While Jessie continues to yell and bitch at Frank, she begins to settle down when they arrive at a diner and have a more intimate talk. It is at the diner that Frank reveals to Jessie his most unflattering vulnerabilities and his virtual blueprint for his life, which he wants to make her an imperative part of.

As she describes to Frank during a long and intimate conversation in the diner, Jessie used to have a cocaine dealer boyfriend who got himself killed under dubious circumstances in South America, thus leaving her to fend for herself on the streets of Bogotá, Colombia (while she does not say it outright, the viewer assumes she did a little third world style pussy-peddling to survive). As a result of her less than glamorous experiences, Jessie is wholly content with her current banal job as a lowly restaurant cashier and makes it quite clear to Frank that she does not want to get her sucked back into the uncertainty of the criminal lifestyle again. Not surprisingly, Frank mocks her attitude while, at the same time, assuring her that he eventually plans to quit thieving and is only doing it now to make up for lost time. At this point, Frank describes to her his general nihilistic worldview and how he became the impenetrable hyper-individualistic criminal that he is today. After being imprisoned at the age of 20 for stealing a mere $40, Frank ultimately found himself spending eleven years in jail as a result of receiving a “manslaughter beef” after brutally beating some bad guys that, as he describes, “tried to turn me out.” Indeed, after brutally beating up a group of prison guards and criminals with a pipe that attempted to gang rape him, Frank was subsequently severely beaten and hospitalized himself, though he managed to beat the leader of the group, a certain 300-pound slob named 'Captain Morphis,' so badly that he died two years later as a result of his injuries. Of course, the entire experience left Frank with an extremely tough mindset and considerably nihilistic worldview where he learned to not care about anything, most notably himself. As Frank tells Jessie, "...I don't mean nothin' to myself. I don't care about me. I don't care about... nothin', you know? And then I know from that day that I survive...because I achieved that mental attitude." At this point, Frank whips out a somewhat childish collage that he made in prison that he describes as "my life," which features images of children, a beautiful woman, and his criminal mentor/paternal figure 'Okla' aka David (Willie Nelson). Okla is the only man that Frank seems to truly respect and he was the one that convinced the antihero to be upfront about his criminal background (as the viewer discovers during a conversation between Frank and Okla, the lead's previous wife divorced him after discovering he was lying to her). Frank points at the woman in his 'life collage' and tells Jessie that it is her. Of course, Frank wants Jessie to be his wife and he promises that he will go 'straight' and quit thieving after obtaining enough money to 'catch up' for the eleven years of life that he lost in prison, stating to her, "Look, I have run out of time. I have lost it all. And so I can't work fast enough to catch up...and I can't run fast enough to catch up...and the only thing that catches me up...is doin' my magic act. But it ends, you know? It will end." While Jessie seems to find Frank's plan to be somewhat questionable, especially since she is infertile and cannot give him the children he wants, he reassures her by telling her that they can adopt a child. Needless to say, the prospect of a large home, wealth, a husband, and a child seems quite enticing to the infertile spinster, so Jessie demonstrates that she has accepted Frank's somewhat strange, almost business-like proposal by holding his hand in what is probably the only truly tender moment in the entire film.

As a result of becoming excited that Jessie has agreed on his somewhat unconventional offer to be his wife and part of his big life plan, Frank decides to call Leo to let him know that he is interested in their partnership, even though it is something he would probably not do under normal circumstances as a lone-wolf that has a hard time running with a pack. Meanwhile, Frank pays a repulsively shady Jewish lawyer $10,000 to bribe a corrupt judge to get his mentor Okla out of prison. Okla has angina and heart disease and made it quite clear to Frank that he did not want to die in prison. While Frank manages to get his friend out of prison, Okla crooks soon after. Notably, after a negro doctor informs him of Okla's death, Frank petrifies the physician by maintaining a creepy dead stare and saying literally nothing, thus underscoring the antihero's incapacity to deal with emotions. In tribute to Okla, Frank decides to name his adopted son after him. Indeed, as a result of the fact that he is turned down by an adoption agency due to his criminal record, Frank manages to procure a baby boy on the black market via Leo, who only went to the effort of getting the child as a means to lure the antihero into his operation. While Leo stylizes himself as a sort of benign paternal figure that does whatever he can to make his underlings happy, he is actually a ruthless megalomaniac that wants to make Frank his virtual slave. Of course, Frank immediately demonstrates that he will be a hard man to control because, unlike Leo and the other mob leaders, he refuses to pay off the local corrupt cops and, as a result, is brutally beaten by about half a dozen cops and has both his house and car bugged. Luckily for Frank, he is far more intelligent than the corrupt cops that are trying to bust him.

With the help of his jolly and somewhat buffoonish partner Barry and a couple crew members, Frank is completely successful at executing a large-scale San Diego diamond heist that Leo has organized for him. While Leo compliments Frank on the score and calls him “Dr. Wizard,” he fails to give the antihero the amount of cash he had agreed upon. Although Frank was promised $830,000 of the $4 million that were made from wholesale of the unmounted stones that he stole during the heist, Leo has the gall to hand him a folder that contains no more than $90,000 and then attempts to play off his shady business tactics in what is surely a Harvey Weinstein-esque moment. When Frank asks him where the rest of the money is, Leo states that it is just the “cash part” and that he supposedly invested the rest of the money, stating like a true bullshitting swindler, “That’s because I put you into the Jacksonville, Fort Worth. . .and Davenport shopping centers with the rest. I take care of my people. You can ask these guys. Papers are at your house. It’s set up as a limited partnership. The general partner is a subchapter S corporation. You’ve got equity with me in that.” Needless to say, when Leo brings up a “major score in Palm Beach” that he boldly assumes the antihero will execute for him in six weeks, Frank becomes extremely agitated and tells him, “This is payday. It is over.” When Leo remarks, “I give you houses. I give you a car. You’re family. I thought you’d come around. What the hell is this? What – Where is gratitude? You can’t see day for night,” Frank reveals he is carrying a gun and then threatens the crime boss, stating in a quite ballsy fashion, “My money in 24 hours, or you will wear your ass for a hat.” Of course, a rich and powerful crime boss like Leo refuses to tolerate a threat from such an ostensible small fry like Frank. Unfortunately for Leo and his associates, they ultimately underestimate Frank’s uncompromising ruthlessness and seemingly psychopathic will power.

When Frank goes by his car dealership and cannot find Barry, he soon finds himself ambushed by Leo’s goons. As a result of attempting to warn Frank that it is a trap, Barry is gunned down by Leo’s boys while he has hands tied behind his back. When Frank wakes up, he finds himself lying next to his buddy Barry’s corpse while Leo is standing over him in an intimidating fashion. While lying on the floor with a completely blank stare on his face like a virtual vegetable, Frank quietly stares at Leo as he states to him in a great speech where he reveals his true devilish self, “Look what happened to your friend ‘cause you gotta go against the way things go down. You treat what I tried to do for you like shit. You don't want to work for me. What's wrong with you? And then you carry a piece in my house. You one of those burned-out, demolished wackos in the joint? You're scary, because you don't give a fuck. But don't come on to me now with your jailhouse bullshit. . .because you are not that guy. Don't you get it, you prick? You got a home, car, businesses, family. . .and I own the paper on your whole fuckin' life. I'll put your cunt wife on the street to be fucked in the ass by niggers and Puerto Ricans. Your kid's mine because I bought it. You got him on loan. He is leased. You are renting him. I'll whack out your whole family. People'll be eating 'em for lunch tomorrow in their Wimpy burgers and not know it. You get paid what I say. You do what I say. I run you. There is no discussion. I want, you work. Until you are burned out. . .you are busted, or you're dead. You get it? You got responsibilities. Tighten up and do it [...] Back to work, Frank." As anyone that has been carefully watching the film up until this point rightly assumes, there is no way that an impenetrable lone wolf like Frank would not only tolerate his best friend's coldblooded murder, but also such an intricate threat against both himself and his family. At this point, Frank must think quick and act lest he be a perennial bitch-boy to a soft four-eyed prick who looks like a public transit bus driver.

As a man that values self-ownership above all us, Frank naturally refuses to be Leo's permanent groveling diamond heist bitch and comes to the conclusion that he is willing to sacrifice literally everything he values, including his wife and son, to remain a free and sovereign individual. Indeed, during the middle of the night while she is sleeping, Frank abruptly wakes up Jessie and coldly and firmly informs her that it is "over" and he is throwing her out, which she naturally has a hard time understanding. While Frank hands her $410,000.00 and tells her that he will have an associate take care of her and the baby, Jessie loves him, cannot understand why he is acting in such a callous fashion, and refuses to leave, complaining, "Wait. We just – We just disassemble it and put it back in a box. . .like an Erector set you just send back to a store? I love you. I'm not going anywhere [...] I'm your woman. You're my man. Frank, Frank. I made a commitment." With a completely cold and glacial stare, Frank replies to Jessie by stating, "To hell with me, with you. . .with everything. I'm throwing you out. Get out" and then hatefully yells to her to get out of his house. In a sort of both literal and symbolic annihilation of his entire life, Frank then proceeds to not only blow up his home, but also his car dealership and bar, thus proving he is not the sort of fellow that does things halfway. Indeed, by blowing up everything in his life, Frank not only wipes away his entire identity, but also makes sure that he can have no second thoughts in terms of going back to his previous life. Of course, Frank then proceeds to pay Leo a surprise visit where he knocks Attaglia out cold in the kitchen and then hunts the mob boss in his own home in a scenario where the powerful crime boss comes off looking like the physically weak and soft coward that he is. After shooting Leo dead upon finding him hiding behind a piece of furniture like a scared animal in one of the rooms in his house, Frank murders the mob boss' henchman Carl and Attaglia after exiting the house, though he is shot a couple of times in the process (luckily, Frank had enough common sense to wear a bulletproof vest and thus comes out of the shootout fairly unscathed). In the end, Frank walks into the night by himself, as if taking the first steps of his new life journey, which will indubitably be alone. Indeed, at this point, Frank has probably accepted that he is doomed to be alone forever and will never be able to be the bourgeois family man that he originally dreamed of.

After my recent re-watching of Thief, I know realize that it and Walter Hill's The Driver (1978) were Nicolas Winding Refn's two main models for Drive (2011). In fact, after watching Mann's film, I have to admit that I have a lot less respect for Refn, as he now reminds me of a sort of European Tarantino, albeit with better taste cinema and a more covert and less self-congratulatory approach to paying 'homage' to his crucial influences. Out of all these three films, Thief is the only one where I found myself entranced by the sight of misty rain drops, flying sparks, and slow-motion explosions, as if Mann was inspired by Stan Brakhage's sort of organic lyricism. Of course, the film owes a good portion of its hypnotic power to its Tangerine Dream score (notably, Mann originally considered using degenerate jazz for the film, but luckily he made the right decision in the end). While I enjoy Mann's subsequent Nazi horror-fantasy The Keep (1983), which also features a Tangerine Dream score, for largely novelty reason, it is the complete opposite of Thief in that it feels so glaringly contrived and phony, as if the Jewish auteur wanted to make the most one-dimensional anti-Nazi film ever assembled in what is ultimately a moronically morally dichotomous neo-fairytale where virtually all Germans are depicted as pure evil despite the fact a group of krauts provided the music for the film (to Mann's credit, Paramount Pictures totally butchered the film and more or less cut it in half, though Mann intended to shoot a 'Aryan holocaust' scene at the end where every single German soldier is brutally murdered by a virtual golem). Indeed, despite being meticulously stylized, Thief has a certain unwavering authenticity to it in terms of its depiction of a psychosis-ridden career criminal that has learned to become internally dead as a means to cope with the traumas he has endured. Of course, like many talented individuals, the antihero of the film at least partly owes his Übermensch qualities to his mental defects. Notably, actor James Caan has described Thief as his second favorite of his own films, with the long diner monologue being the scene he is most proud of in all of his entire acting career. As demonstrated by his roles in Mann's film, Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather (1972), and The Gambler (1974), as well as tendency to do crazy things in real-life like pulling guns on negro rappers and befriending and publicly supporting real-life mafia bosses, Caan certainly seems to at least partially personally embody the erratic quasi-psychopathic characters that he is best known for playing, but of course only the toughest people from working-class backgrounds make it to the top, so that should be no surprise. After all, no one would know who Caan, Mann, or Friedkin was today if they were meek pussies who did not grab life by the balls and make something of themselves by any means possible. Of course, this is also what makes these three men different from most of the Hebrews in Hollywood, who oftentimes owe their celebrity to nepotism and ethnic networking and not genuine talent.

While I respect the fact his third feature Manhunter (1986) is easily the most underrated Hannibal Lecter film and that he was actually able to get an intriguing performance out of Tom Cruise as a psychopathic killer in Collateral (2004), I do not think I could ever call myself even a softcore Michael Mann fan. After all, no real serious auteur could have directed films as lame and phony as The Last of the Mohicans (1992) and Ali (2001). Indeed, the only Mann flick that I like in its entirety is Thief, which I consider to be the filmmaker's closest thing to a true auteur piece, thus making it all the more of a shame that it is probably his least appreciated and most overlooked work. Like Friedkin, I think the real Mann is someone that could have just as easily become a Jewish gangster had his life taken a slightly different course and I believe his debut demonstrates this in its genuine obsession with the criminal mind and lifestyle. Even with his big budget Johnny Depp vehicle Public Enemies (2009), Mann would demonstrate a preternatural obsession with criminal authenticity in terms of historical accuracy in depicting the infamous life and times of German-American gangster John Dillinger and his gang. Of course, what separates Thief from most of Mann's other films and crime-thrillers in general is that it is the real dirty deal and features none of the sort of frivolous tough guy posturing that appeals to the sort of borderline retarded illiterate thugs, dime-bag-peddling ghetto negroes, and spiritually castrated wiggers that masturbate to Scarface (1983) and Carlito's Way (1993) and would probably suck Robert De Niro's cock in a desperate attempt to try in vain to live vicariously through the man that starred in Goodfellas (1990) and some many other ginney-dago-wop-fests. While his stoicism and will power is admirable, there is nothing genuinely romantic about the absurdly asocial antihero of Mann's debut, hence why aspiring rappers, crack dealers, and other crime-fetishizing degenerates would probably have a hard time embracing the film (of course, the Tangerine Dream score would also deter any of these preposterously pathetic peons, but I digress). In short, Thief is a portrait of progressive criminal madness in a quasi-poetic form that deserves to be compared to the more intriguingly morally dubious cinematic works of Fritz Lang. In terms of its uniquely unflattering depiction of Chicago as a sort of post-industrial hellhole where criminals run both the streets and courts, Mann's film probably features the most unforgettable aesthetic assault against the spiritual core of an American city since David Lynch's quasi-Expressionistic depiction of Philadelphia in Eraserhead (1977), albeit in an exceedingly less esoteric fashion. Arguably most interestingly, it is not often that one gets to see a film where a man is pushed completely to the edge and decides to literally blow up his entire life in a blaze of nihilistic glory. It also not often one gets to see a film that is almost orgasmically metallurgical in its essence, as if some of the ideas of Oswald Spengler's Man and Technology: A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life (1931) were used by Mann as a sort of aesthetic theory for Thief, which finds almost perverse pulchritude in post-industrial decay and the synthesis of man and machine. After all, if there is a sort of quasi-realist equivalent to the titular cyborg assassin of The Terminator (1984), it is the eponymous antihero of Mann's film.

THE KEEP THE KEEP

Michael Mann (1983)

Undoubtedly, a Gothic horror World War II flick set in war torn Romania featuring a soundtrack by electronic krautrockers Tangerine Dream sounds like a rather delectable prospect, but somebody made a major mistake when they granted Hollywood Hebraic hack Michael Mann (Thief, The Last of the Mohicans) the once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to direct such an innately ambitious and easy-to-botch cinematic work. Indeed, The Keep (1983)—a film based on the 1981 novel of the same name, which was the first volume in a series of six novels known as The Adversary Cycle written by American sci-fi novelist F. Paul Wilson—is a work that had all the potential of a ‘blockbuster masterpiece’ (an oxymoron if there ever was one!) and would eventually earn cult status among loyal fans, but director Michael Mann ultimately disowned the film and even prevented its release on dvd, which is certainly no surprise as it is an aesthetically pleasing mess of the innately incoherent and horribly uneven sort, not to mention a perfect example of how Hollywood butchers films. Although a little over 90 minutes in its present form, Michael Mann’s original cut of The Keep was a whopping 3 ½ hours in length, which is certainly why the film is an epic abortion with a jumbled and disjointed storyline. A sort of extremely loose reworking of the Golem story from Jewish folklore meets Castle Keep (1969) directed by Sydney Pollack minus the humor, The Keep childishly wallows in Spielberg-esque anti-Nazi clichés and emphasizes heavily stylized action sequences and then-state-of-the-art special effects over character development and sensible linear storytelling. In fact, director Mann once described the film as, “A fairy story for grownups. Fairy tales have the power of dreams - from the outside. I decided to stylize the art direction and photography extensively but use realistic characterization and dialogue,” yet The Keep has a moronic moral compass that seems like it was created by the bastard Judaic half-brother of the Brothers Grimm and certainly does not seem like it was created with grown adults in mind. Indeed, a supernatural and pseudo-spiritual ‘scary’ Shoah flick for a degenerate generation of effeminate braindead fanboys who see Luke Skywalker as their Christ and see any cinematic depiction of Hitler as Satan and German soldiers as demons, The Keep is certainly the most philistine extreme of hapless holocaust propaganda and the soundtrack by Teutonic musical geniuses Tangerine Dream makes it seem all the more bizarre. Indeed, I would be lying if I did not admit The Keep is my favorite Israelite-directed anti-Nazi propaganda flick as it may be an absurdly muddled movie with Streicher-esque caricatures of German soldiers, but it is also an endlessly entertaining ‘popcorn flick’ that acts as a sort of cinematic equivalent to a hokey haunted holocaust museum.

Set in 1941 following the commencement of Operation Barbarossa at the Dinu Mountain Pass of the Carpathian Alps in rural Romania, The Keep begins with the arrival of a German Wehrmacht unit led by ‘nice Nazi’ Captain Klaus Woermann (Jürgen Prochnow). After two of Woermann’s more criminally-inclined kraut soldiers attempt to steal a glowing cross icon they mistake for silver in an uninhabited citadel (aka “The Keep”), they unwittingly unleash an evil Golem-like entity named Radu Molasar that had been imprisoned in the ancient keep. Naturally, metaphysical monster Molasar begins killing off kraut soldiers faster than the snow in Stalingrad, which raises the suspicion of the German army. Eventually, a genocidal SS Einsatzkommando unit led by a nefarious Nazi named SD Sturmbannführer Eric Kaempffer (Gabriel Byrne) is called in to investigate the mysterious murders and restore order in the medieval-like Romanian village. Of course, the first thing Kaempffer has his killer kraut commandos do upon arriving in the town is have a group of wholesome Romanian men executed in retaliation for the deaths of murdered Wehrmacht soldiers, but also to prevent any other murders. A callous National Socialist ‘true believer,’ Kaempffer firmly believes the deaths are the result of communist partisans. At the recommendation of a lying Romanian priest named Father Mihail Fonescu (Robert Prosky), the Germans have a Romanian Jewish historian named Professor Theodore Cuza (Ian McKellen) and his daughter Eva (Alberta Watson) fetched from a concentration camp to help solve the mystery murders as both of them somehow have special esoteric knowledge regarding the Keep. Professor Cuza manages to translate a dead language similar to Romanian written on the wall of the citadel and not long after two SS men attempt to rape his daughter, but she is ultimately saved by Jewish monster Molasar. Gracious for Molasar’s seemingly selfless heroism, Cuza ultimately befriends and makes a Faustian pact with the monster, who also cures the Professor of his debilitating case of scleroderma and gives him eternal youth. Meanwhile, a man with supernatural powers named Glaeken Trismegestus (Scott Glenn) senses something evil is stirring in the Keep and begins to travel all the way from his hometown in Greece to the Romanian village. Of course, Kaempffer continues to kill Romanian peasants and eventually kills Klaus Woermann for his anti-Nazi rhetoric and insubordinate behavior, but anti-anti-Semite Molasar eventually kills the sadistic SS man. Additionally, not unlike Frank Cotton from Clive Barker’s Hellraiser (1987), Molasar begins to take a more human form the more powerful he becomes. When gallant hero Glaeken eventually arrives in the Romanian village to stop Molasar, Professor Cuza attempts to have him killed. In the end, Professor Cuza finally comes to the realization that Molasar is not a saint and Glaeken battles the Golem-like creature, ultimately using his body to once again imprison the all-evil creature in the citadel.

Director Michael Mann essentially summed up the ‘message’ of The Keep when he stated regarding the Second World War, “There is a moment in time when the unconscious is externalized. In the case of the 20th Century, this time was the fall of 1941. What Hitler promised in the beer gardens had actually come true. The greater German Reich was at its apogee: it controlled all Europe. And the dark psychotic appeal underlying the slogans and rationalizations was making itself manifest.” With its unintentionally strange and rather superficial scenes of old Jewish intellectuals lounging in death camps in style, suavely dressed SS of the sadistic megalomaniac sort going on deranged anti-communist diatribes, absurdly childish and cheesy caricature-driven portrayal of good and evil, unflatteringly romanticized depiction of Romanian peasants, and innate irrationalism, The Keep ultimately seems like a warped post-Auschwitz religious parable directed by an atheistic Jew for consumption by feeble minded goy Christians of the pathetically superstitious sort. That being said, The Keep still manages to be a captivating work, as if it was directed by the ½ Hebraic son that H.P. Lovecraft never had with his short-lived Jewish wife Sonia Greene. In a sense, The Keep is a cinematic tragedy of sorts as it has so many strong and strikingly aesthetic and even thematic elements, but is ultimately plagued by its own equally glaring aesthetic and thematic weaknesses. Indeed, with conspicuously contrived and ludicrous quotes from evil antagonist Sturmbannführer Kaempfer like, “The people that go to these resettlement camps... There are only two doors... One in and one out... The one out is a chimney,” The Keep is undoubtedly a work that is also tastelessly cheapened by the director’s personal political/religious bias. Indeed, you know there is a problem with a World War II film when the evil Nazi antagonist is so artificial and anti-human in persuasion that he makes Ralph Fiennes’ portrayal of Amon Goeth in Steven Spielberg’s Schindler’s List (1993) seem to possess as much depth as a character from an Ingmar Bergman film. Rather repellently, The Keep also makes absurd Marxist revisionist references to the Spanish Civil War by making it seem as if the ‘good guys’ (aka communists) tragically lost against Satan’s fascist army. Indeed, featuring a hopelessly redundant hodgepodge of softcore Marxist clichés and ludicrous leftist mysticism, decidedly dumbed down dichotomies between good and evil, demonization of German soldiers as killer kraut Ken dolls, and tasteless glorification of communist/Jewish partisans and Jewish intellectuals, The Keep is ultimately an awe-inspiring film as cinema history’s most ambitious agitprop neo-fairytale and an epic celluloid abortion that reminds the viewer that the so-called ‘holocaust’ is not a historical event but a religion with its own belief system, with Uncle Adolf being the devil incarnate. That being said, forget Claude Lanzmann’s epic snooze-fest Shoah (1985), The Keep is a real and honest holocaust flick of DeMille-esque proportions.

Michael Nankin (1980)

As far I am concerned, there is no such thing as a bad Joe Dallesandro film aside from possibly Francis Ford Coppola's The Cotton Club (1984) and a couple of his later works where he only has cameo roles, so naturally I will watch just about anything featuring the lapsed Warhol superstar. Of course, I jumped at the chance to see little Joe play a psychopathic fugitive killer in the Guido crime-thriller Madness (1980) aka Vacanze per un massacre aka Vacation for a Massacre directed by mafia movie maestro Fernando Di Leo (The Italian Connection, Rulers of the City). Personally, when it comes to the films of dirty dago director Di Leo, I prefer his more obscure and unconventional works like Avere vent'anni (1978) aka To Be Twenty to his much more popular Cosa Nostra-themed flicks, so Madness instantly grabbed my attention when I first discovered it, even if it seemed like a stereotypically sleazy exploitation flick with softcore sex scenes. Indeed, Madness is essentially like The Last House on the Left (1972) Italian style, albeit with Joe Dallesandro and a curiously cynical anti-bourgeois message where the 'victims' of killer Joe are almost less sympathetic than the killer himself. A wicked and biting celluloid work featuring misanthropy and misogyny that depicts young jet-set middle-class Hightalians as the most unscrupulous of money and cock-grubbing whores, Madness is certainly far from the 'victim power'/rightful revenge' message of Craven's The Last House on the Left, which is certainly one of the reasons the film is still provocative and outrageous today. Largely taking place in a country home decorated with posters of strangely creepy Hollywood icons like Marlon Brando, James Dean, and John Travolta, Madness portrays a decidedly degenerate and proudly decadent goombah bourgeois brain-washed by American trash culture and dedicated to then-vogue post-WWII politics like feminism and sexual liberation of the quasi-incestuous. Featuring a totally tasteless bizarre love triangle between a wop preppy, his girlfriend, and her sister, Madness indeed wallows in 'madness,' albeit more of the Cultural Marxist variety. Although director Di Leo suffered hostility from his fans and monetary failure for branching out to the urban crime-thriller ghetto with To Be Twenty, he had the great gall to follow it with Madness, a superlatively sleazy genre-less hybrid featuring elements of action, horror, thriller, mediocre melodrama, and good old exploitation excess. Like To Be Twenty, Madness was also a commercial failure that did not even receive an American distributor (thankfully RaroVideo released a dvd of it in 2012) and thus is virtually totally unknown, even amongst Dallesandro fans. Not exactly up to par with his performances in prestigious European arthouse works like Louis Malle's Black Moon (1975), Serge Gainsbourg's I Love You, I Don't (1976) aka Je t'aime moi non plus, Walerian Borowczyk's The Streetwalker (1976) aka La marge nor Jacques Rivette's Merry-Go-Round (1981), Madness is still mandatory viewing for Dallesandro fans, even if the Italian-American actor's blue-collar Brooklyn accent has been slaughtered via classically absurd Guido dubbing.

Joe Brezzi (Little Joe D) has just escaped prison and to celebrate, he kills two farmers, steals their car, and makes his way to a quaint cottage in the Italian countryside to dig up the 300 million lire that he hid in a fireplace hearth five years ago before he was locked up. Unfortunately, Joe B runs into a seemingly minor problem when he discovers that a lecherous good-for-nothing middle-class 'family' is staying there, thus thwarting his chances of swiftly collecting his well earned cash and making his way to some sort of paradise. From there, Madness evolves into a mildly idiosyncratic and totally tasteless and classless chamber piece where four completely calculating and corrupt degenerates do their damndest to survive, or at least die trying. While snooping around at night around the country home, Joe learns that its occupants are cheaters and liars unworthy of sympathy, let alone mercy, so he has a pretty good idea how to deal with these debauched folks. The 'man' of the house is a would-be-macho preppy outdoors-man named Sergio (Gianni Macchia) who is married to Liliana (Patrizia Behn), but is screwing her pseudo-feminist sister Paola (Lorraine De Selle) under the same roof! Of course, Paola, who seduces her sister's husband Sergio, is the true femme fatale of the humble abode and naturally she puts up the greatest fight when the mayhem begins. If any character is even remotely redeemable, it is Liliana as she at least genuinely loves her hubby, though she is too weak and vapid of a character to have any real sympathy for. After spying on them at night, Joe makes his first move the next morning and savagely seduces Paola whilst she is all by her lonesome. A born whore that knows all the tricks of the trade when it comes to seduction, Paola does everything she can to make Joe think she genuinely wants his cock, even flashing her furry bush at him while sitting in an unlady manner in a chair. Paola eventually attempts a great escape while totally unclad, but Joe soon catches her and no long after he also captures Sergio and Liliana. For his own sadistic enjoyment, but also to demonstrate to poor Liliana that her sister and husband are having an affair, Joe forces Sergio and Paola to have sex at gunpoint, which they do with the utmost gusto and sensuality despite hostile onlookers watching them in a viciously voyeuristic manner. After Joe demonstrates that he is the undisputed alpha-male of the home, but also to spite her sister and husband, Liliana has sex with the violent psychopathic fugitive. Meanwhile, Paola plots to steal Joe's small fortune. In the end, everyone dies except one bitter bitch who has been screwed over by everyone she loves (minus a murderous madman, who she screws over!)

Featuring a psychedelic soundtrack that sounds like Jimi Hendrix farting in a Whammy pedal created by maestro Luis Bacalov (Django, City of Women) and typically radically repellant 1970s wardrobes and home décor, Madness is not exactly an unsung masterpiece of Italian celluloid art but it is certainly a suave and sleazy way to waste 90 minutes or so. Probably best compared to Hitch-Hike (1977) aka Autoſtop rosso sangue ſtarring Franco Nero and David Hess in terms of its glittery Guido grade psychosexual tensions and culture cringe in regard to trendy counter-culture/sexual liberation politics of the time, Madness is certainly naſty and naughty cinematic nihilism at its moſt unwavering yet prepoſterouſly wanton. Although a couple more of his European era films, including Merry-Go-Round, were released after the Fernando Di Leo flick, Madness was apparently the laſt film Joe Dallesandro worked on in the old continent and I would not be ſurprised if he felt the experience was a negative one, thus leading to his return to the United States, yet his underſtated and naturaliſtic performance in the film is indubitably one of the moſt ſtrikingly ſtoic and macho of his ſingular career. Of course, out of all the actors featured in Madness, Patrizia Behn, who only ſtarred in a total of three films during her marginal acting career, would only appear in one more film, the hardcore porn flick La gemella erotica (1980) directed by great Guido sleaze-surrealiſt Alberto Cavallone (whose career had also declined and was forced to make porn flicks out of financial neceſſity, so he made rather unſavory and unhinged fuck flicks that would turn virtually no one on!) and later apparently completed by Luigi Cozzi. Director Fernando Di Leo's anteultimate feature film before his filmmaking career ended in 1985 (despite the fact he did not die until 2003) with Killer vs Killers, Madness, not unlike To Be Twenty, demonſtrates the filmmaker was getting much more angry and aeſthetically malicious as the years passed, as if he could foreſee his own downfall. A tragic yet trashy celluloid work offering nil redemption for its characters nor ſolace to its viewers, Madness is how all exploitation films ſhould be as a work that, unlike the films of Wes Craven, never reaches the cheap and intolerable level of espouſing humaniſtic ideals, liberal lunacy, or moral relativism. In other words, Madness is not an exploitation flick for brainwashed p.c. pussies, frigid feminiſts, mainſtream film critics, nor moſt Quentin Tarantino fans.

THIS WORLD, THEN THE FIREWORKS
THIS WORLD, THEN THE FIREWORKS

Michael Oblowitz (1997)

As far as neo-noir is considered, you probably cannot get more gorgeously grotesque and, in turn, debasingly aesthetically indelible than Michael Oblowitz's fairly unknown Jim Thompson adaptation This World, Then the Fireworks (1997) starring virtual walking-and-talking-human-genitals Billy Zane, Gina Gershon, and Sheryl Lee. In fact, I have no qualms about confessing that I believe that it is easily the greatest Thompson adaptation ever made and I say that as someone that is a fan of both Bertrand Tavernier's Coup de Torchon (1981) and James Foley's After Dark, My Sweet (1990). Both a hyper histrionic homage and misanthropically deconstructive mutation of classic film noir, the film takes a surprisingly refreshingly heavy-handed approach to depicting fraternal twin incest, la mort d'amour and accidental necrophilia, matricide, Mexican back-alley abortions, opium addiction, prostitution, posttraumatic stress, and a variety of other mostly salacious subjects that auteur Oblowitz—a South African Jew that was once loosely associated with the largely artistically bankrupt No Wave Cinema scene—clearly loves wallowing in. In short, the film is an innately immoral cinematic work directed by an innately immoral filmmaker who, not surprisingly, worked as a cinematographer on a number of Rosa von Praunheim films, including aberrosexual agitprop like Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts (1979) and fiercely retarded feminist drivel like Rote Liebe (1982) aka Red Love. While I can only assume Oblowitz is heterosexual, he must have learned a thing or two from the corrosive kraut queen as his Thompson adaptation features more than one fat naked dude and a preteen boy getting the shit beat out of him while wearing nothing but tighty whities. While depriving the viewer of full bush, the film does thankfully features some nicely styled nudes of Gershon and Lee, though one gets the sense that the auteur sees sex as being about as special as a bonafide bowel movement. Indeed, instead of presenting coitus as something intimate or possibly even spiritual, Oblowitz depicts it as a sort of base demonic energy that can be used as either a weapon or form of currency, though it has very little true intrinsic value otherwise. In fact, in the film—a dark noir romance featuring an incest-fueled bizarre love triangle—sex is depicted as the true root of all evil, especially as far as the forsaken male protagonist and his similarly vulgarly tragic twin sister are concerned. Undoubtedly, if there is anything else that rivals carnality in terms of sheer weaponized nefariousness in the film, it is family, as familial matters are the direct source of the main characters' untamable malevolence and crippling metaphysical and psycho-emotional maladies. As the son of a purported holocaust survivor, Oblowitz—an auteur that is obsessed with style and form but seems a little handicapped as far as deep human emotions are concerned—indubitably takes a curious approach to interfamilial trauma, but I digress.

Apparently, the genesis for the film dates all the way back to 1982 after Oblowitz first read a bootlegged Xeroxed copy of Jim Thompson's pulp classic The Killer Inside Me (1952) and became completely obsessed with directing a cinematic adaptation of the novel. After failing to acquire the rights to the novel and a couple failed attempts at adapting other Thompson novels, Oblowitz thankfully finally settled on the author's posthumously released short story This World, Then the Fireworks, though he would get fellow Judaic Larry Gross—a fairly unknown writer that is probably best remembered in the Hollywood realm for doing last minute (and oftentimes uncredited) polishes and rewrites of high-profile scripts, most notably Walter Hill's fairly successful buddy cop flick 48 Hrs. (1982)—to pen the project. Not surprisingly, both Oblowitz and Gross reveal in featurettes on the 2017 Kino Lorber blu-ray release of the film that they regard it as among their greatest artistic accomplishments. While Oblowitz originally gained notoriety for his gritty No Wave flicks Minus Zero (1979) and King Blank (1983)—the latter of which had the honor of playing on a double bill as a midnight movie with David Lynch's masterful debut feature Eraserhead—he subsequently artistically degenerated into a for-hire music video hack and is probably best known nowadays for directing such rather unrefined direct-to-video Steven Seagal action-schlock as Out for a Kill (2003) and The Foreigner (2003), among other similarly embarrassing efforts. In short, there is no question that This World, Then the Fireworks is Oblowitz's crowning achievement as a filmmaker, though only a malevolently morally bankrupt man could sire such a gleefully unhinged, intoxicatingly nihilistic, and lunatically libertine magnum opus. Of course, it goes without saying that the film has one of the coolest and misleadingly poetic titles in cinema history, hence my initial (admittedly largely superficial) interest in seeing it. Luckily, the film lives up to its preternaturally poesy title.

While Oblowitz shares next to nil similarities with Robert Bresson, I think he would appreciate the French master auteur's cinematic aphorism, "Master precision. Be a precision instrument myself." Indeed, This World, Then the Fireworks is by no means an immaculate film yet nearly every single scene feels perfectly constructed with the fanatical meticulousness of an OCD-addled locksmith, thus underscoring the director's obsession with extensive storyboarding and longtime experience as a music video director that was obligated to construct very precise and calculated tableaux. For better or worse, many of the scenes manage to leave an indelible mark on the viewer; whether it be a cockeyed low-angle shot of a bloody yet beautiful post-abortion corpse lying on a dirty metal slab in some Mexican hellhole or a big gob of blood splattering across the smiling face of a seemingly innocent 4-year-old child. In fact, the lack of empathy or any other emotion in these scenes leads me to conclude that Oblowitz is either an unabashed sociopath or at a Tarantino-esque level of emotional retardation, but luckily the film somehow manages to be both darkly humorous and even somewhat romantic. In short, it is anything but banal. If I didn't know better, I would assume that the film was a romantic-comedy for killer couples like Bonnie and Clyde and Shirley Stoler and Tony Lo Bianco, but of course that is one of the things that makes it so strangely intriguing, if not largely psychologically and emotionally deleterious. Personally, as a somewhat antisocial individual that has always been in relationships with relatively asocial chicks, I am always a sucker for a certain sort of mad love and This World, Then the Fireworks certainly delivers in that regard, even though I am not into incest or brutal coldblooded murder, among other things. To put it simply, Oblowitz's flick is the sort of cinematic work Georges Bataille might have directed had he been a psychotic redblooded stud instead of a wimpy degenerate intellectual. On the other hand, I would not exactly call the murderous male antihero featured in the film an alpha-male, as he is a mentally cracked chap that is practically led around by the scent of the cunt of the twin sister that he loves, at least until he falls under the spell of another scenty snatch, albeit of the non-sibling sort.

Notably, in his classic philosophical novel Thus Spoke Zarathustra: A Book for All and None, Teutonic philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche—a fellow that was not exactly that successful when it came to the so-called fairer sex—wrote, “Man is for woman a means; the purpose is always the child, But what is woman for man? The true man wants two different things: danger and diversion. He therefore wants woman, as the most dangerous plaything. Man must be trained for war, and woman for the relaxation of the warrior; all else is folly. Two sweet fruits – these the warrior does not like. He therefore likes women – even the sweetest woman is bitter.” While woman is indubitably “the most dangerous plaything” in This World, Then the Fireworks, the male antihero is certainly no warrior, at least not in any conventional sense. Additionally, the two main female characters, who are beyond bitter, are only interested in the monetary and material and hardly the maternal, as they unequivocally embody the ‘prostitute archetype,’ at least in the Weiningerian sense. In fact, the male antihero played by Billy Zane is too much of an emotionally erratic pretty boy ponce to even compare to the lean and mean hardboiled stoicism of a great film noir star like Humphrey Bogart. Additionally, the film features two very different femme fatales, including a fiery Mediterranean-like literal whore of the sensually unhinged sort and a cryptically killer lady-cop of the naggy Nordic ice queen variety. In fact, it could be argued that these lethal ladies are symbolic dichotomous reflections of the quasi-schizophrenic antihero's considerably conflicted personality. Undoubtedly, Oblowitz's loves these fatally frisky femme fatales as much as he loathes the white picket fence morals and wholesome WASP cultural supremacy that defined the 1950s, but one should not expect anything less from a man that directs holocaust-themed vampire flicks like The Breed (2001) that feature the nasty (and uniquely improbable) novelty of a negro-chink miscegenation (if that wasn't distasteful enough, the film also features a literal Judaic vampire that accuses the same negro of being a 'racist' because he is immune to his Hebraic bloodsucking charms). Indeed, This World, Then the Fireworks is not so much a 'neo-noir' as a sociopathically sardonic tribute to the fact that film noir did the most, at least cinematically speaking, to demystify the American dream and piss on the white Christian majority population that greatly valued said dream. Undoubtedly, Oblowitz's film is as nostalgically American as anthrax-laced (kosher) apple pie. In short, Oblowitz's film does for 1950s America what Harmony Korine's directorial debut Gummo (1997) did for poor contemporary crackers in terms of its aesthetically Talmudic approach to tearing at the moral fabric of the white American goyim until there is nothing but a single weak thread.

As shamelessly incestuous siblings that have practically been attached at the genitals since birth and seem to sometimes share the same mind in terms of their particularly perverse thoughts and carnal (and killer) desires, Marty Lakewood (Billy Zane) and his sister Carol (Gina Gershon) are virtual 'psychosexual Siamese twins.' Aside from sharing the same rotten white trash womb, the fraternal twins were also victims of the same traumatic childhood event that occurred on their fourth birthday in July 4th 1926, which involved their mindless mother abruptly aborting their b-day party to drag them over to a house across the street just in time to witness their completely naked fat fuck father, who was rudely interrupted while fucking his mistress, blowing out the brains of the angry armed fellow that he had just so brazenly cuckolded, or as Marty nostalgically narrates in regard to the impact of the event on his life, "It was funny. It was funnier than Charlie Chaplin or Krazy Kat. The man on the floor didn't have hardly any head at all. And dad and the women – they were naked. Dad went to the electric chair and the women committed suicide. Mom was scarred for life but . . . they were naked and it was funny. It was so funny, I remember. I remember that night well." A sort of bargain bin nihilist philosopher that might have read Mencken but never Nietzsche and who absolutely loves living dangerously as a perversely invasive yellow journalist, Marty lives by the personal Weltanschauung, "Nothing really happens for a reason, it just happens," as if it was the only logical conclusion that he could come to after witnessing his papa commit coldblooded post-coital murder when he was just a wee lad. While it is now 1956 and three decades have passed since his deadly daddy destroyed the psychological and emotional integrity of his entire family, Marty, his sister Carol, and mother Mrs. Lakewood (Rue McClanahan of The Golden Girls fame) have clearly never recovered and have instead degenerated into psychological grotesque human monsters with great sex appeal. Needless to say, when Marty moves back in with his beloved sis and mental mommy after being forced to flee Chicago, old wounds are opened up and old incestuous desires are acted upon, though a bizarre love triangle eventually threatens the sanctity of the extra special brother-sister relationship.

Despite always loving one another, the twins made a rather revealing childhood pact to both marry unlovable losers, or as Marty narrates, “Carol and I did what we said we were going to do back when we were kids. We chose to marry someone that no one else wanted. Someone scorned and shamed and cast aside.” Indeed, while Carol married some rich abusive loser that later dropped dead and resulted in her less than prestigious career as a lowly street hooker, Marty married and even sired a son with a big bloated 400-pound beastess that, in terms of sheer physical attractiveness, is not even worthy of lapping up his rancid excrement. Not surprisingly, when Marty is forced to flee Chicago after his junky pal ‘Joe’ (Richard Edson)—a doped up ex-journalist that provides the dirt on dirty cops in exchange for morphine—is killed by a group of corrupt cops and he becomes the next target due to the incriminating info he has on local law enforcement, he does not think twice about completely abandoning his wife and similarly obscenely overweight son. Of course, considering his rather ambivalent attitude cops and undying love his twin sister, Marty probably never suspected that moving to California to be with his family would eventually lead to himself falling in love with a cop, albeit one with a rather wicked blonde cunt. As Marty proudly narrates in regard to his homecoming, “It did not matter being broke. Carol and I were together again. After three long years—the longest we had been separated. Nothing else seemed to matter.” Rather unfortunately, Carol—a beauteous yet irreparably broken babe that makes her living as a pussy-peddler that seems to specialize in using her womb to suck up the semen of violent rape-obsessed sailors—is somewhat of an emotional wreck. Of course, the same can be certainly said of fairly deranged Marty’s drug-addled mother, who cannot live with the fact that her darling children are lifelong lovers. Rather unfortunately but not surprisingly, Marty will be the only one that is still alive at the end of the film, as Carol and their mother seem to be too ill-equipped to confront past traumas and move on with their lives. As for Marty, he gets involved with some somewhat sinister stuff, but he also discovers a true love—or something resembling it—that does not share the same tainted blood.

Not long after moving back home with his sister and mother, Marty manages to snag a position at the biggest newspaper in town and becomes such a good journalist that he compels his co-employees to live in constant fear and even succumb to alcoholism due to not being able to compete with his inordinate diligence and singular workaholic ethos. Although devilishly clever and a rather ruthless employee, Marty is also plagued with a certain vehement irrationalism that inspires him to quit his job after he has virtually risen to the top of the ladder of the local daily rag. Indeed, Marty might be a virtual moron when it comes to morals, but he lacks the sort of sociopathic careerism that defined the reporter played by Kirk Douglas in Billy Wilder’s desert noir Ace in the Hole (1951) aka The Big Carnival. Indeed, when his prick boss—a cynical scumbag that seems to be able to develop a hard-on at the mere thought of debasing his employees—dares to offer him a nice new position after firing a co-worker, Marty becomes completely deranged and both physically and verbally assaults his considerably shocked employer because he is paranoid that the man has figured out his wants and motivations, which makes perfect sense when one considers that he is a mensch that carries around the deep dark secret that he is in love with his own twin sister and has dedicated virtually his entire life to serving and protecting her. In fact, the film features a childhood flashback scene where a preteen Marty brutally beats a couple young boys with a large stick that dare to attempt to gang-rape his sister in a bittersweet scenario that concludes with an inordinately tender shot of the incestuous twins holding one another during the twilight of the blue hour. As Marty candidly states in regard to his relationship with Carol, “We felt each other’s feelings. We thought each other’s thoughts. We didn’t care what anyone thought of us and that was unforgivable. For that, we had to be punished.” Somewhat ironically, it is only when Marty begins to love someone else just as much as his sister that he is truly punished for his carnal crimes.

In what ultimately proves to be almost too conveniently auspicious of circumstances, Marty almost immediately spots the wanton woman that, for better or worse, will completely change his life shortly after quitting his job. Indeed, upon first seeing delectable dame Lois Archer (Sheryl Lee)—a busty blonde bombshell of the law that is as socially awkward as she is sexy—Marty gets a little bit too excited and quite literally manhandles her in broad daylight right outside of a semi-busy public courthouse. While initially awkwardly defensive to the point where she acts like she is going to arrest him, it soon becomes rather apparent that lusty Lois is desperate to jump Marty’s bones and that she is quite smitten with the proudly aberrant antihero’s Lothario-like brand of lunacy. While Marty asks her rather sleazy personal questions like, “Are you blonde all over or just where it shows?,” Lois soon comes to the conclusion that she wants to engage in a little bip-bam-thank-you-ma’am with him and rather firmly demands, “I want you to come home with me right now.” Notably, not only does Marty go to Lois’ house and engage in heated carnal session with her, but he also soon becomes obsessed with her and her humble abode, which is a scenic beachfront property. While Marty seems to genuinely like Lois, he also immediately begins plotting to swindle her out of her beach house, which is worth a whopping $30,000 (keep in mind, this is the 1950s) and is unfortunately co-owned by her estranged soldier brother. Indeed, as he soon tells his sister, Marty hopes to kill Lois’ brother and own the house within a mere month. Rather unfortunately, Marty might be a sick sociopath of sorts, but he also soon finds himself falling in love with luscious Lois, who seems to almost immediately dominate him in the bedroom as demonstrated by the fact that she is almost always laying on top of him during their intimate post-coital discussions in a manner that makes it seem like she just finished ravishing his rectum him with a sizable strap-on dildo. Undoubtedly, Lois’ sexual dominance is ultimately a form of fetishistic foreshadowing.

THIS WORLD, THEN THE FIREWORKS

As demonstrated by the fact that he gleefully murders a grotesquely morbidly obese 'private dick' named Jake Krutz (William Hootkins) that dares to keep tabs on his sister, Marty can certainly be described as a sadistic sociopath yet he, like so many of his psychologically defective kind, is so damn undeniably likeable. Of course, Marty wears a rather handsome mask of sanity that hides a scared little boy that more or less regresses to an infantile state anytime his hyper hysterical mommy says mean things to him. In fact, he does not even try to deny it when his sister says to him, "I know you like to play the big old rough, tough guy, but deep down you're just a sentimental slob." When Marty suffers a mental meltdown after his mother accuses him and his sister of engaging in incest and then states hateful things to them like, "You both should have been strangled at birth," Carol opts to kill her by personally feeding her an intentional overdose of her favorite bedtime drug in a twisted scene of morbidly ironic matricide where a grown daughter feeds her borderline elderly mother in a mock maternal fashion. While Marty is an unrepentant murderer and debauched degenerate of the quite consciously remorseless sort, his sister Carol, who seems to be largely driven by a certain fierce feral-like instinct, is even more ruthless as a decidedly deranged dame that nonchalantly brags about fatally poisoning men, though her cuntlet seems to be her most killer weapon as demonstrated by the fact that manages to unwittingly fuck a man to death. Indeed, when Carol becomes so electrically aroused upon remembering the tragic event from her 4th birthday, she causes an insurance salesman named Barnett Gibbons (Larry Clarks) to become a victim of 'dying in the saddle' as she violently rides his cock whilst in a seemingly demonic state. Somewhat surprisingly, Carol, who is not one to cry about dead johns, acts as if she is completely traumatized as a result of committing unintentional necrophilia, but that does not stop her bro from crudely quipping, "I've got to hand it to you, dear. You're probably the first hooker in recorded history to induce seizures and cerebral hemorrhage." Clearly emotionally troubled, Carol acts as if she is on the path of orgasmic self-obliteration. Luckily, Marty now has Lois to take Carol's place.

While Marty still intends to rob Lois and her brother of their cute little beach house, he cannot seem to stop himself from falling hopelessly in love with his self-described "copulating cop." Needless to say, sister-fucker Marty also expresses guilt and confusion at his love for Lois, as if he cannot even bear the thought of emotionally devote himself to any other woman aside from his twin. Aside from incessantly fucking her, Marty also enjoys engaging in non-sexual recreational activities with Lois like shooting framed family photos on the beach. In fact, the rather senseless shooting of the photos foreshadows the end of both Marty and Lois' little families. Eventually, Marty even finds himself unable to confront Lois about selling the house because he is "afraid of spoiling that sweet wildness" of their hot and heavy romance, thus hinting that the antihero might not have the spirit of a psychotic gigolo after all. Of course, like every single woman that seems to be too good to be true, Lois eventually becomes rather bitchy and attempts to emotionally manipulate Marty by strategically stating to him, "I only love you. I love you more than anyone else in the whole world and I want to hear the exact same thing back from you." Not surprisingly, when Marty fails to give Lois her desired response, she becomes exceedingly enraged and accuses him of engaging in incest, screaming at him in regard to Carol, "I think you're fucking her! I think you're fucking that little tramp!" Naturally, Marty finds the seemingly phony drama queen to be fairly insufferable and he soon finds himself emotionally and physically abusing Lois, though she seems to enjoy it. Although clearly somewhat masochistic, Lois, like most masochists, is clearly the one that is in control of the relationship. Of course, as an ice cold femme fatale with a nice warm pussy, Lois has ulterior motives and is ultimately playing Marty like a pawn. Indeed, unbeknownst to Marty, Lois' so-called brother is really her estranged husband and she actually wants the antihero to murder him. Meanwhile, a local cop named Detective Harris (Seymour Cassel)—a rather ruthless asshole that knows a scumbag when he sees one—brings Marty to the local police station for questioning and informs him that he is looking for Carol as he believes that she is responsible for the death of both the private detective Jake Krutz and insurance salesman Barnett Gibbons.

Somewhat ironically, most of Marty's problems are solved after Carol dies under grisly circumstances as a result of a botched morphine-fueled back-alley abortion in Mexico. Not surprisingly, Marty, who seems to be still slightly grieving over the death of his mother, does not take the quite unexpected news of Carol's death too well. Indeed, when the Mexican abortionist, who acts rather remorseful, calls him on the phone to inform him of his sister's death, Marty is initially in denial and proceeds to scream in regard to Carol's corpse, "Throw it in the ocean. Throw in a garbage dump. Throw it in an alley so the little dogs can piss on it." When Lois tries to comfort him about his sister's death, mad Marty gives her a swift punch to her pretty little face and then screams with the visceral rage of a dozen AIDS-ridden queens, "Don't EVER feel sorry for me. Ever! Ever!" In the end, Marty's seems to soon get over Carol's death and his big criminal plans also workout, as he kills Lois' 'brother' and gets her to sell the beach house. As it turns out, Lois more or less had the same exact plan as Marty in regard to cashing in on the beach house and the two ultimately revealed to have used each other. Of course, the great irony is that Marty was an unwitting pawn and that Lois used him to execute the murder so that she could liquidate her unwanted husband and sell the house. Now a completely emasculated 'kept man,' Marty is symbolically told to "move over" in a rather bitchy fashion at the very end of the film as the two get in a car and leave town for good to start a new life together. Indeed, now relegated to the passenger seat, Marty is no longer in control of his entire life. On top of everything else, Marty is met with disdain when he warmly tells Lois "I love you," but at least he no longer seems perennially trapped in the same grotesque figurative womb as his belated twin sister and thus can quite worrying about the possibility of siring an inbred demon seed. In that sense, it is only fitting that sister Carol dropped dead while in the middle of receiving a third world grade abortion.

While This World, Then the Fireworks—a cinematic where, at least thematically speaking, madness is the method—is not exactly a ‘message movie’ and it has very little to offer in regard to the stereotypical Hollywood-esque realm of the ostensibly morally redeeming, it does provide male viewers with an insight or two in regard to the mystique of the so-called fairer sex. Indeed, the film’s antihero Marty learns the hard way that, no matter how angelically beautiful and seemingly passive and faithful a woman may seem, women are innately manipulative subspecies and a woman will always reveal her true ugly self and ulterior motive(s) over time when she finally achieves what she secretly wants. As innately fucked up as it is, antihero Marty’s twin sister Carol was the only person that selflessly and organically loved him for who he actually was while his platinum blonde cop girlfriend Lois—a vamp tramp with a venomous vag and crooked badge that makes Rita Hayworth’s character in Orson Welles’ The Lady from Shanghai (1947) seem rather sweet and sensitive by comparison—is a chillingly cold cunt that will probably have him killed one day under dubious circumstances. In fact, despite spending a good portion of the film sweaty and unclad, actress Sheryl Lee does such an excellent job portraying a cunning cunt and all around loathsomely insufferable bitch that even the most die hard of Twin Peaks fans might find themselves losing empathy for her famous TV character Laura Palmer after watching Oblowitz’s film (on the other hand, no heterosexual men wouldn’t want to sexually ravage this busty blonde bitch). Of course, despite being a violent killer with a propensity for completely pointless gleeful sadism, Marty—an oftentimes hysterical and irrational pen-pusher that is prettier than most women—does not exactly embody any sort of great masculine ideal. Undoubtedly, when I think of mad mensch Marty and his covertly feminine attributes, I cannot help but be reminded of the great self-loathing Viennese Hebrew Otto Weininger’s wise words, “The meaning of women is to be meaningless. She represents negation, the opposite pole from the Godhead, the other possibility of humanity. And so nothing is so despicable as a man become female, and such a person will be regarded as the supreme criminal even by himself. And so also is to be explained the deepest fear of man; the fear of the woman, which is the fear of unconsciousness, the alluring abyss of annihilation.” Indeed, Marty is hardly your typical film noir (anti)hero, but instead the sort of violently emotionally erratic and wickedly narcissistic virtual male gigolo that could easily be the son of some sociopathic femme fatale that waited too long to get an abortion. Despite his fiercely fatal flaws, Marty is certainly portrayed in a more positive light than the film’s authority figures, thus underscoring semitic auteur Oblowitz and fellow chosenite Gross’ deep-seated hatred for authority, or, more specifically and importantly, WASP American pie authority. Needless to say, I do not think it is a stretch to assume that Oblowitz sees swarthy Marty as a sort of crypto-Jew (of course, one also cannot forget that the character's sister Carol is played by seductive Jewess Gina Gershon).

As the uniquely uneven oeuvre of suicidal (anti)auteur Tony Scott (and, to a lesser extent, his brother Ridley) demonstrates, starting a filmmaking career as a music video director can be an aesthetically deleterious thing as it can cause a filmmaker to become more obsessed with style, form, and especially editing than narrative constructive, among other things, yet Oblowitz's pre-Hollywood background certainly seems to have been to his benefit for at least his magnum opus. Indeed, This World, Then the Fireworks certainly echoes the dark fragmented mind of its demented dipsomaniac source writer Jim Thompson, as it is a gleefully nihilistic film that could have only been spawned from the mind of an individual (or individuals) that has surrendered their morality and self-esteem to the figurative hell of addiction. Notably, in the featurette The Straight Dope (2017), Oblowitz happily describes previous affinity for cocaine and how it fueled his filmmaking. In the same short doc, Oblowitz also makes the somewhat lofty claim that pulp auteur Samuel Fuller's widow Christa Lang, who was personal friends with the The Killer Inside Me writer, once confided to him that Thompson regarded his film as the best of the cinematic adaptations of his stories (notably, Oblowitz is not the first chosenite to adapt the pulp writer's work, as Kubrick's The Killing (1956), which Thompson co-penned, and Jewess Maggie Greenwald's The Kill-Off (1990) both predate Oblowitz's film). According to Robert Polito in his biography Savage Art: A Biography of Jim Thompson (1995), Mr. Fuller was so obsessed with adapting Thompson's novel The Getaway that he once half-jokingly stated that he would be fully willing to use the novel as the shooting script (unfortunately for Fuller, it was Sam Peckinpah that ultimately adapted the novel, though it is, rather unfortunately, much tamer than its source material). Speaking of Fuller, even his darkest and grittiest films seem like works of cerebral optimism compared to Oblowitz's semi-oneiric odyssey in white picket fence obscenity. Indeed, while Fuller was obsessed with crime and criminals, Oblowitz's film is virtual criminality in cinematic form as a feverishly fucked flick that demonstrates a certain innate and strangely organic lawless spirit as if it was directed by a serial killer that wanted to boast about all the crimes he committed but was too morally bankrupt and narcissistically unaware to see how unflattering of a portrait that he painted of himself. In short, it is no surprise that This World, Then the Fireworks was directed by a man that was so obsessed with intimate 'first-person serial killer narrative' structure of The Killer Inside Me that he waited about 15 years just to have the opportunity to adapt one of Thompson's novels.

As a thematically dark and grim film that has about as much organic pathos and pangs as an erratically shot homemovie of a pink poodle vomiting, This

THIS WORLD, THEN THE FIREWORKS

World, Then the Fireworks is certainly from the Norman Mailer School of aesthetically autistic neo-noir filmmaking. Indeed, aside from Mailer's swansong Tough Guys Don't Dance (1987), the only other 'neo-noir' film that I can really compare it to in terms of sheer moral bankruptcy, vulgar dark humor, counterfeit pseudo-Lynchian posturing, spasmodic storytelling, and Southern Gothic influence (although set in California, Oblowitz's film was actually shot in North Carolina) is Dennis Hopper's clearly flawed but somewhat underrated Don Johnson vehicle The Hot Spot (1990). Surely, what all of these films have in common aside from being deeply flawed yet equally enthralling is that they seem to have all been helmed by genuine sickos and sociopaths, though one can certainly argue that Hopper's moral retardation and offbeat megalomania was the natural result of decades of alcohol and drug consumption and wild orgies (notably, The Hot Spot features a surprisingly tasteful rear-view pussyspot of a very young and nubile Jennifer Connelly in a sensitive Sapphic flashback scene). As for Oblowitz and Mailer (the latter of whom once made a rather violent attempt at murdering his second wife, Hispanic painter Adele Morales, by stabbing her with a penknife and was subsequently deemed "both homicidal and suicidal" by a judge after an involuntary stay in a mental institution), I think it is safe to say that their films are the product of unfiltered narcissistic pathology in sexually steamy yet sardonic anti-shiksa cinematic form. Despite all the endless Hebraic Hollywood films that attempt to portray whites, especially poor white lumpenproles, as being inbred hicks, incest is indubitably a perennial Judaic obsession. Indeed, from Freud (who popularized pseudo-scientific mumbo jumbo about Oedipal mommy-fucking) to Einstein (who married his maternal first cousin/paternal second cousin Elsa Löwenthal) to the eponymous family of Andrew Jarecki's dubiously sympathetic Capturing the Friedmans (2003) to Oblowitz, incest is undoubtedly an obsession, if not practiced behavior, among many prominent Jews throughout history. Collectively speaking, Ashkenazim are among the most inbred people in the entire world and carry a number of distinct genetic and mental disorders, but I think that Oblowitz's obsession with incest probably has more to do with the (meta)political than the sexual. As Georges Bataille noted in his work Erotism: Death and Sensuality, Hebraic frog anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss argued that the banning of incest by society is, ". . . the primary step thanks to which, through which, and especially in which, the transition from Nature to Culture is made." Needless to say, This World, Then the Fireworks is an assault against culture, namely white America culture, hence the importance of hot and steamy incest. Notably, Oblowitz's Judaic ethnocentrism becomes rather obvious in interviews, including one where he remarked that when comparing working with goyish South African novelist J.M. Coetzee and Hebraic lawyer turned novelist Thane Rosenbaum, "It was the difference between dealing with an Afrikaner and a New York Jew." It is also somewhat curious that a man that would take a rather a gleeful approach to cinematically depicting the horrific childhood trauma of 4-year-old twins witnessing their naked father blowing out another man's brains with a shotgun in This World, Then the Fireworks to state that his own father's personal shoah stories were responsible for leaving, "a tattoo from the Holocaust engraved on my heart." To Oblowitz's credit, his vampire flick The Breed, which was actually shot in real WWII era Jewish ghettos, does not exactly take a respectful approach to paying tribute to the holocaust. In a sense, Oblowitz's film is a sort of anti-Blue Velvet as anti-hero Marty Lakewood is like a younger version of archetypal Lynchian villain Frank Booth. Of course, whereas Booth epitomizes pure and innate evil, Marty is depicted by Oblowitz—a kosher culture-distorter with a clear hatred for the small suburban town of Lynch's youth—as an audacious antidote to the cultural sterility and sexual repression of 1950s American suburbia. Judging simply by his unequivocal magnum opus, I can only come to the conclusion that Oblowitz sees fraternal twin incest as being highly preferable to the typical WASP nuclear family, but I digress.

For all its decided degeneracy and seemingly anti-Europid meanderings, I think I could accept the prospect of endearing This World, Then the Fireworks for eternity were I to be so irrevocably forsaken as to fall out of favor with god and his Jewish bastard son and be cast into hell. While I am not a merry murder of the incestuous sort that delights in giving my twin sister bubble bathes like antihero Marty, I can certainly relate to the antihero's grotesque outlaw romanticism and lack of empathy for the greater part of humanity, not to mention his self-destructive affinity for bat-shit-crazy (and beach-friendly) blondes and fiercely frisky Mediterranean bitches. As a sort of unconventional aesthete that prefers my pulchritude to have a sort of dark yet passionate perversity, I also appreciate the film for being the virtual cinematic equivalent to a debauched dream prom date with Karla Homolka that concludes with an orgy with the more attractive of the Manson Family sluts. In that sense, This World, Then the Fireworks—a film that basks in the recklessly hedonistic—is an evil erotic fantasy set somewhere between heaven and hell. Undoubtedly, the spirit of the film can probably be summed up by Judaic Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey's somewhat reasonable words, "There is a beast in man that should be exercised, not exorcised."

AYN RAND: A SENSE OF LIFE

Michael Paxton (1998)

Ayn Rand is one of the few intellectuals and philosophers of the past century that is worth noting. I say that she is one of “few” because she led an unofficial campaign to reveal the intellectual dishonesty of most so-called “intellectuals” that were attempting to (and did) propagate collectivism, cultural Marxism, altruism, and other related cancers that have infiltrated American “culture.” Ayn Rand was originally from Soviet Russia and knew all too well the inhumanity that “altruistic” collectivism caused. Ayn Rand: A Sense of Life is an illuminating documentary on the novelist, screenwriter, philosopher, intellectual, and overall humanitarian. Many New York types have ignorantly labeled Ayn Rand a white Russian due to her hatred of Bolshevism and other related Marxist garbage. This assumption is wrong as Rand (born Alisa Zinov'yevna Rosenbaum) grew up in a secular cosmopolitan Jewish family, a group that was often pro-Bolshevik in nature as they deemed the Czar and Russian empire as “anti-Semitic.” Rand, a life-long proponent of individualism, was completely disgusted by Bolshevik collectivism and made her way to “the land of the free,” the United States. Ayn Rand: A Sense of Life follows Rand’s love for foreign Western cultures and her desire to leave Russia, a place she always had contempt for. Ayn Rand first had aspirations of being a film screenwriter and made her way for Hollywood. By chance she ended up meeting Cecil B. DeMille. Impressed by Rand and her big penetrating eyes, DeMille invited Rand to play an extra in his biblical epic King of Kings. DeMille, an ethnic Jew, was notorious for his homoerotic undertones in his biblical films. Many have questioned whether Cecil B. DeMille was an artist or not, but his knack for cryptic themes leads me to believe that he deserves more credit than film critics have given him. On the film set, Rand would also meet her lifelong husband Frank O’Connor. The marriage between Ayn Rand and Frank O’Connor is one much more interesting than you would find in any Hollywood film. Both husband and wife had a deep respect for one another and dedicated a lifetime to inspiring one another. At one point in their marriage, Rand would cheat on O’Connor but surprisingly it did not affect their marriage. Rand’s detractors have even gone as far as comparing marriage to “the holocaust” and “slavery.” Once again, Rand was able to prove by action and life experience that her beliefs were more than just rational. Irrationality is what Rand considered to be the biggest destroyer of Western civilization and humanity in general. Her philosophy Objectivism firmly promote objective rationality and reason, things that are today shunned by mainstream intellectuals who promote slanderously irrational cultural Marxism. In Rand’s masterpiece The New Left: The Anti-Industrial Revolution, she exposes the source of modern day academia idiocy. Rand warns college students, “reason and morality are the only weapons that determine the course of history. The collectivists dropped them because they had no right to carry them up. Pick them up: you have.” If anyone wants to now why America is resembling the degeneracy that made the Roman empire dissolve, The New Left: The Anti-Industrial Revolution is a mandatory reading. Ayn Rand was also one of the courageous few that confronted the communist humanity traitors that were running Hollywood. In 1947, she voluntarily testified before the United States Un-American Activities Committee regarding the Bolshevik propaganda filth peddlers in Hollywood and her own childhood experience in the Soviet Union. Rand also had the courage to analytically dissect the lies in the pro-communist Hollywood film Song of Russia (1944). Hollywood still makes pro-communist films to this day (Enemy at the Gates and Good Night, and Good Luck) and no one seems to care after up to 100 million deaths in the Soviet Union alone. Virtually every other movie that comes out of Hollywood has some type of fantasy cultural Marxist angle. Ayn Rand is probably most famous for her novels The Fountainhead and Atlas Shrugged. Like Rand’s philosophy of Objectivism, the two novels stress the importance of individualism and personal integrity. In an interview during Rand’s later years, she admits that she had the same philosophy towards life since the age of 2 ½. From this, one can gather that Ayn Rand has had an independent mind since the beginning. In a world where all children are indoctrinated during their most vital years to not care about themselves and tolerate degeneracy, Rand’s dreams of reason and rationality for all have been all but destroyed. Thankfully, Rand has left the world with a wealth of important books, and Ayn Rand: A Sense of Life is an interesting synopsis of her incredible life.

PEEPING TOM

Michael Powell (1960)

Maybe it is because I do not give a shit if anyone knows that Hitchcock is nowhere near one of my all-time favorite directors, but I do not have to think twice about saying that I am more a Peeping Tom (1960) kind of guy than a Psycho (1960) kind of guy. While I cannot remember the first time I saw Hitchcock's Psycho or how many times I have seen it total, I have only seen Peeping Tom twice, with my first time being about a decade ago and my second time being a day ago. While I still think Hitchcock's proto-slasher flick is a groundbreaking masterpiece in its own right, even if it did have a strong influence on the mostly aesthetically worthless slasher sub-genre, there is just something about a crazed kraut would-be-auteur murdering dumb bimbos with his tripod whilst filming their reactions as they die that is slightly more captivating than seeing a weirdo bourgeois fag like Anthony Perkins roaming around in an outmoded grandma dress. The once-infamous film that more or less ruined the career of highly respected English auteur Michael Powell (Black Narcissus, The Tales of Hoffmann) and introduced sex to celluloid for the perennially frigid British public (the work is noted for being the first mainstream British film to feature nudity), Peeping Tom is, among other things, arguably the greatest film ever made on the subject of scopophilia (which is actually mentioned in the film and described by a rather Jew-y psychiatrist character featured in the movie as, "The morbid urge to gaze"), as a work that seems just as critical of the viewer as it is self-critical on the director's part as a perniciously playful work where an aspiring filmmaker quite literally kills, including himself, for his art. The story of a terribly deranged and equally lonely young dude who treats his movie camera like it is his cock and refuses to go anywhere without it, Peeping Tom is a work with many layers as a result of both intentional and seemingly unintentional idiosyncrasies. Indeed, one of these more blatant idiosyncrasies is Austrian-German actor Karlheinz Böhm aka Carl Boehm—an actor that became famous in his native country starring in wholesome Heimat films and alongside Romy Schneider in the historical period piece Sissi (1955)—whose Germanic accent is quite clear in the film and must have added an extra subtextual creepiness to the British who had yet to (and arguably still have yet to) get over the Second World War and blamed the krauts for destroying their glorious empire (indeed, the Brits may have eventually defeated Germany in WWII, but politically speaking, it was a total loss for them). A work created in the collapsing empire that also created the dreaded Hammer Horror films and later waged a war against the entire genre in the early 1980s via the Video Nasty phenomenon, Powell's somewhat eccentric semi-self-reflexive excursion in voyeurism is indisputable proof that our more prudish brothers over the pond can indeed produce masterful horror films, yet Peeping Tom is more than just as masterful proto-slasher flick, as a sometimes strangely touching work featuring a somewhat obscured tragic love story. Indeed, the story of a seemingly ½ autistic aspiring filmmaker who falls for a seemingly ¼ autistic aspiring novelist and vice versa, Powell's work features what is quite arguably one of the most sad and awkward romantic subplots in film history. Undoubtedly, what sets Böhm's character apart from pathetic 'human' killers like Norman Bates and Peter Lorre's character in M (1931) is that the all-too-human serial killer of Powell's film is oh-so close to being normal that his self-prophesized death via celluloid becomes all the more 'touching.' It should also be noted that the character's affliction is a direct result of having a camera shoved in his face during his entire childhood. A sort of masterful admittance of guilt on Powell's part as a filmmaker who had thrived for many decades on stealing the souls of other people via celluloid, Peeping Tom is arguably the most charming condemnation of cinema ever made for which the filmmaker himself would ultimately be wrongly condemned.

Beginning with a scene from the perspective of a camera viewfinder of a faceless man with blue-eyes secretly filming and ultimately killing a trashy blonde prostitute who only charges two quid for her sensual services, Peeping Tom immediately forces the viewer to become conscious of the fact that they are getting a cheap thrill from seeing a seedy snuff flick. The killer cameraman in question is a seemingly benign blond beast by the name of Mark Lewis (Karlheinz Böhm) who, on top of being a camera man's assistant who moonlights as a quasi-pornographer who takes salacious softcore pin-up snapshots for a shop owner who secretly sells the images to informed patrons as part of an underground black market business he has going, is the forsaken progeny of a brilliant yet seeming psychopathic scientist named Professor A.N. Lewis (quite fittingly played by director Michael Powell himself) who used his sole son as a guinea pig for various psychological experiments on the reaction of the nervous system to fear. Indeed, during his childhood, Mark had cameras in his face during his most humiliating and horrifying moments, including when he paid respects to his prematurely deceased mother's corpse, as his mad scientist father would intentionally strike fear and dread in his son to further his 'scientific research.' Naturally, Mark's rather unconventional childhood completely screwed him up and turned him into the deranged dude he is today, as a young and handsome man who is approached by various beautiful women yet seems to be only able to achieve orgasm by watching the fear in a woman's eyes as she dies in front of his movie camera. Indeed, Mark has a blade (or what he calls a "spike") at the end of the tripod of his camera and he drives it into his victim's body in an erotic way whilst filming their death. On top of that, Mark has a distorted mirror attached to the end of his camera so that his victim's become witnesses to their own deaths, thus making their reaction all the more horrified (Scottish auteur Donald Cammell would later incorporate this theme into his somewhat artsy fartsy 1987 serial killer flick White of the Eye). Of course, complications come into Mark's life when he meets a young and somewhat dorky female writer named Helen Stephens (Anna Massey), who seems rather attracted to the pathetic killer's glaring peculiarities. Indeed, Mark is both an occupant and the landlord of a home he inherited from his scientist father and Helen and her blind mother are his new tenants. When Mark informs Helen that he is her landlord, she is rather shocked, remarking you, "walk around as if you haven't paid the rent." Of course, little does Helen realize that, every night, Mark is editing and screening snuff films while she is asleep in the room below his.

When Mark makes the amateur mistake of killing a stand-in, Vivian (Moirá Shearer), on the film he is working as a camera assistant on, he finds police officers, including a certain Chief Inspector Gregg (Jack Watson), hanging around the movie set. Of course, being a deranged dude and all, Mark is more intrigued than petrified by the presence of the police, as it gives him the rare opportunity to document their criminal investigation (in fact, Mark also goes back to the site where he killed the prostitute, even capturing the moment when the hooker's corpse was put in the back of a hearse). Meanwhile, Mark begins to develop an almost normal romantic relationship with Helen, though he is rather ill-equipped when it comes to properly courting a young lady, but he at least attempts to make a serious effort to make her happy. Indeed, while Mark refuses to go anywhere without his camera (his entire life is like an unending documentary as shot from his singular cockeyed perspective) as if it is his cock, Helen actually convinces him to leave it behind during their first date and though he suffers from minor 'camera withdrawal,' by the end of the night, he seems more interested in his quasi-lover than his camera. Although she has no idea what he means, Mark tells Helen that he will never film her, lest he gets overexcited by her fear and kills her as well. Ironically, it is Helen's blind mother Mrs. Stephens (Maxine Audley) who becomes almost instantaneously aware that there is something not quite right about Mark and warns him to stay away from her daughter and that he needs to get some serious help. Of course, Mark becomes quite excited upon learning that Helen is about to have her first novel, which is about a 'magic camera,' published, as she offers him the opportunity to shoot photographs for the book, which he gladly agrees to do for free.

When a German Jewish psychoanalysis aka "sneezer geezer" named Dr. Rosan (played by real-life Austrian Jew Martin Miller, who became famous for his on-stage parodies of Adolf Hitler) is brought on the set by the police to determine if there are any glaring peculiarities among the crew members, Mark foolishly does not think twice about approaching the soul doctor to ask him about his affliction, thus learning that he suffers from a bad case of scopophilia which, according to the discernibly dubious Herr Döktor, can be easily uprooted over time via regular psychoanalysis sessions. Of course, Mark's conversation with Dr. Rosan alarms Inspector Gregg, who has his men follow the assistant cameraman around town. Of course, that does not stop Mark from killing a pin-up model named Milly (English glamour model Pamela Green)—a decidedly ditzzy super slut who explains earlier on in the film that she has bruises on her face because, “I went out with my boyfriend. Getting married next month. Trouble was my fiancé saw us”—while police officers are lurking around the building. Needless to say, when Helen wanders into Mark’s room when he is not there and becomes curious enough to run his projector to see what kind of films he makes, she is in for quite the surprise. Of course, Mark walks in on her while she is watching the murder footage and when Helen asks regarding the footage, “it’s just a film. Isn’t it?” the snuff auteur, who is honest to a fault like so many other basketcases, stoically states, “No. I killed them.” In his own weird way, Mark proclaims his love to Helen by confessing regarding the murders, “I made them watch their own deaths. I made them see their own terror as the spike went in. And if death has a face, they saw that too. But not you. I promised I’d never photograph you.” After the police discover Milly’s corpse, they naturally realize Mark is the killer and head to his home. Realizing there is no turning back, Mark decides to direct the ultimate climax to his life’s film by filming his own death, stating to Helen right before he drives his tripod blade into his throat, “Helen, I’m afraid. And I’m glad I’m afraid.” Of course, one must respect a man who is willing to die for his art.

In a clip featured in the documentary A Very British Psycho (1997), director Michael Powell states regarding his marvelously macabre yet unnervingly touching masterpiece Peeping Tom, “The film was full of compassion...for a diabolical murderer...but then for me, he was not a diabolical murderer, he was a cameraman.” Indeed, while Powell implicates both the viewer and the filmmaker (i.e. himself) with his film, his remark from A Very British Psycho makes it quite clear that he did not have a guilty conscience about it at all. Of course, as demonstrated by the fact that the film was unanimously trashed by critics upon its release and ultimately destroyed Powell’s career, Peeping Tom unquestionably induced a deep sense of guilt in filmgoers upon its release as it made them not only realize that they had an unhealthy addiction to voyeurism, but also that they got a sadistic kick from filmic murder and mayhem. It should be noted that the film was penned by British Jewish cryptographer turned screenwriter Leo Marks, who became interested in cryptography after his father introduced him to Edgar Allan Poe’s story The Gold-Bug (1843) as a child, used ‘coded poems’ while working for the Special Operations Executive (SOE) during the Second World War while waging an occult war against Uncle Adolf, and later would provide the voice of Satan in Martin Scorsese’s The Last Temptation of Christ (1988). Anyway, what many film critics seem to ignore regarding Peeping Tom is Marks’ depiction of psychoanalysis as a sort of esoteric devil’s art that had the capacity to transform a perfectly normal little boy into a deranged killer. Ironically, the film also depicts psychoanalysis as the only true potential cure for Mark’s affliction. Going back to Scorsese, the great Guido American filmmaker would once insightfully remark regarding Powell's meta-slasher flick, "I have always felt that PEEPING TOM and 8½ say everything that can be said about film-making, about the process of dealing with film, the objectivity and subjectivity of it and the confusion between the two. 8½ captures the glamour and enjoyment of film-making, while PEEPING TOM shows the aggression of it, how the camera violates... From studying them you can discover everything about people who make films, or at least people who express themselves through films." To his credit, Powell would use the failure of Peeping Tom to further embrace his lifelong obsession with scopophilia, as he would later direct a rather young, voluptuous, and ultimately underage Helen Mirren in the Australian film Age of Consent (1969) where an old artist played by James Mason eventually finds the inspiration to paint once again after coming into contact with a busty unclad teenage girl. As for Karlheinz Böhm, he would demonstrate that he was just as good at playing unsympathetic, if not rather charismatic, deranged bourgeois dudes in Rainer Werner Fassbinder's underrated darkly comedic Sirkian thriller Martha (1974). A wonderfully wicked cinematic work where a crazed aspiring filmmaker (he even has his own director's chair) catches crusty cunt street rabble in the crosshairs of his camera and subsequently penetrates them with his tripod in what can only be described as the ultimate cinematic climax, Peeping Tom is ultimately a reminder that it feels good to wallow in fear, murder, and death, so long as, to quote Wes Craven's singularly classless and tasteless 1972 Bergman (non)remake The Last House on the Left, you remind yourself that, "It's only a movie."

THE FOURTH MAN

Michael Ray Rhodes (1985)

The Fourth Man is a very odd film from Paul Verhoeven. It is by far his darkest and most artistic. The Fourth Man would also be Verhoeven's last Dutch film (until the recent Black Book). After viewing all of Verhoeven's earlier films, it is easy to see his progression as a director. Although I am a huge fan of RoboCop I wonder where his directing career would have went if he had stayed in his own country. In the beginning of the film (after a montage of a spider taking the life of a fly on a crucifix), we meet the film's protagonist who forgets to wear his pants. He is a gay alcoholic writer with a distaste for most things. For some reason he ends up sleeping with a Dutch Femme Fatale and freeloads off of her for a while. In one odd scene, the writer covers his lover's breasts and pretends she's a little boy. The writer eventually becomes obsessed with the woman's German boyfriend (in which he has only seen pictures of). This is truly a bizarre love triangle. I have never thought of Paul Verhoeven as someone that had an interest in surrealism. Inspired by the film's Catholic themes, the writer often hallucinates death and other scenes of misery. The Fourth Man even features a scene in which he dreams his penis gets cut off with scissors. These constant visions add a whole other element to the film (and to the writer's religious schizophrenia). The Fourth Man also succeeds in capturing the loneliness and depressive isolation of man. The writer doesn't seem like he can do anything. Constantly hallucinating, committing acts of sin, and conspiring. At the very least he has fallen out of the loop of life. Paul Verhoeven always gives off the vibe of a very jolly fellow. I suspect he may be acting. Verhoeven has stated the violence in the film was inspired by the German and American occupation of Holland during World War 2. I doubt he had a happy childhood. I hate the genre and genre title "psychological thriller." It is a title that was invented to make certain Hollywood films sound legit in regards to intellectual merit. The Fourth Man is actually deserving of the title "psychological thriller." The film offers the viewer something to think about at the end. It isn't wrapped up in a neat little package at the end like Joel Schumacher's The Number 23 or plagiarist M. Night Shyamalan's The Sixth Sense. Basic Instinct is a very LOOSE remake of The Fourth Man. It is amazing how a director can take a European art film and turn it into an American sleaze (Basic Instinct is still a decent flick). Americans couldn't handle the gay element of The Fourth Man so Basic Instinct had to replace it with lipstick lesbians. Michael Douglas shouldn't be filmed in any sexual situation.

WITCHFINDER GENERAL
WITCHFINDER GENERAL

Michael Reeves (1968)

If the premature death of Teutonic auteur F.W. Murnau (Nosferatu, Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans) was the greatest tragedy of the late-silent/early-sound era, the greatest tragedy of post-WWII British horror cinema was certainly the patently pointless death of young English auteur Michael Reeves at the age of 25 from an accidental alcohol and barbiturate overdose in early 1969. Indeed, before dying in a less the glamorous but somewhat strangely fitting fashion, Reeves changed the face of British and, in turn, European horror cinema with his third feature and sole masterpiece Witchfinder General (1968) aka The Conqueror Worm, which I recently had the beautifully bittersweet pleasure of re-watching. While Reeves pretty much exclusively worked in the horror genre (though he did work as an assistant director on the Anglo-Yugoslav adventure film The Long Ships (1964) directed by master cinematographer turned hack filmmaker Jack Cardiff), all of his three features, which also include the goofily sardonic vampire flick The She-Beast (1966) aka La Sorella di Satana aka Revenge of the Blood Beast and psychedelic (anti)youth flick The Sorcerers (1967), manage to transcend the genre and feature rather intricate themes of the rather cynical and oftentimes even misanthropic sort. In short, it is no surprise that these films were directed by a self-destructive nihilist of sorts that dropped dead for rather stupid reasons before he could evolve into a world-class cinematic artist. After all, there are not many films like The Sorcerers where an elderly hag lives quite literally vicariously through a young man and uses his handsome body as a means to lure in and kill beautiful debutantes that she clearly has much resentment towards due to her rather withered appearance. Additionally, in a Reeves film, even minor characters stick out in terms of their unintentionally humorous repulsiveness as demonstrated by a character that is simply credited as "The Jewish Baker" in The Sorcerers who is rather aggressive when it comes to peddling pickles and lox and who has no qualms about throwing out any customer that dares not to buy something from his rather quaint kosher establishment. Like any great auteur (and quite unlike many horror filmmakers), Reeves clearly abhorred filler and had an obsessive eye when it came to even the most seemingly mundane of details. Undoubtedly, what makes Witchfinder General superior to Reeves' previous feature is its sheer pastoral pulchritude and idyllic rural rap-turous, which is in stark contrast to its savagely brutal S&M-flavored imagery and misanthropic and pessimistic themes. In fact, the film's cinematography impressed Hollywood maverick Sam Peckinpah so much that he hired its Dutch cinematographer John Coquillon to shoot his UK feature Straw Dogs (1971) and later Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid (1973), Cross of Iron (1977), and The Osterman Weekend (1983). Speaking of Peckinpah, Reeves' film has much in common with the western genre in terms of plot and imagery, albeit it is set in 17th-century East Anglia, England instead of the American frontier. Additionally, not unlike Peckinpah, Reeves clearly had a low opinion of humanity as demonstrated by his cinematic magnum opus, which depicts the sheer and utter (in)human depravity that ensues when a good young man acquires a pathological thirst for revenge and more or less destroys his enemies and himself in the process.

Starring Vincent Price as the eponymous villain in a performance that is quite a bit meaner and leaner than his typical eccentrically effete and cultivated camp queen routine, Witchfinder General is indubitably a great example of an auteur abusing his actor(s) to get at perfect performance out of them. Indeed, in the hope that Price would give a much colder and crueler performance than usual and rather irked that his original choice for the role, Donald Pleasence, was replaced (notably, Reeves and his co-writer Tom Baker specially tailored the screenplay for him), Reeves treated the iconic horror star, who was old enough to be his grandfather, rather horribly during the production. In fact, when Price was injured as a result of falling off of his horse during the first day of shooting, Reeves refused to even see him because he wanted the actor to despise him, so naturally the two had a somewhat troubled relationship from the very start of the production of the film. Of course, in the end, the film was a great success and Price even later wrote Reeves a kind letter, which the filmmaker apparently proudly kept in his wallet, with the heartwarming words, "I was physically and mentally indisposed at that particular moment in my life (public and private). I do think you have made a very fine picture." Notably, Price was later quoted in the June 1992 issue of Classic Images that working with Reeves was, "a very sad experience . . . He was very unstable . . . difficult but brilliant." By virtually all accounts, Reeves was a troubled young man with a dark mind that also happened to love cinema and all of these qualities are apparent in his handful of films. Demonstrating a virtual Asperger-like obsession with cinema since he was a young child, wayward wunderkind Reeves ultimately got his first start in filmmaking by randomly showing up on the doorstep of his cinematic hero Don Siegel (Riot in Cell Block 11, The Killers), who generously offered him a job as his assistant and the rest his history. If someone were to ask me the central theme of Witchfinder General, I would probably refer to the overly quoted aphorism from Friedrich Nietzsche's classic text Beyond Good and Evil (1886), "He who fights with monsters should look to it that he himself does not become a monster. And if you gaze long into an abyss, the abyss also gazes into you." Indeed, in the film, a seemingly morally pristine, sincerely altruistic, heroic, loving and both internally and externally beautiful mensch degenerates into a bloodthirsty beast that derives great pangs of pleasure in chopping up a bitchy queen with an axe. Likewise, a voluptuous beauty succumbs to total madness, but not before betraying her beloved fiancé by whoring herself out to a dirty old man in the hope that said dirty old man will spare the life of her beloved uncle. As

Reeves once confessed in a Penthouse interview, “I’m interested in the depths of human degradation. Just how far you and I can sink.” In short, in Reeves’s rather ruthless little flick, there is no true happy ending, even though the bad guys technically get their just deserts. As his second feature The Sorcerers—a film that provides a certain cathartic murderous mayhem to the insipid hedonism of Swinging London—demonstrates in a fashion that almost borders on ‘acid fascism,’ Reeves was no mindless leftist automaton. Indeed, in its delightfully deranged deconstruction of the degenerate limey hippie scum pseudo-culture, Reeves’ film is a sort of horror-sci-fi equivalent to Michelangelo Antonioni’s Blow-Up (1966), albeit all the more effortlessly nihilistic. Undoubtedly, Reeves certainly did not suffer from the same metapolitical affliction as many counterculture cucks of his era as demonstrated by the following remark from Witchfinder General co-writer Tom Baker, “One of the perennial arguments Mike and I had was about altruism vs. selfishness. Mike said, ‘All human behavior is self-interested.’ And I, as a general sort of liberal student-type, would say, ‘No, no, no, people are more than that, people can do things altruistically. People can help each other.’ But Mike was insistent—and I think he may be right—that all behavior was initially motivated by self-interest. If you believe that, perhaps you do get a bit down.” Although just speculation, I suspect that Reeves would agree with American horror maestro H.P. Lovecraft’s words, “Democracy is just a false idol — a mere catchword and illusion of inferior classes, visionaries and dying civilizations.” While Witchfinder General is certainly anti-authority to an extent, it feels more like the expression of a misanthropic right-wing iconoclast than some deluded college-lobotomized do-gooder type that believes that communism or anarchism will somehow lead to a magical utopia. Indeed, the film was certainly not directed by someone that is foolish, politically retarded, or socially naive enough to even dream that humans are capable of any sort of utopia. In fact, if one learns anything from a surprisingly fresh period piece like Reeves’ Vincent Price vehicle, it is that people will always be the same and that certain people in positions of power will always exploit said power to the most underhandedly sinister degree.

Although highly fictionalized to the point of being almost unbelievable as the average Spielberg-helmed historical drama, Witchfinder General—a film that might be best described as an exceedingly English western-cum-folk-horror-cum-romance that would make for a great tourist advert for East Anglia if it did not feature so much human savagery and an overall uniquely unflattering depiction of English history—is actually based on the mass murdering escapades of infamous yet somewhat enigmatic 17th-century English lawyer-cum-witch-hunter Matthew Hopkins (c. 1620 – 12 August 1647) and his ‘witch pricker’ associate John Stearne (c. 1610–1670). Although very little is known about the real Hopkins, the book A History of Witchcraft: Sorcerers, Heretics, & Pagans (1980) Jeffrey Burton Russell notes in regard to the historical record,

“The height of the witch-craze in England occurred in the 1640s, when the Civil War produced unusual anxieties and insecurities, and particularly in Essex, a county where war tensions and a strong previous tradition of witchcraft came together. Into this opportune situation stepped an unsuccessful lawyer named Matthew Hopkins, who was to cause more people to be hanged in two years than had been hanged in the previous century. Hopkins, a Puritan, was able to play on the war anxieties of the Puritan population of Essex and convince them that a legion of witches was active among them. At a distance it is difficult to judge Hopkins’ motivation. A man who had failed, he seems to have welcomed a chance for fame and success no matter how achieved; he may have relished the power; and he obtained a good deal of money for his efforts. He may even have believed in what he was doing: he relied heavily throughout his career on King James’ DAEMONOLOGIE. Whatever Hopkins’ own purpose, his ministrations were well received. Making a name for himself first in 1644-5 in Chelmsford, a target for witch accusations since 1566, he then moved throughout southeastern England, appointing searchers to help him in his work. Hopkins’ methods were thorough and merciless. He stripped suspects to search for witches’ marks, and used starvation, sleep deprivation, swimming, and other tests and torments. The confessions he elicited show his acceptance of the continental tradition: the witches were members of a sect of worshiping the Devil; they met at night; held initiations; had sexual relations with the devil; and sacrificed to him. Nor did Hopkins neglect English tradition: his witches kept familiars in the shape of dogs, cats, mice, moles, squirrels, and with names such as Prick-ears, Flo, and Bess. Hopkins and his assistant swore in court that they had seen such imps themselves. The witches allegedly performed a variety of maleficia: an elderly pastor of Brandeston, John Lowes, was condemned for sinking a ship from Ipswich by magic. Russell Hope Robbins observes that the judges were so credulous under the influence of Hopkins’ persuasion that they made no effort even to ‘check whether any ship had foundered that day.’ But Hopkins had gone too far too fast. By 1646 considerable opposition to him was already surfacing; later that year he was forced to retire, and the following year he died in some disgrace. In the short space of two years he had earned for himself the informal title of witchfinder-general of England and the contempt of future generations.” While the Hopkins depicted in Reeves’ film is just as absurdly murderous as the real-life one recounted by Russell, there is no doubt that the fictional cinematic version is a dreadfully suave sociopathic opportunistic that, like a Der Stürmer-esque caricature of a money-grubbing Israelite, has an unflinching willingness to commit the most ungodly acts for sheer monetary and carnal gain, though he conveniently gets his insipidly stupid and savagely sadistic underling Stearne, who takes great pleasure out of torturing anything with a heartbeat, to do most of his dirty work. Indeed, the Hopkins portrayed by Price is certainly no lovable uncle type.

WITCHFINDER GENERAL

Considering that the film was a coproduction between Judaic Brit Tony Tenser's Tigon British Film Productions and fellow schlock-peddling chosenite Samuel Z. Arkoff's American International Pictures (AIP), there is no doubt that Witchfinder General was intended as tasteless exploitation trash that would have the capacity to get a morbid psychopathic bitch like Myra Hindley panty's wet. Not unlike the 1966 novel of the same name by Ronald Bassett that it is somewhat loosely adapted from, the film also contains a heavily fictionalized depiction of the daftly deeds of witch-hunter Matthew Hopkins, including a nearly 60-year-old Vincent Price portraying a man that was only about 25-years-old when the real events took place. Still, despite the film's rather liberal approach to the historical facts and various depictions of relatively graphic sadistic torture and ultra-violence, I would not be so insufferably pretentious or anally retentive as to describe the film as exploitation as it is, in many ways, quite the opposite as a cinematic work that offers the viewer next to nil cheap sensual thrills, let alone any notable degree of cheap popcorn entertainment or philistine-gear'd catharsis. Indeed, despite featuring brutal torture scenes that might inspire deep thoughts of murderous misanthropy in certain viewers, the greatest and most ravishing scenes pay tribute to the organic splendor of Mother Nature and oftentimes have a Bergman-esque quality about them that really underscore auteur Reeves' keen cinematic sense and unrivaled talent for meticulously polishing a pseudo-Poe-esque genre turd. Of course, one should not expect anything less from a serious auteur that was not really a fan of horror and instead was motivated to work within the genre simply because he wanted to prove that he could make a great film on a laughable sub-Corman-esque budget. In fact, Reeves funded his first 'official' feature The She-Beast with his own money (notably, he was the rebellious fatherless scion of a prestigious paint-manufacturing family), though he also believed that he would be nothing more than a mere dilettante if he were to continue to fund his own films.

As far as biopics in a horror genre form are concerned, I can think of few that would be more sickly intriguing than one based off of sadistic pervert and SS-Oberführer Oskar Dirlewanger, who is one of the few Third Reich era German military officers that actually lives up to the exaggerated cartoon evil depicted in a stereotypical Hebraic Hollywood movie. While I sincerely doubt that the world will ever see a Dirlewanger biopic, Vincent Price's sophisticatedly sadistic and elegantly evil character in Witchfinder General is surely the next best thing. Aside from the superficial physical resemblance, Price's Matthew Hopkins is, not unlike Dirlewanger, a well-educated dirty old pervert that recklessly employs sadistic killers and exploits his political power and the chaos of war as a means to sexually and materially profit from the suffering of others. In short, Price is not the relatively charismatic and strangely lovable yet unintentionally goofy ghoul that he is best remembered from in classic films like André De Toth's House of Wax (1953) and William Castle's House on Haunted Hill (1959) but instead a mean-spirited misanthrope, obscene opportunist, and cold crypto-miser that cynically uses the anarchy of the English Civil War (1642–1651) as a murderous means to profit from the social and spiritual fears of the poor country peasants that absurdly admire him due to their misguided belief that he will somehow erase all of the evil in the world with his homicidal brand of pseudo-Christian hocus pocus. A coldly calculating yet ultimately quite craven charlatan that is plagued with a pernicious degree of pomposity and arrogance that ultimately leads to his much deserved ultra-violent demise via battle axe, Hopkins is in many ways the ultimate human monster and a fiercely fucked figure that makes slasher icons like Michael Myers, Jason Voorhees, and Freddy Krueger seem like lovable cartoon characters by comparison. Personally, I see Hopkins as symbolically embodying perennial political evil, as he is merely the Leon Trotsky or George Soros of his age, albeit executing his sinister aims in a more primitive and thus overtly odious fashion. Indeed, if there was ever a filmic villain that could be compared to both Nazi pedo-butcher Dirlewanger and Judeo-Bolshevik Trotsky, it is indubitably Price's Herr Hopkins.

While Hopkins represents man at his most suavely sinister as a callously corrupt cynic that prides himself on exploiting the weak and disenfranchised, Witchfinder General protagonist Richard Marshall (Reeves' childhood friend and man muse Ian Ogilvy, who starred in all three of his friend's features)—a Roundhead soldier that supports the Parliament of England and is at war with Charles I of England and his supporters (the Cavaliers aka Royalists)—represents young naïve good, unspoiled hope, and great purity of spirit. Unfortunately for the wiser and more wicked Hopkins, Marshall ultimately manages to make up for his lack of wisdom and viciousness through sheer energy and tenacity after discovering an unquenchable thirst for revenge. After receiving a military promotion in rank upon saving his much respected military commander Captain Gordon (Michael Beint) by killing an enemy sniper and subsequently becoming engaged to his beloved girlfriend Sara (Hilary Dwyer) after being granted permission from her village priest uncle John Lowes (Rupert Davies), Marshall—a rather dashing handsome dude that is quite proud to express his love and affection for his beloved—seems to be on top of the world, but that all changes when witch-hunter Hopkins and his proudly sadistic underling John Stearne (Robert Russell) turn his life into a virtual living hell. Indeed, upon being treated as a scapegoat a result of being a Catholic priest in a protestant village, Sara's uncle John soon finds himself the victim of a literal witch-hunt and Hopkins is called into Brandeston, Suffolk to 'prove' that the innocent old man is a dedicated disciple of the devil. Stabbed in the back with a large needle to prove that he bears the so-called "Devil's Mark" and forced to endure various other forms of nonsensical torture by Hopkins' right-hand man Stearne, Lowes is almost certainly destined to receive a brutal demise, so his niece Sara intervenes and decides to make the ultimate sensual sacrifice. Unfortunately, all of this might have been prevented had Marshall had another day or two of leave from the army and been around to stop Hopkins before he made Lowes his spiritual prisoner, but such is the dark absurdity of fate in the rather ruthless Reevesian realm.

Despite her love and devotion for her fiancé, Sara quite selflessly, though somewhat dubiously, decides to offer her nice and nubile carnal goods to Hopkins under the condition that he spare her uncle John from a grisly death. Indeed, Hopkins—a phlegmatic player with the spirit of a sadistic pimp and a special predilection for fresh and adequately fleshy pieces of golden-haired ass—makes it quite clear to Sara what he wants from her when he states in regard to the precarious situation of her uncle when they first meet, “In private talk, we may shed some light on his innocence. Yes, away from the distraction of the crowd. Perhaps in the quiet of your room tonight, you might be able to help me prove him guiltless.” Despite Sara sexually betraying her beloved Marshall, her inordinately altruistic efforts ultimately prove to be in vain after Hopkins changes his mind as a result of Stearne brutally raping her in a field during a nice sunny day. Too dignified of a gentleman to accept sloppy seconds from his buffoonish knuckle-dragging underling, Hopkins—a calmly malevolent mensch that seems to pride himself on his refined sartorial fastidiousness—seems to become disgusted with Sara after the savage sexual pillaging and quite callously reneges on his despicable deal, thereupon leading to the further debasement of the heroine and the public hanging of her uncle. Needless to say, when Marshall discovers what happens, he somewhat rightly decides that a virtual scorched-earth policy is apt when it comes to taking revenge against his uniquely ungodly enemies. Indeed, after symbolically ‘marrying’ Sara in the virtual ruins of her uncle’s home and then having her travel to the nearby village of Lavenham for sanctuary, Marshall immediately begins plotting his revenge. In fact, Marshall becomes so completely and utterly consumed with bloodthirsty vengeance that he rather riskily and irresponsibly decides to postpone an extremely important special military mission from his boss Oliver Cromwell (Patrick Wymark) to kidnap the King because he is naturally more keen on hunting down Hopkins and Stearne with the help of some of his soldier comrades. In fact, Marshall even dares to risk execution as punishment for desertion, which his boss previously reprimanded him for after he absconded from his military upon hearing about Hopkins’ reign of terror in Brandeston. Indeed, just before he goes on his revenge campaign, the Captain rebukes Marshall for deserting his post and then warns him, “However, in this case, there are two factors which will stay me from subjecting you to a full court-martial. One, we are grouped here at Naseby in preparation for a major assault on the Royalist armies. We need every man we can get. And you’re a pretty good soldier, most of the time. Secondly, I would sleep ill if I had to send to the gallows a man who saved my life. But, Cornet, remember this. If you should leave your command again, I will have no alternative but to throw the whole weight of military law against you.” Although Marshall’s soldier buddies manage to find Hopkins and Stearne while they are traveling in the countryside, the two villains manage to getaway and they even kill some of the protagonist’s buddies in the process. In what ultimately proves to be another absurdly hapless scenario, Hopkins ends up in the same village of Lavenham by happenstance as Sara. While Marshall finally manages to reach the village and reunite with Sara, their happy reunion is short-lived as Hopkins has the two arrested under trumped up witchcraft charges and then sent to a torture dungeon. Needless to say, Hopkins takes great delight in having Stearne savagely torture Sara by jabbing large needles in her back while a bound and tied Marshall helplessly watches with a mixed expression of gruesome terror and seething murderous rage. While Marshall eventually manages to kill Hopkins and stomp out one of Stearne’s eyes, he morally degenerates into a bloodlusting killer in the process, thus leading to his beloved Sara literally losing her mind in the process as she watches the man she loves derive savagely sadistic glee as he hacks away at the alpha-witch-hunter with a nice big battle axe in what is ultimately a more bitter than sweet ending. Indeed, after escaping while bound to a wall in the deep dark depths of the torture chamber, Marshall knocks Stearne on his ass and drives his foot into his eye and then grabs an axe and immediately begins chopping up Hopkins with a certain non compos mentis gusto. When Marshall’s friend Robert walks in on him taking great delight in continuing to swing his axe at the heavily mutilated body of a barely living Hopkins, he is so sickened by the grisly sight that he swiftly shoots the witch-hunter to put him out of his misery. Needless to say, Marshall takes offense to his friend’s mercy killing and proceeds to repeatedly violently scream at Robert, “You took him away from me.” Rather unfortunately but not surprisingly, Marshall degenerated into the sort of “monster” that Nietzsche warned of, though it is hard to blame him.

In its depiction of corrupt Christian authorities using their powers for pernicious, if not downright satanic, means to falsely accuse people of being witches and heretics and then having them tortured and murdered in the most malevolent of fashions, Witchfinder General—surely a singular cinematic work when it was first released—indubitably influenced a number of films from high-camp masterpieces like Ken Russell’s The Devils (1971) to exploitative ‘folk horror’ like Piers Haggard’s The Blood on Satan’s Claw (1970) to German-produced sleaze like Mark of the Devil (1970) aka Hexen bis aufs Blut gequält directed by Michael Armstrong to similarly crypto-Teutonic Jesús Franco trash like The Bloody Judge (1970) starring Christopher Lee to Ulli Lommel’s feminist Salem Witch Trials oriented The Devonville Terror (1983), among various other less notable examples. Of course, aside from possibly The Devils (incidentally, Russell apparently hated Reeves’ film), Reeves’ film is unquestionably the most thematically rich, aesthetically rapturous, and organically (as opposed to exploitatively) brutal of these films, especially as far as the somewhat mercurial villain is concerned. While England is not exactly plagued with murderously greedy witch-hunters nowadays, it certainly has a wealth of corrupt politicians and public servants that are, in their own sort of post-religious neoliberal way, witch-hunters that have no qualms about severely punishing any ostensible heretic that dares not to toe the party line. Indeed, in jolly olde England, playing a relatively harmless prank like leaving a bacon sandwich outside at mosque can be a virtual death sentence, or so poor Kevin Crehan learned after mysteriously dying in prison while halfway through a one-year sentence for committing the ungodly crime of donating free breaded pork products to impoverished Muslims. In short, the evil heretics nowadays are the so-called ‘racists’ and ‘bigots’ that succumb to the insanely inhuman idea that the UK should not degenerate into a caliphate and that England should stay English (of course, the recent racially retarded casting of middle-aged Jewish negress Sophie Okonedo as Queen Margaret of Anjou in the BBC TV series The Hollow Crown by hack director Dominic Cooke reveals that even besmirching medieval British history via blatant blackwashing of a historic Aryan beauty is a suitable means to promote the globalist multicultural agenda). In fact, the English are so desperately afraid of being labeled modern-day heretics that a number of police officers and politicians intentionally looked the other way during the Rotherham child sexual slavery scandal—the “biggest child protection scandal in UK history” and an unbelievably sick and twisted tragedy that involved the sexual enslavement of at least 1,400 white British children, most whom were between 11 and 15 years old, between 1997 and 2013—lest they suffer the horrific fate of being called “racists” for bringing these Paki pimps and their similarly inbred underlings to justice. Of course, in modern England, mocking the native religion of Christianity can gain one social capital in certain contexts but insulting the prophet Mohammad and his black and brown disciplines can lead to all sorts of punishment in both legal bureaucratic and less than legal terroristic fashions. Luckily for modern-day Brits, they get to contend with the radically random dangers of being plowed down by an Allah-approved ‘truck of peace’ or being blown up with a ‘bomb of peace’ instead of deal with dastardly dudes of their own faith and race from a number of centuries ago like Mr. Matthew Hopkins.

I think that there is a certain irony in that the protagonist of Witchfinder General is fighting for Oliver Cromwell, who is (in)famous for allowing the resettlement of the Jews in England during the mid-1650s after having been banned for over 300 years since 1290 when King Edward I of England had issued an edict expelling all Israelites from the Kingdom of England. While that was certainly a very longtime ago, its repercussions are felt very clearly today; whether it be the dubious legacy of Prime Minister Benjamin Disraeli, parasitic colonial tentacles of the Rothschild banking dynasty, Sassoon Family and the Opium Wars, the Balfour Declaration, fratricidal philo-semitism of Winston Churchill, degenerate art of pervert Lucian Freud, or anti-English Zio-globalism of the Miliband brothers and Luciana Berger, among countless other similarly unflattering examples. Needless to say, it is no surprise that a violent anti-Christian film like Reeves would be produced by a Hebraic chap like Tony Tenser who, on top of being one of the UK's most important and revolutionary celluloid smut-peddlers, was responsible for producing early films directed by fellow Judaic Roman Polanski like Repulsion (1965) and Cul-de-Sac (1966). While torturing and lynching supposed witches is no longer vogue among English politicians and public servants, the UK government is still doing its fair share of witch-hunting against pernicious politically incorrect heretics, as one merely needs to make naughty comments about a member of G-d's chosen tribe online and they can expect a police visit and possibly even jail time as many of Luciana Berger's critics have discovered. Undoubtedly, it is quite fitting that Vincent Price's Matthews Hopkins has a certain Svengali-esque quality in terms of both character and appearance. As someone that has managed to get a number of young men imprisoned for years for simply hurting her feelings over the internet, Berger is undoubtedly one of the many Matthews Hopkins that persecute poor peasants in England today. While I am not exactly religious, I would not be surprised if the UK was now ruled over by the devil himself, as it is spiritually sick nation where alien anti-Christian religions are protected to the fullest extent of the law and Jesus has been virtually regulated to a rancid sewer next to a Rotherham graveyard.

As a promising young European auteur that was only able to direct a handful of memorable films before dying before he was 30, Michael Reeves is certainly the Jean Vigo of horror cinema. Aside from dying tragically prematurely and having a relatively small oeuvre, Reeves is also comparable to Vigo in the sense that he was a somewhat anarchistic individual who suffered the misfortune of losing his father at a very young age, as if both men were victims of some intergenerational family curse. In that sense, it is only fitting that the male protagonist played by Reeves' buddy Ian Ogilvy dies horrendously while under the spell of two old farts after terrorizing Swinging London in The Sorcerers, as the auteur seemed to be a victim of both his zeitgeist and heritage (aside from his unfortunate family history, Reeves was apparently also both haunted and helped by a fairly nice inheritance). Notably, after finishing Witchfinder General, the young auteur was preparing to direct the Edgar Allan Poe adaptation The Oblong Box (1969) starring Vincent Price, but he was fired a week before shooting because he overdosed on a similar cocktail of alcohol and barbiturate to the sort that would ultimately kill him. Such senseless nihilistic self-destruction seems to have been common during that time among creative types as Reeves' musician comrade Paul Ferris, who created the musical score for Witchfinder General and even appears in a small but notable role in the film as a young husband that attempts to assassinate Hopkins after he burns his wife alive, attempted to kill himself around the same time (Ferris was eventually successful in 1995 when it committed self-slaughter via drug overdose at the age of 54). Apparently, while visiting Ferris in the hospital after a failed suicide attempt, the two friends morbidly joked about who would be the first to successfully carry out the deed.

Aside from The Oblong Box and another Price vehicle entitled Scream and Scream Again (1970), Reeves was actively planning to get out of the horror ghetto (though, he did make an attempt to buy the rights to Daphne du Maurier's short story Don't Look Now, which was ultimately adapted by fellow Brit Nicholas Roeg in 1973). Indeed, aside from the Tenser-produced IRA-themed and Bonnie and Clyde-inspired crime flick O'Hooligan's Mob, Reeves was also apparently considered for directing what would ultimately be the most famous counterculture film of all-time, or as cinematographer John Coquillon remarked to American horror director Jeff Burr, who directed Price in the horror anthology From a Whisper to a Scream (1987) aka The Offspring, in a 1983 letter, "One day he called me full of excitement. He'd found the story. We were going to ride around the US, shoot in 16mm and shoot every which way, into the sun and out of the sun - on motorcycles. The actor was to be a long-time LA buddy - a completely unknown son of an actor - name of Peter Fonda. The film was to be called Easy Rider. It was while planning this movie that Michael Reeves died. I still mourn the man and miss him. Always will. One doesn't get to meet many people like him." In fact, as recounted by Reeves' friend and perennial leading man Ian Ogilvy in John B. Murray's informative book The Remarkable Michael Reeves: His Short and Tragic Life (2002) in regard to the auteur's lack of enthusiasm for the horror genre, "Mike only made horror movies because they were more likely to see an easy profit—thereby giving him, the director, a reputation with producers for making sure-fire successes. He had no great affection for the genre and looked forward to the day when he could make a different kind of film. He said once that we were making crap, but it was going to be the best-made crap in the world. I like to think there are a few moments in the three films we made together where we came quite close to making the best-made crap in the world." Surely, Reeves transcended celluloid shit and proved to be an alchemist of sorts with his swansong Witchfinder General, as it is an almost disturbingly raw and visceral cinematic work from a clearly foredoomed soul that was able to sire what is an organic gold-tier equivalent to what is now described as 'torture porn' and a film that is, almost literally, worthy of Jean Cocteau's quote, "Beauty makes one lose one's head. Poetry is born of this decapitation." Notably, in a interview with Penthouse, Reeves remarked, "I think violence and murder (in film) are quite justifiable. All you have to do is bring it down to an acceptable level. Then you can make points about the aggressiveness inherent in everybody." Although I extremely loathe rap music and generally feel a sense of disgust when I encounter people obsessing over the death of a celebrity, I was somewhat disturbed to learn about the rather recent premature demise of tragic dope-addled 21-year-old rapper 'Lil Peep' (real name Gustav Åhr) who, not unlike forsaken auteur Reeves, dropped dead as a result of a seemingly accidental drug overdose just as he was gaining some inkling of fame and evolving as an artist. Not unlike Reeves, Åhr—an unintentionally goofy chap with degenerate face tats who proudly sported pink Hello Kitty beanies and was famous for creating a rap hybrid that including elements of emo and pseudo-goth—was somewhat of a pretty boy, thus making the thought of his young decaying body, which once graced European fashion runways, seem all the more disturbing. Also, like Reeves, Åhr was consumed with an innate fiery passion that seemed to be the root of both his quick success and even quicker demise. Totally unpretentious and a virtual James Dean of auteur horror filmmaking, Reeves, also not unlike Åhr, is a perfect example of the semi-subconsciously self-annihilating poète maudit par excellence as a troubled chap that could not even be bothered to live as long as Fassbinder and assemble the sort of extensive and/or eclectic oeuvre that would have guaranteed his place in cinema history as one of the greats (or, at least, somewhat great), but such is oftentimes the fate of an intemperately passionate, proverbial Nietzschean ‘Dancing Star.’ Indeed, as Reeves’ friend Paul Ferris once noted, “No, he was no great intellectual. But, does that matter, you see, for the truth of things? Twenty-four years old, movie mad, but what he did have in him was he wanted to make good stuff to the best of his ability. Movie mad, as we all were, so in that he’s a bit like Hitchcock. I don’t think Hitchcock went to university first and then thought, ‘Right, I’ll do some movies now.’ He was movie mad. It’s the wrong way round. It tends to be a bit tried if you come at it literally the other way around—no passion. Mike was passion, passion, passion, movies, movies, movies.” As both a lifelong horror fan and pretentious cinephile, I can certainly attest to Reeves’ singular cinematic passion.

Michael Sarne (1968)

We certainly live in ugly times where ugliness is worshiped and lauded in the most patently of absurd ways as reflected in everything from TV commercials to sporting events. Indeed, in no other era was it considered normal and even 'romantic' to see two obese ogre-like bull-dykes with shaved heads getting married, for mainstream music to be comprised of largely sub-literate race-baiting neo-minstrel 'singers' who do not even know how to read a single note of music and ramble on about they or their 'bitch's' putrid STD-ridden snatches, and for movies to be polluted by physically and mentally grotesque lard ass Heebs that constantly tell the same two or three scat jokes while swooning over some half-braindead shiksa with pseudo-blonde hair, yet I almost think our contemporary times pale in comparison to the complete and utter abject aesthetic vulgarity of the so-called 'Swinging Sixties,' especially in regard to 'Swinging London' as depicted in the Brit cult flick Joanna (1968) directed by Czech-Saxon actor and pop singer turned filmmaker Michael Sarne. Probably best known for banging busty blonde bombshell Brigitte Bardot and directing the X-rated box-office bomb Myra Breckinridge (1970) featuring Raquel Welch as a tranny, Sarne started his distinctly uneven directing career with the 31-minute 'anti-travelogue' Road to Saint Tropez (1966) starring kraut queer Udo Kier as a gigolo-like boy toy who escorts a horny old MILF around a scenic resort spot in what would be the German character actor's debut film role. With Joanna, Sarne would prove that he was just as good at whoring out dumb blonde females as he was at charming kraut cocksuckers like Herr Kier. Indeed, the star of the film, South African model Geneviève Waïte, was apparently declared persona non grata in her own then-still-white-ruled nation after appearing in Sarne's first feature-length film due to bringing shame to the fatherland by portraying a spoiled rich bitch that has a love affair with a criminally-inclined woman-beating negro from Sierra Leone. Originally supposed to feature Sarne's somewhat more beautiful and surely more tolerable then-girlfriend Gabriella Licudi (Herostratus, The Last Safari) as the eponymous lead, Joanna is notable for featuring arguably the single most annoying female protagonist in all of cinema history, which is certainly no surprise when one considers that lead actress Waïte has just as high and squeaky a voice as her similarly loud and lecherous daughter Bijou Phillips (James Toback's Black and White, Larry Clark's Bully). Sold by Sarne to the studios as a female Alfie (1966) and based on a real-life nymphomaniac/kleptomaniac that the director personally buggered, the film is a sort of satire of Swinging London where an anti-bourgeois Guess Who's Coming to Dinner (1967) is royally fucked by Michelangelo Antonioni's Blow-Up (1966) in a work that reminds the viewer why a good portion of the degeneracy that exists today in the Occident is a direct result of the counterculture era. I certainly dare someone to watch Joanna and not come to the conclusion that the two-headed monster of women's liberation and sexual revolution were not two of the most decidedly deleterious plagues to hit the West during the post-WWII era.

17-year-old Joanna Sorrin (Geneviève Waïte in her first and thankfully and not surprisingly last lead film role) is the superlatively spoiled daughter of a loving magistrate and she hates her well meaning father despite all the pointless expensive gifts he buys her, so she moves from her home in the country to Swinging London where she can better put to use her twin talents of thievery and lechery under the preposterous pretense of becoming an artist. As soon as the viewer sees Joanna jubilantly jump off her train like a Tourette-addled toddler on a sugar rush upon landing in London, you know she is going to be an insufferable little bratty bitch who makes the titular pixie frog princess woman-child of Jean-Pierre Jeunet's Amélie (2001) seem semi-tolerable by comparison. Joanna has such a repugnant character that she even annoys her grandmother, who throws her out of her apartment not long after her arrival after getting tired of her whoring, thievery, and incessant rudeness. When grandmother Sorrin asks Joanna about how her father is doing, she sickly fantasizes about daddy dearest as a corpse with his throat slit. Like so many trust fund brats, Joanna is an aspiring artist and she is taking lessons from a blond Nordic teacher named Hendrik 'Cas' Casson (German actor Christian Doermer of Georg Tressler's Teenage Wolfpack (1956) aka Die Halbstarcken and Herbert Vesely's The Bread of Those Early Years (1962) aka Das Brot der frühen Jahre) who, like virtually all the men the protagonist meets, she inevitably screws. Despite proclaiming, "I just loathe married men. My father's married," Joanne's first boy toy in London is a married man with a fancy sportscar named Bruce (Anthony Ainley of The Blood on Satan's Claw (1971)), who she soon catches with a more beautiful and sophisticated blonde babe named Angela (Jane Bradbury), so she ditches him for 'artiste' Cas, who is also banging a negress with a similarly nauseating high-pitched voice named Beryl (Glenna Forster-Jones). To his credit, Cas is well aware that he is taking advantage of poor young dumb sluts and seems somewhat guilty about it as reflected by his remark, "I get terribly sad sometimes. These girls, they sleep around, going nowhere, meaning nothing. One gets the feeling that all women have achieved by emancipation is the privilege of being laid," but he has a sort of 'feminine essence' about him being an 'artiste' and all, thus he provides Joanna with emotional support, even after the two stop being fuck buddies.

Probably seeing her as no real threat since she is black and despite the fact that they both end up sharing the same man, Joanna sparks up a friendship with Beryl, whose black buck big brother Gordon French (Calvin Lockhart of John Landis' Coming to America (1988) and David Lynch's Wild at Heart (1990)) is a successful yet criminally-inclined long-legged mack daddy that will ultimately become the protagonist's main love interest after her various rendezvous with wimpy white boys gets old. After becoming somewhat irked when Cas confesses that Beryl is better in bed because “she talks less” and that he screws 3-4 different girls a week, Joanna hooks up with a broke ass bro of the hopelessly banal sort named Dominic Endersley (played by the director’s brother David Scheuer of Stuart Cooper’s Overlord (1975)), but that does not last long since she cannot keep her panties on and soon finds herself in bed with a married man whose wife and kids catch them in the act. Luckily, unlike most men in the film, Dominic has enough sense to give Joanna a good slap across the face upon learning of her sexual indiscretions. Meanwhile, through Beryl, Joanna meets an exceedingly effete terminally ill aristocrat named Lord Peter Sanderson (Donald Sutherland), who buggers the black bird and becomes a father figure of sorts to the protagonist, even taking her and her friends on a luxurious vacation to Morocco where he teaches them how to eat couscous and teaches them about the finer things in life. To show her appreciation for his truly aristocratic generosity, Joanna steals Lord Sanderson a compass and a box of cigars. Ultimately, Lord Sanderson reveals to no one else but Joanna that he only has about a year to live because he hopes that it will help her find some meaning in her “uncommitted” and “pointless” life. When Lord Sanderson sponsors an art gallery showing for Cas, whose style is like Jean Cocteau meets counterculture crud, the art teacher ultimately becomes rich and famous. Unfortunately, Lord Sanderson croaks soon after the gallery showing.

When Lord Sanderson eventually dies, Joanna, who has already done her fair share of whoring in a very short period of time, decides she will attempt to start a new life by becoming monogamous with a relatively successful man, but unfortunately she picks a negro with a violent temper and mob connections. Indeed, Joanna hooks up with Beryl’s brother Gordon, who she absurdly declares her love to by stating, “I wish you were white...because I think I’m falling in love with you [...] you frighten me just a bit. Does that make sense? I think you’re going to die or something...And I don’t want to lose you.” Joanna might be a major moron who does not know her ass from her elbow, but her premonitions regarding her love affair with Gordon are more or less spot on. Gordon owns a night club as a result of Lord Sanderson’s patronage, but since the wealthy aristocrat is dead, he now has to receive his funding from more unsavory sources. Needless to say, Joanna immediately moves into Gordon’s flat and the two have fun by engaging in miscegenation and shouting “nigger” at scared old white people. Unfortunately, Gordon has various criminal connections and when a nosy neighbor reports him to the police after seeing him beat up a gangster in their apartment, they receive trouble from the cops, who do not take kindly to seeing an uppity opulent negro with a pretty white girl. When a young white cop comes by the apartment to ask Gordon about the brawl, Gordon rudely refuses to cooperate and even slaps the officer in the face, thus resulting in an entire police squad arriving at the flat to question him about his less than civil behavior.

Gordon resents cops, especially white ones, and demands that they address him as “sir” since, as he states in a ridiculously contrived fashion, he has been living and paying taxes in London for eight years. Luckily, since Joanna’s father is a respected Magistrate, Gordon manages to get off without any charges even though he assaulted an officer. Of course, Gordon’s belligerent criminal behavior does not end there.

After Gordon is brutally beaten by about half a dozen mob goons, he self-righteously declares, “I’ll get those bastards. I’ll get them one-by-one” and plots his senseless revenge while not considering how it may affect him and his girlfriend’s future. Of course, Gordon does not keep his savagery isolated to middle-aged male thugs, as he also beats Joanna for hanging out with Cas, even though he knows they did not have sex. When Joanna asks Gordon why he beat her despite the fact that he knew very well that she did share carnal knowledge with Cas, he replies, “Cause I am a black bastard and I know what’s best for you,” which ultimately turns the warped white girl on. Shortly after learning that she is pregnant with a mongrel baby, Joanna is approached by two police detectives who say they want to speak with Gordon regarding a murder. Indeed, Gordon got his revenge and crushed one of the crackers who beat him up and now he is a wanted fugitive. After managing to evade the police, Joanna meets with Gordon at a secluded beach house where he sweet talks her like a pimp and tells her things that he knows she wants to hear like how he and she will start a family together in New York City, ultimately reassuring her with the bullshit Snoop Dogg-esque words, “It’s all gonna happen baby, it’s all gonna happen.” Of course, Gordon is soon nabbed by the cops while hiding out in one of Lord Sanderson’s estates in Dublin, Ireland and he is ultimately sentenced to ten years in prison for murder. In the end, Joanna takes a train back to her family home in the country just as she once arrived in a scene that cuts back to an ironic flashback of her father warning her, “Don’t overdo it in London.” To add insult to injury in terms of aesthetic vulgarity, Joanna concludes with a musical number of all the characters in the entire film singing the title song “Joanna” written by American poet turned singer-songwriter Rod McKuen.

Notably, in a 2010 interview featured with the BFI Flipside release of Joanna, director Michael Sarne reveals that, no surprisingly, the real-life girl that he used to ‘date’ that inspired the film met a much darker end than the fictional one in the film. Sarne also reveals in the interview that he intended for the film to be much more ironical than it turned out and that he was hardly attempting to glorify Swinging London with the work, though he hoped the film would act as a sort of celluloid time-capsule of its particular era. Notably, Sarne’s film seems to have inspired a sort of ugly anti-utopian trend of now-obscenely-outmoded Swinging Sixties films about nubile blonde beauties eagerly hooking up with black bucks, as demonstrated by the somewhat bizarre avant-garde black power short Death May Be Your Santa Claus (1969) directed by British Black Panther member Frankie Dymon Jr. (who also opted to use a white South African model for the female lead), as well as the agitprop avant-garde collage piece nEROSubianco (1968) aka Attraction aka The Artful Penetration of Barbara aka Black on White directed by Italian auteur Tinto Brass during his early pre-pornography years. For better or worse, out of all the movies about madly miscegenating 1960s London, Joanna certainly features the most eclectically and eccentrically damning depiction regarding the nihilistic excesses of its ostensibly zany zeitgeist. Unquestionably, for me, watching Sarne's film was like the cinematic equivalent of suffering the flu or some other illness, as I felt like I was trapped in some sort of disorienting metaphysical hell that totally transcended the physical realm where all my senses were bombarded with a sort of impenetrable feeling of spiritual vulgarity and grotesquery that felt like it would never end, at least until the film had finally concluded. Despite whatever point(s) Sarne might have been trying to make in the film in regard to race relations and the counterculture movement, the only thing I could come away with from the film was that Geneviève Waïte is the most annoying woman in the world and that I feel absolutely blessed that I have only dated mostly reserved and intelligent girls who don't treat their vaginas like toilets or garbage dumps. Indeed, hidden somewhere in its over-conscious Fellini and French New Wave homage sequences, barf-worthy blue-eyed ballads, pathological fourth wall breaking, and soulless sex and skin scenes is some sort of poignant message about the price of sexual liberation, but it seems to have taken a backseat to the director's curious obsession with the pseudo-cutesy lead, who one might describe as the ultimate anti-diva and braindead debutante.

Michael Seresin (1988)

Contrary to what might be taken from the title, this is not bi-racial film about struggles within Harlem to fend off illegal immigrants that moved in a couple blocks down. Rather, this film is Mickey Rourke's precursor to his extremely-coveted film The Wrestler. Bound by the ring, both Johnny Walker and Randy Robinson are past their prime and down-on-their-luck guys who hit the bottle and pine over someone that seems unreachable. They are also prescribed death by their doctors and warned not to fight again. Scribed by Mickey Rourke under the pseudonym Sir Eddie Cook, Homeboy predates The Wrestler by 20 years but the emotional depth in Homeboy I find to be much more resounding and heartfelt. In short, Homeboy is an underrated classic of character portraits. The prior incarnation of Randy Robinson is a cowboy who moonlights as a boxer who picked up the sport a bit past his prime. This burdening shadow will never let him live down the idea that he could have been great. Besides being an ever-vigilante fighter, he's also somewhat of a hot head. In one of my favorite scenes where a trio of Afro-American "slumdogs" approach Johnny Walker spouting some dialect that seems to be Public Enemy lyrics, Johnny looks up under the brim of his hat, hesitates, and spits phlegm and chewing tobacco on one's fresh white sneakers. This southerner vs. Urbanite mental match is one of Homeboy's finer moments. Not limited to this, Homeboy is also home to some incredibly filmed scenes of outlooks on race relations. In a checkers match with a boxing trainer, a senile boxing hand repeatedly asks the white man what color he is. He then explains how he is red so he is black, by process of elimination. The words "you're black" are presented in such an omnipotent manner that it cracks the screen while setting fire to the topic of race. Soon after, the black man forgets his color again and prompts for another racial lecture. Mickey Rourke's performance in Homeboy is utterly astounding and threatening. At first, this almost mute character will chime in his two-cents with a high-pitched southern drawl that will most likely catch you off guard but fear not, the voice is but an accurate projection of his inner woes. After seeing and hearing his thoughts and stature, Johnny Walker is an enigma worth understanding. He almost seems like a previous experiment in developing the future role of Harley Davidson in Harley Davidson & The Marlboro Man. Aiding the tenor of Homeboy is a joint score composition by masters Michael Kamen and Eric Clapton. Sporadic twangs of strings safely echo in moments of heated aggression or personality immersion. The overall feel of Homeboy seems more of a big-budget auteur piece that has a heart of gold. Michael Seresin took big risks for his first and only directing experience. For being a speech on point of character, Homeboy spotlights the most intense and riveting boxing sequences ever put to film. I found myself shadowboxing outside of the television screen, beckoning one-two punch combos and the likes of a right hook. The ferocity of what happens in the ring is captured perfectly thanks to the cinematography experience picked up by Michael Seresin. Note that this man is the one and only who captured the feel of Alfonso Cuarón's Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban. Behind the events of Johnny Walker's two-note existence is the sleazy promoter played by a "beautiful" Christopher Walken. He learns early enough of Walker's fractured temple but neglects to inform the dead man walking. Instead, he'd rather Walker help him steal a batch of diamonds from Jews. The same motif of ticking time bomb that plagued Johnny Walker was applied to The Wrestler's Randy Robinson."Mickey Rourke and I were in Heavens Gate together; he had this tiny part and I was playing whatsisname. We were sitting up there in the mountains talking about...dinosaurs. And I told him about this thing I had read in some science magazine, that there's a theory that dinosaurs really never disappeared at all. That in fact all they did was get smaller and smaller, their scales turned into feathers and they flew away-and that in fact dinosaurs are still with us, they're just birds. And Mickey said, 'That's interesting,' and he started telling me about this movie that he was going to do someday about a boxer and it was called Homeboy. You know, I remember also he told me at the time, 'There's this guy, the fighters manager, and your gonna play this part.' I said, 'Okay Mickey, lets go.' So almost ten years went by and there we were making it. And I said to him, 'Why don't I tell that story about the birds and dinosaurs?' He said, 'Right.' And there is that scene at the beach with all the seagulls, talking about dinosaurs. It's completely disconnected from anything going on in the movie, but I think it's one of the things in the movie...It's real. Here are these two guys who are really kind of victims, talking about the origin and destiny of dinosaurs." -- Christopher Walken, Film Comment, August 1992. When juxtaposed together, I believe I enjoyed Homeboy more regarding both filmic qualities and scene construction. The Wrestler boasts more bang for your buck on account of the newer facade of a sport but behind boxing there's something furious that lurks past the shell. Both films preach melancholy attitudes towards gutter life, both country and city-wise, but Homeboy has more beauty than brawn. Homeboy is the greatest artistic exercise in boxing created by man for man. It's just a damn shame this film didn't receive buzz like The Wrestler has been lamented with. It dawned on me finally that maybe, just maybe, Homeboy was created just a bit too early. The populace simply wasn't ready for such a marvel.

PRINCE IN HELL

Undoubtedly, the quite quaint German queer flick Prinz in Hölleland (1993) aka Prince in Hell directed by Michael Stock (Fucking Different, Postcard to Daddy) is not only one of the most miserable, misanthropic, nihilistic, dispiriting, and revolting yet strikingly frolicsome and joyful films of the pomo homo sort, but all of the films I have seen in general. More sexually despicable than the rarely seen Brit flick Duffer (1971) directed by Joseph Despins and William Dumaesque, less flattering to rainbow-flag-waving fags than William Friedkin's Cruising (1980) and Todd Verow's Frisk (1995), more ridiculously repulsive than Rosa von Praunheim's City of Lost Souls (1983) and Your Heart in My Head (2005), and more melodramatically menacing than Rainer Werner Fassbinder's The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972) and In a Year of 13 Moons (1978), Prince in Hell is a potent powerhouse of perversity, pathetic passion and promiscuity, and penetrating portending predestination of the most punishing, piercing, and paralyzing kind. Like a collection of reasonably coherent William S. Burroughs' stories come to life set in a neo-medieval XXX-Berg, Berlin ghetto with crude yet sometimes strangely charming carnivalesque characters that are somewhere in between those featured in early Gregg Araki (The Living End, Nowhere) films, Mephisto (1981) directed by István Szabó, Harlequin (1980) directed by Simon Wincer, Larry Clark's Kids (1995), and Shakespeare's Hamlet, Prince in Hell is a decidedly dreary depiction of wild boys on their last savage and intemperate ride in the final lane. Set in the bleak backdrop of post-reunification Berlin, the film follows a beyond bizarre love triangle between three hysterical homos and a pants-less, jaunty and quasi-pedophilic jester who puts on a grotesque gay puppet show that parallels the film's storyline, Prince in Hell – with its bestial buggery, guileless and godawful depictions of drug abuse, and merry männerbünde of mishap and misery – is nothing short of a minor masterpiece of raw, reckless, rancid homophile cinema, but I wouldn't recommend recommending this film to a gay friend nor gay studies professor, as it is the sort of uncompromising and damning piece of cinematic debauchery that reminds one why so many fags have short shelf lives.

The poverty-stricken princes of Prince in Hell – although 'legally' unemployed and one-step away from being homeless homos – have relatively memorable lives as their daily activities include such soundly sordid pastimes as random threesomes with militant leather-fags (including simultaneous gloryhole blowjobs and bootboy buggery, hanging flyers for heroin dealers, humping dirty old men for heroin, getting beaten by East German neo-nazi skinheads, practicing public nudity and sodomy in plain view of grade school children, and discussing the instinctive racism of all Germans, not to untermensch Eastern ones. If I were to hazard a guess judging by their mere appearance and metaphysical melancholy, I would assume that the refined gentlemen of Prince in Hell were the grandbastards of terrorized Teutonic women who had been raped and ravaged by Soviet Slavs, Mongols, and pseudo-Semites during and after the Battle of Berlin at the conclusion of the Second World War. The film mainly follows Stefan (Stefan Laarmann, who also co-wrote the script) who is a lapsed member of the bourgeois and sort of moral 'mom' of the group as he gets quite hung-strung when seeing his homo homeboys shoot heroin, East German junkie punk Jockel (played by writer/director Michael Stock) who is undoubtedly the most decadent and self-destructive of the degenerates, and bisexual father Micha (Andreas Stadler); the man that the two other fellows are fighting over. Despite being a father with a child that is not older than 8 or 9, Micha mostly spends the majority of his time manhandling other men, thereupon leaving his juvenile son Sascha (Nils Leeve-Schmidt) to fall prey to the seemingly unsavory antics of a former mental institution patient and puppet-mastering jester named 'Firlefan' (Wolfram Haack who also acted as a co-writer for the film) with seemingly mischievous (the film hints that he is a molester and he spends most of his time with Sascha, eventually leading to his earthly demise) yet infantile intentions. The more heroin-inclined boys also seek drugs from a boorish and blunt middle-aged homosexual neo-Nazi drug dealer named Ingolf (played by Fassbinder graduate Harry Baer) who incessantly replays Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will (1934) on his television to the utter dismay of his young butt buddies. Needless to say, Prince in Hell is like a lurid Lifetime movie from homo Hades as directed by Ulrike Ottinger had she born a man-loving mensch as opposed to a Sapphic surrealist.

Infinitely more unsettling and realistic than the gay serial killer flick Frisk (1955) directed by Todd Verow – the film that mainstream gays love to hate, which incidentally stars director Michael Stock as a feeble-brained German prostitute – Prince in Hell is undeniably one of the most doleful yet abnormally charming and aesthetically and thematically grating queer flicks that I have ever seen, so it was not a surprise to learn that the film's auteur has a disquieting past that is not that out of line with some of the characters in his film. Although Prince in Hell director Michael Stock would not direct another film until his contribution of the segment "Sternenstaub verloren ..." to the cross-gay film anthology Fucking Different (2005), he recently released the startlingly personal documentary Postcard to Daddy (2005); a highly and some-would-say embarrassingly intimate work where the filmmaker confronts and seeks to forgive his father some 25-years-later for sexually abusing him as a child. Naturally, knowing this terrible tidbit from Stock's personal life makes Prince in Hell all the more of a patently perturbing piece of emotional celluloid carnage of the soul-consuming sort. Although any reviewers of the film have stated to the contrary, Prince in Hell also does a splendid job of portraying the urban street squalor and youthful nihilism of early 1990s post-reunification Berlin in a manner that is in sheer antithesis to the popular mainstream German flick Good Bye, Lenin! (2003) directed by Wolfgang Becker. As someone who has read East German ex-neo-nazi Ingo Hasselbach's book Führer Ex: Memoirs of a Former Neo-Nazi (which was adapted into the 2002 film Führer Ex directed by Winfried Bonengel), Prince in Hell certainly seems to accurately portray the anarchic essence of the street gangs (punks, communists, anarchists, neo-nazis, etc.) that battled for the inglorious idiotic glory of being the kings of Berlin's post-industrial wastelands with the gentlemen of Stock's scrupulous film being the lowest men on the Teuton warrior totem pole. Ironically, one of the characters in Prince in Hell justifies his heroin abuse to his friend by remarking that the depiction of opium-obsession gone awry in the German cult flick Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981) directed by Uli Edel is romantic and ridiculous fiction, which is an absolute absurdity when one considers that at least the junkies in the older film had enough sense not to inject strychnine in their veins and allow a fag queen jester whose exposed dong is constantly hanging out watch their small children. Indeed, Prince in Hell is like Christiane F. for the 1990s post-Stasi era, albeit more disheartening, debasing and antagonistically nihilistic. That being said, it is only natural that the film concludes with little bad boy Sascha committing an act that is more gruesome and disconcerting than anything ever done by his father, as he is the future of the slums of the Fatherland; where fathers suck cock and shoot dope and puppeteers parade around their penises and put on puppet-shows about sodomy for preteens.

POSTCARD TO DADDY
POSTCARD TO DADDY

Michael Stock° (2010)

With the undeniably bad influence of Berlin-based kraut queer queen agitator Rosa von Praunheim (A Virus Knows no Morals, I Am My Own Woman) as his support, novice filmmaker Michael Stock, who in my humble opinion had what it takes to help kickstart the rebirth of a truly uncompromising German cinema free of Hollywood influences, directed the celluloid cocksucking-urban-nightmare-to-end-all-cocksucking-urban-nightmares, Prinz in Hölleland (1993) aka Prince in Hell, at the ripe age of 26 and then rather unfortunately disappeared just as abruptly as he had once appeared. A fiercely faggoty punk neo-fairy-tale set in melancholy post-Cold War Berlin that is part fantasy-like and part cinéma vérité-like in aesthetic yet decidedly deranging and debasing all around, Prince in Hell follows three junky queer squatters (with Stock playing one of them) of the exceedingly self-destructive and needlessly nihilistic sort as they race towards subconsciously killing themselves in a cinematic climax that, for better or worse, is one of the most singularly shocking endings in all of cinema history. While Stock went on to play a goofy German hustler named 'Uhrs' in American auteur Todd Verow's sodomite serial killer flick Frisk (1995) and would direct a short segment for the Teutonic omnibus film Fucking Different (2005), his planned second feature—an assumedly dark autobiographical work entitled Aussöhnung aka Reconciliation about a young man who attempts to come to terms with the fact that his own father molested him—never went past the post-production stage as the German television channel that planned to fund the film cancelled the project after two years of being in limbo due to its considerably controversial material (as Stock said himself regarding the decision, "the editor-in-chief finally decided that the process of reconciliation in the script to "Aussöhnung" (Reconciliation) was even more unsavoury than the rape itself, and the project died."). Instead, Stock decided to direct a 'family' documentary on the same highly personal subject about how he was routinely molested by his father for about 8 years of his tragic life. Quite ironically, while his mentor Rosa von Praunheim who was unquestionably a born pervert who attempted to seduce his own father (!) as a wee bratwurst as he confessed to Todd Verow in an episode of the Arte show Into the Night with... (2002-current), Stock was sinisterly seduced by his sick father as depicted in the filmmaker's surprisingly hopeful yet nonetheless stomach-churning documentary Postcard to Daddy (2010). Contracting HIV and Hepatitis C during his early twenties and more recently suffering a couple of debilitating strokes, the Michael Stock of Postcard to Daddy looks like a morbidly depressed zombie compared to the virile vice-saluting junk-addled street punk of Prince in Hell yet somewhat paradoxically he seems quite happy and positive in the documentary in the end, as if he has finally come to terms with the damage his despicable daddy has done.

It all started when Michael Stock's mother Margret Bartholomé met a swarthy fellow named Roland Stock who she found herself being rather attracted due to what she perceived as his foreign-like 'South American' looks. When Margret got pregnant, she and Roland got married, which ultimately sired three children: Michael Stock and his older brother Christian and sister Anja Stock-Hüttl. Margret loved her husband's adventurous and hedonistic character, but Roland was also a hopeless dipsomaniac and for whatever reason he began molesting his prepubescent son Michael. When Michael revealed to his mother Margret—a humanist involved in various social and political causes, including an Amnesty International group—at the age of 19 that his father routinely molested him for about 8 years, it totally destroyed the entire family, with everyone aside from eldest son Christian completely cutting off ties with the incestuous pedophile patriarch. Roland senior never molested any of his other children, which might partially have to do with the fact that, for instance, his daughter Anja actively avoided him, "because he was so repulsive physically, I didn't want any contact with him. I didn't want to be close to him. Just his bad odor! When you drink in the evening, you smell the next day. And I felt repulsed. I really wanted to keep as much distance as possible." After nearly 8 years of being molested, it took Michael another decade "to deal with it or simply to survive," which he partly achieved by making his story public on German television and even attempting to direct a feature film on the unsavory subject.

Considerably sexually warped due to his experiences, Michael recalls how he fell in love at age 12 with a neighbor girl and when he confided in his father about his feelings, the debauched daddy used it as a perverse pretense to fingers his anus so as to ostensibly demonstrate to his son how to pleasure a girl's clitoris. Naturally, Michael grew up to develop of sick and twisted sense of sexuality and actively sought predatory victimizers for sexual partners, but eventually found his first real boyfriend around the time he directed Prince in Hell and learned to enjoy carnal pleasures in a more reciprocal way. Regarding his self-destructive sexual behavior, Michael confesses, "I was very promiscuous and had no self-respect. As a consequence, I was infected with HIV in my early twenties; and later with Hepatitis C, too. Of course I knew about the consequences of unsafe sex. But I felt that possible death through AIDS would be the ultimate jewel in my drama queen crown. Drowning in self-pity I would have loved to blame it all on my father. But it is not his fault. I have to bare the consequences of my actions and simply have to live with them. And yes, I wonder how my father lives with the consequences of what he did." Eventually, Michael met his second partner, a French architect who wanted to be a filmmaker named Rémi Kaltenbach, but his beau also suffered from 'daddy issues', albeit of a less unhinged variety, and he ultimately developed a psychosis that turned him to religion and self-loathing. Convinced he would never be able to reconcile with his father, Rémi killed himself. At the time, Michael had reconciled with his father, but when degenerate daddy made an insensitive remark regarding Rémi's suicide, the sick father-son 'bond' was once again severed. Ultimately, Michael decided to dedicate Postcard to Daddy to Rémi.

Originally intended to be titled "Mommy's Boys" and centered around mother-son relationships, Postcard to Daddy spends a good portion of its time focusing on Stock's mother, who later became a sex abuse counselor after finding out her husband molested her son. After Michael suffered a stroke, his mother Margret decided to take him on a vacation (or what the director calls a "recuperation trip") to Thailand where the two discuss the filmmaker's abuse at the hand of his fucked father. As Michael Stock wrote in a 'Director's Statement' for Postcard to Daddy regarding the trip, "Unlike my mother, my father has contributed nothing to the process of coming to terms with this trauma. My mother on the other hand, since the day I confided in her at the age of 19, has played a key role in working through this family drama, so it made sense that our relationship would be the focus during this trip." Not merely a cute and catchy sentimentalist title, Postcard to Daddy concludes with a brief interview with Michael's pernicious son-sodomizing monster father Roland Stock, who the filmmaker screens a rough cut of the documentary. While the viewer does not get to see Roland's reaction to the doc, that is besides the point as it was made for the filmmaker's own personal therapy and not as a means to denigrate the castration-worthy kiddy fucker.

Undoubtedly, Postcard to Daddy is one of the most unflatteringly confessional documentaries ever made as demonstrated by the fact that director Michael Stock admits, among other things, that at one point during his nightmarish childhood he began seducing his father (!), thus demonstrating how debased his mind had become. One of the reasons that the German TV channel refused Stock's initial script for his never-made second feature Aussöhnung was because they felt it would demonstrate there was a link between homosexuality and child molestation. Of course, after watching Postcard to Daddy, the viewer cannot deny that it is quite obvious that Stock's self-destructive fagdom is a direct result of being molested, hence why he would seek victimizers as partners and got off to being sexually degraded by strangers and whatnot. Coming close to death and working the unflattering occupation of a dishwasher as a middle-aged man, Stock had his life ruined before he even had a serious chance in life by the very same man who should have been his greatest protector and the consequences of these truly devilish deeds weigh oppressively throughout Postcard to Daddy. In its innate essence, the documentary is a daunting deconstruction of Prince in Hell as it solves the source of the film's seemingly maleficent mystique and startlingly morally dubious and even macabre character. Indeed, due the film's allusions to child molestation and rape flashback scenes, I initially assumed that Prince in Hell might have been written/directed by a victim of sex abuse, but I would have never seriously considered that an authentic victim of father-son incest in fact directed it. Once a 'punk' in more than one sense of the word with an unrivaled tenacity and a knack for post-industrial aesthetic terrorism as demonstrated by his acting and directing of Prince in Hell, Stock sadly seems like a prematurely aged old timer/terminal twink in Postcard to Daddy who needed to make just one more film before leaving this earth. Indeed, considering his film-making career never took off as it should have, Postcard to Daddy ultimately acts as the final word and micro-autobiography on the troubled life and wasted talent of Herr Michael Stock.

BLIND SPOT
BLIND SPOT

Michael Toshiyuki Uno (1993)

Long before his rather brief stint in Hollywood during the early 1990s when he directed both Drop Dead Fred (1991) and Highway to Hell (1991), which were both massive critical and commercial failures that ironically went on to earn cult followings, Dutch auteur Ate de Jong (Het Bombardement, Brandende liefde aka Burning Love) created somewhat low-budget and minimalistic art-house oriented works in his homeland of the Netherlands. Indeed, a year after contributing a segment to the four episode tragicomedy Alle dagen feest (1976) aka Every Day a Party, de Jong completed his somewhat gritty dark romantic-comedy Blindgangers (1977) aka Blind Spot starring tall, dark, and handsome Dutch leading man Derek de Lint (Soldaat van Oranje aka Soldier of Orange, De aanslag aka The Assault) in his very first major role. Although oftentimes humorous, de Jong's film is a largely dejecting work that depicts the slow and increasingly painful breakup of a young couple living in a white ghetto in post-counterculture era Holland. Admittedly, I hate virtually all rom-coms and romance flicks in general as I cannot relate to them in any way and find the humor to be about as funny as a corporate PSA, but then again I am not a physically weak and ugly neurotic Jew-boy who finds himself in the seemingly unlikely situation of attempting to vie for the attention of a beautiful shiksa who would never dream of dating some scrawny heeb in any sane world. Despite being nearly four decades old, Blind Spot is still relevant to modern couples in that it depicts the seeming impossibility of relationships lasting more than a couple year in an era when women give pussy away for free and no longer require men to marry or have children with them. The film is also notable for going into anti-feminist and borderline misogynistic territory and daring to depict the lack of decisiveness, irrationality, and flagrant bitchiness that plagues a woman when she finds herself doubting her relationship, but of course the flick is no more flattering in its depiction of its male protagonist, who is portrayed as jovially foolish, obscenely oblivious, and innately moronic yet somehow absurdly arrogant. Indeed, Blind Spot is not the tale of Tristan and Isolde or Romeo and Juliet, but a portrayal of a love affair that is patently pathetic, prosaic, and, in turn, realistic. Like the lovers in the film, the viewer does not want the couples' relationship to end but at the same time cannot deny the fact that it is ultimately inevitable that the two lovers will part ways. Set in dilapidated apartment buildings, sleazy dimly lit bars, and dirty laundry mats to the bombastic and oftentimes goofy sounds of degenerate Dutch jazz as composed by notable jazz bandleader, composer, and Kurt Weill authority Willem Breuker (Jos Stelling's De illusionist aka The Illusionist, George Sluizer's Twee vrouwen aka Twice a Woman), de Jong's work is thankfully not as Brechtian as it sounds as it is an honest-to-goodness flick fueled by lovelorn lifeblood of the all-too-human sort.

For whatever reason, young male protagonist Mark Jonkman (Derek de Lint) has decided to attend a screening of an ancient black-and-white English-language film where a man self-righteously declares “I will not kill a woman!” upon refusing to take part of the killing of a discernibly lecherous flapper chick who is subsequently gunned down by a robotic firing squad. Not unlike Mark, a young beautiful blonde in her early-20s named Danielle Sandberg (Ansje Beentjes of Roland Verhavert’s 1974 Hendrik Conscience adaptation De loteling aka The Conscript) watches the film as if oddly entranced by the banality of the old-fashioned flick. After the curious vintage film concludes, Mark is approached by cutesy blonde Danielle in the movie theater lobby who offers him a cigarette that he rejects and then attempts to make small talk with him by asking if he goes to the movies often, to which he semi-pretentiously replies, “I go to plays more often.” While Danielle attempts to get Mark to go on a date with her and he acts disinterested and tells her that he has no money, the male protagonist eventually gives in and agrees to go to the young lady’s house since her parents are not there. Since her parents are rather wealthy professionals, Danielle lives in a large and lavishly furnished home, which Mark will later come to resent as he is the son of a modest bicycle shop owner who he rarely sees. Since he is superficially charming and exceedingly extroverted, Danielle successfully guesses that Mark is an acting student. In scene that foreshadow the problems they will have in their relationship, Mark arrogantly assumes that Danielle is an antique store owner when, in fact, she is a student of Slavic Languages and Literature, especially Russian and Serbo-Croatian (which are, notably, the languages of the now non-existent nation of Yugoslavia, which the female protagonist will later consider traveling to after her romance begins to fall apart). Ultimately, Danielle uses the excuse of there being imaginary rats in her attic so that she can get Mark to go up so that she can seduce him. Flash forward two weeks later, the two protagonists have fallen deeply in love with one another and Mark brings Danielle a present in the form of a small box of mint tea that has a key hidden inside. Of course, the key is Mark’s way of asking Danielle to move in with him, which she immediately does. While fixing up their new apartment, Danielle reluctantly admits to Mark that she hopes they will “always be together” and he responds somewhat insensitively by saying, “‘Always’ is a big word.” As Danielle will eventually learn, nothing lasts forever.

At a little bit before the ten minute mark of Blind Spot, the film has flashed forward two years and skipped over what the viewer assumes was the greatest moments in the Mark and Danielle’s once hot-and-heavy relationship. Danielle is depicted looking more than a little bit melancholy while sitting at a bar where she is soon met by Mark’s conspiring beta bitch friend Paul (Jim Berghout) who, being the socially inept and impotent science nerd that he is, pretends to deeply empathize with the female protagonist so that he can get into her precious pink panties. Danielle is pregnant and she is considering dumping Mark because he has a sort of hippie attitude to romance and is not serious about getting married or having kids. After going back to Paul's apartment, Danielle informs him that she is pregnant and is probably going to get an abortion. Meanwhile, Mark finds Danielle's birth control pills and realizes she has not been taking them regularly, thus leading him to assume that she is pregnant. When Mark comes to pick up Danielle from Paul's place and she acts like a cold and callous bitch to him, it only reinforces his suspicion that she is pregnant, yet he does not have the balls to ask her if she is knocked up. Of course, considering that he has a pathetic boyish crush on Danielle, Paul neglects to tell Mark that his girlfriend is pregnant. As girls tend to do while they are irritated at their lovers, Danielle proceeds to bitch to Mark about a bunch of frivolous things like how the milkman had too many zits when he is driving her home. In fact, Danielle decides to randomly get out of Mark's car and continues her bitching campaign while walking down the street while her boyfriend tries in vain to talk some sense into her. In fact, Danielle goes so far as far as attempting to make her beau jealous by stating, "...Paul was nice. I could hardly resist him," but Mark eventually manages to get back in the car.

When the couple finally gets back to their apartment, Mark attempts to get Danielle to open up to him about her feelings, asking her, "Why do you act so strange? You've been acting like a stranger for weeks. When I want to help, you don't talk me," but the only thing she can do is complain about being terribly tired and her head hurting. When Danielle complains "my head hurts" when he attempts to type up an article for work on his typewriter while she is attempting to sleep, the protagonist decides to roam the streets and call his father on a payphone that his girlfriend might be pregnant as if he is actually happy about the prospect of becoming a daddy. The next morning, Mark attempts to have sex with Danielle, but she acts fiercely frigid and callously complains, "You don't have to use your body to prove you love me. You have done that for years." In an attempt to gauge how serious Mark is about the future of their relationship, Danielle asks him where he thinks they will be in five years and he states in an idealistic fashion they will because split up because, "All relationships that last longer than two years, go wrong." After rightly describing Mark's response as a "pseudo-artistic performance" (indeed, it is quite obvious that Mark thinks he is some sort of enlightened post-counterculture progressive who rejects the outmoded morals of the dreaded bourgeoisie), Danielle decides to go against her beau's wishes and plans a trip to Yugoslavia, but when she goes to her rich parents for money, she discovers they are out of town. Before even going on the trip, Danielle writes Mark a letter saying that she will be away for three weeks that ends with, "I won't come back to you." Upon meeting an elderly blind man that she finds sleeping inside a photobooth who she ultimately takes a series of photos with and who describes how he is still very much in love with his dead wife of 20 years, Danielle realizes there really is no future with Mark as she could never imagine him having the same feelings about her as the old widow does of his deceased spouse.

Needless to say, when Mark comes up with the rather absurd plan to save his relationship with Danielle by surprising her by bringing home two middle-aged swingers, Fons (Ben Hulsman) and Joke (Lettie Oosthoek), she becomes exceedingly enraged, especially after the male partner-swapper, who is old enough to be her father, slaps her on the ass in a sassy fashion. Somewhat absurdly, Mark attempts to rationalize his actions by remarking, "That's the future of all relationships. Partner-swapping, cheating, separate holidays, divorce. Everybody we know had one of those problems. And it's the children who suffer." Ultimately, Danielle rebuffs Mark for being so presumptuous as to inform his father of her pregnancy and invite swingers over without asking her about it first, complaining, "By never asking me, you've changed my feelings towards you." Without even admitting she is pregnant, Danielle decides to get an abortion while her boyfriend is busy washing clothes at a laundry mat where he begins playfully flirting with a frigid four-eyed feminist named Anette Urk (Maroesja Lacunes), who is less than impressed with his boastful behavior and gets especially annoyed when he asks her, "Why are activist women always so unfriendly? "You think every man's your enemy, but they can be your friend too. Or do you prefer women?" After proudly declaring, "I've never been cheated on by a woman," Anette moves to the other side of the laundry mat and Mark follows her after noticing she has left a pair of her panties in a washing machine. After acting vaguely suave and blaming his rudeness and "bad mood" on an imaginary car crash, Mark actually manages to get Anette to come back to his apartment with him. Indeed, unbeknownst to Mark, he is attempting to cheat on his girlfriend at the very same time said girlfriend is getting a secret abortion, thus underscoring the innately deceitful behavior of both lovers. Somewhat predictably, Danielle catches Mark messing around with Anette in their attic. While Mark stops making out with Anette due to feeling guilty before things go too far, the damage is already done. Ironically, Anette goes from being a female-power-pontificating prude to a desperate horny woman when Mark rejects her to the point where she pathetically asks him "Am I not pretty enough?" like a little girl with low self-esteem. Ultimately, Mark makes the sexually frustrated feminist leave via a roof window despite the fact she is afraid of heights.

When Danielle tells Mark that they need to talk and says, "The decision has been made, but there are no words to talk about it," it becomes quite obvious that their wrecked relationship is over, though the female protagonist is too afraid to actually execute her decision and leave for good. After telling Mark, "I don't love you anymore," Danielle runs to a nearby sleazy bar and her lovelorn beau naturally follows her like a scared puppy dog. After arriving at the bar, Mark goes to the bathroom to take a leak and is disturbed to find a decidedly deranged Dutch soldier waving a knife at him. After convinced the demented soldier not to stab him he stabs some pipes in the bathroom, Mark unexpectedly learns something about love from the fucked fellow when he hands him a photo of his ex-girlfriend and says, "Once a woman has taken that decision, that's it." After a later incident where Mark attempts to force himself on Anette at the same time pussy Paul pathetically attempts to get into Danielle's panties, the couple temporarily makes up and has make-up sex, but the happiness does not last long. After they share carnal knowledge, Mark expresses his regret about Danielle getting an abortion, stating to her, "As long as that abortion won't haunt us forever," as if he knows their relationship cannot last due to their traumatizing experiences. When Danielle falls asleep, Mark absurdly decides to go out in public while wearing nothing but a coat and is ultimately arrested. Of course, the police give Danielle a call and when she arrives at the police station, the cop on duty asks her if she loves Mark and she responds yes. Upon releasing Mark from his prison cell, the cop states to Mark, "You're lucky with such a nice girlfriend. Hurry, before she changes her mind." Unfortunately, in the end, Danielle does change her mind and decides to go on the trip to Yugoslavia in what is a symbolic end to their relationship.

Not unlike Dick Maas, Ate de Jong is responsible for some of the most conspicuously contrived and Hollywoodesque Dutch films ever made, so Blind Spot makes for an especially interesting film in the filmmaker's oeuvre as much of its potency comes from its grittiness and rawness as a work that certainly does not look like it was directed by a mensch who beats his meat to George Lucas flicks. Indeed, I cannot think of another film where the creaking of floorboards as a result of characters walking around in a dilapidated apartment is so blatant. Of course, more importantly, the film dares to take a relatively realistic approach to dwelling on the more disconcerting aspects of romantic relationships to the point where, like in real-life, there is no happy ending or ideal resolution, thus leaving the viewer with a rare sense of bittersweet sincerity in the end that reminds the filmgoer that fairytales and Hollywood films have nothing to do with real life. Luckily, the film never falls into sappy sentimentalism like Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind (2004), which although lauded for taking a more realistic approach to relationships and breaking up, ultimately ends on a hopeful note that feels like a cheap cope out. In terms of setting and tone, I think Blind Spot is best comparable to gay gutter auteur Andy Milligan's once-lost X-rated masterpiece Nightbirds (1970), which is a considerably darker and more nihilistic work but takes a similarly tragic look at young love in the post-counterculture/post-feminist age. Aesthetically speaking, de Jong's film is like Paul Morrissey's Flesh (1968) meets Woody Allen's Annie Hall (1977) sans the Hebraic neuroticism and pseudo-eccentric intellectual masturbation. Aside from possibly his role in Guido Pieters' Jan Wolkers adaptation Kort Amerikaans (1977) aka Crew Cut, Derek de Lint gives arguably his most energetic and angsty performance of his fairly admirable acting career in Blind Spot, which is a rare film that somewhat benefits from its slightly amateurish and minimalistic direction because it intensifies its overall raw and visceral tone. While I cannot be totally sure, I get the feeling that de Jong's film is more realistic in its depiction of young love in 1970s Holland than Paul Verhoeven's classic masterpiece Turks fruit (1973) aka Turkish Delight. De Jong's film is also notable for being a rare flick that hints that feminism is not the result of members of the so-called fairer sex desiring equality, but quite the opposite. Indeed, as the feminist character Anette reflects in her hypocritical attraction to exploitative and emotionally abuse men as opposed to stoic gentlemen of the morally righteous sort, feminism is a reaction by women to the emasculation and moral degeneration of men and not because women all of a sudden decided that they wanted to pretend that they have cocks and balls. Of course, feminism and its promotion of abortion have helped to lead to the death of lifelong relationships in the West. Indeed, as depicted in Blind Spot, an hour-long trip to the abortion clinic can save both men and women from the responsibility of being a parent, but then again any woman that would pay money to have her unborn child vacuumed out of her vagina while she is fully conscious probably should not have children in the first place. Either way, de Jong's unexpectedly powerful and memorable little directorial debut is a reminder why divorce has become the norm in the Occident and why certain groups of men like those involved in the so-called 'MGTOW' movement have given up on women altogether.

O.K.

Michael Verhoeven (1970)

While war films with anti-war sentiments are no less than a dime a dozen, be it produced by Hollywood or otherwise, I cannot think of such a work as innately idiosyncratic yet politically insipid as German auteur Michael Verhoeven's low-budget far-leftist agitprop film O.K. (1970), a work ostensibly set in the jungles of Vietnam about American GIs yet actually filmed in the forests of Bavaria with an all-kraut hippie/commie cast. Utilizing philo-Semitic kraut commie playwright Bertolt Brecht's so-called 'distancing effect,' O.K. begins rather pretentiously and pedantically with the actors in the film, including writer/director/actor Verhoeven, stating their names, religious affiliations, marital status, and in some cases their sexual experience (actor Wolfgang Fischer proudly states he is 28-year-old unmarried virgin). Despite its absurdly amateurish direction and equally bush-league and eccentrically exaggerated acting, O.K. somehow managed to be chosen as West Germany's official submission to the 43rd Academy Awards for Best Foreign Language Film (though it would not receive a nomination). While also entered into the 20th Berlin International Film Festival, O.K. proved to be so controversial that the film festival was cancelled simply because of the dubious content of the film after old school Hollywood propagandist George Stevens (Shane, Giant) demanded the ostensibly anti-American film to be removed, which in turn caused the festival director to resign and the entire event to fall apart completely. Like the Hollywood film Casualties of War (1989) directed by Brian De Palma and starring Michael J. Fox and Sean Penn, O.K. is based on the true story of the incident on Hill 192 in 1966 during the Vietnam War when a group of GIs kidnapped, gang raped, and murdered a 20-year-old Vietnamese girl named Phan Thi Mao. Despite not featuring leftist Israelite Sean Penn in the absurd role of a evil redneck rapist like Casualties of War, O.K. is all the more radically ridiculous and patently propagandistic in its perverse portrayal of leftist German rednecks (aka Bavarians) as super sadistic and sexually depraved, American and Confederate-flag-waving, anti-communist U.S. soldiers with an irrational hatred yet peculiar fetishism for young yellow girls. Despite featuring nil nudity and almost slapstick-like violence, O.K. ultimately plays out like some sick sex fantasy on director Michael Verhoeven's part, whose dubious fetish for pedamorphic girls is quite obvious as demonstrated by his casting of the prepubescent-like actress Lena Stolze in his most popular films Die weiße Rose (1982) aka The White Rose and Das schreckliche Mädchen (1990) aka The Naasty Girl, as if the filmmaker is projecting his raunchy rape fantasies on half-retarded American rednecks. Sort of like a softcore avant-garde 'torture porn' flick ridden with quasi-commie anti-American clichés typical of members of the 1968 German student movement, O.K. is, at best, a marginally and accidentally entertaining, outmoded celluloid fossil directed by an ethnomasochistic mensch who is clearly trying to aesthetically repent for the fact that his father Paul Verhoeven was a naughty National Socialist filmmaker as demonstrated by his lifelong fixation with anti-anti-communism, blaming his parents/grandparents for the so-called holocaust, and his unhealthy hatred of all-things Third Reich. Luckily, with O.K., Verhoeven at least at some point in his filmmaking career had testicular fortitude and not a mere obsession with blaming the German collective for Nazism as his anti-Vietnam war flick at least makes for a marginally enthralling and exceedingly eccentric exploitation flick.

After the actors of O.K. introduce themselves and their backgrounds in a manner that shows how deeply Bertolt Brecht's theatre theories have deleteriously infected post-WWII German Cinema, one is introduced to the pseudo-American soldiers in their 'natural' habitat. The motley crew of Amerikkkan GIs is lead by a megamaniacal redneck and all-around mad man named Sergeant Tony Meserve (ironically, played by blueblood Friedrich von Thun), a highly decorated soldier who proudly sports an anachronistic Confederate flag on his uniform. Mr. Me-Serve does not like hippies with beards, calling them "communist beards" and stating that a "beard is effeminate," so he gets his dimwitted underlings Corporal Ralph Clarke (Hartmut Becker) and soldier Diaz (Ewald Precht) to hold down a certain pussy pacifist named Rafe (Wolfgang Fischer), so they can give him a nice shave with a large blade, which ultimately only results in half of his mustache being cut off. Seeming to suffer from Tourette's syndrome, the soldiers often randomly spout off weird things that a leftist Bavarian filmmaker like Michael Verhoeven might assume American hick soldiers might say like "immigrant stays immigrant" so as to demonstrate their disdain for darkies immigrating to their homeland despite their fighting in a foreign Third World nation's civil war. When a 15-year-old Vietnamese girl of the Catholic faith named Phan Ti Mao (played by the seemingly Asiatic Eva Mattes, who more resembles a Mongol than a true blue gook) makes the mistake of riding by the American GIs on her bike, they menacingly interrogate her and accuse her of being an atheistic commie spy. After one of the GIs, a nice fellow named Sven Eriksson (not unsurprisingly played by 'noble' leftist director Michael Verhoeven) makes an honorable attempt to stop the humiliating harassment of Ms. Mao, Meserve has Rafe rape the teenage girl. After Meserve declares, "Equal rights for everybody; we're a democratic country," the rest of the soldiers take a turn at physically pillaging Mao, except gentleman Sven, who valiantly refuses to commit the act, although his commanders attempt to force him. Not unsurprisingly, Miss Mao is eventually stabbed by Clarke and eventually maliciously murdered by the sadistic American soldiers via machine guns and soldier saint Sven makes his getaway on the dead gook gal's bike so he can tattle on his corrupt comrades. When it comes to dumping Mao's mutilated corpse, the soldiers agree it is a "matter of honor" and that "everything is o.k." Of course, Sven thinks otherwise and tells his commanding officers about the malicious murder/rape and they tell him to keep his mouth shut because, after all, Sergeant Meserve is an honorable man who has received five medals, including the bronze star, and was even part of the inaugural sermon for President Johnson. Sven is also told by an apathetic commanding officer the following advice, "And remember something else please: this murder did not happen in the United States but outside of civilization. Namely, on the battlefield." Of course, all of the soldiers (with the exception of Sven, of course) eventually received a court-martial and (reduced) prison sentences.

While a piece of absurdly amateurish leftist agitprop that uses Brechtian theatre techniques in a rather blatant attempt to mask its lack of production values and any sort of realism, O.K.—for better or worse—still makes for one of Michael Verhoeven's most interesting and experimental works, as it ultimately seems like an accidental exploitation flick parading around as an audacious antiwar flick, which for its time, it most certainly was. Of course, with mainstream anti-Vietnam war Hollywood flicks like De Palma's Casualties of War (1989), which is essentially a lavish sentimentalist remake of Verhoeven's flick, as well as superior works like Apocalypse Now (1979) and Platoon (1986), O.K. is nothing if not absurdly outmoded and socio-politically and aesthetically redundant, hence the film's almost total obscurity today. Aside from an apparently accidentally created 'sound loop' from a Moog synthesizer, O.K. also has the distinction of lacking a soundtrack, which would go on to inspire rape and revenge exploitation flicks like Israeli degenerate Meir Zarchi's I Spit on Your Grave (1978), which is also an aesthetically retarded work that wallows in radical redneck-bashing and senselessly long rape scenes. Clearly the creation of a man with a needlessly wanton wackjob weltanschauung of the ethno-masochistic quasi-commie/anti-Amerikkkan sort, O.K. is probably one of the most blatant examples of the intellectual and aesthetic bankruptcy of the far-left and today the film only works as a sort of Marxist-sploitation black comedy, but not much more. One must also give minor props to Verhoeven for opening O.K. with a quote from anti-Semite Semite journalist Karl Kraus, but for some reason I doubt the great Austrian satirist would have approved of the Bavarian filmmaker's use of the quote, which is "Humanity had the bullet go in on ear and out the other." Apparently, it seems to have never crossed auteur Michael Verhoeven's mind that the historical record proves that Marxists have committed much greater crimes against humanity than the German National Socialists and Italian fascists ever did, but as O.K. proves, leftists have never let historical reality get in the way of a seemingly psychopathic interpretation of history.

THE NASTY GIRL

Unless focusing on totally deranged, perversely politically incorrect, and superlatively scatological subjects like the late great kraut avant-garde carnny Christoph Schlingensief (The German Chainsaw-Massacre, Terror 2000) or farcical fascism/lunatic leftism of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's psychopathic slapstick flick Satan's Brew (1976) aka Satansbraten, German filmmakers should stay away from cinematically depicting comedy, especially of the cliché far-leftist and philo-Semitic Brechtian sort, which is exactly why Bavarian bitchboy Michael Verhoeven's Das schreckliche Mädchen (1990) aka The Nasty Girl is one of the most intrinsically irritating and aesthetically agonizing films I have ever seen. Based on the true story of a bitchy Bavarian broad named Anna Rosmus who started digging into her hometown of Passau's unflattering Nazi past after being spurred by a nationwide essay contest, The Nasty Girl follows an indubitably nasty busybody girl who digs deep into her town's history, despite having her flat bombed and personal relationships destroyed in the process, only to become an ungrateful cunt after the town honors her by having a bust placed in the town hall in the form of her likeness despite her malicious research. A couple years ago, I had the misfortune of attending a public screening of The Nasty Girl in a room full of Jews, white liberals, and a hodgepodge of multicultural folks of varying racial shades. To my complete and utter surprise, a middle-aged Jewish man popped up immediately during a post-screening conversation regarding The Nasty Girl and rhetorically asked when the Germans will finally refrain from continuing to apologize to the Jews and paying hefty reparations to the not-so-tolerant Jewish ethno-nationalist state of Israel. Of course, the anti-zionist Jew was more keen than most viewers regarding picking up the sickening slave-morality-driven nature of the film, as The Nasty Girl is one of those ostensibly cutesy and comical works that makes it easier for less discerning viewers to swallow its ethno-masochistic, feminist message due to its deranged depiction of a pedomorphic 'little princess' depicted by the ever-so-annoying Lena Stolze, who previously depicted 'anti-nazi martyr' Sophie Scholl in Verhoeven's Die Weiße Rose (1982) aka The White Rose, as the protagonist displaying her sassy Svengali-like 'girl power' by digging into her town's past and proving that many of its esteemed leaders are ex-nazis and kike-killers. The son of National Socialist auteur Paul Verhoeven (no, not the Dutch one!), director Michael Verhoeven seems to have used The Nasty Girl as a way to dig up dirt on his daddy, but he thankfully had enough foresight to obscure his personally pernicious agenda by having a little girl stand in for himself, which is further supported by the director's statement at the beginning of the film, "The story my film tells is at once fiction and truth. I am not interested in the history of a specific town in Germany, but rather in the truth of all towns in our country. My film is set in Bavaria because I live here. Characters and actions are fictional.” Utilizing Syberberg-esque tableaux, including back-projected streets and buildings, and a total blitzkrieging of the Fourth Wall, The Nasty Girl is aesthetic asininity and absurdity that made even holocaust-worshipper Roger Ebert nearly lose his lunch, writing regarding Verhoeven’s flick, “It’s the film’s style that I object to. The story itself is fascinating, but the style seems to add another tone, a level of irony that is somehow confusing: Does Verhoeven see this as quite the cheery romp he pretends, or is there a sly edge to his method? As a rule I welcome stylistic experiments - most movies are much too straightforward - but this time I’m not sure the movie’s odd tone adds anything. Realism might have worked better.” Unfortunately, politics aside, Ebert could not have said it better as The Nasty Girl has the aesthetic integrity of a Geico commercial.

If The Nasty Girl ‘protagonist’ Sonja (Lena Stolze) is good at anything, it is prying into other people’s business, especially when said people kindly and, eventually, not so kindly, tell her to fuck off and to mind her own damn business. After winning a high school essay contest that wins her a trip to Paris, which further lobotomizes her already liberal mind, Sonja is more than confident about entering another essay contest that involves researching her town of Pfilzing’s relationship to the Third Reich, but after hitting a number of dead-ends and roadblocks, largely put up by highly secretive townspeople, especially those people in places of power, she must accept that the essay contest’s deadline has expired, which makes her cuckold teacher boyfriend Martin (Robert Giggenbach) rather happy and the two leftist lovebirds inevitably wed. Of course, the always prying Sonja treats her failure to enter the essay contest as a minor setback and after a bunch of naughty Nazis throw a rock through the rear window of her car after her wedding ceremony, she is more than determined to seek her hysterical revenge against the crypto-Nazi townspeople. In fact, throughout various points in The Nasty Girl, the town of Pfilzing is depicted as a Catholic crypto-Nazi epicenter where drunk and boorish krauts sing old school National Socialist songs secretly in the night like sinister demons. When Sonja discovers a certain Jewish conman, who apparently met his death after being sent to a concentration camp, swindled two Pfilzing priests out of 100 pairs of underwear during the Third Reich, she becomes determined to unmask the unholy anti-Semitic holymen. On top of the nameless and faceless masked neo-nazis in the night, Sonja faces scorn from her professor Juckenack (Hans-Reinhard Müller), who, using Gestapo-esque tactics, secretly bars the girl from researching microfilms in a local city archive. To get to the dubious documents, Sonja decides to sue Pfilzing, which causes countless death threats against the little lady and her extended family, but she ultimately wins the lawsuit, although the so-called ‘Zumtobel documents’ that she is looking for are nowhere to be found and she is given a number of questionable reasons why as to their disappearance. Putting the search for the Zumtobel documents before her baby daughter and jealous cuck of a man-woman husband, her personal life takes a dive for the worst, but hey, she eventually gets the docs and proves her 'girl power' or whatever and literally yodels in celebration. After learning her professor Juckenack was one of the Nazi priests responsible for putting the Jewish conman in a concentration camp and the local pharmacist was involved with experimenting on Jews, Sonja has the distinguished luxury of having her family home bombed by some nefarious Nazi scum. Sonja publishes a paper on her findings, titled "My Hometown in the Third Reich," and is even given an honorary degree from the University of Vienna because of her "brave accounting of the recent history," and is subsequently awarded a doctorate from the Swedish Royal Academy in Uppsala, among various other prizes. After revealing that she is writing a book on the "Jews of Pflzing," Sonja reveals to the town that professor Juckenack, as well as a certain Father Brummel, the man that christened her as a child, were the two priests that got the Jew put in the concentration camp. Meanwhile, Sonja's husband leaves her for Munich, her progressive and sexually promiscuous brother starts screwing girls, and professor Juckenack sues her for defamation. With the help of an old school communist who was persecuted during the Third Reich, Sonja wins the trial and "Juckenack is dropped like a hot potato." Although the townspeople ultimately side with Sonja and pay tribute to her with a bust of her head in tribute, she proves intolerable to the end, stating to the entire town, "I won't let you turn me into a bust and stick me in the town hall. I am a living human being...I'm not falling for this. Just because you're scared shitless, because you're afraid of what I might still find out...I won't be quiet. That is exactly what they want," and promptly smacks her mother and grandmother, thus proving to a hysterical and bitter bitch to the very end.

At the anticlimactic, albeit fitting, conclusion of The Nasty Girl, perennially prying protagonist Sonja climbs up and hides in a tree like a scared little girl who has not only pushed away immediate family and even her neighbors, but who has also become a self-righteous and prissy pixie bitch whose nearly megalomaniacal goals seem to be dragging everyone she knows to a sort of nihilistic and ethno-masochistic netherworld, which can also be said of director Michael Verhoeven and his idiotically idealistic films. In a somewhat recent documentary he directed, Der unbekannte Soldat (2006) aka The Unknown Soldier, Verhoeven proved he saw a kindred spirit/alter-ego in the form of his protagonist from The Nasty Girl by depicting the entire Wehrmacht (German army) as genocidal kike killers, thus making him a man after Teutonophobe S. Spielberg's Hebraic heart. Aside from being an aesthetically appalling piece of failed kraut comedy, The Nasty Girl is a somewhat hateful work that attempts to disguise its deranged message of 'most Germans were and are anti-Semitic Nazis' with a smile by using humor as the ultimate merry and malicious manipulator of the viewer as a wretched work that is intended to inspire self-hatred, guilt, and a sackless slave-morality in German viewers and Hollywood-like Germanophobic hysteria in

Americans and other non-krauts. More embarrassing and aesthetically revolting than the most patently prosaic of Wim Wenders' pseudo-existentialist celluloid meanderings and less humorous and more irritating than the latest Judd Apatow stoner 'Jew crew' comedy, The Nasty Girl is as noxious and nettling as cinematic works come, even in the context of ethno-masochistic cinema. Aside from those interested in seeing girlish and agonizingly annoying lead actress Lena Stolze's stark-naked body or baboonish beer-chugging Bavarian acting which is no less retarded than the average on field antics of an American Negro professional football player, The Nasty Girl is a film to be avoided at all costs, though certain masochists, especially of the cuckold persuasion, might find Verhoeven's film to be one of the greatest 'softcore commie comedies' ever made.

