day with a stomach churning combination of coffee and old pizza crusts. From this average day, his first visit into the static-clouded Videodrome emerges as the first conflict for Max Renn other than his pugnacious style of life. After revealing Nicki Brand to Videodrome in an effort to peak her sexual climate, she becomes strangely aroused by the tape and seduces an unsure James Woods into emitting pain and pleasure, although the two become confused by scenes end. When the time comes for Videodrome to sink into psyches and initiate abnormal growth while subliminally annihilating lucid eroticism, the perspective of Max Renn is severely damaged and left in non-working order. From these all-seeing eyes, he's been converted to an assassin for Videodrome while Nicki Brand, who was also infected, became a seductive symbiote of Videodrome. Her eventual transcendence to digitized flesh is left to the viewers mind to possibly piece together a plot to tell of Max's implied techno-enlightenment. Only then will some answers be solved and many more will be asked. To be perfectly blunt and obtrusive, the philosophy of life prioritized on television is soul sapping and Videodrome's showcasing of technology depleting humanity came before the reality show boom of the 90s and 00s. As charted with the last sentence, the reasoning of Videodrome is more or less prophetic past the further use of an idea called "reality." Depending on the mindset of the viewer at hand, Videodrome may shock/offend you, intimidate you, excite you, and trample you down with the eclectic bevy of forbidden titillation. There's a reason that Videodrome is never explained to those who haven't experienced such a far out film as itself. The experience itself is something of a pinnacle in retrofuturism and the clandestine approach to disputing manipulation in both sexes. It often reverberates ideas of a gender war, all stemming from sexual confusion and assertive hypnosis. "At the end, he was convinced that public life on television...was more than private life in the flesh. He wasn't afraid to let his body die." With these words, It becomes ever apparent that Max Renn is an abasement of flesh and he must be purged. Videodrome is the future of video technology in its own reality and in ours. It might be David Cronenberg's single masterwork and his most frightening experiment.

THE FLY

David Cronenberg* (1986)

David Cronenberg's The Fly is the director's biggest box office success. It is also Cronenberg's most accessible film for mainstream moviegoers. Cronenberg succeeded in creating an original sci-fi masterpiece. Keep in mind that The Fly is a remake of the 1958 Vincent price classic. David Cronenberg was the right man for the remake job. I generally hate remakes. Especially remakes from the horror and sci-fi genre. Remakes in these genres (especially horror) are for the most part guaranteed moneymakers. The sad thing is that newer generations of horror fans know more about remakes (Texas Chainsaw Massacre, The Hills Have Eyes, Dawn of the Dead) than they do the original films. The majority of these films completely destroy the significance and strengths of the originals. Cronenberg lends his psychosexual auteur touch to The Fly resulting in a worthy remake. Like Stanley Kubrick, Cronenberg transforms a film's source material into his own unique vision. Cinema offers the grand opportunity of unique vision. Directors like David Cronenberg use it to their advantage. Most directors are just worried about the paycheck. Jeff Goldblum stars as scientist Seth Brundle in The Fly. Goldblum was the appropriate choice for playing the eccentric and fast talking scientist. Brundle is obsessed with international notoriety and fame. A man that wants to change how people use transportation in the world. He also is also sometimes half asses in his ambitions. This eventually results in Brundle getting drunk and becoming a hybrid of man and fly. Like most of Cronenberg's film, The Fly features monstrous sexual flesh. Brundle's love interest (played by Geena Davis) dreams that she gives birth to a gigantic maggot. Cronenberg has always had an obsession with gynecology (see Dead Ringers). He could even be called the Sigmund Freud of horror. Only David Cronenberg could find sexual elements in typewriters (Naked Lunch), infections (Shivers), car wreck injuries (Crash), and VHS tapes (Videodrome). The world of David Cronenberg is much darker than his nerdy exterior displays.

The Fly is one of the best sci-fi films of the 1980s. David Cronenberg was able to successfully make the transition from underground subversive horror director to mainstream director. He has shown no sign of halting of lengthy career. A History of Violence and Eastern Promises (which I think is one of his greatest films) is a testament to that.

DEAD RINGERS

David Cronenberg* (1988)

There really is something metaphysically empowering about the role of a male gynecologist. It comes off as a sexist protective role played out for dire love of the other sex, but it can also be seen as a voyeuristic sense of comatose induced empowerment. David Cronenberg has covered many things in his films, but none of them have been as sexually charged as this film. Dead Ringers is a film concerning twin gynecologists, the womanizing Elliot and the peepish Beverly. The past is not explained about these characters due to their own psychic link they share. This is a common theory that is brought up on the subject of twins. It hasn't been proven, but it hasn't been disproven. When an illustrious actress enters their life with a mysterious vaginal mutation, their identities swirl into a concoction of sexual deviance, surgical nightmares, and family bonds. Dead Ringers is a vastly important film due to many things. One of them is its own set pieces. Cronenberg had constructed designs for the most horrifying, and ghoulish vaginal instruments; even worthy for a H.R. Giger drawing. The principal duo was based off of Stewart and Cyril Marcus. Jeremy Irons plays the role of a century as two brothers, each with their own personality, but linked together as a similar soul. No one else could have pulled this role off, but I wouldn't mind seeing a version starring Alan Rickman. A film that features gynecologists are as rare as they come. This film is unforgettable. While being a personal masterpiece of Cronenberg's, it does suffer mixed pacing; pacing that is only forgiven with its mammoth ending. Personal identity is the issue at hand in this film. The similar concept of twin souls was brought up more in depth in Richard Kelly's Southland Tales. The genre here is a confused one. Dead Ringers can be regarded as a realist science fiction, or even a black drama, teeming with Cronenberg's trademarked body horror themes. Dead Ringers is hands down Cronenberg's best film. It features a sadistic score that compliments the fruits of labor passed on by Irons. He notes every emotion by including key colors in the film that rub off on you, leaving you emotionally marked. Women with teeth in their vagina is not scary, but women with a mutant vagina IS scary. See this instead of any post-feminist shit. This is a film about sorrow, not shock.

M. BUTTERFLY

David Cronenberg* (1993)

David Cronenberg's film M. Butterfly is a very different direction for this Canadian director. I might be daft enough to consider this a period-piece. In this drama, it follows the downfall of two lovers who can question their own destiny and the worst betrayal to commit. The plot builds around two characters leaving the supporting actors hanging dry. Jeremy Irons plays René Gallimard, a diplomat stationed in Beijing, where he works his job to the best of his ability, while cruising to parties with his bland wife. Things begin to pick up when he meets Song, an opera performer. It is then that he is launched into a colorful world of cultural clashes, treason, sexual longing, and deceit. Through all of this plot comes the perfect end to an almost perfect story. I must keep the plot summarization short as to not give away any of this film's secret. Cronenberg made this film based loosely off the classical play Madame Butterfly. The original writer wrote the screenplay off of his own play for the screen. The film features as usual, Jeremy Irons best performance and when i say this, i mean every performance is his best. Ranging from a love story (M. BUTTERFLY), an action film (DIE HARD: WITH A VENGEANCE), to a surrealist nightmare (DEAD RINGERS). No one can argue with his strict tone of voice but some how manages to play a bottom feeder with ease. Alternating his stance upon the issues through out the movie, he plays a sincere man whose life is of no importance, to a love stricken man, who then hits rock bottom. It is an achievement to watch this film and not feel any emotion. Such a film directed with the utmost care would be the very creation of M. Butterfly. No aspect goes to waste in this romantic drama, but as all films have their problems, this one does to. The main problem is that it is too forced and cut into a regular major motion picture run time. This film would have been just at home with a double VHS set as a four hour epic. Not only does this not pose too much of a threat, but it makes it more available to be seen from a larger audience. M. Butterfly is an epic love story that shows no boundaries and doesn't wallow in it's excess. Grappled into your mind, it doesn't leave your attention long after the sorrowful ending. Highly recommended for those with a soft spot or just a taste for masterful directing.

David Cronenberg* (1999)

The majority of eXistenZ can be attributed to the aesthetic and visual motifs seen throughout Cronenberg's career spanning such volumes of bio-synthetic lasciviousness as Naked Lunch, Videodrome, and Crash. Much of eXistenZ's imagery can be spotted in many of Cronenberg's earlier works from the mutated corporate espionage of Naked Lunch to the anti-technology sentiments of Videodrome. It's where these influences of projects past really adhere eXistenZ into such an exquisite category. You see, eXistenZ was released around a month after The Matrix premiered. The Matrix was one of those films whose vibrations through word-of-mouth increased at an alarming rate, sent screaming off into every magazine, catalog, and film connoisseurs mouth. Lucky for us then, now we have eXistenZ all to ourselves. It really is a shame though, especially since Inception seems to have borrowed many pockets of ambiguity and reality-twisting turns from Cronenberg's more coherent film and has only reached a fraction of the acclaim.

What's interesting to me is Jude Law's performance of Ted Pikul in eXistenZ. Having the much maligned Repo Men fresh in my thoughts, both characters are set on a similar stream of avoidance and violence, although one is less passive and merciless than the other. In Repo Men, the comparison can be drawn at the plot fixture of bio-organics. The pricing is irrelevant and not to be found in eXistenZ but the means to achieve technological and psychotropic escapism through synthetic flesh is where the lines meet. For the perfect antithesis of video games and the need to immerse oneself into a fantastical world of digital manipulation, avoid films like Stay Alive and stick with Cronenberg's definitive demonizing of console gaming. For those uneducated to eXistenZ, the film opens up quickly in the midst of a trial seminar to world famous game designer, Allegra Geller, showcasing her newest game, eXistenZ. By utilizing neural-sensors in a squid-like host, Allegra Gellar connects each "game pod" with umbilical cords wired in through Bio-Ports, located in the base of the "victims" spine. From here is where the film spins wildly, leaving you clawing at conceptions of what is real and what isn't. Soon after the game is launched, an assassin reveals a weapon constructed out of tattered flesh and bone to execute the "demoness, Allegra Geller."

Soon aspiring PR Ted Pikul is on the run with a wounded game designer with a contract on her head. This is where eXistenZ slips in and out of dream states as many questions are raised inquiring as to which reality is the game and which is the real world. Cronenberg makes excellent theoretical terror out of a virtual hallucination that will no doubt be emulated in the far future. Just think, what if Nintendo's Virtual Boy did what it intended to do? I'm not referring to headaches either. Later on in the film, minuscule evolved pseudo-Mugwumps appear to Jude Law's immediate surprise. eXistenZ is a strange delight in this manner which crossbreeds Cronenberg's best into a universal piece of science-fiction. What developed as Interzone in Naked Lunch is later created by the hivemind program, eXistenZ, in the realization of the Trout Farm. Various extraterrestrial beasts are dissected in a crude and seedy manner. A manner in which will spark a craving to shower. The dingy plastic sheeting only adds to the slimy sensation that rolls right off the screen. Given these examples, eXistenZ could be considered Cronenberg's filmic concept of a Greatest Hits album - a scrapbook, if you will.

What eXistenZ provides is a galvanizing science-fiction odyssey that indeed tips the scales in the favor of gamers. Had you never experimented with gaming, most of the thematic way-points of eXistenZ will fall upon deaf ears. Cronenberg continues to promote hard fact as to his status of auteur. Viewing a single scene in any film of his will immediately draw a conclusion to being "Cronenbergian." It's a shame that The Matrix shadowed the release of eXistenZ as it is the superior virtual plane of existence. What eXistenZ accomplished dutifully in a single film took The Matrix three films to match, but to the point of a wilting franchise. Cronenberg's world of meta-flesh continues to amaze and feed that which hungers morbidly inside us. Faults may be found in the constantly evolving world of eXistenZ but like any great game, isn't perfect. It's scenes like Jude Law's constructing of "the special" into a skeletal weapon that make Cronenberg's cinema into the force of grotesque vitality that they remain to this day.

AT THE SUICIDE OF THE LAST JEW IN THE WORLD IN THE LAST CINEMA IN THE WORLD AT THE SUICIDE OF THE LAST JEW IN THE WORLD IN THE LAST CINEMA IN THE WORLD

David Cronenberg* (2007)

During the Nazi occupation of Europe, many prominent Jewish intellectuals - who refused to be enslaved by a movement that openly declared its goal of making the white world 100% Jew-free - simply committed suicide. German-Jewish intellectual Walter Benjamin, a quasi-Marxist of the Frankfurt school variety, intentionally overdosed on morphine pills at the Spanish-French border after realizing his plan to escape to the United States had fallen to pieces. Austrian philosopher Egon Friedell, who unlike Walter Benjamin, had a deep admiration for European culture (as exemplified in his three volume series Cultural History of the Modern Age), jumped out of his window after two SA brownshirts attempted to arrest him. In the short film (approximately 4 minutes in length) At the Suicide of the Last Jew in the World in the Last Cinema in the World - for the first time - Canadian auteur David Cronenberg cinematically acknowledges his Jewish identity; unsurprisingly, in an apocalyptic scenario where the last Jew (David Cronenberg) dies in the last cinema in the world. Cronenberg created the short for To Each His Own Cinema, a film anthology commissioned for the 60th annual Cannes Film Festival. For To Each His Own Cinema, 36 acclaimed film directors from around the world were invited to express "their state of mind of the moment as inspired by the motion picture theatre." Upon directing the short, Cronenberg's mind was not exactly in the most pleasant of places, as he had just heard Hezbollah's mission statement entailing the annihilation of every living and breathing Jew. For his segment in To Each His Own Cinema - David Cronenberg plays himself - as the last living Jew in the world who is about to commit suicide in a lonely bathroom located in the last cinema in the world. Being arguably the greatest living Jewish filmmaker, it is no surprise that the exterminators would leave Cronenberg to die last. Naturally, Steven Spielberg and Michael Bay were probably the first to go.