THE UNKNOWN SOLDIER

Undoubtedly, you have to wonder about a man who has not only dedicated his career to attacking his people and country, but also his own father, which has certainly been the masochistic thematic mainstay of far-leftist Bavarian auteur Michael Verhoeven (Die weiße Rose aka The White Rose, Das schreckliche Mädchen aka The Nasty Girl). While one of his least aesthetically ambitious works, Verhoeven decidedly deluded documentary Der unbekannte Soldat (2006) aka The Unknown Soldier: What did you do in war, Dad?—a pseudo-intellectual and Philo-Semitic agitprop piece of the superficially sentimental variety that libelously attempts to collectively condemn the entire German Wehrmacht (army) as war criminals that were no less evil than members of the Einsatzgruppen SS death squads—is essentially the thematic summation of an exceedingly ethno-masochistic filmmaker who seems to have dedicated his entire career to atone for the fact that his father Paul Verhoeven (of no relation to the Dutch Robocop director of the same name) was a National Socialist filmmaker. The fact The Unknown Soldier opens with the ridiculous inter-title “What did you do in war, Dad?” only goes to show Verhoeven’s vindictive and venomous lifelong Oedipus complex. Inspired by public controversy surrounding the 1997 release at the Hamburg Institute for Social Research of the so-called “Wehrmachtsausstellung” (German Army exhibition)—a largely fiction-based exhibition supposedly focusing on War crimes of the Wehrmacht committed on the East Front from 1941 to 1944 that was set up by German ‘antifascist’ communist historian Hannes Heer, who managed to acquire a rather lengthy criminal wrap-sheet during the 1970s as a left-wing agitator/softcore terrorist—The Unknown Soldier is a brazenly biased work that for the most part only focuses on showing images of kosher corpses and interviewing communist/far-left academics/intellectuals and Zionist Jews regarding the supposed crimes against humanity allegedly committed by the Wehrmacht. While barely touched on in The Unknown Soldier, the Wehrmachtsausstellung exhibit was taken down in 1999 due to the fact that, among other things, only ten percent of all the 800 photos of alleged war crimes were actually Wehrmacht crimes (most were those committed by the Red Army and other commie Slavs) as recognized by Hungarian historian Krisztián Ungváry. Like any red ‘true believer’, Hannes Heer, who refused to acknowledge criticism of the exhibit and his failure as a historian (and very possibly academic fraud), was fired from his position as the director of the Hamburg Institute for Social Research (where the original exhibition was setup) and excluded from being involved in a revision of the exhibition released from 2001-2004 and with The Unknown Soldier, director Verhoeven goes to great lengths to portray the commie shoah showman and falsifier of history as an honorable humanitarian and intellectual sage. Opening with stock-footage of a sign on the Eastern Front that reads “These Jews stirred up hatred against the German Wehrmacht” and proceeding to show a line of lynched Israelites with star of David badges hanging from a pole, The Unknown Soldier wastes no time in imposing absurdly sensationalized psychological warfare on the viewer, attempting to associate the common German soldier with genocide and the holocaust as if the entire Wehrmacht was led by Wotan.

Towards the beginning of The Unknown Soldier, a female newscaster from a news report dated Feb. 24, 1997 states that “The exhibit “War of Extermination – Crimes of German Armed Forces 1941-44” is opening at this very minute after a 4-year battle,” thus demonstrating that, despite being over half a century since the conclusion of the Second World War that the public promotion of suicidal ethno-masochism and self-flagellation has reached a totally new all time low in American-occupied and culturally homogenized Teutoland. Before the viewer knows it, they are introduced to discernibly dubious creator of the Wehrmachtsausstellung exhibit, Hannes Heer—a swarthy, gully, and rather all-around repellant girly man with a pompous ponytail and prissy demeanor who proceeds to go on a self-righteous diatribe about how all Germans were brainwashed to kill and had an innate kike-killing Weltanschauung inspired by Uncle Adolf’s infamous tome Mein Kampf that made the common kraut take a Terminator-esque approach to battle. Outside a Munich-based protest of the exhibit, various elderly proletarian Germans, many of whom fought in the Second World War, discuss their abject disgust and disdain for the misleadingly titled German Army exhibition. One German man makes the insightful remark regarding the exhibit, “Foreigners are running around here, plenty of them, look over there. They’re laughing about the Germans. They’re saying, “Those Germans are crazy,”” and, indeed, the German (leftist) mainstream does seem to have a special affinity for self-flagellation because, after all, since when has a Mongol felt bad about the legacy of Genghis Kahn, a Jew apologized for the genocidal class warfare of Leon Trotsky, or a towelhead apologized for the actions of Osama Bin Laden?! Of course, Michael Verhoeven managed to find as much as footage possible of seemingly nefarious neo-nazi skinheads and National Democratic Party of Germany (NPD) members acting like buffoons while listening to militant neofolk music at outdoor concerts, which then segues into an interview with a ‘holocaust survivor’ (she never actually stayed in a concentration camp) Charlotte Knobloch who, on top being one of the most influential Jews in Munich and being the President of the Central Council of Jews in Germany (Zentralrat der Juden in Deutschland), is also Vice President of the European Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Congress. Journalist Ralph Giordano—another holocaust survivor who never stayed in a concentration camp and later went on to become a communist after the Second World War and dedicating his life to writing propaganda against neo-nazis and Islamo-fascists—also weighs in on the wretched wrath of the Wehrmacht, even declaring that the average WWII-era German had the capacity to be a killer of women and children. All in all, most of the subjects featured in The Unknown Soldier seem to be reading from the same Trotskyite playbook of propaganda, though Christian Worch, an important neo-nazi who, unlike the typical Amerikkkan nutzi, seems rather rational in his opinion. In fact, before looking Worch up online, I assumed he was merely another cultural Marxist historian, albeit one with a much more objective understanding of history. Of course, like in most contemporary European countries, any individual that displays even the slightest pro-nationalist sentiments is looked upon as a potential nazi and homicidal Heeb exterminator.

As historian Jörg Friedrich—an ex-Trotskyite best known for his publication Der Brand (2002) aka The Fire, which details the Anglo-American Allied bombing campaign that was largely carried out to simply eradicate large percentages of the German populous, especially women and children—states near the conclusion of The Unknown Soldier, “No army will ever function if every subordinate first checks each order to verify its validity and legitimacy. If that were the case, the army would be lost already.” And, indeed, Friedrich’s remark seems to be something virtually every of the pencil-pushing far-left intellectuals in The Unknown Soldier cannot seem to realize the job of a soldier and chain of command, as if every single German soldier (no matter how low-ranking) was responsible for the comfort of every Jew and Red Army soldier. As an elderly man protesting the Germany army exhibit states, “It’s natural that people were captured who were partisans or had been, and that they were shot. That is the inalienable right of the Germans.” Ultimately, the Wehrmachtsausstellung exhibit is just another way for communists, vengeful Hebrews, feminists, and American globalists, and other enemies of the German people to shame Germans into guilt and to accept that their nation is turning into a multicultural sewer. Until Germans and other Europeans tell Zionist Jews, leftist intellectuals (aka Frankfurt School fetishists aka ethno-masochistic Philo-Semites), and Americans to fuck off and stop whining about the so-called holocaust, they are facing a very likely suicide as a people and nation as recognized by everyone from Pat Buchanan to French-German ‘New Right’ theorist Pierre Krebs. As director Michael Verhoeven admitted in an interview with indiewire.com, he was largely inspired to direct The Unknown Soldier in retaliation for nationalistic protest against the German Army exhibition, stating “You have to imagine that I am not a documentarian. All films I had made before were purely fictional. But on the 1st of March, 1997, a demonstration of 5,000 neo-nazis took place in the heart of Munich, at the St.Jakobs-Platz, where the Jewish Community Center is established. The neo-nazis came from all over Germany to protest against the exhibition about the crimes of the German “Wehrmacht.” I spontaneously called camera teams to hurry to the St.Jakobs-Platz and decided to confront the neo-nazis with questions. This was the beginning of my work on that documentary, which started before I even had watched the exhibition. It was not only opposed by the right-wing of German society but as well by people of all levels and groups,” thus the documentary should not be approached as anything less than a senselessly sensationalized agitprop piece that gives Deutschland’s most prestigious and vainglorious academic commies a platform to spew their fossilized anti-fascist rhetoric, a good percentage of which is inspired by Soviet propaganda (ironically, a large percentage of the photos from the original Germany Army exhibit were taken from Soviet propaganda files, including atrocities committed by the Red Army, but later falsely attributed to Germans).

For whatever reason, the imdb.com page for The Unknown Soldier does not list a single person interviewed for the documentary, nor does the documentary itself reveal these individuals’ relatively extremist political affiliations, but virtually every one of them, including Hannes Heer, Oskar Negt (a Marxist theorist and friend of Alexander Kluge), Dieter Pohl, Charlotte Knobloch, and Ralph Giordano is a communist and/or Zionist Jew with a political agenda that does not promote peace as one would expect from the film’s anti-war tone, but rather class warfare and genocide instead. While focusing on Jewish suffering at the hands of the average German, The Unknown Soldier fails to acknowledge that, aside from the fact that there were over 5,318,000 German military casualties in WWII (as recognized by German historian Rüdiger Overmans’ extensive study titled German Military Casualties in the Second World War), more Germans were killed in World War II than Jews, not to mention the upwards of two million Germans that were exterminated after the war during the Flight and Expulsion of Germans (1944–50) by the Soviets, who people like Wehrmacht-sausstellung exhibition creator Hannes Heer support in spirit as commies who are traitors to their own people and nation. As stated by former German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer in April 6th, 1951, as presented towards the beginning of The Unknown Soldier regarding Wehrmacht criminals, “The percentage of those who are truly guilty is so insignificant and so exceptionally small that, I would like to say in this context, that they do not tarnish the honor of the former German Armed Forces.” Featuring incessant collage footage of evil Nazis goose-stepping and the same exact played out footage/photographs that are used in virtually every holocaust museum/documentary of starved Jewish corpses and lynch Judeo-Bolsheviks, The Unknown Soldier is just another one of the many examples of how the absurdly outmoded agitpropagandists of the far-left are starved for material in their one-dimensional propaganda war. A virtual porn flick for antifa activists and pedantic cultural Marxist academics/intellecutuals, The Unknown Soldier is ultimately more revealing about how modern day Germany is run by traitors, cowards, and armchair commies than any sort of serious and intellectual stimulating discuss of German soldiers during the Second World War. Rather ironically, director Verhoeven admitted in an interview with the site indiewire.com regarding The Unknown Soldier that he largely learned his craft as a filmmaker from his National Socialist auteur father, stating, “I preferred the more psychological way of directing, which I had experienced with directors like my father and Kautner.” Of course, The Unknown Soldier is nowhere near as entertaining as a Nazi propaganda flick like Der ewige Jude (1940) aka The Eternal Jew directed by Fritz Hippler (who was of partial Jewish ancestry himself), but what else can one expect from a filmmaker who combined the aesthetically banal theories of Philo-Semitic kraut commie Bertolt Brecht with Hebraic vaudevillian style humor for his most popular film The Nasty Girl (1990).

THE KILLER INSIDE ME

Michael Winterbottom (2010)

I did not have much expectation when going into The Killer Inside Me as I assumed the film would be the typical absurdly romantic portrayal of psychopathic killer that Hollywood is so fond of. The film is based on a fairly popular pulp crime novel of the same name that was written by Jim Thompson (who worked with Stanley Kubrick on his script for The Killing) and published in 1952. One writer nicknamed author Thompson "Dimestore Dostoevsky" and with the author's dark psychological insights into human nature (set in backwards rural southwestern United States), I consider that a fair title for the author of The Killer Inside Me. The Killer Inside Me is a fun little film, featuring a hot twat prostitute, the banality of small town socio-political living, and what happens when a group of town folk come to realize one of their own sons is a saint of sadism.

The lead of The Killer Inside Me is played by Casey Affleck, the younger and less impressive (yet less annoying) brother of hack Hollywood star Ben Affleck. Casey Affleck plays Deputy Sheriff Lou Ford, a man who loves platitudes and seems to be a competent yet somewhat mentally slow officer of the law. Underneath the seemingly normal and typical exterior, Lou Ford is a depraved sociopath who seems most alive whilst punching beautiful women in the face. I almost would have liked to have seen Ben Affleck play the role of Deputy Sheriff Lou Ford but his brother Casey does a good enough job. Casey's Texan twang combined with his soft-spoken monotone voice make for a disturbingly effective auditory signature for a sociopath killer.

One has to wonder whether or not sociopaths can love/find love and if so, with who? Deputy Sheriff Lou Ford seems to find love in a hot tamale prostitute played extra erotically by Jessica Alba. Apparently, Alba is one of those annoying Feminists in real-life but in The Killer Inside Me she does a superb job enjoying being beaten during sex, especially in a super sensual scene involving her bare ass and Lou Ford's belt. Alba's prostitute character acts like a super big cunt when Deputy Sheriff Lou Ford warns her to leave town due to her illegal prostitution, so the officer makes sure to give her a little corporal punishment in response to her disorderly behavior, a kind of chastening that eventually results in a deranged sort of true love. If only Jessica Alba's character in the hatchet-job spickploitation film Machete were to have also received the same kind of punishment from a white man of the law. According to mestizo comedian George Lopez, a DNA test showed Alba to be 87% European and 13% Injun. One can only assume that her beauty in general is the result of her European ancestry but the Amerindian genetics helped to add a little extra meat to her delectable derriere.

The Killer Inside Me is certainly no motion picture masterpiece but a worthy way to waste about two hours. After all, Hollywood films about killers are generally highly repulsive and full of more platitudes than Deputy Sheriff Lou Ford could ramble off after an all-nighter drinking Southern Comfort. The Killer Inside Me is a film about the struggle it takes when dealing with the nonstop addiction of sadism. Deputy Sheriff Lou Ford is a somewhat interesting anti-hero that challenges ones thoughts in regards to going beyond good and evil. He may lack the charm of Alex from A Clockwork Orange and charisma of Ted Bundy but one cannot help but find him likable, at least to some degree. After all, Deputy Sheriff Lou Ford was able to drive Jessica Alba to “the congress of a cow.”

FALCONHEAD PART II: THE MANEATERS

Michael Zen (1984)

If any old school American semi-mainstream poofster porn flick adequately depicts what homo Hades might be like for all the S&M leather-fags who succumbed to AIDS in the 1980s, it is most certainly Falconhead Part II: The Maneaters (1984) directed by Michael Zen (The Filthy Rich: A 24 K-Dirty Movie, The Naked Fugitive). Indeed, while most sequels suck shit-marinated mothballs, especially in regard to porn sequels, The Maneaters is nothing short of infinitely superior to Zen's first film, Falconhead (1976), which I found to be an abject disappointment that, although carefully coated in Cocteau-esque mirrors and man-loving mysticism of the nude and nefarious sort, is essentially nothing more than a bunch of pseudo-butch dudes with conspicuously contrived beards and mustaches engaging in rather repellant buggery and whatnot. Of course, The Maneaters features its fare share of male masturbators and shadowy sodomy, but the film is more interested in audacious neo-Gothic aestheticism and a foreboding atmosphere than anything else, as if it was directed by a man who wanted to become a serious arthouse director but lacked the money and morality to do so. Rather nightmarishly nonlinear in structure, The Maneaters is essentially a curious and sometimes creepy collection of patently 'perverse' (in more than one sense of the word!) petite vignettes that resemble the fragmentary structure of early Werner Schroeter operatic celluloid epics like Eika Katappa (1969) and Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran, albeit with an ominous and onieric visuals that lie somewhere in between Luis Buñuel and Salvador Dalí's Un Chien Andalou (1929) aka An Andalusian Dog, Steven Arnold's Luminous Procureess (1971), Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984), and Clive Barker's Hellraiser (1987). The shuddersome sodomite tale of a muscle-bound being with a falcon head and a human body named the 'Falconhead' who captures young narcissistic Nancy boys with his magical masturbatory mirror in a sort of poof purgatory until they learn to become sexually altruistic and selflessly satisfy the needs of other young and not so young men, The Maneaters is an aberrantly allegorical tale that probably sent the wrong sort of message when it was released in the mid-1980s during the Dark Age of AIDS, thus further adding to the wanton and wayward work's dark and sinister appeal. A rare fag fuck flick that addresses the innate narcissism associated with male homosexuality and the tendency for PBFs (pretty boy fags) to be attracted to men that look exactly like them, The Maneaters—a film that carries an unintentionally hilarious message that is the innate literal inverse of "go fuck yourself"—is also a work that will seem extra horrific to the authoritarian LGBT crowd.

Beginning with the Falconhead (Paul Barressi)—a humanoid-like being with a falcon head and human male body—stroking himself in the forest, The Maneaters then introduces a semi-mature blond twink with a British accent named Barry (Rick Taylor) who is haunted by dreams of brutal bird-like creature, but he soon gets over these nightmares and begins to stroke himself in the shower after recalling a discrete encounter he had with a young blond buck that he recently defiled in a local park. Barry is a proud self-absorbed narcissist who only cares about pleasuring himself, though he is willing to fuck other men so long as they look almost exactly like him. One dark night, a seemingly demonic, Svengali-like leather-fag in full gay Gestapo regalia shows up at Barry's home and tells him "Tonight... You will find the Falcon mirror." A true jerk-off asshole, Barry mocks the mystery man and asks him "who the fuck are you?" in a not so nice manner, so said mystery man angrily tells him, "You listen... Falconhead is a creature that captures young narcissistic men... through the mirror... and keeps them imprisoned until they are capable of fluffing someone else besides themselves. Falconhead lives in the reflection of every narcissist." Apparently, the Falconhead's weapon of choice is "a man-eating mirror where lovers of self-reflection become their own reflection" and the bitchy blond Brit Barry has a date with said mirror. That same night Barry attends a somber and surreal queer masquerade ball (which he calls "hardly a party") that is full of all the 'usual creatures,' including queens, fag hags, hustlers and—most importantly—the young narcissists, among other things, but they are all wearing bizarre costumes reminiscent of Luminous Procuress. Luckily, The Maneaters lacks the hippie homoeroticism of Luminous Procuress and prefers to wallow in more wickedly wanton worlds.

True to self-flattering fag form, Barry becomes enamored with two blond twinks who look like him and purportedly have the 'same cocks,' so he watches them engage in literally and figuratively steamy sodomy. From there, The Maneaters enters the naughty nightmarish realm of the pernicious magician Falconhead's 'poof pandemonium' mirror. In one rather startlingly angelic Mishima-esque scene contained within a completely white and otherworldly room in what seems to be homo heaven, a young blond dude masturbates himself using a red rose with thorns, thus drawing the blood of the young poet. Following the lurid lead of an over-the-hill homo sporting a white wedding dress who somewhat resembles Sean Connery in John Boorman's Zardoz (1974), Barry listens and watches as perverts imprisoned in the Falconhead's mirror tell their sexually psychopathic stories in an ultimately feeble attempt to seduce the bratty blond Brit. In a scene that falls somewhere between the 'subliminal' homoeroticism of Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964) and the all-out motorcycle-molesting degeneracy of Fred Halsted's The Sex Garage (1972), Barry watches as two biker boys wearing nothing but jockstraps bugger one another. Barry also voyeuristically gazes at a self-described "cockfreak" who could "eat cock and ass for hours" and "gets off to natural smells" as he sucks off an alpha-cop with a 'cock-shaped helmet.' In the end, Barry manages to 'deny all' the sinister seductions of the demonic perverts in the Falconhead's mirror, including a Medusa-like MILF who seems rather out of place in homo Hades, thus he is trapped in pansy purgatory indefinitely. Naturally, Falconhead Part II: The Maneaters (1984) concludes with the eponymous 'villain' busting a load in the forest and devilishly declaring to the viewer, "You have reawaken from a dream and found yourself soaked with your own cum." Unfortunately for Mr. Falconhead, I did not spill a single seed while watching the film, though I did drop some greasy Chinese rice on my pants.

A sort of celluloid micro-saga of the pseudo-Ancient Greek sort featuring a synth-driven soundtrack in the delightfully dreamy and diabolical spirit of Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972), Falconhead Part II: The Maneaters is nothing short of a mystical arthouse flick with horror and fantasy elements that has been aesthetically defiled by hardcore pornography, sort of like Jean Genet's sole film A Song of Love (1950) aka Un chant d'amour, albeit more pornographic. Indeed, The Maneaters also recalls the films of Polish auteur Walerian Borowczyk (The Beast aka La bête, The Streetwalker aka La marge) due to its artfully fetishistic combination of phantasmagoric imagery and naked naughty bits. In that sense, The Maneaters almost seems like an aesthetic tragedy as a work that has virtually all of the ingredients of an arthouse cult flick, but is ultimately hardly known outside the sad semen-stained world of forgotten vintage gay porn. Probably more than anything else, The Maneaters feels like an extra-gay arthouse take on Clive Barker's Hellraiser (I honestly would be no surprised if Barker, who is gay, saw Zen's flick and got influenced by it) due to its foreboding feel and tendency for characters to enter forbidden realms of unnerving darkness and decadence, though Michael Zen's flick is nowhere as stringently S&M-themed, even if it an authentic fag fuck flick. For whatever reason, auteur Zen went the same dubious route as aberrant-garde kraut auteur Jörg Buttgerit did with his Nekromantik series as he refrained from directing a third Falconhead and thus failing to making it the trilogy it should be. Of course, considering Zen currently directs shot-on-video trash fuck flicks with titles like Young, Hung and Horny (2002) and WMB: Weapons of Masturbation (2003), as well as straight porn videos like Jenna Loves Diamonds (2008) starring Jenna Jameson, I think he gave up on making arthful blue movies long ago, as he probably did not want to lead a loser life plagued by poverty. After all, the last thing Americans want to see is poetic porn flicks with allegorical imagery and esoteric storylines and I am sure The Maneaters proved to be an anti-masturbatory experience for the majority of perverts who saw it when it was originally release nearly three decades ago. A rare 1980s gay porn flick that blurs the typically fine line of not only art and pornography, but horror and homoeroticism as well, Falconhead Part II: The Maneaters is ripe for rediscovery for the adventurous sort of libertine cinephile who thinks Marian Dora is a real artist and who falls asleep at the thought of having to watch another plodding Godard agitprop flick.

BE KIND REWIND

Michel Gondry (2008)

Be Kind Rewind is the latest artsy “American” comedy from French writer/director Michel Gondry. Gondry is highly revered by the cosmopolitan Starbucks crowd for his unconventional and “quirky” postmodern comedies that toy with the way the audience is supposed to interpret (or force to look at) the scene. Be Kind Rewind is no exception to Gondry’s obsession with mise en scène masturbation. Like fellow Frenchman Jean-Luc Godard, Gondry can’t help but use his intellect in a way that completely destroys the true magic of the cinema. Be Kind Rewind stars banal slob comedian Jack Black and psycho black Muslim Mos Def. I must admit that I was slightly turned off to find these two clowns as performers in another artsy fartsy Michel Gondry feature length experiment. Woody Allen’s sex slave Mia Farrow and The Color Purple star Danny Glover are featured in Be Kind Rewind in senior citizen roles. The film also features a variety of other unappealing actors that you would expect in a film low in quality and head high in bullshit. The two lead clowns in Be Kind Rewind decide they should make their own films since the films on the VHS tapes at the video store they work at have been erased. They remake everything from Ghostbusters to 2001: A Space Odyssey, to delight the residents of the intercity hellhole that the video store is located in. Eventually the whole “multicultural” neighborhood is involved in the making of these cardboard set films resulting in a “we are the world” type message. I found this beat-to-death message to be the only thing remotely funny in the pretentious load of frog excrement that is Be Kind Rewind. Be Kind Rewind lacks any type of element that would make a film enjoyable or even remotely interesting to watch. The film presents the failure that is the American intercity as a place of defensive yet sensitive individuals that engage in crime in a “cute” scenario away. Hollywood has always pulled the blinds over the American audience’s eyes in regards to reality that is the urban zoo. Michel Gondry will never be one of the great directors or even notable directors. Like most highly regarded contemporary directors, Gondry only sticks out because of the lack of innovative filmmakers. In a period where M. Night Shyamalan and Quentin Tarantino are considered some of the greatest filmmakers of our time, it is no surprise that Michel Gondry is considered one of the foremost directors of artistic filmmaking.

THE SAVIOR

Michel Mardore (1971)

Undoubtedly, if I ever took away wisdom away as a teenager while observing naive nubile young girls of the same age, it is they tended to consciously overlook the unflattering (and, oftentimes, downright immoral and/or repugnant) attributes of an older and more experienced fellow who had caught their fancy, even going to ungodly and oftentimes self-destructive extremes (i.e. using hard drugs, peddling their puss away for nothing, attempting to pantomime that behavior of blacks, etc.) to catch the attention of their potential male suitors, yet unfortunately far too few films have tackled this subject, at least in a truly perversely poignant sort of fashion, though the French used to seem to have a knack for it. In fact, two semi-obscure frog flicks from the 1970s, Michel Mardore's Le sauveur (1971) aka The Savior and Joel Seria's Marie-poupée (1976) aka Marie, the doll, stand out in my mind as the best and ultimately most orgasmically ominous films dealing with the subject of poor little unwitting Lolitas succumbing to sinister men with uniquely unhinged ulterior motives. Undoubtedly, what makes The Savior especially interesting, if not somewhat convoluted, is that it is an allegorical war flick set in rural Vichy France during the Second World War and features then-washed-up bisexual actor Horst 'The German James Dean' Buchholz (The Magnificent Seven, One, Two, Three)—a seemingly tiny Teuton that more resembles a Mestizo soccer player than a member of the master race—in the Svengali-like role of a psychopathic SS officer pretending to be an injured English paratrooper who exploits the sexual, maternal, and romantic longings of a virginal 14-year-old French farm girl so as to find imperative inside information and ultimately squash members of the frog commie resistance. The debut feature film of a man that is better known for being one of the most important French filmmakers of his time (among other things, Mardore has the distinction of being the first person to interview Cinémathèque Française cofounder Henri Langlois) and who would only direct two films during his short-lived filmmaking career (with the seemingly impossible-to-find lesbian-themed flick Le Mariage à la mode (1973) aka Marriage a la Mode being his only other film), The Savior is what some might describe as an 'Artsploitation' flick as a work that somewhat successfully manages to synthesize elements of arthouse cinema and the war film and spy film genres with that of softcore erotica and even Nazisploitation. Admittedly, if it could not be easily verified online, one might assume the lead actress of The Savior, Muriel Catalá (Faustine et le bel été aka Faustine and the Beautiful Summer, First Time with Feeling), was not much older than Eva Ionesco when she appeared in the erotic coming-of-age flick Maladolescenza (1977) penned by Fassbinder/Herzog collaborator Peter Berling. By the conclusion of The Savior, the female protagonist will be played by the most pernicious of psychopathic players, thus making for a strangely 'penetrating' antifascist propaganda piece that uses the emotional destruction of a voluptuous teenage girl as a nasty and arguably sleazy means to influence the viewer to hate SS men more than Satan himself.

It is summer of 1943 during the middle of the Second World War in the relatively quiet French countryside and one day while walking around a small stream not far from the family farm, pretty 14-year-old peasant girl Nanette (Muriel Catalá) spots a handsome and charismatic, if not small and swarthy, gentleman named Claude (Horst Buchholz) with minor injuries who claims to be a English soldier looking to hookup with some good resistance fighters and thus has a pathological hatred of krauts. When nymph Nanette remarks that she likes how Germans are “tall and blond” and how she has “known Germans that are nice,” Claude matter-of-factly states, “It was the Germans that wanted the war” as if he were the most snobby self-satisfied Brit in the entire world. While it is dubious whether or not that it was indeed the Germans that were the only ones that wanted the war, there is no question that hyper horny teen Nanette wants to blitzkrieg Claude’s bones and she is willing to go to great lengths to hide the supposed English man on her parent’s property to achieve that goal. In a rather juvenile attempt to get Claude in her panties, Nanette offers to ‘play doctor’ with the mysterious soldier, but he is much too old to play such games and thus the all-hot-and-bothered teen takes a more forward approach by totally stripping off all her clothes and getting into bed with him. Of course, Nanette eventually gets what she wants in terms of carnal knowledge and the two subsequently frolic around gaily in the nude in a stream like two hippie love birds, but when the teen temptress tells Claude she loves him, he does not reciprocate her proclamation of love. In reciprocation for sex, Nanette gives Claude information about local French resistance fighters. Of course, little does Nanette realize that Claude is more interested in members of the resistance than their cross-generational non-romantic affair.

Eventually, Nanette has the moronic and ultimately deleterious idea to tell her father (Roger Lumont) about Claude’s presence, which results in her mensch ultimately being taken away from her as he is forced to do manual labor to earn his keep. Pathologically pissed and lovelorn her man has been taken away, naughty Nanette decides to have Claude killed (after all, if she can’t have him, no one will!) by going to a local fascist collaborator named Monsieur Monnery (Michel Delahaye), whose sons (who look rather swarthy, if not Hebraic!) are both in the French volunteer Charlemagne division of the SS, and tell him about the ostensible English soldier. Lying like a seasoned female psychopath at the mere age of 14 in a feeble attempt to appease her heartbroken female fury, Nanette pleads to Monnery with a perfect puppy dog pout, “he [Claude] forced me...he made me...you know...Monsieur Monnery...I want you to find him...and kill him.” Unfortunately, Nanette’s plans fall through and she is soon captured by a SS man, who takes her to her man Claude, who is, rather curiously, now sporting an elegant SS uniform. In a quite prideful meta-megalomaniac manner (at one point, he proudly proclaims, "GOD? I AM God."), Claude lets Nanette she was merely a pretty pawn in the game, stating, "I know you hate yourself because you've committed two unpardonable crimes. Paradoxical crimes. You denounced a hero...and you sheltered a traitor. Your feeling of guilt will follow you all your life. It will stick to your skin. You'll be gay as usual then without warning, then when you least expect it you'll go back and relive those early days. You'll be...A living ghost." Of course, Nanette, being a stupid young girl still loves her mass murderer of a man Claude, even after he kills Monsieur Monnery and some of her relatives. As she watches emotionally paralyzed from Claude's souped up Aryan automobile, all the women and children of her village around rounded up in a building while men are killing via firing squad. Indeed, Claude wastes no time in liquidating every single personal in the village, even Nanette's parents, declaring of the sadistic spectacle to the 14-year-old dame, "The terrorists have been wiped out. Only you and I will know the truth. That's...our marriage...our link...our indissoluble bond. Even though we may never see each other again." Needless to say, being the only surviving member of her village, Nanette develops something that is soul-destroying that transcends simple survivor's guilt. Flash forward to the present and Claude is now a capitalist living under the alias of 'Monsieur Müller' and he comes to visit Nanette, who is now an overweight housewife with a number of rugrats, at her village, which has been totally rebuilt, thus more than hinting that The Savior was inspired by the Oradour-sur-Glane and Maillé Massacres committed by the SS in the summer 1944, which resulted in the destruction of two French villages (which were later rebuilt) and its inhabitants. Clearly haunted by the past and no longer a dumb little girl, Nanette takes her revenge, shouting "For you, Englishman!" before annihilating her first great love in front of her husband and young children.

In its daunting, if not decidedly decadent and carelessly crude, depiction of a lecherous French lass who goes from being a resistance-fighter-bashing collaborator to a staunch anti-Nazi of the rather bloodthirsty yet maternal sort, The Savior is indubitably a piece of aesthetically pleasing leftist agitprop that manages to even outdo Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993) in terms of depicting SS men as one-dimensional demons (indeed, Spielberg's depiction of Amon Goeth is even more nuanced and sympathetic!) and thus the film fails to be serious celluloid art, yet it certainly is a must-see work as a sort of counter work to Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974), albeit much less pretentious. Additionally, The Savior is also a sort of heterosexual celluloid equivalent to Philippe Vallois' Nous étions un seul homme (1979) aka We Were One Man—a queer World War II flick depicting an unlikely sexual relationship between a wounded German soldier and a half-autistic French farmboy—as a work that manages to aberrantly yet artfully depict wayward love during wartime in the rural froglands. Indeed, like the underrated Italian flick One Woman's Lover (1974) aka Donna è bello directed by Sergio Bazzini and starring lapsed Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro as a fascist terrorist who seduces the sexually repressed wife of a sexless commie ideologue, The Savior is a little slice of sleazy celluloid divinity that manages to possess a seemingly immaculate combination of artiness, exploitation trash, gratuitous violence, and quasi-tasteful to totally tasteless eroticism. Undoubtedly, as someone who almost vomits at the prospect of having to watch another formulaic World War II film and as an oftentimes unappeasable individual who finds himself increasingly equally uninterested in watching the splatter swill of Herschell Gordon Lewis and the aimless 'Avant-gardism' of Jean-Marie Straub, I found The Savior to be almost like a charmingly cynical gift from the cinematically eclectic cinephile gods, who wallow in cinematic kitsch just as much as cultivated celluloid. Indeed, unlike Godard, Monsieur Mardore proved that French film critics can churn something other than pedantic postmodern twaddle, as The Savior ultimately seems like an arthouse flick made for lumpenproles with a fetishism for John Wayne propaganda war flicks, which is certainly no small achievement.

I'M DANGEROUS WITH LOVE

Michel Negroponte (2009)

Having read most of iconic Beat Generation writer William S. Burrough's novels, I have known about the hallucinogenic drug ibogaine for a couple years now, yet I never knew it had properties that could cure drug addiction (after all, it is a psychedelic drug). Apparently, ibogaine has the organic power to instantly cure opiate addiction, as well as stop drug withdraw; the most painful and unbearable aspect when attempting to quit opiates cold turkey. Despite the fact that there has been a lot of scientific research done proving ibogaine's effectiveness in curing opium addiction, ibogaine is still illegal in the United States. In the documentary I'm Dangerous with Love (2009), filmmaker Michel Negroponte follows an ibogaine advocate named Dimitri Mugianis as he illegally helps junkies from various parts of the United States quit heroin addiction with ibogaine treatment. Director Michel Negroponte also tries ibogaine himself in an attempt to see if the hallucinogenic drug will cure his addiction to nicotine. As one would expect from a documentary about drug addiction, I'm Dangerous with Love is a dark and gritty, yet revolutionary work - documenting what could be a miracle drug for junkies; ibogaine. Even if a person has no interest in learning about ibogaine, I'm Dangerous with Love works as an excellent anti-opiate public service announcement.

As you learn during the beginning of I'm Dangerous with Love, Dimitri Mugianis is a musician (vocalist for the band "Leisure Class") and ex-junkie who found a cure for his addiction via ibogaine. During his tragic drug addicted life, Dimitri lost best friends and even his girlfriend to heroin, yet none of these horrible events would effectively convince Dimitri to finally quit his opiate-addicted road to a very possible premature death. Dimitri had been addicted to heroin for 20 years, but a single dose of ibogaine cured his life-threatening vice instantly. After kicking his addiction with ibogaine, Dimitri would later dedicate his life to helping other addicts. Despite the illegality of Dimitri's underground ibogaine cure campaign, the former addict rather enjoys his work as he so earnestly expresses in I'm Dangerous with Love. In the documentary, director Michel Negroponte documents Dimitri's administration of ibogaine on various lifelong addicts during a 3 year period. By the end of the documentary, it is revealed that the various subjects who had been administered ibogaine treatment were either completely cured of addiction or were on methadone treatment and no longer wandering the streets in search of heroin. Although I have yet to see the documentary, director Michel Negroponte previously directed Methadonia; a work documenting the substitute addiction of methadone, a synthetic-opiate drug (created in Germany for injured soldiers at the end of World War II when opiates ran out) even more addictive than heroin. After watching I'm Dangerous with Love, it is quite apparent that a single dosing of ibogaine is a much safer alternative to a lifelong addiction to methadone. None of the participants in ibogaine treatment featured in I'm Dangerous with Love seem to have "bad trips" while high on the drug - certainly no worse than the painful withdraw they would have had quitting heroin cold turkey without the hallucinogenic drug.

Towards the end of I'm Dangerous with Love, director Michel Negroponte and Dimitri travel to Western Africa to participate in an ancient Shamanic ritual using ibogaine with native tribesmen. Although this segment of the film is interesting from an anthropological perspective, I doubt it helps to further the cause of legalizing ibogaine for lawmakers. After all, the reason ibogaine is illegal is due to its hallucinogenic properties, as the trip has been described as having the ability to metaphorically "break open the head." When Negroponte tries ibogaine, he has various flashbacks - including being in his mother's womb. Apparently, scientists are currently working on creating a derivative of ibogaine that lacks the substance's hallucinogenic properties, thus making it very possible that the drug will soon be a legal alternative for kicking opiate addiction. That being said, I believe that Michel Negroponte has done a very noble act by creating I'm Dangerous with Love, as the documentary is an in-depth and easy to understand introduction to ibogaine; a wonder drug for desperate opiate addicts. Also, I would be lying if I did not admit that the documentary made me sick to my stomach. Forget William Friedkin's The Exorcist (1973), I'm Dangerous with Love is a real-life documentation of opiate-possessed individuals who have their demons organically exorcised. If you thought Danny Boyle's Scottish junky flick Trainspotting (1996) was disturbing, you have yet to see I'm Dangerous with Love. ZABRISKIE POINT

Michelangelo Antonioni (1970)

While many Americans seem to conjure up images in their mind of peace, love, and a virtual utopian world when they think of late-1960s and naked dirty hippie bastards prancing around in pastel-colored body-paint, I can only think of race wars, smug subversive semites with rebbe-esque beards, STDs, primitive communes ruled by psychopathic megalomaniacs that fuck children, and the general senseless cultural and social subversion that has led to the malefic pre-apocalyptic anarcho-tyranny that we have today in the United States, thus I could not help but delight in the quite literally explosive conclusion of great Italian maestro Michelangelo Antonioni's exceedingly underrated Hollywood production Zabriskie Point (1970), which is probably the only mainstream film featuring hippies fucking and smoking dope that does not come off as retarded twaddle. Indeed, while directed by an innately introverted and melancholic northern guido that was almost sixty at the time he created it and thus naturally had no real intimate personal experience with the people and culture it depicts, I think it is arguably the greatest and most darkly romantic American counterculture film ever made, as the sort of U.S. equivalent to the UK cult classic Performance (1970) co-directed by Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg in terms of defining the zeitgeist and offering the final cinematic word on the counterculture question. A sort of modernist hippie Romeo and Juliet story where there are no feuding families and instead a warring nation where the youth and negroes are determined to rip the moral and cultural fabric of the nation into shreds, the film tells the senselessly tragic tale of a fugitive activist of the rebel-without-a-cause oriented sort who somewhat absurdly steals a small private plane after assuming that he is a fugitive as a result a cop-killing he did not actually commit and flies it to the otherworldly landscapes of Manson Country U.S.A. (aka Death Valley) where he meets and starts a brief yet almost perfectly passionate love affair with a busty brunette stoner secretary, only to absurdly fly the stolen aircraft back to the airport where he got from and thus meets a most pointlessly horrific fate when he is ambushed by a bunch of trigger-happy cops who are fed up with the violent hippie scumbags and black nationalist revolutionaries that have been tearing up local universities, the film notably takes a deceptively simple nuanced approach to rationalizing the collective irrationality that defined the era, hence why so many people have found the flick to be quite inexplicable. A piece of cinematic art impersonating life and vice versa, Antonioni's aesthetically whimsical yet carefully constructed cinematic counterculture assault notably stars two real-life hippie non-actors in the lead roles, with male lead Mark Frechette—an aggressively nihilistic and hateful young man from a poor background that was discovered by the film's casting director while he was engaging in a violent shouting match at a Boston bus-stop—ultimately joining the glorious '27

ZABRISKIE POINT

Club' in 1975 after being sentenced to six to fifteen years in prison for taking part in a botched bank robbery and dying via suffocation while incarcerated in a minimum security state prison in Norfolk, Massachusetts during a seeming dubious weightlifting accident that involved a 150-pound barbell falling on his neck. Additionally, Frechette and his co-star Daria Halprin—the daughter of a prominent San Francisco landscape architect named Lawrence “Pops” Halprin and his wife, postmodern dance pioneer Anna Halprin, who Antonioni discovered and decided to cast after seeing her perform preposterously bad poetry in the nude in Jack O’Connell’s largely forgotten doc Revolution (1968)—were real-life lovers and were referenced by the media as ‘first counterculture couple’ by the media. Of course, Halprin is probably best remembered today as being one of the many ex-wives of Dennis Hopper.

While best known for his ‘trilogy on modernity and its discontents’—L’Avventura (1960) aka The Adventure, La Notte (1961) aka The Night, and L’Eclisse (1962) aka Eclipse—where morosely melancholic upper-middleclass individuals are portrayed as virtual walking but rarely talking corpses of the forsakenly emotionally glacial and spiritually impoverished sort that suffer from the incapacity to communicate and express love and affection, Zabriskie Point depicts late-1960s America as suffering from a different yet no less perturbing social phenomenon that demonstrates that Europe and the United States are at slightly different stages of decline, with Americans still maintaining some of the barbarian genes that helped their ballsy ancestors conquer and tame the land. Indeed, where Antonioni’s post-WWII Italy is a place where young people are seemingly metaphysically comatose and are completely crippled by Weltschmerz and ennui, the director’s America is a seemingly socially and culturally schizophrenic open frontier on the brink of civil war where the old are nothing more than the anachronistic remnants of a dead people and culture, the middle-aged are almost psychopathically materialistic and hopelessly deracinated lemmings that live to make money and buy pointless shit that they do not need, and the young are angry and decidedly disillusioned misfits and rebels who have rejected the American dream and who are all too eager to trash the traditions and customs of their ancestors while, at the same time, pretending to care about and understand the plight of the poor disenfranchised negro. Undoubtedly, the two leads of the film are symbolic of the two anti-intellectual extremes associated with the counterculture movement, with Frechette portraying a perpetually antagonistic hate-filled nihilist with a seeming death wish whose sole political interest is destruction for destruction’s sake and Halprin playing an almost obnoxiously happy-go-luck hedonistic pothead with a high tolerance for belligerent assholes and next to nil serious political ambitions aside from the right to be ostensibly ‘free’ and to use her pussy whenever and wherever she wants to. Of course, what these two virtual opposites do have in common is that they seem to be in a state of perennial childhood, but I guess that is what someone expect from a generation of people that bought into the big lie of the zeitgeist and rejected the traditions and values of their people without having anything to replace them with, hence why many of these extremely lost individuals later embraced yuppiedom, which combines the worst and most deleterious vices of both the hippies and capitalist as reflected in the stereotypical Hollywood image of some bearded bro or slutty blonde snorting a line of cocaine off of a hundred dollar bill. Indeed, in a somewhat unwitting way, Zabriskie Point depicts all the ingredients and circumstances that would lead to the cultureless and deracinated neo-liberal multicultural void that America is today, even if Antonioni was clearly more sympathetic towards the hippies than their parents and grandparents.

Inspired by a true story that the auteur read in a newspaper while in the United States for the 1966 premiere of Blowup (1966) about a young man that stole a plane and was ultimately killed after making the somewhat absurd mistake of attempting to return it to its rightful owner in Phoenix, Arizona, Zabriskie Point was shot from a screenplay penned by Antonioni that was ultimately reworked by no less than three other people, including Sam Shepard, poet-cum-screenwriter Tonino Guerra, and Bernardo Bertolucci's future wife Clare Peploe. Of course, considering the somewhat glaring aesthetic and thematic similarities between Antonioni and Wenders' films, especially in terms of its expansive landscape cinematography, it should be no surprise that Shepard later went on to pen Paris, Texas (1984). Of course, as opposed to Wender's film where the Southwestern landscapes are symbolic of existential despair and nothingness upon nothingness, Antonioni's flick brings a somewhat unexpected sense of utopian purity to the deserts, as if they are the one last place in America that has not been totally tainted by consumerism, materialism, and greed, hence the protagonists' almost otherworldly fuck session, which evolves into a sort of celestial orgy where sand and semen become virtually one. In fact, in Zabriskie Point the real sinister undercurrent of society is not Hades-like landscapes or rock formations but TV commercials, billboards, and manmade communities created by companies that exploit these natural places and environments and have created a perturbing pseudo-culture of innate artificiality that corrupts the soul and spirit. Indeed, in virtually every scene that is set in Los Angeles or in the lavish home of a wealthy individual, the viewer is exposed to a grotesque manmade parody of nature and natural landscapes, with the female protagonist not coincidentally being the secretary and assumed mistress of a covertly sleazy and proudly materialistic real estate executive whose company is responsible for creating a TV commercial for a new resort-like real estate development in the desert that eerily stars a mannequin family as opposed to real living and breathing people, thus underscoring the innate artificiality of what would come to personify post-WWII 'Americanism.' While Antonioni was a leftist intellectual of sorts (for example, Judaic film scholar Virginia Wright Wexman once describe the auteur's cinematic worldview as that of a "postreligious Marxist and existentialist intellectual") and his film production was even considered so anti-American at the time it was being made that it was monitored by the FBI (in fact, the U.S. Attorney's office in Sacramento opened a grand jury investigations into both the film's supposed 'anti-Americanism' and possible violations of the Mann Act, which is a anti-prostitution law that was created in 1910 that prohibits the transportation of women across state lines "for immoral conduct, prostitution or debauchery"), Zabriskie Point is not much more flattering in its depiction of hippies and far-leftist student activists and was even criticized by members of the counterculture movement as being a supposed "sellout" film. In short, the film depicts an eclectically irrational and materialistic America that seems to be on the verge of some sort of collectively cataclysmic cultural and social apocalypse where father and son figuratively fight to the death and where the mother has become a materialistic whore and the daughter a literal whore who works for and sleeps with the very same capitalist vampire that epitomizes that system that kills her figurative Romero. Like most great films about the United States directed from a European outsider's perspective, the film tells you more about the real America than any Spielberg and Michael Bay film ever could, but of course both of those Hebraic Hollywood blockbuster anti-auteur propagandists are responsible promoting the very sort of asininely artificial corporate 'Americanism' that Antonioni so elegantly mocks.

In a sometimes annoying scene that reminds viewers why hippies deserved to get their asses kicked by the cops where Antonioni seems to go back to his early roots as a neorealist filmmaker that directed semi-documentary shorts during the late-1940s through early-1950s like L'amorosa menzogna (1949) aka Lies of Love and Superstizione (1949) aka Superstition, Zabriskie Point begins with a somewhat racially-charged documentary-like scene where white student activists and negro revolutionaries argue in regard to the former's sincerity (or lack thereof) and overall importance in terms of the so-called revolution. Indeed, after berating his white 'comrades' for not taking part in a strike and then advocating violence when a white girl brings up a ROTC building by responding, "All you have to do is go down to the ROTC building. . .take a bottle, fill it full of gasoline. Plug it with a rag," an angry black revolutionary accuses the whites of being more or less posh posers who do not even understand what a real struggle is since they have never had to struggle in their entire lives. Indeed, when a swarthy and seemingly Jewish radical complains, "Yeah, man, but what if you wanna end sociology?," the rather nasty yet refreshingly honest negro rightly replies, "Listen, man, a Molotov cocktail is a mixture of gasoline and kerosene. A white radical is a mixture of bullshit and jive." When an assumed Jewess with a grating voice then proceeds to complain that she does not have to "prove" her "revolutionary credentials" to anyone, especially not some dumb ghetto negro, another black revolutionary hilariously replies, "You get busted for grass and that makes you a revolutionary." Of course, when a blond male activist gets the gall to ask the Afro chic revolutionary, "Are you willing to die?," he responds by angrily alluding to slavery and his ancestors, stating like a stereotypical race-hustling black Baptist charlatan preacher, "Black people are dying. A lot of black people have died in this country. Black people have earned this leadership in blood. We're not gonna give it up." At this point, the film's protagonist Mark (Mark Frechette) abruptly stands up from his chair and stoically declares in front of all of the activists, "Well, I'm willing to die too. But not of boredom" and then walks out of the meeting, thus causing both the white and black activist to agree on something for the first time and discuss how you cannot be truly 'revolutionary' unless you are willing to go to meetings and work with other people. After all, it takes a certain amount of good old-fashioned collectivist brainwashing for a group of people to be stupid enough to throwaway their lives for some futile cause.

Quite humorously, when Mark walks out of the college commie meeting, the afro-adorned black revolutionary declares that someone should read to him excerpts from Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-tung and "That bourgeois individualism that he's indulging in is gonna get him killed," thereupon unwittingly revealing his sheer and utter contempt for traditional Anglo-Saxon values as if it is negative to be a free-thinking individualist as opposed to a collectivist-minded automaton like so many non-European peoples in the world. Somewhat ironically, Mark's so-called "bourgeois individualism" does ultimately get him killed, but what the negro does not understand is that the protagonist is not interested in jerking off to the collected works of Wilhelm Reich or becoming comrades with a bunch of wealthy atheistic Hebrews in some pseudo-intellectual Trotskyite think-tank, as he is a hateful and antisocial individual with a sort of degenerated Faustian spirit that is only interested in destruction and wasting pigs. Indeed, as Mark later confesses to the female protagonist, he absolutely loathes the strict rules, masturbatory discussions, and conformist attitudes that plague the far-left groups that he has associated with in the past. Considering his unwavering individualism and cynicism towards just about anything, Mark seems to have more in common with a right-wing anarchist like Louis-Ferdinand Céline than some vapid dork that would embrace the anti-gospel of the Frankfurt School. When Mark is briefly arrested at the beginning of the film for causing trouble at a police station after repeatedly asking when he can bail out his roommate Monty (Bill Garaway) and then defying cops by obnoxiously yelling support to incarcerated activists, he humorously lies to a completely humorless police clerk and uses the anti-lord's name by saying that his name is "Karl Marx" (somewhat humorously, the less than politically astute cop believes him and types "Carl Marx"). Not long after being released from prison, Mark and a friend manage to buy weapons on the spot without getting the required permits after the protagonist lies to salesman and alludes to naughty negroes destroying his neighborhood by stating, "See, we live in a neighborhood that's, you know, borderline. You know what I mean? We gotta protect our women." Not only is Mark able to buy a gun, but he is also given important advice, with one salesman telling him that he should not get anything "smaller than .38" and another stating just before he and his friend leave, "Say, boys. One other thing about the law, it says you can protect your house. So if you shoot them in the backyard, drag them inside."

Unbeknownst to Mark, who seems totally disinterested in sex and women, a beautiful brunette pothead with a voluptuous body and sassy attitude named Daria (Daria Halprin) will practically fall into his lap in the literal middle of nowhere after he gets into a series of very precarious predicaments as a result of some absurdly self-destruction decisions that he so thoughtlessly makes. Indeed, a possible victim of watching both The Wild One (1953) starring Marlon Brando and Nicholas Ray's Rebel Without a Cause (1955) starring James Dean one-too-many times during his childhood, Mark makes the moronic decision to stuff his new revolver into one of his boots and heads to a local university after hearing on the news about a campus bloodbath involving 200 armed cops that resulted in the arrest of 25 students and 3 teachers. Indeed, as a shameless thriller-seeker, Mark seems to see the campus confrontation as the perfect opportunity to waste a pig. When Mark arrives at the university, he discovers that a gang of armed negro revolutionaries have taken over the campus library. Upon witnessing a cop shooting one of the negroes after they are gassed out of the library, Mark impulsively reaches for his revolver but someone unseen individual beats him to the chase and shoots one of the policemen dead, thus inspiring the protagonist to flee the university and take a city bus to its final stop at the suburban Hawthorne area where he calls his roommate Monty at a proletarian delicatessen and discovers that he has been featured on a news report and is possibly suspected of committing the cop-killing. After failing to beg the particularly portly delicatessen owner to give him a sub on credit (as the prole businessman tells the young commie, "It's not that I don't trust you personally. . .but if I trusted you, I'd have to trust everybody in the whole world"), Mark begins walking down a sidewalk where he sees an aircraft fly over his head, which inspires him to head Hawthorne Municipal Airport where he makes himself quite comfortable inside a small pink named 'Lilly 17' that he impulsively decides to steal. When an airplane mechanic inquires about what he is doing, Mark has the gall to offer him a ride. While he manages to getaway in the airplane, Mark's rather ballsy thievery is unfortunately almost instantly discovered by workers at the airport as he makes the mistake of taking off in the opposite direction.

While Mark is having a great fun flying the plane across the desert and admiring the scenic landscapes, his future love interest Daria is in the middle of driving in her grey 1950s Buick from L.A. to Phoenix, Arizona to meet with her real estate executive boss Lee Allen (Rod Taylor), though she decides to make a pit stop on the way to meet with some hippie guru type named James Patterson that she apparently wants to learn meditation from. Although never explicitly stated, it is hinted that Daria is carrying on a fair with her rather repugnant married middle-aged boss Lee and during her road trip she decides to give him a call at a secluded bar called the 'Rumpus Room' where she states, "I'm in some ghost town. I just called to say I may be a little late in Phoenix." As an assumed result of her incessant dope-smoking, Daria is such a ditzzy dame that she cannot even remember the name of the town that she wants to visit, which she simply describes to her boss as a, "fantastic place for meditation." When Lee asks what you do during meditation, she replies in all seriousness in a fashion that demonstrates she cannot be too serious about it, "You think about things." Ultimately, after briefly talking to the proud owner of the Rumpus Room, who immediately realizes by mere her appearance that she is a good-for-nothing hippie numbskull that has come to see the beatnik bastard that is destroying his community, Daria discovers that she is actually already in the town where her pal Patterson lives. When Daria reveals that she has come to visit Patterson, the bar owner gets noticeably agitated and complains in regard to the seemingly enigmatic guru (who the viewer never actually sees), "Well, you can tell him for me he's gonna be the death of this town. He's gonna ruin a piece of American history [...] On account of being a do-gooder, he brought these kids out here from Los Angeles. Said they were sick. Emotionally sick. You know what that means? But if Los Angeles don't want them, why should we want them?" Indeed, literally seconds after the bar owner discusses his great disgust with Patterson and the bad mentally ill boys that he has plagued the town with, one of the bastard broods throws a rock through a window in his bar.

Before Daria exits the bar and faces the dangers of the wild boys that lurk around the desert, an extremely elderly and seemingly borderline senile bar patron asks her, "Do you remember Johnny Wilson?" and when she replies "No," he proudly replies, "That's me. I was middleweight champion of the world in 1920." While Daria is quite nice to the old man and enthusiastically tells him "That's great," she clearly has no clue what he is talking about. Undoubtedly, the self-described 1920 middleweight champion and the other drunk bar patrons, who are notably all extremely old white man sporting cowboys hats, are symbolic of the old and authentic America before Hollywood contrived a pseudo-culture when real frontiersman, outlaws, and farmers were still civilizing the land and wasting injuns. Undoubtedly, it seems Mark was born into the wrong time period, as he has more in common with the old cowboys of the past that battled red-skinned savages and hunted herds of buffalo than the wimpy armchair intellectuals that enjoy sitting around cafes and discussing the dubious theories of some anti-Occidental Jewish intellectual quack. As for Daria, almost immediately after leaving the Rumpus Room, she soon finds herself being taunted by a pack of wild white and mestizo prepubescent boys who initially hide from her but then consider gang-raping her. Indeed, after following the boys around the almost ominous desert while trying to ask them where their guardian Patterson is, the boys eventually aggressively form a circle around her like a pack of feral dogs and then their assumed leader asks, "Can we have a piece of ass?" While Daria tries to find humor in the borderline surreal situation and replies, "Are you sure you'd know what to do with it?," she immediately decides to flee the town in her car without even meeting up with Patterson after the boys begin to collectively paw at her panties and pussy. With their hippie guardian Patterson being nowhere to be found while the half-crazed pack-minded kids destroy property and attempt to gang-rape grown woman at a rather premature age before their balls have even dropped, one might assume that these hippie-raised misfits are symbolic of the first generation of social defectives that were brought up after all of America's customs, traditions, and morals were being bulldozed by the spoiled buffoons of the baby boomer generation.

While making her way to Phoenix after being nearly vaginally pillaged by a gang of playfully pernicious preteen savages, Daria receives a delightful surprise that causes her to gleefully shriek like she is on the verge of an orgasm when Mark proceeds to dangerously fly over the hood of her car and almost crash into in the process. Indeed, Mark initially noticed Daria's delectable figure while she was parked on the side of the road and adding water to her car radiator, so he decided to do a little bit of aggressive flirting with her via airplane. When Daria decides to park and get out of her car so that she can get a closer look at the anarchistic aviation action, she has to duck and lie down on the desert sand so that Mark does not crash the plane into her. While Daria is somewhat irked by Mark's reckless and potentially quite deadly behavior, she is filled with joy when he throws her a red nightie from the plane window. When Daria eventually gets back in her car and begins driving again, she is delighted to see that Mark has parked his plane and is waiting for her at a shack owned by an eccentric old man who seems to have taken a liking to the male protagonist. Indeed, Daria had no clue that the seemingly half-deranged aviator of the plane was a handsome devil, so her panties probably become completely soaked when she first sees him as indicated by her rather flirtatious behavior and somewhat salacious 'please-fuck-me' smile. After smirking at him like she wants to jump pussy-first onto his cock while warmly thanking him for the nightie but reluctantly informing him that she cannot wear it since it is for the "wrong sex," Mark takes advantage of the situation by telling her that he is in a "little bit of trouble" and then asks her for a ride so that he can get gas for his plane. While Mark confesses to stealing the plane because, to quote the protagonist, he "needed to get off the ground," Daria does not seem to care too much that he is a fugitive (in fact, it seems to turn her on) and gladly gives him a ride, though they naturally take a temporary detour so that they can get to know each other a little more. Indeed, after driving for a little bit, the two stop at Zabriskie Point—"an area of ancient lake bed deposited

5 to 10 million years ago”—where they ultimately go to wander aimlessly around the geological formations and flirt with one another. After revealing to her that he was a forklift driver as of yesterday and was kicked out of college after breaking into the dean’s office and reprogramming the computer so that he “made all the engineers take art courses,” Daria informs him that she heard on the radio that a student activist killed a cop. When Daria reveals that “the guy who killed the cop was white,” Mark attempts to shrug it off by replying “Oh, white man taking up arms for the blacks, huh? Just like old John Brown,” thus reflecting his playfully sardonic sense of humor. Needless to say, Daria is quite enamored with Mark’s crude charm and seems to have only stopped at Zabriskie Point so that he can fuck her there.

When Daria offers Mark a joint, the protagonist reacts somewhat unexpectedly by complaining about how one of the commie groups that he associated with attempted to force him to quite dope-smoking and then remarks, “I wasn’t really in the group. I just couldn’t stand their bullshit talk. Really bored the hell out of me. But when it gets down to it, you’d have to choose one side or the other.” While Daria seems as dumb as dames come, she exposes the inconsistency in Mark’s logic by replying, “There’s a thousand sides, not just heroes and villains,” to which he less than confidently retorts like a child that knows it is wrong but will not admit it, “Point is, if you don’t see them as villains, you can’t get rid of them.” Of course, it is quite obvious at this point that, like many people of his generation, Mark is just a hopelessly confused young man that is into destruction for destruction’s sake and he has no real argument as to why he wants to destroy the system aside from vague pseudo-moralistic sermonizing. Indeed, Mark is filled with a lot of hate and rage, but he does not quite seem to know why, but he does know that acting like a criminal gives him some minor relief from his suffering. Naturally, even a happy-go-lucky pothead like Daria can only endure so much of Mark’s pathological negativity and cynicism and proceeds to mock him by proposing that they play a “Death Game” involving attempting to kill as many animals as possible and eventually each other after he hurts her feelings by describing the desert as being like “death.” At this point, Mark seems to slightly shed his abrasive tough guy exterior and contrarian attitude and begins focusing on aggressively flirting with Daria, who naturally laps up the much-desired attention. Indeed, it does not take long after he begins touching her fairly tanned thigh and unbuttoning her blouse that Mark manages to delicately defile Daria in the desert in what ultimately evolves into a surrealist orgy where a number of hippies involved in twosomes and bisexual threesomes surround the protagonists. Notably, this somewhat haunting dust orgy was performed by the experimental theatre group The Open Theater, hence why the film production was investigated for supposedly violating the Mann Act, even though it is clearly simulated sex that resembles really preposterous performance art (though it should be noted that a member of the group, playwright Jean-Claude van Itallie, who is best known for the satirical counterculture play America Hurrah, went on to direct the homo hardcore flick American Cream (1972) under the pseudonym 'Rob Simple'). Ultimately, the inconveniently sandy lovemaking session gets so passionate that Daria finishes virtual stranger Mark off with a very loving blowjob that makes it quite clear that the female protagonist loves sucking cock. After they finish making love and get dressed, Mark peacefully states to Daria, "I always knew it would be like this" and when she asks "Us?," he replies "The desert," thus contradicting what he said earlier about the area. Unfortunately for the female protagonist, Mark's seemingly orgasmically otherworldly sand sex with Daria is not enough for him to reconsider executing his seemingly suicidal mission.

While heading back to Daria's car, Mark is forced to hide behind a red portapotty when a police officer shows up and begins questioning the female protagonist. Although Mark prepares to shoot the cop while hiding behind the portable toilet with his revolver in his hand, the police officer luckily leaves, though Daria subsequently realizes that he is the supposed fugitive cop-killer after she notices his gun. Although he admits he is innocent even though he actually wanted to waste the pig, Mark refuses to listen to reason and flee the state with Daria, who has good reason to keep him by her side since she now seems to be quite infatuated with him and surely cannot handle the thought of never being able to feel his throbbing rump-splitter inside her fleshy wet orifice(s) again. Of course, Mark remains firm in his desire to take the possibly deadly "risk" of flying the plane back to its rightful owner, even joking, "Sure. You don't borrow someone's private plane. . . take it for a joyride, and never come back to express your thanks." Before heading back, Mark has Daria and the old hermit with the shack help him paint the plane with conspicuously crude psychedelic imagery, including tits on the wings and silly stereotypical hippie slogans on the side like "SUCK BUCKS" and "NO WARS." Not surprisingly, Mark is quite self-satisfied in regard to his preposterous paint job, stating that some people might think that it is not a plane but instead a, "Strange prehistoric bird spotted over the Mojave Desert with its genitals out." When Mark finally flies away in the plane, Daria waves goodbye in what is, unbeknownst to her, her last farewell to the hateful hippie hunk that managed to make her get wet in the most driest and most arid of regions. Meanwhile at the airport, tons of cops, media whores, and spectators have crowded around the area, though they have no clue that the villain plans to come back. When Mark finally arrives at the airport and prepares to land his rather obnoxious looking plane, he is bombarded by no less than four police cruisers. When Mark rams his plane into one of the patrol cars while attempting to drive in the grass so that he can escape, he is shot and killed instantly by a trigger-happy cop in what is arguably the most fittingly anticlimatic conclusion to arguably the briefest and most anticlimatic chase scene in cinema history. Indeed, Mark dies in a quite impotent fashion for a no less impotent 'political'

When Daria eventually hears about Mark's death on her car radio while parked on the side of the road in a region inhabited by gigantic cañti, she develops a forlornly haunted expression on her face, rocks her body back and forth for a little bit while she is staring at the ground, and then abruptly jumps inside her car and drives away as if there is some kind of emergency. Despite everything that has happened, Daria still decides to honor her boss Lee's wishes and drives to his luxury desert home in Phoenix. In what is indubitably another absurd stereotypical leftist attempt to link American capitalism with National Socialism, Lee's desert home bears a striking resemblance to Hitler's home Berghof in the Obersalzberg of the Bavarian Alps near Berchtesgaden, Bavaria, Germany. When Dara finally arrives at Lee's lavish pad, she is disgusted to see three opulent middle-aged whores chatting and sunbathing by a pool and proceeds to put her head under a small manmade waterfall and cry, as if she hopes the water will obscure her tears. After briefly grieving for her handsome prince, Daria watches from an outside window while maintaining an expression of complete and utter contempt as Lee and a half a dozen other business men in suits negotiate about a big real estate deal involving the building of a suburban development in the middle of the desert. When Daria goes inside the house and Lee finally notices her, the superficially charming capitalist approaches her and informs her where her bedroom is while completely ignoring the forlorn expression on her face. While Daria proceeds to walk to her room, she barely even looks inside and instead decides to abruptly leave the house without even saying a word to anyone after a young American Indian maid smiles at her. While Daria begins to drive away, she soon decides to park her car and exit the vehicle so that she can stare at the quite scenic American Berghof. After getting back in the car again and then touching the red nightie that Mark gave her, Daria once again exits the automobile and stares at the Lee's home while seething with rage and hatred until the building completely explodes in a symbolic scene where all the female protagonist's negative emotions as a result of her desert lover's senseless death are channeled into the quite aesthetically pleasing obliteration of corporate crusader Lee's home. Indeed, as demonstrated by the fact that the house is shown exploding multiple times from various different angles, this segment is clearly not a depiction of reality but a mere figment of Daria's rather irate imagination. In a five minute montage sequence that is juxtaposed with Pink Floyd's "Come In Number 51, Your Time Is Up," racks full of clothing, grills and other cookout equipment, refrigerators full of food, and large shelves full of books, among other things, are depicted exploding in slow-motion in what is indubitably a metaphorical fantasy depiction of both Daria and Antonioni's longing for the violent annihilation of the American dream. Of course, it should be noted that Uncle Adolf's Berghof was reduced to ruins by both retreating SS troops that set it on fire and Allied troops that subsequently looted it. After the explosion dream-sequence, Daria smiles and then drives away just as the sun begins to set while Roy Orbison sings "So Young" in what ultimately proves to be a strangely fitting, bittersweet conclusion to a quite brutal yet nonetheless extremely beautiful film. While one can only speculate as to what happens to Daria's character, it would probably not be a surprise if she became politically fanatical as a result of Mark's tragic death. After all, it is said that it was only after his equally grotesque looking brother Aleksandr 'Sasha' Ulyanov was executed as punishment for attempting to assassinate Russian Czar Alexander III that Lenin become completely politically radicalized.

Notably, in his January 1, 1970 review of the film where he gave it a pathetic two out of four stars, lifelong committed leftist Roger Ebert complained in regard to what he saw as the major flaw of Zabriskie Point, "The fact is, Antonioni has no feeling for young people. In his European films, he allowed his characters to behave mostly as adults. But in "Zabriskie Point" we get kids who fall in love and act like kids (running up and down sand dunes, etc.) and the sight is even more depressing than adults doing it. He has tried to make a serious movie and hasn't even achieved a beach-party level of insight." As far as I can tell, it seems that Ebert was either not completely paying attention to the film and/or refused to accept the damning insights Antonioni clearly offers because, aside from depicting an inordinately naturalistic and sensual desert romance between two individuals that clearly have great organic sexual chemistry, the film hints more than just a couple times that these young hippies are nothing more than extremely confused overgrown child who do not seem to understand, let alone care enough to understand, as to why they do the glaringly stupid things that they do. Indeed, while the protagonist is depicted as a rightfully angry and confused young man who has some much pent up hatred and rage that he does not care where or how he channels to the point where he is completely willing to throw his life for something that is so meaningless (hence his absurd rationalizations like, "Point is, if you don't see them as villains, you can't get rid of them"), the female protagonist is a sort of perennial teenybopper and shamelessly self-indulgent pothead princess who takes nothing seriously and simply lives to perpetuate her desire for perpetual pleasure (notably, at one point when she is asked if she does secretary work, she replies while sounding stoned retarded, "Well, it's not something I really dig to do. I just work when I need the bread"). In that sense, despite being complete opposites in terms of personalities, it is no surprise that the protagonists seem like practical soul mates during their rather erotically eventful date in the desert as they are both intrinsically impulsive individuals that take a visceral approach to life, though it is surely fitting that their relationship was as brief and fleeting as it was. While the protagonists more or less seem to literally fall in love at first sight, they are both far too damaged, immature, and whimsical to sustain anything resembling a healthy long-term monogamous relationship, which was quite typical of that zeitgeist, despite whatever romantic bullshit that a hippie sympathizer like Ebert wants to believe. Indeed, the counterculture movement just gave naturally impulsive and self-destructive individuals an excuse to kill themselves faster as the short life of Frechette and countless other famous and non-famous individuals of that exceedingly excremental era readily reveals.

Undoubtedly, despite his rather short-lived acting career, I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that Mark Frechette—a man that was about ten times more attractive and subversive than Jack Nicholson (who, incidentally, starred in Antonioni's subsequent English-language feature The Passenger (1975)), even if the latter is obviously a much more talented actor—was to the hippie generation what Marlon Brando and James Dean were to their eras, so it is only fitting that he croaked at age 27 after a most pathetic downfall that even rivals that of Brian Jones of the Rolling Stones. In fact, Antonioni was so impressed with Frechette that he once stated, "He has the elegance of an aristocrat, though from a poor family. There is something mystical about him." Frechette's aristocratic essence was certainly put to good use as WWI era Italian military officer in the extremely underrated Italian (anti)war film Uomini contro (1970) aka Many Wars Ago directed by Francesco Rosi. Indeed, in terms of Hollywood actors of that time (if he can even be considered one), Frechette was probably the closest living embodiment of the 'Lucifer' type that queer avant-garde auteur Kenneth Anger always speaks of as a sort of slightly less demonic Hollywood Bobby Beausoleil and criminally-inclined counterculture Don Juan who was doomed to crash and burn, especially after foolishly becoming a follower of sexually predatory folk musician turned charlatan cult leader Mel Lyman (in fact, Frechette insanely gave the $60,000 he was paid on Antonioni's film to Lyman). While some people believe that the actor got involved in the bank robbery that ruined his life to fund Lyman and his commune, Hungarian filmmaker Dezső Magyar (Büntetőexpedíció aka Punitive Expedition, Agitátorok aka The Agitators) claimed in an interview featured in Filmkultura magazine that he did it to fund a film, or as the auteur stated himself: "[M]y first friend was Mark Frechette, protagonist of the film ZABRISKIE POINT. We wanted to make a film, to adapt a part of CRIME AND PUNISHMENT because we felt that America was like a Dostoyevsky-type world. Mark said that he would get the money in Boston. He phoned me every second day and always assured me that he almost had the money. One day he called me and said that he would bring the 5 million dollars the next day. Great! I was watching TV in the evening when it was announced that ... Mark Frechette attempted to rob a bank at gunpoint ... and was arrested." Of course, Antonioni had to have great big balls to have the gall to cast non-actors Frechette and Halprin in his first relatively big budget American Hollywood movie, yet he ultimately made the right decision as I could not imagine big superstars of the time like Warren Beatty and Jane Fonda in the lead roles as they would totally taint the film's sense of authenticity. A perturbingly beautiful product of Antonioni taking a celluloid canvas and managing to simultaneously paint his love of the landscape and contempt for most of the people and their intrinsically worthless pseudo-cultures, Zabriskie Point makes counterculture era America seem like a gigantic loony bin made up of the decidedly degenerate lapsed cowboys and frontiersmen who, as a result of no longer having any land or injuns to conquer, have succumbed to subconscious suicide as a result of being largely dominated by two equally deleterious rivaling groups: the soulless corporate materialists that want to turn the country into a gigantic parking lot (notably, in one scene in the film, a tourist states to his wife in all seriousness upon arriving at the titular location, "They oughta build a drive-in here. They'd make a mint") and ethno-masochistic white activists that are seemingly so bored as a result of being the most spoiled generation in human history that they have nothing left to do but mindlessly destroy their country, pretend to empathize with the plight of poor ghetto negroes that hate their guts, and dispose of centuries upon centuries of family and cultural traditions because it is the 'cool' and 'hip' thing to do.

Admittedly, although I 'dig' some genuine counterculture cinema that was created by people that were actually associated with the movement that includes works ranging from James Broughton's The Bed (1968) and Dreamwood (1972) to Dennis Hopper's The Last Movie (1971) to Pierre Clémenti's Visa de censure n° X (1967) and New Old (1979) to Albie Thoms' Rita and Dundi (1966) and Marinetti (1969), I typically cannot stand Hollywood movies about hippies as they more often than not romanticize the era as some sort of virtual Golden Age where a true utopia was almost fully realized by a group of deluded drug addicts that somehow thought it would be a bright idea to transform the Euro-American bourgeoisie into xenophilic noble savages. Luckily, Charles Manson and his harem of deranged LSD-ridden whores came along and proved that 'free love,' primitive communal living, and recreational drug use oftentimes comes at a high price. Of course, one of the things that makes Zabriskie Point so potent is that it more or less predicted that things would probably end very badly for the flower children and the United States in general. Rather unfortunately, lead Frechette's death-by-barbell was a slightly less glamorous way to go out than his cinematic death, though I think it is safe to say his real-life downfall only adds to the dark mystique of Antonioni's film, which is, at the very least, a near masterpiece that has yet to get its due and probably never will since it is an arthouse film that is probably most sought out by the wrong people, including brain-dead Jerry Garcia fans and deluded wimps that want to see a film that validates their belief that the hippies were anything more than useful idiots that had succumbed to their baser instincts and more or less gave a good chunk of the country away to a certain race that calls itself a religion. On a more personal level, Zabriskie Point is the only film I have ever seen where I found myself somewhat identifying with hippie protagonist. Indeed, during my high school and college years,

I was full with the sort of irrational hatred, rage, and nihilistic self-destructive behavior that epitomizes the male protagonist, thus I probably found the character's death to be more senselessly tragic than most viewers would. After all, had the protagonist had attempted to do some research into why he hated the world instead of simply acting off impulse, as well as focused more on pussy than the police, chances are he would have mellowed out to some extent and realized that he was being manipulated by the very same sort of people he had foolishly sided with. Also, I am sure the character would have been less inclined to risk his life were he to realize that the movement was largely led by insincere racial aliens with ulterior motives who would ultimately be largely responsible for the sort of thought-policing that has plagued virtually aspects of contemporary American life, especially in universities. As an innately rebellious individual, I am sure that Frechette would have found the age of political correctness and thought crimes to be infinitely more insufferable his own era. While a self-described super-fascist, it can certainly be argued that Italian philosopher Julius Evola shared a similar view to his fellow countryman Antonioni in regard intellectual and spiritual bankruptcy of the counterculture movement. Indeed, while Antonioni hints in Zabriskie Point that the student activists were just as deluded and decadent as the capitalists and bourgeois 'oppressors' that they hated, Evola wrote in his book Cavalcare la Tigre (1961) aka Ride the Tiger: A Survival Manual for the Aristocrats of the Soul in regard to the Marxist scam and how it is just as much a cultural and spiritual affliction as capitalism: "Humanity's existential lesion is generally explained [by leftists] as an effect of material, economic organization in a society such as the capitalist one. The true remedy, the start of a "new and authentic humanism," a human integrity and a "happiness never known before," would then be furnished by the setting up of a different socioeconomic system, by the abolition of capitalism, and by the institution of a communist society of workers, such as is taking place in the Soviet area. Karl Marx had already praised in communism "the real appropriation of the human essence on the part of man and for the sake of man, the return of man to himself as a social being, thus as a human man," seeing in it the equivalent of a perfect naturalism and even a true humanism. In its radical forms, wherever this myth is affirmed through the control of movements, organizations, and people, it is linked to a corresponding education, a sort of psychic lobotomy intended methodically to neutralize and infantilize any form of higher sensibility and interest, every way of thought that is not in terms of the economy and socioeconomic processes. Behind the myth is the most terrible void, which acts as the worst opiate yet administered to a rootless humanity. Yet this deception is no different from the myth of prosperity, especially in the form it has taken in the West. Oblivious of the fact that they are living on a volcano, materially, politically, and in relation to the struggle for world domination, Westerners enjoy a technological euphoria, encouraged by the prospects of the "second industrial revolution" of the atomic age. At all events, the error and the illusion are the same in both socioeconomic ideologies, namely the serious assumption that existential misery can be reduced to suffering in one way or another from material want, and to impoverishment due to a given socioeconomic system." Aside from its cultural importance as arguably the only honest and artistically merited Hollywood counterculture film, Zabriskie Point also seems like a superficial aesthetic outline for much of David Lynch's post-Blue Velvet cinematic output, especially in regard to Wild at Heart (1990), Lost Highway (1997), and even The Straight Story (1999). Indeed, while I still have yet to see all of Antonioni's films, his tragic Death Valley romance seems to be the only one that has bizarre 'Lynchian' movements. Somewhat interestingly, Wild at Heart star Grace Zabriskie is actually descended from the same exact opulent Polish-American family as the wealthy businessman that Zabriskie Point is named after. Of course, while Lynch's films have seemingly infinite idiosyncratic moments, Antonioni certainly beat him to the punch with a number of things, arguably most notably the 'home appliance holocaust' at the conclusion of Zabriskie Point, which indubitably proves that you do not have to be a commie to enjoy the pseudo-apocalyptic destruction of expensive consumer goods.

STAGE FRIGHT

Michele Soavi (1987)

Michele Soavi is without a doubt the most promising director of Italian slasher films, or giallo, out there. His recycling of common themes while replacing parts not with synthetic, but organic instances of artistry is overwhelming. His most successful film and with good reason is Cemetery Man, also known as Dellamorte Dellamore. His first brainchild was known as Deliria in Italy but throughout the globe is known as Bloody Bird, Aquarius, and most notably in part to DVD labels and posters, Stage Fright. Stage Fright may come with its flaws but besides from the shoestring ending, proves to be a hard-hearted entry of slasher films, while not compromising its quality for innovative deaths, which has many. After working carefully on many of the Demoni saga, I'd like to presume that Soavi enjoyed the "horror amongst a cinematic medium" theme pretty well so he wrote a script for a film adapting the same concept but with a Phantom of the Opera twist bringing the terror into one of the archaic forms of performance art. A struggling group of theater actors work together to bring a piece called The Night Owl. After an incident in which one of the leading ladies of the play unknowingly harbors an escaped lunatic known for slaughtering a group of theatrical denizens back to their building, a night of nocturnal terror is unleashed with blame laid on the maniacal director who succumbs to the madness of creating art. After the killer steals an Owl mask from a flamboyantly gay Giovanni Lombardo Radice, the inhabitants of the stage are sent running for their life. On terms of slashers and masks, Stage Fright keeps a unkempt underdog aspect with the shocking framing and displays of the killer. The Kikuyu of Kenya see the owl as the harbinger of death so the placement of this creature in a slasher flick is more than acceptable. Like their beliefs, when one sees the owl, someone will die. Athena herself would be proud of this film. The owl costume brings a similar aesthetic that the mask in Last House on Dead End Street brought about. While Stage Fright might be weighed down under the scornful of the average slasher fan that drools at the sight of Jason Voorhees' with another bag of preteen sluts, Stage Fright remains one of the most inquisitive, thoughtful slasher films of all time. The greatest aspect of Stage Fright isn't the many ways he dispatches his victims. I could go into detail with this though, enunciating the idea of him using a power drill through a door to kill a male protecting the females in the safe room. I could argue with the misplaced idea that Stage Fright has the greatest chainsaw murdering context over ever The Texas Chainsaw Massacre, which immortalized the weapon within horror. I could even point the beauty out of the stabbing of Corrine as she doesn't realize the "killer" isn't the lovably homosexual Brett but a raving lunatic. But no, all of this proves to be entertainment leading up to a true work of pseudo-chauvinism. The real highlight is the over-incredible soundtrack. Borrowing a classical in-film score of music originally used in Sergei

STAGE FRIGHT

M. Eisenstein's Strike and using a soft theme consisting a cherubic hums, Stage Fright goes above and beyond the works and instances of Goblin thanks to Simon Boswell. Stage Fright marks the near debut of Michele Soavi and for a starting film, remains practically flawless despite the "hammy" ending. Pay special attention to the perfect scene of the madman's inspirational script rewrite using the actors (or what's left of them) in various poses with feathers strewn about. This signals the modern birth of giallo hybrids. Poetic and coarse, Soavi morphs murder into prose with Stage Fright.

CEMETERY MAN

I don't know about other people, but to me, Rupert Everett—a man who first gained critical and commercial acclaim by portraying a British cocksucking commie spy traitor who defected to the Soviet Union in the film Another Country (1984)—positively personifies the pathetically pompous and all-too-proper English poof, even if he looks like a Roman soldier, so I have always found it quite intriguing that he gave one of his greatest performances as a somewhat suave and rampantly heterosexual Guido cemetery caretaker. Indeed, for what is arguably the greatest and most original 'zombie comedy' ever made, Cemetery Man (1994) aka Dellamorte Dellamore aka Of Death, of Love aka Zombie Graveyard aka Demons '95 aka Of Death and Love directed by Italian horror auteur Michele Soavi (Stage Fright, The Church), Everett unequivocally proved he could pull off a quasi-illiterate graveyard philosopher with a more bitter than sweet view of romance and a nasty knack for fornicating in graveyards with busty goombah babes and putting more bullets than semen in said women's bodies. A deathly dark (anti)romance of the rather nihilistic sort disguised as a quirky horror comedy, Soavi's masterpiece of the mirthfully macabre is based on the 1991 novel Dellamorte Dellamore by comic artist/writer Tiziano Sclavi, yet there is no doubt that the director has made the source material his own. Featuring brain-splattering Fulci-esque zombie kill scenes, oneiric surrealism and misogyny in the spirit of Argento (albeit more playful!), a cynical portrait of Italian society that rivals that of unsung artsploitation auteur Alberto Cavallone, and old school gothic aesthetics that recall the best of Mario Bava (in fact, Soavi opted for using an authentic ancient ossuary for the film), Cemetery Man is unquestionably a highly addictive celluloid treat for anyone with even the most marginal interest in great Guido horror cinema, even if it offers more unhinged laughs than petrified screams, as a work that is, philosophically speaking, sort of like a comedy for antinatalists, as well as a romance flick for lapsed necrophiles. A film that is truly done a great disservice when it is described simply as a "horror comedy," "zombie comedy," or anything like that, Soavi's considerably misanthropic masterpiece may deserve some comparison with works ranging from Federico Fellini's Toby Dammit (1968) to Sam Raimi's Evil Dead II (1987) to James M. Muro's Street Trash (1987), but when it comes down to it, there is really no other film quite like it. Indeed, if you're looking for a philistine zombie flick with a sorry 'socially redeeming' message like those directed by George A. Romero, Cemetery Man will certainly prove to be an outstanding disappointment, but if you're looking for what is a seemingly seamlessly assembled arthouse-horror-comedy hybrid the visually quotes Belgian surrealist artist René Magritte and makes vengeful mass murder seem strangely merry, you can probably find no better work than Soavi's lavishly loony neo-gothic celluloid nightmare-within-a-nightmare.

CEMETERY MAN

Francesco Dellamorte (Rupert Everett) is a cynical yet serious cemetery caretaker that rather reluctantly calls a small Italian town named Buffalora his home and he lives in a decrepit old ramshackle at the ancient graveyard with his severely retarded and morbidly obese childlike sidekick/assistant Gnaghi (François Hadji-Lazaro), who can only one (non)word: “nyah.” Working at a graveyard where the front gate has the Latin inscription RESVRRECTVRIS (“They will resurrect”) engraved on it, it should be no surprise that Dellamorte has a semi-serious zombie problem, though he prefers to call these rotten flesheaters “returners.” Indeed, for whatever reason (although never mentioned in the film, director Soavi credited Mandragola roots in the cemetery as being responsible for reanimating the dead), most of the corpses come back to life seven days after the caretaker and his invalid comrade bury them, thus it is Dellamorte’s and his strangely cute and cuddly sidekick Gnaghi’s job to kill them by putting a bullet in their brain, as it is the only way to make the undead dead. A perennial loner who is believed to be impotent by the locals due to false rumors spread by young goombah punks and who is more or less illiterate despite the fact he is an incessantly pondering gravedigger philosopher of sorts, Dellamorte is not exactly the sort of man you would expect to be looking for love, but it eventually comes to him in the voluptuous form of a widow known as “She” (played by Finnish-Italian model turned actress Anna Falchi, who was discovered by maestro Federico Fellini), who comes to the graveyard to grieve over her recently deceased elderly husband. A beautiful yet seemingly warped woman of the rather whimsical sort, “She” only becomes interested in Dellamorte after he shows her his ossuary. While Dellamorte and “She” soon fall in love, their relationship is killed off as abruptly as it starts when the latter is killed after her belated husband rises from the grave and bites her while she is consummating coitus with the sexually virile graveyard caretaker. When “She” later rises from the dead, Dellamorte shoots her in the head, though, as the devastated caretaker will soon learn, she might not have been dead after all. Meanwhile, Gnaghi starts a morbid yet mostly harmless sexless romance with the reanimated head of the local mayor’s prematurely deceased daughter Valentina Scanarotti (Fabiana Formica), who was decapitated in a gruesome motorcycle accident. Of course, Dellamorte’s beloved “She” also returns as a zombie, thereupon causing the caretaker to realize that he was indeed responsible for her death and thus throwing him into a deep hallucinatory depression that inspires him to kill seven of the young Guido punks who spread the rumors of his completely fictional sexual impotence. Indeed, as demonstrated by his one-sided talk with a dictatorial Grim Reaper, who ultimately convinces him to kill the living instead of the dead, poor depressed Dellamorte might not have the most sound of minds, though he is certainly more rational and sane than anybody else from his quaint small town. Of course, Dellamorte kills “She” too after she tries to take a big blood-gushing bite out of his flesh. The Caretaker also has to kill Gnaghi’s zombie lover Valentina after she kills her mayor father (Stefano Masciarelli), who was more interested in his own political campaign than his town's zombie problem and the tragic death of his teenage daughter.

Undoubtedly, things get rather strange and 'soul-stirring' for Dellamorte when two women (also played by Anna Falchi) that look exactly like his beloved 'She' enter his life and ostensibly fall in mutual love with him at first sight. Indeed, the first is the secretary of the town's new mayor Civardi (Pietro Genardi), who instantly falls in love with the cemetery man and even agrees to marry him. Rather unfortunately, the Secretary is afraid of cocks and cannot stand the thought of a big purple-headed love truncheon deflowering her nubile naughty bits, so Dellamorte confirms to her the false rumors of his impotence and goes to a local doctor so he can be castrated (!), but luckily the physician refuses to do the procedure and instead injects his member with a painful substance that will supposedly guarantee that he will fail to "rise to the occasion" for at least the next month. Unfortunately, while Dellamorte is recuperating from taking a gigantic needle to the dick, the sensual Secretary is raped by mayor Civardi and she enjoys it so much that she drops the seemingly perennially forsaken cemetery man and cancels their planned marriage. Rather enraged after losing his second lady love, Dellamorte drives around town while looking for a prostitute and is ultimately approached by two young female college students, including a lady that also bears a striking resemblance to "She" named Laura (Anna Falchi), who he instantly falls in love with and vice versa. Indeed, despite the cock-blocking injection that he received to his dago dong, Dellamorte is so aroused by Laura that he manages to sexually service the carnal college student three times in row, but when he subsequently finds out that she is a high price prostitute, he kills her and two of her friends by setting fire to their apartment. When Dellamorte finds out from the local police investigator Marshall Straniero (played by American actor Mickey Knox)—a malignantly moronic man of law who humorously blames everyone except the cemetery man for the crimes that the cemetery man did indeed commit—that his friend Franco (Anton Alexander) took credit for burning up the college girls, he visits his less than sane comrade in the hospital to find out why he "stole his murders." While talking to Franco, who is in a semi-comatose state, Dellamorte casually puts a bullet in the brain of a nun, a nurse, and a doctor. While leaving the hospital, Dellamorte once again bumps into Marshall Straniero and confesses to the murders, but the automaton-like cop does not pay him any attention. Fed up with life, love, and killing as man who states, "I'd give my life to be dead," Dellamorte decides to leave Buffalora for good, so he tells Gnaghi to pack up his things, including an ancient coffin, and the two leave town. After leaving Buffalora and heading towards a mountain road, Dellamorte abruptly slams on the breaks, which causes Gnaghi to severely injure his rather thick head. After coming to the conclusion, "The rest of the world does not exist," and becoming all the more upset by the fact that his only friend is dying in a rather ridiculous fashion, Dellamorte decides to kill himself and his comrade, but Gnaghi stops him at the last second. Indeed, somehow smashing his head was to Gnaghi's benefit as he can now talk and asks Dellamorte, "take me home...please," to which the graveyard caretaker eloquently replies, "Nyah." Indeed, while life might suck, especially when you're a mass murderer that is responsible for killing your own lover(s), Dellamorte seems to more or less finally come to terms with that fact in the end.

Apparently, the American fanboy horror magazine Fangoria revealed in January 2011 that Michele Soavi was planning to direct a sequel to Cemetery Man that the director described as being more brutal and shocking than the original, though there seems to be no evidence that the film has ever went past the pre-production stage. Personally, I doubt that even Soavi himself could top the original film, but I have to admit that I would not mind seeing him try, even with an older and even gayer Rupert Everett as the lead. Additionally, in the late-1990s Everett approached Soavi about creating an American remake of the film but the project never went anywhere, which is probably for the better, as demonstrated by the countless horrendous Hollywood remakes of successful European films. Indeed, American filmgoers would have certainly been dumbfounded by an unclassifiable flick with the beautifully brutal flesheater-extermimating of Fulci's Zombi 2 (1979) aka Zombie yet the elegant in-your-face surrealism of Fellini's Juliet of the Spirits (1965), hence why the Cemetery Man was a total flop when it was released in United States. Like the criminally overlooked Spanish arthouse-horror flick A Bell from Hell (1973) aka La campana del inferno directed by mysterious auteur Claudio Guerin, Soavi's meta-offbeat zombie flick was certainly not specially tailored for the masses, as it is a true auteur piece directed by a born cinematic artist who just happens to work in the horror genre. Indeed, when it comes to Italian horror, Soavi is the only mensch that deserves to be credited as following directly in the footsteps of great cinematic artists like Mario Bava and Dario Argento, though Cemetery Man certainly demonstrates that he is a more eclectic filmmaker than his celluloid progenitors, as neither of these men were able to juggle comedy, horror, and surrealism in such a seamless fashion. A bad dream-within-a-dream-within-a-dream that does for the zombie genre what Luis Buñuel did for European arthouse cinema, Soavi's film is like the That Obscure Object of Desire (1977) of horror, albeit more figuratively and literally biting, as a feverishly fucked flesheater fever dream of the fiercely farcical sort where the rotting undead are certainly no more repugnant than the living. Indeed, if you're looking for a flesheater flick that more accurately captures the essence of our degenerated and disillusioned zeitgeist and do not mind a little art and pathologically politically incorrect humor mixed with your zombie guts, forget the retrograde undead filmic feces of George A. Romero's post-Day of the Dead oeuvre and bite on Cemetery Man.

Michiel van Jaarsveld (2001)

When I was in middle school and high school, I would oftentimes have these obscenely overweight and disgruntled middle-aged woman teachers with butch bull-dyke haircuts who, probably owing to the fact that they probably hadn't been fucked in years, if not decades, and seemed quite resentful towards males in general, would brag with a sense of sadistic glee that girls apparently matured at a younger age than boys anytime a male student annoyed them or did something they did not like in class. Of course, negro children and dogs mature earlier than white kids too, but I digress. To a certain degree, I agree with these fiercely frigid lard ass teachers, as I certainly noticed all throughout high school that girls tended to get into sex and drugs at an earlier age than boys, but of course it is much easier for them to get sex than it is for a young man, who usually has to have something of value, be it social or material, to give to a girl before she will agree to allow him to play stink-finger with her. Indeed, at the same age young men are just attempting to get a little piece of pussy for themselves, young girls are already learning to use their main vein as a weapon against older men, or at least such is the case in the fairly dark drama Drift (2001) aka Adrift aka 100 paarden directed by Dutch filmmaker Michiel van Jaarsveld (Marrakech, Papa's Tango) and penned by Jacqueline Epskamp, which depicts how a semi-homely 15-year-old teenage dame of the rather white trash sort manages to manipulate and destroy the lives of virtually every man she knows, including her extra loving big brother and best friend's father. Aside from say Dick Maas' goofy and fairly unserious classic comedy Flodder (1986) and its sequels, van Jaarsveld's particularly potent and fairly unsettling feature-length debut has to feature what is arguably the most dysfunctional white trash family in Dutch cinema history. A rare coming-of-age flick from the perspective of a fairly pernicious little wench who acts like a whore because she is starving for male attention yet at the same time cannot stand the fact that her brother-cum-guardian is always giving her his undivided attention and is quite overprotective of her to the point of being puritanical even though he himself is more or less a lowlife criminal with a somewhat busted moral compass, Drift was made as a part of the highly worthwhile 2001 'No More Heroes' series produced by the production company Motel Films where five different talented young Dutch novice filmmakers were given the opportunity to direct a feature-length film depicting "individuals who consciously turn their backs on society." As someone who had already watched and thoroughly enjoyed two of the films in the series, including Martin Koolhoven's AmnesiA (2001) and Lodewijk Crijns' Met grote blijdschap (2001) aka With Great Joy, I could not help but see van Jaarsveld's cinematic effort, which proved to be no less bleak and dejecting, even though it is quite aesthetically different from the other two films, as it takes a more realistic and almost cinéma vérité-like approach to its material. Set in a sort of Dutch sub-suburban ghetto where the locals look more like degenerate white Americans from the inner-city than Western Europeans and are constantly smoking a joint with one hand while chugging a can of beer with the other, Drift is somewhat like a Larry Clark flick sans the flagrant fetishism for scrawny skater boys and other forms of gratuitous degeneracy. Featuring a malicious teenage whore-in-training anti-heroine whose adult brother acts as her legal guardian and supports the family by bootlegging rancid meat and selling it to sketchy food vendors, van Jaarsveld's film is ultimately an uniquely unhealthy reminder of the deleterious effects of Americanization on Western European culture, as well as a rare film that depicts how truly dangerous teenage girls can be in terms of their innately conspiratorial and sadistically self-serving ways, especially when they have been brought up in a broken home without a real male role model.

Samantha aka 'Sammy' (Christel Oomen of Ineke Houtman's Stille Nacht (2004) in her first acting role) is a 15-year-old girl who is experiencing a sexual awakening of sorts, but her big brother Jakob (played by Dragan Bakema, who is so swarthy due to his Serbian ancestry that he managed to pass as an Arab pimp thug in Lodewijk Crijns' Loverboy (2003)) is quite overbearing and refuses to allow her to have a beau, as he cannot stomach the thought of another male touching his beloved little sister. Since their estranged mother disappeared long ago and their deranged dipsomaniac father Don (Bert Luppés of Dick Maas' Sint (2010) aka Saint) is in a mental hospital, Jakob has been Sammy's sole legal guardian for five years and he makes ends meet by buying large quantities of rancid meat from a local factory and selling it to local street vendors at a slightly inflated rate, thus reflecting the warped moral lows he will go to make sure that his little sister is provided for. Each morning before she rides to her high school on a moped, Sammy's brother puts her hair into a ponytail and makes her a sandwich for lunch, but she throws away said sandwich on the way there, thus reflecting what little she thinks of the sacrifice Jakob has made for her. Sammy's best friend is a catty and gossipy little blonde bourgeois bitch named Liz (Maud Dolsma) whose mother is a borderline catatonic pill-popping housewife and whose superficially charismatic father Nevill (Hans Hoes) is a somewhat successful and educated fellow who owns a print shop and rents out trailers to vacationing krauts during the summertime. While Sammy has a crush on a dorky poser punk kid named Thijs (Tim Zweije) who wears the same exact t-shirt of the anarcho-punk band Crass every single day, her friend Liz mocks her because of this, so the protagonist decides to keep her romantic options open.

Sammy is so starved for any sort of male attention that she gets a big kick out of regularly flashing her terribly tiny mosquito bite-like tits at the exceedingly elderly wheelchair-bound neighbor next door. Naturally, when Sammy's friend Liz's sex-starved father Nevill, whose demented wife probably hasn't put out in years, begins showing her affection and even treats her like an adult, she cannot help but wallow in the dubious attention. One night after driving her home after Liz breaks her moped, Nevill offers Sammy the keys to one of the various trailers that he rents out to German tourists after she complains that her brother gives her no privacy. Of course, Nevill ends up showing up at the mobile-home the same exact night that Sammy first goes there to check things out and the two drink wine together in what ultimately proves to be a pseudo-romantic night of sorts where the middle-aged man hits on the protagonist by telling her that, unlike his ditzy daughter Liz, she acts like an adult. After Nevill complains about his whacked-out wife and discusses how he would like to close his print shop and start a publishing company that prints works by decadent French poets like Baudelaire and Rimbaud, Sammy attempts to seize the opportunity to seduce the older man but, to her major chagrin, he turns her down and tells her she is as beautiful as the “mermaid of Copenhagen” when she asks if he will not screw her because she is ugly. Needless to say, Sammy is in quite for the shock when her big bro Jakob chases her down on his motorcycle while she is riding home on her moped in the middle of the night after leaving the trailer. It is obvious that Jakob is in love with his little sister and, as far as he is concerned, he is the only one that is allowed to pound her puss. When Jakob hears from Liz that Sammy might have been hanging out with Thijs, he decides to go by the high school the next day and beat the shit out of the unsuspecting teenage boy, who receives a rather unflattering black eye as a result of the beating. Naturally, Thijs is afraid to talk to Sammy after that, thus forcing the protagonist to focus more on banging her BFF’s dad. Of course, it is only a matter of time before Jakob realizes that his little sister is carrying on an affair with a reasonably cultivated mensch that is old enough to be their father. Additionally, like so many woman, be they young or old, Sammy never seems to think twice about the possible repercussions of her actions. In other words, the anti-heroine never seems to contemplate the fact that she is on the brink of ruining the lives of everyone that she is close to simply because she has daddy issues and is starved of a little bit of male attention.

While Sammy invites Thijs to show up at the trailer one night for a ‘date’ where she assumedly plans to fuck his brains out, he does not show up due to his assumed fear of Jakob and Nevill predictably ends up swinging by unannounced instead and brings the protagonist a gift in the form of expensive French perfume that his wife also wears, thus hinting that the unhappily married father is desperate for young cuntlet because his crazed cunt of a spouse will no longer attend to her simple wifely duties. While Nevill was afraid to pop Sammy’s cherry the first night they were together in the trailer, he cannot help himself by the second night and wastes no time in diving deep into the teen’s twat and breaking nature’s privy seal. Indeed, Nevill deflowers Sammy in a sad sex session that lasts about five seconds. Afterwards, Nevill attempts to delude himself into believing that he was not a pathetic lay by asking Sammy if it hurt and she replies, “No, I felt nothing” adding, “I’m used to it,” thus reflecting the seemingly impenetrable sense of soullessness that she feels. When Sammy's brother partially loses the use of his legs after crashing his motorcycle while racing after smoking dope and drinking beer with his burned out buddies, the protagonist seems to blame herself, so she calls Nevill and tells him, "I can't call you anymore," which the old man does not take well as he has only had a tiny little taste of the teen's cockchafer and is naturally hungry for more. While Sammy attempts to take care of her brother by cooking food for him and keeping his rotten meat scheme going, she pretty much fails at both things as she is rather lazy and has a superlatively shitty loser attitude. Indeed, when Sammy ends up burning fish in a frying pan, she decides to throw another pack of frozen fish that is still in the box into the microwave and subsequently serves it to her big bro, who refuses to eat the food upon inspecting it. When Sammy tries to get Jakob to drink wine instead of beer in the hope of creating a 'romantic atmosphere' between her and her brother, he does not take the hint that his little sis wants to seduce him and demands that she fetch him his usual cans of piss poor piss-water. When Thijs finally gets the testicular fortitude to talk to Sammy again and decides to follow her around when she is peddling her brother's rotten meat and finally realizes what she is doing, he complains, "Don't be stupid. ALL that rancid meat is antisocial," so the protagonist responds by rudely telling him to leave her sight and calling him a "queer."

With her brother incapacitated due to his leg injury, Sammy decides to seize the opportunity to fulfill Jakob's greatest sexual fantasy and seduce him, even telling him before they kiss, "You're the only one." Apparently, despite being a loser in his 20s that hangs around even bigger losers, Jakob is still a virgin, which seems to be the result of him being in love with his sister. To demonstrate her ostensible perennial devotion to her brother, Sammy gets the same trashy homemade eagle tattoo that Jakob has. Meanwhile, Liza's father Nevill begins stalking Sammy to the point where he shows up at her house unannounced and constantly calls her at all times of the day even though she never picks up. When Nevill shows up to Sammy's house to supposedly pickup his daughter Liz, Jakob begins to realize that his sister and the middle-aged man have something going on, especially after the latter mockingly states to him, "break a leg" in reference to his motorcycle injury. When Sammy decides to show up at the trailer one day, she finds Nevill waiting there for her and he wastes no time in accusing her of having an incestuous relationship with her brother, which she does not deny. When Sammy remarks to Nevill that he is not half as good in bed as her brother, the middle-aged man responds by manhandling her and then quasi-raping her from behind in a cruel carnal act that lasts no longer than a split second. After being bent over and vaginally pillaged by her best friend's father, Sammy decides to visit her own daddy Don in the mental institution and is quite dismayed when he grabs her ass and kisses her upon mistaking her for his estranged wife. Ultimately, Sammy decides to play along by pretending to be her mother and sadistically lies to her father by telling him that Jakob is in a raunchy relationship with a poor negress who is one of a twelve kids. After telling her father regarding Jakob and his imaginary black girlfriend, "They stuff their faces all day. Jacob is getting very fat...But she doesn't mind. Love handles," daddy Don somewhat humorously replies, "As long as she is nice to the children." When her father stares at a beer advertisement on the wall of his hospital room that features a photo of a sort of otherworldly castle in Tighnabruach, Scotland, Sammy cruelly says to him, "You won't be going there." Ultimately, Sammy is right as her father dies only a day or so later. Of course, it is vaguely hinted at that Sammy's father died as a result of her giving him a broken heart.

When Liz realizes that Sammy is wearing the same expensive French perfume that her mother wears, she naturally becomes suspicious that her friend is carrying on a lurid affair with her father, so she gets a group of equally prissy little girls to attack the protagonist and hold her down while mocking the home-made redneck tattoo that she has on her back. Instead of denying what she has done, Sammy tells Liz regarding her daddy, "Your father can't keep his hands off me. Tell him I'm going to the police if he doesn't leave me alone" and then the two best friends proceed to brawl like wild animals. When Sammy decides to cook some of the rotten meat that her brother sells on the black market for dinner as a vindictive way to rub his curious choice of trade in his face, Jakob becomes enraged and the two have a monstrous verbal fight. After Jakob tells her that he has wasted his life having to take care of her and that he would have left long ago for America or Australia if it was not for her, Sammy decides to call the government food inspection agency and tip them off about her big brother's less than savory bootlegging operation. Meanwhile, Jakob learns about Sammy's affair with Nevill, so he shows up at the middle-aged man's trailer with his two Neanderthal-like goon friends and more or less beats him to death. When Sammy later shows up at the trailer and finds Jakob's friend pathetically stealing items off of Nevill's bloody corpse, she is told, "Never mind. He's gone." In the end, Jakob finally decides to leave on his motorcycle and start a new life somewhere else, thus leaving Sammy to fend for herself. Of course, Sammy has learned that her naughty bits can help her to get what she wants in life, so it probably will not be long until she finds a nice and weak beta-male cuckold to live off of, or if worst comes to worst, she can get knocked up by a negro from Suriname and live off the Dutch government for at least the next 18 years.

If there ever was a film that savagely demystifies the sexual intrigue of virginal teenage girls and might convince a prospective ephebophile to think twice about getting involved with a busty teen, it is indubitably the borderline emotionally grotesque drama Drift, which features one of the most, if not the most, unflattering depictions of a sexually budding adolescent girl in cinema history. Indeed, aside from possibly Catherine Breillat's À ma soeur! (2001) aka Fat Girl and to a lesser extent both Stanley Kubrick and Adrian Lyne's Lolita adaptations, I cannot think of a more unsettling depiction of a cunt little girl who is beginning to realize the power of her cunt as a god given weapon that gives her the power to destroy men over twice her age with relative ease. It certainly does not surprise me that, like Fat Girl, Drift was penned by a woman, as men oftentimes romanticize women and especially young girls and do not seem to realize that females operate from a totally different moral system (or lack thereof) where men are seen as a means to an end and nothing more. In comparison to other films in the 'No More Heroes' series, Drift is notable in that, unlike Koolhoven's Amnesia and Crijns' With Great Joy, it takes a visceral realist approach to depicting people that have turned their back on society while still technically living in said society whereas the other films take a highly stylized and sometimes surreal approach to portraying people that have physically relocated to strange wooded regions on the outskirts of civilization. Of course, when the protagonist's brother leaves for good at the end of van Jaarsveld's film, he physically turns his back on society as well. Despite his first feature Drift being a nearly immaculate work that transcends Paul Morrissey's early Warhol-produced Trilogy (Flesh, Trash, Heat) in terms of its seemingly authentic approach to depicting dejecting cultural decay and social dysfunction, van Jaarsveld (who was only 31 when the film was released) has only had the opportunity to direct shorts, TV movies, and TV episodes since then and has never directed another single feature, thus reflecting the curious nature of the Dutch film industry and the way it treats its most promising artists. Indeed, Drift feels like the result of combining the best attributes of Ken Loach and Larry Clark, albeit set in a Dutch lower-middleclass setting, thereupon making for a highly accessible work that deals with decidedly dark themes yet never degrades the viewer with cheap sensationalism or pathetic poverty porn, even though it deals with perverse themes like incest and cross-generational rape. Aside from its artistic merits, van Jaarsveld's film is also a fairly insightful work that should be shown to all young male virgins lest they have their lives ruined by an emotionally erratic little slut who turns virtually everything she touches into shit. Of course, as Drift also seemingly unwittingly reveals, it seems that most men, including middle-aged married fathers who should know better, seem to suffer a sort of temporary lobotomy when the prospect of a fresh and untapped underage pussy pops into their mind.

Mick Jackson (1984)

It has become alarming so that British cinema has developed a greater portion of masterpieces than one would care to admit. Take Scum for example, either production, or the recently released Eden Lake, a bold contender for a tangible terror. These marvelous works of various degrees in genre fiction amass a cinema, new, fresh, and raw. It's no wonder Threads has been hailed as being the most disturbing films of all time and after experiencing it, I can't find myself to argue against that. Released in 1984 on BBC One, then BBC Two, Threads quickly disappeared from local television channels with no mystery as to why. Airing this was one of those risqué but necessary steps to discipline tube-tied youth, the same as how one might recommend Requiem for a Dream to be shown to a Health class. Explained in a docudrama mock-"What if?" format, Threads counts down till fallout and examines the middle class and their struggles while war is alluded to on the background television sets. The oblivious nature of the citizenry is one of the lasting images of Threads. Societal structure past, you'd hark back to the days of drinking an ale in your local tavern. But there's nothing of that to be found anymore.

The style alone in which Threads details teleprompters and theatrical reenactments gives an authentic backdrop for the warfare. To be honest, I wasn't quite sure of which direction the conflict would torpedo towards. Given the cheery disposition and expecting nature of the family, I was anticipating a subtle melodrama, strict and concise on point but fair and lax to our soon-to-be family. But that was me holding a flame of hope in vain. Soon thereafter, the nuclear holocaust that we had known was forthcoming suddenly dawned and set afire to the entire establishment of Sheffield which highlights an affordable yet heart-stopping rendition of a nuclear explosion. First the mushroom cloud appears over the horizon only to follow in its wake a searing flash and total meltdown of societal construct, obliterating all in its path. Screenwriter Barry Hines paid close attention to his characters as to not develop a bond with them - charming yet expendable. Threads is a beast, plain and simple. It built it up just to break it back down. The most valuable component of Threads isn't in its consequential look on political affairs or environmental buggery but the scorched imagery it so heavily relies on. The point's passed with excellent marks. I've never respected a made-for-TV film this handsomely, well, not including Bad Ronald.

For the physical part of Threads, much subtlety is employed to the effects of decomposition. Similar to an effect utilized in Tetsuo: The Iron Man, a time lapsed object is shown deteriorating quickly. This effect is brief but sweet. Not once to my recollection has a scene of nuclear attack been so stark and daring. Struggling against convention, the attack isn't filtered through digital animation but instead created on the basis of a blinding and incendiary flash that devastates all in its path. In other words, it's not Emmerich eye candy or anything like The Sum of All Fears. The narrative of Threads is also peculiar, switching from informative title cards to branching stories of two families connected by young and struggling lovers. From this aspect is where much misery comes into play. You see, Threads doesn't detail an afternoon or a week but decades after fallout. This decision highlights not just the fateful attack but the incineration of a major city and the unrecoverable effects of war. At this point a hierarchy of stranded emergency officials struggle to ration food trapped below rubble while strange, bandaged soldiers and officers enforce martial law. Just in these two instances alone makes Threads far from ordinary. Especially for the standards previously set for this film, Threads severs and defies all connections - which serves as an ultimate irony considering the opening analysis of the thread-like structure of civilized life.

It's brave filmmaking like this that makes me realize how important British cinema is. You'd think that during filming, Mick Jackson would have been worried that Threads would be too good. It marks one of the few films that truly scares me, not out of monsters, ghouls, or otherworldly demons but a non-artificial fear. Similar to the feeling tainted on me by Orozco the Embalmer, Threads soured my daily view of life. I don't believe the images within will ever fully evaporate from my mind. I don't mean to bestow Threads with any "film of the year" award. That isn't my intention. However, no matter how flawed, dated, or cheap the production may have been, Threads is a sizzling portrait of a cataclysm that is virtually untouched with barely any competition. Perhaps the most poignant post-apocalyptic film out there.

Miguel Ángel Vivas (2003)

When you decide, if and what, to evolve an idea you see so clearly in your head, the project might be similar to that of I'll See You in My Dreams. What I'll See You in My Dreams has going for it is the fact that is the first Portuguese zombie film and that it heavily evokes a lifeforce similar to that of Dellamorte Dellamore; which is a dry wit zombie film that burdens its Italian-based sassy sensibilities with reflections of art & death while showcasing metaphysical transformation and romance. What impresses me so much about this zombie short is the effective use of lighting, editing, and the natural environments of Portugal to create such a dirty and dust-ridden landscape (Dystopia themed?) of trees and fog that lay habitat to foul-stenched cannibals, along with some natives precariously named after "godfathers" of horror; Sam (Raimi), Dario (Argento), and Lucio (Fulci).

Lucio is a lone warrior stuck at a specific point of his life in which he has become local legend for slaughtering hordes of the undead which have inexplicably invaded his hometown. Not without motivation, Lucio does this not for the safety of his neighbors but in an act of vengeance for the zombies "turning" his once beautiful wife into a flesh eater. But this of course is poor Lucio's fault for catching his wife demonstrating a cemented stereotype of most, if not all women, being cheating whores. In this time of depression, Lucio stands as a lone figure that stands against these monsters and spends most of his screen time in a shoddy pub that is home to some very fascinating characters. I'll See You in My Dreams is a masterful film that also happens to cater to a very specific composition of art, cleverly returning to its main point and opening scene in stylistic deviance. What's surprising to me the most is that this film also happens to be a subtle romance, better than the almost unwatchable Zombie Honeymoon.

Lucio is a character that many will pity and more will follow with arms in the air. Taking the best traits horror legends have to offer, Lucio has been crafted into the ultimate badass and one without desperate one-liners, unresourceful sidekicks, or imitative choreography resulting in bland action and colorless set designs. Never has Lucio expected your attention and he certainly isn't the kind to trade humility for combat skills. For being a low budget feature, this is one film that will not sell out to being an "homage to Evil Dead" or any other degree of comparable taglines I see glued to horror film, regardless of how many bring this exact claim up time after time. I bring up this very true statement as this down right irritates the ever-living fuck out of me and seems to preemptively plague every other straight-to-DVD horror release that has been seen over the years. I'll See You in My Dreams takes premium specimens of iconoclastic film theory and defies conventions of "imaginative" filmmaking with stellar directing and plenty of recycled imagery that has been polished. This from Portugal, none the less. The only reinvention of the undead I could imagine that hasn't been done, hasn't been butchered by some gorehound with a itchy camera-trigger is zombies with jetpacks. Now, prove me wrong but I haven't heard of such an "interesting" idea given the moving image treatment. I'll See You in My Dreams is bar none one of the more systematically riveting zombie films I've seen in quite some time. Distinguished muck and body wounds make for brilliant zombies that take steady advantage of the color spectrum the biology of flesh has to offer. This doesn't have the creative mindset of a young auteur but does consist of high quality gloss coating a sweet, sweet horror core. Everything you get from this film will no doubt be positive unless zombie films just don't "do it" for you. Which in that case you are defined as a soulless being. Don't expect to leave I'll See You in My Dreams without experiencing any symptoms of spiritedness or a foreign infection of spiritual terror tomfoolery.

CHUCK /& BUCK

Miguel Arteta (2000)

Virtually everyone has had a friend or two during childhood who grew up to be something they never expected. Indeed, I had friends as a kid who went on to become felons (i.e. armed robbery, kidnappings), the proud progenitors of bastard mulatto children, green berets, suicide and overdose cases, and dope dealers, among other things. In the decidedly deranged 'dramedy' Chuck & Buck (2000) directed by Miguel Arteta (Youth in Revolt, Cedar Rapids), a somewhat successful yet rather vapid yuppie record company executive in his late-20s is in for quite a surprise when his now gay and quasi-autistic childhood best friend reappears in his life and turns his and his fiancée's sterile little world of bourgeois creature comfort's into a living hell of sorts with his considerably creepy and obscenely obsessive behavior. While advertised as a sort of quirky offbeat comedy that hipsters might assume is some sort of mundane mumblecore garbage, Chuck & Buck is actually a genuinely unnerving and even unhinged work that will almost certainly induce discomfort in all viewers to varying degrees, except maybe NAMBLA members. Undoubtedly, what makes the film even stranger is that it stars the Hollywood Hebraic hack director/producer Chris Weitz (co-producer/co-director of American Pie and The Twilight Saga: New Moon, among other soulless celluloid swill) in his debut acting role and gay actor/writer Mike White (who, on top of writing for Dawson's Creek, is the son of gay 'reverend doctor' Mel White, who used to ghostwrite for Jerry Falwell). Indeed, Chuck & Buck could not have more radically repellent leads whose personal backgrounds represent everything that is appalling about America, which only all the more accents the aberrosexual essence of the film. Undoubtedly, it is not a film that I can say I like by any means, yet it is also undeniably unforgettable, sort of like being flashed by an old homeless man or seeing a lone turd laying in the middle of a public bathroom floor. In fact, I would go so far as saying that Chuck & Buck is a work of spiritual molestation that utilizes comedy as a means to make the depravity of it all easier to swallow, just like how American Pie uses infantile humor to make it seem somewhat tolerable for the viewer to see some effete Jewish dork having sex with a Nordic chick. Seeming like it was directed by a poor man's Todd Solondz (or a homo Terry Zwigoff) and written by a perverted man-child who got molested as a child and enjoyed it, the film, if nothing else, seems like an endurance test to see how much degeneracy American filmgoers are willing to tolerate if quirky humor is involved. An unflatteringly unique tale about ugly people doing ugly things, as well as a look at the more odious side of obsession, Chuck & Buck is like the autobiographical film Spielberg always wanted to make but lacked the gall and sense of humor to do so, as a manchild that many believe has Asperger syndrome who incessantly makes films about children featuring an intolerably childlike sentimentality and a number disturbing gratuitous shots of little boys.

Opening with a scene of grotesque 27-year-old man-child Buck O'Brien (played by Mike White, who looks at least a decade older than his character, even if he does somewhat resemble a fetus) sitting in his room, which is full of Charms Blow Pops and his childhood toys, Chuck & Buck immediately establishes an aesthetically autistic tone as a film about a spastic and quasi-autistic dork who has an unhealthy obsession with his childhood best friend. When Buck's terminally ill mother (Pamela Gordon) kicks the bucket, it proves to be quite an exciting experience for him as his childhood best friend who he has not seen since he was 11, Chuck (Chris Weitz), is attending the funeral. Upon meeting Buck for the first time in some 16 years, Chuck, who is now a somewhat successful record company executive who lives in LA and drives a BMW, remarks how he has not changed at all, which is certainly an understatement. Before Chuck knows it, Buck intentionally walks in on him while he is in the bathroom and grabs his ass. Needless to say, Chuck takes his fiancée Beth (Carlyn Carlson) and heads back to LA immediately. Of course, Buck decides to plan to go visit Chuck, but when he gets blown off, he opts for going all the way for his great love and moves to LA after taking out $10,000 of his assumed inheritance. Immediately upon arriving in LA, Buck begins stalking Chuck, even pretending to be a delivery man so he can sneak into his friend's office. Chuck reluctantly humors Buck's bizarre obsessive behavior for a while, but when the weasel-like weirdo arrives at his house one night unexpectedly and says he wants to play a game that they used to play together as kids, stating, "like one of those games where you stick your dick in my mouth and I stick mine in yours. 'Chuck & Buck, Suck & Fuck,'" the record executive naturally throws him out for good. Meanwhile, Buck begins working on an autobiographical fairytale play inspired by The Wizard of Oz entitled 'Frank and Hank' in the hope that if Chuck sees it, he will realize how much he loves him and ditch his fiancée. Buck pays a theater manager named Beverly Franco (Lupe Ontiveros), whose obesity is only transcended by her bitchiness, to help him cast and direct the play, which she describes as being "a homoerotic misogynistic play," telling its writer, "I don't think this is a child's play...Its way out there. I think you have something weird about women. I think you have something weird about men." Being a complete social retard, Buck does not understand why Beverly describes his play as homoerotic. Against Beverly's better judgment, Buck decides to cast a goofy Guido of the sexually dubious sort from New Jersey named Sam (played by Paul Weitz, the older brother of Chris) because he has the hots for the guy since he looks a little like Chuck, but also has a warped mentality that the playwright can relate to (indeed, in one scene, Sam remarks to Buck regarding old bitch Beverly, "I think she wishes she had a cock [...] I wonder what her twat looks like. You ever wonder that? It's like sometimes she'll be talking to me and all I can think is, 'What does your twat look like? Why don't you show me you fucking bitch.' Yeah, I'm twisted. I got problems. I know I do."). Ultimately, after much stalking and whatnot from Buck, Chuck and his fiancée decide to go to the play. Needless to say, both Chuck and Beth (who is portrayed in the play as a witch) are disgusted with the play, with the latter finally realizing her hubby-to-be used to hump Buck when he was a kid. Of course, Buck continues to annoy Chuck, so when the former offers the latter to get out of his life for good if he agrees to 'sleep with him' for one night, he absurdly agrees. Indeed, Chuck fucks Buck in what is easily one of the creepiest scenarios in film history, even though it is mainly only implied. In the end, Buck finally accepts rejection and ultimately finds solace in hanging out with dumbass dago Sam (whose prick he tries to grab at one point) and being a semi-professional playwright. In an ending that is just as ridiculous as the rest of the film, Chuck and Beth invite Buck to their wedding, which he gladly attends and even manages not to get jealous when he sees his lifelong love kiss the bride.

One element of Chuck & Buck that seemed rather on point is that it portrays molestation victims as people that never seem to grow up, at least beyond the age when they were molested, as if they are still stuck in the same period when they were defiled and cannot progress past that point. Indeed, throughout the film, Buck makes accusations against Chuck like "You put that curse on me," thus highlighting the fact that even he feels that his childhood friend is to blame for his debilitating mental and sexual immaturity. Of course, the film also seems like a limp-wristed assault against heterosexual men, making it seem as if all boys experiment with blowing other boys as some sort of natural rite of passage and are in denial of it when they get older in life. In the end, I found both characters to be innately irritating and totally unsympathetic as two different extremes of American middleclass life: the infantile manchild that never grows up and the psychopathic office boss whose main concerns are appearances, especially regarding what car he drives and what kind of suit he plans to wear to work. When it comes down to it, both characters are emotionally retarded, with Buck being a hysterical neurotic with the social skills of a toddler and Chuck being a fraud who is all about appearances and has no real friends, with his fiancée Beth even seeming like an investment of sorts. Of course, Beth is nothing but a phony bourgeois whore herself who, like her friends, merely projects an image, but has no real personality, convictions, or beliefs. In one especially telling scene, someone compliments Beth on the West Indian decorations she has around her house and she responds by stating, "Thank you! God, I was afraid people were going to think they were racist...my decorator pushed me into it," thus demonstrating her obsession with superficial images and appearances, not to mention her complete and utter lack of individuality/personality to the point where she actually pays someone to design the look of her house. Featuring a childlike song by Gwendolyn Sanford entitled "Freedom of the Heart" that really highlights the quasi-pedo persuasion of the film (Buck may not molest a kid, but it certainly seems like his next logical step in life, especially considering at one point in the film he even allows a kid to lick his used saliva-drenched Blow Pop) and minimalistic 'indy' aesthetic that would make hipsters wet their panties were the film not so creepy, Chuck & Buck is arguably one of the most subtle pieces of celluloid aesthetic terrorism ever made, as the sort of film one might expect to have been directed by Woody Allen's long lost bastard son.

MAGO

Miguel M. Delgado (1949)

Much like how I'd like to open this review up to a blitzing world view on violence in the media, Mago greets you with the same sentiment although infinitely more visceral. Enter a dark street road. The camera slowly pans down until you hear a cacophony of chirps and ribbits. You see thousands of frogs littering the road in a very condensed formation. Human feet begin slowly approaching. Had you heard about the descriptive notoriety and flak this film has been hit with, you can predict what happens next. Feet begin stepping through and on our amphibian friends resulting in a sickening squishing sound. Next come the bicycles, then to the cars, then to the tank treads. The evolution of technology directly attributes to the increasing danger of the possibility of an environmental genocide. You will watch in shock & awe as frogs are slaughtered for the sake of "art" and a "message" to society. The same hypocritical effect could be done if Al Gore decided to slash a polar bears throat and claim Global Warming was the villain. Thankfully, they saved the worst for first so for the faint of heart, tread carefully. Mago is the title of the film and the elusive goddess hinted at towards the incoherent plot, but is also based upon a character in many Oriental religions, mainly Taoism. The film takes the creationist theory and adds a feminine and more divine touch to it, embodying all aspects of Gaia into 12 female spirits, who tend to become suicidal she-bitches after we humans are done with their forsaken planet. You will watch muddy Korean women sobbing in a wasteland of pollution holding dying birds to her bosom. It's quite a depressive feat seeing as how the "Water Spirit" eventually dies in the very pollution that kills her brethren. The average chauvinist might take immediate disgust to this film upon baring some of the fleshed mythos of Mago. Instead of the "weaker female" succumbing to the heart of temptation, the male is the one who steals the forbidden red grapes. As a resulting action, all the males turn primal, raping, killing, beating, and screaming to their hearts consent. Mago fits the religious context of the bible as much as it would had Ann Coulter authored the Old Testament stuffed with Betty Crocker recipes and endless Sally Fields re-runs. Mago presents human realization synchronizing with the heartbeat of nature fluidly at best. The film is a message to all technology enthusiasts. I can imagine the director filming this stock on certified recycled 35mm film stock. "Give up your primitive bodies and disperse your soul into information." is the basic message of one of the more esteemed chapters showing a bald unnamed Korean male drowning in the static screen of his computer monitor. After seeing stock footage of bombs going off, this film is certainly made with post-Hiroshima in mind. The environmental apocalypse is nigh! What novelties make Mago a bit too much to swallow? Perhaps it's the wacky J-Pop musical cues that use death as choreography that blister on the scenes. Listening to the Korean equivalent to Kylie Minogue during a scene of pigs getting brutally massacred is not on my list of to-do's. One such reviewer went as far as to call Mago a "low budget art film", then began claiming how this "Art film" totally sucks because the film doesn't have a Hollywood look to it. I began to become intrigued with critical reception to Mago. Much to my dismay, I found that everyone claims that Mago is a film that had no impact whatsoever on them. It's safe to say that they perhaps had nightmares from this film. I'd personally rather a low budget art production made with callow soul and furious sexuality as opposed to huge budget Hollywood "quirk-fests". I'm looking at you Wes Anderson and Diablo Cody. Mago might have broken a record with the staggering amount of nude actors/actresses appearing in the film. The total tally rounds up to about 825 people appearing fabric-less in this huge Korean production. This truly is "an allegorical poem of environmental destruction." The word "pretentious" is whored and handed out constantly. Before I get a chance to appreciate wonderful visual poetry, from left field comes the inability to fully understand one's personal work. Know that Mago has more deep-seated meaning and philosophy than such over-heralded films such as Be-gotten. The rebirth of the female sexuality has never been as stunningly filmed as demonstrated here. The sacrifice of thousands of wildlife souls is done in vain. While the conveyed message is brutal and nerve-wracking, the animal cruelty is needless. They might as well have directed a sequel to Godzilla vs. Hedorah. I'm sure that charts & graphs wouldn't have the same effect, but I cannot stop suffering for those poor frog creatures in the opening scene. Mago is definitely recommended for people of tolerance, but comes with fore-warning.

Mikael Häfström (2007)

Having a successful film in Hollywood always comes with its hazards. Being an intellectual film is one, apparently. Enter the 2000's where an original horror story is slim to none. Remakes are popping up everywhere, regardless if the original film could even be deemed popular. What happens when you take 2 talented actors, mix them with a hellish entity based on a Stephen King short, and throw in the Carpenters? Well, you'd get 1408. Mike Enslin (Cusack) is a bastard author who travels cross-country, visiting "Haunted" houses, hotels, mansions, and even Lighthouses, to churn out book after book on the subject. His reasons are buried and will not be revealed until later in the film (The wait is worth it). He is not a popular author and is shadowed by his former life. Writing bargain bin novels is no easy choice, which must be why he succumbs to the elusive author stereotype of alcohol and cigarettes. His life is going plainly dull without any real specters until he receives a postcard from the Dolphin Hotel urging "Do not enter 1408" As any ghost hunter would do, he decides to be a hardass and charge in headfirst into this experience of which he might not escape. Since the films release, I have heard horrible reviews and then extremely positive reviews. Any film is open to criticism but few deserve such harsh criticism, especially when such extravagant effort is shown. 1408 is an original ghost story that does what the genre admitted was dead, to scare. 1408 has its moments of claustrophobia, acrophobia, and the all-out jump-out tactics. Also note the familiar use of the Carpenters hit single "We've only just begun" used to a similar effect as in Carpenter's In the Mouth of Madness. Backed with an impressive script and charismatic actors being charismatic, it's no wonder the film has it's good reviews armed with bad. Most of my personal experiences with complaints has been from people who enjoy the horror market as it is, and as we all know, the chances of horror coming out alive is about the same chance we have of a decent Alien vs. Predator movie coming out. It just won't happen. 1408 is one of the few films that are worth seeing from the hacks at The Weinstein Company. They do not care about the future of film. Apart from sporting both black humor and terror, 1408 (The Theatrical Version) has one of the most touchy-feely endings in a long time. This is not a bad thing, no. Many times, the ending will catch me off guard and produce a tear or two. Expect one of the most epic last lines from Samuel L. Jackson ever. 1408 is a newcomer to horror and acts upon what it came for; to entertain and try to bring something new. It does this and more. Do not expect much, for it does not have expectations, but due to its subject matter, it is a disproportional looks on religion and the close-mindedness of humanity.

RUNAWAY NIGHTMARE

Mike Cartel (1982)

I am not really a believer in the whole 'so bad, it's good' designation when it comes to films as I find most Troma films to be completely worthless celluloid turds and I do not exactly have a hard-on for the more or less wholly worthless cinematic work of cross-dressing anti-auteur Ed wood, yet I would be lying if I did not admit there were certain gutter grade works, like the virtual entire oeuvre of Andy Milligan, the stop-motion-animation-based Lovecraftian horror of Equinox (1970), and John Wintergate's Boardinghouse (1982), that demonstrates that celluloid art can sometimes come in even the most lowly and technically inept of forms. For example, I recently happened upon a little known genre-molesting cult item entitled Runaway Nightmare (1982) directed by Mike Cartel that I expected to be a typical highly disposable trash film dud, but it ultimately proved to be a sort of unsung masterpiece of aesthetically autistic lo-fi celluloid of the superlatively satirical yet equally phantasmagorical kind. Like any respectable cult film, Cartel's flick has a background history as ludicrously labyrinthine as the film itself as a work that was expected to be shot over a three week period but was ultimately stretched to three years, only to be released without the director's knowledge in an incomplete form on VHS as one of the first 'straight-to-video' films after the distributor subcontracted it to another distributor called All Seasons Video. To add insult to injury and then some, the distributor not only released the work without Cartel's knowledge, but also spliced in random shot-on-VHS nude scenes in an absurdly conspicuous way worthy of alpha-smut-peddler Lloyd Kaufman. Luckily, in 2014 the original 35mm camera negative received 4K restoration and was released on DVD/Blu-ray by Vinegar Syndrome with the pointless titty scenes thankfully excised (though the scenes were included with the release as an extra feature). Shot under the Jean Harlow-esque working title Platinum Bombshell, Runaway Nightmare tells the marvelously moronic yet uniquely unpredictable tale of two dullard 'worm farmers' living in Death Valley (though the film was actually shot in the Mojave desert) who discover a buried alive blonde bombshell near their farm and then are subsequently kidnapped by a dope-and-occult-addled misandristic feminist cult, only to join said feminist cult and become involved in a total war against the mafia for a suitcase containing precious platinum. Like Robert Aldrich's Kiss Me Deadly (1955) and Paul Schrader's Patty Hearst (1988) meets Werner Schroeter's Manson-inspired masterpiece Willow Springs (1973) and Rudolf Thome's kraut counterculture classic Rote Sonne (1970) aka Red Sun as set in an unhinged cinema universe not all that different from the one featured in Alex Cox's Repo Man (1984) where understated absurdist irony has a sort of highly addictive narcotizing effect on the viewer, Cartel's undeniably singular piece of strangely charismatic celluloid quirk is one of those oh-so rare films that reminds me why I fell in love with cinema in the first place. Featuring a dopey duo that are like Abbott and Costello lost in time and high on tainted acid, Runaway Nightmare is a work that should fail hard in every way yet ultimately succeeds on so many bizarre and oftentimes subtextual levels that it makes one question whether auteur Cartel just had a number of happy artistic accidents while directing the film or if he is some sort of filmmaking genius who never made it past his formative years.

Opening with a 180-degree pan of the desert juxtaposed with a discordant yet bizarrely soothing minimalistic synthesizer-driven score, Runaway Nightmare then features a shot of a sign reading “Death Valley Insect Ranch” and then introduces the two main characters. While proud worm farmer Ralph (director Mike Cartel)—an unwittingly goofy fellow who, somewhat unfortunately, sounds like a cross between Jimmy Stewart and Nicholas Cage, albeit more autistic—loves desert life and is fully content engaging in mindless target practice all day, his business partner and best friend Jason (Al Valletta) is growing tired of the farm and the arid setting, complaining to his comrade, “Jesus, all I’m thinking about is getting away from all these insects. I wanna see some human faces again.” Rather magically, after complaining, “I’d like a little adventure...some excitement. I just wish something would happen, anything,” Jason gets exactly what he is looking for after he and Ralph spot some dubious dudes burying a coffin in the desert. Upon digging upon the fairly cheap looking coffin, Ralph and Jason are startled to find a living and breathing yet totally unconscious buxom blonde that bears a striking resemblance to Fast Times at Ridgemont High (1982) era Jennifer Jason Leigh inside with the rather fitting name ‘Fate’ (played by Amsterdam-born Dutch-Indonesian model Seeska Vandenberg) who they decide to bring back to their house. Before the truly odd couple can call the cops and tell them of the curious case of the mystery girl that they dug up in the desert, Ralph and Jason’s ranch home is invaded by an all-female cult of ‘pussy power’ professing beauties with mostly big boobies who do not take too kindly to men, especially those that they believe have kidnapped one of their sisters. While Ralph and Jason insist on their innocence, the girls demand at gunpoint that they come with them, with one aggressively stating, “Move out or get carried out.” Naturally, Ralph and Jason reluctantly oblige the cunty girls of cult while petrified that they may get their balls blown off, or worse.

When Ralph and Jason arrive at the feminist cult’s dimly lit yet strangely cozy desert compound, they continue to proclaim their innocence and are informed regarding their fate, “Hesperia will decide.” Indeed, the all-girl occult gang is lead by a big butch bitch named Hesperia (Cindy Donlan) and Ralph and Jason are finally introduced to her after the former unwittingly threatens her by stating, “get out of the way unless you want to be hurt” upon attempting to sneak out the front door to ostensibly “water the worms.” Ultimately, the two male prisoners are locked in a cellar when they are not being tortured by the blood-lusting she-bitches of the cult who rather enjoy threatening their much maligned male victims by waving knives at them while saying unintentionally hilarious things like, "I'm into bondage...and discipline" and "You're gonna go through beautiful screams of pain and passion. You have no idea what you're going to feel." Luckily for Ralph and Jason, they are saved from being branded by a sadistic bitch with the fitting name Sadie (Debbie Poropat) by Hesperia who proclaims, "You broke the agreement. We live by the laws." After defending her actions by absurdly stating "the voice told me to kill" like a convict attempting to dodge murder charges by pleading insanity, Sadie declares to her leader Hesperia, "I want to settle up with a duel!" and the two deranged dames proceed to settle their dispute old west style in what is quite possibly the most impotent gun duel in cinema history. While "Sadie is apparently "the best there is with guns," Hesperia gives her a "trick gun" that causes her head to get blown off during the duel. With queen bitch Sadie dead, things get a little less hectic at the feminist cathouse, with Jason even eventually developing Stockholm syndrome and remarking, "You know, I think I'm really beginning to get used to this place," but Ralph does not agree, arguing, "You know it's hard for me to get aroused when I keep seeing my life pass in front of me. Besides, some of those women have some pretty rugged girlfriends." As the viewer soon finds out, while Jason is a semi-suave lady's man with a voracious sexual appetite, Ralph is more or less a spiritual eunuch who would probably be a leader in the so-called men's right movement were he living in contemporary times.

While imprisoned in the cellar of the cathouse, Ralph and Jason are informed by the cult's token fat girl Clio (Ina Rose Fortman) that, despite the fact that most members of the group have a visceral hatred of men, they have been selected as candidates for membership in the all-girl gang. Indeed, Hesperia and her lethal ladies decided after fiddling with tarot cards that the two weaselly worm farmers might have what it takes to become lowly underlings in her chick cult. While Jason describes the entire ordeal as "one large wet dream" where they have found themselves "involved with a group of sex starved women," Ralph continues to complain little a beta-bitch, as he refuses to succumb to capture-bonding. Before being made official members of the cult, the two men are forced to take a couple endurance tests, including being sexually defiled by two hyper horny bestial babes who clearly have not felt a purple-head monster inside their venerable monosyllables in a very, very long time. Of course, Ralph and Jason pass the less than trying tests and are told by Hesperia that "you will be with us in body and soul" and that they will receive all the "sacrifices and privileges" of membership. While the two must give all their personal possessions to the group, they will "get a share of all communal profits." Indeed, aside from being a cult, the group is also involved in organized crime, including arms dealing and weapon transporting, and they want Ralph and Jason to help them exact revenge against a malevolent mafia group called the Syndicate that apparently double-crossed them by stealing a suitcase full of platinum from Fate and burying her in the desert. Of course, things are much stranger than they seem.

As members of the gang Ralph and Jason are forced to do pointless things like move crates from one place to another for no reason like concentration camp prisoners following the orders of SS-Sturmbannführer Paul Otto Radomski, but it does not take long for the latter to receive carnal benefits, including being involved in various threesomes with different girls from around the house. Indeed, like any semi-serious cult, so-called 'free love' and drugs are a regular occurrence at the cathouse. Unfortunately, Ralph is not so lucky as the fat girl Clio incessantly mocks him by randomly yelling "bug farmers" and laughing obnoxiously to rub his curious choice of profession in his face, not to mention the fact that a butch bull dyke constantly threatens him by stating things to him like, "I'm gonna waste you" and "I'm gonna cut you up." Indubitably, the most curious girl around the house is a pale-faced and black-haired Gothic babe named Vampiria (Alexis Alexander) who sometimes acts as a 'living portrait' when she is not attempting to scare Ralph by saying threatening things to him like, "Every man I've touched has died a violent death." When a bodaciously bitchy butch babe named Pepper (Cheryl Gamson) attempts to get in Ralph's pants by staring him directly in the eyes and declaring, "Hey, I'm trying to communicate. I'm into sunshine, awareness, good karma, vibes, and witchcraft. I'd like to mix our blood" and he tells her to go away because he is watching a show on a clearly broken black-and-white TV (!), she becomes so exceedingly enraged that she takes an axe and smashes the television to bits. While Ralph would love nothing more than to escape from the cult and go back to watering his worms, he still proves he is loyal to the girls by getting in a slapstick style brawl at a bar with New Romanticist style pinball machines after Jason saves one of the more big bosomed members of the gang from being harassed by a super sleazy Meštizo-like fellow. Although Ralph has not touched a single member of the gang, that does not stop latent lesbo Pepper from stating to him, "If you don't stop molesting these girls I'll see that you suffer before you die." Indeed, when it comes to women, Ralph is completely and utterly hopeless as demonstrated by the fact that a seductive dame named Torchy (Jody Lee Olhav) licks a large chess piece during a game of chess like it's a cock and says to him "It's your move. You can take me," but he does nothing but stare at her with a somewhat scared expression on his face, as if he has Castration anxiety and is afraid that she might suffer vagina dentata. In fact, Torchy makes another attempt to get Ralph to demonstrate his manhood while she is showering with a couple other girls, but all those gorgeous naked women somehow don't get the protagonist's blood going.

The only girl that Ralph demonstrates even the slightest affection towards is Fate, who reveals to him that Hesperia is really a spoiled rich girl and trust fund brat whose followers are nothing but a bunch of badly brainwashed fanatics that she easily manipulates for her own financial gain while pretending to be a spiritual guru of sorts. When Fate asks Ralph to runaway with her after they get revenge against the Syndicate, the protagonist seems somewhat interested but little does he realize that she is a two-faced bitch and psychopathic femme fatale with ugly ulterior motives that involve mass murder and treachery of the most heinous sort. When it finally comes time for the cult to seek revenge against the Syndicate so that they can get their priceless suitcase of platinum back, Hesperia assigns Ralph and Jason the job of being decoys. Ultimately, the cult successfully raids the Syndicate's warehouse and gets the platinum even though Ralph causes an alarm to go off after botching breaking a window, but it does not take long for the mafia to strike back and attack the girl gang's headquarters. When the Syndicate raids the cult's home, a number of girls, including super chubby chick Clio, are killed in a gun battle, but most of the girls manage to escape via helicopter. Since they apparently cannot fit everyone on the helicopter, Jason and Ralph are left behind, with the former evading capture by hiding in a chimney and the latter soon being caught by the guido gangsters.

While in captivity at the Syndicates headquarters, Ralph conveniently finds a time-bomb lying around the building that he sets to go off when he goes under interrogation. When interrogated by the Syndicate's leader Mr. X (played by the film's art director J. Christopher Senter), Ralph is informed, "You're already dead...The question is, how early do you want to die?," so the protagonist stalls until the time-bomb goes off by asking why they double-crossed the cult and he is somewhat startled to hear that it was actually Fate who double-crossed both groups and attempted to flee town by herself with the platinum. Right after Ralph cries "Oh, God" after wrongly assuming the time-bomb failed to detonate on time and Mr. X responds to him by saying, "There is no god. Nothing can save you now," the explosive goes off and magically the protagonist is the only one that survives the blast. After becoming all discombobulated as a result of the large explosion, Ralph decides to call his prospective ladylove Fate and she informs him that most of the gang members are dead and that she needs to speak to him in private. Ultimately, Fate picks up Ralph in his own van and brags that she has double-crossed "everyone" and that she has "lost count" of how many people she has killed. While Fate predictably shoots Ralph with a powerful weapon that causes him to fly out of the van, he manages to survive because he is wearing a bulletproof vest that Hesperia had given him when the Syndicate raided the cult's compound. Meanwhile, Fate attempts to open the suitcase full of platinum and is blown up in an extravagant explosion. As it turns out in a cute twist that seems to express the stupidity and lack of literacy of both organized crime groups, the suitcase was actually full of plutonium and not platinum.

When Ralph meets up with Jason and the surviving girls, he is quite happy to learn that his worms are as now as big as hamsters. On top of that, the girls declare him, Mr. Beta Bitch, their new leader, with one of them stating, seductively, “We’ll do anything you tell us to.” Of course, instead of demanding hot sex, Ralph merely has the girls do odd jobs like getting him cold cans of Coke when he is engaging in target practice outside. Notably, Ralph also reveals how resentful he is by psychologically torturing the girls that used to torture him by shooting bullets only a couple inches away from their heads. In the end, Runaway Nightmare seems to come full-circle, with Ralph shooting his rifle from the same rock formation as he did at the beginning of the film, albeit this time he has the added bonus of ruling over a collective of sexy and big bosomed broads who slavishly do whatever he says, but the fun does not last long. Indeed, after Ralph and Jason find two dudes (one of which is played by director Cartel’s father, who also acted as the film’s main financier under the pseudonym Eldon Short) dumping a barrel with a label reading “Danger – Nuclear Waste” at the very same place where Fate was buried at the beginning of the film, the film cuts to an epilogue that reveals regarding the characters’ fate: “Hesperia lives in Marin County where she publishes a feminist news magazine. Members of a female desert cult were exposed to radiation and had to be quarantined. Side effects of all women included increased sexual appetite. Jason survived and was confined in the same room with the other females. Ralph developed a unique genetic disorder.” In a second twist ending of sorts that surely demonstrates director Cartel’s obsession with screwing with the viewer’s expectations, Ralph is depicted transforming into a vampire and breaking free from a straitjacket while being held at a place somewhere in Nevada called the U.S. Government Radiological Research Facility. Of course, one can only hope that Ralph is more of a lady’s man in vampire form as he surely would make for an awfully pathetic bloodsucker if he sucks at seducing ladies.

Of course, it would probably interest certain cinephiles to know that Runaway Nightmare director Mike Cartel comes from a family of carnies and that the famous midway that his father owned, Crafts 20 Big Shows, was featured at the end of Alfred Hitchcock’s Strangers On A Train (1951), as well as the Godard favorite Some Came Running (1958) starring Frank Sinatra and Dean Martin and the Elvis Presley vehicle Roustabout (1964). While Cartel has never directed another film, he is apparently currently working on a documentary on carnivals. Aside from working as a film director, screenwriter, and actor, Cartel has also done stints as a soldier (he’s a Vietnam war veteran who who engaged in combat), reserve officer in the Los Angeles Police Department, owner and editor of a weekly newspaper (The Valley Vantage), and Los Angeles Unified School District teacher, thus making him not only the creator of one of the most patently preternatural motion pictures ever made, but also a filmmaker with one of the strangest and most eclectic employment histories. While Cartel once jokingly complained regarding Runaway Nightmare, “I’m still desperately fighting to make sure that this will not be the film I am remembered for,” it will indubitably be the single thing he will be best remembered for, which is certainly more than most people can say about their lives. As demonstrated by the fact that he set up a website for the film, it seems that Cartel is finally able to appreciate and enjoy the fruits of his labor some 30+ years after he created the film, thus confirming the old truism that it is 'better late than never.'

While I sincerely doubt that auteur Cartel was attempting to create anything resembling an experimental or avant-garde film, Runaway Nightmare is—for better or worse—an innately wayward cinematic work that is in a category that is all of its own as a sort of seductively satirical absurdist fever dream that surely makes the most of the deadly delirium that is associated with Death Valley. Undoubtedly, one of the most alluring aspects of the film is its heavy use of chiaroscuro, thus giving the work an absolutely alluring aesthetic that falls somewhere in between classic German expressionist cinema, Werner Schroeter's early high-camp masterpiece Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran, Leslie Megahey's Sheridan Le Fanu adaptation Schalcken the Painter (1979), and Richard Elfman's neo-vaudevillian cult classic Forbidden Zone (1980). It should also be noted that Runaway Nightmare is probably one of the most amazingly anti-climatic films ever made, as a cinematic work where anytime the viewer expects to see a salacious sex scene or grisly murder it abruptly cuts to another scene, hence why it was only to the detriment of the flick when it was released on VHS in the 1980s with random added shot-on-video nude scenes. Indeed, it might not make sense to modern viewers who are used to a cocktail of cheap and tasteless sex and violence, but one of the things that keeps the viewer on the edge of their seat during Cartel's film is their ultimately unfulfilled anticipation for unclad mammary glands, visceral mayhem, and ultra bloody murder. Certainly, Runaway Nightmare is one of those rather rare films where it has a totally original atmosphere and tone that can only be properly articulated to a person by actually watching it. In short, Cartel's micro-budget high-kitsch masterpiece is a film that makes the viewer really contemplate about what the filmmaker was thinking when he was dreaming up such a superlatively strange celluloid beast. After all, Cartel could not look and seem more ordinary and banal if he tried, so one can only wonder how such an inexplicable work sprung from such a seemingly everyday type of fellow. Of course, in its depiction of a cult of killer chicks with big tits who take two goofy guys hostage, Runaway Nightmare seems like it was directed by a kindred spirit of Russ Meyer, albeit with more self-control and imagination. After all, there would not be much 'meat' left in a Meyer flick if all the unclad jumbo jugs were taken out, yet one of the greatest strengths of Cartel's film is that it does not show a single bare nipple.

Of course, one also cannot forget that Runaway Nightmare is probably the best satire on the rotten fruits of feminism and the so-called women's liberation movement since Paul Morrissey's Women in Revolt (1971). Indeed, while absurdly goofy and seemingly hardly serious, the film casts the fairer sex in a distinctly dichotomous light where they are both feared yet fetishized, evil yet erotic, brutal yet beautiful, homicidal yet horny, cunning yet careless, and sadistic yet sweet, with protagonist Ralph symbolizing one extreme male perspective on women and his pal Jason symbolizing another. Naturally, it is probably no coincidence that Jason becomes a total moron after he gives into his carnal cravings while Ralph manages to figure out that the woman who portrayed herself as the biggest victim is ultimately the most evil and predatory of femme fatales as a woman who slaughters her own sisters for financial gain. In his pathological use of cinematic cock-teasing where he sets up a sexual scenario but never delivers the disrobed naughty bits, director Cartel manages to highlight the tricks of the trade when it comes to hypnotizing and, in turn, cuckolding men in a film that one might best describe as the ultimate work of 'anti-exploitation' disguised as pure exploitation trash. If you're looking for the best of psychotronic cinema, you probably cannot do better than Runaway Nightmare, which ultimately alleviates cinematic wackiness to a carefully cultivated art form that people seem to either love or love to hate (I fall into the former group).

For me, one of the greatest perennial cinematic tragedies is a film that almost achieves true greatness, but somehow falls short in one way or another. Indeed, whether it be the extremely poor choice of sexual encounters in a Radley Metzger fuck flick (e.g. the boner-breaking pegging climax in The Opening of Misty Beethoven (1976)) or the phony emasculating feminism injected into Dutch auteur Martin Koolhoven's apocalyptic western Brimstone (2016), cinema history is littered with begrudgingly admirable art that is oftentimes simultaneously intriguing and infuriating, which is certainly the way I would describe much of the oeuvre of mick-blooded English auteur Mike Figgis (Internal Affairs, Cold Creek Manor). While I have in some way or another enjoyed most of films that I have seen by Figgis, including a small chamber piece like his Strindberg adaptation Miss Julie (1999), every single one of them seems to suffer from some sort of glaring defect that makes me wonder whether or not the auteur was more suited for his original career as a musician. For example, Leaving Las Vegas (1995)—the somewhat overrated cinematic work that the auteur is best known for—is by no means a bad film yet it is oftentimes extremely unintentionally humorous in its depiction of a Nicholas Cage as a hyper histrionic suicidal dipsomaniac, which makes me assume that Figgis is, to some degree, emotionally tone deaf. Undoubtedly, my favorite Figgis flick is Liebestraum (1991), yet it also follows the Figgisian trend of being innately flawed and, in turn, sometimes annoying. Although a pure auteurist work in terms of being written, directed, and even scored by Figgis, the film also feels frustratingly derivative to some extent, as if the director was attempting to beat David Lynch at his own absurdist game by making his own more intellectual yet similarly esoteric equivalent to Blue Velvet (1986) in terms of presenting a semi-surreal psychosexual depiction of a degenerate white bread small town. Indeed, in terms of its handsome and well-dressed but semi-autistic protagonist, eccentric and oftentimes downright weirdo characters, sex-fueled mystery and intrigue, and unflattering depiction of the dark underbelly of a small American town, Figgis' flick is the sort of cinematic work that you would expect from a talented artist that was hopelessly naïve enough to believe that anyone aside from David Lynch was capable of being truly Lynchian. Still, Liebestraum—a film that naturally borrows its name from the Franz Liszt piano piece of the same name (somewhat unfortunately, the film features a degenerate jazz cover of the song by American negro jazz alto saxophonist Earl Bostic)—is dripping with enough flavorsome idiosyncrasy and oneiric intrigue to appeal to the more discerning cinephile. Marinated in hermetic misogyny, ominous laconic mumblings, and tastefully lurid eros, Figgis' esoteric erotic-mystery-thriller is a celluloid puzzle fueled by warm fresh pussy juice that manages to reward any filmgoer that does not like things completely spelled out for them. While I can understand why people are critical of the film, I truly do not understand how Liebestraum was so ruthlessly savaged by most professional film critics when it was initially released, especially when it was made during a time that was not exactly great for movies. For example, while his semitic frenemy Siskel had mostly favorable things to say about it, Roger Ebert clearly demonstrated he did not understand Figgis and his intent with the film when he wrote, “Figgis, who shows once again that he is a visual master, is guilty of a screenplay that is all twists and no substance,” as the flick was clearly made with a special emphasis put on style and atmospheric over narrative construction. In fact, it seems that not many critics understood or appreciated the film though in Rough Guide to Film: An A-Z of Directors and Their Movies (2007) the film is somewhat given its due with the brief line, “Tolling dangerously between memory, dream and a baleful present, this modern film noir caught something of the regret that permeates the best examples of the genre.” Quite unlike classic film noir, the protagonist is not some cynical hard ass, but a hopeless romantic that is looking for love and manages to find it with a girl that can hardly be described as a femme fatale. Indeed, the two leads seem like the only decent people left in the world, thus underscoring the importance and singularity of their love in a world full of prostitutes and property developers.

Not exactly a study in intense method acting, Liebestraum is set in a vaguely oneiric and hesitatingly orgasmic world of somewhat ominous mystery and intrigue where the characters, especially the moody and broody male protagonist, seem to wander through life like somnambulists in some sort of absurdist purgatory where love is god’s only reward. In that sense, the film owes much to the silent acting of German Expressionism. Indeed, male protagonist Nick Kaminisky (Kevin Anderson of Charlotte’s Web (2006) fame in probably the greatest performance of his career)—a hunky yet somewhat pedomorphic and seemingly perennially sullen architecture professor—seems to be plagued with a serious case of Saudade, though for who and/or what does not seem apparent to him or the viewer, at least at first, though it feels as if some unseen force is pulling him in the direction of what might fill his internal void. In fact, Nick’s essence somewhat brings to mind the P.G. Wodehouse quote, “A melancholy-looking man, he had the appearance of one who has searched for the leak in life’s gas-pipe with a lighted candle,” so it should be no surprise that he is oftentimes both literally and figuratively in the dark. An adopted bastard that comes to a small Illinois town to be with his biological mother, who he has never actually known, during her last dying games, Nick is ultimately forced to confront a secret dark family history that will lead him to incest, albeit of a somewhat bittersweet sort. A film noir-ish gothic romance about sex, murder, and death that plays around with Nietzsche’s idea of the ‘eternal return’ in its preternatural depiction of cross-generation romantic betrayal and forbidden love, Liebestraum manages to straddle a surprisingly healthy medium between nightmare and erotic fantasy. Speaking of Nietzsche, the film also brings to mind his wonderful words, "Woman was God's second mistake," though man does not fair much better in the film. Indeed, judging simply by the flick, I would assume that Figgis is some sort of misanthrope as virtually all of the characters are loathsome aside from the socially awkward protagonist and his love interest.

Whether plagued by transgenerational epigenetic inheritance or a curse, the film's hapless hero Nick and his unhappily married love interest find themselves more or less unwittingly reenacting the same exact behavior as the ill-fated parents that they never knew. By the end of the film, the viewer discovers that sometimes good sex can result in an intergenerational curse that involves the grand delight of forbidden love. Still, despite the film's dark themes and somewhat ominous overall tone, Figgis sees the film as having an overall positive message, or as he once explained in an interview featured in the Faber and Faber screenplay, "I think LIEBERSTRAUM is important for me, in that it's a growing up script in the sense that only by the two of them getting together do they give themselves the potential to carry on and go somewhere else – not keep returning to the house, not keep returning to that mother/father situation." Indeed, in the erotic esoteric filmic realm of Figgis, unholy extramarital excursions can have positive life-changing outcomes, yet that is not how I initially interpreted the end, even though I rather enjoyed it. While the film concludes with a literal climax of the exceedingly erotically-charged sort, the ending somehow feels about as happy and complete as that of Lynch's Loſt Highway (1997). In that sense, the film is a curious artistic failure where Figgis seems to have done something that is arguably superior to his intent by bringing the ominous to the orgasmic in a somewhat grotesque climatic collage that combines sex and death in an inexplicably bittersweet fashion where the past literally takes its last gasp in the form of the protagonist's mother while said protagonist passionately blows his load in his new lover-cum-sister.

Not surprisingly considering the director, the average lemming filmgoer will probably learn more about the storyline of Liebestraum from watching the trailer than by watching the entire film. For starters, the film depicts two different extramarital affairs that take place thirty year apart, though the second affair could not have happened without the first. As depicted at the very beginning of the film, the first affair ended with the two lovers being gunned down in cold blood by a jealous unseen lover that is not revealed until towards the end of the flick. Not unlike the viewer, as the film progresses, protagonist Nick Kaminsky will eventually discover that his father, who he never knew, was one of the young lovers killed that night yet that does not stop him from putting himself in the same exact sort of situation that got his papa killed. Although now bearing the aesthetically displeasing polack surname of his adoptive parents, Nick is assumedly of Swedish racial stock as his mother is named Lillian Anderssen (Kim Novak in a rather unflattering but strangely fitting role) and he will eventually learn that his ill-fated padre carried the surname 'Munnsen.' At the beginning of the film, a rather dejected-looking Nick arrives to the glaringly symbolically named town of Elderstown via train so that he can provide comfort to the mother he never knew while she succumbs to cancer in a local hospital that is staffed by 'grotesquely beautiful' nurses that moonlight as prostitutes (or so one discovers in an imperative bar/brothel scene that was cut from some versions of the film). When Nick first visits his morbidly sick progenitor, she is completely unconscious and almost resembles a cadaver, but he will eventually discover on subsequent visits that she is a hateful guilt-ridden bitch that suffers from a sort of all-consuming spiritual (love)sickness that has been fermenting for thirty years. While Nick will make a notable attempt to love his mother, he soon discovers that most of his emotional energy will be dispensed on a delectable dame that decided to symbolically chop all her hair off and get a dyke cut after her hotshot real estate developer husband cheated on her.

In what ultimately proves to be a strangely auspicious insistence of happenstance that takes place near the beginning of the film, Nick bumps into an old college friend named Paul Kessler (Bill Pullman in a fitting role as a somewhat unlikable cuck)—an arrogant real estate developer—while the former is preparing demolition on a beautiful gothic "cast-iron" building that he was admiring. Since Nick more or less saves his life by pushing him out of the way just in the nick of time after some debris falls off the roof of the building in what is ultimately an odd bit of foreshadowing, Paul is naturally quite happy to see his old buddy who now has a career teaching "architectural post-doctoral, pre-sexual-type thing" in upstate NY. As Paul somewhat jealously explains to Nick, his wife Jane (Pamela Gidley) read and apparently even liked some of his pre-tentious, or as he awkwardly explains, "I read your books. Well, I didn't read them, exactly, but I bought them. My wife read them. She really enjoyed them, she said. But then, you can never believe a woman." Indeed, before they even physically meet, Nick and Jane are revealed to have a connection which is much deeper than the two or anyone else would have ever guessed. Naturally, despite the protagonist's friendship with Paul, Nick and Jane will become lovers, but such forbidden love is a family tradition, or so the viewer eventually learns. As for being unable to trust women, Paul is certainly right, or so he eventually learns in a rather brutal way.

Not unlike Blue Velvet, Liebestraum is set in a degenerate quiet town where the center of the apple pie seems to be somewhat rancid, though in Figgis' flick it seems that the most upstanding members of society also happen to be the most flagrantly degenerate as if there is a direct correlation between social prestige and perversity. Indeed, upon attending one of his pal Paul's famous local parties, Nick discovers that his mother's respected physician Dr. Parker (Thomas Kopache) is a sort of pathetic pervert that does not seem all that bothered that he is cuckolded by his slutty blonde wife Mary (Catherine Hicks of 7th Heaven fame in an unintentionally hilariously sinful role). At the same party, Nick also first meets Jane, who immediately says to him upon meeting him, "I recognize you. From the photograph in that book. Yeah. You're Nick." Notably, Nick also presents Jane with a bouquet of red roses that look just like ones that he previously gave to his mother while first visiting her in the hospital. While Nick apologizes for the roses being a "little sad," Jane demonstrates her sort of (unconscious) symbolic interest in him by remarking, "I can fix sad roses." In fact, Jane will ultimately fix Nick, at least romantically and sexually speaking, but not before a couple awkward encounters, including an incident at the party where she unwittingly begins to get dressed while the protagonist is curiously lurking around her room.

In what ultimately proves to be a very highly potentially deleterious yet nonetheless insightful incident that really reveals some of the underlying vulnerabilities of the protagonist, Nick somewhat foolishly decides to accept a ride home from Paul's party from an extremely drunk and belligerent cop named Sheriff Peter Ricker (Graham Beckel), who drives like a gleefully self-destructive sociopath and who makes the protagonist all the more uncomfortable by aggressively baiting him with rather rude questions like: "Do you like pussy?" Clearly troubled by the boorish cracked cop questioning his sexuality, Nick emotionally yells that he does love "pussy," but he is not the sort of uncultivated mensch that is fond of just any old flowery cleft of flesh. Although cut from the American MGM dvd release of the film (luckily, the scene is at least included as a special feature), in an imperative 7+-minute scene that really underscores the central themes and aesthetic tone of the film, Sheriff Peter reveals that he is not only a corrupt cop but that he also moonlights as a pimp by bringing him to a local seedy bar that doubles as a brothel. In this inordinately intense scene, an almost insufferably bitchy yet nonetheless beautiful prostitute named Cindy rather assertively attempts to tempt Nick with various pussy-peddlers, including a slut named Michelle that's "reputation is built around her mouth. It's big. It's perfect" and a "bad girl" named Barbara that apparently takes brutal corporal punishment like a champ. In between advertising the carnal merchandise, Cindy bitches out a blind prostitute named Annie for "depressing the fuck out of everyone" by playing Beethoven's 'Moonlight Sonata.' When Cindy asks Nick "Do you like to eat?" and he gives a less than impassioned response "yes," she proceeds to stick her finger in Barbara's meat curtain and then applies the fresh gash gravy on said finger onto the protagonist's lips like it is lip gloss. While Nick shyly licks the cunt juice off his lips in a gingerly fashion, it is clear that he is intimidated by these dames and that he is probably only interested in Jane who has a similarly cerebral and introverted personality. Indeed, naturally as someone that was abandoned as a baby by his biological mother, Nick clearly has problems with women so it is only natural that he ultimately falls for a similarly wounded soul. Clearly a hopeless romantic as demonstrated by his way with red roses, Nick's raison d'être seems to be true love and with Jane he will inevitably find it, thus curing his romantic Sehnsucht. Notably, Nick is haunted in his dreams by an aggressive little girl with red hair that seems to taunt the child version of himself. At the very end of the film as the credits role, the same little girl is playing Liszt's titular 'Liebestraum' on piano in what is a fitting conclusion to this true cinematic love dream.

Under the pretense of collaborating together on an article on the cast-iron building that is being demolished, Nick and Jane begin spending much of their time together and it is immediately obvious that their is an almost otherworldly chemistry between the two. Since her hubby Paul previously cheated on her, Jane has all the reason(s) she needs to cheat on him, but it is ultimately her love-at-first-sight feelings for Nick that cause her to cave and embrace the forbidden romance, though she is somewhat reluctant at first. Notably, before leaving for a trip to Seattle, Paul gets pathetically drunk and warns Nick not to fuck his wife by grabbing him in a less than friendly fashion and stating with a certain piss drunk passive-aggressive elegance, "This cast-iron building—you can come and go as you please, just don't come in Jane." Of course, Nick does eventually cum inside Jane and Paul even bears witness to the aftermath of their hot and heavy romance, which fittingly reaches its climax in the ruins of the cast-iron building. Before then, Nick must learn about his curious genetic inheritance and how sex and death have haunted his family before he was even born. Upon discovering that the cast-iron has been hated for a long time due to a scandalous murder-suicide incident that brought great shame to the area, Nick is naturally somewhat perturbed to discover that his father was one of the people killed in the incident. Indeed, supposedly Nick father's father, Mr. Munnsen, was porking the hot blonde wife of his boss Barnard Ralston III. While it was assumed that Ralston shot Munnsen and his wife, who survived but suffered brain damage, before turning the gun on himself, it is eventually revealed via flashback that Nick's mother shot them all while she was pregnant with him. Seeming to die from a cancer that was sown in lovesick hatred and jealous, Nick's terminally ill mother is the seeming (barely) living antithesis of his romantic ideal. Although only really hinted at, it is also revealed that Jane is actually the sort of ungodly bastard love child of Nick's father and Mrs. Ralston, thus making her and the protagonist biological half-siblings. Unbeknownst to Jane, who was adopted, she is also the bastard half-sibling of the surviving Ralston heir Barnard Ralston IV (Zach Grenier), who is also the one that ordered the cast-iron to be demolished. Notably, Barnard IV is a creepy little turd that creeps out Nick out so much while he is lurking among vintage mannequins inside the cast-iron that the protagonist manages to accidentally smash his head into a wall and get knocked out just from the sheer sight of the little fellow. Indeed, seeming like the bastard progeny of Peter Lorre and a deformed gargoyle, Barnard IV virtually haunts both Nick and Jane, which is no surprise considering their accursed

A sort of metaphysical melodrama where virtually every single character seems to be guided by some dubious foreboding fate, Liebestraum is undoubtedly most successful when it is at its most confidently ambiguous. For example, while waiting for Nick at the hospital where his mother is on her death bed, Jane attempts to help an elderly wheelchair-bound woman and gets the shock of a lifetime when she looks at the woman's face and discovers that she is not only a brain-dead cripple with a large scar on her forehead where she was shot three decades before, but that she has the same exact eyes as her. While Jane has never seen this old woman in her entire life, it is obvious that she immediately realizes that this barely living creature is actually her biological mother. Needless to say, when Jane runs into Nick's mother's hospital room, the odious old bat freaks out and screams in an excruciatingly shrill fashion, "Oh, I've seen you. I've seen you with your legs spread!" as she thinks that she is the same Ralston that she shot in the head 30 years before during a moment of lethally lovelorn rage and jealousy. In fact, Nick's mother Lillian is still haunted by her dead husband's extramarital excursion and acts if it just happened yesterday, as she complains to her son in regard to the moment that she realized her spouse was cheating on her, "I began to kiss the fingers, one by one, and I could smell cunt on them." Notably, Nick's mother also later smells his hands and complains, "I can smell her on you," as if she has mistaken her for her dead husband. Naturally, it is only fitting that Lillian dies at the same exact time that Nick and Jane are making love inside the cast-iron building. While Lillian dies and the building is assumedly subsequently demolished, Nick and Jane have built a hot and steamy romance, albeit of the unwittingly incestuous sort. While Jane's husband arrives at the cast-iron with a loaded weapon and discovers that his wife and Nick have just made love, he simply sheds a tear instead of killing them. Indeed, unlike Nick's murderously jealous mommy, Paul seems to mournfully accept the gravity of the situation as if he understands the authenticity of their love, thus bringing an end to the sick cycle of sex-and-death that has haunted the town. As to the importance of the climatic sex-death scene, auteur Figgis himself stated, "The link between sex and death is a very strong and fascinating one to explore. When people close to us die, the sexual urge becomes very strong as an affirmation of being alive. In LIEBESTRAUM, the character Nick finds himself in a situation where he is visiting his mother, a mother he's never met before, a mother who is obsessed with sexual guilt and jealousy for her husband/son. So, he finds himself in a situation where he's presented with the chance to be promiscuous: he doesn't really know why, but it's a fascinating world to be drawn into. So, what I tried to do in the film is not to play it in a particularly sexual way, but to try and charge the atmosphere."

While Liebestraum technically has a happy ending of otherworldly orgasmic proportions, it somehow seems more bitter than sweet, unless you have no

qualms about incestuous or extramarital affairs, but then again, as auteur Figgis once stated in regard to the film, "There is also the fatalistic aspect of sex. People are fated to get together and it's not necessarily to do with a kind of 1960s idea of sex being good, clean fun. The cleaner and more wholesome you make sex, the less interesting it becomes. It also demeans it as the strongest and most basic instinct we have, and separates it into a containable compartment – which American film has done." Indeed, in many ways, Figgis' film is like an anti-Brief Encounter (1945) as a cinematic work were the protagonist arrives via train and does not bother repressing his sexuality like the poor little lady of the David Lean flick but instead exercises his demons and delicately defiles a dame that he seems like he was practically born to love. Personally, I find it practically impossible to relate to any sort of romance flick, but Liebestraum practically had me wishing I had some singularly beautiful unknown bastard half-sister that I could fuck. Apparently, certain pansy American viewers found the original uncut version of the film to be so perverse that Figgis was actually convinced to excise the infamous whorehouse scene, or as the auteur stated himself, "The scene in the whore-house, as scripted – although it functions, in a sense, like a one-act play and can be lifted, as it has been, completely out of the film – had an enormously important role to play psychologically, for the leading character, with the smell of women, the taste of women, and the establishing of his character in terms of how he behaved in the situation – was not at all like something out of TOM JONES. In other words, it was not a rollicking yarn where a 'real man' would go in and roger those prostitutes and come out and say: I managed to fuck then of them, how did you do? Nick was very submissive and intimidated by these strong women, who also confronted him with the flip-side of the coin of how men would like women to behave, which is as demure rape victims. No, these were women who came forward and said: What would you like? They were very aggressive. And I thought it set a tone in the film which was sort of outrageous, from which the character then had to live through the rest of the film, and go through a sort of romance, and deal with his mother, and ultimately come to terms with an image which had already occurred in that scene. But at the preview the audience were horrified by the scene. They were so offended and uncomfortable, and made so hostile by having to watch this scene, that it was impossible to watch the rest of the film. It turned into a completely circus, with people shouting and leaving. There was this incredible aggression coming from the audience."

While Figgis made the rather absurd and virtually anti-artistic decision to cut out an imperative and highly unforgettable scene from Liebestraum, he was curiously way less tolerant of the idea of artistic compromise when it came to incorporating a quasi-pornographic interracial Adam and Eve scenario in his later experimental feature The Loss of Sexual Innocence (1999). Indeed, As Figgis stated himself in regard to his own personal cuckkampf, "At one point it almost got as far as pre-production in L.A. It was a 'sure thing.' They 'loved it.' We had lunch to celebrate and during the dessert the producers brought up a small point, something small they wished to change, something they were sure would not trouble me at all because it was so damn trivial. I was intrigued by what this tiny detail could be. They wanted Adam to be white and Eve to be black. What it boiled down to was the head of distribution was a white South African and he felt that the world was not ready to see a white woman being rogered by a black man. The script was more radical than the film turned out to be. Over coffee I refused to change the script and they regretfully said that the issue was a deal breaker and that was the end of that. The success of LEAVING LAS VEGAS (1955) is what [finally] made it possible to raise the money for THE LOSS OF SEXUAL INNOCENCE. Their money was raised by pre-selling the film all over the world." In short, for his cinematic dream project, Figgis—a mick-blooded Englishman that spent his early childhood living in Nairobi, Kenya—was unable to back down on his mission of cultural cuckoldry in the form of a film-destroying anti-fascist Adam and Eve miscegenation scenario that is sure to sicken any white man that has not already been spiritually castrated. In fact, Figgis even had his then-girlfriend Saffron Burrows—a fairly beautiful yet seemingly bat-shit-crazy chick that now lives as a carpet-muncher that is married to another woman—portray Eve and thus had the majorly masochistic and emasculating opportunity of directing his lover having sex with a pitch black sambo (incidentally, the sambo question is not exactly well endowed and seems like a burnt little rodent when in the company of the pale porcelain yet simultaneously fiery fire-crotched beauty of Burrows).

Were it not for its rather repugnant interracial Adam and Eve sequences and various other examples of ethno-masochism and preposterous pretentiousness, The Loss of Sexual Innocence might have been Figgis' magnum opus, but I personally believe that both Liebestraum and his debut feature Stormy Monday (1988) are superior. An audaciously anti-American jazz-driven neo-noir starring Sting and an unbelievably young and fresh Sean Bean, Figgis' first feature is certainly underrated and a great example of his prowess as a multi-media artist (on top of directing and penning the film, he also created the soundtrack), but Liebestraum is indubitably a more intricate, aesthetically potent, and unforgettable work. In fact, I recently had a sort of Figgis marathon and I can only come to the conclusion that the auteur has only gotten shockingly worse and worse as the decades have passed, as if he has gotten superlatively lazy and increasingly committed himself to approaching filmmaking as something akin to jazz improvisation. A huge proponent of using digital video as opposed to film, Figgis has spent the greater portion of the last two decades directing mostly worthless trash that can, at best, be described as bloody messy DV abortions. For example, I found his pseudo-Dogme 95 experiment in sapless self-indulgence Hotel (2001)—a badly botched piece of megalomaniacal meta(pseudo)cinema—to be so painful in terms of its sheer aesthetic insipidity and overall general incoherence that I could not even bring myself to finish watching it. On the other hand, Figgis' most famous and successful film, Leaving Las Vegas, is by no means a masterpiece and certainly far too generic and just plain phony when compared to his greatest films like Stormy Monday, Liebestraum, and The Loss of Sexual Innocence. In terms of his mainstream hack work like the Henry Bean penned Internal Affairs (1990) and The Browning Version (1994) remake, they are still far more enjoyable and aesthetically pleasing than Figgis' recent digital video twaddle. Sadly, I simply cannot see Figgis ever directing a film that can be described as an unmitigated masterpiece. For me, Liebestraum is ultimately a sort of arthouse equivalent to junk food, as a fun and highly re-watchable cinematic work that demonstrates that failed art is not necessarily bad art and that artistic pretense is not always painful and/or fremdschämen-inducing. Notably, when the film was originally released, it was oftentimes (unfavorably) compared to the superficially similarly themed Dead Again (1991) directed by Kenneth Branagh, which is somewhat unfortunate since it is like comparing Luis Buñuel to Mel Brooks. In other words, Figgis' flick is the work of an aesthetically-inclined artist and Branagh's film is the product of a talented yet tone deaf artisan that lacks the innate poetic flair that is typical of Figgis' more accomplished cinematic works. Indeed, there is no doubt that Figgis is a talented artist, yet his own innate degeneracy seems to have prevented him from evolving into a great artist that is capable of creating great works in the same league as a Bergman, Antonioni, Lynch or even a Cronenberg. Of course, Figgis is unequivocally a true auteur with his own original vision, as most of his films, especially the pre-digital ones, seem to inhabit the same fucked (and idiosyncratically sexually-charged) Figgisian universe. In other words, in terms of British filmmakers, Figgis is more of an artist than a Christopher Nolan or a Tom Hooper, but of course art does not sell as the uniquely underrated filmmaking career of Philip Ridley (The Reflecting Skin, The Passion of Darkly Noon) surely demonstrates.

While Liebestraum received a number of negative reviews when it was originally released, it is also, somewhat ironically, one of, if not Figgis' most personal film, or as the auteur explained himself in an interview when asked by Walter Donohue, "I think it is. There are things in LIEBESTRAUM that when I came to write certain scenes I thought: Oh no, I can't really put that in. It's a little bit too – not only personal – but a little bit too intimate. It was quite a barrier to cross to actually write the film. But then, having written the film, it's fine. There's no problem about it any more. The interesting thing about filmmaking is that you do work these things out. And only by making these things as films, do you move on from them and, in a sense, become richer. You look at other people's work, like Bergman. He's worked through all kinds of strange emotional statement that he's put on film and then gone on to something else." Rather unfortunately, Figgis is no Bergman, but he does go slightly further than the Swedish cinematic sage in terms of sensual subversion, albeit in a curious cunt cream fashion. Judging by the glaring cultural cuckoldry in The Loss of Sexual Innocence and the preternatural passivity of the protagonist of Liebestraum, it seems that Figgis is the emasculated auteur par excellence. Still, one must give the filmmaker credit for his honesty in terms of exposing said emasculation. One also must give him credit for clearly both loving and exploiting film the conventions of film noir. After all, as Nietzsche once wrote, "The good men of every age are those who go to the roots of the old thoughts and bear fruit with them, the agriculturalists of the spirit. But every soil becomes finally exhausted, and the ploughshare of evil must always come once more." Unfortunately, it seems that Figgis' own soil has succumb to hardscrabble. As to the central message one takes from a romance as raw and raunchy yet perversely passionate and authentically darkly romantic as Liebestraum, Nietzsche certainly had it right when he wrote, "That which is done out of love always takes place beyond good and evil."