As blacklisted Jewish-American scholar Norman Finkelstein mentioned in the documentary Defamation, there is no reason to expect another Holocaust anytime in the near future. Of course, in At the Suicide of the Last Jew in the World in the Last Cinema in the World, the viewer experiences a fictional dystopian portrait of the future - where Zion has fallen from grace and Uncle Adolf's New Order plan for the Twentieth Century has been revamped and finally realized. David Cronenberg, a reform Jew who grew up in an assimilated middle-class Jewish Canadian family, acknowledges in his segment for To Each His Own Cinema, that whether he likes it or not, he is a Jew. As Cronenberg stated upon directing At the Suicide of the Last Jew in the World in the Last Cinema in the World, "I've never thought of myself as a Philip Roth whose subject was his Jewishness, but I've never denied it." Surely, Cronenberg has found more influence in the collected works of William S. Burroughs than in the texts of the Talmud, yet the Canadian auteur has accepted that his self-professed enemies (Hezbollah) will always regard him as a Jew. Cronenberg also stated regarding Hezbollah, "It's pretty interesting to hear someone say our goal is to kill every Jew in the world wherever they are. That means me and my children. It does evoke a reaction.", hence his reasoning as to why he decided to direct such a stark and dreary short. In At the Suicide of the Last Jew in the World in the Last Cinema in the World, Cronenberg's last miserable minutes of life are captured by the fictional future MBT channel AutoBioCam. The commentators in the short treat Cronenberg's suicide as if they are commenting on a college baseball game, throwing out ignorant and ultimately erroneous speculation (describing him as a Hungarian filmmaker) on the director's filmmaking career. No doubt, with this short, Cronenberg is poking fun at the mechanical and automaton-like manner in which contemporary news broadcasters present death and catastrophe in World News. After all, David Cronenberg is the man that brought us the psychosexual Sci-Fi masterpiece Videodrome, a film that artistically illuminates the danger in regards to television blurring the lines between virtual reality and live flesh. Unsurprisingly, Cronenberg directed At The Suicide of the Last Jew in the World in the Last Cinema in the World in a manner that, just like a rundown of the day's sports stats, emotionally disassociates the viewer from the fact the last Jew in the world - who is blatantly in a state of great psychological pain - is about to die. It was certainly Cronenberg's intention that the short - despite showing a man on the verge of offing himself - provokes about the same emotional response in the viewer that a Hot Pockets commercial would.

Despite dealing with mostly horror, science fiction, and supernatural works throughout his filmmaking career, David Cronenberg has unwaveringly revealed his peculiar personality under the translucent veil of his blatantly psychosexual films. One film professor (William Beard) even went as far as to write an unflattering book (The Artist as Monster: The Cinema of David Cronenberg) that proclaims Cronenberg is the true monster of his films. Monster or not, in At the Suicide of the last Jewish in the World in the Last Cinema in the World, Cronenberg becomes both the victim and perpetrator of his own premature demise. In a way, the short is Cronenberg's most revealing work (uncovering his greatest fears), showing the director showing a phallic-like gun in and out of his mouth in a most humiliating manner - as if he is being forced to perform fellatio on it against his will just seconds before the bullet blows through the barrel - ending his life in a most unwanted deadly climax - indubitably drenching the room in excessive amounts of bodily fluids. Anyways, if somehow an anti-Semitic movement consolidated total power in the world, one would hope that they would at least have the decency to spare master auteur David Cronenberg's irreplaceable life.

A DANGEROUS METHOD

David Cronenberg* (2011)

If any film has ever played out onscreen almost exactly as I imagined it would before viewing it, it is David Cronenberg's A Dangerous Method; a cinematic portrayal of the bizarre psychoanalytic love triangle between Aryan Christ Carl Gustav Jung (played by Michael Fassbender), the Rebbe of psychoanalysis; Sigmund Freud (played by Viggo Mortensen), and the young and thoroughly neurotic Jewess Sabina Spielrein (played by Keira Knightly). As someone who has read numerous books by Jung and his break with pseudo-father-figure Freud, I was quite surprised by the realistic (and often politically incorrect) portrayal of the inevitably doomed relationship between the two alpha-psychoanalysts. Like A Dangerous Method director David Cronenberg himself, Freud was a Jewish atheist who had a keen knack for sexualizing the most trivial of everyday situations and circumstances. Also like Cronenberg (and unlike their fellow perverted but more sexually ambitious Judaic kinsman Wilhelm Reich), Freud also tended to link man's greatest fears with the sexual. As fairly accurately portrayed in A Dangerous Method, C.G. Jung was annoyed by Freud's stern interest in incest and dogmatic anal fixations, thus the two eventually parted ways in a most irreparable way. Freud's jealousy over Jung's affair with his Jewish patient Sabina Spielrein would also prove to be detrimental to their already disintegrating relationship.

From the very beginning of A Dangerous Method, it is most apparent that Sigmund Freud is quite conscious of his Jewish identity and the alien Aryan society he lives in. One of the real-life Freud's heroes was Hannibal because like Carthaginian military commander, he saw himself as Semite who sought to destroy Occidental Civilization. Of course, Freud, being nothing more than a glamorized, penis-obsessed pencil pusher, attempted to battle Western Civilization by corrupting its morals through his less than kosher theories, especially in regard to sexuality. In A Dangerous Method, Freud's sheer resentment towards the Teuton man is more than obvious and even Jung is not excluded from his hatred. Due to the fact that the psychoanalytic movement was disproportionately Hebraic, Freud championed Jung as the chairman of the International Psychoanalytic Association so as to give the organization a more "Aryan Face." Cronenberg makes light of this fact (albeit, somewhat subtlety) in A Dangerous Method; no doubt a bold and totally anti-Hollywood gesture on his part. Of course, Freud's racial chauvinism becomes most glaring when he realizes that his goy boy protégé starts an affair with the kind of stunning Jewess that he could have only dreamed of as a young mensch in the ghetto. Freud sees fit to (in a dishonest fatherly manner) tell Spielrein that she should "never trust an Aryan" and that her affair with Jung is nothing more than the delusional pseudo-love of a Jewess fawning over a mystical Aryan "Siegfried."

It is undoubtedly an understatement for me to say that I was a bit weary of the thought of seeing stoic Dane Viggo Mortensen portraying a totally emasculated and hopelessly neurotic early 20th century Jewish intellectual yet he managed to pull it off the seemingly impossible in A Dangerous Method. Indeed, Mortensen looks like Freud on 'Roids yet he is versatile enough as an actor to mimic the stewing bitterness and growing quasi-schizoid paranoia of the Viennese psychoanalyst in an exceptionally believable way. It also does not hurt that Mortensen sports Freud's stereotypical beard. Naturally, just like all of his performances, Michael Fassbender does a notable job portraying young C.G. Jung; a man who has yet to grow as a great thinker in his own right. Only after his break with Freud and his deep immersion in Gnosticism did Jung develop into the highly revered thinker he is today. Fassbender portrays young Jung as a man torn between his allegiance to a somewhat hostile father figure and asserting his own budding original theories. Although his role as proto-hippie psychoanalyst Otto Grass is small, Vincent Cassell performance is also quite notable. Even as a Frenchman, Cassell brings the charming swarthy libertine routine to a new extreme in A Dangerous Method. To my surprise, Keira Knightly had me believing that she was as a neurotic Russian Jewess whose behavior ranges from the severely repellant and dangerously childish to sexually fetishistic and highly professional. That being said, not only is A Dangerous Method a cinematic introductory course in psychoanalytic history but also a work of romantic neo-Victorian decadence.

I have noticed that a lot of diehard David Cronenberg fans are somewhat disappointed by the Canadian filmmaker's more recent non-body-horror works. On the contrary, I found A Dangerous Method to be more subversive and ambitious than much of Cronenberg's earlier works as the film is merely more intricately packaged with a sleeker and subtler design. Sure, a small scene of sado-masochistic sex between Fassbender and Knightly may be the most visually offensive aspect of A Dangerous Method but the film tells an imperative story – the battle of two cultures and two peoples – a dichotomy about the history of psychoanalysis that even the most dedicated of psyche nerds have yet to understand. Over two decades after her fling with Freud and Jung, Sabina Spielrein was exterminated by SS Death Squad, Einsatzgruppe D in 1942. Although Freud laughed at Jung's insistence on the importance of myths, his young student would predict – through “dubious ancient Aryan myths” – the outcome of the National Socialist revolutionary via his infamous essay Wotan; a work that describes the Teutonic archetype and what role it would play in the awakening of the German “collective unconscious” (a term coined by Jung) and the war and destruction it would bring to Europe (and its enemies) as a result. Of course, Freud managed to escape from the Gestapo and his anti-Aryan theories live on today in the hearts of Cultural Marxist college professors and Hollywood screenwriters. Seeing as it is virtually impossible nowadays to watch a children's show without hearing some sort of Freudian sexual quip, it is quite obvious who of the two adversarial psychoanalytic heavyweights had the most dangerous method.

David Cronenberg* (2014)

Despite the fact that he directed his first feature, Stereo (1969), 45 years ago and has been making mainstream films with Hollywood stars since the late-1970s, Canadian auteur David Cronenberg (Videodrome, Eastern Promises) had never shot a single frame in the United States, let alone Hollywood, until recently with his latest and long-in-coming work Maps to the Stars (2014) aka Bailey's Quest aka Hollywood Nightmare, though he only spent 5 days in Los Angeles and Beverly Hills directing it, with the rest of the film being shot in the filmmaker's native city Toronto. Of course, considering the film is one of the most pathologically venomous and shockingly scathing assaults on Hollywood in decades, Cronenberg could not have picked a more tactical and befitting time to finally shoot in Tinseltown. Based on a script turned novel by novelist, actor, screenwriter, producer, and director Bruce Wagner—a man that has demonstrated that he is one of the keenest and remorseless critics of his home city as demonstrated by his writing credits ranging from Paul Bartel's savage satire Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills (1989) to the underrated five-hour dystopian mini-series Wild Palms (1993)—Maps to the Stars languished in pre-production for six years before Cronenberg could get the funds to make it because no Hollywood producer wanted to touch such a biting work that scathingly portrays Hollywood as a modern day Sodom festering with incest, schizophrenia, teenage drug addiction, sadomasochism, and general psychopathic behavior. Unquestionably Cronenberg's most humorous work to date, albeit in a brutal fashion that will probably make most viewers feel guilty for laughing, the film makes Robert Altman's The Player (1992) seem like a silly Disney romp and Paul Schrader's The Canyons (2013) seem like a Hughes-esque teen drama by comparison. Indeed, next to Maps to the Stars, John Schlesinger's The Day of the Locust (1975) and Roman Polanski's Chinatown (1974) seem like nostalgic sentimentalist depictions of Hollywood during the good old days. As a rabid hater of Hollywood and everything it stands for, Cronenberg's film proved to be a rather therapeutic experience for me. The multilayered tale of an ambiguously Jewish Hollywood dynasty and related intertwined Sunset Boulevard scum who are probably better fit for work in a Gulag than getting paid millions of dollars to star in films that contribute to the moral degradation and infantilization of virtually the entire global population, Maps to the Stars ultimately seems like Cronenberg's unconscious argument as to why he never decided to work in Hollywood, even though he probably could have flourished there as a fellow member of the Hebraic tribe. Indeed, I like to think the film is a prophetic work about holy-wood's capitulation.

The Weiss family has some serious problems, which probably has largely to do with the fact the mother and father are brother and sisters and their children are inbred demon seeds. To the Weiss' credit, they did not know they were brother and sister until after they fell in love, but that did not stop them from spawning schizophrenic children. The patriarch of the family is Dr. Stafford Weiss (John Cusack), a celebrity psychotherapist and seemingly psychopathic alpha-conman who has managed to successfully con the masses into buying his bogus 'hocus pocus' books because he has so many high-profile clients. Dr. Weiss' sister/wife is Cristina Weiss (Olivia Williams) is the archetypical 'controlling mother' in many ways in that she has masterminded the rather lucrative career of her internationally famous child star son Benjie (Evan Bird), who is an obscenely arrogant yet somewhat intelligent 13-year-old recovering drug addict, sort of like a composite of Macaulay Culkin and especially Justin Bieber. Benjie has an estranged schizophrenic sister named Agatha (Mia Wasikowska), who he has not seen since he was a small child when she tried to kill him and the entire family by burning their house down, but not before giving him an overdose of drugs before setting the family homestead ablaze. Badly scarred by the fire she set seven years previously, Agatha has to always wear leather arm-length gloves and is completely scarred on the left side of her face, which she tries to hide with her goofy pseudo-flapper haircut. Unbeknownst to the Weiss', deranged daughter Agatha travels from her Florida-based mental institution in an exceedingly hopeless attempt to reunite with her family. Naturally, it will ultimately have tragic consequences.

Ultimately, lapsed pyromaniac Agatha takes a job as a personal assistant from her father's client Havana Segrand (Julianne Moore) after being introduced to the batshit crazy burn victim via an exceedingly overweight Carrie Fisher (playing herself). Among other things, Havana is a once-famous, has-been Hollywood actress of the psychopathically self-absorbed sort who literally jumps for joy when her rival's toddler son drowns to death, thus enabling her to get a role in a remake of a 1960s classic entitled Stolen Water that her belated mother Clarice Taggart (Sarah Gadon) starred in and received various prestigious film awards for. Clarice died young in a fire and Havana, who resents her mother's fame and dubiously blames her being supposedly molested as a child, regularly sees her appear as a ghost who constantly taunts her about her glaring insecurities and lack of talent. One of the reasons that Havana hires Agatha is because she was a 'victim' of a fire just like her mother, thus making her think she will somehow be able to get over her progenitor's ghost if she employs the externally and internally damaged dame. Upon arriving in L.A., the first thing Agatha does is visit the home that she burned down seven years before. Agatha also starts a 'romantic' relationship with a struggling actor named Jerome Fontana (played by Robert Pattinson in a role based on screenwriter Bruce Wagner's own experiences before he became famous in Hollywood) who she met after hiring him as a limo driver. Of course, soft-spoken gentleman Jerome, who is the closest thing to a 'likeable' and 'sane' character in the entire film, is just using Agatha for “research” purposes, as he wants to further develop his acting chops.

Meanwhile, Bieber-esque bitch boy Benjie is on his way to being just as insane as his sister Agatha. Indeed, not longer after visiting a terminally ill girl named Cammy (Kiara Glasco) in the hospital and asking her how she got AIDS even though she has non-Hodgkin lymphoma (NHL) in what is an elaborately planned publicity stunt to bolster his career for paid press he has gotten as a result of being a 13-year-old that had to enter rehab, Benjie finds himself haunted by the ghost of the terminally ill fan whose deadly disease he could not bother to look up. Benjie is famous for starring in a Home Alone-like film franchise ‘Bad Babysitter’ and his mother Cristina has managed to secure him the lead role of the latest sequel, but he soon finds himself resenting the project after being shown up by an enterprising up-and-coming 4-year-old redhead runt named Roy (Sean Robertson). Of course, Benjie gets back on drugs again in no time. After finding out that she came to visit Benjie, Dr. Weiss decides to confront Agatha and more or less threatens her to stay away from the family. Of course, as the film ultimately reveals, Dr. Weiss seems to resent his daughter more due to the fact that she knows his dark secret about being married to his sister/her mother than the fact that she tried to kill the entire family by burning the house down. Indeed, Dr. Weiss’ entire charismatically vomited “self-help” spiel seems to be a sort of instinctive self-defense mechanism to cope with the deep dark secret that he married and had children with his own sister. Ironically, Dr. Weiss’ most famous book, which he arrogantly describes as “a classic,” is called “Secrets Kill” and as the conclusion of the film will reveal, indeed they do. Indeed, while Maps to the Stars might not be in the spirit of Cronenberg’s old school “body horror” flicks, that does not mean that the film does not have a similarly large body count. Indeed, not unlike the half-braindead teenagers featured in countless c-grade slasher flicks from the 1980s, you just cannot wait until these innately insufferable, inane, and grotesquely vain characters are put of their misery and snuffed out for good.

In terms of technique and ‘artiness,’ I have never really found David Cronenberg to be a particularly gifted filmmaker. What makes his films interesting are the unnerving subjects he chooses, be it William S. Burroughs’ magnum opus or the sex life of ‘Aryan Christ’ Carl Jung. Indubitably, despite being the director’s first film shot in Hollywood and a rare attempt by the filmmaker to take a stab at satire, Maps to the Stars is archetypically Cronenbergian to the core as a work that takes an unwaveringly unflattering look at the darkness of humanity and the sensitivity of human flesh, be it coming in contact with fire or the used-up genitals of a would-be-MILF over-the-hill fire-crotchted actress. Personally, I found nothing particularly striking about Cronenberg’s direction and would even argue that Schrader’s similarly themed failure The Canyons proved to be a more aesthetically pleasing and gripping experience, yet Maps to the Stars is still a far more superior film. Indeed, while a work of celluloid fiction, the film still manages to iconoclastically demystify the mythmakers of Hollywood. Like a more coherent and less esoteric twist on David Lynch's Mulholland Dr. (2001) meets a Barton Fink (1991) set in contemporary times, Cronenberg's film should be playing at every single movie theater in America as a sort of mischievously frolicsome deprogramming tool that lets the masses know that their filmic heroes are sexually depraved junkies with a weakness for incest.

Interestingly, Cronenberg also hints at the self-loathing that has been an innate part of Hebraic Hollywood since the beginning as documented in the rather insightful book An Empire of Their Own: How the Jews Invented Hollywood (1989) by Neal Gabler. While never mentioning it overtly, it can be inferred that the central family featured in Maps to the Stars is of the Judaic persuasion as hinted by their stereotypically Jewish surname 'Weiss.' In one rather hilarious scene early on in the film, egomaniacal brat Benjie—a little scrawny turd who, like many Hollywood Judaic types, bleaches his hair to make himself look more 'Aryan'—verbally assaults his stereotypically fat, swarthy, and unkempt middle-aged Jewish assistant, Arnold (Joe Pingue), hatefully stating in a sarcastic fashion: "Great Rabbi...death and dying. Man of wisdom...Zen fucking Arthur. I've got a new nickname for you: "Museum of Tolerance." When Arnold tells the little turd to watch his mouth, Benjie replies, "Why don't you show me your cunt, huh? I know you have one. Jew faggot." Of course, considering his less than flattering depiction of Jewish atheist messiah Sigmund Freud in A Dangerous Method (2011), Cronenberg has never been particularly fond of mindlessly supporting his people's great "culture-distorters" like most of the Hebrews in Hollywood. Additionally, in Eastern Promises (2007), Cronenberg cast the so-called "Russian mafia," which is a Jewish entity, in the most brutal of lights. Of course, it is doubtful that Cronenberg is a 'self-loathing Jew' but just a sensible mensch that is critical of the more unsavory elements among his people. In fact, Cronenberg has even gone so far as to distance himself from the cliché money-grubbing Hollywood Hebrew type, stating in a 2007 interview with nypress.com, "A sell-out is a personal thing. Ivan [Reitman] was always destined for Hollywood. That's what he wanted. I never wanted that." In the same interview, the director also remarked, "I'm always aware of [being Jewish]. It's always on my mind, but not obsessively. When you're threatened because of one aspect of your nature, whether it's your sexuality or your gender or your ethnic background, you become acutely sensitive to it for that moment. But it doesn't necessarily mean that's what defines you as a person." Indeed, it seems that Cronenberg is "acutely sensitive" to the fact that his people are not only brainwashing the masses with their neo-Trotskyite propaganda and promoting every form of moral degeneracy and metaphysical affliction imaginable, but that they are also degrading and exploiting the artistic medium for those purposes. With that being said, I like to think that Maps to the Stars is the director's sort of unofficial indictment of insipid Zio-ganda and aesthetic worthlessness of Hollywood, as well as his argument as to why he has avoided working in Hollywood his entire life despite the fact that he could have easily ascended to royal status among the upper echelons of the Hebraic hegemony over Hollywood.

Featuring an aging actress of the borderline psycho-biddy sort being beaten to death with her own film award trophy, a burnout and drug-addicted 13-year-old child star attempting to strangle to death his 4-year-old rival, a fading actress suffering severe flatulence and constipation as a result of taking too many painkillers, an aspiring actor screwing a severely scarred burn victim in an attempt to advance his career and fine tune his acting talents, and a hyper hysterical actress trying in vain to outdo her long deceased mother in terms of popularity, Maps to the Stars is ultimately the closest thing to a film in the spirit of Kenneth Anger's hilarious hidden history book Hollywood Babylon (1959). Indeed, as the screenwriter's other works like Wild Palms and Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills also readily demonstrate, Bruce Wagner is surely one of the greatest, if not the greatest, critic of Hollywood working today and thus he should share credit with Cronenberg in terms of being the auteur behind Maps to the Stars. The fact that Wagner—a mystical-minded man who was a member of the inner-circle of Carlos Castaneda and studied under Indian Hindu guru Ramesh Balsekar—has described the aspiring actor character played by Robert Pattinson that literally and figuratively whores himself out as being of a semi-autobiographical nature just goes to show that even a man who has more or less built a career on mocking Tinseltown cannot even escape the debasing powers of Hollywood. Notably, Cronenberg once stated regarding his film, "Hollywood is a world that is seductive and repellent at the same time, and it is the combination of the two that makes it so potent." Personally, I find nothing particularly seductive about contemporary Hollywood, nor the fictional one depicted in Cronenberg's film, but the Hollywood of Sunset Boulevard (1950) is a different story. Indeed, the Hollywood of today is far too vapid, plastic, and uncultivated to produce deranged yet dignified divas like Norma Desmond. Instead, we have fat ass Hebraic slobs like Jonah Hill, neo-Cro-Magnon morons like Channing Tatum, unattractive and untalented pseudo-diva bitches like Julia Roberts, phony Uncle Toms like Will Smith, scheming neo-vaudevillian sub-smut-peddlers like Friedberg and Seltzer, ethno-masochistic baby-negro-collectors like Angelina Jolie and her beau Brad Pitt, racially ambiguous mystery meat like Wentworth Miller and Vin Diesel, and Asperger-addled blockbuster philistines like Steven Spielberg and Michael Bay. Needless to say, if Hollywood were to burn to the ground as depicted in one of the posters for Maps to the Stars, it would be no great loss.

CURSE OF THE PUPPET MASTER

David DeCoteau (1998)

Without a doubt, one of the most disappointing, distressing, wacky, and maligned films ever created was Curse of the Puppet Master. Hated by everyone and spited by everything, this film is regarded as one of the worst films ever created. In light of recognizing the aesthetics behind Full Moon, I have come to terms with Curse and urge you to reconsider relieving the tension on your incendiary opinion towards what might be the most original take of the Puppet Master lore. Curse of the Puppet Master takes a classic tale like John Steinbeck and alters it into a sub-par horror film with hints of a magic philosophy and low-grade romance no doubt written by a lonely man with fantasies of hooking up with well-off, successful women. The turn witnessed at hand is a full 180°. The long lost visual effects of David Allen will be missed sorely. It's as if the puppets have carpal tunnel syndrome keyed in by their non-stop fidgeting in a sour attempt to give them the look of life, but this same plague can be said for the last 3-4 films. My friend once did a mock impersonation of an incredibly popular sound byte of a man screaming in a "Hyeaaa Hyeaaaaahhh Hyeaaaaahhhh" fashion. Having sounded familiar, I wasn't sure if I had just watched too much Ahh! Real Monsters as a child. What do you know, 2 minutes into Curse of the Puppet Master, this very same clip was played to an excruciating effect as you watch a mysterious puppet get doused in gasoline, only to be replayed some odd 20 minutes later. A vapid sex-crazed daughter of a doctor then dabbles in an art of seducing the "stable boy". She tells the idiot "The brain is the most over-rated organ." Perhaps the scribe of said script was furious at all the other quality fluff getting published while his unfinished Puppet Master vs. Demonic Toys script ended up in Charles Band's trash receptacle. As for the femininity plane in Curse of the Puppet Master, the end result is nil. They strive for a miserable damsel in constant distress, but the screen is too busy glorifying jock rapists. What works is some rather interesting budding philosophies towards labor and spirituality. Dr. Magrew tells Tank that if you work hard enough with blood & sweat, you can give anything life. This is the motto that Tank follows to his inevitable, albeit goofy, grave. Curse of the Puppet Master is no worse than Puppet Master 4 or 5. While I once had some respect for the film on a level of how bad it was, I realized that the director of Leatherface was actually the one and the same. Not related. DeCoteau will later move onto directing Retro Puppet Master which is without a doubt one of the atrocious films I have ever seen. For an excuse to cover his directing Curse of the Puppet Master, he adopted the "Alan Smithee" way out and renamed himself Victoria Sloan. If I had directed two of the most disappointing sequels in the history of low-budget horror, I'd want people to account it on me being a woman director as well. Curse of the Puppet Master is indeed a horrible film, but it takes an ancient franchise and gives it a fancy new makeover, even if it was better off untouched.

CHAOS

David DeFalco (2005)

Chaos is a foul and repugnant film. The stench of death and vermin will no doubt be excreted from your television set. I use the words "brutal" and "nihilistic" when needed be, but after a while, the films start to lose their impact. Sure, the subject matter might be way over average viewer's heads but I always retain the fact that it was once disturbing to me. One word I've never had to use in a review - Savage. Chaos is absolutely the most savage experiment ever planned out and filmed. This is also the reason that Chaos fell into an early grave. Chaos is another rehash of Bergman's The Virgin Spring. Even though Last House on the Left was an uncredited remake, I don't enjoy the idea of picking on David DeFalco's film just because it made somebody shit their pants due to the embodiment of evil acted out by Kevin Gage. David DeFalco is an absolute lunatic, if you couldn't tell by his film making. To promote Chaos, he galloped around LA Coroner's Crypt babbling about evil while shirtless. At least it's more thought out than David Lynch making a public appearance with cattle. Chaos isn't nearly a shot-by-shot remake as you might have read from the many flammers this film has pissed off. I like to think of it as a thought-by-thought remake. DeFalco takes a scene, imagines to himself "Hey, we need to change the bumbling cop duo and add some race relations to ante up the tension!" and it works like gold. There's so many things I can't stand about Craven's heralded "masterpiece". It might have been terrifying years ago but we have Chaos now. Kevin Gage acts alongside Sage Stallone (Who is also co-owner of the fabulous Grindhouse Releasing) and both deliver incredible acting performances. Whereas Kevin Gage builds up the terror with his impressionable evil gestures and facial contortions, Sage Stallone mellows the screen out as the one participant who isn't sure if he is alright with what's going on. By the end of the film, you will suddenly be aware of the evil that exists all around. You will realize that you are breathing manually and that anyone can take that away from you on a mere whim. Chaos is easily one of the worst reviewed films of all time. The score averages at around 7%. Do the math and understand how many people felt persuaded by their virtues, morals, and other reviewers into spitting venomous remarks at this film. As a kid I did the same with Rocky Horror Picture Show. I eventually cleared my head, re-watched it and fell in love. I urge you to get your own opinion on this film. The film might have been tasteless and a unbridled nightmare, but that doesn't mean it's a bad effort. This film harmed me more ways than Last House on the Left ever hoped to. Chaos is full of violence and rape, but most of it is implied and shown off screen. The voyeuristic techniques of the camera are denied and proves that there are still some things where we shouldn't tread. Chaos has a delirious low-key ending that blows the original material's out of the water. You will be left stranded without a sick sense of glory. Only a few choice films have this incredible power to sicken. Enjoy it while it lasts.