Mike Figgis (1999)

Female coming-of-age flicks, especially of the actually female-directed sort, are not exactly common, but it seems the emasculated French pump out the best and most patently perverse films from this niche subgenre, with Catherine Breillat's Fat Girl (2001) aka À ma soeur! certainly being a notable and rather nasty example. Undoubtedly, the most innately idiosyncratic and downright bizarre girly coming-of-age flick I have ever seen is Innocence (2004) directed by Argentinean-born auteur Gaspar Noé's Bosnian-French wife Lucile Hadžihalilović (La bouche de Jean-Pierre, Good Boys Use Condoms). Rather loosely based on a novella by degenerate Teutonic playwright Frank Wedekind entitled Mine-Haha, or On the Bodily Education of Young Girls (1903) aka Mine-Haha oder Über die körperliche Erziehung der jungen Mädchen—a work that was rather unfortunately lauded by Judeo-Marxists Leon Trotsky and Theodor W. Adorno, as well as mischling diva Marianne Faithfull—Innocence is certainly no less controversial than the sordid and gritty cinematic works of Hadžihalilović's hubby Noé (to whom she dedicated the film), though for entirely different reasons. Indeed, with its various scenes of fully naked preteen girls frolicking around lakes and whatnot, Innocence is certainly the sort of work that would attract the larger male pedophile population were the film not so pathologically plodding and steeped in atmosphere-driven ambiguity. Like her blatant filmic influence David Lynch, Hadžihalilović has stated in various interviews that it is up to the viewer to find their own meaning while watching Innocence, for which I certainly respect the filmmaker as the film features nil of the far-left novelty intellectualism that oftentimes plagues frog cinema. Like Picnic at Hanging Rock (1975) directed by Peter Weir meets A Day with the Boys (1969) directed by Clu Gulager meets The Spirit of the Beehive (1973) directed by Víctor Erice meets Lynch's Eraserhead (1977) in keen color and written from the perspective of a little girl, Innocence is a visceral yet esoteric work where ritual and routine drive the film's seemingly nonsensical storyline. A somewhat ironically titled work, Innocence is a film about the loss of innocence every member of the fairer sex must face when evolving from a prepubescent girl into a physical and mental woman who longs for a man. Set in a bizarre French boarding school for girls where new students arrive naked in tiny coffins and are inevitably molded quasi-militaristically into women if they are successful with their secret studies, Innocence is an ominous, oneiric, and foreboding flick that even manages to transcend Terry Gilliam's Tideland (2005) in terms of its bewildering portrayal of the complete and utter confusion that is female childhood. Undoubtedly an innately flawed film that I found to have various glaring annoyances that were clearly executed by someone with a soft, if not artistically strong, female touch, Innocence is certainly a work that will more appeal to women and probably also effeminate gay men, but will certainly provoke a response in all viewers, namely due to its various scenes of nude little girls, obsessive hermetic symbolism, and nonlinear storyline.

One thing that my girlfriend, who ultimately hated the film, and I found particularly annoying about Innocence is that the prepubescent protagonist, Iris (Zoé Auclair), is an Asian of unmentioned origin who sticks out like a sore yellow thumb in an exclusively white and seemingly 'classical' French boarding school, as if auteur Hadžihalilović wanted to make sure her film was 'multicultural' enough for the average French cultural Marxist cinephile. Like all the new students at the institution, Iris inexplicably arrives naked in a coffin, as if she has been reborn a baby vampire. Instead of being greeted by the school's teachers/adults, Iris is welcomed and shown the ropes of the all girls school by the little girls that attend it. The pupils at the school are differentiated by age with colored ribbons that they wear in their hair, with the youngest student wearing red (Iris' color) and the oldest wearing violet. Almost immediately upon arriving at the school, Iris becomes infatuated with an older girl named Bianca (Bérangère Haubruge), who the newcomer looks up to as a mentor and seems to have almost lesbian feelings for. Iris has no clue how she arrived at the school and complains about missing her brother, but her pleas are only met with the reassurance that she is now at 'home.' Despite lacking control of the students in many regards, the teachers are rather authoritarian and seem like frigid dykes who want to break little girls just as they were once broken long ago. When one of the little girls, Laura (Olga Peytavi-Müller), attempts to escape from the school on a leaking rowboat, she ultimately drowns and her corpse is burned up in the coffin she arrived in a ritualistic manner in front of the entire population of the institution as if a warning to all other girls at the school to not attempt to escape. Indeed, fear is the foremost tool used to keep the girls in check. When a rather homely girl that looks like Anne Frank, Alice (Lea Bridarolli), lashes out due to the fact she was not picked to 'graduate' from the school, she later runs away and disappears and the teachers tell the rest of the girls to forget she ever existed. A lady named Mademoiselle Eva (Marion Cotillard), who teaches the girls ballet and the finer points of being a fair lady, does the honor of setting the coffins of dead girls on fire, while a cunty cripple with a cane named Mademoiselle Edith (Hélène de Fougerolles) acts as a sort of adversarial character. Notably, Iris is told that if she breaks the rules at the school (i.e. attempts to escape), she will be punished with being forced to stay there forever like the female teachers, who never developed into real woman as sexless spinsters who have dedicated their lives to teaching little girls (after all, those that cannot do teach!) In the end, Iris' best bud Bianca graduates from the school and almost immediately finds a 'man' upon entering the real world in a symbolic scene clearly indicating she has finally reached womanhood.

In an interview, auteur Lucile Hadžihalilović stated regarding Innocence and her expectations regarding how certain audiences will respond to the film: “I think the audience’s reaction will vary between men and women. Naturally, I think it’s easier for women to identify with the young girls. They’ll understand it more quickly and directly. Their own lives will be evoked. It’s a bit more complicated for men since there are no male characters in the film. So I think their own view of the young girls will be evoked.” Indeed, I would be lying if I did not admit that I could not completely lose myself in the film as Innocence was clearly made by a woman with a ‘nostalgic’ sense of childhood, which Hadžihalilović confirmed in an interview when she confessed: “Someone told me that they think my film portrays what it is to be a normal girl, in a normal school who conjures up that world in their imagination to recount their experience. In that sense, yes, my film is completely autobiographical.” Somewhat peculiarly, Innocence is also rather heavy on “nature-worship” and reminded me of a Lynchian take on völkisch National Socialist propaganda flicks like Enchanted Forest (1936) aka Ewiger Wald. In fact, auteur Hadžihalilović confessed regarding her interest in adapting Mine-Haha, or On the Bodily Education of Young Girls, “One of the elements that I really liked in Wedekind’s story was its pantheism. Maybe it’s personal and related to my childhood, but I have the impression that children live in nature.” Undoubtedly, if one learns anything while watching Innocence, it is one cannot stop the power of nature and that nature knows no morals.

Indeed, if there was anything I could relate to in Innocence, it is the film’s mystical depiction of nature and its organic majesty because as a child I loved nothing more than getting lost in the woods and feeling like I was one with the animals, trees, and water. Of course, as symbolically depicted at the conclusion of Innocence when Bianca graduates and heads to the city, most people seem to lose their affinity and respect for nature when they become adults. Notably, Innocence is not the only film based on Wedekind’s Mine-Haha, or On the Bodily Education of Young Girls, as director John Irvin made an inferior yet much darker lesbo-themed adaptation of the novella entitled The Fine Art of Love: Mine Ha-Ha (2005) starring Jacqueline Bisset. A film that will probably only ironically appeal to dubious individuals into arthouse child porn like Maladolescenza (1977) as well as female cinephiles looking to get in touch with their inner child, Innocence ultimately proves Lucile Hadžihalilović is a true female talent who has yet to make her masterpiece and who does not need to rely on cliché feminist/left-wing politics to attract praise from critics like most female filmmakers do. Make no mistake about it, Innocence is a slow and oftentimes plodding arthouse work, but Hadžihalilović is clearly an uncompromising and intuitive artist in the Herzogian sense who takes cinema very seriously as an artistic medium and who is not afraid to alienate the majority of filmgoers, which is certainly something I can respect. Indeed, while I know next to nothing about Hadžihalilović, it is quite clear to me that Gaspar Noé has found his soul mate and she clearly lost her innocence long ago, but like her film demonstrates, innocence is something one does not truly understand until it is lost forever.

BORN OF THE WIND

Mike Kuchar (1964)

Maybe because I have not seen that many decent films about deadly undead Egyptian aristocrats wrapped in ancient bandages, but I have never really had a strong interest in mummy movies, so I can appreciate it when a filmmaker dares to rape and defile the conventions and mythology of the classic horror subgenre, especially if you have to be a half-crazed and remarkably socially awkward camp-oriented genre-molester like Mike Kuchar (Sins of the Fleshapoids, The Secret of Wendel Samson). Indeed, forget the Ed Wood penned pseudo-erotic celluloid turd Orgy of the Dead (1965), the bandaged corpse host of Antony Balch's suave counterculture sexploitation flick Secrets of Sex (1970) aka Bizarre, Anthony Hickox's self-referential porno horror-comedy Waxwork (1988), and even the curious cult item Don Coscarelli's Bubba Ho-Tep (2002), Kuchar's 24-minute silent horror-melodrama-sci-fi experiment in avant-garde camp Born of the Wind (1961) is certainly one of the most wildly idiosyncratic, morally vacant, and uniquely unpredictable mummy movies ever made, even if it is more or less a glorified home-movie that was directed by someone that one might assume is a benign mental patient who could one day become like Mickey Rooney's titular character in Yabo Yablonsky's The Manipulator (1971) aka B.J. Lang Presents. Shot on the much maligned consume grade medium of 8mm, Kuchar's waywardly enthralling flick not only abruptly switches between various movie genres in a ridiculously refreshing way, but also features various forms of archaic animation as a work that makes the special effects of the homegrown semi-Lovecraftian cult classic Equinox (1970) seem comparable to that of Fritz Lang's Metropolis (1927). One of the few Kuchar Twins flicks that has been professionally restored and is available in DVD form (it was somewhat fittingly released as part of the 2008 DVD compilation Experiments in Terror 3 alongside shorts by Guy Maddin and imaginary filmmaker J. X. Williams), Born of the Wind has a sort of very distinct and unforgettable DIY Gothic neo-Expressionist aesthetic about it that accentuates the films refreshingly amoral tone where the most heinous of monsters are depicted in a strangely empathetic light that might make the average Hollywood spoon-fed American filmgoer vomit in abject confusion. A mad-scientist-meets-vampiric-mummy tale that evolves into a hysterically tragic bizarre love triangle involving pernicious space invaders and cat burglars that becomes completely aesthetically and thematically anarchistic in the end to the point where the filmgoer will be questioning whether what they just saw really happened or not, Kuchar's flick is nothing short of campy romantic pessimism at its most flagrantly freaky and pleasantly psychotronic. Seeming like it was directed by the bastard idiot savant stepson of James Whale and Curtis Harrington, the short features a sort of melodically melancholic spirit that you might expect to bleed from Douglas

BORN OF THE WIND

Sirk's mind had the master of melodrama become a horror fan upon developing Alzheimer's disease. Somewhat underwhelming described by co-star George Kuchar as, "A tender and realistic story of a scientist who falls in love with a mummy he has restored to life... 2,000 years as a mummy couldn't quench her thirst for love!" Born of the Wind is nothing short of the height of celluloid outsider art as a work that tests the bounds of artistic tastefulness.

After opening with a sort of pseudo-psychedelic title screen, Born of the Wind features a partially incorrectly spelled handpainted inter-title reading, "It's been three weeks since the disappearance of the mummy from the city museum. At Koshki Castle, Dr. Morris D. Koshki works feverishly to decode an old Egyptian scroll. The scroll says it can bring life and youth back to the mummified princess who died at an early age, thousands of years ago." Indeed, Dr. Koshki (Kuchar regular Bob Cowan of The Secret of Wendel Samson (1966) and The Devil's Cleavage (1975)) is an extra mad scientist with a slight sensitive side who seems rather lonely and hopelessly sexually repressed as he has dedicated all of his time to reanimating an ancient aristocrat Egyptian corpse that was born before Jesus Christ and no task or crime is too big for him to accomplish this seemingly ludicrous task of quasi-necrophiliac forbidden love. After berating his annoyingly meek maid (Janice Jones) for knocking over something while he is studying arcane Egyptian scrolls at his desk, Dr. Koshki finally realizes that he will need to procure human blood if he wants to perfect a magical potion that will give life to his rotten would-be-lover, so he naturally raids a blood bank that is designated with a poorly handwritten sign on the front door at a place called Shalimar Hospital and steals a couple jars full of fresh vital fluids. Upon getting home with the jars of stolen blood, Dr. Koshki is so excited about the prospect of bringing the mummy to life that he spills the stolen sanguine fluids all over the place while creating his special reanimating potion. Somewhat anticlimactically, the Mummy (Kuchar regular Donna Kerness of The Naked and the Nude (1957) and Sins of the Fleshapoids (1965)) instantly comes to life and transform into a somewhat beautiful busy babe after Dr. Koshski applies his special serum to her initially thoroughly decayed skull. Somewhat preposterously, the mummy princess immediately embraces Koshski upon becoming reanimated and naturally the good doctor laps up all of the attention like a middle-aged virgin who has never had a girlfriend before. Of course, being an autistically scientifically minded social misfit with probably nil social skills, especially when it comes to the opposite sex, Koshski never seems to consider that his special mummy chick might not feel the same way about him as he feels about her, or so he will eventually learn the hard way as the film progresses.

Not unlike a typical bloodsucking vampire, the mummy needs blood to survive as she begins to rot if she does not have a steady plasma supply. When Dr. Koshki's cat knocks over the last remaining jar of blood while he is playing a piano ballad and he is forced to leave the castle to go steal some more red stuff from the local hospital, the fiending mummy, who cannot wait for her undead dope, takes it upon herself to rejuvenate her busty body by slitting the throat of the dorky castle maid and gorging on her seemingly half-stale vital fluids. While Dr. Koshki is naturally shocked to see the awkwardly contorted bloody corpse of his buffoonish maid when he gets home, he does not really give his poor loyal employee's brutal death a second thought because he has more important things on his mind, or as an inter-title reveals, "Enslaved by his desires for the Princess the murder was soon forgotten, washed away in her tender, all consuming embrace, and in her promises of eternal love." Unfortunately for the dandy-like mad scientist, his sphinxlike undead princess' feelings for him are not exactly as strong as his are for her. Indeed, one night while sleeping in bed alongside Dr. Koshski, the busty mummy awakes to the sound of two incompetent cat burglars stealing utensils from the castle kitchen, so she absurdly threatens them with a hammer but before she knows it her anger and fear turn into ecstasy when the men get physical with her. Indeed, when one of the burglars (Spencer Lee Todd) grabs the blood-addicted princess and gets a little rough with her, she begins to enjoy it, strips off some of her clothes, and then proceeds to ballroom dance with the low-life criminal. While the mummy finds her dance partner to be fairly fun, she more or less falls in love at first sight upon seeing the face of his somewhat more handsome comrade (George Kuchar), who immediately reciprocates her feelings. Needless to say, this bizarre love triangle gets all the more bizarre when Dr. Koshki, who is busy sleeping like a baby, discovers that his beloved has committed the unpardonable act of emotionally betraying him like some cheap floozy.

Before leaving the castle with his criminal compatriot, Kuchar tells his new mummy mistress, "I'll be waiting out there for you," instead of just taking her with him then and there, which would have been the more sensible thing to do, or so he will soon learn as Dr. Koshki will ultimately discover his undead lover's treachery before she can attempt to escape from his revengeful wrath. Of course, like any normal girl that likes a boy and wants to impress him, the mummy princess decides to get all dolled up before she joins her lover, so she puts on a slutty skirt and some streetwalker-esque make-up. As revealed in an inter-title in regard to the mummy's love for Kuchar's character, "As if born again for a third time, the Princess prepares herself for her new love." Before meeting Kuchar outside, the princess makes the silly mistake of looking at Dr. Koshki one more last time while he is sleeping and in the process unwittingly wakes him from his slumber. As the sun causes a light to magically beam through a forest in a fashion that makes it resembles a sort of fiery star, the princess and Kuchar play and frolic gaily in the snow with one another right outside of the castle while Dr. Koshki stares angrily at them through an upstairs window while hysterically cursing at his treacherous beloved. When the princess makes the mistake of walking back inside the castle, Dr. Koshki is naturally waiting for her and he immediately begins violently slapping her in the face. Deriving a sort of vengeful sadistic glee from his violence against the woman that broke his heart, the good doctor can only laugh hysterically and point his finger at the princess like she is a freak when he notices that her face is beginning to rot. When Dr. Koshki then proceeds to laugh even more maniacally upon revealing that he has emptied all of the jars of blood in the castle, the perpetually deteriorating princess becomes enraged and begins savagely stabbing him with a large knife so that she can rejuvenate herself with his blood, but it curiously does not harm him and nil vital fluids are drawn. Indeed, in a bizarre plot twist that could happen in a Mike Kuchar flick, Dr. Koshki strips his clothes to the point where he is only wearing goofy red long underwear and then transforms into a sort of silly lycanthrope-like beast with white whiskers. Of course, things only get stranger from there, as the beast begins floating across the floor in a robotic fashion, puts on a metal helmet and is eventually beamed up to a flying saucer that is conveniently hovering above the castle in what is indubitably one of the most wonderfully implausible scenarios in Gothic horror cinema history. Indeed, as it turns out, Dr. Koshki is not just a misunderstood melancholic Gothic dandy cuckold or even a wussy werewolf, but an evil extraterrestrial with a perverse fetish for ancient undead earthling pussy. As Dr. Koshki flies into outer space in his spaceship, Kuchar helplessly watches in abject horror as his beloved deteriorates rather rapidly and eventually dies, with the only thing remaining of her once-voluptuous body being her skeleton, a lone eyeball, and some rotten gray flesh.

Sort of like a stylishly schlocky Tristan und Isolde of the 1960s NYC underground as directed by an eccentric fellow who thought he could beat Douglas Sirk at his own game in terms of assembling aesthetically melodic yet misanthropic melodramas, Born of the Wind ultimately packs an unbelievably potent psychotronic punch that demonstrates that Kuchar could fill more passion and intrigue in 20 minutes than some imitator like Nick Zedd could in one of his features like his somewhat comparable 74-minute monster movie Geek Maggot Bingo or The Freak from Suckweasel Mountain (1983). Undoubtedly what separates the films of Kuchar and his brother from the filmmakers they influenced like Zedd and John Waters is that there is genuine beauty and human emotions in their films while their celluloid disciples just rely on heavy-handed scatological humor, cheap witticisms, and a bottom-of-the-barrel trash aesthetic. Simply put, Born of the Wind is arguably the greatest and most lavish 8mm film ever made as a marvelous monstrosity of a monster melodrama that manages to reconcile Tod Browning and Ed Wood with Sirk and Josef von Sternberg, among other things. In terms of idiosyncratic mummy movies, Kuchar's film is up there with Herbert Achternbusch's absurdist arthouse comedy I Know the Way to the Hofbrauhaus (1991) and Michael Almereyda's postmodern Celtic pagan piece The Eternal (1998) aka Trance, though it is naturally a lot more accessible than the other two films as a short and wickedly bittersweet celluloid treat that seems to have infinite replay value. Of course, with its lavish low-budget high-camp decadence, pseudo-arcane mystical themes, and all-star underground cast that includes Bob Cowan, Donna Kerness, and George Kuchar in the lead roles, Kuchar's short is unequivocally a worthy predecessor to the director's magnum opus Sins of the Fleshapoids (1965). An endlessly entralling lo-fi micro-epic packed with an elegant aesthetic decadence that is comparable to any early Werner Schroeter flick and with a refined sense of cinema literacy that makes the films of Quentin Tarantino seem like the autistic postmodern ramblings of a negrophilic preteen megalomaniac that is addicted to Ritalin, Born of the Wind certainly deserves a special place in cinema history in some dark and wet corner, not least of all because it proves that you can make a timeless genre-schizophrenic Gothic horror-romance in your stern Ukrainian mother's cramped apartment.

SINS OF THE FLESHAPOIDS

Mike Kuchar (1965)

If a young Werner Schroeter got possessed by the ghost of Douglas Sirk's dead Nazi son and attempted to direct a lo-fi loose mutated reworking of both Ridley Scott's classic Philip K. Dick adaptation Blade Runner (1982) and Fellini Satyricon (1969) into a single film on a budget of a mere thousand dollars and starring a motley crew of most homely and swarthy Hebrews, it might begin to describe Mike Kuchar's legendary kaleidoscopic underground magnum opus Sins of the Fleshapoids (1965), which features a curious hodgepodge of neo-classical, pop art, Marvel comic, and kitsch aesthetics as a truly modern science fiction flick that managed to unwittingly reinvent the genre in a fashion that would make it seem quite hip and chic as opposed to an escapist fantasy realm for autistic virginal fanboys. Apparently strangely largely influenced by the director's then-obsession with Hollywood Hercules and Tarzan movies (which is apparent in Kuchar's casting of a couple muscular and not-so-muscular men sporting loincloths and excess body hair) but also avant-garde works like Kenneth Anger's classic Crowleyite flick Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954), Kuchar's film was amazingly made without the benefit of a script and partially shot in the director's bedroom, which he transferred into a sort of neo-Grecian pleasure-pad one evening after eating dinner. Indeed, probably the most absurdly aesthetically decadent high-camp flick film that was ever shot in a NYC apartment aside from possibly queer photographer James Bidgood's pseudonymously directed cocksucker cult classic Pink Narcissus (1971), the semi-tragic sci-fi-melodrama hybrid was 'co-penned' by the director's somewhat more prolific twin brother George Kuchar, who incidentally directed his own masterpiece Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966) around the same time period not long after brother Mike had quit their final collaboration Corruption of the Damned (1965) in the middle of production. After quitting Corruption of the Damned (which he credits his brother for directing 80% of), Kuchar's first solo film after ending his co-directing collaboration with his brother George was the darkly romantic and equally decadent 8mm horror-sci-fi-melodrama hybrid Born Of The Wind (1964), which feels like a fairly admirable warm-up for what would ultimately be regarded by most people, including the director himself, as his masterpiece. Notably, John 'The Pope of Trash' Waters once stated regarding the influence of the Kuchar brothers' two masterpieces, "George and Mike Kuchar's films were my first inspiration. George's HOLD ME WHILE I'M NAKED, Mike's SINS OF THE FLESHAPOIDS – these were the pivotal films of my youth, bigger influences than Warhol, Kenneth Anger, and even THE WIZARD OF OZ." While I am not sure that I agree that Hold Me While I'm Naked is George's greatest work, Sins of the Fleshapoids is certainly Mike at his most maniacally masterful, as a bizarrely beauteous celluloid orgasm that features barrage of post-bohemian Bacchanalian bathos and that was directed by a perennial 'amateur' auteur when he was at the height of his artistic powers.

Undoubtedly what I found more intriguing about Kuchar's sci-fi micro-epic in comparison to the pre-Polyester (1981) films of John Waters is that it is not drenched in a tidal wave of pathologically witty irony or a proudly tasteless 'trash for trash's sake' spirit, thus making for what I say as a innately more honest and authentic cinematic work that dares to attempt to achieve cinematic beauty on a mere beggar's budget (it should be noted that Kuchar was largely against writing a script because he was interested in examining his own subconscious). Certainly while watching Sins of the Fleshapoids, I got the sense that Kuchar is a crypto-misanthrope who sees his own fellow homos as unscrupulous conman and whores, women as conniving cunts who will marry a man they do not love for his money while keeping a more sexually preferable lover on the side, and romance as a deadly dangerous delusion that compels people to lie, cheat, steal and kill, among other things unsavory things that are quite timeless among human beings. In other words, Kuchar's film can be seen as a sort of anti-Terminator in terms of both spirit and aesthetics, as a campy genre-molesting avant-garde piece where machine is morally superior to man that ultimately manages to do the seemingly impossible by siring great cinematic pulchritude and intrigue out of cynicism and decadence. Set a million years in the future in a dystopian world after a nuclear holocaust that was responsible for wiping out most humans and civilization where eponymous humanoid-like robots that were created by scientists as human servants have developed genuine human emotions like love and hate as well as purer and more innocent form of love and affection than real humans, who have degenerated to a decidedly decadent Satyricon-esque state as lazy and pacifistic hedonists who live simply to eat and fuck and lack the testicular fortitude for war, Kuchar's pleasantly ridiculous robot romance features both a physical and spiritual robo-rebellion where love conquers all in the end, just not for humans, who are so hopelessly forsaken that it would be nothing short of an act of gracious mercy to exterminate them all from the entire planet so that the androids can prosper and create a more magical world.

Both narrated by and starring Kuchar superstar Bob Cowan (who also created the bizarre musical score and who probably could be described as the film's sort of secondary auteur due to his crucial artistic contribution to the project) in the lead role as a tragically spastic android named 'Xar'—a hardly handsome and somewhat heavyset male machine that sports a André the Giant-esque toga and a goofy plastic helmet that resembles the fairly aesthetically displeasing ones worn by the Soviet Red Army during the Second World War—Sins of the Fleshapoids begins with a series of fairly memorable hand drawn credits that were created by the director with crayons and scrapbook paper, thus giving the viewer the impression that they are about to endure a film that is as insanelly idiosyncratic as it is shamelessly minimalistic. After declaring, "The time...is a million years in the future” in a somewhat histrionic fashion (somewhat humorously, Cowan later felt embarrassed by his narration, or as he states in the doc It Came from Kuchar (2009), “Well I was supposed to be a robot and then of course I did the narration, which makes me wince a bit when I hear it now. It’s over-the-top.”), the narrator describes Xar’s artificially engineered race, stating in a sort of pleasantly putrid pseudo-poetic fashion, “The Fleshapoids are mechanical men. They are servants of the human race who obeys the human’s every demand. These robots are called ‘Fleshapoids’ because their shells resemble human flesh. The synthetic flesh developed by the top scientists of the world who devoted their lives to the creation of these perfect mechanical slaves.” Xar is the personal property of a less than beautiful middle-aged broad (played by Kuchar superstar Gina Zuckerman, who had apparently had a fetish-based stipulation that any film she appeared in had to have a scene where a man ripped her clothes off) of the grotesquely self-absorbed and decadent sort who sits around all day eating fruit in a lackluster fashion and undressing in front of her two Fleshapoids, as if she gets an exhibitionistic kick out of displaying her nearly ancient flesh for manmade machines that do not seem to have cocks (as revealed later in the film, the robots have sex by shooting electricity into one another’s fingertips). While it is somewhat hard to tell since he almost always has a robotic expression on his perennially glacial face, Xar certainly seems less than impressed when his owner disrobes and is nothing less than horrified when she later attempts to seduce him.

Whilst an android that moves around in a ridiculously robotic fashion as if he was the victim of being routinely gang-raped by a band of Mexican dipsomaniac bikers, Xar is somewhat sensitive and does have strong humanlike emotions that he is having an increasingly hard time controlling, or as the narrator hypermelodramatically narrates regarding the strange evolutionary condition that has plagued the tin souls of the protagonist’s robot kind, “The Fleshapoids have now been in existence for 20,000 years. If all the humans had been destroyed by the Great War, they would have been the only creatures left on earth. The earth would have been inhabited by mechanical replicas of the humans who built them. In those few thousands of years when the earth was rebuilding itself and the human race had not yet begun to re-multiply after the Great War, the Fleshapoids were completely alone in the wild of the natural world. In that time, a strange thing happened. Some of them developed senses. They began to react to evolution and environment just as the minute organisms did a billion years ago. Xar was one of these Fleshapoids who had become a victim of these changes. Xar no longer wanted to obey the humans; not when he himself had tasted the world of emotions; not when he too had experienced the one force that makes men emperors of the universe: love. For today will be the day that the Fleshapoids sinned.” Indeed, while admiring himself in a mirror like the tragic figure of Narcissus from ancient Greek mythology, Xar’s owner embarrasses him by walking in on him, thus causing the robotic protagonist to run away from his master and turn in the opposite direction in shame. When his owner sternly states “Turn and face me” (which, like all the dialogue in the film, is absurdly expressed in comic-book-like cartoon bubbles) as if she plans to fuck him and Xar refuses to comply out of shame and disgust, things take an ugly turn for the worse. At this point, Xar’s owners whips out a pot of water and aggressively declares, “Obey me, or I’ll wet you and make you rust!!,” thus inspiring the protagonist to defend himself in a most extreme fashion. After grabbing the pot from her hand and tearing off her dress, Xar is forced to murder his owner by thrashing her to the ground with his mighty mechanical fist after she once again dares to attempt to rust him via H₂O. Naturally, after killing his master and being successful in his one-android robot rebellion, Xar is free to do what he likes and lucky he has a beloved damsel in distress of sorts to save.

Not unlike Xar, ravishing robo-girl Melenka (German diva Maren Thomas of The Secret of Wendel Samson (1966) and Color Me Shameless (1967), who apparently would sometimes suffer mental breakdowns on Kuchar’s film sets and was once a Playboy bunny) is an emotionally evolved Fleshapoid that has developed the ability to feel human emotions and she loves the protagonist, but unfortunately she is the personal slave of an evil and ambiguously gay aristocrat named Prince Gianbeno (George Kuchar). Luckily, Prince Gianbeno’s futuristic castle is fairly close to Xar’s dead owner’s less than humble abode, so it does not take long for the protagonist to get to his beloved, though he does not have any clue of the histrionic horrors that await him inside the decadent royal estate. Of course, as can be expected, Prince Gianbeno has problems of his own, as he might be a wickedly depraved blueblood bastard who smacks food out of Melenka’s arm and kicks her to the ground from the luxury of his throne after she meekly attempts to serve him dinner, but he is also married to a lecherous lady with a very voluptuous body named Princess Vivianna (Kuchar superstar Donna Kerness of Born of the Wind (1964) and The Craven Sluck (1967)) who has cuckolded him by starting a lurid love affair with a swarthy beefcake boy named Ernie (ex-Marine Julius Middleman). As the narrator declares regarding the big bosomed Princess, “Living off her husband’s money and hospitality, she now had everything. For Vivianna had, too, found love. Together with Ernie, they vowed to share eternity together,” but little does she realize that her beefy beau is a conspiring crypto-cocksucker of sorts who, not unlike Montgomery Cliff’s rather dapper character in William Wyler’s classic melodrama The Heiress (1949), thinks like an evil woman and is really just after her riches. Indeed, whereas the Fleshapoids only know true love and affection, the humans are compulsively cunning creatures that use love as a tool of treacherous deceit, with hairy beefcake Ernie being a far from earnest lover.

While Princess Vivianna loves admiring herself in a portable mirror while wearing nothing aside from sunflower flower petals over her nipples and a fig leaf over her pussy, her misleadingly muscular loverboy Ernie enjoys eating Wise brand potato chips and candy bars while receiving back massages from super faggy twink-like Fleshapoids servants, among various other strange activities that would make most sane straight men cringe in abject disgust. When they are lying together in bed, Vivianna vies for Ernie's attention and affection by giving him pieces of gold jewelry that were given to her by her horrendous hubby. As Xar begins breaking into the castle, Vivianna and Ernie are in the middle of foreplay, but the carnal session is abruptly aborted before the real fun begins when the Princess realizes that she has to meet her sinisterly effete husband downstairs for dinner. Before going downstairs, Vivianna curiously orders two Fleshapoids to service Ernie by bathing and feeding him like a baby, thus revealing that she might be aware that her lover is an aberrosexual of sorts who prefers hard cocks to warm cunts. Meanwhile, Xar lurks through Gianbeno's distinctly decadently decorated castle and eventually finds his lover Melenka sitting on the Prince's throne where he declares to her, "We are Robots...yet we are in love." Melenka must be extra flattered in regard to the sacrifice Xar has made for her by killing his master and coming to see her because says to him, "Let us now make love" and then the two proceed to make love by mutually zapping electricity into one another's hands via their fingertips. As Xar and Melenka continue to passionately penetrate one another with erotic electricity while Ernie receives an extra sensual massage from two male Fleshapoids in the upstairs wing of the castle, Vivianna eats sauerkraut with Prince Gianbeno and attempts to keep up the preposterous charade that she actually loves him and is not harboring and humping a man behind his back in his own home, but things get somewhat awkward when the routinely clumsy Princess accidentally spills a glass of water on her husband after he requests that she put out a candle.

When the Prince asks Vivianna where her gold necklace is and she mundanely replies that she left it upstairs, Gianbeno insists on fetching it for her and begins making his way up the steps even though his wife pleads that she can get it herself. Rather revealingly, the debauched aristocrat has a sadistic smile on his face as he treads up the stairs, thus revealing that he is well aware that his wifey has cuckolded him and that he cannot wait to rub it in her face that he knows about her extramarital treachery. Determined to be with her boy toy for eternity, Vivianna chases after Gianbeno and pushes him down the stairs, thus knocking the Prince unconscious. Hoping to flee the castle with her beau before her husband awakes from his slumber, Vivianna immediately runs back to Ernie and yells to him, "We must run away, my husband knows about us!," but the seemingly half-brain-dead male whore does not exactly act like he is hard pressed for time and even has aristocratic sugar-momma dress him as if it is too much of a hassle for him to clothe himself. Indeed, after dressing Ernie in a traditional American football uniform (!), including pads, Vivianna puts a crown of flowers on top of her beau's NFL helmet and the two begin heading out of the castle. Of course, being a third rate Don Juan with a dubious sexual persuasion, Ernie has his mind on money and tells Vivianna "Take your jewels" but she accidentally drops the jewelry box while attempting to grab it, thus causing priceless gold to fly all over the place. While Vivianna acts like it is no big deal and attempts to get Ernie to leave immediately with her without the gold because they clearly do not have time to fiddle around with petty material objects when their lives and love affair are at stake, the greedy crypto-gay beefcake boy wastes no time scooping up the jewels, thereupon causing the Princess to finally come to the realization that her beau has always been after her riches and that he probably does not even love her. At this point, Vivianna decides to ask Ernie, "Who do you love?,...me or my jewels?" and naturally she is startled when he moronically replies, "BOTH!" Although they have no time to waste, Vivianna becomes hysterical and attempts to fuck Ernie right then and there while he is gathering the jewels and is not too happy when her lover violently pushes her to the ground like a worthless piece of trash. Completely heartbroken, the Princess runs to a corner of the room, pulls out a dagger that she has hidden in her bra, points the blade of the weapon at her heart, and then declares to Ernie, "If you leave me...I'll kill myself," but he is not at all impressed and merely rhetorically asks "Is that a promise?" and then walks away. Clearly feeling like she has been stabbed in the heart, Vivianna charges Ernie from behind and quite fittingly literally stabs him in the back with the dagger, thus killing him instantly. Although not depicted, one can only assume Vivianna has no choice but to subsequently kill herself as a desperate woman that has lost her great love and probably her great fortune.

Upon finally regaining consciousness, Prince Gianbeno goes looking around the house for Vivianna but instead finds his Fleshapoid servant Melenka making electric love with Xar, which he finds quite unsettling. Indeed, as the narrator states regarding the Prince's shock, "It was incredible for Gianbeno to understand how two robots could feel affection for one another. 'It's against nature,' he screamed. 'Against the laws of the universe...That bodies made out of nuts and bolts could feel the pangs of love in their aluminum hearts. This would upset the very foundation of life itself. What would become of the human race if these two lifeforces meet? War? Slavery? This time, the human being the slave. An unknown hideous force thus as this must be removed from the face of the earth in shame. Gianbeno must disconnect them.'" From there, Gianbeno proceeds to 'disconnect' Melenka by opening her dress and fiddling with a device near her robo-boob that causes her entire body to instantly shutdown. Not willing to tolerate a pansy prince who has messed with his lover's mechanical mammary glands, Xar violently slams Gianbeno to the ground and then proceeds to turn Melenka back on. After the narrator pseudo-moralistically declares, "Man has created this new race of creatures. Now he must pay the punishment and vengeance they set upon him," Xar grabs Gianbeno's hand and declares "I'm negative" while Melenka grabs his other hand and declares "I'm positive.” From there, the two android lovers prove that opposites truly attract by simultaneously frying the Prince to death with red rays of electricity that is so powerfully electrifying that the only thing left of Gianbeno when they are done is his charred skull. While the two robots prove that love conquers all in their seemingly effortless liquidation of the Prince, Melenka subsequently cries “S-S-Something is wrong” while staring at Gianbeno’s skull and then proceeds to fall to the floor while moaning hysterically with pain. While initially seeming like the film might end on an unhappy note, things become what auteur Kuchar once described as “so preposterously cute” when a cuddly baby robot emerges from between Melenka’s legs, thus ushering in what is probably the world’s first android baby birth.

While financed solely with money Mike Kuchar earned while working as a photo retoucher, Sins of the Fleshapoids was such a relatively big success for an underground movie upon its release that the director earned enough in royalties that he was able to pursue his dream of not having to work a ‘real’ nine-to-five job for about six years (though it should be noted that, like his twin brother, Kuchar lived fairly modestly). With Kenneth Anger’s Scorpio Rising (1964) and Andy Warhol and Paul Morrissey’s Chelsea Girls (1966), Kuchar’s magnum opus is regarded as one of the three most influential American underground films of the 1960s and it was even argued by avant-garde gatekeeper Jonas Mekas that Slavic-blooded frog skirt-chaser Roger Vadim ripped off the film with his mainstream sci-fi sexploitation flick Barbarella (1968) starring neo-bolshevik bimbo Jane Fonda due to both films featuring a scene where characters have sex via their hands. Notably, when asked by Jack Stevenson about the purported influence of his film on Vadim’s flick, Kuchar dismissively replied in a somewhat humorous fashion, “You’re referring to the smoking fingertips in BARBARELLA, when the actors hands touch in mock lovemaking, but I had sparks of lightning shooting out of the fingers – not smoke – when the robots make love in SINS. If Vadim’s screenwriters did lift ideas from my film, I can’t understand why they would pass up on the idea of using comic book “thought bubbles” floating above the actors when they are required to think.” Thankfully, in the same interview, Kuchar reveals denies the idea of insufferable dyke Hebrewess Susan Sontag’s obscenely overrated 1964 essay Notes on Camp influencing his work, remarking, “I have never read ‘Notes on Camp’. My own definition of the word is this: You pitch your tent (camera and crew) in an established theme park. In the case of SINS OF THE FLESHAPOIDS, we pitched our tent on sci-fi comic book territory and the Hollywood style of moviemaking. Then you go on holiday with the established form, consciously accentuating the artificiality inherent in the styles and techniques they used to manipulate the audience. Thus the soundtrack music becomes loud and obvious, make-up is over-applied or blatantly misapplied, and the actors are obviously ‘acting’, or even better, they can’t act at all!...It’s a sort of vandalism, a form of good natured sabotage.” Indeed, the difference between Kuchar's films and the completely forgotten cinematic works of Sontag is that the former were the expression of a rich and eccentric soul who made films because he loved making films while the latter were the product of a soulless wench with an affinity prosaic and pedantic intellectual masturbation, hence what differentiates the Sins of the Fleshapoids director and his brother from most of the Structural filmmakers that were associated with the 1960s American underground.

Personally, I see 'camp' as a form of 'good natured rape,' with Sins of the Fleshapoids feeling like the natural result of Aubrey Beardsley pillaging every single wet orifice of Stanley Kubrick's Spartacus (1960). Indeed, I would be lying if I did not admit that the scorching warm colors of Kuchar's made me feel in the mood for lurid electric love, albeit not the sort involving sparks of lightning shooting out of fingers. While some might refer to Kuchar's magnum opus as keenly kitschy trash cinema, there is undoubtedly a strange quasi-aristocratic spirit to Sins of the Fleshapoids, even if it is a debauched one, so it should be no surprise that Kuchar also stated in his interview with Stevenson regarding his influences, "Gregory Markopoulos... he was an inspiration. If there is such a notion as "Gay Pride" – he was it! You don't need to flaunt it when you've got the regal poise and golden ideals of this guy. He was memorable, an impeccable aristocrat who dined at the Automat (an inexpensive, now extinct, cafeteria where you put nickels into a slot to receive plates of hot food from behind glass doors). Had he lived in another age, Gregory would have been perfectly at home in a powdered wig and buckled shoes." While Kuchar never directed a film as elegant and meticulously constructed as Markopoulos' avant-garde masterpiece Twice a Man (1964), Sins of the Fleshapoids unequivocally proves that he is a celluloid alchemist as a rare filmmaker that could turn shit into gold. Indeed, maybe it is because I associate such Hollywood sci-fi flicks with fat ugly dorks that suffer from Asperger syndrome, but I would much rather re-watch Kuchar's film over Planet of the Apes (1968), any of the Star War films, David Lynch's Dune (1984), or virtually any other big budget science fiction flick any day. Of course, Sins of the Fleshapoids has about as much to do with science fiction cinema as Anger's Scorpio Rising has to do with teen rebel biker flicks and John Waters' Desperate Living (1977) has to do with classic Disney fairytale movies, hence its uniquely undying charm as classic piece of American camp that has never and can never be properly imitated or duplicated, even by queer filmmakers like Rosa von Praunheim (who considered the Kuchar brothers to be one of his main influences and even hired Mike to be the cinematographer for a couple of his films). If you're a happy-go-lucky misanthrope like me and can fathom a world where androids are more morally sound than the majority of humanity, you will probably not find a film that is more delectably decadent and kitschy yet cultivated than Sins of the Fleshapoids which, in its unflattering depiction of a pathologically cosmopolitan dystopian society that is plagued by perverse hedonism and is too impotent for far, is the 1960s underground's equivalent to John Boorman's cult classic Zardoz (1974), albeit all the more otherworldly and patently preternatural.

THE SECRET OF WENDEL SAMSON

Back in the good old days before being gay turned into a sort of highly coveted “good guy badge,” it was not uncommon for queer filmmakers to direct at least one highly personal film about homo neuroticism and coming out of the closet. Indeed, from Curtis Harrington’s Fragment of Seeking (1946) to Kenneth Anger’s Fireworks (1947) to Gregory J. Markopoulos’s Twice a Man (1964) to Andy Milligan’s Vapors (1965) to David Blyth’s Circadian Rhythms (1976) to Werner Schroeter’s Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King to William E. Jones’ Massillon (1991) to Todd Verow’s Anonymous (2004), there is no shortage of highly idiosyncratic and largely hermetic self-loathing fag flicks that demonstrate that gay men are among the most perennially lonely, pathologically paranoid, and intricately neurotic people around, but few of these films are as bafflingly bizarre and unnervingly dejecting as the 33-minute featurette The Secret of Wendel Samson (1966) directed by Mike Kuchar (Born of the Wind, Sins of the Fleshapoids) who, despite later making a living creating homoerotic illustrations and paintings of the somewhat Tom of Finland style sort, typically refrained from including overtly homophile content in his early pre-video films (though his later shot-on-video efforts, like Statue In The Park (1993) starring underground cartoonist Mike Diana, are very, very gay). Out of the half a dozen or so Kuchar films I have seen, none is more grueling, discombobulating, paranoia-inducing, and overtly avant-garde than his self-loathing sod flick, so it should be no surprise that the director credits Orson Welles’ Franz Kafka adaptation The Trial (1962) aka Le procès starring Anthony Perkins for inspiration. Just like Perkins’ classic character in Welles’ masterpiece, the protagonist of Kuchar’s film is a terribly tortured lost soul with a crippling persecution complex that feels he is incessantly being followed and lives in a perpetual metaphysical nightmare without end. Starring somewhat popular redheaded pop artist Red Grooms (who himself directed a couple of films around the same time, including Shoot the Moon (1962) and Fat Feet (1966)) as the eponymous lead as a mentally perturbed poof painter who regularly engages in sex with anonymous strangers because he is afraid of being in a committed gay relationship and who is terribly guilt-ridden because his female friend has fallen in love with him and wants to jump his bones, The Secret of Wendel Samson is a semi-surreal work that is not all that aesthetically different from various artsy fartsy porno and sexploitation films from around the same time, including the Amero brothers’ psychedelic fuck flick Bacchanale (1971) and Chuck Vincent’s Voices of Desire (1972), as an ominously oneiric psychosexual psychodrama of the hallucinatory sort that manages to do the seemingly impossible by making NYC seem like one big foreboding ghost town where only pathetic perverts and phantoms dwell. A film that unequivocally demonstrates that, at least for some people, there is nothing 'gay' about being gay, Kuchar's exceedingly embarrassing work in paranoiac poof excess ultimately demonstrates that he was not less haunted by his homosexuality than his twin brother George Kuchar, whose early masterpieces like Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966) and Eclipse of the Sun Virgin (1967) have earned him the reputation of being the more hopelessly self-loathing and neurotic of the two very strange Slavic-American sodomite siblings.

As referenced in the book Desperate Visions: The Films of John Waters & the Kuchar Brothers (1996) by Jack Stevenson, Kuchar once stated regarding the titular character of his film, "Wendel Samson is a Universe in himself, but perhaps even more complex. The cosmic bubble is governed by the forces of electrical magnetic inertia. He is governed by a need Unstable. A hunger to understand the impossible. Himself maybe. A quest to find the equation to happiness in a cosmic structure where happiness is not a physical property. He is a star in a cluster of stars. A solar speck in the speckled nebula of souls. A silent phantom radiating in the heavens of shining phantoms. Floating on the islands within islands, in a bubble, fifty million light years curved." Hilariously, Kuchar would later state of the quote in an audio commentary track that it was something he wrote as a "flamboyant youngster. It's certainly flowery... That's certainly a mouthful of flowery stuff." Judging merely by the film, I can only assume that hallucinogenic substances most have compounded his paranoia and propensity for poetry, as The Secret of Wendel Samson ultimately feels like a 'head film' for homos, albeit a timeless one that manages to make the internal torment associated with being a closeted homosexual accessible to even the most flagrant of fag-bashers, so long as they appreciate trippy art films where the 'bad trip' is merely a state of mind. The genesis of the film is a result of star Red Grooms approaching Kuchar and offering to star in one of his movies. Beginning with the idea of an allegorical scene featuring Grooms stuck in a gigantic spiderweb, Kuchar later decided to create a film about a protagonist that is literally "tangled up in psychological problems" and ultimately assembled what is indubitably his most incriminating, pathetic, and psychoautobiographical work to date.

Beginning with a close-up shot of the dejected, melancholy face of protagonist Wendel Samson (Red Grooms) and then a credit scene sequence where the inter-titles are superimposed over a dilapidated brick wall, the film then captivates the viewer with an abrupt dream-sequence of the character tangled in a gigantic spiderweb, which is notably also wrapped around his genitals. From there, we see a shot of Wendel meekly standing behind a woman who is facing the opposite direction and is discernibly distressed. The woman's name is Margret (played by Mimi Gross, who is the daughter of fairly famous Zionist sculptor Chaim Gross, whose apartment acted as one of the sets for the film and who Kuchar and his brother apparently found to be quite detestable) and she is in love with wimp Wendel, who does not reciprocate her feelings because he's a full-blown shit-stabber and he feels terribly guilty about this fact. After what Kuchar once described as the film's "pictorial overture," the viewer is exposed to various bizarre aspects of Wendel's particularly pathetic life, including the fact that he is being constantly followed by two very strange men (played by George Kuchar and Bob Cowan, with the latter of whom being responsible for the film's highly complimentary paranoid beatnik noise score) and that he enjoys having random sex with strange men that he finds on the street. Despite being a wide receiver on the pink team, Wendel also seems to loathe his fellow fags as hinted in a scene where he dumps his queen-ish gay lover because he cannot bear listening to him to talk incessantly about gossip, redecorating, and fancy vacations to exotic places where they can presumably pay to have sex with young Asian or Latino boys. Indeed, when Wendel's boyfriend, who is an ultra cultivated cocksucker who has primitive African tribal art hanging over his apartment walls, proceeds to bitch and moan about things like having to find someone to watch their cat when they are on vacation in Liberia (?!), the protagonist dumps him by simply walking out the front door while he's still talking. Of course, Wendel is no less socially inept when it comes to his female friend Margret, who has an undying craving for cock but somehow does not realize that her fire-crotched male BFF is a full-fledged nancy boy who cannot bother to swing both ways.

As a gay man that is trying to avoid the awkward situation of being seduced by a sexually starved straight woman of the fairly homely looking sort, Wendel is always trying to find ways to avoid hanging out with Margret and even manages to get out of going to a party with her by stating, "I promised myself I was going to put in new shutters in the kitchen." Unfortunately for Wendel, Margret decides to show up at his apartment unannounced on the night of the party and rubs his lies in his face by remarking, "I see you haven't put up the new shutters in the kitchen yet," to which he meekly replies after pausing for a moment, "Oh, you know how easy it is to not do anything." At this point, Wendel thinks to himself regarding Margret, "Something tells me she's here for more than a chitchat visit," and then proceeds to spy on his female friend via a keyhole while she is in the bathroom. As is quite apparent to both Wendel and the viewer, Margret has come to the protagonist's apartment to both declare her love for him and to seduce him but of course she ultimately fails to get what she wants. While awkwardly sitting next to one another on a bed, Margret asks Wendel about his sex life and remarks, "I wonder how you make as a lover," but of course the protagonist is too petrified to reveal to her his sexual persuasion and instead has an absurd daydream where he imagines himself romantically wining and dining a somewhat hot babe and then begins making love to her on a leopard print rug. After Wendel stops daydreaming, he begins eating food like a slob on his bed and is eventually given an ultimatum from Margret, who is desperate for the protagonist's fiery dick. After declaring her to love him and begging him to fuck her after he does all he can to sit as far as he can away from her in his tiny bedroom, Margret states to Wendel, "Wendel, tell me you love me...or kick me out...but make up your mind NOW. Wendel, I can't stand this anymore." Of course, Wendel lacks the testicular fortitude to answer Margret directly, but thankfully he eventually gets his feelings across.

Instead of answering Margret, the scene cuts to Wendel being woken up in his bed by the two strange men that have been following him. At this point, Wendel must embrace his inner homosexual Übermensch or continue to live a pathetic life of guilt and paranoia. Indeed, the two strange men force Wendel to go with them like they are some sort of gay-bashing ghosts who have been assigned by a super holy heterosexual god to convert him to heterosexuality and ultimately bring the protagonist to a building where he is confronted by ten very different people, including a young sailor, a homely nurse, and a middle-aged blonde bombshell (Floraine Connors of Kuchar's The Craven Sluck (1967) and Tales of the Bronx (1970)), the latter of which pulls out a sort of futuristic laser gun on him and demands that he have sex with her. When Wendel refuses to fuck the old blonde boot and instead begins brutally slapping and beating her, the two strange men make him stand facing the wall and then everyone takes out a pistol and proceeds to execute the protagonist with a storm of bullets comparable to the ending of Bonnie and Clyde (1967) where the eponymous outlaw lovers are ambushed by the cops. Miraculously, despite being shot countless times, Wendel is not only unharmed by the execution but also manages to transform into a sort of sod Superman (indeed, sound clips and quotes from Superman are juxtaposed with this scene) and then makes a swift escape, but not before laughing manically in the faces of his tormentors in an allegorical scene that is surely symbolic of the protagonist's unwavering acceptance of his own homosexuality. In the end, Wendel and Margret finally say their goodbyes to one another, with the latter finally accepting the fact that her beloved redheaded friend is a flaming fag who has no use for needy Jewish American princesses.

Surely infinitely more brave, convincing, and intriguing than Ang Lee's Brokeback Mountain (2005), Tom Ford's A Single Man (2009) and just about any other Hollywood film that attempts to portray poof pathos and pangs, The Secret of Wendel Samson is really an enlightening aesthetic example as to why it is truly offensive when contemporary propagandists and special interests groups have the gall to complain about persecution and inequality, not to mention the fact that the film unwittingly reveals that so-called 'gay marriage' is a somewhat oxymoronic concept that ignores that homosexuality is largely a 'fetish' and compulsion that is solely based on sex and especially not lifelong commitment or reproduction, which is after all the point of matrimony. Of course, the film also unwittingly reveals that, at least as far as instincts are concerned, homosexuality is certainly not a choice that any sane person would make, but a sort of carnal curse that marginalizes the gay individual from the rest of society, hence why an eclectic group of people of all ages and both genders are involved in the firing squad style (pseudo)execution of the titular character as they are symbolic of the general public as a whole. Notably, in the end, the protagonist resolves his situation by saying farewell to his female friend in a scenario where the character finally acknowledges that he is all on his own and will never be a truly accepted member of normal heterosexual society in any meaningful way, hence the abject absurdity of the fallacy based concept of so-called 'sexual equality,' for the homo will always be an outsider no matter what MTV or the double bastard mulatto political pimp President of the United States tells us. Indeed, certainly no one could watch The Secret of Wendel Samson without coming to the natural conclusion that being a sod seriously sucks, even if you are one of those very rare individuals that has the special benefit of having a fellow fag twin like Kuchar. While certainly a genre-defying work that is easily Kuchar's most overtly avant-garde oriented effort to date, I think the film would be best described as a hallucinatory piece of experimental homo horror that is like the Carnival of Souls of the American queer avant-garde underground as a vaguely quasi-Cocteauian psychodrama that depicts the struggle of being a shit-stabber without being pedantic, patronizing, pretentious, and/or preposterous like so many other similarly themed works. Notably, the director's brother George Kuchar also directed a film about a woman that falls in love with a fag entitled Pagan Rhapsody (1970), which plays out very differently from The Secret of Wendel Samson in that the gay male lead actually manages to have sex with a woman but the film ends tragicomedically when the protagonist vomits as a result of his heterosexual experience and his lover subsequently slips on the barf and dies. A somewhat less personal and more genre-obsessed filmmaker than his brother, Kuchar may have had his greatest achievement with his brilliantly ludicrous lo-fi sci-fi anti-epic Sins of the Fleshapoids (1965), but The Secret of Wendel Samson is certainly the film to see if you want to discover the curious misfit of a man behind the camera.

THE CRAVEN SLUCK

Mike Kuchar (1967)

Naturally, as a result of my recently acquired obsession with the films of George Kuchar, I decided it was about time that I dig through the somewhat less impressive oeuvre of the filmmaker's less prolific but seemingly all the more gay twin brother Mike Kuchar, whose 20-minute darkly comedic sci-fi-melodrama hybrid The Craven Sluck (1967) aka Madonna seemed like a worthy introduction to his films, especially since it stars his pathologically dorky sibling in the outstandingly against-type role of an abusive womanizer who exploits the undying loneliness of an over-the-hill blonde bombshell who is suicidal due to the fact that her less than handsome workaholic hubby no longer wants to acknowledge her existence, let alone hump her the way she needs to be humped. What I have immediately discovered upon watching a couple of Mike Kuchar's films is that he is a somewhat more genre conscious and slightly less personal filmmaker than his twin, whose largely autobiographical auteurist works oftentimes reek of sardonic self-loathing and self-destructive obsession. While the brothers initially co-directed amorously appealingly titled works like I Was a Teenage Rumpot (1960) and Pussy on a Hot Tin Roof (1961) together as teens and were soon lovingly described as "the Mozarts of 8mm Cinema" (in fact, avant-garde gatekeeper Jonas Mekas once described their work in The Village Voice as, "Pop Cinema at its best pop"), the two eventually began directing their own individual auteur pieces when they graduated from using consumer grade 8mm to 16mm film stock after Mike bought a 16mm camera, or as George states in the documentary It Came From Kuchar (2009) directed by Jennifer M. Kroot in regard to their failed collaboration on Corruption of the Damned (1965) and their subsequent parting of ways as a twin directing team, "He [Mike] bought a Bolex and we launched our career[s]. The first picture was CORRUPTION OF THE DAMNED. That was a big 16mm movie. Then Mike abandoned that because he was more interested in Hercules type movies and I was left with the CORRUPTION OF THE DAMNED and I finished that. And that was our first 16mm film." Incidentally, the first films that both brothers created after going their separate ways as filmmakers were also the films that would be regarded as their greatest masterpieces, with George directing the semi-autobiographical self-reflexive experimental melodrama Hold Me While I'm Naked (1966) and Mike directing the ultra lo-fi sci-fi micro-epic Sins of the Fleshapoids (1965). Despite directing their own individual films, George would continue to be an important ingredient in Mike's cinematic works as the main leading man of most of his brother's films. Undoubtedly, what is somewhat ingenious about The Craven Sluck is that Mike managed to get his brother George—a hopelessly neurotic homo who had about as masculine charm and charisma as a plastic pink flamingo lawn ornament—to pull off the seemingly unlikely role of a portraying a charismatic lowlife beatnik alpha-male that manages to con various strange beautiful (and not-so-beautiful women) into falling madly in love with him despite the fact that he is married to a manly pill-popping cripple. A playfully degenerate piece of eccentric extramarital excess where a big bosomed blonde that looks somewhat like a poor man's cross Jayne Mansfield and Anita Ekberg learns the hard way that carnal crimes do not pay, especially when cheating on your husband with a debauched beatnik bastard with a Beatles-esque mop-top, Kuchar's little film ultimately makes a major mockery out of the once-timeless institution of marriage, heterosexual monogamy, and romance in a fashion that can be appreciated by any man, be they are hetero or homo, who has ever had to deal with the problems associated with lovelorn female hysteria. In other words, Kuchar seems to have made The Craven Sluck as a means to brag about the fact that he, as a proud poof, does not have to deal with the problems that bored and/or whimsical dames cause.

Instead of opening with proper credits that involve inter-titles appearing on the screen (apparently, Kuchar assembled the film in a hasty fashion so that he could finish it in time so that it could play at a gay film festival), The Craven Sluck begins with salacious publicity shots of female lead/'glamour puss' Floraine Connors juxtaposed with an off-screen narrator (Bob Cowan, who also portrays two of the characters) orally reciting the credits in a goofy fashion (for example, a pin-up photo of the female lead is juxtaposed with the narrator stating, "Also starring the extremely lovely and talented Bob Cowan, not pictured here"). Protagonist Adele (Floraine Connors) has been married to her sub-average-looking husband Brunswick (Bob Cowan) for seven years and their once apparently steamy love affair has stagnated so drastically that the latter is more interested in reading The Wall Street Journal than looking at his wanton wifey's rather large tits, which are fairly hard to not notice. As Adele somewhat hysterically thinks to herself while her hubby ignores her as the two sit at their kitchen table, "He makes me ashamed of my torso and ignores my womanly charms. If this is how our marriage has turned out after all these years, I want no part of it. When he leaves for work, I'm going to kill myself." Indeed, while still strangely wearing her bra and skirt (I guess Kuchar could not convince Connors to lose her clothing and completely expose her bare bazoombas), Adele gets in her bathtub and absurdly attempts to drown herself by merely lying down and holding her head under the water, but she is ultimately saved just in the nick of time when her husband unexpectedly comes home after forgetting to bring his beloved fountain pen with him to work. Somewhat humorously, Brunswick pays such little attention to Adele and her brazen behavior that he does not even realize that she was trying to kill herself and instead berates her by complaining, "For heaven's sake, Adele! You could have at least fed the dog before you took your bath!" and then thinks to himself, "When will that peroxidized woman face up to the responsibilities of being a wife?!" Of course, Adele is the sort of wayward woman that should have become a pin-up model or go-go dancer instead of a housewife, which is a 'job' that is innately at odds with her psychology as an exhibitionist with a seemingly potent sex drive who cannot stand sitting around an apartment all day while there are tons of hot men roaming the streets that she would love to show off her giant udders to. With seemingly nil interest in having children, Adele certainly personifies what Otto Weininger described as the 'prostitute archetype.'

Luckily for her, at least initially, Adele's dog (played by the Kuchars' real-life pet 'Bocko,' who played the eponymous lead of George's classic short The Mongreloid (1978)) will both literally and figuratively lead her to a new and much more exciting path in life, or so it seems at first. Indeed, when Bocko runs away while Adele is walking around a park, a vaguely handsome young man named Morton (George Kuchar) whose ostensibly good-looks she has been admiring comes to the rescue and helps her to catch the renegade canine. An effete dressed young bargain bin beatnik who is sporting a pair of extra queer cowboy boots, black leather-pants, and unbecoming suit jacket, Morton gives off the impression to Adele that he is a chic and sexually potent young gentleman of the sensually adventurous sort who makes her husband seem like an insufferable rotting old fart by comparison, so naturally the protagonist more or less instantaneously falls for him without really thinking twice about the consequences. While sitting at a park bench and sharing food with Morton, Adele thinks to herself, "Oh, I'm having such a wonderful time...its been years since I've had someone to talk intelligently to. I think I'll tell him what I've always wanted to be: A movie actress...desired by a million men." Somewhat revealingly, while fantasizing about being a famous actress, the film cuts to a sort of fetishistic dream-sequence featuring Adele doing burlesque oriented glamour poses where she shakes and flashes around her extra fleshy jumbo jugs, thus highlighting the character's rather moronic sense of vanity. Of course, Adele is rather saddened when she has to eventually part ways with Morton, but she never stops to think that her new loverboy is an abusive degenerate who likes roughing up his crippled wife, or as the narrator states, "Little does Adele know about Morton's private life. Florence, Morton's wife, suffers from severe headaches due to a serious bicycle accident in which Morton was at fault." Before parting ways, Adele and Morton kiss in a sickly goofy scatological montage that inter-cuts shots of dog Bocko defecating and that wickedly lampoons a famous kissing scene from Douglas Sirk's Imitation of Life (1959).

Indeed, when Morton gets home from his amorous play-date with Adele, he reveals a very different side of himself by doing all he can to ignore his ugly crippled wife Florence (also Bob Cowan, albeit this time in Divine-esque drag), who is popping pills while hilariously reading the latest chic leftist literary vomit in The New Yorker. When Florence dares to annoy him while he is watching an episode of the sci-fi adventure TV series Voyage to the Bottom of the Sea (1964-1968), Morton roughs her up by pushing her on the ground and then shoving her onto a sofa. Obviously someone that encourages his wife's seemingly highly deleterious drug addiction, Morton also gives Florence some pills and has her swallow them with a coffee mug full of toilet water before going out again to hunt for some more sexy street cunt. Naturally, when Morton happens upon a young blonde babe named Marilyn Marmoset (Donna Kerness of George Kuchar's masterpiece Hold Me While I'm Naked)—a character who, as the narrator notes at the beginning of the film, has a surname that is curiously the, "same spelling as the African tree monkey"—while prowling the streets and stalks her all the way back to her apartment (in fact, Ms. Marmoset even unlocks her door so that he can walk right in), he decides break off his planned rendezvous with Adele, who he lies to by telling her that he has to attend to a sick uncle who has supposedly, "been stricken with a severe case of gassy stomach and is in considerable pain." Unfortunately for her, Adele learns the truth when Morton's wife grabs the telephone from him and reveals to the protagonist that her dashing love interest is a deceitful scumbag who is banging various other dumb broads. To make matters ten times worse, a UFO invasion hits NYC only seconds after Adele gets off the phone with the dime-store Don Juan, thus the protagonist has to put her lovelorn despair on hold. While Adele declares, "Good Lord, we're being attacked by flying saucers from another planet. I must flee to safety!" and immediately begins attempting to find sanctuary around the city, she is soon zapped by a UFO ray and completely vaporized shortly after leaving her apartment, thereupon conveniently abruptly concluding the heroine's story and, in turn, the problems associated with her domestic despair. In the end, the narrator snidely states regarding the ostensible moral of the story, "So, as we near the closing of our story and see how the little pieces of life fall into their true meaningful places, we can't help but think to ourselves: God really...uhuh...came...uhuh...knew what he was doin...uhuh."

Apparently, auteur Mike Kuchar was so embarrassed by The Craven Sluck after completing it that he initially refused to screen it, or as the filmmaker once stated in an audio commentary track for the film, "I developed a complex...I thought maybe this might be the sloppiest picture ever made. And I started to repress it, like for years...And I never really put it into many shows after it had its release." It was not until the film was warmly received when it was screened at retrospectives in both Germany and England that Kuchar actually began to finally embrace and respect his own film, thereupon leading him to conclude that he is not exactly the best judge of his own work. Of course, as a campy work featuring both a fat fellow in drag portraying an abused housewife and an unloved wife who attempts to off herself in a bathtub, The Craven Sluck has almost certainly influenced the infamous Manhattan Love Suicides (1985) segment Thrust in Me (1985) co-directed by Richard Kern and Nick Zedd where the latter filmmaker dresses in drag and portrays a girl her kills herself in her bathtub, only for her corpse to be mouth-fucked by her emotionally negligent beau (also portrayed by Zedd in a scenario that seems to pay homage to the scene in John Waters' Female Trouble (1974) where Divine literally fucks herself by portraying both a male and female character during a rape scene), who interprets her act of self-slaughter as an attempt at emotional blackmail and reacts accordingly by deriving pleasure from her death. While Kuchar's film might not be as graphic as Thrust in Me, it is certainly a cleverer and more competently directed work that demonstrates Zedd is merely a poor heterosexual imitator who lacks the charm, cinematic literacy, and class of his filmic forebear. Certainly one of the most tastelessly charming titled works ever made (although the word has multiple meanings, 'sluck' is typically seen as another word for 'slut' and is a portmanteau of 'slut' and 'fuck'), Kuchar's film is ultimately a mockery of heterosexual romantic love and marriage that is both sardonic and even scatological in its satirizing of high Hollywood melodramas like Sirk's Imitation of Life, as a work that not only dares to feature a UFO appear out of nowhere during the last minute or so and zapping the female heroine to death but also features a dog defecating in a seemingly painful fashion while the female lead and her new extramarital beau kiss, thus underscoring the pettiness of both romance and personal problems in the context of the world at large. After all, what would seem more frivolous to a gay man than the romantic qualms of a big boobed blonde bimbo with the IQ of a gnat. In the end, The Craven Sluck ultimately proves to be a highly therapeutic experience in that it gives the viewer the opportunity to witness the singular novelty of seeing some annoying airheaded female lead randomly killed under rather absurd circumstances, which is a fantasy I have always had ever since I was a kid as a result of those rare occasions where I was forced to watch a Hollywood romantic-comedy or kitschy big budget melodrama. Indeed, call me a cynic, misanthrope, and/or sadist, but I would be delighted to see Casablanca (1942) conclude with a Nazi UFO appearing out of nowhere at the end and vaporizing both Humphrey Bogart and Ingrid while they are saying goodbye to one another during the all-too-famous airport scene.

Johnny's a dead man walking. You wouldn't guess that he's the ripe, young age of 27 at first glance. Hell, even I thought 40 was a generous guess. Similar to the philosophy of Into the Wild, only deliriously intellectualized, the carefree and often risqué charisma of Johnny is a savage tool for him to abuse most females he encounters, but no, Johnny's not a misogynist. Like most of us, he's a misanthropist. Unlike most of us, the complexity of which his mind unravels allows us for the perfect specimen for documentation of sorts. His form of sincere narcissism is one that is most unexplored. He doesn't represent himself as a human being in most aspects, that is, unless he just got the hell kicked out of him. He wanders around the scenes quoting philosophers, raping women, chain-smoking, and discussing high society values in an establishment that is crumbling underneath of him. The character of Johnny has reached a demigod level thanks to Mike Leigh's British masterpiece. There are many adjectives that can be used to accentuate the thoughts this film provokes. Searing is an audacious example that springs to mind. I'd owed it to Derek to watch this film for little over a year now. Collecting dust on my shelf; Had I known this film would have been so invasive of my every thought, I would have picked this up a lot sooner. I had always jested about viewing this film under the sole condition that I, in fact, would be Naked as the film puts it. But be as it would, Naked is a metaphor for humanity slowly unsheathing itself after a precisely paced film has just burned its many images into your retinas. Soon after the climactic opening in which our anti-human lead is having passionate sex, the moans of delight turn into a forceful scream. We realize that like most women, the very thought of a domineering male can prove to be the ultimate fantasy and the most accessible fetish. Escaping Manchester as to not get beaten up by the family of the rape victim, Johnny pops in on his ex-girlfriend at her flat, which leads to many awkward situations and raw characteristics clashing, almost flammable to the touch. "Well, basically, there was this little dot, right? And the dot went bang and the bang expanded. Energy formed into matter, matter cooled, matter lived, the amoeba to fish, to fish to fowl, to fowl to frog, to frog to mammal, the mammal to monkey, to monkey to man, amo amas amat, quid pro quo, memento mori, ad infinitum, sprinkle on a little bit of grated cheese and leave under the grill till Doomsday." Enter Jeffrey, a bourgeois playboy who has it all but continues to take more. This archetype is one to loathe and Jeffrey (or Sebastien) creates such an intimidating and daunting character that you realize that Johnny is just a drifter who looks good by comparison with a true sort of evil. With the film slowly reeling forwards, one must make the connection that these two characters would meet but who knew when? Their long awaited encounter explodes into what might be the first example of making an anti-climax into art. Never has a film had such raw monologues that prove the unscripted genius of that which is a lost form of theater known as improvisation. The mark of the beast is near us all. Naked is a bold sexual politic in a long list of cinema masterpieces. While not being entirely linear around a set plot point, this allows Mike Leigh to focus on much more important matters at hand. Each interaction is priceless. Naked is a film that is so cleverly cultured that it baffles me still, days after viewing.

THE WRAITH

Mike Marvin (1986)

The Wraith: a film that has been following my shadowed memories since I began indulging in cinema at an incredibly early age. Upon my initial obscured viewing of The Wraith, traces of this film stuck like tacks to my every film experience. The black figure reminded me of Robocop and in turn the revenge plot took me right back to The Wraith. The lone enigma provoked thoughts of Grease 2 and that 80s byproduct of hairspray and motorcycles refreshed my memory of the spunk that The Wraith accounted for. It wasn't very long until I realized that every route in my cerebral channel will inadvertently wind back to the original slave & master relationship that The Wraith created and damaged with its vicious familiarity attack on my senses. In short: fuck my life. This is simply one of those films that are relishable to those who appreciate the era. Mocking the harmless, self-contained 80s cheese is that of complaining about the over-abundance of black and white pictures in the 50s. For a sci-fi revenge film, The Wraith isn't grossly disappointing. When it comes down for the retribution, you'll find a lot of irritating cats being iced by methods of a kamikaze parked car in which they crash into at full speed, only to have the car reassemble itself and drive off. For the impact solely based on The Wraith's universe, it's a bit on the ridiculous side. Having an anti-hero to root for is always a welcome tidging but to have a completely indestructible being that jumps from one greaser to the next is just an inevitable countdown that you are now apart of, willingly or not. In this top billing role, Charlie Sheen shares about 10 minutes screen time tops while the prototype Dodge "Turbo Interceptor" steals the shows and the applause with a futuristic look that, still to this day, creates a forcefield of timeless antiquity. At its core though, The Wraith is nothing but vehicular fetishism. It's what The Wizard did for Nintendo and at times, the product placement of this blisteringly "cybernetic" automobile seems gratuitous and unresourceful with the many changes that the script could have used. What's worse is the implementing of an "innocent young woman." Most women in revenge fare involve betrayal, deceit, or a slew of virtue-smashing pseudo-dyke whores, for the most part. To see a woman beat to the ground and haven't cracked yet is Hollywood fabrication at its best. Along with the mocking of the feminine spirit, it seems that The Wraith also indulges in several scenes that follow a contradictory homosexual/homophobic script writing trend with young males, fast cars, and enough euphemisms to temporarily stuff fill the crater that is Jennifer Garner's slutty face - nonsensical at best. To be true to my own developed senses, yes, The Wraith is an absolute travesty on film. But alas, somewhere in the visioning of this masturbatory 80s explosion exhibitionism lies charm, not your normal everyday charm but a festering pocket of immense joy that can only be delivered by a ghost/robot Charlie Sheen. The Wraith isn't scared of making mistakes, rather it chooses to deliver smash bang entertainment with an awkward Lego warrior and an extremely fast car that delivers an enigmatic atmosphere with a droning engine noise that blazes down the roads with such neglect that could only be filmed by a teenager himself.

THE WRAITH

AMICUS MORTIS

Mike Stoffels (2007)

Amicus Mortis is a neat little short made by the fine people over at VET-TV productions. Amicus Mortis loosely translates into "Death of a Friend". The film takes place somewhere in the Netherlands and is a great example of a zero-budget film gone right. The plot revolves around two friends and plays in reverse chronological order. One friend is captured and devoured by a Dutch cannibal and by a technicality, is set free. The lonesome friend does not like this one bit, so he decides to seek revenge.

Yeah, we have heard this plot before, but that isn't at fault here. It is a refreshing take on the revenge scene because of a few things including the savagery of the crimes and the few minutes we spent with his friend. They seemed close but we do not know the length of their relationship. All we do know is that his friend is worth killing for. The acting was not great but it is expected. Some movements seemed more forceful and less fluent. Besides having an entertaining movie, the film boasts an incredible soundtrack. I swear, I have been listening to the song on the main menu for over half an hour. Besides that, we have orchestral, and very tense ambiance which fits very nicely with the mood of the film. Besides from a good story, we get great gore which includes a chainsawed ankle, sledgehammer to the groin (That hurt guys), and a tongue cut off. What I greatly appreciate about the violence is that they prove in the modern era, you don't need close-ups of shocking gore to make the audience squirm. Each scene is intertwined with a hyper-slide show of pain which holds it together like celluloid glue. It reminds me of the glory days of ultraviolence. The film could have been a slight bit longer, and they could have added in some more bonding between the family to greater the impact of his untimely death. The only scene that really bothered me was the Bar scene. I had no idea what any of it meant if anything at all except it involved a drunken ex-convict, and the glass breaking over his head looked too fake. All that aside, it was the scene that really showed what it is like to have someone looking out for you. Another thing I noticed is that when the cannibal cooked him, he used a garlic spice. In fact, it was the same spice that the German cannibal Armin Meiwes used. Coincidence? or a shout out to the notorious man? The same crew are making a new film which I am also really looking forward to reviewing. The working title is Goatriders: The Last Silver. Amicus Mortis is a good, entertaining, and yet shocking film about what it is like to lose someone you greatly love. If you appreciate hard work in cinema then there is no doubt that this will please you.

Undoubtedly, aside from possibly Fons Rademakers' epic Harry Mulisch adaptation The Assault (1986) aka De Aanslag and Marleen Gorris' insufferable 'feminist fairytale' Antonia's Line (1995), Karakter (1997) aka Character co-written and directed by Mike van Diem is probably the most successful, critically revered, and well known Dutch film in the United States. Indeed, like Rademakers and Gorris' films, van Diem's debut feature won the Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film at the Academy Awards and is one of the few Dutch films that is not a pain in the ass to find in the U.S. on DVD. Of course, considering the sort of obscenely overrated European films (e.g. Tom Tykwer's Run Lola Run (1998), that seem to get a lot of attention in the United States, I was somewhat hesitant to watch Character but considering I have recently seen a number of worthwhile films starring leading man Fedja van Huêt, including Erik de Bruyn's Wilde Mossels (2000) aka Wild Mussels and Martin Koolhoven's AmnesiA (2001), I ultimately gave in and decided to give it a watch. Based on both the best-selling 1938 novel of the same name and short story Dreverhaven en Katadreuffe (1981) by Dutch writer Ferdinand Bordewijk—a modernist writer whose style mixed elements of the 'New Objectivity' movement and magic realism—the film has an aesthetic clearly influenced by German expressionism and had a fairly large budget (7 million Dutch guilders) and shooting period (it was shot over a 71 day period between the summer and fall of 1996). As can be expected for such a big Dutch production, Character was produced by the 'commercial' Dutch studio First Floor Features co-owned by Dick Maas, whose hit films Flodder (1986) and Amsterdamned (1988) were also produced by the studio. Of course, First Floor Features is also responsible for producing 'arthouse' works, most notably Alex van Warmerdam's first two features Abel (1986) and De Noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners, so it is not much of a surprise that they would also be responsible for van Diem's film. What is a big surprise about Character is that such an expensive production, which was also partly co-produced by the Belgian production company Kladaradatsch!, was given to a director, cinematographer, and lead actor that were more or less novices who had yet to tackle such an ambitious production. Indeed, while director van Diem had won the Dutch 'Golden Calf' for best short film and the Student Academy Award for best foreign student film for his short Alaska (1989), he had nil experience directing an actual feature-length with a large film crew. Similarly, while lead actor van Huêt had appeared in small roles in Theo van Gogh's Jan Wolkers adaptation Terug naar Oegstgeest (1987) aka Return to Oegstgeest, Gerrit van Elst's Advocaat van de Hanen (1996) aka Punk Lawyer, and a couple TV shows, he was far from a well leading man that could lure in audiences with his reputation. Despite being such a mainstream big budget effort, Character is a decidedly Dutch tale about the poor bastard son of an 'evil' powerful bailiff who torments the progeny he has never had a relationship with as a curious means to make sure he grows up to be a strong and successful fellow who can stand on his two feet. A somewhat crushing tale about a young man that is so obsessed with spiting his seemingly all-powerful father that he misses out on everything else in life that actually makes life worth living like sex and love, among other things, van Huêt's film ultimately captures the emotionally glacial character of many of the Dutch people, especially in relation to their families. Indeed, whether intentional or not on the director and co-writers part (aside from director van Diem, the film was also co-written by producer Laurens Geels and Ruud van Megen), Character is more about the Dutch national character than anything.

The place and time is the Dutch city of Rotterdam during the early 1930s (although not really revealed in the film, the novel is set between the protagonist's birth in 1903 and 1931 when he graduates as a lawyer) and young protagonist Jacob Willem Katadreuffe (van Huêt) visits the office of his much hated father Dreverhaven (Belgian actor Jan Declair) to spitefully say to the man, "I've come to tell you...today I have been sworn in as a lawyer. I'm sure you regret this, but I've succeeded...and this is my very last visit to you." To Katadreuffe's surprise, Dreverhaven congratulates him and asks to shake his hand, but the protagonist responds rather hatefully by stating, "I cannot shake the hand of someone who's worked against me my entire life." That same day, Dreverhaven is murdered and Katadreuffe, whose clothes are covered in blood, is arrested as he seems like the culprit, especially after a number of people noticed the protagonist leaving the scene of the crime in a hasty fashion. For the rest of Character, Katadreuffe tells his dejecting life story about how he came to spitefully hate the man that fathered him despite never really knowing him. Although all evidence seems to point elsewhere, Katadreuffe rather vocally maintains his innocence. First, the protagonist states of his father, "Dreverhaven...the law without compassion...the curse of the poor" and proceeds to describe how the man is infamous for literally throwing impoverished people into the street as a pernicious bailiff who makes the monstrously miserly money men of a Charles Dickens novel seem somewhat benign by comparison. Katadreuffe's mother Joba aka 'Joba' (Betty Schuurman) was in the service of Dreverhaven as a servant for about one year when the bailiff decided to initiate a "once-only affair" that resulted in the peasant woman's impregnation. About six weeks after conception, Joba broke the silence and told Dreverhaven, "I'm expecting. I'm leaving," and ultimately left for good, thus ushering in the beginning of a lifelong feud of sorts.

As protagonist Katadreuffe explains to the police inspector, both his mother Joba and father Dreverhaven were fairly quiet people who rarely ever talked, thus underscoring their fairly similar personalities as rather cold and introverted individuals who seem to have a complete and utter incapacity to express their feelings.

With the help of his assistant, Dreverhaven tracked down Joba's whereabouts after she had given birth to protagonist Katadreuffe and sent a letter merely reading, "When is our wedding?" along with a money order for a suitable sum, but the proud and pigheaded peasant woman rejected the letter and it was sent back to the sender. In what protagonist Katadreuffe describes as a "duel" that "lasted more than a year," Dreverhaven attempted to send the same letter to Joba month after month until he eventually received a response that read, "Will Always Be Refused." Meanwhile, Katadreuffe is now a young grade school boy that is taunted at school by other boys with notes reading "bastard" and verbal reminders that his "mother is a whore." Anytime Katadreuffe attempted to ask his mother about the identity of his father, she would reply "We need nothing of him." After Katadreuffe nearly chokes another boy to death after he attacks him and calls his mother a whore, the protagonist's family is forced to move to another area of Rotterdam closer to Dreverhaven. One day while with his mother at a port, Katadreuffe sees his father for the first time and becomes obsessed with getting to know him. After the protagonist is arrested after unwittingly getting involved with a gang of poor boys stealing bread, he decides to tell the police guard that his father is Katadreuffe, but when the bailiff shows up at the police station, he denies knowing the boy and Katadreuffe narrowly escapes being raped by a gay pedophile prison guard, thus inspiring him to say to his mother regarding his father, "we need nothing of him." Indeed, Katadreuffe ultimately realizes that it is probably not a good idea to get in contact with a negligent father who is so cold and callous in terms of his character that he allows his completely vulnerable son to become the prisoner of a sadistic child molester.

Determined to make something of his life and make the most of his seemingly unwavering intellectual potential and thirst for knowledge, Katadreuffe begins religiously reading a set of the Encyclopedia Britannica that he has acquired even though the set of books only goes up to the letter "T." One of the reasons the protagonist decides to escape into an introverted world of books and ideas is that his mother completely refuses to talk to him. When Katadreuffe reaches his early adult years, he decides to work as much as possible so that he can leave his mother's home because he feels unwanted there. Around the same time, a young communist 'true believer' named Jan Maan (Hans Keating) rents a room at Joba's home and the new tenant and protagonist soon become good friends despite their very different world views. Ultimately, Katadreuffe comes up with the idea to buy a cigar shop as a means to develop his independence and to get away from his mother, but the protagonist falls into bankruptcy when the business he buys is a scam (instead of cigars, he receives boxes of hay) and he is unable to pay back the creditors. Luckily, since the value of his assets is less than the court costs, Katadreuffe is told by an eccentric lawyer named De Gankelaar (Victor Löw) at the law firm representing him that they have decided to cancel the bankruptcy. After making an audacious attempt at impressing some clients at the law firm with his command of English, Katadreuffe manages to convince De Gankelaar to hire him. As time progresses, De Gankelaar—a somewhat goofy dude with a bushy mustache and almost grotesque underbite that makes it seem as if he constantly has something in his mouth—becomes his mentor, guardian, and quasi-father-figure.

As a result of his new job and source of income, Katadreuffe is once again hit with the threat of bankruptcy and in the process soon learns that his father is the one responsible for filing it against him. Katadreuffe also learns that Dreverhaven also came by his mother's house and attempted to once again 'propose' to her marriage, but of course Joba turns it down. Needless to say, Katadreuffe decides to confront his seemingly sadistic estranged daddy and soon learns what kind of man he is after he watches Dreverhaven suicidally enter a neighborhood that has been taken over by armed commie thugs and risks his life attempting to evict the murderous Marxist tenants, thus resulting in him being grazed with a bullet after a young revolutionary shoots him in the face. Ultimately, Katadreuffe is ordered to repay his father over "18 months of misery" with his job earnings, but when the protagonist is finally free of debt and no longer the monetary slave of his father, he feels unfulfilled and decides to ask his progenitor for another chance so he can obtain an education. As the protagonist explains regarding his decision to be once again indebted to his sadistic father, "I wanted to challenge him...and win." Unfortunately, when the protagonist becomes the office manager of his law office after the old manager Rentenstein (Lou Landré)—an ambiguously Hebraic henchman of Dreverhaven—leaves, his father demands the money back and he is once again forced back to court for bankruptcy. With the extremely altruistic help of his mentor De Gankelaar, Katadreuffe manages to get out of legal trouble, though it is partly the result of Dreverhaven deciding to cease his reign of terror, which makes the protagonist realize regarding his father, "He just wanted to show me who was boss."

In an important subplot that reflects the way the protagonist's unconventional upbringing has affected his outlook on life, Katadreuffe manages to badly botch what could of been a great love affair with a co-worker named Lorna Te George (Tamar van den Dop). Both Katadreuffe and Lorna are fairly introverted and emotionally unavailable individuals that have a hard time expressing themselves. When the protagonist graduates college, he is given a surprise party by his co-workers where they also present him with a complete 24-volume set of the latest edition of Encyclopedia Britannica. While it is obvious that Lorna wants to talk to Katadreuffe about their mutual feelings for one another, the protagonist ultimately makes it seem like there is no room for a woman in his life after he announces that he is going to law school and then proceeds to give the following speech to his co-employees: "Everyone has certain talents. Each of us has to discover them...and then develop them...so as to make progress. And I'm sure each of us will make that progress...no matter where he's from. As long as he focuses on one single goal...and is willing to sacrifice everything else. He'll overcome all setbacks and resistance. As long as that one goal prevails...and he won't be distracted...and will put everything else aside. That is my true conviction." Naturally, Lorna is heartbroken and thus quits her job and moves away, with the protagonist only bumping into her years later and discovering that she is now a married mother. Ironically, Katadreuffe's mother berates him by calling him as stupid as an owl for screwing up his relationship with Lorna despite the fact she is largely to blame for causing his incapacity to form relationships and express love. Indeed, in terms of his adult 'character,' Katadreuffe is just as much the son of his mother as the son of his father as both parents were more or less than same in terms of their (non)emotional brutality.

Of course, Character concludes just as it starts with Katadreuffe's confrontation with his evil and manipulative miser father Dreverhaven who, somewhat curiously, congratulates his son after he reveals that he is now officially a lawyer. Naturally, the protagonist refuses to shake his estranged father's hand, with his reason being that his progenitor had worked "against him" during his fairly miserable life, but Dreverhaven denies this and proclaims that he has worked "for him." Indeed, as Dreverhaven states earlier in the film to Joba in regard to his reason for being so hard on their son, "...I'll strangle him for nine tenths and the last tenth will make him strong." Of course, considering that Katadreuffe was largely determined to become successful in life as means to spite his father, Dreverhaven is not all that out of line to say that he worked "for him," as it is doubtful that the protagonist would have made it to where he did had he been given a steady dose of love and affection during his impoverished upbringing. In what is ultimately the closest the father and son will ever get to one another in the entire film, Katadreuffe decides to initiate a fight by leaping over a desk and attacking Dreverhaven, but the elder man ultimately beats up his son. Unfortunately for him, Dreverhaven makes the mistake of embracing his seemingly unconscious son after beating up, so Katadreuffe uses the opportunity to sink his teeth into his father's nose, break a chair over his head, and eventually throw an entire bookshelf on top of him. From there, Katadreuffe pulls out a knife that his father previously gave to him and acts if he is going to stab and ultimately murder Dreverhaven, but when the old man begs his son to kill him (notably, throughout the film, the father attempts to coerce his bastard son into killing him with the same exact knife), the protagonist opts out and leaves. As it turns it, Dreverhaven died as a result of a suicide that involved himself stabbing himself in the gut and then subsequently breaking his own neck by leaping from the top floor of his building. Indeed, not only is Katadreuffe cleared of the murder charge, but he also becomes a very rich man (or as his resentful commie comrade Jan states, a "damned capitalist") after he inherits all of Dreverhaven's properties and wealth, which the old man willed to the protagonist just before committing suicide. Of course, the biggest surprise for Katadreuffe is that Dreverhaven signed the will with inscription “Father,” thus confirming that the evil old man has finally truly accepted the protagonist as his son. Despite his unwaveringly love for his fiercely frigid mother, Katadreuffe ironically receives his greatest ‘gifts’—both in terms of ‘character’ and material possessions—from the evil estranged father that he only knew from a deep dark distance.

Notably, as a result of the fact that the Dutch metropolis of Rotterdam has very little of its original pre-WWII buildings and architecture due to being bombed into oblivion by the Germans during the so-called Rotterdam Blitz on May 14, 1940 that resulted in almost the complete destruction of the entire historic city centre, Character was mainly shot in Wrocław, Poland, thus adding to the film’s already Kafkaesque essence. Of course, it is also ironic that the protagonist of the film would have to go through such a struggle to become rich and successful, only for all the property he inherited to have most likely been destroyed about a decade later during the Second World War (in fact, Rotterdam was so thoroughly disseminated by Teutonic bombing that Belarusian-Jewish artist Ossip Zadkine created a sculptor entitled ‘De Verwoeste Stad’ aka ‘The Destroyed City’ in tribute to the metropolis), thus underscoring the meaninglessness of material wealth in the long run, especially when it comes at the price of love and personal relationships. On top of following in the tradition of works like Paul Verhoeven’s Katie Tippel (1975) aka Keetje Tippel and Guido Pieters’ Ciske the Rat (1984) aka Ciske de Rat in terms of its devastating depiction of the sort of Dickensian horrors that most everyday urban Dutch people faced before the modern era, Character is important in that it reveals the worst of the decidedly ‘Dutch character,’ as a work that is as unflattering as the films of Michael Haneke are to Austrians and Germans in terms of how it depicts the people of the Netherlands. Indeed, it is no coincidence that the first multinational corporation and first company to issue stock was the Dutch East India Company, just as it is no coincidence that the Netherlands has always produced some of the world’s darkest and most pessimistic artists and writers, with Pieter the Elder Bruegel, Hieronymus Bosch, Jooſt van den Vondel, Godfried Schalcken, Vincent van Gogh, Gerard Reve, Adriaan Ditvoorſt, Willem Frederik Hermans, and Alex van Warmerdam just being a couple examples of the sort of unsettlingly penetrating Dutch cultural creators that have flourished in the tiny Germanic Low Land over the past half a millennium or so. Admittedly, for a notable Dutch film, Character is certainly a shockingly contrived and easy-to-follow work that seems like it was specially tailored for American general audiences, thus making it a worthy work for novices of cinema of the Netherlands, but not something I would describe as a great masterpiece of any sort. Unfortunately, the film is also plagued by a somewhat cliched reductionist quasi-Marxist interpretation of history where capitalism is depicted as the source of all evil and the police are depicted as proto-fascist thugs and child molesters who brutally beat and killing poor young commie revolutionaries. Ironically, despite creating a critically and monetarily successful Academy Award winning work for his first feature, director Mike van Diem would go on to focus on directing TV commercials and did not get another opportunity to direct another feature film until rather recently, with his upcoming work De Surprise (2015) aka The Surprise starring Character star Jan Decleir and Georgina Verbaan, which is currently in post-production, being the filmmaker's first feature in almost two decades. Ultimately, van Diem's debut is the kind of work that gives you a good idea of the difference between mainstream European cinema and that of Hollywood, as it may not be up to par with contemporary Dutch arthouse masterpieces like Adriaan Dittvoorst's De witte waan (1984) aka White Madness, Theo van Gogh's Loos (1989), Alex van Warmerdam's De Noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners, Aryan Kaganof's Kyodai Makes The Big Time (1992), and Maartje Seyferth and Victor Nieuwenhuijs' Venus in Furs (1994), but it certainly demonstrates that even the most contrived and formulaic of big budget European movies tend to have more artistic merit, aesthetic eloquence, and cultivation than the most widely critically revered of American blockbusters.

ARCADE ATTACK

Mike Wallington (1982) I found a VHSrip of this eighties documentary movie and was pleasantly surprised. I know have the pleasure to review this hybrid film and i have to say, it is the most original idea i have seen in a while. Only carrying a short runtime of 23 minutes, this film starts off as an interesting look at arcade machines and pinball machines.

When the film starts is says "SILVERball Heroes VS. Video Invaders in ARCADE ATTACK". We see shots of a huge arcade center in a busy city and we are then led inside where we have the british narrator explaining the importance of pinball machines. He is explaining about the companies that produce them and going through their specific features and what makes the game fun. We then have someone talking about the importance of arcade games especially Defender. He even goes as far as to say "You need to become the ship." while spouting philosophies claiming you aren't playing a game, you are exercising human nature. We then see a neu-wave punk playing his favorite pinball machine. He loves it so much he even has a tattoo of it spanning his entire back. Then the camera focuses on someones love for Space Invaders, claiming everything else in inferior. While the narrator is explaining the color characters on the pinball machines, you start to notice animations. What happens next is where it steps up a notch. The Space Invaders climb out of his TV screen "Ringu" style and begin to launch a full scale attack on Pinball and Pinball fans, annihilating the punk and leaving nothing but his shoes on fire. We then see the various pinball machines break open to see their respected characters forming a defense against the invaders. Heroes fall, Evil prevails. When attack wave three comes around, the city is in ruins and few stand. With documentary style editing, its hard to see what this film is aiming for. When you pull it back and take a look, it seems Pinball lovers are crying out. This was around the time when arcades destroyed all pinball games in competition. Its a video commentary when watched in this generation, you really start to miss the good days where it wasn't about graphics or killing the most creatures. Each side is fighting for their own preference and have their own ideological views and explain their side. I need to go play a pinball game now.

THE RED AND THE WHITE

Miklós Jancsó (1967)

I have the horrible misfortune of generally holding Marxist films as the most important. Russian-Hungarian co-production The Red and the White directed by Miklós Jancsó is a fine example. Over the years, I have come to hate most War Films (especially American War films). I especially have no respect for so-called antiwar films like Platoon (Oliver Stone trying to prove he's a man) and All Quiet on the Western Front (good old Lewis Milestone AKA Lev Milstein). Milestone later went on to make pro-war American propaganda films such as A Walk in the Sun and Halls of Montezuma.

The Red and the White is not like the typical American war film (or War film in general). The film takes place during the Civil War of 1918 in central Russia at the height of Bolshevik barbarianism. The film takes a realist approach which ends up becoming surreal. The gathering of human cattle to be shot becomes especially interesting when decisions are made on who gets it first. The killings are repetitive but never boring. The Red and the White holds shots longer than even most Italian Neo-Realist films would. I always enjoy when I can actually get into a scene before almost having a seizure from a Vertov-Style split second shot.

One interesting and unconventional element of the film is its presentation of war as both absurd and redundant. Generally, most propaganda films (especially Bolshevik) have a completely one side view on hand. The Red and the White features a midget would-be rapist Bolshevik violating a young white Russian girl (she is stripped and then washed for Stalin's other Bloody Dwarf). The white army ends up blasting this Trotskyite away with a variety of bullets. Truly refreshing for both sides.

The White Army's elitism is not match for the global proletarian barbarians. In all honesty, it's hard for me to decide who I like more. The Bolshevik obsession with fighting by any means necessary gets quite interesting. Some of the White Army POWs even end up converting to the Red Army. I guess that could be considered an all time low.

The conspiring of a woman with her diversion of the White Army via her naked body would be deemed misogynist by self loathing Emma Goldman would-be's. These type fighting techniques are very rarely seen from any type of war film. Its odd form of voyeurism becomes especially erotic.

I doubt "E.T. hands" Spielberg watched The Red and the White in preparation for his gore fest/sentimentalist Zio-fantasy Saving Private Ryan. It may have inspired thought on his part which could have ended in Jurassic chaos. After all, he is the master of fantasy and showmanship.

EXECUTIVE KOALA

Minoru Kawasaki (2006)

When I look back at my life and ponder upon my larger regrets, never would I propose that I deserve this form of punishment. Naturally, cinema is one of my greatest passions, second only to sodomy. What cruel mistress would be foul enough in her arts to subject me to comeuppance in the form of cancerous film-making? Enter the films of Minoru Kawasaki, a Japanese director who panders around the very essence of Japanese culture perceived by Westerners - Namely, really cutesy "kawaii" plush furies and starry-eyed kaiju homages with an IV-drip of anime inspired machinations. Jumping in head-first, I honestly didn't want to know what a film starring a larger Japanese man in a Koala mask would entertain me with - the word entertain used very loosely. It just so happens that Executive Koala goes the way of dark comedy as we straggle behind a divorced salarykoala who begins to have bizarre flashbacks and memory lapses which lead him to conclude he is a sleepwalking murderer. Following the disappearance of his wife some odd years ago and now his girlfriend's bloody corpse, a detective trails behind Tamura, koala, and feebly attempts to find incriminating evidence. All the while Tamura creeps closer to cementing in a new, mysterious Korean client for his business firm.

Making a film like Executive Koala would be relatively simple, had you the willpower to capture motion video of less-than-savvy acting abilities and the awful motor-skills of a hybrid man-marsupial. It takes a true hack to twist the absurd into the unwatchable. Certain Japanese films, as tawdry as the may be, have the elements of train-wreck mixed with such unclassifiable material that it literally is damn near impossible to peel your eyes from the screen. Executive Koala certainly does not have this effect. Personally, I found myself in a room, wanting to be distracted by anything - a fly buzzing about the room, a phone call from someone I didn't want to talk with, even the mad rumblings of displeased bowels would have been welcome as opposed to forcing myself to be transfixed on what might be the worst film I have ever sat through, and to be honest, if I had known Executive Koala would end the way it did, I might have turned it off just to shatter the disc, to jab it straight into the jugular of the one who gave it to me. Minoru Kawasaki has created films similar to this, such as Calamari Wrestler and Crab Goalkeeper, in which he cuts and pastes a hybrid creature "seamlessly" into a world compromised of humanity. This makes for a silly marketing ploy to sell tickets. Executive Koala opens with a crudely animated introduction highlighting the cast of characters with a cheery song. Once the murder mystery actually takes place, you are immediately evidenced guilty as to Tamura being the killer. Certain kill scenes are composed of the victim facing a corner of the room while Tamura, facing the camera in grotesque close-up, strafes past the camera with inconsistently glowing eyes, obviously the results of a buggy animatronic koala head or the unmentioned fact that he is a cyborg. Do I even need to mention Tamura's inconceivable ability to teleport across the room on a whim? Never mind reality, Executive Koala is too insipid to waste your time defending it.

Few if any scenes within Executive Koala stand with purpose. Much of the runtime is dedicated to proving that Tamura is a skilled worker with an excellent ethic, yet demonizes his sanity and memory loss with instances of murder, only for the murders to have not actually taken place. Coincidentally a film is being shot of the same condition but it is never mentioned again after this initial scene. After the detective visits Tamura's village of birth, Executive Koala infuriates further with an amateur sing-and-dance number that includes getting final judgment from a fiery deity that I can only assume to be a dark lord. Executive Koala is many things - embarrassing, boring, entirely without charm - not to mention whenever a character is involved in physical combat, Minoru Kawasaki edits the character out and replaces it with a stuffed mannequin to get thrown and twisted to hearts content. Quirky and eccentric, somewhat, but that doesn't cover up the fact that Executive Koala is rookie garbage. No facet can be found enjoyable within the film and certainly not the physically harmful ending in which, after a daftly cover-up, Tamura gets the girl, the detective forgets the crimes altogether, and they all stare at the sun in an equally disgusting pose - filled with inspiration and direction. I hate Executive Koala and so should you. If not for the incredibly stupid lack of "Koreagraphy" during the final fight than for the rest of the film, compromised of digital piss and shit, the likes of which entice me to punch my eyes out with a thin, blunt object.

SEDUCTION: THE CRUEL WOMAN

Monika Treut (1985)

A personal friend of German New Cinema dandy Werner Schroeter and his cinematographer Elfi Mikesch, one would think that kraut lesbian auteur Monika Treut (Female Misbehavior, Warrior of Light) would be a great and original filmmaker whose sacrilegious Sapphic cinema would be next to none, but that just is not the case, at least as far as I am concerned. Admittedly one of her films, Seduction: The Cruel Woman (1985) aka Verführung: Die Grausame Frau – a debut feature-length work she co-directed with Miss Mikesch – does have some highly commendable aesthetic merit comparable to Schroeter's Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King (a work Mikesch also shot), if not due to her collaborator's previous experience working on her own films and those of Rosa von Praunheim, including the standout neo-German expressionist work Horror Vacui (1984). A literature and philosophy major in college who wrote her doctoral thesis on the role of women in the works of Marquis de Sade's Juliette (1797) and Leopold von Sacher-Masoch's Venus in Furs (1870) – Treut was certainly intellectually prepared to direct Seduction: The Cruel Woman; a strikingly seedy but sleekly stylized cinematic work about a decidedly debauched, seemingly deranged, and determinedly deranged dominatrix who owns a hellish torture gallery where she keeps a number of loyal and sometimes disloyal slaves who sport haute couture when not getting manhandled by their maniacal mistress; a mostly malicious and somewhat monetary-inclined master of misanthropy, misandry, and bestial butch mayhem. Inspired and loosely based on Sacher-Masoch's novella Venus in Furs, Seduction: The Cruel Woman features a highly modern yet urbane 'lesbian fascist' aesthetic where leather, pleather, high heels, skulls, studded dildos, torture chamber bathrooms and psychopath chic dominate the imagery in an oftentimes oneiric realm where nihilistic flesh and fantasy make for an atmosphere not all that different from Clive Barker's Hellraiser (1987), albeit more rigidly refined without a supernatural element or over-the-top horror flick special effects. Since directing Seduction: The Cruel Woman, Treut has yet to direct another film that even remotely resembles the cultivated risqué atmosphere she, at least in part, conjured up with her first feature, so I can only assume that, like with Bruce LaBruce and his most immaculately directed cinematic work Hustler White (1996), the Sappho auteur owes much of the look of her standout work to her co-director. One could also say the same about fellow butch Teutonic auteuress Ulrike Ottinger, whose early works Madame X: An Absolute Ruler (1978) and Ticket of No Return (1979) seem to have seriously influenced the aesthetic and themes of Seduction: The Cruel Woman, because after the severance of her personal and creative partnership with Tabea Blumenschein, the look (a distinctly postmodern Germanic one with shehe S&M imagery) of her films dramatically changed for the worse. Although

SEDUCTION: THE CRUEL WOMAN

Mikesch would continue to operate the camera on subsequent works directed by Treut, none of these films, mostly being of a quirky lesbian flavor that is probably decisively distasteful to anyone that isn't a lily-licker or so-called trans-man, have the penetrating if perturbing power of Seduction: The Cruel Woman.

If I can credit Monika Treut and her cunt-licking compatriot Elfi Mikesch with anything, it is – for better or worse – demanding that viewers of Seduction: The Cruel Woman participate to some degree; whether they like or not. Indeed for masochists, the film might be something approaching celluloid masturbation of sorts, and to the sadist, one might want to decapitate the lead anti-heroess for daring to be such a demanding and over domineering bitch on a high horse of hateful hedonism. A wanton and wacked witch with wild ideas that she has turned into a highly profitable and perverse full-time profession and odious obsession, lead Wanda (Mechthild Grossmann) seems like a particularly pulchritudinous woman upon superficial glance, but when she opens her cunt-biting and cock-chopping mouth, it is quite apparent that she has far from a ladylike soul, but certainly a spiteful proclivity towards sexual sadism of the distinctly Sapphic man-loathing kind. Although she has a number of lovers/admirers/employees/slaves from both respective genders, including Gregor (Udo Kier); a rather romantic dreamer who thinks he can convert a dyke to dick due to their past romantic relationship, Justine (Sheila McLaughlin); a foreign femme and torture 'trainee' who has yet to realize that seduction is an illusion, and Herr Maehrsch (Peter Weibel); a jerk-off journalist who discovers that he enjoys being a human toilet after falling under the mistress' spell while interviewing her for an article. Friederike – the so called "lady prime minister," and friend and servant as Wanda calls her – is in charge of "propaganda and protocol" at the phantasmagorical S&M gallery of fascism of the flesh where both pain and pleasure are transcended for something more pathological. If all of the patently perverse players of Seduction: The Cruel Woman have something in common, it is that they are all looking to fill some sort of inner void, with their feverish fetishism being the means from which they try to appease this metaphysical hunger. Despite taking the role of fetish Führer in her temple of torture, wretched wench Wanda is indubitably the most 'spiritually' and emotionally vacuous of the bondage bunch as she is all but disturbingly dead inside, hence her nefarious need to dominate and destroy others, or at least what little is left of their innate humanity, goodness, and innocence. An admitted and positively proud "mysterious tyrant," Wanda tells journalist Maehrsch (before he realizes his dream of having dykes defecate in his mouth) that, "sexuality in that way no longer interests me," meaning she no longer has interest in natural sexual intercourse and human affection, but instead a need to dominate and, in some cases, destroy those weaker than herself for monetary profit. Of course, Wanda is not always able to maintain her sadistic stoicism, as she has a bodacious bitch attack every week (or so says her dissatisfied lover) when overwhelmed by what is left of her 'previous self' and having to deal with the daily needs of her attention-starved servants. Although Wanda is able to hold up her domineering front most of the time, some of her underlings are less stable, thus resulting in a violent backlash at the considerably anti-climatic conclusion of Seduction: The Cruel Woman.

Described as, "like a sexier version of Fassbinder's The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant," in Images in the Dark: An Encyclopedia of Gay and Lesbian Film and Video (1996) by an author displaying a bit of a proclivity towards puffery, I would still argue Seduction: The Cruel Woman is one of the best lesbian films I have ever seen (and actually sat through in its entirety) and probably the only one I have watched more than once, but I guess that does not say much as a student of Weininger and Mencken. Unlike Fassbinder's Die Bitteren Tränen der Petra von Kant aka The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant – a work featuring some of the most marvelously miserable melodrama ever brought to the silver screen, Seduction: The Cruel Woman features a whole lot more style than substance, which is undoubtedly the film's most glaring flaw. The film originally had its world premiere at the 1985 Berlin Film Festival, to which Monika Treut remarked regarding the audience response, "That opening was like a riot. It's still a nightmare to me, which makes it hard to recall. It was packed, sold out three days beforehand...we didn't know what going to happen...the audience got so mad. They attacked us. Only people who hated the film talked. That was only men. They just went crazy." Of course, I can see why most men and probably also the majority of women would hate the film, as the lead Wanda embodies every repellant, repugnant, and reprehensible trait a biological 'woman' could have, as the ultimate 'anti-woman' who, aside from being stunningly beautiful in appearance, does not feature a single trait the men looked for in the opposite sex like being humble, passive, dainty, empathetic, and sweet, thereupon making her the ultimate cinematic bull-dyke fantasy as the archetype for the intangible Über-dyke; a physical lipstick lesbo, but also with the menacing might of a cultivated carpet-muncher who is manlier than most men and has women flocking to her bed. That being said, Wanda seems like the extreme of a mad matron with a macabre case of penis envy, hence her perennial and impenetrable bitter dissatisfaction to the very end. Needless to say, it is no coincidence that Treut would go on to direct a number of films featuring female-to-male transsexuals.

MY FATHER IS COMING

Monika Treut (1991)

Ever wondered what would happen if a boorish, beer-bloated Bavarian kraut comes to Jew York City to visit his daughter and discovers that his little girl is a mixed-up, carpet-munching and miscegenating lesbo that no longer has love for the Fatherland?! Well, such is the sexually and culturally confused world of Sapphic German auteur Monika Treut's cunt-loving Amero-kraut cult comedy My Father is Coming (1991) aka My Father is coming - Ein Bayer in New York, a radically ridiculous and raunchy dyke-fest of the sometimes sentimental but always vulgar sort where a proud German mensch learns to become 'progressive' via peversion by having a grotesque Jewish porn star/performance artist by the name of Annie Sprinkle endow him with some much needed kosher carnal knowledge. If Weimar Berlin of the 1920s and early 1930s was the world capital of sexual debauchery and gender derangement before Uncle Adolf kicked all the Jews and their shabbos goy friends out, New York City must have inherited all that degeneracy when all the Hebrews immigrated there, or at least one would assume so after watching My Father is Coming, a film that rightfully associates homosexuality and other sexual aberrations with cosmopolitanism, but also nationalism, especially of the Teutonic persuasion, as outmoded and even socially odious. Clearly influenced by German New Cinema alpha-fag Rosa von Praunheim's flauntingly decadent documentary Überleben in New York (1989)—a sickening celebration of retarded race-mixing, lurid and loony lesbianism, and cultural deracination that follows three modern German women as their lives change drastically after moving to the big rotten apple—My Father is Coming is a culturally cynical and vaguely campy tale about pussy power and why lesbianism trumps both the father and the Fatherland, at least in sadomasochistic lady-lover Monika Treut's gal-gazing eyes. Like Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977) as depicted from the sardonic pseudo-intellectual Sapphic perspective, My Father is Coming is a film that reminds heterosexual men why lesbians—and not the pseudo-lezzy sort featured in silicon-soaked porn flicks—are the greatest enemy of mankind.

Vicky (Shelley Kästner)—a semi-out-of-the-closet lesbian of the German immigrant persuasion, who looks like a cross between Gillian Anderson and anti-feminist feminist Camille Paglia—is quite worried about the fact that her proudly German father Hans (German New Cinema cult actor Alfred Edel, who died two years after the film's release) is coming to visit her in NYC and does not know that she likes licking lilies and lives with a rampantly homosexual homo with an unhealthy fetish for muscular Latinos. A struggling actress who cannot even land a role acting as a German character despite her ostensibly Aryan blood (she looks more Italian/Jewish than anything), Vicky spends most of her time waiting tables and conversing with her Puerto Rican lesbian co-worker Lisa (Mary Lou Grailau) and she has very little time to spend with her father. When boorish Bavarian Hans does arrive to NYC, he comes armed with “real Bavarian sausage” that he smuggled through customs and happens to run into his daughter’s anti-German Hungarian neighbor, who makes some rather snide remarks about how “the fuehrer was a vegetarian” and how she apparently had a German boyfriend once, but dumped him because he brought over potato salad with a swastika drawn with mayo in the middle of dish. After realizing the less than homely Hungarian broad is a lesbo with a jealous estrogen-free lover, Hans leaves and finally runs into his daughter, who pretends her blatantly flamboyantly gay roommate Ben (David Bronstein) is her husband. After being surprised to learn from his daughter that “lots of Russian Jews live here and they hate Germans” when he is denied Jew food at a kosher deli, Hans agrees to go to Vicky’s next acting audition, which happens to be with dildo diva Annie Sprinkle, who is casting for her upcoming erotic film Pornutopia. While Vicky fails to entice and get the part in the porn flick, Hans gets a part in an American TV commercial by happenstance after randomly meeting a casting director, but the burly kraut also starts a relationship with jaded Jewess Annie Sprinkle after she vulgarly urinates in front of him. Feeling a bit of melancholy and jealous that she did not get the role but her non-actor father did, Vicky randomly runs into a James Dean-wannabe female-to-male transvestite named Joe (played by Michael Masee, the man who accidentally killed Brandon Lee during the film of The Crow (1994)), who offers to give her a ride to work, thus beginning an erotically fruitless relationship. While starting a harmless, seemingly one-sided relationship with Joe, Vicky starts an even more steamy affair with her co-worker Lisa. Needless to say, Hans is a little irked when he walks in on his daughter fondling a swarthy Puerto Rican gal, but he eventually comes around after cumming (indeed, the title My Father Is Coming seems to have a dual and quasi-incestuous meaning) and becomes accepting of his little girl’s vice after Annie Sprinkle gives him a rather racy and repugnant rub down, thus committing the unholy sin of racial defilement. In the end, proud kraut Hans is semi-Americanized and leaves NYC wearing looking like lard ass liberal slob Michael Moore in a goofy baseball cap and accepting the fact that his daughter is a deracinated and ethno-masochistic tuna-face dyke.

When discussing why post-WWII Germany is so accepting of gaydom, director Monika Treut theorized, “that after the Third Reich, and with the constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany, people have become very sensitive—have had to be very sensitive—when defining others as outcasts,” thus explaining why queers arguably dominated German New Cinema. Indeed, rather remarkably, in terms of persecution, it is Germans and not gays, transvestites, and lesbos that are the greatest target of scorn, hatred, and ridicule in My Father Is Coming. For example, when protagonist Vicky tries out for an acting role as a German character, the casting director states “think of the Nazis” in terms of the stereotypically robotic Teutonic performance she is looking for, thus illustrating the sort of endless and tedious Teutonophobia that has dominated in Hollywood, mainstream media, and brainwashed American minds ever since the Second World War. Additionally, Hans is taunted by strangers a number of times due to his glaring Germanness, including two dykes insinuating he is a Hitlerite, a German-Jew questioning about what he did “during the war” (He was just a boy and his father was killed), and being denied authentic kosher food. Of course, with My Father Is Coming, auteur Monika Treut symbolically broke with her German identity as virtually all of her subsequent works where shot abroad and she gained her largest audience with American lesbians, thus transcending the blood she herself feels is tainted, so much so that even being a bean-flicking bull-dyke is more socially acceptable. In fact, one could argue that she traded her Aryan identity for an abberosexual one as most of her subsequent works, including Female Misbehavior (1992), Gendernauts: A Journey Through Shifting Identities (1999), and Lesbian Nation (2009), expressed an identity as being one’s (lesbian) sexuality and not the blood and soul of one’s birth. Of course, as exemplified in lezzy Lisa’s remark “no one ever believes me when I tell them I’m Puerto Rican” in My Father Is Coming, Monika Treut seems to think of lesbianism as a multicultural pseudo-race without physical borders and social restraints, while also advocating race-mixing via Hans and Annie Sprinkle as the poisonous antidote to national and racial pride among heterosexuals. That being said, My Father is Coming is essentially a degenerate völkisch propaganda flicks for chicks that do not like dicks, henceforth, it goes without saying that Treut film(s) are the aesthetic/cinematic equivalent of a temporary STD to anyone that is not a clit-hopper. Indeed, Herzog’s Stroszek might have ended in terrible tragedy and misery, but I found it far less stomach-churning than the sickeningly sentimental conclusion of My Father Is Coming, a fucked flick where a Fräulein surprises her father with the fact that she fingers other gals and expects him to accept it and he does so only after a Jewess fingers him. It might be a stretch, but I doubt Uncle Adolf would have been impressed with tranny-like Annie Sprinkle’s unflatteringly large Jewess jugs but Alfred Edel is a different story, thereupon illustrating the major difference between the Teutons of today and yesteryear.

Morita Hisashi (???)

WARNING: IF YOU ARE EASILY OFFENDED AND PRONE TO SICKNESS, DO NOT PROCEED

I went into this film with every expectation to vomit. Seeing as how many people have not finished this, i made it a personal challenge to watch it. Indeed, it is celluloid hell, but the hype outlives the dream. This is a near impossible to get, Japanese scat/filth/fetish porn that is only circulated through traders and such. It opens up with very normal looking Japanese women skipping around in white with umbrellas and looking very cutesy. Whereas there are no subs, so i do not what they are saying, nor do i really want to know. Next, a woman is in an all white room and there is a raised platform. She squats upon it and begins to defecate. This happens after discharge sprays everywhere. I can easily imagine the look on our readers face as they are reading this. After this, she then performs foreplay on the pile of feces, dipping her tongue in it, letting saliva collect on it. After this viral playtime, she decides to slurp it up and gargle with it. After this, we are treated to a monologue of sorts with VICTIM #2. We then see a woman tied to a wall. Surrounding her are six giggly Japanese women who then defecate and urinate on a plate each and walk up and throw it in her face. After they let it soak in a little bit, they then walk up and smear it in her face. The only time i felt a little nauseous was when the woman was before a bowl of cooked noodles. They then inserted a baster filled with milk in her ass only to be shot out back in the bowl. She then eats it all then performs forced fellatio on the butler until she vomits it out mixed with semen back in the bowl, only to have it tipped into her mouth. Repeat this cycle a couple of times. Woman after woman steps up to the plate (No pun intended) and in the course of this we encounter Milk enema's, semen covered vomit noodles, a woman dipped in a vat of shit and discharge, a woman's mouth crammed with shit and then closed in with a lengthy piece of duct tape only to have her head covered in a plastic bag which they then use a blow dryer to seal the air out until she passes out. With all these in this shit filled concoction, this is easily the most vile disgusting video out and might be the ultimate party film. One can only imagine how many drinking games can be played with this. While the humility grows, so does the time. This feature clocks in at 2 hours and 13 minutes. This is the most extreme film I have ever seen but still not enough to make me lose my dinner. I would not recommend this to anyone but when i get time i will check out TERRIBLE MEAL. Due to the shocking nature of this film, no pictures could be uploaded. After all is said and done, we are treated to trailers (I think) of normal pornography. I need to take a shower.

GAYNIGGERS FROM OUTER SPACE

Morten Lindberg (1992)

Created by internet trolling group GNAA, this film is the first of its kind. A homosexual romp which greatly resembles any old science fiction film. It is a shitty, monotonous, misogynist film displaying the exploits of Gay Crusaders filmed in glorious Black & White with a running time of a horribly paced 24 minutes.

The storyline involves Captain B. Dick and his crew with such names as "THE GAY AMBASSADOR" and "SGT. SHAVED BALLS". They recently found out there are disgusting "FEMALES" on our wonderful planet and vow to free us men from the "FEMALES". Their computer copiously produces spelling inaccuracies which brings up the question if Gayniggers can spell at all. When they find women in various countries, the master computer which talks in a Speak-N-Spell mannerism, gives them information on said country with racial themes attached. They travel to China, in which the women speak in a wonderfully racist dialect formed with "ching chong ching kings" and such. When they laser the women away, the man hugs the GAYNIGGER and looks so happy. The Chinese man's voice is obviously someone speaking into a recorder than played backwards. Along the way, married men turn instantly homosexual and blow kisses. The soundtrack is composed of the all-to-familiar funk/blaxploitation theme. It seems to steal most of its cues from Isaac Hayes's work on Shaft. I don't think i can ever see a Negro with a Mohawk and not laugh again. The set design is just all aluminum foil. It's quite interesting due to all the reflections and the light tricks it plays. At the end of this film, when all women have been assimilated, you seem a collage of men in a pool deep-throating banana's and singing about being homosexual is the way to go. A bit of queer propaganda has never hurt anyone. The only thing i can really say about this film is it is funny, but for all the wrong reasons.

COLD FISH

Morten Lindberg (2001) Following hot on the trail of Love Exposure is Sion Sono's newest film, Cold Fish. This odd horror film is quite a departure from his previous works because unlike most directors, Sion Sono embodies his own work with diligence and depravity. Cold Fish isn't very aesthetically similar to Love Exposure as it is more focused and budgeted on a single strand of narrative as opposed to the labyrinthine construct of Sono's absurd romance epic. Undoubtedly situated with tension, one glance at the poster should inflict mental side-effects akin to a bad omen. I could probably sit here and gush at the mere mention of Sion Sono and how spoiled and content I feel after viewing his films one after another but I will fight the affliction at its source while attempting to keep my composure. It would also become apparent that Sion Sono has gotten a handle on his cinematic deviance, even going as far as to be comic in nature. Now I pray you'll excuse the pun but Cold Fish, at its very core, profits with a morbid take on a "fish out of water" tale and like several of his films, is based on a true story. This story, in particular, being the case of Gen Sekine, a 59 year old dog breeder who conspired and poisoned four people.

Cold Fish opens up on with a very go-getting display of bright pastel colors and a delicate piano tune spliced with an ominous pounding. You can compare the introduction of Cold Fish to Gaspar Noe's Enter the Void as they both feature a very similar iconographic vortex, alike to being siphoned for every ounce of attention. We are then guests in the home of Shamoto and we watch their daily duties which include vomiting from nervousness. It is then when a chord is rung that highlights an estrangement so bizarre for being that close in proximity. Shamoto is the timid husband and proprietor of the squalid tropical fish shop they live out of, Taeko is the caretaker of the fish, and Mitsuko is the obligatory rebellious teenage girl. The events of Cold Fish pick up rather swiftly as Shamoto receives a phone call from a supermarket; the manager asking for his presence as his daughter was caught shoplifting. After some humility is passed evenly to the fragmented family, the situation is diffused when a Mr. Murata makes his presence known and talks the manager down from police intervention. After revealing that he, too, is a fish trader, Shamoto and Murata quickly bond over a stretch of peculiar and intrusive methods that leave Murata's true intentions masked. Here in lies the magic of Cold Fish, as per Sion Sono's evolution of character, this film is no exception to dizzying violence and absurd and utterly uncomfortable moments from the start to the twisted end. Shamato; shrewd and laden with cowardice. Murata; kind man whose costume is shed to reveal a sinister side - not one with the remove of, say, a greater evil. No, Murata's sickness lends much more to the promise of financial gain.

To properly describe Cold Fish, you'd have to step back and analyze each character and their behaviors. Sion Sono has learned much throughout his career. Breaking into the mainstream with J-Splatter success Suicide Club then tip-toeing through with films like Hazard, Strange Circus, and the Soiled Sinema favorite Love Exposure, Cold Fish demonstrates perfectly well the talent and mutability of his direction. The confidence that permeates on screen appeals so broadly to me. I feel as if I am invincible heading into a film of his, knowing full well that I will not be disappointed. Some might argue the fact of Noriko's Dinner Table being stale and mundane but I will refrain from commenting until I can devote my absolute full attention to it. To break down what I mentioned earlier, take the character of Taeko for example. Shown in the beginning rampaging through a grocery store, frolicking amidst the isles, gathering the necessary ingredients for a traditional Japanese supper, Sono then time-lapses through the process of preparation only to rival the exertion on her behalf with a scene of silence. Later on that evening, once Mistuko is rid from their domicile, Shamoto sits nervously with Taeko while watching a romantic late-night programme on the television. Obviously inspired by the affection, Shamato decides to make a move on Taeko only to be sternly rejected wielding the "she might come back soon" line. This catapults the common case of an unfulfilled marriage into sadistic grounds, spanning murder and infidelity. One could argue the cause but then again, Shamato never seemed to have luck on his side and this one chance meeting was enough to derail all fates featured within.

Throughout the entirety of Cold Fish, I was teased and satisfied with Sono's wonderful handling of the oft-unappreciated eccentricity of the Japanese. This ranges from extreme bouts of enthusiasm and the more commonly recognized over-emphasis of their words. This soon trickles dry, though, when Cold Fish switches the safety off half-way and turns into a dark and brooding horror film. I was unsure of how Cold Fish could end. No, how it would end. Immediately upon starting the film, you can never be sure of how it will close and upon seeing it and coming forward for another round, you simply cannot believe the curveball it is so prepared to hurl at you. I will refrain from mentioning a thing concerning the finale of Cold Fish other than this; it will terrify you, move you, shock you, and appall you. The violence featured in Cold Fish is something I had taken for granted. I did not realize I could still be shocked by something as novelty as "blood and guts" but alas, I found myself mortified, staring blankly at the screen. In retrospect, what I experienced was very similar to my first initiation to, say, the Guinea Pig series - namely, Flowers of Flesh and Blood. It was simply a spark that no words could recreate for a third-party member. To summarize all these conflicting emotions I can only muster a gasp, exhausted and drained in part of Sono's rape of character - Cold Fish is a flawless depiction of a soul dying. Sion Sono also happens to be a musical genius. He may not be so hands-on as to create his own melodies but as far as juxtaposing images to a classical score, there is no competition. Now as I ruminate on this ghastly thriller, I humbly request that you wait patiently and look forward to the R2 release from the prodigious Third Window Films and if you haven't, acquire a copy of Love Exposure through them.

DECODER

While viewing the pessimistic, yet poetic German dystopian avant-garde science fiction film Decoder (1984) - directed by Muscha and written/produced by Klaus Maeck - one gets to experience the greatest work of aesthetic terrorism ever committed to low-grade celluloid. The film was heavily inspired by the subversive meta-political cut-up theories of William S. Burroughs, so it is fitting that Decoder writer Klaus Maeck would once again pay tribute to the Beat guru by directing the spoken word collage documentary William S. Burroughs: Commissioner of Sewers (1991). Taking inspiration from his best friend Brion Gysin, Burroughs began experimenting with cut-ups, henceforth cutting-up and re-structuring everything from his writing to tape-recorded audio tapes (comprised of everything from authoritarian voices to noises in the street) while living at the Beat Hotel in 1960. The excessively pessimistic and anarchically individualistic Burroughs once stated about Gysin, "Brion Gysin was the only man I ever respected," so it is no surprise that the Beat writer would take his friend's odd experiments very seriously. Both Burroughs and Gysin were assisted by mathematician and scientist Ian Sommerville. Burroughs would later pay tribute to Sommerville for his efforts by creating a character modeled after the Beat technician named "Subliminal Kid" that is featured in the cut-up novels Nova Express and The Ticket That Exploded. Burroughs' cut-up experiments were also inspired by unconventional quasi-scientific instruments, including wacky Marxist psychoanalyst Wilhelm Reich's Orgone Accumulator and The Church of Scientology's E-Meter. With his tape-recorded cut-up experiments, Burroughs felt he had the power to use auditory aesthetic terrorism as a weapon to counter government propaganda, and even cause anti-government riots. In Klaus Maeck's ingenious experimental work Decoder, a young "noise-freak" named F.M. experiments with anti-Muzak in an attempt to destroy corporate (brainwashing) muzak that is played at an imperial and Americanized fast food chain called H. Burgers. H. Burgers advertises that they "serve 100% German beef" and they have an employee army of fascistic H-Burger Youth. F.M. is disturbed by the fact that the Muzak played at H-Burger hypnotizes customers, thus turning them into loyal consuming automatons. Of course, in Decoder - muzak (mood altering music) is better than music - but muzak of the corporate persuasion is ultimately dehumanizing and downright evil.

In an interview featured in the book Naked Lens: Beat Cinema written by Jack Sargeant, Decoder writer Klaus Maeck stated the following regarding William S. Burroughs in an interview conducted by the author, "Be aware that for Germans it is not always easy to understand his American accent, even if you do speak English. And so many people here do not understand his humor, which is what makes him so funny and lovable.” Of course, your typical American would also be at a loss to understand the absurdist humor and non-linear writings of William S. Burroughs. Naturally, Burroughs’ greatest admirers are fellow artists who found much inspiration and insight in the Beat writer’s vast collection of works. In Decoder, the cast of actors (most being non-actors) is made up of various artists who were inspired by the Beat guru in one way or another. The main protagonist of Decoder, F.M., is played by F.M. Einheit (also known as Mufti) - the real-life musician best known for contributing his percussion talents to the German post-industrial group Einstürzende Neubauten. F.M.’s beautiful girlfriend Christiana is played by Christiane F. - the real-life best-selling author and ex-junkie/ex-prostitute who wrote the gritty autobiographical book “Christiane F. - Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981)” - which was later adapted into a notable film of the same name. Also, Genesis P-Orridge - the pioneering industrial/post-industrial frontman (Throbbing Gristle and Psychic TV) and real-life friend of William S. Burroughs - plays (during his pre-tranny days) an occult muzak High Priest in Decoder. The only “real” actor featured in Decoder is William Rice - who plays Jager - a hit man sent out by an evil Muzak corporation to kill E.M.. Although an eclectic and influential avant-garde artist who contributed much to the art scene in East Village, NYC during a number of decades, Bill Rice is probably best known in the cinema world for playing himself in the segment “Champagne” featured in Jim Jarmusch’s Coffee and Cigarettes (2003). Last but certainly not least, William S. Burroughs plays a phantom shopkeeper in Decoder who gives E.M. a dismantled machine during one of his psychedelic lucid dreams. To say the least, Decoder features an all-star cast of real-life aesthetic terrorists that also happen to be the artistic heirs of William S. Burroughs.

Like Slava Tsukerman’s Liquid Sky (1982) and Agustí Villaronga’s In a Glass Cage (1987), Decoder is a totally audacious libertine art house film with an uncompromisingly distinct aesthetic that could have only been conceived during the ultra-materialistic dystopian nightmare era of the 1980s. Also like both Liquid Sky and In a Glass Cage - Decoder is a work of cinematic poetry - where the aesthetic integrity of the film is more important than the plot. Not to say that the plot of Decoder is irrelevant (it was inspired by the mind of William S. Burroughs after all!), but that the film’s plot is secondary to the alluring and mood-altering imagery of the film. Like a novel by William S. Burroughs, specific scenes of Decoder will leave a deeper impression on the viewer than the fairly uninvolved (yet meta-politically inspirational) plot. In fact, after initially watching Decoder, most people will have a difficult time articulating the plot of the film, but, of course, certain scenes in the film will indubitably stick out in their minds; whether the viewer likes it or not. Despite being a film about the power of magical sounds and spellbinding muzak; Decoder - a virtual cinematic kaleidoscope - is ultimately a visual affair that transports the viewer to an aesthetically pleasing Teutonic post-industrial wasteland - where colors speak louder than words and where a person's physical appearance reveals the most about a person's character. In the world of Decoder, German children dress up in Wehrmacht uniforms while playing their favorite arcade war games and new wave technocratic stormtroopers militantly roam the nuclear-rainbow-colored streets. Instead of embracing the Blood and Soil ideology of the Third Reich, the thoroughly Americanized post-WW2 German populous featured in the film robotically live for microchips and desolate sidewalk strips. For those individuals who have always wondered what a William S. Burroughs-inspired punk rock nightmare would be like, Decoder is probably the only film that offers such a delectable absurdist, albeit fanciful, cinematic affair. While watching Decoder, I couldn't help but wonder what the film would be like under the influence of a dreamachine (which makes an appearance in the film); a stroboscopic device that produces visual-stimuli (a "drug-less" psychedelic high) for the viewer through its hypnotic flicker, which was invented by Brion Gysin, William S. Burroughs, and Ian Sommerville; the three men that also inspired Decoder.

Aesthetically, Decoder owes some credit to the mostly forgotten no-budget "para-punk/no wave" films that were made in New York City during the late 1970s. The cinematographer behind Decoder, Johanna Heer, worked on the para-punk film Subway Riders (also featuring Bill Rice) directed by Amos Poe. In comparison to the extremely amateurish and often times improvised para-punk films, Decoder received much better funding (most of which came from West German government subsidies including "Hamburg's Film Funds" and "Kuratorium Junger Deutscher Film") and consequently grandeur production values. It should also be noted that the recently deceased industrial/post-industrial musician Peter 'Sleazy' Christopherson (Throbbing Gristle, Coil) played an imperative part in the production of Decoder by operating a video camera that was used to capture the cameos performances given by Genesis P-Orridge and William S. Burroughs in the film. Although P-Orridge's and Burroughs' appearances are brief in Decoder, they add a certain celebrity and character to the work that is vital to the film's artistic credibility. As one can expect from a film featuring pioneering industrial muzak-makers, Decoder is equipped with a complimentary soundtrack featuring tracks from such notable muzak groups as Soft Cell and Psychic TV. Indeed, Decoder is a wonderful work that travels through the meta-political heaven and hell (and everywhere in between) of the muzak world - a magickal and marvelous apocalyptic microcosmos where dream and reality are virtually one in the same - thus it is no surprise that the film is arguably the greatest phantasmagorical dystopian cinematic dream ever created. When it comes to the sub-genre of sci-fi-cyber-punk cinema, Decoder is certainly the greatest and most original of its kind (sorry Japan!). It is certainly not a coincidence that Germany and Japan - the two axis nations that were defeated in the second world war; literally the most tragic and deadly military conflict in human history - have been at the forefront of creating the most gloomy, pessimistic, and perverted films that the world has ever known.

William S. Burroughs, "Anyone with a tape recorder controlling the soundtrack can influence and create events." (The Invisible Generation, 1966)

Occult Muzak High Priest (Genesis P-orrige) in Decoder, "Information is like a bank, our job is to rob that bank."

Out of all the characters featured in Decoder, sexy Christiane F. is easily the most peculiar. What makes Christiane so different from the rest of the characters in the film is that she mostly lives in her own escapist world of the organic - where technology is disdained and frogs are godly. Apparently, the real-life Christiane F. is also an introverted lady who finds happiness and comfort in the company of her loyal pet frogs. Of course, Christiane F. is incapable of manipulating modern reality like her noise-freak boyfriend due to her uncompromising aversion to technology. When bickering with E.M., Christiane quips after mentioning the unoriginality of his noise-terrorist activities, "Even the Gestapo used music to make people shit to death." On top of being a linguistically eloquent lady, Christiane F. is also the most beautiful person featured in Decoder, despite her ridiculous punk rock wardrobe, cyber-punk hairdo, and atrocious personality. By ignoring technology, Christiane F. has only confirmed the victory of globalist corporations, therefore, she hates technology in vain; whether she acknowledges it or not. Although Christiane's anti-technocratic sentiments are admirable, she offers nothing in the way of practical solutions (aside from effortlessly cock-teasing hit man Jager) for correcting her grievances, but, instead, verbally assaults her boyfriend; a proactive man who selflessly risks his life for the good of his technologically-enslaved nation. Thus, Christiane - an armchair revolutionary of the worst kind, with a unflattering passive slave-morality to boot - is an excellent example as to how one should not react (escapism and mere negative criticism) when battling corporate terror. E.M., on the other hand - has the right idea - as he has made an effort to learn the corporate enemy's subliminal techniques and cryptic-strategies, henceforth somewhat successfully battling corporate muzak with his subversive anti-muzak.

Decoder Soundtrack featuring songs from EinStürzende Neubauten, Soft Cell, E.M., and Psychic TV The cut-up novels of William S. Burroughs and the revolutionary anti-technocratic film Decoder were certainly ahead of their respective times, as both ambitious experiments are more relevant today than when they were originally released. It is no mistake that scenes from Fritz Lang's futuristic dystopian sci-fi film Metropolis (1927) appear in Decoder, as both German films foretold the progressive enslavement and collective homogenization of man via technology and international capitalist monopolies. Man may have created the machine in a feeble attempt to become god, but now the machine controls man and man is left with a godless spiritual void that will most likely never be organically fulfilled. It should be noted that most of the key points predicted by German philosopher Oswald Spengler (whose works were a major influence on William S. Burroughs' worldview) in his work Man and Technics: A Contribution to a Philosophy of life (1931) – a short, but insightful book that poetically illustrates man's technological deracination from nature and inevitable dependence on manmade machines – have unfortunately come true. Although Decoder was released over a quarter-century ago during the Orwellian year of 1984, war fought through abstract and subliminal technology has only become even more relevant and inorganically sophisticated - as one can engage in cyberwars on the internet from the comfort of a personal home computer. Now the layman can cheaply operate his own international digital television channel via YouTube, as well as manage a worldwide digital newspaper via a blog/website (like this one!). For the more criminally-minded, one can attack government computers, steal a person's identity, and illegally appropriate money as an on-line hacker from any place in the world. If you think William S. Burroughs was merely a degenerate junkie-queer writer, it is about time you open your eyes and unplug your ears, and watch Decoder; a film that clearly demonstrates as to why the Beat writer lived by Hassan I Sabbah's supposed last words, "Nothing is true – Everything is Permitted."

MAD MUTILATOR

N.G. Mount (1983)

Now this is what I'm talking about. Mad Mutilator, no, Ogroff the Mad Mutilator (1983), is a film that brings me harking back to my heydays in the course of splatter cinema. An age in which most cinephiles discover and explore, leading them to extended bathing in celluloid excrement. Mad Mutilator is something I had been meaning to check out and a recommendation from a dear friend put Ogroff's mutilation onto the fast track of necessary viewing. Having time off during work surely befitted the experience of Mad Mutilator; that pounding pressure in the frontal lobe that needed to be exorcised with a crudely fashioned axe. Just what was I getting myself into? Mad Mutilator opens on a note of sheer esoterica with a car stopping and a bouncing, bubbly boy skipping into the forest. Like any radically redesigned filmmaker, N.G. Mount decides to begin his crude French slasher with our pivotal mutilator shedding the boy of mortal coil. For being a steaming heap of film dung, Mad Mutilator sure shelters something enjoyable under its hood, even if I can't quite put my finger on it. So what Mad Mutilator is, is a low-fidelity French splatter film whose crude upbringing really fosters a Violent Shit anti-aesthetic. It is a classic example of film degraded to the point of an untranslatable condition.

Other than offering the maiming of a child, Ogroff's daily duties of thinning out the French population offer many surprises, especially when the film turns over halfway. After dramatic chase effects and the slaying of teenagers playing chess in the plains, Ogroff heads to his cabin to gawk at a pin up whose literally pinned up with darts. After this, his post-edited grunts strike off a scene in which Ogroff's Axe becomes his personal phallic extension and proceeds to masturbate and fondle his own instrument of terror. Actually, Ogroff loves tasking his Axe with the nubile flesh of women. So much soft skin to be flayed, so little time. In fact, had he kill with sexual discrimination, meaning only women, a fetishistic satisfaction could be argued - his utilizing of the blade. This proves to be too much thought put into such a shallow pool of aggressive ideas, though. Another of Ogroff's hobbies isn't so much cannibalism as feeding his pets, namely a dog and several zombies under the rubble of his hut. Shown in brief scenes throwing ground beef under a steel trapdoor, this is later heavily emphasized when these zombies escape, turning a tale of a masked murderer into the making of a tragic anti-hero. Boy, Ogroff sure is a strange creature, one who fights for the lives of his victims. So much so that by films end, the term happy refuses to apply with our mutilator's fate.

Perhaps my favorite expression of Mad Mutilator's is the all-synth soundtrack whose inspirations spouts therein influence and ethereal screams from past dimension X (must be). It is purely the soundtrack whose preeminence creates the shifting soiled tone of the film that sparks hints of atmosphere. Compiled with fluctuating bubbles, pops, and whistles, Mad Mutilator's soundtrack sounds as if it were concocted in an all-too literal "beat laboratory". Without the soundtrack of synth-science, Mad Mutilator would benefit from nothing. It would be the cinematic equivalent of a black hole. Already is there scare dialog but paired with the abscessed special effects (if you can call them that) you'd get a life-killing incident of slasher footage. Ogroff's visage depends entirely on his leather-sex-mask. His character is thankfully gifted with some remove of a psychopath but plays bumbling in several scenes, specifically when he gives up chase with the mother of the slain child only to turn around to witness the car pass her, thus preempting him to return with chase. In this and many other regards, it is possible to connect Ogroff with some form of autism, giving him leagues more depth. For certain reasons, Mad Mutilator's only real contribution to film is the wacky events that later give way to early elements of fan fiction and the fact that it is a French antique. One that can be cherished if quality isn't a token concern and Axe-havings benefit whatever sour mood you may be in. Mad Mutilator also predates the brutality that the cowardly French would later adopt as the crown of their influx of neo-horror films.

Even the story is ridden with faults. Mad Mutilator contains itself within the span of an afternoon or so it seems. Ogroff trails the roads, finding victim after victim. If math is given consent then his body count alone for a week would trim a large portion of rural France's population. Ogroff is the very personification of genocide - a cold, burly machine capable of unstoppable madness. This changes with the inclusion of the undead, however, as Ogroff is besmirched by his own pets and by films end, unknowingly becomes a shambling toxic creation of his own doing. Mad Mutilator doesn't stop there though. Near the final minutes of Ogroff do we find one of Ogroff's maidens being given a ride by a humble holy man who turns out to be of vampiric origins. The forest in which Ogroff resides must be of cursed soil. How else would so many myths, legends, and monsters thrive off what seems to be barren in regards to resources or wildlife? Don't mistake my tooting of Mad Mutilator's horn to hint achievement. No, Mad Mutilator compromises the very notion of tedium and even manages to make a chainsaw fight echo mundane. Past the inclusion of some strange figures, Mad Mutilator Béla Tarr instead decided to focus his long tracking shots on rookie dreams of cheap gore and Axe murders. Repetition, when employed passively, can benefit your acquisition of knowledge in many cases, even furthering dramatic effect. In Mad Mutilator, repetition will be your undoing. Many scenes prove to be expendable. In fact, an abridged version could only benefit the film. Although I am fairly partial to the ending, an ending in which Ogroff's morality can be questioned. Perhaps Ogroff "madly mutilates" to keep the zombies destructive appetites curbed. Maybe his daily duties of murder are but for the greater good, less these creatures of the night destroy the very fabric of society. But really, who cares if Ogroff is too stupid to distinguish life from zombie?

If proven to do anything, Mad Mutilator's only ability is to force me to spend an awfully long time contemplating a film that I will inevitably hate, but with appreciation.

Nacho Cerdà (1994)

With Nacho Cerdà's extremely literal necrophiliac short Aftermath (1994), what you see in terms of visuals is what you get and nothing more. So, what do you see in Aftermath? In the short, you see a degenerate mortician fornicate with the recently deceased body of a Spanish woman. As can be expected from a woman from Spain; the female corpse is swarthy, but exotic, yet unfortunately (but unsurprisingly) on the way to being exceedingly rotted and surely less than erotic. The mortician in Aftermath - who undoubtedly gives off the vibe of a creep merely from the cold stare of his dark eyes - has a little foreplay with the female cadaver, running his knife (which he initially uses as a substitute phallic) up and down the corpse's cold body. In most studies concerning real-life necrophilia, over half of the corpse-humpers admit their sexual interest in the dead is due to the fact that an animated body makes for an unresisting and 100% rejection-free sex partner, thus one can assume that aside from being mentally deranged; the majority of necrophiliacs are also pathetic losers (at least in terms of obtaining consensual sex with the opposite sex). The necrophiliac mortician of Aftermath not only likes to slip his pecker into an extra cold meat curtain, but he also enjoys taking pornographic pictures of his necro-sex-escapades. At best, Aftermath is a decently shot piece of Necrophilia-cinema, yet thematically it is fairly shallow - offering nothing more to the viewer than sensational mortuary copulation. For those that get their jollies by merely watching the sickest images they can find taken at face value; Aftermath will be a work of high-class splatter art. For those looking for a deeper subtext (as featured in Buttgerit's Nekromantik films) contained within a necrophiliac work; Aftermath will surely be disturbing and sickening entertainment, and nothing more.

Nekromantik director Jörg Buttgerit has already paid his respects (as featured on the Unearthed Films release of Aftermath) to Nacho Cerdà and his necrophiliac work Aftermath. I can imagine Cerdà couldn't have received a greater compliment for Aftermath - as Buttgerit is indubitably the greatest artistic innovator behind necro-ophile cinema. Having already seen Buttgerit's feature-length works prior to Aftermath; I felt nothing groundbreaking nor cinematically spectacular was accomplished with the Spanish director's subversive short. After all, Spaniards Luis Buñuel and Salvador Dalí produced something much darker - both in imagery and theme - with Un Chien Andalou (1929); a Spanish surrealist short that was created over 3/4 of a century ago. Aftermath does provide strong evidence that Nacho Cerdà may one day develop into an accomplished and innovative auteur, but it is also obvious that he has yet to mature in the realm of complex themes. After all, Aftermath is probably the most expertly crafted (from a technical perspective) film featuring necrophilia ever made, yet the film is undeniably lacking in substance. I also found Cerdà's feature-length film The Abandoned (2006) to be decently made horror work, but that film - like Aftermath - lacks substance and originality. Aftermath is actually the second film in a trilogy by Nacho Cerdà. The final film in the trilogy; Genesis - a work about re-birth - is probably Cerdà's most original film to date. Despite its weaknesses, Aftermath is still a notable film that I can recommend - as I do not doubt that Spanish director Nacho Cerdà will one day make a name for himself as one of the greatest artists of "horror" cinema.

Due to Aftermath's aesthetic and thematic similarities with the infamous "The Roswell Alien Autopsy" footage, various people mistakenly think that Cerdà directed the pseudo-documentary footage. To Cerdà's credit, Aftermath does have a certain authentic look that makes it seem more disturbing than it actually is. Still, I found myself laughing when the mortician initially mounts the female corpse in the short. Unlike the corpse fucking in Nekomantik; Aftermath lacks the kind of artistic beauty that is so often associated with Buttgerit's films. Whereas Buttgerit presents necrophilia in a most easily digestible manner; Nacho Cerdà's presents it in a cold and sterile real-life mortuary kind of way. Of course, Cerdà was obviously trying to offend in hopes that he would "burn a hole into the soul of the viewer" with Aftermath, thus giving the title of the film a double-meaning (whether that was Cerdà's intention or not). At the emotional aftermath of watching Aftermath, you will certainly never think of corpses and morticians in the same way. Also, a warning to dog lovers: Aftermath will most likely cause you to be very pissed, not to mention disgusted (even more so than the film's corpse fucking!).

Nacho Vigalondo (2007)

The leering cover art is what initially grasped me by the collar; a bandaged messianic figure with a haggard trench coat wielding scissors with malicious intent. Sounds almost like a film based on the Clock Tower video game series, doesn't it? Rather than attempting horror, Timecrimes takes the jet-set path to science fiction bludgeoning 12 Monkeys and Timecop into the same hypothesis. While this may sound like a convoluted mess that's hard to distinguish the thematic moral of the story; save the lady or save the world, Hector is the star of an easy to understand time travel movie. A better way to put it is that Timecrimes is an intelligent and engaging film equipped with training wheels. It's a nice departure from being primo mindfuck as I like to mix-match the intellectual trials with the devious entertainment so Timecrimes came as a surprise to me, one that does become slightly frustrating as we watch Hector 3 or 2 replay the same scene from a different vantage.

After I received this film from America's favorite courier service, Netflix, I procrastinated immensely with this film as I didn't see myself fit to sit and stare at a television screen perplexed in what I would consider the most stressful week of my hardly progressed life. I tried over and over to become absorbed in the film and ended up just putting it on pause at an estimated 9 minutes in. The one day I found time to sit and watch this film uninterrupted I discovered that once you reach 10 minutes in, the film ejects itself from the prepositioning phase into a wild world of an unexplainable nude woman and a mysterious bandaged man who loves to stab incarnations of himself which presents itself as the most painful distraction to be presented in time travel cinema. Poor Hector, who knows how long he's been living in this Groundhog Day hell on earth. Not to bring any spoilers upon you, the nude woman is perhaps one of the better scenes in the film. Not for continuity or presentation, but for the actress's incredible body. Every time she appeared on screen, which was often, I got shivers down my spine. I had no idea that a Spanish dame could be so attractive. Timecrimes gets points for both having someone fill the once empty "useless chick" role but also turning that position into something that becomes a martyr for the murderous instincts lurking deep within one of Hector's personalities . . . or all of them. The bandaged saint and his laboratory accomplice reincarnate themselves as leading roles instead of supporting characters which enhances the swift kick into the genitals that occurs nearing the finale of this never-ending cycle of epochal torture. Timecrimes is a film that is innocently simple enough for the childlike film goer whose expectations match explosions and swiftly thrown curse words. This momentous occasion in which a film revolving about an intricate plot and repeating consequence that is simple enough for a toddler to understand is why Timecrimes should be essential viewing for those who haven't been implemented the teachings of finer cinema. Not much to say about this film other than it's required viewing of the impartial genre that is composed of the underdeveloped and under-appreciated niche entitled Spanish cinema e.g. Killing Words. Time-crimes is a textbook science-fiction thriller that does just about everything right and in the end, it's simplicity manages to kill the arthouse feel but resuscitates that acclaimed ongoing personal melancholy with its vibrant and lush wooded setting. An environmental surprise that reeks of talent and misery, Timecrimes did not disappoint me for even a minute. Just goes to show that even the most civil of men house a "dark passenger."

MERRY CHRISTMAS, MR. LAWRENCE

Nagisa Ōshima (1983)

David Bowie has played various film roles during his career where he has magical and supernatural powers, probably because he is known for being a space oddity of sorts. That being said, I do not think he has ever seemed more powerful than he does in the film Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence directed by Japanese auteur Nagisa Oshima. David Bowie has been an ambiguously queer fellow his whole life (I think he fancies black women now), no doubt the British heir of Oscar Wilde's dandy boy legacy. In Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence Bowie's Ziggy Stardust powers reach their full potency in a film that Yukio Mishima would have probably (secretly) described as his favorite romance movie had he not committed ritual suicide via Seppuku before the film was released. Despite the film being fairly aesthetically normal (or many times, even boring), Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence is a certainly film like no other, a demented forbidden romance between Anglo male and Japanese male, a song of subversive ultranationalistic Samurai sexuality.

Colonel John Lawrence is a charming British fellow, a man that looks after his fellow British POW comrades and attempts to form a somewhat positive relationship with his Japanese captors. Lawrence has no tolerance for Japs giving his fellow Brits slaps (on top of much worse physical punishment), thus resulting in being beaten many times whilst coming to his comrades rescue. Like the cultured Brit that he is, Mr. Lawrence also prefers chatting (as opposed to physical barbarism) with his Japanese captors in a respectful manner, attempting to instill reason into a group of Japanese men who still live by a strict and many times irrational spiritual Japanese Samurai code. One Japanese chap asks Mr. Lawrence, "Is it true that all English men are Homosexuals?" I consider that a fair question as I wondered the same thing for the longest time but then I realized I was just used to American-style barbarian manners and a less refined (and bastardized) form of the English language. Mr. Lawrence is no doubt offended by the Japanese man's question regarding Anglo sexuality and assures the silly Jap that wartime is just a time for extra special male bonding. Somewhat shockingly (to me), the Japanese man states, "You all fear homosexuality, a Samurai doesn't fear it." The great Japanese Samurai writer Yukio Mishima probably feared it (or at least was ashamed of it), but that may have also led him to be the last famous figure in Japan to commit Seppuku, a poetic honor like no other, a feat that truly proves that the sword is mightier than the pen.

Aesthetically, aside from the films wonderful (if not somewhat dated) soundtrack, Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence is not exactly the most innovative film. The power of the film lies between the chemistry of the actors, most notably David Bowie (who plays Jack Celliers) and Ryuichi Sakamoto (who plays Captain Yonoi). Captain Yonoi is an uptight authoritarian figure who seems to follow a strict Samurai code; that is until he first sees Jack Celliers. Any fellow Jap that attempts to harm Celliers, Captain Yonoi punishes in an almost reflex-like manner. Immediately, Mr. Lawrence becomes perplexed by Yonoi's obsession with Jack Celliers but soon realizes it is of a homoerotic nature. In fact, it becomes fairly blatant to everyone at the POW camp that Captain Yonoi has a homoerotic obsession with Celliers, so obvious that Yonoi's ADC attempts to kill Jack in hopes that it will free Yonoi-boy from his gay love. David Bowie's flower-eating super-homo powers are far too powerful for Yonoi, so compelling that Mr. Stardust prevents the execution of a man by kissing the Captain and causing him to lose all of his sexually repressed Samurai discipline. This simple kiss scene is possibly the gayest scene I ever seen in a film despite how seemingly innocent it may seem. In Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence David Bowie's life-long crusade of extra spacey ambiguously gay power finally reaches its full peak with a mere peck on the cheek.

Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence is a film that caught me by surprise for I expected another boring American POW World War II film and received a rainbow roller-coaster through sexually-repressed Samurai hell. No tour through Stalingrad or South Africa could prepare a viewer for a film like Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence nor could a Rainer Werner Fassbinder cinema marathon. I fear that the blond rebel beast David Bowie will now haunt my dreams, staring at me with his heterochromia eyes, chewing on his flowers for what would feel like hours. Near the conclusion of the film Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence Jack Celliers suffers a tragic end buried from the neck down in a Japanese torture garden. Still, by the end of the film one feels content knowing Captain Yonoi salutes his comrade one last time.

TURKISH I SPIT ON YOUR GRAVE

Naki Yurter (1979)

I really don't know how else to put it. If I labeled this review Intikam Kadini, It would probably lose interest and not draw eyes as this alternative title does and seeing as there already is a Turkish film called Kadini Intikam directed in 1968, I don't want to risk the chance of the Internet buzz indicator spoiling my credibility. So, as the cinema industry would have it, our good friends in Turkey have decided to remake a film that never really had any substantial elements to it to begin with. I can foresee the day some third world country decides to remake Reptilicus. And such is the origins of the spawn of nightmares and how "it" comes into existence. I Spit On Your Grave is a classic of rape/revenge films merely because it is one of few that actually attempted to supersede violence, both sexually and primordial, and form a film with both of these key assets in mind. Now, in most rape/revenge films, It's the same formula over and over again that somehow only gets increasingly worse as the idea stays out to dry longer. You'd think with the Hollywood reinvention of contemporary cinema, some chump would attempt to reinvent the genre. Oh wait, there was an attempt that slipped under most radars. While Death Sentence was an amazing attempt to create a post-modern version of Death Wish but with less Bronson and more Bacon, the result was a film that lacked rape and thus, lacked nutrition. To start out, allow me to state this obvious. This Turkish rendition of a "rape classic" is absolutely disgusting and vile and not in the exhibitionist aspect. Almost every segment of this film is annoying, contrived, anti-cultured, and to put it plainly; lame. But the real "sauce" that flavors this film is, hilariously enough, the transfer of the print. Remember when Grindhouse was released and the audience soon noticed the scratches and grain on screen. Well this move also helped out booth operators worldwide as they didn't have to risk scratching a print and having their manager scold them. The Turkish I Spit On Your Grave is one of the worst negatives I've ever witness and ironically enough, this by itself is enough to turn the film into soluble material and even a degraded form of art. For more on the subject of decaying film as an art, check out an interesting piece called Decasia - The State of Decay. So what one would expect, thankfully, is still intact. A group of rough travelers stop by what appears to be a farm plot run by a peasant girl and a mild-mannered farm hand that meets his fate at the hands of the disgruntled male. To continue the tradition, hormones fluctuate and this "poor" female is sodomized by 3 to 4 men. I've seen dramatic interpretations of rape here and there but none have touched the level of unbelievable and cheesy as this film accomplishes within a swift 10 minutes. After she was raped and noticed her deus ex machina was slaughtered off screen by a Turkish Bob Hoskins, she packs her bags (She has none. She recovered from the trauma rather quickly) and sets off to the city to become that of a social chameleon with plans to seduce and destroy and she does just this but in really anti-climatic ways that takes the subject of implied violence and attaches weights to the very idea. What the final product equates to is an acid-washed film print of an unauthorized remake lacking subtitles. The experience is wholly psychedelic and whiny at times but I enjoyed myself thoroughly watching this film. If this film were to ever find release, the transfer better be just as bad if not worse. I'd never thought I'd see the day where a shitty transfer can actually amplify the effects of a film, let alone redeem it for the very sin that it creates. For some great pseudo-Muslim softcore pornography, this title is a very arousing piece of third world debauchery composed of archaic cinematography and the likes. In other words, come ready with gifts of alcohol as this film isn't as wacky as the other Turkish atrocities. And by that I mean this is disappointing compared to Turkish Star Wars. Sucking at sucking must suck.

EAT THE SCHOOLGIRL
EAT THE SCHOOLGIRL

Naoyuki Tomomatsu (1997)

This title is severely misleading. There are no scenes of cannibalism or any real schoolgirls for that matter. This film has taboo's on the mind and does not stop until you are convinced it can't get any worse. This is just another notch in the book of extreme Asian cinema. It's a shame that other countries don't have an extensive list of violent and depraved films like Japan does. The plot is very jumpy and is mostly incoherent. The film opens up with a woman having phone sex with a young blond haired guy. It is only obvious what he is doing. This scene is way too drawn out and lasts an embarrassingly long 3-4 minutes. If you live with anyone who knows not of your estranged cinema taste, your best bet would be to turn the volume down, as we know Jap orgasms are painfully loud and over-acted. After this, there are several scenes depicting a man dressing as a schoolgirl slaughtering people and immediately ejaculating on their face. Mid-coitus has never been so disgustingly fun. Along the way, we have beautifully drawn crayon murals, angelic figures being promiscuous, forced enema's, and a throat fucking-vomit inducing rape scene turned consensual. Apart from being extremely sadistic, the film has some beautiful imagery and clashing color schemes that blend together to strangely make this film work. The film is at a barely recognizable running time of 60 minutes. Too long to be a short, Naoyuki Tomomatsu knows how to beat the system. I will have to hand it to Eat the Schoolgirl for not sticking to one genre. We have a thriller with touches of surrealism laced with a gangster side story and many hints of love around every bloody corner. It's mainly about rubbing one out in the faces of death which should be at the top of everyones priority list. While being confusing and an overall mess, Eat the Schoolgirl is a decent art house/exploitation film from the director of that horrible film we cant help but love "STACY". There is enough rape and gore to satisfy the biggest pervert and enough symbolism to keep the run-of-the-mill cult cinema watcher endowed with a headache. It comes recommended.

VERMILION EYES

Nathan Schiff (1990) A piece of self-destructive writing; how beautiful. I was watching this film when I humbly dozed off in a beautiful land of still-images that were currently happening. Just over an hour satisfied me deeply; this carnivorous decaying film of stillborn images of the deepest sexual gratification and hidden pleasures. In many ways, this film suits me, not only in my current mood, but in my current stance. Soundtrack of the now: Sanchez is driven by demons. Ambiance embeds me into my current seat. If there were only two things on my mind right now, it'd be a fine piece of cinema and the casual mind-fuck woman. Not to get too "off-topic", the film picks up instantly with an over-weight Mexican looking man. Not much is known about him other than the present discovery of his fetish donning a haz-mat suit near dead bodies and satisfying his deepest voyeuristic fetishes. What a world we live in! Balance reigns supreme. I noticed a wonderful spider blocking my wooded route today. It was asleep; perfectly in the center. A bulls eye consisting of a wonderful insect. Such symbolism today is reminding me of Nathan Schiff's lost film. A dreary work of art. One which many can't relate to. I sometimes wonder if the directors have personal motifs. Our central (again; balance) character is a blend of a cavalier spirit and also blurring personalities, left only with excess characterization. He dreams and films dead women. Just like the modern sociopath before him, he is fascinated with death in the most intimate form. Other than that, he dresses up in air proof clothing to establish the disconnection betwixt him and the dearly departed. A whores sarcastic grin taunts his ego. For this, he must backlash. But it was all a dream? For this man, Love is the only escape from his inner psyche. But when bad goes to worse, and worse becomes women, the only thing to really do is to embrace your falling. Much like I've learned to do over the years. Vermilion Eyes is a contemporary Peeping Tom. You see, when I first viewed Peeping Tom, I hated the film. Sure, it had "the angles and the budget", but it was as bland as they come. Criterion isn't a label that automatically makes a film they release "amazing" and "a work of art." A more proper term for a Criterion release would be "Jesus fuck, not another Kurosawa film." One of many things Peeping Tom lacks, is intimacy. The film feels dry and distasteful. Vermilion Eyes catches up the slack felt behind and promotes a superfluous film articulated with a grainy backdrop and a modern depression with a scar of a killer. On the down side, the acting is pretty horrific at times. In fact, "the woman" walked in as I was viewing this. Let's just say she walked in at an unfortunate time, and I looked like a fool watching a Lifetime film 12 times recorded. That's the only downside I can establish grounds with. The sound effects are top-notch and even more so their cues. Every scene would be nothing if not aided with a harsh screeching of an alone instrument. I've read forums (Not much information exists on the film) and all I've read are portraits of how "gory" the film is. This is not as brutal as it is "piercing." Vermilion Eyes is definitely it's own experience. It lulled me to a silent slumber as well as shook me until I was wide awake. I've got to hand it to Nathan Schiff. He successfully captures the feel of Nekromantik, yet being an American film. "One man's trash is another man's treasure" This quote strikes a great blow to the viewing nature of the film. So far, the only copy is this film is a beyond horrific VHS rip floating around on the world wide web. Normally, I'd rather a DVD rip or a remastered version so I can contain every detail, but for a bizarre reason, the grain, sound cut-offs, and tracking error's complete the film. It's all in place to combine a low-budget puzzle of a scintillated kind.

Like Caligula before it, Vermilion Eyes features an explicit "babydeath" scene as a crudely-animated drunk driver takes the life of a family on the road. This, I can imagine, would be enough to enrage any form of censorship committee. The character touches the dead infant with tragedy in his touch. One to which I can relate wholly to. He promptly wraps the infant up and stores it. As surrealist as it gets, Vermilion Eyes never gets too unrealistic. A step above other low budget productions; behind these eyes lies a great vision, a vision of horrors committed to bodies being captured on celluloid; much like we would be viewing now. Schiff knows how to embrace the fleshy details of a woman's form, creating from this vessel, a beautiful canvas that we can all enjoy watching burn. Schiff has discovered the ecstasy behind death; for which he created, Vermilion Eyes.

A very whole-hearted thanks to Pete Cann for this film.

THE CRYING GAME

Neil Jordan (1992)

The Crying Game, upon initial viewing, is an unsettling experience. Neil Jordan was able to direct a film with unconventional characters in situations you generally would never expect. In doing, Jordan demonstrates the power of cinema as an emotional persuader. Even the most offensive and disturbing of situations come out as normal and everyday feelings. The Crying Game is a "Game" of emotions created by the director (and a well acted cast) against the audience.

Forest Whitaker stars as a British soldier named Jody who is captured by the Irish terrorist group the IRA. Jody strikes up an ambiguous relationship with an IRA Irishman by the name of Fergus. After an unfortunate and violent accident of sorts, Fergus seeks to find Jody's true love. For reasons not apparent at first, Fergus is compelled to see someone he really knows nothing about. All too soon, Fergus realizes that there was more to Jody than met the eye.

Throughout The Crying Game, Fergus has visions of Jody playing bat mitzen enthusiastically. I found these scenes to be unintentionally comical yet help to "glue" the film together. Fergus seems trapped between his past life in the IRA (which comes back to haunt him) and the "new life" he has yet to realize consciously. Everything Fergus faces in life is some type of hurdle. Fergus hunts down Jody's "girl" Dil, and immediately becomes obsessed. Fergus gives Dil "the look" and a bond starts to develop. A bond of the unholy sort that I dare not mention. The Crying Game features a clashing and connection between various subcultures of Great Britain. Neil Jordan was able to take a simply directed film and through its story, make it unforgettable. Also, Neil Jordan might hate women.

THE WICKER MAN
THE WICKER MAN

Neil LaBute (2006)

The Wicker Man (1973) is one of the best horror films ever made. The film is truly an eerie experience of Neo-Pagan horror. When I found out that a remake had been made starring Nicholas Cage, I was more than skeptical. The horror remake is inevitable for most of the "classic" films. The update of The Wicker Man is further evidence that no film is too sacred in the eyes of money worshipers. The location of Summersisle has changed from an Island in Scotland to the coasts of Washington state, USA. This change already takes away crucial atmospheric elements found in the original film. The inhabitants of Summersisle USA still have their Celtic roots (in the form of blonde hair and lame clothes). Nickie Cage cannot understand their backwards and unprogressive ways.

The new and unimproved The Wicker Man features an anti-feminist (or feminist) slant. These Summersisle folks are ruled by one sexually frustrated female. The men are pathetic second class citizens who are in complete servitude to their busting bosom counterparts. One could look at these evil bitches as heroes (Emma Goldman fans) or heretics. I felt enormous pleasure in seeing a large bull dyke take a blow to the face via Nicholas Cage's fist.

The Wicker Man is another one of those films that feature an evil white child on the front cover (although the little girl never has evil eyes in the film). Hollywood really gets off to portraying the juvenile white devil as a literal one. I would not mind seeing Spielberg's children sporting a pair of devil horns and a tail in his next epic fantasy.

I could go on as to why The Wicker Man is just another bad remake but that is unnecessary. The remake of The Wicker Man is an entertaining look into the destruction of important aspects of film in hopes to receive a lowest common denominator financial success. Nicholas Cage deserves an Oscar for the beatings he gave at Feminist island. Someone needs to drop off some Nazi SS Zombies (like those found in Shock Waves) at Summersisle.

LAKEVIEW TERRACE

Neil LaBute (2008) I absolutely loathe Samuel L. Jackson. For some reason, when I see him on a TV screen I just wish that his head would explode (kind of like in Cronenberg's Scanners) during one of those moments where he acts "uppity." I have also never found Mr. Jackson to be "cool" nor have I ever felt that most of those "cool" films that he has starred in have been of any quality. I once explained to a burnt out hippie type why I felt that Black Snake Moan was easily one of the most degenerate stylized pieces of cancerous filth that I had ever seen. Naturally, the hippie fuck was baffled and just continued to talk about why he thought Samuel L. Jackson was so "bad assss." There is one performance featuring Samuel L. Jackson that I do appreciate and it happens to be in the universally hated film Lakeview Terrace. Of course, Lakeview Terrace is your typical Hollywood high quality (as in high priced) dung, but it features SLJ in a new type of role. Jackson plays a racist cop that hates race mixing and "progressive" types. When an interracial couple moves next door to this black racist cop, things start to get excitingly politically incorrect. Not only does SLJ hate race mixing, but he also hates wiggers that spend their wasted days loitering parking lots.

From my personal experience, I have encountered two types of black cops: lovable uncle toms (like Sgt. Al Powell in Die Hard) and angry racist black cops. SLJ does a superb job playing the latter type of cop and he also demonstrates a valuable point. The masses love Samuel L. Jackson when he's a belligerent criminal unloading bullets into people, yet they hate him when he's a belligerent criminal cop unloading bullets into other criminals. Are blacks only cool to the masses when they are criminals (or "messiahs")? Why is a black criminal cop something to be despised yet many times black gangsta crack dealers are considered cool?

Hollywood loves to romanticize over "minority" criminals and the masses love these imaginary criminals even more in return. In Lakeview Terrace, a black man holds a decent job and supports his family (as a single father) but is made out to be the ultimate villain. Of course, Hollywood is run by "men" that lack more than a little testosterone and hate to see a man that actually is responsible for his family. After all, isn't it fascist and misogynistic for a man to run a household nowadays? According to Lakeview Terrace, "being a man" might even lead you to trying to kill interracial couples. Hollywood certainly knew how to channel Samuel L. Jackson's "cool" uppity behavior and utilize it to demonstrate the PURE EVIL of a Negro dats gotta job!

DOG SOLDIERS

Neil Marshall (2002)

Unfortunately for the horror fan, a quality werewolf film is hard to come by. The Howling is still an okay film that has obviously aged ungracefully over time. John Landis' An American Werewolf in London is not a bad film either but is far from a serious werewolf film. It is a shame that horror "directors" aren't obsessed with directing films about lycanthropes as they are with lame zombie flicks. The directly-to-video werewolf film Dog Soldiers is proof that you don't need a lot of artistic talent and money to make a quality film about bloodthirsty furry beasts. Dog Soldiers is a film set in the highlands of Scotland (although actually filmed in Luxembourg). The rural area in the film would alone scare most city dwellers as the wild is obviously dominant over man in Dog Soldiers. The film follows six British soldiers that have been dropped off in the highlands of Scotland. These chaps, to their horror, find the remains of a special forces unit. The only member left of this savagely slaughtered unit is a weirdo that goes by the name of Captain Ryan. A blond beast named Cooper is in charge of the "dog soldiers." He had a prior problem with the mysterious and arrogant Captain Ryan. Cooper seems to love dogs and refused to shoot one on the request of Captain Ryan as part of special forces training. Cooper makes it clear early in the film that he only fights those that desire to be punished. Captain Ryan, on the other hand, has a sort of sadistic persona that repulses Cooper. The hate between these natural enemies reaches an intense climax during the conclusion of Dog Soldiers. When I first started watching Dog Soldiers, I expected your typical cheap and forgettable horror film. The production values seemed low and the artistry nonexistent. As the film progressed, I found Dog Soldiers to be possibly the most well paced and action packed (in a good way) werewolf film that I have ever seen. Dog Soldiers also features a few twists and turns successfully making the film even more entertaining. The lead protagonist of the film Cooper is a real man that you can admire unlike most heroes found in your typical contemporary American horror or action film. The lycanthropes featured in Dog Soldiers are tall and lanky man beasts worthy of being in a werewolf film. These werewolves don't look like the universal wolfman but more like wolves of gigantic proportions. The fact these werewolves are less human than your typical werewolf only makes them more horrifying. I must admit that I approved very much so when the soldiers started killing these man beasts. The soldiers that fight these werewolves seem to have a homoerotic bond of comradeship. Dog Soldiers director Neil Marshall would also visit a "girl power" lesbian theme in his later film The Descent.

THE TELEPHONE BOOK

Nelson Lyon (1971)

While I certainly consider myself to be someone that has a more libertine oriented sense of humor than most people and consider virtually no subject to be too taboo, I have always found most so-called 'sex comedies' to be particularly retarded and just an excuse for a filmmaker to assemble a highly profitable masturbation aid for lonely losers that cannot get pussy on their own. Of course, a handful of great Guido arthouse auteur filmmakers like Pier Paolo Pasolini (The Decameron, Teorema) and Marco Ferreri (Dillinger Is Dead, Tales of Ordinary Madness) made some notable films that might be loosely described as sex comedies, but I cannot think of any other films from the ostensibly carnal comedy subgenre that don't make sex seem hopelessly banal, at least until I recently saw the somewhat obscure X-rated counterculture cult piece The Telephone Book (1971) directed by one-time auteur Nelson Lyon, who somewhat fittingly later produced Paul Morrissey's Spike of Bensonhurst (1988). While a man that is notable for working for Andy Warhol (apparently, he gave Warhol the idea for the cover artwork that he designed for the 1971 Rolling Stones album Sticky Fingers), acting as a writer for Saturday Night Live, and producing spoken word albums for both William S. Burroughs and Terry Southern (whose writings, especially his novel Candy (1958) co-penned by Israelite Mason Hoffenberg, were an obvious strong influence on Lyon's film), Lyon is unquestionably best remembered today as the man who was blamed by the entertainment industry for the death of Jim Belushi (the two injected a heroin-cocaine cocktail called a 'speedball' together after a boy's night out), which is somewhat fitting considering the decidedly debauched nature of his sole feature, which more or less feels like the deranged fantasy of a wayward kosher creep that lusts after defiling pedomorphic shiksa girls. Indeed, the story of a terribly stupid childlike 18-year-old dame that looks and acts more like a 12-year-old who becomes infatuated with a smooth talking obscene phone caller and goes on an vaguely orgasmic odyssey to try to find him that ultimately results in her encountering various other perverts, The Telephone Book is a sleekly directed piece of proudly obnoxious art-trash that seems to delight in acknowledging the fact that the United States degenerated into a Hebraic hell hole of senseless and nihilistic hedonism as a result of culture-distorting movements like so-called women's liberation, the sexual revolution, and other metaphysically malignant countercultural crud that the baby boomers bought into that was mostly imported to the U.S. by resentful German-Jews who wanted to get back at the evil Aryan Goyim. Somewhat seeming like it was created by the bastard stepson of Dušan Makavejev and Robert Downey Sr. and penned by the neo-Freudian head of the Frankfurt School psychoanalysis department, the film is notable for featuring a couple Warhol superstars (e.g. Ondine and Ultra Violent) and concluding with a 'climatic' piece of surreal animated pornography, but I think it is most important in that it indubitably demonstrates that when Uncle Adolf kicked the heebs out of Germany, they set up shop in NYC and ultimately assembled Weimar 2.0 (of course, it should be no surprise that the film was produced by a fellow with the name Merv Bloch). So decidedly debauched that it was even hated by to left-wing Jewish critics like Judith Crist and Pauline Kael, The Telephone Book is arguably the most elegantly and artfully sleazy film ever made as a sort of sickening mix between the Marx Brothers and Marcuse, albeit somehow actually sometimes funny.

Alice (Sarah Kennedy of Stephanie Rothman's The Working Girls (1974)) is a petite 18-year-old hippie ditz that describes herself as "rather beautiful," looks and acts like a poor man's Goldie Hawn (of course, unlike Hawn, Kennedy is a real goy gal), and lives in a small specially decorated flat that is covered with Warhol-esque nudes as wallpaper, so naturally it should be no surprise that she regularly masturbates with a special large pink vibrator and only seems to think about fucking, though she has rather refined erotic tastes that not just any dirty hippie bastard could fulfill. Luckily, by a miracle of pure stupid luck Alice 'hears' the man of her dreams, Mr. John Smith (veteran radio announcer and soap opera actor Normal "The Voice of God" Rose of One Life to Live and All My Children), when he randomly makes an obscene phone call to her from a public telephone where he talks "very seriously" about her tits and other naughty things, thus resulting in the pretty philistine protagonist diddling herself under her sheets while she is talking to the unconventionally charming mystery caller. Rather excited about the fact that she encountered a man with such a sensually seductive voice that his mere voice managed to cause her to wet her panties, Alice calls her bitchy gal pal 'Eyemask' (Jill Clayburgh of Paul Mazursky's An Unmarried Woman (1978) and Alan J. Pakula's Starting Over (1979)) about the great news, but her supremely self-absorbed friend, who spends virtually all of her time lying in bed, is more interested in receiving cunnilingus from a grotesque sounding fellow and listening to audio recordings of Hitler than concerning herself with the unconventionally lurid love life of her cutesy comrade. Indeed, while Alice manages to brag regarding Mr. Smith's call, "It was only a phone call but it was a work of art. You had to hear it. It was no dime-store amateur," exceedingly egotistical cunt Eyemask hangs up on her soon thereafter. At this point, Alice seems to realize that she can only count on the mysterious Mr. Smith, who soon reveals his real name to her and tells her to look him up in the telephone book, but unfortunately it is an absurdly common name, so the desperate protagonist decides to call every single person with the same exact name until she finds her mysterious lover.

When Alice calls a man named 'John Smith' and asks him if he is the man that made dirty phone calls to her and he says yes, she soon somewhat hilariously finds herself involved in the shooting of an orgy scene in a pretentious porn flick directed by an egomaniacal old pornographer named 'Har Poon' (Barry Morse of Roy Ward Baker's Asylum (1972) and Peter Medak's The Changeling (1980)), who has an entire harem of young women at his disposal. Indeed, 'Har Poon' is the pseudonym of a stag director named John Smith, who sports Groucho Marx glasses while he fucks and absurdly thinks he is the Orson Welles of pornographers and who would probably not make an obscene phone call unless someone paid him handsomely for it. Although Alice is certainly no genius, she begins to suspect that he is an 'impostor' and not the real John Smith, but that does not stop her from being coerced into taking all her clothes off and joining a group of equally unclad female porn stars and a dirty old man in an scenario that seems like a sensual anarchic take on the old Hasbro game Twister. Indeed, while the preposterously pedantic pornographer, who seems more like a cynical old grandfather than an old school maestro of blue movies, manages to get Alice to take off all her clothes and get in a large orgy scene with him and about ten other stupid sexy girls, the real John Smith luckily magically calls while they are shooting and thus the protagonist finally manages to put two and two together and subsequently exists the shoot, thus leaving the fuck film director somewhat baffled. Of course, Har Poon is not the last debauched degenerate that she encounters before finding her enigmatic soul mate.

After briefly calling Eyemask in what proves to be another uneventful phone conversation that involves the protagonist's friend curiously listening to an audio recording of an Adolf Hitler speech while loading a pistol (while it might seem like Eyemask is about to commit suicide like Uncle Adolf, the character makes another appearance later on in the film), Alice encounters a mustachioed creep on a subway who flashes his member at her in a grotesquely goofy fashion, but instead of being grossed out the protagonist decides to fight fire with fire by unbuttoning her clothing and flashing her own naked body at the rather foul flasher, thus petrifying the pervert to the point where he runs for his dear life. In the desperate hope that the subway pervert might possibly her dear Mr. Smith due to his degenerate behavior, Alice decides to chase him down and discovers that he is actually a quack psychoanalyst (Roger C. Carmel) who likes to brag about how much money he makes even though his office is in a local ghetto. After getting over his shameful behavior and realizing that he might have the opportunity to exploit the strange situation, the pervert decides that Alice has a "beautiful pussy" and is a "nice piece of cunt" and decides to chase her down when she begins to leave. Ultimately the psychoanalyst offers Alice all the change in the world to make phone calls if she agrees to undergo some psychoanalysis experiments in a local sleazy restaurant. Using an archaic change dispenser that is fittingly attached near his genitals, the psychoanalysis gives the dame dimes to disclose her life, but being that she is rather dumb and inarticulate, she begins to enrage the debauched pseudo-scientist, especially after he draws a childish picture of a penis and she describes it as resembling the state of Maryland when it is obviously a sketch of a cock and balls. When the psychoanalyst asks Alice to describe her most pleasurable sexual experience, Alice details the story a gawky and sleazy Jewish ex-banker (William Hickey of John Huston's Prizzi's Honor (1985) and Jean-Jacques Annaud's The Name of the Rose (1986)) that suffered from the pesky curse of priapism. Needless to say, the story turns the psychoanalyst on so much that he begins dispensing dimes all over the place as if he is about to ejaculate in his pants, but Alice abruptly leaves before finishing the story, thus assumedly giving the quack doctor an intolerable case of blue balls. Naturally, when Alice is robbed in a phone booth by a particularly perverted looking prick that has the audacity to also tell her that she is "very strange" while shoving a gun in her face, things begin looking rather bleak for the seemingly perennially peppy protagonist and she gets so desperate that she decides to follow home a middle-aged dyke with a prop baby stroller who defiles her with two vibrators. Luckily, Mr. Smith somehow manages to know to call Alice while she is at the dyke's house and tells her to go back to the apartment where he will finally meet her.