I DRINK YOUR BLOOD
I DRINK YOUR BLOOD

David E. Durston (1970)

I Drink Your Blood(1970) is a rabid killer hippie classic inspired by “The Manson Family” killings. The messianic leader of the cult is a buff Native American looking Shaman that seems to be three times as large as the real Charles Manson. He addresses to his cult that, “let it be known that Satan was an acid head. Drink from his cup.” Surprisingly, it is not acid that makes these scumbag hippies go on a killing frenzy, but the deadly juices of rabid dog put into meat pies that the degenerates eat. The rabid poison was put in the meat pies by a virtuous young man who wanted to avenge the disrespect that the hippies committed against the boy’s grandpa.SATAN!The shaman leader of the cult probably has the silliest dignified accent I have yet to see in a film such as I Drink Your Blood. His second in command is a rambunctious Negro who has had enough of the lynching bestowed upon his unfortunate forefathers. The white men in the cult are pathetic and impotent. The girls are for the most part blond whores looking for “Sex, Drugs, and Rock N Roll.” They also have a middle aged eastern Asian woman in the group for whatever reason. I guess she makes a great accessory.The real “hero” of I Drink Your Blood is the young blond haired boy that poisons moral breaking hippies. This young man has dreams of being a veterinarian and he’s not going to let some hippie scum get in his way. The child hero makes me wonder if I Drink Your Blood was also supposed to be a family film as it does have a good moral message. Nudity, decapitations, and guts aside, I Drink Your Blood gives Hollywood a run for their money as far as “good messages” go.I Drink Your Blood is one of the best films of it’s kind. It’s full of gore, comedy, rednecks, and violent deaths that any true American horror fan would demand. I can imagine American drive-in theaters of the early 1970s were full of happy filmgoers when I Drink Your Blood was first screened. What a wonderful world it would be if someone started a new horror subgenre featuring white liberals and hipsters killing minorities while infected with rabies. I Drink Your Blood is the film to look at for that type of inspiration.

BLACK SANTA'S REVENGE

David F. Walker (2007)

Black Santa's Revenge is a 20-minute blaxploitation short directed by David Walker that features the lovable and huggable Ken Foree as the enigmatic Black Santa. The film opens up with our favorite Black Santa losing at a game of dice where he lost most of his money. He shoos his friends home before he begins to have flashbacks about poverty stricken and disappointed children. The film starts off nice and easy that leads up to a ridiculous robbery that seemed too unplanned and led our vigilante in a detective's office.

The opposing sides of racial tension are shown in an often anti-white way as we bare witness to the detective try and put Black Santa in the crime. This is just ignored as the camera gets a good luck at the hilarious mural of the white man with his small dog behind his desk. After stressing about the disappointment of the children he decides to go drinking at a strip bar. After some glamorous strippers do their thing, we see our very own Black Santa hammering down shots and then requesting the bottle. Turning around, he sees one of the men involved with the robbery. Intoxication in hand, he decides to follow him to their hangout. After grabbing a shotgun, it all ends with bloodshed and incredible yuletide one-liners. Black Santa's Revenge has it's own errors and would have fit a longer running time a lot more snugly. Despite all this, the film is very watchable and proves that Ken Foree has what it takes to be a new blaxploitation star and bring the almost dead genre back to life. Pick this DVD up HERE for a very small price of $13.00. The amazing nostalgic cover art alone is worth it.

IN THEIR SLEEP
IN THEIR SLEEP

David Gaz (2004)

Having heard only a mutter as to the existence of In Their Sleep, when on the contrary, similar films such as Martyrs and À l'intérieur scream across horror outlets, I found myself wandering into an experience that I'd be woefully revisiting, even after an extended period of rest. Co-starring the ferocious Jean-Hugues Anglade, In Their Sleep primarily banks off the equally intense performances throughout. Having a perpetual fault in predictability, In Their Sleep assures you that being in the know isn't very much different than being blinded. The emotional core is continuously throbbing, allowing scenes to metamorphosize into truly nefarious examples of the French and their increasing lack of apathy towards family life, and that might very well be the shocking secret to their success. In Their Sleep opens with Sarah (Anne Parillaud, La Femme Nikita) dealing with a minor instance of turmoil as her son is upset with their relocation into the country. After pouting for a short amount of time, Sarah brings a tray of desert up to his room, finding only an open window. Assuming he might have snuck out, as I would, you see Sarah shed a slight emotion of panic and briskly walks to the window peering down. What awaits her is her son impaled on several reinforcing bars, gasping and choking on his own blood.

Flash-forward a year later and Sarah is still visibly shaken to the point of societal detachment. Scolded by the head nurse for amping a dosage and near-injuring a patient, Sarah is sent home on leave for several days as to collect her emotional baggage and come to terms with her loss. Things unfortunately spiral into disarray soon after, as we find Sarah hitting a young man with her automobile. Carrying him to her car, it becomes apparent that this boy, roughly the same age as her sons, is fleeing from a maniac. News of this collides with the mention of a burglar on the loose but by this point it's too late. Sarah is ultimately ensnared into a psychotic confrontation between two strangers and their words and pasts violently clashing, testing Sarah's committal of preservation entirely. Not to issue too much of the film's plot away and to preserve the integrity sustained by the cast, especially Arthur Dupont's dark gravitas. In Their Sleep suffers from the very typical mistakes of first time directors. The co-directors, also siblings, Caroline du Potet and Éric du Potet, made sure to craft their film around the basis of minimalistic, yet jarring, violence. This in turn propels In Their Sleep into a film encompassing upsetting scenes of shedding mortality and chastising the all-too vulnerable viewers into a submission.

Since much of In Their Sleep rides the train of suspense/thriller, red herrings are utilized in scenes challenging already cemented perspectives. This will have either two effects on you. You will be genuinely surprised, maybe shocked or you will just get pissed you off. Perhaps I'm being too kind of this film, a film that has done nothing for me but bring to light a feeling of utter melancholy, which soured my mood. But as it stands, In Their Sleep is a very rare breed of film that strafes past the violence and into the consequences of these acts of brutality. You may think to yourself that these acts signify what modern convention has smeared as a "terrible ending" but you'd be shocked at how poetic the finale of In Their Sleep is. A warm feeling spreads through your body with a tune of divine opera fluttering throughout the credits. If not for the violence or the substantial hype most new age French horror collects, see In Their Sleep for that evidence of emotion weaved through each character. The directors have created a film that bleeds as its characters do and mourns as well. In terms of pure psychopathy and the remove of a killer burned onto celluloid, even one as frenzied or empathetic as the culprits, In Their Sleep is a marvel of sick intentions with some of the more disturbing hospitality towards a sleeping family I've seen yet.

REQUIEM FOR A VILLAGE
REQUIEM FOR A VILLAGE

David Gladwell (1975)

While the Germans have paid great tribute to their rural traditions and cultures with the once-popular but now largely ridiculed Heimatfilm genre, their Germanic brothers, the English, who have always had a larger disparity between the classes, have done very little to cinematically honor their ancestors and seem more interested in making intolerable hagiographies about banal monarchs and whatnot. Recently, I had the good fortune of happening upon an avant-garde Anglo-Saxon Heimat film that is surely a hidden gem among the seemingly bottomless pit of banality that is the British film industry. Directed by relatively unknown auteur David Gladwell—a man better known for editing Lindsay Anderson classics like If... (1968) and O Lucky Man! (1973) than his own films—Requiem for a Village (1975) is a lucid, lyrical, operatic, and totally unclassifiable celluloid poem about a church and cemetery caretaker from an east Anglian village who feels dejected by modernity and urbanization and who prefers to reminisce over his dead friends, neighbors, and family members while cleaning their tombstones. Of course, as one can expect from an experimental work, Gladwell's film is not merely mindlessly nostalgic sentimentalist twaddle like most Teutonic Heimat flicks, though it is by no means a pretentious masturbatory dilettante piece that was made by the director with the intent of proving how 'avant-garde' he is. Part living postcard, part ethnographic meta-documentary (Gladwell cast real people from the Suffolk villages where he filmed for the acting roles), part metaphysical zombie flick, part love letter to an ancient village and a dying way of life, part T.S. Eliot-esque cine-poem, and part critique of technology and the rise of the suburbs, Requiem for a Village—a split-narrative work that seamlessly connects the past and present as depicted from the perspective of an old man who literally and figuratively lives in the past and is ready to take his last gasp so as to be reunited with his deceased wife—is one of those rare films that seems almost completely original in its essence, as a film that establishes its own distinct cinematic language. Indeed, Lindsay Anderson probably said it best when he stated of the work: "David Gladwell's film is an authentic, lyrical pastoral work of absolute and obstinate originality - the work of a unique artist... Requiem for a Village is one of that handful of works which prove that the English poetic genius is fully capable - given the right, rare circumstances - of expressing itself in cinema, as it always has in literature and painting." Not unlike Fred Halsted's avant-garde homo hardcore flick LA Plays Itself (1972)—another film that contrasts the organic beauty and serenity of the country with noise, human nastiness, and abstract man made concrete jungles of the city—Gladwell's film depicts the bulldozer as a ruthless symbol for the destruction of pastoral perfection and history, as well as man as a pernicious god-given plague with a propensity for committing forced entry in regard to both nature and the nether-regions of other human beings (luckily, Gladwell's film does not feature any brutal fisting scenes, though it does feature a savage yet strangely beautiful rape montage that is arguably the most poetic depiction of sexual ravaging ever committed to celluloid). Somewhat of a 'folk horror' work in part that is more authentic in its essence than Robin Hardy's The Wicker Man (1973) in organically depicting the ancient culture it centers around, Requiem for a Village features the unrelenting cultural pessimism of Oswald Spengler, the lyrical love of landscapes (but also people) of Godfrey Reggio's Koyaanisqatsi: Life Out of Balance (1982), the nuanced appreciation of the Volk and Volksgeist of Edgar Reitz's magnum opus Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984), the playful acknowledgement of England's pagan roots in David Rudkin's Penda's Fen (1974) directed by Alan Clarke, and the sensitive yet highly sensual approach to sexuality of the best works of Polish auteur Walerian Borowczyk, as a folkish filmic fever dream that demonstrates that the purest and most magical forms of pulchritude arise from the blood and soil of the peasantry, which has been more or less murdered by man himself.

Requiem for a Village centers around an elderly church caretaker who belongs to a zeitgeist long gone and who longs for death, whether he knows it or not. While now living in the suburbs like most of the surviving members of his quaint East Anglian village, the Old Man still spends most of his days working at the village, mainly in and around the old church in which he was married. Completely out of touch with the living, the Old Man only talks to himself, with most of his conversations revolving around attempting to remember the death dates of his former neighbors while looking at their ruined tombstones at the church graveyard. In fact, the Old Man spends so much time obsessing over his dead neighbors and loved ones that these individuals somehow manage to come back to life and rise from the grave, though they are not rotten. Indeed, Gladwell's film probably features the most benign and warmly welcomed 'zombies' in all of cinema history. After watching in astonishment as the dead rise from the grave in a most jubilant fashion and barely acknowledge him, the Old Man enters the church and magically transform into his younger self on his wedding day. From there, the film unearths fragments from the most memorable and sometimes even goofy (in one scene, a man brags how he tied a rope around a horse's testicles so it would not kick him) moments of the Old Man's life. As was not uncommon at the time, the Old Man lacked experience on his wedding night and awkwardly got to "know" his beloved in a most naive fashion, which is in stark contrast to the sexual degeneracy of today where virgin teenage boys get addicted to pornography at an early age and ruin much of the magic associated with discovering the opposite sex. The birth of the Old Man's daughter, who is now a somewhat grouchy middle-age spinster with a dyke-like haircut, is depicted in rather graphic detail, thus underscoring the traumatic and dangerous yet visceral beauty of human reproduction. The birthing scene certainly reminded me that it was not uncommon not too long ago for a mother to sacrifice her life to create more life whereas women today are pampered all the way through pregnancy and hardly have to worry about dying before bringing their children into this world.

In Requiem for a Village, a gang of young leather-clad bikers become a symbol of the rapid proliferation of technology and urbanization, as well as a symbolic representation of how the present unsympathetically kills and buries the past, especially in regard to culture, customs, art, and religion. Ultimately, the Old Man who lives in the past is killed after one of the crotch-rocket-riding whippersnappers runs him over, which proves to be a truly divine experience for the dejected geezer, who is reunited with his deceased spouse and the rest of the villagers who succumbed to fate long ago. The Old Man's death is important as with his demise comes the burying of all the customs, traditions, and memories of the village, which is scheduled to be bulldozed to make way for a new chic suburb development. Before dying, the Old Man demonstrates his disgust for the modern world in a variety of ways, which is most apparent in a montage where the old disgruntled fart flings soil at a monstrous mechanized gold dirt digger, which cuts to a flashback scene of a ploughman tending to his horse, thus reflecting the increasingly cold and abstract relationship man has to nature. In arguably the most potent segment of the film towards the end, the Old Man recalls being a young boy watching his father quasi-rape his mother in a delightfully disturbed montage which is inter-spliced with a flashback sequence of two scythe-wielding young men gang-raping a young girl, as well as a present-day sequence of the bikers raping a girl, in a darkly erotic segment highlighting the historically violent nature of regeneration and the cycle of life. Indeed, it is hinted that the Old Man was spawned from an act of such sexual savagery, thus reflecting the ironic nature of nature, as a paradoxical system that creates life out of destruction, harmony out of chaos, and beauty out of abject ugliness. After all, if Alejandro Jodorowsky's father did not rape his mother in Chile some 80+ years ago (as the auteur has claimed in various interviews), the world would be deprived of such cinematic surrealist masterpieces as El Topo (1970) and Santa Sangre (1989). Of course, if one thing is for sure, it is that the Old Man, like every human being, left this world the same way he entered it—as nothing, or as one of the characters wisely states during one of the many flashback scenes: “We all come from dust and we go back to dust.”

A fleeting glimpse of an extinct kultur from rustic rural England before the age of culturally schizophrenic phenomena like chavs and wiggers, the deluge of third worlders from the ex-colonies, the great national shame of Islamic South Asian white slavery rings, American cultural colonization, and the rise of the suburbs, among various other modern social plagues that make the once-great British empire seem like an inexplicable memory, if not absurdist fantasy, Requiem for a Village is not only a lost arthouse masterpiece of sorts, but an invaluable historical document that gives you a better feeling and understanding of a now extinct culture and way of life than any graduate degree ever could. In terms of major themes in the film, Oswald Spengler, himself a die hard critic of the British and their influence on the world, probably said it best when he wrote: "Long ago the country bore the country-town and nourished it with her best blood. Now the giant city sucks the country dry, insatiably and incessantly demanding and devouring fresh streams of men, till it wearies and dies in the midst of an almost uninhabited waste of country." Indeed, aside from the old church and cemetery, which are both in discernibly bad shape, the country is depicted as raped and plundered in Gladwell's film. Going back to Spengler, he once stated: "When the Englishman speaks of national wealth he means the number of millionaires in the country." Of course, England's real wealth is depicted in Requiem for a Village, but the English do not seem to know that, hence why the film is truly one of a kind, as a rare rendering of the real English people and not effete monarchs with bad teeth, swarthy untermenschen from the third world, and chav scum. Featuring an immaculately complementary haunting choral musical score by David Fanshawe (Seven Years in Tibet, Gangs of New York), an exceedingly ethereal depiction of the Suffolk countryside, and a rare authentic expression of the Anglian Volkgeist, Gladwell's is a film that unequivocally proves that not all English people are either sniveling, pretentious, tea-drinking twats or brain dead, tattooed, and illiterate white trash scum.