While sucking on a banana like it is a cock while sitting in the dark in her apartment while she is all by her lonesome, Mr. Smith eventually shows up while sporting a suit and pig mask that only covers the top portion of his face. Indeed, almost the entire second half of the film is dedicated to Mr. Smith's background story and eventually his predictable erotic rendezvous with Alice, but I guess that is what one should expect from an oftentimes illogical film with an extra thin plot about a dumb dame who falls in love with a mystery man who gets off to saying dirty things to strange people over the telephone. When Mr. Smith arrives at Alice's apartment, he explains in defense of his pig mask, "I have a little difficulty communicating with people eye to eye," and then proceeds to brag about his preternatural seduction talents as an eloquently spoken obscene phone caller who has dedicated his life to molesting the ears of unsuspecting strangers with his velvety baritone voice. Indeed, as Mr. Smith coolly and calmly brags to Alice, "I make obscene telephone calls. The best calls... The calls that no one can resist. I have perfected this highly specialized art to the point where, if I wanted to, I could seduce the President of the United States, his wife, his children, his grandparents, but I have no political ambitions." As Smith also explains, he makes about a thousand obscene telephone calls a year (or four calls every day for five days a week), though naturally he was not always the world's most cultivated obscene caller as hinted by the fact that he is a suavely dressed WASP professional type. Indeed, while giving her an extra sensitive bubble bath where he demonstrates his deep gentlemanly affection for her, Mr. Smith explains how he went from becoming a decorated war hero and astronaut as well as family man to becoming the shadowy master of exhibitionistic unsolicited ear-fucking phone calls.

During the Vietnam War, Smith was a Captain in the army who had special propensity for slaughtering the oriental enemy and being loved by his men, or as he states himself that he, “Fought the yellow reds...killed them left and right. I get medals and promises. I looked lovely. Not faggy, just lovely. I had a good, no nonsense face.” Apparently, Smith would calm his fellow soldiers by punching them in the gut and kissing them, albeit, “Not like a fag but like the way one man kisses another man.” Happily married with a son and little dog, Smith eventually became even more famous when two men approached him while he was cutting his yard with a special ‘Gravely’ lawnmower and asked him, “Hey, wanna be an astronaut?” or so he tells Alice while talking into her cunt and derriere like it is a gigantic phone receiver. Needless to say, being a stereotypical Nordic WASP with a strong stoic demeanor, Smith accepted the offer and joined NASA as an astronaut. Unfortunately, while in a weightless chamber where he saluted NASA officials upside down, Mr. Smith dared to declare to the men when they asked him what he wanted before takeoff, “A big. . . beautiful. . . red-nippled. . . giant. . . TIT!” As a result of his big bad dirty mouth, Mr. Smith was examined by NASA psychiatrists who concluded that the weightless chamber fried his brain and that he was too, “psychologically unfit to represent this country in orbit.” At this point, Mr. Smith’s life goes completely downhill as he becomes sexually impotent and no longer enjoys cutting the grass like he used to. In fact, when the family dog began nipping at Mr. Smith’s feet while he was cutting the grass one day, he got so agitated that he almost killed the creature by kicking it some 30 feet across the yard. Upon calling the vet about his injured dog, Mr. Smith accidentally called the wrong number and in the process used the opportunity to make his first obscene telephone call, thus leading to a deep, dark undying obsession that ultimately resulted in his public disgrace and the loss of his family, though he did not mind and instead fully embraced his new linguistically lurid lifestyle by moving from suburbia to NYC where he could really test his seductive talents on the nation’s most debauched and depraved citizenry.

Needless to say, it does not take long before Alice is throwing herself at Mr. Smith and begs him “Please fuck me,” but as he firmly states, he “can’t do it,” at least not in the good old fashioned way. As Smith explains, “There’s only one way,” which naturally involves the two getting in two separate adjacent public phone booths and engaging in full-blown phone sex of the otherworldly orgasmic sort. Ultimately, Mr. Smith and Alice’s phone-fucking session is depicted in the form of a grotesquely obscene piece of animated pornography that was not surprisingly created by a Hebrew named Len Glasser (who is probably best known for being a storyboard artist on the animated TV series Adventures of Sonic the Hedgehog (1993-1996)) that seems like Ralph Bakshi’s Robert Crumb adaptation Fritz the Cat (1972) meets the caricatures of kraut commie Dadaist George Grosz, albeit more graphic than one might expect. Indeed, in animated form, Alice transforms into a headless being with four legs, two cunts, and seven tits while Mr. Smith’s head is replaced with a gigantic tentacle-like tongue which he uses to perform cunnilingus on the female protagonist. In between having her snatch defiled by Mr. Smith's gigantic tongue, Alice mounts the tops of buildings in a scenario comparable to Mara Mattuschka's experimental avant-garde short S.O.S. Extraterrestria (1994) where the filmmaker uses the Eiffel Tower as a sort of makeshift dildo in a sardonically silly scene that satirizes Godzilla. Of course, in the end, Mr. Smith finishes Alice off by shoving his terribly talented gigantic tongue up her twat and invading every crevice of her seemingly oversensitive body. After Alice climaxes, Mr. Smith, who is not into monogamy or physical sex, exits the telephone booth while Alice remains in her's while attempting to recover from her truly sexually cataclysmic climax, which seems to be the thing that she was searching for all along as a decadent dingbat that could not find that right dude to scratch her sexual itch. Indeed, if Mr. Smith can be credited as a hero in anyway, it is for managing to get Alice to finally shut up her distinctly grating Betty Bop voice. In that sense, the conclusion of The Telephone Book is exceedingly satisfying.

According to Judaic producer Merv Bloch in the audio commentary track featured on the Vinegar Syndrome release of the DVD/Blu-ray of the film, The Telephone Book director Nelson Lyon was apparently nicknamed 'Captain Smut' due to the fact that his mind was just as sexually depraved as his sole film indicates. Indeed, Lyon's film is ultimately quite irritating as it seems like the cinematic equivalent of one of those grotesque Jewish caricatures from Julius Streicher's Der Stürmer of a vulgar Hebrew with a sinister smirk on his face defiling a blonde Aryaness, albeit unlike the Nazi tabloid, the film takes delight in such depravity. Of course, The Telephone Book is not the first film with a similarly spiritually sick Semitic spirit that involves the celebration of the defilement of strikingly stupid blonde Aryan girls, as Jewish British auteur Michael Sarne's similarly meticulously stylized counterculture flick Joanna (1968) also features a dumb, 'sexually liberated' blonde cunt with an exceedingly annoying voice who gets involved with all sorts of good clean debauchery, albeit the difference is that she ultimately hooks up with a physically abusive negro thug criminal instead of a disgraced WASP with a fetish for making obscene phone calls. In fact, Joanna star Geneviève Waïte was originally supposed to play Sarah Kennedy's role, but her then husband, the Mamas & The Papas singer-songwriter John Phillips, made her drop out of the production because he wisely thought it would be a bad career move. I somewhat hate to admit it but I found the film's various nods to the films of Warhol, especially Chelsea Girls (1966), to be one of its most intriguing aspects, with queer superstar Ondine's pointless role as a hyper hypocritical narrator who fondles the ass of a random naked dude that is lying on his desk and French-born superstar Ultra Violet's role as a leather-bound porn star that wields a whip surely being two of the greatest highlights of Lyon's flick. Notably, the film originally featured an intentionally monotonous intermission scene where Warhol eats popcorn for about thirty seconds or so, but apparently the footage is now lost. Somewhat surprisingly, despite being soon forgotten after its disastrous release, The Telephone Book apparently influenced at least one very popular film. Indeed, apparently the scene near the end of the film where Mr. Smith gives Alice a bath would later inspire a similar scene between Marlon Brando and Maria Schneider in Bernardo Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris (1972).

While there is certainly much to hate about The Telephone Book and the dubious people that were responsible for making it, one of the things I most appreciate about it is that it seems to mock pseudo-arthouse European skin flicks like I Am Curious (Yellow) (1967) and I Am Curious (Blue) (1968) directed by Swedish auteur Vilgot Sjöman, thereupon seeming to make a farce of its own all-too-overt artistic pretenses. Of course, with its mocking of the white Christian mainstream and WASP establishment as well as obsession with the defiling of barely-legal shiksa girls, the film finds itself in solidarity with untalented Judaic Warhol-wannabes of the same era like William Klein (Who Are You, Polly Magoo?, Mr. Freedom) and Norman Mailer (Wild 90, Maidstone), with the latter once (in)famously writing regarding the 1969 Apollo 11 moonlanding, "the real mission of the WASP in history was not, say, to create capitalism, or to disseminate Christianity into backward countries...It was to get the U.S. to the moon." Surely Mailer's anti-Spenglerian writings had an influence on the anti-NASA flavor of The Telephone Book, which does not feature a sexually impotent anti-commie war hero turned astronaut of the archetypal Nordish sort as an obscene phone caller for nothing. Padded with various filler scenes of Ondine as a hypocritical homo moralist narrator and pseudo-documentary testimonial scenes of reformed 'obscene callers' discussing their fetishes (in one admittedly quite hilarious scene, a housewife states, "...I take a [beep] banana and then I shove it up my cunt and kind of squish it around so my hole gets all juiced up...then I roll around a while with it in me until I'm chewing the rug and purring"), Lyon's film is certainly no masterpiece but it is undoubtedly the closest thing to a truly artsy fartsy American sex comedy as a sort of Citizen Kane of the subgenre. Somewhat ironically considering the film's distinctly Hebraic approach to humor, the film owes its fairly recent rebirth as a sort of lost cult classic as a result of a couple degenerate German guys who contacted producer Bloch after finding his contact info on the internet and managing to get it rereleased on DVD and played at various prestigious film festivals on Europe, thus demonstrating that about 70 years of Frankfurt School inspired Cultural Marxist propaganda has certainly left a lasting impact on the hearts and minds of the citizens of Europe. Indeed, after recently listening to a Hebraic porn mogul brag about the fact that he is the godson of mob-connected Jewish Orthodox smut-peddler Reuben Sturman and that it is the ultimate fantasy of every Judaic boy to despoil a good Catholic girl (as the mogul notes, most of the original male porn stars were Jewish and most of the female porn stars were Catholic), I think that The Telephone Book has even more historical value than its proponents give it, as a film that makes Woody Allen's Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex (But Were Afraid to Ask) (1972) seem like an episode of Mickey Mouse and more or less validates everything thing that Julius Streicher—a scapegoat of the Nuremberg Show Trials that was hanged by the Allies for simply for exposing what is easy to see nowadays just by watching the average Hollywood comedy—reported in his Nazi tabloid newspaper. In fact, I would argue that The Telephone Book is the sort of anti-Der Stürmer of sex comedies, which is certainly no accomplishment considering the scatological neo-Vaudevillian smut that Hollywood regularly excretes on the world, thus making it mandatory viewing for anyone that still believes that American is still run by puritanical Christians and not a somewhat small cabal of semi-Asiatic culture-distorters who hate everything that America originally stood for.

THE GODDESS BUNNY

When the iconoclastically iconic Pre-Code horror flick Freaks (1932) was released, the eponymous real-life misbegotten humans featured in the film offended the sensibilities of the average filmgoer so much that the film ultimately ruined the careers of its popular director Tod Browning, who only the year before had gained great success with Dracula (1931) starring Bela Lugosi. Additionally, when Bavarian wild man auteur Werner Herzog released his second feature film Auch Zwerge haben klein angefangen (1970) aka Even Dwarfs Started Small, the film was so universally controversial that both neo-Nazis (who apparently sent death threats to the filmmaker) and the far-left denounced the film and the work was ultimately banned for a period of time shortly after its premiere. Undoubtedly, all of the freaks in both of these films combined pale in comparison to a certain underground disabled tranny superstar featured in the no-budget camcorder documentary The Goddess Bunny (1998) directed by subversive underground artist, documentarian, and legendary racist cartoonist Nick Bougas aka A. Wyatt Mann (Death Scenes, When the Applause Died). While Bougas had the distinguished honor of making a candid documentary about Church of Satan founder and High Priest Anton LaVey entitled Speak of the Devil (1995), the infamous filmmaker would have his greatest triumph in terms of documenting the culturally apocalyptic with his unfortunately rather unsung magnum opus The Goddess Bunny. A true cult 'superstar' that aesthetic nihilist auteur/archivist John Aes-Nihil (Manson Family Movies, The Ma Barker Story) describes at the beginning of the documentary as "the only truly glamorous star left in Hollywood," The Goddess Bunny (aka Sandy Crisp aka Johnnie Baima) had the grand misfortune of being born 2 ½ months premature to a mother with infectious polio in her uterus and would thus grow up horribly disfigured and with an 18 inch steel pole in her spine, not to mention the fact s/he spent a good portion of her childhood in hellish foster homes where s/he was routinely sexually molested from age 9 to 13. Getting his big break in film after punk filmmaker Penelope Spheeris (Suburbia, Wayne's World) spotted him walking down the streets of L.A. and decided to cast him in her gritty exploitation flick Hollywood Vice Squad (1986), the Goddess Bunny would ultimately become the main and most revered star of auteur John Aes-Nihil as the leading lady in The Drift (1989), The Goddess Bunny Channels Shakespeare (1989), and The Ma Barker Story (1990) and would also have a small role in the filmmaker's campy Tennessee Williams adaptation Suddenly Last Summer (2008) starring large and in charge chocolate drag queen Vaginal Davis. In terms of getting to the badly broken heart of the Goddess Bunny—a Jack(ie) of all trades who has worked as a hustler, tap dancer, drug addict, welfare queen, and avant-garde cabaret dancer—you will find no document more decidedly debasing and insanely intriguing than Bougas' totally anti-bogus document of delightful depravity, The Goddess Bunny.

Introduced by sub-underground filmmaker John Aes-Nihil with the single sentence, "We are going to delve into the life of the only truly glamorous star left in Hollywood," The Goddess Bunny wastes no time in candidly exposing the patently provocative personality that is the one, the only, the Goddess Bunny! Flung into a terribly tragic life plagued by emotional and physical brutality, the Goddess ultimately spit in the face of normality, morality, and classical beauty and decided to reach for nothing short of true godhood. Of course, being a great goddess is no simple task, thus the Bunny faced his fair share of pain as the victim of a gang rape committed by a Mexican and his degenerate gringo friend. Asked about the sexual pillaging by a rather intrusive East Asian woman as to why he thinks he was the victim of the rape, the Goddess replies rather narcissistically yet exceedingly eloquently by stating, "I guess because I look so real compared to all the six-foot-two drag queens out there," while standing next to a picture of kosher commie killer Leon Trotsky. As a Goddess, the Bunny also has venomous archenemies, most notably a Latino with a beak of a hook-nose that goes by the out-of-this-world title, 'The Cosmic Danielle.' During a special event in tribute to the Goddess Bunny, the disabled diva fails to show up (apparently, he oftentimes gets lost on the way to events), the Cosmic Danielle uses it as an opportunity to steal the spotlight and bitterly besmirch her rival, stating, "that Bunny Goddess creature—she's got more nerve than someone with a real normal body, I'll tell you. I'll tell you that's not gossip, that's real life." Of course, the Bunny gets her just revenge and mentions how the Cosmic Danielle and his boyfriend savagely butt-raped some poor fellow and also mentions how it is a shock that the spick shemale does not have the clap. As a pre-op transman who proudly states, "one of my favorites is Joan Rivers," the Goddess never backs down from an ugly fight, even amongst fellow trannies and has no problem admitting, "For those people that know me, living with a transsexual isn't one of my normalcy's because of the fact that a lot of them have emotional problems and they go through emotional swings to where the female and male hormones are fighting amongst themselves..." As for her dreams for the future, the Goddess Bunny states, "I hope in the future that handicaps can be used in film and television on a more frequent basis and that maybe tomorrow we will be the next Don Johnson or Meryl Streep and that we won't have to depend on government financing." Of course, not all dreams come true, even if cultural Marxist Hollywood has attempted to depict more trannies and cripples in a rather contrived manner for insincere political reasons.

Towards the end of The Goddess Bunny, the eponymous superstar states regarding her acting career, "So I figure it this way...if Hollywood won't take me, I'll deal with the underground. We've now got our own fan club going on. I've done a photo with Joel-Peter Witkin which happens to have sold for fourteen grand," yet unfortunately he has not done much in terms of film acting since the release of Bougas' documentary, though auteur Aes-Nihil sells a dozen or so extremely rare DVDs on his website featuring the leading lady-lad with charming titles like Lick My AIDS Sores, Mondo Bruce-s B-Day, Wedding of the Goddess Bunny to Rocky, and Goddess on the Love Channel. If nothing else, the Goddess Bunny is a superstar among superstars who makes the drug-addled dude-divas of Paul Morrissey's anti-feminist satire Women in Revolt (1971) seem like superficially slutty Lindsay Lohan and Britney Spears look-alikes. While undoubtedly a depressing documentary about a forsaken individual who most filmgoers will find rather hard not to pity, The Goddess Bunny is also a sort of vice-ridden piece of venereal video art that makes one feel like they had just spent an entire night sleeping in a South American tuberculosis ward. Indeed, as someone who considers Jörg Buttgerit's arthouse-splatter flick NEKRomantik (1987) a work of celluloid pulchritude and eagerly anticipate the latest film by Marian Dora (Cannibal, Melancholie der Engel aka The Angels' Melancholy), I must admit that The Goddess Bunny caused my stomach to churn in abject disgust on more than one occasion during my initial viewing of the film. Of course, in its portrayal of the Goddess Bunny as an 'AIDS terrorist,' lover of deformed Negro cocks, welfare system exploiter, drug addicted ex-hustler, and craven sex addict, The Goddess Bunny is bound to burn a hole in the paperbag-covered souls of do-gooder leftist lambs and loony LGBT true believer types. Indeed, while the Goddess goes so far as bemoaning the fact that Lassie the dog has been honored with the Hollywood Walk of Fame yet not a single horribly disabled person like himself has received this honor, the superstar clearly seeks no pity and would probably laugh if some politically correct poofter tried to blame the lack of cripples in cinema on an anti-cripple/anti-tranny conspiracy. In a degenerate weakness-worshiping and morally inverted age where every slave-morality-ridden emotional cripple (i.e. ghetto blacks, rich Jews, bourgeois sexual degenerates) attempts to wear their deluded 'victim status' as a badge of honor, the Goddess Bunny proves the will to power can go a long way, even if you're a paraplegic cock-and-crack-addicted tranny.

SPEAK OF THE DEVIL

Nick Bougas (1995)

After reading a few books by Church of Satan founder and High Priest Anton LaVey, I felt I needed to see the documentary Speak of the Devil. Aside from LaVey's biographies, Speak of the Devil is probably the most personal document you will ever find on LaVey. Although I am not a Satanist, I find Anton LaVey to be an interesting character, who said and wrote things that most people cannot even handle hearing without reacting in hysterics. A true follower of the left-hand path, Anton LaVey was a carny with brains and devilish insight, truly one of the last of his kind. Although obviously having low production values and sometimes tedious, Speak of the Devil is a documentary I plan to watch again anytime I have the urge to see a dark one man carnival. It is now surprising that Anton LaVey was able to give the horrific Tod Browning film Freaks (1932) new life after the film had been nearly buried via past public outrage and banning upon its initial release. Speak of the Devil follows Anton LaVey in his home which looks like it could have been in an 1940s Gothic horror film. LaVey has a personal library with a sign that threatens bodily harm for those that might have the curiosity of picking up one of his rare books. Anton LaVey also has a room full of androids as he had come to prefer to be in the company of virtual humans instead of your typical boring real-life humans. LaVey was friends and influenced by a man named Cecil Ex. Nixon, who happened to have built a brilliant automaton by the name of Isis. In Speak of the Devil, Anton LaVey goes into discussion about how he both hates people yet loves to study them. I found this discussion to be one of LaVey's most insightful to who he really is in the documentary. Anton LaVey also was once the proud owner of a Nubian lion named Togare. Speak of the Devil features stock footage of the LaVey family and Togare on a children's television show. Anton LaVey is sporting hair on this show as this was before he shaved his head and started the Church of Satan. LaVey's daughter Zeena can be seen as a child in this footage. She later would go on to denounce her father and claim she was responsible for his death via ritual curse. Speak of the Devil also features Anton LaVey playing the calliope in true carny fashion. During his eerie carnival-like performances, footage of the carnival and vaudeville appear giving the documentary its most powerful moments. As stated before, Speak of the Devil does suffer from low quality production as it has the bad video quality so prevalent during the early 1990s. I would have preferred the documentary to have had a sort of German expressionist or film noir aesthetic but one can only dream. For those somewhat interested in carnivals, the occult, and the left-hand path, Speak of the Devil is a must see. The documentary goes as a great companion piece to Blanche Barton's The Secret Life of a Satanist which is also endorsed by author Barton in Speak of the Devil. One also cannot pass up a film featuring Boyd Rice bowling.

ALPHA DOG
ALPHA DOG

Nick Cassavetes (2006)

Alpha Dog is contemporary crime drama (more like a comedy) directed by son of legendary independent filmmaker John Cassavetes, Nick Cassavetes. Mr. Nick lacks the innovation of his father as Alpha Dog is “stylized” in a similar way of many films of its kind. Alpha Dog is centered around possibly the worst subculture in America; Upper Middle Class wigger drug dealers who think they are “gangsta’s.” The film is based on a real-life crime carried out by play thugs that obviously got in way over their head. Alpha Dog features an array of actors ranging from baby faced pop singer Justin Timberlake to almost bald action stuntman Bruce Willis. Emile Hirsch, the heartthrob of many teenager American girls, stars as the lame ass drug dealer Johnny Truelove. Truelove and his friend Jake Mazursky (played by Ben Foster) have a falling out which leads to a kidnapping. Jake is a deranged Jewish drug addict who sports an Nazi SS tattoo on his neck which can be seen when he beats a party of people up (including a black woman). Johnny Truelove has no problem calling his friend Jake a “kike” more than once in Alpha Dog.

I find the title Alpha Dog to be comical as none of the “men” in the film are masculine. I have seen bull dyke lesbians that make better “alpha males” than the drug dealing clowns in the film. I found the strongest aspect of Alpha Dog to be the comedic elements which I still don’t know whether they were intentional or not. Unlike the disgusting rich wigger fest Havoc (2005), Alpha Dog has it’s merits in displaying the characters of film as laughably clownish bitches. Sadly, I can see the average teenage white American thinking that the characters featured in Alpha Dog are “bad ass.” Alpha Dog is far from a serious film that offers two hours of unpretentious entertainment. Like Larry Clark’s Bully, the film presents a “based on a true story” look at the sad specimens MTV “culture” has produced in America. The acting performances are full of character (not the kind you want to emulate) and are consistent throughout. The real Johnny Truelove was the youngest criminal ever featured on America’s Most Wanted. I wonder if he is as big of a turd as the Alpha Dog character version of Johnny Truelove.

THE JUNKY'S CHRISTMAS

Nick Donkin (1993)

Who better than old man junky William S. Burroughs to tell Christmas stories to young children around the Christmas tree? In the miserable Christmas claymation short The Junky's Christmas, elderly WSB narrates that opiate-withdrawing tale he originally wrote for his book Interzone. Despite being recently released from prison, the junk sick animated anti-hero (Danny) of the short film is determined to bring joy to his veins with a shot of opium. Indeed, The Junky's Christmas at first may seem like an ode to opiates but it also contains the special Christmas theme that it is better to give than to receive. Danny may spend all of the film trying to score junk in the most absurd and pathetic ways but by the end of The Junky's Christmas he has celebrated the true meaning of Christmas.

As a child, I especially enjoyed watching vintage stop motion animation Christmas specials like Rudolph The Red-Nosed Reindeer. Now older and much more pessimistic, I find it very hard to feel the Christmas spirit no matter how many old Christmas films I try to watch for nostalgia's sake. Instead of Santa Clause, I was hoping that I could at least meet St. Nicholas's evil comrade Krampus this year. It was not until I watched The Junky's Christmas last night that I even remotely felt in the mood for Christmas. After all, the short film features the animation I loved as a child without the fantastically optimistic messages that most Christmas films contain. I may not be able to relate to Danny's homelessness or Junk sickness but I can certainly relate to his nihilistic winter solstice.

After running a bunch of pathetic scams in hopes of getting the opiate kick he needs, Danny finally obtains a small amount of morphine by faking face Neuralgia to a kindly but suspicious doctor. Not only does Danny finally have the junk he needs for the Christmas Nacht but he also has a couple bucks to spend on a hotel room. Distracted by the sounds of a young man in pain from kidney stones in a room nearby, Danny visits the pain and bedridden unhappy Christmas boy. Feeling sympathy for the boy and being in the junk sicken Christmas spirit, Danny kindly plays doctor and gives the boy his only opiate pain reliever for the night, thus doing his good X-Mas deed of giving instead of receiving. No doubt an Angel was watching over Danny as the junky receives an immaculate fix from the heavens above. For a story written by William S. Burroughs, The Junky's Christmas is surely one of the most optimistic pieces that Beat Sage had ever written. At the conclusion of the short, William S. Burroughs joins his family which even put me in the Christmas spirit.

“CRIMINALLY INSANE”

Nick Millard (1975)

Screw deluded fat acceptance morons, it has been my personal experience that the most cunt, ruthless, hateful, and just plain evil women I have ever met were also lard asses that no normal man would touch with a ten foot pole, thus I consider a loudmouthed female ogre to be an infinitely more horrifying villain than a beauteous femme fatale who manipulates men for her own personal gain. After all, at least the predatory femme fatale gives her male victims a good blowjob or two before throwing him under the bus. Undoubtedly, as demonstrated by the fact that Kathy Bates won both the Academy Award for Best Actress and a Golden Globe for her career-jumpstarting role as a psychopathic plus-size she-bitch in Misery (1990) demonstrates, I do not think I am the only person that finds extra chubby chicks to be extra creepy villains. When I was about ten or eleven, I could not help but rent a VHS tape with the overtly sensational title Crazy Fat Ethel featuring a morbidly obese killer on the cover, not realizing the film was actually an innately inferior sequel/remake of a superlatively sleazy piece of work entitled “Criminally Insane” (1975) directed by pornographer turned offbeat genre ‘auteur’ Nick Millard (Fräulein Leather, Satan’s Black Wedding) under the pseudonym ‘Nick Philips.’ Directed by a man who managed the career of his own octogenarian porn star mother Frances ‘the oldest living porn actress’ Millard (who incidentally acted as the producer of the film and many of Millard’s other works and is probably best known for starring in gerontophilic fuck flicks with titles like The Ultimate Granny Gang Bang (2000) and 92 and Still Banging (2000)), “Criminally Insane” is indubitably pure and unadulterated unmitigated trash with sass and a scrumptious sicko sense of humor that reminds trash cinophiles why they watch celluloid sleaze in the first place. Set in a sort of alternate post-counterculture white trash universe where less than pretty pussy-peddlers, elderly senile Johns, effeminate pimp would-be-actors, delinquent foul-mouthed delivery boys, cynical cops, and morbidly obese mass murderesses reign, Millard’s shockingly penetrating gutter grade low-camp photoplay feels like it was directed by a genuine dirtbag and pimp who lives off the suffering of others. Indeed, the lead anti-heroine is a grotesquely fat unhinged bitch who certainly looks the part she plays, but somewhat ironically the character somehow makes deranged obese dames seem vaguely likeable, at least in a sort of novelty sense that makes you forget that ‘fativism’ clowns exist. Featuring special effects that make the mostly worthless works of Hebraic exploitation hack Herschell Gordon Lewis almost seem Hollywood-esque and unexpected ‘artistic’ pretense, including a bizarrely entrancing psychedelic dream-sequence that could have only dreamed up by a decidedly deluded film director who has somehow convinced himself that he is an authentic ‘artiste’ following in the poetically macabre footsteps of F.W. Murnau (indeed, maestro Millard has credited Nos-feratu (1922) as being one of the biggest influences on his horror films), “Criminally Insane” is unequivocally one of the few true ‘masterpieces’ of authentic exploitation cinema, as a marvelously morally retarded work that is nearly immaculate in its innate ineptness and gritty celluloid scumminess. Of course, one must also not forget that Millard’s film is probably the only film of its conspicuously kitschy kind that features a Hebrew-hating killer who trusts her Jewish doctor even less than an elderly Israeli lawyer trusts Herr Doktor Josef Mengele, thereupon making for a rare ‘horror-comedy’ that lacks a kosher flavor while still managing to be completely and utterly morally bankrupt.

As Jewish mental hospital head Dr. Gerard (Cliff McDonald) tells worried white trash polack grandmother Mrs. Janowski (Jane Lambert of Brian De Palma’s The Fury (1978)) regarding his concerns about releasing her morbidly obese whack-job granddaughter, “Your granddaughter’s case is a very strange one, Mrs. Janowski. Severe paranoid manifestations, long periods of depression, violent outbursts. Quite frankly, it’s against my better judgment that she is being released.” Indeed, lard ass lunatic Ethel Janowski (Millard regular Priscilla Alden) has received electric shock therapy and has spent much time isolated in a padded cell with a straitjacket, yet her main complaint regarding her stint in the mental hospital is that they are not giving her enough food, or as she later complains to her granny like a true paranoiac, “Did you know they tried to kill me? That goddamn Jew doctor gave them orders not to give me enough to eat. Two lousy boiled eggs and a piece of dry toast for breakfast. They were trying to save money and starve me while they were at it.” After Fat Ethel is released under the condition that she comes to four weekly appointments for electric shock therapy, her grandmother expresses her moronic sense of optimism by stating, “Everything is going to be fine again, I know it will.” When Ethel gets home and immediately fries an entire package of bacon and about a dozen eggs to celebrate her untimely release from the loony bin and her grandmother comes downstairs and remarks, “A person is never too old to watch her figure,” it becomes quite clear that the two wacky women will eventually bump heads and one of them might even literally lose their head. When her grandmother remarks that she needs to lose some weight because being fat is unhealthy for her heart, Ethel quasi-poetically replies, “My heart is just fine as long as my stomachs not empty.”

Not surprisingly, things take a considerably nasty turn for the worst in the Janowski home when Ethel comes downstairs in the middle of the night to get a midnight snack and discovers that there is no food in the refrigerator and all of the food has been locked inside a cabinet by her grandma. When her grandmother wakes up and comes downstairs to find her granddaughter attempting to open the lock on the cabinet by stabbing it with a butcher knife in a quite ferocious fashion, she asks her what she is doing and Fat Ethel cries, “What’s the idea of locking up all the food?” Needless to say, when her granny firmly declares, “We’ll have no fresh meat or milk until you learn to curb your appetite,” Ethel becomes exceedingly enraged, chases Mrs. Janowski from behind while yelling, “You and that heeb are trying to starve me again. Well, you’re not going to do it,” and literally stabs her in the back with the butcher knife. Although dead, the key to the cupboard is locked in Mrs. Janowski’s hand via a death grip, so Ethel proceeds to frantically stab her dead grandma’s hand while repeatedly shouting “I want that key” like a disgruntled child throwing a temper tantrum. After managing to free the key from her granny’s cold dead hand, Fat Ethel naturally proceeds to gorge on junk food and even leaves her grandparents corpse in the same spot in a pool of blood until the next day. Indeed, aside from being a rather rotund and equally intemperate wench with the self-discipline of a rabid autistic toddler, Ethel is lazy as hell, which will ultimately lead to her inevitable downfall.

Since both she and her dead granny have no source of income aside from meager unemployment benefits, Ethel finds herself in serious trouble when it comes to procuring food, so when she places a huge order over the phone with a local grocery store that she owes money to and the delivery boy arrives with the goods and refuses to give them to her since she only has $4.50 for an order that is $80, she hilariously hits the teen over the head with a liquor bottle and then proceeds to stab him to death with the now broken bottle. Literally right after killing the ill-fated delivery boy, Ethel’s sub-homely hooker sister Rosalie (Lisa Farros) randomly shows up at the house and asks if she can crash there for the next couple of days. Being a drug-addled degenerate that peddles her pussy for a living to dirty old men and dates an abusive fellow that regularly beats her, Rosalie is naturally not the least bit concerned when she notices a pool of blood on the floor of the house, not to mention the fact she does not ask her super big sis for much information about her MIA grandmother’s whereabouts. Ethel clearly has no sense of solidarity with her family as demonstrated by the fact that she seems completely disinterested when Rosalie states to her, “I guess she’s better off sleeping with that little brown man than being drunk all the time,” in regard to the fact that their mother is living with a dubious Filipino man. Additionally, when Rosalie begins bringing back Johns to the house in the middle of the night who fondle her breasts in plain view, Ethel merely finds the situation to be mildly humorous.

Despite the fact that she warned Ethel to tell him that she never wants to see him again if he ever showed up at the house, Rosalie soon brings her low-life would-be-actor/pimp beau John (Michael Flood) to live at the house. As is quite apparent by her senseless behavior, Rosalie is more concerned over the fact that John previously left her for an older woman than the fact he routinely beats her. As John explains to Rosalie before they have ‘makeup sex’ as to why he beats her, “Rosalie, I’m gonna tell you the truth for once, okay? You need a good beating every once in a while. All women do. And you especially.” Meanwhile, Dr. Gerard decides to pay Fat Ethel an unexpected visit since she has been ignoring his calls and has missed her electric shock therapy sessions, so the anti-heroine naturally murders him and then locks his corpse in her grandmother's room where she has placed all the other corpses. When Rosalie laughs at John while watching him put on makeup and remarks, "I'm sorry...I've seen a lot of things but never a man putting on makeup," the petty gutter grade pimp becomes enraged and smacks the shit out of her while calling her a "stupid whore." Of course, as demonstrated by the fact that they are depicted jovially snorting cocaine together in the next scene of the film, the two zany lovebirds do not stay mad at each other for long. As Rosalie explains to her sister regarding her and her beau's nose candy, "It's a nasal medicine the doctor prescribed. Both John and I have sinuses." Somewhat fittingly, it is ultimately their noses that lands Rosalie and John into serious trouble.

The same night a police officer named Detective McDonough (George 'Buck' Flower of Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS (1975) and John Carpenter's They Live (1988)) comes by the house asking questions about the delivery boy that Ethel had murdered for $80 worth of food, Rosalie and John find that they are unable to sleep due to the putrid stench of rotting corpses emanating from Grandma Janowski's room, so they make the unwitting mistake of complaining to the whacked out woman responsible for the odious odors. Naturally, Ethel thinks that John is getting a little bit too nosy for his own good, so she brutally slaughters him with a hatchet while he is asleep, thus causing Rosalie to wake up and scream in abject terror in the process. Of course, Fat Ethel is forced to liquidate her sister as well, though that does not stop her from continuing to talk to her after she is dead and say sassy things to her corpse like, "I know you want to be alone. Sometimes I can hear you. I know what you were doing with John, Rosalie." In a scene that hints at necrophilia, Ethel is featured laughing hysterically while lying next to John's corpse in bed in a scenario that eventually turns into a strange pseudo-artsy dream-sequence that features psychedelic murder scenes (including scenes of Ethel hacking away at what is clearly a cheap mannequin sans wig), shots of a graveyard, and the deranged anti-heroine dressed like a glamorous diva in a pink dress. While Fat Ethel finally gets enough common sense and motivation to dispose of her corpses by dismembering them, putting them in trash bags, and driving them to an oceanside cliff where she plans drop them off, a group of pesky tourist taking photographs ruin her plans and she is forced to bring the body parts back home. While tirelessly hauling the bags of body parts back into her dilapidated home, Ethel carelessly leaves some of the parts in her unlocked truck and it does not take long for a busybody neighbor to discover a dismembered hand upon examining the car. Of course, Detective McDonough soon comes to arrest Ethel, but he is in for quite a surprise when he finds his suspect gnawing on a dismembered arm, thus causing him to cry out, "My god."

“CRIMINALLY INSANE”

As a shot-on-video piece of patently pointless trash where no less than ¼ of the film seems to be comprised of footage from the previous film, the “Criminally Insane” sequel Criminally Insane 2 (1987) aka Crazy Fat Ethel 2 is nothing but a sad joke that is not even worthy of being described as a cheap novelty by fans of the original film. In fact, anti-auteur Nick Millard would reuse the credits and kill scenes from his magnum opus in a number of his subsequent shot-on-video sub-schlock works, including such singularly worthless efforts as Death Nurse (1987), Death Nurse 2 (1988), and Doctor Bloodbath (1987). Naturally, Millard would also continue working with the same actors, including “Criminally Insane” star Priscilla Alden and when the director was asked in an interview with the curiously named horror film review site The Liberal Dead why he chose to do this, he gave the startlingly pretentious reply, “So I like using the same people. Again and again. Rainer Werner Fassbinder, the German director, did the same thing...” As can be expected from any cult horror film that even has the most pathetically marginal of followings, a remake entitled Crazy Fat Ethel (2015) directed by a fellow named Brian Dorton (Trashology, Theatre of the Deranged) is set to be released sometime this year, though it is an indisputable fact that no film can recapture the distinct putrid post-counterculture trash essence of Millard’s original film. Indeed, “Criminally Insane” is like a Warhol era Paul Morrissey flick as directed by an apolitical smut-peddler who still unwittingly manages to demonstrate how degenerate America has become since so-called women’s liberation and counterculture movements helped the Baby boomers further rationalize their pseudo-individualism and nihilistic hedonism. Indeed, 250 pound beastess Ethel is just another hopeless moron inspired by the hippie weltanschauung that, if it feels good you should do it, albeit she just takes her self-absorption a step or two further. Of course, considering her flagrant anti-Semitism, one would think that Fat Ethel would know better and not embrace a Reichian/Marcusian approach to eating, but not everyone is perfect. In terms of films about resentful tubs of quasi-female lard, you certainly cannot do better than “Criminally Insane”, but considering that over half of Americans are ‘overweight’ (aka fat asses), I suspect that subsequent generations will find the film less funny and easy to relate to. After all, the Occident is so decadent nowadays that it now has a growing collective of politically active social justice lard asses known as the so-called ‘fat acceptance movement’ who actively promote unhealthy physiques and lifestyles in a pathetic attempt to rationalize their aversion to exercising and sensible eating. Somewhat tragically, if not surprisingly, “Criminally Insane” star Priscilla Alden—a true outsider actress whose performance in Millard’s film makes Shirley Stoler’s character in The Honeymoon Killers (1969) seem rather lightweight and who would have indubitably made a great John Waters superstar as the more demented daughter of Edith Massey—died of complications from diabetes at the age of 68 on 24 August 2007. Obviously, her performances in Millard’s films did not scare Alden straight about her weight and inspire her to take a more healthy approach to life, but at least she has been immortalized as the most deranged plus-size dime store diva of cinema history.

MURDER-SET-PIECES
MURDER-SET-PIECES

Nick Palumbo (2004) Nick Palumbo's Murder-Set-Pieces is a refreshing new take on the slasher film. So refreshing that I forgot that it was a slasher film. Director Palumbo was able to simultaneously piss off veteran horror fans and Jews. This is an accomplishment in itself. Last House on a Dead End Street director Roger Watkins(RIP) has championed the film. Murder-Set-Pieces obviously did something right.

The film's serial killer is a German prince and descendent of a high ranking Nazi officer. His mother was a whore and he has complete contempt for women. This Teutonic psycho killer energetically kills Las Vegas whores when he's not driving around in his muscle car. Henry Lee Lucas wishes that he had this much style.

Chocolate candyman Tony Todd gives an amazing performance as a sex shop clerk. I have on more than one occasion rewinded and rewatched this ACTION PACKED scene. Belligerent and fat Fred Vogel of August Underground fame also appears in the scene as a robber. In fact, the entire Toe Tag Pictures team is featured(they also did the special FX for Murder-Set-Pieces). I much prefer Murder-Set-Pieces to any of films in the Toe Tag library. Murder-Set-Pieces is complimented by its soundtrack. Stupid metal makes you want to join in on the killing. Most Hollywood horror films feature music of this nature but Murder-Set-Pieces utilizes it properly. The film also contains a speech by the fuehrer himself(from Triumph of the Will) while the Aryan killer does some sit-ups. What a great way to workout.

Shock poetry is the best way to describe Murder-Set-Pieces. For all its stupidity, it has much more character and routine playability than the majority of "underground" horror films. Nick Palumbo has potential as a director. Stock footage of the 9/11 world trader center attack was his boldest move. The only thing missing is a thumbs up from Steven Spielberg.

THEY EAT SCUM

Nick Zedd (1979)

Maybe because I have not fried my brain on speed or acid, don't have a fetish for pale chubby chicks with shitty attitudes and equally obnoxious black hair dye jobs, have not been obsessed with punk rock since I was a teenager, like a tad bit of substance and technique from my trash cinema, loathe highly derivative cinematic works that purport to be subversive and iconoclastic, and/or cannot tolerate filmmakers who have yet to learn how to properly use a simple tripod after decades of filmmaking experience, but I have to admit that I have always found the so-called Cinema of Transgression movement to be fairly worthless and irrelevant and I cannot for the life of me understand why it was ever regarded as any sort of cutting edge avant-garde movement. More or less the second wave of New York City filmmakers associated with the similarly overrated but somewhat more idiosyncratic No Wave Cinema scene, the movement emphasized philistine shock value and pointless sex and violence and lacked the fairly more eclectic approach of their predecessors (for example, the No Wave filmmakers made war films, sword-and-sandal epics, sci-fi flicks, musicals, etc.) and, despite the fact that the group's tiny 438-word official manifesto declares that, "all film schools be blown up and all boring films never be made again," virtually all of the so-called transgressive filmmakers associated with it subscribed to a sort of unofficial collective conformity involving low-camp 'lo-fi' post-Kucharian degeneracy and both literal and figurative juvenile masturbation that involved heroin, shitty third rate punk rock, ugly and out-of-shape girls with guns and physically and mentally weak men that like taking it in the ass, and all-things sexual dysfunction. Over the past decade, I have made various valiant attempts to get through a single film directed by the pretty boy messiah of the movement, Nick Zedd (The Wild World of Lydia Lunch, War Is Menstrual Envy), but I failed every single time as I found each of these works to be so hopelessly banal, intolerably technically inept, absurdly adolescent, and shockingly unoriginal that I just could not bring myself to suffer such superlatively stupid celluloid silliness in its entirety. Indeed, I could not even bother to finish watching Zedd's early 11-minute short The Bogus Man (1980) as it only took me a couple minutes to get tired of the plodding punk rock posturing and rather retarded visuals, so naturally I never thought that I could ever endure an entire feature-length film directed by the would-be 'Prince of Puke' (indeed, it seems Zedd was striving to be the next John Waters) yet I shocked myself the other day after managing to endure all 73-minutes of his directorial debut They Eat Scum (1979) and somehow I even found parts of the crud-covered celluloid work to be quite funny and memorable, even if in a magnificently witless quasi-Troma-esque sort of way (in fact, Zedd is so avant-garde and/or desperate for work that he appeared in alpha-smut-speddler Lloyd Kaufman's Terror Firmer (1999)).

THEY EAT SCUM

Somewhat seeming like it was directed by the piss poor Asperger-addled punk anti-lovechild of John Waters, Jack Smith, and Sid Vicious, the dimestore dystopian flick They Eat Scum tells a moronically labyrinthine and superbly spastic tale of hopelessly American apocalyptic cultural autism that features, among other things, albino negroid nerds, tranny poodle-penetrators, self-castrating eunuchs and skanky groupies with sewed up twats, cannibalistic negro-eating punk automatons, third rate fascistic heroin-addicted female punk rock vocalists, and various other forms of patently pointless sub-subhuman trash that only a unrefined nihilist hipster man-child like Mr. Zedd would bother to cinematically dream up. Indeed, watching a Nick Zedd film is like encountering a schizophrenic hobo masturbating with the aid of his own feces as lubrication while discussing the failed state of the democratic two-party system. Very much a fetishistic fantasy scenario for the filmmaker, the film was partly inspired by how the mainstream media portrayed the punk subculture as a serious societal threat and depicts the mirthful mayhem that ensues when a female junky punk rock singer from an ostensibly Evangelical Christian family incites her followers to engage in mass cannibalism and cause a nuclear meltdown so that she can takeover NYC and become the first cannibalistic Nazi-punk cunt queen of the super shitty city. While the title may be in reference to a group of thoroughly brainwashed punk automatons that cannibalize normal folk, They Eat Scum certainly can also be seen as reference to the viewer, who is forced-fed incessant primitive images by the sneering alpha-scumbag autistic-garde auteur. After watching the film, I could not help but think that Zedd is the kind of guy who enjoys regularly getting his ass kicked so that he can brag about it to his equally infantile lowlife buddies, but then again one could not expect anything less for a NYC underground untermensch that would be masochistic enough to fuck a swarthy slag like Lydia Lunch. Needless to say, They Eat Scum stars a Lydia look-alike she-Führer who naturally lacks the elegance, charm, and good-breeding of the eponymous blonde beastess of Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS (1975).

If you need irrefutable evidence of the fact that the culture-distorters in Tinseltown have been more successful than any other group in human history in terms of demonizing a people when it comes to their unwavering smear campaign against the National Socialists and Germanic people in general, just watch They Eat Scum and see how many times underground mental midget Zedd incorporates the swastika as a conspicuously childish form of shock value that could only be effective on the average American or any other viewer that has had a Hollywood lobotomy. In fact, when asked in an interview featured in the book Art That Kills: A Panoramic Portrait of Aesthetic Terrorism 1984-2001 (2011) about his fetish for the almighty Hakenkreuz, Zedd proudly confessed, "Yeah, Swastikas are always a good way to get a knee-jerk reaction, to piss people off. A timeless symbol. Anything to shock and offend or confront a complacent audience, and anything to be anti-art." Rather unfortunately, Zedd gives the swastika the potency and depth of the McDonald's golden arches logo, which is to some extent fitting as the film is the avant-garde cinema equivalent of fast food, as it is cheap, digests poorly, and is prepackaged with the sort of expertise that one would expect from a ghetto-dwelling petty criminal who will do anything to avoid having to learn a real trade. Luckily, Zedd's film also attacks the Jews and their spiritually and culturally cuckolded Zionist Christian allies. Unlike his mostly negrophiliac predecessors in the No Wave movement, Zedd is also no more kosher what it comes to poor colored folk, as he even had the gall to exploit the absolutely accursed genetics of a Woody Allen-esque bug-eyed albino negro who seems to suffer from a terrible case of ADHD. Zedd's zanier than sick obsessions also include Romero-esque flesh-eating, self-castration, mass infantilism, live punk rock shows at popular clubs like CBGBs and Max's Kansas City, the dysgenic and genetically mutated, retards and freaks, Mr. Rogers, kitschy religious icons, and other things that make the director seem like a quasi-heterosexual John Waters wannabe who whored out his scrawny pimple-ridden ass to the Kuchar brothers. Centering around a suburban motherless family with an evangelical Christian father, loser transvestite son with a precarious poodle fetish and murderously misanthropic identical sisters who both attempt to takeover NYC and turn it into the most genocidal and chaotic place since Haiti, They Eat Scum is ultimately a 'feel-good' film for fiercely fucked people who like their lowbrow humor to be completely devoid of morality and good taste, among other things. In other words, the film is not a bad way to waste 70 minutes or so, especially if you're itching for some punk-tinged toilet humor that somehow paradoxically reminds the viewer that American culture was slightly less shitty a couple decades ago.

For whatever reason that is probably only known to dooper Zedd himself, They Eat Scum opens with a sickeningly spastic and exceedingly retarded four-eyed cripple mutant sporting 'whiteface' being spoon-fed what looks like liquid diarrhea, which is ultimately what the anti-auteur plans to figuratively do to the viewer with his darkly jovial and aesthetically nihilistic film. Notably, the over-extended introductory sped-feeding scene is juxtaposed with a disturbingly sappy Mr. Rogers song that somewhat fittingly concludes with the line regarding the benefits of being a child as opposed to being an adult, "You can do many things that grownups can't do anymore. For one thing, you can pretend you're all grown up." Of course, Zedd does not even pretend to want to be an adult and the film ultimately seems like an intricately frivolous and ultimately incoherent argument as to why growing up sucks and should be avoided at all costs. After the insanely inane intro, the viewer is transported to Brooklyn, NYC where eccentric fat old Evangelical whackjob Mr. John Wesley Stain and two of his three distinctly mentally disturbed children (the third 'kid' is not revealed until much later in the film). Demonstrating that he is a good little Christian cuckold-servative, patriarch Stain loudly recites to his ugly tranny son Jimmy aka 'Jim' and junky punk daughter Suzi Putrid (Zedd's then-girlfriend Donna Death of Rachid Kerdouche's Final Reward (1978) and Zedd's Geek Maggot Bingo or The Freak from Suckweasel Mountain (1983)) during a seemingly improvised dinnertime prayer, "Blessed be our neighbors [undecipherable] hapless Jewish immigrants, and mighty lord Abraxas, Menachem Bagel, pray...bless us and..." After the somewhat botched prayer, Daddy Stain informs his daughter that he has set her up with a scientist's mechanic named Herman Barbell and he wants her to give him an "extra special welcome," but little bitch Suzi immediately becomes extremely agitated and moans in an insufferable fashion, "Shit, not another nerd, Pap. I'm getting tired of all those nerds you keep sending over." Jimmy is also not too happy with his papa's sleazy matchmaking scheme as he is jealous of his sister's regular gentlemen callers and complains in an obnoxiously whiny fashion, "What about me and Polio, Pap? Me and Polio never get any visitors." Of course, as a less than charming chap that has less testicular fortitude than his own sister and resembles a tranny serial killer à la Buffalo Bob of The Silence of the Lambs (1991), Jimmy boy does not have much to be happy about. Since he is a sexually confused "blasphemer" and unrepentant zoophile that is literally in love with his pet poodle Polio, Jimmy is simply told by his father after complaining about his lack of male visitors, "My son...I pray for you. A day doesn't go by where I don't pray for you. Someday, the good lord will answer my prayer...I hope." Luckily, the entire family will soon be put out of its misery as a result of the cunning conspiratorial schemes of the dead matriarch's particularly perverted and no less demented crypto-cross-dresser brother.

When Jimmy makes the foolish mistake of leaving a used condom sitting around the house, his father, who points at his son while curiously wearing the semen-soaked rubber on a couple of his fingers, accuses him of being a "smut-peddler" and harshly punishes him by taking away his beloved pooch Polio and locking him in the bathroom for a week. Unfortunately for Jimmy, Mr. Stain puts poor Polio in Suzi's sadistic hands. Meanwhile, Suzi's gentleman caller Herman shows up and completely disgusts the young lady because he is an autistic albino negro nerd whose eyes are virtually popping out of his head and who attempts to compliment the punk princess' black books by comparing them to a West African black fly, which he gleefully describes as being able to deposit worms under your skin while they suck your blood. In fact, Herman is so autistic and ADHD-addled that he does not even notice when Suzi walks out of the room will he continues to express an almost amorous delight in discussing the pernicious essence of the black fly. Just like his daughter Suzi, Mr. Stain is mentally enslaved to his dead wife's distinctly debauched brother Mr. Wizard (aka 'Little Simon') and even follows his order to put 100% his will in his name. A sicko sadist that killed his sister so that he could steal her prized dark green dress and ultimately assume her identity, Mr. Wizard is in love with a tranny blow-up doll, which he romantically whispers to, "It doesn't matter that you have a rubber brain. When it comes to lust, they're all the same." As a man on a rather ambitious malefic mission, Mr. Wizard got his niece Suzi addicted to heroin so he could brainwash her into brainwashing the fans of her popular 'deathrock' group Suzy Putrid and the Mental Deficients, which also acts as a quasi-mystical cult that inspires its braindead fans to indiscriminately murder people for sport. Indeed, while performing on stage with her punk band at CBGBS, Suzi demands that her mindless fans become abstinent mass murderers, arguing that they should kill everyone, be they, "Black or white...Young or Old...If it moves, kill it." As for sex, Suzi seems to hate it even more than she loathes dressing like a female, proselytizing to her adorning fans, "Remember, fucking is for animals. There will be no sex. If you can't control yourselves, cut off your cock...sew up your cunts...or better yet, let me do it, for I am your god." Naturally, as starstruck automatons that are even dumber and more deleterious than GG Allin's groupies, Suzi's fans immediately oblige her and soon begin murdering and cannibalizing random people on the streets of Brooklyn, including negro gangsters, Hasidic Jews, and other forms of rather repellant ethnic rabble that once acted as the inspiration for the anthropomorphic monsters in the horror stories of H.P. Lovecraft.

Now in control of her brother's beloved doggy Polio due to his week-long banishment to the family bathroom, Suzi decides to bring the poor pup to a decrepit doggy whorehouse that gentleman Jim frequents and blackmails the drag queen madam named Mrs. Wanger into giving the dog rabies with the threat that she will tell the dreaded SPCA about her "sordid business." Naturally, as a successful business owner that charges $100 per her hour for prospective clients to get more than platonic with man's best friend, Mrs. Wanger follows Suzi's deranged demand. Meanwhile, Father Stain regularly taunts his son Jimmy by standing outside the bathroom door that he is imprisoned inside and incessantly repeating, "You're an underachiever, Jimmy." After complimenting her performance backstage at CBGBs by telling her that she has a talent for "asserting a vice-like grip on the crowd" while she shoots junk into her arm right next to him, Mr. Wizard recommends to Suzi that she kill her entire family and she replies, "Mr. Wizard, you have all the answers." Of course, Suzi gets all the more pumped up for familicide after learning from a terribly pedantic Uncle Tom newscaster on TV while simultaneously reading a "Penis Enlargement Techniques" magazine whilst lying panty-less in bed that her band Suzy Putrid and the Mental Deficients inspired a number of local violent crimes, including acts of vampirism. Indeed, some of Suzi's fans gorge on some street negroes while a four-eyed white dork intentionally has himself run over by a car while "Good Vibrations" by the Beach Boys is humorously blasted in the background. Like many punks (and probably Nick Zedd), Suzi's fans are resentful failed members of the bourgeois who have decided to wage war against the society that rejected them, so they like saying silly and unintentionally hilarious things like, "Everyone's trying to be middleclass, even the Puerto Ricans.” To demonstrate their hatred of their middleclass, Suzi and her gang of punk rock goons kidnap a scantily dressed young girl, tear off all of her clothes, shove a rat down her throat like it is a giant cock, and then dismember her body, especially her tits, with an electric saw and then collectively devour her limbs and organs in a ritual act of Romero-esque punk rock paganism. When Jimmy kicks the bucket after releasing rabid pup Polio in the family home, Father Stain decides enough is enough and is not only provoked to kill the family dog by blowing it away with a shotgun but also his beloved daughter who he hoped that he could one day pimp out to a wealthy gentleman caller. In fact, Mr. Stain is so bloodthirsty that he actually commits the blasphemous act of entering the unholy demonic grounds of Max’s Kansas City and then slits his daughter’s throat in front of all of her adoring fans. Needless to say, Suzi’s fans respond to Mr. Stain’s uniquely unpardonable sin of punk rock decide by ripping the old man to shreds, or so the viewer assumes (his death is not depicted onscreen, but instead simply reported by the Uncle Tom news anchor, thus hinting that Mr. Zedd probably ran out of special effects money at some point during the film’s production).

In an assumed mockery of Jesus Christ’s resurrection, Suzi is subsequently featured in a coma at a mental institution after her death via paternal filicide as if she somehow managed to come back to life, though it ultimately proves not to be her but her estranged identical twin sister ‘Poxy’ who fell into a deep eight year sleep after being brutally raped by her unhinged uncle Mr. Wizard. Although initially seeming both saner and tamer than her dead twin upon miraculously awaking from her coma as a result of Mr. Wizard apparently electrocuting her body, Poxy becomes completely bat-shit crazy upon being reunited with her unhinged uncle, who not only raped her as a little girl but also killed her mom by causing her to get impaled by the horns of a bovine named ‘Bessie the Cow’ after pushing her out of a barn window. Confusing Poxy for her sister, Suzi’s fans rescue her from the mental institution and take Mr. Wizard hostage. Almost immediately after being rescued, Poxy becomes a bigger mass-murdering megalomaniac than her dead sister and even proudly declares upon being shown two fans that mutilated their genitals in tribute to her, “These are not fans. These are loyal subjects...slaves who surrendered their entire universe to my authority.” When Mr. Wizard attempts to coerce Poxy into telling her fans to let him go, the deathrock diva vehemently screams in his face while displaying an overwhelming thirst for bloody vengeance, “You, Mr. Wizard, are the lowest form of human life...You spineless, perverted parasite! You killed my mother...you raped me when I was 8...you turned my sister into a heroin addict and my whole family into a row of corpses. You, Mr. Wizard, are an obscenity on the face of this earth. The viciousness of your crimes can only be avenged in one way: On the surface of my super-deluxe-outer-space turntable.” As punishment for his crimes, Mr. Wizard is decapitated after Poxy straps him to a gigantic record player. As reflected in her decided delusions of grandeur and ludicrously lofty ambitions, not to mention her unquenchable lust for blood and castration, Poxy seems to have ironically inherited the same genetic taint as the uncle that she loves to hate, thus it is only a matter of time before she botches her plans and is murdered in a fashion that is no less disgraceful than that of Mr. Wizard and her many victims.

After liquidating Mr. Wizard, Poxy murders the Uncle Tom newscaster on live television and then stares into the camera and self-righteously declares to the populous of the city, "My name is Suzy Putrid and you, New York, are the scum of the earth. All you listen to is disco...you deserve to die and before this broadcast ends, you'll begin to feel effects of a disease for which there is no cure." Indeed, Poxy has her fans cause a core meltdown at a nuclear power-plant in New Jersey that is only 24-miles north NYC, thus causing 100,000 people to die instantly and many more to succumb to slow and painful deaths as a result of radiation poisoning. After radiating a good portion of the city's population, Poxy declares herself the ruler and 'Death Queen' of the multicultural metropolis, secedes from the union, and fittingly renames the area 'Necropolis.' Of course, like most big plans, Poxy's radiation epidemic has some less than ideal unintended consequences that involve the birth of a race of monstrous anthropomorphic mutants who ultimately do not take too kindly to her reign of terror. Flash forward 20 years later and murderous mutant rebels are revolting against the Death Queen and her nihilistic neo-Nazi dictatorship. Ultimately, Poxy dies a dishonorable death via giant mutant cockroach after refusing to listen to her queen-ish queer adviser. As the mutants raid Poxy's headquarters, "YMCA" by the Village People plays triumphantly in the background (it should be noted that Poxy's adviser describes the classic cocksucker song as "the sound of revolution" and "mutant disco"). Ultimately, the film concludes with a narrator rhetorically asking questions like: "Will the normal cockroach outlive man?" and "Is man a disease?" In a potential nod to the conclusion of They Eat Scum, Mexican-born Cinema of Transgression figure turned academic Manuel De Landa might have been inspired to direct the short Judgement Day (1983) aka Massive Annihilation of Fetuses, which features a number of real-life cockroaches being tortured to death and was described by the director as, "...my tribute to the real master race that will soon inherit the planet [...] Cockroaches have not only invaded the flip side of my house (i.e., the back of my kitchen, the other side of my walls, etc.) but they have also taken over some areas of my unconscious....Since I started the film the structure of my nightmares has changed, almost as if I had violated their laws and they were getting ready for revenge."

Notably, in his The Cinema of Transgression Manifesto that was printed in a 1985 issue of the fanzine The Underground Film Bulletin under the unsurprisingly moronic pseudonym Orion Jeriko, Nick Zedd wrote regarding his self-stylized celluloid pseudo-religion, "All values must be challenged. Nothing is sacred. Everything must be questioned and reassessed in order to free our minds from the faith of tradition. Intellectual growth demands that risks be taken and changes occur in political, sexual and aesthetic alignments no matter who disapproves. We propose to go beyond all limits set or prescribed by taste, morality or any other traditional value system shackling the minds of men. We pass beyond and go over boundaries of millimeters, screens and projectors to a state of expanded cinema,” yet They Eat Scum, like many films associated with the movement, fails to slaughter a single sacred cinematic cow, lacks any seriously subversive or sensible political messages, is innately derivative (notably, Zedd once even went so far as to steal images from German auteur Ulrike Ottinger’s avant-garde epic Freak Orlando (1981) for an ad for his film Whoregasm (1988)), and is almost completely devoid of the sort of graphic sexuality that such similar works are (in)famous for. Indeed, if you want to see a truly anarchistic and strikingly strange film associated with the Cinema of Transgression movement, checkout Manuel De Landa’s distinctly directed and decidedly discombobulating anti-noir micro-epic Raw Nerves: A Lacanian Thriller (1980). At best, Zedd’s film is like the NYC underground equivalent to a Hollywood stoner comedy like Half Baked (1998) and it certainly seems superlatively softcore compared to the doc Hated: GG Allin & the Murder Junkies (1993) directed by Hebraic Hollywood hack Todd Phillips (Starsky & Hutch, The Hangover franchise). In a world where Hollywood openly backs pedophiles like Roman Polanski and Woody Allen yet blacklists bad goyim like Mel Gibson simply for saying something less than positive about god’s chosen tribe or expressing a religious objection to two sexually promiscuous fairies pretending to be husband and wife, They Eat Scum now feels like a playful diversion that was directed by the hipster equivalent of an inebriated fratboy who gets a cheap narcissistic thrill out of lighting his farts on fire while in the company of his frat comrades. Indeed, mainstream America has become far too debauched, eclectically moral bankrupt, and spiritual retarded for Zedd to be relevant nowadays, not to mention the fact that fellow Baltimore-born filmmaker John Waters did much more subversive things in the same vein many years before with works like Pink Flamingos (1972) and Desperate Living (1977). Luckily for Zedd, Waters is a fan of his debut feature, or as he stated in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier, “I like the whole idea of the movie...I mean, THEY EAT SCUM, which is still maybe one of my favorite titles in the history of titles.”

In Blank City, Zedd more or less revealed his dubious objective as a filmmaker when he stated regarding They Eat Scum, “The front-page of The Wall Street Journal called it, ‘the vilest and most revolting performance I have ever seen...Please do something to stop it.’ And I was quite elated to get this kind of attention...and this kind of outrage.” As his comment transparently demonstrates, Zedd is not a serious artist by a carny dilettante and punk rock prankster with a cheap Super-8 camera who pointlessly seeks attention for attention’s sake and does not have much more to offer. Indeed, it oftentimes crossed my mind while watching his debut feature that Zedd is internally imprisoned in a perpetual state of adolescence where he is trying in vain to receive the attention—be it positive or negative—that his parents assumedly denied him as a child. Although one of the more humorous running jokes of the film, I could not help but think that when the evangelical Christian father John Wesley Stain says to his son, “You’re an underachiever... Jimmy,” Zedd was depicting his own father and the way he treated him. In a great example of Zedd’s own delusional and megalomaniacal overestimation of his own films, the filmmaker actually had the audacity to argue in the documentary Lik Your Idols (2007) directed by Angélique Bosio as a defense for why no one gives a shit about his work, “The more hidden and marginalized something is, the more subversive and revolutionary... and, in the future, more and more people will become aware of what I’ve done. It’s just that now I’m sort of buried alive.” Of course, history has proven the opposite, as Zedd has become less and less revered among cinephiles as the decades have passed while fellow subversive avant-garde filmmakers that also utilized cheap Super-8 cameras like Teutonic aberrant-garde blond beast Jörg Buttgerreit and especially Nordic Canadian auteur Guy Maddin are becoming more and more popular, even though the former more or less abandoned filmmaking for about two decades. Notably, in Lik Your Idols, Zedd’s comrade Richard Kern demonstrates that he is more humble and sensible in regard to his place in cinema history when he states, “As a filmmaker with The Cinema of Transgression, it was just an involvement based around getting high and making movies... and having fun. I didn’t think anything would come of it.” Ultimately, They Eat Scum works best as a punk prank at the expense of bratty man-child hipster Zedd and the NYC underground as a whole, as it is a work that strives for artistic greatness but ultimately features the artistic integrity of one of Jack Smith’s cum-covered AIDS-ridden farts. Still, a constantly comical piece of filmic feces that has the gall to mock a uniquely ugly and rodent-like Israeli terrorist like Menachem Begin by having a half-crazed Christian cuck refer to him as ‘Menachem Bagel’ cannot be all bad. Indeed, Zedd may subscribe to the politics and aesthetics of punk rock puke, but at least he is not a politically correct pansy or self-loathing negrophile like the majority of people that have ever been historically described as New York City avant-garde filmmakers. In fact, if I were to credit Zedd with any notable accomplishment, it would be helping to put the final nail in the coffin of NYC avant-garde with his innately derivative celluloid senselessness and absurdly infantile approach to anarchy and nihilism. Certainly with They Eat Scum, cinematically vomited on every underground NYC auteur that came before him by reducing their motifs and beliefs to unintentional parodies, thus it is a work that should be seen by any serious self-disrespecting cinephile or lapsed hipster hobo.

THE BOGUS MAN

Nick Zedd (1980)

If there has ever been a sort of NYC underground equivalent to Edward D. Wood Jr., it is unequivocally trash auteur Nick Zedd (They Eat Scum, War is Menstrual Envy), though I would argue that the (in)famous Plan 9 from Outer Space (1959) director made more genuine and passionate work that more reflected his intention to fully express himself and his curious affinity for sporting women's panties than to merely offend people with overtly juvenile punk diletantism. Indeed, there is probably more internal pain and embarrassing self-reflection in Wood's semi-autobiographic quasi-docudrama Glen or Glenda (1953) than in Zedd's entire oeuvre, though his ironically titled work The Wild World of Lydia Lunch (1983) is admittedly quite pathetic as a work where an audio breakup letter read by the eponymous gutter skank makes the Cinema of Transgression anti-messiah seem like a sad little cuck who is desperate to make a quick buck off his ex-girlfriend's disposing of him. While I have been familiar with Zedd for no less than over a decade, I could never bring myself to watch one of his films in its entirety until somewhat recently as I could not stomach even watch ten minutes of his second feature Geek Maggot Bingo or The Freak from Suckweasel Mountain (1983) when I attempted to watch it about ten years ago, yet I have been feeling rather masochistic recently and decided to delve into the filmmaker's entire oeuvre, thus leading me to consider that the 11-minute short The Bogus Man (1980) is indubitably the filmmaker's most immaculate, idiosyncratic, and sophisticated work to date. A sort of intentionally grotesque allegorical agitprop piece involving kitschy bodily dismemberment, cheap Jimmy Carter masks, pulsating vagina chairs, eccentric Dr. Strangelove-esque German-Jewish mad scientists, and morbidly obese unclad monster ladies with bald heads, Zedd's short is, at best, a thankfully short and more bitter than sweet exercise in intricately bad taste that delights in debasing the viewer with its ostensibly insane imagery and asinine anarchistic politics. Like Geek Maggot Bingo, I originally attempted to watch The Bogus Man a number of years ago and found myself terribly bored to death by it and turned it off after only a couple minutes, but I decided to brave through the entire short somewhat recently upon watching a VHS tape of The Wild World of Lydia Lunch that featured it as a sort of bonus film to remind what kind of filmmaker Zedd really is (indeed, Zedd's 'experimental' Lunch doc seems like a rip-off of a Vivienne Dick flick, which is somewhat ironic considering the filmmaker once stated in an interview featured in the book Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant, "The reason I made that was because I had seen films that Lydia was in, by Vivienne Dick, which were horrible – they were just so boring and stupid and they had received these glowing reviews [from] the film critics at the Village Voice. And I knew I could do something better than that."). I guess I should have probably watched more than a couple minutes of Zedd's short when I first attempted to view it about a decade ago, as I recently discovered that I missed out on the crazy cunt chair and grotesquely obese unclad female monster doing a distinctly debasing striptease, among other forms of gutter grade celluloid (anti)poetry of the perniciously playfully psychotronic sort that epitomize The Bogus Man.

Like the sadomasochistic para-punk (meta)politics of Beth B and Scott B (the former of whom Zedd used to bang after she divorced the latter, or so Richard Kern reveals in the doc Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier) meets the viscerally grotesque post-holocaust psychosexual special effects of Jörg Buttgerit, Zedd's obnoxiously obscene short is notable for being one of the few films by the anti-auteur that does not seem outrageously outmoded nowadays in an age where senseless trash like so-called 'torture porn' has become mainstream, not to mention the fact that The Bogus Man seems far too slick and 'professional' to have been directed by the perennial punk poser. Of course, as a work that wallows in ugliness and insipid shock value for shock value's shake, the short is undoubtedly pure Zedd in the most positive and 'complimentary' sort of way, thus making it a great introductory work for novices. Whereas Zedd's first and arguably greatest feature They Eat Scum (1979) resembles a sort of hysterical punk sci-fi home movie and his second feature Geek Maggot Bingo seems like what happened if a more misanthropic Mike Kuchar attempted to direct an epic Ed Wood homage while high on both speed and acid, The Bogus Man actually has something resembling a carefully and tightly constructed avant-garde mise-en-scène as a sometimes foreboding yet equally campy chiaroscuro piece that is probably the director's least politically infantile yet simultaneously most experimental work to date. In short, the film is Zedd at his most overtly 'cinematic.' Part cynical parody of spy movies, part excessive exploitation trash, and part malicious criticism of both pussy President Carter and the American political system in general, the film depicts a world where the U.S. commander-in-chief has been replaced by various eponymous clones. Of course, the real appeal of The Bogus Man is that it is a nihilistically nightmarish piece of celluloid that demonstrates that, not unlike the title and some of the content of War Is Menstrual Envy (1992), Zedd seems to have a sexually schizophrenic belief that the pussy is mightier than the penis, among other things.

The Bogus Man opens mysteriously enough in a nearly pitch black room where a mystery man sporting a ski-mask states, while sounding like a sort of perverted newscaster, "No, I am not a terrorist. I am an undercover agent for the Central Intelligence Agency. My identity must remain a secret, for I am about to reveal to you for the first time privileged information concerning the most diabolical scheme ever hatched: To subvert our democratic system, C.I.A. complicity in the government's plot to clone the President of the United States. This will be the first in a series of reports in which I shall present hard evidence in the form of filmed interviews with witnesses and participants in the government's project, which resulted in the successful replacement of our President by several clone duplicates. In these reports, I shall establish beyond any shadow of doubt the validity of my assertion that our President is not, in fact, the man you voted for, but is, in reality, the Bogus Man." From there, the dead serious yet ultimately unwittingly quite silly masked man in the shadows describes certain footage that was "forwarded to the director of the Central Intelligence Agency for his consideration" and how "When the director amassed enough evidence from our reports, the agency blackmailed the government into increasing their own power. America is now in danger of becoming a police state." The footage in question features an interview with a certain Teutonic tongued mad scientist (American photographer David McDermott of James Nares Rome '78 (1978) and Anders Grafström's The Long Island Four (1980)) with missing teeth who conducted, "the original cloning deception in the winter of '76." Upon the secret footage being shown, the scientist declares with a heavy German accent, "The Bogus Man wants to be elected. You must not vote for him" and then declares "I am in terrible danger. I can say no more." Unfortunately for the German-speaking scientist, his sinisterly brilliant mind has been taken over by the same supposed "sinister forces" that coerced him into cloning cuckold President Jimmy Carter. When asked if he feels guilty for his role in the cloning, the scientist becomes vaguely enraged and replies in an agitated fashion, "Guilty? Guilty? We have created a myth. It is a myth of passion...A reality of virtue of being a spore...A source of courage. Our myth is the nation. The greatness of the nation...This grandeur, we subordinate all the rest." When the scientist is revealed to have literal blood on his hands and then asked if he feels guilt for his involvement in the murder of Mr. Carter, he panics, babbles about a bunch of bullshit in German, and then nonsensically blows his brains out with a handgun in a somewhat tragicomic scene that is quite typical of the morally dubious humor that is oftentimes associated with the films of the Cinema of Transgression movement.

When the nameless/faceless CIA agent with the ski mask appears again, he sullenly declares regarding the footage of the exceedingly eccentric German scientist, "I know how you feel. When I first saw this footage, all I could say to myself was: 'Why did my eyes have to see this? Why?' You're probably asking yourself the same question...right now." From there, poorly shot footage of a morbidly naked unclad she-beast (portrayed by tragic tranny artist Greer Lankton in a genuinely disturbing fat-suit that s/he created herself) dancing next to the American flag is juxtaposed with what the man in the ski mask just said. Indeed, when the man says "Why did my eyes have to see this? Why?," it is also clear that he speaking for the filmgoer while they are watching the fiercely fat naked quasi-female freak, which is apparently one of the "Bogus Man" clones. As the CIA agent with the ski mask also reveals, each finger of Jimmy Carter, who is now quarantined as a result of contracting leprosy, was used to create clones and “one of the clone presidents is now running our country and he is a Bogus Man.” Apparently, a group called the SLA was involved in a series of successful assassination attempts against Bogus Man clones, but each time they were killed they were immediately replaced with another imposter and no one knows about this because, “The media has imposed a blackout on any of these events.” As the man in the masked CIA agent proudly states regarding himself and the SLA, they have been “patriotically attempting to destroy all clones in order to snuff this hideously diabolical scheme to undermine the sanctity of our executive office. Nick Zodiac and I have risked grave hazards in order to bring these frightening facts to your attention. Now that you know this, it is your patriotic duty to do everything in your power to see to it that this man is not reelected president.” In the end, the ‘real’ Jimmy Carter (aka a man in a fairly cheap Carter mask) is portrayed having his fingers hacked off while he is tied to a pulsating vagina chair. In the very the last scene, the mensch with the ski mask is depicted merely smoking a cigarette in the shadows, as if telling the Bogus Man story gave him a mighty orgasm or something.

Notably, in his article Notes on the Work of Nick Zedd, legendary Lithuanian-American avant-garde filmmaker and underground gatekeeper Jonas Mekas wrote, “I discern a great sadness in Zedd’s work. Frustration and sadness. All those penises, shaking breasts, all those sad, bedraggled protagonists, the dregs or the glories of that world which populate his films, they all exude sadness. There is no ecstasy in those shaking breasts and penises, no joy. Nothing but frustration, sadness. Yes, I would even go as far as to say that they exude a longing for love, compassion: Longing for a lost paradise. A pretty hopeless passion, I presume, the world being as it is.” Of course, it seems Zedd sees things quite differently, or as the filmmaker once stated himself, “Genocide is brutal. In comparison, my movies are not at all brutal. They’re entertaining,” thus revealing that the auteur sees himself as a sort of harmless exploitation director. While I certainly agree with Mekas in that Zedd’s films are plagued with a certain fierce juvenile frustration, I think the filmmaker is more disgruntled than melancholic and is simply an uncultivated nihilist of the sexually dysfunctional sort who worships ugliness and actually genuinely believes that his films contain idiosyncratic fantasy utopias where people like himself feel free and at peace. As the sort of anti-messiah of 1980s America’s most prominent underground film movement who grew up in the relatively safe bourgeois realm of suburban Maryland, Zedd ultimately reflects the aesthetic and intellectual impoverishment of American culture in general, not to mention the fact that he is a true prodigal son of the American dream and thus dwells in a sort of nefarious nightmare of his own self-prideful making, which is arguably apparent in The Bogus Man via the mere visuals alone. Indeed, I would argue that Zedd is the true bogus man, as a sort of jovial executioner of art and beauty who has taken on the role of being an uncompromising ‘artiste,’ yet has done everything in his power to defile the fullest and most eclectic of all artistic mediums: cinema. As reflected in his remark, “I think everything is politics, life is politics, I see my films as entertainment not political tracts....I don’t know, it’s such a loaded term, ‘politics,’” Zedd also represents the nadir of cinematic agitprop as a man that is too hopelessly stupid and passive-aggressive to have any real message aside from advocating for destruction for destruction’s sake and nothing more. Still, I cannot completely loathe a filmmaker who apparently had a major influence on Christoph Schlingensief (in fact, during a Schlingensief retrospect at the Museum of Modern Art in NYC, three of Zedd’s films were also screened, demonstrating his imperative influence on the truly iconoclastic Teutonic auteur). Of course, as much as I think that Zedd is a pathetically perennially posturing dork, I can respect The Bogus Man and the filmmaker’s sentiments regarding the film that it is, “about how all the presidents of the U.S. have been puppets of the military-industrial complex. . . . it’s about how all these public figures who we’re supposed to admire are really clones of dead ideas which should be obliterated.”

THE WILD WORLD OF LYDIA LUNCH

Out of all the filmmakers in cinema history, very few probably can compare to Rainer Werner Fassbinder when it came to his personal love life being closely intertwined with the films he made and the people he cast in them. Indeed, Fassbinder largely made his quasi-psychedelic avant-garde anti-western Whity (1971) in the futile hope of vying for the attention of his married black Bavarian boy toy Günther Kaufmann by unsuccessfully attempting to turn him into a film star (the film was never even distributed theatrically and was rarely seen until relatively recently when it was released on DVD). Apparently, when Kaufmann fell out of favor at a certain point, Fassbinder decided to fire him from the lead role of Der amerikanische Soldat (1970) aka The American Soldier and replaced him with Karl Scheydt (though Kaufmann sung the film's theme song "So Much Tenderness"). Ultimately, Fassbinder would immortalize his rather rocky and one-sided doomed romance with his mulatto beau with his early masterpiece Die bitteren Tränen der Petra von Kant (1971) aka The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant, though he would obscure reality by transsexualizing himself and his ex-lover in Sapphic high-camp form. While Fassbinder's films and their background histories expose a seemingly romantically accursed man who could be both a venomous sadist and pathetically meek masochist, none of it quite compares to the patently pathetic and just plain repugnant lengths that the Cinema of Transgression anti-messiah Nick Zedd (They Eat Scum, Geek Maggot Bingo or The Freak from Suckweasel Mountain) went through to direct the superlatively shitty celluloid anti-love-letter The Wild World of Lydia Lunch (1983). While I certainly try to stay away from any film that features anti-Renaissance woman Lydia Lunch, my curiosity got the best of me after watching the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier and learning that Zedd made the film to document the proudly cuntly eponymous subject breaking up with him. Certainly an (unintentionally?) ironically titled work that makes Lunch seem like a disgruntled toddler who made a seriously botched attempt at giving herself a haircut while high on Ritalin and makes Zedd seem like a obnoxiously self-pitying little poser punk cuck who probably enjoys it when fat women step directly on his testicles with high-heels, The Wild World of Lydia Lunch is a truly cringe-worthy and Fremdsham-inducing example of phony yet pathetic art imitating phony yet pathetic life. As Lunch stated regarding the film in Blank City, "it's a homemovie of me walking around with a 'fuck off, leave me alone' cassette I sent him in the mail as a soundtrack. I was not happy with this." Despite being particularly pointless and of absolutely no interest to anyone aside from the 'artiste' and maybe the star, Zedd apparently felt it needed to be made, stating in Danhier's doc, "I wanted to put something on film that would capture that moment in time," thus revealing that he must be a morbidly masochistic

mangina who seems proud of the fact that he was dumped by a decidedly dirty dame that has more testicular fortitude than him. Of course, the question is why would any self-respecting man want to make a film in tribute to his girlfriend breaking up with him featuring said girlfriend walking around aimlessly juxtaposed with an intricately bitchy audio breakup letter?! Apparently, the same sort of man that would somewhat ironically write like a teenage megalomaniac in a (micro)manifesto, "We violate the command and law that we bore audiences to death in rituals of circumlocution and propose to break all the taboos of our age by sinning as much as possible. There will be blood, shame, pain and ecstasy, the likes of which no one has yet imagined. None shall emerge unscathed. Since there is no afterlife, the only hell is the hell of praying, obeying laws, and debasing yourself before authority figures, the only heaven is the heaven of sin, being rebellious, having fun, fucking, learning new things and breaking as many rules as you can. This act of courage is known as transgression. We propose transformation through transgression - to convert, transfigure and transmute into a higher plane of existence in order to approach freedom in a world full of unknowing slaves." Indeed, quite tough words for a man that makes such mundane art, as the only subversive thing about The Wild World of Lydia Lunch is that celluloid sped Zedd would actually try to pass off such a patently pathetic Super-8 turd as a real film.

Shot in Ireland and England in the summer of 1983 while Lunch was there with the intention of starring in some film directed by Irish experimental filmmaker Vivienne Dick (She Had Her Gun All Ready, Guerillere Talks), The Wild World of Lydia Lunch ultimately seems like it was made so that Zedd could capitalize off of his (ex)girlfriend's marginal fame as a slutty punk anti-princess and so-called 'spoken word artist.' Indeed, as someone that made the dreadful mistake of reading Lunch's almost psychopathically written whore memoir Paradoxia: A Predator's Diary (1997) where she blames her degenerate vacuum-cleaner-peddling father and the fact that he supposedly molested her as the reason for her legs being perennially spread (or as she wrote herself in the book, "So twisted by men, a man, my father, that I became like one"), I immediately recognized her gratingly and distinctly emotionally vacant prose being vomited in the film. It is no surprise to most people that many artists tend to suffer from certain narcissism related personality disorders, but Lunch is a real unsavory crusty cunt with psychotic tendencies that is in a league of her own and Zedd's abortive 23-minute doc reveals why she somehow absurdly believes that she is god's gift to men and that the world revolves around her unflatteringly fat ass. Indeed, even the greatest of menschen are willing to suffer a certain amount of ceaseless bitching, self-absorption, and irrationality from the so-called fairer sex, but any man that would dare to date the less than lushly lecherous spunk-soaked (un)lady Lunch is a major masochist and sub-beta-bitch, among other things. After watching a mere two minutes or so of the shockingly plodding pseudo-experimental doc, I was hoping that at least a dozen members of a biker gang would emerge from a dark alley and senselessly sexually ravage Lunch so that she would shut the hell up (but then again, she would probably enjoy it and I can only imagine the hideous hog sounds she makes during sex).

Undoubtedly, probably the only marginally entertaining aspect of The Wild World of Lydia Lunch is that a large part of Lunch's rant involves bitching about whether or not the film is actually going to get made and that Zedd will have to fend for himself if he dares to take a trip over the pond to the UK. In fact, after listening to Lunch's seemingly lethal pathological bitching, the viewer is left shocked that it was, rather unfortunately, actually completed. Of course, the film was probably assembled in a couple hours while the 'actress' and 'auteur' were stoned as a result of sniffing glue, so that would probably explain why the film is so piss poor even by Zedd's standards (notably, when the film was originally released on VHS, the tape also included Zedd's short The Bogus Man (1980) as if to remind the viewer what kind of director he really is). In what is ultimately the most disgruntled pity party ever featured in cinema history, Lunch narrates via her self-described "a fuck-off-and-leave-me-alone recording" at the very beginning of the film, "Nick, nothing is working out as planned. I am in total despair...disrepair [...] I have had some of the grisliest days of my life wondering what to say or what to do to you." Of course, Lunch deceptively starts out the audio break-up letter in such a melodramatic way to portray herself as a damsel in distress so that she can kill Zedd softly and elicit phony sympathy for him while kicking him to the curb. In what might be considered borderline anti-Semitism by Hollywood standards, Lunch proceeds to bitch how her Hebraic manager Robert Singerman screwed her out of money and now she cannot pay for Zedd's trip as she apparently originally intended to. In a shot featuring Lunch lurking in a dark stairwell like a poser Goth dyke, we hear the pseudo-spooky slag complain, "I feel like fucking off in the distance for a six month disappearance. After I have been believed for dead, maybe my high hopes, ignorance, and trouble-making will be forgiven and forgotten. Maybe I will be dead. I am in a permanent state of morbidity." Somehow I doubt that, despite her pseudo-sullen bitch stares and Siouxsie Sioux haircut, Lunch is as morbid and hopelessly desperate as she portrays herself as, but I do not doubt that she is lying when she claims that she is comforted by, "the most morbid man the world has left alone" because, to quote her, "he is undoubtedly worse off than me," as she is clearly a sadistic bitch who creams her festering stained panties every time she experiences schadenfreude

If the doc has any comedic value whatsoever, it is when Lunch spews pseudo-poetic barf like, "I'm at a loss of everything. I can barely move. I do not want to think or do anything...lethargy and apathy have placed their print at the base of my brain. My heart ran away with the moon and I'm left ugly and lonely. Although I tried to pursue, I don't want to be left with the burden of finding us support.” Indeed, if there is anything more infectious than her daddy-defiled downy-bit, it is the acidic word viruses that she regularly excretes from her odious facial orifice. If Lunch has anything that can even remotely be described as an admirable attribute, it is that she actually admits that she is a nasty little narcissistic bitch, narrating in her anti-love-letter to avant-garde sped Zedd, “I am, due to necessity, becoming more self-concerned [...] do not misinterpret this for anything other than self-preservation.” As for her comatose romance with Zedd, Lunch finally gets to the point when she cynically states regarding their shattered love affair, “What once was is never again. How sad...but not really.” Somehow, I doubt someone like Lunch has the capacity to love, hence why she uses her gash to make cash. Apparently, Zedd is no more optimistic about their love affair, as Lunch complains, “Your last letter depressed me irreversibly...so callous yet so true.” Alluding to the fact that she is NYC’s most routinely used cum-dump, Lunch also complains, “Anyway, I really need some fucking time off, I feel like a goddamn rag that’s been used to wipe up after one man from the next. You may or may not understand this condition.” Of course, as a seemingly masochistic man who tends to date bargain bin anti-babes and derelict divas that have less than effeminate faces than he does, Zedd probably can understand Lunch’s curious condition in some strange way.

As to why Lunch is breaking up with Zedd, she states in a considerably cold and callous tone, “I guess I just want to be relieved of any and all responsibility for and of your emotional, physical, and financial well-being. I do not want the hideous suffocation of any sort so capable of being readily reproduced with any relationship, even ours. My selfishness exceeds itself at this point, but if it doesn’t I would simply be forced to wither and die away at the fatal hands of repetition.” Like so many little girls who dump their little beaus, Lunch claims that she still wants to be friends with Zedd, even declaring during a superficially misanthropic pseudo punk rant that surely screams of juvenile posturing and gross insincerity, “...above all, I hope you’re my true friend. My cohort...in this unending and ugly garbage bin—the world—where self-denial and self-suppression is the key taught since day one. We go against this grain and we live for truth. The ugly fucking truth.” Of course, Lunch would not know the “ugly fucking truth” if an AIDS-ridden Detroit negro-beast bit her on her saggy semen-soaked ass. At about the halfway point of the doc, Zedd himself makes an appearance and cuckishly admires Lunch as if he is completely infatuated with her essence while she chews on a piece of grass while looking at the filmmaker as if he is a sad and pathetic nuisance who does not have what it takes to truly pound her putrid puss. After Lunch self-righteously declares to Zedd, “I need a vacation from all the fucking hassle I’ve gone through to make some stupid dreams come true and I have been try...I am racked [...] You speak of the ruination of your life as you knew it; I speak of the death of mine,” the audio breakup letter has finally concluded and the rest of the film the viewer watches the eponymous gutter grade femme fatale doing pointless things like aimlessly walking around and standing on street corners while locals look at her as if someone has flung a steaming pile of feces across her face.

In a vaguely intentionally humorous segment of the doc that clearly demonstrates that she lacks even the slightest inkling of maternal qualities, Lunch pushes a happy little boy on a swing while maintaining her signature disgruntled bitch facial expression. While the film does not feature the sort of nudity and lechery one would expect from a film titled The Wild World of Lydia Lunch (indeed, I bet Zedd came up the title strategically in the hope that more people would buy it on VHS as a result of assuming it was a Kern-esque blue movie) and starring a street slut that has no problem sucking cock on film, the viewer can see Lunch's baloney nipples in a couple scenes where she is wearing a white dress that is far too elegant for such a rather unrefined gutter wench. In one of the few scenes where she actually seems genuinely happy and excited, Lunch plays catch with a dog who cutely sees her off when she rides away on a motorcycle with some random leather-clad lowlife. In what is indubitably the most pretentious scene in the film, Lunch smashes a small mirror that she is staring into, as if she hates being the female Narcissus of the Cinema of Transgression movement. In the end in a mellow yet vaguely Gothic pastoral scene that seems borrowed from Jean Rollin, Lunch enters a gated path, shuts said gate, and then disappears from the frame, thus assumedly signifying the end of her romance with Zedd. Notably, the doc concludes with the inter-title "Film Stolen by Nick Zedd," thus making it seem like that the film was actually indeed shot by Vivienne Dick (for anyone that has seen any of her short films with Lunch, the aesthetic similarities are unmistakable) and that Zedd stole the footage and merely edited it together. Either way, The Wild World of Lydia Lunch is not the sort of film that any self-respecting auteur would want to claim as their own.

As someone that probably would not even have fucked Lydia Lunch when she was at her prime (sorry, but short and pudgy girls with shitty haircuts and attitudes really just do not do it for me), The Wild World of Lydia Lunch proved to be nothing short of an abject aesthetic torture test of the odiously obnoxious sort and, in that sense, it may be the most obscenely offensive thing that Nick Zedd—a less than sophisticated would-be-agitator and failed enfant terrible who thinks it is edgy to film burn victims licking titties and ugly fat chicks displaying their damaged goods—has ever directed. Naturally, when an obnoxious and emotionally stunted hipster brat like Zedd actually attempts to direct a film with a semi-serious and even emotional tone as he did with his Lunch doc, it has uniquely ugly consequences, but I never expected what probably can be best described as a singularly pathetically incriminating and self-denigrating vanity piece (of course, it is impossible to gauge whose vanity piece it really is). As a fan of Kenneth Anger's Eaux d'artifice (1953) and early Werner Schroeter flicks like Eika Katappa (1969) and Argila (1969), I certainly have no problem with plot-less films featuring melancholy girls doing nothing but posing and walking around, but Zedd's film is about as aesthetically delectable as pus-covered potato chips. Apparently, Zedd has claimed that he made the film as a means to get revenge against Lunch for dumping him by making money off of her, yet the eponymous subject has mostly good things to say about the film and filmmaker, starting regarding the auteur and his debasing doc, "That he was bold enough to come and track me down anyway is a testament to his stubborn dedication to his art." Personally, I think the film is more of a testament to how lazy, pathetic, uncreative, parasitic, and stupid Zedd is as an artist, but I actually have respect for Lunch for agreeing to allow her bitchiness to be exploited in such a shamelessly sleazy fashion that demonstrates that the filmmaker probably could have had a serious career in reality TV. Indeed, if Zedd should be awarded any sort of honor for The Wild World of Lydia Lunch, it is that he has probably directed what is the most embarrassing film ever made and I cannot even blame an insufferable cunt like Lunch for dumping his weak ass. As can be expected, Zedd has only become all the more emasculated over the decades, as he is now a stay-at-home dad who spends his days doing laundry for his Mestizo son and assumedly taking orders from his much more masculine Mexican baby-momma. While I am sincerely happy for Zedd that he has now settled down and has his own family, I pray that he does not make a homemovie in tribute to them in the vein of The Wild World of Lydia Lunch. As for Lydia Lunch, thank god she has never reproduced.

MANHATTAN LOVE SUICIDES

Nick Zedd (1985)

While most people would probably agree that suicide is no laughing matter, I think that it can be successfully made the butt of a joke if dope sick NYC hipsters, homo hustlers, and deformed drug dealers are involved, or so I learned while watching the seedy and sleazy yet equally silly and schlocky Super-8 celluloid quadriptych Manhattan Love Suicides (1985) directed by underground punk (anti)pornographer and prominent Cinema of Transgression figure Richard Kern (You Killed Me First, Fingered). A sort of absurdly tragicomic epic short film that is made up of four different separately shot yet thematically connected works, including I Hate You Now (1985), Stray Dogs (1985), Thrust in Me (1985), and Woman at the Wheel (1985), Kern's grotesquely goofy flick might be best described as the filmmaker's sort of neo-bohemian bargain bin equivalent to Pasolini's The Decameron (1971) as a perversely and sometimes perniciously playful piece made up of loosely connected petite vignettes that work as sort of nihilistic fables of the oftentimes savagely slapstick sort. In many regards a sort of who's who of the Cinema of Transgression movement as a work that features wayward acting performances from many of the main filmmakers of the scene, including Nick Zedd (They Eat Scum, War is Menstrual Envy), David Wojnarowicz (Where Evil Dwells, A Fire in My Belly), and Tommy Turner (Simonland, Rat Trap), and seems to almost parody the more pretentious works of the NYC underground scene, Kern's flick is literally and figuratively masturbatory celluloid trash that seems like it was directed by a brain-damaged teenage tweaker who stole his grandma's Super-8 camera, yet at the same time it is also a distinctly fun and shockingly memorable movie that reminds the viewer that even morally retarded perverts can create marginally notable lowbrow (anti)art. While it probably seems like a strange puffery-plagued bullshit comparison to make, Manhattan Love Suicides somewhat reminded me of David Lynch's masterful debut Eraserhead (1977) in a very particular way in that the film practically bleeds the foreboding essence of the specific zeitgeist and post-industrial hellhole that it so unflattering depicts while also focusing on the tragic young love in the big city and ultimately turning the morbid into the merry in the process. Indeed, I could not watch one second of Kern's film without fantasizing about NYC being nuked into oblivion lest the world be contaminated by its anti-culture of rampant rudeness and infantile narcissism, as the flick makes the rotten Big Apple seem like a third world metropolis for poser poets and third generation punks who spend all day walking around and doing literally nothing but trying to give off the impression of being hopelessly hip and angsty, among various other emotional contrivances that are most typically obsessed over by hormone-imbalanced teenage girls. Despite the film's superficially sensational porno-esque title, Manhattan Love Suicides is innately anti-erotic in tone, even though it features various unclad genitals from both genders, and contains a highly alienating post-counterculture Sodom where love is, at best, an intangible fantasy and adolescent delusion and, at worse, an all-consuming sickness that leads one to kill themselves in an incredibly stupid way that is hardly romantic. Of course, in Kern's film it is impossible to feel empathy for a single one of the characters who have committed suicide as the depictions of self-slaughter are so absurdly amateurish and over-the-top that one can only see it as morbidly mirthful in the most keenly kitschy sort of way. In other words, Kern's film makes Jörg Buttgerit's similarly themed work Der Todesking (1990) seem like a late era Bernardo Bertolucci flick by comparison.

The first and arguably the best chapter of the film is Stray Dogs, which depicts a tall young street hustler who literally falls apart at the seams because a particularly pompous middle-aged artist rebuffs his love to the point of sadistically mocking him for it. At the beginning of the segment, the insufferably pretentious-looking 'artiste' (played by real-life artist Bill Rice of countless cult flicks, including Decoder (1984) directed by Muscha and Jim Jarmusch's Coffee and Cigarettes (2003)) is depicted walking around with a vaguely attractive woman with a dyke haircut, as if he hopes to obscure the fact that he has a fetish for young yet grizzled prick-peddlers (as revealed later in the film, the artist has an obsession with taking portraits of hustlers and painting hard cocks). When the woman points out a poster for a moronic looking Hollywood film and asks him, "Isn't this that movie about a guy that marries two pregnant women at the same time?," the revoltingly smug artist acts like a vainglorious queen and retorts, "I'm surprised at you" and then remarks regarding the lead actor of the movie, "He's a fat pig." After walking by a dog grooming place where the artist mundanely remarks, "I've got a dog like that" and his lady friend replies, "I do too," the two seeming mismatched love birds soon part ways. Unbeknownst to the artist, a side-piping 'stray dog' (artist and sometimes actor/auteur David Wojnarowicz) has been following him like a lost puppy and wants him to take him home and let him sleep in his bed, which he rather reluctantly does after the lanky hustler, who walks and moves in a strange robotic fashion like a sort of autistic fag Frankenstein monster, encircles him at an ATM and puts his arm on his shoulder in a considerably awkward fashion that gives the viewer the impression that he wants to bash his brains in. On the way back to the apartment, a sort of debauched junky skinhead licks his lips at the artist, which naturally causes the hysterical lovelorn hustler to get extremely jealous to the point where he violently pushes the young baldheaded bastard out of the way. When they finally get back to the apartment, the hustler's nose curiously begins bleeding after the artist rejects one of his various failed romantic advances. When the artist decides to work on a painting and fails to acknowledge that the stray streetwalker is still in his presence, the young man cries whilst staring out of a window and then proceeds to sit on a couch and masturbate like some cheap stripper slut.

Somewhat humorously, when the artist notices the hustler choking his chicken, he merely looks disgusted like he is watching a slimy homeless man defecating on his new carpet. After another failed romantic advance, the hustler begins to lose it, starts bleeding out his neck, and then collapses, which the seemingly sadistic artist finds rather funny. Upon finding a stack of portraits with a portrait of himself located at the top of the stack, the hustler becomes momentarily happy but that soon ends when he looks at the rest of the photos and discovers images of various other young male prostitutes, thus causing him to become so distressed that his arm inexplicably falls off. Although initially shocked upon seeing the hustler lying in a pool of blood on his floor, the artist decides to stop working on his painting and begins drawing a picture of the armless prostitute while he is dying, thus his death via heartbreak is not completely in vain. After all, countless great works of art are the product of lovelornness and romantic despair, even if Stray Dogs is not one of them.

The second segment of the film, Woman at the Wheel, is arguably the weakest of the four parts and is largely the brainchild of female lead Adrienne Altenhaus and depicts how some women might be driven to suicide if they incessantly date superficially 'misogynistic' assholes who insist on driving their cars, especially if they are automobiles that they bought with their own money. Indeed, when Altenhaus shows up at her lover's pad and proudly declares while sounding like a doped up 15-year-old regarding her new automobile, "Hey, man, checkout my new car. Like it? Let's go for a drive," she is forced to get in the passenger seat because her bastard neo-bohemian beau (Nick Zedd sporting a singularly retarded large hat that unequivocally proves that he is one of the greatest fashion victims to have ever graced the streets of NYC) insists on driving. While driving the car, the bitchy boyfriend mocks Altenhaus' earrings and shouts naughty things at her like "Fucking bitch...Fuck off! I'll drive the way I want to," so the female heroine eventually gets so enraged that she repeatedly calls her gutter-hipster lover a "fuckhead" and then subsequently throws him out of her car while giving him the middle finger emoji and joyfully telling him to shove it up his ass. When Altenhaus decides to get an upgrade in terms of a boyfriend and hooks up with a generic Wall Street preppie type who looks like he regularly blows men in urine-drenched public bathrooms, the pseudo-suave gentleman proves to be just as adamant driving her car and treating her like a worthless piece of trash as Zedd's character. Of course, Altenhaus is even more vicious with her preppie beau due to her past experiences with dysfunctional romance and even has the gall to say to him, "I don't even know why I hang around with you, you prick. You've got a little prick, too, you asshole," thus revealing that the female protagonist is probably a little bit sexually repressed and would benefit from a cock being rammed down her throat. Needless to say, Altenhaus is not too happy when her boyfriend frankly says to her, "Your fucking attitude stinks [...] I don't wanna hear this fucking shit anymore about your car. I'm driving it. It's my car when I'm driving it, so quit talking about it." When the preppie later attempts to drive her car, Altenhaus decides to whack him on the head and leaves him for good. At this point, Altenhaus becomes so fed up with men that she begins dressing like a nun, so naturally when a gang of belligerent young men approach her car and shout obscenely crass things like "Hey baby, suck my dick" and "I got a dick to suck" she becomes murderously unhinged and decides to run them over during a moment of PMS style road rage. While one of the men is lying lifeless on her windshield, Altenhaus suffers a sort of ominous Carnival of Souls-esque orgasmic hallucination where she imagines herself in an orgy with the chaps she has just killed, suffers a sort of psychosexual panic attack, and then crashes her car into a wall. While one can only speculate, maybe if Altenhaus had found the right cock for her cracked cunt, she would have not met such a patently pathetic end.

The third segment of the film, Thrust in Me, is notable for being not only co-written and co-directed by the Cinema of Transgression's self-appointed Führer Nick Zedd, but also featuring the trash auteur in dual acting roles, which include a too-cool-for-school hipster deadbeat and his morbidly depressed girlfriend. Although I was not particularly surprised since he looks like a sort lesbo fangirl for the New York Dolls, it should be noted that Zedd seems to have a natural affinity for gender-bending. Seemingly disillusioned about her relationship with her hotheaded hobo-like hipster boyfriend, Zedd-in-drag decides to read a book entitled How to be Your Own Best Friend: A Conversation with Two Psychoanalysts (1971) by Mildred Newman, but that soon proves to be too banal for the dejected young lady, so she tosses the book aside and decides to do some less light reading and begins flipping through Hebraic frog Émile Durkheim's classic text Le Suicide (1897). Of course, the woman opts to commit suicide, but her boyfriend has no idea as he is too busy assaulting redneck pimps and attempting to look oh-so rebellious and edgy by kicking around trash in the streets to be around to stop her. Indeed, after tearing off the cover of a kitschy looking book entitled Collection of Selected Prayers (1975) by Allan Kardec featuring an image of Jesus Christ and then taping it onto her bathroom wall, the woman undresses, gets in her bathtub, and kills herself by slitting her wrists. When the boyfriend gets back home after aimlessly strolling the streets of Manhattan like some would-be street celebrity who is a legend solely in his own mind, he immediately decides to take a shit and while doing so is completely oblivious to the fact that his girlfriend is lying dead in the bathtub right next to him. After defecating and subsequently failing to find toilet paper, the man looks around and does not think twice about wiping his ass with the Jesus book cover that his loony lover taped to the wall. Of course, upon locating the book cover, the man soon notices his dead girlfriend and is quite startled by what he sees, though his subsequent response to seeing the corpse of his beloved is hardly predictable. In fact, the man is so excited by what he sees that he whips out his already erect member and begins mouth-fucking the cold wet corpse. After ejaculating what seems to be enough cum to fill a two liter milk carton, the man seems way more happy and fulfilled than before his girlfriend killed himself. In the end, the man stands on the roof of his apartment building while the corpse of his girlfriend lies on the ground in a black plastic bag next to him. Notably, when Thrust in Me was screened at the Ann Arbor Film Festival, it was condemned as being misogynistic by various cunt carpet-munching feminist groups, so Zedd responded by writing a relatively admirable defense to his detractors entitled Dear Feminists where he argued that, by committing necrophilia with the corpse of his drama queen girlfriend (who was certainly attempting to commit emotional blackmail with her suicide), the character in his film had broken “the shackles of self-deceit which constitute the sentimentality of romantic love.” Indeed, as described in Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant, in his decision to take pleasure in his girlfriend’s death as opposed to enduring internal pain, Zedd’s character was able to remain, “mental[ly] independent.”

The fourth and final segment of the film, I Hate You Now, is notable for featuring real-life lovers, junky filmmaker Tommy Turner and his wife Amy Turner, as a degenerate dope-peddling pair that seems to have a wild sex life as demonstrated by the fierce fucking that the two do at the beginning of the piece. Notably, it is only revealed a couple minutes into the segment that the nameless boyfriend is not your typical gutter-level drug dealer, as half of his face is terribly deformed. Possibly due to the fact that he probably has a serious inferiority complex as a result of being teased during his entire life for having a fucked up face, the boyfriend acts somewhat cold to his girlfriend, even though she does everything for him, including cooking him fried eggs and helping him to roll joints that he sells to lowlifes on the street. When not peddling cheap weed or penetrating his girlfriend’s blonde gristle-gripper, the boyfriend practices bench-pressing an incredibly low amount of weight that could not be more than a mere 30 or 40 pounds. When her boyfriend goes out to sell some dope to some random street scavenger, the girlfriend gets depressed upon looking at a photo of her beau, thinks about what she can do to get him to show her more love and affection, and then comes up with the less than bright idea to burn her face with a iron so that she and her lover will somehow be closer due to being mutually disfigured. Of course, being largely visual beings who consider physical attractiveness to be one of, if not the most, important attribute a woman can have, it is doubtful that the boyfriend will be pleased with his beloved’s thoughtful sacrifice. Unfortunately, when the boyfriend gets home and sees that his girlfriend’s face is almost as revoltingly warped looking as his own, he pushes her and then screams in her face, “What have you done to yourself? Oh no, what the fuck!?” thus demonstrating his decided dissatisfaction with her rather hasty and insanely irrational decision. Upon doing a couple seconds of deep thinking, the man decides to kill himself by loading his barbell with all the weights he owns and then dropping it on his neck. Needless to say, the woman is not too happy when her boyfriend kills himself, especially after the sacrifice she has made for him, so she somehow manages to burn herself alive by lighting a small frying pan on fire and then standing over it. Certainly, in its own morally repugnant and innately illogical way, I Hate You Now is surely the most overtly 'romantic' segment of the entire film.

Notably, when interviewed by The Quietus in 2010 and told by interviewer John-Paul Pryor that, "I find STRAY DOGS the most bizarre of all your films," Richard Kern replied in an insightful manner where he proved that there was actually a point to the degeneracy of his film, stating, "That was one of the MANHATTAN LOVE SUICIDE series, which were all about getting so hung up on your relationships that you just couldn't do anything else. When you're young you are so overwhelmed with all these emotions that are centered on your relationship – your life at that age is not about what you are doing but about who you are going out with. All the movies in that series were about people who just get so hung up on it all that they kill themselves. When you are older, it seems like the stupidest thing to be suffering so much: to feel that you have to die for love." While I would argue that most of the segments of the film are about deleteriously deranged infatuation as opposed to actual genuine love that demonstrate the tendency of romantic relationships to be unequal and one-sided, the anti-erotic omnibus flick is arguably Kern's most mature, sensible, and thematically eclectic cinematic work to date as a playful piece of ludicrously lo-fi slapstick cynicism that might be described as the ultimate celluloid punk (anti)romance. Indeed, the film features a message about young mad love that is not all that different from Alex Cox's Sid and Nancy (1986), albeit directed in a strikingly technically inept way that is comparable to Sid Vicious' bass-playing or Darby Crash's howling and growling (speaking of the suicidal Spenglerian sod, a poster of Penelope Spheeris' classic doc The Decline of Western Civilization (1981) is featured prominently in the I Hate You Now segment). In the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Céline Danhier, musician J.G. Thirlwell, who composed most of the music for the film, stated regarding Manhattan Love Suicides, "The no-budget part of it provides the humor, but also all of the emotions that are portrayed in those films are so exaggerated and so over-the-top it's almost Dadaist." Indeed, in terms of its idiosyncratic and sometimes idiotic use of largely silent humor, Kern's film is probably the closest thing to a punk L'Age d'or (1930), albeit with fittingly piss poor direction and nil production values.

As a man that would oftentimes let other people, especially Lydia Lunch, takeover his films and do more or less whatever they wanted to, Kern may be the ultimate 'anti-auteur' as far as subversive underground filmmakers go and this is especially apparent in Manhattan Love Suicides. In fact, in the doc Blank City, Zedd acts as if the Thrust in Me part is completely his creation, stating like a true elementary school iconoclast, "I thought I would make this film THRUST

IN ME in which I play a female as well as a male. I thought it might offend people. When I put up posters for it with pictures of myself in drag, they were defaced and I thought that's great. That's exactly the response I want. I want to piss off the homophobes." Somewhat ironically, the acting performances of filmmakers like Zedd, Turner, and Wojnarowicz are actually more entertaining and unforgettable than the majority of the films they themselves directed, thus hinting that Kern's greatest talent might be in locating the specific strengths and talents of his collaborators and getting them to expose them on film (as he has oftentimes revealed on his VBS.TV show Shot By Kern, Kern uses a similar technique when he photographs unclad girls, who he encourages to expose their true characters and emotions while exposing their tits and pussies). Indeed, Kern must certainly have some special talent if he managed to accomplish the seemingly impossible task of causing a decidedly deplorable anti-diva like Ms. Lunch to shine on the seedy silver screen, which is especially apparent in Fingered (1986) where the perennial whore does what she does best by getting fucked by an abhorrent asshole and acting like a classless cunt who is about to blow a fuse because she has not gotten her hourly heroin fix.

While he would later steal his art-trash-porn aesthetic for his own films and even give the Cinema of Transgression auteur a cameo role in his somewhat disappointing second feature Super 8½ (1994), Bruce LaBruce wrote an article in 1990 for the Canadian 'cappuccino communist' film magazine CineACTION! entitled Right Wing Chic: Adam Parfrey and R. Kern Fingered!! under his supposed real name Bryan Bruce where he accuses Kern (as well as subversive Jewish publisher Adam Parfrey of Feral House fame) of being a 'fascist' of sorts, as if fascists make films about loose ladies like Lunch being violently finger-fucked and a beta-male bitch being fucked both anally and orally by two chicks wearing strap-on dildos in an exceedingly emasculating threesome, among other things, but I digress. The only marginal praise that LaBruce gives to Kern in the article is for Manhattan Love Suicides, which he describes as his "best film," but not without including the snarky little pink Gestapo remark that, "...we can't ask for too much. We are well prepared for his later forays into misogynist and homophobic territory." Notably, LaBruce begins his article with a pseudo-sensational quote by Kern from Film Threat where he sensibly stated, "If you have a black guy in a movie and he does something stupid you run the risk of being called a racist. . .Due to the feminist movement any reflection on, of, or about woman is going to be judged more critically than the same reflection about men. It's purely a matter of hypersensitivity. For example you would think everyone at the Village Voice was a black, gay, Jewish woman – such is their degree of hypersensitivity to certain subjects." Indeed, one of Kern's most blatant and admirable rare true strengths as a filmmaker is that he not only dares to depict the hard truth, but also portrays it in a preposterously exaggerated way, hence why Manhattan Love Suicides features a young homo hustler (as portrayed by a real-life ex-hustler!)

who is looking for a 'daddy' figure and lethally lusts after a middle-aged man, as well as depicts a woman using suicide as a form of ruthless emotional blackmail against her beau, among other things that expose Manhattan for the socially malignant human zoo that it is. Of course, one should not expect anything less from a man who was almost as pathetically debauched as the people he cinematically depicted, or as he once stated regarding his films, "There were sexual elements, there were drug elements. For some movies I paid people. I offered them $15 cash or $15 worth of drugs. A lot of people would do the drugs and then we'd shoot the movie. During the shooting of the movie, I was so wasted on smack and ecstasy all the time." Most importantly, Manhattan Love Suicides is an unequivocal piece of true trash art because it makes no lie about the fact that NYC is a degenerate cultural wasteland where cheap heroin, diseased and festering cunts, and visceral ultra-violence are the only form of solace from living in such a uniquely ugly and culturally retarded urban sewer.

POLICE STATE

While I have certainly met cops that were insufferable dickheads and megalomaniacal control-freaks, I find few things more innately impotent and pathetic than people that have a pathological hatred of police officers, especially when these morons sprinkle their irrational hatred with pseudo-moralistic self-righteousness while being degenerates themselves who almost seem jealous of the largely imagined power and control that they believe the men in blue have, not to mention the fact that these people are usually candy ass pussies who lack both the testicular fortitude and self-discipline that it takes to be a cop, especially in some urban multicultural sewer like NYC. As demonstrated by the recent collective hysteria of the mainstream media and the useful idiots that are always more than willing to believe every absurd specially tailored lie that is spoon-fed to them by said media as a result of a handful of negro thugs that were killed after making a series of superlatively stupid choices when dealing with the police, cops have become a sort of easy and highly trendy scapegoat for rampant 'urban' criminality and a drastically declining nation that is on the verge of becoming a third world anarcho-tyranny of the racially chaotic sort. Indeed, only in America can a seemingly half-retarded black thug who sold drugs to his own people and lived a completely parasitic existence become a sort of saint because he died under dubious circumstances upon being taken into custody by a multicultural black-white group of cops, but I digress. Aside from rappers, the most moronic and anti-intellectual cop hatred probably comes from the various outmoded punk movements that sprung up over the decades, so naturally it should be no surprise that para-punk trash filmmaker Nick Zedd (Geek Maggot Bingo or The Freak from Suckweasel Mountain, Totem of the Depraved)—a man that depicted a dystopian world where a group of braindead punk rock fans cause a nuclear meltdown and turn NYC into a punk rock (or "Death Rock" as it is labeled in the film) dictatorship via his debut feature They Eat Scum (1979)—would ultimately sire what is perhaps the most silly and senseless anti-cop film ever made.

Indeed, Zedd's 18-minute black-and-white short Police State (1987) is a fiercely philistine anti-police piece that attempts to be ten times as hardcore as Cool Hand Luke (1967) yet ultimately feels like the Cinema of Transgression's answer to Police Academy (1984), with the rambling auteur portraying arguably the most unsympathetic 'victim' of police brutality in cinema history as an arrogant posturing punk who ultimately gets castrated after unwisely running his mouth to every corrupt cop that he encounters at a police station upon getting arrested for mocking a fat ass polack pig. Of course, as someone that would much rather see Zedd being beaten to a bloody pulp by a gang of corrupt cops than any of his actual films, the short acts as the next best thing, not to mention the fact that it features the 'subversive' left-wing trash auteur uttering the word "nigger" against a negro cop despite being an ostensibly 'anti-racist' film that pays tribute to chocolate police brutality victim Michael Stewart. While there is certainly more potent and visceral anti-cop hatred in Raymond Pettibon's "Police Story" artwork for his brother's punk/hardcore band Black Flag than Zedd's film in its entirety, Police State benefits from being a fairly humorous, if not oftentimes unintentionally so, black comedy that begs to be taken seriously (as Zedd once stated of his film, he hoped it would "show people what cops are really like"). What the film really shows people is the sort of senseless passive-aggressive behavior that might lead someone to get their ass kicked by a pissed off cop who has had a bad day and hardly wants to deal with the rude and belligerent behavior of a smartass little twit who thinks being uncooperative with an officer of the law is some sort of serious political statement.

Partly inspired by the Operation Pressure Point gentrifying program that took place in Alphabet City in 1986, the film's genesis was described by Zedd as follows in the doc Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier, "In order to, supposedly, clear the neighborhood of drug dealers and other unwanted elements, the mayor of New York instituted the policy to make it more desirable for up-scale members of the community to move in. The government sent in police officers and subjected us to harassment. I decided to satirize their behavior in the movie POLICE STATE." Not just one of the many schlocky celluloid examples that proves Zedd suffers from Persönlichkeitsentwicklungsstörung, the film also demonstrates that the garbage auteur is a proud masochist with a pathetic victim mentality, which is arguably the most entertaining thing about him and his films as Police State readily demonstrates. Among other things, the film is also notable for being a rare example where Zedd actually attempted to make a movie with something resembling a cohesive narrative that features a discernible beginning, middle, and ending that even concludes with a fun twist of sorts. Of course, there is not one single second of the film where Zedd does not seem like a posturing, overly self-conscious, and insufferable twat who wallows in negative attention and certainly deserves the beating he gets from a couple corrupt cops who cannot tolerate being around some smug young bum who is even more arrogant and self-righteous than they are. As Police State unwittingly reveals, cops and criminals are oftentimes two sides of the same coin.

After an opening title sequence where some degenerate (apparently, Zedd himself) spraypaints "State" under a "Police" decal on a squad car, Nick Zedd is harassed by a stereotypical big dumb stupid polack policeman named Sergeant Wojynski (Willoughby Sharp of Zedd's Whoregasm (1988) and I Was a Quality of Life Violation (2004)) when he dubiously walks down a ghetto alley for seemingly no reason at all. Not surprisingly considering the goofy way the punk speaks and walks, the cop thinks Zedd is a junky and demands to see his arms, so the protagonist shows his arms and says to Wojynski after revealing he has no track marks in a smartass fashion, "See. I'm not a liar...you are." When the cop asks to see his ID, Zedd stupidly replies in a fashion that makes him sound like a 13-year-old girl who has just discovered the Sex Pistols, "I don't got any ID, but if I did, it would be fake." Of course, when the cop asks Zedd his name, he lies and says his name is "Frank Serpico." Zedd also gives the fake names "Michael Stewart" and "Fred Flintstone," so the cop asks him in all sincerity if he is a "fucking faggot." When Zedd foolishly calls Wojynski a "Motherfucker," Wojynski hilariously knocks him on his ass and angrily states to him, "Look up here! You wanna fuck with me? I'll fuck with you. You hear me, asshole? Now, where do you live?," to which the protagonist pathetically replies in a fashion that makes him sound like one of the eponymous teens from Beavis and Butt-Head, "86 Fuck You Street." At this point, Wojynski informs Zedd, "Ok, you got yourself a trip to the station, smart ass," and proceeds to brutally beat up the protagonist to let him know who's boss. Since Zedd proceeds to egg on the violent cop despite the brutal beating he has taken from him as a result of running his big mouth, one can only assume that he is a masochist who rather enjoys getting stomped on by a boorish polack pig like a discarded cigarette butt. When a young negress asks Wojynski, "What are you hitting him for?," the cop calls her a "stupid nigger" and threatens to take her back to the station while she describes him as a "fucking pig" under her breath. As Zedd will soon discover, black cops can be even more corrupt than their white comrades

When Sgt. Wojynski takes Zedd back to the station, he gives his superior, a nameless bald negro Lieutenant (Flip Crowley), a police report stating that the protagonist has been arrested for, "assaulting police officer, suspicious conduct, creating a disturbance, inciting a riot, resisting arrest, malicious mischievous, and being a faggot." Wojynski also falsely accuses Zedd of being a racist and calling someone a "nigger," which offends the spade to the point where he asks his stupid Slavic underling, "You enjoy saying that word, don't you?" and "Tell me, did he call you a dumb polack?" When Wojynski eventually convinces the Lieutenant that Zedd supposedly called someone a nigger, the Uncle Tom cop becomes exceedingly enraged, screams in the face of the protagonist, "Alright, you slimy little motherfucker... You're gonna wish you had never been born," and beats him to a bloody pulp. Although the negro lieutenant forces Zedd to sit in a chair, a morbidly obese toothless guido detective (played by junky degenerate Rockets Redglare of Jim Jarmusch's Stranger Than Paradise (1984) and Down by Law (1986)) soon walks into the holding room and demands that he get on a table. When the detective says to Zedd, "You're a faggot, you know that?," the protagonist retardedly retorts like a bullied toddler, "takes one to know one, fat boy," thus resulting in him getting his ass beat by a somewhat effete lard ass thug with a disgustingly nasally NYC accent. Ultimately, the detective puts a cigarette in Zedd's ear after pretending to be nice to him to by giving a quick drag of said cig. Unfortunately for Mr. Zedd, the detective is just too smart and sadistic for him.

After the detective leaves, the goofy jigaboo lieutenant comes back and yells at Zedd, "Get down off that table, faggot!" and then once again forces the pathetic punk back into the chair. Of course, when the debauched detective returns, he demands that Zedd get back on the table and screams, "Tell me where that dope is or you're one dead little girl." Naturally, Zedd refuses to comply since he does not have any dope, so the detective informs him, "you had your chance and blew it" and once again leaves. When the negro lieutenant comes back and yells at Zedd for standing on the table again, Zedd gets the gall to sarcastically ask the unintentionally silly shinebone cop, "Why do they call you nigger?," which does not sit too well with the racially sensitive black pig. Indeed, instead of forcing Zedd to sit in the chair like before, the lieutenant breaks it over his head. Determined to beat Zedd's ass during a 'fair' fight, the lieutenant even takes the young punk's handcuffs off and begs him to hit him, but the pussy protagonist decides to do nothing aside from spitting in the colored cop's face (certainly, one must give credit to Zedd for daring to spit in a spade's face in a film). When the detective comes back, he brings a revolver with him and informs Zedd that by the end of their meeting, he will get the protagonist to blow his own brains out with the weapon. Somewhat curiously, the detective also demands that Zedd pull down his pants and expose his genitals (thankfully, Zedd does not show hismmm. Under the serious threat of castration, Zedd still refuses to tell where the drugs are and has his cock chopped off as a result. While the detective hands him the gun in the hope that he will blow his brains out as a result of being a man that no longer has his manhood, Zedd ultimately uses the weapon on the cop by shooting him in the head and then subsequently manages to escape, or so the viewer assumes. In the end, the film closes with a shot of a "missing" flyer with a pic of Zedd and an advertisement of a cash award of $50,000 for anyone that manages to locate him. As for Zedd, he is now both literally and figuratively ball-less as opposed to just the latter.

Undoubtedly, the 'brilliance' of Police State lies in its seeming 'realism.' Indeed, I can certainly imagine some fat stupid polack or negro cop calling Zed a "fag" or "faggot" and treating him like the obnoxious narcissistic little cunt that he is. Not surprisingly, Zedd has bragged about spray painting not one but two cop cars for his film (apparently, his cinematographer botched filming him vandalizing a patrol car the first time he did it, so they had to do it again), or as he stated in an interview in Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant while sounding like some over-the-hill Dennis the Menace wannabe, "So there are two cop cars driving around with 'Police State' on the back. That was good advertising for the film. I felt good doing it, it was like the feeling you get when you shoplift an expensive department store and you're not sure if you're gonna get caught or not." Notably, South African auteur Aryan Kaganof would later sample the graffiti scene for his experimental documentary Night Is Coming: Threnody for the Victims of Marikana (2014), which could not be any more different from Zedd's film, even if it does have an overt anti-cop message. It seems the film has an extra close place in Zedd's heart, as he cites it as inspiring him to not to off himself by putting a bullet in his brain, or as he stated in his Deathtripping interview, "When I did POLICE STATE I thought I'd get it done in six months and instead it took me two years. For two years it was really bothering me, because I felt this need for it to come out, but in a way it was good because it kept me from killing myself. I mean, I was so depressed during that time that if I hadn't shot POLICE STATE I might have killed myself. I wanted to do something great before I died. I wanted to finish it and have it out to prove I could do a film like that, so it kept me alive – the same thing now with this novel I'm writing – it keeps me from giving up, knowing I have something to complete." Indeed, for better or worse, it certainly seems that Zedd literally lives to make films, even if they are not exactly good or thoughtful ones.

If we can believe him, according to Zedd, Police State is banned in degenerate liberalized Aryan countries like Sweden where hardcore porn has been perfectly legal for many decades (I guess those culturally cuckolded Swedes cannot bear to watch a film where the classic colloquial racial slur "nigger" is used multiple times). As Zedd bragged in Deathtripping regarding the film's infamy, "It makes people uncomfortable, especially in Germany for some reason. [laughs] I think the cops didn't like it too much in Sweden – the police raided the apartment I was living in and took me to the station with all the movies and they told me I might be facing four years in prison." While I find Zedd's story to be a tad bit dubious, I certainly do not doubt his resentful hatred towards cops, so it should be no surprise that he followed in the same slave-morality oriented path as Spike Lee in Do the Right Thing (1989) by paying tribute to ghetto negro martyr Michael Stewart. Admittedly, I have to give Zedd credit for saying of Lee, "Spike Lee I think is a pint-sized racist [...] He's really lucky to get so much money to make bigoted films. He can get away with it because he's black." Additionally, Police State demonstrates that Zedd has a better knack for cinematic comedy than Lee who, despite his incessant crying about Hollywood using racial stereotypes, has directed a number of films that feel like neo-minstrel shows, not to mention his incessant utilization of flagrant anti-guido sentiments as reflected in his various wopsploitation flicks like Jungle Fever (1991) and especially Summer of Sam (1999) despite the fact that he has largely stolen his aesthetic from proud Sicilian-American filmmaker Martin Scorsese. Indeed, an example of comedic genius in Police State is the casting of demented junky/dope-dealer turned actor/comedian Rockets Redglare—a morbidly obese guido slob who was born addicted to heroin (his mother was a junky and his father was a small-time mafia career criminal) and who some believe was Sid Vicious' Jewess girlfriend Nancy Spungen's real killer (Redglare was the infamous punk rock couple's drug dealer)—in the role of a savagely sadistic police detective who gets a thrill out of castrating young punks. Of course, any film featuring polack jokes also cannot be all that bad. Naturally, the real weakness of Police State is Zedd's prosaic would-be-sassy anti-cop sentiment, which is about as subtle and sophisticated as a coat-hanger abortion, but such juvenile antics are certainly to be expected from the little mensch that brought the world such intolerably kitschy trash anti-classics as Tom Thumb in the Land of the Giants (1999) and Lord of the Cockrings (2001). For all Zedd's anti-police hatred, I find it particularly strange that he would relocate to Mexico City, which is famous for its conspicuously corrupt Meŕtizo cops, but I guess he hopes to be a big fish in a very small and dirty garbage-covered pond.

Nick Zedd (1988)

Somewhat hilariously, while Cinema of Transgression anti-messiah Nick Zedd (They Eat Scum, Electra Elf) went of his way to attack certain famous American avant-garde filmmakers, most specifically Structural filmmakers associated with Jonas Mekas' inner-circle, in his not-quite-infamous piece of aesthetic agitprop The Cinema of Transgression Manifesto (1985) by denouncing the supposed "laziness known as structuralism" and "profoundly undeserving non-talents like Brakhage, Snow, Frampton, Gehr, Breer, etc," he would later eventually attempt to create his own experimental work in a fairly similar vein to the films of some of these filmmakers. Indeed, Zedd's 12-minute piece of explicitly childish (anti)pornographic collage Whoregasm (1988) resembles the sort of cinematic work experimental film maestro Stan Brakhage (Dog Star Man series, Mothlight) might have assembled had he suffered severe brain damage in a car wreck, became obsessed with collecting badly damaged vintage stag films, and tried in vain to reinvent himself as the most insipidly iconoclastic filmmaker in cinema history. Comprised of vintage erotic found footage, scenes of the director having unsimulated sex with his girlfriend, outtakes from the proudly obnoxious art-trash filmmaker's surprisingly narratively conventional black-and-white anti-cop short Police State (1987), and a fairly complimentary art-rock noise score by Sonic Youth, the film might be Zedd's most overtly experimental, abstract, and visually and structurally anarchistic cinematic effort to date, but it also exposes the fact that the aberrant auteur is a one-note celluloid transgressor who merely makes films to offend, as if there is any great merit to merely offending for offending's sake. Whoregasm is also notable for being one of a couple of films where Zedd appears in drag, though instead of attempting to suck a limp dick like he did in Richard Kern's wholly horrendous 5-minute short King of Sex (1986), the filmmaker uses his mouth to molest the lips, tits, and twat of his dead-eyed junky then-girlfriend Susan Manson, who returns the favor while her beau is sporting a tacky cheap dress that probably no real-life crack-addled drag-queen would ever be caught dead in.

Following in the filmic footsteps of a couple of the shorts featured on the 'legendary' The Cinema of Transgression Vol. 1 (1986) VHS tape, including Mutable Fire (1984) directed by Bradley Eros (aka 'Erotic Psyche') and Shithaus (1985) directed by rocker Jon Spencer (of the Jon Spencer Blues Explosion), Whoregasm demonstrates that Zedd must have been desperate for film ideas (and of course money and fresh film stock), as he might have gone so far as founding a certain somewhat mythologized film movement, but it was not long before he was parroting the ideas of others filmmakers associated with said movement. Shamelessly advertised upon its release with a flyer with the sensational quote, "Banned in 13 countries!!! Banned forever in Canada!!! Seized by Montreal Customs!!! The film The Voice won't dare review!!! The most obscene film ever made," and an image of naked painted dwarf and matching Dalmatian dog that was stolen from German-Jewish dyke Ulrike Ottinger's aberrosexual epic Freak Orlando (1981), the short might be Zedd's most innately experimental work to date but it is also certainly one of his most derivative as a mess of an anti-movie that looks like it was hastily assembled over an afternoon while the director was high on speed because he wanted to meet a deadline for an upcoming film festival. A rather fittingly titled work in that sense that it is probably Zedd's most obvious and desperate attempt to both literally and figuratively whore himself out for his proudly obnoxious (anti)art, Whoregasm is ultimately a pseudo-sleazy botched celluloid orgasm directed by a man whose idea of sexual pleasure is downing drag-queen dongs and being defecated on by dirty diseased dames with tasteless tit tattoos like the one that appears in the film.

Beginning with a drawing of a brown eyeball that looks like it might have been smeared with feces, Whoregasm seems to immediately warn the viewer that that a tidalwave of sloppy steaming celluloid shit is about to be rudely excreted onto their eyes. As is standard procedure for a Nick Zedd flick, the film wastes no time flashing swastikas for no apparent reason, albeit this time the glorious Hakenkreuz is connected to a crucifix as if to insinuate Christianity is 'fascistic' or some other absurd asinine bullshit belief that is typically spouted by sub-literate left-wing lemmings that worship at the golden calf of passive nihilism and/or see Jello Biafra as a sort of Christ-like figure. Not surprisingly, an imagine in the spirit of the degenerate art of kraut commie John Heartfield (born Helmut Herzfeld) featuring Adolf Hitler with a skull-like face subsequently appears. From there, things get extra degenerate with an image of a tranny proudly showing off their cock as well as footage of Susan Mason pulling a bloody tampon out of her seemingly festering cunt (notably, later in the film, you can see blood oozing out from between her legs, but that does not stop Zedd from chowing down on her meat-curtain). In a demonstration of Zedd's assumed approval of racial cuckoldry and miscegenation, vintage footage of a white whore sucking a darkie dong is intercut with pseudo-psychedelic footage of a guy riding a horse. Arguably the most infamous part of the film is of an assumedly doctored photograph featuring a masculine man with an erection standing behind a little boy who has his pants pulled down and his bum right in front of the muscular homo's member as if he is about to violently deflower the tiny tot. After various gay and NAMBLA-approved images of aroused naked man, scenes of a used up old whore showing off her somewhat large tits and similarly sized derriere are juxtaposed with color outtakes from Zedd's Police State, including the filmmaker being arrested. Of course not film set in NYC would be complete without a random appearance from a panhandling negro hobo, who is holding a sign that curiously reads, "Except for the grace of god there stand I. I'm blind. Please buy a pencil." I certainly hope some bought the poor superstitious spook a nice pencil, as I doubt he would want to be associated with such a film, especially without getting paid for his efforts.

Although segments of the footage are featured inter-spliced throughout the entire film, almost the second entire half of Whoregasm is dedicated to a fairly static and largely anti-erotic 'sex tape' featuring Zedd and his then-lover Ms. Manson. Judging by the footage, one can only assume that Zedd enjoys every single sex act aside from actual standard fucking. Indeed, dressed in full-drag with blood red lipstick and a flamboyant dress, Zedd seems like he is attempting to duplicate Manson's appearance to the point where they seem like they inspired deranged British tranny Genesis Breyer P-Orridge's Pandrogeny Project where the seriously sexually confused musician attempted to become a single entity with his lover Lady Jaye by mirroring her physical appearance (while P-Orridge went so far as getting serious cosmetic surgery done, the results were quite dubious to say the least). Due to the fact that he never asserts himself by actually penetrating her pussy with his prick and dedicates virtually all of his mostly frivolous fucking to meek and passive acts like showing Manson's foot in his mouth and performing cunnilingus on her, Zedd seems more like a lesbian than a heterosexual man, at least as far as his oralcentric approach to carnal knowledge is concerned. In a shot that is probably symbolic of Zedd's somewhat preternatural sexuality, Manson gives him a blowjob while he has his dress hiked up. Towards the end of the film, shots of Manson fellating Zedd are intercut with a shaking hand holding a revolver in an erratic montage sequence that seems to demonstrate Zedd's clichéd affinity sex with death. In the end, the film comes full circle by concluding with a shot of the same eyeball that appeared at the very beginning of the short, albeit this time drenched in red as if to compliment Zedd's fetish for menstrual blood.

It is probably worth noting that Whoregasm 'heroine' Susan Manson dumped Zedd after starting a lurid love affair with a lesbian and moving to Los Angeles to pursue a career in pornography. Seeing as Zedd has never paid any of his gutter superstars to star in his films, one can only assume Manson eventually came to the important epiphany that, if she was going to bear the shame of sucking cock and exposing her beaver on film, she might as well get paid for it. While I cannot be sure, I can only assume that Whoregasm is not unlike Zedd's mind-numbingly banal pseudo-experimental documentary The Wild World of Lydia Lunch (1983) in that the film was made as a sort of revenge against his ex-girlfriend for dumping in. Not surprisingly, Zedd was involved in much more disgusting sex with Manson than the fairly tame fucking that is depicted in his film, or as the auteur hilariously wrote in his book Totem of the Depraved (1996) in regard to the last night he 'made love' with his sweetheart before she left his sorry ass for good, "When it came time for me to take a piss, she opened her mouth and a hot stream splashed down her throat. She inhaled lines of dope as I crouched over her and allowed my bowels to empty a load of shit onto her back. I then smeared the soft brown excrement over and around and onto her two big breasts as she pulled me down onto my back and straddled my head with her legs. A shower of shit blasted out of her rectum onto my face as I opened my mouth to taste the warm oozing substance. I then violently vomited onto her face and licked the puke and shit up in order to gag and vomit again. I felt totally clean. My sides were empty and covering the woman I loved. We rolled around and covered ourselves in vomit and shit and continued to lick each other's assholes until our tongues were sore. I snorted two bags of coke and puked all over a copy of the Good News Bible before passing out. When I awoke the next morning, the color TV and both VCRs were gone. Sue left a note saying she wouldn't be coming back." It is only speculation, but I am going to have to assume that Miss Susie Poo decided that Zedd's flagrant fecal fetish was the last straw as far as their relationship was concerned. In Totem of the Depraved, Zedd also notes that Manson found vaginal sex painful due to psychological issues, which is certainly an important insight to have when watching a film that is so exceedingly anti-erotic as Whoregasm where it seems like the dope-addled autistic American grandson of Georges Bataille decided to make a home-movie of his weekend excursion with a punk hooker and then edit together the footage as final project for some preposterous postmodern art class.

Apparently, a ten-minute segment of Whoregasm featuring Ms. Manson masturbating with money was lost forever when a shipment of Zedd's films was seized by the Canadian government in the spring of 1988 just before the filmmaker arrived to put on a showing of his work in Montreal. Additionally, like his subsequent sci-fi schlock-art epic War Is Menstrual Envy (1992), the short is meant to be screened via two-screen double project, yet the VHS and DVD versions only feature a single screen. While British-born Zedd proponent Jack Sargeant wrote in his book Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008), "Zedd still screens WHOREGASM as a two screen double project, and one video edit of this exists under the spurious title FUCK YOU (ASSHOLE VERSION). A single projection version of WHOREGASM has also been released on video. Neither of these versions are particularly satisfactory, illustrating the major problem with video when film goes beyond its traditionally prescribed limits," I certainly cannot imagine the dual screen version of the film being much of an improvement and I say that as someone that appreciates works like Warhol's Chelsea Girls (1966), Werner Schroeter's Argila (1969), and even Brian De Palma's Dionysus in '69 (1970). Of course, double project is only one of the many outmoded cinematic gimmicks that Zedd has in his figurative auteur toolbox, with avant-garde collage films featuring pornographic imagery not exactly being something new or innovative and with Whoregasm oftentimes feeling like a poor punk's take on the 'avant-garde home-videos' of French actor and sometimes experimental auteur Pierre Clémenti, especially his magnum opus New Old: Chronicles of the Present Times (1979). Of course, Zedd's film seems like bratty child's play and truly masturbatory juvenilia compared to the celluloid homo Hades conjured up by Luther Price in his experimental work Sodom (1989), which utilizes gay pornography in a sort of metaphysically diseased fashion.

Ironically, despite trashing the Structural filmmakers in his 1985 Cinema of Transgression manifesto, Zedd has acknowledged that one of his greatest influences is the Viennese Aktionism and the movement's main filmmaker, Austrian-Jewish Structuralist auteur Kurt Kren, films embody a true cinema of transgression and do not resort to the uniquely unrefined post-Kuchar grade school shock values that the Lord of the Cockrings (2002) director is infamous for. Personally, as far as his more experimental cinematic works go, I think that it is safe to say that Zedd's most original and idiosyncratic film is his early short The Bogus Man (1980). Additionally, aside from being fairly derivative and unoriginal, Whoregasm suffers from lacking the energetic spirit of Zedd's early works like They Eat Scum (1979) and Geek Maggot Bingo or The Freak from Suckweasel Mountain (1983), but then again he was addicted to 'Cocteau's kick' when he was making it, hence his particularly unprolific output during that time. After feces-flinging punk rock messiah G.G. Allin's somewhat anticlimatic death, Zedd wrote about his quasi-compatriot, "G.G. went out of his way to be hated. He spread hatred and stupidity everywhere he could. One theory advanced for his psychopathology was a childhood of sexual abuse. Who knows? Furthermore, who cares? I consider it a joke that I'm even writing about him. His minimal talents were focused on a crude form of infantile self-promotion manifested in public filthiness." Somehow after watching Whoregasm, I get the impression that Zedd was merely projecting his own anti-qualities onto Mr. Allin.

WAR IS MENSTRUAL ENVY
WAR IS MENSTRUAL ENVY

Nick Zedd (1992)

After a number of years of total inactivity, Cinema of Transgression anti-messiah Nick Zedd (The Bogus Man, The Wild World of Lydia Lunch) attempted to make a comeback of sorts with his first feature-length film in almost a decade. Indeed, the moronically titled cinematic work War Is Menstrual Envy (1992) aka War Is Menstrual Envy: Parts I, II, and III is undoubtedly Zedd's own sort of equivalent to Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) and Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972) as a sometimes oneiric flick that is not only special effects heavy, but also the director's most epically artistically ambitious work to date. Indeed, one can certainly tell while watching the film that Zedd intended it to be his magnum opus, as well as a work that would demonstrate his maturity as both an artist and filmmaker. Of course, Zedd's film is no masterpiece like 2001: A Space Odyssey or Lucifer Rising as it is basically a convoluted collection of autistic-garde petite vignettes of the intentionally obscenely obnoxious sort that are only loosely connected by an ostensible 'antiwar' theme, thus demonstrating that the auteur might have suffered some serious brain damage due to decades of drug abuse (as he described in his book Totem of the Depraved (1996), Zedd was addicted heroin around the time he made his last film Whoregasm (1988)). Once described by Zedd himself as set, "In November 2092, following the death by radiation poisoning of 9/10ths of the human race. A cult of sea worshipers appears led by a human deity known as Shiva Scythe. Forming a telepathic alliance with the world dolphin population, they bring about the destruction of Christianity and Islam" (notice Zedd does not have the testicular fortitude and/or intelligence to mention Judaism, even though it is an antiwar film and Zionism is directly responsible for a good percentage of the war and chaos that has plagued the Middle East since at least since the end of the Second World War), War Is Menstrual Envy features a uniquely ugly mutant chick with a shaved pussy and bright orange skin who fucks a giant octopus, a large Jew pretending to be a barbaric redneck biker having his head blown off with a shotgun by a female bartender, an apocalyptic soldier sporting a gas mask who drives a bayonet into the chest of a naked baby boy, and porn history's most infamous Jewess porn star making love to and licking the heavily scarred skin of a real-life burn victim, among other things that demonstrate why the filmmaker is and has always been a one-note wonder who lives to attempt to shock and disgust and not much more. Once apparently described by banker turned onetime Warhol superstar Taylor Mead (The Nude Restaurant, Lonesome Cowboys) as, "The greatest underground film ever made," the aberrantly kaleidoscopic 16mm celluloid work is notable for being a rare truly 'cinematic' Zedd flick in that it has a strong sense of mise-en-scène, which is in stark contrast to the auteur's absurdly amateurishly directed early features like They Eat

Scum (1979) and Geek Maggot Bingo or The Freak from Suckweasel Mountain (1983). Indeed, almost completely devoid of both plot and dialogue, War Is Menstrual Envy is comprised of would-be-iconoclastic themes and imagery that seem like the creation of a perniciously petulant child who masturbates to the thought of his cinematic miscreations giving his bourgeois parents a heart attack. Seeming somewhat like the result of the Viennese Aktionists attempting to direct a bargain bin antiwar film for Disney starring the descendants of the cast of Tod Browning's Freaks (1932), Zedd's film is about as intellectually stimulating as Brazilian tranny porn, albeit with more cheap makeup and smaller penises (Zedd's included!). In other words, War Is Menstrual Envy oftentimes feels like the patently preposterous result of some trash auteur like John Waters or Andy Milligan developing delusions of grandeur and attempting to reinvent themselves as a real serious 'artiste.'

While only 77 minutes long, War Is Menstrual Envy could have easily been cut by two-thirds of its running time and still have the same impact on the viewer, thus providing strong evidence that spending most of his (non)career making short films really has warped Zedd's view of nuance when it comes to the art of feature filmmaking (notably, the film was shot in three different segments, which were later combined into one fairly fragmented feeling film). Indeed, it takes about seven minutes before the title screen appears, as the film begins with a sort of pseudo-existentialist epilogue that seems to attempt to abstractly communicate internal pain and sexual dysfunction (Zedd's Cinema of Transgression frenemy Richard Kern aka 'Nazi Dick' once described the film as being, "set in the future, where there's no water, women are sluts, and men are fucked up sexually"). Beginning with a shot of two heavily bandaged individuals that resemble mummies lying in awkward positions on a sterile looking floor and quivering in seeming abject pain in an all-white room that is almost painful to look at juxtaposed with discordant noise, the film immediately gives the viewer the impression that the filmmaker is an emotionally and sexually wounded cripple of sorts, or at least he seems to be (sub)consciously communicating as such in a fairly heavy-handed way. Eventually one of the mummies begins twitching rapidly and then attempts to kiss and hump the other one, though he eventually opens his mouth and spews a bunch of blood out of his mouth as if he has just drained his comrade dry of their precious vital fluids. After spitting out the blood, the mummy (played by a young twink-ish Guido named Steven Oddo, who Zedd once mundanely stated of that, "He likes to mutilate himself in public. I don't know why...His body is covered with scars...") is featured completely unwrapped (Zedd makes sure to get a close-up of his flaccid member) and then proceeds to slowly and anticlimactically carve "WAR" into his chest in tribute to the first word of the film's title. After the mummy epilogue, a sort of second title sequence begins featuring quasi-apocalyptic soldiers wearing gas masks and riding horses while attacking some unseen enemy in a sunny desert. In a seeming self-tribute to the director's ostensible iconoclastic powers as a filmmaker, the title sequence concludes with "Directed By Nick Zedd" superimposed over an atomic mushroom cloud. Unfortunately, things get a little bit less impressive from there, though the film does have its undeniable unforgettable moments.

If War Is Menstrual Envy has something resembling a lead heroine, it is indubitably Cinema of Transgression anti-diva, performance artist, and sometimes filmmaker Kembra Pfahler (a strange lady that is probably best known as being the lead singer of the cult glam-punk-shock-rock band The Voluptuous Horror of Karen Black), who is completely naked for almost the entire film aside from generically vulgar and intentionally unflattering body-paint that would probably appeal to fans of Gwar. In what is indubitably the most tedious, tasteless, and just plain stupid section of the film, Pfahler is featured 'swimming' in an aesthetically grating 'green screen' (chroma key) scenario where her completely hairless body is superimposed over deep sea stock footage that was seemingly stolen from some sort of National Geographic documentary. Sporting nothing but black thigh-high vinyl boots and a cheap neon yellow wig, Pfahler stands (and sometimes lies) in place while barely pretending to swim by motioning her arms and legs in a goofy lackluster fashion. Clearly Zedd must have been on a minuscule budget that forced him to use all of the footage he shot because the scene features moments where Pfahler unwitting breaks down the fourth wall by staring straight into the camera and then proceeding to blatantly talk to someone (probably Zedd) off-screen. Despite being about twenty minutes long, the segment is comprised solely of the 'surreal swimming,' with the climax of the scene being Pfahler pretending to fuck a gigantic octopus (it should be noted that she was once married to a Japanese fellow, so that might explain her octopus fetish). Indeed, at one point Pfahler has one octopus tentacle inside her freshly shaved pussy while another one is penetrating her mouth, thus demonstrating that she is probably a fairly sexually versatile woman who lets none of her wet fleshy orifices go unused. Of course, the raunchy orange-skinned lady also grinds her shaved main vein against one of the tentacles, which is depicted in a close-up scene of playfully orgasmic octopussy perversity. Needless to say, none of this is even remotely erotic unless you are someone that gets off to associating vaginas with seafood or are into women that look like they were run over with an ice cream truck that was driven by members of the Cockettes, though the segment is certainly as contrived and tedious as the average porn flick.

In the only segment of the film that vaguely resembles any sort of traditional movie in the sense that it involves human-beings interacting in their own typical social habitats, Jewish artist and sometimes filmmaker Ari M. Roussimoff (who directed Shadows in the City (1991), which Zedd appears in and was the last film to star NYC underground filmmaker Jack Smith of Flaming Creatures (1963) fame) absurdly portrays a violently intolerant GG Allin-esque biker-like redneck brute who sports black 'tough guy' sunglasses and a denim vest with a confederate flag patch and proceeds to hassle every single person he encounters while getting drunk at a seedy dive bar for sexually deprived (sub)human misfits. Indeed, when a cheaply tattooed fellow named 'Tattoo Mike Wilson' stares down the baldheaded biker due to his obnoxious behavior, Roussimoff rudely throws a bottle cap at his face. While Roussimoff pushes around both men and women, he decides to flirt with a sickly looking tranny (Ron Knice) that is dressed like a slutty 1920s flapper and looks like he is about to die from AIDS. Of course, the big butch bro has not clue that the pseudo-chick actually has a dick, so when the flagrantly faggy flapper randomly whips out a big black strap-on dildo (!) and then proudly waves it around like it is an impressive weapon of sorts, Roussimoff naturally goes completely berserk and begins choking the seemingly physically and mentally sick shemale creep. Clearly highly intolerant of violent rowdy meatheads causing trouble in her sleazy taproom, a dyke-like barmaid whips out a shotgun and blows Roussimoff's head off in what is easily one of the most hopelessly schlocky head-exploding scenes of cinema history. After the Hebraic GG Allin gets his head blown off, a blonde female dwarf appears out of nowhere and begins destroying everything in sight while standing next to his corpse in a scene that is almost entirely in aesthetically odious color negative film. Eventually a sort of male sex slave sporting nothing but a gimp mask appears and attempts to clean up the menacing she-midget's mess, so the extra little lady responds by proceeding to hurl pieces of garbage, including broken violins and smashed records, at her assumed sensual servant. During this segment, scenes from Zedd's previous experimental film Whoregasm are randomly spliced in, including a shot of the filmmaker in drag sucking on his onetime-girlfriend Susan Manson's extra bloody used tampon.

After a collage of sorts that was clearly stolen from a nature documentary that features time-lapse footage of decaying animal corpses and dying flowers (it should be noted that Zedd has an affection for neo-Marxist French Situationist filmmakers like René Viénet and Guy Debord because they utilized the postmodern technique of détournement and made films by simply reworking other people's footage to give them new meaning while simultaneously destroying their original cultural contexts), the viewer is exposed to sentimental footage of a happy baby boy, who is soon senselessly murdered by an ominous soldier sporting a gas mask who carefully impales the little lad with a bayonet. From there, the soldier walks around post-apocalyptic ruins whilst admiring the dead baby on his bayonet as a flag with a swastika-like symbol waves in the background (of course, this symbol is featured prominently throughout the film). After the sort of pseudo-spiritual soldier scene, the viewer is bombarded with a series of vintage stock still photographs of men whose faces were horribly disfigured in war, as well as footage of deformed fetuses in jars full of embalming fluid. Not surprisingly, things only get uglier from there as the next scene begins with a color negative close-up of Zedd's unimpressive cock. Completely naked aside from a whorish leopard print fur coat and blue body-paint, Zedd resembles a sort of radically repellent drag queen from 1950s B-movie sci-fi purgatory in a scene that is juxtaposed with some long-winded negro preacher proselytizing about the supposed greatness of Martin Luther King, Jr., among other mostly mundane things. In an assumed juvenile attempt to make this largely senseless scene as aesthetically unpleasing as possible, Zedd opted to have the camera incessantly zoom in and out during the entire segment, thus making it quite the relief when it finally ends. During this scene, anti-diva Kembra Pfahler and some other equally grotesque beings covered in body paint dance around Zedd as if they are having some sort of LSD-inspired Cinema of Transgression pow-wow. Somehow, I got the impression while watching this segment that Zedd secretly longs to be a decadently glamorous coke-fueled runway model (as the auteur bragged in Totem of the Depraved, Annie Sprinkle once landed Zedd the less than dignified job of posing for a couple porno mags).

In what is indubitably one of the best segments film, Kembra Pfahler and singularly grotesque porn star Jewess Annie Sprinkle attempt to sexually seduce an extra frigid middle-aged commie officer in a scenario that seems like what might have happened if Hebraic exploitation hack Herschell Gordon Lewis attempted to remake Dušan Makavejev's WR: Mysteries of the Organism (1971). Like with the bar scene, Zedd decided to ruin this segment by juxtaposing it with outmoded rap music that makes the filmmaker come off as a dorky teenage negrophile fraud who is trying to annoy his parents. Set in a room in the spirit of Ulrike Ottinger's sardonic postmodern dystopian flick Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (1984) aka The Image of Dorian Gray in the Yellow Press aka Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press where the walls are covered with newspaper wallpaper that has a SS Siegrune symbol spray-painted on it, the segment depicts the stoic Stalinist officer trying in vain to keep his composure while Ms. Sprinkle shoves both her cow-like mammary glands and a strap-on dildo in his face while Pfahler simultaneously acts like a ADHD-ridden grade school student that is on the verge of suffering a major epileptic fit. After the girls get done rubbing their largely nasty naughty bits in the poor commie comrade's face, the film cuts to a shot of a bronze statue of Hindu Tantric deity Shiva that is sitting on top of a table that is right next to a completely motionless man that is completely covered in bandages and is reclining in a sort of campy throne. After the establishing shot, Pfahler appears out of nowhere in a blasphemous nun outfit that exposes her fairly firm boobs and then begins carefully taking off the bandages on the man in an almost ritualistic fashion, thus eventually revealing that he is a burn victim (played by a real-life burn victim who was simply credited as 'Ray'). Of course, in his largely moronic dedication to shocking the viewer, Zedd made sure to zoom in on the poor fellow's heavily scared skin, so it should be no surprise that things naturally get more revolting from there. Indeed, after Pfahler sloppily dresses the burn victim in a poor fitting military uniform, Sprinkle abruptly appears and begins undressing Ray (who she apparently was dating in real-life at the time because she wanted to experience sex with all different kinds of people, including burn victims). In a fairly stupidly disgusting yet strangely tender scene that indubitably demonstrates that she wallows in even the most grotesque of flesh, Sprinkle proceeds to lick Ray's scars and eventually rub her titties in his face while he delicately kisses all over her body with a certain degree of sensitivity that betrays his fairly horrific appearance. As if to brag that he has thoroughly despoiled the eyes of the viewer by the end of the film, War Is Menstrual Envy concludes with a couple images of red bloody eyes, with the credits scene featuring graphic medical footage of a badly damaged blue eye being repaired during surgery.

Quite hilariously, when I mentioned the title of War Is Menstrual Envy to a certain less than liberal lady friend of mine, she remarked that Zedd must be a faggot because no sane woman likes having periods and that it is a patent absurdity that any man would pretend to glorify such a thing. Of course, considering the film features a clip where Zedd sucks on a bloody tampon as well as another clip of Susan Manson's blood-stained ass crack and genitals, one can only assume that the seemingly sexually autistic auteur has a menstrual blood fetish that he is absurdly attempting to project onto both the viewer and his supposed enemies (aka masculine males), hence its senselessly sensational title. Undoubtedly, the best thing I can say about Zedd's flick is that it is probably the most intricately infantile cinematic work that I have ever seen, as if it was directed by the sexually abused bastard brood of Mayan Deren and Russ Meyer, albeit nowhere near as important as either of those two filmmakers' contributions to cinema history. Personally, I see War Is Menstrual Envy as the last major work of the Cinema of Transgression movement (though Tessa Hughes-Freeland's rarely seen experimental Georges Bataille adaptation Dirty (1993) is also a similarly important work from the later period of the movement). It should also be mentioned that Zedd was really into the writings of kosher commie crackpot Wilhelm Reich at the time he made the film, thus exposing the sort of senseless pathological sexual degeneracy that the psychoanalyst's pseudo-scientific writings attempts to validate in their promotion of a completely unrealistic pan-sexual utopia. Indeed, the only thing one really learns by watching the film is that Zedd is unequivocally a sexual cripple and anti-artistic miscreant who gets a kick out of making his own personal fetishes seem as radically repellent as possible. It might interest viewers of the film to know that despite the fact Zedd hoped that he would be able to sexually defile his two main lecherous leading ladies during the production of the film, both of them apparently turned him down, or as the filmmaker complained himself in his book Totem of the Depraved, "I thought if I made a movie where everyone was naked I might get laid. The film, entitled WAR IS MENSTRUAL ENVY, would deal directly with the misdirection of my sexual energy. Two of the actresses on the project might have wanted to fuck me but for some reason didn't feel right about it. I thought if I played an octopus, I might be able to rape Annie Sprinkle but Kembra Squalor insisted on doing the scene instead and would only allow her husband to rape her. I thought up another scene where I'd play a mummy and have sex with an old girlfriend, but she had band practice the night we were supposed to do it so I had to give the scene to two other actors. I pray I will find some way to get laid before this film is done since it is costing my investor so much money." Of course, had Zedd invested more time and effort into creating a more cohesively constructed cinematic work than trying to get into the seemingly rancid panties of his raunchy female stars, he might have made a film that elevated celluloid trash to something worthy of being described as art.

In Totem of the Depraved, Zedd demonstrates his sheer and utter cultural retardation by making the boldly moronic blanket statement, "European 'culture' is all second hand, and occasionally people with money there pay people like me to bring them the real thing from America so they can decided what next to imitate," as if War Is Menstrual Envy was not a sort of failed culturally mongrelized attempt to make 'Viennese Aktionism for Dummies.' Of course, in general, Zedd is hopelessly American to the core, as a culturally and spiritually vacant artistic defiler and proud philistine who considers rap (which plagues his film) to be a legitimate form of art and whose sole goal as an artist seems to be creating the ugliest and most abhorrent films imaginable. Indeed, while it might be a extremely low-budget Super-8 film about corpse-fucking that features a guy sucking on an eyeball in a sensual fashion, not to mention a graphic unsimulated scene where a farmer kills and skins a cute bunny rabbit, a film like Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik (1987) at least has a certain provocative poetic beauty to it that is nowhere to be found in any of Zedd's films. What makes Nekromantik such an intriguing and somewhat singularly provocatively poetic work is that it manages to make the revolting and grotesque aesthetically pleasing while War Is Menstrual Envy manages to accomplish the total opposite by making pussies and titties seem like highly deleterious mutant animal parts. After watching Zedd's film, I can truly see why the filmmaker has at various times referenced wanting to commit suicide, as only a hopelessly lost, passive-aggressive nihilist who lives to figuratively shit on the world with his one-dimensional celluloid ugliness could have sired such a superficially sick flick.

Somewhat absurdly, Zedd apparently believes that War Is Menstrual Envy has influenced various popular Hollywood cult films, including Abel Ferrara's Bad Lieutenant (1992) and Oliver Stone's Natural Born Killers (1994), with the filmmaker once even complaining like a resentful social justice warrior, "I wish that I was making more money, I mean, it's annoying when these people take my ideas and make money off them. Meanwhile I'm still trying to scrape together enough money to make another movie. It's kinda unjust, you know." Indeed, Zedd believes that his film influenced Bad Lieutenant because both flicks feature the same Schooly-D song, but Ferrara had already used music by the rapper for his previous film King of New York (1990), which was released two years before War Is Menstrual Envy. While Zedd once starred in and assistant directed a short entitled Thus Spake Zarathustra (2001) based on the classic philosophical novel of the same name written by Friedrich Nietzsche, it is quite evident from the filmmaker's statements and artistic sentiments that he not only suffers from the sort of slave-morality that the Teutonic philosopher ruthlessly condemned, but that he is also plagued by a sort of soul-decaying passive nihilism, or as avant-garde gatekeeper Jonas Mekas once wrote in his essay Notes on the Work of Nick Zedd in regard to the totally tactless trash auteur, "I discern a great sadness in Zedd's work. Frustration and sadness. All those penises, shaking breasts, all those sad, bedraggled protagonists, the dregs or glories of that world which populated his films, they all exude sadness. There is no ecstasy in those shaking breasts and penises, no joy. Nothing but frustration, sadness." Indeed, Zedd epitomizes the worst attributes of the archetypal anarchistic rebel that Nietzsche venomously criticized in Thus Spoke Zarathustra: A Book for All and None (1883-1891) and in no where is this more apparent than in War Is Menstrual Envy. Of course, I would rather re-watch Zedd's film over the latest Hollywood blockbuster any day, but that is because I found it fleetingly humorous in a fashion not unlike encountering a schizophrenic black bum verbally assaulting petrified white liberals on a city sidewalk or a morbidly obese retarded man attempting to hit on a pretty yet prissy chick who is trying her darnedest not to reveal her sheer and utter revulsion at the fact that such an unwitting romantically forward fellow would dare to even think he was capable of getting with her. If there ever was a film that unintentionally exposes the importance of seemingly unrelated things like masculinity, spirituality, and artistic self-restraint, it is undoubtedly War Is Menstrual Envy, which was not coincidentally directed by a passive-aggressive girly man who has been known to engage in cross-dressing and banging drag queens, among other rather unflattering things that might lead one to suffer the grand disillusion that human warfare is the natural result of manly men wishing that they had the capacity to hemorrhage from their genitals for a couple days each month without dying of blood loss.

ECSTASY IN ENTROPY

Not long before he ruined his entire cinematic aesthetic and dedicated himself to digital diarrhea and created the unbelievably embarrassing public access TV series The Adventures of Electra Elf (2005–2010) with his obscenely obnoxious and anything-but-sexy then-girlfriend/co-conspirator Reverend Jen Miller, Cinema of Transgression would-be-demigod Nick Zedd (The Bogus Man, Whoregasm) provided fairly good evidence that he might have actually grown up and seriously matured as a filmmaker, at least aesthetically speaking. Indeed, with his proudly degenerate experimental dystopian epic War Is Menstrual Envy (1992), Zedd demonstrated that he had finally developed some serious sense of mise-en-scène and tableaux construction and disposed of the intentionally absurdly stupid storylines that were typical of his early features like They Eat Scum (1979) and Geek Maggot Bingo or The Freak from Suckweasel Mountain (1983) so that he could put most of his emphasis on siring a singular aesthetic. Unfortunately, the film also demonstrated that Zedd's taste in politics and music had become all the more innately infantile and just plain downright repugnant, thus hinting that all of his drug intake during the late-1980s rotted at least part of his brain. In his final film that was actually shot on real film as opposed to digital video, Ecstasy in Entropy (1999), Zedd ultimately managed to prove that you can unequivocally be simultaneously cinematically refined yet totally and unbelievably politically and morally retarded. Somewhat misleadingly described by Zedd himself as being about, "a group of intellectual warrior lap dancers struggling to overthrow the authoritarian structures of corporate state capitalism," the 17-minute short was shot on black-and-white 16mm film stock (though a couple scenes at the very end are in color) and is notable for being the filmmaker's sole work that was funded with a grant (Zedd was awarded a Chicago Underground Film Festival Completion Grant, though apparently the flick, not unlike a lot of Jim Van Beber's films, still remains a perennial 'work-in-progress'). Unquestionably one of Zedd's more ambitious and artistically accomplished cinematic works to date, Ecstasy in Entropy is probably the most strange and idiosyncratic stripper flick since Stephen Dwoskin's haunting feature-length avant-garde masterpiece Dyn Amo (1972). Additionally, the film is probably the first (and last) 'avant-garde fat acceptance' flick as a work inhabited by beefy busted up meta-buxom old bitches who are well past their expiration date in terms of sex appeal, though I did not doubt that they are at their peak in terms of their carnal technique as chicks that give off the impression that they have sucked thousands upon thousands of dicks. If you ever wondered what porn star Jewess Annie Sprinkle might look like pregnant, Zedd's film is probably the next best thing as the veteran fuck flick heroine has a massive protruding gut that is almost as large and saggy as her legendary cantilever bust.

A piece of vaguely cultivated celluloid kitsch with semi-serious yet ultimately horribly failed agitprop ambitions, Ecstasy in Entropy is like an unholy aesthetically autistic marriage between old school film noir, the 1960s pseudo-Bergmanesque proto-pornographic exploitation flicks of Joseph W. Sarno (who incidentally ghost-directed Sprinkle in her arguable most famous film Deep Inside Annie Sprinkle (1981)), the slapstick titty titillation of Federico Fellini, and the primitive pre-Morrissey works of Andy Warhol, especially the screen tests (notably, Zedd also payed 'tribute' to Warhol with his previous short Screen Test 98 (1998) aka Why Do You Exist?). Featuring a decidedly debasing soundtrack that includes tedious tunes by old school degenerate jazz, Burt Bacharach, and hip-hop producer Chilly Chill, the film was made in the spirit of Zedd's filmmaking approach The Theory of Xenomorphosis (1998) and the auteur's Mexican baby-momma Monica Casanova gave a good idea of the film's inner logic (or lack thereof) when she stated, "Through the vehicle of innovative movies like his two-screen WAR IS MENSTRUAL ENVY and low budget 16mm gems like ECSTASY IN ENTROPY, Zedd employs shock value in the service of xenomorphosis, a term he coined to describe what happens when the 'domain wall of an alternate universe smashes your reality tunnel and neurological re-engineering occurs.' In these films a 'union of opposites' provokes cognitive dissonance or atavism causing viewers and participants to change from within." Of course, the only real change that the film will inspire in someone is a boner if they happen to have a fetish for fat beat up babes with big saggy butts and bomsoms that resemble ancient mutant cow udders. Indeed, a flagrantly seedy yet extremely silly cinematic work that thankfully manages to unwittingly undermine any political message it might have due to the sheer stupidity of its sometimes cringe-inducing content, Ecstasy in Entropy is another rude celluloid remainder as to why Zedd's lack of taste in women is only transcended by his lack of wisdom and insight when it comes to serious socio-political matters. A sort of A Gun for Jennifer (1997) for art fags on acid, the short is, not unlike the unclad trashcan divas that it stars, the sort of thing you might be embarrassed to let your friends know that you indulged in, even though you might find yourself revisiting it at some point.

Beginning with a credit sequence that is in the form of raunchy publicity shots that were taken by Cinema of Transgression filmmaker Tessa Hughes-Freeland (Baby Doll, Dirty), the film then cuts to a shot of lapsed Warhol superstar Taylor Mead (The Flower Thief, Lonesome Cowboys) lurking in a dark, seedy, and somewhat claustrophobic strip joint where infamous porn star Hebrewess and self-described "post-porn modernist" Annie Sprinkle (who previously appeared in War Is Menstrual Envy) is attempting ply the money out his hands by fondling and exposing her super saggy jumbo jugs, which are notable for having rather large baloney nipples. Even though exceeding effete man-child Mead seems about as straight as a circle, he is so hopelessly enticed by Sprinkle's carny-like bargain bin burlesque routine that he begins harassing her saggy flesh with his trusty cane. When Sprinkle begins inserting her finger inside her mouth in a provocative fashion as if she is sucking a tiny cock, Mead naturally puts money in her oral orifice. At a certain point, Mead almost even seems strangely petrified by Sprinkle's extra fleshy funbags. As a lifelong whore who sells her gash for cash and who is largely infamous for her Public Cervix Announcement routine where she invited audience members to ostensibly "celebrate the female body" by viewing her fleshy pink void with a speculum and flashlight, Sprinkle also notably symbolically kisses a $100 bill as if it were he one true love. Somewhat humorously, Sprinkle also shoves her borderline grotesque gazongas in the face of a hopelessly entranced East Asian chap. Since she is the only woman in the room that is receiving both money and male attention, Sprinkle is eventually ganged up on and attacked by all of the other discernibly used-up, aesthetically devitalized, and mostly fat bar sluts, who also moonlight as self-stylized anti-capitalist commie revolutionaries of the rather raunchy sort. Indeed, after one of the strippers begins to strangle Sprinkle with her own beaded necklace, the bordello of unflatteringly busty 'big boned' strippers begin a sort of unhinged carnal civil war while a poor lone Chihuahua named 'Pinky' sniffs their assumedly rancid feet. At one point, the mostly unclad wayward woman seem to be playing Sapphic leapfrog, with one of the women's backs being plagued with seemingly dozens of grotesque zits. Of course, one can only imagine what the room smelled like when these gleefully seedy 'slapstick slut' scenes were shot.

In what might be described as a sort of playfully pornographic intermission segment, a playful Jewish hook-nosed whore named Darryl Goldsmith performs an unsimulated blowjob on a guy the bears a striking resemblance to the main frog fag in French thief turned novelist Jean Genet's sole directorial effort Un chant d'amour (1950) aka A Song of Love. Eventually, the real cock is replaced with what is obviously a plastic prick which repeatedly squirts the stripper slut in the face with seemingly gallons upon gallons of extra milky pseudo-semen. While the loads upon loads splash in her face, the stripper maintains a goofy smile on her face as if her greatest fantasy has cum true. After the rather explosive cumshot scene concludes, the viewer is bombarded with what is undoubtedly one of the most odiously obnoxious scenes in cinema history, which involves Warhol-esque screen tests featuring various strippers engaged in sensual poses juxtaposed with off-screen narration of different strippers spewing pro-commie idiocy in an exaggerated pseudo-seductive fashion, thus reflecting Zedd's innately autistic incapacity for separating his 'art' with his glaringly incongruent and patently preposterous political views. Indeed, as Ms. Sprinkle pretends to look all fancy while smoking a cig that is attached to a flapper-esque cigarette holder, some strung-out-sounding Bitch mundanely moans, "Of course...The bolsheviks used to the term 'socialist' to describe their system to critically exploit its moral prestige while the West uses it to insult libertarian ideals by associating it with a communist prison state, thus undermining the popular perception that there could be progress towards a more just world.” Thankfully, these unintentionally ‘zany’ juxtapositions of beefy burlesque bitches and prosaic neo-bolshevik twaddle unintentionally makes Zedd’s rather ridiculous attempts at communist cheerleading seem all the more intrinsically moronic. After all, Zedd seems to forget that so-called ‘sex work’ is the sort of timeless trade that Marxist fanboys like to bring up when they are decrying the dehumanizing tendencies of capitalism.

While Zedd veteran Brenda Bergman (Geek Maggot Bingo and Why Do You Exist?) inserts a gun in her big mouth as if it is a cock, some dumb bitch moans, “Landlords are the enemy...the police are the enemy...the police are the servants of the ruling class, protecting their property from their rightful owners: the people that occupy and maintain their buildings and factories.” In a scene that almost unwittingly mocks the tens of millions of chinks and gooks killed under communism, a topless East Asian chick with perky average-sized tits dances while some neo-bolshevik spouts classically contrived commie and anarchist cheerleading slogans like “Property is theft” and “Anarchy is shared self-interest, not irresponsibility.” Needless to say, when some stupid chick says, “you cannot be free until you renounce violence as a method of solving problems,” it is more repulsive and vomit-worthy than the canine coitus and cannibal scenes in Zedd’s debut They Eat Scum. In another equally absurd scenario, a haggard hag prepares to shoot junk into her arm as some dumb bitch quotes Marxist mass murderer Mao and states, “All reactionaries are paper tigers.” Of course, with socialist anti-values now being part of the thankfully rapidly dying American mainstream as reflected in everything from academia to MTV, leftist revolutionaries are nowadays nothing more than dried up old fecal matter that is about to be blown away in a tornado of uncompromising Europid fury.

In the final segment of Ecstasy in Entropy, neo-burlesque whore and famed fag hag, *World Famous *BoB (Zedd’s Lord of the Cockrings (2002) and John Cameron Mitchell’s Shortbus (2006))—a woman that could easily afford to lose about eighty pounds or so—is depicted reading a copy of Newsweek with the pseudo-Nietzschean headline “IS GOD DEAD?,” at least until she is rudely interrupted by a sneaky and sexually ambiguous Judex-esque quasi-ninja in high-heels. Indeed, the gender-confused ninja climbs down a ladder and starts strangling BoB for seemingly no reason, ultimately not realizing that the less than little lady has deadly funbags that make for fierce Fellini-approved wanton weapons. While the distinctly busty broad puts up a rather valiant fight, the naughty ninja manages to swiftly strip her completely naked, which proves to be not very hard since the cellulite-ridden chick is not wearing any underwear. In a scenario that was almost certainly influenced by the bare breasted brutality of generously endowed exploitation cinema Jewess Chesty Morgan in such conspicuously crude Doris Wishman anti-classics as Deadly Weapons (1974) and Double Agent 73

(1974), BoB knocks the ninja out cold with her fearsome fuck udders. Demonstrating that she is probably at least twice as strong Zedd, BoB even manages to lift the ninja's lifeless body over her head like she is wanton wife of King Kong. Of course, the film concludes just as abruptly as it begins.

Notably, on the DVD Abnormal: The Sinema of Nick Zedd released by Rubric Records, there is some behind-the-scenes footage of Ecstasy in Entropy, which is almost more entertaining than the film itself and which demonstrates that Annie Sprinkles never seems to break her (pseudo)seductive porn star persona, especially when shamelessly attempting to flatter her directors. Indeed, at one point during the footage, Sprinkle can be seen kissing Zedd's ass and stating to the director in an overtly salacious fashion, "Nick, you're adorable. You're SO adorable. I'm a big fan. I'm very...proud to be here," to which he replies in an unintentionally hilariously meek and unimpressed fashion, "The feeling is mutual." As Zedd proudly revealed in his book Totem of the Depraved (1996), Sprinkle helped to secure him temporary employment in the porn world, or as the filmmaker wrote himself, "I started making money writing porno stories and got a job acting in Kembra Squalor's super-8 movie TRILOGY OF TERI with Annie Sprinkle. In this film, I was required to wear a dress, lipstick and makeup, and I did a scene where I pissed on a girl's legs. Before doing the scene, I was given a pill that turned my piss fluorescent orange. I then modeled in the nude for Annie's camera and appeared in ADAM AND ALL MALE magazine in leather pants with a naked girl. It was the first time I'd ever been paid to jerk off." Of course, Ecstasy in Entropy can also be described as a form of masturbation where Zedd demonstrates that he is probably the only person in the world that gets a hard-on from flabby busted up old harlots quoting chink mass murderer Chairman Mao.

Despite his flagrant left-wing sympathies and innately infantile attacks against so-called "fascists" (aka any successful person with self-discipline and/or individual that he is resentful towards, like his ex-comrade Richard Kern, who he began referring to as "Nazi Dick"), Zedd once had the gall to state, "I am politically an anarchist and sexually a fascist—I don't think there is anything wrong with that." Personally, I do not see anything "fascistic" about fucking fat chicks and drag queens and sucking on used blood-soaked tampons as Zedd has been known to do, but I digress. I think Jonas Mekas probably best summed up Zedd's sexual degeneracy and its intrinsic relation to his special brand of cinema when he wrote in his article Notes on the Work of Nick Zedd, "I have always felt and I still do that Nick Zedd has swapped spirituality for flesh, love for hate and anger [...]" It was I think Amy Taubin who described Nick Zedd's work as the Cinema of Transgression. Whereas I have always thought that a more correct description of it would be Cinema of Genitalia – since the Transgression of that cinema seldom, or ever go any further." Indeed, Zedd's idea of celluloid subversion is flaunting his debauched sexual fetishes, sort of like a baby proudly showing off their feces. As for his politics, Zedd, who grew up in suburbia and whose “father was a conservative person who lived a quiet existence as a lawyer and a bureaucrat for the US Postal Service,” could not be more conformist and mainstream, hence his vocal support of borderline wealthy kosher conman Bernie Sanders for President of the United States. Like commie messiah Karl Marx and most self-stylized work-shy commie types, Zedd is not actually a member of the Lumpenproletariat but a failed bourgeois who cannot compete in the free market and thus naturally believes that the government has the right to rob successful people and give their money to parasites and resentful losers like himself. Of course, what pro-socialist types like Zedd do not realize is that communism and capitalism are not all that different and are really two different sides of the same kosher coin in terms of their materialist Weltanschauung and mutual desire to destroy and ultimately enslave Europe and the rest of the world, hence why Hebraic Wall Street banker Jacob Schiff of Kuhn Loeb and Co. was the primary financier of the judeo-bolshevik revolutionaries that murdered tens of millions of white Christian Russians during the so-called Russian Revolution, just like how nowadays kosher capitalists like George Soros provide the funding for anti-white groups like Black Lives Matter and the flooding of Europe with highly hostile third world savages. Indeed, as Russian revolutionary anarchist Mikhail Bakunin once wrote in 1871 in regard to complimentary relationship between Jewish capitalist and communists, “Himself a Jew, Marx has around him, in London and France, but especially in Germany, a multitude of more or less clever, intriguing, mobile, speculating Jews, such as Jews are every where: commercial or banking agents, writers, politicians, correspondents for newspapers of all shades, with one foot in the bank, the other in the socialist movement, and with their behinds sitting on the German daily press — they have taken possession of all the newspapers — and you can imagine what kind of sickening literature they produce. Now, this entire Jewish world, which forms a single profiteering sect, a people of bloodsuckers, a single gluttonous parasite, closely and intimately united not only across national borders but across all differences of political opinion — this Jewish world today stands for the most part at the disposal of Marx and at the same time at the disposal of Rothschild. I am certain that Rothschild for his part greatly values the merits of Marx, and that Marx for his part feels instinctive attraction and great respect for Rothschild. This may seem strange. What can there be in common between Communism and the large banks? Oh! The Communism of Marx seeks enormous centralization in the state, and where such exists, there must inevitably be a central state bank, and where such a bank exists, the parasitic Jewish nation, which speculates on the work of the people, will always find a way to prevail ...” Of course, like some many white shabbos goy clowns before him, Zedd is just another useful idiot who thinks he is being edgy and rebellious but is just really unwittingly supporting the same cause as that of the heeb degenerates in Hollywood, albeit at a more pathetic level.