PLAGUE TOWN

David Gregory (2008)

Deceivably so, for the benefit of the slasher genre, Plague Town was created by the director of Texas Chain Saw Massacre: The Shocking Truth and just about any other exploitation making-of documentary you could point a finger at. With all this experience delving into the making of classics, does his secondhand skill rank up enough for him to create his own bold masterpiece? It is my deepest sorrow to announce "Nay," his film does not withhold the visual promises of a terror soaked foreigners - go - camping - wrong - place - wrong - time scenario that has been imprinted upon the very tome of slasher film 101. Can anyone create this genre anew without fear of retaliation from incompetent viewers and fellow filmmakers alike? Plague Town's biggest mistake was the entrance of the stepmother/father relationship. Necessary to the story arch, of course, but with the later events that unravel in the film the evolving aura that had blessed the cinematography of Plague Town diminishes to a larvae state and everything that has been worked upon so hard, died off suddenly in a state of emergency that was declared with a blind sense of urgency. It appears that Plague Town decided the build up wasn't worth delaying the actual screen terror so they catapulted our characters into uber-violent and unnerving situations that weren't entirely necessary and upon the slaughtering of the stepmother, you soon realize that everything beautiful about Plague Town died with that dear, sweet lady. Other than the stepmother being used as a pawn to prove a point about the utter stupidity of the female sex in moments of distress, Plague Town employs many subliminal tactics in making you despise anything with a uterus. It seems the men are the only one with any sense at all and in this subversive element of misogyny comes a great deal of entertainment to give Plague Town any credibility at all. I expected more from the first Dark Sky Films production. To the outstretched arms of anyone that remains excited for campfire horrors in rural communities, Plague Town is the same rehash we've seen over a thousand times. Make no mistake, this film doesn't claim to present new themes or material but If you've seen one reimagining you've seen them all. The presentation allows itself the ability to defy most expectations with a stark image permeating a sense of helplessness and with the help of a spectacular one sheet, Plague Town really appears to be better than it should. But we soon find out with no speculation as to how banal Plague Town really is. Most films have a choice, to speculate on the characters at the heart of the tale or to prime up the antagonists, as many as there are. With nowhere to go other than the route of senseless violence that equates with an ending that evokes strong themes of desperation and female degradation, Plague Town doesn't add up to anything other than a film with an Irish family being hunted by... things? My point exactly. "Independent horror has always challenged the norm and furthered the genre," says director/co-screenwriter Gregory. "And Plague Town goes into far more perverse and disturbing territory than the average horror film. The entire cast and crew of Plague Town are not only prepared to push the envelope, but pummel and mutilate it as well."For a first time production from the company that has brought us Ils (Them) and Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer, Dark Sky Films has brought us a depressing chapter of "independent" horror. For a project that claims to be perverse, personally, I need more literal evidence to justify these claims. Laying out a plan of forced childbirth and cutting to credits isn't what I'd call "perverse." At least, not in a Dying Breed sort of vein, which indulged itself on the visceral images of violent gang rape which, needless to say, is exciting on par with my fetishistic values. To jump from casual reviewing standards to snarky self-deceit, Plague Town can measure up to some form of otherworldly entertainment - about as much entertainment as you can extract from watching screaming girls run around in a caked-like darkness and claiming high caliber cinematography. Plague Town doesn't succeed on any ends other than a character study in the mind of a naive bitch. To watch characters ripped from Child's Play 2, Girl, Interrupted, and Legally Blonde engage in scenarios composed from pathless obtrusions with locals and to boast some integrity, leaves me as clueless as a certain film starring Alicia Silverstone. And what's worse is the fact that the only character you root for, the father, disappears while looking for help 20 minutes or so in to never be heard from again. No hint to his demise. He was written out completely. Humility has a discerning title and it is Plague Town.

David Grieco (2004)

Poor old Malcolm McDowell, he has yet to even come close to having an acting role as prestigious as when he played Alex in A Clockwork Orange. Apparently, Mr. McDowell rubbed Stanley Kubrick the wrong way after A Clockwork Orange and it probably cost him a very successful acting career. Instead, McDowell has spent his career playing in such films as the recent Italian film Evilenko. After watching the film, I had no clue that it was actually Italian. I would have assumed Evilenko was some anti-Russian British propaganda film.

Evilenko is a film loosely based on the Ukrainian serial killer Andrei Chikatilo. Chikatilo was a sicko that was convicted of killing 52 women and children mostly in Russia. He had a problem with impotence and his murders stemmed from that unfortunate problem. For some reason, it was not hard for me to believe Malcolm McDowell was a child murderer and sex pervert. I found it awfully awkward seeing McDowell attempting to molest a young school girl while in a state of derangement. That being said, the only thing that carries Evilenko from beginning to end is Malcolm McDowell's performance.

Italian composer Angelo Badalamenti lent his musical talent to Evilenko by producing the film's scores. Badalamenti is best known for his scores in David Lynch's brilliant Twin Peaks series and his films such as Blue Velvet. Unfortunately, Badalamenti's score doesn't really stick out in Evilenko. The lack of a notable score also goes hand in hand with the film's lack of overall aesthetic. Evilenko had the feeling of a very cheap TV production produced in one of the less than prosperous countries of Eastern Europe. Essentially, the film lacked the overall artistic power that one comes to expect from an Italian director.

Andrei Chikatilo was a card carrying communist. It is not secret (or maybe it kind of is) that communists are the biggest mass murderers in human history. The impotent killer of Evilenko however, has no real position of power except over little children. The way Malcolm McDowell looks at a child is a somewhat disturbing thing to see. What is even worse is seeing the elderly nude body of Malcolm McDowell. Evilenko is a film for those that are fans of McDowell or films about nature's worst predators. Just don't expect a work of artistic genius.

YOUNG DR. FREUD

David Grubin (2002)

Aside from A Dangerous Method (2011) directed by kosher Canadian auteur David Cronenberg, until rather recently, I did not think there was a film pertaining to the imperative role that his background as an ethnic Eastern European Jew and his hatred of Germanic peoples played on Sigismund Schlomo Freud (otherwise known as Sigmund Freud)—the founding father of the dubious ‘science’ of psychoanalysis—but luckily I recently discovered the docudrama-like made-for-TV ‘biopic’ Der Junge Freud (1976) aka Young Dr. Freud directed by philo-Semitic Austrian auteur Axel Corti (God Does Not Believe in Us Anymore, The King’s Whore) and penned by the director’s longtime collaborator Georg Stefan Troller. The son of a man of partial Italian extraction who was a member of the anti-Nazi resistance that died in 1945, Axel Corti (whose birth name was Axel Fuhrmanns, but assumedly changed his surname to ‘Corti’ to show his solidarity with his Guido blood as opposed to his out-of-fashion Teutonic genes) was anything but a National Socialist sympathizer and Austrian nationalist as demonstrated by his Wohin und zurück (1982-1986) aka Where To and Back Trilogy, which follows a Viennese Jew of the far-left persuasion whose father who murdered my Nazis and who ultimately stereotypically flees to New York City and inevitably returns back to Europa as a translator/prison interrogator to deal with them nasty Nazis, so naturally his work Young Dr. Freud takes a somewhat sympathetic view of Sigmund’s Semitism and how it shaped his anti-kraut/anti-bourgeois pseudo-science, even if the film dares to psychoanalyze the ‘soul doctor’ in the process, thereupon demystifying his legacy as a man that practically created a modern form of secular Judaism via psychoanalysis. Beginning in 1938 with Freud boarding a train from Vienna to London so as to escape from Uncle Adolf’s wrath, Young Dr. Freud—as signified by its quite literal title—depicts the degenerate doc’s meager life before he was a Freudian and got addicted to cocaine and cocks, but also and, arguably most importantly, demonstrates how the psychoanalyst’s parents background as Galician Jews made him feel like an outsider of Vienna and born enemy of the Aryan Viennese. Although clearly directed by a man with left-wing sympathies and a respect for Freud, Young Dr. Freud is the sort of biopic that could have never been made in Hollywood because, aside from neglecting to portray the psychoanalyst as a humanitarian hero of sorts and mystifying his life by making a patron saint of the holocaust and humanity, the film also somewhat unintentionally demonstrates that his ‘science’ was not much of a science at all, but an intellectual weapon used by a man who saw himself as a modern day Hannibal as a subversive Semite battling against Western Civilization.

Opening with a scene set in 1938 of an old Sigmund Freud boarding a train from Vienna to London, Young Dr. Freud accompanies these images with off-screen narration from an unnamed narrator who acts as a sort of cinematic psychoanalyst throughout the film and states regarding the psychoanalyst, "Of all the wise men of his day, Freud is at this moment the least loved, probably by himself, too," but, of course, after the Second World War and defeat of the Third Reich, he became a messiah among leftwing and largely Jewish academics and intellectuals who wanted revenge against the Germans and who naturally spread his iconoclastic ideas like the 'plague' (notably, Freud once remarked to his then-associate C.G. Jung during a 1909 trip to America that "they don't know it but I'm bringing them the plague" in regard to introducing his ideas to unsuspecting goy yanks) and have forever tainted Western society, sexualizing everything, including infants. As depicted in the first couple minutes of Young Dr. Freud, Freud (played by veteran Austrian TV actor Karlheinz Hackl) is psychoanalyzed via interviews with an unseen narrator, starting with his childhood as a persecuted Eastern Jew who eventually landed in Vienna as a young child so his father (who came from an unreformed Hasidic Jewish background) could pursue business as a wool merchant, stating of this experience, "Vienna always held terrors for me all my life...About as cosy as an arena...You always felt surrounded by strangers...No, not just strangers, unknown beings...To survive, you had to recognize them." In a very telling scene, Freud displays his undying disgust and shame for his father after being attacked by peasant anti-Semites and not defending himself, stating, "I never let that happen to me without defending myself," thus demonstrating he was a born fighter and not a passive victim. When Freud grew up to be a young doctor, he told Dr. Josef Breuer—the Austrian Jewish physician who laid down the foundations for psychoanalysis—that he was disgusted with his teacher's planned trip to Russia, stating, "In Russia they're murdering Jews and you go there to your noble patients...But you're Breuer, not just a Jew...But it's my people they're murdering in their pogroms." When Breuer remarks to Freud that he is "no Eastern Jew," his combative protégé retorts, "My father is," thus proudly displaying his deep sense of attachment to his cultural and racial roots. When courting his soon-to-be-wife Martha Bernays (Sylvia Haider), he confesses to her his ultimate goal with his profession is to be, "Some sort of conqueror, I think...An intellectual adventurer...Someone quite ruthless," which he most certainly will become as a man who will greatly contribute to the destruction of the moral fabric of European civilization.

Beginning with attempting to understand how eels manage to copulate despite the fact that male eels might lack testicles, Freud goes on to take on the case of "Anna O." (pseudonym of Austrian Jewess feminist Bertha Pappenheim) with his teacher Breuer and the two release the cast study Studies on Hysteria (1895), which introduced the technique of psychoanalysis as a form of cure, though the book was initially poorly received. Although highly ambitious, which is largely inspired by his abject hatred of Aryans, anti-Semitic or otherwise, and prophetic paranoia regarding potential pogroms, Freud is crippled by self-doubt and his self-contradictory nature, but luckily his aggressive arrogance compels him to tread on with a vengeance. At the recommendation of an Aryan scientist who does not hate Hebrews, Freud heads to Paris in 1885 for a fellowship with French clinician Jean-Martin Charcot—the so called “Napoleon of the neuroses”—which is a turning point in his career that moved him towards the practice of medical psychopathology which he will be (in)famous for. Freud also starts a long and intellectually deleterious relationship with a crackpot kosher otolaryngologist named Wilhelm Fliess whose theory of ‘nasal reflex neurosis’ postulated that there was a connection between the nose and genitals (and ultimately relating this theory to a number of neurological and psychological symptoms) and whose idea of ‘innate bisexuality’, among countless other dubious perverse theories, will have an imperative influence on the founding father of psychoanalysis. While dealing with a professor named Dr. Meynert (Norbert Kappen), who criticizes the young Jewish doctor, stating, “You believe in hypnosis? That quackery beneath the dignity of thinking men?,” Freud becomes all the more determined to rebel against what he sees as archaic Aryan science, which rejects that men (as opposed to just women) can be hysterical. Meanwhile, Freud gets hooked on cocaine, stating of its benefits, “it boosts work capacity and relieves depression” and that “It’s a substitute for morphine and doesn’t cause addiction,” thus proving that his theories regarding human sexuality were not the only things he was wrong about. While essentially helping to lead the way for the ‘sexual emancipation’ of women and so called ‘sexual freedom’ for everyone else, Freud did not really practice what he preached as he was scared of pussy, which may have led him to be biased in forming his theory that all humans are bisexual.

Ironically concluding with an excerpt from a letter written by Freud to his wife Martha that reads, “Let our biographers sweat. We don’t want to make things easy for them. Let them all be right in their concept of “the hero’s development.” I’m looking forward to the mistakes they make,” Young Dr. Freud is probably the most objective and thoughtful biopic ever made about the psychoanalyst as the film neither portrays him as a Hebraic hero nor Semitic saint, but an absurdly arrogant and exceedingly eccentric character whose Eastern Jewish roots could have never been deracinated, but, instead, fueled his career as a proud Semitic subversive whose instincts and interests compelled him to destroy, with extreme prejudice, German mores. Notably, in a passage from his work Interpretation of Dreams, Freud, in an attempt to make sense of why he had a metaphysical aversion to stepping foot in Rome, argued he was sort of retracing the footsteps of Hannibal—the Semitic leader of Carthage—as a member of an “alien race” in an Aryan land, writing, “Hannibal... Had been the favorite hero of my later school days... And when in the higher classes I began to understand for the first time what it meant to belong to an alien race... the figure of the semitic general rose still higher in my esteem. To my youthful mind Hannibal and Rome symbolized the conflict between the tenacity of Jewry and the organization of the Catholic Church,” and the film Young Dr. Freud certainly expresses this strong side of the psychoanalyst, albeit in the abstracted manner of a European attempting to understand a racial outsider. As a man who described himself as “a fanatical Jew” in a 1931 letter and on another occasion writing he had a “strange secret longings” related to his Jewish blood, Freud basically concocted a kosher intellectual weapon through psychoanalysis. As evolutionary psychology Kevin MacDonald wrote in his groundbreaking work The Culture of Critique: An Evolutionary Analysis of Jewish Involvement in Twentieth-Century Intellectual and Political Movements (2002) regarding Freud and his (un)holy mission against Aryan civilization via psychoanalysis, “His identity as a Jew was thus associated with a self-concept in which he selflessly does battle with the enemies of the group, dying in an act of heroic altruism defending group interests—a mirror-image Jewish version of the grand finale of Wagner’s Nibelungenlied that was an ingredient in Nazi ideology.”

A Teutonized Hebrew schooled in Goethe, Schopenhauer, and Nietzsche who hated the alien world in which he came of age but also hated himself as depicted in scenes from Young Dr. Freud where he remarks “I hate Vienna any time of the year...At present everything makes me vomit, including myself,” Freud was an all around corrosive force who did more harm to the world than good. For example, Freud’s nephew Edward, “the father of public relations,” Bernays would utilize his uncle’s theories on the human mind to brainwash the American populous with subconscious propaganda utilizing psychoanalytic techniques, which is depicted in Adam Curtis’s great award-winning 2002 documentary for the BBC, The Century of the Self (2002), a epic work that makes it quite clear that Freudian psychoanalysis was a weapon meant to subvert and defile people and not to help them. After all, where has psychoanalysis gotten daughter-lover Woody Allen, himself a lifelong advocate of psychoanalysis?! In terms of the few Freud flicks that exist, Young Dr. Freud is the best in terms of introducing the lifelong neurosis of the man behind psychoanalysis, ultimately making the Hollywood movie Freud: The Secret Passion (1962) directed by John Huston and starring Montgomery Clift seem like a pseudo-provocative piece of sensationalism and softcore surrealism that gives a redundant reductionist view of the man’s ideas and does not even attempt to touch his Jewishness, arguably the most important influence behind his work. Shot in black-and-white in a vaguely dream-like manner, Young Dr. Freud is not exactly a pleasurable picture to watch, but, of course, Freud is not exactly the most heartwarming historical figure to study, thus making the film seem like a suffocating trip through Hebrew intellectual Hades, but an interesting and important one nonetheless that reminds the unconscious gentile viewer that the psychoanalyst did not have their best interests in mind. As the great so called self-loathing Jew Karl Kraus—one of the earliest critics of psychoanalysis and a sort of intellectual adversary of Freud—once wrote, "The Jews control the press, they control the stockmarket, and now they also control the unconscious."

SAW V
SAW V

David Hackl (2008)

"Here we go again!" - Brendan Fraser in The Mummy: Tomb of the Dragon Emperor.

This above line was looping through my mind at an incredible velocity as I slowly trudged through the remnants of the once average Saw franchise. All shit hit the fan after Saw II was released only to be slightly redeemed by the second sequel - which was pushing it as it was. In the 5th (Eagh!) installment, director David Hackl creates a morbid sequel weighed down by so much "elusive" material that the film strays from the suspense torture into another one of those incredibly average and dare I say, boring, detective stories. Righteous Kill comes to mind when dissecting the fifth installment. As you can expect, Saw V has an ending that wants you to scream "Oh Shit!" but this one is painstakingly predictable. Saw V is nothing but vapid material only created to set forth a string of extra occurrences which happens in two universes - the Hollywood industry and the in-film multiverse. Saw is a series that refuses to die no matter how many sad souls it tricks into buying tickets. Taking in mind that I enjoyed the first and third for being needless torture for people who didn't pay school dues and other silly trife, Saw V is a sequel that is among the worst of the series and I implore you to not see this film. Saw V cheat sheet so you don't have to see it. If you want to experience an incredibly boring film to the maximum, do not read this following paragraph. Tattooed man crushes his hands and gets his torso slowly sliced by pendulum only to be split in half. A Detective's head is placed in an airtight cube filled with water. He presumes to stab a hole in his neck so he can breathe - survives. V shaped razors attached to a cable pulls a girls head into them decapitating her instantly. Explosion rocks the bald man's world splattering him across the room. Girl is stabbed in neck then electrocuted into a crisp. Man is squished completely and twin buzz saws cut through finger webbing's upwards into the wrist. This completes most of the gore and the entire point of the films. Saw V is a pretty bad film that is indecisively hard to sit through. At times, I found myself fidgeting hoping it would end sooner. Had the film been imagined by the original director's brainstorming, the twist might have been good or surprising. Nothing to see here except violence that can easily be found in classic video nasties which are much more filling in time for All Hallows Day. Easily forgettable and a preliminary excursion into the doomed series that is Saw. If purgatory is sweltering than Saw VI is scalding.

DEAD DREAMS OF MONOCHROME MEN

Although I have never been particularly fond of serial killers nor the American populous' peculiar obsession with them, I spent a good portion of my time last weekend watching a number of films about them. Out of all of these mostly wretched works, only two left any sort of notable impression on me: The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer (1993) and Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men (1989). While The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer impressed me due to its unabashedly exploitative and downright uproarious portrayal of deranged Dahmer, Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men had the total opposite effect on me. Based on a stageplay about Dennis "British Jeffrey Dahmer" Nilsen that was conceived by Lloyd Newson and performed by the DV8 Physical Theatre located in London, England, Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men directed by David Hinton (Strange Fish) is a militantly expressionistic cinematic performance art piece that can barely be described as a serial killer flick, at least in any conventional sense. DV8 Physical Theatre, which has been described as 'the theatre of blood and bruises', is somewhat notorious for its 'unconventional' approach to dance, using everything from virtual violence to less-than-mobile cripples in their pleasantly peculiar frolic pieces. Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men – a film that begins with four men feeding off of a catchy synthpop track and each other at an aggressive gay club and ends with three of these men laying dead in artful poses – is quite possibly their most infamous yet critically revered work. Featuring not a single line of dialogue nor acknowledging a single character's name, the film expresses a variety of entangled emotions that surely cannot be properly articulated through the use of mere stagnant words. Shot with black-and-white film on minimalistic yet aesthetically domineering sets engulfed amongst unsettling shadows, Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men is a work that permeates gritty doom and gloom in a strikingly stylized and queerly indefatigable fashion. Had Jean Cocteau taken steroids instead of opium and collaborated with Jean Genet, Jörg Buttgerit and Derek Jarman on a film directed within the seemingly limited confines of a lone soundstage, it would most likely resemble Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men; a work of truly carnal cinematic poetry in motion.

If the real Dennis Nilsen were to watch Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men, I am sure he would be more than flattered by the highly fictionalized portrayal of his homo-cidal antics. On top of featuring four men that one would never mistake for being banal government bureaucrats, none of the actors give off the vibe of a feeble and pathetic introvert that footage and photographs of Dennis Nilsen radiate in a most shuddersome manner. Preying exclusively on the weak, including junkies, prostitutes, vagrants and the like, Nilsen was not exactly a stud of a serial killer and neither were his queer quarry. Sporting bold combat boots and shaved heads (or at least two of them are), the muscular martial men of Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men look as if they could be training for the remaining days of an apocalyptic world war. Of course, these agile brothers-in-arms are not getting ready to attack an enemy army, but each other. Featuring ambiguous dichotomies that blur the line between sex and violence, and love and hate, Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men is a work that examines psychosis and the transcendence of the individual from the organic to inorganic. Due to the exceptionally choreographed and brutishly calculated 'dance' sequences featured in the film, every movement in Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men seems quite naturalistic, despite the blatantly theatrical persuasion of the film. It is not until three of the four men are dead that the viewer realizes the line between the normal and abnormal has been irrevocably crossed. As someone who has always found most forms of dance to be dreadfully insipid and uninspiring, Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men proved to be an exorbitantly dynamic work that can be relished even by those individuals who are not very keen on grown men dancing around like coke-fueled fairies.

Using the curious case of cunning coldhearted killer Dennis Nilsen as a mere motif for examining ideas and interpreting emotions about the frailty of human condition in a refreshingly unpedantic manner, Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men is a film that will be more of interest to fans of Leni Riefenstahl and Ingmar Bergman's work than the typical serial killer fetishist. For those interested in seeing a strictly realistic portrayal of Dennis Nilsen and his crimes, the gritty British horror-docudrama Cold Light of Day (1989) directed by Fiona-Louise (who committed suicide shortly after finishing the film at the premature age of 21) makes for an atmospheric and endearing yet objective depiction of the mass murderer's odious 'sexual' conquests. In many ways, Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men is the ultimate anti-serial killer flick. Instead of portraying the killer in a typically romantic manner as a charming social Darwinist with a refined taste for blood (The Silence of the Lambs, American Psycho), or as a monstrous killing machine with nil emotions (Halloween, Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer), Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men depicts the deadly man-hunter in a state of unmitigated 'nakedness', characterizing him during his most vulnerable and, ultimately, his most human moments, thus bring humanity to the inhuman; undoubtedly, an audacious and perverse premise that is bound to offend an ample number of viewers. Indeed, the film is as visceral as serial killers flicks come, yet Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men does the seemingly impossible by not featuring a single drop of blood. Needless to say, I never expected for an avant-garde dance film to be one of very few works that, in my opinion, successfully playacts the metaphysics of murder, at least of the thoroughly repressed homosexual sort. Not only would I argue that Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men is quite possibly the most importunate 'dance' film of its time, but I would also wager that it is one of the most celestially idiosyncratic offerings of mostly malodorous and depreciated celluloid ghetto that is the serial killer film.

SLAUGHTER DISC

David Quitmire (2005)

Horror porn is a somewhat new trend that has been picking up momentum over the last couple of years. This is no surprise when considering that both horror films and porn follow a similar formula (little bit story, action, story, action, etc.). Both types of films also appeal to some of the most powerful and archaic of human emotions. The only reason people watch porn and horror is to satisfy cheap excitement. David Quitmeyer's Slaughter Disc didn't even satisfy my boredom. Slaughter Disc couldn't have cost more than a couple hundred dollars (and it is feature length at 90 minutes) to make. It has a pathetic local cable access channel quality with shitty digital video and crudely synchronized sound. These detractors still don't necessarily destroy a film of this type. Anyone going into a film like this shouldn't expect spectacular production values (or any values). Antiporn is supposed to be what Slaughter Disc is about. I guess that is quite right as I found nothing in the film remotely arousing. A typical looking porn star in dollar bin Halloween make-up and "spooky" white contacts isn't going to appeal to anyone (except maybe fans of Jerry Only's new The Misfits). This false vixen satisfies her lust for blood in a lame "gothic" way. She kills her victims after performing typical sex acts on them. Sorry, but this is no Nekromantik. Slaughter Disc features one of the most ugly and pathetic protagonists to grace the cheap screen of digital video. I hope this "film" isn't an auteur piece as David Quitmeyer has completely incriminated himself as the world's most desperate filmmaker. Slaughter Disc is full of loser masturbation, banal porn, and homemade horror. I can imagine that Quitmeyer (who calls Slaughter Disc "postmodern horror") came up with the idea for the film after drinking a couple cans of Coors Light. The horror world is already polluted with a dung heap of horrendous trash. Slaughter Disc is just another bag of garbage for the already putrid pile. Fans of both porn and horror will find that the film has nothing interesting or stimulating to offer. I hate to give negative reviews to low-budget filmmakers, but with Slaughter Disc it is absolutely necessary. The actual "slaughter disc" is one of those plastic discs that come in CD-R and DVD-R packs. The "slaughter disc" pretty much sums up the whole video (pointless, cheap, and disposable).

LAWRENCE OF ARABIA

David Lean (1962)

Lawrence of Arabia is one of the legendary “epic” films that always makes top 100 lists. The film is almost 4 hours of aesthetically pleasing desert cinematography. Lawrence of Arabia follows the life of T.E. Lawrence and his exploits during the first World War. He manages to unite blood thirsty (this is no joke) Arabs so they can kill a bunch of Turks. T.E. Lawrence is a sassy Anglo chap that doesn’t even fit in with his own charming British counterparts. He much prefers wearing Arab sheet gear and shooting Turks with his big revolver. Lawrence also has a thing for Arab men. The real Lawrence used to hire Arabs to whip him for pleasure. In the film, Lawrence is beaten as punishment and becomes quite upset. Was director David Lean trying to cover up the truth? Lawrence of Arabia, like most other epics, suffers from being way too long. Epics are only long because they lack intellectual content. Lawrence of Arabia could have easily been cut an hour. A film starts to blur together when most of it takes place in a desert. Director David Lean wanted to show how “big” a film could be. He inspired Steven Spielberg and George Lucas to kill American cells in the process. Alec Guinness (Obi-Wan Kenobi) is also featured in Lawrence of Arabia. I don’t think that I would agree with the assertion that Lawrence of Arabia is one of the greatest films ever made. It looks like one of the most labor extensive and expensive films ever made. I guess it’s one of the best films ever made when looking at Lawrence of Arabia with a capitalist mindset. I just thought it had beautiful cinematography and not much depth.