Undoubtedly, were it not for Zedd's obsession with obnoxiously flaunting his proud political philistinism, his films would be much easier to swallow and would probably leave not such a bad aftertaste, which is especially apparent in Ecstasy in Entropy as a kitschy cinematic work that seems like the degenerate result of the mongrel quasi-heterosexual brood of George Kuchar and Doris Wishman attempting to make what they believe is a bold and subversive political statement yet falling flat on their face. Additionally, despite being apparently mostly straight, Zedd ironically has even worse taste in women than homos like Andy Warhol, Andy Milligan, and the Kuchar brothers. Indeed, while I certainly appreciate a woman with a nice hourglass shape, big tits, and especially a large but firm derriere, there is hardly anything erotic about the big burly Amazonian beastess of Zedd's little flick. While Zedd described himself as being "sexually a fascist," his obsession with loud, large, and over-domineering women, not to mention the fact that he seems to have a special affinity for cross-dressing (in fact, in Richard Kern's short King of Sex (1986), he even sucks a guy's limp dick while in drag), demonstrates that he is the sexual equivalent of a neurotic and majorly masochistic French social justice warrior. After all, real fascists, who fuck with their cocks, do not fetishize corpulent kosher cunts or washed-up old fag Warhol superstars, among other (sub)human rabble. Still, Ecstasy in Entropy is seemingly infinitely more interesting than the average Russ Meyer flick, plus, at a mere 17-minutes, it never drags too much, even if the chicks in the film have tits that practically drag on the ground.

SIN

Nico B. (2008)

Until relatively recently, I do not think there has ever been an occasion in my life where I felt a certain overwhelming nostalgia for a film that I had never actually seen, but such is certainly the case with the apparently long ago completed but only just released cinematic work Sin (2005-2008) directed by Dutch-born auteur Nico Bruinsma. I first heard about the film in 2008 but did not become obsessed with seeing it until early 2013 after interviewing director Nico B, whose latest film 1334 (2012) became somewhat of a personal obsession of mine. At the time, my lady friend had become extremely sick with some mysterious illness and joked that she was ill with “1334,” thus the film name became a brief but nonetheless memorable inside joke of sorts between of us (given that both of us are also longtime fans of Christian Death/Rozz Williams, the dark origin of the name was not lost on us). In short, early 2013 was a very happy period in my life and I cannot help but associate the enigmatic film Sin with it, so naturally I have been dying to actually see the film in all its sexually sacrilegious splendor, especially considering that I eventually began to suspect that it might not ever be released. A partially pornographic, silent black-and-white avant-garde triptych with an innate timeless quality starring both literally and figuratively dark dames with deadly and thankfully wholly organic fleshy curves that should remind any sensible heterosexual man why fake tits are aesthetically repugnant and nothing short of the erotic equivalent of fool’s gold, Nico’s rather refined 30-minute celluloid experiment in stylishly sinister eroticism is arguably his most personal and, in turn, auteur oriented, film to date. For those familiar with dark-haired Dutchman, it is no secret that Nico B is arguably better known as a film distributor and owner of the great company Cult Epics than as a filmmaker, hence his fairly small yet nonetheless notable oeuvre. Of course, Nico pretty much always intended to be both an entrepreneur and auteur as he saw it as a practical means to not succumbing to the starving artist cliché that has more or less become synonymous with his famous countryman Vincent van Gogh. In fact, as the filmmaker stated in an interview with proud belligerent dipsomaniac Gene Gregorits in regard to his one-time film professor and mentor Babeth Mondini’s absolutely imperative early influence on his career, “She took me to school every day, because we both lived in Amsterdam. After one month, she said, ‘Okay, I like what you’re doing but the films you want to make are not going to make any money.’ Or, ‘No one’s going to invest money in these films.’ I thought, Well, I’ll make money first, and then I’ll do films. She gave me the best advice of my life.” Ultimately, Nico would return the favor by releasing Babeth’s feature Kiss Napoleon Goodbye (1990) starring Lydia Lunch and Henry Rollins under his Cult Epics label.

Not unlike his one-time friend, legendary experimental filmmaker Kenneth

SIN

Anger, Nico B is an auteur that might not direct many films, but when he does they tend to be seemingly immaculate in their esoterically erotic 'evil' splendor as singular celluloid works that surely transcend time in terms of both cinematic technique and subject matter. Also, like his one-time professor, Dutch experimental master Frans Zwartjes (Living, Pentimento), Nico seems to have nil interest in appealing to any sort of audience as a perennially underground filmmaker that rarely makes full-length features and is only concerned with exploring his own distinct personal obsessions, especially of the carnal sort. In that sense, Sin is, in many ways, the quintessential Nico B film as a sort of instant cult classic that will only be truly appreciated by those select loyal few that have the will and good instincts to find it. Somewhat ironically, despite being rampantly heterosexual as demonstrated by his virtually lifelong obsession Bettie Page and the promotion of her bondage films, Nico's best known film is the homo serial killer meditation Pig, which was co-written and co-directed by legendary deathrock prince(ss) Rozz Williams and thus less geared towards the Dutchman's own sexual proclivities (for starters, the film not only features no unclad female bodies, but not female characters at all). As his early Super-8 student film Slime (1990) rather blatantly reveals, Nico has been long obsessed with many of the same themes, especially in regard to the so-called fairer sex, sacrilege, and the sometimes strangely complimentary relationship between sex, death, and religion. In many ways, Sin, much like Rozz William's art, is a deceptively spiritual cinematic work in that sense that it feels like it was created by a heretical believer who subscribes to an inverted form of Christianity where sin and human misery are worshiped, as if Nico lost the faith due as a result of living in such a dark, dispiriting, and dystopian realm that he could only bring himself to believe in hell and sinfulness. Indeed, not unlike much of Zwartjes' films, Sin feels like an aesthetically pleasing expression of hell on earth, thereupon making it all the more notable that the director hails from a literally puritanical Calvinist nation where telling jokes was even considered subversive only a couple of generations ago.

Notably, nearly a decade ago in 2008, Nico B confessed in an interview in regard to the cryptically semi-autobiographically nature of his film, "My new film SIN is a collection of 3 stories told from my own personal experiences with women I have been with. I put the protagonist of each film in a different time and changed their professional ambitions. All three I shot on Super 8 to get that early century artistic feeling. All three are also very surreal and erotic (and of course controversial). In one story a nun gives an on camera blow job to a priest. I believe this is the first art film to show this on screen. The scene is a tribute to Rozz of Christian Death (both of us being brought up with Christian beliefs). Also, the religious ending of BETTIE PAGE: DARK ANGEL is also a reference to the scene in SIN." As Nico's own words more or less express, his film is a sort of amorously abstract three-part cinematic anti-love letter to seemingly mostly dangerous and mentally unstable ex-lovers from his past. In a second interview that I conducted with Nico in 2013, he demonstrated an almost ambivalent attitude to the act of filmmaking by stating, "I never intend to ever make any film, unless I see no way out," thus underscoring the internal pain, sorrow, and despair that is at the very core of the film. Of course, judging by the fact that virtually all of the male characters in the film meet a grisly or tragic end, it is easy to see what Nico means as Sin is a fairly forebodingly forsaken cinematic work that, despite featuring unclad busty babes flaunting their entrancing flesh, is clearly the agonized express of a haunted and internally wounded individual that sees sex as an oftentimes deadly affair, at least spiritually speaking. An elegantly gritty three-part Super-8 tone poem fueled by pathos of perversity and full of big and highly suckable milky white tits and nicely trimmed beavers, Nico B's strikingly beautiful dark romantic cinematic confession thrives on unabashedly laurelling the lethally lustful and sexually neurotic in such an effortlessly confident and reassured fashion that most filmgoers, including thoroughly desensitized gorehounds, will be simply stunned and dumbfounded by what they see to the point where they will only remember the big bosoms and cross-in-the-cunt. Far too moodily aesthetically exquisite to be confused with actual pornography and too politically incorrect and just plain incendiary to be accepted by the more spiritually castrated members of the Criterion Collection crowd, Sin is cinema for the decidedly romantically damned.

A modern day mythopoeic silent flick featuring a musical score made up entirely of Impressionist compositions by Claude Debussy that thankfully does not seem masturbatorily cinephiliac in a Guy Maddin-esque fashion nor obnoxiously anachronistic like the sickeningly silly shot-on-video neo-vintage Lovecraft adaptation The Call of Cthulhu (2005) directed by Andrew Leman, Sin begins in a striking fashion that seems like what might happen if someone attempted to reconcile the classic Golden Age Hollywood biblical epics of Cecil B. DeMille with Kenneth Anger's classic psychedelic Thelemite micro-epic Lucifer Rising (1972). After beginning with an ancient Egyptian princess having her throat slit by some random Egyptian gentleman, the following inter-title appears, "In ancient Egyptian mythology the panther Bastet is the God of pleasure, dancing and music, also known as . . . LADY OF THE EAST." Literally roaming with black panthers as a child, the Lady of the East grows up to be a sort of archaic stripper and while she is doing one of her exotic dance routines she is 'bought' by a wealthy American (Pipo) who brings her back to the United States where she becomes the headliner in a Chicago burlesque cabaret act called "Dance of the Pharaohs" where she exploits her exotic ancestral roots in a fittingly kitschy fashion. Leading a lurid life of potentially deadly vice, the Lady of the East has a traumatic childhood flashback in regard to the murder of her father whilst in an opium haze and subsequently shoots her man dead with a handgun after he gets the gall to attempt to steal her precious whoring money.

SIN

As the 'Lady of the East' segment seemingly unintentionally reveals, America has the power to even debase tough third world whores. Of course, the segment also reveals that it is never a good idea to get involved with a girl that has daddy issues, especially if said daddy issues began at an early age before any sort of emotional maturity could have been reached.

In what is arguably the most intricate and indubitably the most controversial segment of the film, 'Le Modèle,' one watches with erotic intrigue as porn star Caroline Pierce—a seemingly forsaken woman that now regularly appears in extremely amateurish 'mandingo' porn—portrays a dual role as both a Catholic nun and a lecherous model in a provocative performance that features a devilishly dichotomous look a female sexuality and spirituality. Undoubtedly, one could argue that the model is the nun's sort of Jungian shadow and vice versa, as both characters seem to reflect the other's unconscious longings and compulsions. Despite being total opposites in virtually every single way (for instance, the nun is followed by a white cat while the model is followed by a black one), they are merely inversions of one another, with one suffering from sexual repression and the other spiritual repression. Of course, as Nico B more than hints in the segment, the sexual is oftentimes intertwined with the spiritual and vice versa, with a crucifix being arguably the ultimate figurative (and, in the film's case, literal) dildo and/or phallic symbol. While 'Le Modèle' oftentimes feels like a hypnotic hodgepodge of Jean Cocteau's The Blood of a Poet (1930), Maya Deren and Alexander Hammid's Meshes of the Afternoon (1943), and John E. Schmitz's The Voices (1953), it also owes a little to the Catholic carnality of Walerian Borowczyk's classic Nunsplotation flick Interno di un convento (1978) aka Behind Convent Walls. While the nun sucks the cock of a swarthy Jesus-esque priest with great grace, the model seductively stabs her cunt with a wooden crucifix, which she eventually mutilates herself with after adding a crown of thorns to the makeshift holy dildo. After their sexual experiences, both women become somewhat haunted in their own ways, with the nun being obsessed with destroying a statue modeled after the model and the model being preoccupied with the horrors of being seen naked in public by finger-wagging nuns and priests. In the end, the nun stabs the statue in the heart and causes to magically bleed and the model strips her clothes and enters a large church, which immediately becomes consumed with flames of passion. As to whether either woman achieves salvation or eternal damnation, one can only assume, but considering the model seems to worship herself and her own body (hence why she is a model) instead of Christ like the nun, it is probably safe to say that she will become one of Satan's sluts.

Undoubtedly, the third and final segment of Sin, 'The Maid,' is the most understated and enigmatic as a sullen and quite literally pathetic story that centers on a vaguely handsome and independently wealthy legless dope fiend (Mark Lee) that hires an inordinately busty broad (Dahlia Dark) to supposedly clean his humble abode. Indeed, the eponymous cleaner has what might be sensitively described as 'jumbo jugs' and she certainly knows how to use them as indicated by the fact that her crippled employer is regularly voyeuristically gazing at her fine fleshy goods. In fact, the perverted cripple even finds himself masturbating with one of his stubs whilst admiring the maid's absolutely mesmerizing carnal meat, as if her ample sized body parts are all the more of a turn-on for him since he is missing some of his own appendages (whether or not he has a cock remains to be seen). A man that seems to have come to the conclusion that he is nothing and that no healthy sane woman would ever be genuinely interested in him as a romantic partner, the visibly lonely legless wonder seems determined to degrade himself and does so by kissing and gently placing high-heels on his rarely clothed employee's feet. The relationship between the man and his maid is innately infantile and almost seem like that of a mother and son as demonstrated by his tendency to crawl around his house like a baby and stare at his employee's fine fuck-udders like he is desperately thirsty for mother's milk. As an individual that seems to have lived a seemingly unbearable life of pain and discomfort as hinted in haunting childhood flashbacks where he receives large injections from a doctor while being watched by a little girl that may or may not be his sister, it is certainly no surprise that the man is a morbidly morose and melancholic masochist that lives solely to further his own self-debasement despite the fact that he is wealthy. In a bittersweet conclusion that really sums up many of the themes of the entire film, the well endowed maid gives the man an injection that provides him a most permanent form of solace that could not be more ideal considering his extra precarious predicament in life. As all three of the chapters of Sin make quite clear, sex and death are the only things that make life truly worth living, especially if you are a whore, cripple, or nun.

In the introduction of his text Eroticism: Death and Sensuality, French Nietzschean Georges Bataille wrote, "Eroticism, it may be said, is assenting to life up to the point of death. Strictly speaking, this is not a definition, but I think the formula gives the meaning of eroticism better than any other. If a precise definition were called for, the starting point would certainly have to be sexual reproductive activity, of which eroticism is a special form. Sexual reproductive activity is common to sexual animals and men, but only men appear to have turned their sexual activity into erotic activity. Eroticism, unlike simple sexual activity, is a psychological quest independent of the natural goal: reproduction and the desire of children. From this elementary definition let us now return to the formula I proposed in the first place: eroticism is assenting to life even in death. Indeed, although erotic activity is in the first place an exuberance of life, the object of this psychological quest, independent as I say of any concern to reproduce life, is not alien to death." Undoubtedly, Bataille's words in regard to erotic passion, as opposed to sexual reproduction, having to be imagined by the individual are indubitably relevant to the entire essence of a film like Sin where sex takes a truly transcendental and otherworldly form that entirely eclipses bodily functions, so it is only fitting that the frog anarchist concludes his introduction to Erotism with the remark: "Poetry leads to the same place as all forms of eroticism—to the blending and fusion of separate objects. It leads us to eternity, it leads us to death, and through death to continuity. Poetry is eternity; the sun matched with the sea." Of course, in a way, cinema is also eternity, thus making it all the more fitting that Nico B's film has an innate timeless quality as a cinematic work that even transcends the truly bygone era(s) that it recreates, hence its similarities to the films of Cocteau (who Nico paid tribute to with his 'travel film' Ville Jean Cocteau (2003), which is included with the BD/DVD combo of Sin released by Cult Epics).

Sometimes feeling like an avant-garde porn-snuff flick documenting three real-life cases that were excised from Kenneth Anger's classic piece of highbrow toilet reading Hollywood Babylon (1953), Sin is nothing short of an orgasmically oneiric celluloid gem that was made for the sort of dark seeker cinephile that looks at hunting down rare and arcane films as a sort of spiritual quest. As a successful film distributor and cinematic poet that clearly only makes films for himself, Nico B is like both Vincent van Gogh and his brother Theo van Gogh combined. Certainly, I cannot think of another mensch that I respect as both an artist and businessmen that releases obscure European arthouse films that no one else would dare to release. While set in an idealized past that seems like a schizophrenic universe as dreamed up by the black sheep stepson of Judaic pornographer Irving Klaw and surrealist poet Cocteau, Sin is certainly most potent if viewed from the perspective of a cryptically autobiographical film that is based on three events from Nico B's life, hence why the filmmaker seemed so reluctant to release it. Of course, as a film with a strangely erotic crucifix masturbation scene that makes the infamous unholy preteen Onanist scenario in The Exorcist (1973) seem like outmoded child's play, one can only speculate how literal the film is in terms of its autobiographical depiction of the auteur's sexual life, though one can pretty much assume that Nico B has had his fair share of unhinged girlfriends with humongous hooters. Naturally, as art history has unequivocally demonstrated, crazy cunts with addictively delectable carnal-traps and devilish curves always make for a great source for artistic inspiration, even if one would rather forget the mind games and violently neurotic tendencies that tend to plague many members of the so-called fairer sex. Undoubtedly, after watching Nico's film, I could not help but be reminded of Friedrich Nietzsche's poetic words, "The true man wants two different things: danger and diversion. He therefore wants woman, as the most dangerous plaything . . . Man must be trained for war, and woman for the relaxation of the warrior: all else is folly . . . Too sweet fruits — these the warrior does not like. He therefore likes woman — even the sweetest woman is bitter [...] Thou goest to women? Do not forget thy whip!"

In his 1963 article 'The Camera As A God,' film theorist and experimental filmmaker Charles Boultenhouse (Handwritten, Dionysus) provocatively wrote, "The good film-maker is he who is engaged (consciously or unconsciously) in preserving and perfecting the demon in the camera; the very best film-maker is he who is engaged in transforming the demon into the god. I am sure you will see that an idea so theological as this will probably make out experimental film to be positively sacred in character and commercial film rather blasphemous. You will be right.." In the same article, Boultenhouse also states, "Hollywood is the tease of all time [...] The teenagers of all ages who worship its fetishes will never be satisfied; nor will the Demon of the Camera, bored almost cross-eyed by the miles of Nothing passing before it into Oblivion." Of course, whereas Hollywood gives you nothing more than the a wholly artificial pseudo-blonde silicone-fueled tease that has plagued vulnerable American youth with a sort of collective metaphysical disease that has caused them to confuse love with lust and eroticism with animalistic bodily function, Sin—a delectably demonic film where, in the Nietzschean sense, god is long dead and has been replaced by a sort of Dionysian goddess of erratic eroticism—is a three course orgy that reminds the viewer that sometimes the sight of a certain pussy evokes serious pathos. As someone that counts virtually all of the great loves of my life as voluptuous women with killer curves and delectable derrieres, I can certainly understand the misery, melancholy, and lovelorn lunacy that the unclad female form can provoke in men, hence my admittedly somewhat perverse personal obsession with a film like Nico B's where a woman's best assets are elevated to the level of spectral archetypes that stir the collective unconscious and penetrate the psyche like a pulsating love truncheon plowing into a fresh hymen-intact prick-purse. In short, Sin is the sort of romance film that you hope to see from a friend of Rozz Williams and ex-student of Frans Zwartjes.

Nico B. (2012)

On April Fools' Day 1998, Rozz Williams (born Roger Alan Painter) – the virtual crowned king of American Deathrock (otherwise known as 'Goth' music) and the charmingly creepy and charismatic man behind such musical groups as Christian Death, Shadow Project, Premature Ejaculation, and Daucus Karota, among various others – committed suicide via hanging in his West Hollywood apartment at the mere age of 34. One of the last artistic projects Mr. Williams worked on before his untimely death was the audaciously aberrant avant-garde arthouse short Pig (1999), which he co-wrote/co-directed with Dutch auteur filmmaker Nico B. (Hollywood Babylon, Bettie Page: Dark Angel). Originally intending to make a totally plot-less 10-minute short shot on Super 8 with a procrastinating friend named Iggy, Rozz eventually turned to experienced filmmaker Nico B. for direction with his idea for a sadomasochistic serial killer piece featuring frantically fetishistic themes and imagery, where, in turn, the Dutch auteur proposed they shoot the cinematic work on 16mm, add a discernible storyline (if not a sharply and sadistically surreal one), and make it a featurette at 25 minutes. Throughout the month of December 1996, Nico and Rozz collaborated on notes for a film at a bar-restaurant that the filmmaker would later develop into script pages and storyboards, thereupon conceiving the sublimely salacious story that would be told in the succulently seedy and spiritually sinister cinematic form via the feverishly foreboding film Pig. Hiring the towering yet lanky fellow James "cowboy" Holland to played Rozz's cock-pierced celluloid victim, the two cultivated cinematic collaborators shot the film in a mere two months utilizing an abandoned house in a desert, Williams' apartment and basement, and some random dungeon as the setting for the film. Rozz's collage book "Why God Permits Evil" – a hand-designed work featuring images of a skull, snake, swastika, and dollar bill signs on the cover – was also utilized in Pig at the recommendation of Nico (who quite intrigued by Rozz's unholy tome) as a fetishistic guide for the fantasies that the sadistic surrealist killer would carryout cinematically. While Nico immediately went to work on editing the film after principle photography was finished, Rozz had a hard time delivering the ultimately delightfully dispiriting industrial soundtrack that he promised he would assemble for Pig and would only finish recording it a mere week before his tragic death, but he never found the time to fine tune these tracks. With Rozz dead, it was up to Nico to find someone to mix the haunting sound recordings, which was inevitably done by Chuck Collison (Rozz's collaborator from Premature Ejaculation). After battling with a number of film labs who were ostensibly offended by the film's stark S&M imagery and authentic body mutiliation, Nico was eventually able to convince FotoKem located in Burbank, CA to print the first cut of Pig and the film inevitably premiered on January 3, 1999 at Coven

13 in Los Angeles at the El Rey Theatre and soon after played to a sold-out audience at the American Cinematheque in LA, but the Dutch filmmaker was far from finished with his collaboration with the deceased Deathrocker. Over a decade later, Nico began work on a quasi-sequel to Pig entitled 1334 (2012); an uniquely unpropitious and unsettling, as well as intensely intimate, featurette ghost story centering around a very real phantasm from the filmmaker's past.

As Nico B. quite candidly mentioned in an interview Soiled Sinema conducted with him way back in 2008 regarding his collaboration with Rozz Williams and Pig, the dolorous Deathrocker had developed a hopeless romantic infatuation with the married heterosexual Dutch filmmaker during their cinematic collaboration. As Nico explained in the SS interview, "At the end of his life, Rozz told me that he was in love with me. Of course, the sexual part I could not do much with which I had to tell him. I think it hurt him as we were very close in the last year of his life. I know he wanted somebody to love him and have a relationship with, especially a man. He felt guilty about something that happened when he was a teenager and he never really got over it. I think that and the lack of love made him kill himself." Clearly, Nico was also unable to get over his experience with Rozz and his suicide, thereupon resulting in 1334; a silent yet sinfully seductive black-and-white ghost story about the fiendish forewarning future and the penetrating yet perturbing past that was inspired by calamitous true events, but dramatically and expressionistically fictionalized. Opening with spectral Super 8 film footage Nico shot at Rozz's actual apartment in 1997 (featuring a sketched portrait of Jeffrey Dahmer and a swastika flag hanging on the wall), thus linking it with the prophetic celluloid past of Pig, 1334 continues thereafter with a startlingly morbid phantasmagorical reconstruction of the Goth icon's self-slaughter via hanging 12 years earlier (Nico technically finished principal photography for the film over a 7 day period during June 2010) in the very same perverse penthouse. Most of 1334 was shot in Nico's Los Feliz-based house where the strikingly strange occurrences that pestered the filmmaker really happened. Featuring inter-spliced images of tarot cards, including the "wheel of fortune" and "death" cards, 1334 has an erratic esoteric essence to it that is quite in tune with Pig, albeit with a somewhat less Williams-esque flavor. Of course, considering it features original music (including three unreleased electronic tracks) and art by Rozz Williams, 1334 most certainly carries a post-Christian Death lifeblood to it that is most unmistakable, which becomes all the more terribly tenebrous for those acquainted with the background story behind the film. That being said, I think it is no exaggeration for me to say that 1334 is easily one of the most exquisitely eerie films that I have ever seen, despite the fact that it features none of the real-life body mutilation that pleasantly plagued its suavely swinish predecessor Pig.

Also utilizing some of the greatest and most ominous landscape paintings ever evoked by Flemish Renaissance painter Pieter Bruegel the Elder, including my personal favorite “The Triumph of Death,” Nico B. pays perversely playful postmodern tribute to the Dutch master of aesthetic destruction that came before him. Utilizing a green-screen, the filmmaker gives new life to Bruegel’s paintings in a most apocalyptic manner, thus eloquently eliciting the wonderfully woebegone world in flames that Rozz Williams would never live to see; the literal and figurative augural incineration of the American dream. It also should be noted that the year “1334” – a number Rozz Williams was most pathologically obsessed with due to its association with the year the Black Death emerged from China and eventually killed 30–60 percent of Europe’s population – was also the time frame which Bruegel’s paintings were set. Ironically, featuring actor Bill Oberst Jr. (Abraham Lincoln vs. Zombies, Excision) – a serious and unabashed Christian true believer (it is worth noting that Rozz was raised in a strict Southern Baptist household and his father was an eccentric minister/dilettante artist of sorts) of German descent (also like Rozz) who typically plays murderous lunatics, including a Nazi zombie – depicting Rozz Williams, I am sure the Deathrocker who committed suicide on All Fools’ Day would have appreciated his friend Nico’s soundly sardonic casting decision. American rocker Dante White-Aliano aka Dante Adrian Whit (frontman of the L.A.-based band Dante Vs Zombies) plays the lead role in 1334 as a presumable stand-in for Nico B. as the man who must deal with the unsettling, unholy wraith of Rozz Williams’ lost and downcast soul. The film also features three uncredited female actresses of similar Bettie Page-like (Nico B. directed a biopic based on the famous 1950s pin-up model entitled Bettie Page: Dark Angel in 2004) appearances, one of which apparently acting out a bizarre experience that happened to her a number of years ago. Needless to say, 1334 is far from a sentimental tribute to the decisively damned Deathrocker, but a miserably mournful and misanthropic art-house memorial for a melancholy musical genius whose self-initiated earthly demise had lead his former collaborator to create an exceedingly esoteric work that is literally at a loss for words.

Shot in the understatedly underground filmmaking spirit of Pig (both films cost roughly $5,000.00 to produce), 1334 – with its heart-piercingly sharp yet soundly gritty b/w film stock, positively penetrant post-deathrock aesthetic, delightfully discordant electronic score, nihilistic negative shots, and heavily hypnotic hopelessness – is indubitably a sensitive yet unsentimental sequel to the enrapturing transgressive film it so closely spawned, sort of like an aborted fetus who has sired an equally sick yet more sophisticated son. Like Jean Cocteau’s Blood of a Poet (1930) aka Le Sang d’un Poète meets the early shorts of Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Pentimento) meets the films of Richard Kern (Submit to Me, Fingered) minus the technical incompetency and cheap titillation, 1334 is an innately inordinate and ominously oneiric piece of celluloid obscurity conjured up by an unwholesomely obsessive auteur filmmaker who is more proficient at dwelling on the mystique of death than most filmmakers are at depicting life, but I guess one should not expect anything less from a film director whose filmic depiction of a mutilated corpse was described by Crowleyite cinemagickian Kenneth Anger as being, “the most convincing dead body in a movie of all time” (in reference to Pig). An abhorrently alluring atrocity exhibition with Rozz Williams’ rather emotionally-ravaged unseen ghost as the virtual metaphysical grim-reaper of the approaching apocalypse, 1334 is a soothingly sacrilegious cinematic work that reminds one why a figurative Hades is all the more penetrating than a horrendously humble Hollywood heaven. As a lifelong lover of Rozz Williams’ music that regards the first Christian Death album Only Theatre of Pain (1982) as one of my favorite musical records of all time, I feel that 1334 makes for a most merry of celluloid maladies.

Luckily, Nico B. made the wise decision in releasing both Pig and 1334 as a set in the form of a BD/DVD via his distribution company Cult Epics. For more info on Pig/1334, checkout <http://cultepics.com>

ANIMAL LOVER

Nico Maſtorakis (1912)

On a long list of filthy films that I had to view, Animal Lover and A Summer's Day were near the top of my list. It was a much needed change to my average review quota of inane horror films exercising extreme brutality that has captivated the Western audience by storm and leaving no room for a decadent change in routine. Alex de Renzy - creator of Femmes DeSade and Long Jeanne Silver - has created a documentary "documenting" the absurd sexual rite of copulating with animals. He opens quite tediously explaining how it used to be a fad and furthers his trial and error by explaining quite boldly that it's more compliant in women. He more or less calls women inter-species whores which really gave me a chuckle here and there. This monotone dialogue goes on for what seems to be countless hours until he gets on to interviewing a lone girl who is in the shadows. Her identity has been concealed and de Renzy swears that she has an interesting story to tell. The woman begins a story about how she was a youth living in the US who decides to visit Morocco (I believe) for cheap hash. She explains how she is picked up by a group of Arabs and brought back to a warehouse and forced to repeatedly screw up to 4 guys at a time. She sobbingly exclaims she switched numerous warehouses and was in circulation for 18 months. The narrator shows no remorse for this girl and presses horrifying questions forcing her to talk about how she had to fellate upon dogs in order to get her freedom. With no money in Morocco, she had to become a prostitute to contact the United States Embassy. While the authenticity of this claim can be argued, it still is indeed monstrous to view a crying girl tell while the narrator pressures her asking very violating questions. What just was presented was the introduction. The second half of the forty-minute long feature is footage of Bodil "The Boar Girl" Joensen explaining her love for animals and then demonstrating this by, slowly, making love to her domesticated canine. Never in my life have I been as sickened as by what I just saw. I fast-forwarded through this scene in complete disgust. I have no right to judge a soul but honestly, What the fuck!? Animal Lover has only been shown once in the states. It was shown in seedy cinema's in San Francisco. This of course resulted in a 5 month jail sentence for the theater manager (Or so I'm told). Animal Lover begins with aspirations to be a wealthy documentary, rich with knowledge, but quickly descends into being pure exploitation filth. This is easily passable and outrageously sickening. For a more artful production, A Summer's Day is recommendable, but only if the subject interests you.

ISLAND OF DEATH

Nico Mastorakis (1976)

A perverse exploitation masterpiece loaded with so much violence and sex it seems unreal. This film is directed by Nico Mastorakis and shatters just about every taboo. We have incest, bestiality, rape, and of course murder. This film was recently released with cover art that grabs just about any gorehounds eyes. Words like BANNED or UNCENSORED are plastered all over the blood red front. The synopsis is about two lovers that escaped to a small island in Greece. They were being chased by a negro detective named Foster. Of course, he sports a 70's afro. They seem like a normal couple at first but you soon realize they are actually brother and sister. While first arriving, they seem to be a normal couple. The next morning, he wakes up and wants sex. She says no so what does any normal man do? Certainly not go outside and rape a goat and kill it no less. What starts of as a trip into a macabre vacation soon turns much worse. The brother seems to be out of control. Spiting perversion and delving into an unknown layer of hypocrisy. Once killing a few of the sinful residents, the heat begins to build up. This film in few ways reminds me of Frailty. Christopher sees himself as the carrier of gods swift justice. The angel of death in some ways. The key point of this film is to address violence as crude as possible. One of the best scenes in this film is the bulldozer decapitation. This film depicts sex in such a calm manner but with such perverse angles. This film wouldn't have been so great if it wasn't lead by such great acting performances. My favorite character was the painter. He really brought character to his role. This film has more artistic merit than most movies portraying a similar subject matter. Rape is seen as a civil instinct and a primal action, leaving the viewer questioning ethics. This film, while not being made for anyone, is a film for everyone. It is a mix of every major genre. This film is not as disturbing as it is advertised but it is definitely unsettling. Sporting an amazing soundtrack that roots back to the era when exploitation was great, it uses weird reverberations and key sound effects through out the film. With an ending that is as original as they come, Island of Death should not be missed.

PERFORMANCE

Nicholas Roeg (1970)

For better or worse, if any film reflects the distinct and decidedly decadent zeitgeist of its time, especially in regard to art, kultur, and social trends, it is Performance directed by Donald Cammell (White of the Eye, Wild Side) and Nicholas Roeg (Don't Look Now, Track 29). Admittedly, the first time I attempted to watch this stylish yet sleazy cult film, I felt it was nothing more than sleekly directed, photographed, and edited hippie excess and celluloid debris directed by two decadent and delirious drug-addled counter-culture filmmakers whose idea of an artistic statement was seeing how much superficial and stereotypical sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll they could fit into about 2 hours and thus use these pseudo-shocking ingredients as a means to make up for a convoluted, nonsensical story of the sensory-overloading sort. After all, what better gimmick for the "ultimate cinematic trip" than featuring Mick Jagger of The Rolling Stones in one of the lead roles in his debut screen appearance, not to mention the bold and beautiful German-Italian model/actress Anita Pallenberg (Dillinger Is Dead, Michael Kohlhaas - Der Rebell) – girlfriend of Brian Jones and later Keith Richards – as the sexy and sassy female lead. On that basis alone, Performance – a film where gangster-meets-rocker – was destined to be a 'cult classic' no matter how incompetently it was directed, but as I learned during my second-viewing of the cinematic work, it is more than just an expensive proto-music video. The film was directed by two first-time directors: Nicholas Roeg who previously worked as a cinematographer for films like The Masque of the Red Death (1964) and Fahrenheit 451 (1966), and Donald Cammell who was a child prodigy and society portrait painter who inevitably gave up the medium to become a filmmaker.

In regard to questions as to who was the real 'auteur' behind Performance, Cammell thought the question was "just silly," but did admit to the authors of Donald Cammell: A Life on the Wild Side by Rebecca Umland and Sam Umland (2006) while speaking quite narcissistically and characteristically in the third-person that "In truth Nic has been extremely embarrassed by all the attention he's received for Performance over the years, but the fact is, Donald and Nic worked together, and Performance was the result of the special mixture of them both. It's simply impossible to sort it all out." Considering that Cammell's film career never really took off (he only directed three more feature-length works before his suicide in 1996 after he did not get final-cut for his swansong Wild Side) after Performance, most film critics and theorists contend that it is essentially a Nicholas Roeg film due to his relatively illustrious and successful career as an idiosyncratic auteur filmmaker, but as Anita Pallenberg in Cammell's biography and crew members featured in the documentary Influence and Controversy: Making 'Performance' (2007) also vouch, the directing responsibilities were for the most part divided this way: one filmmaker dealing with the actors and the other with the technical aspects. On top of acting as the cinematographer, Roeg was in charge of the technical responsibilities while Cammell – who also wrote the script – dealt with the actors and the innumerable cultural references (literature, painting, filmmaking, etc.). If it says anything, Donald Cammell acted like a pompous dictator on the set of Performance despite being a novice filmmaker, as Anita Pallenberg remarked that the tragic auteur was “being very much a prima donna for a director who had no previous experience. He was a very difficult director to work with” and “There was lots of banging and slamming doors, that sort of thing. Sometimes he would get mad at the technical crew. He thought they were working too slowly or something like that.” Whatever the true nature of the motley crew’s work habits, it would take two years before Performance was to be released after its completion in 1968, in part due to Warner Bros dissatisfaction with the film. Cammell’s friend and longtime collaborator Frank Mazzola re-edited the film in 1970 (by then, Roeg gave up on the film and went to Australia to direct Walkabout), henceforth giving the film the fluid and fierce feel it has today and finally making it releasable in the studio’s eye.

Featuring a corrupt cocktail of gay gangsters, tripping hitmen, reclusive rock stars, androgynous men and women, and an all-around semi-psychedelic essence of decadence, Performance – much like Kenneth Anger’s Lucifer Rising (1972), which incidentally features director Donald Cammell in the role of Osiris ‘the lord of death’ – is one of few cinematic works from its time to portray its era with more than the pathetic pretense of peace and love, but also with chaos, destruction, and dissolution of all things that once were, thus signaling Aleister Crowley’s (who was like a surrogate uncle to Cammell as a young lad) prophecy of the Aeon of Horus. Essentially a film that is divided into two acts, Performance begins with the introduction of the character of Chas (James Fox) – a gangster ‘soldier’ in an East London gang modeled after the infamous real-life Kray twins led by a physically repugnant and exceedingly eccentric homosexual (Ronald “Ronnie” Kray was openly bisexual) named Harry Flowers (Johnny Shannon) – who intimidates people via violence and destruction so as to collect pay-offs for his boss. An archetypal man’s man of the stoic and unsentimental sort, Chas fancies his trade, most notably bringing absolute fear to his enemy’s souls. Naturally, things take a turn for the worst when Chas decides to disobey his boss Mr. Flowers’s order not to get involved with Joey Maddocks (Anthony Valentine) – an archenemy of the somewhat sadistic paid street fighter sort whose business his boss plans to takeover – and he fails to follow orders. Not only does Chas throw his muscle against Maddocks, but he also ends up killing him. Needless to say, Flowers and his officers decide Chas is bad for their “terrific democratic organization” which knows not to mix business and personal vendettas, so they decide they must rid themselves of the “ignorant boy...out-of-date boy.”

PERFORMANCE

Now a dual fugitive of the law and organized crime, Chas goes underground and into hiding and decides living with a wash-up rock star will be the last place his enemies would look to find him. Now calling himself "Johnny Dean" with the contrived 'artistic' occupation of being a "juggler," Chas eventually finds himself at the basement apartment which is owned by an effete, degenerate rock star Turner (Mick Jagger) who has "lost his demon," thus essentially signaling the second and final chapter of Performance. At first, Chas only meets Turner's lover Pherber (Anita Pallenberg) who gets every dime out of the crypto-gangster she can swindle, which – being a dead man walking - he is more than willing to pay. Despite paying an absurd amount for rent, Turner – who has an agile animosity for Chas – attempts to give the money back to the new tenant. Chas isn't exactly impressed with his landlord and his friends either, describing his new residence as "a right pisshole" filled with "long hair...beatniks...druggers...free love...foreigners...you name it." Despite his initial repulsion toward the renegade rock star and his lurid and lecherous lifestyle, before he knows it, Chas is quite literally penetrating Pherber and eventually comes to feel a sort of odd metaphysical and even homoerotic connection to Turner. To quickly 'cure' the fag-bashing gangster of his manly 'homophobic' tendencies, Pherber and Turner drug Chas by tricking him into eating hallucinogenic mushrooms and digging deep into his seemingly impenetrable psyche, thus unleashing his inner femme. By way of dirty drugging, uninhibited and increasingly indulgent partaking of carnal knowledge and the overall narcotizing influence of his sin-sanctifying hippie landlord's influence, Chas is physically and mentally transformed thus thrusting him into a state somewhere in between hell and nirvana and hereafter inspiring him to sleep with a boyish French girl named Lucy (Michele Breton) – who happens to be the third person in Pherber and Turner's pan-sexual ménage à trios – that he describes as a "bit underdeveloped...like a little boy" and becoming physically androgynous himself like Turner; both men eventually becoming one another's alter-egos.

Ultimately, Performance is about transformation and the unity of two individuals into one; Chas being the archetype for pure masculinity and Turner being a man in touch with both genders or as Pherber states, "man-and-female man," as a dichotomy of sexual extremes. Unlike if the film were directed today, Chas' testosterone-draining transformation is not portrayed as a purely positive thing as it inevitably leads to his assumed ruin because due to becoming more 'in touch' with his feminine side, he is drained of his masculine instincts thus rendering him inhibited and vulnerable in matters that would not have fazed him previously. Using a hardened gangster as the audacious anti-hero of Performance makes the trans-gender transfiguration all the more compelling. Written by Cammell, who despite being a lecherous ladies man who dated teenage girls while a middle-aged man, apparently dabbled in homosexuality (according to rumor, including with Mick Jagger during the making of the film), homosexuality is certainly a theme that runs throughout the entirety of Performance in various forms and guises; both subtle and self-evident. Aside from the obvious influences of Jorge Borges (especially in regard to identity crisis), the film also makes a number of references to beat queer junkie icon William S. Burroughs (Naked Lunch, The Wild Boys), including Turner's remark that, "nothing is true, everything is permitted" in reference to the novelist's mythical attribution to Nizārī Muslim Hassan-i Sabbāh and fictional hashish-taking warriors. Indeed, in Performance, "everything is permitted," but for a price most people are not willing to pay. Both Chas and Turner pay that price only for it to lead to their untimely descent. Donald Cammel also extended his hand to Lucifer for a life of debauchery and (self)destruction, thereupon leading to his death via self-sacrifice in a manner not all that different than the character he wrote and directed for Performance; no doubt the forsaken artist's finest pursuance as a filmmaker.

THE MAN WHO FELL TO EARTH
THE MAN WHO FELL TO EARTH

Nicolas Roeg (1976)

An innately idiosyncratic freak-out film that people tend to either love or hate but usually nothing in between, The Man Who Fell to Earth (1976) directed by British auteur Nicholas Roeg (Don't Look Now, Track 29) is a decidedly discordant and decadent dystopian counter-culture science fiction epic undoubtedly plagued with seemingly endless plot-holes and nauseating nonsensicalness, yet it has two things that stick out distinctly—post-Ziggy Stardust David Bowie in his first starring role during the prime of his lifetime and surrealist sci-fi special-effects that seem to fall somewhere in between the poetic body fascism of Leni Riefenstahl and a proto-cyberpunk aesthetic—thus the undeniably uneven celluloid work still has managed to gain a loyal cult following since its release. Roeg's virtual celluloid equivalent to 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) and all the more pessimistic in its depiction of the seemingly forsaken future of man and technology than Stanley Kubrick's sci-fi masterpiece, The Man Who Fell to Earth—in its incessant depiction of modern dandy Bowie drinking gin and juice and watching multiple boobtubes (while displaying little or no actual interest in real boobs)—is also probably the only science fiction work that can help inspire alcoholics and television lemmings to kick their pathetic habits as a sharply scathing indictment of the many of vices that plague modern man. Featuring not a single character who does not have some sort of physical and/or metaphysical affliction, including pathological materialism, workaholism, miscegenation, homosexuality, mindless hedonism, and virtually every other incapacitating excess imaginable, The Man Who Fell to Earth features an androgynous alien who slowly but surely learns America has everything, everything aside from a organic kultur and a soul. Somewhat loosely based on the 1963 sci-fi Walter Tevis of the same name and featuring a protagonist somewhat reminiscent of the anti-hero of Oscar Wilde's sole novel The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890) in that, despite his hyper hedonism and moral decay, he never physically ages, The Man Who Fell to Earth is a film that quite blatantly, if not beautifully, drives home the allegorical message that in America, even wealthy space aliens suffer from the distinct alienation and inner feeling of worthlessness that Americanism sows.

Both an illegal alien and a space alien, sensory sensitive extraterrestrial humanoid Thomas Jerome Newton (David Bowie), although having a passport and accent that make him seem to be of the British persuasion, has just landed on earth from the faraway planet Anthea in the hope of obtaining water as his arid desert home planet is suffering from a terrible drought that is threatening the lives of his family, which includes a wife and two kids. Mr. Newton's first act of original sin is pawning his wedding ring for a mere $20, thus soon realizing that everything in America has a price, no matter how intrinsically or sentimentally valuable to the individual. Of course, with that shiny new bill with Andrew Jackson on it, Newton will sire his technocratic empire using normal technology from his own plant, but like many things about The Man Who Fell to Earth, this is never really aptly explained or depicted. Before the viewer knows it, Newton has started his own bureaucratically titled technology company "World Enterprises Corporation" and is talking to a middle-aged nerd with monstrous bifocals, a leading patent attorney named Oliver V. Farnsworth (Buck Henry), who he offers $1000.00 an hour to work for him. Before Farnsworth knows it, he reinvents his life and embraces sodomy, buying himself a live-in muscleman and, when not working hard for Newton, dedicating his life to senseless and unfulfilling hedonism like every great and successful (and not so successful) modern American. Newton has started the company so he can build a special spaceship that will enable him to ship water to his own home planet, but a number of things get in the way, including pathological hedonism and materialism, as well as enemy corporations and weirdoes working for the U.S. government. Although a happily married man to a fellow space alien, Newton starts a rather mis-matched sub-romantic relationship with a lonely and ditzy yet empathetic housemaid named Mary-Lou (played by Candy Clark, who Roeg was romantically involved with at the time). Although literally causing her to piss her panties on first revealing to her that he is really a bald extraterrestrial with reptilian eyes, Newton barely has to put any effort into making Mary-Lou fall in love with him because, after all, he is stinking rich and is equally socially retarded as she is, but he ends up leaving her anyway. Newton also hires a lecherous college professor named Dr. Nathan Bryce (Rip Torn), who has a proclivity for banging tons of his 18-year-old freshmen female students with Electra complexes, as a fuel technician and soon he becomes the alien technology mogul's right-hand man.

Unfortunately, Dr. Bryce figures out Newton is a sneaky spaceman and tells the U.S. government, so right before the extraterrestrial is about to fly his finished spaceship to his home planet, his game plan and inter-galactic voyage is thwarted. Farnsworth and his bulky boy toy are killed after being thrown out their apartment and Newton is imprisoned in a lavish apartment hidden deep inside the bowels of a dilapidated apartment building. Meanwhile, Mary-Lou and Bryce, who have aged dramatically due to alcoholism and whatnot, are now a couple. During his vice-ridden imprisonment, government doctors subject Newton to a number of painful experiments in a feeble yet well funded attempt to find out if Newton is really an alien, but the stoic spaceman, who despite being given steady doses of alcohol refuses to loosen his lips, never reveals his secret. Somehow, Mary-Lou, who has gone from looking like semi-pretty virginal Christian girl to a dipsomaniac hag of the hysterical and Hebraic-like sort in the spirit of Joan Rivers, visits Newton while he is imprisoned and they have rough, nihilistic sex and the alien waves his cock and gun and they both drink like Irish fish, but both ultimately realize they do not love one another. Rather inexplicably, one day Newton realizes he can escape from his decadent apartment cell and merely walks out, thus hinting that his imprisonment was partially self-inflicted due to acute alcoholism and weakness for television. In the end, he records a rock album for his wife, who like his children, is assumedly dead. Filthy rich but suffering from perennial melancholy and drunkenness, Newton falls in a drunken stupor in his chair during a nice and sunny day as an alien victim of the American dream.

Regarding the Apollo 11 moon landing, scatological Jewish novelist, aesthetically-retarded Renaissance man, and attempted wife-murderer Norman Mailer, who was incidentally beaten to a bloody pulp by The Man Who Fell to Earth star Rip Torn in his own Warhol-wannabe film Maidstone (1970), wrote, "the real mission of the Wasp in history was not, say, to create capitalism, or to disseminate Christianity into backward countries...It was to get the U.S. to the moon." Additionally, Mailer wrote regarding his hatred of the Nordic race and his assumed jealousy that it was not members of his tribe that enabled man to reach outer space and the moon, but nefarious National Socialist SS technology, "To wit, he can project himself 'extraordinary distances through a narrow path. He's disciplined, stoical, able to become the instrument of his own will, has extraordinary boldness and daring together with a resolute lack of imagination. He's profoundly nihilistic. And this nihilism found its perfect expression in the odyssey to the moon—because we went there without knowing why we went." Indeed, Mailer's words certainly describe the Aryan alien played by David Bowie in The Man Who Fell to Earth in a sci-fi work that abstractly and seemingly schizophrenically portrays the American dream and space race as the drainer of all vital lifeblood. If Newton's original plan was to save his family from very probable death, his only reason for living by the intentionally anti-climatic conclusion of The Man Who Fell to Earth was to drink another fancy alcoholic cocktail, thus radically reflecting the height of sorrow and soul-destroying internal sickness that American materialism sires. A culture-less country with an intrinsic dog-eat-dog business philosophy since its inception, America is a place where idealistic dreams devolve into banal bureaucratic nightmares or so Newton learns as he yearns for something deeper and more real that money cannot buy. In fact, Newton has all the money in the world and after watching Japanese Kabuki theatre he becomes immersed in Japanophilia, even wearing the traditional Jap garb and designing his house in a similar orientalist fashion because, like the typical low-class wigger, adderall-addled autistic anime fan, and xenophiliac limp-wrist bourgeois white leftist that are quite prominent in today's America, he finds nothing of intrinsic cultural value (i.e. art, literature, and clothing) in the gloriously culturally-retarded USA and is incessantly searching for something to fill the void, including sex, drugs, rock n roll, dated films, and the fruits of ancient foreign cultures, but, of course, he learns that nothing can replace the real-thing, especially when it comes to something as organic as kultur, which American consumerism and cosmopolitanism have replaced.

As Mary-Lou states to Newton in a feeble attempt to get him to stay on planet earth, "This country is rich...we have everything," yet the sulky space-man, despite his infinite wealth, only finds endless misery after endless misery until he has totally given up on his virtuous campaign to save his family and planet, thereupon making The Man Who Fell to Earth what is very possibly the most esoterically, if not oftentimes asininely so, one of the most anti-American science fiction flicks ever made. Featuring scenes of alien Newton, who is able to live simultaneously in different time zones, seeing dirty and barbaric white settlers from America's colonial past past, The Man Who Fell to Earth even goes as far as portraying the roots of America as being sown in sin and savagery. Quite ironically, the film features a number of poetic montages of human and alien bodies in flight that were unquestionably modeled after National Socialist auteuress Leni Riefenstahl's two-part epic documentary in beauteous body worship Olympia (1940). Of course, curious cuckold auteur Nicholas Roeg, who has always shown an undying commitment to ethno-masochism and xenophilia as expressed in flirting and naked swimming sessions of a white teenage Australian girl and a black Aboriginal "noble savage" in his early work Walkabout (1971), displays a similar merry fetishism towards miscegenation in The Man Who Fell to Earth in a scene featuring a muscular and naked Negro buck man-handling his white wife, who the Sambo Übermensch has mongrel children with. Undoubtedly, if there is any true American tradition, it is the nation's history of deracinating people and destroying their culture and mixing their blood and The Man Who Fell to Earth certainly depicts such a truly postmodern scenario, where an eccentric extraterrestrial with a firm commitment to family and nation planet morphs into a alcohol-addled, TV-addicted, hyper hedonist who ultimately barely has enough energy to do much more than slouching in a desk. While The Man Who Fell to Earth might be the first and only film to fully expose David Bowie's emaciated holocaust survivor-esque body and shriveled Starman member, it doubt the film will be exciting to all those women who dreamed of the glam rocker's cock after seeing him in kitschy tight in The Labyrinth (1986) as young girls, but it an aesthetically hypnotic and out-of-this-world celluloid work that provides much rotten food for apocalyptic thought. As the great German philosopher Oswald Spengler wrote in his short work Man and Technics: A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life (1931)—one of the first critiques ever written on technology that prophesizes Occidental civilization will be destroyed by materialism and technocratic wars with opposing nations—regarding the effects of technology and the industrial revolution on European man: "As once the microcosm Man against Nature, so now the microcosm Machine is revolting against Nordic Man. The lord of the world is becoming the slave of the Machine. Their strength is bound up with the existence of coal." While I doubt Nicholas Roeg is a fan of and/or has ever written anything written by Spengler, I think the filmmaker would agree with the Teutonic thinker's thought on technology as expressed in The Man Who Fell to Earth—a patently pessimistic celluloid work where a wealthy Nordic spaceman becomes a slave to virtually every vice known to man as a result of his super sophisticated understanding of technology yet sheer and utter lack of culture, family, and a moral compass. If there is anything to be learned from watching The Man Who Fell to Earth, it is once an individual has navigated their way to the USA, it is nearly impossible for one to find their way back, at least on a spiritual level.

BAD TIMING

As far as I am concerned, anytime one happens to run into an image or deplorably mundane piece of music from a little hideous creature and Hebraic hippie like Art Garfunkel, it is most certainly a moment of “bad timing,” especially where the eyes and ears are concerned, yet to my complete and utter surprise, he actually played an interesting lead role in a striking cinematic work that is quite suited for his repugnant character. Playing the role of an American psychoanalyst who happens to be teaching young Aryans the value of subversive Jewish intellectualism in Uncle Adolf’s homeland and develops a deranged infatuation a bodacious blonde beastess, Art Garfunkel proved to a more than an apt pretentious creep in British auteur Nicholas Roeg’s sordid cinematic tale of sicko seduction Bad Timing (1980) aka Bad Timing: A Sensual Obsession. Described by an executive from its U.K. distributor Rank as “a sick film made by sick people for sick people,” Bad Timing is most certainly a brazenly bawdy and decidedly disgusting piece of celluloid about a physically and psychologically sick poindexter of the anti-Teutonic sort whose revolting airs of intellectual superiority are only matched by his seemingly psychopathic jealousy and unhealthy sexual fixation with a beauteous, if not bat-shit crazy, blonde babe who happens to be married to a Slavic slob three decades her senior. Told in the archetypically Roegian style of discordant and deconstructed nonlinear narrative via jaded jump-cuts and mesmerizing mosaic montages, Bad Timing unfolds what led a woman to commit suicide and land in a hospital after intentionally overdosing on drugs and the more bitter than sweet romance with a possessive and perturbed psychoanalyst that led to such deleterious behavior. Set in emotionally and culturally sterile Cold War era Vienna, Austria—a post-Nazi nightmare where Sigmund Freud museums stand and the ‘soul doctor’ pseudo-science of psychoanalysis is very much alive nearly a century after its blasphemous birth—Bad Timing portrays a dying Europa where the Fin de siècle of the last century as described by degeneration pioneer Max Nordau seems rather tame when compared to that of the twentieth century, where extra-European powers like the United States of America and the Soviet Union have turned Faustian man’s land into a mundane museum and vice-ridden vacation spot to be raped and pillaged, sort of like how the ‘anti-hero’ of Roeg’s film treats his fair lady.

Dr. Alex Linden (Art Garfunkel) of Bad Timing is certainly one of the most unlikable and emotionally vacant characters of film history as a pedantic yet perverse psychoanalyst/professor who respects no one and nothing aside from his own bloated ego and sterile intellect. Why a lovely yet lecherous blonde lady in her mid-20s named Milena Flaherty (Theresa Russell) sees anything attractive in Linden is quite the inexplicable mystery, but the fact she is married to an ugly, overweight Czech man named Stefan Vognic (Denholm Elliott) certainly proves she has never been a woman of refined taste in men, especially considering her affair with an arrogant American psychoanalyst will lead to a brutal near death experience after being driven to a serious suicide attempt involving the swallowing of a number of nasty narcotics. As a woman who has no problem stating such salacious things as “it’s burning my pussy,” Milena certainly sparks a certain amount of seemingly intangible life in a soulless sophisticate like Alex Linden. While the patent prick of a psychoanalyst initially finds Milena’s free-spirited behavior and sassy and aggressive sensuality to be quite liberating, it does not take Linden long to develop a uniquely unhealthy obsession with Milena, including spying on her and digging up every dirty document (he produces psychoanalytic profiles for his own personal use via American military intelligence data supplied by army psychiatrists) he can find out about her Slavic hubby, a curious cuckold if there ever was one. After a dubious night with Milena that ends in the little lady’s hospitalization after a senseless attempt at self-slaughter via drug overdose, Linden finds himself the sole suspect of foul play by an American police investigator named Netusil (Harvey Keitel), who can read through the psychoanalyst’s preposterous pretentiousness. Apparently, while suicide is not a big thing in Austria, “ravishment” aka rape is and investigator Netusil knows when and where vaginal swabs must be performed, but he finds out that getting a confession from a pernicious psychoanalyst—a man who has made a living at raping other men’s souls—proves to be a most complicated feat.

What makes Bad Timing especially interesting is the political and cultural context the film is set in. Indeed, I do not think it is a coincidence that the film takes place in Adolf Hitler’s homeland, where instead of featuring museums to the Führer and the reign of the Übermensch, museums exist dedicated to anti-Aryan Freud and degenerate artists like Gustav Klimt and Egon Schiele and untermensch Americans, Slavs, and Jews populate Vienna just as prophesized by the National Socialists. With American Hebrew Art Garfunkel—a stereotypical Jew with a Jew-fro who looks like a slightly less swarthy version of auteur Alejandro Jodorowsky—as a psychoanalyst of all who things whose trade, as demonstrated by American evolutionary psychologist Kevin MacDonald, was formed, not unlike Boasian cultural anthropology and Marxism, as a subversive Semitic intellectual movement against Western morals and Occidental civilization, in the lead role of Bad Timing, I think it is safe to say that director Nicholas Roeg was making a statement about who ultimately triumphed after the Second World War. Of course, as a man who demonstrates his curious xenophilia in Walkabout (1971), Negrophiliac race-mixing in The Man Who Fell to Earth (1976), cultural-cuckold Kabbalah fetishism in Eureka (1983), and his softspot for Yiddish geniuses in Insignificance (1985), I think it is clear that Mr. Roeg was quite satisfied with the outcome of World War II. In one especially telling scene in Bad Timing, Garfunkel’s character makes the snarky remark, “The Germans have always been very good at archives,” thus alluding to the holocaust in a cynical, self-satisfied fashion and his glaring visceral hatred of krauts. Garfunkel's character also has a couple stare downs with an Austrian Aryan doctor, who he refuses free cigarettes from (yet accepts the redneck Marlboro red cigs of an American). As the National Socialists carried out the virtuous act of expelling psychoanalytic messiah Sigmund Freud from Austria, it is not by mere chance that Garfunkel is peddling the same tawdry pseudo-science in the same place it was born and later banned. Indubitably, the most penetrating and allegorical scene in Bad Timing is when the less than homely Hebrew Garfunkel psychologically terrorizes and eventually maliciously rapes a buxom blonde beauty. After all, what could be worse timing and circumstances for an Aryan woman than to be in the hands of a psychotic Judaic stalker in Hitler's homeland after the Second World War. Indeed, holocaust saint Elie Wiesel did not include the sentence "fargvaldikh dayshe shikses" ("rape German shikses" aka "rape racially impure non-Jewish kraut women") in regard to how some of his concentration camp buddies sexually ravaged some kraut women in the original Jews-only Yiddish edition (which, of course, was taken out of the goy translations) of his novel Night (1955) for nothing.

A virtual realist fantasy flick in the spirit of Philip Roth and Herbert Marcuse for Jews and shabbos goys in its perverse portrayal of a lustful sexual savagery between a Jew psychoanalyst and Shiksa goy gal and/or a malicious psychosexual horror melodramas for bad goys and gals, Bad Timing is a positively perturbing and pessimistic anti-love story for the technocratic and bureaucratic post-national cosmopolitan age, where the decidedly degenerate art (paintings by Klimt are featured in the opening credits) and pseudo-sciences of yesteryear have, quite absurdly, been elevated to the level of the best that the West has to offer. Undoubtedly, the female lead Milena's words "Why don't you just fuck me death?" toward the end of Bad Timing certainly have more than a literal context as the Vienna portrayed in the film is inhabited by hostile rapist Jewish psychoanalysts, philistine Slavs, and exploitative Americans, which is something akin to a deadly outbreak of spiritual syphilis. With a scuzzy Semite as a leading 'man' and vomit-worthy multicultural noise from proto-hipster monkeyman Tom Waits, power poof pop group the Who, and degenerate Jazz Negress Billie Holiday in the land of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Bad Timing portrays an absurdly apocalyptic zeitgeist in European history that is as disgusting, unnatural, miscegenated, and ultimately suicidal as the romantic relationship that is perversely portrayed in the film. If there ever was an allegorical love story for the decided death of the West, Bad Timing is it.

Maybe it's because I am sometimes somewhat of a contrarian, but I have to admit that I think Eureka (1983)—an epic cinematic work that takes its name from the Edgar Allan Poe essay of the same name that was shelved for two years and would only receive sporadic theatric distribution in a handful of cities upon its release in 1985—is not only the most underrated and unjustly scorned film by British auteur Nicholas Roeg (Walkabout, The Man Who Fell to Earth), but also a masterwork and arguably the filmmaker's celluloid magnum opus that demonstrates the auteur almost achieved what so few other filmmakers have: a celluloid Gesamtkunstwerk. As analyzed by Roeg himself, "I was initially interested in a character who wanted to satisfy an all-consuming desire...that's what I want'...but when he gets it, what happens after his brief ecstatic moment? Nothing more than left over life to kill," Eureka is loosely based on the still unsolved murder of American-born British Canadian gold miner, entrepreneur, investor, and philanthropist Sir Harry Oakes, 1st Baronet, who was brutally battered and burned to death in 1943 in his lavish Bahamas-based mansion. As depicted in Eureka, many different people are suspected of wanting Oakes dead, including his son-in-law, longtime business partner, and Jewish mobster Meyer Lansky (who did not like the fact that the rich man resisted his attempts to build casinos on the Bahamas islands). As critics have noted, Eureka is essentially Roeg's thematic equivalent to Orson Welles' Citizen Kane (1941) as a work depicting a stinking rich quasi-antihero who has all the money in the world yet cannot seem to find happiness and ultimately becomes a rather bitter and lonely fellow instead. A totally unclassifiable work that star Gene Hackman stated of, "It's not an adventure story, although it has all the elements; it's not a straight mystery, although it has a lot of mystery involved in it; it's not a drama of a family, and yet it has that too. It also has a variety of locations - everything it takes to make a really interesting movie," Eureka is part action-thriller, part gangster flick/film noir, part psychoanalytic horror story, part erotically-charged forbidden romance, and part anti-murder-mystery, but most importantly, it is an allegorical odyssey about greed and its innate relation to (mis)fortune, as well as a daunting depiction of shared 'souls' between parents and progeny. Adapted by Roeg's sometimes collaborator Paul Mayersberg (The Man Who Fell to Earth, Merry Christmas Mr. Lawrence) from the book King's X (1972) aka Who Killed Sir Harry Oakes? by American lawyer/FBI agent Marshall Houts, Eureka is a seemingly nihilistic film that concludes with the protagonist's death in what Harlan Kennedy of American Cinema Papers described in 1983 as a "bizarre Walpurgisnacht," yet quite ironically the murdered protagonist ultimately gets everything he wants in the end, thus demonstrating the director's talent for deconstructing the most complex of human souls.

The first 30 minutes or so of Eureka could stand alone as its own individual film. The year is 1925 and American gold digger Jack McCann (Gene Hackman) has spent no less than 15 years searching for gold in a miserable and deadly environment that has driven weaker men to suicide (Jack watches stoically as a man literally blows his brains out). After ditching his “spawn of a Danish whore” explorer partner, Jack finds a nice little translucent rock, which he later shows to his pagan-like mistress Frieda (Helena Kallianiotis), who prophesizes regarding the rock, “this stone found you. It has your name on it. Not outside, but inside. It’s your destiny. But everybody pays. Everybody pays!” and, indeed, pay he does. A man who lives by the admirable, if not self-righteous, maxim, “I’ve never earned a nickel from another man’s sweat!” Jack ultimately falls into a mountain of gold but his mistress Frieda symbolically dies when he comes to deliver the good news. As a man who believes “gold smells stronger than a woman” and whose girlfriend states of him “with you, the gold is everything,” Jack decided long ago that material gain was more important to him than anything else, so when he obtains all the wealth in the world, he no longer has anything to truly live for as a Faustian man who was born to climb mountains but whose wealth causes him to live an uncomfortably comfortable lifestyle of laziness and luxury. Flash forward two decades later and Jack is now a married father who is essentially the unofficial king of the Bahamas. For such a rich man, Jack seems quite bitter as demonstrated by his remark “Once I had it all. Now I only have everything,” but considering his British wife Helen (Jane Lapotaire) is a ditzy dipsomaniac and his daughter Tracy (Theresa Russell) is married to a degenerate dandy named Claude Maillot Von Horn (Rutger Hauer), he has a rather hectic life where everything he loves is also the source of his stress and disillusionment with life. On top that, Jack’s business partner Charles Perkins (Ed Lauter) and two mafia bosses, Jew Mayakofsky (Joe Pesci) and Italian-American Aurelio D’Amato (Mickey Rourke), are scheming to get rid of the old ‘dinosaur’ as they have grandiose greed-driven dreams for the Bahamas that the lapsed gold digger does not agree with. Undoubtedly, Jack has the most contempt for his pretty playboy son-in-law Claude as he has not only stolen his daughter but he also wants his soul. A perennial dilettante who, despite looking more Nordic than an Arno Breker statue, dabbles in the kabbalah like some moronic Hollywood celebrity, Claude is a mirror-admiring narcissist and self-admitted coward who is morbidly envious of Jack to the point where he attempts to belittle the man and his achievements at his own dinner table, stating in front of a number of guests, “You didn’t earn the gold, Jack; you took it from nature. You raped the earth.” In the same scene, Claude demonstrates his true corrosive character by swallowing a piece of Jack’s gold, thus performing an act of reverse alchemy by turning gold into shit.

A hopeless cynic, Jack states in the company of his guests Claude, Charles Perkins, Mayakofsky, and D’Amato, “Business... Thieves among thieves... pirates stealing from each other,” thereupon figuratively digging his own grave with the sort of stoic confidence of a man who is not afraid to die. After various hostile confrontations with his adversaries, Jack is battered, blowtorched, and covered in feathers in what is undoubtedly a singularly brutal death yet quite ironically he gets what he wants in the end. With his much desired death after two decades of being incapacitated by wealth and luxury, Jack can also rest in peace knowing the wop-yid mafia has left to go somewhere to peddle their goods, his wife Helen has stopped drinking like a fish, and that Claude has been banned from the island and has left Tracy’s life forever. Indeed, while initially charged with Jack’s death, Claude is cleared of charges after his wife Tracy reveals he is too much of an indecisive coward to go to such drastic lengths as killing someone. Indeed, Tracy and her father Jack are ‘kindred spirits’ as if she is his Jungian anima and he is her animus and thus the legacy of the gold king will live on through his little girl. Naturally, Claude was too weak of a man for daddy’s girl Tracy, hence the dissolution of their relationship in the end. While Tracy loved her hubby with her whole heart just as her father put his whole heart into unearthing gold after 15 years of trying, Claude is an emotional wreck and a forsaken lost soul who will never find solace in anything, hence his pathological dilettantish dabbling in racially alien occult religious practices like kabbalah and voodoo (he takes two women, neither of whom are his wife, to a Negro voodoo orgy) and preference for nonwhites to his own people (in fact, in one scene, Jack asks Claude if the natives like him, to which he replies, “Yes. That’s true. It’s the whites who don’t like me.”). In the end, Eureka concludes somewhat euphorically with a flashback to Jack’s adventurer days, where he narrates the following words: “There’s gold, and it’s haunting and haunting. It’s luring me on as of old...and it isn’t the gold that I’m wanting...so much as just finding the gold. It’s the great big, broad land way up yonder. It’s the forest where silence has lease. It’s the beauty that thrills me with wonder. It’s the stillness that fills me with peace.”

Interestingly, Eureka concludes at the end of the Second World War, thus demonstrating a new era of multicultural American hegemony has reared its ugly mongrel face in the world. Indeed, at one point in the film, Hebraic mob boss Mayakofsky, which is a character based on real-life Judaic organized criminal Meyer Lansky, states, “So who’s not an American? Everyone is an American now. The Germans? They’re Americans. In Chicago, there’s many Germans. The Japanese... Believe me, one day, they’ll all be Americans, also. Languages. That’s all the difference. This war, what is it? It’s a war between Americans who all speak different languages, so how can we lose?,” as if he knows the days of racially homogenous nation-states are over. Of course, what Mayakofsky really means by ‘American’ is a cultureless and deracinated individual who has given up all the things that really have intrinsic value in life (i.e. art, kultur, love, tradition) for the dubious prospect of soulless material gain and nothing more epitomizes what it means to be American in the post-WWII era than the wandering Jew, who gave up his roots long ago. Somewhat bizarrely when considering his flagrant promotion of counter-culture degeneracy with Performance (1970), noble savage worship and WASP-smashing in Walkabout (1971), black-on-white miscegenation in The Man Who Fell to Earth (1976), and philo-Semitism and psychoanalysis fetishism in Bad Timing (1980), Roeg claims he was accused of anti-Semitism due to a scene in Eureka in which protagonist Jack asks his son-in-law Claude if he is “a yid.” In an interview with American Cinema Papers, Roeg responded to these claims with the following: “At the dinner early in the film, Claude is wearing this shirt with cabalistic signs on it, flaunting this rather cleverer-than-thou image. And at one point, after they’ve talked about the five points of wisdom in the Cabala, McCann says ‘And the sixth is bullshit.’ And he goes on, ‘There’s only one Golden Rule. Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. The rest is conversation.’ Well, people have come up to me and said ‘Oh, anti-Semitic!’ and this, that, and the other. Well, when Jack says that he’s actually quoting straight from the center of the Talmud: ‘There’s only one Golden Rule’ the Talmud says: ‘Do unto others,’ and then it ends, ‘The rest is commentary.’” thus demonstrating the filmmaker’s somewhat obfuscated solidarity with god’s chosen tribe.

In the same interview with American Cinema Papers, Roeg remarked, “One reason the film isn’t a murder thriller...is that McCann doesn’t die. That’s to say, what he is, what he represents is absolutely continued in Tracy.” Undoubtedly, what makes this especially interesting is that the character of Jack lives on through a daughter and not a son, as it is symbolic of white WASP male decline and the rise of feminism, not to mention multiculturalism (as represented by the Sicilian and Jewish mafia bosses). Indeed, the character of Jack, who literally climbed mountains to achieve his nihilistic dream yet is not happy upon achieving it, epitomizes European ‘Faustian’ man to an almost a stereotypical degree and thus can be seen as a symbol of the so-called ‘old dead white man’ aka the original American (and world) elite. Of course, the character of dandy Claude—a proto-counter-culture type who suffers from xenophilia and senseless hedonism, not to mention lack of true identity, purpose, and testicular fortitude—is symbolic of the postmodern ‘progressive’ pussy white man. Undoubtedly, judging solely by the themes of his films alone, I think auteur Nicholas Roeg has the most in common with the character Claude, although his adventurous filmmaking career certainly demonstrates he has much in common with Faustian man Jack. After all, only a true son of Europe (not to mention a man who used to work as a cinematographer for old school celluloid epic maestro David Lean) could have assembled a film so laboriously ambitious as Eureka and I am not the least bit surprised that the money-grubbing studio bosses at MGM/UA found the film too esoteric for the masses.

INSIGNIFICANCE

Nicholas Roeg (1985)

In a sense, virtually all of English counter-culture auteur Nicholas Roeg's films are 'failures,' but, at the very least, most of them make interesting failures due to the director's propensity for taking risks and experimenting with narrative structures, complex themes, morality, etc. Unfortunately, Roeg is not simply a rogue filmmaker, but also an unrepentant leftist, cinematic deconstructionist and cubist, and dubious weirdo who had an obsession with seeing his then-wife Theresa Russell cinematically murdered, molested (by a horrid Heeb like Art Garfunkel no less!) and/or mutilated on the silver screen and who has displayed a nauseating knack for xenophilia and 'noble savage' fetishism as depicted in Walkabout (1971), a perturbing admiration for Freudian psychoanalysis and ardent Philo-Semitism in Bad Timing: A Sensual Obsession (1980), and a seething hatred for American/Southern whites in Track 29 (1988), thus making the director the product of a degenerate and largely ethno-masochistic zeitgeist. Of course, I was not surprised to learn that Roeg hates Joseph McCarthy, loves and empathizes with Albert Einstein, and has a sort of feminist revisionist opinion of the more tragic and sad than titillating and sexy Marilyn Monroe as depicted in his work Insignificance (1985). Of course, seeing as the film was based on a screenplay/play written by British dramatist Terry Johnson, who was inspired to write the play after learning that an autograph of Albert Einstein was among Marilyn Monroe's possessions at the time of her premature death, one cannot simply give Roeg all the credit for the incendiary ideas/scenes featured in his film Insignificance, set in New York City in 1954, dramatizing a fictional interaction between American icons Marilyn Monroe, Joseph McCarthy, Joe DiMaggio, and Albert Einstein, who are never mentioned by name but are simply called The Actress, The Senator, The Ballplayer, and The Professor as their uncontested popularity makes even mentioning their names rather insignificant as their popular public personas as icons have transcended them as sort of American archetypes that were born in a cultureless nation following the prosperity of the nation as a result of victory during the Second World War. A sort of sardonic yet ultimately apocalyptic black comedy that shows what happens when culturally and politically diametrical American cultural bigwigs bump heads, Insignificance is an innately iconoclastic yet ultimately 'politically correct' work that attempts to connect the past to the present by presenting the 1950s, like the 1980s when the film was made, as a 'reactionary' time fueled by materialism, philistine celebrity worship, mass-mindedness, and anti-communist 'witch hunts.' As someone who considers Marilyn Monroe nothing more than 'Hebrew Hollywood's greatest whore' and superstar Shiksa who did more to ruin the reputation of blonde women (despite being a natural redhead) than Nazi propaganda would, considers Einstein a cousin-copulating racist zionist who convinced FDR to work on the atom bomb so Germany could be wiped out and whose contributions to mankind were ultimately more negative than positive, and that Joseph McCarthy was right, if not ineffective, I found Insignificance to be a sometimes interesting cinematic experiment riddled with left-wing clichés, obnoxious overacting, and artistic pretensions, but nonetheless an interesting experiment in celluloid quasi-esoterism.

It is 1954 and tons of horny men have gathered outside to see the naughty bits of an actress (Theresa Russell), presumably Marilyn Monroe, in what will prove to be the iconic scene from Billy Wilder's aesthetically deplorable and insanely overrated Freudian farce The Seven Year Itch (1955) where the seemingly half-retarded female protagonist's dress is blown up in a manner that seems nothing less than absurdly orgasmic. Naturally, the Actress' husband, The Ballplayer (Gary Busey), who is clearly modeled after Joe DiMaggio, is irked by the fact that virtually every man in American will be able to see the same unclad legs that are supposed to be his and his only. Meanwhile, a nauseatingly neurotic yet equally narcissistic Jewish scientist that goes by 'The Professor' (Michael Emil), who is clearly modeled after Albert Einstein—horrendous Heeb-fro and all—is minding his own business solving math problems when an absolutely heinous and barbaric fellow that goes by the name 'The Senator' (Tony Curtis, who starred along side the real Marilyn Monroe in Billy Wilder's Some Like It Hot (1959)), who is clearly a conspicuously crude caricature of Joseph McCarthy, shows up and demands that the poor and innocent Hebraic sage go before a committee to investigate his very probable communist-related activities. Of course, The Professor turns The Senator down and not long later the Semitic scholar receives a visit from the ostensibly Aryan Actress. To his shock, The Actress is no shit-for-brains Shiksa but a startlingly smart seductress who is able to give an almost vaudevillian demonstration of the Theory of Relativity via toy cars, soldier figurines, flashlights, and balloons. Despite being married to a belligerent Guido, The Actress is apparently a sapiosexual and admits to The Professor in an amorous manner that he is at the top of the list of people that she would like to share carnal knowledge with. While The Professor is eventually convinced to have sex with The Actress, he is completely cockblocked when The Ballplayer, who wants to talk to his wife about their marriage, shows up. Of course, The Professor realizes that he is no match for the martial prowess, so he changes rooms and meets an 'Uncle Tom' Cherokee Indian Elevator man (played by Will Sampson of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1975) fame) who claims he is no longer a Cherokee because he watches too much television, but that the scientist is because his Theory of Relativity is similar to some ancient and arcane Indian belief. While The Actress and The Ballplayer discuss their dubious marriage, the baseball maverick has already fallen asleep when his wife tells him that she thinks she is pregnant. The next morning, The Senator, who is revealed to be sexually impotent in the typically Hollywood Freudian fashion, arrives to The Professor's hotel room, only to discover The Actress laying stark naked in a daze in the bed. Being an evil reactionary anti-communist, The Senator threatens to expose The Professor and The Actress, who he mistakes for a hooker, and even punches the little lady in the stomach, thus causing the superstar to have a miscarriage. Eventually, The Professor arrives and sees The Senator stealing his papers. Instead of allowing the Senator to have them, The Professor throws all his research out of the window and the politician finally accepts defeat and leaves. After discussing her marital problems with The Professor, The Ballplayer learns from his wife that their marriage is over. Of course, The Professor has worse things to worry about than The Ballplayer as he knows he is indirectly responsible for a bunch of Japs getting nuked during the Second World War, hence his constant looking at his broken watch, which is stopped at 8:15 a.m. (the time when the Americans dropped the nuke "Little Boy" on Hiroshima), and being h by hallucinations of Nazis and scorched Japs throughout Insignificance. Sensing his glaring guilt, The Actress finally bitches enough at The Professor for him to admit his feeling of responsibility for the nuking of Germany. At 8:15 a.m., he has a vision of a nuke covering The Actress and the hotel room in flames. In the end, the personal problems, as well as the iconic legacies, of The Actress, The Senator, The Ballplayer, and The Professor seem rather petty and insignificant.

While most of the characters featured in Insignificance seem like crude caricatures, director Nicholas Roeg and writer Terry Johnson did their damndest to deconstruct these world famous 1950s American icons and portray them as individuals plagued with pestering personal problems just like everyone else, thus demystifying them in the process yet paradoxically adding to their 'mythos.' Of course, despite being a consistently experimental filmmaker, Roeg follows in the grand Hebraic Hollywood tradition of cinematically canonizing Albert Einstein and odiously obliterating Joseph McCarthy as if these softcore commie cinematic clichés were not infectious enough. Personally, I have always had nil interest in the American cultural icons featured in Insignificance and find baseball, Hollywood pseudo-divas and Playboy models, democratic politicians, and 'eccentric' Jewish scientists to be exceedingly dull symptoms of the contrived and ultimately worthless non-culture of America and that, as an ex-colony, the United States of America, never nor will ever have the great artists, divas, statesmen, philosophers, and poets Europa once had. If one were to rate America's history, especially within the past century, in context, within world history, it would barely even warrant a footnote. Of course, America's sole claim to fame is the atom bomb, which was largely the creation of German-Jewish minds who were kicked out of the Fatherland, which Insignificance alludes to when The Professor's sailboat is destroyed by a bunch of naughty Nazi brownshirts. Like Italian maestro Luchino Visconti's penultimate work Conversation Piece (1974) aka Gruppo di famiglia in un interno, Insignificance is undoubtedly a rather idiosyncratic and underrated chamber piece among the filmmaker's larger cinema oeuvre. Of course, like virtually all of Roeg's films, Insignificance suffers from its outmoded and now anachronistic leftist 'revolutionary' pretensions, as if some jaded Judaic jackass like Bill Maher or Jon Stewart shit in the director's brain. Still, to see abortion-addict Norma Jean's dress in flames and bosom covered in blood, as well as Einstein's pathological guilt over being largely responsible for contributing to one of the most deleterious inventions in human history, makes Insignificance worthy of the admission price, even if the film itself is largely insignificant in itself in its overall influence on cinema history.

Nicholas Roeg (1988)

Out of all of his many experimental and distinctive auteur works, Nicholas Roeg's drama-fantasy-horror hybrid Track 29 (1988) is very possibly the English filmmaker's most singular, inscrutable, and artistically ambiguous work, even if it is his least technically innovative. Co-produced by George Harrison of The Beatles fame and penned by English screenwriter Dennis Potter, Track 29 takes an outsider (aka liberal Brit) look at a small American Southern town in a most contemptuous and unflattering way. Starring Roeg's cat-eyed ex-wife Theresa Russell (Eureka, Insignificance) in the lead role, Track 29 is a work centering around a mentally-unstable and under-sexed alcoholic housewife named Linda Henry who receives a surprising visit from a young eccentric British hitchhiker named Martin (played by Gary Oldman) who purports to be the son she reluctantly put up for adoption as a scared teenager. Fed up with her pretentious yet eccentric philandering surgeon husband Henry (played by Christopher Lloyd) – who has a peculiar duel fetish for masochistic spankings and model trains – Linda begins to embrace the loony leprechaun of a man that is apparently her long lost sole progeny, but unfortunately for her, he may be only a figure of her distorted imagination. While her hubby Henry is off getting routine spankings at work from his beak-nosed mistress nurse Stein (played by a young yet still considerably repulsive Sandra Bernhard), Linda enters the mysterious world of incestuous family bonding with her man-child son; a hyperactive and high-strung lad who feels that being a coddled grown-up toddler is an ideal career move. Noticeably scarred by his abandonment as a child, Martin inevitably has a terrible temper-tantrum and takes out his pent up rage on Henry and his extravagant model train set in this extremely loose reworking of Oedipus Rex.

It should be apparent to most viewers of Track 29 that Nicholas Roeg is not exactly sympathetic towards the inhabitants of the small Southern town that he depicts in the film. In fact, not a single character in the entirety of Track 29 is remotely likable. One can only assume that Roeg was pompously sneering at the fictional degenerate confederate Anglo-Americans characters that he so brazenly concocted throughout the production of Track 29. Many of the characters and scenarios played out in the Track 29 would be at home in David Lynch's Twin Peaks. Indeed, I would go so far as to say that Track 29 is a work that is probably more of interest to Lynch lovers than fans of Roeg's previous work. Although missing Roeg's signature choppy deconstructed narrative montages, Track 29 does feature a couple Lynchian flashbacks that scream rustic surrealism and oddball clodhopper perversity, which is undoubtedly the English filmmaker's prejudiced vision of the American South. Right from the get go of Track 29, it is most apparent that Linda is the no longer desired trophy wife of her intellectually superior husband Henry; a man whose sense of superiority over his spouse is quite glaring to the point where he barely sees the need to conceal his preference for toy trains and his less than homely Hebraic mistress. Linda, being of a more conventional sexuality, fantasies about her Daddy but eventually settles for her overly sensitive son; a fellow who is quite conscious and equally vocal about his overwhelming Oedipus complex. Only through her son (whether he be real or imaginary) can Linda expel the "inner demons" of her fragile mind and rid herself of a soulless man who sees her as nothing more than blatantly inferior aesthetically-pleasing white trash. Despite the mostly obnoxious and otherwise loathsome nature of the main characters in the film, I was reasonably impressed with all of the lead performances featured in Track 29. I tend to think of Theresa Russell as a savvy and sophisticated seductress so it was nice to see her play against character as a psychosis-ridden philistine with a self-destructive drinking problem. Additionally, I have always found Christopher Lloyd's iconic character roles in the Back to the Future trilogy and The Addams Family films to be patently exasperating, so I certainly welcomed the unwavering chutzpah and gross infidelity of his character in Track 29. Of course, out of all the performances featured in the film, Gary Oldman deserves the most praises for his willingness to hop on Christopher Lloyd whilst au naturel, on top of acting like an all-around retarded rug rat throughout Track 29.

At the conclusion of Track 29, many questions are left unresolved; hence the general mixed feelings towards the film among Nicholas Roeg fans and general viewers alike. For me, Track 29 is an abominable portrait of Americana that keeps on giving with subsequent viewings due to its lack of resolve and overall incoherence. Whether Track 29 is a dream-within-a-dream, a series of alcohol-induced illusions, and/or a semi-surreal depiction of reality is up for speculation, but I certainly consider the overwhelming ambiguity of the film's storyline to be one of its finest assets. After all, being that Track 29 is an intemperate celluloid psychodrama of sorts that depicts the lifelong trauma a woman suffers from after being brutally deflowered by a bestial carnay, one can only expect a certain amount of rationality for such a work. It should be noted that Martin himself takes on the appearance (even featuring the same trashy Mother tattoo sprawled across his chest) and wardrobe of his hillbilly father, who he actually meets while hitchhiking during the beginning of Track 29. For Linda, Martin is a dichotomous symbol for her greatest dreams and worst nightmares; the son of the man who would not stop when she said "no" during sex, but also the man that gave her carnal pleasure and her only child. It is only when she comes to terms with these conflicting emotions via Martin that she can move on with her life. Needless to say, I think that rape victims should approach Track 29 with the utmost caution.

FEAR X
FEAR X

Nicolas Winding Refn (2003)

I have a strong belief that for every person, there is that "one" film. One to define your personality and you understand thoroughly that this film is indeed a visualization of your characteristics. Sort of like soul mates, except not as homosexual. For me, that film is Fear X. Don't let the title deceive you like it has hundreds of thousands of people. Fear X to me, is pure ripened sadness, billowing from every molecule existing on each frame.

John Turturro plays a lonely security guard who is past the point of insanity. After his loving wife is killed in a random incident, Turturro pours over surveillance tapes trying to piece together the events. The striking determination is enough to get under your skin and grasp your arteries. While mainly being a film about redemption, it has a potent mixture of hyper-voyeurism. Nicolas Winding Refn is a Danish director who filmed Fear X after writing some ideas for television shows and directing gangster films. Fear X is the box office flop that was beat out by the latest Scary Movie spoof. Due to the huge failure of getting any revenue, Refn's company Jang Go Star went bankrupt, killing all chances for another decent film. Fear X is prone to negative remarks from critics but it is all up to you. Perhaps in another life, I might even mock this film. On a personal note, I might add that Fear X had a bizarre effect on me. When I first found the film, it was at a video store, lying in a box for unloved DVD's without cases. I promptly took it home to leave it sit in a binder until I finally decided to watch it due to a friend's recommendation. Within the first 15 minutes I was sobbing hysterically. Unbeknownst to me, this desperate feeling of paranoia would only increase, granting the film Fear X the title of a personal emotional roller coaster. David Lynch's biggest success, Blue Velvet, is known for its keen and vibrant uses of the color Blue and how it manages to cause the normally "cool" color to leave a stain on you. Fear X has a very similar effect, but with the color Red. While red normally has a warm feeling, even being related to blood, it lacks all these happy sensations. Refn's use of red causes your eyes to glaze over leaving you with the utmost urgency to finish this film and "get the hell out of there" Several features of the film really make it stand out. One being that the film was shot in chronological order, as in, the beginning was shot first and the ending was filmed last, and two being the ending. Rather than having an ending that features a plausible outcome, the director decides to go with an entirely open ending, allowing whatever your mind has built up to create a whole world involving the situations and characters. Fear X isn't perfect, nor is it an auteur's work, but it is a masterpiece of blistering emotions. What else would you expect from a screenplay penned by Hubert Selby Jr.?

BRONSON

Nicolas Winding Refn (2008)

In Charlie Bronson's world, pain does not exist as either a hindrance nor pleasure. It exists as madness, pure and concentrate. Nicolas Winding Refn's latest film is a hybrid of a surreal arthouse piece combined with a biopic that is as short-lived as Bronson's time out of the bird. Long since have I seen Refn's previous effort titled Fear X and had you read my review of the film, you'd recall that film forcing tears from my face at a mere 15 minutes in. But the rumors of his company's bankruptcy made me feel as if it were the end of his short-lived yet illustrious filmmaking career. After I heard the title Bronson being circulated through the gossip mill, I thought to myself "Who'd want to see a film about Charles Bronson?" Not to knock his acting credentials or anything but the man seems hardly fitting for anything I'd love to experience through a visual third-person art piece. The term art is also applied very loosely, gentlemen. After reading who the director was, my heart skipped a beat and I soon endeavored into a film other than Die Hard that made me want to walk outside, inhale a deep breath of fresh, free air and punch someone in their fucking face. Welcome, folks, to the demoniac composure of Bronson. Bronson follows an infamous prisoner named Mickey Peterson who, after robbing a post office and initially receiving 7 years in prison, blows his short time behind bars into an overwhelming 34 years locked away, eventually becoming a victim of his own aggravated insanity. This berserk powerhouse of insane glee has given way for the near perfect portrait of creative liberties with an identity and a stunning and successful enactment to get inside of the mind of an unstable, hyper-violent machine. Buzz on the street even leads to a potential Academy nod for Tom Hardy's breakout performance. From RocknRolla's queer to Bronson's machismo statue, Hardy's turnover as our troublemaker at least deserves him some critical status and to be completely fair, it would seem much of Hardy's influence on mannerisms is a mix of the real Charlie Bronson and Daniel Plainfield's character in There Will Be Blood. Note the scene in which he responds to an attempted hostage negotiation with "What have you got?!" The similar demeanor, head shudder, and tone bring Daniel Day-Lewis' character specifically to mind, although I could be mistaken. A notion recently brought to mind, most "bloggers" don't really understand the nature of the film they're viewing nor do they grasp the fact that this film is presented through the mind of someone who is not all "together" up there. A Current.TV film review chronicles the scattered thoughts of video bloggers and manipulated women alike. Such thoughts as "not a complete biopic" and "bad pacing" were some of but the few complaints against this film. Granted, every film is magnetic towards harsh criticism but if anything, only the male nudity could be lashed at as seen by the opening weekend pour out of Watchmen reviews. The pacing in Bronson was set at a remarkably fast and efficient speed that, by the end of the scene, you're left wanting more. Remember kids, Bronson isn't a godforsaken miniseries. It's a two-hour feature length presentation without the desire to bore with more than bargained for. Another waived the fact that the picture is "indie" and expressed a contempt for the operatic violence while referencing the notion that Refn "must have seen A Clockwork Orange!" Wow, bitch, way to read back Damien McSorely's quote directly from the theatrical trailer. Vile and spiteful cynicism aside, the film contains nothing akin of Kubrick's "best," as there is nary a scene of rehabilitation in sight nor is there any morals dictated other than madness rules all in it's own kingdom. Visually, Bronson is an arresting feat in starched and rusted masculinity with a raw contemptuous anger for authority. Refn must have a deep chip on the shoulder for creating such a maniacal fit of renegade filmmaking that even only begins to humanize such a monster. and in the meantime making him one of recent cinema's most beloved starring character. It's generally safe to say that tight and taut editing and brilliant palettes of blood and bruises make Bronson the only quintessential biopic but not only within the characters deeds, the entire tale is weaved masterfully. Whether to thank the fantastic storytelling or the ability to create an unofficial Problem Child 3: Goes to Prison is beyond me. If anything, I congratulate Refn for creating an icon purely consisting of utter destruction - a masculine tornado of whose virility is untouched in any way, shape or form. It doesn't even matter which badge you carry. Finally, a villain of which you can safely root for. Armed with a violent nature one can appreciate, Bronson maims the competition as being fiercely watchable. In fact, I haven't been able to re-watch a film in some time but Bronson has me viewing this film over & over again as I introduce new people of Refn's more accessible masterpieces. Bronson certainly didn't leave me sobbing like Fear X did, but Bronson is more of an intimate film. That's surprising to even my self. I haven't seen the lauded Pusher trilogy but knowing my past with his works and how deeply they've touched me in many-a-clever emotion, I'm sure I can find something personal to adore about it (them.) Bronson is the "indie" classic to end all classics. Now I'm sure I won't think this when another gem comes along but as it stands, Bronson is one of the only films that make potential homicide look thrilling and admissible as an everyday activity in physical vulgarity. A hay maker for critics, this is one motion picture that won't leave my head for sometime.

VALHALLA RISING

I do not think it would be an exaggeration for me to say that Valhalla Rising (2009), directed by Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn, is the greatest Odiniſt film that has ever been made. Unlike the multicultural-sensitive and blasphemously cartoonish Marvel Comics movie Thor (2011), Valhalla Rising is an anti-pacifiſt masterpiece that is lavishly ſteeped in the old Nordic Odinic religion. The protagonist of the film is One-Eye, who like the Germanic God Odin, is missing an eye. Also like Odin, One-Eye displays a keen affinity for war, battle, victory and death as his life revolves around these things, even as he tragically meets his untimely but prophetic demise. Valhalla Rising can also be seen as a metaphorical portrayal of the birth of Chriſtianity and the death of Odin in ancient Europa. After escaping and killing a group of men who forced him to fight-to-the-death other captured men, Odin meets up with a degenerate Männerbund of hopelessly holy Chriſtian Crusaders who are sailing for the homeland of their alien Chriſt; Jerusalem, but inſtead they land in the New World; the Americas. It is immediately apparent upon their initial meeting that, despite being members of the same race, One-Eye and the Crusaders are of a wholly different nature as the band of Chriſtians display nothing short of weary and wimpy behavior when around the unpredictable Heathen Cyclops One-Eye; a man who may have one unflinching eye but seems to have ten more in the back of his all-ſeeing head. As Valhalla Rising progresses, it is all too apparent that Chriſtianity has severely pacified the blond beaſt Crusaders of the film. Whereas One-Eye is a beſtial barbarian whose inſtinſts are fully intact, the Crusaders display a sort of incertitude and deracination that is moſt certainly the result of adopting an alien religion that is at odds with their forefather's religion of battle and war. Although Odin apparently ſacrificed himſelf for himſelf, Jeſus Chriſt (as mentioned by a Crusader in the film) ſacrificed himſelf for all of humanity. In Valhalla Rising, the Crusaders sheepiſhly become the victims of Amerindians yet One-Eye proves to hold his own, until ſomething changes his mind and he takes an unexpected path.....

In many regards, Valhalla Rising is an anti-action-adventure flick as it is a work that is recognized for its breaking of redundant genre conventions, moſt notably due to its artful and atmospheric prowess and its ſtatic yet ſtrangely unpedantic pacing. Simply put, Valhalla Rising is an oh-so unfortunately rare thinking man's action-adventure film, thus it will moſt likely leave your typical alcoholic American football fan in an even more drunken ſtupor of hopeless bewilderment and reſtleſs agitation. Although the film may not include as many battles and bloody corpses as Zach Snyder's abſurdly overrated work 300 (2007), Valhalla Rising is ultimately a more visceral and brutal work that – like the ancient Germanic barbarians – takes no prisoners. Also, unlike 300, Valhalla Ris- ing – despite its various bloodstained dream sequences – has a truly organic feel that makes it stand eminent over its superfluous CGI-stylized contemporaries. The themes featured in Valhalla Rising are more in tune with nature and the “law of the claw,” thus the film makes for a truly unique cinematic experience that the world has not seen since the films of the Third Reich. In Valhalla Rising, the Crusaders who follow anti-organic Christian laws fall prey to their theological pacifism while One-Eye – a man who still “feels” the Odiniist paganism of his ancestors – seems to be invincible. One-Eye can even be seen in Valhalla Rising staring at a Crusader-made crucifix with a smirk. To One-Eye, the cross is nothing more than a false idol that has no more intrinsic value to him than an opera by Richard Wagner has to a crack-smoking and 40 oz.-chugging rapper.

The conclusion of Valhalla Rising – not unlike Ingmar Bergman's The Virgin Spring (1960) – can be seen as a symbolic metaphor for the death of Odinic German paganism in Europe. When One-Eye – like Jesus Christ – sacrifices himself for someone other than himself, he also takes the religion of his ancestors with him into oblivion. After all, Gods and religions only die when the adherent of these beliefs are no more but it has also been stated reputable psychologists that these religions are passed on (albeit dormant) through the blood of ancestors. In Swiss psychoanalyst C.G. Jung's essay Wotan (aka Odin), he theorized that the spirit of Odin continues to slumber in the collective unconscious of all Germanic peoples, stating of Germans during the first half of the twentieth century, “But what is more than curious -- indeed, piquant to a degree -- is that an ancient god of storm and frenzy, the long quiescent Wotan, should awake, like an extinct volcano, to new activity, in a civilized country that had long been supposed to have outgrown the Middle Ages. We have seen him come to life in the German Youth Movement, and right at the beginning the blood of several sheep was shed in honour of his resurrection. Armed with rucksack and lute, blond youths, and sometimes girls as well, were to be seen as restless wanderers on every road from the North Cape to Sicily, faithful votaries of the roving god.” Jung believed that the National Socialist revolution in Germany was an atavistic awakening of Wotan in the German populous and that every so often, the rouse of the old pagan gods was only nature, adding “If we apply are admittedly peculiar point of view consistently, we are driven to conclude that Wotan must, in time, reveal not only the restless, violent, stormy side of his character, but, also, his ecstatic and mantic qualities -- a very different aspect of his nature. If this conclusion is correct, National Socialism would not be the last word. Things must be concealed in the background which we cannot imagine at present, but we may expect them to appear in the course of the next few years or decades. Wotan's reawakening is a stepping back into the past; the stream was dammed up and has broken into its old channel.” Although One-Eye sacrifices himself for the life of another, he does so in an honorable manner by allowing himself to be killed in battle, thus securing a position in Valhalla; the heavenly “hall of the slain” that Odin reigns over. To the ancient Germanic peoples, sins (in the Christian sense) like rape, pillaging, and murder were considered nothing short of honorable. Throughout Valhalla Rising, One-Eye sneers at the Christian Crusaders in a most sinister but deserving manner. In his mind, by killing these passive Christians, he is altruistically giving them a sense of honor that they are indubitably undeserving of.

Recently, a class action lawsuit was taken against FilmDistrict, the distributor of the film Drive (2011), by a soulless and philistine wench due to her exceedingly petty and pathetic belief that the film’s trailer is misleading, the film features very little driving/chase scenes, and that it promotes violence against Jewish people. I am sure that this disgruntled money-siphoning she-bitch would be even more angered if she were to watch Drive director Nicholas Winding Refn’s previous film Valhalla Rising; a work that pisses on the scrolls of the Hebraic Judeo-Christian religions and the very weak and meek kind of society that she is symbolic of. Needless to say, such class action lawsuits would be nothing short of an absurdity in a world where Odin reigns. With the transvaluation of all values and destruction of a master morality that formed in Europe via the slave-morality of Christianity came a lamentable “taming of the blond beast.” Although disguised as a mere Viking action-adventure film, Valhalla Rising portrays this suicidal change in a somewhat subtle manner. Through Christianity eventually came the liberal humanism that is now common in the Occident today. If modern Germanic peoples continue to uphold these deracinating and apocalyptic self-destructive trends, they can expect to meet a similar fate to that of One-Eye when he passively offers himself to hostile Amerindians. Aside from being an exquisite work of bloody martial art, Valhalla Rising features an important Odinic philosophy of the warrior spirit that can only bring strength to the post-Christianized Europoid. Set to a score of ambient noise, Valhalla Rising, like a religious ceremony, is first and foremost, a work that is meant to be felt and wholly embraced by the viewer. If any film can inspire a person or a collective to go on the Wild Hunt, it is Valhalla Rising.

THE WOODSMAN

Nicole Kassell (2004)

I have been waiting for a while to see Hollywood release a film empathetic towards pedophiles and similar ilk. Unless I am mistaken and they have done it before, it seems that The Woodsman is a new all-time low for the Freudians of Sunset Boulevard. Unsurprisingly, the star Pedo of the film is Kevin Bacon, a role he has played before in Sleepers, although this time he seems he enjoys little girls instead of little boys. Not since Patrick Swayze's role in Donnie Darko has there been a actor better suited for the role of scum of the earth. A film like The Woodsman just makes me wonder what Hollywood's ultimate goal is with their undermining of traditional values and Western social norms. They have already brainwashed most American's into thinking flooding America with uneducated savages as the height of humanistic altruism. They have already convinced white women it's best to abort their own child because nothing is better and more important than a career. Most importantly, Hollywood has taught us to always use animalistic empathy and sentimentalism instead of the intellect. After all, how else could any thinking person swallow the crock of cultural Marxist scheid that Hollywood is selling? With The Woodsman, Hollywood wants you to know that not all child molesters are bad guys. Of course, The Woodsman was directed by a female director, Nicole Kassell, who probably felt the film to be an exercise in female empowerment. The lead anti-hero (or whatever he is supposed to be) Walter, played Kevin Bacon, is a pathetic man who gives the appearance of being a victim more than being a victimizer. Right from the beginning, director Kassell wants us to sympathize with this kiddo-phile ex-con. After all, he was probably a victim of more than one experiences of prison sodomy. Walter's only friend (Carlos) when he gets out of prison is a Latino, a member of a group especially known for their enjoyment of their own daughters (or at least according to a Cop I know in a certain Latino infested area). Carlos also happens to be married to Walter's sister. Walter was the only person in his family to promote his sister partaking in miscegenation with his beaner best friend and for that Carlos owes him one. Walter's own sister won't see him, but the Mexican banging his sister (who shot out Mestizo half-castes) like a piñata, does. Talk about family matters. A Member of the Concerned Black Men of America Who are the are the heroes of the urban wilderness of The Woodsman? Try a noble a Negro and Negress, who have a special knack for protecting the world from white pedophiles. Rappers Mos Def and Eve play the roles of the most concerned individuals in the fight against Walter and his knew found freedom. Mos Def plays a cop, who despite his flimsy build, likes to make threats at the even flimsier Walter. Eve plays a co-worker/secretary who has a super Negro spiritual ability of sniffing out stinking pedos. Hollywood truly is a place of dreams and fantasy where upside down casting is begotten just right. But then again, a morally dubious mulatto messiah is supposed to save the world in real-life. I guess “art” really does imitate life, but I think in the case of Hollywood it’s the other way around. Hollywood defecates out an image and expects the naïve public to accept those destructive ways as normal, desirable, and ideal. If the Hollywood studio system was wiped out and replaced with something of value, the Western world would no doubt start healing instantaneously. The Woodsman in the Woods catching Wood By the end of the film, Walter becomes a “hero” of sorts. Due to his child molester psychology, he is able to sniff out others like himself. Walter decides that it is one thing to molest little girls, but molesting little boys is just going too far. Mos Def makes it known subtly that he approves of Walter’s criminal justice and by the end of The Woodsman, the world is a better place. Looking around online, it is apparent the majority of critics see The Woodsman as a spectacular piece of groundbreaking social cinema. Of course, it is obvious the reason for the great reviews is that The Woodsman offered the public an emotional rollercoaster of triumph in the name of “prejudice” and a promise of hope. Surely, not many people that viewed the film actually took the time to think analytically about what they just watched and what message it gives. The American public would rather stay in the childish woods of sentiment and fantasy.

VISIONS OF ECSTASY
VISIONS OF ECSTASY

Nigel Wingrove (1989)

With the Halloween season in full swing (or at least it was when I first started writing this review), it is naturally time for countless grown women who dream of purchasing silicone tits to celebrate by dressing in slutty nun costumes, which is something I do not quite understand, at least as far as the uniquely unsexy religious sister garb is concerned. Indeed, maybe it is because I did not have the blessing of being raised in the Catholic faith but I have never had an innate understanding of the fetishistic obsession with nuns and the eroticization of Catholic iconography in general, especially since virtually all of the nuns that I have encountered in real-life looked quite homely and seemed like latent lesbians, asexual, or childish. Of course, judging by the cinematic works of various auteur filmmakers ranging from Luis Buñuel to Jesús Franco to Walerian Borowczyk to George Kuchar to Werner Schroeter, there is no denying that Catholicism seems to sexually warp certain people that are brought up in the faith (after all, when an adult, especially an authority figure, tells a child not to do something, it just makes the kid want to do it even more). From personal experience, I can say without hesitation that one of the most sexually voracious girls that I have ever dated was a chick from such a strict traditional Catholic background that her parents forbid her from watching PG-rated movies. Somewhat curiously, despite being brought up as an atheist by his seemingly extremely liberal-minded parents, British auteur, underground media mogul, and quasi-pornographer Nigel Wingrove (Sacred Flesh, Satanic Sluts series) developed a lifelong fetish for naughty nude nuns that is quite apparent from the films he directs as well as the Euro-sleaze classics that he distributes via his film distribution company Redemption Films (which was founded in 1993 and later relaunched in 2012 in association with Kino Lorber of all companies). In fact, when Wingrove had the opportunity to see 17th-century Italian Baroque sculptor Gian Lorenzo Bernini's masterwork Ecstasy of Saint Teresa—a statue depicting Roman Catholic saint Teresa of Ávila that is generally considered to be one of the true sculptural masterpieces of High Roman Baroque—while staying in Rome, he was so inspired by the work that he decided to direct a film influenced by it. Unfortunately, the film in question, Visions of Ecstasy (1989), would not only ultimately result in Wingrove going from being a home-owning art director to homelessness, but would also make him an infamous public figure that was hated by both British politicians and everyday people alike due to the media controversy it caused. While a mere short film with a 17-minute running time that was shot over a three day period in April 1989 with 'glamour models' who had just got done touring as cage-dancers for the Beastie Boys, Wingrove's film is quite notable for being the only film in all of British cinema to be banned in the UK for blasphemy, with the cinematic work remaining outlawed for over two decades until 2008 when the outmoded blasphemy law was finally abolished (and unfortunately replaced with a more heinous law called the Racial and Religious Hate Act, which criminalized the mocking of untermensch religions like Islam and Judaism, among every other absurdly archaic non-European religions, thus reflecting the sort of authoritarian cultural cuckolding that is quite vogue in jolly old post-empire Great Britain).

A sort of non-linear experimental neo-Nunsploitation flick that attempts to be both cultivated and poetic in its meticulously stylized sensual sacrilege, Visions of Ecstasy is ultimately not much more sexually graphic than Danish auteur Benjamin Christensen's silent era masterpiece Häxan: Witchcraft Through the Ages (1922), which will probably be a shock to those viewers that know of its long and complicated history as a government certified piece of celluloid blasphemy. In fact, aesthetically speaking, the film owes more aesthetically to the films of German Expressionism and German dandy Werner Schroeter's blasphemous high-camp Oskar Panizza adaptation Liebeskonzil (1982) aka Council of Love than the Nunsploitation trash that auteur Wingrove so deeply cherishes, thereupon making for a somewhat unclassifiable cinematic work that will probably disappoint both exploitation fans and pretentious art fags alike. As a perversely phantasmagoric nonlinear work with nil dialogue and a somewhat fetishistic emphasis on mise-en-scène, Wingrove's short particularly reminded me of the films of Canadian artsploitation auteur Karim Hussain, especially his proudly heretical directorial debut Subconscious Cruelty (2000). In terms of films belonging to the Nunsploitation subgenre, Visions of Ecstasy probably owes the most to Polish master of erotica Walerian Borowczyk's Behind Convent Walls (1978) aka Interno di un convento as a solacing piece of rather refined sleaze that emphasizes understated sensuality over heavy-handed horn-dog style crudeness (in fact, as a work that features nuns shoving wooden dildos up their naughty bits, Borowczyk's flick is ultimately much more graphic than Wingrove's short, which only goes so far as showing bushy beavers). Of course, it should also be mentioned that director Wingrove himself credits School of the Holy Beast (1974) aka Convent of the Sacred Beast directed by Norifumi Suzuki and The Other Hell (1980) aka L'altro inferno aka Guardian of Hell directed by Bruno Mattei as the Nunsploitation flicks that influenced Visions of Ecstasy. Featuring an original synthesizer-driven celestial musical score by Steven Severin (who also composed the score for Wingrove's short Faustine (1990) starring the director's then-girlfriend Eileen Daly) of the classic English Gothic/post-punk band Siouxsie and the Banshees, Wingrove's film feels like the cinematic equivalent of making out with a voluptuous Gothic chick for the first time but only being able to get so far as sticking your finger inside of her, as it is a literally and figuratively masturbatory flick that is all foreplay and ultimately does not seal the deal in terms of cumming to full heretical climax. Indeed, sexually speaking, the film will probably only arouse young boys and perennial virgins who still have weekly wet dreams because they have yet to find a girl that will let them fuck them.

According to Wingrove, his intent with Visions of Ecstasy in regard to central subject Teresa of Ávila was to, “visually interpret a section of the writings of St Teresa and through those images convey some of the sensual eroticism that I felt emanated from her words.” Judging by his film, one has to wonder how Wingrove came to the conclusion that Ms. Saint Teresa of Jesus was a bisexual sadomasochist of sorts simply by reading her religious texts, but then again she was the granddaughter of a heretical Marrano Hebrew who was persecuted during the Spanish Inquisition for allegedly readopting the Judaic faith of his ancestors, so she certainly had ungodly genes (incidentally, sadistic Grand Inquisitor Tomás de Torquemada, who was infamous for persecuting crypto-Jews, was also of crypto-Jewish stock himself). Indeed, during the film, the Spanish mystic and Roman Catholic Saint meekly mounts Jesus and grinds her gash against the postmortem son of god’s cock while he is nailed to the cross and is even sexually serviced by a Sapphic slave (which is apparently her own psyche) while in bondage. Aside from the introduction, the film is really only comprised of two softcore petite vignettes where the only penetration depicted is in the form of Saint Teresa driving a nail into her own hand like she is attempting to perpetuate some sort of sordid stigmata hoax (of course, she is really just embracing her Christ-like masochism). A celluloid chiaroscuro of the amorously oneiric sort that is just too damn tame and sensitively constructed to be considered truly obscene by today’s standards, the film somewhat curiously opens with a credit sequence featuring a graceful butterfly flying in slow-motion. After the soothing opening credits scene, the viewer follows the camera as it hovers over a wild quasi-Expressionistic landscape covered with plants, leaves, and dirt until it catches up with the butterfly, which is sitting near a trail of blood. The trail of vital fluids ultimately leads to drops of blood dripping onto a rock. It seems that Teresa of Ávila (Beastie Boy dancer Louise Downie) gets wet at the thought of Jesus sacrificing himself on the cross, as she is portrayed hammering a nail into her hand in a fashion that seems like a cock penetrating some sort of wet fleshy female orifice, hence the blood-splattered rock. Undoubtedly, Teresa is a girl that likes it dirty as reflected by the fact that she knocks over a chalice full of blood and then proceeds to lick the red stuff off of the ground like a pathological lily-licker who gets extra hungry for poontang when her girlfriend is on her period. Considering Teresa seems to be in a sort of perpetual orgasmic state of immaculate ecstasy as reflected in her violently spastic movements as she becomes more and more despoiled with biological substances, it almost seems that she is fantasizing that her own blood is the crucified’s cum (after all, according to some of the Manson girls, Jesus died with a hard-on), hence why she rubs the vital fluids all over her body, especially her tender tits. Of course, Teresa is only warming up for her big date with the son of god, as well as her own sexually sick psyche.

While the first segment of Visions of Ecstasy is certainly surreal, the second and final segment of the film is wholly psychosexual in a purely visual way. Indeed, one could argue that the second segment is merely what was going on in Teresa's mind while she was masochistically masturbating with a holy nail during the first part of the film. A fairly simple montage sequence featuring two alternating tableaux, the segment switches back and forth between Teresa copulating with Christ on the cross and another slightly more abstract scenario where the female protagonist is sexually serviced by a female slave while her hands are bound in bondage. Credited as the 'psyche of St. Teresa' (Elisha Scott), the blue-eyed and dark-blond-haired Sapphic servant slowly crawls on all fours to Teresa, who is dangling from her hands from a rope like she is engaged in a sort of mock crucifixion. As the protagonist's psyche begins making her way up her body, the montage features parallel shots of Teresa licking the gory wounds and fondling the pale skin of Jesus Christ's seemingly cold corpse as it is nailed to the cross. Indeed, if there is something that Teresa unequivocally has a fetish for, it is Christ's Five Holy Wounds, especially the giant lance wound in his side, which almost resembles a mutilated pussy in the film. As for Teresa's carpet-munching Psyche, she seems to be infatuated with the protagonist's breasts and especially her nipples, which she delicately tongues like a pussycat licking milk out of a bowl. At the very end of the film, Teresa holds Jesus' nailed hands and 'Psyche' eventually collapses from all the excitement.

Somewhat humorously considering it is easily his most well known and discussed cinematic work, director Nigel Wingrove does not think much of his infamous short, or as he wrote in his fairly insightful 36-page essay Finding Ecstasy on the Road to Redemption (2012), "I have not actually watched VISIONS OF ECSTASY for maybe fifteen years. In fact, barring a few moments, images, or sounds I don't particularly like it anymore, and were I to have my time over again I would make it very differently. But in a sense that was what VISIONS was all about; it wasn't a masterpiece, or even a feature, it was just an 18 minute short film, self funded, to be self-released, a stepping-stone up the greasy ladder to success, or oblivion." In fact, Wingrove is so shockingly unsentimental and frank about the more glaring flaws of his film that he rightly noted in the same essay that, "the result of this stampede into film making was that I was essentially creating a series of still images rather than a series of moving images that worked as a whole for the twenty minutes duration of the film. The other problem was, had it been edited in a way that would have made the images work as I had envisaged it would have meant that VISIONS OF ECSTASY should have been about five minutes long or less. I really had not understood or even grasped at that time how fast screen time uses up imagery or how critically important it was to carefully plan and work out scenes. Of course, this wouldn't have mattered if VISIONS OF ECSTASY hadn't been about to be subjected to such intense scrutiny." Indeed, the film may be shamelessly artsy fartsy in its direction, but it oftentimes drags like the average cheap porn flick yet without the benefit of full-on hardcore pornographic action. After watching most of the director's oeuvre, I have to say that my favorite Wingrove flick is his very first cinematic effort Axel (1988), which features a fairly similar aesthetic to Visions of Ecstasy, albeit without the heavy-handed and largely outmoded sacrilegious imagery. Notably, like his pseudo-metaphysical Teresa of Ávila anti-biopic, the short but sinfully sweet 6-minute film was influenced by another artist's art. Indeed, it should not surprise anyone that has seen the paintings that Axel is a filmic interpretation of Teutonic Dadaist Max Ernst's classic paintings THE ROBIN OF THE BRIDE (1940) and THE ANTIPOPE (1942). Unfortunately, Wingrove has mostly stuck to directing neo-Nunsploitation flicks ever since the (non)release of Visions of Ecstasy, including the intolerably kitschy 72-minute feature Sacred Flesh (2000), which feels like the patently pathetic result of a virginal Game of Thrones fan attempting to direct a softcore barebones remake of Ken Russell's The Devils (1971) on a $500 budget using a bunch of used up coked-addled strippers. While Sacred Flesh might feature quasi-pornographic imagery that includes a close-up shot of nun diddling her freshly shaved pussy, the fetish-driven feature is completely devoid of the sort of celestially sensual essence that makes Visions of Ecstasy worth seeing.

After watching Visions of Ecstasy a couple times, it is still hard for me to wrap my head around the fact that the film was officially banned for blasphemy in the UK for over two decades, especially considering that British auteur Derek Jarman's experimental feature The Garden (1990) is not only just about as sexually graphic and certainly more perverse (it features fully naked men and leather-fags in bondage, among other things), but it is also more intricately blasphemous as a work that dares to overtly homosexualize various classical biblical themes and stories, including Mary Magdalene being portrayed as a vulgar drag queen and two gay lovers suffering from Christ-like persecution at the hands of the Christian church (incidentally, Jarman was one of a handful of celebrities that also included writers Salman Rushdie and Fay Weldon who vocally supported Wingrove after his film was banned). Of course, various Ken Russell flicks, including The Devils (which Jarman notably contributed his singular production design skills to) and The Lair of the White Worm (1988) are also more blasphemous than Wingrove's flick, but I digress. Despite the film's somewhat dubiously sleazy interpretation of the writings of Teresa of Ávila, I got the sense while watching it that Wingrove has a sort of closeted appreciation for Christianity, especially in terms of Christian art and rituals, as if the film was an unconscious attempt by an atheist filmmaker to create something spiritual (interestingly, in the documentary Hail Mary! A Brief Peek at Nunsploitation (2009), Wingrove states that his psychotherapist told him that his religious fetish was the result of "want[ing] to be noticed" due to this atheist parents divorcing). If one thing is for sure, it is that Wingrove has enough good sense to realize that the current leftwing multiculturalist law that protects the religions of alien races of people is ultimately more repressive and dangerous than the ancient blasphemy law that resulted in Visions of Ecstasy being banned, or as the filmmaker once wrote himself in regard to a celebrity lunch he attended where a bunch of media bigwigs and mainstream artists, including meta-queen Ian McKellen, made “crass remarks” about God and Jesus that it was, “All jolly good fun I suppose but I could see nothing to celebrate, the jokes were all safe, after all attacking Christianity is fairly easy and its followers rarely hijack planes and fly them into buildings or hack journalists’ heads off or mutilate women’s genitalia. Likewise being such an enlightened bunch they wouldn’t dream of criticizing the religions of other races so presumably they are all happy with the Government’s new catch-all multi-faith laws which are anything but a dead letter [...] the Racial and Religious Hate Act became law in 2006 with little real opposition. The new law ensures in all probability that religion will never again be the subject of humorous attack or controversial interpretation or anything other than what its most devout followers dictate and for that we must thank the lawyers who devised it.” Indeed, as his words indicate, Wingrove might be a blasphemous smut-peddler who has made a name for himself by creating and distributing films that the Devil might diddle his dinky to, but he understands the appallingly absurd double standards that exist among the mainstream media when it comes to criticizing religions, with hypocritical and seemingly culturally retarded neo-liberal politicians and celebrities endorsing Islamization of the UK while at the same time promoting things that are diametrically opposed to Islam like fag rights, feminism, pluralism, and pornography, among other culturally corrosive ingredients that are typical of a dying civilization.

Indeed, there is probably nothing more impotent, patently pathetic, and pseudo-subversive than an artist, comedian, or celebrity attempting to mock Christianity, yet these same sort of mainstream leftists will be the first to cry racism if a person dares to say anything but positive things about some backward religion that is practiced by shit-skinned colonizers from the third world who do not suffer from the sort of spiritual retardation and ethno-masochism that plagues many Europeans and thus naturally exploit Occidental man’s suicidal decadence, hence the EU-backed alien invasion scam known as the so-called ‘migrant crisis.’ After all, there are few things more barbaric than cutting a little girl’s clit off like certain Muslims do or an elderly man sucking the cock of a baby boy that has just been circumcised like in Judaism, yet Hollywood and the mainstream media never tires of bringing up certain evil things that Christians supposedly did many centuries ago. While I still not understand the whole appeal behind Nunsploitation cinema and the eroticization of nuns in general, I do have to admit that there is certainly no way in hell that anyone could ever successfully make anything relating to Judaism or Islam even remotely sexually appealing. The fact that there are numerous traditionally Catholic nations like Italy and French where the women are exotically beautiful and busty is probably what is most responsible for the relative success and popularity of Nunsplotation, with Guidoland not being the most prolific producer of these films for no reason. Of course, Europeans created beautiful and sometimes erotic Christian art in spite of Christianity and not because of it, so one should not expect that the races of people that subscribe to the other two sand religions would ever bring any sort of pulchritude to their respective faiths (after all, judging simply by the traditional clothing and haircuts, not to mention bizarre rituals, of Hasidic Jews, it seems that Judaism actively promotes ugliness).

As a man that would go on to distribute works ranging from Clive Barker's early low-budget black-and-white experimental shorts Salome (1973) and The Forbidden (1978) to classic surrealist flicks like Alain Robbe-Grillet flicks like Trans-Europ-Express (1966) and Glissements progressifs du plaisir (1974) aka Successive Slidings of Pleasure to classic retro Euro-sleaze like Jesús Franco's Paroxysmus (1969) aka Venus in Furs and La comtesse noire (1975) aka Female Vampire and Jean Rollins' La rose de fer (1973) aka The Iron Rose and Fascination (1979), among various other masterpieces and anti-masterpieces of both the arthouse and exploitation realms via his label Redemption Films (somewhat fittingly, the mainstream media outlet The Guardian coined the phrase, "Redemption – House of the Writhing Nun" in anti-tribute to the company after they released the old video nasty Killer Nun (1978) aka Suor Omicida directed by Giulio Berruti), Nigel Wingrove has, for better or worse, probably done more than any modern day Englishman in terms of promoting fetishistic horror and the sensually Fantastique. In fact, Wingrove named Redemption Films in tribute to his campaign for both personal and professional redemption after Visions of Ecstasy more or less completely destroyed his entire life. Aside from his essay Finding Ecstasy on the Road to Redemption, Wingrove also co-wrote a book entitled The Art of the Nasty (2009) published by FAB Press about his personal struggles against censorship. While certainly not a late-1980s equivalent to Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger's Black Narcissus (1947), Visions of Ecstasy is a nice little allegorical tribute to one of the more eccentric and seemingly spiritually schizophrenic exploitation subgenres, even if it comes nowhere near to living up to its singularly infamous reputation. With Nunsplotation now receiving mainstream respectability as demonstrated by Hollywood films like Robert Rodriguez's anti-white garbage Machete (2010) where fire-crotched celebrity slag Lindsay Lohan wields a weapon while sporting a nun's habit, the subgenre has been beaten-to-death and virtually totally extinguished of its vitality and potential, thus Wingrove's film is ultimately a remainder that there was actually a time when it took a certain amount of testicular fortitude to create such a salaciously sacrilegious work. Indeed, you know you have done something right when Derek Jarman—a man that was made a 'gay saint' by the ultra blasphemous sod activist group Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence (SPI)—advocates for your Nunsplotation flick.

Niki de Saint Phalle (1973)

Despite my general disdain of virtually any and everything relating to feminism, sexual 'liberation', and gender politics, every once in a while I find myself exceedingly – if mostly unintentionally – amused by pretentious works of art of this thoroughly deplorable persuasion. Most recently, I had the distinct (dis)pleasure of viewing the man-hating quasi-Freudian film Daddy (1973) directed by Franco-American feminist sculptor Niki de Saint Phalle and British documentarian Peter Whitehead (Charlie is My Darling, Benefit of the Doubt); a work of degenerate-art-gone-awry yet somehow done somewhat accidentally right, but for all the wrong reasons. Although co-directed by Whitehead – a filmmaker best known for documenting the London and NYC counterculture scenes of the late 1960 and creating proto-music-videos for groups like Pink Floyd and The Rolling Stones – Daddy is essentially an embarrassingly intimate and incestuous, as well as contemptuous and sadomasochistic (un)love letter to Saint Phalle's unfortunate father. Whitehead originally intended to create a documentary about Phalle and her artistic works, but this idea later dissolved into what is one of the most glaringly grandiloquent and inadvertently ludicrous films ever made. Best known for her mostly aesthetically displeasing sculptures (including a horrid blob-like Golem statue located in Kiryat Hayovel, Israel) and paintings, Daddy features many of Niki de Saint Phalle's childlike artistic creations in various forms, which do a splendid job accentuating the would-be-audacious auteur essence of her discombobulated mind and schizophrenic Electra complex. From the very beginning of Daddy, it is most apparent that Saint Phalle both adores and abhors her dear dad and his pesky philandering phallus. As a daughter of a French banker, Saint Phalle created a rare work that expresses the downright petty personal problems of a spoiled bourgeois debutante whose starvation for attention is played out in such an absurdly hyperbolic and hysterical manner that one would think assume she survived a famine; or at least an overextended third world mass gang raping. In short, Daddy is a patently pathetic and erratic exposition of what it means to have never struggled in one's life and the rare neurosis such a lavish yet unnatural la-di-da upbringing sows.

Featuring giant cocks in coffins, buckets of blood and naked voluptuous beauties on altars, and elderly pseudo-aristocrats in pancake makeup and drag, Daddy is a decadent daydream for the more debauched members of the blasé bourgeois. Of course, if one can look past the putrid pettiness of Saint Phalle's next-to-nonexistent personal problems, Daddy makes for an engaging and curiously worthwhile cinematic effort. Divided into chapters by Phalle's toddler-esque color drawings, Daddy feels like a Victorian Gothic kitsch piece directed by posh preschoolers, except ridden with mostly distasteful fetishistic sex scenarios that would probably only interest demoralized bluebloods and novice swingers. In fact, I would argue that Daddy is like an Alberto Cavallone (Zelda, Blow Job) film had the Italian director taken himself too seriously, and lost his technique and sense of humor, but I guess that is what one would expect from an ostensibly discordant collaboration between a feminist erotomaniac and an uninspired hippie documentary filmmaker. Lacking any true daughterly affections for her cold, collected, and cunning father, Saint Phalle channeled these eternally desired but never consummated suppressed emotions into an unhealthy and pathological sexual form, thus enabling her to identify with the unloving fornicator and misogynist whose semen she was spawned from on some level; no matter how utterly base, socially taboo, and exceedingly revolting. To appease the bestial appetite of the man whose attention she hopelessly sought, the woman even offers her dandy-like daddy a virginal vixen in between sexually degrading him in a variety of perversely infantile and unequivocally vulgar ways. Needless to say, Daddy is the sort film Sigmund Freud would have lauded as it plays out like one of his fantasy-inspired theories; or would have at least provided him with a masturbation aid. Narrated in an incautiously contrived and ridiculously wooden manner and performed by a cast of incompetent non-actors, Daddy is a work that even Camille Paglia couldn't have sit through without smirking snidely, yet these flagrant flaws also act as some of the film's greatest and most idiosyncratic attributes.

Although Saint Phalle attempted to reject the conservative values of her family, even causing her kinfolk to decry and shun her art in the process, she inevitably ended up marrying and becoming a mother at a relatively young age, thus turning into her own worst enemy and eventually suffering from a nervous breakdown of sorts. After watching Daddy, I was not the least bit surprised to learn of Saint Phalle's seemingly hypocritical destiny as her love-hate relationship with her family – most specifically her father – seems so deeply enrooted in her being and artistic creations as expressed so vividly in Daddy that deracinating herself from it could have only resulted in a much more extreme and detrimental psychological break. Whatever I may think of the quality and beauty (or lack thereof) of her art, I do believe that Daddy is a true and genuine artistic expression of the artist, even if created by a somewhat soulless woman (or an emotional retard if you will) who was probably given more pet ponies than hugs as a child. If there is a film that boldly yet disastrously expresses the stereotype that feminists are often inspired to adopt their ideology due to having weak and decidedly detached fathers, it is incontestably Daddy.

DER BUNKER

Nikias Chryssos (2015)

Aside from a couple major exceptions like the late great kraut Renaissance man Christoph Schlingensief and underground arthouse-splatter auteur Jörg Buttgerit, Teutonic film has mostly been a dreary wasteland since the death of Rainer Werner Fassbinder in 1982 and, in turn, New German Cinema with it. Indeed, the films of the so-called 'Berliner Schule' (aka Berlin School) are mostly a sad, pretentious, and plodding joke that seem to reflect the worst clichés of the arthouse world, or as Oskar Roehler—a decidedly degenerate director that has at least directed a couple of somewhat worthwhile films, including Agnes und seine Brüder (2004) aka Agnes and His Brothers and Atomised (2006) aka The Elementary Particles—once rightly said regarding the largely anti-cinematic and equally soulless cinematic works associated with the mundane film movement, "they are always slow, always depressing, nothing is ever really said in them." Luckily, things have been changing somewhat in the German cinema world as reflected in genuinely entertaining, original, and highly re-watchable films like Katrin Gebbe's Tore tanzt (2013) aka Nothing Bad Can Happen and Till Kleinert's bizarre killer tranny genre-bender Der Samurai (2014). Undoubtedly, one of the most bold and entertaining contemporary Aryan actors is Kleinert regular Pit Bukowski who, despite being quite apt at playing waywardly eccentric characters as demonstrated by his uniquely unflattering performance as the eponymous character of Der Samurai, revealed in Greek-German auteur Nikias Chryssos' unclassifiable art-trash chamber romp Der Bunker (2015) that he can also play lame and annoyingly passive-aggressive college students. A film with a title that humorously inspires images of Uncle Adolf contemplating his final days in the infamous Führerbunker, Chryssos' debut feature is as immaculate and idiosyncratic as first films come. Featuring highly memorable moments of absurdist family awkwardness and obscenely outmoded sets that rival David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), grotesque characters that might be best described as crusty kraut equivalents to the mad Baltimorons of John Waters' Pink Flamingos (1972), and unhinged quasi-incestuous eroticism and dementedly humorous family affairs that might fit somewhere in the same universe as Nikos Nikolaidis' Singapore Sling (1990), the film is somewhat paradoxical in the sense that it is so patently preternatural yet also a rare contemporary German flick that could be enjoyed by American philistines that are allergic to reading subtitles or not used to watching films that do not feature token cardboard negro and/or arab characters. Like a Teutonic apocalyptic Napoleon Dynamite (2004) set in a creepily quaint dystopian fairytale land where a sort of metaphysical autism pollutes the atmosphere, Der Bunker is a film that somehow manages to simultaneously chill, bewilder, agitate, titillate, disgust, and humor, among other things. Part narcotizing nightmare and part foul fantasy, Chryssos' debut is also probably the only film that manages to reconcile the semitic slapstick of the Marx brothers with the low-camp homo humor of Herr Waters.

If it were not for underrated New German Cinema filmmaker Hans W. Geißendörfer (Jonathan, Der Zauberberg aka The Magic Mountain)—a largely unknown auteur that had the distinguished honor of directing tragic white liberal Jean Seberg in her very last feature—and his daughter Hana acting as the film's co-producers, it is very doubtful that Der Bunker would have ever been made. As a man that made his debut as a filmmaker with a darkly comedic anti-fascist vampire flick featuring real-life animal-killings and beautiful gothic pastoral scenes that resemble Caspar David Friedrich paintings at a time when his Aryan contemporaries were creating banal commie docs and static quasi-Godardian twaddle, old mensch Geißendörfer could probably appreciate Chryssos' determination to make an insanely idiosyncratic film with a soul in an era where soulless Berlin School bullshit is all the rage among Deutschland's spiritually sterilized and emotionally glacial cultural elite. Indeed, Der Bunker certainly was not directed by someone that jerks off to Sartre novels or seriously considers Marxist mischling agitpropagandist Harun Farocki to be a wise old cinematic elder. Despite being an audaciously bizarre piece of cinema that was co-produced by an old auteur that has directed films featuring hardcore incest and interfamilial fecal matters (e.g. Schneeland (2005)), Chryssos has credited a number of Hollywood and/or otherwise fairly mainstream movies as influencing the film. For example, the film features an emasculated father that wears a woman's apron whilst doing woman's work that was inspired by Jim Backus' insufferably pathetic character in Nicholas Ray's Rebel Without a Cause (1955). Likewise, a strangely intense scene featuring a 'boy' cheating on a country capital verbal quiz was inspired by a famous showdown from Sergio Leone's The Good, the Bad and the Ugly (1966). Undoubtedly, in his striking talent for paying homage in a uniquely unpredictable yet fairly seamless way to classic Hollywood films, Chryssos follows in the postmodern post-Hellenic tradition of Nikos Nikolaidis. It should also be noted that Chryssos has expressed in various interviews an appreciation for more impenetrable arthouse works ranging from Spanish junky auteur Iván Zulueta's cult masterpiece Arrebato (1980) to the classic Jap doc The Emperor's Naked Army Marches On (1987) to Belgian auteur Fabrice Du Welz's hellish anti-Heimat horror show Calvaire (2004) aka The Ordeal to Aleksey German's celluloid swansong Trudno byti bogom (2013) aka Hard to be a God.

Sort of like a delightfully demented dystopian update of a Brothers Grimm fairytale as assembled for a decidedly deracinated generation of Germans that sees their own rich culture and history as an intangible and outmoded novelty that is no longer applicable to the hopelessly Americanized Aryans of today (notably, the film makes references to great German thinkers ranging from Nietzsche to Heidegger in a variety of less than respectable ways, including kitschy busts and ridiculous philosophical lectures), Der Bunker is more or less like a short trip to a dark corner of postmodern Occidental purgatory in a insanely zany celluloid form. A cinematic work that works as both a trashy yet artsy exploitation flick and an esoteric art-trash parable that features a somewhat erratic emotional range the falls somewhere in between the darkly humorous anti-bourgeois absurdism of Luis Buñuel, the grade school Hollywood sentimentalism of The Goonies (1985), and the mirthfully grotesque eroticism of great polack pervert Walerian Borowczyk, Chryssos' debut is a seemingly immaculate film that is, for better or worse, completely unforgettable. The bizarrely bittersweet story of a young college student that rents a room in what ultimately proves to be a WWII era forest bunker in the hope of getting the peace and quiet he needs to commence work on some arcane cross-field scientific theory, only to find himself being coerced into becoming the professor of a supposedly 8-year-old boy whose incredibly demented and equally delusional helicopter parents are grooming him to be the president of the United States despite the fact that he is a mentally disabled German retard that somehow resembles a misbegotten cartoon character from some forgotten Nickelodeon TV series from the early 1990s, Der Bunker is, at the most fundamental level, an anti-authoritarian film that was written and directed by a chap that is clearly glad he did not have a traditional Prussian education. Set in an surreally anachronistic maniac microcosm that is ruled over by a mentally unhinged matriarch who uses both her perky lactating tits and a demonic being that may or may not actually exist named 'Heinrich' as a means to control and manipulated everyone in her fairly small household, the film also critiques cults and cult-like families and how the heads of such groups will oftentimes use religion and/or some mythical 'higher being' as a justification for their dirty deeds. Thankfully, quite unlike many films that critique religion and discipline, Der Bunker is not obnoxious, condescending, or heavy-handed in its execution. Of course, in its depiction of a deranged cold cunt as the dictator of the household, the film also makes for an apt tribute to Angela Merkel era Germany.

Der Bunker begins with an unhinged wuss of beta-bitch father (David Scheller) absurdly talking about the "life-affirming" quality of a fried egg while eating breakfast with his wife and son in the kitchen of the titular home in a scene juxtaposed with Chopin's Nocturne Opus 9, Number 2. The nameless 'Father' is a patently pathetic eccentric with a goofy outmoded mustache who is more or less the servile bitch of his strangely sexy yet creepily psychotic wife (Oona von Maydell) who does nothing around the house aside from dictating orders via a supposedly supernatural open wound on her calf. In terms of mentally unsound mommies that engage in sexually dubious activities with their sons, the Mother of the film cannot really be compared to any other character in cinema history aside from possibly porn star Georgina Spelvin's character in Chuck Vincent's underrated non-pornographic horror-thriller-drama hybrid Bad Blood (1989) aka A Woman Obsessed. While she does not engage in S&M style rape with her son like Spelvin's character in Vincent's film, the matriarch in Chryssos' flick does seem to derive great sexual satisfaction from breastfeeding her overgrown son. The decidedly dysfunctional married couple of Der Bunker has big plans for their seemingly half-retarded, oversized 8-year-old son 'Klaus' (Daniel Fripan), who they are ruthlessly preparing to one day become the president of the United States despite the fact that he is a quasi-autistic kraut gnome with a fiercely flat affect who cannot even memorize the capitals of neighboring European nations. Indeed, despite the fact that homeschooling is strictly illegal in post-Hitler Deutschland, little Kraus is being groomed by his pseudo-intellectual father—an eccentric dilettante that dresses like a hobo who wants to give off the impression that he is actually a misunderstood genius—to be the leader of the world's foremost military and economic power. As a uniquely ugly little boy with a marvelously mediocre personality, horrible temperament, and low IQ that physically resembles the mutant hate child of Andy Warhol and Angela Merkel, Klaus has very little going for him but his mother suffers the grand delusion that he is exceptionally 'gifted.' As the film reveals as it progress, the nameless mother is under the 'spiritual guidance' of a nasty wound on her leg that is supposedly from another galaxy named 'Heinrich' who tells her how to run her family. When a nameless student (Pit Bukowski) makes the major life-changing mistake of renting a room in the eponymous home of the distinctly dysfunctional family in the hope of getting some much needed peace and quiet while he works on developing a groundbreaking cross-field scientific theory that involves Higgs boson, he soon finds himself being coerced into being both Klaus' professor and the family's all-purpose domestic bitch, yet somehow by the end of the film things fall into place for all those involved in what is ultimately one feverishly fucked family farce.

While the Student was expecting to have a nice quaint room with a lake view, he is somewhat disappointed to learn upon arriving at the bunker that he will be living in a cold and damp unfinished room with a low ceiling that looks like it would be a great place to store a bunch of naked emaciated Jewish corpses in some shitty Hollywood holocaust movie. Immediately upon arriving at the house, the Student also begins acquiring an ever growing debt due to not having enough for the rent advance, though the scheming Father, who clearly has unsavory ulterior motives, tells him it is no big deal since he can "help around the house" and then gives him a nice quasi-homoerotic foot bath. Unbeknownst to the Student, the Father, who is more miserly than an elderly widowed Jewess, immediately begins keeping careful tabs on his debt, including whenever he uses a napkin or eats a dumpling during a family dinner. Ultimately, the Father uses the Student's debt as a means to guilt trip him into teaching his son. Indeed, after confiding in 'Heinrich,' the Mother, who seems to believe that the open wound in her leg is some sort of all-knowing god, demands that the Student become Klaus' new instructor despite the Father's feeble protests. Despite the Student's refusal to teach Klaus when initially asked by the Father, the Mother manages to manipulate the protagonist into doing her bidding by shedding phony tears and less than subtly hinting at potential sexual favors. Undoubtedly, judging simply by her appearance and especially actions, the Mother is the sort of woman that would have been burned at the stake during medieval times under the suspicion of being a wicked witch. After all, it is not often you meet a woman that is compelled to abuse her husband and child because she is demonically possessed by a wound in her leg. Indeed, in a somewhat strange way, the Mother is a hot bitch that is begging to be buggered, yet she is ultimately creepier than any of the devilish she-bitch hags featured in Robert Eggers' The Witch (2015). A lazy erotomaniac that mostly lounges around the house while her eerily emasculated spouse incessantly cleans the place, the Mother's sexual depravity seems to go hand-in-hand with her Führer-esque need for total control as a woman who seems like she has a super clit that puts her pathetic husband's cock to shame in terms of sheer size.

While Klaus' schoolroom is adorned with kitschy busts of Shakespeare and Nietzsche, his parents are hardly interested in having him receive an eclectic Occidental education. Indeed, while the Student tries in vain to teach Klaus about the philosophy of Martin Heidegger and the history of the U.S. Federal Reserve, his parents are mainly concerned with having their son memorize the capitals of countries since they believe it will provide him with the knowledge that he needs to become the president of the United States. Of course, it does not take the Student long to realize that Klaus might have some serious learning disabilities and thus acts accordingly by helping the creepy little lad cheat on a quiz. Indeed, after the Student writes the names and capitals of various nations on his hand, Klaus manages to trick his parents into thinking he has finally learned something. As a reward for demonstrating that he is ostensibly capable of mindless memorization, Klaus' parents proudly treat him and the Student to the timeless family ritual of 'Joke Night,' which involves the Father dressing up like a sexually disturbed clown and reciting horrendously hokey jokes from a seemingly ancient joke book. When it is eventually discovered that Klaus cheated, the Father beats both him and the Student over the ass with a wooden cane as punishment in a hilarious scene that really highlights how passive and pathetic the supposedly intellectually gifted protagonist is. Completely fed up with Klaus' complete and utter hopelessness as a pupil, the Student (or, as Klaus calls him, 'Mr. Student') also begins using corporal punishment and even actually manages to get the grotesque 8-year-old to memorize the capitals of various countries by brutally hitting him in the hand with the wooden cane every single time he gets an answer wrong. While Klaus' hands and fingers are left completely bloody and brutalized as a result of the tough lesson, the little lad is so happy that he actually learned something that he is completely joyous as a result of the experience and proudly boasts to his parents about his new skill. As a reward for achieving the seemingly impossible by teaching her son to memorize the capitals of a number of fairly obscure countries, the Mother pays a special visit in a foxy fur coat to the Student late that night and then proceeds to fuck his brains out in what seems to be a rather long and eclectic sensual session that proves to be both sexually and intellectually exhilarating. Indeed, aside from allowing him to drink milk from her tits just like Klaus, the Mother's sexual powers prove to be so inspirational to the Student that he manages to get tons of science work down while he is in the middle of fucking her. Notably, before having sex with the Mother, the Student had made nil progress on his work, but after being given a special sort of carnal knowledge from the seemingly insane woman the protagonist gets fairly close to completing all of his work. Unfortunately for the Student, fate has different plans for him that has more to do with women's work like vacuuming carpet than elementary particles.

Of course, all good things must come to an end, or so the Student learns after making the unwitting mistake of teaching Klaus how to play. Indeed, as the unfortunate child of an almost sinisterly stringent pervert matriarch who dictates a whole set of bizarre rituals for the entire family, Klaus never had the opportunity to live like a normal child and play, hence his innate joylessness and overall lack of personality. When the Student takes the effort to play with him in a variety of goofy childish ways that includes piggyback rides and sword fighting, Klaus develops a sense of individuality and eventually begins rebelling against the strict rules of his family, thus throwing the entire social structure of the house out of equilibrium. Needless to say, the Mother immediately becomes alarmed by her son's newfound love of playing, so she naturally confides in Heinrich and is told to kick out the student lest she risk losing her little boy Klaus. On Klaus' birthday, the Father awards the Student a phony diploma declaring that he is retired and thus no longer needed by the family. Of course, Klaus' entire birthday is ruined when he learns that his parents are kicking out his new best friend, who is so angered by the entire situation he calls the father a "sick fool" and then proceeds to physically assault him in what proves to be a rather impotent fight between two very different yet nonetheless similarly weak and ineffectual men. While the Student and Father are fighting, Klaus collapses and becomes extremely ill as a result of his mother's abusive attempts at forcing him to dance by spinning him around in circles in what ultimately proves to be a sick way to celebrate the poor socially retard boy's birthday.

Not surprisingly, the Student becomes the scapegoat for all the family's problems and the parents demand that he leave the house that night after Klaus collapses during his ill-fated birthday part. Unfortunately for the Student, he has developed an almost brotherly affection for Klaus and decides to rescue him from his family by kidnapping him. Of course, the Mother, who demonstrates pseudo-supernatural powers of awareness that make her seem like a cross between the vampire of Noseratu and one of the voluptuous vampire sluts in a

Jean Rollins flicks, manages to awake just before the Student can escape and ultimately uses her sexual powers to virtually hypnotize the young scholar, who she severely wounds by stabbing in the gut just before he attempts to kiss her on the lips. With the Student left bedridden and, in turn, completely dependent on the family, as a result of his injuries, Klaus, who has finally developed a personality of his own, seizes the opportunity to leave his home for good, though not before kicking his mother in her 'Heinrich' and making her cry like a little bitch. In the end, the Student seems to be happy to be the new family slave, as he takes over the Father's housework duties and acts as a sort of more useful replacement for Klaus, thus leading him to not having to worry about stressful things like discovering breakthrough scientific theories. Not unlike with the death of the eponymous protagonist of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Händler der vier Jahreszeiten (1972) aka The Merchant of Four Seasons, Klaus' abandoning of the family proves to be to the overall benefit of the family as a whole as the Student makes for a most apt replacement and the Mother and Father seem to now have a normal loving marriage. Indeed, instead of acting like dickless dictator, the Mother begins wearing makeup and flirting with her husband in an overtly loving fashion that seemed totally improbable before Klaus left.

As a work of aberrant absurdist comedy, Der Bunker is seemingly perfect, but I have to wonder about what sort of message Chryssos is trying to make. Don't get me wrong, I consider helicopter parents to be a wholly corrosive social pestilence that has contributed to a generation of socially and sexually autistic cripples that cannot even tie their own shoes or find a clitoris, but the film also seems to have a dubious slacker message about the supposed need for one to not strive for greatness or reach their peak in terms of personal accomplishment or intellectual prowess. Indeed, in the film's depiction of a protagonist that initially strives for intellectual brilliance but ultimately gives up and becomes a meek man-slave as a sort of relief from the stress and hard work that comes with acquiring said intellectual greatness, one suspects that Chryssos has somewhat of a loser defeatist attitude that is contra to the sort of innate Übermensch philosophy that once made Germans great in the past, thus making it somewhat fitting that the film references both Nietzsche and Heidegger. Of course, one can only assume that Chryssos associates Nietzsche and Heidegger, who were both innately anti-liberal and philosophically revolutionary thinkers, with National Socialism, hence why he and many modern Germans would misguidedly subscribe to a slacker Weltanschauung. Notably, while researching the film, I discovered that, quite unfortunately, Chryssos is an enthusiastic leftist ethno-masochist of sorts that regularly tweets and retweets on Twitter about imaginary anti-Semitism and anti-towelhead sentiment in contemporary Deutschland, as if he is totally oblivious to the fact that his nation has been completely colonized by hostile Islamic hordes, but I digress. Also, one almost gets the sense while watching Der Bunker that the director is brainwashed by the typical German leftist narrative and believes that homeschooling is an evil, as if public schools do a better job rearing kids (obviously I have never attended a German public school, but any American can tell you that public schools are all about indoctrination and mindless memorization, hence why girls tend to do better in school and so many Americans graduate from high school despite being illiterate or sub-literate). After all, homeschooling is illegal in Germany because the government is afraid of supposed “parallel societies” that abstain from the quasi-commie public school objective of so-called “lived tolerance.” Of course, the great irony is that anti-homeschooling law is Nazi-esque legislation that was created specifically for the prevention of parents raising their kids to be National Socialists, just as so-called hate speech laws in Germany are an overtly fascist means of attempting to prevent fascist sentiment. To Chryssos’ credit, he does hint at the joke that is modern education in his depiction of Klaus being forced to do mindless memorizing, which any monkey can do and proves nothing about an individual’s true intellectual prowess. Of course, if modern public schools actually taught students how to think for themselves instead of what to think, they might begin to question classic oxymoronic liberal slogans like “diversity is our strength.”

Judging simply by his depiction of homeschooling in his debut feature, one can only assume that Chryssos is the stereotypical kraut leftist lemming who naively believes in the same Judaic Allied Powers propaganda that has been fed to Germans since 1945. Somewhat ironically, despite being a fairly subversive genre-bending comedy, Der Bunker demonstrates in its grotesque depiction of outsiders that live off the grid the same sort of conformist mentality and naivety that is stereotypically German and ultimately led to the collective support of the Third Reich. Indeed, to make a truly subversive and socially insightful Teutonic comedy that reveals what is truly sick and unnatural about the Fatherland, one would have to make a film featuring an emasculated pink-haired German boy that sports an Israel t-shirt who gladly accepts being sodomized on a playground by a gang of Somalian negroes because he was taught in public schools that whites are evil exploiters and rapists that must atone for the sins of their ancestors by dedicating their lives to the perpetual comfort and coddling of angry and ostensibly oppressed brown-eyed and black-haired peoples from the Global South. Indeed, only in contemporary Germany will you find a political movement like ‘Antideutsch’ (aka ‘anti-Germans’)—an innately anti-Teutonic social disease that is heavily influenced by kosher commie theorists like Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer—that hold protests where they celebrate the killing of German civilians and firebombing of German citizens by holding banners featuring an image of RAF commander Arthur ‘Butcher’ Harris that read “NO TEARS FOR KRAUTS.” Naturally, I was not surprised to discover a photo from the set of the Der Bunker shoot featuring an Antifaschistische Aktion (aka Antifa) flag in the background, thus indicating that Chryssos is probably a proponent of fascistic antifascism. Of course, only Chryssos knows what is going inside his head, but it amazes me that a man that could make such an uncompromisingly wayward flick could be such a stereotypical conformist bitch when it comes to politics, but then again, as the career of Hans-Jürgen Syberberg sadly demonstrates, you cannot be taken too seriously or respected as a filmmaker in Germany unless you subscribe to something that is at least as left-wing as the mainstream (neo)liberal narrative. After all, even a miscegenating homo anarchist like Fassbinder was accused of being racist, misogynistic, and antisemitic during the 1970s. That being said, Chryssos deserves credit for managing to make a German film that features an all-German cast and not a single Turk or negro, even if the Teutons are portrayed in a less than flattering fashion that recalls the grotesque anti-German caricatures of super smug kraut commie George Grosz.

Notably, in his article A Note On Comedy In Experimental Film featured in the summer 1963 edition of Film Culture magazine, avant-garde artist and filmmaker Sidney Peterson (The Petrified Dog, Mr. Frenhofer and the Mino-taur) wrote, "Given the activist approach, the tendency to exploit the intrinsic and often misleading comical-diabolical attributes of the medium is almost overwhelming. Thus, we get film-makers' films in which the basic elements are as ill-matched as Boehme's flesh and the devil. And because they are ill-matched, the consequences are inevitable. New and perhaps unintended subjects emerge [...] Perhaps 90 per cent of all experimental [film] work is, from this point of view, in its very nature, comical. It is unnecessary to mention particular works. Some are funny, some funnier. It is partly a question of when. Inconsequence has a way of becoming consequential, and the most illogical sequences may lose their irrationality by merely becoming familiar. Thus, new unintentional emerge from an original lack of intent, and the process may continue indefinitely, with the same eyes never regarding the same film." Undoubtedly, the 'genius' of Der Bunker, which is more of an experimental comedy than an 'experimental film,' is that the viewer oftentimes finds themselves questioning the director's true intent, as it is a film that simultaneously makes laughing feel awkward and awkwardness laughable. In other words, the film derives its greatest strength from its extreme open-endedness and unwavering ambiguity of intent, though it should be noted that the director once confessed in an interview with Lola magazine, "I want to use humor as a means of anarchy." Indeed, in stark contrast to the director's conformist cultural Marxist political persuasion, Der Bunker is the closest thing to a kraut arthouse equivalent to a Million Dollar Extreme (MDE) movie. Like the anti-liberal anti-comedic skits of the MDE boys, Chryssos' film depicts an innately sick and dysfunctional world that is only made even remotely tolerable through the most absurd approach to humor. In fact, I suspect that autistic mass murders like Adam Lanza, Elliot Rodger, James Holmes, and Chris Harper-Mercer might have been less apt to snap had they been exposed to movies like Chryssos,' which would have probably been solacing to their distinct mental wiring. I also think that Todd Solondz would find Der Bunker to be a great masturbation aid.

Easily the greatest film ever released by Artsploitation Films aside from possibly Kleinert's Der Samurai, Der Bunker hopefully represents a sign of a new renaissance in Teutonic cinema, though my cynicism leads me to think otherwise. More recently director Nikias Chryssos directed a short 10-minute doc entitled The Double Feeling about a Las Vegas fleshlight factory, thus underscoring his somewhat refreshing lack of seriousness as a filmmaker (of course, considering his politics, it is probably for the better). If Chryssos continues making warped aesthetically autistic dark comedies, he might have the potential to evolve into an evil Greco-Aryan Mel Brooks. After all, the last thing that the Fatherland needs is another ethno-masochist twat that directs serious 'experimental films' about culturally schizophrenic Turkish feminists and children with Down syndrome. Indeed, I might be the only one that holds this opinion, but arguably the greatest and most singular accomplishment of Der Bunker is that it proves that someone that is totally brainwashed by the leftist narrative, the false faith of Holocaustianity, and the multicultural myth can still make a seemingly immaculately constructed and somewhat politically incorrect film that is not totally tainted by bogus blue-pill bullshit. Surely, one cannot go wrong with a film that seems like it was directed by the strangely Americanized heterosexual brood of Werner Schroeter and Ulrike Ottinger, as Der Bunker is like an aesthetically decadent arthouse film for exploitation fans that hate arthouse films, which is certainly no small accomplish, especially in a nation where the hyper humorless and humdrum films of the Berlin School are considered the height of cinematic cultivation. While Germany will probably never produce another Nietzsche or even a Fassbinder, it certainly has room for a Mel Brooks or a John Waters, though hopefully Chryssos will evolve into something more enigmatic yet red-pilled.

Niklaus Schilling (1972)

While the New German Cinema movement of the late-1960s through early-1980s was responsible for producing a wide range of great cinematic masterpieces ranging from Werner Schroeter's Eika Katappa (1969) to Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) to Edgar Reitz's Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984) to Ulrike Ottinger's Freak Orlando (1981) to Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977), the movement was only responsible for a handful of horror films, though thankfully they are mostly rather notable and original. Arguably, the most well known of these films is Werner Herzog's classic F.W. Murnau remake Nosferatu: Phantom der Nacht (1979) aka Nosferatu the Vampyre (1979) starring Klaus Kinski as the eponymous blooduscking ghoul. Not unlike Herzog's flick, the Fassbinder produced serial killer flick Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe (1973) aka Tenderness of the Wolves directed by Ulli Lommel and penned by and starring Kurt Raab was also heavily influenced by German Expressionism. While not exactly influenced by Expressionism, Nachtschatten (1972) aka Nightshade directed by Niklaus Schilling (Rheingold, Die Vertreibung aus dem Paradies aka The Expulsion from Paradise) was heavily inspired by a once-popular film genre of yesterday and is indubitably one of the most idiosyncratic, refreshingly apolitical, and 'counterrevolutionary' films of New German Cinema. Indeed, a sort of pleasantly morbid Gothic neo-Heimat horror flick that was heavily aesthetically influenced by the rather wholesome and sentimental Heimatfilm genre that that was popular in Germany, Switzerland, and Austria from the late 1940s to the early 1970s yet fairly unknown outside of the German-speaking world, cinematographer turned filmmaker Schilling's exquisite debut is as shamelessly Teutonic as films come in terms of its themes, motifs, and overall aesthetic, at least during the 1970s when ethno-masochism and politically-charged leftist horseshit was vogue among German filmmakers. Somewhat interestingly, fellow Swiss-German Philip W. Sauber made an intriguing black-and-white student 'horror' film entitled Der einsame Wanderer (1968) aka The Lonesome Wanderer a couple years before Schilling that also features heavy influence from German Romanticism and even the Heimat genre. Unfortunately, Sauber's political tastes were less cultivated than his aesthetic ones, as he died during a shootout with police in Cologne after killing a cop in 1975 while he was a member of the German far-left anarchistic terrorist group '2 June Movement' (aka 'Bewegung 2. Jun'), thus he never had the opportunity to make a film of the caliber of Schilling's debut. Underrated German auteur Hans W. Geisendörfer's visually striking debut Jonathan (1970) also predates Schilling's film in terms of Gothic Heimat horror, but it is somewhat plagued by a lame antifascist subtext that involves vampires being depicted as sort of perennial fascists that feed off the blood of hardworking proles. In short, Nightshade is simply the best of the handful of New German Cinema Gothic Heimat flicks.

While technically a member of New German Cinema movement, Schilling was somewhat of a critic of his contemporaries and had an aesthetic that some might erroneously describe as 'fascistic.' Indeed, the pastoral scenes in Nightshade seem like something out of a landscape painting by 19th-century German Romantic landscape painter Caspar David Friedrich. Notably, in his 1977 article 'Cinema, Melodrama, and the World of Emotion,' Schilling argued in regard to his distinct philosophy to filmmaking, "One can say that the special qualities of German film are its countryside, its regions, the soil, and perhaps its people in general. And likewise its myths. A 'German world of feelings' if you will, which can be an almost ideal cinematic subject. In this sense, the German films of the thirties, forties, and fifties have more to do with cinema than the films of the sixties and seventies. And our surroundings have lost nothing of their mythologies at all; and these are of interest to me." Undoubtedly, it would not surprise me if Schilling was attacked as a 'Wandervogel romanticizing' and 'bourgeois Blut und Boden backing' crypto-Nazi for having the testicular fortitude to make such an audacious claim in an age when the Baader-Meinhof Gang was celebrated by certain fairly popular German filmmakers. Somewhat ironically, before becoming an auteur in his own right, Schilling was responsible for acting as a cinematographer on some of the hippest kraut counterculture flicks and arthouse flicks of the late-1960s, including Klaus Lemke's 48 Stunden bis Acapulco (1967) aka 48 Hours to Acapulco, Jean-Marie Straub's Fassbinder collaboration Der Bräutigam, die Komödiantin und der Zuhälter (1968) aka The Bridegroom, the Comedienne and the Pimp (1968), and Rudolf Thome's Detektive (1969) starring fashion model turned commie groupie Uschi Obermaier. Notably, Detektive also starred platinum blonde bombshell Elke Haltaufderheide, who would eventually become Schilling's wife, muse, producer, and regular leading lady, including in Nightshade where she practically glows with tragic and haunted lovelorn pulchritude.

A singular work of uncompromising cinematic 'Liebestod' where a certain fatally foreboding lovesickness constantly contaminates the air to the point of virtual asphyxiation, Nightshade is a film with virtually nil plot and similarly little action. In short, it is a film of intense yet delicately constructed slow-burning atmosphere and morbidly morose pathos that resembles the most breathtaking of darkly erotic nightmares and ultimately provides the viewer with a hauntingly stirring cinematic orgasm in the end that—for better or worse—is completely unforgettable, even if it is somewhat predictable. Had Dutch avant-garde auteur Frans Zwartjes attempted to direct a Heimat flick with something resembling at least a shell of a narrative, it might resemble Schilling's film. In its darkly romantic oneiric depiction of mud and murder in the remote countryside, the film also deserves comparisons to the cinematic works of underrated Belgian auteur André Delvaux (Rendez-vous à Bray, Belle). Needless to say, in terms of construction and setting, especially in regard to the beginning, the film owes much to credit to Danish master auteur Carl Theodor Dreyer's masterful vampire film Vampyr (1932). In terms of its horror approach to the Heimat genre and quasi-mystical depiction of moors and the outdoors in general, the film also seems to have been influenced by the fairly forgotten West German pastoral Gothic Rape on the Moor (1952) aka Rosen blühen auf dem Heidegrab directed by Hans H. König. On a less obvious but no less crucial level, Schilling's debut also owes credit to the films of Italian maestro Michelangelo Antonioni in terms of attempting to reinvent the concept of narrative cinema and being a sexually tense mood piece that features a short doomed love affair between two alienated strangers.

Right from the beginning of the film, it is apparent that protagonist Jan Eckmann (popular Dutch actor John Van Dreelen) is a stranger in a strangeland and that it can only end badly for him. Shot around the Lüneburg Heath region (the German equivalent of Dartmoor moorland in southern Devon, England) of Lower Saxony in northern Germany, the film is set in sparsely populated rural village where the people seem emotionally comatose and walk around like melancholic somnambulists, as if they are the ghosts of an ancient region of the Fatherland that was completely annihilated in World War II. As an unabashed workaholic that works in the music publishing industry, Jan plans to leave as soon as possible since he has only traveled the region to look at a house that he is thinking about purchasing. Based in Hamburg, Jan never really mentions why he wants to buy a quaint old house in the countryside, but he seems to suffer from some unconscious form of Fernweh as if he was compelled to come to the region by some unseen sinister force. A successful yet childless single man of the mostly materialistic bourgeois sort, Jan also gives off the vibe that it has been a longtime since he felt both the emotional and physical warmth of a hotblooded woman, hence probably why he eventually falls prey to the patently preternatural flirting qualities of the seemingly unhinged female lead. Like so many films of cinema history, Nightshade reveals the sort of bizarre and irrational behavior that a man will put up with just for a little piece of premium grade pussy. To Jan's credit, the female lead has some indescribable and seemingly intangible quality about her that absolutely entrances both the viewer and protagonist. Since he has only come to the village to simply inspect a house that he might purchase, Jan naturally assumes it will not be a long stay, but he does not anticipate that the homeowner, Elena Berg (Elke Haltaufderheide), is a rather disturbed dame with a glaring case of lebensmüde that will do anything to avoid even discussing a price for the house. Indeed, when Jan knocks on the front door of the house and gets no response, he looks through a side window and is somewhat startled to discover sullen blonde beauty named Elena—a middle-aged woman that is clearly past her prime, yet still absolutely stunning—burning papers and other items in her fireplace. Since Elena seems oblivious to her surroundings, Jan lets himself inside the house and introduces himself as a potential buyer, yet she simply refuses to discuss a price. While Elena has a somewhat frigid affect that hints that some sort of tragedy has chilled her soul and turned her into not much more than a walking and talking corpse, she does seem intent on having Jan stay and tries to ply him with some Vermouth, which he throws in the fireplace when she is not looking. While Jan makes it quite obvious that he wants to know the price for the house and then leave, Elena still manages to coerce him into spending the night in a guest room in the upstairs of the house. As demonstrated by the fact that he is chain-smoking in the dark while he should be sleeping, Jan certainly seems somewhat uneasy by the situation and the mysterious sexy spinster that owns the house, yet he is also undeniably attracted to Elena, hence why he opts to stay the night despite his instincts telling him to leave immediately.

When Jan wakes up after his first night at the house, he is somewhat startled to be greeted by a large lavish breakfast and a note from Elena letting him know that she is at church. A workaholic that hates eggs and rarely eats breakfast unless it is in his office, Jan is not all that impressed with the nice gesture and remains adamant that he plans to leave ASAP after finding Elena at a small eerie church, but the beautiful woman suffers from a terrible case of Erklärungsnot and proceeds to use strange and manipulative feminine tactics to keep him around. For example, Elena sobs when Jan tells her he has to leave, but she pushes him away and runs into another room when he dares to attempt to kiss her. In fact, Elena even seems to haunt the protagonist's dreams, as Jan has a petrifying yet nonetheless aesthetically alluring nightmare where he sees her lovingly placing red flowers on his gravestone. Somewhat curiously, the gravestone has an inscription of three years before on 27th of July 1968 as Jan's death date. Notably, while Jan is having this stunningly morbid nightmare, Elena is kissing his lifeless lips as if she is attempting to breathe death into him. Unbeknownst to Jan, Elena's belated husband, who the protagonist bears a striking resemblance to, died under mysterious circumstances on 27th of July 1968. During that same night, Jan is also startled to discover Elena attempting to start her dead hubby's Mercedes while in a somnambulist-like state. While Jan manages to kiss her lips and neck and fondle her breasts while she is still sitting in the car, Elena eventually pushes him away. Unfortunately for Jan, Elena is still deeply in love with her dead husband, but luckily he bears an eerily striking resemblance to the seemingly ill-fated dead man.

Naturally, one of the things that most annoys Jan about Elena is the fact that she is so impenetrably secretive in a passive feminine sort of way yet, at the same time, this seems to allure him (of course, it does not hurt that she is a nice piece of Aryan ass). For insistence, there is a locked room next to Elena's that she will not let Jan see inside, though she will not give any good reason for attempting to hide it from him. Eventually, Jan becomes so hopelessly infuriated with Elena's pathological evasiveness and unsettling secrecy that he loses his cool and demand answers, yelling at her as if she is his delinquent daughter, “I went along with it. But now you’re done. What are you simulating? What do you want from me? Why do you want to sell the house? What’s the matter with the room? Why don’t you want to show me the room? You want to sell, but you don’t want to talk about the price. What about the car. Why did you want to drive off? You were inside my room! What are you doing at night? Say something! I don’t want the house. Nobody is going to buy it! Never! I don’t even want it as a present.” At this point, Elena gives in and hands the key to the locked room to Jan in a slow and almost ritualistic fashion as if the male protagonist is about to open Pandora’s Box. Needless to say, Jan gets somewhat of a shock when he opens the door and discovers a virtual shrine to Elena’s dead husband in the form of an almost unsettlingly mundane and minimalistically decorated work office. On top of discovering a daily calendar with the date 27th of July 1968—the same exact day that the male protagonist saw inscribed on his gravestone during his nightmare—Jan sees a 1960 wedding photo of Elena and her dead husband, who is his virtual doppelgänger, albeit slightly balder and less attractive. Before Jan knows it, Elena is inside the room, but when he attempts to talk she softly covers his lips and guides him to her husband’s bed where they proceed to make love. Of course, by entering the locked room, Jan has symbolically accepted the role of Elena’s dead hubby and thus is repaid with morbidly melancholic poontang.

Considering that Elena is obviously attracted to Jan because he looks just like her dead husband, it is safe to say that she engaging in a sort of emotional spectrophilia with the male protagonist when she begins a sexual relationship with him. Not surprisingly, the next morning after they have sex for the first time, Elena transforms into a completely different person and sheds her hypnotically sullen forlornness for a sort of bubbly girlishness, as if she is a teenage girl that has just fallen in love for the first time. Indeed, Elena immediately begins acting as if Jan is her dead spouse and begins decorating the house as if they are newlyweds that have just moved into their first home. In short, Elena resembles the happy girl from the 1960 wedding photo of her and her dead husband. Elena also becomes obsessed with having Jan take photographs of her outside, but every time he does so her face is curiously obscured in the photo as if she has some sort of curse weighing down on her and/or she has a black mark on her soul. Of course, Jan becomes somewhat worried when he checks Elena’s mailbox against her wishes and discovers an August 1969 newspaper with the ominous headline, “Mysterious Death in the Pine Moor Remains Unsolved.” To make matters more unnerving, Elena completely collapses when the two begin walking towards the local moor. Naturally, Jan is forced to carry Elena back home, but the protagonist becomes somewhat startled when she remains bedridden and states while in a state of haunted delirium, “Stay! Please stay! I want... I want you, Werner. Come on! Let’s go back. No, let’s not take the car. We’ll walk! A couple of flowers for you. The rain will cover the tracks. Hold me tight. Help me, Werner! Careful! The dress! It's getting wet. It's deep." As Jan soon discovers, 'Werner' is the name of Elena's dead husband. Naturally, Jan only becomes more and more obsessed with learning about the dead man and his dubious fate.

When Elena falls completely asleep after spending most of the day bedridden in a semi-conscious state, Jan uses the opportunity to do what he has been meaning to do for days and goes to a local inn to call his work. Of course, Jan gets quite the shock when the rather rotund innkeeper states to him, "You're well preserved . . . after three years in the moor" and accuses him of being the mysterious "Werner Berg." After a little bit of morbid confusion, the innkeeper pulls out an old newspaper with an article about Werner's death that reads, "Elena Berg has been found not guilty on all accounts. The verdict in this sensational trial has been expected. The court had no other choice. But a shadow remains on Elena Berg. A discharge due to lack of proof is inevitable. The defendant left the court in cold blood." Notably, the article features a court photo of Elena where she looks like the most glacial of femme fatales and certainly not the same woman that the viewer has encountered at any other moment in the film. Chilled to the bone by what he has encountered that night after discovering that he may have made love to a mad mariticide that literally got away with murder, Jan refuses to sleep with Elena, who is too weak to complain, and instead lurks around the house that night while chain-smoking and looking like he has seen a ghost. The next morning, Elena looks even worse and seems to be suffering from some Camille-like wasting disease, yet she gets the strength to tell Jan everything that he has been dying to know. As Elena explains, Werner had been separated from her for a year on the day he died in 1969. When Werner decided to pay her a visit after a year of separation, lovesick Elena, who felt she could not live without him, tried in vain to convince her husband to come back to her, but he "got angry," and replied, "It's right the way it is now." As Elena also explains to Jan, "The years we spent together were a living hell to him. He would never change his opinion," thus indicating they had a very one-sided marriage that was doomed to oblivion. Realizing that Werner would never come back to her, Elena decided to fail to warn him about a dangerous moor when he attempted to take a shortcut in the countryside. Indeed, Elena watched passively as her husband was swallowed alive by the moor. As for her reasoning, Elena confesses to Jan, "He couldn't leave anymore. I loved him. Now I possessed him. Forever. That's what I wanted to tell you . . . so that . . . I give you the house for free. You just need to open the letter. Forgive me! But . . . Forgive me!" Only seconds after telling her story, Elena dies in her bed. Upon examining a desk next to Elena's bed, Jan discovers a bottle of Pentobarbital-Natrium and realizes that she has killed herself.

While I can imagine many fecund-free feminists deriding the film for being ostensibly misogynistic due to its inordinately dreamy depiction of a halfcrazed cunt causing the death of her husband because she cannot bear to lose him, Nightshade is, at least in my less than humble opinion, somewhat flattering in its depiction of womankind, especially in regard to love. After all, even when a woman is dumped by a man that she is genuinely in love with, it usually does not take her long to rebound and devote herself to another dick. Indeed, it usually seems that women get more upset at the prospect of their lover finding another (superior) partner than simply losing said lover, hence the tendency of women to get jealous over the new girlfriend of an ex-boyfriend despite the fact that they no longer have any sort emotional attachment to said ex-boyfriend. Of course, as a childless middle-aged woman that has a much harder time snagging a mensch than a 20-year-old twat with a firm ass and tits, the female lead in Schilling's film has other reasons to be mad about her husband leaving her as she probably has a perennial case of Torschlusspanik (after all, the great irony of the sexual market place is that, while a man's value tendency to increase as he ages, a woman's simply decreases as her value is based almost solely on her looks and fertility). In that sense, the fact that the film was produced and stars the director's wifey makes it all the more intriguing, as if lead Elke Haltaufderheide was threatening to kill Schilling if he ever dared to leave her (also, on a more pathetic level, Schilling might have wanted to believe that Haltaufderheide loved him so much that he fantasized that she would kill him if he ever made the mistake of leaving her). Either way, Nightshade is a perversely yet elegantly darkly romantic film that demonstrates in a uniquely unnervingly entrancing fashion that a lost love can be a fate worse than death that can lead to the lovelorn loser to becoming a haunted mess that is imprisoned in an increasingly suffocating pandemonium of the past.

Considering it is a two-character film with next to nil plot or storyline, seemingly no studio sets, sparse dialogue, and rather simple camerawork, Nightshade could have easily been a major disaster and abortive cinematic Kuddelmuddel yet it ultimately makes for a shockingly atmospheric and singular cinematic work, especially for an a first-time auteur who originally worked as a cinematographer on rather different and largely black-and-white flicks that have mostly not aged quite as gracefully. Indeed, unlike many of the cinematic works of New German Cinema, which were oftentimes politically-charged and very much typical of their particular zeitgeist, Schilling's film has a timeless quality not unlike the great works of German Expressionism. As for Schilling's rather distinct cinematic Weltanschauung, he made his intentions rather clear when he once wrote, "It is really quite simple: cinema should involve the senses. I think of 'cinema as an experiential realm,' as an experiential form, something that makes it—or should make it—different from television. Seen in this light, film is by no stretch of the imagination merely to be equated with cinema. If there is anything I bemoan it is surely the increasing impoverishment of cinema, especially in the Federal Republic of Germany, where it actually has become a form more and more like television and connected to it.” Somewhat ironically, the virtual heart of New German Cinema, Rainer Werner Fassbinder—a man that made a good portion of his films for television—was a fan of Schilling’s films. Of course, the two filmmakers share one major thing in common and that is their almost pathological love of melodrama (notably, Schilling’s wife Elke Haltaufderheide would also star in Fassbinder’s magnum opus Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) in what would ultimately prove to be her penultimate acting role). In fact, as Schilling once wrote, “Melodrama—what a strange concept; another cubbyhole in which one places scenes with crying men, childless, rich women, passionate love-hatreds, and setting suns. It also is used as a disapproving and disdainful response to a precisely choreographed attack on the world of emotions, something a cinematic film can do if it takes itself seriously. I take it seriously and no doubt use these forms taken from the melodrama, because these forms likewise contain something that is specifically cinematic: an optical narrative structure which does not explain and edify—a way of dealing with emotions.”

Interestingly, fellow Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid (Heute nacht oder nie aka Tonight or Never, La Paloma)—a friend and collaborator of Fassbinder—was also obsessed with melodrama, despised leftist agitprop and the counterculture decadence of his own zeitgeist, and was considered ‘counterrevolutionary’ by both fellow filmmakers and film critics. Also, Elke Haltaufderheide is certainly to Schilling’s films what Ingrid Caven was to Schmid’s early cinematic works in terms of being a terminally tragic diva that slowly but surely disintegrates on screen as a result of a deadly love that dare not be named. Undoubtedly, both Haltaufderheide and Caven are so spiritually forsaken, internally wounded, Todessehnsucht-obsessed, and just plain physically pale in these films that they seem like they would turn into dust if one were to attempt to caress them. Of course, the major difference between Schilling and his contemporaries Fassbinder and Schmid is that he was heterosexual, which probably explains why his films are more erotic and ‘sympathetic’ to the perils of the female lead. Undoubtedly, in a somewhat preternatural way, one can sense Schilling’s love for Haltaufderheide and her emotional and physical nuances simply by watching his films, especially Nightshade and his arguable magnum opus Rheingold. Likewise, Schilling’s love of classic German landscapes is also fairly apparent, which is indubitably one of the reasons why he is the most innately Teutonic filmmakers of his era. In terms of its hopeless and fatalistic doom and gloom Gothic Heimat melodrama, nyctophilic dream-sequences, bold and luscious colors, and decadently romantic spirit, Nightshade is like New German Cinema’s adequately pessimistic equivalent to Veit Harlan’s National Socialist melodrama Opfergang (1944) aka The Great Sacrifice. Of course, unlike with the female protagonist in Harlan’s film, there is no transcendence for the forlorn female lead of Schilling’s flick unless you count lovesick suicide. In terms of sheer otherworldly aesthetics, eerie tone, and phantasmagoric imagery, Nightshade certainly has more in common with Frank Wisbar's underrated Nazi era horror flick Fährmann Maria (1936) starring tragic dark-haired beauty Sybille Schmitz (who, incidentally, also starred in Dreyer's Vampyr and was the inspiration for the tragic eponymous junky ex-actress of Fassbinder's Veronika Voss).

As someone with an uniquely unhealthy affinity for morbidly depressed and unnervingly introverted natural blondes of the Teutonic-blooded sort, Nightshade proved to be a bittersweetly beautiful affair, even if I found the female lead's guilt-ridden lovesick suicide to be slightly improbable. Of course, my complaint seems pointless when I remember that Schilling's film is a Gothic cinematic tone poem that is best left to the soul than the intellect. Either way, the film bleeds feminine melancholy in a way that rivals the best of Ingmar Bergman and for that reason alone makes it worth viewing. A cinematic work that manages to strip down cinema and bring it back to its basics while at the same time reinventing the concept of narrative cinema, Nightshade also provides a refreshingly experience that recalls times that were simpler, especially when one considers the mostly worthless films that are created in Germany nowadays. Indeed, after watching Schilling's film, I could not help but recall a recent interview with French blonde bombshell Brigitte Bardot where she was asked if she watches contemporary French films and she boldly replied, "Never. But what is it with all these actors and actresses? We only see scrofulous, sick, twisted and ugly people. The heroes today, they are people in crutches or paralysed in a wheelchair or old and in a coma. Where are the heroes? Where are the personalities that make us dream, the Gabins, the Brasseurs? I think of Alain Delon. Who replaced him? Now it's just beards [She uses the word "barbus" which literally means beards but is also slang for Muslims] and actresses with oily hair who get raped in corners then find excuses for their attackers. You only have to look at the César Ceremony [French Oscars equivalent] where nice zombies thank Mum and Dad, their concierge and their taxi driver, while making the compulsory call for human fraternity and antiracism." While it was most certainly not Schilling's intention, Nightshade is also a reminder that one middle-aged blonde beauty is indubitably worth more than six million 19-year-old Turk twats.

CHARLES MANSON SUPERSTAR

Nikolas Schreck (1989)

Charles Manson Superstar is a documentary about American icon Charles Manson and his legacy that was established by the media that martyred the would be Christ. Director Nikolas Schreck visited Manson in 1989 at San Quentin prison in Death Valley to do the hypnotically insightful yet hilarious documentary. Charles Manson, a man that was essentially raised in prison, became the drug messiah of a bunch of rich kids turned pseudo-Occultists who murdered some Hollywood types (including Roman Polanski's pregnant wife Sharon Tate), resulting in a media money making frenzy. In the documentary, Schreck attempts to decipher the real Charles Manson through serious analytically established evidence (against myths) and words from the little Manson's mouth. Manson declares that "Christ was a little guy" and with that, it is easy to see the man's own self established megalomania that inspires weak willed teenagers to this very day. At best, Manson is an illiterate intellectual poet that has become a messiah of his own prison cell. Charlie Manson has managed to survive basically his whole life and for that he should be commended. In former jail mates book Manson in his Own Words Manson explains his pathetic life without any real sentiment. Charlie Manson makes it clear that from the very beginning it has only been about survival. Charles Manson Superstar also features Manson talking about many of his own personal philosophies. Manson considers himself essentially a white nationalist and anti-feminist. These are things that media Zio-Clown's like Geraldo Rivera jump on Manson for immediately. Having a swastika engraved in your forehead also doesn't really help. With "the family" Manson also had plans of starting his own "Afrikakorps" inspired by German Field Marshal Erwin Rommel (who was supposedly involved in the conspiracy to assassinate Adolf Hitler). Charles Manson expected a race war to erupt and an apocalyptic scenario to take place. We will just have to wait and see if the Race War and Apocalypse happens. Rommel and his Men Charles Manson has inspired a variety of diverse groups with his acts. The lame terrorist hippie "Weather Underground" and various Nazi groups were inspired by Manson. To these groups of disenfranchised individuals, Manson attacked the system and won. Charles Manson laughs at both groups. Charlie also makes claims that the outside world steals it's culture from the prison world. Manson even acknowledges his deep respect for Adolf Hitler as Manson describes Hitler as someone "trying to put order back in the world." Charles Manson Superstar also notes a variety of a books and films influenced by Manson. I Drink Your Blood, Helter Skelter, and Manson Family Videos are just a few films about the "hippie killer." Charles Manson Superstar is probably one of the most enlightening films on Manson as the other films are for the most part merely mythical presentations of the lonely man. In the documentary, Charles Manson's behavior ranges from nonsensical to intimidating (he starts baiting the camera man), to pathetic. I recommend Charles Manson Superstar to anyone that is looking for a good unconventional laugh and a more realistic view of the most "dangerous man" of the late 1960s.

EURIDICE BA 2037

Nikos Nikolaidis (1975)

For whatever reason, I have to respect a filmmaker who, despite directing various highly idiosyncratic feature films over the course of three decades (not to mention the fact that he spent over another decade directing shorts and working as an assistant director), felt that his very first full-length cinematic work was also his very best. Indeed, Greek auteur Nikos Nikolaidis (Glykia symmoria aka Sweet Bunch, Singapore Sling) considered his first feature Evridiki BA 2037 (1975) aka Euridice BA 2037—a superlatively subversive and uniquely uncompromising black-and-white avant-garde molestation of the classic Greek tragedy Orpheus and Eurydice that seems like it was made just in time for the Occidental apocalypse—to be the most solid and structured film of his totally singular filmmaking career. While I am not sure if I would describe it as Nikolaidis' single greatest work, it is surely one of the best and most impressive debut features I have ever seen from a director as a work comparable to Luis Buñuel's Un chien andalou (1929) aka An Andalusian Dog, Orson Welles' Citizen Kane (1941), François Truffaut's Les quatre cents coups (1959) aka The 400 Blows, and David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), among various others. While I have not seen every single cinematic reworking of the Greek tragedy, I have no doubt in my mind that Nikolaidis' film is the most aesthetically and thematically anarchistic, culturally pessimistic, darkly erotic and eclectically unhinged adaptation of Orpheus and Eurydice ever made as a work that makes Jean Cocteau's masterpiece Orphée (1950) aka Orpheus seem like a dopey Disney variation and Sidney Lumet's The Fugitive Kind (1960) resemble a hokey exploitation piece. Of course, what better than a real genuine Greek fellow to adapt the classic tragedy of his ancient ancestors and demonstrate how so utterly depraved and hopelessly lost the Occident is today. I must admit that the more films I see by Nikolaidis, the more I realize that he is the most important and underrated post-WWII Greek auteur, but of course Greece has always been generally lacking when it comes to filmmaking, even in comparison to small countries like Belgium and the Netherlands, with many important directors from the country like Nikos Papatakis (Les abysses, Les Équilibristes aka Walking a Tightrope) and Costa-Gavras (Z, Amen.) spending most of their careers working abroad. What immediately stands out about Nikolaidis' adaptation in comparison to all the other versions, aside from the fact that it is a demented dystopian chamber piece that relies heavily on dream logic, is that it focuses primarily on Eurydice (or 'Euridice') and her nightmarish psychological demise while waiting idly in the most banal of hells. Indeed, unlike the original story which depicts the Arcadian romance of the hero and heroine before the latter ends up in the depths of Hades and the former subsequently enters the dark otherworldly abyss to try and ultimately fail at saving her, Euridice BA 2037 takes place entirely in a sort of metaphorical pandemonium where the eponymous ‘protagonist’ (or more like ‘anti-heroine’) Eurydice, who does not remember Orpheus, waits in vain while going insane to be released after she has already served her time. Indeed, Nikolaidis’ film is a histrionic psychodrama of the most haunting sort that demands much from the viewer and gives absolutely nothing away aside from nice shots of Russian-German star Vera Tschecowa’s generous mammary glands.

Notably, star Vera Tschecowa appeared in what is oftentimes described as the very first New German Cinema feature, The Bread of Those Early Years (1962) aka Das Brot der frühen Jahre directed by Herbert Vesely, which is interesting considering that Euridice BA 2037 is one of the first works of the so-called ‘New Greek Cinema’ movement as a work that completely revolutionized the medium in Greece and opened up cinematic possibilities that largely went unrealized. Indeed, despite being forty years old, the work is still as shocking, singular, and unclassifiable as film’s come as a clear expression of the artist’s obviously troubled and seemingly haunted psyche. In Nikolaidis’ film, love is dead and the protagonist is more or less a dead soul with amnesia who is simply referred to as “BA2037” by the people that have imprisoned her in a metaphoric hell that, not unintentionally, resembles a typical humdrum bourgeois apartment. Set to the soothing, if not sometimes saddening, sounds of Chopin, Vivaldi, and Dinah Shore, Euridice BA 2037 is a piece of schizo-cinema that somehow manages to be morbidly melancholic yet sometimes playfully humorous and jovial. The film begins with sounds of live ammunition and warfare juxtaposed with the credits sequence and then cuts to a small group of bratty young men and women tormenting protagonist Eurydice while she sleeps by dropping dirt and whatnot on her head from a window over her bed. Probably not coincidentally, these young delinquents resemble far-left student protestors or ‘bobos’ (aka bourgeois bohemians) of that time period. After fighting her youthful attackers with a makeshift pitchfork of sorts, Eurydice stares in a melancholic fashion at a bouquet of dead flowers wrapped in an old newspaper, which can be interpreted as being symbolic of the fact that love and romance are old news in the decidedly dead dystopian world of Nikolaidis’ film. After standing around and looking all moody and broody, Eurydice approaches a mustached man that is lying on her bed and goes to touch him but it seems like some unspeakable force is holding her back. Although never directly stated, the man is her lover Orpheus (British actor John Moore) and Eurydice has fragmented flashbacks of making love to him. Like virtually all the people that come to see Eurydice, it is dubious as to whether Orpheus is really in the apartment or merely a figment of the obviously mentally perturbed protagonist’s seemingly loony and labyrinthine ‘imagination.’ Indeed, it could be argued that nothing in the film is real and is, instead, merely the product of the clearly crazed heroine’s discernibly damaged mind. At one point, Orpheus attempts to apologize to Eurydice for something that is never made completely clear, but she stops him, changes the subject, and complains that she should have been freed from the apartment five days ago when her sentence ended, but then strangely remarks, "Who knows... Maybe I have already left," as if she is speculating that she might have lost her mind. Naturally, at the end of the film, Eurydice will have a long-awaited romantic 'showdown' of sorts with Orpheus that will seal both his and her fate for eternity.

When a random stranger calls Eurydice on the telephone and says that he is trying to contact his lover who he has not seen or talked to in five years, the protagonist remarks, "It's weird" as if she cannot fathom the idea of a man still being in love with a woman after such a long period of time without any contact. Eurydice tells the man that she does not know him or remember any of the stories or names he mentions, but she tells him that she would like to meet him and invites him to come to her apartment later that night. Of course, it is later revealed that the man on the phone is Orpheus. In between moving piles of junk around her house in a rather tedious and ultimately fruitless fashion as if she is trying in vain to live the life of a domestic housewife and failing miserably, Eurydice daydreams of bizarre things like discovering two naked corpses wrapped in plastic in a Lynchian fashion. Eurydice also calls the people that have imprisoned her and complains that she should have been released five days ago, so the man on the other line promises to send by a truck before noon to pick her up so she can be transferred but of course it never happens. After staring at the static on her TV screen like an autistic automaton for a couple minutes, Eurydice takes a shower and when she finishes she becomes rather alarmed and eventually completely petrified when a man in a military uniform rings her doorbell and then attempts to shove an envelope under the door, which the protagonist aggressively fights to push back under the door while completely naked (during all the commotion, Eurydice loses her towel and her mind), as if the piece of mail contains a bomb or anthrax and she is afraid for her life. Not long after the incident with the mailman, a beautiful young woman (Niki Triantafyllidi) in a black plastic coat appears in the apartment out of nowhere and it is quite clear that she recently tried to commit suicide as indicated by the cut marks on both of her wrists, so Eurydice attempts to clean her wounds but the strange exotic young lady stops her. Out of all the people that Eurydice encounters during the film, she is the most empathetic and kind to the mysterious woman, who is probably not a real person but instead a possible alter-ego or younger version of the protagonist (who might be in hell because she killed herself). As the strange young woman says regarding her suicide attempt, "He will think I did it because of him. Why would I do it? I don't love him anyway... but I think he knows it. He figured it out." Undoubtedly, the young lady's sentiments of resentment for her beau seem to mirror how Eurydice feels about Orpheus, who will ultimately go to great lengths to attempt to get the protagonist to remember the love they once had for one another. Whether Eurydice has genuinely forgotten Orpheus and her former love for him or she is just pretending to as women oftentimes do is quite questionable. When the strange woman randomly disappears just as abruptly as she once appeared, Eurydice becomes completely petrified and begins slowly and carefully looking for her around her apartment, but the only thing she finds is herself in the bathroom (!) showering just like she did only moments earlier just before the mailman came by and scared the shit out of her.

Like a scared child, Eurydice eventually decides to hide under the sheets on her bed where she is initially petrified but eventually begins masturbating and experiencing a series of extra ecstatic orgasms. When a silhouette of a man's hand appears over the sheet, Eurydice becomes all the more turned on and has some more orgasms, but when the curious hand begins caressing her she eventually suffers a sort of spasmodic panic attack where her large breasts giggle wildly. After her rather bizarre phantasmagoric masturbation session in the bed, Eurydice decides to play with talking baby-dolls and gets them to have 'sex.' Indeed, after one of the babydolls says, "Come, let's do something naughty," Eurydice takes the clothes of the dolls and forces them to engage in a rather childish game of coitus that more than hints at the protagonist's warped sexuality. As indicated by the fact that the male doll has an erect member, the toys are 'anatomically correct' and Eurydice seems to have another orgasm while playing with the toys, but eventually gets agitated for some reason and decides to viscerally bite the penis off of the male one, thus reflecting her undeniably hostile feelings towards the opposite gender. When Orpheus calls again, Eurydice, who has the baby-doll penis in between her teeth like a toothpick, once again reiterates how she has no idea who he is or what he is talking about. Orpheus brings up a mutual friend named Vera who was apparently killed at an amusement park while they were hanging out there, but Eurydice describes the story as "improbable." Meanwhile, Eurydice falls further into a lapse of sanity as demonstrated by her violent mutilation of baby-dolls and visions of decapitated goat heads, among other things that only seem to make sense in her own mixed-up mind.

Eventually, a strange man randomly shows up at Eurydice's flat while it is storming heavily outside and offers to trade her two sardines that he has carefully wrapped in a piece of cloth for some jewelry, but the protagonist turns him down. The man apparently works for the hellish bureaucracy that has imprisoned Eurydice and he tells her that she has not been "transferred" yet simply because his employers are "just lazy." Of course, like the mysterious young woman, the man disappears just as abruptly as he once appeared. After attempting to hunt down some imaginary figure with a butcher knife while sporting nothing but a turtleneck sweater and panties, as well as subsequently using fingernail polish to paint the wrists of the mysterious young suicidal woman that randomly showed up earlier in the film, Eurydice is eventually visited by the mysterious man that has been calling her on the telephone who naturally turns out to be Orpheus. When Orpheus walks in the apartment with a bouquet of flowers while sporting a military uniform and hardhat with a light on it, Eurydice acts less than friendly to him and demands that he turn the light off, which he gladly does. After Orpheus shows his concern that he hopes his uniform does not scare her and says that he can probably arrange to have her released from the apartment, Eurydice remarks that he is very nice and even strangely offers him a bath as if she is on intimate terms with him and/or wants to jump his bones.

After some small talk, the two lovers turned strangers sit at a kitchen table and Orpheus shows Eurydice old photographs and tells her a story about how he, her, and a woman named 'Vera' once went to an amusement park together and the latter suffered broken ribs when a ride malfunctioned and ultimately died on the way back after her already broken ribs were split open in a car wreck. While looking at Orpheus' old photos, Eurydice notes that Vera looks remarkably like her and then remarks, "See what funny clothes we used to wear?" as if she somehow now remembers the past. Of course, there probably was never a 'Vera' (which is notably and probably not coincidentally the real-life first name of the actress that plays Eurydice), as the dead woman that Orpheus is speaking of is probably actually Eurydice and the only reason he is telling her the story is in the hope that his beloved will somehow remember. Undoubtedly, the scene where Orpheus attempts to get Eurydice to remember him is borderline heartbreaking and accented by the song "Till" by Dinah Shore. After an initially romantic flashback scene of Orpheus and Eurydice kissing in a lake in pouring down rain that ultimately erupts into violence, the protagonist is featured murdering her lover and subsequently running down the hallway of her apartment in a creepily jubilant fashion while carrying her murdered beau's internal organs in a triumphant fashion. The film concludes the same exact way it began with a group of young people attacking Eurydice from a window above her bed while she sleeps. Indeed, Eurydice is trapped in a perennial metaphysical prison where she is forced to relive the same events over and over again every single day for eternity like she is trapped in some grotesque Gothic Greek version of Harold Ramis' Groundhog Day (1993). Of course, unlike Bill Murray's character in the Ramis flick, Eurydice seems unconscious of the fact that she is reliving the same day over and over again and thus acts the same exact way every single time.

Although completed in 1975, Euridice BA 2037 did not play in Greek theaters until six years later just after a major earthquake devastated the country, thus most likely adding to the assumedly already shaken audience's viewing experience. To demonstrate director Nikos Nikolaidis' lack of pretentiousness, especially in regard to his own work, it should be noted that the filmmaker once stated regarding his directorial debut, "Certain intellectual Italian critics asserted that "Euridice BA 2037" applies and finally proves Lyotard's cinematographic theories as well as the solution to many of the problems which puzzled Pasolini's for years. I am embarrassed because I didn't know then and I still don't know anything about Lyotard's theories or Pasolini's problems." Like much of his work, it is also apparent while watching the film that the auteur is surely lacking when it comes to pomposity as demonstrated by the fact that Euridice BA 2037 opens with a shot of a photograph of early classical Hollywood comedic philistine double act Laurel and Hardy. Not surprisingly considering its dually off-putting combination of perversity and incessant discombobulating ambiguity, the wayward Orpheus and Eurydice (anti)adaptation, despite winning various coveted awards, was apparently severely criticized by both audiences and film critics alike when it debuted at Thessaloniki Film Festival, with those few individuals that actually enjoyed the film being a supposed “reckless” bunch, or as Nikolaidis stated himself, “I realized that the audience this film appealed to was a “reckless” one, made up of people who willingly huddled into the basement of the movie theater “Alkyonida”. Driven cinephiles, which ignored the published critics (disregarding both good and bad reviews, because – we all know how the critics system works by now).” Of course, the film most certainly has the same audience today.

On top of describing it as his personal favorite of all his cinematic works, Nikolaidis rightly recognized his debut feature was too much for audiences when it was released as expressed in a remark he made while discussing his later dystopian masterpiece Morning Patrol (1987), “I believe that it is a film ahead of its time just like “Euridice BA 2037” was.” Notably, Euridice BA 2037 and Morning Patrol are the first two chapters of Nikolaidis’ post-apocalyptic ‘The Shape of the Coming Nightmare’ trilogy, which concluded with the filmmaker’s most fiercely impenetrable and perniciously perverted yet paradoxically humorous cinematic effort The Zero Years (2005), which was ultimately the last film the Greek auteur ever directed. What all three of these films have in common is they demonstrate a sort of great disconnect between the sexes that reflects a sort of death wish for the Occident where reproduction and family do not even enter the equation. Certainly Greece’s closest equivalent to Ingmar Bergman’s masterpiece Persona (1966), Euridice BA 2037 depicts a kind of erotically apocalyptic frigidness of the fairer sex via its hyper hysterical (anti)heroine, who not coincidentally kills her beloved Orpheus in an allegorical gesture that can be interpreted as the meta-physical hell of perennial loneliness and sexual deracination that has replaced love and romance in Europa. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Eurydice has amnesia in regard to her past love affair with Orpheus, for love has become, at best, a faded memory that seems completely intangible in the present late-stage of Occidental decay. I am certainly not exaggerating when I say that Nikolaidis’ film is easily one of the greatest adaptations of a classic work as it completely deconstructs, defiles, and reassembles Orpheus and Eurydice for contemporary times, not to mention the fact that it was directed by a filmmaker from the same devastatingly degenerated nation where the tale was originally sired. Ironically, aside from Roman Polanski’s Repulsion (1965), Ingmar Bergman’s Through a Glass Darkly (1961) aka Såsom i en spegel, and to a lesser extent John Cassavetes’ A Woman Under the Influence (1974), the only other film I can truly compare Euridice BA 2037 to is the R-rated psychodramatic chamber thriller Deranged (1987) directed by pornographic auteur Chuck Vincent. Aside from taking place almost entirely in a messy apartment and centering around a mad woman who is suffering a major mental breakdown, both films manage to be simultaneously unflattering to the so-called fairer sex yet at the same time demonstrate an inordinate compassion to people with vaginas that no actual woman would dare express. The Eurydice of Nikolaidis' film is not the all too delicate and perfect wood nymph of the original ancient Greek tragedy, but the rotting yet pulsating womb of the west that worships death and is allergic to all-things-love. Undoubtedly, to say one has to suffer from a certain amount of hopelessness in regard to love and the future of the Occident and humanity to fully appreciate Euridice BA 2037 would be a major understatement. In other words, it was probably no fun being Nikos Nikolaidis, hence probably why the man seemed to love old mindless outmoded Hollywood classics that are nothing like the films he actually directed as they probably provided him with much needed escapism and, in turn, relief from his existential misery.

MORNING PATROL

Nikos Nikolaidis (1987)

Nearly a decade ago, I saw a totally unclassifiable Greek cult film entitled Singapore Sling (1990) of the completely and utterly depraved yet darkly humorous and equally erotic sort that pays bizarre homage to Otto Preminger's classic film noir Laura (1944) and that one might describe as the most idiosyncratic 'arthouse horror' flick ever made. Admittedly, I was somewhat caught off guard by the film because it was released on DVD by Synapse Films, which typically releases less than artistically merited cult horror flicks, and I certainly was not expecting such a stylishly sleazy cinematic work that managed to be so decidedly demented yet inordinately aesthetically dignified. For whatever reason, I did not think to look into some of Singapore Sling director Nikos Nikolaidis' other films until rather recently after researching films on the myth of Orpheus and Eurydice and discovering that his debut feature, Euridice BA 2037 (1975) aka Evridiki BA 2037, was a disturbing black-and-white mutation of the classic Ancient Greek tragic love story. While barely known outside of Greece aside from his magnum opus Singapore Sling, Nikolaidis—a modern Renaissance man of sorts who also worked as a record producer, theater director, and prolific TV commercial director, among other things—might be, at least in my less than humble opinion, the world's greatest director of dystopian arthouse works. A man with a patently pessimistic view of the world and where it was heading, Nikolaidis described his swansong The Zero Years (2005)—a film set in a dystopian S&M brothel where four prostitutes that were forcibly sterilized allow themselves to be devilishly defiled while running low on food and other supplies—as not depicting some less than ideal foreseeable future, but as depicting the pernicious present. Set in a necrotizing post-apocalyptic Europa where amnesia and mysterious fevers are rampant, death squads roam the streets and countryside, absurd booby-traps await you around every corner, and where any person that you come into contact with will more than likely attempt to kill you, Proini peripolos (1987) aka Morning Patrol is arguably Nikolaidis' greatest contribution to the dystopian subgenre as a work that is so malignantly melancholic in its essence that it makes Ridley Scott's Blade Runner (1982) seem like a relatively conventional Hollywood fantasy film and Terry Gilliam's Brazil (1985) seem like a bombastic live-action cartoon directed by an autistic fanboy. Set in a neo-noir nightmare realm where the main city is completely unpopulated yet classic Golden Age Hollywood film noir flicks from the 1940s and 1950s are perennially playing on TV screens and in movie theaters, Nikolaidis' virtual anti-sci-fi flick features nil special effects and a sort of post-European Europe where the only memories of past times come in the form of old school works from the Hebraic dream-makers of Tinseltown. Somewhat paradoxically, Morning Patrol is arguably Nikolaidis' most hopeful and romantic work, as a sort of apocalyptic romance where two strangers that initially attempt to hate one another yet ultimately unite and bond on mutual faded memories and try to find hope in a world that is beyond hopeless. Featuring a deceptively intricate and philosophical script, the film is notable for featuring excerpts from the writings of novelists like Raymond Chandler, Philip K. Dick, Daphne Du Maurier, and Herman Raucher for the scenes where the two lead characters narrate their thoughts on living in a dying world plagued by death, pain, murder and not much more.

Morning Patrol begins with the nameless female protagonist (Michele Valley of Singapore Sling and Yorgos Lanthimos' Kynodontas (2009) aka Dogtooth) roaming the countryside and attempting to remember her former life in a place in the East called 'Mandele' that no longer exists. The female protagonist is afraid that if she refrains from talking that she might die and that if she attempts to sleep she will be caught by a death squad called the 'Morning Patrol.' Undoubtedly, the protagonist has a rather pessimistic worldview as indicated by her remark, "The most stupid question once can ask on this earth is, 'Where the hell did everybody else go?'" but she has perfectly good reason to think the way she does as virtually all of her fellow surviving humans want to kill her just so that they can steal her mostly worthless belongings. Indeed, the only people left in the world are coldblooded killers and the protagonist is reluctantly one of them, as she lives in a 'dog eat dog' world where passivity means a very certain grisly death. As the protagonist says regarding other people, "Sometimes I see them in the distance... sliding down the hills, heading West... They kill each other over a drop of water... or they get killed by Patrols." Although she has no evidence that there is something waiting for her on the other side, the protagonist is also heading west to a dubious place called 'The Sea,' but first she must pass through a nearby city that is even more deadly than the countryside. Since she, like all the survivors of whatever apocalyptic event led to the dystopian world that now exists, suffers from amnesia and can't quite remember anything clearly about her former life, the protagonist speculates that she used to have a boyfriend and lived with her parents. After finding a crouching corpse that she initially mistakes for a living man, the woman is able to bandage her wounded arm while she tries in vain to remember how she injured it.

As demonstrated by the fact that she brutally slaughters a man with a knife after mistaking him for a corpse and stealing his watch, the female protagonist is a fierce murderess who is well prepared to fight to the death, especially when it comes to malicious men. After all, as the woman pessimistically narrates, "What does it matter where you are, if you're dead. In the murky waters, or high up in a marble tower, what does it matter. You're dead, and you don't care about anything anymore," thus reflecting the fact that she has a little bit of life left in her and she is determined to get to a nearby city where she will have food, water, and shelter. Of course, the city is occupied by members of the Morning Patrol and when the protagonist arrives there, she does not waste any time in murdering one of the guards and stealing his gasmask. Upon entering an abandoned luxury apartment, the woman finds food still on the dinner table as if the family that originally lived there had just vanished into thin air while eating. While at the apartment, the woman watches vintage junky classic The Man with the Golden Arm (1955) directed by Otto Preminger and starring Frank Sinatra and Kim Novak, but her viewing is interrupted when she notices a remote control toy car in the building and abruptly leaves.

When the woman enters another apartment, she finds various James Dean and Natalie Wood posters hanging on the wall and begins watching The Big Combo (1955) directed by Joseph H. Lewis and starring Cornel Wilde and Richard Conte, but she does not stay there for long. After leaving the second apartment, the woman heads to a completely empty movie theater that is curiously screening Charles Vidor's Gilda (1946) starring Rita Hayworth and Glenn Ford, even though there is clearly no one there running the film projector. While attempting to enjoy the movie, a unisex gang of four men and women that are dressed somewhat like post-apocalyptic punk hobos begin approaching her in a rather bizarre manner that makes it seem as if they are performing ballet with the theater seats. Ultimately, all four of the gang members surprise attack the female protagonist at once and a female member knocks her out by putting her head between her thighs in a somewhat fetishistic fashion. When the protagonist wakes up, she finds herself tangled in reels of film and soon notices that all four of her attackers have been mysteriously murdered and thus she is able to get back all the gear and supplies that they stole from her. As the protagonist will soon discover, she has a guardian angel of sorts that has been watching over her ever since she arrived at the city.

After leaving the movie theater, the protagonist finds a loaded shotgun in a large junk pile and heads to another abandoned apartment to watch some more old school Hollywood film noir. While staring at the television like an automaton, a man sneaks up on her and points the shotgun she just found at her face. Upon revealing his face to her and moving the shotgun away from her head, the man (Takis Spiridakis of Nikolaidis' Glykia symmoria (1983) aka Sweet Bunch) reveals to the woman that he is a guard in the Morning Patrol and that he has been watching over her ever since she arrived in the city. The guard also warns the woman that it is his job to kill if she is still alive and in the city after three days, but he also demonstrates his genuine concern for her by warning her to stay away from, "Cinemas, food stores, phone booths... They're all traps. Nighttime is the best time for running." While the woman more or less admits to killing one of his Morning Patrol comrades and stealing his gas mask, the man decides not to turn her in and instead begins to leave, but on the way out he collapses. Indeed, the guard suffers from a mysterious and seemingly incurable illness that causes fevers and his bones to ache. When the man wakes up, he finds himself lying in bed with the woman who is once again watching an old film noir. Ultimately, the woman blackmails the man into helping her to make it out of the city so that she can make it to the seemingly mythical place in the west called 'The Sea' by stealing the pills that he uses to treat the mysterious illness that he suffers from. While the man probably could easily beat up the woman and take his pills back, he seems to genuinely want to help her and has obviously become disillusioned with working for the Morning Patrol, so he goes along with her plan to travel to the Sea, even though he knows that no one who has ever traveled there has ever come back to confirm that it actually exists, thereupon more or less guaranteeing a very certain death for both of them.

It is quite apparent that, despite their initially resentful attitudes towards one another, the woman and man have a strong attraction and connection towards one another that only becomes all the more apparent the longer they are around one another. Indeed, the two might have even known one another in a previous life, as the woman asks the man at one point, "Are you sure we have never met before?" and then says, "You had a house on the hill. I used to watch you from afar," but the guard cannot remember anything. Needless to say, it does not take long for the man's comrades at the Morning Patrol to realize he has gone AWOL and they immediately begin attempting to hunt him and the woman down. Meanwhile, a second guard (Panos Thanassoulis of Singapore Sling and Dimitris Athanitis' Kamia sympatheia gia ton Diavolo (1997) aka No Sympathy for the Devil) on a motorcycle keeps a lookout for the two protagonists and even talks to the man via telephone and warns him to not go west because the death squad has already setup a roadblock there. At one point, a group of Morning Patrol members attempt to murder the man and woman at what looks like a post-industrial junkyard, but the two protagonists kill them and then steal their bus and begin heading towards the outskirts of the city. Naturally, the man begins succumbing to his illness over time and the woman begins acting vaguely more intimate with him. When the two enter a swamp one night, the man collapses and narrates, "I could already hear the patrol approaching us. Don't think that I quit. I know this is my last chance. And if they're going to get me back, they won't get me alive. There are so many stories about us. They say that after the river, down at the valley of death, when the moon is gone, seven angels pray for those who leave the city...And when the battle is over, and the smoke dissolves, we get to the sea...alive or dead, it doesn't matter. Don't think I quit." The woman picks up the man and attempts to carry him through swamp but he ultimately dies in her arms. After the man dies, the woman passionately embraces him and kisses him on the lips for the first time. The last thing the man says before dying is, "Do you have a name?" which is a question that the woman refused to answer when the two first met.

Notably, director Nikos Nikolaidis would later state regarding his masterpiece Morning Patrol, "This is a movie that still scares me and I avoid watching it... I believe that it is a film ahead of its time just like "Euridice BA 2037" was." Indeed, while it is not nearly as graphic or grotesque as Singapore Sling, The Zero Years, or many of Nikolaidis' other works (in fact, the only nudity it features is a rather brief nipple slip from Michele Valley), the film is completely soaked with a positively penetrating sense of dread, hopeless, despair, and emotional deadness that consumes the viewer's soul from the very beginning to almost the very end. It is only until the final couple minutes and especially the last couple of second of the film where Nikolaidis dares to express any degree of love and compassion in the very final scene when the female protagonist is finally able to let down her guard and express her affection for another human being, but it is ultimately too late as the male protagonist has already dropped dead. Of course, one could interpret the final scene of the film as a message to viewers that, no matter how shitty and degenerate the world is, one must never hold back on love because you might miss it entirely if you do not act upon it immediately as there is no telling one a lover might perish or when the world might end. Undoubtedly in its complete and utter lack of special effects and utilization of real location of strikingly exotic post-industrial ruin, Morning Patrol strangely reminded me of the somewhat strongly forgotten hippie-ish dystopian flick Glen and Randa (1971) directed by McJew Jim McBride (David Holzman's Diary, Breathless), but of course Nikolaidis' film is a remarkably more entrancing, atmospheric, and culturally pessimistic work that, in terms of its construction as a slow-burning post-apocalyptic celluloid nightmare, seems nearly immaculate. Indeed, aside from its superficial similarities with Glen and Randa, the only other film I can think of comparing Nikolaidis' work to is Andrei Tarkovsky's masterpiece Stalker (1979), which certainly shares some aesthetic similarities as both works manage to make the dystopian and the dejecting so delectable. It should be noted that Morning Patrol is the second film in the director's post-apocalyptic 'The Shape of the Coming Nightmare' trilogy, with Nikolaidis' first feature Euridice BA 2037 being the first chapter and his cinematic swansong The Zero Years being the third and final installment, thus making the triptych seem like the foundation of the auteur's entire celluloid oeuvre. While Morning Patrol is unequivocally the least sexually explicit and most 'conventional' chapter in the trilogy, it also happens to be the most immaculate as a disturbingly aesthetically pleasing work that is oppressively foreboding and practically bleeds weltschmerz in a particularly preternatural fashion that no other Mediterranean filmmaker ever seemed capable of. Indeed, if Nikolaidis had a specialized talent, it was making the end of the world seem so innately pernicious yet paradoxically beautiful.

SINGAPORE SLING

Nikos Nikolaidis (1990)

Singapore Sling is a nice perverted Greek film that taps into what the average person might call taboo sexuality. Many men might feel as if they are in the right set of hands after being wounded if two beautiful woman watch over him. It also might be a fantasy of many men to be in the company of an incestuous mother/daughter duo that only has sex on the mind. But these two women also have murder on their mind which has become more interesting than any sexual domination game that they could ever play. The so called emancipated woman can become a dangerous thing. A woman not dominated by a strongman is a wild storm of nothingness. Like the sex obsessed ladies of Singapore Sling, there is a void in their life that no novelty form of sexual/physical domination will ever fulfill. Only when the sharp phallic knife of a man enters that woman's most intimate spot in a savage way does she feel content. Not only is she now at ease but she can die happy as does a certain lady in Singapore Sling. Singapore Sling has a certain sleek film noir aesthetic that penetrates ones emotions immediately. Things are always rainy and gloomy in the film, even during moments of hopeful sexual enjoyment. The younger woman featured in Singapore Sling speaks poetically of her assumed dead father taking her virginity at a young age. The woman recites her past sexual activities as she rapes a wounded man that has just been found on her front doorstep. Her Mother is jealous of her daughters private moments as most mothers/women are. The man the women call "Singapore Sling" is trapped in a large house with two women that have yet to be tamed. Lacking the proper man to fulfill their deranged sexual needs, the mother and daughter enjoy playing a little game of "secretary." The mother forces the daughter to perform fellatio on her artificial member and the girl does so with glee. She can't get enough of the feeling of being under the control of a pseudo-male. But these perverted psychological prostitutes never fulfill their womanly needs as no woman can take the place of a man. I dare someone to find a happy "emancipated" woman that isn't a full-fledged and gender deranged lesbian. Despite murdering a young lady, "Singapore Sling" has become the woman's savior. The woman cannot be blamed for her desire to murder him as she is ultimately amoral. Her perversity has lead her to a life of hedonistic nihilism which has morphed into insanity. The young woman sexually pleasures herself with fruit in a furious manner but is incapable of producing her own fruits. She is a void of a woman and only death will release her from her living nightmare.

THE ZERO YEARS
THE ZERO YEARS

Nikos Nikolaidis (2005)

While David Lynch has long been one of my favorite American filmmakers as the man behind singular masterpieces like Eraserhead (1977) and Blue Velvet (1986), among other notable works, I felt his most recent feature Inland Empire (2006) was not much more than a conspicuously convoluted mess of steaming digital diarrhea that seems like a perversely prosaic parody of the director's own signature 'Lynchian' brand of filmmaking, albeit shot on a bargain bin budget using the hopeless artificial anti-art medium of MiniDV. Needless to say, after learning that Lynch decided that he would never shoot on real film again because of how much 'artistic freedom' he felt that digital video gave him while shooting Inland Empire due to its cheapness, I ultimately came to the conclusion that the auteur filmmaker had fried his brain on too much Transcendental Meditation (indeed, the doc David Wants to Fly (2010) directed by David Sieveking makes it quite clear that Mr. Lynch has become a virtual slave of the Hindu cult). When I discovered absurdly underrated Greek auteur Nikos Nikolaidis (Proini Peripolos aka Morning Patrol, Glykia Symmoria aka Sweet Bunch) had shot his most recent feature The Zero Years (2005) was shot on digital video (and later transferred to 35mm) and the director publicly revealed after its release that he was giving up on filmmaking altogether because the work failed to achieve the same success as his earlier work Singapore Sling (1990), I naturally assumed the worst. Notably, not only is the film Nikolaidis' celluloid swansong, but also the final chapter in the director's glorious three-decade-spanning 'The Shape of the Coming Nightmare' trilogy (preceding the director's two masterpieces Evrydiki BA 2037 (1975) and Morning Patrol). While not reaching the self-defiling extremes of Inland Empire in terms of a great auteur anti-cinematically shitting on his own oeuvre via digitized labyrinthine lunacy, The Zero Years is most certainly Nikolaidis' most overtly kitschy and aesthetically flaccid work, thus indicating that digital video can make the work of a seasoned master seem like that of a broke ass amateur with more ambition than artistic prowess. A sort of compulsively claustrophobic dystopian chamber piece set entirely in a government-run S&M brothel that is occupied by four madly melancholy pussy-peddlers of the regrettably sterilized sort, the work was described by Nikolaidis as having an intentionally shitty 'realist' aesthetic as it is not supposed to be depicting some ungodly future but the pernicious present, or as the director stated himself, "It would be a mistake to interpret this as a futuristic story. No matter how harsh it may appear this movie is about the shape of things that are already here and established, along with the set of things that are just starting to be applied, while we already feel their consequences. Therefore, the attitudes of the actors, the camera frame, decoupage in general as well as the light, must all provide for the particular atmosphere of the movie, yet they must move within entirely realistic levels.” Indeed, I would be lying if I did not admit that The Zero Years, not unlike Nikolaidis’ greatest works, induces a sort of malignant metaphysical sickness in the viewer that falls in somewhere between melancholia and weltschmerz, which should not be a surprise considering it was directed by a man whose first film was titled Lacrimae Rerum (1962). Set in a world where forcibly sterilized prostitutes hopelessly dream in vain about having children to the point where they practice changing diapers yet they live their lives in an innately anti-sexual way where their bodies are used for just about everything and anything besides reproduction, The Zero Years is ultimately an allegory for the death of the Occident as a work that depicts Greece as a post-industrial toilet inhabited by spiritual and sexual cripples.

After a less than narcotizing and fairly anti-erotic opening montage featuring women fiercely masturbating and people locked in cages, The Zero Years introduces the decidedly dejected quasi-protagonist Vicky (Vicky Harris, who previously starred in Nikolaidis’ See You in Hell, My Darling (1999)), who has “come all the way from hell” and has just arrived at her new home-cum-workplace at a government-run whorehouse that is rarely frequented by patrons, who are mostly shadowy government figures with serious sexual problems. In fact, things are so bad in terms of business that the girls that live there only sometimes have water and lack a steady supply of food. Upon arriving at the rather dark and ugly dystopian brothel, Vicky first meets Christina (Eftyhia Yakoumi), who is surely the most crazed and hopelessly neurotic of the girls as demonstrated by the fact that she pathologically quasi-‘masturbates’ with one of her breasts while looking outside with binoculars at people she seemingly schizophrenically believes are stalking her. The leader of the bordello is the eldest member of the group and she goes simply by the name ‘The Leader’ (Jenny Kitseli of Nikolaidis’ The Loser Takes All (2002)). The leader is unquestionably the most forlorn of the group as demonstrated by various suicide attempts which include slitting her wrists with a straight razor in a bathtub. The youngest and most naively hopeful of the girls is ‘Maro the Whip’ (Arhontissa Mavrakaki) who incessantly fantasizes about having a baby, even though she is well aware that she, like all of the brothel babes, is sterile. Undoubtedly, Maro’s delusions of motherhood are partially induced by the fact that her water regularly breaks and she suffers ‘projectile miscarriages.’ To fund money for the child she will never have, Maro regularly steals money from the group that she stashes away. Maro cannot have orgasms, but she is proud of the fact that every dirty man that she comes into contact with wants to defile her. In terms of her personality and behavior, Maro seems like the ugly extreme of contemporary toxic femininity as an insanely impulsive chick that probably suffers from a nasty case of borderline personality disorder that is only compounded by her comorbid nymphomania. Ironically, despite her glaring psychological problems, Maro is indubitably the sweetest of the girls, though when one of her chick comrades dares to draw a mustache on her icon of Mother

Mary, she is thrown into an angry and violent rage. Unlike virtually all of the other women at the brothel, Maro is hardly cynical and has yet to completely lose faith and hope, but the viewer assumes it is only a matter of time before she becomes just as metaphysically dead as her friends.

Notably, the brothel has a sort of bureaucratic 'Supervisor' (fittingly played by Michele Valley, who played the eponymous lead of Evrydiki BA 2037) who makes sure the girls are turning enough tricks and bringing in enough dough. When the Supervisor mentions the fact that Christina did not service a single customer during the entire month, the Leader covers for her by claiming she engages in threesomes involving Maro (of course, considering that Christina seems like a crazed cunt of the carpet-munching sort, the Leader's explanation seems totally plausible). To give her a sort of therapeutic release, the Leader regularly smashes raw eggs on Christina's rather small bare breasts. As assumed punishment for her half-ass work habits, an invisible entity with a foul smell that is assumedly unleashed by the government violently rapes Christina in front of the other three women in an unsettling scenario in the quasi-supernaturally sleazy spirit of Sidney J. Furie's The Entity (1982). When these bizarre incidents of phantom sexual pillaging occur, the women calmly and somberly state, "The children are here again," as if they are totally used to witnessing and/or experiencing such bizarre and inexplicable phantasmagoric rape scenarios. When the Leader gets extra violent with a customer sporting a gimp mask and business suit while stating poetically sadistic things to him like, "[You] might as well forget your God down here. God is me, and this. Got it worm? I'm gonna put you in my infected juices... Empty cocoons are all you produce," the fellow is knocked unconscious and nearly dies, so the girls decide to lock him up in a cage and make him their slave. Ultimately, Maro makes the slave her own personal pet and feeds him mush while talking to him about how she is going to have his baby. Needless to say, the authorities eventually come to the brothel looking for the girls but they are far too loyal to one another to say anything.

Unlike the rest of the women in the film, protagonist Vicky once gave birth to a healthy baby girl, as well as a mutant baby no with fingers and nails growing out of its knuckles that was eventually taken by the authorities. In fact, The Zero Years features incessant black-and-white flashback scenes of little girls walking through a post-apocalyptic wasteland that seem to hint at Vicky's past life as a mother. Vicky plans to leave the whorehouse as soon as possible and tells the other three girls that they should all reunite at a seemingly imaginary ethereal beach called 'The Sea' (which was also the dream destination of the protagonist of Morning Patrol). In fact, Vicky oftentimes daydreams about her and her three new friends living a wonderful life of ultimately intangible happiness and ecstasy at the Sea. When Vicky eventually receives a letter with some important news from one of her friends, she leaves the brothel and says her goodbyes to her discernibly sullen sadomasochistic sisters, but it does not take long for her to come crawling back because, as she somberly, states, "I'm back because...I looked around for old friends out there but there are none. They're scattered, lost or in hiding...So I didn't get very far." In the end, all four girls and Maro's pet gimp have a sentimental family dinner with one another and while sharing a toast, the Leader happily declares, "I was just thinking how beautiful it is...that we're all back together again." Indeed, simply judging by the bittersweet conclusion of The Zero Years, one might assume that the director is a crypto-feminist of sorts of that loves nothing more than the thought of a group of gals bonding as a sort of hermetic sisterhood where stereotypical negative female behavior like jealousy, deceit, and vanity are nonexistent.

A culturally apocalyptic celluloid slumber party from hell set in a Greek diva whorehouse equivalent to the home featured in Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), The Zero Years ultimately feels like a tribute from auteur Nikos Nikolaidis to the countless barren women and old maids in contemporary Greece and the rest of the Europe. While Nikolaidis was certainly not a right-winger, his patently pessimistic views regarding the death of sexuality and motherhood in Europe are not all that different from those espoused by French New Right figure Guillaume Faye in his work Sexe et Dévoisement (2011) aka Sex and Deviance. Indeed, for a variety of reasons that range from insane taxes (which absurdly partially go to the funding of the children of large and mostly Islamic illegal immigrant families) to feminist-inspired careerism to the seemingly perennial war among the sexes, women are no longer having children in Europa and the indigenous populations are steadily dying out (the Mediterranean has arguably been the region that has been the most deeply impacted by this perturbing phenomenon, with Greece and Italy having especially low birth rates that signify a suicidal people with no future), but of course the death of motherhood is only one of the major themes of Nikolaidis' film. As the director insightfully revealed regarding the film's importance in terms of his 'The Shape of the Coming Nightmare' trilogy, "In terms of chronological order, this script was conceptualized before both Euridice BA 2037 and Morning Patrol. We are at the decadence of the New World Order. Silence, chemical suppression, state fascism, broken communication, fear and apathy have all been installed for good. That's why the surveillance cameras are not in use anymore... they are no longer needed. Everything is settled." Aside from his misguided statement regarding "fascism" (do any contemporary leftists even know what the word means?!), Nikolaidis' remark certainly does justice to The Zero Years, which depicts a society that is so sick that people are fully complacent with their slavery, which is covert and takes both psychological and metaphysical forms yet is nonetheless unmistakable.

Indeed, the characters of The Zero Years are the ugly extreme of Nietzsche's prophecy of the anti-Faustian 'last man,' albeit much worse. While the 'last man' is at least comfortable in his pathetic passivity, the women of Nikolaidis' film live in virtual sexual servitude yet are still too pathetically passive to fight back in any meaningful way with their enslavement of their customers arguably just being an extension of their eccentric erotic dysfunction as melancholic madams of sadomasochism. After watching the film, I could not help but think that Greece certainly needs political parties like Golden Dawn lest the ancient nation completely succumb to its own suicidal decadence. After all, the dying Greece of today is not the result of some imaginary "fascism" as described by Nikolaidis, but the sort of neo-liberal nihilism that has been eating away at the soul of Europe after the Second World War. While nowhere near as artful and intricate as the first two films in Nikolaidis' dystopian trilogy, The Zero Years was certainly a fitting way to conclude his strikingly singular filmmaking career as it takes the director's love of female characters to the extreme and demands that the viewer share their misery, thus making for a film that is not only S&M-themed but also demands that the viewer engage in a little bit of sadomasochism, at least on the spiritual level. In terms of the film's highly intimate and even claustrophobic chamber piece oriented approach to female bonding, Nikolaidis' swansong is like a Greek dystopian take on Fassbinder's early masterpiece The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), albeit in a totally idiosyncratic form that manages to create an aesthetically aberrant marriage between the women-in-prison film (WiP) exploitation subgenre and the strange realm of artsy fartsy sci-fi. Indeed, it is not often that one happens upon a fairly recent film that seems like it was directed by a man who loves Ingmar Bergman's Persona (1966) and Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) just as much as Roger Vadim's Barbarella (1968) and Chopper Chicks in Zombietown (1989), hence why The Zero Years, like most of Nikolaidis' oeuvre, will remain a celluloid oddity that is only appreciated by those cinephiles with a special love for cinema where the typically fine line between celluloid trash and high art has been ruthlessly ripped to shreds. While Nikolaidis did not conclude his filmmaking career in the most glorious of fashions (how many filmmakers do?!), he at least stayed true to his highly personalized weltanschauung and aesthetic vision and never succumbed to the influence of dubious gurus or corporations, which can hardly be said of David Lynch, who thrives on the reputation of films he created decades ago and who uses his celebrity as a means to whore himself out to one of the most preposterous pseudo-religions since Scientology.

LES ABYSSES

Nikos Papatakis (1963)

For whatever reason, the French have always had a deep and undying fetishism for criminals, with sadomasochist sodomite philosopher Michel Foucault, who was himself an undetected criminal of sorts (he intentionally infected other men with AIDS without their knowledge), once describing the crimes of 19th century poet/murderer Pierre François Lacenaire (who was depicted in Marcel Carné's 1945 classic Les enfants du paradis aka Children of Paradise and was later portrayed as the eponymous subject of Francis Girod's 1990 biopic Lacenaire aka The Elegant Criminal) as a figure who was responsible for giving birth to a new kind of lionized outlaw (as opposed to the traditional 'folk hero'). In describing the particular archetypal spirits of different European races, German philosopher Oswald Spengler would describe the English as Vikings, the Germans as Knights, and the French as Anarchists, remarking regarding Frogland, "The classical site of Western European revolutions is France. The resounding of momentous phrases, streams of blood in the streets, la sainte guillotine, terrifying nights of conflagration, heroic death at the barricades, orgies of the crazed masses—all these things point up the sadistic mentality of this race." Indeed, as the country that gave birth to the Marquis de Sade and Le Théâtre du Grand-Guignol, the French put the Krauts and Brits to shame in terms of aesthetic sadism, so it should be no surprise that many artists, writers, and intellectuals in France became obsessed with two murderous maid sisters, Christine and Léa Papin, who became outlaw heroes of sorts after they brutally killed their employer's wife and daughter in Le Mans, France, on 2 February 1933. Indeed, commie surrealists, filmmakers, philosophers, and literary figures saw the Papin bitches as proto-communist revolutionaries of sorts who were the spiritual mothers of future revolution, with Jean-Paul Sartre, Simone de Beauvoir, Jacques Lacan, Jean Genet, Claude Chabrol, and even Jean Cocteau, among countless others, paying tribute to the homicidal maidservants in one form or another. One of the most famous works based on the Papin girls is the Genet play The Maids (1947) aka Les Bonnes, with the novelist's Greek friend Nikos Papatakis—a nightclub owner turned filmmaker who funded and produced the literary outlaw's first (and ultimately last) film A Song of Love (1950) aka Un chant d'amour—also more or less adapting the story for his first feature Les abysses (1963) aka The Depths. A shockingly enthralling work about two hysterical homicidal maids of the rather misleadingly cutesy, if not equally crazed, sort who brutally kill their two female masters, Les abysses enjoyed 'Succès de scandale' upon its release and even almost caused a full-blown riot at the Cannes Film Festival. A naked melodrama with hyper histrionic acting, Papatakis's film is like a modernist take on Greek tragedy meets Fassbinder on steroids, albeit with a lesbian as opposed to homoerotic subtext. Penned by now-forgotten French avant-garde playwright Jean

LES ABYSSES

Vauthier in what would be his sole film credit, Les abysses is a scornful little film where virtually none of the characters have any redeeming qualities that was clearly designed to strike fear and terror into the hearts of the French bourgeois, so it should be no surprise that spiteful little commie frog Jean-Paul Sartre paid the work a grand compliment with the following words, "The cinema has given us its foremost tragedy." Staring two real-life sisters in the lead roles as lethal ladies whose cuteness is only transcended by their lust for criminality, Les abysses is a thrilling, chilling, and subtlety titillating sister act from prole purgatory where the poor kill the rich and are more or less treated as revolutionary saints as a result.

Michelle (Francine Bergé, who starred in Georges Franju's Judex (1963) and Joseph Losey's Mr. Klein (1976)) and her little sister Marie-Louise (Colette Bergé, who later had a small role in The Day of the Jackal (1973)) are maidservants yet they have not been paid for their work in about 3 years and the family that they work for are away and have left them to their own devices, so they have decided to bring senseless destruction to the home. The two sisters are afraid that their bosses are planning to their sell chateau, which will leave them homeless, so they take it upon themselves to make the rather quaint home unsellable by ripping the wallpaper off the wall, putting holes in other walls, making a variety of extravagant messes, hacking up chairs with knives, and putting holes in wine barrels, thus flooding the basement and wasting one million Francs worth of wine. When their bosses end up showing up early and unexpectedly, the girls accuse them of doing it on purpose so as to sneak up on them while committing unholy acts of destruction (indeed, despite their psychopathic behavior, these girls are guilty). Monsieur Andre Lapeyre (Paul Bonifas of Fanny (1961) and Charade) and his second wife Madame Lapeyre (Colette Régis of Jean Renoir's La Bête Humaine (1938) arrive with the former's adult daughter Elizabeth (Pascale de Boysson of Roman Polanski's Tess (1979))—a Bressonian figure of sorts that is arguably the most complex character in the entire film—who has separated from her husband Philippe (Jean-Louis Le Goff). Indeed, as her flagrant flirtatious behavior with Marie-Louise demonstrates, Elizabeth is a closest lesbian who has no interest in men. When the Lapeyre family arrives, the two maidservants demand their back wages and food, but they have no money to give, hence why they are planning to sell their chateau in the first place. Due to her undying love for Marie-Louise and her delusional liberal mentality, Elizabeth even attempts to beg her father and stepmother not to sell their house, but her efforts are in vain.

After Madame Lapeyre tells the girls to clean the house, they do the opposite by wrecking it and throwing fish at Elizabeth, with Michelle even shouting that she hates her whilst spitefully tossing the slimy aquatic creatures at her boss' mostly kindhearted daughter. Meanwhile, the Madame attempts to convince her husband to fire the girls, but he can't because, as he remarks, "How can I fire them if I can't pay them? We owe them 3 years' wage," though he does decide to plot his revenge against the maids after realizing that they have ruined all of his wine, which the prospective buyers of his home house were planning to pay him good money for. After little Marie-Louise collapses while doing 'work' (aka wrecking the house), her sister Michelle accuses Madame Lapeyre of being inhuman and trying to kill her sister. Eventually, Michelle makes the following threat to her bosses (though she only says it to herself): "This is the last straw. To you, I'm just a maid. I wasn't born to empty garbage cans...I don't enjoy soiling myself in your filth...stepping in your muck...or emptying Monsieur's spittoon. You cannot forget we are maids...but...you'll see, strange things will happen." Indeed, being the elder of the two sisters, Michelle is the dominant one and does not think twice about smacking her little sis across the face for the most minor of infractions (i.e. giggling). When Madame Lapeyre once again attempts to get the girls to do some work, Michelle refuses and makes the rather absurd claim, "This is our property! We are no longer your servants. Bitch! You Bitch! Get out of here! You owe us 3 years' pay [...] We are here legally as co-owners." Of course, as a bitter old bitch, Madame Lapeyre makes for the perfect nemesis to Michelle, retorting to the malefic girl with the rather snide remark, "You're trying to ruin us. You damaged everything on purpose...You unplugged the wine. You cost us a million francs...You deprived animals. I don't dare say what I really think." Desperate to get the maids off her back, the Madame attempts to reconcile with the girls and offers them enough money to buy a 'chicken home' on the Lapeyre estate, but the girls are greedy and they want everything, so Michelle rejects the offer. When Elizabeth flirts with Marie-Louise at the dinner by caressing and complimenting her "artistic fingers," Michelle becomes severely agitated, so to appease her sister she spits her food in the Lapeyre girl's pretty little face. After dinner, Marie-Louise and Michelle stalk Elizabeth outside and the former accuses her of being a lesbian, hatefully stating, "It's the Holy communion you're after...That's what you want, you pervert!" After calling her a dyke, Michelle holds Elizabeth and forces Marie-Louise to violently beat her, which she does with gusto. Despite the emotional and physical brutality she has just received at the hands of the two maids, Elizabeth attempts to kill Michelle with kindness by remarking, "Michelle, I think you're only wicked on the surface" and offering to split the house with the two girls if her father dies (since Madame Lapeyre is not her real mother and she signed a prenuptial agreement, Liz inherits everything if her father dies) because, as she sentimentality states, "That way we could always be together." Of course, their relationship is not even going to last the night, as Michelle has murder on her mind.

When Madame Lapeyre discovers her stepdaughter Elizabeth's plan to split her inheritance with the two maids, she accuses the trio of plotting her hubby's death. After hearing of his daughter's dubious plans, Monsieur Lepeyre decides to smack his daughter Liz around. Towards the end of the film, Elizabeth's ex-husband Philippe, who is a swarthy fat cuckold of a candy ass toad, arrives with the couple that plan to buy the Lapeyre home and Michelle and Marie-Louise immediately begin attempting to sabotage the sale, telling the prospective buyers the home is infested with termites and that the owners are evil slave-drivers. When the two 'unconventionally sexy' sisters decide to put on their maid outfits for the first time in the film, the buyer's laugh their asses off in a rather cruel fashion, as the girls have expressions on their faces that scream of meekness and abject degradation. While the girls attempt to serve the hosts, they fail miserably as they cannot even successfully fill up cups with coffee without spilling it on everyone. The last straw for Michelle comes when Elizabeth touches Marie-Louise's skirt, as the crazed cutie does not take too kindly to girls touching her little sister's leg, so she attacks the Lapeyre girl from behind like a rabid monkey, cannibalistically bites her on the throat, and begins stabbing her repeatedly in the gut with a butcher knife in a scene that, in terms of pure visceral violence, puts the iconic shower scene in Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) to shame. While Michelle savagely slaughters Elizabeth, perennial follower Marie-Louise picks up an iron and brutally beats Madame Lapeyre to death with it. After finding the two women's corpses, the prospective buyers and Elizabeth's ex-husband Philippe accuse Monsieur Lapeyre of causing the deaths. While Philippe hatefully berates Monsieur Andre by calling him a vile and weak coward, the buyer says to him, "Your stupidity caused their deaths. You are the real murderer. You poor fool." In the final scene of the film, Monsieur Lapeyre, Philippe, and the buyer and his wife stare directly into the camera rather intently. The film closes with the following epilogue: "In late fall, 1933, in the town of Le Mans, France, the Sisters Papin were tried in the court of Assises. They were adjudged guilty of murder and sentenced...The elder sister to death, the younger to imprisonment. Yes...The record shows that the court itself raised the question: "Who Is Truly Guilty Here?"

While Les abysses attempts to portray the two murderesses as victims who were provoked to kill due to the exploitation they experienced at the hands of their employer, the film ultimately made me go so far as to reconsider slavery, as the maidservants were so innately idiotic, dangerously compulsive, and insanely irrational in their nonsensical and ultimately nihilistic actions that there is no way that they could run their own lives and are thus better off if someone else, even if a family of banal boobeoise bastards does it for them. Indeed, the film also unwittingly demonstrates that slaves are typically more brutal, needlessly cruel, and callous than their masters and it is not simply due to their deep-seated desire for revenge, but also because they have no experience with power and thus abuse it, hence why they go all the way and kill their bosses in a fit of homicidal fury. While I cannot say that I have studied the crimes of Christine and Léa Papin closely, judging solely by Les abysses, I think it is nothing short of patently pathetic that anyone would consider the two sisters heroes, be they working-class or otherwise. The 'Les abysses' of the film is in the Nietzschean sense and is taken from a reference made by Elizabeth Lapeyre to Michelle, with the following obscenely overused 146 aphorism from the German philosopher's work Beyond Good and Evil (1886) more or less describing the two murderers' predicament: "He who fights with monsters should look to it that he himself does not become a monster. And when you gaze long into an abyss the abyss also gazes into you." Undoubtedly, Les abysses has had some influence on French culture, as Joël Séria's excellent artsploitation flick Don't Deliver Us from Evil (1971) aka Mais ne nous délivrez pas du mal—a work very loosely based on the Parker–Hulme murder case (which also inspired Peter Jackson's 1994 film Heavenly Creatures) with lesbian undertones—seems to be a modernist reworking of Papatakis' film. In some ways, Czech auteur Věra Chytilová's classic Daisies (1966) aka Sedmikrásky—a work about two exceedingly moronic counter-culture-brainwashed chicks that have an affinity for wasting food and destroying other peoples' homes—seems like a parody of Les abysses, albeit with the two anti-heroines rightfully dying in the end. Of course, Jean Genet's take on the Papin sisters story would be cinematically adapted by the British director Christopher Miles in 1975 under the title of The Maids in a film starring Glenda Jackson and Susannah York, but this work seems quite tediously tame when compared to Papatakis' pernicious little psychodrama, though it is certainly worth checking out. Rather startlingly enthralling and morally dubious for a work of its time, Les abysses is a rare piece of 'revolutionary melodrama' that goes all way and is rarely plagued by the commie con of moral self-righteousness, as Papatakis may have attempted to paint the two deadly dames as victims, but there is also no question that both girls are quite deranged. Predating the May 1968 events in France where a series of Trotskyite student protests sparked the striking of 11,000,000 workers (more than 22% of the total population of France) and almost caused the collapse of French President Charles de Gaulle's government by half a decade, Les abysses ultimately makes the working-class struggle seem a lot more romantic than pedantic pinkos like Jean-Luc Godard would later portray it. Indeed, Les abysses is sort of a wonderfully aberrant missing link between classic French Quality Cinema and the French New Wave and is thus of interest as both a piece of French cinema history and as a heretical study in class relations and fucked female psychology.

GLORIA MUNDI

Nikos Papatakis (1976)

Despite their professed love of freedom, humanism, equality, and liberation, it oftentimes seemed that far-left European filmmakers, especially of the Mediterranean persuasion, of the late-1960s/1970s had a special affinity for perversion, sadomasochism, hatred, and vulgarity, with Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) representing arguably the apex of such highly (pseudo)intellectualized aesthetic savagery, though Bernardo Bertolucci, Liliana Cavani, and Marco Ferreri, among countless other auteurs, did their part as well to turn cinema into a form of terrorism. Of course, for every Pasolini or Ferreri flick, there were also films by somewhat lesser known but no less subversive auteur filmmakers like Alberto Cavallone (Spell – Dolce mattatoio aka Man, Woman and Beast, Blue Movie), Salvatore Samperi (Cuore di mamma aka Mother's Heart, Uccidete il vitello grasso e arrostitelo aka Kill the Fatted Calf and Roast It), Giulio Questi (Django Kill, Death Laid an Egg), and Elio Petri (A Quiet Place in the Country, Todo modo), among countless others, that tested the bounds of celluloid decency, with Greek-French filmmaker Nikos Papatakis (Les abysses, Thanos and Despina) being a particularly interesting case of leftist artsploitation filmmaking that would certainly baffle today's much softer leftist ideologues. Born in Ethiopia in 1918 where he would eventually join the army of Haile Selassie (a man that later became the supposed 'messiah' of the Rastafari movement) as a teenager in 1935 to fight Mussolini's invasion, Papatakis relocated to Paris in 1939 and soon established himself as a film extra, with his first major film credit being the producer of queer criminal novelist Jean Genet's sole film, A Song of Love (1950) aka Un chant d'amour. Indeed, homo Genet became infatuated with the handsome hetero, even dedicating his poem 'La Galère' ('The Galley') to "Nico, the Greco-Ethiopian god." Among other things, the filmmaker eventually married French Jewish Fellini actress and possible ancestor of Captain Alfred Dreyfus, Anouk Aimée (La Dolce Vita, 8 1/2), in 1951 and acted as a co-producer on John Cassavetes' first feature Shadows (1959) after temporarily seeking exile in NYC during the early 1950s due to his disgust with the colonialist practices of the French during the Algerian War of Independence. For his audacious directing debut Les Abysses (1963), Papatakis loosely adapted Genet's popular play Les Bonnes, which went on to achieve 'Succès de scandale,' so it should be no surprise that the auteur decided to up the ante in terms of aesthetic subversion with his subsequent works, with his film Gloria mundi (1976) aka In Hell aka Tortura—a sort of aesthetically terroristic anti-colonialist piece of meta-cinema that almost totally ruined the filmmaker's career—being easily his most hateful and subversive work to date. Indeed, a film-within-a-film about a considerably crazed neo-bolshevik babe who has been so terribly brainwashed by the (un)holy writ of anti-Saint Marx and his devout disciples by her communist revolutionary/filmmaker boyfriend that she is willing to literally torture herself and carry bombs around Paris for the commie cause, In Hell is also a work that is quite unintentionally incriminating in terms of making far-left filmmakers seem like sicko sadists, as a majorly misanthropic film of the innately sadomasochistic sort that seeks to throw the viewer into an aberrant void of visual and emotional perniciousness and daunting displeasure. A soul-stabbing piece of quasi-art-porn agitprop steeped in nihilism, emotional and political hysteria, and incessant anti-erotic nudity, the film features women intentionally burning their breasts with cigarettes in what is sort of a warped form of method acting, a French officer shoving a glass bottle into the naughty bits of an Algerian 'freedom fighter' (aka terrorist), and an Algerian belly dancer who can pick up and open bottles with her Islamic cooch. A damning depiction of an unseen filmmaker who coerces his actress/girlfriend/baby mama/slave/disciple into literally torturing herself while rehearsing for a film in limbo that will probably never be finished about the torture of Algerian terrorists by purported frog fascist imperialists, In Hell is a work that ironically portrays the filmmaker as a torturer, terrorist, misogynist and demented debaser who demonstrates his cowardice by using women to carry out his dirty work, as well as a film that portrays communists as bourgeois posers with too much time on their hands, thus making it seem quite inexplicable that it was directed by a staunch left-winger like Nikos Papatakis. Featuring Papatakis' then-wife Olga Karlatos in the lead role as a lovelorn actress who electrocutes her own genitals to appease her degenerate boy toy, In Hell is undoubtedly one of the most troubling cases of life imitating celluloid art and vice versa ever made.

Algerian-born actress Galai (played by Olga Karlatos, who appeared in work ranging from Lucio Fulci's Zombi 2 aka Zombie to Sergio Leone's Once Upon a Time in America to the musical Purple Rain starring Prince) is a fanatical woman with an unhealthy affinity for revolutionary politics and acting, but her biggest and most deleterious obsession is her filmmaker/revolutionary boyfriend Hamdias, who, although hiding out in some undisclosed location, still manages to keep his girlfriend/actress under his complete and callous control via audio recordings and phone calls. Galai incessantly studies audio tapes given to her by Hamdias that she uses as a guide for acting and terrorist activity, as she wants her boyfriend to recognize her sacrifice as both a lover and freedom fighter and she is willing to do just about anything to obtain his respect and acceptance. During the first couple minutes of In Hell, Galai practices screaming while suffering inexplicable torture by giving herself real electric shocks to her nipples and genitals while sitting in a bathtub. She is also not shy about putting out cigarettes on her breasts, which are covered with a number of nasty burn marks and scars. Galai's hope is that by successfully doing whatever Hamdias demands, she will be united with him and their lovechild. When Hamdias becomes disappointed with Galai's completely genuine screams of pain and berates her over the phone with the following words, “Shut up! A real terrorist doesn’t scream as you do! You scream like a slut who likes it! This is not a brothel! This is France! You behave like the scum that you are, you and the race you come from!” the little lady naturally has a bit of a freakout of sorts and complains to her boyfriend, “I almost stripped my own flesh to rehearse your scenes. Look what you’ve reduced me to! I’m full of blisters. You’ll end this film Hamdias... You’ll end it, one day.” Indeed, Galai takes method acting to new extremes and she has the unflattering battle scars to prove it. When Galai meets up with a prick of a producer named Raftal (Roland Bertin) about funding the rest of the film she and Hamdias are working on, the money man tells her that her boyfriend is a negligent father and “madman” who absurdly puts his energy into politics when he does not even have food to eat.

Indeed, Hamdias is working on an arthouse work set over a two decade period about the torture of Algerian female terrorists and he is proud to admit that his film has no story, nudity (although it does feature nudity, albeit of the anti-erotic sort), nor myths, hence why Raftal will not produce the work as it will not make him any money. Raftal convinces Galai to show him her tits by tricking her into thinking he might give her an acting role in an upcoming film, but instead, the only thing he gives her is a cigar burn on one of her breasts. Clearly deranged and a seasoned master of masochism, Galai merely laughs when Raftal burns her as she is far too desensitized as a result of Hamdias’ incessant abuse to give a damn about such an insignificant injury from such an insignificant man. Later that day, an exceedingly paranoid guy with long hippy hair named Torres, who is a member of the same terrorist cell as her boyfriend, comes by Galai’s apartment briefly and gives her money, but he also accuses her and Hamdias of working for the CIA. Indeed, Torres is pissed that Galai has a bomb that she is carrying around in her purse and speculates that she and her boyfriend are part of an elaborate CIA plot to bring down the communist group and he even threatens to ‘neutralize’ Hamdias. Later on, Galai receives a letter from Torres’ terrorist cell claiming that she has jeopardized the entire group with her erratic behavior and that she will be ‘eliminated’ if she does not get rid of her explosives in two hours. Hopelessly devoted to her lunatic lover, Galai opts for keeping the explosives and ditching her apartment. When Galai visits her boyfriend’s cinematographer, he demands that Hamdias must choose between being either a filmmaker or international terrorist, but the revolutionary auteur does not see any difference between the professions. Galai eventually gets the bright idea to hide the bomb at a Catholic Church, but when she asks the priest, he violently kicks her out and condemns her for making a “provocation under God’s roof.” Under Hamdias advice, Galai tries to seek shelter with her boyfriend’s sculptor/terrorist friend Naki (Mehmet Ulusoy), but he knocks her out and tries to rape her but vomits instead because he is so repulsed by the cigarette burns on her bosoms. After shoving some cash down her panties, Naki gives the following rant against his ex-buddy Hamdias: “he wants blood, violence, armed fighting. In May ’68, he had the dance in the streets, the dance of death. Revolution! Let’s take on the immigrant workers. The only ones who can get mobilized by despair! He is not only imbued with utopias, he’s also a fool! We need to be coherent, he said, if you’re a revolutionary of art then you must be in politics too!” After bashing Galai’s beloved Hamdias and refusing to hold her bomb, Naki is of course snidely berated by angst-addled actress, who states, “Sometime communist, sometime anarchist [...] How do you justify your cowardice?” Indeed, there is no question about it, Galai is the toughest character in the entire film, even if she is an emotional train-wreck, as she has the power of (un)love on her side.

After bitching out Naki, Galai goes on her merry way and heads to a private screening of the footage from the unfinished film she and Hamdias are attempting to find funding for, but little does she realize that a bourgeois bitch named Marsanne (Christiane Tissot) has hatched an elaborate trap and is planning to kill the filmmaker there. Indeed, Marsanne is a disgruntled lover of Hamdias who is brainwashed by feminism and wants to get even with her ex-lover, who she accuses of treachery, even though she is apparently still in love with him. When she arrives at the screening, which takes place at a fancy mansion inhabited by rather wealthy left-wing ideologues, Galai is given some elegant clothing to wear by Marsanne in an act of seemingly unlikely kindness. Of course, Marsanne is merely wearing a mask of pseudo-civility, as she soon begins showing her true self by talking trash about Hamdias, even describing him as a “phallocentric Pygmalion” who pretends to be motivated by his desire for “freeing colonized people” yet is against the so-called “de-colonization of the woman.” Naturally, at this point, Galai becomes quite agitated by the negative remarks made about her boyfriend/torturer and begins to quote Hamdias’ revolutionary writings word-for-word as if she is some sort of commie automaton on overdrive, so Marsanne calls her an “under-educated revolutionary,” among various other not so nice things. When another guest at the screening remarks about “the clitoris’ submission to the penis,” Marsanne responds with the following venomous and vulgar words, “We live in an age where an irresistible movement towards community happiness has come to life. Well, I’ll reassure you, little reactionary parrot: a cunt receiving dick or a dick faring her well, once they’re washed they’re like new!” At this point, Galai has lost all semblance of sanity and yells to Marsanne and her friends, “We can’t stand proletarian pseudo-bourgeois any longer! End with civilization. We are ill with dogmas and dogmatisms plagued by liberating pseudo-libidos leprous with ideological colonization, liberalism, imperialism, and Stalinism...infected with neo-Christianism and neo-spiritualism and eaten away by Freud’s disease and the cancer Fascism and social bourgeoisie! You’re all syphilitic! Consumptive! Rotten,” and then proceeds to smash a TV screen. After all of the drama begins to cool down, Galai, Marsanne, and the rest of the guests finally get around to seeing the footage from Hamdias' unfinished film, which is about a French soldier who has a forbidden romance with an Algerian belly dancer (played by Galai) who can pickup and open bottles with her vagina. Flash forward two decades later, the French soldier is now an officer who tortures his former belly dancer girlfriend's terrorist daughter (who was a baby in the scenes from two decades before), even shoving a bottle up her vagina to the point where she bleeds profusely from her gash and then loses all consciousness. After the screening, a perverted psychiatrist comes up to Galai and remarks how the film is fascinating because of its supposed "obsession with maternal vagina." Eventually, the psychiatrist loses it after Galai says he resembles Hamdais and attempts to shove a bottle up the actress' snatch, but she has no problem beating up the intellectual weakling. From there, Galai attempts to kill everyone at the screening with her bomb, but it is soon exposed that the bomb in question is not real, so the guests then proceed to gang up on the actress and verbally and physically assault her. In the end, Marsanne and her co-conspirators attempt to get Galai to call Hamdais on the phone, as they have attached a bomb to the phone line that will detonate if the filmmaker picks up, but naturally his long suffering girlfriend refuses to do so. Of course, when Galai arrives at Hamdais' apartment, he is already dead.

Featuring a woman that seems more demonically possessed than Linda Blair in William Friedkin's The Exorcist (1973) and is like the virtual prototype for Isabelle Adjani's character in Andrzej Zulawski's Possession (1981), In Hell is certainly not a film you should see if you suffer from a hysterical girlfriend with erratic behavior, as the work might push you over the edge of sanity due to its positively perturbing and unnerving portrayal of a woman under the influence of semi-insanity and lovesickness. Considering auteur Nikos Papatakis was married twice and he clearly subjected his second wife Olga Karlatos to torture while shooting In Hell, one can only speculate how autobiographical the film is. Indeed, while watching the work, all I could think about was how it felt like an unintentional parody of filmmakers like Albert Cavallone, who essentially ruined his life and career due to his uncompromising vision as a subversive filmmaker who refused to play by the rules, but it seems that Papatakis was to some degree attacking himself, which is a commendable act for any artist. Featuring references to Luis Buñuel (a The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie (1972) poster is featured prominently during the beginning of the film) and advertised with a quote by Friedrich Nietzsche, In Hell is certainly not the exploitation trash that certain DVD companies and gorehounds try to pass it off as nowadays, but of course, like Pasolini's Salò, the infamy of the work's aesthetic brutality will always transcend its artistic merit. As far as I am concerned, In Hell is more or less the cinematic confession of a uniquely unhinged auteur/revolutionary that may feature a prominent, it not superlatively shallow, anti-colonialist message of sorts, but is really a character study about master and slave relationships (i.e.

Unflinchingly anti-bourgeois and extremely critical of far-left revolutionaries and neo-commie terrorists (in the film, the bourgeois and far-left revolutionaries are essentially one in the same), In Hell is ultimately in the idiosyncratic 'anti-leftist leftist' tradition of Dušan Makavejev (WR: Mysteries of the Organism, The Coca-Cola Kid) as a scathing and quasi-scatological critique of the far-left from the far-left, thus making it a work that will probably appeal more to right-wing anarchists/libertines than contemporary pansy leftists, who tend to be rather intolerant people that get offended by mere words (i.e. 'tranny', 'nigger', 'bitch') and certainly could not bear to see a commie comrade have a bottle shoved up her cunt. Of course, more than anything, the film is a work of unflinching celluloid misanthropy that attacks everyone, not least of all 'bobos' (bourgeois bohemians). Of course, In Hell did not just offend certain members of the left upon its release; as the film was apparently withdrawn from distribution upon its release because some rightwingers threatened to plant bombs in any theater that dared to screen the film and thus the work would not be screened in a Paris theater again until 2005. I must admit that In Hell is my first introduction to Papatakis and at the very least, it has enticed me enough to want to dig up the auteur filmmaker's entire oeuvre. Papatakis may have fought against Mussolini's Guido heroes and professed to be a leftist, but like the fictional filmmaker Hamdias of In Hell, he was most certainly a demented dictator of sorts who used and abused people, including his wife, for his art, which is certainly something any serious cinephile can appreciate, whether they want to admit it or not.

Nimród Antal (2010)

The substantial realization that we might never get a decent Predator nor Alien revival has been becoming more and more of a cold reality. After the death of Stan Winston, it just appeared that all hope had vaporized along with any honor that might have still been beating in the Predators ruthless hearts. With word of Robert Rodriguez spearheading a continuation/reboot/remake, I began to feel a little more calm towards the concept. After all, it could never be as bad as either of those Alien vs. Predator films, right? Soon word was handed that Rodriguez jumped from the director's chair to producer and passed the project onto Nimród Antal, the director known for directing Armored, that mediocre bowel movement only saved by Jean Reno. With a credible "experiment" in showcasing African-American poverty and the trials & tribulations of an honest black worker, could Nimród Antal create a film that is fluent with the mythology and the technology of the Predator mythos? Better yet, can anyone sit through the credits of the film without giggling? Predators opens up blindingly fast with a shot of Adrien Brody's face rippling in the wind as he plummets towards "Earth" at what I'd guess to be 125 miles per hour. After regaining consciousness and swearing rather loudly, he begins frantically beating at this alien device on his chest until the chute deploys at nearly 1000 feet before ground leaving him free-falling through the trees and hitting the ground with a wincing crunch. The screen switches to black and the Predators title block appears. The opening is not only one of the greatest set ups in action/horror history but shocks the participating audience as well. All three times I've seen this film, after the feature presentation snipe plays, the audience is murmuring and gossiping only to be interrupted by the crude sound of wind resistance and flapping cheeks. Everyone redirects their focus to the screen and remains silent for most of the film, only letting out a hearty chuckle at the comedic relief's more important lines e.g. "Fuck you, space faggot!!" As soon as the cast becomes acquainted with much chagrin, they form an unlikely fellowship and the film hits a very familiar and welcome chord with the paranoia and fear of the unknown that was so arresting in the science-fiction containment odyssey Cube. Predators in fine-print is the rawest nature of Cube injected with Predators only the setting is randomly generated by what could have been a similar engine used in SimCity. This not only creates a new experience from any Predator film we've seen but ultimately makes Predators its own film, not borrowing many likenesses from the sequel and only consisting of nods to the original John McTiernan's action juggernaut and winks to the comics. While the film suffers from the pick-and-kill method of eliminating characters as if they were host to a mundane form of roulette, Predators still features enough surprises to keep your mind vastly entertained. It really doesn't matter if you enjoyed the machismo-ill nature of the original Predator or the street-smart Urban temper tantrum that is Predator 2. If your instinct and taste leads you to either of these two cult favorites then you're in the clear to enjoy the tactful extravaganza that is Predators. If you happen to be a fan of Alien vs. Predator and have no desire to see "boring jungle movies" then you can kindly hit ALT + F4 and do us all a favor. What you and I doubted about Adrien Brody has been proved to be incorrect. As we'd love to doubt his ability in a science fiction action film, Brody assumes the macho hero role as if he'd been built from the ground up with it. Sure, the body mass in Predator can never be superseded by the cast of Predators but our questionably tasting ethnic marinade is created with Danny Trejo as a monster Mexican degenerate, Topher Grace as a weaselly doctor, and several "can't point my finger on it's" as they pickpocket similar roles or unfamiliar, as if there was an alternative. The way Predators is constructed is quite simple; Antal and Rodriguez takes a formula known to work and installs a nature of gusto into this reprisal as to excite the static youth into admiring something that isn't comparable to Modern Warfare or energy drinks by bringing the war and the energy. It's been an exciting year for Adrien Brody. This Oscar-winning actor has had 3 different ranges of characters to cover from Predators de facto miniature ass-kicker to Splice's wimpy deviant and finally to The Experiment's struggling musician/activist who gets himself knees deep in Forest Whitaker's shit. Predators is one of those films that struggles to keep the fans happy while sacrificing some of their dignity in the process. There is no doubt in my mind that this may be second or third to Scott Pilgrim vs. the World for pure, unadulterated fun but Predators will be too much for some die hard fans to chew, especially after learning of extraterrestrial boar-beasts being unleashed on our survivors. Predators is its own solemn entity and I appraise its finesse in bringing a new spin on the tale.

DE PALMA
DE PALMA

Noah Baumbach* (2016)

Unlike superlatively soulless anti-poets-cum-pop-artists like Quentin Tarantino and prosaically pretentious pseudo-arthouse posers like Darren Aronofsky, who I will always loathe with an unrivaled passion, Brian De Palma (Dressed to Kill, Scarface)—a virtual deracinated wop Hitchcock, albeit even more materialistic and pathologically-inclined—is a filmmaker that I used to really, really hate but have somewhat warmed up to over the years, in part because I look at him and his oeuvre from a quite different perspective than when I initially judged his work. Indeed, when comparing De Palma to great cinematic artists like Ingmar Bergman and Carl Theodor Dreyer or truly subversive auteurs like Fassbinder and Pasolini, his films seem like shallow exercises in masturbatory technical aptitude and excess-ridden escapism, but when one looks at him like his hero Alfred Hitchcock (who, not surprisingly, came from an engineering background that involved, “mechanics, electricity, acoustics, and navigation”) as a sort of hyper-rational scientific and mathematical-minded nerd of sorts as opposed to an intuitive artist or poet (in fact, De Palma first studied Physics, Math, and Russian in college), his films can be appreciated as sort of insanely immaculately stylized sleaze and the masterful expressions of a corpse-cold megalomaniacal mind; or, in short, the diseased Faustian male mind of modernity. In short, De Palma is a sort of ‘tyrannical technical auteur’ with the virtual mind of an Asperger surgeon (which was his much resented father’s trade) that somewhat curiously got involved in the art of cinema, yet an auteur nonetheless as his entire body of work is riddled with the same obsessive themes/tropes (e.g. perverted voyeurs, slutty/bitchy blondes, antisocial antiheroes, political conspiracy/corruption, etc.) that one would expect from an artist with his own distinct Weltanschauung.

While De Palma still makes films, he is clearly well past his prime and has now become, not unlike his American New Wave/New Hollywood buddies like Peter Bogdanovich and especially Martin Scorsese, a sort of prematurely enshrined cinematic hero and legend among young filmmakers that fetishize that era (without question, out of all the modern young filmmakers that are obsessed with this period, Paul Thomas Anderson, who is like the cinematic broad of Hal Ashby and Robert Altman, has been the most successful in terms of capturing its spirit). Undoubtedly, probably the greatest example of this new De Palma hero worship is the hardly-popular documentary De Palma (2015) co-directed by fellow mischling filmmakers Noah Baumbach and Jake Paltrow where the eponymous auteur gets in virtual VH1 Behind the Music mode and summarizes his entire career in a fairly candid and vaguely personalized fashion that emphasizes his professional highs and lows (yet mostly ignores his failed marriages, children, etc.). Just as Bogdanovich once did the same by promoting the work of older cinematic heroes like Orson Welles and John Ford, Baumbach followed in this tradition by not only producing the De Palma doc but also co-producing (with fellow exceedingly emasculated hipster humorist Wes Anderson) the mostly mediocre screwball comedy She's Funny That Way (2014). Rather unfortunately, quite unlike Bogdanovich, who certainly paid his dues in terms of cinematic research, these younger hipster filmmakers seem to be way less literate and cultivated than their filmic forefathers so instead of getting something like the classic film text Hitchcock/Truffaut (1966) by François Truffaut (which, incidentally, acted as the subject of a 2015 documentary of the same name directed by Kent Jones), we get a sort of less involved documentary equivalent where the filmmaker is never seriously challenged but instead offers a mostly chronological summary of his failures and successes while (rightly) condemning the corrupt industry that oftentimes failed him as a filmmaker. Indeed, as De Palma states in the doc, "The Hollywood system we work in, it does nothing but destroy you. There's nothing good about it in terms of creativity. So, you're battling a very difficult system, and all the values of that system are the opposite of to what goes into making original, good movies." Starting in the underground as someone influenced by everything from static Warhol trash to Michelangelo Antonioni's existential (anti)melodramas and learning the trade by making propaganda for the NAACP and amateur shorts for underground film festivals, De Palma's life has certainly been one long strange cinematic journey so it is not surprising that Baumbach and Paltrow's 107-minute doc feels like the CliffsNotes version of his career.

Aside from a couple exceptions, including Get to Know Your Rabbit (1972) and the apparently-uneven commercial sci-fi-horror-thriller The Fury (1978), I am very familiar with De Palma's oeuvre and even went to the effort of watching his endearingly crude experimental cinephiliac short Woton's Wake (1962), formative meta-horror feature Murder à la Mod (1968), and 'avant-garde' split-screen doc Dionysus in '69 (1970), so I am very well aware that the auteur has a big veiny pulsating hard-on for Hitchcock and, to a lesser extent, Jean-Luc Godard. In fact, De Palma's glaring flaunting of these influences is one of the reasons that I initially found his films to be so outstandingly annoying, as I may be a cinephile but it is hard for me to respect a filmmaker that knows a lot about cinema but very little bit about real-life (not to mention, culture, philosophy, etc.). Yet, as the documentary, which rather fittingly begins with footage from Vertigo, reveals, De Palma's personality is indubitably intertwined in his work as he is, not unlike a character from one of his many films, a voyeuristic pervert of sorts that not only played peeping tom on his philandering father, but also broke into his padre's office to get photographic evidence of these traumatic extramarital excursions (not surprisingly, as he alludes to in the doc, De Palma is a mommy's boy). While he does not say it outright, De Palma recognizes he is an exceedingly emotionless prick that, due to circumstances, was forced by circumstance to develop a fighting spirit, or as he explains in a relatively cold and collected fashion, “I lived in a family full of these incredible egotists who seemed to be very insensitive about the kind of damage they were doing to each other and my middle brother is very sensitive. I don’t feel that he was powerful enough to stand up to these forces. I used to protect him all the time. He doesn’t have the kind of combativeness that I have. So, it would be like this little kid trying to say, ‘Stop shouting, it’s not his fault.’ And nobody would pay any attention to me and I was basically ineffective, and I became very tough because of that.” Indeed, while De Palma did not get the opportunity to cut up human flesh like his father, he got to cinematically simulate it many times in a highly sensationalized fashion and ultimately project such unsavory fantasies to millions of people from around the world via his fucked films. In short, De Palma’s films, which are big on a certain unnerving soullessness and artifice, are the natural, albeit patently perverted, consequence of the innate soullessness and artifice of suburbia.

In the doc, De Palma makes it quite clear that he was big on babes from an early age and was prone to do stupid things to impress them, including quite characteristically secretly filming an all-female sex ed class. Naturally, the auteur would eventually use his success as a filmmaker to become a would-be pussy-magnet of sorts and this led to three curiously short-lived failed marriages, including his first (and longest) marriage to Dressed to Kill (1980) and Blow Out (1981) star Nancy Allen (who undoubtedly owes the best roles of her career to De Palma). Not exactly the handsomest or most kindhearted of bourgeois goombah chaps, it is not easy to see why it might be somewhat hard for De Palma—a reasonably educated fellow from a well-off yet dysfunctional upper-middleclass family—to keep a dame, but there seems to be more complicated reasons, namely his obscenely obsessive workaholic loner mentality. Indeed, as the filmmaker proudly boasts in the doc, “That’s the upside of being a loner, for the most part, you can suddenly say, ‘This isn’t working.’” Somewhat surprisingly considering his dorky exterior, De Palma also reveals an alpha-male-mentality when it comes to women and work, even boasting in the doc, “People in your life can be threatened by your intense concentration, your complete immersion in what you’re doing. My true wife is my movie, not you.” Of course, this also explains De Palma’s sheer and utter lack of a knack for the truly romantic despite his flagrant obsession for fine (unclad) female flesh. In that sense, De Palma’s films are about as sexually mature as the sort of slasher trash that he wonderfully parodies in a Psycho-esque fashion at the beginning of Blow Out. Undoubtedly, it is also fitting that De Palma’s failed Nicholas Cage vehicle Snake Eyes (1998)—a morally confused political-thriller that begins with a bang but fizzles out like lame sex—concludes on a question mark as far as the semi-sleazy antihero Rick Santoro’s romantic interests are concerned. While De Palma might be a sometimes obnoxiously formulaic filmmaker, he’s also somewhat of a realist and cynic that knows nothing in life is guaranteed, especially where love is concerned.

As his incredibly uneven Godardian comedy Greetings (1968)—a film even more insufferably dated than Godard's Two or Three Things I Know About Her (1967) and La Chinoise (1967)—reveals in a rather obnoxious fashion, De Palma is a proud draft-dodger and he even goes so far as to detail his experiences in a shamelessly self-satisfied manner in the doc, remarking with a certain sickening degree of bourgeois chutzpah, "I mean, if you wanted to stay out of the war, and you were a middle-class kid, you could figure out a way to do it. I finally had to go in and I had a letter from a doctor. I took everything to make me allergic, so I could hardly breathe. I was up all night and I was running around, wheezing. They took me right to the psychiatrist. I had to dead stare right at his forehead and talked about my homosexual feelings. I was a communist. I was a homosexual. I was crazy. And I think with my letter from my doctor, that got me out." While I can certainly see why someone would not want to fight in the Vietnam War, De Palma—a rather soft guy that seems like he's never even been in a fistfight—would go on to cinematically heap insult on injury to the young vets of his generation by directing the trying antiwar turd Casualties of War (1989) where he uses his privileged position as a famous filmmaker to depict GIs as sociopathic rapist killers of the inordinately ravenous redneck sort (and, of course, it is urban half-Hebrew Sean Penn of all putrid people portraying such a preposterous caricature). Aside from working with rather redundant material on a case that had already been covered almost two decades earlier in a more intriguing and subversive fashion by German auteur Michael Verhoeven's O.K. (1970)—a film so controversial that it literally caused the end of the 1970 Berlin International Film Festival after the jury president, overrated Hollywood maverick George Stevens, demanded that the flick be removed, thereupon resulting in the resignations of the festival directors—De Palma's Vietnam War flick is pure sensationalized shit; or, more specifically, grotesquely emotionally manipulative celluloid manure as directed by a shameless draft-dodger that actually dares to shit on men that were considerably less fortunate than him. After all, De Palma's Scarface collaborator Oliver Stone might have some rather retarded political beliefs, but he at least served bravely in the Vietnam War (where he was injured twice in combat) and thus earned the right to direct a film like Platoon (1986), which is naturally totally superior to Casualties of War. Notably, De Palma would do almost the same exact thing with his all-the-more-insufferable digital diarrhea pseudo-doc Redacted (2007). Aside from being audaciously aberrant agitprop of the lowest order, this positively putrid abortion demonstrates De Palma's desperation in terms of attempting to be relevant as a filmmaker as it is found-footage-feces—a popular cheap gimmick at the time it was made—where the auteur discards what he does best in terms of technical prowess. Needless to say, Palma's war films have about as much sincerity and credibility as a serious dramatic film about child sexual abuse as directed by Roman Polanski or Woody Allen.

Admittedly, another reason I used to have a much lower opinion of De

DE PALMA

Palma is because he is responsible for directing the favorite films of wiggers, rappers, and gutter-dwelling gangsters, including Scarface (1983) and Carlito's Way (1993), henceforth making him responsible for at least inspiring some of the most savage untermenschen criminality of the past couple decades. Indeed, I can remember being in middle school during the late-1990s and noticing that seemingly every single male negro and wigger that I encountered was sporting a Scarface t-shirt that was two or three sizes too big with matching saggy pants. In fact, it took me well over another decade to ever to gain the open-mindedness to actually watch the film as I naturally associated it with the worst sort of retarded rabble. Luckily, in the documentary, the viewer discovers that De Palma—a distinguished dork that has virtually nil in common with the ghetto lumpenproletariat that the film inspired—is seemingly disgusted by this phenomenon and refused to endorse it despite the potential for monetary reward, or as he explains in regard to the ultimate legacy of Scarface, “A decade or so later, it found its audience with the hip-hop generation. Well, since I’m not a big fan of hip-hop, I knew nothing about it until people basically told me about it. Universal came to me and asked if I would approve a hip-hop soundtrack to SCARFACE, and I said absolutely not.” Still, it is rather curious that a sheltered bourgeois boy like De Palma would inspire such insipid savage delinquency, as it reveals a certain sense of primitive sociopathy and emotional retardation. In that sense, it is no surprise that De Palma always fails miserably when it comes to depicting drama. Despite his seemingly lifelong covert philo-semitism (aside from once being married to Jewess Gale Anne Hurd and having a daughter with her, De Palma’s virtual autobiographical stand-in in Greetings and its 1970 sequel Hi, Mom! is a swarthy anti-white degenerate would-be-pornographer named ‘Jon Rubin’), De Palma has mostly shied away from PC bullshit as demonstrated by the rabid anti-wop rhetoric of Sean Connery’s heroic mick cop character Jimmy Malone in The Untouchables (1987) and the various unflattering racial caricatures featured in The Bonfire of the Vanities (1990), including an evil Hebraic district attorney that opportunistically uses an interracial hit-and-run case to help further his re-election. Of course, it also goes without saying that De Palma has also deeply offended various LGBT authoritarian types over the decades with his depictions of trannys and lesbians in films like Dressed to Kill and Passion (2012). One also cannot forget that De Palma has mostly been an equal-opportunity-hater when it comes to the so-called fairer sex, as you arguably won’t find a film with a more unflattering depiction of horny high school girls than his classic Stephen King adaptation Carrie (1976). Even in his later failures like Femme Fatale (2002) and The Black Dahlia (2006), De Palma manages to seamlessly create an association between feminine beauty and unbridled sociopathy, as if femininity itself—or at least femininity in its most physically fine and statuesque form—is innately deadly and destructive, but I digress.

Interestingly, in an interview with Joseph Gelmis featured in the book The Film Director as Superstar (1970) conducted when De Palma was a virtual unknown, the then-young-filmmaker would confess, "Godard's a terrific influence, of course. If I could be the American Godard, that would be great." Of course, De Palma, who is not even in the same universe as Godard in terms of artistic and cultural literacy (in fact, I would argue that there is more references to high kultur in an obscure Godard flick like Germany Year 90 Nine Zero (1991) than in De Palma's entire oeuvre), would inevitably take the virtual opposite route, which he foretold at the very end of the same interview when he stated in regard to his next film, "It's probably going to be a Hitchcockian suspense movie, which I think will be good for us. I'd like to try a change of pace and concentrate on a technical, stylistic exercise. I'm interested in things like split-screen and 3-D. I'd like to work in a different form for a while. I wouldn't mind doing something like PSYCHO the next time, something that reprieves me from the political and moral dilemmas of our society for a while." Needless to say, I do not think it is a coincidence that mechanical-minded De Palma ended up a successful Hollywood filmmaker and the rather mercurial Godard would eventually isolate himself into increasing esotericism that undoubtedly reached its zenith with the 8-part avant-garde video project Histoire(s) du cinéma (1988-1998). After all, while Hitchcock—a fairly literal-minded perfectionist that was rarely genuinely poetic—merely continued to master his craft throughout his career as if he was simply focused on directing a different version of the same exact film, Godard has never stopped evolving as an artist to the point where it has had a dubious impact on his career and left him completely isolated. Of course, De Palma's evolution (or lack thereof) as a filmmaker could not be more different from Godard's, thereupon making the French auteur's early influence on the Hollywood filmmaker seem almost absurd on retrospect.

While there are many criticisms that can be made against De Palma and his films, I think it is safe to say that he is Hitchcock's greatest and most ambitious heir, as he has cleverly utilized some of Big H's greatest tools and techniques and taken them to their natural degenerate conclusion, at least in his greatest films like Dressed to Kill. Compared to Hitchcock's Australian disciple Richard Franklin (Patrick, Psycho II), who undoubtedly made some entertaining films despite being somewhat of a hack, De Palma seems like a great master. While one could certainly argue that François Truffaut was the superior filmmaker, I think it is safe to say to De Palma even manages to show a greater innate affinity with his uneven Vertigo-esque Schrader-penned feature Obsession (1976) to Hitch than the French auteur did with flagrantly Hitchcock-esque The Bride Wore Black (1968). Likewise, Sisters (1973) might be an obscenely onanistic hodgepodge of hyper Hitchcockian cinematic debauchery that can be accurately described as a glorified slasher, but it still works. Thankfully, De Palma has always given credit where credit is due and has never obscured his influences, even if he probably should have had more eclectic influences. Of course, if you're a very literal-minded math/science nerd type that does not understand poetry or art in general, Hitchcock—a virtual cinematic engineer—is probably the most apt filmmaker to steal from as his films were practically created in pre-production and storyboarded to death to the point where the English auteur apparently found the actual directing of the films to be the most boring part. Naturally, in the doc, De Palma constantly references Hitchcock, though the most revealing moment comes when he remarks, “People talk about Hitchcock all the time, you know, being so influential. I’ve never found too many people that followed after the Hitchcock school except for me. Here’s a guy that developed those incredible visual storytelling vocabulary, and it’s sort of going to die with him. And I was like, the one practitioner that took up the things that he pioneered and built them into different forms in a style that I was evolving. It’s like a whole modern form that he created. Having studied a lot of directors and having lived now to practically being 70, you see that your creative periods are in—most directors are in—in their 30s, their 40s, and their 50s. They, and obviously, they can go on and make another 20 movies or 10 movies, but you’ll probably only be talking about those movies they made in their 30s, their 40s, and their 50s. You know, and I’ve always thought Hitchcock was a great example, because, you know, after VERTIGO and PSYCHO, and you can talk about THE BIRDS all you want and all the movies he made after that and then of course, the critical establishment finally caught up with him and started to write about what a genius he was. Except those movies aren’t as good as the ones he made in his 30s, his 40s, and his 50s.”

While I have to disagree with De Palma’s assessment of Hitchcock’s oeuvre (Undoubtedly, I think Vertigo and Psycho are assuredly his greatest films), the Italian-American auteur seems to have personally found a parallel with his hero in terms of the trajectories of their filmmaking careers. In my opinion, De Palma has not directed a truly great film in well over three decades. Indeed, aside from Body Double (1984) being what I would describe as the last great truly De Palmian film, I would argue that the filmmaker’s underrated genre/gender-bending horror-musical Phantom of the Paradise (1974) is also superior to anything he has done in the past three decades. Additionally, at best, I see films like The Untouchables and Mission: Impossible (1996) as not much more than expertly-crafted hack work and De Palma even more or less admits in the doc that he was chasing fame and fortune when he chose these specific highly commercial projects. While De Palma has somewhat gone back to his roots in recent years, including depicting deadly dykes in Passion and rather cynical ultra-violence and political corruption in his latest Domino (2019), he seems incapable of matching his contemporary William Friedkin with a film as insanely and intoxicatingly idiosyncratic as Bug (2006) or as freshly fucked as Killer Joe (2011). In that sense, the documentary De Palma feels more like a sort of autobiographical obituary of a filmmaker than a mere career-spanning tribute. Either way,

I hope I don't live to see the day when such a film is made in honor of Noah Baumbach or his shabbos goy compatriot Wes Anderson (indeed, it is no exaggeration for me to say that De Palma is easily Baumbach's most entertaining and least insufferable film). Compared to documentaries on European arthouse auteurs like Daniel Schmid - Le chat qui pense (2010), Mondo Lux : The Visual Universe of Werner Schroeter (2011), Roland Klick: The Heart Is a Hungry Hunter (2013), and Fassbinder: To Love Without Demands (2015), the documentary certainly feels more superficial and less arty and intimate, yet that also seems somewhat fitting considering the almost clinical filmmaking method and demeanor of its titular subject. In that sense, we should be extremely grateful that Jem Cohen did not direct the doc. I also found it rather fitting that De Palma is a one-man-show and not plagued with the sort of prosaic puffery or pedantic pontificating that typically plagues film docs featuring actors and film historians. I am not sure about De Palma's philosophical influences, but Thus Spoke De Palma would have certainly been a more appealing name for a doc about such a cinematically monomaniacal man.

Say you will about deathly dry and deracinated dago De Palma—a weird wop that attended a Quaker school as opposed to a Catholic one—but he has earned his place in cinema history by creating some of the most exciting Hollywood films during the most exciting time in Hollywood history when he could have just as easily degenerated into an autistic basement-dwelling dweeb like actor-turned-auteur Keith Gordon's character in Dressed to Kill and today be an elderly virgin that collects action figures as inspired by film franchises created by his more money-grubbing-inclined buddies George Lucas and Steven Spielberg. One must also respect De Palma's lifelong use of split-screen and putting the technique to better use than Andy Warhol and Paul Morrissey did in their playfully plodding experimental anti-epic Chelsea Girls (1966). As to what makes a real 'auteur,' De Palma provides a simple yet fairly concise answer at the end of the doc when he states, "You make a certain kind of movie because that's the way you see things. And these images keep reoccurring again and again in your movies. And that's what makes you who you are." As to the meaning of an uprooted guido Quaker of the spiritually vacant sort being one of the more interesting mainstream Hollywood filmmakers of his generation, Spengler certainly foresaw the future of art when he wrote, "Two centuries after Puritanism the mechanistic conception of the world stands at its zenith. It is the effective religion of the time. Even those who still thought themselves to be religious in the old sense, to be 'believers in God,' were only mistaking the world in which their waking-consciousness was mirroring itself. Culture is ever synonymous with religious creativeness. Every great Culture begins with a mighty theme that rises out of the pre-urban countryside, is carried through in the cities of art and intellect and closes with a finale of materialism in the world-cities." Undoubtedly, with his hopelessly urban fetishistic post-Christian voyeuristic gaze,

DE PALMA

De Palma has—whether he knows it or not—artistically embraced the twilight of the Occident.

Undoubtedly, De Palma's films represent—in their nonchalantly nihilistic depiction of sex and death and sheer and utter lack of authentic pathos despite constant depictions of extreme human suffering—this decidedly detached modern materialism where the figurative Nietzschean 'Death of God' has inevitably lead to such pathetic things as spastic scopophilic killers and bourgeois-endorsed performance art that involves negroes raping white women (e.g. the 'Be Black, Baby' segment from Hi, Mom!), among other things. Of course, I would argue that Mission: Impossible is the sickest of De Palma's films as its popularity reflects the collective cultural, artistic, and spiritual bankruptcy of the majority population (whereas, despite its degeneracy, a dreary De Palma flick like Blow Out at least recognizes an innate spiritual sickness of sorts that ripples throughout society). Likewise, Vertigo feels like a deeply spiritual film when compared to the metaphysically barren landscapes associated with virtually all of De Palma's films. While the documentary does not make the case for De Palma being a sort of hopelessly spiritually despoiled M. C. Escher of genre filmmaking (which is how I see him), it does (largely unwittingly) demonstrate that the auteur—an anti-authority type that, somewhat paradoxically, has done quite well for himself working within the system—is a sad symptom of his era and his films are a symptomatic of his own sicknesses, or as the filmmaker states himself, "Most of my movies are about megalomania and guys that live in the insulated universes and the crazy things that happen within those insulated universes, which is something that continues to fascinate me." In the age of technics, De Palma—a cold and almost creepily calculating character that seems to interpret every aspect of life as some sort of scientific experiment or technical problem to be rationally solved—is the auteur we deserve but probably don't need, as no one, no matter how hopelessly cratter-brained or fiercely philistine, deserves the ungodly horror of living in a morally and spiritually inverted world full of ebonics-literate troglodytes sporting size-XXXL Scarface t-shirts. Still, there's no denying that Dressed to Kill is one of the most shamelessly stylish films ever made, not to mention a nice escapist aesthetic antidote to the tyrannical tranny terror that has recently plagued the Occident.

THE MACHINE GIRL

Noboru Iguchi (2009)

The producers (or whatever) of Meatball Machine and Death Trance, have teamed up again to make another Japanese splatterpiece in order to rocket their names into the greats of cult cinema. Well, they just might have made their mark. The Machine Girl's trailer debuted on the Internet and instantly fans began to gobble it up. Fans of Tsukumoto will indeed see some clever depictions of his creative ideas. Ami is a popular high-school basketball star who is raising her younger brother by herself. When his brother is a casualty of bullying, she takes revenge to the next level and dons a machine gun attachment ala Ash from Evil Dead. Throughout the casual hour-an-a-half run time, Noboru Iguchi does pull out all the stops and steals the limelight from other absurd bizzaro Japanese films. The film follows the rough-and-tough paper thin stereotype of having a stronger sister. Her brother is a kind-hearted wimp who bows down to the average feminist. This in turn, leads to his pitiful death and her family's name squashed even more. The current Japanese cinema loves to portray their citizens as crazed perverts who all overact to the point of slow retardation. This being the only real problem i had with the film. With that in mind, that is the only concrete problem i have with Asian cinema. In example, that really annoying "HWWWWWUUUUHHH" noise they make whenever they are surprised before death. This is evident in Battlefield Baseball, Versus, Meatball Machine, Death Trance, etc. etc. This sound effect is demonstrated many time in The Machine Girl. The effects in this film, as you might have seen in the trailer, are crazy, out-dated, and juicy. Various assortments of weapons are displayed including arm-chainsaw, machine gun, cyber shurikens, poles, rods, and the bland katana. Needless to say, the film owes much of its charm to its incredible cast of crazy characters. A team of high-school ninjas resemble the Power Rangers in the movie. The social commentary is a bit annoying and is about as redundant as was presented in this years Rambo. Preening school girls and socially inept parents declare their pacifism and are later seen attempting to slice and dice our poor anti-hero. Indeed, she is a murderer, but she is a damn sexy one at that. A word of advice; Don't get attached to any certain limb in this film. I mean, you can express your adoration for a leg, but don't let it get too sincere. I promise you, that specific body part will be ripped or cut off in some crude way. The Machine Girl is the most fun i have had with a film in a long while. A messy biopsy couldn't be this much fun.

RAPE /& DEATH OF A HOUSEWIFE
RAPE /& DEATH OF A HOUSEWIFE

Noboru Tanaka (1978) Most films that have to do with rape take the subject on a more visceral approach, adding violence, often revenge, and over-the-top antics. Many of these films are deemed as “exploitation” films. When you have a film like R&DOAH, it seems very genre bending in order to classify it. Its age, quality, and subject matter adhere to the policy of being an “exploitation” film but it is of a new breed. When you hear the title, you think nothing but it being a sensationalistic film using rape as a factor for erotic means or even shock, but Noboru Tanaka’s film is much more than that. The plot follows three young kids and young adults, who have had their brief run-ins with the law but remain to be “good kids”. They are social misfits and are the kids who have had 12 jobs in 2 years time. They frequently try to squirm sex out of hapless females and drink a lot. Sound familiar? It seems some things don’t change. The title alone gives away the ending for the most part. It still must be seen. This film simply was way ahead of its time. This film deserves to be more known for that matter. It was released at the right place at the wrong time. R&DOAH is best described as a mix between Korean gangster film Friend and Clark’s Kids. It’s a foreboding film. You hear the title and while watching, you just wait for the situation to finally unfold. While you forget about it, you soon regain that knowledge and you experience bouts of anxiousness. Getting it over with earlier would be too easy for the viewer. The acting is pretty damn good, the star being Taiko and Emiko. The ill fated couple whose loving stereotypical relationship is one of epic proportions. Scenes will remind you of Blind Beast and then switch to Buio Omega. This film would best be described as a psycho-sexual tale of three friends whose passions are alcohol, women, and the never ending quenching of hormones. The only way to acquire this film is through a website or various traders/torrents. So far, Soiled Sinema is the only website to review this. My thanks go out to Pete Cann for bringing me this film. I only hope that more people take it upon themselves to go see this. This is not “exploitation”. This is life. These are things you feel and exploits you encounter. Sometimes you go to far and sometimes you under appreciate the natural human effort. Watch out for a truly heartbreaking ending/twist near the end credits. What sets this one apart is that this is not about vengeance, nor is it about redemption or forgiveness. There is no deep meaning to be taught other than time heals all things.

Nobuhiko Obayashi (1977)

Concerning Supernatural horror, my hard exterior has indeed softened up with the viewing of the Asian classics. Hausu is a dreamlike theatrical horror film ripe with goofy humor and marvelous set pieces. Hausu's plot line involves a stuck-up daughter of a successful father. Due to her mother's death, she has clung to her father and has not grown up on her own. When he brings news of his plans to re-marry, she goes in a fit and calls up her Aunt in hopes for their class trip to take place at her house. When she gets a letter back, she rounds up her friends to go, but on the way, the teacher is prevented from going there and must await for the next day. During the stay, these naive girls who fit the mold of an Asian Mystery Inc. begin to notice weird unnatural events occurring and the mystery behind an eerie cat and a timeless melody. Hausu has been compared to the likes of Argento and while I support this claim, I personally believe that Nobuhiko Obayashi succeeded more on a personal level. While Suspria was an effective Giallo thriller, it lacked many aspects enough to make it a masterpiece. Hausu takes the dreamy visuals and vivid primary colors and expands on the idea of a theatrical horror film. With painted skies, Hausu might be the most beautiful film I have ever seen. It's obvious that Miike's Sukiyaki Western Django got the idea of the beginning from a viewing of Hausu. What makes Hausu so different from any other film is the varying styles of experimentation in it. Several scenes are Green-screened over a creepy painting or a tiled texture. We have tie-dye murder scenes, hungry pianos, and a psychotic cat. In this instance, the cat isn't black, it's white, which is a very clever change. A cat endowed with white hair will bring about the downfall of all Oriental women's futures. Many kaleidoscopic effects are used to manipulate your cornea's into hallucinating yourself. If there is such thing as a film being a psychotropic drug, this is it. Scenes are spliced over top each other and some are even played back that results in a hilarious cacophony of "remixes" (Oddly reminds me of a Chipendale illustration) The undertones in the film are fit for women only. There are only a couple males in the film and they are played by mutton-chopped apes and goofy retards. The emphasis on "Death to any woman who isn't married" is played out very well and is satisfying to see the genre characters die off. There's the Kung-Fu star, the glutton, the vain fashionista, the brainless photographer, and several others. The others had no memorable quirks other than doing the dishes and cleaning the floors (Misogyny?). Hausu is the most original film I ever seen and deserves the title of "Phantasmagoric" over any other film that is relatable. Despite its stern approach towards the roles of women, It is a remarkable portrait of a post-WWII Japan with fiery skies. A war-torn canvas has never been so wacky and elegant; Truly a marvelous mix.

Norman Jewison (1975)

Rollerball is what I consider to be a classic. Not a classic in the vain of such films as Citizen Kane or 2001: A Space Odyssey, but a film entirely on it's own. The "extreme sport" subject might be an incredibly familiar subject in pro and con exploitation films but Rollerball produces an entirely organic spin on the subject. Norman Jewison brought to film what could be the cutting-edge sport of the future, not some trivial game that uses the hybrid of flesh and machine. In this personal future, society isn't glitz & glamour. There's no flying cars or voice-activated refrigerators. Simple fabrics and uniforms breathe life in a game that very well could be with its thought out rule system and view on extreme violence in the media. Rollerball isn't that futuristic game of death to boost ratings - this game is to create a view of futility in individual effort. That is, until Jonathan E. becomes the first man since the halt of the corporate wars to spiral in popularity. Jonathan E.'s character deals with some trials & tribulations and the theme of this film is his rebellion to an evil corporation. His defiance is not one of the explosive types where he - a single man - barges into HQ armed to the teeth with weapons. He has a gentle defiance to him. His unsatisfied smirk the entire movie reads "You're really an asshole...". He is just a man who has lost it all and chooses to fight back with the only way he knows how to. Rollerball is a brave visioning of a new world based on a short story. It's regards towards the future and censorship feels awfully similar to that of Fahrenheit 451. Don't let the year 2018 fool you, this future could be highly possible. In a utopia where nobles are referred to as "Executives", this science-fiction monarchy phases me as being unsettling. I don't think I'd sacrifice much for endless luxury. One scene of drug-addled women taking a gun armed with explosives and destroying the last remnants of nature strikes me in too many senses. This masquerade of humanity is far too disquieting, even for my eyes. Rhetorical female conversations sit upon this film's masterpiece. When women aren't being used as spies or moles, they are viewed as lying and cheating whores. E.'s own wife got taken by an Executive but all the reasons for this personal tragedy do not make it acceptable. Females are often viewed in this film destroying beautiful things with a deranged look of sheer madness. Rollerball is a testament to that myth that women love "bad boys" as they themselves have a stark interest in violence. Rollerball is a classic that fits within it's own confines. It is violent and unflinching and it is the anti-exploitation film to counter the likes of Death Race 2000. I miss the times when social commentary was the film and not a condiment on the side. James Caan plays an amazing performance as his restlessness and inner rage break through his calm exterior. Rollerball is a must-see dystopian piece of 70's cinema.

Norman Mailer (1971)

Although not exactly common knowledge, by proving that you can get away with and even earn critical and commercial success from creating absurdly amateurish and plot-less films with no editing and starring uniquely untalented drug-addled and appallingly narcissistic non-actors with next to nil talent or charisma, pop (con)artist Andy Warhol—a man whose greatest talent as an underground filmmaker was turning the camera on and off and who took credit for films he did not even direct—inspired a couple popular Jewish intellectuals and literary figures to try their own lot at becoming avant-garde filmmakers. While the films of sapphic Semite writer and feminist cultural critic Susan Sontag (Duet for Cannibals, Brother Carl)—a loony far-leftist lady-licker who despite once proclaiming, “The white race is the cancer of human history,” directed every single one of her films in the white home continent of Europa, as if the rich cultural legacy would somehow rub-off on her work—are all but totally forgotten, the films of novelist Norman ‘White Negro’ Mailer are slightly better known today, with the Criterion Collection releasing a two-disc box-set of his early films under their sister line Eclipse in 2012 under the title Eclipse Series 35: Maidstone and Other Films by Norman Mailer. As one might suspect from the name of the Eclipse box-set, Maidstone (1970) is considered Mailer’s ‘masterpiece,’ though it is far from a masterpiece of any sort, though it has at least one thing going for it. Indeed, the film is worth seeing for one reason alone and that is seeing Mailer being beaten up by mainstream actor Rip Torn (Men in Black, Marie Antoinette) with a hammer in front of his wife and young children in a totally real and unsimulated scene where the actor got mad at the would-be-auteur’s superlatively shitty ‘realist’ directing style. Mailer’s penultimate cinematic work and third feature following the rather poorly directed and largely incoherent works Wild 90 (1968) and Beyond the Law (1968), Maidstone is a somewhat autobiographical film where the novelist turned director plays a popular auteur filmmaker who is running for president during a dangerous time when most of the normal politicians have been assassinated. A more ‘bad bad’ than ‘good bad’ work of micro-movie megalomania where Mailer invented an cinematic alter ego that seems to fulfill his own failed political (he made a failed attempt at running for mayor of NYC in 1969 at the urging of feminist Jewess Gloria Steinem), masculine (he boxes and fights in the film) and filmmaking (the character’s filmmaking talents are absurdly compared to Fellini, Dreyer, Antonioni, and Buñuel) fantasies and dreams. Indeed, Maidstone is an ‘auteur’ work in the worst sense of the world.

The film opens with a British TV host named Jeanne Cardigan (Jean Campbell) telling Brit viewers how she is going to travel to the United States to follow the seemingly laughable presidential campaign of egomaniacal filmmaker Norman T. Kingsley (Norman Mailer). To add a sorry sense of substance to an inately incoherent and aimless film, Maidstone features various numbered titles to denote chapters, with the first chapter being titled "A Meeting of High Officials." The 'High Officials' sit together in a luxury manor and discuss whether or not Mr. Kingsley is "ripe for assassination." A human 'melting pot' that was spawned from a Russian-born father and a mother of largely Welsh descent with rumored gypsy, Irish, Jewish, and negro blood, Kingsley is as American as a rancid apple pie. Although Kingsley graduated from Princeton with a degree in architecture after receiving a scholarship, somehow he magically became a filmmaker. The High Officials also believe that he is gay (or what they describe as "Greek love"), which one might assume due to the fact he is a swarthy and considerably overweight middleaged man that walks around in leather-fag apparel, including a fascistic leather cap and a matching black leather vest, which he wears with nothing underneath. A filmmaker in the spirit of his Hebraic racial comrade Henry Jaglom, Kingsley/Mailer is a local misogynist who stylizes himself as a feminist, despite the fact that he is prone to viciously attacking women for seemingly no reason at all. While proclaiming to his actresses regarding his films, "I can't believe in making sexploitation films, as they are called. I'm really a very squeamish man, as you'll come to discover. I'm interested in sexuality...rampant and respondent, but also in some taste. I can't bare bad taste. I'll use each and every one of you in any way I can. I will never ask to do anything that will completely violate you. On the other hand, I may push several of you to find yourself in emotional and, dare I say, anatomical situations..." Kingsley is indeed making a sexploitation film of sorts and he is willing to break a woman's self-esteem just for the mere dignified pleasure.

When interviewing a negress for a role, the director states to her in a voice that sounds like it's somewhere in between a black preacher and a frog, "I believe that good acting comes out of tyranny...out of a sense of slavery, you understand? You'll be enslaved if you want to be a good actor." Of course, Kingsley is no less brutal with the blonde Aryan Shiksa babes. On top of telling one Nordic blonde she needs to get rid of her wrinkles, he calls another one a "dumbo" and "a big strong eager peasant" who is only fit to play a "cook for the whorehouse" in his film. After getting another Aryan bimbo to admit she would like to screw a negro and a mestizo, degenerate creep Kingsley gets rather aroused and begins defiling the little lady, even attempting to pull down her panties after randomly starting to makeout with her in an exceedingly repugnant fashion. Of course, Kingsley does not stop there, as he gets French-born Warhol superstar 'Ultra Violent' to fuck a pitch black negro. On top of that, Mailer hangs around black nationalists that hate his guts because he wants to seem 'cool' and 'liberated,' not to mention the fact that he wants their vote. Of course, Kingsley is proud of the fact that he is a scumbag and even goes so far as bragging, "I'm the male equivalent of a whorehouse madame" during a truly stomach-turning Jaglom-esque moment.

When asked by British newscaster Jeanne Cardigan if he is running for president just to please his already inflated ego, the 'messianic auteur' proudly declares, "I am a narcissist by definition. I'm an actor...a director...I'm fascinated with exposing myself to multitudes."

At about the one hour mark of the film, the work degenerates into ludicrously laughable failed celluloid art experiment featuring a variety of spastic yet somehow marvelously mundane montages that Mailer probably thought were moments of pure cinematic genius. During one of these superlatively sorry scenes, newscaster Cardigan falls into what seems to be a rabid state while her tits hang-out her dress and declares her hatred for Kingsley while playing with a bloody baby doll. In what is arguably one of the most mindnumbingly mundane and moronic scenes in celluloid history, footage of people slowly walking in a field like zombies is juxtaposed with audio of a woman moaning during sex. During one of the few highlights of the film a micro race riot breaks out at a ball in a segment misleadingly titled, "The Grand Assassination Ball" featuring Kingsley and his comrades sporting aesthetically vulgar gray suits with matching tophats. After a negro seems to suffer a seizure after attacking a cracker, the ball degenerates into a hippie 'happening' involving the ritualistic burning of American money, braindead beatnik bastards dancing like zombies on PCP to generic psychedelic music, and some dumb drugged out bitch talking about "freedom" and asking people if they are "black or white." In a rather incriminating scene involving his significant other, Kingsley hatefully berates his wife Chula Mae (played by Mailer's real-life wife Beverly Bentley) for ruining his fun (she insults his goofy tophat) and proclaims that it is the first time in 15 years of marriage to her that he has felt freedom.

Of course, Mailer saves the best for last in a segment entitled "The Silences of an Afternoon" that features the (in)famous scene where Rip Torn (playing the role of Mailer's character's brother 'Raoul Rey O'Houlihan') attacks Kingsley/Mailer with a hammer. After hitting Mailer in the head with a hammer, Torn comes out of character and declares, "I don't want to kill Mailer, but I must kill Kingsley in this picture." Indeed, in a film as torturously tedious as Maidstone where the actor/director wallows in his own egomaniacal excrement, it is a true, transcendent act of spiritual liberation. Clearly high on some sort of chemical substance, Torn is still cognizant enough to know his actions were warranted, stating to Mailer after giving him a much deserved beating, "I had to do that, you know that" and "The picture doesn't make sense without this, you know." In an absolutely horrendous scenario of unhinged female hysteria, Mailer's wife declares, "I'll kill you" and attacks Torn in a patently pathetic fashion. Of course, Torn probably best sums up Mailer and his cinematic persona when he rhetorically asks the novelist turned director, "You're just a fraud, aren't you?!"

About at the halfway point of Maidstone, Rip Torn declares in a jolly face,

"The acts of the man make the man." By using Torn's logic to analyze the director, one easily comes to the conclusion that director Normal Mailer is a misogynistic megalomaniac who attempts to style himself as what he is not. Indeed, while Mailer portrays himself in the film as a rampantly heterosexual macho stud of the considerably charming and charismatic sort and exceedingly eclectically talented Renaissance man, he comes off in the film as a small effeminate dork and alpha-male of the artistically vacant sort who gets a kick out of venomously berating impressionable young women and filming negro bucks carnally defiling desperate Aryan broads. Mailer's equivalent to Dennis Hopper's epic experimental failure The Last Movie (1971), Maidstone is aimless semi-autobiographical metacinema at its most sickeningly self-indulgent and I say that as someone whose favorite directors are typically described as "self-indulgent." A mostly pointless film with somewhat of a pay-off in the end, Mailer's film is like the cinematic equivalent of an impotent elderly cripple with diabetes masturbating for about two hours and somehow climaxing in the end in a rather sloppy, self-degrading mess. While I think Mailer is a candy ass kosher pansy who thought he was an alpha-male because he took cheap shots at effeminate rich faggots (e.g. Gore Vidal) and beat and even attempted to kill women (in 1954, the novelist got drunk and stabbed his then-wife Adele Morales twice, puncturing her pericardium, thus resulting in emergency surgery), I will give him credit for including the rather unflattering scene of himself getting beat up by Rip Torn, who was certainly no fine muscular physical specimen, at the end of Maidstone.

Interestingly, in a candid interview featured in the book Film Director As Superstar (1970) by Joseph Gelmis, Mailer confessed that one of his main interests in film was that it was an artistic medium that could not be conquered by his ostensibly genius Hebraic intellect, or as the writer/director most notably stated himself: "The greatest intellectual pleasure I have is carrying an experience I can't dominate with my mind. Because I come out of a tradition of people who are born to dominate life with their minds. The Jews are the greatest intellectual machines of any species of man on earth. I think that's really the reason, beyond any other, why the Jews are next to universally detested by people who don't understand their fine, war, tender, loving, and forgiving sides. The reason why every farmer alive, why every redneck, instinctively distrusts the Jew is because the Jews are intellectual machines. And they are, you know, more than anyone else. I grew up in that tradition." Indeed, not unlike his equally anti-Occidental racial kinsmen Marx, Freud, Trotsky, Adorno, and Sontag, who all dedicated their careers to undermining the white Christian world, the self-proclaimed "intellectual machine" used his ostensible Judaic genius to defile the white goyim with the Eurypid-pioneered art of cinema as his tool via Maidstone, which is nothing but an infantile celluloid jerk-off piece where the aberrant 'auteur' tried in vain to defile everything that white Anglo-Saxon America holds sacred, yet failed miserably as demonstrated by its lack of true cult status as a piece of pretentious twaddle that even Mailer fanboys despise. Indeed, when Mailer absurdly described the work as “a revolutionary film,” he meant in the Trotskyite anti-Aryan-goy sense, hence its stereotypical Hebraic hodgepodge of blonde-Shiksa-defiling by vulgar Heeb and negroes, black nationalism fetishism, pornographic imagery thinly disguised as female liberation, loveless sex depicted as ‘free love,’ and kosher cognitive dissonance presented as avant-garde art. Still, I am glad that Maidstone was made, as Mailer’s pathetic beat down during a pansy girly fight has been forever immortalized, which is certainly the next best thing to seeing Trotsky taking a Stalinist icepick to the back of the skull.

TOUGH GUYS DON'T DANCE
TOUGH GUYS DON'T DANCE

Norman Mailer (1987)

If a morally retarded wife-beating Hebrew with a fierce fetish for opulent fags, cuckolds, and sinisterly slutty blonde shiksas was given a couple million dollars by his schlock-slinging kosher kinsmen Menahem Golan and Yoram Globus at Cannon Films to make an esoteric anti-Reaganite themed rip-off of David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986), except set in the homo-friendly Northern WASP historic resort area of Provincetown, Massachusetts in Cape Cod instead of a quaint Southern suburb in Lumberton, North Carolina, it might begin to describe a film as pleasantly preternatural, superlatively silly, preposterously poorly acted, obscenely overwritten, and inexplicably entertaining as the abject commercial and critical bomb that is Tough Guys Don't Dance (1987) directed by novelist, playwright, and self-described 'White Negro' Norman Mailer. Indeed, somewhat seeming like the noir-ish Northern 1980s equivalent to the Southern Gothic genre as directed by an over-the-hill hipster that had the balls and arrogance to create his own sort of distinct and oftentimes quite obnoxious and pretentious yet nonetheless hilarious Yankee-confederate hybrid slang lingo for the film, Mailer's fourth and final feature has a number of quite glaring similarities to Lynch's masterpiece, not least of all the prestigious presence of half-breed guidette goddess Isabella Rossellini as an unconventional female lead and a melodic original musical score by Angelo Badalamenti, yet the film is actually based on the director's 1984 Dashiell Hammett and Mickey Spillane inspired noir-thriller/murder mystery novel of the same name. Somewhat curiously, despite being one of the rare movies in film history where a novelist actually cinematically adapted his own novel for the silver screen, Mailer had fellow sleazy Judaic Robert Towne (real name Robert Bertram Schwartz)—a screenwriter turned hack filmmaker best known for being Warren Beatty's long-time bitch and for penning Roman Polanski's Chinatown (1974) and its mostly mediocre 'WASP versus Jew' themed sequel The Two Jakes (1990) directed by Jack Nicholson—touch-up, polish, and revise the film's screenplay, as if the lifelong writer turned cinematic auteur could not master the nuances of his own distinct dialogue and wayward storyline. Although a somewhat thematically subversive cinematic work that demonstrates that untermensch Mailer is unequivocally more degenerate and sexually depraved than the grotesque Judaic caricatures featured in National Socialist propagandist Julius Streicher's infamous tabloid newspaper Der Stürmer, Tough Guys Don't Dance is undoubtedly the director's most 'accessible' and commercially oriented motion picture. Unlike his three previous features Beyond the Law (1968), Wild 90 (1968), and Maidstone (1970), the film is not a preposterously plodding masturbatory pseudo-Warholian vanity piece that seems like it was directed by the auteur over a single weekend while he was tripping on acid and attempting to date rape as many platinum blonde goy gals as possible, but instead the film is a genre-defiling cinematic abortion of unintentionally absurdist thematic and artistic pretense. While probably not even worthy of being described as a putrid piece of stinking and steaming celluloid excrement, somehow, against all odds, I absolutely loved it. Although featuring none of the insane moments of improvisation of his early films like Maidstone where Mailer suffered the grand shame of getting his kosher ass kicked by Rip Torn in front of his entire family, Tough Guys Don't Dance is indubitably the only film that the auteur has directed that does not have a single dull moment, even though it oftentimes feels like it has the aesthetic integrity of a third rate preppy cocaine equivalent to trashy soap operas like As the World Turns and Dallas. Indeed, while I absolutely loathe Mailer and everything he stands for and consider distinctly untalented McJew Ryan O'Neal to be easily the biggest flaw of Stanley Kubrick's Barry Lyndon (1975), I cannot help but embrace the film as what I would argue is the greatest "so-bad-it's-good" and "oh-my-God-I-can't-believe-this-exists" film ever made as an autistically directed piece of self-satisfied celluloid sleaze that is so endlessly enthralling due to its startlingly poorly executed acting, ludicrously labyrinthine plot, innately insane and sometimes daunting dialogue, and patently preposterous pathological perversity that it absolutely has to be seen to be believed.

While obviously a sardonic and less than shadowy neo-noir with a hard-on for Hammett and other hardboiled literary trash where the director demonstrates his decidedly schizophrenic some-love-but-mostly-hate relationship with both America and the country's white Anglo-Saxon Christian majority, Mailer somewhat curiously insisted that Tough Guys Don't Dance was first and foremost a horror movie. Indeed, as Mailer stated in the featurette Norman Mailer in Provincetown (2003): "TOUGH GUYS DON'T DANCE is a horror film. It's special because it's done in the style of a tough guy murder mystery. It's built on a number of premises that are basic to horror: offbeat characters, a brooding landscape, a kind of edgy humor, and a considerable amount of violence that's loose in a town. I think those elements can build terror as effectively as special effects. I would even go so far as to say that, if a strange and sinister fever is loose in the pleasure-loving classes of America, this film is ambitious enough to look to be the embodiment of that fever." Of course, by "pleasure-loving classes of America," Mailer means tall, blond(e), and slender Aryans goyim, which he cinematically portrays as intricately stupid, hyper hypocritical, idiotically impulsive, and crude charming objects of confounded fetishistic worship, as if the auteur is infatuated with Nordic Americans the same way some majorly misguided degenerate whites are infatuated with the inflated self-esteem, delusions of grandeur, and complete and utter lack of self-consciousness of famous negroes like Kanye West and Snoop Dogg. Though, make no mistake about it, the film is certainly Mailer's own anti-Aryan kosher celluloid equivalent to Jud Süß, as a film where Mailer attempts to less than subtly blame America's descent into collective psy-chopath consumerist greed on a curse brought over by European settlers. More specifically, Mailer depicts 'Hell Town' (aka Cape Cod) as a cryptically evil ex-outlaw colony that is still haunted by the legacy of the murderous pirates and whores that once governed the region.

Forget the sort of masters of usury and corporate raiders like Dennis Levine, Ivan Boesky, Carl Icahn, Asher Edelman, Michael Ovitz, and Michael Milken that inspired Hebraic banker Gordon Gekko of Oliver Stone's Wall Street (1987), Mailer seems to think that the real unhinged psychopaths that reflect the supposedly forsaken spirit of the United States are busty blonde shiksa sluts and rogue cops (incidentally, Mailer's youngest son, writer and sometimes actor John Buffalo Mailer, portrayed the best friend of Shia LaBeouf's character Jake Moore in Oliver Stone's lackluster sequel Wall Street: Money Never Sleeps (2010)). Set in a patently paranoid cocaine-fueled world of clandestine Kafkaesque conspiracy that inhabited by proudly whorish yet nonetheless highly superstitious white trash femme fatales, wealthy crypto-cocksucker cuckolds that gladly take orders from their (ex)wives, a psychopathic comorbid schizophrenic corrupt cop with an unquenchable thirst for thoroughly debased pseudo-blonde whore cunt, an all-wise yet uneducated Mafioso-like cancer patient patriarch who has always been afraid that his sole son might be a faggot, and a ex-con/ex-bartender turned would-be-writer protagonist who cannot remember if he decapitated two blonde bimbos or not, among various other quite colorful, tastelessly charming, and inordinately eloquently spoken characters as portrayed by both talented and untalented actors in what is undoubtedly the most wonderfully awful performances of their careers, Tough Guys Don't Dance is as memorable and as re-watchable as any great cinematic masterpiece, albeit because it has a shockingly convoluted plot and virtually every scene features some gratingly obvious flaw or idiosyncrasy that is so unforgettable that it burns a hole into the viewer's brain, thus confirming that Pulitzer Prize winning writers do not exactly make for even semi-competent filmmakers, even when adapting their own work on a fairly decent budget with relative creative freedom. While best remembered today for vomiting out some of the worst musical, action, adventure, sci-fi and fantasy films during the 1980s, including Golan's outstandingly baffling anti-opus The Apple (1980), John Derek's pseudo-erotic vanity piece Bolero (1984) starring his own wife Bo Derek, and Hebraic hack Sidney J. Furie's infamously horrendous franchise-killer Superman IV: The Quest for Peace (1987), Cannon Films also arguably deserves credit for producing the most absurdly bad arthouse of the era, including Jean-Luc Godard's anti-Shakespeare adaptation King Lear (1987), which incidentally also stars Mr. Mailer. Whether Godard's flick and Tough Guys Don't Dance are just examples of senseless Judaic nepotism gone terribly awry remains to be seen, but I can certainly safely say that I would prefer it if Golan and Globus were in charge of the Hollywood studios instead of the sterile Semites in suits that run them nowadays.

Directed by a man that once stated, "Moviemaking is like sex. You start doing it, and then you get interested in getting better at it," yet never managed to cultivate a distinct cinematic style after directing four features and who incessantly cinematically depicts coitus as something that is always vulgar, grotesquely ugly and exceedingly abusive, Tough Guys Don't Dance probably features the most confusing and inexplicable film noir style storyline since Howard Hawks' The Big Sleep (1946) and has even been described as a parody of the Raymond Chandler style by some critics, though, arguably most importantly, it is a seemingly unintentionally oneiric piece of totally uncensored Judaic depravity in an unintentionally campy horror-noir form that exposes to the viewers what one of America's most prominent socio-politically conscious Jewish writers and intellectuals of the second half of the twentieth-century really felt about the nation's white majority. Indeed, whether it be focusing on the sexual prowess of a demented cop as memorably portrayed by Teutonic-blooded B-movie actor and sometimes director Wings Hauser, a hyper hypocritical Southern Baptist preacher with "the longest prick in Christendom" as ironically portrayed by a pre-lard-ass Penn Jillette, or the pernicious pussy-powered criminal schemes of two cock-and-coke-loving middle-aged blondes who both married opulent fags for their money and who ultimately get killed and decapitated, Mailer demonstrates that he had a more keenly naturalistic understanding of human sexuality than Freud and Reich and seems to subscribe to both of the quack kosher psychoanalysts' theory that all human behavior is solely and fundamentally sexually driven (of course, as C.G. Jung revealed after his break with Freud due to the latter's firm rejection of spiritual influences, this is a very Jewish perspective). The multi-layered but hardly subtle tale of a middle-aged dipsomaniacal ex-con/ex-bartender turned would-be-writer/kept man who, about a month after his harlot southern belle from hell wife leaves him, goes on a two-week bender full of blackouts where he has trouble recalling as to whether or not the blood he finds in his Jeep and the blonde-haired decapitated head he finds in his marijuana stash are the result of a murder or two that he might have committed whilst well under the influence, Tough Guys Don't Dance undoubtedly features one of the most patently pathetic and annoyingly passive (anti)heroes in cinema history as strangely fittingly personified by failed leading man O'Neal in one of the most unforgettably horrendously histrionic performances of the eclectically phony 1980s. Of course, whereas somewhat spiritually-minded Aryan weirdo Lynch demonstrates a sort of haunting fear of becoming like the villains in Blue Velvet, crude sex-obsessed materialist Mailer makes it seem as if he wants to be mind-fucked by every single one of his uniquely unsavory creations, as if he lives for self-perpetuated degradation, thus underscoring the stark contrast between the two artists. Indeed, no one can finish Tough Guys Don't Dance without coming to the natural conclusion that Mailer is, not unlike the film's protagonist, a posturing pseudo-masculine masochist who believes being macho means being a raging cynic that says pseudo-esoteric things like, "Just want to tickle my stick?" and attempts to fuck anything that happens to catch his cockeyed glance. Naturally, the film is a crude and obscenely onanistic example of Mailer tediously tickling his own stick, but one cannot deny that he is a master masturbator whose less than graceful shameless self-love can be quite rewarding for those individuals that are in the mood for a retarded celluloid rhapsody of rather rude and cravenly crude raunchiness and zany scatological lyricism.

After opening with hopelessly passive protagonist Tim Madden (Ryan O'Neal)—a sort of failed alpha-man and perennial alcoholic loser who has more or less realized his dream job of becoming a writer, yet finds himself incapable of actually writing—randomly narrating in an almost joyous fashion, "I keep saying to myself, 'Death is a celebration,'" Tough Guys Don't Dance then continues with an open credits sequence that features various scenic coastal shots of Provincetown, Massachusetts that seems like it could be an advertisement for tourists (notably, just as depicted in the film, the area is a haven for homos and other aberrosexuals). While certainly not a fag, Tim seems to be a magnet for strange self-loathing queers and has a self-destructive tendency towards falling in love with sexually insatiable harlots who he lacks both the sexual and monetary prowess to fully satisfy. At the beginning of the film, Tim wakes up hungover as per usual and prepares to bash someone in the head with a crowbar when he hears some unknown individual fiddling around in the downstairs kitchen area of his fairly lavish bourgeois beach house. Luckily, Timmy does not have to terrorize anyone, as he does not discover a hostile intruder lurking in his home but instead his much more masculine father Dougy (Lawrence Tierney). Completely bald as a result of chemotherapy and considerably overweight in an old tough guy sort of way, as if his muscles have turned to mush due to age, Dougy probably does not have long to live as a result of having cancer and wants to establish a strong bond with his son before he dies, or as he states to Tim while drinking some liquor, "Six months ago, they told me to stop [drinking] or I was dead. I stopped. Now the spirits circle around my bed and they tell me to dance. I tell them, 'Tough guys don't dance.' They answer me, 'Keep on dancing.' You know, son, my illness makes me think you're all I got. I don't want to die without you knowing my regard for you." Luckily for Tim, Dougy has decided a rather auspicious time to reappear in his life, as he needs help since he has two female decapitated heads in his cellar and he is not sure if he was responsible for the women's deaths or not. On top of everything else, it seems that everyone Tim knows want to murder him or frame him for murder. Thankfully, daddy Dougy is not afraid of decapitated dame domes and will ultimately provide his somewhat squeamish son with much needed unlawful support.

Clearly a extremely street smart individual with big brass balls, Dougy can immediately tell something is wrong with his son as he looks extremely worried and dejected, but he absolutely refuses to allow his sole progeny to succumb to self-pity or failure. Indeed, when Tim bitches about the fact that his wife Patty Lareine (Debra Stipe aka Debra Sandlund in her first film role in a truly unforgettable performance that earned her a nomination for both "Worst Actress" and "Worst New Star" at the 8th Golden Raspberry Awards) left him 28 days ago with a negro chauffeur and he has not heard from her since, Dougy rightly replies to his repugnantly melancholic son, "Quit feeling sorry for yourself. Any guy that marries a rich dame deserves everything he gets [...] You married the wrong girl, that's all. Should have married the other one. The Italian girl, what was her name? Yeah, that's the one you should have married." As Dougy wisely states, Tim did indeed marry the wrong woman as he is still hopelessly in love with a spunky yet seemingly semi-autistic Italian model named Madeleine Falco (Isabella Rossellini), but he ruined that hot and heavy romance when he fell victim to the Hebraic vice of Mailer's kosher comrade Al Goldstein's SCREW magazine where he used the personal section to setup an ultimately life-changing orgy with a Li'l Abner-esque white Christian couple from the Deep South named Patty and Big Stoop (Penn Jillette of Penn & Teller). While Tim should have known that the group sex experiment would go bad when he showed Madeleine a photo of the couple and she excitedly stated in regard to Big Stoop, "He must have the longest prick in Christendom. There's no other explanation for him," he foolishly decided to go on with the orgy since he was at a sort of crossroad in his relationship with his gorgeous guidette girlfriend, or as he tells Dougy, "I didn't really know if I was in love or trapped by love. We were in the season when one marries or one parts." Needless to say, the orgy resulted in catastrophic consequences for all parties involved, especially Tim, who was forced to confront the rather unfortunate fact that Big Stoop's Christly liver-lifter proved to be much mightier than his own. Likewise, Patty fell 'in love' Tim while he was performing cunnilingus on her and told him he was "sweet" because he is "mean and nasty-minded, and so pleasurable." In fact, Patty Lareine was so impressed with Tim's crude wit and pussy-eating talents that she confessed to the protagonist "You marked me for life" and promised to dump Big Stoop, marry and divorce a rich man for his money, and then marry him and use her alimony to support his lifelong dream of becoming a writer. Unfortunately, Tim had no clue that cunning cunt Patty would eventually go and marry his crypto-cocksucker comrade from college and then use him against his schoolmate during the divorce trial. Of course, when Tim accidentally causes Madeleine to become infertile as a result of damaging her womb in a car crash after watching one of Big Stoop's church sermons and then is subsequently arrested and sentenced to a three year prison sentence after getting busted for dealing coke, he naturally accepts Patty Lareine's sort of Faustian femme fatale pact to marry her when he gets out of jail. Naturally, had Tim never wasted his money on a copy of SCREW magazine or even questioned his love for Madeleine, all of these disastrous things could have been easily avoided. Not only did Tim ruin the womb of the woman he loved and thus guaranteed that he would never be able to produce progeny with his beloved, but he also married an unlovable social-climbing skank who would ultimately make his life a living hell of the most intricately insidious sort.

The majority of Tough Guys Don't Dance—an innately incoherent and convoluted cinematic work that demands that the viewer watch it multiple times if they want to truly understand the entire storyline—is told in flashbacks where Tim describes to his father how he eventually arrived at the nightmarish situation where he woke up one morning to find Madeleine's name and a heart tattooed on his arm and little recollection of what had happened to him the last night. Of course, Tim is somewhat reluctant to tell his father how he came to be the proud owner of two blonde female heads that he refuses to clearly look at and identify, as if he is afraid that one of them might belong to his estranged wifey Patty Lareine. As Tim explains to his father Dougy, it all started this past "crazy summer, idiotic summer" when his wife Patty Lareine had one of her many famous Dionysian coke-and-caviar parties and a dubious cop named Alvin Luther Regency (Wings Hauser) randomly showed up and proudly introduced himself as Provincetown's new 'Acting Chief of Police.' At the party, Regency revealed he was a renegade cop of sorts that did not mind drinking and smoking dope on the job. Naturally, it was only a matter of time before fellow wildly debauched extroverts Patty Lareine and Regency fell in love with one another, or so Tim eventually discovers in a most macabre fashion. As a result of becoming increasingly obsessed with two dead whores that were murdered a hundred years ago in the nearby area of Hell Town where pirates and prostitutes once ruled and regularly plundered ships and murdered sailors, Patty Lareine demanded to Tim that they hold a séance where she ultimately had a horrific premonition of her own decapitated corpse. As a result of her unsettling experiences during the séance where she was confronted in her own grisly demise, Patty Lareine decided to leave Tim for good and ever since then the protagonist's life has been one hazy yet gruesome existential nightmare full of blackouts and sleazy sexual encounters. As Tim explains to his father in regard to his resentment towards his wife, "How I hated Patty Lareine's all-superior fuck-you face. She had been the largest addiction in my life, pure love, pure hate, all squashed up together." In fact, Tim was so angry when Patty left him that, as depicted in a flashback scene, he went to the trouble to cut a photo of her in half in a manner that makes it seem as if she was decapitated, thus foreshadowing her grisly demise. Upon hearing this story about Patty Lareine's bitter departure, Dougy remarks to Tim, "Something bad's about to happen. Strange things fall into place," so his son reluctantly informs him that "Last week two people were murdered" and that "parts of the bodies" are in his cellar. As Tim states in his defense to Dougy, "I didn't do it. I don't think I did. But my head's been peculiar lately, I have blackouts. I hallucinate. It's been a bad five days." As he explains to his father, he suspects virtually everyone he knows of the murders, especially corrupt cop Regency, Patty Lareine, and an extremely wealthy ex-schoolmate named Wardley's Meeks III (John Bedford Lloyd). Naturally, it comes as a great surprise to Tim when he eventually discovers that one of the heads in his cellar belongs to an ex-porn star that he randomly fucked one evening right in front of her cuckold husband on the very same night she was murdered.

As Tim explains to Dougy in a borderline histrionic fashion, things got really ugly five days ago when he met a middle-aged couple named Jessica Pond (Frances Fisher) and Lonnie Pangborn (R. Patrick Sullivan) while getting drunk at a local restaurant called the Widow's Walk. It is immediately apparent that Jessica is a stuck-up slut, as she proudly boasts of being a popular ex-porn star, but then bitches that the Provincetown is full of shacks, so Tim attempts to impress her by telling her the legend of 'Hell Town' and how some of the so-called shacks were ferried in from there, or as the protagonist states to her in an almost gleefully sadistic fashion, "150 years ago, out there, across the harbor, a mile. Whores, whalers, pirates. On a moonless night, they'd build a beach fire. Incoming boat would mistake it for the lighthouse and run aground. And these pirates would plunder it. Orgies of plunder. In certain houses you can still hear the cries of slaughtered sailors." Instead of scaring Jessica, Tim's sordid story seems to cause her to wet her panties. After taking the seemingly mismatched couple back to his house to snort some coke, Tim gets a little agitated with his company when Jessica states "You look like one of those method actors that plays the killer," so he threatens to kill them both in a semi-joking fashion and then proudly boasts to Lonnie, "I feel demented tonight. I could fuck your woman right in front of you." From there, Tim whips out his cock and has Jessica, who is probably a master of fellatio due to her porn star background, give him head while her pansy cuckold hubby watches on. The morning after aggressively fucking Jessica in an empty parking lot right in front of her crying cuckold hubby, Tim cannot seem remember anything from the previous night aside from loser Lonnie sobbing like a bitch and is thus quite startled to find both the Madeleine tat on his arm and that the passenger seat of his Jeep is soaked in blood. On top of that, Regency gives Tim a call telling him to come by the local police station where he tells him to, "Move your stash." While a police officer, Regency is also a shameless pothead and absurdly remarks to Tim regarding his dope, "I like your homegrown, it puts feathers on my ass. Godly stuff." When Tim goes to the wooded region of Truro woods to move his marijuana stash, he virtually suffers a total mental breakdown when he discovers a black plastic bag containing a decapitated blonde female head instead of his homegrown dope. After that, Tim suffers nightmares were he routinely hears a creepy female voice asking him, "Whose head is it?" To make matters worse, the owner of the Widow's Walk comes by Tim's house and informs him that Jessica and Lonnie's car is still parked in the restaurant parking lot, thus hinting that something horrific might have happened to them. Meanwhile, Tim discovers that Regency's white trash dope-dealing informers—two ugly, stupid, and sleazy greaser-like degenerates named Spider (John Snyder) and Stoodie (Stephan Morrow)—were the ones responsible for giving him the tat. Of course, Tim becomes even more startled when Spider accuses him of being involved in some major cocaine deal he knows absolutely nothing about.

Not long after his somewhat rude encounter with Spider and Stoodie, Regency has Tim come by the police station and reveals that he found the corpse of Lonnie Pangborn inside the trunk of his own car and that he believes the cuckold committed suicide. When Regency asks Tim whether or not he thinks Lonnie might have been a faggot and the protagonist replies, “He might wash his hands after making love but, no, I wouldn’t call him a swish,” the corrupt dope-smoking cop proudly replies with a hint of gleeful arrogance, “I don’t have a high opinion of your acumen. You read Pangborn wrong, he was a flaming faggot” and then reveals that he discovered a letter “hot from the dead man’s pocket” that proves he was a candy ass pansy poofster bastard. Somewhat curiously, Lonnie’s letter was written to Tim’s extremely wealthy self-loathing gay ex-schoolmate Wardley’s Meeks III, who also happens to be Patty Lareine’s ex-husband. Although former friends that were both expelled from Exeter together, Tim betrayed Wardley by lying about him in court during his divorce trial with Patty Lareine. During the trial, Tim backed up the little lady’s dubious accusation that wimp Wardley was an abusive husband who regularly referred to her as a “cheap redneck” and beat her if she dared not do drugs with him. If Tim’s troubles could not get any worse, Regency gives him the surprise of a lifetime by bragging to the hapless protagonist that he is married to his beloved Madeleine and that they have two sons, even though she is apparently infertile. Of course, it seems like an awfully big coincidence that Provincetown’s new Chief of Police just happens to be married to the love of Tim’s life.

As a result of the fact that he is still deeply in love with her and cannot get over the fact that she married a seemingly deranged renegade cop like Regency, Tim decides to pay Madeleine a surprise visit where he confesses “I’m still in love” and expresses his dissatisfaction with Patty and his failed writing career, but she angrily replies, “You chose Patty Lareine. I hope you’re happy, because I am. Mr. Regency and I make out five times a night. That’s what I call him, Mr. Five.” After calming down a little bit after a little bit of the sort of back and forth bickering that is not atypical of ex-lovers, Madeleine hands Tim a letter and curiously calls him “Mr. Six,” but tells him “not to coming running back” anytime soon. For whatever reason, Tim opts to drive to a beach to examine the letter where he is startled to read Madeleine’s words, “My husband is having an affair with your wife. I don’t think we should talk about it...unless you’re prepared to kill them.” In what is indubitably the most infamous and unintentionally hilarious scene in the entire film, Tim responds to the shocking letter by screaming the following in an absurdly contrived and unrealistic histrionic fashion, "Oh man! Oh God! Oh man! Oh God! Oh man! Oh God! Oh man! Oh God! Oh man! Oh God!" That night, Tim admits to Regency that he had sex with Jessica on the same night that her husband died, so the crazed cop warns him in a somewhat tongue-in-cheek fashion, "You better hope and pray Jessica doesn't surface as a corpse, because if she does, that little nosebleed on the seat of your Jeep is gonna look like THE TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE" (of course, it should be noted that Cannon Films produced and distributed Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chainsaw Massacre 2 (1986) the year before they released Mailer's film). After becoming somewhat startled as a result of his strange conversation with the Chief of Police, Tim decides to go back to the woods where he keeps his pot stash and is startled to find that there are now two blonde-haired heads there instead of just the one that he found previously. Upon reluctantly grabbing the heads and preparing to leave the woods, sleazy hillbilly psychos Spider and Stoodie emerge from a white vintage Rolls-Royce owned by Wardley and attempt to slaughter the protagonist with mere knives, but luckily the protagonist's dog attacks the wild white trash assailants. In what is arguably the most ridiculously bad and just plain stupid scene in the entire film, Spider stabs and kills what is clearly a stuffed toy dog while Tim knocks out Stoodie. While Tim opts to show mercy to his would-be-killers and does not finish off the two swarthy low-life drug dealers, he does smash up his pal Wardley's prized vintage Rolls-Royce. Indeed, while Tim angrily complains to Spider while sounding like a stoned stupid surfer dude, "Your knife is in my dog," he just cannot gather the anger and rage to kill the sleaze-bag after he meekly pleads, "Have a heart, man. I need medical attention. I'm sorry, man. I got nothing against your dog." When Tim wakes up the next morning, the chronology of Tough Guys Don't Dance finally catches up with the beginning of the film where Tim is startled to find his father downstairs and then begins telling him his bizarre story about how he ended up with two decapitated heads in his cellar.

As eventually becomes quite clear after the protagonist finishes telling his father everything that has happened up until the point when he discovered two decapitated blonde heads in his pot stash and decided to hide them in his cellar, it seems that everyone that Tim knows with the exception of his daddy Dougy could potentially be in a plot to frame him for murder and/or kill him. Since Tim does not have the testicular fortitude to do it himself, Dougy agrees to examine the decapitated female heads in the hope of figuring out their identities and exact causes of death. As his father eventually reveals to him after conducting what is probably a mafia style amateur autopsy, the heads belong to Patty Lareine and Jessica and both women were not decapitated until after they were killed. Quite fittingly considering since she has used, abused, and exploited virtually every man in her life, Patty Lareine died as a result of a bullet to the heart. While his father takes a boat out to the ocean to "deep six the heads" since he is too much of a pussy to do it himself, Tim receives a hysterical phone call from Madeleine where she complains in regard to her hubby Regency, "I'm terrified. He's wearing his Green Beret uniform. And he keeps his machete in the police car. He's mutilated my photograph, the one in the living room." After telling Madeleine to immediately flee her house and drive to his place, Tim decides to swing by the local police station to steal a machete out of Regency's trunk so that he has evidence against the corrupt cop. Indeed, Tim assumes that the machete Madeleine spoke of while they were on the phone was used by Regency to decapitate both Jessica and Patty Lareine, though he ultimately discovers that he was only half right. While Tim manages to grab Regency's machete and is thrilled to discover that it can be used as evidence against the corrupt narc cop since the weapon is still covered with blood, he is subsequently kidnapped at gunpoint by gay boy Wardley, who forces him to walk to a beach where he reveals how he not only killed Spider and Stoodie, but also his ex-wife Patty Lareine, who he was hoping to remarry. Indeed, perennial wuss Wardley went completely berserk and opted to shoot Patty Lareine in the heart after she proudly confessed to him that he stole $2 million from him for a bogus drug deal, mocked him in regard to his dubious master plan to become a powerful coke dealer that would be "equal to a Renaissance prince," and then attempted to blackmail him for $10 million. Wardley also describes to Tim how Regency was screwing both Jessica and Patty Lareine, but the former was shot and killed by the latter out of jealousy during a cat fight and then was subsequently decapitated by the crazed cop, who personally placed the head in Tim's drug stash. During that night, Regency proudly proclaimed to Patty Lareine, "I love you and I'll walk through hell with you." During the same night, Patty Lareine hinted to Regency that she felt she was possessed by the spirits of two dead whores by shouting while in a seemingly demonic state, "The bed in my house used to belong to two whores killed in Hell Town one hundred years ago. And they floated the bed across on the water. Invite those whores into you and me." Of course, after hearing Wardley's confession, Tim finally realizes that it was Regency and Patty Lareine that attempted to frame him for the murders. While Regency was screwing both Jessica and Patty Lareine, he only actually loved the latter and was only using the former as a means to help him with the drug deal. After deliberating as to whether or not he should kill Tim for betraying him and ruining his marriage, Wardley considers forcing the protagonist to give him a blowjob, stating to him, "What if I were to say, 'Madden, take it in your mouth or die'? Would you take my pride and joy into your mouth?" but he is convinced not to when the lead calmly replies, "Wardley. You don't care anymore about that." Ultimately, Wardley forces Tim to sit beside him and then kills himself by putting a bullet in his heart just like he did with his ex-wife Patty Lareine.

When Tim gets home from his demented little two-man nocturnal beach party with suicidal sod Wardley, he is happy to discover that Madeleine has arrived at just the same time. Unfortunately, when Tim goes inside his house, he discovers a drunken and belligerent Regency shooting the shit with his father. When Tim gets the gall to accuse Regency of being involved in the murders and attempting to frame him by covering the front seat of his Jeep with blood and placing Jessica's decapitated head in his pot stash, the lunatic law man rationalizes his actions by stating to Dougy, "Your son put her [Madeleine] up in orgies and your son cracked her up in a car and destroyed the womb. That's the woman I inherited. So let's get it straight – I hate your son." Indeed, apparently Regency has always hated Tim and wanted to destroy him for making his wife infertile and thus denying him the opportunity of having children. In fact, Regency even proudly states to Tim, "I hate your guts [...] I wanted to see you die in your own shit. I wanted to make you crazy." When Tim brings up the fact that he is a crazed lunatic that decapitates people, Regency replies, "I wanted to get her [Jessica] face out of my system. I wanted total fidelity with Patty." Indeed, while undoubtedly a terribly deranged nut-job that seems like he could be the ex-jock preppie cousin of Leatherface, Regency's professed love for Patty Lareine seems totally genuine, so naturally he does not take it too well when Tim reveals to him that she is dead and that she was murdered by her fag ex-husband Wardley. In fact, Regency is left so shocked and heartbroken when Tim reveals to him that Patty Lareine has died that he immediately suffers a major stroke that leaves him partially paralyzed. While papa Dougy agrees to put Regency out of his misery, Madeleine unexpectedly does the job for him after the cracked cop dares to disrespect the gorgeous guido gal. Indeed, when Regency shouts while drooling heavily out of the side of his partly paralyzed face, "Patty Lareine – She was big time. Ooh la la. I thought you were big time but you turned out to be small potatoes," Madeleine shoots him dead, thus inspiring Dougy to joke, "I could have told him: never call an Italian small potatoes." In the end in what ultimately proves to be a sort of bittersweet false happy ending that is apparently less disturbing than the one featured in Mailer's source novel, Madeleine surprises Tim by buying him a luxurious $2 million mini-mansion that she paid for via the dirty money Regency and Patty Lareine scammed out of poor Wardley. Notably, during this scene, both Tim and Madeleine are dressed like vulgar 1980s yuppie clothing, as if they are the sort of couple that fucks while listening to Huey Lewis and the News and watching Reagan speeches. Somewhat interestingly, the film concludes in a somewhat inexplicable and ambiguously ominous fashion, with a shot of Tim shutting the door of his fancy new house juxtaposed with a seeming she-bitch laughing manically, as if the protagonist has now been condemned to a sort of preppie Reaganite purgatory as a result of the blood money and tainted and infertile lover he has so mindlessly embraced. Indeed, while Madeleine is undoubtedly Tim's great love, she is also a murderess with a seemingly unquenchable sexual appetite that, not unlike whore-from-hell Patty Lareine, attempted to talk him into killing her husband.

declares with almost playfully sadistic tongue-in-cheek glee, "The Devil made this picture." At least figuratively speaking, I think Mailer is correct, as his inately morally bankrupt film reveals a real visceral yet nuanced hatred and contempt for WASPs, whether they be Yankees or Confederates and/or rich faggots or poor redneck whores, as well as a sort of firmly ecstatic affinity for every and any form of sinful moral depravity. Indeed, unlike most of the heebs in Hollywood, Mailer is not even trying to obfuscate his keen Christ-killer tendencies, but instead proudly wallows them, thus underscoring his 'integrity' as an artist. While featuring an intricately loathsome and even grotesque portrayal of Anglo-Saxons from all class backgrounds, I got the sense from watching the flick that it is a sort of projection in filmic horror-noir form of Mailer's fetishistic fantasy view of Aryan American goyim, as if he would love to regularly hang out with these extra crude and rude losers, lowlifes, and emotional cripples, especially the two blonde whores (of course, it is no coincidence the film features countless blonde-shaming moments, including a scene where Patty Lareine states after the protagonist accuses her of being a fake blonde, "My pussy hair was bright gold in high school. Until I went out and scorched it with the football team"). In fact, at the beginning of the film, the main femme fatale Patty Lareine boasts, "I am a witch. Good blondes are," thus underscoring Mailer's sort of pathological post-holocaust hatred of the Nordic race. After all, one can only imagine the hysterical Hollywood and mainstream media outcry if someone directed a film where some obnoxious Hebrewess like Barbra Streisand declared, "I am a witch. Good Jewesses are." In Mailer's ideal white American Christian fantasy world, all the women are conniving whorish cunts, about half the men are self-loathing faggots whose slut wives carry around their testicles in their purses, and the only person with both wisdom and common sense is a terminally ill gangster-like exbartender who always feared that his sole son was a flaming fruit. While it is unquestionable that Mahler is quite intrigued by his characters, you can also certainly sense his quite unwarranted feeling of superiority over them, but I guess that is what one should expect from a man that once stated in an interview with Joseph Gelmis featured in the book The Film Director As Superstar (1971), "I come out of a tradition of people who are born to dominate life with their minds. The Jews are the greatest intellectual machines of any species of man of earth. I think that's really the reason, beyond any other, why the Jews are next to universally detested by people who don't understand their fine, warm, tender, loving, and forgiving sides. The reason why every farmer alive, why every redneck, instinctively distrusts the Jew is because the Jews are intellectual machines." Of course, aside from the fact that Jews tend to have mediocre visual-spatial intelligence and are hardly forgiving as their religious holidays and countless Hollywood holocaust movies clearly reveal, cosmopolitan city boy Mailer is totally off in his wishful diagnosis of hillbilly antisemitism, but that should be no surprise considering the piss poor yet admittedly quite amusing redneck caricatures featured in Tough Guys Don't Dance. As a rare Hebraic intellectual of his age that pretended to be tough and advocated machismo mentality, it should have been readily apparent to Mailer that rednecks cannot stomach physically weak, passive-aggressive, and/or neurotic individuals that talk too much, do not work with their hands and/or do not know how to change a tire, but I digress.

Somewhat curiously, despite his lack of glaring talent as a filmmaker, Mahler apparently preferred filmmaking to writing, or as he states in Norman Mailer in Provincetown, "It has to be understood that I always loved film and loved directing. When I made my three underground films, I had a ball. I mean, I had more fun in terms of work than I ever had before in my life. Writing a novel is not fun. Writing a novel is dreary [...] The day-to-day work is tough. It is like being a coal miner. You go in everyday to the office [...] It ends up being a small prison and you've gotta deliver. When you direct, it's a little bit more like being the general of an army, but a most wonderful army where there's almost no blood and where all sorts of exciting things happen. Things changing all the time. It's like this marvelous war that is more circus than a war [...] I love directing. People said to me, 'Well, if you love directing that much, but you speak of the novel as being the highest art form you know, would you have deserted the novel?' I said, 'Yes. In exactly the way that very often a man that is happily married for many years will run off with a floozy. Sure.' Although, films weren't my floozy, they were my bread." Notably, at the very end of the same doc, Mailer takes full responsibility for the singular mediocrity of Tough Guys Don't Dance, stating, "The only place I can get critical here is on myself as the director. But I had the materials to make a very good movie and I had a pretty good script. And, for some reason, some people like the movie, only a few people love it, a good many people don't like it. I will take the blame for that. The actors delivered. The photography was splendid. The music was very good. I still have a feeling—cause this is natural for every director that's had, let us say, a semi-failure—what's crucial to it is exactly that I believe this film was yet gonna have its day, so I'm delighted that we're having it on DVD." While anyone that is not blind can plainly see that Mailer's film is a bloody vulgar celluloid abortion, I have to confess that I firmly believe that it is one of the most bafflingly enthralling and unforgettable American films of the 1980s, as a nasty little cinematic spectacle that is comparable to the bloody aftermath of a terrorist bombing in a high class strip club that is full of coke-addled yuppies, Baptist Christians dressed in their Sunday best, and leather-clad extras from The Wild One.

Seeming like a hypnotically histrionic half-baked hodgepodge of Hamlet, The Big Sleep, The Fugitive Kind, Night Moves, and Blue Velvet as directed by the spiritually vacant, sadomasochistic, and cinematically handicapped anti-love child of Flannery O'Connor and Paul Schrader, Tough Guys Don't Dance is a film that is truly in a league of his own as a sort of cinematic equivalent to a STD that was contracted during a great yet shameful night of sex with the world's most physically alluring yet emotionally insufferable whore. In other words, the film leaves an indelible impression on the viewer that falls somewhat between debasement, deflection, Fremdscham, and complete and utter dumb-foundedness. While a semi-cryptically anti-Reaganite work (notably, at one point in the film not long after the character decapitates the corpse of his dead lover, morally challenged cop villain Regency expresses his desire to become president of the United States), the film more intriguingly manages to simultaneously capture the essence of the quite cosmopolitan zeitgeist while contradicting the innate artificiality of the Reaganite 80s with its strong regional setting (in fact, Mailer based both his novel and film on locations that he was already very familiar with in Provincetown, where he lived for a good portion of his last couple decades alive). Indeed, I hate to reference both films in the same sentence, but Mailer virtually does for Cape Cod in Tough Guys Don't Dance what Fritz Lang did for Weimar era Berlin in M (1931) in terms of capturing the almost otherworldly foreboding and demonic spirit and atmosphere of its seemingly forsaken setting. Personally, I have always detested New England and the sort of backwards and terribly naive white liberal peasants that live there, but Mailer's film inspired me to fantasize about the prospect of encountering such ungodly weirdos and mentally defective criminals in Cape Cod. In a sense, Mailer's film is arguably the ultimate anti-Lovecraftian flick, as Yankee WASP master of horror H.P. Lovecraft's stories are completely devoid of any erotic or romantic content aside from rather arcane and unflattering references to sexual reproduction, yet Tough Guys Don't Dance dares to depict a nefarious post-Puritan New England where sexual depravity is the norm and where a pussy is a woman's sole key to unlocking the so-called American Dream, not to mention the fact that it takes place in a racially homogeneous and literally 100% white Anglo-Saxon world where racial miscegenation is not even an issue (of course, a good portion of Lovecraft's stories were inspired by the author's horror and terror at the thought of race-mixing and racial mongrelization as reflected by the part-beast humanoid monsters that oftentimes inhabit his quite prophetic Spenglerian literary realms). Admittedly, there is one major similarity between Lovecraft's stories and the film, as they both depict a world that is guided by the ancient pre-Christian philosophical law of Eternal Return where time and history are cyclical as opposed to linear, which is made especially apparent in Mailer's movie when the two sinisterly slutty femme fatales Patty Lareine and Jessica suffer the same exact forsaken fate as the two Cape Cod whores that were murdered a century before.

A virtual celluloid treasure trove of wickedly wayward and amoral thematic idiosyncrasies, Talmudic toilet humor, Hebraic sexual and racial pathology, and unintentionally avant-garde anti-Anglo-Saxon/anti-goyim wackiness, Tough Guys Don't Dance is a film that I would indubitably label the greatest celluloid anti-masterpiece among celluloid anti-masterpieces, as a fierce flick that totally delivers in terms of its debauched Judaic anti-goy delirium of insanely inept and obscenely overwritten degenerate hipster heeb filmmaking. Somewhat fittingly, in the first chapter of his literary swansong White Power, World War II hero and magazine publisher turned American Nazi Party founder and inordinately satirical pro-white propagandist George Lincoln Rockwell—a fairly humorous and charismatic mensch whose father was, somewhat curiously, a popular vaudeville performer named George Lovejoy “Doc” Rockwell that was friends with a number of prominent and influential Jews of the era, including Benny Goodman, Walter Winchell, Jack Benny, and Groucho Marx—attacks Mailer for his scatological sins against the America public, stating, “TIME magazine reports on September 2, 1966, that one of America’s top writers, Norman Mailer (‘The Naked and the Dead’), now concentrates on the bowel. ‘Man’s nature,’ says this Jewish playwright, ‘can be divined by the color, the shape, the size of the movement of his bowel contents.’ This ‘artist’ regularly appears on national TV and has his books published. No outraged protest.” Undoubtedly, if I can pay Mailer anything resembling a great compliment, it is that—in terms of his eccentricity, troubled romantic relationships (though, unlike Mailer, Rockwell never stabbed or attempted to kill one of his wives), subversive approach to humor and satire, racial chauvinism, and affinity for conspiracy theories (for example, in his bio Marilyn: A Biography (1973), Mailer made the claim that Marilyn Monroe was assassinated by members of the CIA and FBI because they resented the fact that she defiled JFK)—he is like the Rockwell of Jews, albeit nowhere near as handsome or stoic (incidentally, in a April 8, 1963 letter to The Washington Post publisher and co-owner Philip L. Graham, drug-addled gonzo journalist Hunter S. Thompson wrote, “Politics: opposed to Nixon, Norman Mailer & George Lincoln Rockwell”). Of course, only a country like America could produce such divergent yet similarly incendiary public figures as G.L. Rockwell, who repackaged National Socialism in a super gimmicky carny huckster fashion to make it more palatable to the United State’s rather large culturally and spiritually retarded white prole population, or Mailer, who partly became famous for writing the proto-essay “The White Negro: Superficial Reflections on the Hipster” where he fetishizes the first generation of deracinated and disillusioned European degenerates that succumbed to the distinctly debasing metaphysical plague of Afrophilia. When it comes down to it, Tough Guys Don’t Dance is most fundamentally about the seemingly forsakenly deadly and deranged roots, stranger-the-fiction legacy, and overall eclectically eccentric essence of the United States, or to quote the film’s tragic crypto-cocksucker character Wardley Meeks III, “Only a country as mad as ours could be such a roaring success.”

Oliver Hermanus° (2011)

With my recent viewing and reviewing of Aryan Kaganof's wonderfully wayward rape musical Nice to Meet You, Please Don't Rape Me! (1996), I felt it was about time that I checkout another, albeit somewhat less controversial, South African film about sexual pillaging, Beauty (2011) aka Skoonheid aka Purity directed by relatively young Capetonian auteur Oliver Hermanus (Shirley Adams). As I learned after talking to a white South African cinephile, apparently there is no way in hell that a film like Skoonheid would have been allowed to see the light of day during the apartheid. Indeed, aside from featuring a brutally disgusting and stomach-churning scene towards the end of the film that puts the strangely iconic 'squeal like a pig' scene from John Boorman's Appalachian classic Deliverance (1972) to shame in terms of its random rectum-reaming gruesomeness, the film also features a less than thinly disguised attack on the values of the white Afrikaner communist, especially the old school bourgeois that came of age during the apartheid era and now must face the natural repercussions of being white during a new era black rule. A somewhat nasty reworking of Thomas Mann's novella Death in Venice (1912) set mostly in Cape Town that was directed in a glaringly Haneke-esque style (indeed, Hermanus has cited The Piano Teacher (2001) as being one of his favorite films), Skoonheid centers around a successful married Afrikaans businessman who leads a second secret life as an alpha-homo (he is a 'top') and becomes obsessed with (and ultimately begins stalking) his old best friend's handsome collegiate son. In the film's depiction of an older and rather introverted sexually repressed man brought up under a strict authoritarian system that does not look too kindly on homos who develops a dangerously fanatical and ultimately violent infatuation with a young heterosexual man, Hermanus' film also owes a heavy thematic debt to John Huston's Reflections in a Golden Eye (1967) starring Marlon Brando and Elizabeth Taylor, as well as The Sergeant (1968) starring Rod Steiger. As director Hermanus—a man of mixed racial origin (aka 'mystery meat')—revealed in an interview with the major Marxist website World Socialist Web Site (WSWS) as to why he decided to set the film in Bloemfontein: "I chose it because I assumed it was the sort of South African city where I'd never want to spend my life. It's a bastion of Afrikaanderdom and very segregated. It was the capital of the Orange Free State in the first republic of South Africa and was where the British first established concentration camps to lock up Afrikaners during the Boer War." Indeed, in terms of its glaring 'new left'/Reichian style critique of the white Afrikaner community, Skoonheid utilizes similar libelous clichés that one would expect from a heavy-handed filmmaker like Spielberg (i.e. the complete fabrication in Schindler's List that Yid-killer Amon Goeth was secretly in love with a Jewess). Still, Hermanus manages to bring a degree of nuance to the central character in that, although he is a conservative cracker who loathes coloreds and eventually rapes a young man as a result of being sexually repressed, he is still a sympathetic character to the audience, at least to some extent, yet Skoonheid ultimately blames white-ruled South Africa for the protagonist's sexual savagery and it thus pathetically predictable in that regard, as if the director wanted to kiss the mainstream left's already bloated bunghole. Aesthetically, the film straddles a healthy median between arthouse and Hollywood and is thus a sort of South African equivalent to Tom Ford's A Single Man (2009) as a dark and tragic fag flick that most people can relate to, yet due to its single scene of sadistic forced sodomy towards the end, Skoonheid also features a tiny tinge of exploitation that might appease the appetites of jade gorehound and ex-convicts.

Middle-aged business owner and family man Francois van Heerden (Deon Lotz) is at his eldest daughter's wedding party, but he is not celebrating his little girl's big day as his discernibly lonely eyes are magnetized to a young law student and advert actor named Christian Roodt (Charlie Keegan), who is the son of the protagonist's old friend Willem (Albert Maritz). Francois has not seen Christian, who calls him 'uncle Francois' out of habit, in 7 years and he is determined not to wait another 7 years to seem again, yet he lives in a conservative suburban Bloemfontein and the young man lives in 'liberal' multicultural Cape Town. To make matters worse, Francois' young statuesque blonde daughter Anika (Roeline Daneel) and Christian have just started a romance of sorts, thus evolving into a truly bizarre love triangle that only the protagonist is aware of. In fact, Francois resents his two daughters and bitchy wife Elena (Michelle Scott) because, as a closet homo, he hates women, especially the sort that incessantly nag at him. Indeed, Francois is part of a secret group of suburban Afrikaner sodomites that all randomly meet at one of the members' house and engage in discrete micro-orgies of sorts. When one of the members of the sod collective attempts to bring an effeminate negro to the orgy, he is told "no crazies...no coloreds" and that he is "no longer welcomed" and thrown out of the house in a somewhat physically aggressive manner, thus demonstrating there is an unspoken apartheid of sorts among Afrikaner South African suburban sodomites. Naturally, Francois begins stalking Christian, who is always hanging out with Anika. Due to his undying infatuation with Christian's charming twink beauty, Francois begins to suffer acute anxiety and irritably and even goes to a doctor to address what are ultimately psychosomatic symptoms. Indeed, Francois is god's loneliness gay man, but he self-deludes himself into coming up with an absurd plan to make Christian his boy toy.

Ultimately, Francois plans a fake business trip to Cape Town so he has an excuse to spend time with Christian. When Francois arrives at the Roodt home, he cannot keep his eyes off Christian and when the young man complains he wants an iPod, the business man goes out and buys one for him as a present. Upon hearing that Christian has headed to a place called Clifton Beach, Francois lies to his friend Willem so he can get the young man's phone number, but when he arrives at the beach to surprise his crush with the iPod, he sees that the boy is with his daughter Anika. Enraged his much resented daughter is with the mensch he loves, Francois calls the cops on his progeny for ostensibly stealing his car (she drove his BMW to get to Cape Town), thus ruining her date at the beach just as she had unwittingly ruined his. After his failed attempt to surprise Christian at the beach, Francois goes to a gay bar, tells an effeminate negro to "buzz off" when he attempts to hit on him, and barfs after drinking to many beers and getting turned on by a young Adonis-like fag. That same night, Francois manages to meet up with Christian and confesses to him, "Sometimes I still feel like becoming a pilot and flying way and leaving everything...everyone," thus demonstrating his disillusionment with life. Christian is well aware of his charm as a handsome and likeable young man and clearly realizes Francois 'likes' him, so he offers his 'uncle' a ride because he wants to ask him to fund a business he hopes to start. When Francois and Christian go to the former's hotel room, the latter asks his secret admirer for money for his potential business prospect. Francois attempts to kiss Christian, but the young man suavely rebuffs his advances and continues to talk about the money he would like to borrow. When Francois finally comes to the realization that Christian only wants to use him for his money, his loses his cool, goes completely beserk, and begins to beat and bugger the young man in a fierce fit of rage that leaves the law student completely emotionally and anally ravaged. A number of times during savagely sodomizing Christian, who cries like a little girl and does very little to fight back, Francois loses his erection. When everything is said and done, Francois' sadistic sexual conquest seems like somewhat of a disappointment. As for Christian, one never knows what becomes of him, but he certainly never calls the cops on Francois and stops seeing his rapist's daughter Anika. In the end, Francois goes back to business as usual, though he continues to admire young handsome homos from afar at restaurants and whatnot.

Ultimately, Skoonheid is a film about the inability of people to change once they have been brought up a certain way. In that regard, it seems director Oliver Hermanus thinks there is little hope from white Afrikaans who grew up in apartheid era South African. Indeed, all the white suburbanites of the film agree that "The country is going to hell" and that, in regard to the actions of the black-run ANC government, "They are forcing us to be racist." As auteur Hermanus revealed in an interview with WSWS regarding why he had the white characters make these remarks: "These are very common sentiments amongst conservative white South Africans. In their private lives Francois and the milieu he's from often discuss amongst themselves whether or not the apartheid system was better, safer for them. They may appreciate some of the new political changes, but at the end of the day they would choose the old system because it guaranteed them economic strength and security." As Hermanus would also reveal in an interview with the UK website Idol Magazine regarding how the Afrikaner community has responded to the film: “The very conservative community was definitely scared, outraged, shocked. The younger community was very excited, but the general consensus was that the story wasn’t far-fetched, everyone felt they had an uncle or a brother who behaves in a similar way – emotionally distant, and you can sense that there is an underlying feeling of repression.” Indeed, more than its odd pro-gay liberationist message (to Hermanus’ credit, he did not want people to view his film as a ‘queer’ work, though it would ultimately win the coveted ‘Queer Palm’ at the Cannes Film Festival), Skoonheid is a film about the bitter end of white South Africa and the traditional white bourgeois Afrikaans community in general. Indeed, with the death of Francois’ generation while come a culture ‘gone with the wind,’ so to speak, and black South Africa will certainly express a sigh of relief when that day comes. Of course, when the day comes when whiteness is gone, it is quite dubious whether or not films like Skoonheid will still be allowed to be made, especially in a backward nation where ‘corrective rape’ (aka raping lesbians in an ostensible attempt to convert them to heterosexuality) is quite vogue. Out of all the potential rape scenarios that happen in real-life South Africa on a daily basis, Skoonheid manages to depict the most unlikely, thus more than clearly indicating where the brown filmmaker’s sympathies lie. Indeed, while Skoonheid seems subversive on the surface, its message is undoubtedly as mainstream as they come, thereupon making it a work that is as equally disappointing as it is engaging. On the other hand, the film has incited some irrational hatred in LGBT-lobotomized homos comparable to William Friedkin’s Cruising (1980) due to its less than flattering depiction of a crypto-cocksucker so, in that regard, Skoonheid certainly rises above the majority of sod celluloid swill of Hollywood and ultimately makes a great counterpoint to the shamelessly superficial sentimentality of Brokeback Mountain (2006).