THE CABINET OF DR. CALIGARI
THE CABINET OF DR. CALIGARI

David Lee Fisher (2005)

The majority of film remakes are cinema blasphemy only created because they are a guaranteed moneymaker. Unsurprisingly, a good percentage of remakes are for the horror genre as I doubt the studios really have any respect for their audiences intelligence. When I found out that the 1920 German expressionist horror film The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari was remade, I became skeptical. On the other hand, I knew the film was not made as a way to cash in on a formally successful franchise. Aside from universities and film societies, I seriously doubt The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari receives many new viewers considering the film is almost 90 years old.

The 2005 “re-imagining” of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari happens to have the sound and set from the original film. The original backgrounds of the 1919 film were scanned and the remake was filmed on a blue screen. This gives the film an odd feeling that you have seen the place before but things are not quite right. I would compare it to a reoccurring nightmare that slightly changes each time. The scanned backgrounds of the original film are fairly seamless in combination with the new acting footage.

The story featured in The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari is fairly faithful to the original and still retains much of its power. It is just a bit odd to watch a film I have seen countless times now featuring sound dialogue. Naturally, this causes one to focus less on the image than if watching the original. As can be expected, the actors featured in The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari lack the power of the original performers. But quite honestly, who could champion the acting skills of Conrad Veidt? The actors featured in the remake deserve to be commended just for taking up such a challenge.

For fans of the original film and Guy Maddin, The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari is a film worth seeing. At worst it is a novelty film for those that cherish German expressionist cinema. In these so called “postmodern” days, the re-imagining of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari is unsurprising. With the lack of original contemporary masterpieces and original auteur, filmmakers spend more time looking at older films to get inspired. The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari(2005) director David Lee Fisher deserves a handshake.

THE CABINET OF DR. CALIGARI

David Lee Fisher (2005)

The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari is one of the notable masterpieces of German Expressionist cinema. German expressionist painters lent their talents to the design of the film resulting in one of most elaborate and unsettling set designs in cinema history. Designer Hermann Warm also created rigid and distorted set pieces that capture the viewer into a world of dissonant emotion that many individuals might find uncomfortable. Contemporary director Tim Burton owes The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (with other films of the German expressionist era) credit for being a major influence on the "gothic" directors work. I also couldn't help but notice the striking resemblance between Edward Scissorhands and somnambulist Cesare. Of course, The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari is a film worthy of "borrowing" from.

The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari has been noted for displaying the negative emotions of postwar German society. Basically, film theorists (especially Siegfried Kracauer) believed the film showed the "nightmare" that was Germany after the first world war. Although I believe this is true to some extent, the validity of that arguments doesn't change the fact that the film is a masterpiece (as some contemporary film historians are claiming it is not). The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari was made at a time when the horror film was still taken serious as a genre. The film is one so strong in the aesthetic department that the viewer can't help but keep their eyes on the distorted image. The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari is also one of few films that comes close to resembling a nightmare. Historical context does not always make a film notable. The artistry of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari speaks for itself.

The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari has a "twist ending" that does not get old in future viewings. The reason is that The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari is a film the sets a mood where the film's story is secondary. Don't get me wrong, the story itself is engulfing and fantastic. You just don't see many films that have as powerful images as those featured in The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari. Film sets nowadays are designed by over glamorized construction workers. The artists of the German expressionist period captured a nations (or at least their own) disturbed psyche via canvas.

The somnambulist featured in The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, despite his effeminate nature, makes the ultimate midnight fiend. For Dr. Caligari to unleash this being for a late night killing is more than appropriate. Jason Voorhees is a deformed retard and Leatherface is just a retard. I love me some slasher films, but when I think of a "scary" killer, Cesare comes to mind. Thankfully, although the film is in a state of minor deterioration (sometimes a good thing), The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari still haunts us today.

David Lynch (1977)

In 2004, David Lynch's film Eraserhead (1977) was justly deemed "culturally, historically, or aesthetically significant" by the United States Library of Congress and chosen for preservation in the National Film Registry. Personally, I feel Eraserhead is worthy of all three categories used by the United States Library of Congress, as I indubitably consider the film one of the grandest artistic achievements in American history. When I look back at my entire life, only a handful of hallmark films would leave such a deep impression on me that they would act as markers for which every subsequent cinematic work would be judged; Eraserhead being one of those films. Eraserhead is the kind of rare cinematic work that seems to have grown organically from the soul of the artist, boldly expressing the most deepest, darkest, and repressed feelings of traditional white America crying out in a nebulous globalized industrial world. I was certainly not surprised to learn that David Lynch has described Eraserhead as his "most spiritual movie." Lynch grew up in wholesome "middle America", so it is no revelation to realize that his whole outlook on life was changed when he moved to the industrial wasteland of Philadelphia; the city that would inspire the postindustrial barrenness of Eraserhead. Describing his ideal upbringing, Lynch stated, "Because I grew up in a perfect world, other things were a contrast." After viewing Eraserhead for the first time, it will be glaringly apparent to the viewer that something was burning a hole in the sensitive filmmaker's pure soul.

After David Lynch married his first wife Peggy (which produced a daughter), the Lynch family moved to Fairmount, Philadelphia, an area plagued with such brutal crimes that it would harbor a dire sense of fear in the young filmmaker. Not only was David Lynch thrown into a state of perpetual fear by the city; he was also a reluctant father in a troubled marriage. After sending a copy of his short film The Alphabet (1968) and a script of the short The Grandmother to the newly founded American Film Institute, David Lynch received financing for his upcoming work, eventually leaving Philadelphia for the AFI conservatory in Los Angeles, California. Not long after moving to the most populated city in California, Lynch began working on Eraserhead. AFI initially granted the director $10,000.00 to work on his first feature-length (although the film was originally intended to be only 42 minutes) film. Although David Lynch started filming Eraserhead in 1972, he would not complete the film until 1977. Not long after he started shooting the first scenes of the film, Lynch's marriage dissolved, as did the grant money for the production. Unable to obtain subsequent money from AFI, David Lynch took out a loan from his generous father and started a newspaper route. Divorced from his wife, Lynch started living on the movie set of Eraserhead, filming much of the movie during his sleepless nights. Despite suffering terrible times in Philadelphia, an atomized nuclear family, and an overall turbulent position in his life, Lynch was able to channel all of these negative emotions into the unsettling nightmarish aura that is Eraserhead; A film that Lynch has described as "my Philadelphia story."

Eraserhead begins when a diseased "man in the planet"(who I see as God) manipulates a couple metal mechanical levers, propelling a sperm-like organism to fall out of Henry' Spencer's (the film's protagonist) mouth into an abyss of percolating liquid. Although David Lynch has continuously left the meaning of Eraserhead in the realm of ambiguity, I see this scene as the conception of the alien child that will haunt Henry throughout the film. Near the beginning of Eraserhead, Henry is invited to eat dinner at the dilapidated house of his hyper-neurotic girlfriend Mary X. Henry, always anxiety-ridden and confused, is especially startled by his Girlfriend's bizarre family. Whilst eating dinner with Mary X's tribe, Henry becomes perturbed by a miniature man-made bleeding chicken that he is quite reluctant to carve. The father of the house makes a point to recognize that the mini-chickens are "just like real chickens," - a statement that reminded of the failure that is the industrially manufactured food industry, as well as the absurdity of inorganic food. I also could relate to the contrived conversation Mary's father tries to strike up with Henry. Every time I have dated a girl, I have been bothered by the banality and passive aggressive nature of the Girl's father, thinking to myself that behind this man's facade of friendliness lies an atavistic urge to kill the man that has buggered his sweet little girl. Mary X's Mother also carries an exaggerated caricature that resembles Mothers of girls I have dated - a combo of aggressive neuroticism and sexual gesturing. Like Henry, I always questioned whether or not I would leave the home of my girlfriend's family unscathed. Unfortunately for Henry, he will be indefinitely enslaved to his girlfriend's family via the birth of a repulsive newborn mutant child.

Eraserhead is a film that would have never worked, had the director opted out of shooting it in black-and-white film stock. Both in atmosphere and aesthetic, the film is a stark colorless journey into a very real nightmare, following a lonely life that hopelessly struggles to find physical/psychological relief. Thank the Anti-Christ that Eraserhead reached cult status in the underground cinema circuit, as the film's success probably saved Lynch from a dreadful life. Every time I watch Eraserhead and see Henry Spencer lose sanity as his mutant infant cries endlessly, I can only guess the unmentionable things that haunted David Lynch's mind as a destitute parent living in the cold bowels of a Philadelphia ghetto. The only escape Henry has in Eraserhead is in the company of a beautiful temptress that lives across the hall and a mutant-cheek cutie that lives in his radiator. Henry's girlfriend is homely at best, with a personality comparable to that of a neurotic toddler that suffers from acute autism. I think that most viewers of Eraserhead will agree that Henry's extracurricular sexual liaisons are quite understandable when you consider the intolerable nature of his girlfriend; a highly disagreeable gal that spends most of her time falling victim to seizures. If you believe that you have suffered immensely from a highly destructive romantic relationship at some point in your life, after watching Eraserhead you will indubitably change your mind and feel nothing short of the deepest empathy for poor Henry Spencer; God's most lonely man. By directing Eraserhead, David Lynch audaciously filmed his black and battered heart on celluloid for all the world to see.

Although I have seen more than my fair share of films with dreamlike qualities, Eraserhead is the only one that permeated the organic feeling of an authentic dream. Like Henry Spencer, in my dreams I have had the tragic feeling of losing a beloved lady in the darkness of hallways. During dreams, I have also had the pleasure of meeting an autoerotic succubus, as well as a virginal blond beauty; the two archetypal extremes of female sexuality. I decided to re-watch Eraserhead a couple days ago after hearing a worthy cover of the song "In Heaven" by the darkwave group The Danse Society. Although Eraserhead is a cinematic journey into heaven, the film also takes the viewer deep into the bottomless pits of psychological hell. The lady in the radiator may have an unsettling smile, but she certainly makes "everything thing feel fine." Despite the morbid nature and grueling intensity throughout most of the film, Eraserhead concludes on an uplifting note, as if David Lynch was able to foretell the fruitful career he would have in filmmaking (not to mention the fact he has dated beautiful women like Isabella Rossellini). Eraserhead ends with a climax more electrifying than a brothel of flapper whores screaming out in ecstasy as they reach the peak of an ethereal collective orgasm. If you consider cinema holy, Eraserhead is your Book of Revelation.

David Lynch (1984)

Dune is David Lynch's only sci-fi film. Lynch considers Dune to be his only artistic failure. After viewing the film for the first time, I thought Dune was Lynch's "biggest" mess. I assumed it was merely jumbled pieces of the Frank Herbert novel (which I have not read). I have changed my mind on the abstract sci-fi film. Dune has more cohesion than Lynch's recent digital effort Inland Empire. Although the film lacks a lot in the way of detail, Dune makes up for it in aesthetics. The set design in Dune makes Star Wars IV: A New Hope look weak in comparison. The shots of the sand dunes, deserts, and other landscapes are easily comparable to the beauty found in David Lean's (who at one point was supposed to direct Dune) Lawrence of Arabia. In contrast to the beauty of the film, Dune also includes futuristic dark knights of the apocalypse. The Baron and his henchman offer a sort of evil that is highly enjoyable. The Baron has a striking resemblance to second in command of Third Reich Hermann Göring (who was descended from Bavarian Barons). Like Göring, the Baron enjoyed himself some young men. The Baron only gives a slight signal to his feelings when admiring Feyd (played by Sting). The Baron and Göring also share a charismatic bloated flamboyance that they somehow pull off. Hermann Göring was a hedonistic drug addict who was forced to wear a straight jacket when committed at a mental hospital. The Baron also carries a similar profile in his power hungry sociopath ways. The Baron

Hermann Göring

I never thought I would see Kyle MacLachlan play a Christ like figure. His performance in his role as Paul (who later emerges later in the film as Muad'Dib) is surprisingly bold. Paul has invested his life in obtaining the "spice" to confirm his messianic powers. Gigantic sandworms, neon blue eyed creep children, fire crotch Nazis, and Sting offer elements not often seen in David Lynch films. I still think that Eraserhead is Lynch's greatest achievement. Dune lies somewhere in the middle of Lynch's best films (I used to think Dune was his worst film). Someone needs to convince Lynch to go back to film. His artistic freedom needs to be somewhat limited.

BLUE VELVET

David Lynch (1986)

I go back and forth on what is my favorite David Lynch film. It wasn't hard for me to realize, however, that Eraserhead and Blue Velvet are the most important to me. Although Eraserhead left a much larger impression on me, Blue Velvet is a film that I go back to most often. Blue Velvet is also one of the few films that has made me feel patriotic as an American. Like the setting of Lumberton in Blue Velvet, I grew up in a small town. Also like the world featured in the film, I felt slightly disturbed by the strange wholesomeness of the community and also sought to find the more subversive elements in my small town.

Jeffrey Beaumont is a fairly "normal" college student who returns to his hometown after his father suffers from a severe stroke. The stroke scene in Blue Velvet is hilarious like many of the tragic events featured in the film. I especially liked when a Jack Russell terrier starts attacking the water coming out of the hose in slow motion. Although supposedly "man's best friend," this doggy seems completely apathetic to his owners horrible fall. This scene, and like many other in Blue Velvet, is a brilliant assault on the values that the post-World War II suburbanites held so deeply.

Jeffrey Beaumont finds himself in a strange situation when he finds a human ear randomly in a vacant grass field. Once giving the ear to a local police detective, he begins to realize that things are not quite right in Lumberton. Then on after, Jeffrey begins to realize that the small town he grew up in is not so normal after all. With Blue Velvet, David Lynch was able to create a film of mystery that borders on the surreal. David Lynch has admitted that he is not an intellectual and that his ideas come from subconsciously within. I believe this is why Blue Velvet is a unique film and the story that could not have been contrived by the most clever of screenwriters/filmmakers.