SEIZURE!
SEIZURE!

Oliver Stone* (1974)

While mainstream far-leftist 'auteur' Oliver Stone (Platoon, Wall Street) has directed countless pieces of big budget agitprop trash, one might never suspect that he actually once directed a quasi-exploitation horror-thriller starring suicidal Filipino midgets and lapsed Warhol superstars, as such eccentric cinematic ingredients seem far too curious for a man who assembled a film as pathetically pandering and disgustingly pseudo-sentimental as World Trade Center (2006). Indeed, long before making a name for himself by penning screenplays for relatively successful Hollywood films like Midnight Express (1978), Conan the Barbarian (1982), and Scarface (1983) and developing the reputation he would need to direct imbecilic softcore commie celluloid polemics, Stone directed a goofy and even somewhat campy little known horror flick entitled Seizure! (1974) aka Queen of Evil aka Tango Macabre starring Jonathan 'Barnabas Collins' Frid of Dark Shadows (1967-1971) fame, Hervé 'Tattoo' Villechaize (who was apparently the director's roommate at the time) of Fantasy Island (1977-1983), and Mary Woronov of Warhol's/Morrissey's Chelsea Girls (1966) and Paul Bartel's Eating Raoul (1982). An American-Canadian coproduction that was partly produced by Greek-American Mafioso Michael Thevis (a marvelously murderous man nicknamed the "Scarface of Porn" who once owned half of the hardcore porn industry), who used the film as a means to launder money due to the fact he was under investigation by the FBI, Stone's debut feature is a discernibly amateurishly directed work of the totally tasteless and superlatively sloppy sort that could have been assembled by any random exploitation hack, yet it is still certainly more interesting than probably the majority of the director's later films. Interestingly, Stone is so embarrassed by his first feature that he later bought the copyright for the work so it could never ever again be released (though, it is rather easy to obtain a bootleg DVD of the film). Stone probably also wants to forget the film as it proved to be a nightmarish production for the Hebraic frog filmmaker, or as Greg Merritt revealed in his work Celluloid Mavericks: A History of American Independent Film (2000): "Long before PLATOON or JFK, a cab driver and unsuccessful screenwriter named Oliver Stone co wrote and directed SEIZURE (1974), the disjointed tale of a horror novelist whose nightmares come to life. Stone had virtually no previous production experience; the movie had no money. In an effort to get paid, the crew mutinied, dwarf actor Hervé Villechaize threatened Stone with a knife, and the cinematographer held the film negative for ransom. SEIZURE played in only one theater." Shot on a majorly meager budget of $150,000 using mostly uniquely untalented soap opera actors, Seizure somewhat follows in the cinematically sacrilegious tradition of Wes Craven's The Last House on the Left (1972), which is a non-remake of The Virgin Spring (1960), in that it is more or less an exceedingly loose bastardization of Ingmar Bergman's Hour of the Wolf (1968) aka Vargtimmen. Unlike Bergman's film, which follows the mental derangement of a painter, Stone's quasi-metacinematic work revolves around a high-strung horror novelist, who incessantly dreams of a malefic multicultural trio of crazed bloodlusting freak characters in his mind, only for said malefic multicultural trio of crazed bloodlusting freaks to come to life and torture and slaughter the protagonist's innately insufferable friends and family.

Hack horror novelist Edmund Blackstone (Jonathan Frid) is at a weekend getaway with his wife Nicole (Christina Pickles) and 10-year-old son Jackson (Timothy Ousey) and he is horribly stressed because he cannot think of an adequate ending for his upcoming novel. Luckily, a wicked weirdo threesome will ultimately provide him with the real-life experience he needs to create an authentically horrifying horror novel, though it is dubious as to whether or not he will live to read said novel. Indeed, Blackstone keeps having recurring dreams about a triad of nasty and noxious freaks, including a swarthy dwarf with a rather repugnant leather-fag mustache named 'The Spider' (Hervé Villechaize), an axe-wielding muscle-bound Mandingo-like negro named 'Jackal' (Henry Judd Baker), and a Goddess Kali/Vampira wannabe named 'Queen' aka 'Queen of Evil' (Martine Beswick). Despite seeming to have premonitions that these fatal freaks will soon appear at his home and wreck havoc upon his loved ones, Blackstone decides to invite a number of his friends to his country home for a vacation, including a manically materialistic businessman of the somewhat psychopathic sort named Charlie Hughes (Joseph Sirolian) and his butch bitch wife with nil tits named Mikki (Mary Woronov), as well as an exceedingly effete 'European' aristocrat named Count Serge Kahn (Roger De Koven) and his very vain trophy wife Eunice (Anne Meacham). Before arriving and taking Blackstone and his friends/family hostage, the nightmarish creatures lynch the family dog and leave it for the novelist to find. Meanwhile, Blackstone creates exact sketches of the three quasi-human murderers that will soon insidiously invade his quaint countryside crash pad. Noticeably shaken and agitated as demonstrated by his erratic and highly irritable behavior, Blackstone is asked by his sensitive son Jason what is bothering him, to which the novelist revealingly replies, "I'm scared of something inside me." Indeed, as super sophisticated Semite Serge will eventually reveal after being taken hostage, the Spider, Jackal, and the Queen of Evil are all archetypal characters from ancient folklore, with the latter, who is the leader of the triumvirate of terror, being the Hindu Goddess Kali. The ancient archetypes of evil are inside Blackstone's mind and ultimately his loved one's will pay after he lets them out to play.

When the murderously mischievous 'monsters' arrive, Blackstone and his buds soon learn that they will be playing a deranged Darwinian game of survival of the fittest that only one of the house guests will survive. At this point, the large and in charge Queen of Evil declares, "We are without beginning and without end” and “Our purpose...our only purpose...is death.” While some characters are murdered after losing silly contrived games played against their comrades, others are talked into committing suicide during scenarios that ultimately reveal each character’s foremost weaknesses. For example, Serge’s wife Eunice opts for self-slaughter after malevolent midget Spider besmirches her beauty and makes her look like the bastard sister of Freddy Krueger. Of course, when these characters are pit against each other by the tyrannical trio, they demonstrate their true ugly and oftentimes predatory characters. For example, the Queen of Evil offers to spare Mikki if she kills Blackstone. Of course, Blackstone defeats Mikki, though he refuses to finish her off, so the Queen does it for him. When Blackstone does the unthinkable by denying the Queen’s carnal advances, he is given two hours to be alone with his wife Nicole before she does. During their last moments together, Nicole stoically states to her cuckold of a husband, “You’re a coward, Edmund...I realized that tonight.” Meanwhile, old Count Serge has accepted his forsaken fate like a man and before being decapitated by big black buck Jackal, he confesses to Blackstone, “I’ve come to believe that god is both good and evil. Sometimes he speaks to us with terror...like Yahweh or Mithras...or Kali. I’ve learned something tonight... I lived through the Russian Revolution...The Nazi occupation of Europe, but tonight...tonight, I’m old. I’m like a little baby in the arms of a new world. I think death, true death, is a companion...not an enemy...to life.” After Serge dies, the Queen offers to spare Blackstone’s life if he tells her where his son is hiding. Rather pathetically, Blackstone, who ultimately proves to be a sickeningly self-centered psychopath of sorts (much like most of his friends), opts for sacrificing his own son and he rationalizes this decision by stating to himself, “I can start again, after all it was all a dream, my life, always...books, ideas, illusions...even the people around me—Nicole, my friends, Jason—my love for them was only an author’s love for his own creations, but he can create others...more and more. An artist is without end. He never dies. He is not allowed to die.” In the end, after a twist ending or two (or three), it is revealed that horror novelist Edmund Blackstone perished at the age of 47 via heart attack. Luckily, no one else will have to bear the misfortune of reading another one of his phony horror novels.

While a witless and largely prosaic pseudo-philosophical/pseudo-metaphysical work that flirts with going beyond good and evil yet ultimately cops out in the end, Seizure is nonetheless most certainly one of Oliver Stone’s most original, thoughtful, and shockingly idiosyncratic films to date, as a sort of misbegotten cinematic marriage between Tod Browning’s Freaks (1932), Bergman’s Hour of the Wolf, and Nicholas Ray’s Bigger Than Life (1956), albeit minus the drug element. While Stone intended to, “use the horror genre to treat serious psychological and cultural idea,” the film ultimately falls as both exploitation horror and as a piece of intellectual wankery. Indeed, it is quite obvious while watching the film that Stone has little interest or understanding of the genre and only made a horror film as they tend to make for the best financial gambles for first time directors. In fact, the director more or less admitted such in 1991 when he stated regarding the film, "You have to stretch to like it. It wasn't great. I felt back then the same as I do now, that I always wanted to direct, and the horror genre was easier to break in with." The director would follow up Seizure with an even more forgettable quasi-horror flick entitled The Hand (1981) starring Michael Caine before directing his first big success Platoon (1986) and dedicating the rest of his filmmaking career to creating shamelessly cliché bourgeois liberal bollocks. In the book Oliver Stone's USA: Film, History, and Controversy (2000), which only mentions Seizure a single time in all of its 340 pages, Robert Brent Toplin wrote regarding Stone's pre-fame days: "By mid-1976, he had written eleven scripts and even directed one, SEIZURE, on a shoestring budget in Canada but failed to attract much critical or popular attention. It seemed he was going nowhere at a frantic pace. His marriage fell apart, he quit one job after another, and success continued to elude him. As America celebrated its bicentennial, Oliver Stone was a marginally employed twenty-five-year-old living in a cheap apartment in New York City. Had Stone been a movie character, he would have been TAXI DRIVER's Travis Bickle." Personally, I see more artistic integrity in the Travis Bickle that directed Seizure than in the philistine commie conspiracy theorist that directed such ludicrously long agitprop pieces as JFK (1991), Nixon (1995) and W. (2008) that remind the viewer why American mainstream left-wingers make for the most shallow, soulless, and just plain stupid of filmmakers in all of cinema history.

THE HAND
THE HAND

Oliver Stone* (1981) If British had it's own language, Michael Caine would be British for Suave. In the wake of the death of Creature/Animatronic autuer Stan Winston, I decided to revisit some of his lesser known works. The Hand is a 1981 horror film centering on a comic strip author whose hand is dismembered in a freak car accident. Upon the disappearance of his severed hand, people who provoke his rage meet a demise similar to The Brood. If I had to compare The Hand to two films, It would be Magic meets The Brood. Michael Caine's performance sadly doesn't rival Sir Anthony Hopkins, but provides for a tasty full course meal throughout this psychological horror film. This might be the only Oliver Stone film I can say I really enjoy. Spring loaded with a twist ending that will reverse the ways of your emotions, The Hand could easily dominate most other films of it's kind if marketed correctly. The Hand is one of those films I respect for it's clever use of animatronics. While not as breakthrough as the hand in the Addam's Family, this one is increasingly morbid as it decays and rots. Michael Caine is a frizzy haired recluse who shelters his pain through alcohol. While being a tired cliché, it's the most relatable for pain. Alcohol is tough love in can form. When bodies begin dropping, the almost young Caine doesn't even notice. A modern age Tell-Tale Heart with a bigger body count, The Hand was recently released as apart of the Twisted Terror's collection making this worthy gem available to the most sheltered cinema goer. The soundtrack marks a spooky entry in confined horror orchestra and several of the white-out editing effects used to style up his severe fury. Michael Caine's character is one we could all end up like. Albeit, we probably won't have any detached limbs chasing around, doing our handiwork. Love doesn't nearly have as big of a message as hatred and violence does. In this small rural community, Caine sets out to teach a lesson about country hospitality. A cautious tale from Oliver Stone, too bad he decided to make flimsy propaganda and shitty patriotic films.

WALL STREET

Oliver Stone* (1987)

Oliver Stone loves communism, money, and agitating. All three things seem to go together hand in hand (revolutions cost money and Wall Street bankers have always funded them). Stone's father was a stockbroker on wall street and that's what influenced him to direct the film Wall Street. The film illustrates a realistic look at the international free market and the goons that are parasites of it. Wall Street is based on the real life insider trading criminal Ivan Boesky (in the film he is named Gordon Gekko). Gordon Gekko is a monetary obsessed sociopath bent on acquiring as much as possible. He is a quick talker and constantly conspiring. He loves to leave the working man jobless as he collects a couple extra dollars for his efforts. Gekko hasn't done a days work in his entire life. He is more interesting in living off others by buying and selling. Gekko sums up his outlook on life with the following quote: "Greed, for lack of a better word, is good. Greed is right. Greed works. Greed clarifies, cuts through, and captures the essence of the evolutionary spirit. Greed, in all of its forms, greed for life, for money, for love, knowledge has marked the upward surge of mankind." I honestly believe that Oliver Stone has a deep and passionate respect for Gordon Gekko. Stone hides his true respect by making the films protagonist Bud Fox a "good" guy at the end of Wall Street. Mr. Stone doesn't want to incriminate himself too much. Oliver Stone is a firm believer in GREED IS GOOD! Gordon Gekko shows his hatred for white Europeans with the following quote: "That's the thing about WASPs, they love animals, can't stand people." I respect his honesty. Oliver Stone is also a hater of Western civilization. Stone and his surly heroes are about as deranged as scumbag Abbie Hoffman at his hippie propagandist peak. It is a shame that Stone didn't direct the shitfest Steal This Movie. Wall Street is one of Stone's best films. He allows the masses to get at peak at their money masters. Wall Street would have made a great Nazi propaganda film if it had only been made 50 years before. Emil Jannings could have played Gordon Gekko. Janning's performance in F.W. Murnau's German expressionist masterpiece The Last Laugh confirms this. Oliver Stone could be considered an auteur of sorts. He has his own over stylized style and signature traits (lying about history, cocaine induced editing, etc). Apparently Stone likes to get stoned as his arrest history shows. Maybe he'll direct a film on the Sassoon family and their opium wars. I am sure he idolizes them too.

THE DOORS
THE DOORS

Oliver Stone* (1991)

I would be lying if I didn't admit that I am a fan of Oliver Stone's The Doors. Being a fan of The Doors I couldn't help but become interested in the film. The film's soundtrack for the most part is music from the band. The myth of Jim Morrison's Shaman persona is shattered with Stone's emphasis on the lead singer's self destruction. For once, Oliver Stone attempts to be semi-honest with a film. Val Kilmer surprisingly pulls off the charismatic Jim Morrison. This includes both acting and singing like Morrison. I generally hate any type of biopic or period piece film. Hollywood tends to make a mockery of interesting people and times. Oliver Stone essentially makes a brief synopsis of Jim Morrison and The Doors history. I like to think of the film as one fancy montage music video of The Doors. Nothing wrong with fancy images and good tunes. Oliver Stone used to listen to The Doors and take LSD. Now he snorts cocaine and misquotes Adolf Hitler. Stone also likes to propagate insane conspiracies that fit his Neo-Marxist fantasies. I wonder if he killed any of his comrades in the Vietnam War. One could only imagine Oliver Stone firing a machine gun while screaming the lyrics to "Break on Through." The Doors features cameos from many interesting personalities. Crispin Glover and Billy Idol were my favorites. Glover did a great job portraying Andy Warhol as a silly boy. Oliver Stone made a point on insulting Warhol's pictures in The Doors. Too Bad Warhol factory director Paul Morrissey has given more to film than Oliver Stone ever will. I also very much enjoyed the Native American Shaman that appeared randomly throughout The Doors. He seemed very excited when in full drag at a Warhol factory party. I hope he didn't take a bath with Morrison at the end of the film. Naked medicine men give lethal dosages of opiates.

WORLD TRADE CENTER

Oliver Stone* (2006)

I was not at all surprised when I learned that Oliver Stone had decided to capitalize off the 9/11 terrorist attacks with his film World Trade Center. Stone's deep respect for subversive and morally unconventional money making was confirmed in his 1987 film Wall Street. World Trade Center also acts as a propaganda film of sorts catering to the mindset of traitorous capitalist internationalists and their corporate backers. As any good propaganda should be, World Trade Center hides behind a completely idealized view of the American blue collar patriotic spirit. World Trade Center focuses on two New York City police officers that have been trapped in the rumble of a building in ruin. Both men are the everyday hero that risk their lives to ensure the safety of the United States from criminal elements (or at least Stone wants us to believe this). These characters were based on the real life New York City Port Authority policemen who were trapped in a virtual hell on earth. Oliver Stone is able to exploit the hearts of true American sentimentalists by focusing on the suffering and personal problems both suffer. Oliver Stone confirms his commitment to the state of Israel clear with one random and out of place quote from a Jewish cop in the film. He says exactly, "Israel? It's Gone. It's Nuked" and follows with "The whole freaking world is coming to an end today, Willy." For those who don't know, the middle eastern countries hate the United States due to our complete and 100% support of the state of Israel. We provide Israel with all the weapons and funding necessary to "fight" the enemy states surrounding Israel. The entire world knows this yet, the average American seems to have no idea.

The quote from the Jewish police officer has another bold yet sick meaning. The world will cease to exist before the state of Israel is wiped out. Israeli military historian and theorist Martin van Creveld stated the following about the unrelenting preservation of Israel, "We possess several hundred atomic warheads and rockets and can launch them at targets in all directions, perhaps even at Rome. Most European capitals are targets for our air force.... We have the capability to take the world down with us. And I can assure you that that will happen before Israel goes under." Although van Creveld obviously lacks empathy for humanity as a whole and is clearly a sociopath, his assertions are most likely true. I am sure Oliver Stone is more than aware of this. Oliver Stone brings up another pro neo con element to World Trade Center. Policeman Will Jimeno (one of the officers trapped in the WTC rubble) is a Colombian American who has done quite well for himself in the United States. He has a beautiful white wife (who he describes as a feisty woman of Italian and German extraction), a home, and a little girl he loves (with one on the way). In the beginning of World Trade Center, officer Jimeno drives to work in a redneck diesel truck listening to generic country music. Jimeno acts a symbolic replacement of the blue collar western European worker for the Latino immigrant outsider. He has taken the European American's women, job, truck, and even music. The Latino American has become the new American hero (replacing the John Wayne and Bruce Willis types) to compliment the neo con agenda of a globalized and "universal" America.

The real Will Jimeno

Another odd element of World Trade Center is the devout Christian marine Dave Karnes. Karnes believes that the 9/11 attacks were an act against god and he seeks vengeance against what he sees as enemies of Christ. Oliver Stone portrays this character as both hero and Christian psycho extremist. Karnes acts symbolically as evangelical Christianities war on evil Muslim extremists. In reality, "the war on terror" is used as a way to insure Israel's security in the middle east. I can only imagine Oliver Stone laughing behind the scenes, thinking about how brainwashed Judeo-Christians are fighting Israel's war for them. Oliver Stone also doesn't miss the opportunity to use blasphemy against Jesus Christ. Officer Will Jimeno envisions Jesus carrying a water bottle (trapped Jimeno is quite thirsty). These slight dreamlike silhouette images appear in World Trade Center a couple times. Oliver Stone has turned Jesus Christ into an absurd fantasy cult leader that guides Christian gentiles lives magically from one tragedy to another. Christ has become a tool of neo cons in their goal of international control and collectivism. World Trade Center may not feature the insane conspiracy theories that drive other Oliver Stone films, but it is obviously propaganda. Reading and seeing interviews with Oliver Stone incriminate the director as a self serving and sociopath disinformation man bent on confusing the ignorant even more. Like the bloated and unfunny disinformation propagandist Michael Moore, Oliver Stone is really working for the money man. These directors pretend to be freedom fighters, but in reality are the biggest promoters of authoritarianism and loss of freedom. May they one day be exposed publicly as the corporate backed liars they truly are.

CANNIBAL TERROR

Olivier Mathot (1980)

I've seen some bad films in my time. I've researched the film Cannibal Terror and it's said to be the worst. Now, I don't think any of these people have seen Carnivore or Razortooth, but I will simultaneously forgive them and thank them. Cannibal Terror is indeed bad, but it's not as awful as some of the other trash I've seen. Cannibal Terror consists of a couple bumbling criminals who hook up with a prostitute to kidnap a business tycoon's daughter for ransom. Things get complicated when they are caught and the escape to an island via ferry. Little do they know that this island is home to Cannibals with afro's and mutton chops. That right there is the sole amusement of the film; watching white people in face paint dancing around looking awkwardly at their neighbor wondering to themselves "What the fuck did I get myself into?" Among the Video Nasties that have had the ban removed, Cannibal Terror is the weakest link of the bunch, the others being The Evil Dead and Inferno. My problem with cannibal films is that they're all the same formulaic approach. Some guy gets in trouble, heads into the jungle. Rape. Gore. Oh no, message at the end. What was the moral of the story? These films don't speak to me in any way, shape, or form. The only cannibal film that had a message that I paid attention to was our favorite, Cannibal Holocaust. All these victims normally begin their mistake with the rape of some key female figure. Instead of films mocking the broad horror genre, someone should spoof a cannibal film. That would be easy, but it's easier if you pretend Cannibal Terror is a spoof. Soon after this rape scene, more white cannibals come thanks to a spiteful husband of the woman they raped. In the end, everything settles to a simmering happiness and everyone gets what they want. Except me. This film was bad. I expected something salvageable out of the Cannibal Terror experience. All I got was scraps. If you like your rape schlocky and your gore dubbed over with mayonnaise produced sounds, you might enjoy this film. I think it is at least worth to skip through, if not for the gore then for the mutton chop cannibal who strangely resembles Elvis. Conspiracy theorists, beware. Your king has gone into hiding acting in shitty Z grade EuroTrash.

ADORATION

Olivier Smolders (1987)

What inspires a man to kill? Is it a right of passage? Does it make a "man" of a man to kill a man? What about killing a woman? Why kill something beautiful and innocent? Why kill something you swoon over? Japanese cannibal Issei Sagawa killed and ate a young woman that he was obsessed with. While studying in France, he met a young Dutch girl. The short and Asian Issei Sagawa had a questionable obsession with this tall Aryan woman. Apparently, Sagawa has described himself as a "weak, ugly and small man." It is obvious that a man that would describe himself in such a manner lacks the confidence to obtain a beautiful European woman. Instead, Issei decided that killing and eating the object of his lustful desire would be the only way of obtaining an intimate moment with the unfortunate lady. The Body of Sagawa's victim Belgian experimental director Olivier Smolders directed a powerful short film about Issei Sagawa and his victim. The beautiful 1987 short Adoration features scenes of black and white brutality worthy of a certain degree of "adoration." Director Olivier Smolders added a couple fictional elements to give the short a more "poetic" feel. The young women featured in Adoration is even shot during the reciting of poetry. Sagawa wastes no time disassembling the young woman's limbs and putting them to his mouth so that he can "absorb her energy." With Adoration, Olivier Smolders accomplished creating a film that combines both depravity and an unsettling calmness. Adoration is not a glamorized look at murder and sexual gratification, but a view into the life of a pathetically perverted individual. Issei Sagawa fainted after cowardly shooting his victim in the back of the neck. After regaining consciousness, Issei raped her dead body and then proceeded to eat the flesh off of the victim's hips. Nowadays, Issei Sagawa is living the life of a "minor celebrity" in Tokyo, Japan. He writes restaurant reviews, acts in films, and is a published author.

BLACK NIGHT

Olivier Smolders (2005)

Black Night (Nuit Noire) is the debut feature length film from the surrealist director Olivier Smolders. The film follows a Natural Sciences Museum conservator, Oscar, who has a perverse insect fetish that eventually turns completely sexual. One day, he comes home to find a naked pregnant African woman occupying his bed. He is immediately both disgusted and disturbed by the woman's occupation of his domestic habitat. She is sweating and dying of an unmentioned disease.

Since Black Night is "weird," "dark," and "surreal," the film has been compared to the works of American auteur David Lynch. I don't really find much in common with Black Night and films by David Lynch. People really need to stop comparing every film conflicting with linear film cohesion to David Lynch. Surrealist directors have existed since the birth of cinema. Olivier Smolders has a more concrete vision in mind than David Lynch (especially when comparing the film to Inland Empire or Mulholland Dr.). Black Night has also been compared to the writing of novelist Franz Kafka (I assume especially the Metamorphosis) which is more a reasonable assertion.

I can already hear Spike Lee calling Black Night a racist surrealist film. The African woman featured in Black Night dies and Oscar starts constructing a cocoon out of her body. When the cocoon finally hatches, something "whiter" appears. I doubt it was the director's intention to involve race in the film, but with contemporary America and "academia's" cultural Marxist (whether they know it or not) obsession with such matters, it is inevitable.

Black Night also features footage of pre-colonial Africa (not real stock footage of course). Two white Europeans (man and child) in expedition clothes and two Africans (Woman and child) in native garb smile for the camera peacefully. Knowing how Africa fell into complete shambles after colonization, this scene invokes irony at an unintentionally (or I assume) absurd level. Black Night seems to be a fusion of an artist's subconscious and his own personal obsession. Two elements that have always made for powerful and sincere art.

Director Olivier Smolders is someone to look out for in the future. He has a pellucid vision as all great artists should. The surrealist images found in Black Night carry a resonance that will stay with you long after the film is over. Identical Nordic elderly men, mutilated little girls, and alien-like insects all come together to construct a film of aesthetically dynamic radiance.

DONKEY PUNCH

Olly Blackburn (2008)

Wow. What a provocative and sensational title. When a film encompasses its roots as well as Olly Blackburn's does, it's sure to be a surefire hit, am I right? Donkey Punch follows the extracurricular activities of "chavs doing chavvy things". This plot summary was blissfully composed and surprisingly summarizes the film perfectly. Don't expect a scandalous thriller compromising the lives of British youngsters, instead you will find a film that borrows elements from Mean Creek and an intense kill ala Haute Tension. For those of you who are unaware of what a Donkey Punch is - Urban Dictionary. I'd recommend this website for the jolly fuck that wrote this film as well. The Donkey Punch manoeuvre is when you punch the back of the head, not generally the neck, but perhaps that fed towards the plausibility of the stupid slut dying during copulation. At first I expected an I Know What You Did Last Summer approach but found myself bored as these feisty tweens constantly contradicted themselves and flipping every which alignment in a befuddled mess that smelled worse than the ocean they were sailing. The blows are interchanged on the dot, leaving much to wonder. What you are given is a sub-par blow-by-blow revenge film that isn't "Crazysexycool" or anything in between. While Donkey Punch isn't entirely horrible, I wouldn't actually recommend it save for 2 of the death scenes. While 4/5 of the males are "right wankers", the lot all have their gleaming moments which allow you to redefine their characteristics. This might be the biggest anticipation for Sundance, but it is also the biggest let-down. Taking a stride from the average film concerning the perils of the nuclear family, Donkey Punch doesn't know where it stands on the issue of sexism. It bloats its way through each scenario making each sex look stupider and stupider as time wears thin. First, the women whore themselves out to strangers, consume narcotics, and get beaten silly only to end up dead, then the male becomes the abusive Neanderthal lugging around a guilty conscience. Things even out slightly as the end justifies the means. The biggest poisonous blow was the script. The beginning is a full-fledged cerebral assault on the average "yank". The cockney slang is whipped out encore style with no mercy. You'll be begging to hear some proper English in a matter of minutes. Nigel Thornberry comes to mind. Suddenly, I can hear "Smashing!" being repeated endlessly. Donkey Punch wants nothing more than to be a chaotic neutral friend to the battle of the sexes. 'Tis a pity, O' adolescence.

THE NATURE OF THE BEAST

Ondi Timoner (1994)

Judeocentric cultural Marxist moral bankruptcy is quite obvious in many ways in Tinseltown, but in no way is it more apparent than the fact that pedophilic rapists and sex criminals have no problem continuing to work in the industry yet people that say slightly naughty things about Hebrews, homos, and/or leftists are oftentimes blacklisted and viciously attacked by the yellow press. Indeed, Judaic auteurs like Roman Polanski and Woody Allen did not allow certain rather unsavory sex scandals result in them serving prison sentences, let alone ruin their careers. Likewise, mainstream leftist journalists and film critics are shockingly sympathetic when it comes to writing about these degenerates, as if their Hebraicness gives them a perennial pass (of course, Polanski's shoah survivor status does not hurt). Maybe it is due to the fact that he was a wily wop instead of a member of god's chosen tribe, but gay guido Victor Salva found himself serving 15 months of a three year sentence after he got busted boning the 12-year-old star Nathan Forrest Winters of his debut feature Clownhouse (1989). In fact, aside from molesting Winters over a four year period that started when the young boy appeared in the softspoken sexual predator's Spielberg-esque debut horror short Something in the Basement (1986), Salva was arrogant enough in terms of his craven carnality that he actually dared to film himself engaging with mutual oral molestation with the little lad, thus giving the authorities all the evidence they needed to certify his guilt (apparently, the cops also discovered that Salva had a massive collection of child porn). Of course, Salva's affinity for little boy buggery did not stop him from eventually continuing his career in Hollywood, as his fellow Sicilian-American filmmaker buddy Francis Ford Coppola was eventually able to help him relaunch his filmmaking career and he would go on to direct relatively mainstream turds like the Disney distributed celluloid self-pity party Powder (1995) starring Jeff Goldblum and the rather commercially successful horror franchise flicks Jeepers Creepers (2001) and Jeepers Creepers II (2003). As revealed in the article Can Victor Salva Move On? by Glenn Lovell, Salva once even bragged in regard to his relatively disturbing ability to work and flourish in Hollywood despite being a convinced child molester, "I'm not sure people are comfortable being seen with me.... But I think [studio execs] saying, 'He'll never work again' was all for show. My God, if they were to take the [arrest] records of every filmmaker or actor, they'd have to shut this town down . . . Let's face it [hollow laugh] anybody can work here who makes money." Indeed, as Salva, Allen, and Polanski have confirmed, you can commit the most ungodly of crimes against children and continue to work in Hollywood, so long as you're not suspected of blaming Jews for decide or starting eternal wars in the Middle East.

Despite making fairly lame mainstream movies for the most part, Salva, unlike Polanski and Allen, has somewhat utilized his prison experience and dubious reputation as a sexual predator to his artistic advantage, at least when it comes to two of his lesser known films, including The Nature of the Beast (1995) aka Bad Company aka Hatchet Man and Rites of Passage (1999). In fact, Salva wrote the scripts for both of these films while he was still in prison and Rites of Passage is actually a semi-autobiographical movie that was inspired by the fact that the filmmaker's abusive alcoholic stepfather disowned him for being a faggot long before he was ever busted for molesting the child star of his debut feature Clownhouse. Not unlike American arthouse auteur Jon Jošt—a pacifistic white liberal who spent over two years in prison for draft-dodging—with his arguable magnum opus Last Chants for a Slow Dance (1977), Salva utilized his personal experience interacting with dangerous criminals in the slammer as crucial inspiration in terms of constructing characters for these two very morally ambiguous yet nonetheless strangely insightful and unforgettable films that test the bounds of social and cinematic acceptability. Unlike Jošt's film(s), Salva's movies naturally focus on rough and tough homos and criminally-inclined perverts. While Salva might have been busted for preying on preteen boys, these two films clearly indicate that the filmmaker also has a fetish for butch alpha-male types and anti-social rebels. Somewhat ironically but not surprisingly considering the auteur's somewhat laughable talent when it comes to directing serious melodrama, the least overtly gay yet most sexually-charged of these two films, The Nature of the Beast, is also the superior cinematic effort and arguably the filmmaker's greatest film yet. In short, you can really sense while watching the film that Salva has spent a lot of time thinking about the sort of guys that would love nothing more than to rape, rob, and/or beat him to death. Not unsurprisingly, the film utilizes the classic LGBT canard of hinting that the source of a serial killer character's homicidal tendencies are sexual repression and self-internalized homophobia, which is somewhat ironic considering that Salva exercised his own personal sexual demons by molesting a boy.

A horror-thriller-slasher-drama-mystery road flick that involves a sort of covertly gay disharmonious romance between a middle-aged alcoholic bourgeois serial killer and a somewhat younger junky ex-con crook-cum-hitchhiker, The Nature of the Beast is a film that is nearly impossible to discuss and analyze without revealing crucial spoilers (in fact, I recommend watching the film first before reading this if you don't want it ruined for you). Arguably one of the most innately fucked up and depraved depictions of 'opposites attracting' in quasi-mainstream American cinema history, Salva's film is like a more overtly homoerotic take on The Hitcher (1986) and Spielberg's made-for-TV thriller Duel (1971) with elements of road movies as diverse as Monte Hellman's Two-Lane Blacktop (1971), Terrence Malick's Badlands (1973), and Rainer Erler's kraut cult horror flick Fleisch (1979) aka Spare Parts, albeit sans any sort of genuine artistic value. In terms of its homoerotic subtext and psychopathic character(s), Salva's film can also certainly be compared to Pasquale Festa Campanile's beautifully brutal anti-bourgeois cross-country chiller AutoStop rosso sangue (1977) aka Hitch-Hike starring Franco Nero and David Hess. Additionally, I don't doubt that Salva, who apparently adores golden age Hollywood, is a fan of Ida Lupino's film noir classic The Hitch-Hiker (1953). Undoubtedly, one of the most, if not the most, potent aspect of the film is the rather intense chemistry between perennial boy bimbo Eric Roberts and unrivaled Übermensch of silver screen stoicism Lance Henriksen in what is indubitably one of the most superlatively sick unrequited love stories ever committed to celluloid. Indeed, when it really comes down to it, The Nature of the Beast is the sad and pathetic story of an ostensibly rough and tough lost gay boy and the murderously repressed suburban family man that is too uptight and impenetrable to embrace the lonely lad and engage in In flagrante delicto with him. In its depiction of a bad boy from the wrong side of the tracks with serious pathological daddy issues, the film follows in the pleasantly politically incorrect tradition of William Friedkin's Cruising (1980), which is notable for pissing off mainstream gay authoritarian groups due to its rather unflattering depiction of a sod serial killer with a sort of gay Oedipus complex who incessantly writes letters to his long dead father. In terms of depicting a gay lumpenprole rebel that tries in vain to be loved and respected by an anally retentive bourgeois prick, the film somewhat strangely shares similar themes to Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Fox and His Friends (1975) aka Faustrecht der Freiheit. As demonstrated by the fact that virtually none of the murders are depicted onscreen and the overall film is relatively bloodless, I think that it is fairly safe to say that Salva merely uses generic genre conventions as a means to trick straight viewers into watching a patently perverse poof (anti)love story. Still, despite being a crypto-cocksucker film that was never released in theaters, the film proved to be New Line Cinema's biggest direct-to-video title of 1995. Undoubtedly, leads Henriksen and Roberts certainly deserve credit for molding an otherwise mostly banally constructed film into bizarrely delectable piece of raw psychosexual intensity where bloodlust replaces love and murder acts as a substitute for sex.

As a virtual lifelong fan of The X-Files, I am also naturally a fan of Chris Carter's somewhat more esoteric and occult oriented Fox television series Millennium (1996-1999) starring Lance Henriksen as a terminally sullen ex-FBI agent named Frank Black that has a keen talent for catching serial killer by using a special genetic gift that allows him to be able to 'empathize' with the criminally perverted and see the world through their warped eyes. In Millennium, Henriksen—a man who, in terms of appearance and demeanor, is not surprisingly the son of a Norwegian sailor-cum-boxer with the nickname 'Icewater'—plays a stoically melancholic man who seems like he has all the pain and misery of all of humanity bearing down on his supremely forlorn soul. Undoubtedly, one of the things that makes The Nature of the Beast so intensely intriguing is that Henriksen portrays a decidedly depraved dude that his character Frank Black would have obsessively hunted on Millennium. As for Eric Roberts, he portrays a rawer yet somewhat deconstructed version of the rebel-without-a-cause archetype as exemplified by legends like Marlon Brando and James Dean, as well as real-life copycats like American teenaged spree killer Charles Starkweather. Naturally, as a homo with a softspot for cute and charming conmen that are probably desperate enough and/or morally bankrupt to do gay-for-pay even if they aren't actually faggots, Salva clearly empathizes with Roberts' character while attacking Henriksen's character for his supposed sexual repression. In fact, it can certainly be argued that The Nature of the Beast goes as far as to portray Roberts' hustler-like character as a victim of sort uptight bourgeois gay self-loathing, with the film somewhat hinting that if Henriksen's embraced his inner-homo by sucking cocks and reaming rectums, he might not be a hyper hypocritical homicidal maniac that enjoys cutting people into little pieces. Needless to say, the film also has an extra hidden layer of truly unnerving psychosexual horror when one considers that it is a cinematic that critiques sexual repression yet was directed by a perverted fellow with a pederastic predilection. Indeed, one of the things that makes The Nature of the Beast so awfully engulfing is that watching the film has more or less the same appeal as witnessing a uniquely unsavory crime that has to be seen to be believed. In other words, it is indubitably the sort of film that you would hope to see from a real-life sex criminal, even if Salva demonstrates the legitimacy of Heidegger's Jewess mistress Hannah Arendt's 'the banality of evil' theory as far as genuine artistry is concerned (indeed, like his hero Spielberg, Salva is not an artist but an artisan).

Like virtually all of Salva's films, The Nature of the Beast is, in terms of sheer direction and construction, hopelessly contrived and screams of mechanically constructed pre-processed celluloid product (in this sense, one can certainly see why Spielberg is one of the director's biggest influences), but thankfully Mr. Henriksen and Mr. Roberts and their borderline shockingly believable savage homoerotic chemistry make this film worth viewing, even if you have nil interest in smoking poles or pursuing the exotic art of bugchasing. Indeed, it seems that in every single scene in the entire film, a tumbleweed conspicuously passes by, including the opening scene where a faceless serial killer known as the 'Hatchet Man' emerges from the backseat of a vintage Chrysler and kills a poor fat wop in a desolate motel desert parking lot in the middle of the night. The next day, protagonist Jack Powell (Henriksen)—an extremely uptight looking businessman with a family who seems like he is hiding some deep dark secret—drives by the crime scene and is told by a cop, "Keep going, straight through. At least until you get to the interstate. Don't stop to make any new friends" due to a "homicide." Jack seems somewhat surprised when he sees tiny pieces of body parts being removed from the trunk of the Chrysler. Before driving away, Jack sees 'Hatchet Man' written in blood on the trunk of the car. As the viewer will soon learn, Jack has much more important things to worry about than a deranged serial killer that enjoys turning people into mincemeat. While driving on the highway, Jack spots an inordinately handsome hitchhiker (Roberts) with a cool strut who he seems to want to pick up, but decides to pass. Unfortunately for Jack, he opts to stop at a pink diner called 'Cadillac Jacks' where, upon entering the bathroom, he is soon intimidated by the boorishly charismatic hitcher, who says to him while peeing in a urinal, "You're not too neighborly, are you?... You got a kink about watching people fry in the desert?" From there, Jack makes the mistake of apologizing and offers to buy the hitchhiker, who introduces himself as Adrian aka 'Dusty,' lunch. One of the first things Adrian does to shock and provoke Jack is to ask him, "Are you a fag? I don't mean any offense if you are. I mean, if it weren't for homos... none of us fellas would ever get a ride. I've thumbed enough miles to know that." Somewhat strangely, Jack does not even bother to deny he's a homo and one gets the sense that Adrian is no novice when it comes to the timeless art of hustling, as he seems like he could be the meth-addled redneck half-brother of Joe Dallesandro. A sort of sleazily suave bisexual take on the 'Hawksian woman' archetype, Adrian might be a total piece of self-destructive human excrement, but he is undeniably likeable. Of course, Jack is even more disturbed when Adrian states to him while figuratively peering into his soul, "You know, Jack, I can usually tell in about two minutes... all I need to know about a person." When a less than sophisticated waitress named Patsy (Roberts' real-life wife Eliza Roberts) comes to the table, it becomes obvious why Jack is terrified, as she casually mentions how over $1 million was stolen from a local casino. As hinted by a snazzy suitcase he is constantly carrying around, the viewer assumes that Jack stole the money, hence his anxiety. Before the day is over, Patsy is dead and Adrian, who the viewer assumes has managed to use his hustler charms to seduce her, was one of the last people to see her alive. While the viewer suspects that Jack is a thief, one also assumes that Adrian is the mysterious killer, but by the end of the film the filmgoer will learn that first impressions can be seriously misleading and that you never really know what is going on in people's heads.

For virtually the entire film, Jack makes every desperate attempt he can to flee Adrian's aggressively charming company, but the too-cool-for-school hitchhiker blackmails the lame old bourgeois businessman and constantly reaffirms his intent to place an anonymous call to the local cops with his license plate number if he dares to attempt to abandon him in the scorching deserts of Southern California. Adrian is certainly the sort of shameless charmer that never takes no for an answer and he is totally determined to establish a bizarre close relationship with Jack. When it comes down to it, Adrian just wants to simply have some good honest dangerous fun with the old man and earn his respect, but Jack is too hopelessly repressed and finds the young stud's dirty little heroin addiction to be quite disgusting as revealed by rather self-righteous things he says to him like, "That stuff is disgusting. You put enough of that in you and you're going to goddamn fall apart.” Of course, as an angry dipsomaniac that incessantly has Jack Daniels pumping through his veins and who seems to bask in stewing in his own deeply hidden angry and hatred, Jack is no less of an addict than Adrian is and he is in complete denial about that fact. In fact, Adrian attempts to callout Jack on his flagrant hypocrisy by stating, “You know all about it, don’t you, Jack? Yeah, people scream evil like a motherfucker...unless it’s their own—then it’s cool.” Naturally, Adrian also hints that he is interested in more things than just drugs and that he desires Jack sexually by stating somewhat ambiguous things like, “Repression is a deadly thing. It’s deadly.” Unfortunately for poor Adrian, his words will prove to be quite literally true, but before he kicks the bucket in a seriously savage fashion he gets to go on a strange road trip with the world’s angriest suburban family man.

Since Jack is too much of an anally retentive pussy to fuck him (or get fucked by him), Adrian gets focused on a dope-dealing hippie couple named Gerald (Sasha Jenson) and Dahlia (Ana Gabriel) from Boston that are driving across country in a van full of drugs in the stereotypical hope to, “check out the rainforest before they cut it all down.” Needless to say, Jack is not happy to see the two hippies and forces Adrian to abandon his new friends only a couple minutes after meeting them at a secluded gas station. Of course, Adrian is at least partly interested in these hapless braindead hippie morons because he so desperately wants to make Jack jealous. In fact, Jack gets so jealous of Adrian’s new friends that he flips out, pulls over the car, and yells, “We don’t look right together, get it? Everyone within a hundred miles...knows about the Hatchet Man and the goddamn money. Do you understand? What, do you think I’m some dumb ass old man...that you can drag around on your psycho circle jerk?” To Jack’s credit, Gerald and Dahlia did question whether or not he and Adrian were lovers, as they certainly make for quite the striking odd couples. Unfortunately, for Jack, insatiable dope fiend Adrian is “looking to do a little business” since Gerald and Dahlia have a magical “traveling pharmacy” and he needs some of Cocteau’s kick lest he suffer from a seriously hellish bout of junk withdrawal in the desert. While Jack gets a little bit unhinged at this point and repeatedly screams, “get out of my car” like a violent tyrannical toddler that does not want to share his toys, he finally cools down and gives Adrian the following ultimatum: “If we’re gonna do this, we’re gonna do this my way.” Needless to say, Adrian refuses to play nice and subsequently petrifies Jack by dropping a highly poisonous Gila Monster in his lap that he bought from a mischievous guido midget named Harliss at a bizarre pet store called Creepy Crawly Zoo. While Jack is growing increasingly hysterical about the reptile in his crotch, Adrian more or less confesses his dark and twisted lust for him by boldly declaring, “Don’t play me, Jack. You know what I am, and I know what you are. That’s ain’t never gonna change. Now get us out of here before you kill the both of us.” Of course, when the two anti-buddies pull into a campground and discover Gerald and Dahlia are already there, Jack cannot stop Adrian from hanging out with the hippies.

Undoubtedly, during the campground segment of the film Jack's true repressed gay feelings for Adrian are revealed in a couple of strange yet not all too surprising ways. Indeed, almost immediately, Jack decides to go pout by himself in the woods like a little crybaby because he is jealous of Adrian's new friends, even though he has spent the last couple days desperately attempting to get away from the young punk. When Dahlia makes the misguided mistake of attempting to talk to Jack by telling him some hippie pseudo-metaphysical bullshit about how he has a "purple aura" and that he "has some kind of terrible trouble," he gets somewhat physically aggressive, warns her, "You take Gerald, and you get the hell away," and ultimately scares her away so badly that she attempts to talk her beau into fleeing the park for good. After Dahlia runs away, Adrian confronts Jack and more or less declares his love for him by passionately state, "You think this is coincidence, our paths crossing like this? We attracted each other. We were like magnets, Jack. The two of us colliding in time...bound together by our little secrets." Indeed, Adrian seems to think Jack is his special soul mate, but the nearly emotionally impenetrable old fart does not want to believe it, as he is a man of immense hatred and glacial impenetrability who just does not know how to let himself be emotionally vulnerable. After accusing him of being "afraid of partying" because he "might like it," Adrian also makes a point of mocking Jack's hypocrisy by stating, "You think you know right from wrong? You think you know what that is? You got as much right to moralize as Jack the fucking Ripper." Rather revealing, it is only when Adrian catches Jack engaged in ménage à trois of sorts with Gerald and Dahlia that he completely loses it and goes completely berserk in what amounts to a pathetic emotional breakdown of sorts. Even more revealingly, before actually catching them engaging in drug-fueled carnal indulgences, Jack bangs on the van while Adrian is inside and pathetically pleads to him during a rare moment of tactless vulnerability, "Adrian, don't do this" and "we need to talk," as if he wants to declare his love and affection for him, but is just too plain socially and sexually ill-equipped to do so. After getting done fucking and doing dope with the hippies, Adrian comes back to the hotel room to find Jack lying in bed and looking quite morbidly depressed, as if his lover cheated on him with cheap white trash. In short, Jack looks like a completely broke man and hustler Adrian naturally decides to take advantage of the situation. In the hope of cheering Jack up, Adrian encourages him to pay Gerald and Dahlia a special unannounced visit, stating in a mischievous fashion, "Why don't you go to the van? You know you want to," which he does. At this point, it becomes fairly obvious that it might be Jack and not Adrian that is the Hatchet Man, as the serial killer's bloody signature is inscribed on the hippie van the next day. One could also certainly argue that, as a present and gesture of love and affection to his new comrade, Adrian lured in the two hippies so that Jack could have a little fun with them.

THE NATURE OF THE BEAST

In the final and arguably most melodramatic act of the film, Jack follows his original plan before meeting Adrian by driving the two to a secluded forest cabin that he inherited. In the first scene where the stolen casino money is actually revealed to the viewer, dumb ass 'Dusty' carelessly loses $250,000 during a drunken game of poker, so he quite predictably decides to cheer herself up by shooting some junk into this arm, thus predictably disgusting Jack, who bitches, "Oh, you're just a slow-motion suicide. If you want to kill yourself...why don't you just get it over with instead of waiting for somebody else to do it?" When Jack further remarks, "Well, you don't look like a junkie," as if to pay him a mild compliment in a backhanded sort of way, Adrian suavely retorts, "You could look like a prince and still be white trash" and then goes on a nihilistic rant about how everyone has "a hole" that "can't be filled," life is filled with "nothingness," and how every self-destructive impulse is "just the nature of the beast." When Adrian dares to call him out on his flagrant hypocrisy and knocks a glass of liquor out of his hand, Jack decides to sneak up to him from behind and knock him out unconscious by repeatedly beating him over the head and body with his metal briefcase in what is ultimately a quite cowardly act that really highlights the mean bourgeois bastard's inner volcanic hostility and overall lack of humanity. Indeed, Jack decides that hardhearted homicide is the most adequate antidote to Adrian's rather reasonable complaints of hypocrisy. After firmly taping him to a chair, Jack gives Adrian a self-described "lesson in life" by declaring "The monkey doesn't shit where the crocodile sleeps. You're the one with the needle in his arm looking for a new daddy, right? What's he supposed to come along and do? Finish what the first one started? Well, here he is. Father knows best." While creating a seemingly deadly cocktail that includes a bunch of heroin and Jack Daniels, Jack gets on his high horse and remarks, "He goes by many names—crank, crack, croak. I bet you there's not even a name for this. But you can think of one on your last trip to Never Never Land. Maybe, by rights, you should end up in little pieces. Maybe that's all you really want. I don't know. I'm not a shrink. But this is exactly how you should go out." Before injecting the deadly dope in his compatriot's neck, Jack sadistically states, "It's just a shot, little boy," thus causing Adrian to lose his cool for the first time in the entire movie and meekly beg while on the verge of tears, "Please don't kill me, Jack." Of course, gentleman Jack is hardly a forgiving man and even seems to derive sadistic glee from seeing Adrian squirm. Indeed, after shooting the bad batch into Adrian's rather red neck, Jack declares, "Off to see the wizard." Needless to say, Jack watches intently from only a couple feet away as Adrian jerks and convulses in an erratic fashion as he succumbs to a drug overdose.

While Jack is sure Adrian is dead and buries his corpse before it gets dark, things get a little strange later that night when the ostensibly dead hitchhiker begins to rise from the grave during a less than auspicious moment involving local law enforcement. Indeed, shortly after Jack's old cop pal Sheriff Gordon (Brion James) and his young partner 'Little David' (Tom Tarantini) randomly arrive at the cabin to warn the psychopathic businessman of possible crooks and criminals in the area, Adrian slowly but surely digs himself out of his relatively shallow grave whilst his would-be-killer looks on in terror that he might be caught and ultimately recognized for the murderous monster that he really is. Luckily for Jack, Sheriff Gordon and his partner leave abruptly due to a call regarding a domestic disturbance, so Jack only has to worry about just finishing off Adrian for once and all instead of going to jail. Needless to say, Adrian decides to taunt Jack after unearthing himself and does so by writing "Hatchet Man" on his car. As for Jack, he whips out a shotgun and immediately attempts to gun down Adrian while he lurks in the shadows. When Adrian eventually reveals himself, he does so in a super suave fashion by lighting a match, coolly declaring, "You can't kill the devil, Jack. You ought to know that," and then kicking Jack his suitcase in what ultimately proves to be a poetically suicidal act. Terminally heartbroken after being rebuffed by the brutal old man, Adrian reasonably complains to Jack, "You know, you really are a sick man, Jack. Here I am...the one single body...on the face of this shit-eating planet...who would accept you...for what you really are. And you try to kill...and bury me." Ultimately, Adrian seems so emotionally wounded as a result of being so ruthlessly rejected that he more or less allows Jack to finish him off. As for Jack, he finally expresses his truly twisted psycho killer Weltanschauung by coldly yet confidently declaring, "People spend their whole lives thinking that someone is going to come along and take away all their misery. For a precious few, I am that someone" and then reveals a large hatchet that he had stored in his beloved suitcase, thus confirming beyond any doubt that he is indeed the infamous "Hatchet Man" serial killer, which Adrian clearly knew all along. With his last bit of gall, Adrian asks Jack, "Why do you cut them up into little pieces," and the suburban serial killer replies with a notable hint of visceral hatred "For the fuck of it" and then proceeds to kill the poor lovelorn junky off-screen. In the end, Jack goes back to his bourgeois family in the suburbs where he greets a paperboy and states in a phony jolly fashion "say, hey, Billy." Before the final credits appear, the following Jeremiah 17:9 appears: "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. Who can know it?"

As far as homoerotic thrillers are concerned, The Nature of the Beast is, in terms of sheer sexual and emotional tension, the ultimate bloody and badly botched anti-orgasm as the two male leads never put aside their differences and fuck like the sick Sturmabteilung-esque sods that they are, but then again one could argue that the real sexual climax is when Jack murders Adrian in what ultimately proves to be an amazingly aberrant act of perverse poofster poetry in a film where a queer filmmaker reveals in a somewhat covert fashion the darker side of fagdom à la Armin Meiwes and John Wayne Gacy. Undoubtedly, the film is also notable for featuring a potent example of a failed Folie à deux, as Adrian so desperately desires to be on the same wavelength as Jack in terms of perverse pathology, but really the two men are total opposites, even if they are both fairly morally bankrupt in their own ways. Of course, it is ultimately bourgeois businessman Jack that is the sickest of the two as a sociopathic serial killer of the innately impenetrable sort who has his head so far up his own ass that he cannot even accept the inordinately tender Kameradschaft of a charming junky crook, even though he actually accepts him for who he is a sadistic killer with a fiercely foul fetish for savagely dismembering strangers. Of course, the film seems to be a pathetic projection of auteur Salva's own feelings of rejection, as if he had a crush on some big mean murderer in prison, but the guy rejected him and/or found it impossible to respect him because he is a soft and weak pedo. After all, The Nature of the Beast was adapted from one of the five scripts that he wrote while in prison where he had a lot of time to personally confront and think about the criminal mind. Apparently, prison was, not surprisingly, a nightmarish experience for Salva, or as he told Glenn Lovell in an interview, "I was never more scared or closer to death than I was in prison. I received no therapy there. Prisons are not places for rehabilitation or learning to understand yourself or your actions. They're monster factories." Not unlike many gay men, Salva seems to be a major masochist, as he certainly delights in sexualizing the criminals and killers in his films. Of course, like many child molesters, Salva was very quite possibly the victim of child molestation himself, so it is only natural that he would depict the worst sort of human predator as a sort of perennially intangible sex object that is devoid of empathy and compassion. Thankfully, Salva simply subtly proposes questions and refuses to offer answers.

Not unlike Moors murderer Ian Brady's book The Gates of Janus: Serial Killing and Its Analysis by the Moors Murderer Ian Brady (2001) published by the fine folks at Feral House, The Nature of the Beast might be best described as an obscenely odious piece of criminal outsider art where the creator's own criminal passions and experiences are an intrinsic ingredient of the work. Don't get me wrong, Sicilian sod Salva is far from a great cinematic auteur, but his films, especially The Nature of the Beast (1995) and Rites of Passage, open a window into the mind of a degenerate criminal that, at the very least, seems to be hardly ridden of his despicable desires and has no problem expressing them cinematically, even if in a semi-hermetic fashion. Surely, I would file most of Salva's films under the 'true crime' section despite being fictional features, as they say just as much about the filmmaker as the paintings of frog cannibal Nicolas Claux reveal about him. Indeed, even in his ostensibly non-gay films like Powder and the Jeepers Creepers franchise, Salva could not help but include barley-legal shirtless twinks and seemingly subconscious gay subtexts that are nothing if not incriminating. Once describing his arrest and imprisonment for molesting a 12-year-old boy as nothing more than a mere "little hiatus," Salva hardly seems sincere when he makes generic anti-pedo declarations to journalists like, "I do not advocate inappropriate sexual behavior with children.” In short, Salva says one thing but his films certainly say another. Certainly, one cannot get through watching The Nature of the Beast or Rites of Passage without coming to the conclusion that the writer/director is a conscious sexual outlaw that looks down on men that repress their sexual perversions. After all, Salva more than hints that Henriksen character’s hateful murderous impulses are the direct result of sexual repression. Of course, one could argue that making bloody horror is Salva’s only outlet for his pedo tendencies and that if he was not making such sickly salacious films he might have become a re-offender and/or cheerleader for NAMBLA. Either way, there is no denying the captivating carnal criminal perversity of a film like The Nature of the Beast where the viewer is forced to sympathize with the sick and sexually depraved. As a marvelous male bimbo with certain glaring white trash qualities (e.g. wife-beating), Eric Roberts hardly seems like he is easy to offend, yet apparently he deeply regrets appearing in The Nature of the Beast. Indeed, in an interview featured in the February 6, 1996 issue of the mainstream gay magazine The Advocate, Roberts remarked, “I made a movie with Victor just before POWDER called THE NATURE OF THE BEAST [...] I’ll say that had I known Victor was a pedophile, I would not have made that movie. Victor didn’t lie, but he lied by omission [...] If a man is going to videotape his sex life with a boy, it makes me nauseous. It makes me feel very vulnerable, and I’m not a vulnerable guy.” Of course, Salva is the real monster of his films and a perfect case study when it comes to proving the auteur theory, but I doubt he was born that way. Abandoned by his biological father and abuse and gay-bashed by the alcoholic stepfather that raised him, Salva undoubtedly longs for a “daddy” just like Adrian in The Nature of the Beast, so I think it is only fitting to conclude this review with Mr. Roberts’ eloquent words from his Advocate interview, “The behavior that is abusive comes out of a child in us that feels frightened or scared. But the problem is, it doesn’t translate: A big grown man, when he’s in that child state, is a big grown man doing it; he’s not a hurt child. I realized I was hurting myself. You don’t mean to abuse anybody around you. But as you hurt yourself, you hurt other people.” If there is anything that the viewer truly learns while watching the film, it is that Salva truly believes that he, like most people, is a victim of the nature of the beast and that the act of boy-bugging reveals an extra advanced degree of this spiritually necrotizing eponymous affliction.

SKATEISTAN: TO LIVE AND SKATE KABUL
SKATEISTAN: TO LIVE AND SKATE KABUL

Orlando von Einsiedel (2011)

As a teenager, I was in awe when I found out that the small rural county I called home was planning to build a skatepark. After all, skateboarding was far from being the most popular recreational activity (hunting is without question, infinitely more popular) in my area and there were only about ten skaters at my high school. Nowadays, it seems like every town has a skatepark or two, including war torn Kabul, Afghanistan. In the short documentary Skateistan: To Live and Skate Kabul directed by Orlando von Einsiedel, the viewer is briefly exposed to the culture shock world of Afghan guerilla skateboarding. In the documentary, young Arabs skaters cruise through monumental rubble, weaving through gnarly animal heads and debris-ridden battle zones. One young Afghan skater mentions that not many of his countrymen understand the world of skateboarding, thinking that the young skaters feet are attached to their skateboard by some type of magnetic field. The 2001 American blitzkrieg-style 'Operation Enduring Freedom' invasion may have not given the people of Afghanistan the freedom that the United States of America had promised but at least they now have an indoor skatepark.

Play

In Skateistan: To Live and Skate Kabul, a 17 year old skater named Murza discusses his turbulent and violent upbringing in Kabul, Afghanistan. Although Murza was not exactly happy with Taliban-occupied Afghanistan, he still prefers it to the American occupation, as he feels that his country had much more stability when it was run by the infamous Islamist militia. The popular sk8 phrase "Skate or Die" has a more literal meaning for Murza when you consider the intemperate and chaotic world the youthful Afghan boy skates in. Murza originally had a job slavishly washing cars in the wintertime, which often resulted in frozen and cracked hands, surely not an admirable trade even in Afghanistan. Muhammad must be watching over Murza during holy Jihad, as the Afghan boy now has a dream job teaching skateboarding at Kabul skatepark. Like most skateboarders around the world, Murza describes skateboarding as an addiction that causes symptoms of withdrawal when one is unable to push wood. I never thought I would find skateboarding inspiration in Afghanistan but Skateistan: To Live and Skate Kabul is undoubtedly an attestation to the universal appeal of sidewalk surfing.

The most glaring flaw of Skateistan: To Live and Skate Kabul is the length (around 9 minutes in length), as you only get a taste of the Afghan skateboarding in this original micro-documentary. I would really enjoy watching a documentary that follows a group of Afghan skaters over a period of a year, to find out if they are caught in a skate session that turns into sniper battle or terrorist bombing. Thankfully, a feature-length documentary on Kabul skatepark, Skateistan:

Four Wheels and a Board in Kabul, is being released sometime in 2011. I sincerely hope that the Kabul skate park is not destroyed by a suicide bomber or American troops, especially when you consider that it is one of the few things that these children without childhoods have to look forward to. I doubt any skateboard teams will be touring through Afghanistan anytime soon, so it is up to the first generation of Afghan skaters to produce their own local skateboarding heroes. With their own national culture being annihilated right before their adolescent eyes, at least these kids are able build their own subculture in the slightly less dangerous atmosphere of Kabul skate park.

THE TRIAL
THE TRIAL

Orson Welles (1962)

Orson Welles' film adaptation of Franz Kafka's The Trial is one of cinematic expression. I would even argue that the film is Welles' most expressive. I found myself more engulfed by the set design than the film's unconventional plot. Anthony Perkins stars as the victim protagonist of The Trial. A man that is guilty of a crime he hasn't committed. No one will tell the man what crime he is guilty of. One theory of Kafka's intent with the book was that of Jewish identity. As a Jew, Kafka felt the victim of constant judgment and social abstraction. The Trial most certainly gives off that that feeling. Anthony Perkins' character is always on the defense and paranoid to his judgmental accusers. To such an extreme degree that he literally explodes. To make The Trial even more eerie and haunting, it was filmed in post world war II Europe (Paris mainly). Producing the film after second world war makes the film more appropriate than when it first was published 40 years before. It is interesting to consider whether or not Kafka had predicted the future. Nonetheless, the film was time appropriately released. The Trial was one of few films that Orson Welles had full control over (aside from Citizen Kane). I think this is quite obvious watching the film as it does not cater to the lowest common denominator. The set design and dark aesthetics of The Trial are very overwhelming to say the least. A court room full of hundreds of vocal accusers, aggressive police at every hidden corner, and the unknown lurking in every shadow effectively traps the viewer. Orson Welles knew what he wanted to do with the film. The Trial is a film that requires and deserves multiple viewings. It is condensed with many of Orson Welles' signature cinematic techniques. It is a shame that Orson Welles was unable to acquire funds to that would have enable him to keep continuing his auteur vision. The Trial is a must view for serious fans of film. "Say what you will, but The Trial is the best film I have ever made." — Orson Welles

Osamu Dezaki (1983)

Second Sonny Chiba night in a row. This time I focused my time on a film solely featuring the Dragon eyed Chiba. In this role, he plays the incredibly popular manga hitman Golgo 13. This is technically a sequel to an earlier Golgo 13 film, in which Bullet Train co-star played the assassin lead. It's now increasingly rare for me to see an interesting assassin story. As much as psych development might be handy, it's heavily an overplayed asset. One thing I respect about Shinichi Chiba: In most of his more popular films, he leaves a reference towards him being a Japanese/Chinese mix. One might speculate as to why but the reason seems to bridge the gap between both cultures and cinema. If you intend to see Chiba with a perm, then you picked the right motion picture. When I first viewed Sonny Chiba in a thrift store tape in The Street Fighter, I was amazed at his hectic skills in The Street Fighter, but was disappointed at the thought of there being no more Terry Tsurugi style martial arts. Well, I for one have been proved wrong. Once Duke Togo (Golgo 13) gets surrounded by a bunch of punks, he goes out of his way to inflict massive bodily harm leaving many bodies in his wake. The action level of this film is off the charts. We're either treated to a silent assassin moody-brooding everywhere or we get that same hitman doing stage dives shooting people right in between the eyes. Let the squibs fly. It's a recurring theme in the legend's films to have him pull off a job and get betrayed, which usually leads to more action, violence, and the seduction of women. The character of Golgo 13 surprisingly needs preparation. You can't pull a Nicholas Cage and just pick up a sniper rifle, utter a couple noir-ish monologues, and have an enjoyable anti-hero. Chiba's fluid movements assembling his rifle were dually noted. The rifle was an extension of him as he traced the skyline with the barrel. If this film should be noted for anything, it's Chiba's stunning performance. I enjoyed Golgo 13 to the fullest extent that I'd ever imagine I could. The theme song to the film gets drilled into your head. Expect to be humming it after the film is over. Another plus is that you just feel so damn cool while watching this. Detective Smithy was played by a great actor; too bad that was the only film he'd been in. Now if you'll excuse me, I need to go play this game on my NES.

SILVESTER COUNTDOWN

Oskar Roehler (1997)

I have never really cared for celebrating New Year's Eve aside from when I was like 5-years-old because it was the only time my parents would let me stay up past midnight, but for some reason, I decided that I wanted to see if I could dig up one single film revolving around the bullshit holiday that was semi-decent, which ultimately rather predictably proved to be a hopelessly frivolous and tasking non-goal of the ultra banal sort with next to nil pay-off. I considered watching the second-rate slasher flick New Year's Evil (1980) directed by Emmett Alston (who, incidentally, was the cinematographer behind the meta-physical pseudo-arthouse abortion Moonchild (1974) directed by Alan Gadney) but then I realized that I was not in enough of a masochistic mood to watch such pointless celluloid dreck. I also thought about watching the short Arthur Schnitzler adaptation Silvesternacht - Ein Dialog (1978) aka New Year's Eve co-directed by Douglas Sirk and Hajo Gies and starring Fassbinder diva Hanna Schygulla and Hebraic-blooded perennial screen Nazi Christian Berkel, but I was not in the mood for some heavy Sirkian melodrama, even in such a small dose, so I opted to watch some immature 1990s kraut quasi-arthouse trash instead. Indeed, I ultimately decided to watch Silvester Countdown (1997) aka In With the New directed by Teutonic enfant turd Oskar Roehler (Agnes und seine Brüder aka Agnes and His Brothers, Atomised aka Elementary Particles) as I felt in the mood for a combination of failed celluloid art and sleazy nihilistic trash. Although No Place to Go (2000) aka Die Unberührbare—a quasi-expressionistic work depicting the director's Marxist novelist mother Gisela Elsner's suicide as partly inspired by the German reunification and the death of her dream of a commie Krautland—is oftentimes described as Roehler's debut feature, he directed a couple of mostly forgotten mid-length and feature-length films before that. Somewhat notably, Roehler's directorial debut was the rather politically incorrect 60-minute work Gentleman (1995) starring the somewhat obscure German cult figure Konradin Markus Leiner aka QRT aka "Fascho-Kurt"—a sort of 'postmodern' fascist junky philosopher and neo-dandy who overdosed on heroin not long after the film was released, but not before penning a 500-page tome called Drachensaat aka Dragon's Seed: The Way to the Nihilist Hero influenced by everyone from Ernst Jünger and Otto Weininger to alpha-Beat William S. Burroughs—engaging in unsimulated drug use (i.e. shooting up heroin) and killing unclad sluts. Roehler also directed hedonistic trash like the grotesque feature-length work Gierig (1999), as well as the TV movie Latin Lover (1999) co-penned by bank robber turned novelist/actor Burkhard Driest (Stroszek, Cross of Iron, Querelle), yet Silvester Countdown still seems like the work of a formative auteur who has yet to fully develop his true style. Like Gregg Araki hetero-kraut style on speed meets would-be-titillating

MTV-approved Euro-techno trash, Roehler's darkly comedic New Year's Eve nightmare is a plot-less and obscenely aesthetically outmoded jerk-off piece of the plodding yet sometimes playful sort that depicts the troubled relationship of two young Berlin-based lovers who fuck like rabbits, but spend most of the rest of the time fighting and emotionally tormenting one another over the most trivial of things.

The somewhat ironically named 'Romeo' (portrayed by actor/director/producer Rolf Peter Kahl of artsploitation trash like Angel Express (1998) and Bedways (2010)) and 'Julia' (Marie Zielcke of Christian Zübert's Lammbock (2001) and Doris Dörrie's Am I Beautiful? (1998)) are two erratic lovers that live in a mostly vacant and unfurnished apartment in Berlin that resembles a sterile doctor's office. Julia likes to dress in vulgar costumes mostly involving unnaturally colored wigs, a pleather trench-coat, neon underwear and goofy glasses to surprise Romeo, who seems to rather enjoy such seemingly silly role-playing as demonstrated by the impassioned sex sessions that ensue, but after the fucking all hell breaks loose, as the two foredoomed love birds do not seem to get along otherwise and tend to rebuke one another over the most moronic of (non)infractions and (pseudo)problems. Probably to reflect their infantile mentalities, the couple's apartment is adorned with children's toys like tricycles and superhero paraphernalia, as if the two are living in a perennial state of childhood and would find it to be much too bourgeois to decorate their living space with family photographs, antique furniture, and proper home appliances. While Romeo is some sort of degenerate photographer that takes trashy pinup photos of generic-looking models, Julia is a less than serious college student who flies into rages anytime her beau demonstrates his care and concern for her by reminding her to go to class or study. Julia is so emotionally volatile that she even flies into a violent rage after Romeo eats something off her plate to the point where she throws the dish of food at her boyfriend and threatens to leave him. In fact, Julia does a lot of threatening to leave, but she does not dare to actually follow through with her threats as it would probably be detrimental to her hedonistic lifestyle of lecherous loser living. Unquestionably, the couple are spontaneous and thrill-seeking, but this seems to be more the result of their lack of self-control and maturity than any sort of true virtue. When Romero's old buddy Franz (Robert Viktor Minich of Hans Weingartner's Free Rainer (2007)) invites him and Julia to hangout with him after hearing about his pal's new hot girlfriend, the two lovers take an ultimately disastrous trip to Poland that demonstrates how truly toxic and ultimately terminal their relationship really is.

On the train ride to Polackland, Julia expresses to Romeo her concern that he always ruins her mood and then explains how he once mocked a postcard of two lovers on a platform at Vištula valley in Poland and how she is only partly excited about going there now as a result of his negative attitude. Ultimately, the two end up hanging out with Franz and his very Aryan-looking Polish drug addict girlfriend Jessica (Juliane Werner) at Vištula valley and Romeo ends up bitching the entire time because he has a hard time treading through the snow and is jealous of the fact that his old buddy is shamelessly flirting with his girlfriend, who seems to lap up all the attention juřt because she knows that it pisses her overly jealous boy toy off. When Julia spends too much time flirting and smoking hash with Franz, Romeo gets all moody and broody and leaves abruptly, but not before bitching out his friend after he does nothing to help out his girlfriend Jessica after she passes out after she swallows one too many pills. While in public, Romeo seems jealous of every man that looks at Julia and even goes on a bizarre irrational rant about how he would love to shave off one guy's muřtache and glue onto a woman's pussy after suspecting the guy has checked out his girlfriend. After their failed rendezvous with Franz and Jessica, the couple decides to head to Warsaw where they have spontaneous sex in dark alleyways in between bickering and bitching to one another. When the two go to a sleazy peepshow joint, Romeo demonstrates his complete and utter moral bankruptcy by remarking regarding one of the strippers, "Look at the eyes. Totally dead! What a turn-on" and then makes the dubious decision to encourage his girlfriend to strip in one of the peepshow booths. Of course, Romeo ultimately gets exceedingly pissed after seeing Julia strip, especially after the swarthy Slavic scumbag manager of the eřtablishment remarks regarding his girlfriend, "German girls are really firřt class and she's a #1 dancer." To make Julia feel like a cheap slut, Romeo tries to talk her into screwing the manager of the peepshow joint, which enrages her so much that she runs out of the building and almořt gets hit by a car in the process. After that, the two attempt taking various cab rides back to their hotel, but due to their pathologically antagoniřtic and highly irritable personalities, it ends each time with them having to be driven back to where they originally řtarted, which is symbolic of the hopeless vicious circle nature of their relationship and lives in general.

When Romeo and Julia finally get back to Germany after five grueling days of tragic-comedic hell, their contempt for one another has only grown all the řtronger, with the fights only becoming all the more hateful and frequent and sex becoming virtually nonexistent. Indeed, Romeo begins failing to assert himself sexually and towards the end of their rather ridiculous relationship, he mařturbates in bed while lying next to Julia shortly after they have a fight in what is easily one of the mořt pathetic 'sex' scenes in all of cinema hiřtory. While more or less a řtupid little girl who has no idea what she wants in life, Julia finally wises up to the fact that her catastrophic relationship with Romeo is irreparably broken, with sex—the one thing that kept them together—no longer even working. The chaos of their bitter romance is reflected in the fact that their flat becomes covered in tons of trash, dirty clothes, and various other forms of cluttered junk, with Julia beginning to physically and mentally resemble a rambling drunken hobo who looks like she might explode at any minute. Of course, Julia eventually leaves for good, thus forcing Romero to suffer alone while wasting away in his trash-covered apartment, which has turned into a virtual fortress of proto-hipster loserdom. At the end of the film, Romero absurdly jerks off to a nude photograph of Julia while standing in front of a mirror in a scene symbolic of the character's corrosive and self-destructive masturbatory narcissism. As for Julia, one can only assume that she discovered the error of her ways and found a less than attractive but monetarily successful older man who she could become a stay-at-home wife to.

Notably, auteur Oskar Roehler once remarked regarding the two unloving lovers of Silvester Countdown that, "Neither of them are mature enough for love and maybe never will be," thus highlighting the fact that the director is in no way sympathetic to the deplorable couple in his film, though I am sure that he can at least relate to their plight as a fellow from the very same 'lost' generation and aimless subculture that the film depicts in such a deplorably decadent fashion. As the unwanted progeny of two self-absorbed card-carrying commie novelists who was pawned off to his grandparents and never knew a normal family upbringing, Roehler grew up a broken individual and many of his largely autobiographical films like No Place to Go (2000), Atomised (2006), Lulu and Jimi (2009), and Sources of Life (2013) aka Quellen des Lebens reflect his considerably dysfunctional and screwed up background (which he discussed in some deal on the German TV channel DW), with the latter film being based on an autobiographical novel entitled Herkunft spanning three generations of the director's own trouble family. Ironically, while Sources of Life portrays Roehler's far-leftist 'progressive' parents as horribly narcissistic and abusive individuals, the director's ex-Nazi grandfather—a one-time supporter of Strasserism, the 'left-wing' branch of National Socialism that was promoted by Hitler's rivals Gregor and Otto Strasser—is depicted in a rather sympathetic light. Undoubtedly, Silvester Countdown depicts the sort of screwed up individuals that Roehler's parents and the later 68er-Bewegung generation produced as a result of their ostensibly liberal, far-left anti-bourgeois weltanschauungs. While Roehler may not be a Fassbinder or even a Herzog, his films are important for the simple fact that they offer a window into the sort of decidedly deleterious effect that far-leftist brainwashing and non-parenting had on an entire generation of Germans. As the director has explained in interviews, he had the opportunity to experience the mentalities of both the pre-WWII and post-WWII generations as someone who was shuffled between his father (his mother was completely out of the picture) and both sets of grandparents during his erratic childhood. Silvester Countdown was clearly made at a point in Roehler's life when he was still a young man and had probably failed to develop any sort of meaningful romantic relationship that actually transcended sex. I can certainly relate to a relationship with great sex but plagued fighting, but my personal problems certainly seem completely insignificant compared to those of the couple in Roehler's film whose incessant bickering literally brought nausea to my stomach, which was only further accentuated by the film's bombastic and terribly plastic pseudo-hip soundtrack, which sounds like what you might expect to hear in a gay night club in hell. Indeed, if I had eaten the normal New Year's Eve junk food while listening to the grotesque song "Shut Up (And Sleep With Me)" by Sin with Sebastian (fronted by obnoxiously vulgar quasi-tranny kosher cocksucker Sebastian Roth), I would have probably projectile vomited on my computer screen. In terms of sights, sounds, and general essence, Silvester Countdown would probably be best described as an anti-nostalgic celluloid fever dream that vividly demonstrates why the 1990s were such an aesthetically aberrant and culturally vacant zeitgeist that surely reflected the curious collective unconscious of the people of that time. Of course, considering this is the New Year and all, I have to conclude that, judging by Silvester Countdown, people are not sticking to whatever bullshit resolutions they have been making each year, as people have only grown more vapid, hedonistic, immature, and autistic since the film was released nearly two decades ago.

NO PLACE TO GO

Unfortunately for him, German auteur Oskar Roehler (Agnes and His Brothers, The Elementary Particles) was born to egomaniacal communist writers who wanted nothing to do with him, so he was essentially brought up by his grandparents. While Roehler's father was a novelist and literary editor who edited works by important West German literary figures like Günter Grass, his mother Gisela Elsner was a somewhat popular novelist who has been described as 'Jelinek's older sister' and was a member of the once-prestigious leftist post-WWII literary group Gruppe 47, to which Grass, Heinrich Böll, Ingeborg Bachmann, and various other German authors belonged. Among other things, Elsner, who was born into a wealthy family like so many other leftist literary types of her pedigree, is known for endorsing the destruction of bourgeois sexuality via group sex and orgies with her novel Berührungsverbot (1970). Depressed with the death of the GDR, falling of the Berlin Wall, and the realization that her materialist messiah Lenin's dream would never be realized, Elsner committed suicide in 1992. With his first feature-length film Die Unberührbare (2000) aka No Place to Go aka The Unforgiven aka Hanna Flanders, Roehler did what probably no other filmmaker has done in history by depicting the last days leading up to his mother Elsner's suicide. Shot in a black-and-white noir-ish style reminiscent of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's penultimate film Veronika Voss (1982) and, to a lesser extent, David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), No Place to Go makes for a sort of celluloid obituary/suicide letter for the 68er-Bewegung generation and counter-culture movement in general. In its moody and melancholy depiction of the glorious fall of the so-called 'Anti-Fascist Protection Rampart', No Place to Go also makes for a much needed celluloid counterpoint to Wolfgang Becker's sentimentalist swill Good Bye, Lenin! (2003), which essentially took a hopelessly goofy Hollywood approach to the dissolving of the GDR. As can be expected from a man whose mother abandoned him at the age of three, Roehler did not take a sentimental approach to depicting his mother in No Place to Go, but instead portrays her as a walking and talking anachronism and hopeless hypocrite whose Leninist political persuasion was in stark contrast to her affinity for expensive Christian Dior coats and aesthetically repugnant wigs. The atmospheric and intentionally aimless story of an over-the-hill leftist dame that becomes suicidal after coming to the realization that, regarding the German people and reunification, "They're not fighting for truth in the spirit of Lenin, they're fighting for candy bars," No Place to Go is, if nothing else, one of the most intimately unflattering depictions of a communist intellectual.

As a once popular West German far-left writer who once dreamed of emigrating to East Germany but has just witnessed the fall of the Berlin Wall and the almost unanimous joy among both West and East Germans, Hanna Flanders (Hannelore Elsner)—a sort of would-be-literary-diva and retarded femme fatale who fails at conning men but unquestionably dresses the part—has certainly seen better days and is contemplating suicide. After all, the GDR was the only place still publishing her pretentious bolshy novels, so she has also lost her sole source of income. Since she is considering offing herself, Hanna decides to relocate from her apartment in Munich to post-communist East Berlin where she plans to stay with her East Berlin mentor Joachim (Michael Gwisdek), who always promised her a place to stay if she ever arrived in the city. Before meeting with her dear marxist mentor in East Berlin, Hanna Flanders goes to West Berlin to visit her ex-speed-addict writer son Viktor (Lars Rudolph) who she has not seen in over three years and who used to provide her with drugs in the past. Ultimately, the reunion proves to be a pathetic disaster, with the mother unsuccessfully attempting to buy speed from her son who is withdrawing from drugs and does not take kindly to hearing his mother asking to do so such an unsavory thing. Of course, Hanna's encounter with Joachim is no less disappointing, as he not only decides to not let her stay with him, but is also celebrating the fall of the Berlin Wall and who tells his old 'true believer' student that, "times have changed dramatically," which is a rather bitter pill for the novelist to swallow. Luckily, Hanna manages to secure a dilapidated old commie style apartment from an admirer. When Hanna goes to a local bar, she bumps into a drunken stranger named Dieter (Bernd Stempel), who states, "I've read all of your books. I liked your last one the best. The one about your sister committing suicide and how that happened...it was a really moving portrait of how barbaric interpersonal relationships can be." Dieter also reveals that he is a teacher who teaches, "German and history...A fateful combo," and taught some of her novels in school, which she takes as a great compliment. Of course, when the drunken Dieter begins groping Hanna, she freaks out, so the teacher verbally berates her like she is old trash, yelling, "Hey, you're a real bitch, you know? You should be happy that anyone even wants to touch you anymore! Look at you, you old bag!...You, with those sagging tits. Hanna Flanders...wrote nothing but shit in the last 20 years!" which naturally rather depresses the novelist. After failing to fall asleep and stating to herself, "What a nightmare! A nightmare. Now I can't even fall asleep," while walking around her Lynchian apartment like the bride of Frankenstein, Hanna wanders around East Berlin and runs into a happy young lady, who invites her to stay with her family, which she does. Of course, the family Hanna is staying with is celebrating the death of the GDR and when she remarks to them regarding her admiration of the dissolved nation, "For me, your communism here in the East was the perfect world. I had a lot of trouble with life in the West, since returning from England. And I often thought of moving to East Berlin...Now it's all collapsed and it's as if I too have fallen apart," she is looked at as if she is a deluded moron. Indeed, Hanna finally has to admit regarding her disconcerting meeting with the happy East German family, "They're completely different people. I have no relation to them. I don't stand a chance there."

More desperate than ever, Hanna decides to visit her elderly bourgeois parents to 'borrow' some money so she can get back to Munich. While Hanna's mother is a cold bitch, her father is a cowardly cuckold, but he at least gives her some money to get back to Munich. Determined to get her old apartment back, Hanna attempts to return her designer Christian Dior coat back to the store she bought it from for only half the price, but the employees of the store look at her like she is a common bum and refuse to buy back the item. Luckily, Hanna ends up randomly bumping into her ex-husband Bruno (Vadim Glowna), who is still in love with her and is more than willing to give her a place to stay. That night, it seems that both Hanna and Bruno are transported back to the magic of the late-1960s, but when the two attempt to make love, the ex-husband is too drunk and depressed to consummate coitus. The next day, Hanna wakes to find that Bruno is even more drunk and babbling about events from decades past if they were only yesterday, stating, "Hanna, what are you doing here? I thought you'd fallen asleep. I'm so furious. It's so fucked. So fucked. I'm so angry, I could cut off my hand. Gudrun, Ingeborg, Rita, Ulrike...I can understand these girls so well. They knew what was going on. You have no idea how much I loved Gudrun. I loved that girl so much." Indeed, Bruno's extra flabby appearance and rampant alcoholism clearly indicate he has not gotten over the moronic death of Ingeborg Bachmann nor the dubious suicides of the Baader-Meinhof babes, but most importantly, he has not gotten over Hanna, who has her head so firmly inserted in her ass that she never was able to devote herself to him. Needless to say, Miss Monomaniac Hanna leaves Bruno for good after his drunken debauchery. Before long, Hanna finds herself randomly waking up in a hospital where she is told she overdosed on barbiturates. To top off everything else, the Doctor reveals to Hanna that due to her proclivity towards chain-smoking, she has developed vascular disease in her leg and that if she does not quit ASAP, she will most certainly lose her leg. Ultimately, Hanna agrees to go to rehab and quit smoking cold turkey, but considering the already fragile state of her mind, it proves to be a most grueling experience. Fed up with life and realizing her dreams of a commie utopia are gone forever, Hanna takes one final drag from a cigarette and falls to her death from a hospital window. Indeed, it seems that the only thing that kept Hanna going in the first place was her dream of a Leninist utopia, so when all chances of that ever happening were dashed with the destruction of the Berlin Wall, she truly had nothing to live for and nothing to keep her going. Ironically, in the end, she was no different from the many die hard National Socialists who committed self-slaughter during the mass suicides in 1945 Nazi Germany.

Interestingly, despite the film's already unflattering depiction of its lead, No Place to Go would later be described by auteur Oskar Roehler as a 'romanticized' view of his mother. Indeed, in a 2012 interview with the Deutsche Welle (DW) cultural magazine Arts.21, Roehler stated, "My mother really was a bad person who dreamed up a bunch of evil schemes" and "I felt as if I was being stabbed by needles again and again...The way my mother continued to judge me...my birth, my existence, and so on." Ultimately, Roehler would later "exact revenge" against his mother by writing the autobiographical novel Herkunft (2012), which spans three generations of the director's family (starting in the post-WWII era and concluding in the 1980s) and which the auteur later adapted into the epic 174-minute film Quellen des Lebens (2013) aka Sources of Life. While far from perfect and in many way a formative work, No Place to Go is certainly one of the more interesting and worthwhile German films of its mostly cinematically vacant zeitgeist. Indeed, a work that manages to cross Alexander Kluge's Yesterday Girl (1966) with Fassbinder's Veronika Voss with a little bit of Eraserhead (indeed, aside from featuring an eccentric protagonist with an even more eccentric head of hair, Roehler depicts post-Cold War Berlin in a similarly foreboding manner to Lynch's cult masterpiece) and campy hagsploitation (one can see Hanna Flanders as a sort of kraut commie equivalent to 'Mommy Dearest' meets Norma Desmond of Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard (1950), albeit with a more intellectual, flat affect) thrown in for good measure, No Place to Go is one of the few German films of the 2000s that I would recommend to fellow cinephiles, especially those with an affinity for German New Cinema. A rare film where the viewer actually wishes for the protagonist's suicide knowing that she wants nothing more than to disappear from the world, No Place to Go—for better or worse—is probably the most honest depiction of the disgruntled 68er-Bewegung mindset in an age where the fall of the Berlin Wall declared that dreams of a communist utopia were deadlier than Angela Merkel's sex drive and no better person could have been better suited for directing the film than Oskar Roehler, the forsaken progeny of a commie ideologue who cared more about dead Judaic-Mongol mongrel marxist monster Lenin than her own son. That being said, I was almost surprised that No Place to Go did not conclude with the song "Ding Dong! The Witch Is Dead" from The Wizard of Oz (1939), as it is a work that was directed by a man who confessed on German TV that he cried with joy upon learning that his mother died. An arthouse dramedy that destroys the commie celluloid mythos of Kluge and Straub, No Place to Go is a sort of nihilistic attempt at healing after generations of leftist lunacy in the Fatherland. Of course, as Roehler demonstrated with his mundane mainstream effort Jew Suss: Rise and Fall (2010), he lacks the testicular fortitude to approach the Third Reich era without any sort of the same self-loathing typical of the original left-wing cultural-cuckold kraut, thus demonstrating that he was truly his marxist parents' son.

AGNES AND HIS BROTHERS

Oskar Roehler (2004)

In contemporary Germany, it seems there are two types of filmmakers: Those culturally retarded and deracinated dilettantes that merely copy off of Hollywood and become money-grubbing artisan hacks like Tom Tykwer, and the oh-so few filmmakers who attempt to revive the auteurism of German New Cinema. Undoubtedly, Oskar Roehler (Suck My Dick, Jew Suss: Rise and Fall) is (or was) part of the second category as a filmmaker who was inspired by Rainer Werner Fassbinder's The Merchant of Four Seasons (1972) and Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) at a young age, once stating regarding these films, "I was about 12 or 13, and after seeing those films, I would just walk through the park and think about them." While I have not seen every single one of the director's films (most of them do not have English subtitles), I think Agnes and His Brothers (2004) aka Agnes und seine Brüder is Roehler's greatest and most ambitious work to date, though it is certainly no masterpiece. Unquestionably a not so inconspicuous take on Fassbinder's avant-garde masterpiece In a Year of 13 Moons (1978), Agnes and His Brothers also centers around a melancholy tranny who did the unthinkable and cuts his penis off to appease a powerful and less than loving lover (this time instead of using a Jewish slumlord like in Fassbinder's film, Roehler opted for an American Negro fashion designer). In fact, In A Year of 13 Moons star Volker Spengler was originally supposed to play the father of the lead character(s). Of course, Roehler's film is not a remake of In a Year of 13 Moons and is quite different in parts, namely in that it also focuses on the equally screwed up lives of the eponymous tranny's two elder brothers. Additionally, Agnes and His Brothers displays its Hollywood influences due to its unwavering sentimentalism, use of played out pop rock music, and copout (semi)happy ending. The German answer to American Beauty (1999), albeit all the more morbid and scatological in its critique of the bourgeois, Agnes and His Brothers depicts a universally sexually debauched upper-middleclass where hatred, sexual perversion, and unhappiness are givens and where fathers are even more patently perverted than Woody Allen. Unquestionably, one of the most interesting and surprising aspects of Agnes and His Brothers is that it depicts the emotionally and sexually ruined middle-aged children of the counter-culture era, thus making a rare film that dares to laugh at the tragic, if not inevitable, results of far-leftist parents who refused to parent and thus sired individuals that are so screwed up that they have scat fetishes and have paid money to have their genitals chopped off. Stating his intent with the film as follows, "What interested me most was to show what things look like now in this country. I wanted to convey a mood, a basic feeling with a number of facets that can't be pinned down solely to one single relationship between two people," auteur Roehler ultimately assembled a black post-counter-culture comedy nightmare with Agnes and His Brothers that offers good enough reason as to why the indigenous population of Germany is committing demographic suicide and how Teutonic auteur cinema itself is merely a platform for members of the bourgeois to bash themselves.

Agnes Tschirner (Martin Weiß) is a depressed tranny who never knew nor has even seen a picture of his/her mother, a purported member of the Baader-Meinhof Gang who apparently took a fire extinguisher to the head while in Stammheim prison and allegedly later committed suicide after becoming peniless. The only thing Agnes knows about his/her long deceased mother is what was told to her by her burnout degenerate hippie father Günther (Vadim Glowna) while he was inebriated. Agnes has two brothers that are just as screwed up as her, if not more so, including Hans-Jörg (Moritz Bleibtreu) and Werner (Herbert Knaup), but neither of them have done anything so drastic as have their dicks chopped off. Hans-Jörg is a sex-addicted librarian and pathetic peeping tom who sneaks into female bathroom stalls at his work and masturbates while watching women defecate via a gloryhole. When it comes to women, Hans-Jörg is a pathetic joke who is constantly laughed at by the fairer sex, so he spends much of his free time attending sex addict anonymous meetings where he listens to people's stories about having love affairs with their dogs and whatnot. Undoubtedly, Werner, who is married and has two teenage sons, is the most strong and successful of the Tschirner brothers, but he is no less screwed up and his relative success seems compensate for his broken family life. Married to a blonde cougar named Signe (Katja Riemann) that no longer loves him and the father of an ambiguously gay amateur filmmaker son named Ralf (Tom Schilling) who his wife dedicates all his attention to, Werner has devoted himself to his career as a Herr Doktor and leader of the Green Party. Undoubtedly, the source of the Tschirner brothers' pathologies lies with their rich but seemingly half-retarded father Günther, who Hans-Jörg believes molested little brother Agnes. As indicated by a melancholy man named Heinz (Ralph Ferforth) that cries at the sight of the Tschirner brothers and slavishly does house work at the lapsed braindead hippie's house, Günther is also probably gay, thus hinting that he may have in fact molested the son, or at the very least resented his children.

When Agnes is called "the scum of the earth" and kicked out of her apartment by her asshole workaholic boyfriend Rudi (Oliver Korittke), s/he moves in with her old and lonely fag hag friend Roxy (played by Fassbinder superstar Margit Carstensen) and soon learns from a receptionist at a hospital that there is something very wrong with her lab results, but s/he is too afraid to stay to talk with the doctor and find out exactly what the problem is. Meanwhile, Hans-Jörg, who has just been rebuffed by a chick he screwed who played him like a true cuckold pawn and talked him into painting her apartment, goes by his father's homestead and mistakenly believes he sees his brother Agnes giving papa Günther blowjob. As for Werner, his son filmed him defecating on his piece of paper in his home office and his wife thinks it is quite hilarious. In terms of their dead sex life, wife Signe complains to her scat-fiend spouse, “Where is the casual relationship between your earnings and your toilet behavior? How can you even assume that I’d feel the ghost of eroticism, if I have to witness, if I have to witness you pressing out your secretions everyday?” not to mention the fact she believes that her hubby is a schizophrenic. Eventually, Werner loses his cool and decides to destroy his wife’s bushes and son Ralf’s pot plants with a chainsaw. Needless to say, Signe leaves Werner and brings their sons with her. Meanwhile, Agnes learns that her great love Henry Preminger (played by Lee Daniels, the producer of Monster’s Ball (2001) and director of Precious: Based on the Novel “Push” by Sapphire (2009))—a famous gay American Negro fashion designer—is coming to town. After revisiting his ex-wife and children (!), Agnes borrows his dead mother’s wedding dress for his reunion with Henry. As the viewer discovers, Agnes cut off her cock for Henry, but this only repelled him. When Agnes runs into his ex-love and his entourage on the red carpet of a show, Henry pretends not to remember him, but agrees to come by his apartment for ‘German coffee’ after finally vaguely pretending to remember the tragic tranny. While Henry eventually reveals his undying life for Agnes when they are alone together, it is revealed that he cared more about his career than his relationship, hence why their relationship ultimately dissolved. Although Henry achieved the fame and fortune he always dreamed of, he more or less confesses he is unhappy to Agnes. Meanwhile, Hans-Jörg blows his father Günther’s brains away with a shotgun and proceeds to star in a porn flick after being offered the job from a dude named Manni Moneto (Martin Semmelrogge) from his sex addicts anonymous group. To his shock, H.J. falls in love with a porn star named Desiree (Suzan Anbeh), who consoles him after he has a freakout while filming a porn scene. Luckily for Werner, his son Ralf runs away, so Signe comes back home for his support. In the end, Agnes dies of the dubious illness (in one scene, blood seeps from her crotch, thus hinting its related to his/her sex change) she refused to ask the doctor about while remembering a rare happy moment when she was a little boy, patricidal fugitive Hans-Jörg heads eastward with his new lover Desiree, and Signe gets his wife back.

A Hollywood molested take on Fassbinder’s masterpiece In A Year of 13 Moons made for a socially dysfunctional, degenerate generation of Germans reared on MTV and Adam Sandler flicks and post-cultural liberal capitalism, Agnes and His Brothers has about as much aesthetic value as a car commercial, yet its scathing scat humor and callous critique of the post-Baader-Meinhof bourgeois ultimately makes it one of the most interesting and, dare I say, greatest Teutonic films of its zeitgeist. Featuring an ironic use of pop rock songs like “Happy Together” by The Turtles, Agnes and His Brothers, not unlike more recent Martin Scorsese flicks like Goodfellas (1990) and The Wolf of Wall Street (2013), is afraid to rise above the tragicomic despite its rather somber subject matter, as if the incapacity to mourn as has only grown worse in Germany since the end of the Second World War. To auteur Oskar Roehler's credit, his intent was not to make Agnes and His Brothers too Bergman-esque in tone so as to appeal to Hollywood-lobotomized philistines, or as the director stated himself in an interview, "I didn't want to take the whole thing too seriously, however; I wanted to make it rather light and playful, so that it would be fun to watch. I used to be all too quick in making moralistic points, but unfortunately I always noticed this too late." Roehler would follow up the film with the similarly themed but somewhat inferior work The Elementary Particles (2006) aka Atomised based on the French novel Les Particules élémentaires (1998) by Michel Houellebecq, but his work has only become all the more mainstream and, in turn, superficial, as time has passed. Like a Teutonic equivalent to what Todd Solondz has accomplished in terms of sardonically satirizing the culturally and sexually confused American Hebrews of New Jersey suburbia, Agnes and His Brothers is a patently pessimistic piece of hysterically humorous celluloid psychotherapy created in an age when the only thing one can do in the face of overwhelming social dysfunction is laugh it off. A postmodern mutation of Oedipus Rex set in German suburbia made in a time where a kosher culture-distorter like Sigmund Freud and his Frankfurt School disciples' ideas have defiled every aspect of bourgeois life (indeed, if the Hebraic psychoanalysts had any goal, it was that) and where neo-vaudevillian humor has even taken over a traditionally humorless nation like Germany, Agnes and His Brothers is ultimately an unhinged reminder where American (non)kultur has probably had a more deleterious effect on Germany than firebombs did in WWII. Undoubtedly, Roehler is no Fassbinder and not even a Schlingensiefel, but there is more truth in 5 minutes of Agnes and His Brothers than all the films of a deracinated Teutonic hack like Tom Tykwer combined.

Oskar Roehler (2006)

As a so-called 'reactionary' with an unfashionable proclivity towards anti-liberal iconoclasm, cultural pessimism, 'right-wing' libertinism, and racial/religious hatred, French novelist Michel Houellebecq is undoubtedly a sort of literary grandson to French pariah Louis-Ferdinand Céline. That being said, it is doubtful that any contemporary filmmaker could do justice in terms of cinematically adapting Houellebecq's work (hence why he probably started adapting his own novels), as it is much harder to get away with politically incorrect material in film, which is probably the artistic medium that has been most debased and exploited by gatekeepers of commie culture-distorting, than it is with books. As the proudly prodigal son of irresponsible 'bobos' (aka bourgeois bohemians) who even went so far as to depict the last couple days leading up to his Leninist mother's suicide in Die Unberühmbare (2000) aka No Place to Go, German auteur Oskar Roehler (Jew Suss: Rise and Fall, Sources of Life aka Quellen des Lebens) was more or less the best suited mensch to adapt Houellebecq's novel Les Particules élémentaires (1998) aka The Elementary Particles aka Atomised, as a work depicting two sexually and socially degenerate ½ brothers whose dysfunctional behavior is a direct result of their whorish hippie mother's lack of parenting (indeed, like the characters in the book, Roehler was mostly brought up by his grandparents). Atomised (2006) aka Elementarteilchen aka The Elementary Particles, which Houellebecq apparently originally planned to direct himself, is the socially scathing result of Roehler working on a screenplay for 3 years and belated kraut alpha-producer Bernd Eichinger's talent at producing reasonably decent mainstream films. Like Roehler's previous (and, in my opinion, superior) work Agnes and His Brothers (2004) aka Agnes und seine Brüder, Atomised seems like it was directed by a Hollywoodized heterosexual Fassbinder. A less than merry mix of existential crisis and impenetrable depression, sexual looseness and impotence, paraplegic suicide and lithium-inspired hallucinations, anti-Oedipal complexes and tragic abortions, and all around social sickness, Atomised unfortunately lacks a lot of the nasty unrepentant nihilism that acted as the driving force of Houellebecq's source novel yet the film still manages to capture the essence of Occidental decline in a fashion that can be appreciated by the most attention-span-deprived of philistine viewers. Indeed, directed by a man whose own emotional development was clearly stunted by his parents' lack of love and nurturing, Atomised—with its cheap sex scenes, somewhat contrived direction, and strategic use of played-out pop rock songs—is every bit a product of the cultural and emotional retardation that it so unflatteringly depicts. The salacious yet saddening tale of two ½ brothers that act as a sort of dichotomy for the two extremes of western man—with one brother being deracinated, introverted, asexual, unemotional, logical and the other being emotional, highly sexual, extroverted, artistic, and irrational—Atomised is ultimately a rare mainstream German film that actually has something to say, even if it goes about saying it in a fashion that would probably give a Hebraic arthouse hack like Terry Zwigoff (Ghost World, Bad Santa) a hard-on.

Beginning with the contrived Albert Einstein quote, “One does not have to understand the world, one only has to find one’s way in it,” Atomised immediately introduces protagonist Michael Djerzinski (Christian Ulmen), who abruptly decides to quit his great job as a scientific researcher at a biotechnology institute because, as he writes himself, “I have to go back to the origin of my interest, to that innermost force, which binds the world together. Back to the elementary. I have to resume the research that I interrupted in Ireland 3 years ago. The artificial reproduction of organisms without sexual contact. Is it desirable...? It is desirable for a scientist to ascertain this feasibility. Truth is like an elementary particle. It can’t be split into smaller parts.” Indeed, Michael is a 30+-year-old virgin dork who, as described in the source novel, uses his “cock to piss, nothing more” and turns down a reasonably hot blonde chick at his work that hits on him in the most flattering of ways. After his hot co-worker compliments him by stating, “It is a pity you’re leaving. To me you were always like a Niels Bohr or a Heisenberg: a person of exception intellectual ability, someone with a totally unique way of thinking,” Michael merely admires his own intelligence and not the blonde babe’s voluptuous body. When Michael’s parakeet randomly drops dead, he merely takes the bird out of its cage and drops it into the trash can as if it were no more valuable than a used condom. Meanwhile, Michael’s half-brother Bruno Klement (Moritz Bleibtreu), who is a high school literature teacher, is giving a lecture on the poetry of Baudelaire, but he gets a little bit distracted by his 17-year-old student Johanna Rehmann (Jennifer Ulrich), whose photo he routinely masturbates to. Needless to say, when Johanna remarks, “I think eroticism was a driving force for Baudelaire’s creativity, but that it made him lonely at the same time. I’d say these lines reveal the classic, tragic core of male fate,” Bruno gets all hot and bothered. Although a teacher, Bruno, who spikes his baby’s baby formula with sedatives when he is working so as to have complete silence, really dreams of becoming a revered novelist, but he tends to write rather politically unfashionable prose, as demonstrated by the following words: “We envy and admire the Negroes for we want to become like them: animals with a long cock and a tiny reptilian brain... The Negroes are still in the Stone Age. They can’t acquire our knowledge, they have no clue about hygiene and they also spread AIDS.” When Bruno meets with his publisher about having this racially charged text published, he is turned and told that he is a, “true racist. You’re full of it. That is good. The stuff about Negroes is great. Its strong, crazy, and daring. You’re talented [...] My good man, what were you thinking? The Third Reich is history,” though his publisher also compliments him by stating, “You’re a reactionary. All great writers were reactionaries... Benn, Goethe, Thomas Mann, Dostoyevsky.” Needless to say, after failing to get his work published and pathetically botching an audacious attempt to seduce his student Johanna, Bruno loses it and goes to a mental institution where he is prescribed lithium and less than fondly reminisces about his shattered childhood.

As Atomised progresses, it is revealed that Michael and Bruno’s hippie whore of a mother Jane (Nina Hoss) did not even bother to tell her sons that they had half-brothers until the two were both teenagers. While at the nut house, Bruno tells a female doctor named Dr. Schäfer (Corinna Harfouch) about how his mother abandoned him for “hippy shit” and left for Poona. Ultimately, Bruno was raised by his grandparents until he was 13, but was put in a boarding school after both of his grandparents died (rather absurdly, his grandmother died in a tragic kitchen accident involving boiling soup). Bruno also tells Dr. Schäfer about how he had quasi-incestuous feelings for his mother as a teenager, confessing, “I jerked off on my mother.” While Bruno desired affection from his mother, Michael would not even let his mother hug him, thus highlighting the stark contrast between the two bastard bros. Now well into their 30s, the two half-bros occasionally meet at a bar and discuss their miserable lives, where on one occasion Bruno complains regarding his wife, “She’s a lousy cocksucker, I felt her teeth – and she’s got cellulite.” When the two brothers go to see their mother, who just recently converted to Islam after being fed ‘Sufi mystic bull-shit’, on her death bed at some hippie commune she is staying at, Michael makes the threat to his unconscious progenitor that he plans to cremate her body and put her ashes in a trash bag. After a night of screaming hateful obscenities at mommy dearest, Bruno eventually reaches solace after his mother finally drops dead, though brother Michael seems entirely indifferent to the experience. After reuniting with his high school sweet heart Annabelle (Franka Potente), Michael finally manages to show some minor love and empathy for the first time in his entire life and even manages to lose his virginity in the process, yet after learning all the scientific calculations he made regarding cloning have proven to be 100% correct, he decides to go to Ireland to continue his research and thus leaves his little lady in the lurch. Meanwhile, Bruno decides to go to a hippie nudist camp in a desperate attempt to find a prospective lover. After offending a hippie feminist bitch by describing African music as “too primitive,” Bruno gets in a hot tub to cool off and meets a chick named Christine (Martina Gedeck) who “cannot stand feminists,” thus making the two a perfect match. Naturally, Bruno and Christine practically fall in love at first sight, yet they also become swingers who engage in large orgies. While in Ireland, Michael learns that he impregnated Annabelle, but she was forced to get an abortion because the baby had ‘abnormal cells’, which is rather ironic considering the father of the aborted baby is attempting to perfect artificial reproduction. Meanwhile, Bruno’s relationship also takes a turn for the worse after Christine collapses at an orgy and a doctor subsequently reveals that she will no longer be able to walk again as a result of coccygeal necrosis. While Bruno attempts to save their relationship, it is too late as Christine opts for suicide and jumps off her balcony to her grizzly death. Of course, Bruno goes back to the mental institution, as he no longer wants to go on living as a result of his experiences. In the end, Atomised closes with the following epilogue: "Some forty-five years later, the scientific world came to the conclusion that there is an elementary relationship between sexual aggression and the pursuit of monopolies, dominance and the resulting conflicts of these pursuits – such as wars. Michael Djerzinsky was awarded the Nobel Prize for his alternative theory of the reproduction of the human race. His half-brother Bruno spent the remainder of his life in a psychiatric clinic. According to reports he was happy there."

While no masterpiece, Atomised unwittingly exposes modern German 'classics' like Run Lola Run (1998) aka Lola rennt and Good Bye, Lenin! (2003) for the vapid and superlatively soulless pieces of politically correct celluloid twaddle that they are, as Roehler's film ultimately points the finger at the counter-culture movement/68er-Bewegung generation and technocracy as the two great destroyers of German kultur, community, and family. For instance, in a scene of dialogue that could have been written by Teutonic philosopher of western decline Oswald Spengler, protagonist Michael is told by a mentor: "The thirst for knowledge! Only a few people have it. But these few are the most important power in the world. They keep on researching until one day they possess the key to rational knowledge. Nothing in the history of humanity was ever more important than the need for rational knowledge. Western civilization has sacrificed everything to that need...Its happiness, its hopes, its religion and ultimately its life." Indeed, in many ways, Michael reflects 'Fauſtian man' yet paradoxically shares qualities of Nietzsche's prophesized 'laſt man,' as a soft fellow with a typically Aryan drive for knowledge and discovery that is all too happy with the glacial emotions of the postmodern world, wallows in sexual impotence, and who is quite eager to see Aldous Huxley's prophesies in Brave New World (1931) fully realized. Atomised also wastes no time in destroying the hypocritical joke and abject failure that is feminism/women's lib as hilariously expressed in a story told by Bruno's girlfriend Christine regarding her experiences with brainwashed feminists: "I could never stand feminists [...] after turning every available man into a miserable, impotent neurotic, they systematically mourned the end of masculinity. So after sending their men packing they ended up getting humped by lousy Latino machos. Eventually they got themselves banged up and started making jam," thus demonstrating that feminism has only made women all the more miserable, not to mention the fact that it has created a war of hatred among the sexes that has destroyed the nuclear family and has caused the birth rate to decline in such a drastic manner among indigenous Germans (and most Europeans in general) that it can only be described as ethno-suicide. As auteur Oskar Roehler revealed in an interview with <http://cineuropa.org> as to why he was interested in cinematically adapting Atomised: “I liked the book and wanted to make the film because it tells so much about my generation – especially the male generation – of people who are in their mid-40s now: their weaknesses and the bad experiences they have had with the generation before them and the cultural fights they had to go through. These were the reasons I wanted to do an adaptation of the book; the stories of these characters that were so lifelike and real. It is very daring in that it laughs about male sexuality and the inferiority complexes of men. The book is very fascinating because I never read about these topics before in such an honest way.” Indeed, while Atomised is not some sort of stoic ultra-conservative Evolaian critique about everything that is fundamentally flawed about the modern world, the film does manage to communicate some of the more obvious post-WWII social and cultural plagues that are eating away at the Occident and have only become all the more malignant as the days pass. Like his cinematic forefather Volker Schlöndorff’s greatest films, Roehler managed to simplify Houellebecq’s ideas with Atomised so that they could be made palatable to the most intellectually lazy of layman and in that regard the film more or less succeeds. Indeed, with the possible exception of Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, who has essentially retired from filmmaking, no living filmmaker (including Houellebecq himself) would have been fully suited for adapting Houellebecq’s novel in all its thematic complexity and superlatively cynical culture pessimism, so one must just be happy with Roehler’s film, which is like the Teutonic equivalent to one of American Hebrew Todd Solondz’s fucked filmic family affairs.

BLACK GIRL

Ossie Davis (1972)

Despite what some of my less than liberal socio-political views might suggest, I like to think that (or, my accurately, pretty much know) that I am extremely open-minded when it comes to cinema, at least until I get a significant taste of something and realize I can do without it, hence my refusal to watch virtually all new Hollywood films. Indeed, while my cinematic tastes are admittedly largely proudly Eurocentric, I could not help but eventually look into the rather small world of true African cinema, so naturally I am familiar with Senegalese novelist turned cinematic auteur Ousmane Sembène (or 'Sembène Ousmane' as he is known among certain frogs). Best known as the undisputed 'father of African film,' Sembène—a communist that studied filmmaking in the Soviet Union at Gorky Film Studio from 1962-1963 under Hebraic hack propagandist Mark Donskoy (The Childhood of Maxim Gorky, A Mother's Heart)—is also arguably the greatest black African filmmaker to have ever lived and a virtual one-man-film-industry that demonstrated that a black man could create his own cinematic universe in an artistic medium that was more or less solely invented, pioneered, and refined by Europids. Notably, the first Sembène film I ever saw was his arguable magnum opus Xala (1975), which is somewhat stereotypically black in the sense that it depicts a corrupt 'uncle tom' businessman that suffers from the ultimate negro nightmare of erectile dysfunction as a result of his self-hating and fellow-negro-exploiting ways. Indeed, while the film might not feature ebonic-ridden rap music or stoned stupid brothas' with their pants falling off their asses, it does include a number of classic perennial stereotypes that are associated with blacks. At the same time, the film is heavily influenced by ancient African folklore and folk culture (notably, the film also features a brief nod to Sembène's cracker hero Charlie Chaplin). To my surprise, I actually found Xala to be fairly humorous when I first saw it about a decade ago and thus decided to dig further into Sembène's oeuvre, thus leading me to his celebrated debut feature La noire de... (1966) aka Black Girl. Notable for being the very first feature-length film directed by an actual black African in sub-Saharan Africa (as opposed to a pseudo-negro flick directed by a white man or Jew), the almost-60-minute flick was somewhat of a hit in France upon its initial release despite its rather blatant anti-French persuasion and even won the coveted Prix Jean Vigo for 'best feature film' in 1966, thus securing Sembène's place in cinema history.

Despite being directed by an unrepentant Pan-African Marxist and thus something I would typically be repelled by, Black Girl proved to be anti-French and anti-white in the best sort of way as a cinematic work that features a scathing depiction of the decadence of the white bourgeois. A postcolonial tragedy that reveals both the innate absurdity of multiculturalism and the somewhat predictable cultural and racial tensions that it sires, Sembène black-and-white art-house flick follows a young eponymous negress as she learns the hard way the perils of moving from her native Dakar, Senegal to Antibes, France to work as a domestic servant for a super bitchy and sexually repressed white housewife and her well-meaning but weak and ineffectual white husband. Somewhat rightly described by various reviewers as “deceptively simple,” Black Girl is a fundamentally flawed film with a somewhat convoluted flashback structure where it is nearly impossible to tell whether or not the film takes place over the course of a few days or a couple of weeks (naturally, the fact that the heroine seems to have only a couple wardrobes does not help). Indeed, if the viewer did not know better, they would assume the titular negress opts to kill herself after only a couple days of domestic frog servitude, thus giving off the absurd impression that black women rather face death than do a mere couple days of hard housework. Of course, this was not Sembène’s intent, as Black Girl is a movie with a strong message that attempts to demystify the African view of the ‘European Dream’ and the assumed comforts that await poor African negroes in Europa, which is somewhat ironic considering that the filmmaker owes a good portion of his success, critical prestige, and artistic inspiration to France and the Occident in general. Although surely a work of agitprop, the film has a striking softness and distinct elegance about it due to its inordinately dainty dark-skinned lead and thankfully never succumbs to outlandish grotesqueries, senseless sexual debauchery, or bestial stupidity of an American black power classic like Sweet Sweetback’s Baadasssss Song (1971) directed by Melvin Van Peebles (who incidentally began his feature filmmaking career with the relatively tame French quasi-art-house flick La Permission (1968) aka The Story of a Three-Day Pass). Of course, Sembène’s debut feature is a film that is more about black powerlessness than black power. Instead of being a violent blood orgy and racist fantasy that does literally nothing to address the serious internal problems of the black community like Van Peebles’ flick, Sembène’s examines real problems like low self-esteem, illiteracy, and material envy.

A fifth-grade dropout that was born to a lowly fisherman, Sembène originally earned fame as a novelist, but he eventually realized that not many of his fellow negroes actually read books, so he eventually decided that cinema would be the best artistic medium to spread the Pan-African Marxist message, which is quite clear in his debut feature. Based on one of the director’s own short stories, Black Girl might be best described as a political manifesto in celluloid form. In short, the film is melodramatic agitprop’s piece that was clearly informed by Sembène late-life remark, “When women progress, society progresses.” While watching the film, the viewer soon comes to the realization that a negress will always be a perennial second-class-citizen in frogland and that France is a decadent and sexually inverted nation where women seem to wear the pants in relationships and have more testicular fortitude than the men. Once controlling much of

Africa and the rest of the world, France is only a brittle cracked shell of what it used to be and is surely symbolically personified by the decadent white family in the film. Naturally, as the very first African-negro-directed film and a cinematic work that somewhat recently had its 50-year-old anniversary, Black Girl is like an ancient artifact that becomes most intriguing when compared to both contemporary black cinema and the state of negroes in France today. As the hordes of negroes, arabs, and other third worlders that are literally risking their lives just to get to France because they believe it will lead to a lifetime of relative leisure and government handouts, it seems Sembène—an assured victim of naïve acquiescence who seemed to have more faith in his own people than they did in him—was a little too optimistic in his hope that blacks would tell whitey to fuck off and instead stay in and build up negroland. Indeed, I would not be surprised if France was renamed ‘Greater Haiti’ in about a decade or so, but I digress. Of course, the great irony of non-Europids wanting to relocate to Europe is that Europe is (or, was) great because of native Europeans and the more non-Europids the continent accepts the less European Europe naturally becomes, thus leading to an overall decline in quality of life. After all, civilization is a precarious thing and not all peoples are suitable for it, or as Harvard-educated American political theorist Dr. Lothrop Stoddard once wrote in his classic text The Revolt Against Civilization: The Menace of the Under Man (1922), “Civilization thus depends absolutely upon the quality of its human supporters. Mere numbers mean nothing. The most brilliant civilization the world has ever seen arose in Athens—a tiny community where the number of freemen (i. e., genuine Athenians) numbered perhaps 50,000 all told. We therefore see that, for civilization to arise at all, a superior human stock is first necessary; while to perfect, or even to maintain that civilization, the human stock must be kept superior. And these are requirements more exacting than might be imagined. Surveying human history, we find that superior stocks are the exception rather than the rule. We have already seen how many races of men have never risen above the planes of savagery or barbarism, while relatively few races have shown the ability to create high and enduring civilizations.” Needless to say, France has been long extinguished of the stock that once made the nation great and flooding the country with largely hostile aliens from the Global South is only going to speed up its complete and utter capitulation. Undoubtedly, the France depicted in Black Girl seems like a sort of figurative luxury cruise ship that has a small hole and is slowly but surely beginning to sink, as the white characters certainly live a life of ease and luxury in a scenic resort area, but it is clear that they are weak and decadent and thus easily susceptible to a drastic decline.

True to Marxist form, Black Girl is a film that depicts work as an innate evil of sorts that always involves a sinister master-slave dynamic. Indeed, there is no nuance when it comes to Sembène illustrating that when a black person works for a white person, it is nothing more than a form of neo-slavery that seeks to racially, culturally, and economically subjugate the mostly unwitting negro. In fact, the film exaggerates this to such an absurd degree that the titular ebony queens opts to commit suicide in a rather violent way after getting tired of a sexually-repressed white cunt bitching at her all the time (on top of it being somewhat absurd that someone would off themselves instead of simply quitting a job that they loathe, it should be noted that suicide is very rare among black women). In short, elements of the film border on the hopelessly histrionic to the point of heavily contradicting the film's oftentimes realist feel, but then again that is one of the reasons why the film is so bizarrely engulfing. Utilizing Godardian and Italian neorealist filmmaking techniques as well as African oral traditions, Black Girl is also a somewhat aesthetically paradoxical work in that it is an audaciously anti-neocolonial flick with extremely overt European influences. In fact, were it not for Sembène's blatant negro gaze and obvious intuitive racial empathy for the black female lead, one might assume the film was directed by an ethnomasochistic white liberal if they did not know better. Mostly comprised of unsynchronized dialogue of the eponymous heroine's clearly articulated thoughts as she complains in simple words her increasing disdain, sorrow, and fatigue in regard to her job, Black Girl certainly benefits from a seemingly unintentional oneiric-like quality to the point where the viewer feels just as imprisoned in the grating psychodrama that is her unconsciously culturally colonized mind.

Black Girl begins simply enough with the titular heroine Diouana (played by first-time actress Mbissine Thérèse Diop, who later appeared in a small role in Sembène's Emitaï (1971) aka God of Thunder) arriving in a cruise ship to the French Riviera from Dakar where she previously lived in a literal shack with her rather youthful mother. As a poor and completely illiterate girl with no history and next to nil personal belongings, Diouana naturally believes that her life can only get better now that she has moved to France to work as a domestic worker for a white family. Of course, Diouana eventually learns the hard way that there is nothing fun or exciting about being a poor and illiterate black girl in a bourgeois European country where she has no friends. Featuring a fairly disjointed narrative that abruptly switches back and forth between the past and present in a fairly effective manner that underscores the heroine's tragically pathetic plight and the steps that led to her being in such a less than ideal situation in the first place, the film slowly but surely uncovers how Diouana was more or less tricked into becoming an all-purpose-slave for a lazy cracker bitch that cannot even bother to play with her own kids or make her husband breakfast despite the fact that she does not even have a job. Virtually plucked off a Dakar street corner where she and other young negresses would wait at during the day in the hope of being hired by a rich white employer, Diouana is pure of heart and virtually infantile in terms of her understanding (or lack thereof) of the world and especially people, hence why she made for easy prey for a conspiring 'Madame' (played by Anne-Marie Jelinek, whose surname suggests Czech, and possibly Jewish, origins) that clearly believes she can bully the negress into doing anything for her. Married to a weak, ineffectual, and emasculated yet seemingly well-meaning nameless Monsieur (Robert Fontaine), Madame is clearly the boss of the house and wastes no time in turning Diouana into her own virtual personal lapdog. Initially plying her with gifts like her own used clothing, including silk underwear, and initially only making her watch her kids upon first hiring her in Dakar, Madame turns into a completely different person when Diouana arrives in France. Indeed, instead of being simply a nanny as she expected, Diouana receives a rather rude awakening when Madame also makes her a cook, maid, and an object of constant ridicule. For whatever reason, Diouana never once questions Madame's demands and instead keeps her misery inward. Indeed, as the film progresses, Diouana becomes engulfed in a psychologically crippling nightmare of perpetual ennui and melancholy as she passively accepts her own virtual slavery until it becomes completely unbearable and she succumbs to the most drastic and permanent form of defeat.

In a series of flashbacks, one learns that Diouana started a brief yet seemingly passionate romantic relationship with a black brother (Momar Nar Sene) from Dakar with revolutionary leanings as demonstrated by a fancy flag of Congolese independence leader and black nationalist martyr Patrice Lumumba that is hanging on his apartment wall. Needless to say, Diouana's boyfriend gets fairly agitated at her when she dares to have a little fun by playfully hopping across a war memorial in tribute to Dakar patriots that were killed in Europe during World War II. In fact, the boyfriend calls Diouana's seemingly harmless display "sacrilege" and violently rebukes her for her flagrant ignorance and naivety in regard to the memory of so many dead Dakar brothers. Despite their minor quarrels, it is clear that Diouana and her boyfriend are a great match and that the heroine should have stayed in Dakar to be with him instead of risking everything to work for a melanin-deprived bourgeois cracker family in a faraway land. Undoubtedly, Diouana's brief romance with her revolutionary beau is the only point in the film when she seems consistently happy and comfortable in her own skin. In short, Sembène is communicating to the viewer that it is always preferable for a black woman to be with a black man in a poor African homeland than living in a wealthier white world full of strangers.

While Diouana arrives in France virtually ready to party in a pretty polka-dot dress that she is quite proud of, Madame soon mocks her for wearing said dress and forces her to wear an ugly apron in a symbolic gesture to denote her new lowly status as an exotic neo-slave. Although the heroine hoped that she would at least have the opportunity to buy new clothing while in France, she does not even get to experience that fairly minor joy and spends literally all of her time virtually imprisoned in her employer's banally decorated apartment. When her white employers have some friends over for lunch one day, a rather rotund bald-headed guest of the somewhat pig-like sort randomly declares to Diouana, "Do you mind, miss? I've never kissed a black woman" and then kisses her without her permission, thus predictably disgusting her in the process. While the heroine can tolerate cooking spicy rice for the guests, she seems almost irrevocably dehumanized after being pecked on the cheek by a fat and goofy old white dude. Monsieur also seems to have some sexual interest in Diouana, but he is too weak and impotent to act on his desires. Of course, Madame seems to notice her husband's interest in Diouana, hence one of the reasons for her poor treatment of the heroine. As the days pass, Diouana becomes more and more dejected and naturally escapes further inward. When Madame notices the heroine's glaring change in character, she snidely remarks, "Diouanne looks strange" and "She seems to be wasting away," though she ultimately comes to the conclusion that it is simply because she is "lazy." Of course, Madame is not exactly happy with her life either as demonstrated by remarks like, "I'm fed up with this life" after getting annoyed with her seemingly impotent husband for taking a nap. Indeed, as the director seems to suggest, Madame might be somewhat less of a ruthless bitch if her clueless husband knew how to sexually satisfy her. As Diouana thinks to herself regarding Madame's boldly bitchy behavior and Monsieur's similarly unhappy nature, "She wasn't like that in Dakar. Neither was he," thus suggesting that even white people prefer Africa to Europe. As for France itself, Diouana can only think, "For me, France is the kitchen, the living room, the bathroom and my bedroom. Where are the people that live in this country? The mistress told me, 'You'll see, Diouana, there are lovely shops in France.' Is France that blackhole?" Indeed, Diouana may be black as coal but nothing is darker to her than the bottomless pit that is the seemingly forsaken frog soul.

While Diouana finds working incessantly for an uptight bitch completely insufferable and experiences a variety of horrendous things like being rudely awakened by the sexually repressed white woman screaming in her face, "Get up, lazy-bones! [...] We're not in Africa!," it is only when the Madame writes a fake letter that is ostensibly from her mother in Dakar that she really loses it and becomes completely convinced that she is a slave. Indeed, Diouana can only weep with rage when the Monsieur reads aloud to her a rather bitchy letter that was supposedly written by her mother that reads, "My dear daughter, this is your mother writing. I've had no news since you left. I got the address of your employers through a friend. My health is getting worse every day. Why do you leave me penniless? I've nothing to live on while you squander your wages. I know you can't write but I'm sure your mistress will do it, as she's a lady and a mother and gave you her cast-off clothes for us. She'll write for you. You mustn't think only of yourself. You've sent nothing since you left and yet you've got your wages. What do you do with them? Think of your mother who has to pay even for water and who is so poor. I think of you and pray for you and your employers. Your Mother." To add insult to injury, Monsieur proceeds to write a phony reply letter to Diouana's mother with his own words while she thinks to herself, "That's not true. And it's not my letter. My mother didn't write it. And I didn't ask him to write a letter for me. And my mistress is no lady. It's because I can't write. If I could write, I'd tell about my mistress' 'kindness.' I'm a prisoner here." Naturally, the entire experience is humiliating for Diouana, as it forces her to confront her illiteracy and how such a handicap can so easily yet ruthlessly be used against her. Indeed, completely unable to express her own misery and torment to anyone, Diouana becomes overwhelmed with internal misery to the point where it becomes totally unbearable and she eventually completely emotionally implodes.

After the phony letter incident, Diouana opts to symbolically terminate her employment with the frigid frog family by taking back an authentic ancient African mask that she gave to them as a gift when they first hired her. When Madame notices the mask is missing and attempts to take it back, an unintentionally humorous interracial struggle over the primitive artifact occurs between the two women that only ends when Monsieur breaks up the little bitch fight. In a feeble attempt to appease Diouana, Monsieur subsequently attempts to pay her, but she drops the 20,000 francs on the floor and collapses, as if she feels great guilt and shame for figuratively prostituting herself for such worthless paper. At this point, Diouana thinks to herself, "Never again will the mistress scold me. Never again will she say, 'Diouana, make coffee.' Never again, 'Diouana, make rice.' Never again, 'Diouana, take off your shoes.' Never again, 'Diouana, wash this shirt.' Never again, 'Diouana, you're lazy.' Never will I be a slave. I did not come here for the apron or the money. Never will she see me again. Never will she scold me again. Never again, Diouana. Never will I see them again." Before opting to kill herself by slitting her own wrist in the family's bathtub, Diouana thinks to herself in regard to Madame, "She wanted to keep me as a slave," thus highlighting that her suicide is an extreme and revolutionary, if not somewhat warped, act of personal autonomy. Indeed, too impotent to defend herself in any other fashion, Diouana has her revenge against the family that emotionally destroyed her by destroying herself in their prized bathtub. After Diouana's dubious death results in a small scandal that is covered in a local newspaper, Monsieur opts to fly to Dakar to return the heroine's personal belongings, including the ancient mask, to her mother. When Monsieur meets Diouana's mother, he is somewhat bewildered when she refuses to take his blood money. In the end, a little black boy from Diouana's neighborhood scares Monsieur out of the shacktown by putting on the ancient mask and following him from behind in a manner not unlike some slasher movie killer in a symbolic scene where auteur Sembène seems to express his hope that African youth achieve a sort of atavistic reawakening by getting in touch with their ancient roots and ultimately scaring away whitey from the dark continent for good.

While I generally consider Marxists to be infinitely more repellent than fecal-feeding maggots on dog shit and regard Afrocentric types to be less credible in terms of historical facts than a schizophrenic Christian Evangelical after taking a bad hit of acid, I somehow found Black Girl to be, relatively speaking, a fairly sensible film with a healthy message against the false song of multiculturalism and a sort of organic black pride that is not driven totally by resentment or an imagined glorious past involving ancient rocket-powered pyramids and magical pitch black Israelite god-kings, among various other patent absurdities. While it probably was not even Sembène's intention, the film also manages to do the seemingly impossible by deconstructing the loud and angry negress archetype. Indeed, in an exotic negroid prole fashion, the eponymous heroine of Sembène's debut feature radiates an inordinate amount of refined ebony elegance that is simply all but impossible to find in cinema history, including in negrophiliac Hollywood. In short, Spike Lee's films seem like neo-minstrel shows compared to the true negro kultur that Sembène created cinematically. Indeed, in terms of American negro filmmakers, it seems that only Charles Burnett (Killer of Sheep, My Brother's Wedding) comes close to Sembène in terms featuring nuanced black characters as opposed to mere stereotypical caricatures and one-note coons.

Notably, at the beginning of his fairly lengthy review of Black Girl for in the April 21, 1995 issue of the Chicago Reader, Jewish-American film critic Jonathan Rosenbaum argued, "If you trace African film back to its first fiction feature, it is only thirty years old. Yet far from being underdeveloped, it begins on a more sophisticated level than any other cinema in the world." Of course, Rosenbaum's statement verges on puffery and completely ignores that Sembène's film owes a good portion of its potency to largely European influences and thus can hardly be described as a cinema that was sired from scratch, at least as far as aesthetics and filmmaking techniques are concerned (naturally, one also cannot forget that Sembène learned his craft from kosher commie Don-skoj). Of course, what makes the film truly and authentically African is the story it tells, thus giving some credence to Sembène's famous quote, "If Africans do not tell their own stories, Africa will soon disappear." As far as back as at least the short agitprop doc Afrique 50 (1950)—the first French anticolonialist film and a once-quite-controversial piece that led to its French director René Vautier to being imprisoned for several months—certain European filmmakers, especially of the frog orientated sort, have directed sympathetic films about black Africans, yet such cinematic works oftentimes seem racially condescending, self-congratulatory, and virtue-signal-ridden when compared to the films of a real nigga like Sembène. In fact, in a 1965 polemical exchange between the two filmmakers, Sembène accused French cinéma-vérité co-founder Jean Rouch—a quasi-communist anthropologist that holds the dubious distinction of being "the father of Nigerien cinema" despite initially arriving to Nigeria as colonialist in 1941—of, "[looking] at us [black Africans] as if we were insects." As someone that is more often than not disgusted by the way Judaic filmmakers and Hebraic Hollywood depicts European history and European-Americans in film, I can certainly empathize with Sembène in a strange and somewhat unexpected way in that regard.

As a work of artful agitprop that is guided by poetical pathos and a rather blatant yet nonetheless potent and unforgettable message about the need for negro self-determination, I would have to mostly agree with Rosenbaum when he wrote regarding Black Girl, "I'm fully convinced that nothing in this movie can be weakened or spoiled by knowing the story in advance, which is why I'm not showing any hesitation about revealing it. For Sembène, the event is mere raw material articulation is everything." Of course, the film was made with a youthful black African audience in mind, so it should be easy to see why a black viewer, despite gender, might be horrified at the prospect of a buxty and beauteous negress violently offing herself due to living an insufferable slave-like existence of perennial domestic banality at the behest of a seriously sexually-repressed white bitch and her insanely impotent and outstandingly aloof cuckold husband. Unfortunately, history has not gone as Sembène hoped it would and now there are more African negroes in France than at any other time in history. Of course, these largely Islamic negroes have not come to France to become low-paying servants, but to act as shameless parasites and suck on the decrepit old withered teat of the French state while creating their own 'little Africas' inside of urban ghettos that no sane white person would dare to walk in. Indeed, it seems French novelist Jean Raspail was unfortunately all too prophetic in terms of his racially apocalyptic vision of Europe as depicted in his classic dystopian novel Le Camp des Saints (1973) aka The Camp of the Saints, as France and most of the rest of Europe is experiencing a sort of 'reverse colonialism' where the third world, seeking 'the white man's comfort' at the white man's expense, comes to feed on what is left of the virtual cock-less cadaver that is the contemporary West. As both Black Girl and The Camp of the Saints demonstrate in quite different ways, colonialism works both ways and has been largely disastrous for both sides in its disharmonious uniting of two very different races from two very different lands and cultures. Undoubtedly, one of the things that most stood out to me about Black Girl is the almost absurdly impressionable nature of the titular heroine in what ultimately seems to be a critique from Sembène in regard to an innate weakness of African negroes. Indeed, Lothrop Stoddard might as well have been describing the heroine of the film when he wrote, "This lack of constructive originality, however, renders the negro extremely susceptible to external influences. The Asiatic, conscious of his past and his potentialities, is chary of foreign innovations and refuses to recognize alien superiority. The negro, having no past, welcomes novelty and tacitly admits that others are his masters. Both brown and white men have been so accepted in Africa. The relatively faint resistance offered by the naturally brave blacks to white and brown conquest, the ready reception of Christianity and Islam, and the extraordinary personal ascendancy acquired by individual Arabs and Europeans, all indicate a willingness to accept foreign tutelage which in the Asiatic is wholly absent.” Indeed, the eponymous heroine of the film immediately becomes enamored with the novelty of France and French culture and gleefully accepts a position as a mere servant, but this ultimately results in great misery and eventually tragedy.

For better or worse, resentment seems to be an innate ingredient of black identity and Black Girl is certainly dripping with such resentment, but it thankfully never reaches Spike Lee-esque proportions. Like the rebellious young college kid that cannot stand that he still relies on his parents for rent and food money, Sembène—a black African that was born a French citizen in an African nation that had been under French rule since the late-1800s—was quite flagrant in his resentment towards the French, which is arguably more apparent in Black Girl than any of his other films but, unlike many black American filmmakers, he at least offered a vision for a better future. Needless to say, it is a bitter and biting irony that the film was made with French money, won the 1966 Prix Jean Vigo for best feature film, and is technically a ‘French-Senegalese’ production. In short, Sembène’s debut is literal postcolonialism in celluloid form, even if the auteur intended it as a piece of pure and unadulterated Marxist orientated Pan-Africanism. In that sense, I can understand Sembène’s resentment, as if he probably always had it in the back of his mind that he was perennially colonized and could never achieve a complete sense of totally organic African purity, so it is nice to know that virtually all of the auteur’s films after Black Girl were true Senegalese productions. Unfortunately, Sembène never seemed to realize that his intellectual influences like Marxism and feminism were decidedly decadent intellectual movements that were largely created by European-Jews. Indeed, not unlike Frantz Fanon, Sembène’s mind was colonized by kosher quacks. Needless to say, Marx’s long-term influence on Africa has been largely ugly, bloody, and even genocidal. Slave-morality-oriented philosophy aside, Marxism is as alien to Africans as any thing French. While Black Girl gives somewhat different reasons as to why, in general, blacks will fail to collectively flourish in Europe, Stoddard offered fairly reasonable, if not exactly politically correct, theories when he wrote in regard to non-Europids in general, “Now how does the Under-Man look at civilization? This civilization offers him few benefits and fewer hopes. It usually affords him little beyond a meagre subsistence. And, sooner or later, he instinctively senses that he is a failure; that civilization’s prizes are not for him. But this civilization, which withholds benefits, does not hesitate to impose burdens. We have previously stated that civilization’s heaviest burdens are borne by the superior. Absolutely, this is true; relatively, the Under-Man’s intrinsically lighter burdens feel heavier because of his innate incapacity. The very discipline of the social order oppresses the Under-Man; it thwarts and chastises him at every turn. To wild nature’s society is a torment, while the congenial caveman, placed in civilization, is always in trouble and usually in jail.” Of course, the racial character of France’s prisons, criminal gangs, and ghettos certainly demonstrate Stoddard is right, even though he wrote those words in 1922 long before the decolonization of Africa and flooding of Europe with various groups from the third world. Indubitably, one of the most important things I took away from Black Girl is that it is the first film directed by an African negro features a strong anti-multicultural message. Surely, Sembène's debut feature makes for a great double feature with Claire Denis' White Madness (2009)—a less than liberal flick about an unhinged white bitch that hates white people who ultimately sacrifices her entire family to anti-white negro revolutionaries because she refuses to move to Europe—as both films demonstrate in rather provocative ways how Africans and Europeans will never live in harmony. Of course, one only has to look at American, Haitian, and African history to realize this is true, but most whites rather live in denial of the fact that most blacks have nothing but contempt for them and nothing they do can change that. Personally, I much prefer watching films by the likes of Sembène, Carl Franklin, and even Spike Lee than taking in part in any real-life multicultural experiment and I say that as a proud and unrepentant Eurocentric cinephile.

THE MAN WITH THE GOLDEN ARM

Otto Preminger (1955)

Nobody, including junkies, wants to watch most films about junkies, unless you have exceedingly excremental taste and can somehow trick yourself into believing there is any sort of truth in regard to the dope fiend lifestyle in senseless swill like Askhenazi pseudo-arthouse poser Darren Aronofsky's pleb-tier clinical con-job Requiem for a Dream (2000) where the soulless smackhead lifestyle is romanticized in a rather retarded MTV-esque fashion full of debasing hip hop montage masturbation and pathetic plastic histrionics, among other aesthetically bankrupt would-be-artsy-fartsy asininities. Aside from being an absolutely aesthetically atrocious film that test the bounds of feckless art faggotry and too-cool-for-school cultural retardation, the film was clearly directed by someone that has no direct experience with heroin or junkies but of course an authentic portrayal of such human debasement would have never been such a big hit with packs of mindlessly rebellious teenagers and sapless liberal academics. While attempting to do their own best Harmony Korine/Larry Clark impersonation, the Safdie brothers utilized their typical cheap gimmick of poorly disguising autistic trash as provocative art for Heaven Knows What (2014) where they utilized real junkies yet managed to say absolutely nothing new or interesting about the junky experience. While I do appreciate films like Barbet Schroeder's More (1969), Paul Morrissey's Trash (1970), Jerry Schatzberg's The Panic in Needle Park (1971), and Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981) to varying degrees, none of these films also seem to provide the full junky experience, especially in terms of the vicious circle that comes with full-blown junkydom. Thankfully, blue-eyed goombah god Frank Sinatra was able to provide the world with a fuller look at the perturbing perils of heroin hell.

Needless to say, I never expected that a film from the mid-1950s starring alpha-wop performer Sinatra and directed by subversive Austro-American semite Otto Preminger (Bonjour Tristesse, Anatomy of a Murder) would provide in what is my best estimation the full junky experience, at least in a sort of soundly seedy post-noir sense where the most glaring trash on the streets is the people. Indeed, The Man with the Golden Arm (1956)—a film that could not be more immaculately and unforgettably titled—is far from a fun flick as a sort of cinematic equivalent to stale dog shit and old vomit boiling on a hot city sidewalk. In short, the film does what Preminger does best in terms of its hardly covert cynicism, misanthropy, and overall unflattering depiction of humanity; or, in this sad soulless case, subhumanity. In my admittedly counter-kosher yet reasonably artistically fair opinion, Preminger—an Austrian Jew that was oftentimes described as an 'Nazi' by collaborators due to his cold and sadistic authoritarian character (not to mention his strange fetish for playing Nazi characters, most famously in fellow chosenite Billy Wilder's Stalag 17 (1953))—was no real artist and he never directed a true cinematic masterpiece despite coming pretty damn close with his classic film noir Laura (1944), but his strong and subversive character secured his place in cinema history as a somewhat memorable auteur that, for better or worse, helped to destroy the censors. As Andrew Sarris once stated of the filmmaker, "His enemies have never forgiven him for being a director with the personality of a producer [...] Preminger's legend is that of the cosmic cost accountant, a ruthless creature who will mangle the muse for the sake of a shooting schedule." More than an accountant, Preminger—the son of a once-powerful Austrian public prosecutor who earned a 'Doctor of Law' at the recommendation of his father—demonstrated the antichristian spirit of a tyrannical Talmudic lawyer that prides himself on the malefic maneuvering and manipulation of the legal system, which is actually something he both personally attempted and depicted with his films, including The Man with the Golden Arm.

While Preminger apparently originally had little interest in directing a film about a dreary dope fiend, he was quite keen on destroying the Hollywood Production Code, which states in the 'Crimes Against The Law' section of film censor Joseph I. Breen's document: "The illegal drug traffic, and drug addiction, must never be presented." While Jewish leftist actor John Garfield intended to play the lead in a projected cinematic adaptation of kosher quasi-commie Nelson Algren's 1949 source novel of the same name, the outlaw film noir star died prematurely in 1952 long before Preminger became interested in the project (in fact, Preminger bought the rights for the project from Garfield's estate). In the end, it was ultimately Algren's great misfortune that Preminger ever got interested in the project. Although the filmmaker originally had enough respect for the novelist to have him brought out from his home in Gary, Indiana to Hollywood to write the film's screenplay, he apparently did not respect him or his screenwriting abilities too much as he soon replaced him with Walter Newman (Ace in the Hole, Cat Ballou) in an artistically disastrous scenario that haunted the writer for the rest of his life, or as hapa film historian Chris Fujiwara explained in his biography The World and Its Double: The Life and Work of Otto Preminger (2008), "For Algren, Preminger would become an obsession, a symbol of the crass arrogance of power, an enemy with whom he would grapple again and again in his writing and his reminiscences." A man that was ruthlessly criticized by none other than his kosher-con racial kinsman Norman Podhoretz for glorifying ghetto trash at the expense of polite society, Algren had what might be described as the quintessential 'Barton Fink Mindset,' which is really underscored in a critique of Preminger where he states, "...the life of the common man has never filtered into Otto's brains and emotions; or into his talent such as he has. The book dealt with life at the bottom. Otto has never, not for so much as a single day, had any experience except that of life at the top." Unfortunately, the trouble with Algren's critique is that, despite being a Hollywood film featuring the novelty of a famous garlic-breathed singer-cum-star, Preminger's

The Man with the Golden Arm does an inordinately good job portraying the purgatorial (non)existence of poor dope-shooting and scam-running proles to the point where one feels like taking a shower after watching the film lest you succumb to an unnerving feeling of festering filth.

In his highly worthwhile text Opium, journal d'une désintoxication (1930) aka Opium: The Diary of His Cure—a delightful diary of self-deluding yet insightful spiritual degeneration that makes alpha-Beat William S. Burroughs' books on dope seem all-too-soulless by comparison—French poet and cinemagician Jean Cocteau states, "The half-sleep of opium makes us pass down corridors and cross halls and push open doors and lose ourselves in a world where people startled out of their sleep are horribly afraid of us." Undoubtedly, Cocteau's words are a great way to describe the inordinately haunting and oftentimes debasing experience of watching The Man with the Golden Arm, which is set in a piss poor polack ghetto of the North Side of Chicago where people seem to thrive on nothing more than fear, paranoia, and a special sort of social parasitism where even the feral version of 'man's best friend' is a commodity and suavely sociopathic dope dealers aggressively prey on (ex)addicts in the gleeful hope that they get rehooked. Indeed, as Burroughs once wrote, "The junk merchant doesn't sell his product to the consumer, he sells the consumer to his product. He does not improve and simplify his merchandise. He degrades and simplifies the client." As soon as the film's protagonist Frankie Machine (Frank Sinatra) is released from a federal Narcotic Farm in Lexington, Kentucky, he makes the mistake of heading back to his crud-crusted Chicago hellhole where his sinisterly slimy dealer Louie (Darren McGavin)—a virtual pimp of human souls that prides himself on underhandedly exploiting human weakness for maximum personal benefit—immediately begins offering him 'free' heroin (notably, the name of the drug is never mentioned). Unfortunately for street parasite Louie, at least initially, Frankie has big plans and wants to leave behind his previous criminal career as the 'dealer' in illegal card games to become the drummer of a big band. Of course, as Burroughs also wrote, "A junkie spends half his life waiting," and while waiting Frankie cannot ignore the, "thirty-five-pound monkey on his back."

Notably, in his book Romancing Opiates: Pharmacological Lies and the Addiction Bureaucracy (2008), English mischling psychiatrist Theodore Dalrymple completely demystifies the deluded view of drugs, especially opiates and heroin, as a source of profound artistic inspiration and creativity and instead presents them as a patently pathetic tool of the self-destructively nihilistic and, in turn, oftentimes criminal. In short, it is rare for happy people to become heroin addicts and it is only natural that someone suffering from a spiritual void would try to fill said void with what Burroughs lovingly described as 'Cocteau's kick.' Undoubtedly, such is the case of Frankie Machine who has somewhat tangible dreams but is living a virtual nightmare as the figurative emotional-punching-bag of a deranged wife named Zosh (Eleanor Parker) and the pawn of local small-time criminals. While Frankie deeply loves his ex-flame Molly (Kim Novak), he felt so guilty about (supposedly) crippling Zosh while drunk driving that he pathetically agreed to marry the crazy cunt while she was still in the hospital. In fact, Molly, who works as a server at a strip club, is the perfect dream girl as she encourages Frankie to pursue his dream of being a professional drummer while resentful wench Zosh berates him for even considering doing something that might better him and, in turn, give him a reason to leave her and move on with his life. Frankie also has a goofy best friend named 'Sparrow' (Arnold Stang) that runs a silly scam that involves peddling homeless street dogs to unsuspecting customers. While Sparrow is a good friend, he is also a bizarrely nebbish low-life and is involved with the same scumbags that plague Frankie's life. In short, Molly is the only true bright light in Frankie's increasingly darkening abyss of a life. Needless to say, anyone that has to deal with an insufferable bitch like Zosh would love to escape to the ecstatic warmth of a heroin high, so it is not long before dealer Louie finally convinces Frankie to embrace the narcotic void. As Louie gleefully states before Frankie shoots his first dope since his prison stint, "Monkey's never dead, dealer. They monkey never dies. When you kick him off.....he just hides in a corner waiting his turn."

As one can expect from any serious self-destructive addict, the abject misery of Frankie's personal life parallels the extent of his drug abuse, though the former oftentimes fuels the latter and vice versa; or, in short, the vicious circle that is dope fiend purgatory. Although Frankie knows what he must do due to lessons from a certain Dr. Lennox (who he proudly states of, "He was real good to me") as demonstrated by remarks like, "See, part of the cure is to keep yourself busy doing things you enjoy. Like for instance, I wanted to learn to drum and music," the totally callous and craven parasites of his subprole life keep scamming him into their sociopathic schemes. Indeed, aside from the fact that his wife Zosh is keeping him a virtual slave by pretending to be a wheelchair-bound cripple when she is actually perfectly capable of walking, Frankie's old boss Schwiefka (Robert Strauss)—a man that unequivocally proves that sometimes it is perfectly fine to judge a book by its cover—wants to make him his virtual slave again for his illegal card games and dope dealer Louie largely makes that happen with his highly addictive street smack. While Frankie does manage to make it into the musicians union, he botches his big band tryout due to suffering from drug withdrawal. To make matters worse, Frankie gets caught cheating during a long poker marathon that brings disgrace to his bastard of a boss Schwiefka. When Frankie beats him during an unsuccessful attempt to rob his drug stash, Louie naturally goes looking for him and is in quite surprise when he accidentally discovers that Zosh can actually walk. Afraid that Frankie will surely leave her if he discovers her big lie, Zosh actually kills Louie by pushing him over the railing of her apartment stairwell where he falls a couple floors to his miserable death (admittedly, this is a fairly awesome and completely unexpected murder scene). Naturally, Frankie is immediately suspected of the killing due to being one of Louie's virtual dope slaves, but luckily he is hiding out at his great love Molly's apartment while he withdraws from dope. Needless to say, Frankie certainly does not have luck on his side but he does have love in the form of gorgeous ghetto Fräulein Molly who demonstrates through sheer action that she is the only true good element in the protagonist's life (after all, even Frankie's best bud Sparrow is, at best, a sleazy street scavenger that regularly lounges around low-lifes).

Zosh is such a pathetically evil monster that she actually dares to confess to Molly in regard to her long-term plans for her husband, "He put me in this chair. And as long as I sit here, he'll never leave me. He knows he belongs to me. I wouldn't wanna live if he left me. And I'd rather see him dead too than have him go to you." While Molly has come by to convince her to help in regard to his drug problems and being suspected of murder, Zosh—a woman so deranged that she regularly happily glances at a misspelled 'romantic' scrapbook chronicling her crippling and subsequent marriage to the protagonist—is only interested in keeping Frankie for herself and she will go to any low to keep him on her gutter grade femme fatale leash. In the end, Frankie, who has decided to leave town, finally discovers Zosh's handicap ruse and so does the local cop Captain Bednar (Emile Meyer) who immediately realizes that she is actually Louie's killer. With nothing left to lose aside from her miserable life, which is worth less than nil, Zosh impulsively decides to throwaway said miserable life by jumping off the balcony of her apartment building right in front of Frankie in what feels like a moment of karmic kismet where a murderess dispatches herself the same exact way that she killed her victim. In the end in what is ultimately a fittingly uncomfortable yet largely deserved 'happy ending,' Frankie and Molly leave town while perennial ghetto-dweller Sparrow predictably stays behind. Not surprisingly, Nelson Algren's source novel ends on a more negative and decidedly anti-Hollywood note with Frankie pulling a Rozz Williams and killing himself on April Fools' Day after being forced to abandon Molly while hiding from the cops. Needless to say, it always feels like a sick joke when 'love conquers all' in a Preminger picture.

In my opinion, Preminger might be an authentic auteur but he is also an obviously overrated auteur that never managed to direct a true masterpiece. Indeed, while Andrew Sarris was right when he wrote, "LAURA is Preminger's CITIZEN KANE, at least in the sense that Otto's detractors, like Orson's, have never permitted him to live it down," I do not think I would ever describe Laura as an unmitigated masterpiece yet, at the same time, none of Preminger's subsequent output comes even close to it aside from The Man with the Golden Arm. While I have not seen all the director's films (which would undoubtedly be an unrewarding and redundant task), I have seen most of the notable ones and they are largely too long, insufferably (socio)politically motivated, rambling, and plagued with a sort of obscenely obnoxious arrogance that the director was well known for. When Preminger attempted to make a virtual Zionist The Gone with the Wind via Exodus (1960), he only achieved bombastic banality and a sort of gratingly disingenuous humanism where he tries in vain to care about the plight of Palestinians in between glorifying Herzlian heroics. While the auteur was certainly successful in demonstrating his fetish for law and the manipulation of said law with his classic flick Anatomy of a Murder (1959), no courtroom drama deserves to be at the preposterous length of 160 minutes. With his (anti)Catholic epic The Cardinal (1963)—a film where the auteur gleefully associates both Catholicism and his seemingly much despised Austro-Kraut homeland with the nastiness of National Socialism—Preminger was unable to hide his hatred for the Catholic Church and lead Tom Tryon (who was apparently at least partly inspired to quit acting due to his experiences with Preminger). As for his Panavision Pearl Harbor epic In Harm's Way (1965), Preminger produced a particularly plodding piece of all-star stagnation where John Wayne, Kirk Douglas, and Henry Fonda seem like they are pretending to star in a John Ford flick and failing miserably at it. While Bunny Lake Is Missing (1965) is a particularly potent preternatural psychological-thriller that, in many ways, defies classification, Preminger, who was ironically not really fond of the film, would never again direct a truly worthwhile movie. When he was not shitting on the American South with unintentionally grotesque tabloid-like trash like Hurry Sundown (1967), Preminger was paying insincere backhanded tribute to the hippies due to their mindless subversion of traditional white Christian American society with insufferably kitschy, pseudo-psychedelic twaddle like Skidoo (1968), which is notable for featuring a virtual graveyard of washed-up actors, including Jackie Gleason, Frankie Avalon, Cesar Romero, and Groucho Marx. As for Such Good Friends (1971) ghostwritten by Elaine May under the pseudonym 'Esther Dale,' Preminger made a valiant attempt at being a poor man's Woody Allen in an unintentionally absurd kosher sex-comedy that is about as hot as Whoopi Goldberg's nappy naughty bits.

Of course, one of the things that makes The Man with the Golden Arm so surprisingly enthralling aside from Frank Sinatra and Kim Novak's performances is that, with the exception of the iconic title sequence by Saul Bass, it is not particularly Premingerian in the emotional sense and it actually feels sincerely sympathetic (as opposed to arrogantly cynical) in its depiction of human degradation and desperation. Aside from source Nelson Algren's novel, the film probably owes its sense of humanistic authenticity to Sinatra who, unlike a lot of people that worked with Preminger, was unwillingly to take shit from the dictatorial director, which he was able to get away with due to his fame and popularity (notably, Marlon Brando, who snatched the lead role in On the Waterfront (1954) from Sinatra, was also interested in the role). In fact, Preminger was so impressed with Sinatra that he wanted to use him in an adaptation of Mario Puzo's The Godfather, or as the auteur-cum-producer wrote, "Many years later Paramount asked me to direct THE GODFATHER. I thought Sinatra would be wonderful in the lead and sent him the book. I even offered to eliminate the character of the winger, who some people thought was patterned after Sinatra. Nevertheless he said, 'Ludvig, I pass on this.'" Luckily, Francis Ford Coppola would ultimately direct the film as Preminger has never directed a film as nearly as aesthetically potent and truly epic as The Godfather (1972) despite his tackling of various films with long-running times. As Chris Fujiwara noted in regard to the film, "Like THE MOON IS BLUE, SAINT JOAN, and, especially, PORGY AND BESS, THE MAN WITH THE GOLDEN ARM is in this sense an exception to the main movement of Preminger's work after his departure from Fox and before SKIDOO: an abstract, hermetic film rather than one that involves itself with a reality that exists outside, and for other purposes than, the filmic project. The sets render Algren's skid row as an isolated and self-contained world, accentuating both its hopelessness and its lack of historicity. This world has no past and no future; it is read for the bulldozers. The stylization of some of the performances—Robert Strauss's and Arnold Stang's, notably—suits this desperate and artificial quality perfectly." Of course, this 'artificiality' that Fujiwara speaks of only underscores the protagonist's increasing junky jadedness, dirtbag delirium, and lingering lovesickness, as if the character has been condemned to a completely colorless heroin habitué hell. Indeed, the best compliment I can pay the film is that it is like the Fritz Lang's M (1931) of junky films as a boldly fucked flick that somehow manages to utilize studio artifice to underscore the metaphysical malaise of the urban underworld to the point where the viewer feels that they have actually spent a couple hours in heroin addict Hades.

If The Man with the Golden Arm is the junky cinematic jam par excellence where the viewer has the singular luxury of experiencing the spiritually necrotic nadir of narcotic nihilism, Jean Cocteau's surrealist directorial debut Le sang d'un poète (1930) aka The Blood of a Poet—a film that the poet turned filmmaker alludes to in his opium diary when he states, "My next work will be a film"—is its European arthouse celluloid counterpoint as an oneiric Orphic odyssey as inspired by the auteur's own apparently life-changing experiences with opium. In short, Cocteau's film is arguably an example of the 'positive' effects of opium. Notably, Cocteau would argue in his drug diary, "Opium, which changes our speeds, procures for us a very clear awareness of worlds which are superimposed on each other, which interpenetrate each other, but do not even suspect each other's existence." While I can somewhat respect Cocteau's somewhat naively romantic view of a drug that debased his soul and his words certainly make for a good description of the otherworldly experiences of the eponymous poet protagonist played by Enrique Riveros, The Man with the Golden Arm is unequivocally more in tune with the hauntingly hideous moral, emotional, physical, and spiritual lows associated with heroin addiction. In fact, I would warn the more impressionable art fags out there to stay clear of Cocteau's Opium: The Diary of His Cure lest they catch a nasty addiction that won't inspire much art but probably tons of all-consuming misery and quite possibly even death. After all, for every Bukowski and Burroughs, who were both miserable men, there are probably millions of degenerate drunks and junkies with failed artistic intentions and The Man with the Golden Arm does a rather respectful job depicting the perils of such a disgusting dead-end life. As for a vaguely similar real-life parallel to the character of protagonist Frankie Machine in terms of a junky jazz musician that lives to lose, American jazz trumpeter Chet Baker is a good example and, in that sense, queer fashion photographer Bruce Weber's documentary Let's Get Lost (1988) certainly makes for a great double feature with Preminger's flick. Needless to say, superficially romantic pop cinema like The Basketball Diaries (1995) is nothing short of a frivolous emotional con job if you are really looking to get down with dope fiends. While by no means a bad movie, Danny Boyle's Trainspotting (1996)—a film that seems more aesthetically inspired by psychedelic drugs than the opium oriented sort—has probably inspired more people to shoot junk than stay clear of it. As for junky films directed by actual junkies, Richard Kern (Submit to Me, Fingered) of the so-called Cinema of Transgression movement is probably the most notable example and naturally his films are totally morally retarded. Needless to say, most junky cinema is junk.

Notably, Andrew Sarris summed up Preminger's artistically curious cinematic career as follows, "We are left with a director who has made at least four masterpieces of ambiguity and objectivity—LAURA, BONJOUR TRISTESSE, ADVISE AND CONSENT, and BUNNY LAKE IS MISSING, a director who sees all problems and issues as a single-take two-shot, the stylistic expression of the eternal conflict, not between right and wrong, but between the right-wrong on one side and the right-wrong on the other, a representation of the right-wrong in all of us as our share of the human condition. In the middle of the conflict stands Otto Preminger, right-wrong, good-bad, and probably sincere-cynical." Indeed, aside from the occasional neo-Sirkian melodrama à la Fassbinder's The Merchant of Four Seasons (1971), not many films quite achieve the "sincere-cynical" of The Man with the Golden Arm where a marriage is depicted as something as spiritually deadly as narcotic addiction. And, undoubtedly, arguably more than any of Preminger's other films, his junky flick depicts, for better or worse, the signature penetrating Premingerian moral ambiguity (or lack of morality) that Sarris relatively soundly describes. In short, The Man with the Golden Arm is no pussy film, but a penetrating piece of understated pathos where one gets to the dead heart of addiction in a fashion that does not coddle the viewer or give them wild romantic ideas about addiction.

As someone that has personally known various junkies, including of the dead, undead, and almost-dead variety, The Man with the Golden Arm proved to be at least strong enough to make me (almost) consider taking a nice warm shower lest bask in the metaphysical grudge and grime, but I must confess that the film does not address the philosophical aspect of junkydom. Indeed, as Cocteau once wrote, "The purity of a revolution can last a fortnight. That is why a poet, the revolutionary of the soul, limits himself to the about-turns of the mind. Every fortnight I change my programme. For me opium is a revolt. Addiction a revolt. The cure a revolt. I do not talk of my works. Each one guillotines the other. My only aim is to spare myself Napoleon." Of course, one also argue that the opioid epidemic plaguing white mainstream America is also a (largely unconscious and supremely misguided) collective nihilistic revolt against Hebraic Hollywood and all it stands for as Tinseltown is merely the propaganda arm for the globalized crypto-kosher post-white multicultural America. And, of course, it was Preminger, who literally utilized The Man with the Golden Arm as one of his various cinematic weapons to crush mainstream white Christian morality, who helped to pave the way to this Hollywoodland hell. In that sense, I somehow feel much better about recommending Victor Sjöström's silent dipsomaniac delight The Phantom Carriage (1921)—an aesthetically pioneering film that takes both a literal and figurative approach to depicting the haunting horrors of alcoholism—instead of Preminger's lumpenprole dope fiend flick when it comes to films depicting the purgatorial perils of addiction. Indeed, if non-junky Preminger's greatest contribution to the art of cinema was a junky flick featuring a popular wop crooner that was at least partly motivated by quasi-legal reasons, one comes to a rather dubious conclusion about his value and legacy as an artist. In that sense, Preminger was probably on a similar moral plane as a junky, albeit with the spirit of a Wall Street cokehead type. Of course, I say that as someone that considers transcendental European arthouse films like Robert Bresson's The Devil, Probably (1977) and Adriaan Ditvoorst's White Madness (1984) to be the absolute apotheosis of junky cinema, but such hermetic flicks were not made for the same American prole audience that The Man with the Golden Arm was meant to appeal to. After all, even when it comes to junkies, not all people are equal.

Otto Rippert (1916) Alexander Shevchenko has a gift of terror. He has this uncanny ability to take simple architectural pieces or even household antiquities and bring something absolutely sickening or terror filled with his long, abstract, and calculated shots. Same with Burial Ground, the shorts are too short to be giving away the linear flow of the story. In some degree, it does involve phantasmal rebirth which is a bold move for even him. The lighting, or lack there of, is a beautiful canvas that this film paints on. Darkness shrouds every surface. You cannot escape it, Shevchenko makes sure of that. "He also has a cunning sense of humor" The same way that the original Resident Evil incorporated the lone door opening animation, Homunculus uses it to the same advantage. As always, the music is masterful and twisting with macabre bleep-beats. Homunculus is what Jacob's Ladder would have been like, had it been 5 minutes long. There's no doubt that Shevchenko learned a lot under the wing of fellow surrealist Iskanov. With both these artists at the reigns of foreign surrealism, the world will indeed be a better place. The Tourist DVD could not arrive any sooner. Bring on the motion picture runtime.

CONFESSIONS OF A SHOPAHOLIC

P.J. Hogan (2009)

It began as a simple question. "Did you want to screen Confessions of a Shopaholic?" she said. All I can really recall my reaction being was a loud and exaggerated scoff. There was no way in hell that I would be caught dead watching some dumb broad buy expensive clothes for an hour and a half. Somehow, somehow, I found myself in the empty theater with the only reasonable companion one could bring to a film of this lesser caliber - alcohol. Lots and lots of alcohol. What a strange night it soon unfolded to be. Love isn't that deep feeling associated with Ryan O'Neal, rather, it's that very shallow feeling you get in the pit of your stomach when you realize that you can live off a hard working male for a bit. That's the way Hollywood portrays it anyways. Take me home, pretty please? Confessions of a Shopaholic wasn't so much as a film experience as it was an interactive socializing convention amidst the backdrop of a Legally Blonde meets Devil Wears Prada knock off. For me, this is something that I'd never quite experienced before. Added with drama, what we had here was a localized version of MST3K. On to the film, as you can tell from the tag line "All she wanted was a little credit", this is a coy and slimy attempt to lure the American woman into a film starring the toady Isla Fisher. Considering we're in a recession, this film might as well be the introduction of Shaft in the slave trade era. I can imagine the box office attendant and the ushers strung to a tree, feet dangling and flashlights rolling on the carpet. Experimentally, this is a film that's designed to cater to every woman's needs of shopping, lying, cheating, and manipulating their way into the hearts and pockets of men. Carefully positioned between cold blooded slaughter and a speculative viewpoint, I'm approaching this film from every angle and I cannot admonish you from this film enough. As a date movie, it blows, simply. The trailer hinted not of a plot but with it lingered the stench of productivity and decay. I won't bother to see if this was fast tracked to release coinciding the debut of the new Friday the 13th film but I can realize that people will fall into two fan categories; those who want to see a "date movie" and those wanting to see a horror movie. Rebecca Bloomwood is a shopaholic. After collecting a rather large debt and avoiding the collector while attempting to become a writer for a top fashion magazine, she encounters totallyyy craaaazzy obstacles on the way. I refuse to ponder the thought any more but I don't recall watching women with debt taking shot after shot of liquor being PG material. Glub glub If you say "like", like every sentence then there's not a doubt in my mind that you will enjoy this film. After heading home, I realized how intoxicated I had become and how much this experience offended my every instinct and emotion. I felt like a ragdoll with no stitches. Like Rebecca, I too was stressed at the fact that I had to live her life, even for a little over an hour. I was in no way the proper state to write on this film so being hungover will have to suffice for now. Confessions of a Shopaholic takes the very problematic scenario every film has (a woman) and injects it into a film about cosmopolitan dreamlands of money, fame, success, and green scarves. This is an absolute travesty of all existential unhappiness rolled into a tight ball streamlining the decay of womanhood in general. Upon second thought, Touchstone Pictures hasn't produced anything good in a while. Final Verdict: Leslie Bibb looks like a fish.

LOST BOYS: THE TRIBE

P.J. Pesce (2008)

I had been waiting for a sequel to Joel Schumacher's sexy vampire classic The Lost Boys for sometime now. Apparently, the first attempt at a sequel to the film, The Lost Girls, was stopped because the repulsive rich bitch Julia Roberts caused a falling out between actors Kiefer Sutherland and Jason Patric. It would be another 20 years that the sequel to The Lost Boys, Lost Boys: The Tribe, would be released. The sequel was a direct-to-dvd low budget release, part of Warner Brothers genius idea of making shitty sequels to their best films. The Lost Boys director Joel Schumacher was completely against the production of Lost Boys: The Tribe. From the get go, Lost Boys: The Tribe looks like a fairly cheap and quickly made film. The opening titles look they were edited on an amateur high school kid's home computer to amuse his friends. The weakness of the introduction is in complete opposition to the power of "the flight of the vampire" featured in the opening of The Lost Boys. I knew immediately during the film's beginning Lost Boys: The Tribe would be an exercise in horror sinema blasphemy. How does one handle sitting through a long awaited piece of garbage sequel to one of their favorite vampire films? The "tribe" of vampires featured in Lost Boys: The Tribe are as contemporarily lame as one can expect for today's generation of MTV slaves. They are stupid, lack charisma and style, and spend all their time seeking irrational hedonistic pleasures. Instead of bloodsucking in style, they go around like a gang of retarded victims of cultural Marxism. Their leader, played by Angus Sutherland (½ brother of Kiefer), seems to have taken too many bong hits after brain damaging surfing sessions. Like most aspects of Lost Boys: The Tribe, casting didn't seem like much of a concern for the producers of the film. Tyree B HugRee The only actor to reprise his role from the original The Lost Boys was Corey Feldman as Edgar Frog. I must say that Feldman's performance is one of the most embarrassing that I have seen in film history. Although steadily approaching middle age, Feldman beats to death one liners throughout Lost Boys: The Tribe that seem like a grotesque parody of his performance in the original film. He wears similar militant clothes like in The Lost Boys, still uses comic books as his bloodsucker fighting guides, and tries to make his voice deeper than it really is. Unfortunately from Feldman, I don't think he ever hit the crucial stage of puberty in his life. Corey Haim makes a very brief appearance in the middle of the credits of Lost Boys: The Tribe, as a vampire that looked to be too overfed after a stay in a concentration camp. Feldman and Haim share quick verbal gabs at one other like they do on their reality show. The difference is they don't discuss how they let one another get raped by adult Hollywood types during their younger years. It would have been too painful to watch the drug induced brain fried Corey Haim attempting to play Sam throughout Lost Boys: The Tribe.

LOST BOYS: THE TRIBE

Loſt Boys: The Tribe is an excellent example of why film sequels are evil and only used to make a quick buck on the legacy of a quality film. Director Joel Schumacher has openly admitted that The Loſt Boys is his beſt film and he is right. One ſhould have reſpected his requeſt for Loſt Boys: The Tribe to never be made. I know Corey Feldman needs work but I ſee him more as ſomeone that blows black men in shitty prison movies.

SHROOMS

Paddy Breathnach (2007)

Shrooms was a nifty little gem I found amongst a list on new independent horror and to feed the insatiable appetite I have been having lately, I got my hands on a copy. To start off, I must say that the premise is ingenious. Five college students meet up with a friend and their guide Jake in Ireland. The whole purpose of the trip is to, well...trip. They will be camping in the woods for a couple of days having an extended psychedelic trip but don't realize the terror quite at hand. Jake is an expert of Psilocybin mushrooms and a sleazy guy at that. After briefly explaining the identifiable marks on the mushrooms, his eyes wander and he notices a death cap mushroom. This is a very big problem because apparently if you eat it, your hearts and lung will explode. Before the students got a chance to get too creeped out he explains in Irish folklore, that if you do not die, it is said to grant you foresight and intense ferocity. Tara is the ringleader of this event, and is the stupid one in the beginning of the movie. She is the one who wanders off and trips. She is the one who finds a pretty mushroom, and she is the one who decides to eat it. Upon ingesting it she suddenly starts to have a massive seizure, if it were not for Jake, who knows what might have happened. She is then carried back to the camp muttering, "I saw you save me". They then begin to collect the shrooms to brew some tea. Bluto (Dumb jock who is on Steroids, stereotype what?) gets denied from sleeping in his tent by his cock tease girlfriend so instead drinks some tea. He is now wandering through the woods talking to cows which is a truly hilarious scene. Tara has a dream where Bluto gets massacred, wakes up, finds him and forces him to go to sleep again. In the morning, she wakes up and finds he is missing. From this point on, Tara begins to see a hooded black figure that is described as a Black Butcher from folklore that killed many people. With a boom in independent horror, it is hard to find a diamond in the rough. The director is some Irish guy named Paddy Breathnach who has made a couple other unnoticeable films. The film's premise is the main treasure, that and a couple of really memorable creepy scenes which owes a lot to the eerie soundtrack playing all the while. Excellent cinematography mixed in with clever camera work. One thing that made this movie all the more enjoyable is the fact that the death cap mushrooms do exist but I know nothing about the folklore surrounding them. The actual term for the shroom is Amanita phalloides and no antidote is available for this. The best part of the film is the fucking ending. It seems over played at first but when it happens it is shocking, merciless, and brutal to the core. The ending also sets up a lot of layers to this film and could create multiple endings. Not only that but they also managed to capture the feeling of paranoia and the actual trip. The film seems like the most terrifying anti-drug advertisement ever made. "Don't do drugs or you will get brutally murdered!" and it just might work. After watching this I am truly terrified of doing Shrooms just in case i happen to remember the Cloaked figure. This film might touch down more with someone with personal drug history. This film does come recommended even if it has uninspired characters with inconsistent dialogue. If you are in the right setting, this film could chill you to the bones.

NEXT DOOR

Pål Sletaune (2005)

Next Door is the immaculate conception of the new-age thriller; A messiah in blood-stained garb. Next Door is one of the most uncomfortable cinematic experiences I have ever had the pleasure of sitting through recently. Taking nods from Roman Polanski and other masters of creepy perversion, Pål Sletaune's first film of its kind strikes gold and weak hearts for unraveling an abrasive erotic thriller that unloads on you like a buck shot. I look down upon the terms "sexual" and "thriller" being directed towards a single target. Most of these self-proclaimed sexy thrillers bore me with their virgin-esque sluts parading around the screen awkwardly attempting to play a cock tease. With so much bland material out there that doesn't challenge hormones, It seems the genre never had a start until Basic Instinct (Which I didn't find "sexy"). Finally, a film has arrived that has challenged all preconceived notions and morals that have filled my head since growth. This is the film that will arouse you for all the wrong reasons. John is the man you were when your girlfriend of ages left you. Alone and afraid of the world, he works and spends the rest of his time confined in his prison-like flat pining over his lost girlfriend. His surroundings call him a consumer whore from afar which is a theme devoid of closure. Sparking from his lost romance, he finds himself lured into a very scary and intimate world with his two stunningly beautiful next door neighbors. Only with the recent acquaintances is he allowed to leave the mindset of a man mentally incarcerated to his apartment. Next Door is a film that relies heavily on its awaited conclusion so much that what I say must be cryptic and esoteric for your own pertinent means. Much of what is built is thanks to the brooding aura and stunning female casting choices. While John is the complete opposite with the face only a mother could love, the two lead female tenants are gorgeous and sexy in their own Nordic way. If films like this are given passage into US distribution soil thanks to Danger After Dark, then fight the good fight! Next Door is a stunning invasion into the seedy yet surreal world of masochism; emotional and physical.

Panos Cosmatos (2018)

While I certainly consider the 1980s to be one of the best decades for music and regard many films, ranging from Rainer Werner Fassbinder's swansong Querelle (1982) to Tim Hunter's River's Edge (1986), from the same era as being among my personal favorites, I have become increasingly disgusted with the entire nostalgia culture trend as is probably most popularly epitomized by the obscenely overrated Netflix series Stranger Things. A degradingly derivative, conspicuously contrived, and politically correct Spielbergian pseudo-artistic con featuring gay little racially ambiguous boys as heroes and a mostly mute baby dyke as a heroine, the preposterously popular show, not unlike the films of (sub)human turd Tarantino, indubitably reveals more about the artistic and cultural bankruptcy of our age than its actual true worth as popular entertainment. Indeed, I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that, for better or worse, there is more originality, creativity, and humanity in a single episode of the original Twilight Zone or The Outer Limits than all of the episodes of Stranger Things combined, but I digress. Undoubtedly, it is a symptomatic of our spiritually sick and soulless age that people look to the Reaganite 1980s—a mostly materialistic age when most movies were mostly nothing more than mindless entertainment—as a means to calm metaphysical afflictions like Weltschmerz and Sehnsucht, but, of course, it is not all that surprising considering we live in a decidedly deracinated consumerist age where the only frame of reference for the past is in spiritually and culturally hollow Hollywood form. Personally, I find most of these nostalgia fetish pieces annoying specifically because they express virtual swooning adoration for the very same sort of lowbrow entertainment products that lead to such spiritual emptiness in the first place, as a Spielberg or George Lucas movie is surely not going to provide one with the same sort of cultural or spiritual nourishment that traditional religions, families, and societies once provided people. In short, these frivolous filmic products are narcotizing poison disguised as the cure. For that reason, I am able to, somewhat reluctantly, embrace the sort of 'reactionary retrowave' cinema of young Greco-Italian-Canadian auteur Panos Cosmatos, who does not merely fetishize the past but also critiques it in a refreshingly esoteric fashion the involves the utilization of both old school genre and experimental cinema techniques. Although Cosmatos has only directed two features, he demonstrated with his very first feature Beyond the Black Rainbow (2010) an inordinate maturity in terms of both aesthetic vision and worldview. Influenced by films ranging from Jean-Luc Godard's Le Mépris (1963) aka Contempt to Alain Resnais' Last Year at Marienbad (1961) to Saul Bass's sole directorial effort Phase IV (1974) to E. Elias Merhige's Begotten (1990), Cosmatos' directorial debut is indubitably visually alluring but what arguably makes it most interesting is its scathing anti-Boomer subtext. Indeed, as the young auteur has revealed in various interviews, the film is partly a critique of the spiritually degeneracy of the Baby Boomer generation and how they foolishly experimented with dubious forms of occultism while high on psychedelics. In his latest and greatest film, Mandy (2018), Cosmatos not only expands on his anti-Boomer sentiments, but also demonstrates a further aesthetic refinement that ultimately reveals that the auteur is one of the most interesting filmmakers working today. Like a romance-revenge film as directed by the heterosexual godson of Kenneth Anger and Werner Schroeter, the film somehow manages to reconcile the psychedelic cinematic journey of something like Lucifer Rising (1972) with Charles Bronson/Michael Winner righteous retribution classics like The Mechanic (1972) and Death Wish (1974).

Notably, Cosmatos is actually the son of belated Greco-Italian filmmaker George P. Cosmatos, who of course is best known for Hollywood genre exercises, including the Sylvester Stallone vehicles Rambo: First Blood Part II (1985) and Cobra (1986), the aquatic sci-fi-horror flick Leviathan (1989), and the celebrated Kurt Russell western Tombstone (1993). While the elder Cosmatos demonstrated a certain talent for eccentricity with the little-known 'rat horror' flick Of Unknown Origin (1983)—a somewhat underrated flick featuring Peter Weller in a surprisingly unforgettable performance that was one of the influences behind Mandy—the son, who clearly has different aesthetic tastes (notably, his belated mother was Swedish sculptor Birgitta Ljungberg-Cosmatos), is clearly the more idiosyncratic and experimental of the two. Indeed, it would be easy to accuse Cosmatos of nepotism but—aside from the fact that he did not direct his first feature until about half a decade after his father had died—this fat, swarthy, and goofy-looking fellow has clearly already paid his dues in terms of dedicating his life to the art of cinema and, unlike Brandon Cronenberg, he does not even seem remotely interested in parroting the auteur themes of his padre. While the film stars Mr. Meme Nicholas Cage as the lead, Mandy is clearly not the work of a simple artisan looking to support his family but an enterprising (and seemingly somewhat troubled) artiste that has a somewhat aesthetically schizophrenic affinity for both total trash and high-art. In other words, Cosmatos clearly made the film for himself, but luckily he has good enough taste to make films that appeal to slightly more people than just a marginal group of introverted autists.

In regard to his arguable magnum opus Trouble in Mind (1985), Alan Rudolph—a protégé of Robert Altman who got his start directing obscure no-budget horror trash like Premonition (1972) and Nightmare Circus (1974) aka The Barn of the Naked Dead—once remarked, “To me, love is always the turning point, the best hope for any future. And my favorite subject for a film.” If we are to take Rudolph’s words seriously then it is completely understandable why the protagonist of Mandy goes into full self-destructive exterminationist mode after his one-true-love is burned alive by members of a somewhat Manson Family-esque cult. Undoubtedly, Rudolph and Cosmatos' film have very little in common yet they do share at least two imperative similarities in terms of their combination of virtual worship of romantic love in a wicked world juxtaposed with a potent palette of (oftentimes neon) colors. Just like his previous feature Beyond the Black Rainbow, the film is set in 1983 as if to hint that it is the foreboding penultimate year just before the Orwellian nightmare begins, or so one would surely assume upon watching the films. Indeed, while Mandy might share various aesthetic similarities with films from the same decade when it is set, the film is sometimes as dark and dejecting as the most miserable works of German Expressionism despite paying homage to films as dumb and benign as Friday the 13th (1980) and Phantasm II (1988). In its sometimes gleeful recycling of popular horror flicks in an artsy fartsy fashion, Cosmatos' film somewhat recalls shameless guido rip-off movies like Giulio Paradisi's Stridulum (1979) aka The Visitor. Of course, unlike Paradisi, Cosmatos' relatively seamless pomo film referencing is clearly more influenced by cinematic nostalgia than sheer monetary gain. Undoubtedly, the fiercely phantasmagorical film is like a reworking of the Orpheus and Eurydice myth as meant to appeal to stupid horror fans that are not even familiar with said myth; or so one would assume if one actually believed that the average My Sweet Satan-esque metal head could stomach something even remotely like an art film. In fact, Mandy is one of the very few films that, in terms of influences and message, I would describe as a true white proletarian art film, though it is surely a cinematic work that most people seem to either love or love to hate. As for me, I was shocked that I could thoroughly enjoy a film that features stupid pointless heavy metal fonts for similarly seemingly pointless chapter title sequences, but I take what I can get. To some degree, the film is the cinematic equivalent of junk food and the sort of flick that provides a sort of childlike escapism, yet it does provide a tinge of spiritual nourishment and righteous romantic justice that similar films are quite lacking. In short, the film contains very little, if any, culturally syphilitic poz, which is certainly no small accomplishment considering the current cultural climate.

For me, the brilliance of Mandy comes in the form of the little things like an evil demonic biker gang that seems like it is the miserably misgotten spawn of the strangely iconic Cenobites from Clive Barker's Hellraiser (1987) brutally buttfucking the bikeboys of Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1963). Likewise, the animation feels the bastard mongrel brood of characters from the esoteric erotic Japanese animated feature Belladonna of Sadness (1973) directed by Ei-ichi Yamamoto and the Canadian cult sci-fi-fantasy Heavy Metal (1981). As for the beautifully foreboding forest depicted in the film, it falls somewhere between the more mystical German Heimat films and the first two The Evil Dead films. Not unlike like Philip Ridley's comparably eerily mystical The Passion of Darkly Noon (1995), the film might be set in the American wilderness but it was actually shot in Europe (indeed, while Saxony, Germany stands in for Appalachian region of North Carolina in the former film, Cosmatos opted for somewhere in Flemish Belgium for his feature). And, not just because of the Lowland Country setting, the film echoes the wonderful neo-Gothic weirdness of Belgian auteur filmmakers like André Delvaux (One Night... a Train, Belle) and Harry Kümel (Daughters of Darkness, Malpertuis). In short, Mandy resembles some sort of marvelous Frankenstein movie monster as carefully assembled from the butchered parts of 1980s horror/slasher cinema, the Fantastique genre, the psychedelic films of Kenneth Anger and Alejandro Jodorowsky, 1980s era David Lynch, Heavy Metal-esque animation, Stan Brakhage films like the Dog Star Man (1961-1964) cycle, and stupid heavy metal shit. Luckily, the film is greater than the sum of its seemingly absurdly combined hodgepodge of parts. If Nietzsche was right when he wrote, "There is one thing one has to have: either a soul that is cheerful by nature, or a soul made cheerful by work, love, art, and knowledge," then one must assume that Cosmatos has the latter type of soul as Mandy is clearly the expression of a man that lives for art and feels obligated to express this to the world. Undoubtedly, the film is not the expression of some simple artisan that simply learned a thing or two about cinema history from film school but an autodidact and natural cinephile that makes no distinction between lowbrow cinema trash and high celluloid art, but simply 'good' and 'bad' film of all sorts. In that sense, Cosmatos is somewhat like Nicolas Winding Refn sans the obnoxious autism.

In the featurette Behind the Scenes of MANDY, one of the film's producer, Daniel Noah, remarks in regard to a central theme of the flick, "To me, this film is ultimately a romance. It is the story of love and while it is a sad story—the story of lost love—it's also a story about when you lose someone, you still hold them in your heart. And this is a movie that we hope will provide comfort, which is a funny thing to say about a film that is such a dark journey. But it provides comfort because it speaks to people, like Panos and like us, and it says to them that they're not alone." Indeed, in many ways, the film, or at least the first half of it, is a simple tasteful love story of the rather wholesome sort where sex does not even really come into play, as the protagonists are depicted in a relatively normal domestic setting doing simple things that lovers tend to do like spooning each other in bed while talking about their favorite planets and watching shitty low-budget horror films together like Don Dohler's Nightbeast (1980). Indeed, it is not until the titular heroine is brutally murdered by a Jesus cult that we truly realize how powerful their love is, at least for the male protagonist who carries out a savagely sadistic scorched-earth policy against the culprits. An inordinately psychedelic neo-gothic romance-revenge hybrid where there is no real redemption aside from the glorious thrill of destroying one's enemies, Mandy cannot be described as an uplifting film yet it does somehow have a deranged triumphant spirit in the end. Surely, while watching the film I could not help but be reminded of various drunkenly lovelorn quotes by Edgar Allan Poe like, “The death of a beautiful woman is, unquestionably, the most poetical topic in the world,” as the eponymous heroine’s fiery demise is indeed quite the sight, as is the various consequences of said death. Likewise, when Poe wrote in his short story The Black Cat (1843), “There is something in the unselfish and self-sacrificing love of a brute, which goes directly to the heart of him who has had frequent occasion to test the paltry friendship and gossamer fidelity of mere Man,” he could be speaking of the male protagonist.

The story of Mandy is deceptively simple: Simple man lives a simple happy life with his beloved girlfriend; hippie Jesus cult ruins man’s life by kidnapping and murdering his girlfriend; destroyed simple man then dedicates his destroyed life to vengefully destroying every single member of the hippie cult. Of course, the film is more of an aesthetic journey than a narratively complex Kubrickian tale. The male protagonist is named ‘Red Miller’ (Nicolas Cage), which is a fitting name because he is a simple man that, by the end of the film, has a totally red-face as a result of all that blood that splatters on him while passionately dispatching his enemies. Red’s beloved girlfriend is named Mandy Bloom (Andrea Riseborough) and she also has a fitting name because she is beautiful young babe that is at the height of her physical prowess and feminine fertility. As hinted in the film, both characters come from rough traumatic backgrounds yet they have managed to find a special sort of happiness due to their strong love for one another. Even before she is killed, it is clear that Mandy is probably the only thing keeping Red from being a miserable mess. While the lovers live in an incredibly safe rural area called Crystal Lake in the remotest forests of the Shadow Mountains, Mandy has the grand misfortune of one day being randomly spotted while walking to work by a bleach blond hippie cult leader named Jeremiah Sand (Linus Roache)—a megalomaniac and charlatan that leads a motley crew called ‘Children of the New Dawn’—who immediately decides he cannot live without her, so he has his cult members kidnap her and Red. Being drugged out cult members that are mostly lacking in the physical prowess department, the Children of the New Dawn—a group of about half-a-dozen mostly bleach blond Aryan degenerates that look like they could be the family members of Stephen King fetishist and filmmaker Mick Garris—are not exactly fit for the kidnapping, so they summon a demonic biker gang called the ‘Black Skulls’ to carry out the operation. Rather curiously, the biker gang is summoned via a musical instrument called the “horns of Abraxas” and are given a large batch of hard LSD and a fat male victim—the weakest member of the cult—as payment (or “blood for blood”) for their actions. A somewhat hard bitch that had a traumatic upbringing (among other things, her father apparently taught her and other kids at a very young age how to mindlessly slaughter baby starlings), Mandy does not let a large dose of LSD stop her from completely humiliating and emasculat-ing Jeremiah—an unequivocal god and legend in his own mind—when he bares both his naked body and soul to her and attempts to ply her with pathetic pseudo-poetic compliments in front of all of his followers. While presenting himself as a virtual god in mere mortal form, Mandy literally laughs in Jeremiah's face while his flaccid pecker is hanging out in what proves to be an especially unnerving moment of the film. Not unlike Charles Manson, Jeremiah is a failed folk musician that, rather conveniently, inevitably found “another path. The path I have always been truly destined for” and became a cult leader, so he is doubly internally wounded when Mandy mocks both his music and authority. Needless to say, Jeremiah needs to save face and uphold his authority in front of the cult after being so ruthlessly rejected, so he opts to have Mandy burned alive after literally conferring with himself in front of a mirror like the bargain bin Narcissus that he is and stating to himself whilst crying like a little girl, “Tell me what to do.” Unfortunately for them, Jeremiah and his crazed crew fail to murder Red. Instead, they make the ultimately fatal mistake of ruthlessly taunting Red by making him watch his beloved being burned alive, but not before Jeremiah's seemingly half-autistic right-hand man Brother Swan (Ned Dennehy) declares to him, “Take a good look, you worthless piece of human excrement. This is the tainted blade of the pale knight, straight from the abyssal layer” and then stabs him in the side with said “tainted blade.” Naturally, the only thing that Red cares about after surviving the horrific soul-crushing ordeal is pure and unadulterated bloodthirsty revenge. Needless to say, the self-stylized quasi-Gnostic cult is no match for the most broken-hearted of backwoods bros.

In what can either be seen as either a major flaw of the film or a perversely poetic statement about the power of love, Red, who seems almost literally possessed by the Greek goddess ‘Adrestia,’ expends very little effort when it comes to systematically exterminating rather enigmatic enemies that almost seem to have magic satanic powers. Indeed, upon visiting an old negro friend named ‘Caruthers’ (Bill Duke) in his remote trailer to fetch his prized crossbow named ‘The Reaper,’ Red is informed by his comrade that the Black Skulls are ungodly beings and will probably kill him, but the friendly warning does not faze him. Indeed, as Caruthers explains in a sort of strangely poetic country colored gentlemen sort of fashion in regard to the Black Skulls, “There's stories that there was a chapter that ran courier for a manufacturer of LSD. He took a disliking to them and cooked them up a special batch, and they have never been right in the head since. I seen them once from a distance. What you're hunting is rabid animals and you should go in knowing that your odds ain't that good, and you'll probably die [...] When I seen them things, they were in a world of pain. But you know what the freakiest part was? They fucking loved it.” After visiting Caruthers, Red also opts to forge a large battle axe, thus underscoring his compulsion towards a truly visceral and brutal ‘hands on’ sort of revenge as opposed to simply gunning down his enemies with some sort of assault rifle. Although

Red is captured by the Black Skulls after crashing his car while attempting to hunt them down, he actually proves to be a formidable fighter against completely leather-clad faceless creatures that can hardly be described as human. Living in a home that more resembles the double-wide trailer of stereotypical meth-addled bikers than the ominous lair of demonic beings, the Black Skulls reveal certain idiosyncrasies despite their matching 'infernal uniforms.' For example, a gaunt and seemingly gay member of the group that seems to have a makeup dresser makes Red cry by stating, "You have a death wish." Red retorts by crying "I-I don't want. . . I don't want to talk about that" and telling him, "You're a vicious snow flake." Since he is the most faggy of the group, Red does not have to waste too much energy to takeout the lanky biker even though one of his hands is initially nailed to a floor. The next biker Red encounters is a grotesquely large and fat porn addict named 'Fuck Pig' that seems to be a demonic couch potato of sorts. On top of destroying Fuck Pig's living room while he is watching a porn, Red gets a couple gallons or so of the rather rotund biker's blood on his face after murdering him. While the final biker puts somewhat more of a fight as the two battle in front of a burning car, Red has no problem decapitating the bulky Jason Voorhees-esque being, especially after the creatures taunts him by stating in regard to Mandy, "She burns. She burns. She Burns." Before dispatching the final biker, Red himself transforms into a demonic being of sorts after fiendishly consuming some of the Black Skulls' cocaine and LSD. Of course, Red then makes his way to the church of the Children of the New Dawn after completely liquidating the Black Skulls brigade, but before he does he must meet a mysterious LSD chemist so that he can get directions.

The Chemist (played by Richard Brake, who is probably best known for playing the legendary 'Night King' in HBO's big (s)hit show Game of Thrones) is a Delphic hippie-guru-like figure with a pet tiger name 'Lizzie' and without Red even saying a single word to him, he remarks, "It's cool, man. Jovan warrior sent forth from the eye of the storm. When it's calm, I know it's good. Oh, man. They wronged you. Why they gotta be like that? You exude a cosmic darkness. Can you see that? Okay. The children. North." From there, Red heads north where he first encounters Brother Swan, who has the gall to state, "She... She burned brightly, Mandy. Don't you think? Still, better to burn out than fade." Since Swan has a big mouth, Red opts to underscore that fact by firmly penetrating his oral orifice with the butt of his battle axe, thereupon killing his creepy psychotic sycophantic ass in a rather brutal fashion that is something akin to deadly oral rape. From there, Red knocks the children off one by way as day turns to night until he eventually reaches their primitive church, which seems like it is located in a remote pit of hell. Somewhat predictably, Red first encounters Jeremiah's lead whore Mother Marlene (Olwen Fouéré)—a sort of evil and sexually insatiable Mary Magdalene figure with a disturbing million-cock-stare—who demonstrates a shocking degree of self-delusion and denial by bragging without even showing the slightest inkling of fear that she is about to be murdered, “Jeremiah says. . .I’m the most sensual lover he’s ever experienced. . .because of my sensitivity. . .and my empathy. I can anticipate my lover’s every move. I meet them. Like warm waves. . .locking. . .the rocky. . .hard shore.” As the old whore of Jeremiah who was once told by her charlatan lover that, “Everything you do is wrong,” Mother Marlene was naturally jealous of Mandy and Red killing her almost seems like a compassionate act of mercy, even if he decapitates her. In what ultimately proves to be a grand entrance, Red scares the shit out of jerk-off Jeremiah Sand by rolling Mother Marlene’s decapitated dome into his lair. While Jeremiah commands, “Come no closer. God is in this room” and tells Red, “You’re just meat. Without a soul. Without a brain. Without anything,” the charlatan messiah soon reveals that he has nil authority by trying in vain to spare his own life by curiously offering to suck the protagonist’s prick. Indeed, it seems that the sex-obsessed sicko, like all sociopath/narcissist types, lacks the capacity to differentiate between love and sex, though he clearly sees the latter as a symbol of power. Of course, Red is not impressed with Jeremiah pansy pleadings of, “I’ll blow you, man. I’ll suck your fucking dick!,” so he crushes the cult leader’s head until eyeballs pop up with his bare hands and then sets his decapitated head on fire. Notably, as Red is crushing Jeremiah’s skull, he lets out an orgasmic yell that reveals that he has finally obtained the visceral emotional relief of killing the man that killed his one-true-love. In the end, Red erases all physical memory of the Children of the New Dawn by burning their church down and then nostalgically thinks of Mandy while driving away as if she is in the passenger seat of the car with him as he maintains a deranged expression of happiness on his absurdly blood-soaked face. As Red drives away, the planets Jupiter and Saturn can be seen in the sky, which, quite notably, are the lovers’ favorite planets as revealed during a tender moment near the beginning of the film before everything went to hell. Incidentally, in the same scene, Red jokes that he likes the Marvel comic character Galactus because he “eats planets,” which is fitting words for a man that murdered virtually every single member of a group called the Children of the New Dawn in what amounts to a sort of Gnostic Ragnarök.

Undoubtedly, Mandy is, in many ways, an exaggerated expression of Nietzsche’s words, “Ah, women. They make the highs higher and the lows more frequent.” Personally, I have seen enough men throw their lives away on women to feel a little bit agitated by certain aspects of the film, namely Red entering a perennial dark void of no return for a woman that seems like a cold cunt, though I can certainly sympathize with him. While the titular chick clearly does not deserve the inordinately brutal demise she receives, it is hard to deny that seems like a total bitch and it is probably no coincidence that her greatest outburst of emotion comes out in the form of her laughing demonically for an extended period of time at a sick sociopathic pseudo-messiah, as if she was begging for death. Notably, a scene at the beginning of the film where Jeremiah Sand first sees Mandy bears a striking resemblance to the artwork on Black Sabbath's 1970 self-titled debut album (additionally, aside from the fact that Mandy is wearing a Black Sabbath t-shirt in this scene, Cosmatos once remarked in regard to his intent with the film, "I wanted to create something like a heavy metal album cover from the '70s"). Of course, this is not the only moment in the film where Mandy resembles a witch. In short, Red—a man that literally devotes his entire life to his women—is too good for Mandy, thereupon making his vengeful mass-murdering spree all the more tragic. Of course, the fact that the heroine is a bitch makes the film an all the more romantic example of masculine sacrifice as the protagonist takes virtual otherworldly risks and it is doubtful that his lover would have even done a fraction of the same things for him had the tables been turned. It seems that auteur Cosmatos has a more sympathetic view of the heroine as he stated in an interview with comingsoon.net, "I mean, it was very important to me that you actually care about Red and care about Mandy and feel something for them unless it just becomes a lot of noise signifying nothing, you know? And I really feel it's important, even for being just an abstract film, you still sort of feel some kind of connection to what you're watching emotionally." Judging by his own remarks, I can only assume that Cosmatos has a seemingly self-destructive fetish for broken women, as if he is the sort of dude that would stay with a batshit crazy bipolar bitch that got gang-banged by an entire underage high school football team. On the other hand, Cosmatos reveals another side of the heroine in an interview with thebrag.com that makes her seem more sympathetic where he states that she would have approved of Red's murderous revenge campaign, remarking, "Absolutely. I think she loves all of him, so this part is definitely a true part of them. And her too: I think she would have done the same for him." Undoubtedly a charitable (to say the least) view of women, Cosmatos also demonstrates an almost grotesque naïveté regarding womankind as if ladies have ever historically demonstrated a tendency towards sacrificing their security, let alone their lives, to avenge a male lover. In that sense, Mandy, despite being inordinately aesthetically mature, sometimes feels like wishful juvenilia, at least in an emotional sense. After all, while the filmmaker is nearly middle-aged, he is from a soft generation of man-children that were largely raised by women. I hate to say it, but I feel like Cosmatos needs to learn more about a life and the opposite sex before he makes another movie unless he decides to switch to the sort of stupid genre trash that he loves. Indeed, maybe Cosmatos should put down some of the unhealthy cinematic junk and watch some Fassbinder where he can learn more about the specific timeless peculiarities of the so-called fairer sex.

Nietzsche once wrote, "Heavy, melancholy people grow lighter through precisely that which makes others heavy, through hatred and love, and for a while they rise to their surface.” For better or worse, the same can also be said of the film’s hero and his eponymous lover, as Red reaches his full potential as an almost godly Übermensch of retributive murder—or, more in tune with the character’s mindset, ‘Galactus’—when he loses his beloved and his lover demonstrates an almost otherworldly degree of potent maniacal contempt while mocking a psycho that has just kidnapped her. While I find the statement somewhat dubious in itself, Red’s actions do confirm Georges Bataille’s words, “The unleashed desire to kill that we call war goes far beyond the realm of religious activity. Sacrifice though, while like war a suspension of the commandment not to kill, is the religious act above all others.” Indeed, Red certainly achieves a sort of spiritual transcendence underscored by the final shot of the film that he would have never achieved had he not gone on his vengeance campaign of hyper homicidal heartbreak. While the film features a number of scenes of vulgar brutality, it also carries a good timeless traditional message about the power of love, which says a lot for a film that was, according to its director, influenced by, “the weird, amorphous vibe of [Lucio Fulci’s] CONQUEST” of all films. Additionally, I also respect Cosmatos for not being a politically correct cunt and instead having the gall to make an explicitly pro-revenge film of the artful sort in a pathetically pacifistic age of neutered nihilism. In fact, the auteur would state in an interview with Filmmaker Magazine in regard to Mandy, “I actually think [the act of vengeance] really does help the characters. I wouldn’t want to make a movie that punished the person taking revenge, and I tend to prefer films that don’t moralize about it.” The film also makes a mockery of commercialism as is especially expressed in an unforgettable scene where, shortly after his lover is murdered, Red becomes disturbed upon seeing a goofily perturbing TV commercial for a grotesque easy-mac-and-cheese brand called ‘Cheddar Goblin’ that involves an eponymous green monster absurdly vomiting the sub-food product onto a disturbingly overly cheery child’s head. In regard to the Cheddar Goblin scene, which provides a rare moment of comic relief in what is an otherwise largely heavy film, the great auteur Italian Ettore Scola was certainly right when he once said, “Grotesque humor is a noble and tragic way of representing contemporary problems.” In terms of aesthetic cultivation and relative lack of degeneracy, Cosmatos seems to have a lot of potential as an auteur, though one hopes he at least matures somewhat when it comes to women and cinema as boyish 1980s nostalgia only gets you so far as an artist. Indeed, maybe Cosmatos’ new buddy Nicolas Cage, who was such a big fan of E. Elias Merhige’s Begotten (1990) that he produced the auteur’s second film Shadow of the Vampire (2000), will try to convince him that the 1980s mostly sucked as indicated by rather retarded films he starred in like Vampire’s Kiss (1988). Still, both of Cosmatos’ features demonstrates he is a talented filmmaker with a lot of potential that seems to artistically benefit from some sort of internal misery. Indeed, I hate to say it, but I think that the auteur has a lot to gain from some more suffering. In fact, Mandy was apparently largely influenced by repressed rage the auteur felt as a result of the death of his parents, especially his mother, which explains the film's complete and utter lack of erotic love. After all, as Thomas Ligotti once noted, "Let's say it once and for all: Poe and Lovecraft—not to mention a Bruno Schulz or a Franz Kafka—were what the world at large would consider extremely disturbed individuals. And most people who are that disturbed are not able to create works of fiction. These and other names I could mention are people who are just on the cusp of total psychological derangement. Sometimes they cross over and fall into the province of 'outsider artists.' That's where the future development of horror fiction lies—in the next person who is almost too emotionally and psychologically damaged to live in the world but not too damaged to produce fiction." While I would not wish suffering on any one, especially not what happens to the male protagonist of Mandy, I think the greatest thing that might happen to a filmmaker like Cosmatos is to have a disastrous relationship with a soulless bitch like the titular thots from Bergman's Summer with Monika (1953) and Fassbinder's Bolwieser (1977) aka The Stationmaster's Wife. Speaking of human misery and tragedy, it should be noted that the film's Icelandic composer Jóhann Jóhannsson died of an accidental drug overdose before the film was even released. When I discovered this shortly after watching Mandy, I even felt a bit angry at the senseless loss despite knowing very little about the musician as Jóhannsson's exceedingly ethereal musical score is nearly immaculate and certainly one of the greatest and most potent aspects of the film. Apparently, Cosmatos took Jóhannsson's death rather hard, as he was hoping to establish a lifelong collaboration with the composer. Considering that Cosmatos is himself no stranger to drug abuse, I think he might want to consider directing the ultimate cinematic (anti)drug trip as he certainly already has all the artistic vigor to accomplish that.

HANGING SHADOWS: PERSPECTIVES ON ITALIAN HORROR CINEMA

Paolo Fazzini (2007)

Italian horror cinema (and Italian cinema in general) has always been something very magical to me. Its easy to imagine George A. Romero behind the camera directing the wretched disappointment that is Land of the Dead, but I can only fantasize about Lucio Fulci directing Don't Torture a Duckling. Italian horror cinema has always seemed an old country away. Director Paolo Fazzini introduced me to this world with his important documentary, Hanging Shadows: Perspectives on Italian Horror Cinema. With the exception of a couple of books, Italian Horror Cinema has been vaguely recognized as a merited part of film history. Native Italian countryman Fazzini exposes the men behind the cameras and other plays involved. He does this in a way pertaining to many aspects of Italian Horror Cinema. Between interviews, various killing sequences are featured through Hanging Shadows. Made for the documentary, these murders pay deliberate homage to the Italian maestros discussed.

Such things are discussed as whether or not Lucio Fulci was an artist or an artisan, Ruggero Deodato's contempt for the media, and many directors self-admitted fear. New directors also discuss their problems with getting films made in Italy. Italy seems to be having a serious problem in getting financiers for Horror films today. It would be great to see Michele Soavi release a new film every year. These interviews result in new and different perspectives when watching your favorite zombie, cannibal, or giallo masterpiece.

Hanging Shadows soundtrack is a variety of Italian hip hop beats and rap songs. Although I expected a soundtrack by Goblin, I found it to be fitting and complimentary of the documentary. Its flows well with its smooth and seamless editing. This makes for a much more interesting view in comparison to short documentaries and interviews found on most DVDs. Like most Italian films, the dialogue is very fast in comparison to the subtitles. You may end up rewinding scenes to see what Ruggero Deodato said, but it is well worth it. Nothing said in Hanging Shadows is insignificant or unimportant to any fan of Italian Horror films.

Film school is a waste of money when you can learn about film history by watching documentaries like Hanging Shadows. Besides, you most likely aren't going to find classes with an Italian Horror focus. I recommend Hanging Shadows to any fan of Italian cinema. It's not often that you get to hear the subversive maestros of the macabre speak!

LADY VENGEANCE
LADY VENGEANCE

Park Chan-wook (2005)

The final film in Park Chan-wook's Vengeance Trilogy; Lady Vengeance is a stifling femme fatale hiccup in Chan-wook's otherwise remarkable career. The trilogy began quietly with the poetic Sympathy for Mr. Vengeance. The trilogy then took a sharp turn with the uproarious Oldboy. With word of Chan-wook developing a contemporary noir epic, the word excitement can only construe so much. Having watched Lady Vengeance around 4-5 years ago with a roommate, my initial sentiments were most crude. Lady Vengeance had what it took to bore an impressionable foreign fanatic beyond the realms of the unreal. Said roommate swore that it needed an additional viewing to fully set in the effects and thanks to Suncoast's 40% off all new DVDs sale, this wish of his became a reality. Before I had set out to rewatch Lady Vengeance I tried earnestly to remember details from the film. All I had drawn was blanks except for the final lengthened scene of familial justice. Here, deep within my blank memory banks, exists evidence of the wretchedness of Lady Vengeance. The introverted background of the character Geum-ja is so fatally flawed that it kills not only sympathy for the character but even her realized "white" form, as highlighted by Park Chan-wook's Fade to Black and White edition of the film. Now I fully understand why the title was trimmed from Sympathy for Lady Vengeance to the simplified Lady Vengeance. There isn't a shred of decency in this film, not for Geum-ja and certainly not her irrational, horrendous daughter.

Lady Vengeance follows a woman named Geum-ja fresh off a 13 year stint in a women's prison for a crime she didn't commit. For 13 years, Geum-ja sat in the corner of her strange cell with many other women, watching as her cell-mates were sexually assaulted by a grotesque troll of a woman portrayed by Go Su-hee. This time was bid terribly as Geum-ja concocted her master plan boasting one step, a simple "kill Mr. Baek". Upon release, Geum-ja lingers about, visiting former cell-mates who are mostly connected as being a victim of sexual assault to Go Su-hee. Since Geum-ja since poisoned her for three years with bleach, a certain kind-hearted notoriety surrounded her. The film basically boils down to repeated instances of Geum-ja "winging it". Her plan is nil, the fruit of her preparation is an aesthetically pleasing N.Korean firearm, and the story is as convoluted as possible. If my short, fractured summary seemed at all confusing, turn back now as the narrative digresses much more than my seemingly-ramble dictated. This intricate pattern of feminine clockwork makes an interesting attempt at painting a mural of sinners but Park Chan-wook's ideal masculinity behind the camera smudges the intended effect. Despite suffering effects similar to what cancer can do to the nervous system, the shell of Lady Vengeance is what one would expect coming from the international sensation that brought us Oldboy and J.S.A. It is a technically efficient film that includes several examples of surrealism and symbolism, the former being more worthy of screen-time than the latter. The argument of the intended symbolism during the final scene springs to mind. A scene in which defies filmmaking logic as we witness smoke billowing out of a room and Chan-wook musters the gumption of ambiguity and calls "symbolism." Obviously hinting towards a house fire, the finale wraps up with Geum-ja reuniting with her daughter in the alleyway outside of her house. For those who need the dots connected, when I see smoke and two parents blissfully asleep, only to switch setting to a girl barefoot in thick snow outside her house, a fire is the only thing that explains the events that have just transpired.

This clever ruse that Lady Vengeance is ignorantly putting forth on display attempts to instill a sense of righteousness into vengeance. Simpler means of vengeance, including all of the Death Wish films, did it far simpler and to much more effect. Another terrible condition plaguing Lady Vengeance is an atrocious script. I found myself in severe agony during the translation scene in which Geum-ja uttered the word "atonement" over and over, dizzying my already stewed hatred for every character in this film. It was bad enough that Geum-ja was rapping repetition but to have Choi Min-Sik repeat it over her words created a cinematic likeness to a 16 car pileup. The first half of the film scrambles to juxtapose flashbacks with present day character vignettes, ultimately creating a beast of cinema whose scruffy exterior could be comically reported as suffering from "bed-head". I understand Chan-wook's decision to include these scenes cause if executed correctly, could conjure a means of clarity. Since I am writing negatively about this aspect, you can presume that it failed against its own advantage. The collective of post-dyke characters that Geum-ja meets all represent deus ex machina in the sense that their existence is only to bring together a plan that is never seen to fruition. Geum-ja scraps the plan once she finds herself unable to kill again. Atonement for her sins? "Bad atonement...good atonement"? "Big atonement...small atonement"? You get the picture.

By the end of the film many glaring inconsistencies are made aware. Perhaps if Chan-wook's master plan was, in fact, to encapsulate a human interaction with trial and error then Lady Vengeance might have come out as another scorned girl-with-a-gun picture. Sadly, this wasn't the case the largest smear on Chan-wook's near perfect track record is born. With my prior exposure to Lady Vengeance being sour and my now current revisit to the arthouse director's choice in the Fade to Black and White version, I feel as if a terrible scab has been reopened. My body has since began detoxing itself slowly, making haste to scrape the remains of the radical feminization that Lady Vengeance planted. While the whole film is not to blame and the final scene involving Mr. Baek's punishment became quite rousing, it was not enough to save this picture from being such a flop of whimpering proportions. Lady Vengeance is a textbook example of what not to do when gifted with artistic freedom. This coming from a director who has always employed such demoralizing projects in masculinity (Not including I'm a Cyborg, But That's OK). Geum-ja is a vile woman, of whorish intent and inane means to reach her goals. If she even had any. Her frequent abuse of cinematic angst and shock value overloads the screen. No matter how many times she wears leather or eyeshadow or even how often they mention either the intended effect will never rub off on me. In short, Lady Vengeance was D.O.A.

THIRST

Park Chan-wook (2009)

I've given myself up to Park-Chan Wook and various other Korean masters. After charismatically bringing a manga to life with his mucky revenge thriller Oldboy, he separated himself from the pack by creating not only the greatest adaptation (arguably) of comic-to-cinema but insisted that this entity has an existence past paper thus making Oldboy seem so far apart from the rest of the pile. With his Vengeance trilogy, I have been impressed mostly but I will admit needing to rewatch all three for an overall satisfactory experience but with Thirst, Chan-wook seeks to reset the way the horror and vampire genre are to be digested. Thirst is a brooding vampire noir and I'd like to think the first of its kind. But this slow burning cinematic hemorrhage will inevitably take its toll on your default mood and I assume with this statement that the power of film is capable of moving you to either end of the extremes. The incredible aspect of Thirst is its multi-format inconsistencies that leap from scene to scene bewildering you with what appears to be embracing every manifestation of these night demons sans the bat metamorphosis. Perceived by me to be an unintentional ode to The Invisible Man, Sang-hyun adorns bandages spanning his entire body for what he doesn't realize to be a deathly allergy to sunlight. From the silent stalking to the coffin sleeping, Thirst spans all incarnations of vampire, save for the glitter variety. The Bandaged Saint's introduction to the screen is what sets this absent priest apart from the other sexually-ravenous Catholic members of the boy-loving kind. After hearing the pleas of a suicidal nurse in the confession stand, Sang-hyeon sighs and suggests to her a diet of sun and anti-depressants and to "forget that bastard who dumped you." Not so much holy as a vulnerable man. Wanting to do some good he volunteers his body as a vessel to play guinea pig to experiment treatment for an incurable disease called the Emmanuel Virus. After dying on the table after an unsuccessful blood transfusion(!), he returns to life softly praying and miraculously healing. All this leads up to his wild descent into the evil charms of a woman who is just given a tiny bit of power who then executes the lowly priests self-extinction. And thus the true majesty of Thirst is bared to all. In a way it seems despondent towards the cries of gender equality and feminism but as you can so succinctly envision in this tale of fiction coated in non-fiction, things are not always what they appear to be. While the male is really no good but at least strives for less than original sin, it's the female, "Eve", who banishes the immortal Adam to a silent purgatory of relentless emotional abuse. Thirst invokes in me a malicious wrath of hatred towards the promiscuity of women. As far as hypocrisy goes, I've indeed had my fill. The scene with Tae-ju having rough sex with one of Kang-Woo's dinner friends flustered me to no end. One facet of life I cannot indulge into is the whorish behaviors of the female. More recently, I've had to deal with heavy emotional baggage of the same caliber but not quite as fitting. I would strongly recommend you viewing Thirst if you've ever had female problems which applies to most men. Anyone who disagrees with me is a whipped bitch, that's all. Thirst is composed of select scenes of explosive conflict as the hunger drives and thrives within the unholy only to alternate between takes to a serene and peaceful look into the life of a nocturnal predator. It's not as though these are bad people. It's rather sorrowful to observe this wayward servant of god helplessly try to remain of good intent as he struggles with a condition that his "god" undoubtedly had to create; unless of course he seeks counsel in the open arms of science. Now on to the highlight of the show, sex and blood lust. If Thirst had to be known for one thing, it's the trauma-inducing sex scenes. To watch a vampire unaware of his own strength literally pound a virgin unabashedly while she winces in pain is as awkward as watching those POV porn angles of slapping genitalia. To its credit, Thirst also is cursed with incredibly realistic sex sequences. This is no escapist view into what sex should be or how it should be. No glamorous makeup, no soft grunts, no magical butterflies in the pit of your stomach. The lavish sequences of lust are raw, crude, and desirable only to those involved which is how sex in cinema should be. When the film finally reaches its forlorn conclusion, silence will swell up in the pit of your stomach which was the case for me and it seems that all of life's problems were solved with the promise of a lovely sacrifice. Far be it from me to exclaim this to be the best vampire film created in a long time but I'd be lying if I didn't admit this is one of the best. It's also rather uncommon for a film to show the truth of the ever-going female decay and how we are powerless against it.

NO MERCY FOR THE RUDE

Park Cheol-hee (2006)

At the top 10 of each genre lies at least one Korean film. With me, it is an escalated science. Koreans take ingenious ideas and with that, forge myth with matter in lines of technical aspects, thus creating a potent story backed mostly by stunning visuals. Ha-kyun Sin - Korean actor of personal favorite Save the Green Planet! - stars in the almost comedy that is No Mercy for the Rude. No Mercy for the Rude concerns a single man who is the highlight of our story. He grows up as a mute due to a genetic disfigurement leaving him with a short tongue. In order to save up for tongue surgery, he becomes a die hard assassin whose strict moral code leaves him only killing rude people. As one's mind might wonder about who deserves the label "rude", the film should be retitled No Mercy for Thugs. Our character is a cold soul. One who kills with out mercy, and one who strives to be a matador. The hypocrisy kicks in once this "rude" killer starts assassinating people, laying his swift knife of judgment upon anyone he disapproves of. The film feels like a three-part saga much like this years The Signal. The first half is a funny and uplifting comedy. The middle is like a scorching family drama, and the climax is a saddening trial of love, left with an ending worthy of The Believer's fame. The scene-stealer here isn't the aptly named mute assassin Killa, but his colleague in crime who is disappointingly unnameable. Blame it on the translation issues, not me. His friend and partner is a once Ballet student who has used his old style of dance to elevate his sword & dagger play to a dangerous level, and in turn he creates an art form out of killing, whereas our Killa just thrusts knives into chests. No Mercy for the Rude is by no means perfect. It transcends the line between good and great and nestles in it's own place. This film has a bold flavor. Whether you crave and accept it is your choice. This film at least comes recommended for the hilarious introduction and the somber ending.

Pascal Laugier (2008)

With buzz circulating within the horror community about the over-privileged sea of French neo-feminist horror, Martyrs was just stock lined up to be fast tracked to an "Unrated" DVD cut available at your local Best Buy where the weak minds can stumble upon films that redefine "ultraviolence." This is funny in itself for the average viewer seeing as how the worst they've experienced is stocking stuffer garbage like Hostel, but in the comfort of their own living room they're treated with hyperactive scenes of misogynistic sadist nightmares that can only be described by horror's leading review experts as dully as possible. These releases allow for an influx of quote tags such as "Gorey," "A bloody roller-coaster," or any other spin off of the English language that could create a mirage thus deceiving you into purchasing just another horror film with women in their underwear. Martyrs starts off as any film of this caliber would; a scene of a bloody running, screaming girl with incredibly short hair. This ritual of sorts establishes our heroine as a vulnerable being that eventually transcends fear and humanity and becomes a shell aided only by a little girl Anna. Leading experts would love to know what had happened to poor Lucie but nary a bit of evidence remains in the warehouse where she was held captive for little over a years time. Cut to 15 odd years later. We're shown a lovely suburban home with a loving family that tends to their young children's needs and enjoys gardening and such antiquities of the "American dream." Knock on the door. A slight expressionless face of the father. Boom. Hole blasted through his gut. A cloaked female figure steps over his mangled figure and proceeds to systematically execute his family in a horrendous fashion, devoid of emotion and style. Truly a horrific sight to behold although the serenity of the white walls calms you down from full malfunction. From this introduction that thankfully wasn't abetted by classical music, were given glimpses into the story line and flashbacks to what actually happened to Lucie all those years ago. What's better is that we don't relive that much of what happened to Lucie, instead, Anna herself becomes a "martyr" in order to show us firsthand what transpired in those cells that reflect the clear and conservative terror that Cube brought to life. Tupperware has never seemed so prophetic before, has it? Martyrs has been called the opposite of Funny Games and I'd like to think that this assertion is absolute but I still find more substance in the ending of Martyrs than found in a rewind system of Funny Games, both past and present incarnations. Along with the striking cinematography of bright reds and abyss-like blacks that accompany most French horror, more than odd elements stand out that echo Natural Born Killers and Bonnie & Clyde. The pairing of Anna and Lucie bring about some awkward cooperative bonding scenes that seem almost out of place. Well, ultimately the effect is nulled upon discovery that both characters were necessary for each other. It all turns to shit with that doomed kiss. With that one kiss that seems to cemented in the "culture" of French horror, both these martyrs were flying first-class into a life of sin. Lucie was condemned anyhow seeing as she murdered a 15- or so year old girl and a fashionable 18-something male that had his life ahead of him. If Martyrs acquiesced to one task, it would be issuing a warning against wandering womanhood and the perils of lesbianism. As Anna was shot down, Lucie looked perplexed at the action. It's as if she lacked any form of sexuality, which I'm sure was correct. Just when Martyrs has built atmosphere and died down like a simmering flame, the story seemed to drive into the soil. Nothing could come out of what had been left. The obstacles had been cleared out but just like that, a phoenix rose out of the ashes and shook embers off its glorious plumage. For the incredible wordplay, know that I'm not in love with Martyrs - I'm just in love with the final moments of the film. To avoid spoilers, I'll be discussing much of the impact and resolution in comments if needed be. Martyrs is a film that needs immediate disclosure during the credits. Don't turn off the film. Don't get up. Don't alter your existing environment in any way, shape, or form. For this reason, I pity those who experienced this in the theaters. For an enlightened and heightened mind set, no distractions are mandatory. Sit still and listen to the somber track scroll through its run time and the credits scroll upwards into the inevitable oblivion. Martyrdom is a metaphor for the pacing of this piece of cinema. First, you feel uncomfortable but wary enough to venture deeper into the darkness. The abuse collects and soaks. Sensory deprivation is up next followed by the annihilation of humanity and free will - Absolution upon the ending. Martyrs is an extremely flawed (not) horror film that is blessed with an ending that has "that stare." The kind that makes you question the previous events that only recently unraveled. A truly uncomfortable cinematic experience that is plagued with death at every corner but unearths beauty behind sacrifice. This film braves the clichés that comes hand in hand with the new wave of French horror.

WHO IS K.K. DOWNEY?
WHO IS K.K. DOWNEY?

Pat Kiely, Darren Curtis (2008) Who is K.K. Downey? is largely a film i can appreciate. It manages to be witty, hilarious, and vastly entertaining, but also happens to trash an entire counter-culture. The glory of this trashing is that it actually manages to be harmful to this counterculture, the "indie hipster" trend. The film makes an attempt at making an "indie" film in the style of many indie bands are created and book frauds are produced. With that in mind, I will explain the story within a story. Theo and Terrence are in a shitty band and Theo is writing a book. This book largely resembles most auto-biographical literature that has to do with rim-jobs and cheese balls. Theo's book won't get published due to him being a fat white kid, so he tricks the sly Jewish book representative by giving the book to the star, K.K. Downey, thus turning it into a faux-biography. Terrence plays K.K. and becomes famous. Drugs, rock, blah, blah. The story depicted in this film revolves around an entire "way of life", by which, when i say that, i am openly mocking all conformity to be non-conformist. The film is indebted to J.T. Leroy, for his "auto-biographical" book about his life growing up and being repeatedly raped. This later turned out to be a hoax, and was the work of a female newspaper writer, which comes as a big disappointment. The degeneration of this style can be seen in many little conversational pieces, such as when K.K. does a reading, one hipster in the audience says "I find it to be like, Kafkaesque, but without like any bugs, right?" In that one line I knew that this films spoofing was part intentional, yet jokes still remain that mock the mockery. A book entirely about sodomy and heroin is largely uninteresting, but when it turns out to be a true story, people flock to discover beauty from a "false" spirit. In order to poke fun at people who quote philosophers and recite poetry, a scene involving an over-bearing jealous cynicist who happens to review music occurs. Alone at night, trying to discover the coincidences behind the sudden appearance of K.K, he masturbates to a picture of Voltaire. Seeing what he has done, he lowers the picture in shame. Besides the outrageous humor, the film has a collection of mesmerizing scenes, such as K.K's love interest's synth pop poetry performance. Who is K.K. Downey? is a film that i tried to hate at first, but i couldn't do it. It's brashly funny, honest, and manages to deliver a horrifying blow to these fads that seem invincible. Maybe now, we can derive some sense out of recent generations. As R.L. Stine would state, Hipsters beware, you're in for a scare. Playing at the 17th Philadelphia Film Festival www.phillyfests.com

Pat O'Connor (1993)

Like his previous cinematic works Le salamandre (1969) and Afrika (1973), Alberto Cavallone's Zelda (1974) – a sometimes psychedelic, erotic melodrama about a celebrated racecar driver, his wife, and their merry Ménage à trios lifestyle – is a sufficiently, if superficially, nihilistic work about betrayal, negrophilia, murder, and mayhem from the seemingly preposterous perspective of debauched bourgeois types. Zelda would also be the first film that Cavallone gave into carnal commercialism as he shot scenes of hard pornography for the French version of the film, which I regretfully have yet to see. In a narrative structure quite similar to Afrika, Zelda begins with a scene of the bloody bodies of male protagonist race car driver Mark Davis (Giuseppe Mattei) and his Negress mistress Clarissa (Halina Kim) laying lifeless from what seems like an overly sentimental suicide pact, but as the film progresses and libertine-laden layers of the backstory are peeled back, one soon realizes a fierce and highly hypocritical form of female jealousy and treachery is ultimately to blame. Sometimes resembling a shallow arthouse film directed by a pretentious softcore pornographer on LSD, Zelda is best perceived as an elegant erotic flick of the posh pulp persuasion which – not unlike the wanton works of filmmakers Radley Metzger (The Lickerish Quartet, Score), Walerian Borowczyk (Goto, Island of Love, La Marge), and Tinto Brass (Salon Kitty, Caligula) – were quite popular in Europa during the 1970s. Of course, despite its similarities with other films of that era, Zelda – with innately iconoclastic and misanthropic themes and oftentimes anti-erotic sex scenes – has the unmistakable feel of an Alberto Cavallone film, albeit of his more commercial blend. With characters that spout such pseudo-existentialist gibberish like “we must destroy ourselves to justify our existence” and “I detest everything that is normal” – in between talking of bestiality and the lack of emotional authenticity in regard to interracial love – one cannot help but be enamored by succulently stylized cinematic sleaze that is Cavallone's – the one and only – Zelda.

Equipped with an action-packed assortment of acid-washed, negative, and overexposed stock footage featuring racecars, crotch-rockets, wild horses, airplanes and whatnot that comprise a large fraction (seemingly to be around ¼ of the film) of film, Zelda is a wayward cinematic kaleidoscope of cool bullshit that oversexed, ritzy twit types are into; none of which I can relate to, yet that does not detract for the rich kitsch of this cross-grained celluloid trainwreck. The title character of the film, Zelda, is a decisively duplicitous bitch with a terrible sexual itch she can't seem to scratch, hence her particularly perverse propensity for seducing and sleeping with members of both genders instead of her perpetually horny husband. Described in the film as “a dove, a snake and a bitch at the same time” like so many other miserable matriarchs of Italian families,

ZELDA

Zelda ultimately is the undisputed duce of the household and she wields power with her (and other people's) pussy. In short, sex acts as a debauched form of double-dealing in Zelda that leads to familial disintegration and eventually death. Of course, no one is innocent in the film as Zelda's racecar-driving would-be-superstar husband Henry is more interested in scuba diving than the fact that his college-age daughter Ingrid (played by blonde bombshell Franca Gonella; a woman that can barely pass for 25) is philandering with his middle-aged Negro friend, a fellow racecar driver with a need for speed and pan-sexual degeneracy. Manic for miscegenation, racecar rockstar Henry eventually falls madly and unflinching in love with black babe Clarissa (Halina Kim) – the wife of his black buddy – who Zelda initially seduces, thereupon sparking the torrid threesome that will eventually culminate in the demise of her own marriage. Even after Henry's botched attempt at suicide, which paralyzes him and thus irreparably pacifies his sexual potency in the process, Clarissa stands behind her melanin-deprived man to the dismay of overzealous Zelda; the queen bitch of her less than humble abode. In the end, Zelda and the rest of the jaded lovers seek bloodthirsty vengeance of the most malevolent, multicultural sort.

With its cursory yet completely callous and cheaply charming cocktail of hedonistic sex, extreme sports, and mind-numbingly mundane yet unintentionally mirthful melodrama, Zelda is proof that style and cynicism can go a long way for a film that would otherwise be without a single inkling of merit. While nowhere near as worthwhile as Alberto Cavallone's quasi-surrealist sadomasochistic masterpieces of the cine-magically macabre such as Man, Woman, and Beast (1977) and Blue Movie (1978), nor even the phantasmagorical softcore flick Blow Job (1980), Zelda does make for a passable, if secondary, addition to his unruly miscegenation-based melodramas Le salamandre (1969) and Afrika (1973). Ultimately, Zelda is palatable due to its strikingly state-of-the-art synth-based musical score (created by Marcello Giombini), rather Roeg-esque nonlinear editing, pseudo-poetic psychedelic wild horse scenes, sleekly stylized shot composition, and hyper-hysterical scenes of histrionics. As a film with such positively preposterous dialogue as "is it really love or just the desire to sleep with someone with black skin?" and "Hurry up, I'm a bitch in heat," Zelda is just another great example as to why the Italians made some of the most terribly yet trimly trash films of the 1970s and 1980s.

GODZILLA VS. MECHA GODZILLA

Patrice Lefebvre (2002)

Cult status doesn't do much for me. If you tell me a film is praised and glorified for cutting edge low budget entertainment or abstract and obscene imagery, I won't become magnetized to the fad as much as the next fan would be. In case, Godzilla vs. MechaGodzilla is not merely just a bad film; it's downright disappointing. The conflicting and complex story is juicy in details but to continue the food metaphors, is tasteless. A group of scheming aliens are introduced without an introduction. I cannot recall the scene that shows their origin. They just appear with a greasy assassin and plot to steal an ancient statue capable of releasing King Caesar; The only weapon that can destroy MechaGodzilla. I hope King Caesar is in no more films. I don't think I could handle another unwelcome surprise. Pretty soon, King Caesar (being of fleshy and hairy descent) attempts to take on a giant robotic killing machine made out of space titanium. The very idea of physics allowing enough momentum for the "King" to damage MechaGodzilla flusters my brain and shatters my universe, although the idea of a giant hairy caveman doing battle with a robot lizard is a bit far out as well. King Caesar's attacking styles rapidly change as well. It's as if the original director jumped ship halfway through and left it up to a rookie to finish. He begins by pummeling Mecha G with his berserker rage, but once Mecha G gets a single hit in, Caesar runs and hides behind a rock waiting for Godzilla to save the day. The prophecy stated that Godzilla would need the help of the King, but it seems that the King needed all the help. Godzilla's costume is ridiculous in the entry. It looks childish and ligh-hearted. It lacks that product that gives it a scaly lizard look and with gestures that a constipated kick boxer makes, this Godzilla is hardly intimidating. I'd never seen an animal "put up dukes" until this disappointing sequel. For the first appearance of MechaGodzilla - Who had always looked good as an action figure - I found this to be a first impression of the disaster kind. Godzilla vs. MechaGodzilla isn't all it was/is hyped up to be.

Bijou
Bijou

Patrice Rhomm (1978)

After the success of his debut crossover feature Boys in the Sand (1971)—a work that predated Gerard Damiano's hardcore hit Deep Throat (1972) by almost a year—auteur-pornographer Wakefield Poole (Moving!, One, Two, Three) bravely decided to do the seemingly nonsensical by following up his homo hit with an experimental erotic flick of the exceedingly ethereal and quasi-psychedelic sort that would prove to dumbfound most audience members. Indeed, a film with a title that is generally associated with classic American cocksucker flicks from the 1970s and 1980s, Bijou (1972) is a sort of arthouse 'head' flick featuring a brigade of phantom homo hippies giving head to an ostensibly heterosexual construction worker who finds himself being worshiped as a virtual sexual god by a group of languidly lurking shadowy sodomites of the somewhat ghostly sort. As auteur Poole describes in his audio commentary for the recent 2014 Vinegar Syndrome DVD release of his second feature, he originally intended to direct a heterosexual porn flick after being annoyed by the fact that dago Damiano cashed in on what the gay auteur did with Boys in the Sand via his mafia-distributed 'breeder hit' Deep Throat, which ultimately became the most profitable pornographic film of all time. Luckily, innate sexual invert Poole decided to stay true to his poof persuasion and directed Bijou instead which, although a fag fuck flick with minor heterosexual elements, has more in common with the experimental works of Stan Brakhage (Dog Star Man, Scenes from Under Childhood) and a Kenneth Anger flick like Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954) than the average queer hardcore flick, albeit minus the diva-like fag hags and Crowleyite/Thelemite imagery and symbolism. Once lauded by Variety as follows, "Part Kubrick, part raunchy Disney [...] it looks like a porno film starring Robert Redford, Warren Beatty, Steve Reeves, and Joe Dallesandro," Bijou is pure body worship in celluloid form as set in a phantasmagoric poof pandemonium that blurs the line between homo heaven and hell. Although mostly shot in the filmmaker's apartment on 16mm film stock with a somewhat meager budget of about $22,000, the work looks like a lavish big budget 35mm production, which is largely a result of the Poole's use of experimental lighting as a man with a background in theater. A decidedly drug-influenced work of the rather ambiguous and open-ended sort, auteur Poole described the film as follow in an introduction for the recent Vinegar Syndrome release: "I came up with the idea that I wanted to make an abstract full of enigmas and things that key off things in your mind...you had to make your own movie out of the images that you saw and whatever you brought to the film from your experiences would affect what you got from the movie." Of course, as a work about a straight construction worker who is sexually serviced by half a dozen men or so, Bijou is certainly a fag fantasy gone awry, but one not without aesthetic merit as a sort of marvelously misbegotten celluloid marriage between the so-called 'aesthetic fascism' of Leni Riefenstahl and the cine-magic of Kenneth Anger, which is certainly an aesthetically audacious cinematic combo made in hell.

Beginning with a thriller-like segment that director Poole himself described as being, "like a Hitchcockian tribute," Bijou starts with a fateful happenstance meeting between three strangers that ultimately acts as the catalyst for the rest of the plot. Indeed, after a slutty streetwalker-like chick (Cassandra Hart) sporting an aesthetically repellant fur coat and a mini-skirt is hit by a car at an intercity crosswalk driven by a young man (played by producer Marvin Shulman, who produced most of Poole's films) with a shaved head and a flamingly gay mustache, a dubious young construction of the opportunistic sort with a leather-fag mustache (played by porn star/director Ronnie Shark, who died of AIDS in 1991 at the age of 43) slyly snags the dead hooker's purse and takes it home with him after hiding it inside his coat jacket and making his way to the nearest subway. After getting back to his pathetically furnished dump of an apartment, the Construction Worker drinks a huge glass of milk that looks more like semen and empties the dead prostitute's purse out on his bed, ultimately finding pink lipstick, keys, an old letter and photography and, most importantly, an invitation for a mysterious club called Bijou that has to be used by 7:00 p.m. that day. After jerking off to images of naked chicks to the 'honkey blues' sounds of Led Zeppelin songs "Dazed and Confused" and "Babe I'm Gonna Leave You" while taking a shower, the Construction Worker heads to club Bijou (interestingly, the entrance of which was shot in Poole's apartment building hallway). When he gets there, the blue collar (anti)hero hands his magic red ticket to a rather old Jew-y bitch of a ticket taker (Lydia Black) and is directed towards a door which he enters, only to discover everything is pitch black inside of the seemingly unoccupied club. Needless to say, the ostensibly heterosexual proletarian laborer has no clue what kind of nightmare of phantasmagoric homo hedonism that he has gotten himself into.

After a couple seconds of standing in the pitch black club of carnality, the Construction Worker notices a neon sign reading "remove shoes", which he immediately does. When he spots a second neon sign reading "remove clothes," he also does not think twice about doing that and soon enters a mystifying netherworld of distorted mirrors and white smoke. While walking through the club like a proudly well endowed panther on the prowl, the Construction Worker notices a variety of bizarre gigantic sensual statues, including a pink face with a giant penis hanging out of its mouth, as well as yellow sea urchins and a giant bouquet of pink hands. Eventually, the rather intrigued protagonist happens upon a sexually ambiguous longhaired individual laying face down on the floor in a somewhat crucified-like position. Of course, the sexually androgynous individual is a dude, but that does not stop the supposedly straight protagonist from promptly penetrating the tightly bound fellow's heinie highway. Since the bound bitch boy does not move, it seems as if the protagonist is penetrating a fresh corpse. Like most men after having a good fuck, the Construction Worker falls asleep after his initiation into bum-buggery, but he is soon awakened by a mysterious collage film that is being projected by a seemingly pernicious unclad cameraman (as fittingly played by director Wakefield Poole). Eventually, four different projected screens appear with four different men provocatively undressing and eventually masturbating (this footage is actually the screen-tests Poole shot while auditioning performers during pre-production). While the four screens are being a projected, a fifth screen appears in the middle featuring the same seemingly wanton woman who was hit by the car at the beginning of the film. Just as the supposedly dead hooker strips off all her clothes, all four men reach sexual climax, as if she is responsible for initiating them into a life underworld sod lechery. After the projected masturbation scenes conclude, the Construction Worker passively allows a mysterious tattooed man (played director Poole's boyfriend Peter Schneckenburger aka Peter Fisk, who also starred in Boys in the Sand) to lick and suck him up and down. Eventually, the two men's rather languid sex session erupts into a somnambulist seven man orgy, with a new man appearing every couple minutes or so to join in the ritualistic manwich. By the end of the oneiric orgy, the protagonist takes on a more aggressive role and the men leave one-by-one by disappearing into the darkness just as they once 'came.' After blowing his load and achieving an otherworldly orgasm, the Construction Worker falls asleep in the same place he did previously after bugging the first boy and after waking up, he puts on his clothes and leaves the club a new proud member of the occult gay underworld. Indeed, the protagonist is in such a ecstatic state after his extra-erotic esoteric experiences that he does not even notice the bitchy ticket taker's attempt to give him another free pass to Bijou. In the final shot of the film, the Construction Worker smiles for the first time in the entire film, as if a gay orgy has solved all of his problems in life. Needless to say, it is doubtful that the protagonist will tell his co-worker about his experiences at NYC's premiere phantom poof club.

When it comes to old school bro-on-bro blue movies, Bijou is certainly the Citizen Kane (or more like Metropolis) of gay porn flicks, as an aesthetically, thematically, and technically revolutionary work that is more than just a mere masturbation aid for dudes that dig big dongs. While the film certainly has its hedonistic elements (after all, the director has admitted that he was heavily influenced by recreational drug use at the time of making the work, with some critics have even jokingly calling the film 'Boys on the Grass'), aesthetically speaking, Poole's film is certainly a piece of Apollonian art, especially when compared to the decidedly dark and deranged Dionysian works of Fred Halsted (LA Plays Itself, Sextool) and French artsploitation auteur/pornographer Jacques Scandelari (Beyond Love and Evil, New York City Inferno). American porn producer/auteur Jack Deveau would later direct a film in a similar aesthetic vein entitled Strictly Forbidden (1976) aka Le musée about a young American tourist that finds himself trapped in a museum exhibit during after-hours where the statues and sculptures come alive at night and cum on the young yank lad's face. Additionally, the heterosexual hardcore flick Visions (1977) would also borrow from Poole's film by being partly set in a phantasmagorical netherworld featuring giant genitals and phantasm fuckers. Indeed, if National Socialist sculptor Arno Breker had been a gay pornographer, his films would probably resemble Poole's, as Bijou glorifies the male physical in a classical fashion just as much (if not more so) as it focuses of pre-AIDS bareback buggery. Of course, as a southern-bred boy with a background in theater, dancing, and choreography, Poole had a more 'traditional' view of aesthetics, which is quite apparent in a film like his second feature where he attempted to make cocksucking into a highly poetic and lyrical art. Notably, one of the 'performers' in the film, Bill Cable—a good friend of Marlon Brando's murderous son who later appeared in small roles in films like Pee-wee's Big Adventure (1985) and Elvira: Mistress of the Dark (1988) as cops—was heterosexual (he died in a motorcycle in 1998 at age 51) and the director merely utilized him as a human statue of sorts (indeed, he does not actually engage in the gay orgy, but instead wraps a rope around the protagonist's head and stares menacingly). Interestingly but not surprisingly, the director attempted to go mainstream with his next effort Wakefield Poole's Bible (1973), which is neither gay nor pornographic and features three chapters based on Old Testament stories about female Biblical figures, with 'popular' female porn star Georgina Spelvin (The Devil in Miss Jones, Police Academy) playing one of the lead roles. Shot mostly in the director's apartment with all of the special effects done through the camera, Poole's transcendental masterpiece of atmospheric androphilia and erotic masculinity is indisputable proof that you do need that many resources to create an entire cinematic universe. If you ever thought about wondered what a psychedelic musical as imagined by the Village People might be like, but think the band's banal music is banal (Poole's film features a great ambient and ethereal score), Bijou features that and much more as a rather rare example of a crossover avant-garde colon-choker fuck flick.

Patricia Harrington (2007)

One thing about me, I love "When Animals Attack!" films. There isn't nothing I like more than watching a stupid teenage whore spray No-Tear baby shampoo in a giant python's eyes. When I saw the various posters for Razortooth, I expected this to be a shitty film, albeit a grand one with misplaced scenes of action. A film that I can take to get together's and laugh out loud about. Boy, was i wrong. Despite the amazing covers, this film is rotten. When the opening credits rolled through, I saw the directors name was Patricia. This horrified me for some inexplicable reason. Patricia is a name that gives me great grief. It singularly solidifies the fact that women are spawn to god awful names. In the beginning of the film, we have a couple of escaped convicts escaping jail. How quaint. This duo in terror slip by a police scouting unit that eventually is all slaughtered by a giant piranha-eel hybrid that looks fucking stupid. The funny thing about this is, the monster doesn't eat them. What kind of creature kills for sport besides an Alien bounty hunter? We then see the main character; some pompous asshole animal control worker who stares at a wedding ring laying on the counter in front of a wedding picture. I wouldn't have guessed, but due to the somber effect of the heartfelt music, my guess was that he had split with her. After hiding his anguish by playing the harmonica (Blues stereotype), he sets out to be annoying around town, playing the harmonica. After 5 minutes of him playing it, I wanted to reach through the screen and shove it up his ass. We meet his ex-wife, the only attractive female in the film, and she is the Sheriff. The entire film plays off on local fears of having an exotic creature ruining the cycle of life in a small country town. A similar incident happened very close to where I live. Creatures called "Snakeheads" were running around on land, eating all the fish and disrupting the order of balance. This film, being based on the swamp, is lush with type-casting, such as the pregnant trailer park beauty queens and the sickeningly obese chicken obsessed redneck who farts and giggles. About 1 hour and 10 minutes through the film, I literally felt sickened. I developed a high fever and had to sleep it off. This similar experience is what became of me after viewing Mondo Collecto. I think I am allergic to horrible displays of cinematic trauma. At about 1 hour and 20 minutes in, I passed out asleep in the living room. I woke up, not viewing the ending, but I can honestly say that I am glad I missed it. Perhaps I could have been one of the many fatalities displayed in this movie. Razortooth is god-awful.

THE WOMAN WHO POWDERS HERSELF

Patrick Bokanowski (1972)

Art Fags beware! You're in for a surrealist scare! La Femme qui se poudre (The Woman Who Powders Herself) is a short film that has been no doubt neglected just as the maker of the film Patrick Bokanowski. Despite his Polack sounding name, Patrick Bokanowski is a French filmmaker obviously following in the footsteps of France's greatest filmmaker/poet Jean Cocteau. Like Cocteau, Bokanowski is able to say something through visuals that the human mind could otherwise never articulate. Like all good poetry, The Woman Who Powders Herself is best looked at without trying to intellectualize and overanalyze. With a short film like this, one should just let the beauty seep into ones soul.

As a child I used to go to a certain unnamed life-saving museum on the east coast. At the museum there is an attraction know as laughing Sal, the former automaton Queen of a boardwalk Funhouse. Unlike most children, I was not afraid of Sal. I actually hoped her grotesque large manmade body would come to life and scare other vulnerable children. But alas, that never happened, but I also never forgot about laughing Sal. As soon as the screen faded to the first image of The Woman Who Powders Herself, I felt as if I was reunited with Sal, in all her beyond homely glory. Like my recollection of laughing Sal, the short film has the feeling of a vague yet soul piercing dream.

The score featured in The Woman Who Powders Herself sounds like it was created by a schizophrenic folly artist. The score (if you can even call it that) compliments the film in a way that very few other films have been successful with. To put it very simply, The Woman Who Powers Herself has neither linear story nor linear sound but a collection of perfectly collected broken pieces that could have been found in Jean Cocteau's own personal hell (although I believe Cocteau's hell would feature a man powdering his face). A truly complete piece of cinematic art should always (well almost always) have it's own original score. Although I consider myself a fan of Luis Buñuel's Un chien andalou and Aryan genius composer Richard Wagner, the short would have been more of masterpiece had the whole film been of 100% original material.

It is fairly hard to tell whether or not The Woman Who Powders Herself had an influence on any other artists, but for a work of it's originality and artistry, it had to influence someone. Before he was a hack, it seems that Begotten director E. Elias Merhige took a note or two from The Woman Who Powders Herself. People wearing featureless masks is always a good way to creep out filmgoers, especially in gritty black/white films. Lets not forget the particular dark liquid featured on the floor in The Woman Who Powders Herself that looked like a similar liquid (and with a similar shot composition) as god kills himself in Begotten. The difference between both films is that The Woman Who Powders Herself was at the right runtime at around 15 minutes whereas Begotten was an hour too long. I also wonder in Douglas P. alpha-neo-folk group Death In June saw The Woman Who Powder Herself and decided to wear a featureless mask with his German camouflage outfit.

Some people have said The Woman Who Powders Herself is a commentary on the idea of female beauty in the Victorian era. Although I do not deny this assertion, I could really care less. For me, The Woman Who Powders Herself is a somewhat modern day phantasmagoria that I can enjoy in the comfort of my living room. Very few films transfer me to a dream world of such extravagance and of such a fantastic nature. The Woman Who Powders Herself will stay in my mind's eye just the way that Eraserhead, The Blood of a Poet, Begotten (the first 15 minutes of course), Fireworks, and Meshes of the Afternoon have been burnt there.

MASCARA

Patrick Conrad (1987)

A totally thrilling and theatric tragicomedic tale about tyrannical brothers, torn and tormented sisters, tranny temptresses, heroically heterosexual French dress designers, unsubtly sexually aberrant S&M debauchery, heavily implied incest, and the grand tradition of classical opera and the Grand Guignol, the Belgian-Dutch-French co-production Mascara (1987) directed by Belgian auteur Patrick Conrad is as big-budget as curiously campy European arthouse sleaze works come as an ill-fated (both critically and commercially) film that is hopelessly screaming – like a hysterical queen suffering from benzo-withdraw while reminiscing over his/her favorite over-touchy-feely uncle – for a cult following it has, quite inexplicitly, yet to acquire. In the rich cinematic tradition of high-camp auteur filmmakers like Jean Cocteau, Luchino Visconti, Liliana Cavani, Werner Schroeter, and Agustí Villaronga, yet daringly disguised as a Hollywood psychosexual thriller with the intention of making it palatable for the philistine masses, Mascara ultimately proved to be too patently perverse and morally dubious for the average filmgoer, hence why it was a total failure at the box offices. Even so, the film still manages to put subsequent commercially successful transsexual thrillers like The Silence of the Lambs (1991) and The Crying Game (1992) to shame in its sometimes sardonic sensuality, conspicuous yet cabalistic cloven-footed camp consciousness, and strikingly erotic and anti-erotic absurdity, but it seems only a select few have had the honor of viewing this super 'sleeper' of cinema. Imagine Jean-Pierre Melville's 1950 cinematic adaptation of Jean Cocteau's novel Les Enfants Terribles except more penetratingly perverse, meets Cocteau's Orpheus (1950) aka Orphée where many of the character's genders are reversed (if not altogether ambiguous) and set in an underground opera house from hermaphrodite Hades akin to Monika Treut and Elfi Mikesch's Sacher-Masoch-esque realm of the sadistically sexually unchaste in Seduction: The Cruel Woman (1985), but exquisitely executed in such a torridly tongue-in-cheek style that one would never describe it as 'art,' at least with a straight face, and you have Mascara; a soundly sordid sin-saluting and eccentrically entertaining cinematic work where erratic erotomaniacs, delirious deviants, and the psychotically sexually confused are in the majority and the sexually sane are a sad underwhelming minority. That being said, whether one likes Mascara or not, I doubt any viewer of the film will ever forget the scenes featuring otherworldly netherworld 'Mister Butterfly'; a place lethally lurid operatic nightmare factory of fetishism and foul flesh where sex and violence go together like razorblades and cyanide. A near perfect work of titillating and terrorizing trash entertainment for refined cinephiles (or just a plain masterpiece for the trash-inclined), Mascara is a rare reminder that severely sleazy cinema can, in fact, be startlingly sophisticated with the sort of subversive aristocrat cinematic class that 'perfect Wagnerite' Ludwig II of Bavaria and camp horror writer-poet Count Eric Stanislaus Stenbock would have surely appreciated.

Literally almost struck (via car) by fleeting love in the form of a only slightly-loony lady of class and sass named Gaby Hart (Charlotte Rampling), Chris Brine (Derek de Lint) – a surprisingly stoic and certifiably sane French costume designer – has no idea that he is about to become the pawn of a prominent and sexually perverted police commissioner; the ambiguous lifelong lover and brother of the special lady that will sweep away the dandy dressmaker's hearty heart. An aesthetically and sexually insane cinematic work featuring male femme fatales, corrupt cops who love ladies with cocks, esoteric S&M opera, and mysterious shemale deaths in a rather ridiculous realm where semen-demon-eats-semen-demen, Mascara is nothing short of Orpheus from ominous yet ostensibly orgasmic homo hell. A crazy cunt of a cop named Bert Sanders (Michael Sarrazin) – who according to his own sister, derived his fanatical love of opera as a baby whilst suckling on their culturally refined mother's nipple – loves his all-seeing/knowing/corrupting power as a perverted police commissioner, but not as much as his love for his widowed sister Gaby and shemales singing "Salome" by Richard Strauss. As the sort of slick sociopathic lawman of lunacy you would expect to find in David Lynch's Blue Velvet (1986), except all the more aberrant and unabashedly arrogant, Bert uses his power to cover-up crimes, as well as his erratically exotic extra-extracurricular activities, but also to keep tabs on his sister's gentlemen callers. Needless to say, when Gaby starts fornicating with Frenchman Chris, the police officer decides his sister's boyfriend must go, but not before using the froggy costume-designer to special tailor a dress (that literally drives the already-crazy cop absolutely mad) for his favorite tranny opera singers at his favorite underground opera house Mister Butterfly; a hyper-hedonistic hellfire of heretical homos where powerful crypto-perverts and nefariously narcissistic high-class lady-dudes with tits and female asses 'go bump in the night.' When the star queen shemale of the Satanic surrealist S&M show is violently strangled to death one fateful night, Bert naturally attempts to implicate Chris – the man who designed the decadent dress – for the murder, thus forcing Gaby to decide whether she will defend her lover or loyally support her bat-shit crazy bro's conspiratorial plans. Apparently not the first time Bert butchered one of her love affairs, Gaby – a single mother whose husband died mysteriously a couple years before – is rather weary of starting a serious romantic relationship, thereupon sending mixed messages to Chris despite her unwavering love for the charming dressmaker. A sexually confused psychopath whose cunning yet corny charm is only rivaled by his fervently flaming freak-outs that are especially triggered by Chris' sparkly and shimmering dress, Bert would make for a standout case study for Psychopathia Sexualis (1886) as a character fit for an early John Waters, but played in an almost 'surrealistically' straight fashion that eclipses Christian Bale's stoic yet too severely satirical performance in American Psycho (2000). Like any great work of killer camp cinema, one finds themselves subconsciously rooting for berserk bad boy Bert, even if one knows it will not be long before his perverse proclivity for chicks with dicks will get the better of him.

Mascara indubitably proved to be catastrophic for director Patrick Conrad's career in filmmaking as he would never direct a film again after his delightfully degrading big budget crypto-tribute to Cocteau. Interestingly, Mascara does the opposite of the classic camp subgenre of 'Grande Dame Guignol' in casting a middle-aged (not quite elderly, but surely past her prime!) Charlotte Rampling (Tis Pity She's a Whore, Stardust Memories) – an actress quite well known for playing a number of pathologically perverse and psychosexually disturbed roles throughout her career as a determined diva of decadence, including playing a concentration camp sex slave who senselessly swoons over a SS officer BDSM-style in Liliana Cavani's The Night Porter (1974) and even falling in love with a chimpanzee in Nagisa Oshima's Max mon amour (1986) aka Max, My Love – in a relatively 'normal' role as a sad yet sensible woman whose emotionally debilitating personal problems stem from her uniquely unhinged brothers' incestuous love for her. Of course, Rampling's ostensibly against-type performance in Mascara is not the only thing marvelously mixed-up about Mascara, as the comprehensibly camp conscious cinematic affair maliciously molests the sexually aberrant aesthetic sensibility to the point where the audio-visually ravished viewer begs for more, but, unfortunately, at least as far as I know, no other film does what Belgian auteur Patrick Conrad's film does; homogenizing high and low kitsch in killer thriller form. Although Michael Sarrazin is generally best known for his performance in They Shoot Horses, Don't They? (1969) directed by Sydney Pollack, I will always remember him as the loveable lonely lunatic in Mascara; a film that gave the Canadian actor the opportunity to make-up (with literal make-up) for his missed career-changing opportunity (Sarrazin was originally cast for the role but was unable to go through with it due to a prior contract) to play gay-for-pay cowboy Joe Buck in Midnight Cowboy (1969). Unfortunately, while Midnight Cowboy went on to be the first and only X-rated film to win "Best Picture" at the Academy Awards, Mascara is not even popular enough to warrant an actual DVD release, but I guess that is what one should expect from the only film that has done the seemingly impossible by aesthetically reconciling the high-camp decadence of Werner Schroeter's Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972) aka The Death of Maria Malibran with the salacious slasher sodomy and bloody homo-cidal brutality of William Friedkin's Cruising (1980).

Patrick Longchamps (1974)

Without question, the Italian work Simona (1974) directed by Patrick Longchamps is the best film ever created based on the writings of French transgressive author Georges Bataille. Forget the pompously putrid performance art documentaries (Visions of Excess, The Monster in the Night of the Labyrinth) starring HIV-positive homo-sadomasochist Ron Athey and Andrew Repasky McElhinney's obscenely degenerate porn flick Story of the Eye (2004), Simona is the only film based on the work of Bataille that deserves to be mentioned in the same sentence with the unabashedly decadent French author. Simona is based on Bataille's 1928 novella Story of the Eye and like the book, the film manages to do the seemingly impossible by successfully combining art with eroticism for a most savory feast of sensual aesthetic overload. Thankfully, Simona is not a mere rehashing of Bataille's book but a work that uses the original story as a sturdy skeleton for its many exquisite vignettes and delectable erotic scenarios. Simona is a cumming-of-age story about a beautiful and luscious lady named Simona (played by Italian goddess/actress Laura Antonelli) who generously carries along a young and naïve man-muse named George and uses him as a she-devil's plaything. Simona and George mischievously romp around the countryside, using everything from dairy products to clergymen as unconventional sex toys. Along the way, the twosome turns into a threesome when they virtually kidnap a cute but somewhat reluctant blonde girl. Although featuring deviant sex and nonstop full-frontal nudity throughout, Simona is a rare work of cinematic eroticism with class and without compromise that is guaranteed to titillate and tantalize the coldest of puritan prudes.

Near the beginning of Simona, the leading lady lets her boy toy know that, "milk is for the pussy" and, naturally, she acts accordingly, cooling herself off by sitting panty-less in a pleasant plate of delicious liquid dairy. Simona is certainly a committed proponent of body-wetness as she also finds the ocean to be a grand place for sexual exposure and team-based body ravagement. Some of the most breathtaking scenes featured in Simona are of a seaweed-heavy sex-triad on the beach. Taking cues from Nicholas Roeg (his collaborator Donald Cammell would later re-edit an English language version of the film that was never released), Simona features abstract and non-linear editing throughout, jumping back-and-forth from vulgar yet voluptuous scene-to-scene. Thus, due to the film's consistently erratic editing and always engrossing scenes, Simona proves to be an unflinchingly enthralling experience throughout. Like Bataille's novella, Simona truly has the feel of a person recalling their precious, pheromone-heavy memories. Thankfully, Simona manages to "cut the fat" when it comes to recalling the most penetrating and stimulating of her infamous personal history. Whether it to be her valiant attempt to seduce a pussy priest with her pussy or life-shattering personal tragedy, not a dull moment is stored in the beautiful lady's beautiful mind.

Generally, when watching erotic Euro-sleaze flicks from the 1970s and 1980s, I am somewhat repelled by the domineering hippie "free love" atmosphere. Simona is different in that it has a timeless quality that fails to reek of pot smoke and venereal diseases. Featuring Baroque architecture and nude live-human-statues, the film is also a somewhat clever and tasteful erotic mockery of the Roman Catholic Church. Unsurprisingly, the film concludes with the quote, "...you can be Saints, either in a religious sense, or in an erotic sense" by Italian novelist Alberto Moravia. Indeed, Simona has an almost religious and spiritual tone to it, as if it is a perfect therapeutic response to the sexual repression caused by the Catholic Church. I consider it nothing less than the phenomenon of synchronicity that I happened to be reading Romanian philosopher E.M. Cioran's early work Tears and Saints during the same time as my viewing of the film. Simona is blasphemy gone beautiful; a meritorious trait indubitably shared by source-writer Bataille.

MY BLOODY VALENTINE 3D

Patrick Lussier (2009)

One of my many pet peeves: When someone expresses distaste for a theater experience and groans "I'll just wait till it's released on DVD..." pertaining to admission prices. Seeing how rental prices are on average $5 or below and DVD's, brand new, are around $18, this assessment is brash and naive in nature. Sure, dramas aren't necessarily known for their impact on a 25 foot screen but horror films and action all owe their allegiance to the mighty screen. My Bloody Valentine 3D is a film that you either see in theaters or you don't see at all. It's that simple. Stemming from the original's plot line, My Bloody Valentine 3D divvies up the gore, storyline, and characters and tweaks each category as seen fit. The violence is elevated to an extreme level, the ending is altered to better fit the "bubble-gum" psycho-horror that is popularly seen today, and the characters are given that teen heartthrob makeover with their stunning eyes, less-is-more makeup appliance, and that flippy cow licked hair that's making a stylish comeback; We'll be seeing no more of those bushy 80s teenagers anymore. Good riddance. That is, unless Rob Zombie attempts to continue his "American" series ending with The Devil's Rejects. For the optimal 3D experience, the closer you sit to the screen, the more "penetrating" the optical effects will be. In regards to this film, My Bloody Valentine was destined for greatness in stunning 3D. The pickaxe is the prime weapon of choice to glorify with eye-popping visuals. The dimensions of the weapon allow for it to appear menacing off screen rather than a flat machete or an equally less impressive weapon. The pickaxe is also put to great use in this film, allowing for postmortem abortions, ripping out rib cage's, severing torso's, plucking out people's jaw's, and many other uses. My Bloody Valentine is as bloody as advertised with a special treatment of depth to man made body cavities. The original My Bloody Valentine has been christened "low budget charm" by pretty teenage girls but I find everything but charm in the collected product. The unforgiving dialogue, the tedious build up of suspense, the lack of usage of the pivotal miner; All these work against it. Underusing the intimidating Miner character is like putting a birthday cake in Jason Voorhees' hands. It's taking something good and befouling it with childish play things. The 3D remake is a step up from the original in near every way and even goes as far as to deconstruct the slasher genre and piece it together properly for the modern youth generation. In the state of a horror depression where every other film is a remake of some obscure Japanese tale or some feminist ghost activity followed by monotonous Saw sequels, a film that's designed for fast, flying violent fun is greeted with open arms as we cast a scornful eye over our shoulders, blaming Hollywood for killing one of the most popular genres with fluff. Thanks to the 3D format, the film has many foregrounds to focus on. Everything looks good in 3D, it's proven effortlessly except for films like Journey to the Center of the Earth. I've heard only rumors of that travesty. From the riveting opening title sequence down to scenes of dialogue, the depth of the shots provides for a filling cinematic experience. This is an experience to herald and consummate with. Once I had strewn the formula of My Bloody Valentine 3D around and analyzed each part, your assumptions may be right. It may be new-wave horror and ultraviolent, it may have wily teenage humor and cliché plot twists, and it may have the flaws of the original going against it but with 3D on its side, My Bloody Valentine 3D is one of the more captivating theater experiences and deserves a go for being so.

DRIVE ANGRY 3D

Patrick Lussier (2011)

Two days ago, I had the pleasure of going to witness the rated R glory of Drive Angry in full 3D. You know, that latest gimmick that Hollywood has already done beat to death. Patrick Lussier came straight out of the box office from the 3D remake of My Bloody Valentine and hopped into the affable Drive Angry with Nicolas Cage attached to star. Now, although the 3D industry is largely based around tacky effects and the obligatory screen-busting props that fly out over yonder, Drive Angry does seem to be the film to see in 3D, what, with breasts bouncing and bullets flying and the general "fuck you" attitude smeared on the specialty screen installed. This brings me to the life force of Drive Angry and you might be pained to admit it; Nicolas Cage. Drive Angry couldn't have possibly been anything without Hollywood's least favorite and greatest character actor. Take Cage's performance in Deadfall for example. Eddie was the reason to see the film, hell, I still haven't seen the film. I just wooed YouTube into letting me watch Nicolas Cage's performances only, sparing myself the semblance of an atrocious plot and script worshipping a cast iron deity in the form of Eddie.

Stopping myself before I go too far out on a tangent, Drive Angry boasts a simple and delectable plot. Milton has escaped from hell and is seeking out his infant granddaughter before a satanic cult can sacrifice her to bring about the apocalypse. Realistically speaking, when I heard this storyline I simply assumed it was the sequel to Ghost Rider. Don't both hold foundations in hell and escaping the clutches of that ever-exaggerated Satan while speeding away in a vehicle of sorts? Another placeholder that Drive Angry touts for an encore is the immature and altogether disgusting sense of humor employed. Immediately following a fist, Amber Heard mocks her bald, butch fiancé by threatening to snitch on his secret love affair with her own dildo. Drive Angry is what I hope the second Ghost Rider film will model after and my wishes might be grounded in a more serene reality as the project is being helmed by Neveldine/Taylor, the fine folks behind the ludicrous and unappreciated Crank: High Voltage. If they can take the dormant brilliance of Cage and unleash it in a current of hell-bent violence and soul-punishing angst then we might just be looking at another comic classic to go right alongside Punisher: War Zone.

Drive Angry does have its crime of error about it; most cases can be blamed on the format of 3D itself. While My Bloody Valentine featured those pivotal scenes of "visceral towards camera = shocking" you've got to remember that film was the first horror film to be shot in 3D so the shtick was of brainstorming brilliance, at least to the heads of Lionsgate. In Drive Angry, it is almost bothersome to see skulls and fragments and debris fly at you. Which again, problem of the format ergo Drive Angry can sustain its luster. Not for long though, which leads me to the biggest inconsistency of Drive Angry; the awful, awful special effects. For a film of this caliber and budget, you'd assume one would polish up the digital animated sequences of vehicular demolition enough to the point of shameless presentation. Again, you'd be wrong. A scene in example is when the incredible William Fichtner, as the Accountant, commandeers a hydrogen truck and laughably walks out of the cab onto the hood of an attached police car in a scene that seems all too familiar. Oh, that's right. It looks familiar because that very same effect was used in Bruce Willis' RED. Not only that, the tanker flips over two cars horizontally while Nicolas Cage speeds underneath it which recalls the same stunt used in, yet again, Bruce Willis' Live Free or Die Hard. Only this time the effect looks as if it was utilizing stop-motion animation. To give credit where credit is due; at least they have great choices of action inspiration.

The icing on the cake is without a doubt in my mind the glorious car chase sequences. There certainly is something deeply erotic hidden in the loud rumbling of a '69 Charger but I couldn't place an origin on it. With this sexuality in queue, Drive Angry goes the full mile with a gunfight during a sex scene, ridiculous and very Last Man Standing-ish. Patrick Lussier has come a long way from straight to video horror sequels when you look it at from a certain vantage. When a film like this comes around, you are, for sure, in for a treat of escapism to marvel at. By definition, Drive Angry has all the makings of an enjoyable ride: David Morse, Nicolas Cage, cinematic nihilism, and a broad spectrum of rude, crude, and lewd comments to appease the brat in us all. It is simply unfair that Amber Heard didn't disrobe before us. For some odd reason, since she has revealed to the paparazzi that she is in fact a dyke, no nude scenes have been written in her films since 2008's The Informers. It is either a strange rite of respect or the fallacy of common courtesy. I can't discern the difference, can you? Oh, and did I mention there's a brief scene of irrumatio?

PRIVATE PARTS

Paul Bartel (1972)

Poor Paul Bartel. Imagine if you directed an excellent exploitation flick deserving of instant cult status that was buried by a studio and rarely seen, then a degenerate yet exceedingly popular Hebraic shock-jock horndog like Howard Stern comes along and creates a film with the same exact name a couple decades later, thus guaranteeing the film's permanent obscurity. Indeed, Private Parts (1972) is the debut feature of Bartel and unlike Stern's 1997 biopic of the same, it is wickedly funny and pleasantly perverse. Sort of like a compulsively campy mutation of Psycho (1960) featuring hagsploitation elements as if directed by the son of Curtis Harrington, Bartel's quasi-slasher flick is far too sophisticated for gorehounds yet too raunchy and perverse for the sort of bourgeois cinephiles who delicately diddle themselves to the artwork of the last Criterion Collection release. Made at a time when obnoxious bull-dykes did not have their own hit talk shows, parents would beat their sons if they decided to dress like girls, before tranny freaks and other sexual invalids associated with the authoritarian aberrosexual LGBT movements did not start throwing out smear words against heterosexuals like 'cisgender' and 'heteronormativity,' and—arguably most importantly—when fags still knew how to make fun of themselves, Private Parts is a masterpiece of cinematic homo self-exploitation that demonstrates that gays indeed had an important place in this world when gay-bashing was still somewhat vogue. Undoubtedly Bartel's most primitive and graphic work (indeed, the film features genitals as advertised), the film is partly a satire of the counter-culture era that features, among other things, a murderous woman who thinks she's a man that looks like Lou Reed, as well as an old bitchy puritanical hag who helps said loony Lou Reed look-a-like slaughter worthless hippie degenerates. Sort of like Blood Feast (1963) meets Chelsea Girls (1966), Private Parts is the tastefully trashy story of a 16-year-old teenage girl who moves in with her reclusive bull-dyke-like hotelier aunt who runs a rundown hotel inhabited by senile old cranks, gay closeted middle-aged reverends who live second lives as leather-fags, and a cock-less female-to-male tranny of the majorly murderous sort whose idea of a sexual climax is injecting her blood into a water-filled blowup doll. Featuring auteur Bartel during his more 'svelte' period in a Hitchcockian cameo as a man having anonymous sex in a public park, Private Parts is a rare 'psychotronic' work possessing both wit and intellect that demonstrates that horror and exploitation hacks have no excuse for directing mundane and/or mindless cinematic twaddle, as one can make a perfectly perverse film with a bit of sophistication. Opening with a marvelous montage featuring various nudes set against a pitch black background, Private Parts immediately sets a titillating tone of quasi-campy sex and violence of the postmodern Hitchcockian (emphasis on the cock!) sort.

After her less than homely bitch of a roommate Judy (Ann Gibbs) catches her playing 'peeping tom' (aka she sees her screw some nerdy hippie), 16-year-old Cheryl Stratton (Ayn Ruymen)—a petite little lady that might suffer from a mild cause of autism—is forced to seek shelter elsewhere, thus she decides to head to a rundown hotel owned and operated by her eccentric estranged Aunt Martha (Lucille Benson). Upon arriving at the hotel, Aunt Martha, who seems like a repressed bull-dyke, is somewhat hostile, but finally agrees that she can stay under one condition: "that you promise not to wander around the hotel alone. This is no place for a little girl." Indeed, as a place inhabited by a gay religious leader named Mr. Moon (Laurie Main), who moonlights as a leather-fag despite being well into his 50s and has young twink hustlers sent to his room that he refuses to pay, and sundry women with varying degrees of dementia, Judy sticks out like a sore spade thumb. When Cheryl's bitchy ex-roommate's boy toy stops by to see Cheryl for dubious reasons, he finds himself decapitated by a mysterious slasher killer, with his headless corpse being thrown in an incinerator. Upon asking Aunt Martha about her blood uncle Orville and Cousin Alice, who is supposed to be twice her age, Cheryl gets some rather strange answers. While Aunt Martha states that Orville, "passed on several years ago, age of 73," she is slightly more ambiguous regarding Alice, stating, "I guess you'd say she's in the Lord's hands." Meanwhile, Cheryl learns that there is a reclusive photographer that lives at the hotel named George (John Ventantonio), who has turned one of the hotel rooms into a makeshift darkroom and only leaves his room at night. When Cheryl's intolerable bitch ex-roommate shows up at the hotel, Aunt Martha lures her to George's darkroom where she is assumedly slaughtered.

In what ultimately evolves into a non-romantic subplot, Cheryl meets a young man named Jeff (Stanley Livingston) at a locksmith store while getting a key made and the young man asks her to go on a date with him to a rock concert, which she agrees to do. Towards the last 30 minutes or so of Private Parts, the mysterious seeming homo George begins making regular appearances at night. While lurking near a park, a random man remarks to George, who looks like Hebraic proto-hipster Lou Reed, that, "Goddamn hippies, they're taking over this country. It's shameful! Ain't got no morals at all! All these young gals doing it left and right. They don't care. And there's nothing they won't do. You know what I mean?" The guy also says, "Goddamn weirdoes are taking over this country" and he must be right as George soon begins snapping photos of people having sex out in the open in a public park, with auteur Paul Bartel being one of the perverts. When George gets home from his naughty night in the park, Aunt Martha confronts him regarding an apparent obsession he has with Cheryl, telling him she has devoted her life to "helping him....overcome flesh," to which he emotionally replies, "you've helped ruin my life. You robbed me of a normal childhood and now you're trying to rob me of whatever little pleasures I can still enjoy...I'm a human being and I need human contact. Now." And, indeed, in his own wayward way, George attempts human contact with Cheryl by leaving her some fetishistic clothing (i.e. stockings, large gloves, etc.) on her bed with a note reading: "you would drive me crazy if you'd let me see you with these things on." Determined to prove she is a grown woman and not the annoying naïve little girl that she is, Cheryl puts on the stockings and gloves (which leaves her breasts, bush, and butt bare) and takes a bubble bath, which peeping tom George watches via a hidden hole in the wall Norman Bates style. After getting rather aroused by Cheryl's less than titillating performance, George 'has sex' the only way he knows how by injecting his blood into a translucent blowup doll. Indeed, instead of injecting the doll with his DNA the normal way by merely ejaculating in it with his prick, George uses a needle as a pseudo-penis and blood as his semen.

While Aunt Martha attempts to save Cheryl from the patently perverted photographer by kicking her out of the hotel, George calls the teen that night and she confesses to him that she likes him because he is the only one that doesn't treat her like a "little girl." That same night, Jeff picks up Cheryl for their planned date to the rock show, but she becomes angry after he asks her about her missing cousin Alice. Indeed, after Jeff mentions that Alice disappeared around the time she began hanging out with George, stupid little girl Cheryl becomes enraged at him for besmirching her prospective beau and heads back to the hotel. Upon arriving back at the hotel, Cheryl is warned by Aunt Martha that she has booked her a bus ticket for the next morning to Chicago and that she, "won't have whores and painted women in my house." When Jeff goes back to the hotel looking for Alice, he is knocked unconscious with a large glass bottle. Meanwhile, Cheryl meets George in his rather bizarrely decorated room and the two begin a photo session. Of course, things become rather strange for Cheryl when George boy attempts to inject her with his blood. During a struggle, George is killed after a large light stand falls on him, and when Aunt Martha storms into the room afterwards, Cheryl stereotypically cries rape. While Aunt Martha is fiddling with George's corpse, Cheryl realizes that the recently deceased photographer has breasts and is really a woman. Indeed, Aunt Martha offers Cheryl the chance to also be her pseudo-son like George, stating, "You can stay here and take his place. You can be my son." Of course, Cheryl declines, so Aunt Martha attempts to stab her with a butcher knife. In the end, the police arrive and Jeff survives. When leaving the hotel of closet-homo horror, Jeff spots Cheryl, who has taken on the identity of the perniciously puritanical persona of her Aunt Martha, who she has killed, just like Norman Bates did with his momma.

Undoubtedly, in its depiction of a deranged serial killer of the sexually schizophrenic sort, Private Parts anticipates the teenage tranny slasher flick Sleepaway Camp (1983), but of course, Bartel's film is infinitely more sophisticated as a work that updates Hitchcock's Psycho for the counter-culture age. One of the most interesting aspects of the film is that the most demented slasher killer in the film is a repressed bull-dyke who is so out of touch with her own sexuality that she accuses her own female relatives of being wanton whores and even attempts to turn them into men. Indeed, on top of confessing that she had to be artificially inseminated to have her daughter Alicia, Aunt Martha states to Cheryl regarding why she did not have a child with her actual husband, "Not Orville, just me. He was too old. We went to a doctor and worked it out another way. Didn't need Orville." Indeed, if the outmoded and pathetically played-out horror genre needs anything, it is more films where the monster is a crazed carpet-muncher who is murderously hungry for the taste of a creamy, young cuntlet. Unquestionably a lost masterpiece as far as campy quasi-exploitation films are concerned, Private Parts is just another example as to why auteur Paul Bartel is one of the most underrated and overlooked filmmakers of his generation, as a sort of Curtis Harrington of his zeitgeist. Indeed, it seems that only exceedingly effete cock-sucking camp filmmakers like Harrington and Bartel had what it took to deal with directing boorish old fat cows.

EATING RAOUL

Paul Bartel (1982)

When it comes to cinematic camp, I can rarely stand the intentional lowbrow and largely cartoonish camp exploitation 'auteur' filmmakers like Russ Meyer and Herschell Gordon Lewis. Indeed, the closest I can get to appreciating such proudly degenerate drivel is the films of actor and sometimes auteur Paul Bartel (Death Race 2000, Lust in the Dust), who was certainly a marvelous iconoclast and cinematic satirist that was just far too witty and subversive for the mainstream, hence the relative obscurity of most of his films today, especially when compared to the work of Meyer and even Lewis. Indeed, compared to Meyer and Lewis, Bartel also had much more testicular fortitude as a sort of less conservative west coast Paul Morrissey with no qualms about attacking the left and the counter-culture movement, with what is arguably his magnum opus, Eating Raoul (1982), being a sardonic satire of sexual liberation in Hollywood where an eccentric and slightly snobbish married couple begins luring in and slaughtering bourgeois swingers so they can steal their money in the hope of realizing their dream of opening a restaurant. Co-written by Richard Blackburn, who also acted as associate producer/quasi-co-director and previously directed the criminally underrated lesbian Lovecraftian vampire flick Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973), Eating Raoul is a wonderfully wicked buffet of libertine laughs and lunacy that is marinated in a sort of rather refined elegance and sophisticated cynicism that reminds one why auteur Bartel was probably one of the most passive-aggressive misanthropes that has ever worked in film. Starring Bartel and lapsed Warhol superstar Mary Woronov (Chelsea Girls, Silent Night, Bloody Night), who starred alongside one another previously in a number of films (in fact, they would later reprise their roles from Eating Raoul in the 1986 cult horror-sci-fi flick Chopping Mall), in the lead roles with the sort of quirky chemistry that one could expect from an effete middle-aged fag and a seasoned fag hag, the film may not be art but there is certainly an artfulness to its audacious comedy. Featuring the sort of eclectic perverts that one would expect to see in an early John Waters film and set in a Hollywood quasi-Sodom where rape is even more common than theft in a work that alludes to the cannibalization of a Mexican mensch, Eating Raoul is a "comedy of murders" that allows the viewer to safely revel in the serial killing of various upper-middleclass degenerates from the comfort of their own home, thus the film also acts as a sort of scathing piece of cinematic therapy that may deter potential serial killers.

Opening with a narrator stating, "Hollywood, California, city of contrasts. Home to the rich and powerful...yet so popular with the broken and destitute. Here sex hunger is reflected in every aspect of daily life...and instant gratification is tirelessly pursued. A center of casual violence and capricious harassment...where rampant vice and amorality...permeate every strata of society...and the barrier between food and sex has totally dissolved. It is a known fact that prolonged exposure to just such a psychopathic environment...will eventually warp even the most normal and decent among us. This then is the story of Hollywood today. Not a pretty story, but presented here exactly as it happened" juxtaposed with images of attempted sexual pillaging and various other forms of post-sexual revolution degeneracy, Eating Raoul immediately establishes a tone that is nothing if not pleasantly politically incorrect. Protagonist Paul Bland (Paul Bartel) is a discernibly bland, if not cultivated, man who makes a pathetic living working as a liquor store clerk and who, while working one day, makes the absurd mistake of ordering a case of $400-a-bottle Château Lafite Rothschild wine from the store, which could not have happened at a worse time, as he needs $20,000 to realize his dream of opening a fancy country kitchen restaurant. Although seemingly sexless, if not downright latently homosexual, Paul is married to a nurse that has bigger balls than he does named Mary (Mary Woronov) and she has an even harder time suffering fools than her ambiguously impotent hubby does. When a hyper horny patient named Mr. Barker (John Shearin) attempts to get in Mary's granny panties at the hospital, the wickedly wise nurse gets him back by getting an ugly old hick-like fellow to give him a 'high colonic.' With their rent jacked up to an extra $175 a month and their apartment complex invaded by middle-aged swingers, Paul and Mary are not exactly in the highest of hopes.

After a couple degenerates attempt to rape Mary and Paul kills them with a frying pan, the couple comes up with the epiphany of luring sex perverts so they can kill and ultimately rob them. After all, as Paul complains, "People are pigs. How do they get away with it? Why should they live so well when good people like you and me get shafted?" so the married couple decides that it is their turn to do the shafting. After going to a single mother named "Donna the Dominatrix" (Susan Saiger) who has no problem talking about anything ranging from "golden showers" in front of her baby boy to advice about being a 'lady of the night,' the married couple places an ad in a local trash newspaper and Mary begins her marvelously murderous career of being a pseudo-dominatrix who accepts any sort of pervert, albeit for a hefty price. Indeed, Mary comes into contact with a pseudo-SS sadist who gets off to role-playing with concentration camp sex, an Aryan hippie rapist, an elderly midget cowboy with a large dog, and a proponent of paraphilic infantilism, among countless other patent perverts who Paul exterminates with a regular old kitchen frying pan.

After the couple unwittingly hires a young mestizo thief posing as a locksmith named Raoul Mendoza (played by real-life second-generation Mexican-American Robert Beltran), the married murderers turn into a threesome. Indeed, after breaking into Paul and Mary's place and discovering their dastardly deeds, Raoul offers to become their partners, as he plans to sell the corpses of their victims to a dog food company, thereupon making their serial killing business even more lucrative. Of course, Mary and Raoul eventually become lovers (Thai weed comes into play) and the latter conspires to kill Paul, as he wants the gringo's cash and naughty nurse wife. After Paul complains to Mary regarding Raoul, "Twice he tried to run me over...the rotten little beaner," the reasonably happily married murderer decides to take revenge against the Hispanic Don Juan by hiring a chick to pretend to be a nurse (as well as a blind nun and immigration agent) who coerces the pseudo-Latin lover to take an ostensible anti-venereal disease pill that ultimately makes him impotent. Of course, Raoul finally figures out that he has been fooled and pulls a gun on Paul, but Mary stands by her husband and whacks the whacked out Hispanic over the head with a frying pan, thus killing him. Forgetting that they have promised dinner to their realtor James (played by co-writer Richard Blackburn, who also played a porn addict obsessed with a magazine called "Nuns and Nazis"), Paul and Mary serve Raoul for dinner. In the end, the quasi-antiheroes get their restaurant. While eating Raoul, James states, "I hope you make this a permanent item on your menu...it's French," to which Mary replies, "No, it's Spanish."

Inspired by the classical cannibalistic serial killer antihero Sweeney Todd, as well as somewhat similarly themed films like the British black comedy The Ladykillers (1955) and François Truffaut's self-professed "favorite American film" The Honeymoon Killers (1969) directed by opera composer Leonard Kastle, Eating Raoul ultimately totally transcends its influences as a sort of Tinseltown take on the Grand Guignol that makes a mirthfully macabre mockery of everyone and everything, ranging from anally-retentive Château Lafite Rothschild snuffers to a lapsed Catholic Mexican professional thief with a special (and ultimately deadly) affinity for brown-on-white miscegenation. Featuring everything from auteur Paul Bartel killing over a dozen swingers by plunging an electric lantern into a hot tub to a Chicano conman proudly declaring, "I ain't no wetback" to a phony immigration agent, Eating Raoul is a rather idiosyncratic cinematic example of off-color comedy being channeled through a sort of venomous wit comparable to Oscar Wilde. Not surprisingly, a sequel to the film entitled Bland Ambition, which was written by the original writers (including Dick Blackburn, was scheduled for production, of which director Bartel described as, "[The film] starts with Paul and Mary Bland happily ensconced in their Country Kitchen, where they're doing a land-office business. The arrogant young Governor of California stops off to have lunch and is furious he is not recognized and permitted to jump the line. In retaliation, he sends a health inspector to close down the Country Kitchen, and Paul and Mary are encouraged by the media to retaliate in kind and run against him for Governor of California," but rather unfortunately, Vestron pulled the plug on the funding about 10 days before they were to begin shooting. Of course, the death of Bartel in 2000 at 61 from a heart attack guaranteed the sequel would never be made. Although described by auteur Bartel as follows, "I wanted to make a film about two greedy, uptight people who are at the same time not so unlike you and me and Nancy and Ronnie, to keep it funny and yet communicate something about the psychology and perversity of those values . . . My movie touches on many things: the perversion of middle class values, the resurgence of Nixonism, machismo versus WASP fastidiousness, film noir . . . ,” Eating Raoul ultimately seems like an assault on ‘Americanism’ in general, from the rich workaholics who only find solace in banging their best bud’s wife to small-time cholo crooks who may hate everything that old school white America stands for, but still want a piece of the rotten American pie. Of course, it is quite doubtful that a film like Eating Raoul could be made today, as it lacks ‘diversity’ and ‘racial sensitivity,’ among countless other intolerable things that people are suppose to tolerate nowadays, thereupon making it all the more interesting that it was directed by one of the most flagrantly effete and pathologically passive-aggressive ‘queen’ character actors in film history

SCENES FROM THE CLASS STRUGGLE IN BEVERLY HILLS

It might seem unlikely that a stupid American would direct a campy and sometimes racially insensitive remake of the French classic ‘comedy of manners’ The Rules of the Game (1939) aka La Règle du Jeu, but character actor/sometimes-auteur Paul Bartel (Eating Raoul, Death Race 2000) did such a bold and wonderfully cinematically sacrilegious thing for his almost criminally underrated mutation of Renoir’s masterpiece, Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills (1989). While I have yet to get around to seeing The Rules of the Game, I have seen enough of Renoir’s films to know that his anti-booboisie comedy of manners probably did not feature a dog performing cunnilingus on an ‘Uncle Tom’ negress or an East Asian gangster stating in broken English, “rabbits and Mexicans brains ain’t too big,” to a Mexican servant with an unhealthy gambling addiction. Indeed, like any cultivated celluloid comedy, Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills is equal demented doses of the radically raunchy and wonderfully witty, as a superlatively sardonic work of the decidedly darkly comedic sort that makes a major mockery of the now-old school Beverly Hills bourgeoisie. Although I had seen the film before, I recently decided to re-watch Bartel’s unsung masterpiece of merry misanthropy (indeed, after watching most of his films, I am convinced that the director absolutely hates everyone) after realizing it was co-penned by Bruce Wagner (who has a small cameo at the beginning), whose 5-hour-long brainchild Wild Palms (1993) I recently developed a rather strange addiction to. Of course, both Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills and Wild Palms do a rather relentless job reaming the stinking rich rectum of Los Angeles’ uniquely unlovable upper-class. On top of being a rare cultured American comedy featuring an all-star cast (including Bartel playing his typically effortlessly effete self), the film is also notable in that young star Rebecca Schaeffer was murdered just six weeks after the film was released by a crazed ½ Korean fan who had been stalking her for 3 years (indeed, had she pursued her original aspirations of being a rabbi, she might not be dead today). Indeed, practically specially tailored to be an instant cult classic, Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills is arguably Bartel’s most belligerently immoral and subtly sophisticated work to date, hence why it is probably less well known when compared to the director’s previous celluloid efforts of excess and eccentricity like Death Race 2000 (1975) and Eating Raoul (1982), as it seems most American filmgoers prefer low-camp over wicked yet refined wit. A fiercely fucked farce that has a number of subplots, but mainly revolves around two male servants—a mestizo addicted to gambling and a bisexual hustler that has the words “Your Name” tastelessly tattooed to his assumedly diseased ass—who make a truly low-class wager as to who will be the first to sexually seduce the other’s employer, Bartel’s work is probably the only film that can boast such an eclectically bonkers and stupidly salacious cast of characters, including a goofy fat ghost who died of autoerotic asphyxiation and has come back to haunt his horny wife, a male whore who gambles $5,000 just so he can get into a romantic Chicano's pants, a gold-digging jigaboo who moonlights as an S&M porn star, and a divorced housewife who lusts after Mexicans because she has read one too many D.H. Lawrence novels, among countless other human creatures with an unquenchable hunger for humping anyone and everyone despite class differences (indeed, if the film demonstrates anything, it is that there is no such thing as discrimination in the bedroom, so long as one has a craving for the other person), so long as they do it in a super sleazy and secret way so as to not potentially hurt their loved ones.

Rich bitch Clare Lipkin (played by Jacqueline Bisset in a rather against-type role) gets so enraged with her chipmunk-mouthed Mexican maid Rosa (Edith Diaz) for breaking some sort of worthless porcelain knickknack in her home during a big fancy dinner feast that she throws boiling water in the poor over-the-hill Latina's rather bloated face. On top of that, a pathetically pretentious and ambiguously gay pansy who describes himself as "Beverly Hill's foremost thnologist" (aka diet doctor) named Dr. Mo Van De Kamp (Paul Bartel) decides to finish the mestizo maid off with an Abercrombie & Fitch brand handgun, so naturally the Hispanic houseboy Juan (played by Robert Beltran, who was previously in Eating Raoul) decides to honor his racial sister by throwing a boiling pot of water on his bossy boss Clare, but just before he does, it is revealed it was all a joke in celebration of the young servant's birthday. Unfortunately for Juan, his life is not exactly that interesting, as it is revealed that everything that he has just experienced was just a dream. On top of that, Juan owes an East Asian gangster named June-Bug (Jerry Tondo), who uses a muscular negro as his muscle, a long unpaid $3,700 gambling debt. Luckily, a bisexual servant named Frank (played by Ray Sharkey, who died of AIDS in 1993 but not before giving it to a couple of his girlfriends) that works for his boss Clare's friend Lisabeth Hepburn-Saravian (played by lapsed Warhol superstar turned Roger Corman superstar Mary Woronov) makes a $5,000 bet with him regarding who can seduce and sexually savage the other's employer first. Since Juan has no cash, he has agreed to give his anal virginity (and, in turn, his rampant heterosexuality) to Frank if he loses the wager. Of course, being a Paul Bartel film, it is somewhat easy to guess what happens to Juan's twink-taco.

Juan's boss Clare's husband Sidney (Paul Mazursky) has just died in a freak autoerotic asphyxiation accident and now his pathetic ghost is haunting her. Somewhat melancholy, as well as horny (her husband's ghost confesses to her that he became sexually disinterested with her after their daughter was born), due to the death of her hubby, Clare has some friend and family members over for the weekend, included her hack playwright brother Peter (Ed Begley Jr.), who has written works with titillating titles like "Little Shylock," and his new negress wife

'To-Bel' (Arnetia Walker), who married the preppie would-be-tortured-artist on a whim after only knowing him for a couple of days because she assumes he is ridiculously wealthy (of course, as Dr. Mo Van De Kamp later reveals to her, Peter is on the, "last scraps of niggardly inheritance"). Needless to say, Clare is somewhat disturbed by her brother's rather dark romantic acquisition, though the family dog 'Bojangles' takes a special liking to To-Bel and maws at her afro-puff-covered pink-eye as if it is a raw steak. A shameless Uncle Tom that knows how to play pussy white men with her man-eating pussy, To-Bel absurdly states upon being absurdly asked if she has any relatives in Africa, "Isn't that interesting...but I have no desire to go to Africa. None whatsoever. Israel, yes," as if she assumes that Hebrews are where the real 'bucks' are. While Juan and Frank plot to get in the pussies of the posh hags, rich bitches Clare and Lisabeth do the same, with the latter stating regarding her unquenchable thirst for prole poles, "we're soft, they're hard...they work, they eat, they fuck." Divorced from her bald philandering gynecologist husband Howard (Wallace Shawn), Lisabeth is especially hungry for Hispanic flesh, stating regarding the Mexican servant, "There is something very D.H. Lawrence about Juan...something dark and something Aztec...that one could never know."

Feeling sorry for a hyper horny young teen in need of temporary sexual release, Juan gives Lisabeth's sensitive pianist son Willie (Barret Oliver of The NeverEnding Story fame) "righteous videotapes" (aka porn videos) and the young lad soon discovers that To-Bel is a porn star while watching a lurid Sapphic S&M blue movie where the ebony hoe cracks a female cracker with a whip. On top of that, it is also soon revealed that Lisabeth's husband Howard was in a steamy love affair with To-Bel, who wants to take revenge against her bastard of an ex-beau, which she does by boning his much more handsome and more well hung son Willie. Indeed, Willie later brags in front of his mother and all the other house guests that, "Aunt To-Bel told me that compared to my dad I was hung like a rhino." Indeed, Willie must have developed an instant mania for miscegenation, as he also screws fat Mexican maid Rosa. Of course, Willie is not the only one who gets lucky during the wanton weekend in the seemingly banal Beverly Hills suburb, as virtually everybody literally and figuratively screws everyone in Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills, though Frank, being a homo who pretends he's half-hetero, opts for drugging Clare instead of actually greasing her weasel, as Juan walks in on his passed out boss in bed with his friend and assumes the worst. While Juan actually manages to seal the salacious deal in terms of bugging hyper horny divorcee Lisabeth, he lies to Frank and pretends to lose the wager, thus absurdly resulting in the loss of his rampant heterosexuality (Frank fucks him from behind like he's a woman). Of course, in what seems to be a mockery of virtually every single Hollywood film ever made, everything works out in the end, with Juan beginning a relationship with old sugarmomma Lisabeth, Clare's daughter Zandra (Rebecca Schaeffer) hooking up with dirty old man Dr. Mo Van De Kamp, and Clare finally getting over her husband's ghost, who is left with the ghost of the family dog (indeed, the poor doggy, like Sidney, also perished in a freak accident). In the end, the dead dog has the last word by telling ghost Sidney, "You're so full of shit."

A film with an intentionally pretentiously long title that sounds like the name of some sort of forgotten European neo-Marxist film from the late-1960s/1970s (actually, a Jewish documentarian directed a film in 1977 entitled Scenes from the Class Struggle in Portugal), Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills (1989) ultimately rips both the proletariat and the bourgeoisie a new asshole, which is certainly something any self-respecting person can appreciate. Indeed, while the film is a major mess in terms of narrative structure as a wayward work where the main 'plot' falls to the wayside almost immediately, it is also a mischievously mirthful orgy of ludicrous laughs that reminds one that there has indeed been a couple of masterful comedies made in Hollywood, though they certainly were not directed by Mel Brooks. Undoubtedly, had director Paul Bartel been Hebraic and not made jokes at the expense of Israel (as he does in the film), Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills would probably be revered as one of the greatest celluloid comedies of its rather unfunny era. Indeed, forget Das Kapital, Bartel's filmic farce features more cultivated hate and contempt for the upper-classes than failed bourgeois bum Marx could have ever dreamt of. Assuredly, one of the things that makes the film, like most of Bartel's work, so brilliant is that it is nearly impossible to tell what the director's political persuasion is, as he spares no one from his deliciously venomous scorn, including meek Mexican maids, virginal teenage piano prodigies, female Uncle Toms, the sort of annoying and spastic yappity little white dogs that old women like to spoil (Bartel actually had the gall to have the dog, Bo-Jangles, killed off), effeminate gynecologists, and various other beings that I typically find myself quite repelled by. Like the anti-liberal/anti-counter-culture cinematic works of Paul Morrissey, Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills also dares to make sex seem rather ridiculous, as a work that wallows in perversity but is, at best, rather anti-erotic, despite featuring nudity and whatnot (undoubtedly, I must admit that the sight of Mary Woronov's unclad body made for an unsettling experience). Ultimately, one of the main messages of the film is that everyone is a whore, but it is only the working-class who consciously realizes this, as they have to constantly prostitute themselves just to survive and thrive. Of course, the title of the film is quite tongue-in-cheek, as the real struggle that occurs in the film is between two lowly servants from the same class who are competing from poorly aged rich bitch gash. While I do not doubt that Renoir's The Rules of the Game is an unmitigated masterpiece, I have a feeling that Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills offers more wicked laughs, as a bodacious black comedy that is darker than Al Jolson in blackface and wittier than Oscar Wilde on crack.

NIGHT OF THE HELL HAMSTERS

Paul Campion (2006)

Hamsters are rather cute cuddly creatures that fill their cheeks with various nuts and fruits. Only this time, they seek blood from teenager invaders of their spectral realm. Paul Campion is the director of the glorious gem from New Zealand. While he might have borrowed the insatiable appetite of gore from his fellow native Peter Jackson, that is about the only relation in film that this short carries. (Frank, eat your heart out) When Nature Attacks is always a brilliant genre to make a film on. You save on most production expenses and you don't need to milk a brilliant script to get the idea of entertainment across. Night of the Hell Hamsters, just like Child's Play before it, takes great pride in delivering something playful in a demonic package with massive bloodshed. The babysitter (Note the ode to the pastel colored generation of ultraviolence) convinces her cowardly boyfriend to participate in a mock Ouija board "round" and in doing so, revives a demonic spirit named Spoz Gar (Ghostbusters which reanimates the tenant's furry companions into wide eyed harbingers of doom. With a New Zealand style of humor, this short invokes chuckles and gives a cricket bat another use as seen in Shaun of the Dead. (Only a wee bit more terrifying) Night of the Hell Hamsters is a bloody brilliant 15 minute short that will leave you clawing for more. Instead of featuring the casual "male friend causes apocalypse and heroine cleans up after his mess" plot line, this film gives some leeway to the feminist-charged film of today. I don't know about you, but I'm looking forward to a possible sequel. Perhaps Paul Campion and R.L. Stine could collaborate to bring Monster Blood II to the big screen.

DECEPTION OF A GENERATION

Paul Crouch Jr. (1985)

Deception of a Generation is a fine Christianity documentary about the occult, homosexuality, necromancers, Satan, and other related Antichrist elements that infiltrated Children's cartoons of the 1980s. Despite my apathy for Christianity and the silliness of the documentary, Deception of a Generation is pretty true in its assertion of anti-Christian influences that have subverted children's cartoons. Anyone that has been around and associated with the Long Island and NYC types knows that these individuals believe that blaspheming Christ is their "God Given" right. With shows like Family Guy, it is obvious that these Antichrist folks don't even try to hide their contempt for Christianity. Of course, when anyone (I.E. Mel Gibson) attempts to hold the "masters" accountable for their deeds, they go on an ad hominem attack campaign laced with so much estrogen that it would put professional complainer Jerry Seinfeld to shame.

Phil Phillips

Apparently children of the 1980s starting shouting "Jesus isn't the master of the Universe, He-Man is" in parking lots like it was nothing. Christian host Phil Phillips makes it clear that he believes children worship their occult cartoons more than a man that died for their sins. They also use tie-in action figures and toys to practice their "worship" of homosexual occultists. I really could care less about Christianity but it is no doubt that the occult dogma of TV (for both Children's shows and TV in general) has subverted the average American into a brain dead and impulsive, vice driven disciples of Satan (at least in a metaphorical sense). Are the Smurfs really dead (blue skin) homosexual communists of Satan? Is Jesus really a winner and Satan a loser? According to the host of Deception of a Generation, Phil Phillips, yes. The documentary also uncovers the homosexual agenda by Steven Spielberg's child classic "E.T." Phillips believes that these "Anti-Christian" teachings found in children's cartoons are a plot. I personally think that the Antichrist agenda found in children's cartoons is more about instinct than a plot. The state of New Jersey, Hollywood, and NYC (where most of these "creators" come from) might as well be the unofficial capitals of hell. These areas spawn the most paranoid individuals that have rarely left the city due to their fear of receiving a similar fate to those victims found in The Texas Chainsaw Massacre. SATAN LURKS INSIDE YOUR CHILDREN'S TOYS The host of Deception of a Generation seems to be more a "false prophet" than a true believer. He can see the degeneracy so commonly seen in children's cartoons because he seems to have a certain "tainted" element to his own soul. Host Phillips gets especially excited when stating that Barbie is perfect except for having "Hong Kong stamped on her ass." Phillips is a similar false prophet to that of the boyish messianic power of Paul Sunday in There Will Be Blood exercises.

One has to admit that real Christianity in America has been for the most part destroyed. The only thing you have to do is turn on the television and see it's promotion of materialism, homosexuality, crime, drugs, false gods, and overall destructive behavior. The media leaders practiced their techniques subtly over half a century using Freudian psychological techniques. Now they do whatever they want whenever they want. Whether it be the whoring out of preteens on the Disney channel or the hateful filth against Western Civilization on MTV, the media leaders have done their job well. Despite having some good points, Deception of a Generation is unintentionally comical for the most part, thus confirming the lack of seriousness and "faith" gentile society puts into Christianity.

Paul Flaherty (1994)

Clifford excels at being the strangest normal film I have ever seen. Unlike Orson Welles' tactic at filming Citizen Kane's lead with a larger than life perspective, they reverse the camera effect to cast a 40 year old Martin Short as a 10 year old pseudo-Problem Child. Paul Flaherty (Director of Who's Harry Crumb?) creates an enjoyable almost-family film that has enough adult situations and pure evil to pass around. Martin Short plays 10 year old Clifford AKA The Antichrist. This little shit's biggest dream is going to the prehistoric theme park aptly titled Dinosaur World. He has a borderline case of talking to an inanimate object throughout his entire life. The film starts in the future. The year 2050 to be exact. There Clifford is a priest at a school for troubled boys. From this environment, he manifests his past to show us (the viewers) how much of a prick he was. Clifford wasn't no ordinary mischief maker. He aimed low and hard, making Charles Grodin's life a living hell. He ruins all aspect in his life just for his dream to be realized. Martin Short's acting as a child is down right amazing. Prior to this film, I didn't know much about the actor other than he wasn't young. Upon further scrutiny, I discovered that he was actually extremely aged. And no CGI? Most impressive. I wouldn't consider this film to be extremely hilarious but rather quirky, jovial, and engrossing. The chemistry between Martin and Charles is a definite experience which never falters but only flourishes. Over the course of the film's surprisingly short run time, not much is uncovered about the central character of Clifford. Other than being a PSA about the horrors of spoiled children, this film should be advertised as an full length abstinence commercial. Children live without mercy and are ruthless. The wits exchanged in the film are quickly exchanged without missing a cue until one victor is left standing. Charles Grodin does seem to have a habit of playing "that guy." The one you see in films that feature bastard children creating exasperating hardships then switch faces towards the end for a heart felt reunion. I don't know how many times I've seen Grodin snap in films. God knows if he has ever killed a cast member of the Beethoven series. The beginning sets up for a laughing riot but goes out with a small pop. If the ending were some how different, I'd definitely appreciate this dark comedy a lot more.

THE PEST

Paul Miller (1997)

Wow. Where do I begin on this comedic curiosity? I'll start with the obvious. The Pest is perhaps the most fucking retarded film I've ever had the pleasure of witnessing. New grounds are broken in terms of "awful" film making. I first saw The Pest around 3 years ago. I remember thinking it was a truly funny film. I kept this in mind when I rewatched it this past week. You know that feeling when you look at yourself in the past and get disgusted with the past you? I encountered that when I realized that I thought The Pest was comedic in an honest way.

If anything, The Pest is only really good for the impromptu musical opening. The rest is utter garbage that one cannot help but facepalm in the general direction of any of the cast/crew for participating in this monstrosity. They should have saw this coming. Armed with an arsenal of pro-Jewish/anti-German gags, this film can easily be dissected as a German hate piece. "Evil homosexual German" this, "Poor Jew" that. Even for the overly-sympathetic, this gets murderously irritating fast. The writer David Bar Katz, being a noted Jew, doesn't waste any time glorifying the Jews in an over-exempt amount of scenes that stretches across the entire run time. The punchline never comes either. The Pest retains some charm in its spin-off of The Most Dangerous Game. The pathetic part is that I recognize The Pest as being more accomplished than Ice T's Surviving the Game (You just lost it). Gary Busey's maniacal yells and sneer could make me cry any day. I'll regard The Pest as one of the worst comedies ever created from here on out. The proceeding events don't sit well with me but I favor The Pest over Surviving the Game and that's something I'd never want to admit. John Leguizamo is a universally adept actor. The exigency of accepting him starring in The Pest is becoming quite a chore. I hope that Leguizamo decided to fire his agent after this film. Himmel is his Nazi father's son and that's the way he'd put it. He is a raging homosexual who enjoys phallic imagery and seducing his father's hunting subjects. He'd rather pet snakes and mutter German sexual obscenities than murder poor Latino scam artists. The Pest features some of the worst jokes ever committed to celluloid performed by John Leguizamo. If you thought Corky Romano was bad, think again. Even though The Pest is a brand of humor for vegetables, I still found myself entertained enough to finish it. The level of stupidity it reaches can be deemed brilliant by few, but I don't think I ever want to watch this film again. Proceed with caution.

FLESH

Paul Morrissey (1968)

Andy Warhol's Flesh (or more appropriately Paul Morrissey's Flesh) is an eccentric study in male prostitute body worship. Little Joe makes a living by supporting his family selling his body to dirty old men. He has no shame in it as he has to pay the bills somehow. Little Joe is a middle school dropout with an attitude. Paul Morrissey may be an anally retentive old queen but he sure admires the lifestyle of the poor and drugged out, hence his charm as a filmmaker. Little Joe's wife has no problem with Joe whoring his body out for cash. She participates in sexual encounters with women to get her sexual fill. Joe and his wife also have a baby together. Joe's obsession with laying around naked parallels that of his newborns daily activities. In one crucial scene, little Joe studies his son in awe as he crawls around on the floor. It is never too soon for a father to learn from his child. Joe has his best conversations with his Johns. They encourage Joe to work out as they admire his body. I found it pretty depressing (although somewhat touching) that Joe's "clients" took him more seriously than his family and close friends. Joe also makes sure to giving tips to a young hustler on how to get "dates." He encourages "gay for pay" sexual acts. Joe has to support his drug habit (and family) somehow. Flesh has the aesthetic of an amateur documentary film. I could only imagine Flesh in this aesthetic as anything different would take away from the raw power of the pathetic life of a hustler. Little Joe is not a glamorous individual. He can barely even make it out his apartment. Prostitution seems like the only legit reason for Joe to leave home. Flesh is mandatory viewing for all serious fans of independent cinema.

TRASH

Paul Morrissey (1970)

I have always thought that Andy Warhol was somewhat retarded. He always had the talent of “discovering” artists and financing their projects. I believe that his greatest find of sorts was his filmmaker Paul Morrissey who is often considered Warhol’s most hated collaborator. Andy Warhol’s Trash is a perfect example of why many pseudo artist hippies hate the underrated auteur. Italian American drug addict Joe Dallesandro was the star and centerpiece of Paul Morrissey’s legendary trash trilogy. The films voyeuristically explore the slavery (both mental and physical) that resulted from sex, drugs, and Rock n’ Roll “revolution” so often found in the late 1960’s. Joe is a slave to heroin and only shows ambition when attempting to obtain his drug of choice. He supports his habitat by giving sexual favors to woman he uses for drug money. Unfortunately for him, he can’t even get his dick up to satisfy the women offering to pay for his services. Despite looking like a hippie home video from the late 1960’s, Trash has more to stimulate the mind than all Darren Aronofsky films combined. Trash is a virtual document of white Americas decline into self destructive hedonism and mindless pleasure seeking. The “revolutionary” promoters (such as whiny agitator Abbie “Abe” Hoffman) of “liberation” movements of the late 1960’s were the children of former American (and from abroad) Communists (red diaper babies). The reality is that these scumbags subversives were bent on destroying western order and determined to get people to fall prey to their weaknesses for pleasurable vices. The irrational babbling of a drugged out rich bitch with clown make-up acts as a great metaphor for the “revolutionary” changes that occurred during the fall of the United States. Although Joe Dallesandro is constantly zoning out during the rich bitch’s idiotic ramblings, his responses are quite adequate. This drugged out girl isn’t even worth being acknowledged as a human being. To be fair, her “acting” and performance is unforgettable. The actress (her name was Andrea Feldman) later committed suicide by jumping of the 14th floor of an apartment building. A rosary and a can of coca cola was supposedly found in her hands (another metaphor?). Trash is far from being Trash. The film is an important piece of American history and better reflects America during the 1960’s than Easy Rider ever could. American youths are still being inspired by dead hippie legends and ruining their lives getting addicted to drugs. Paul Morrissey was the best weapon America ever had in the so-called war against drugs.

WOMEN IN REVOLT

Paul Morrissey (1971)

On June 3, 1968, schizophrenic lesbian Valerie Solanas – the radical feminist who penned the laughably ludicrous SCUM Manifesto that urged the apparently-fairer sex to, “overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation and eliminate the male sex” – arrived at the Warhol factory in atypically feminine attire and like the cowardly woman she was, shot the ultra-effete pop-artist Andy Warhol while he was preoccupied with the telephone. Although Solanas ultimately failed in her attempt to assassinate a man as physically frail as Andy Warhol with a loaded weapon, not least of all because she was an exceptionally mentally unhinged female with an innately irrational case of debilitating hysteria and delusions of grandeur, she continued to harass and stalk the supposedly misogynist artist after her release from New York State Prison for Women in 1971, of which she was once again arrested for not long thereafter. As Solanas told journalist Robert Marmorstein of The Village Voice, “[s]he has dedicated the remainder of her life to the avowed purpose of eliminating every single male from the face of the earth.” Of course, Andy Warhol took these threats very seriously and lived in fear for the rest of his life that the SCUMbag butch broad with an extra big dick-less chip on her shoulder would attempt to assassinate him again. Thankfully, Warhol still maintained his sense of humor during all of this as demonstrated by the film Andy Warhol's Women in Revolt (1971) directed by Paul Morrissey (Trash, Blood for Dracula). Not only would the film be the last production where Warhol himself got behind the camera, but Women in Revolt is also a parody of the so-called Women's Liberation Movement, most specifically targeting saucy psycho Solanas and her hubris-driven SCUM Manifesto. Starring Candy Darling (Flesh, Der Tod der Maria Malibran), Jackie Curtis (Burroughs, W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism), and Holly Woodlawn (Trash, Night Owl) – three of the Warhol factory's most legendary transvestites – as the women leading a mindless and ultimately failed revolution against a mostly imagined patriarchal society under the acronym PIG (Politically Involved Girls), which is undoubtedly a sardonic snipe at Solanas' sordid SCUM (“Society For Cutting Up Men”), Women In Revolt is one of the greatest and most campy anti-feminist works ever made and a film that would only be rivaled by John Waters' later work Female Trouble (1974).

Although missing the always delightful Joe Dallesandro, Women in Revolt has much in common with the “Paul Morrissey Trilogy” (Flesh, Trash, Heat) that the iconic junky hunk starred in due to it also being produced by Andy Warhol and its unmistakable pseudo-cinéma vérité anti-aesthetic. A lifelong opponent of liberalism and self-described “right-winger” of the Irish Roman Catholic persuasion, Paul Morrissey has consistently mocked those with less restrained bleeding hearts consistently throughout his filmmaking career and with Women in Revolt – an audacious attack on the more preposterous trends associated with Second-wave feminism – the Warhol factory auteur assembled one of his most contemptuous and facetious attacks to date. According to the most articulate of the tranny trio, Jackie (Jackie Curtis) – a feisty virgin suffering from an acute case of sexual repression – the fierce feminists are, “tired of being exploited.” Not allowing her idealism to get in the way of her instinctive female narcissism and jealousy, Jackie has no problem proudly declaring that, “Candy’s after pussy, Holly’s after cock...What I’m after is something – intangible.” Indeed, like a “True Believer” in the sense outlined in German-American social psychologist Eric Hoffer’s 1951 book of the same name, Jackie – who keeps a slavish houseboy (Dusty Springs) to do her nails and tidy her apartment while incessantly torturing him physically and emotionally – is a woman who romantically dreams and somewhat actively aspires for a female-ruled future due to her absolute discontent with her own plush and privileged personal life. Like the failed-bourgeois communist revolutionary that scapegoats the abstract and impersonal “capitalist” for his personal failure, Jackie and her girls hold men and their pesky peckers responsible for their own (at least partially) self-induced misery. In the heat of passion, Jackie declares to her floppy-cock houseboy that, “Don’t you know there’s something more beautiful in this world than – that thing – between your legs? Haven’t you heard of Women’s liberation?...Cunt is beautiful...You know that males are inferior to females.” To her credit, the houseboy’s flaccid cock is quite unsightly, hence why she eventually ‘cheats’ on him by buying sex from a male prostitute named Johnny Minute (Johnny Kemper), thus embezzling the funds (which were conned out of a senile, elderly woman) of PIG and betraying and hereafter absconding from the feminist cause in the process. Unsurprisingly, the other two bro-broads of PIG also desert their newfound fascist-feminist ideology. Candy Darling is initially recruited for PIG to help launch the movement due to her glamorous status as a “society deb socialite” (as described by a hostile bull-dyke reporter). Of course, Darling’s intentions were never savory to begin with as she hoped to use PIG as a dubious means for launching a film acting career. Darling eventually becomes a talentless international actress with mostly non-speaking roles in Jules Verne adaptation filmed in Yugoslavia and Italian sexploitation films, including a fictional Roman epic work entitled The Fornicon by allowing film directors to, “fuck the daylights out of her.” Considering she was raped by her brutish, closet-case husband Marty (Martin Kove), Holly’s conversion to feminism is more reasonable than the other two, but she inevitably forsakes her femininity by bestially molesting any man that passes her general radius, thus eventually degenerating into a homeless wino wench by the conclusion of Women in Revolt. Needless to say, by the end of Women in Revolt, the PIG ladies have not only failed to get anywhere without the help of the by-now-fairly-greasy fried bacon between their legs, but have also blundered every superficial attempt at being uniquely ‘liberated’ as a woman via contrived

Before Andy Warhol succumbed to a botched gallbladder in New York City at 6:32 a.m. on February 22, 1987 (maybe death via assassination would have been a more glorious way to go out?!), two of the three stars in Women in Revolt would also perish tragically. On March 21, 1974, at aged 29, Candy Darling died of Lymphoma, of which s/he commented in a melodramatic letter sent to Warhol and friends, "Unfortunately before my death I had no desire left for life . . . I am just so bored by everything. You might say bored to death. (D)id you know I couldn't last. I always knew it. I wish I could meet you all again." Although Jackie Curtis would appear in the films Underground U.S.A. (1980) and Burroughs (1983), s/he eventually died of a heroin overdose at the age of 38 in 1985 that was eerily foretold in Lou Reed's popular song "Walk on the Wild Side" in the following verse, "...Jackie is just speeding away - Thought she was James Dean for a day... then I guess she had to crash, Valium would have helped that bash." As revealed in the documentary Superstar in a Housedress (2004), Curtis was receiving a blow-job from a woman when she died in what was 'her' first heterosexual liaison, which is assuredly an ironic and biting way for a drag-queen to croak. Even though Holly Woodlawn gave up on the fabulous life of an actress in 1979, thereupon cutting her hair and becoming a butch busboy after moving back home to Miami with her parents in the process, she would go on to play cameo roles in films like Twin Falls Idaho (1999) and as herself in the documentary Jack Smith and the Destruction of Atlantis (2006). Although Women in Revolt may not offer a strong argument for the equality nor superiority of the fairer sex, the brief and tragic lives of two of three of its anatomically-male stars makes for a worthy argument that – relatively speaking – biological females may in fact be stronger than the typical tranny. Of course, as the estrogen-deprived lesbo reporter at the conclusion of the film states, "The people want filth" and – thankfully – Women in Revolt is overflowing with it.

FLESH FOR FRANKENSTEIN

Admittedly, although I personally prefer Blood for Dracula aka Andy Warhol's Dracula to its companion Space-Vision 3D monster flick spoof Flesh for Frankenstein aka Andy Warhol's Frankenstein, I find both films to be especially enthralling and entertaining as campy anti-tributes to two classic horror stories. Like Blood for Dracula, Flesh for Frankenstein – a work that is like an unruly marriage between William Castle and early John Waters, except more sophisticated and 'conservative' – is a twist on the iconic story it lampoons with a potent political subtext making up an integral part of the film, but instead of focusing on 'communism-for-dummies' like Morrissey's morose yet mirthful vampire flick, his mischievously magnetic tale of Modern Prometheus focuses on the racial obsessions of National Socialism, except with a Serbian spin. Married to his sexually promiscuous sister Baroness Katrin Frankenstein (Monique van Vooren), Baron von Frankenstein (Udo Kier in one of his most memorable performances) is a hyper-intellectual, inbred and all but impotent man (although he has somehow sired two children) who has substituted sex for emotionally sterile science, and sexual reproduction with corpse reanimation. Determined to build a super race of undead slaves of Serbian stock – who he believes are the direct descendents of the ancient Greeks – Baron Frankenstein will stop at nothing to achieve his goal, even if it means having to kill, dismember, and rebuild the bodies of sexually virile peasants in the process, but his sinister plans run amok when he picks the wrong working-class hero as his specimen. Insistent on finding an Übermensch of a male with an immaculate Serbian nasum and rampantly heterosexual demeanor; or as he states "a man who wants to make love to anything," because Dr. Frankenstein believes these sort of men make for the most loyal of slaves, things don't go exactly as planned when he decides to utilize the body of an anomalous Serbian peasant named Sacha (Srdjan Zelenovic) who aspires to live a life of celibacy in a monastery. Like Blood for Dracula, Flesh for Frankenstein is a work that obsessively focuses on the degenerate, spoiled blood of the morally and physically declining European aristocracy. In stark contrast to the aesthetically and thematically sterile genre films of British Hammer horror – formulaic works Paul Morrissey has made nil qualms about recognizing his detestation for – Flesh for Frankenstein brings life and new blood to a classic yet outmoded classic horror tale that is often seemingly lifeless when directed by less ardent filmic artists.

Somewhat surprisingly, Blood for Dracula and Flesh for Frankenstein were shot back-to-back in a mere seven days without anything resembling a completed script, as Paul Morrissey even went on to admit to an AFI audience that, "I think the secretary (Pat Hackett) made up most of the dialogue," which is quite remarkable considering the relative coherence of the film's story when compared to the director's previous gritty, realist pseudo-cinéma vérité efforts like Flesh (1968) and Trash (1970). Morrissey made abundant room for changes to the script for Flesh for Frankenstein, stating, "Each night I'd think of what further absurdity might logically follow from where I began," and indeed, the film is undoubtedly the most batty and campy, yet strangely refined retelling of Mary Shelley's iconic story to date, even making Mel Brooks' parody Young Frankenstein (1974) seem prosaic and even hopelessly childish. As with Blood for Dracula, Flesh for Frankenstein features Joe Dallesandro as a proletarian partisan (Nicholas, the stableboy) who uncovers the perturbing and perverted plot of a debauched aristocrat (both times played by Udo Kier) who is more interested in the blood and guts of nubile young women than the tender, wet glory between their legs. In one of the most memorable lines in Flesh for Frankenstein, Baron von Frankenstein states to his socially inept assistant Otto (Arno Juerging), "To know death, Otto, you have to fuck life – in the gall bladder," in a hilarious and memorable scene that Paul Morrissey meant as a parody of a line from Italian commie auteur Bernardo Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris (1972); a film that the Warhol survivor was not particularly fond of, describing it as, "the worst kind of soap opera dressed up with these pretentious allusions, its self-proclaimed importance." Indeed, one of the main reasons why both Flesh for Frankenstein and Blood for Dracula have aged so gracefully over the years is due to the films' lack of odious ostentations. That being said, despite its innately perverted persuasion and absurdist gross-out imagery, Flesh for Frankenstein is clearly the work of a cultured man who understands the conventions of the genre and story he is spoofing that he is like Dr. Frankenstein himself, reassembling the pieces of the tale as a mad scientist auteur and resurrecting a wholly new and preposterously grotesque cinematic monster with a life of its own. My only complaint with Flesh for Frankenstein is that I will probably never get to see the film as it was meant to be seen: in gall bladder fucking 3D, where it brings the horror off the screen... and into your lap!

Featuring reproduction paintings by German Symbolist/Art Nouveau painter Franz von Stuck, who Adolf Hitler was notably a fan of (once even comparing his mother's eyes to one of the painter's renderings of Medusa's possessed orbs), and general Jugendstil inspired set design, Flesh for Frankenstein, like its brother film Blood for Dracula, is as classy and charming as horror comedies get, so it was only natural for audacious auteur Paul Morrissey to take his art and interest in German kultur one step further with the straight arthouse flick Beethoven's Nephew (1985). Although an admirable piece of celluloid art in itself, with Beethoven's Nephew it feels like there is a void within the film due to its lack of Morrissey's unmistakable, idiosyncratic humor. As Morrissey has mentioned himself, it seems that comical films last well past their expiration date, hence why Flesh for Frankenstein and Blood for Dracula both inspired nervous yet loud laughter after all of these years. Although seemingly one dimensional in theme to the uninitiated viewer, Flesh for Frankenstein is a clever and canny cinematic concoction that chronicles the fall of Europa's aristocracy via the generational declension of a single German family. With a baron father who can only find sexual satisfaction by masturbating with a scalpel and a baroness mother who will fuck anything that moves, including a reactivated Serbian corpse, it is no surprise that the adolescent Frankenstein children display discernible homicidal pathologies as they play, hence why Flesh for Frankenstein concludes with a hint that they will lead a more sadistic, monstrous, and intrinsically anti-human future than their inbred parents. That being said, as much as I typically loathe sequels, I would love to see Morrissey's take on James Whale's Bride of Frankenstein (1935), but something tells me the world will never see the birth of such of a celluloid monster. With the European monster films, both Paul Morrissey and Joe Dallesandro would finally detach themselves from the celebrity of pop-art beast Andy Warhol and spark fruitful careers in their own right (not that their work with Warhol was not of their own making); the former directing films in the old world (The Hound of the Baskervilles, Beethoven's Nephew) and Los Angeles (Madame Wang's) and the latter staying in Italy and starring in a variety of eclectic, if often dubbed, roles all around the continent. The two Warhol brand monster films would also mark the last time Morrissey and Dallesandro would work together and I personally cannot think of a better way to end an artistically lucrative partnership.

BLOOD FOR DRACULA
BLOOD FOR DRACULA

Paul Morrissey (1974)

I have always been fond of vampire films. One of the most unconventional vampire films of cinema history is Paul Morrissey's Blood For Dracula. The film is also known as Andy Warhol's Dracula despite the fact that Warhol had nothing to do with the film artistically (like most of his ventures). Unlike Paul Morrissey's under appreciated "flesh trilogy" Blood for Dracula seems to have an actual budget and even set design. Like Morrissey's "flesh trilogy," Blood for Dracula is essentially an auteur piece. God bless Paul Morrissey for making two brilliant "horror comedies" in the culturally rich country of Italy.

Blood for Dracula opens with Dracula (played by a young Udo Kier) putting on some ridiculously gothic makeup. Dracula even decides that he needs to put black paint in his hair so that all those that seem him know that he is a tragic figure. After all, Dracula is a member of the archaic and dying European aristocracy. He tells people that he is "the last of his kind" while speaking in a depressing yet accepting tone. Dracula can't even find a virgin girl for blood in the newly degenerate Italy.

The rival of Dracula is a young peasant and handyman named Mario played by the infamous Joe Dallesandro. Mario is a self proclaimed Marxist idealist who has plans of destroying both the aristocracy and petty Bourgeoisie. Mario feels that he shouldn't have to work so that others don't have to. Mario is firmly against the natural order of class distinction. After screwing a sluttish Bourgeoisie girl, he rants about revolution. Mario even has an "iron & sickle" hanging over his bed. Marxism has become Mario's reasoning so that he can rape and pillage those that have more than him. Somehow this peasant learned how to read and Karl Marx has showed Mario the light. When he encounters the decaying aristocrat Dracula, contempt fills Mario's spiteful heart. The written lies of Karl Marx has convinced Mario that he is "owed" something. This sort of mentality resulted in around 65 million people dead in the Soviet Union alone.

With Blood for Dracula, Paul Morrissey portrays the death of Europe and western civilization via classic horror story. The half civilized worker (or as Marxist's say "proletarian") has become the liberator of humanity. The weakening aristocracy is finally exterminated by the angry little "worker." Out of all the anticommunist filmmakers, Paul Morrissey executes his message best. What other director could perfectly execute a satire of Marxist revolutionary mass murdering mindset? Paul Morrissey, always a minimalist, put more thought into his films than money.

Dracula suffers from the poisoning of "bad blood" various times throughout Blood for Dracula. The assumed "virgin" girls in the film have already been defiled by a worker. I doubt I will ever see a man vomit blood with such expertise and elegance as Udo Kier in Blood for Dracula. In film, Joe Dallesandro also probably gives his greatest cinematic performance. Holocaust survivor and child molester Roman Polanski also makes an appearance in Blood for Dracula as a swindling peasant. How good can a film get? Blood for Dracula is mandatory viewing for serious fans of Sinema.

MADAME WANG'S
MADAME WANG'S

Paul Morrissey (1981)

Always the charming and progressive celluloid cynic, anti-aesthetic auteur Paul Morrissey (Trash, Women in Revolt) left virtually nil nihilistically hedonistic American counter-culture group unscathed with his conservative-meets-trash filmic odysseys, so, naturally, when the decidedly destructive punk subculture reared its ugly Mohawk-adorned head during the late-1970s/early-1980s, it was only a matter of time before the factory filmmaker deconstructed the (non)ethos of the movement, swirled it around in a maggot-infested consumerist trashcan, and documented it for the untrained, weary eyes of cretinous fashion victims to see via Madame Wang's (1981). Centering around an East German KGB agent named Lutz (played by German medical student Patrick Schoene in his first and only acting role) who comes to Los Angeles, CA to spark a communist revolution by recruiting "hippies, Americans who hate their country" and Jane Fonda, but eventually gets caught up in the less than dainty disorder of creative panhandling and the L.A. punk scene, Madame Wang's is a work that is critical of both capitalism and communism, although the former political persuasion takes the larger brunt of Morrissey's bodacious misanthropic musings and moralizing. Like virtually all of Morrissey's cinematic works, Madame Wang's is a keenly unkind kitsch arthouse piece that – unlike the degenerate-friendly films of fellow camp filmmaker John Waters (Pink Flamingos, Desperate Living) – maliciously mocks the miserable army of dastardly streetwalking delinquents that it depicts. In his implementation of a tall, dark, and handsome Nordic man of foreign origins with a stoic and deadly serious demeanor, Morrissey has recognized (longer after he finished the film) that protagonist Lutz is his vague alter-ego; a sound mind trapped in a nightmarish no man's land where traditional Occidental mores have been traded in unwaveringly for nihilistic hedonism and glorified (yet undignified) self-worship that is typical of late period civilization that, in terms of theme, is not totally out of line with Federico Fellini's timely depiction of imperial Rome in his decadent epic Satyricon (1969). Stereotypical, aloof and robotic in movement, Lutz is to Madame Wang's what Arnold Schwarzenegger would later be for James Cameron's The Terminator (1984); an unwittingly witty gardener of human weeds, but unlike the charismatic cyborg assassin, the cryptic-communist kraut commando has more of a proclivity towards brutalizing himself than sorting out leftist revolutionaries from the future. More punk than Sid Vicious' postmortem smegma, Madame Wang's is a thematically insane indictment of the United States with a grandiosely gritty garbage dump aesthetic that only a seasoned pessimist could love.

After jumping ship in the Pacific ocean and swimming ashore, Lutz's first duty as a would-be martyr of Marxism is to cut himself up with his only piece of luggage; a sharp switchblade. As depicted early on in Madame Wang's, likeable loon Lutz is a stoic sadomasochist who is ashamed of the artificial Soviet nation state he carries out espionage for, as expressed by his irksome response and lack of answer when asked about his curious country of origin. Not long after leaving the sewage-covered seaside, Lutz encounters a pretty prostitute (listed as 'Girl in Temple' in the film's credits and played by Morrissey real-life niece Christina Indri) who introduces him to her unconventional family of lapsed hippies, gay Buddhist gurus, intolerable drag queens, and petty, pathetic criminals that live in a post-industrial wasteland of sorts where trading worthless garbage makes for the sub-subculture's most vital currency. The middle-aged members of the decisively disgusting derelict group range from odious, obese drag queens to pathetic purveyors of Eastern religions, but what they all have in common is that they are all perverted and unscrupulous ex-hippie degenerates that – being the putrid parasites they are – hope to use protagonist Lutz for some sort of unsavory ghetto-level capitalist scheme. Undoubtedly, one of the most interesting and wildly idiosyncratic characters in Madame Wang's is a fiercely flaming fag pimp/door knob fetishist (listed as 'door knob collector' in the film's credits and played by off-off-Broadway star William Edgar) with probably every discomfiting mental affliction known to man, hence his obscenely ostentatious obnoxious and his complete and utter lack of personal integrity. Not far behind in libertine lunacy is a morbidly obese ex-hippie-turned transvestite (played by Jimmy Maddox) who is the sole parent of Lutz's hooker friend and a fat and seemingly half-retarded blonde boy that is addicted to McDonald's hamburgers and flatulence. The man-mother feels that, "It's not easy being a single parent, both mother and father, to two kids," hence why s/he recruits Lutz for robbing cars and wallets, which is totally unbecoming for an East German who states, "If I have any success here it's because I have discipline" in a country where any and everything has a price and getting rich by whatever deplorable means necessary is the highest of virtues, especially for those individuals that have the honor of living in L.A. Shot in part at the Long Beach Masonic Temple, which was owned by Jack Simmons, who also acted as the financial backer of Madame Wang's upon the agreement with Morrissey that he would use his building as a set for the film. Needless to say, the iconic superstructure makes for a sneering yet strangely symbolic place for Lutz and the hobo family squat, as the currency they so perilously crave is garnished with the same masonic symbols featured in their humble abode. Although Lutz believes he, "should become something like Che Guevara," out of necessity and to hide his Stasi origin, he is forced to take up odd jobs including being a pimp, prostitute, and punk rocker. Out of all of these particularly pathetic street person trades, Lutz – a miserable yet indomitable masochistic commie twink – seems to best excel at being a punk rocker due to his preternatural propensity for slashing himself with his beloved switchblade, but this anomalous career choice doesn't last long as the East German declares he "would rather do anything – anything than this." In a scene echoing the erratic and musically inept stage performances of The Germs frontman Darby Crash – a fascist junky homo-punk demigod inspired by Mussolini, Nietzsche, and Spengler (hence the most probable title origin of Spheeris' The Decline of Western Civilization) who believed in supreme order – Lutz ironically uses his communist anti-individualistic self-discipline to mutilate himself for a shocked audience that mistakenly believes his actions to be a display of individualistic visceral punkness at Madame Wang's (played by Ziegfeld girl Virginia Bruce in her last acting role) punk rock Chinese restaurant, which was based on a real-life L.A. punk venue owned by a certain Esther Wong.

Although Madame Wang's features amateurish direction not much better than the "Paul Morrissey Trilogy" (Flesh, Trash, Heat), horrid and sometimes inaudible sound, and set and costume design that would probably even offend barmaid-turned-thrift store proprietor-turned-John-Waters-superstar Edith Massey (Female Trouble, Love Letter to Edie), it was indubitably a conscious decision on the director's part as his previous work The Hound of the Baskervilles (1978) – a comedic period piece and spoof – proved Morrissey was more than just a crude creator of risqué X-rated home videos. Probably more than any of his films, Madame Wang's manages to be both an insightful reflection and relentless roast of the intrinsically valueless subculture it depicts. Featuring musically inept lesbian folksingers with totally talentless tot song lyrics like, "I like Charlotte, I think she's so swell and if you don't like her Buster you can burn in Hell," a seemingly half-retarded, Johnny Thunders-like singer that throws infantile temper tantrums while on stage, and performances from real-life punk acts like The Mentors and Phranc, the self-described "All-American Jewish Lesbian Folksinger," Madame Wang's is debauched enough for most real-life punk rockers to enjoy, even if they have no inkling to the fact that Morrissey is relentlessly poking fun at them with his film. In the end, a brainwashed Aryan of the Marxist persuasion proves to be the most individualistic nonconformist punk rocker, but rather absurdly, it was only through collectivist communist brainwashing that he was able to persevere in a foreign land where freedom and self-expression is touted as one of the country's greatest virtues. Forever tainted by capitalism and punk, Lutz leaves America with the decision that he will no longer help spark a communist revolution, declaring, "I don't care anymore, it's their problem." I don't think it would be an exaggeration to say that in Madame Wang's and virtually all of Morrissey's other cinematic works, liberalism, counter-culture idealism, and consumer capitalism are no less worse deleterious against one's soul than spiritual syphilis.

FORTY DEUCE

Paul Morrissey (1982)

Before even knowing his name while I was still a wee lad, I had a visceral, irrational, and unwavering hatred for popular Hollywood actor Kevin Bacon, but I must admit that he must be doing something right as far as acting talents are considered. As the man I love to hate, boyish Bacon makes for an especially effective villain, so naturally I was intrigued when I discovered that the relatively successful actor played an exceedingly slimy and suicidal Sicilian-American gigolo in arthouse-trash auteur Paul Morrissey's first urban NYC youth work Forty Deuce (1982). Based on a play of the same name penned by controversial off-Broadway playwright Alan Bowne (Beirut, Sharon and Billy) who died of AIDS related illnesses at the premature age of 44, Forty Deuce is a work whose author is ironically symbiotic of the sort of sometimes lethal 'free loving' libertinage that Paul Morrissey thoroughly despised and routinely ridiculed in his films. Forty Deuce centers around two bisexual male prostitutes who are not nearly as handsome as "Paul Morrissey Trilogy" star Joe Dallesandro thereupon making them more desperate in their struggle to earn cash via cock and coke; or as the apathetic anti-hero of the film states: "I sell dick, I sell dope, I come, I go." In Forty Deuce, absurdist gutter-level hilarity ensues when the two putrid protagonists of the film discover that the virginal boy they hoped to sell has accidentally overdosed on heroin, henceforth they attempt to frame a bourgeois John for the belated boy's terribly tragic death. A vivid and – some would say – vicious depiction of 42nd Street trash, Forty Deuce, like most of Morrissey's work, portrays the liberal inspired dead-end road of self-satisfying sex and drugs in a uniquely unsentimental and decidedly dispiriting manner. Totally withdrawn from circulation by its distributor, which I am sure now-high-profile actor Kevin Bacon is thoroughly pleased about, Forty Deuce – not unlike most of Morrissey's post-Warhol factory works – is nearly impossible to find.

As an audacious and ambitious auteur known for single-handedly taking on every aspect of the filmmaking process with his gritty, gutter trash pictures, Alan Bowne's play was nothing short of impressive to Morrissey, stating of the work: "I had never encountered any play or film that could even remotely be considered as anti-sex, and here was this astonishing indictment of the liberal horror." As a work of 'toilet tautology' – which Morrissey described as, "an equation of sex to the toilet," Forty Deuce would make for an equally gritty and curiously scatological film adaptation where sex is no more glorious of a bodily function than defecation and urination. Spending most of his free time shooting up heroin on the toilet and shooting his load into human toilets, homo-for-heroin prostitute Ricky (Kevin Bacon) is indubitably a fine fellow with his high priorities, trading his soul and sucking poles for temporary mind-altering pleasure of the highly lethal kind. Featuring some of the most disgustingly depraved and damned despicable proletarian 'street capitalists' ever captured on sickly-looking celluloid, Forty Deuce is a candid testament to the sordid storm of human filth that consumed 42nd Street Manhattan only three decades ago. The most apt and fitting description of all the characters featured in the film is given by a hysterical hustling Negress who states: "We all niggas, nigga." Indeed, if anyone needs evidence that the United States has its own Third World, one only needs to view Forty Deuce. The only exception is a bourgeois John named Mr. Roper – who is ironically yet strangely fittingly played by recently deceased conservative commentator Andrew Breitbart's father-in-law Orson Bean (Anatomy of a Murder, Being John Malkovich) – a snide and significantly arrogant businessman who may look at the teenage boys he blows as trash, but he has no problem fondling their flesh, even admitting, "I derive the most intense pleasure from knowing that your body is being purchased in the same way as toothpaste or a pair of shoes. It's tit for tat, kids. Our tyranny as opposed to yours," so it is only all the more hilarious when the two lead male prostitutes trick the hotshot queen into committing accidental necrophilia and attempt to frame him for the death of a young boy.

Interestingly, most of the second half of Forty Deuce utilizes a split-screen that was first employed by Paul Morrissey's in the Warhol collaboration Chelsea Girls (1966). The split-screen is especially effective in that it underscores the bodacious bamboozling of the two hustlers and the pretentious claptrap of cryto-degenerate client Mr. Roper. Needless to say, Forty Deuce is a much starker and less jocular work than most of Morrissey's other realist campy comedies. Indeed, Kevin Bacon may have played a sadistic sodomite of the pederast persuasion in Sleepers (1996) directed by Barry Levinson, a phantasmagorical rapist in Paul Verhoeven's Hollow Man (2000), and a cunning child molester in Nicole Kassell's The Woodsman (2004), but none of these roles compare to all-encompassing filthiness of his cock-chomping, con-artist character in Forty Deuce. But then again, Orson Bean steals the show in the film as the posh and polished pervert character of Mr. Roper who not only lies to his bought boy toys about his reasoning for frequenting Manhattan ghettos, but ultimately lies to himself, until the moment he is carefully caressing an adolescent cadaver. That being said, I would not be surprised if Mr. Roper was designed as Paul Morrissey's filmic alter-ego because as an articulate, professionally-dressed, cultured, and conservative fellow, he is certainly the character most closest to his physical and mental likeliness out any film he as ever made. With a befitting score by Cameroonian musician Manu Dibango and a racially diverse cast of drug-dealing derelicts including a Puerto Rican that speaks Yiddish and racist blacks that make drug deals with white fags, Forty Deuce is an engulfing exposition of the multicultural sewer that is archetypically liberal New York City.

MIXED BLOOD

One of the reasons that I thoroughly enjoy gritty urban crime films is because I often times find them to be gregariously gratifying and unintentionally hilarious. When I found out about Paul Morrissey's black comedy crime flick Mixed Blood – a work chock-full of politically incorrect racial tensions and multicultural sociopathic juvenile career criminals – I was fairly intrigued, as I have come to love the cynical gritty realism of the director's Warhol produced Trash trilogy (Flesh, Trash, Heat) and his politically satiric Monster films (Flesh for Frankenstein, Blood for Dracula). After watching Mixed Blood, I must admit that I was more than delighted by the flick, as I surely can't remember the last time I "laughed out loud" while watching a film. Despite wickedly laughing throughout my viewing of Mixed Blood, I still wonder whether or not all of the somewhat ambiguous scenes featured in the film were intended to be capricious (I assume a little of both). After all, Mixed Blood features a variety of ethnic actors with heavy accents and nonexistent (yet charming) acting skills. The plot of Mixed Blood centers around two rival ethnic gangs – one composed of recently arrived underage illegal aliens (people described by the mainstream media as "undocumented workers") from Brazil and another composed of vicious Puerto Ricans – who battle for criminal (drug trafficking) control of New York City's Lower East Side. The Brazilian gang is led by Rita La Punta (aka the bitch), a middle-aged Mary Magdalene-like figure who controls the gang of ruthless and underage gangsters. Although she acts as a pseudo-mother to the boys of her gang, she also has a bastard biological son (whose father is unknown) named Thiago; a boy that is clearly mentally retarded (an unflattering fact Rita openly admits and regrets). The actress that plays Rita, Marilia Pera, is probably best known in the cinema world for her performance in Hector Babenco's Pixote (1981). When one of Rita's beloved adolescent hoods meets a grizzly death via being thrown off a roof by members of the Puerto Rican gang, she realizes that she must wage a war against the rival (but somewhat) similar race. As Rita dramatically states in Mixed Blood, "There Will be Blood."

If there ever was a crime film that dramatized the murderous dangers of urban race-mixing, it is the fittingly titled film Mixed Blood. Anti-heroine Rita has no reservations when she states the following regarding miscegenation, "Never mix blood." Over a quarter-century after Mixed Blood was released, racial tensions have only intensified for the worst in the (especially urban) Occidental world. Of course, Rita is not the only character featured in the film that despises other races, as every race is attacked by virtually every character in Mixed Blood; with whites being described as "whitefaces" and musical Puerto Ricans being labeled as "Spanish Negroes." In Paul Morrissey's Andy Warhol produced Trash Trilogy, the admittedly conservative director lampooned the absurdity of the hedonistic

“counter-culture” revolution, drug addiction, free sex, and “women’s liberation.” In Mixed Blood, a film created over a decade after the final chapter in the original trilogy was released, Morrissey unabashedly foretells the crime-ridden virtual hellhole that would bloom like an army of weeds in a flower bed as a result of third world immigration (a direct result of the 1965 Immigration Reform Act proposed by hypocritical Zionist politician Emmanuel Celler and heavily supported by degenerate senator Ted Kennedy) and nihilistic race-mixing. The unspoken fact that multiculturalism advocates don’t dare ever mention – which is a central theme to Mixed Blood – is that so called minorities almost exclusively become victims of crime and terror from fellow minorities, and not from the distinctly (or so Hollywood tells us) and mystically evil white man. Of course, one must accept this largely forgotten biblical truth: for the life of every creature is its blood (Leviticus 17:14) – whether the collectively neurotic and illiberally-liberal sick members of white American and Northern/Western Europe acknowledge it or not – as virtually all other races and life forms do. In the urban nightmare contained within Mixed Blood, race-hate is in its most primitive, yet hilarious form. One of the funniest scenes occurs early on in the film when a black female cop approaches a drug dealer who has a line of buyers that crowd a city block. After inquiring about his blatantly illegal activities, the dealer retorts to the cop, “What the hell are you talking about you nigger bitch.....dyke.” Not long after, the cop visits Rita who also calls her a dyke. Naturally, racial and sexual discrimination are not the only things that make Mixed Blood an uproarious piece of black comedy crime cinema. One of the funniest characters in the film is Thiago – Rita’s delightfully dimwitted son – a young man who repeatedly states variations of the following when he is under the suspicion that a person is poking fun at him, “Don’t make fun of me, I don’t like it.” When it comes to unconventionally charismatic criminal speds, Mixed Blood generously delivers.

Like most crime-related films, Mixed Blood features a couple alphas and a bunch of betas, but of a totally unorthodox sort. Clearly, the greatest alpha featured in the film is Rita – a woman who leads a gang of underage boys from the comfort of her decrepit apartment; the intellectual epicenter of her crudely, but carefully assembled criminal enterprise. Like the equally exotic Anna Magnani (Mamma Roma, The Fugitive Kind), Rita is sexually alluring despite her overused and rapidly deteriorating flesh. Obviously, being a woman that has bedded uncountable men, Rita knows how to mentally manipulate youthful boys into executing her criminal demands. Juan, an alpha in the Puerto Rican gang, controls his men in a more masculine way – establishing authority via violent verbal and physical assault. During a particularly jocular scene in Mixed Blood, Juan states to one of his philistine henchmen, “Who the fuck washes his hands then takes a piss? Only a no brain spick would do something like this....I’m the only that tells you how to piss.” Indeed, Juan rules with a unruly black-market iron fist, ruthlessly mutilating and murdering rival gang members just for kicks. To say the least, Mixed Blood is a counter-revolutionary vintage crime film with a certain authenticity that you won't find in Hollywood. Additionally, Mixed Blood is a wonderfully zany work that celebrates multiculturalism in a most honest way by valiantly portraying the true colors of a color-clashing urban dystopia. Instead of offering silly hope like the repulsively sentimental work Crash (2004), Mixed Blood condemns multiculturalism (the word itself being an oxymoron) and its culture-destroying tendencies (The failure of the USSR and Yugoslavia have proven this). Like Paul Morrissey's previous films, Mixed Blood is more relevant today than when it was originally released. Unlike your typical Hollywood crime, Mixed Blood neglects to romanticize the urban proletarian criminal world, but, instead, shows it for what it is; a group of uneducated individuals who irrationally see crime as the only way to survive. The film also features John Leguizamo's first credited film role, thus foreshadowing his fairly successful acting career in Hollywood crime films. Equipped with a complimentary and highly festive soundtrack, Mixed Blood is a truly vibrant (despite the ultra-realistic gritty anti-aesthetic used by Morrissey) and uncompromising black comedy crime drama that is a fine anti-tribute to the third-worldization of the United States. I will end this review with some words of wisdom from Rita, "You must always do what your mother says."

BEETHOVEN'S NEPHEW
BEETHOVEN'S NEPHEW

Paul Morrissey (1985)

Without a doubt, Beethoven's Nephew (1985) aka Le neveu de Beethoven is the most stoically serious and professionally produced film ever directed by iconoclastic Roman Catholic and self-described conservative auteur Paul Morrissey (Flesh, Madame Wang's) – a 'counter-revolutionary' filmmaker whose talents only increased and whose films became all the more personal the more he moved away from his ex-collaborator Andy Warhol. A French-West German co-production that was, quite inexplicably, co-penned by talented French-German actor Mathieu Carrière (Young Törless, Malina), who also stars in the film in a more minor role, Beethoven's Nephew, not unsurprisingly, is oftentimes compared to the big budget, Academy Award winning Hollywood film Amadeus (1984) directed by Miloš Forman, yet despite having a much lower budget work and being a work that is barely recognized in the United States, Morrissey's film goes to much greater extremes in giving a damning and demystifying depiction of the great German composer and his curious relationship with his nephew, so it is no surprise that it ultimately caused many modern day krauts to be sour, or as the director stated himself, "Beethoven was pure Molière, a character of lunacy and exaggeration, not the Shakespearean hero that the Germans now pretend. That was widely known during his lifetime." Indeed, if one were to judge the perturbing portrayal of the seemingly megalomaniac of a maestro in Beethoven's Nephew, it is easy to see how the rapist/murderer anti-hero Alex from Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange (1971) was able to find a kindred spirit in the music of Beethoven. Utilizing Jacques Brenner's 1957 fictional memoir of Karl van Beethoven – a work largely rooted in fact that portrays the composer's nephew as a helpless victim of his famous uncle – but especially the groundbreaking work Beethoven's Nephew aka Il Nipote di Beethoven (1972) written by Italian author Luigi Magnani and excerpts from the composer's own personal letters, Beethoven's Nephew portrays the composer as crazy a crank of a cripple whose talent for music is totally transcended by his obsession with his young nephew and hatred of the boy's ostensibly whorish mother. A man who was apparently described by his own brother as having an, "almost total incapacity to have normal relationships with other people," and who charged his patrons to watch him hedonistically gorge himself as if he were the bastard great-great-great-great-grandfather of Hermann Göring, the mad maestro is tragicomedically depicted in Beethoven's Nephew – one of only a handful of films that manages to portray the unflattering connection between pure genius and sheer madness as a sort of idiot savant pathology – as a possessive pervert who does not think twice about physically manhandling his nephew away when the lad has his member intertwined in a voluptuous housemaid's meat-curtain.

As a lifelong listener of the Teutonic composer himself, director Paul Morrissey has hypothesized that the new emotionalism in Beethoven's late quartets and the choral finale of his Ninth Symphony was the feeling of passionate love he had developed for his nephew and this is communicated aesthetically in the film in the following fashion as described by the auteur himself, "When Beethoven looks at his nephew, his emotions are not spoken but heard on the soundtrack, the emotions of the idealized music." Of course, as an aberrant authoritarian of sorts, Beethoven would also inevitably drive his nephew to attempt committing suicide by shooting himself in the head. As one learns while watching Beethoven's Nephew, Beethoven (Wolfgang Reichmann of Werner Herzog's Signs of Life (1968) aka Lebenszeichen and Woyzeck (1979)) completely and utterly hated his sister-in-law Johanna (Serge Gainsbourg 's one-time muse Jane Birkin), so when his brother Carl died of tuberculosis, he managed to take custody of his nephew Karl (Dietmar Prinz in his first and sole movie role) after a protracted legal battle against his brother's wanton widow, who, in part, was denied custody due to her dubious morals (she has an illegitimate child with another man and was a convicted thief) and lack of financial support. In Beethoven's Nephew, the maestro wastes no time in coddling and constantly looking after his proto-twink nephew, which rather annoys the lad as he has no life of his own and certainly does not have the talent to be the great musical composer his uncle wants him to be. Even when Karl manages to move away and go to private school, the unhinged uncle follows him along and even walks in on the boy and his friends engaging in smutty sex-capades in their dorm room, which naturally enrages Beethoven, but he gets all the more huffy and puffy when he realizes that his nephew is regularly seeing his mother – a high-class harlot who fornicates with men not much older than her son. Aside from his nephew, who the composer wastes a small fortune on to pay for his school and hyper-hedonistic lifestyle, Beethoven treats everyone around him as objects and obstacles to be manipulated for his own personal gain, and eventually he begins writing new music just so he can earn money from his patrons and spend it on things related to Karl's lavish lifestyle. When Karl falls hopelessly in love with an older woman named Leonore (Nathalie Baye of François Truffaut's Day for Night (1973) and the hit AIDS-themed TV movie And the Band Played On (1993)) who is a wealthy artist, the boy has finally managed to find a way to get away from his softcore sadist of an uncle, so Beethoven plots to irrevocably destroy the relationship. Finally fed up with the way his Uncle has dominated his personal life and has cock-blocked him innumerable times, Karl attempts suicide via bullet to the head, but miraculously survives. Using his uncle's weakness for him against him, Karl inevitably has the last laugh...even if he never laughs. In Paul Morrissey's mind, as well as apparently many Germans around the maestro's time, it was, quite ironically, nephew Karl who led to Herr Ludwig van Beethoven's worldly demise.

BEETHOVEN'S NEPHEW

While many viewers have described Beethoven's Nephew as a homophile work portraying Beethoven as an incestuous pederast of sorts who has a hysterical hatred of women, including The New York Times star critic Vincent Canby, who described the film as being, "full of homoerotic nuances," Paul Morrissey has vehemently denied what he sees as outright outrageous allegations. In fact, concerning the dubious dynamic of the one-sided relationship by the marvelously moonstruck maestro and his mostly emotionally monotone nephew in Beethoven's Nephew, Morrissey stated, "It's inconceivable to think that Beethoven wanted sex with his nephew. That's a "liberal," Freudian idea. I never thought this. There was no eroticism. What he seemed to want was what Frankenstein and Dracula wanted, control and possession. That's a much more powerful and confusing emotion. And although he never said it, maybe some kind of affection. His concerns with his nephew had more to do with his nephew's maturing, the reality that he was growing up and would no longer be under his control...Wanting to control life makes him more sympathetic to me, a conservative, because remember, to me sex is the stupid religion of the "liberal." In none of my films has sex ever been anything that anybody ever "wanted." To read Beethoven's motives as sexual is to swallow the pervasive liberal lie that sex is not just a positive value but the entire meaning of life on the planet! When you believe that lie, naturally it follows that all behavior gravitates towards that goal."

Indeed, considering virtually all of Paul Morrissey's films feature some sort of handsome, if not sadly strung-out, hunk in some form of undress, it would be easy to see that the filmmaker was living vicariously through the authoritarian anti-hero of Beethoven's Nephew – a darkly comical and romantic cinematic work featuring what is one of the most unhealthy uncle-nephew relationships ever captured on celluloid, yet executed with the sort of restrained subtlety of the silent era. Like the other famous Morrissey of Irish stock, many believe that Paul Morrissey has led a life of (Catholic) celibacy and his former collaborator Andy Warhol seems to have thought the same thing, writing, "The running question was, did he [Paul Morrissey] have a sex life or not? Everyone who'd ever known him insisted that he did absolutely nothing, and all his hours seemed accounted for, but still Paul was an attractive guy, so people constantly asked, 'What does he do? He must do something...,' yet no one seems to know what that "something" was as we only have his films as evidence and if something thing can be said about Beethoven's Nephew, it is that the director must really love Beethoven's music and looks nostalgically on the good old days of Occidental high kultur and when men taught their sons (or, in this case, nephews) responsibility and discipline, like staying away from salacious young ladies with syphilis. Even though Morrissey portrayed Beethoven as a belligerent and boorish bastard of a man in Beethoven's Nephew, the auteur ultimately, "was always entirely sympathetic to Beethoven. I feel sorry for him because he was the victim of his own selfishness.

I like the story because there's such a connection between his music and his life. I was struck by the fact that Beethoven never pontificated about his music. He'd say it was the best and then leave it at that. That was the one little area in which he was secure. Otherwise he was blind, helpless, a little like Mister Magoo. This makes him very human, even sympathetic." Indeed, one cannot help respect a man who is best known for depicting impotent hunk hustlers in a heroin haze and being the 'Warhol Factory Filmmaker,' yet finding a kindred spirit of sorts in Beethoven. In our contemporary zeitgeist where the popular nasty noise that is played on MTV and Hollywood movies that are written by proud pimps, crack-heads and dope fiends, clownish would-be-Whores of Babylon, enfant terrible twinkies that sound like Negress soul singers, braindead pothead metalheads who drown their musical ineptitude in distortion, white trash wiggers who confuse spastic illiteracy with poetry, and so-called country singers who throw up if they ever smelled a steaming cow turd, Beethoven's Nephew makes for a classy work of cinema that reminds one that there was actually a time when a person could actually have 'too much concern' for the welfare of their kin.

SPIKE OF BENSONHURST

Paul Morrissey (1988)

Admittedly, I have a soft-spot for Italian-American greaseballs, especially when they are as ill-tempered, self-centered, and idiotic yet charismatic as the character Spike Fumo (played by Roman-like Sasha Mitchell; a man of Russian-Jewish descent) featuring in the Paul Morrissey film Spike of Bensonhurst (1988) aka The Mafia Kid. On top of being blessed with mostly Italian blood (he is $\frac{1}{4}$ Irish), Spike has a mother who is dabbling in lipstick lesbianism and an inmate father who is taking the rap for local mafia boss Baldo Cacetti (Ernest Borgnine), who apparently brutalized some hookers that were really male cops in drag. An ambitious young man who dreams of being a professional boxer, even if the fights are rigged, Spike fancies and inevitably impregnates blonde-haired Italian princess Angel (Maria Pitillo); the daughter of Mr. Cacetti. Although the small-time Mafioso likes Spike as an individual, he sees the aspiring boxer as nowhere good enough for his daughter, thus banishing the soon-to-be-father of his grandson to Red Hook, Brooklyn; a rough Puerto Rican neighborhood full of impoverishment, gutter-level criminality, and mafia-inflicted vice. Undoubtedly, Paul Morrissey's most accessible and conventional film to date, even if it is positively politically incorrect, Spike of Bensonhurst – which is like Rocky (1976) meets Baby It's You (1983) meets Mixed Blood (1985) in its urban multicultural melodrama, except with a more sophisticated sociopolitical subtext – should at least be as popular as John Hughes' films like The Breakfast Club (1985) and Pretty in Pink (1986) as it is certainly a 1980s cult comedy of the highest caliber, yet is only championed by those individuals that are blessed enough to have seen it. More confident, slightly more intelligent, and assuredly more ambitious than Rocky Balboa, Spike Fumo takes crime boss Baldo Cacetti's advice: "You're Italian... You gotta go out in the world and make something of yourself." Unfortunately for Mr. Cacetti, Spike's personal aspirations are bad for the family; both criminal and personal.

The Cosa Nostra neighborhood of "Little Italy" Bensonhurst, Brooklyn in Spike of Bensonhurst is not exactly same as it was during the early 20th century when it was a haven for less than prosperous Italian and Jewish immigrants. Indeed, the Dago district is still full of Italians and a couple Jews, but they now are an integral part of mainstream America, especially when it comes to left-wing political influence. Even the local Mafioso Baldo Cacetti admits he runs a respectable front, remarking to Spike of Bensonhurst protagonist Spike, "Hey, I even support the liberal politicians... All that garbage." It is mentioned in the film that one of the mafia boys even goes to a Live Aid to heighten the absurdity of bourgeois 'boldness, bluster, swagger' in this extraordinary wop-exploitation flick. When protagonist Spike is exiled by Mr. Cacetti to the Puerto Rican neighborhood of Red Hook – a place of pandemic poverty, hungry children, and low-life drug dealers – he is transported to virtual old school Little Italy where a new generation of foreign tan people hope to achieve the American dream just like his Sicilian ancestors did only a couple generations ago. The Puerto Ricans are the ‘new Guineas’ and egomaniacal, machoman Spike sees it as his duty to civilize them by teaching the block’s children the ‘Brooklyn alphabet’ (“Fuckin’ A, Fuckin’ B, Fuckin’ C...”) and by beating up dawdler drug dealers, which inevitably catches the attention of Mr. Cacetti, who finances and profits from the drug operation in the neighborhood. Almost immediately upon relocating to Red Hook, Spike moves in with rival boxer Bandana’s (Rick Aviles) family, which is actively promoted by the grande dame (Antonia Rey) of the household, who cites great Italian heroes like “Caesar” and “Mussolini” as a sign of her deep admiration for the Italian people. Bandana’s mother is not the only one that likes narcissistic newcomer Spike because soon the Italian stallion has impregnated the daughter of the house, India (Talisa Soto), who was named in tribute to brown-people-liberator Mahatma Gandhi. Saucy Spike makes no qualms about expressing his sense of superiority to Bandana and his people, stating quite shamelessly, “seeing as I come from a more advanced culture as yourself, I want to tell you that we Italians would never let ourselves become the victims of these politicians and good damned drug dealers like you people. Forget about it!” Despite attending a Bar Mitzvah for the son of corrupt congressman Bernstein that is full of Mafioso’s, little does Spike realize, that it is his goombah crime boss relatives and family friends who are pumping drugs into the neighborhoods and in bed with (both literally and figuratively) the corrupt liberal politicians that he so thoroughly and vocally despises. In the end, hardheaded Spike, the son of a “Sicilian lowlife,” is able to reconcile the differences from his less than esteeming blood relations (his own mother calls him a “Pussy. Asshole. Fuck..”) and his adopted, less economically advantaged yet more loving Puerto Rican family.