Isabella Rossellini is an undeniably beautiful and stunning woman yet I find it hard to see her as sexually attractive. This is probably due to her ability to play a completely deranged Dorothy Vallens in Blue Velvet in a very authentic manner. Whether it be a knife wielding Dorothy demanding Jeffrey to strip or her being completely naked and battered near the end as she speaks of Jeffrey putting his "disease" in her, she is genuinely creepy. Dorothy also acts as the perfect opposite and arch enemy of Jeffrey's teenage love interest, Sandy. Whereas Dorothy is somewhat voluptuous and dark haired, Sandy is very homely (or more like ugly) and blond. David Lynch's dichotomy of the beautiful ruined whore and the plain Jane wholesome blond girl next door is something that probably crossed his mind many times in his younger years. With the conclusion of Blue Velvet, it seems that beautiful deranged women are only good for screwing and wholesome girls are good for marrying. What a profound revelation.

Dennis Hopper's performance as Frank Booth in Blue Velvet is without doubt one of his greatest. The only other performance by Hopper that rivals it is his performance in Tim Hunter's River's Edge as the crippled psycho biker Feck. From the initial appearance of Frank Booth in Blue Velvet, the tone of the film changes. Frank Booth is a criminal with some serious mother issues. Like many of the most inhumane killers and politicians of history, Booth seems to have some sexual issues as shown after he rapes Dorothy Vallens in an almost ritualistic manner. A friend of Frank Booth named Ben also seems to have sexual issues. Frank calls Ben "suave" various times during his visit at his old ugly whore infested residence. Ben's "suaveness" is that he is an effeminate homosexual pimp (assumed) that has an ability to pull off pancake makeup. Due to their odd sexualities and pathologies, both Frank and Ben have fallen into a life of "unnatural" crime.

Suave Ben

Despite being a somewhat strange film, Blue Velvet is a great film to watch with friends. Quoting such Frank Booth lines in Blue Velvet like "baby wants to fuck!" and "Heineken? Fuck that shit! Pabst Blue Ribbon!" have become a sort of cult (or not so cult) phenomenon. One also cannot forget the memorable soundtrack in Blue Velvet. Dorothy Vallens's less than musical performance of Blue Velvet is notable as well as queer Ben's lip-sync performance of Roy Orbison's "In Dreams." To bring up River's Edge once again, this film and Blue Velvet make the perfect two billing midnight living room screening.

Blue Velvet is the ultimate piece of cinematic Americana. That being said, I believe David Lynch to be the greatest truly "American" contemporary director. Only America could produce such a unique individual as the ever so charming Frank Booth. Only America could produce such an ideal "normal" young man as Jeffrey Beaumont. Finally, only America could produce such a unique film as Blue Velvet. What a shame that Hollywood is full of such banal and mediocre "directors." One can only guess how many David Lynchs are hiding out in American small towns.

WILD AT HEART
WILD AT HEART

Exceedingly eccentric white trash Elvis Presley worship, unclad morbidly obese hookers, a Southern Negro being beaten to death by Nicholas Cage to the soothing sounds of speed metal music, wayward The Wizard of Oz fetishism of the looney Lynchian sort, Jack 'Eraserhead' Nance barking like a dog, a rather sleazy Willem Dafoe accidentally blowing his own head off with a sawed-off shotgun, the whoring out of ostensible all-American girl Laura Dern in the role of a Marilyn Monroe-esque character, Hebraic proto-hipster John Laurie sporting a confederate flag trucker hat, a hyper hysterical Sherilyn Fenn dying in a brutal car wreck after complaining about such trivialities as misplacing her purse, and the absurdist reinvention of the Southern Gothic are just a couple of the reasons why Wild at Heart (1990) has become one of my favorite David Lynch films, with Eraserhead (1977) and Blue Velvet (1986) being the only films directed by the avant-garde neo-surrealist auteur that transcend it in terms of celluloid majesty. Indeed, while I initially wrote-off Wild at Heart as an interesting, if not second rate, work directed by an auteur who had already reached his full artistic potential with Blue Velvet when I first saw it over a decade ago or so, it is now one of my favorite films of the 1990s and probably the only Nicholas Cage film I do not feel embarrassed about recommending to my friends. Arguably Lynch's most overtly erotic yet darkly humorous work to date, Wild at Heart is based on the neo-noir pulp novel Wild at Heart: The Story of Sailor and Lula (1990) by 'neo-Beat' poet/novelist Barry Gifford (who would later go on to co-pen Loft Highway (1997) with Lynch) and features one of the greatest collections of character actors in film history, including Harry Dean Stanton, Willem Dafoe, Crispin Glover, Isabella Rossellini, Jack Nance, John Lurie, Sherilyn Fenn, Grace Zabriskie, and Diane Ladd, amongst various other wild and wayward walking and talking human caricatures. Based on a novel Lynch described as being "a really modern romance in a violent world – a picture about finding love in hell," Wild at Heart is like a Southern fried Blue Velvet minus any inkling of wholesome Americana as a sort of heterosexual love letter to Tennessee Williams (interestingly, stars Diane Ladd and Laura Dern are related to Williams). Featuring Hollywood goofball Nicholas Cage (who wears his own snakeskin jacket in the film, which he did in tribute to Marlon Brando's performance in The Fugitive Kind (1960), which was based on the Williams play Orpheus Descending (1957)) in the lead role in what unquestionably the greatest and most fitting performance of his career as an exceedingly eccentric Elvis fan, Wild at Heart is a rare cinematic work that manages to be as unwaveringly entertaining and provocative as it is aesthetically audacious, which is undoubtedly one of Lynch's greatest talents as a filmmaker who has managed to do the seemingly impossible by bringing the avant-garde to Hollyweird. A neo-noir/southern gothic/road movie hybrid that totally distinguishes itself from the old school film genres it is inspired by, Wild at Heart is ultimately the closest an American film from the 1990s has come to resembling genuine American celluloid art, as a sort of playfully pernicious cinematic postcard from the monstrously mongrelized hell-on-earth that is the post-Confederate South. In other words, Wild at Heart is about as 'culturally sensitive' as a Nathan Bedford Forrest sex tape.

Beginning with strangely loveable 'antihero' Sailor Ripley—a character aptly described by actor Nicholas Cage as “a kind of romantic Southern outlaw”—brutally beating to death a sleazy Negro criminal named Bobby Ray Lemon (played by stuntman Gregg Dandridge) to rather ridiculous speed metal music in what I believe is one of the most absurdly humorous scenes of cinema history, Wild at Heart immediately lets the viewer know that they are watching a film that neither Spike Lee nor Steven Spielberg could stomach. The black thug that Sailor murdered was hired by his 20-year-old 'virgin-whore' girlfriend Lula Pace Fortune's (Laura Dern) maniac mother Marietta Fortune (Diane Ladd) to kill him, so naturally the snakeskin-jacket-sporting gentleman killed the sinister watermelon man in defense, even if he seemed to have a little too much fun while doing it. Unfortunately for him, Marietta—a whack-job wench and somewhat over-the-hill femme fatale who sometimes takes on the form of a broomstick-riding Wicked Witch of the West—believes Sailor was a witness to the murder of Lula's father in an act of arson/murder disguised as an accidental fire and thus wants to dispose of him before he can tell everyone the truth (though, in fact, he never actually witnessed the crime). As a result of committing the murder of the black hoodlum at a very public Cape Fear ballroom located somewhere in between North Carolina and South Carolina, Sailor is sent to prison for a short time, but when he gets out his beloved Lula is waiting for him outside the jail and the two rekindle their literal and figurative flame by heading to a motel room and making passionate mattress-drenching love. The same night, the two lecherous love birds go to a concert for the speed metal band Powermad and when Lula is harassed by a dimwitted Guido metalhead, Sailor respectfully beats said Guido metalhead's ass and proceeds to sing a quasi-campy cover of Elvis Presley's "Love Me." A hopeless romantic who is not exactly the wisest when it comes to nuances of law and order, Sailor decides to break parole and head on a Bonnie and Clyde-esque road trip with Lula to sunny California. Meanwhile, Lula's deranged mother Marietta hires a private detective Johnnie Farragut (Harry Dean Stanton), who also happens to be her on-and-off again boyfriend, to track down Sailor and Lula and bring them back. A scheming bitch of a witch if there ever was one, Marietta also hires another on-and-off again boyfriend, gangster Marcellus Santos (J. E. Freeman) to track down and kill Sailor, but the career criminals opts for killing Johnnie Farragut first. Though already a psychopathic witch of a woman, Marietta loses what little is left of her sanity upon discovering Farragut is dead and proceeds to draw over her face and entire body with red lipstick. Meanwhile, Sailor and Lula, who have no idea of the demented depth of Marietta's sadistic she-bitch schemes, wallow in their wild and wanton romantic road trip as if they are the only two people in the world, but the two receive a bad omen when while driving on a road called the 'Yellow Brick Road' they discover the horrific aftermath of a two-car accident, even witnessing a babbling and bloodied broad (Sherilyn Fenn) taking her last gasp right before their startled eyes.

With less than $100 to their names, Sailor and Luna end up in a Texas hell-hole of a town named 'Big Tuna' where most of the Fellini-esque inhabitants seem like they would probably reek of rancid fish guts. Not long after reluctantly landing in Big Tuna, Sailor bumps into an old Latina gal pal named Perdita Durango (Isabella Rossellini), who pretends to give him vital information as to whether or not there is a price on his head but is really in cahoots with hitman Santos and a mysterious mob boss named Mr. Reindeer (W. Morgan Sheppard), who has a peculiar proclivity towards flashing a shiny half dollar before executing his victims. After learning that Lula is pregnant, Sailor becomes so desperate that he agrees to commit a bank robbery with a sinister sex pervert of an ex-marine turned psychopathic career criminal named Bobby Peru (Willem Dafoe). Little does Sailor realize that Mr. Peru sexually assaulted Lula and works with Ms. Durango/Mr. Reindeer and thus plans to kill the 'E' fan during the bank robbery. Of course, the bank robbery is botched when a cop randomly shows up and Sailor manages to survive the ordeal after Peru gets his head blown off (with his own gun!) during a shootout with the police officer. The snakeskin-sporting protagonist is sentenced to almost 6 years (5 years, 10 months, 21 days to be exact) in prison for his part in the crime and is separated from his wife for about 6 years, not to mention the fact that he misses bonding with his son during his most critical years. Just as she did about 6 years before, Lula waits for Sailor outside the prison when he is released from jail, albeit this time with their young son Pace Fortune (Glenn Walker Harris Jr.), but their happiness upon reuniting is short-lived as the ex-con believes it will be best for everyone involved if he goes elsewhere and disappear from their lives entirely. Luckily, not long after his heartbreaking and seemingly senseless breakup with Lula, Sailor is beaten up by a gang of multicultural thugs after calling them "faggots," as he passes out from the beating and has a vision of the Glinda the Good Witch (as portrayed by Sheryl 'Laura Palmer' Lee) from The Wizard of Oz, who pleads to him, "Don't turn away from love, Sailor." After becoming conscious again, Sailor apologizes to the yellow and brown gangs members for questioning their sexuality and thanks them for beating him up and knocking some much needed sense into him. In the end, Sailor reunites with Lula and sings a cover of E's "Love Me Tender", which is a song he said he would only sing to his wife.

Despite receiving mostly mixed and negative reviews upon its initial release (most notably by exceedingly effete and equally flabby film critic Roger Ebert, who led an army of trendy boozers at Cannes after Jury President Bernardo Bertolucci announced the film won the most prestigious prize), Wild at Heart managed to rightfully win the coveted 'Palme d'Or' at the Cannes Film Festival in 1990, thus demonstrating that despite their airs of pretense, the frogs surely have the right to be stinking snobs, especially while in the company of philistine American film critics. In eclectically bizarre company with The Wiz (1978) directed by Sidney Lumet, Weit Weit Weg (1995) aka Far Far Away directed by Norwegian-kraut queer video artist Bjørn Melhus, and The Cuckoo Clocks of Hell (2011) in Ron Atkins in its postmodern celluloid defiling of The Wizard of Oz, Wild at Heart ultimately says "There's no place like home" in a fashion worthy of 100 dead dipsomaniac Confederate war generals, as an American fairytale for those individuals that are far too cynical and disillusioned with the land of the culturally-free and socially-depraved to give a crap about classical children's stories. It should be noted that, aside from the Twin Peaks (1990-1991) prequel/epilogue Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (1992), Wild at Heart is technically the only film directed by David Lynch that has a sequel (though it is more a sequel to Gifford's Sailor and Lula novel series than a directed sequel to Lynch's film), with Perdita Durango (1997) aka Dance with the Devil—a work also based on a Barry Gifford novel centering around the character Perdita Durango (albeit this time played by the less aesthetically pleasing Rosie Perez, as opposed to Isabella Rossellini)—being directed by Spanish auteur Álex de la Iglesia instead of Mr. Eraserhead. While being more faithful to Latino lunacy than Lynchian and lacking the characters of Sailor and Lula, Perdita Durango will certainly be of interest to most Wild at Heart fans, as a work that ultimately wallows more in black Meztizo humor than black white Southern hearts. While I must admit it is hard for me to relate to Elvisphile protagonist Sailor on most levels, I found myself rooting for his purity of heart and dangerous dedication to romance. Indeed, while seeming a bit autistic when he declares that his snakeskin "represents a symbol of my individuality" and "belief in personal freedom," Sailor simultaneously represents the best and worst thing about America as an idealist whose dreams are also the source of his worst nightmares, yet he keeps treading on anyway like any great die hard dumb ass yank would.

If Pasolini gave a good idea of the spirit of post-WWII Italy during the so-called 'Years of Lead' with his films and written works and Fassbinder did the same with his plays and films regarding the post-Wirtschaftswunder years and far-left terrorist in West Germany during 1970s, David Lynch has certainly achieved something similar, with Wild at Heart reflecting the director's fear of America falling into criminal barbarism, or as he stated upon reading Gifford's book and deciding to tackle the project, "It was just exactly the right thing at the right time. The book and the violence in America merged in my mind and many different things happened." Of course, since Wild at Heart, Lynch's works have only become all the more labyrinthine and impenetrable, with his most recent feature Inland Empire (2006) indicating that America is on the brink of some sort of cultural apocalypse. That being said, I now get a nostalgic feel while watching Wild at Heart, as it depicts a time when filmmakers had no qualms about featuring evil negro characters and before the Southwest faced the wraith of the Mestizo Reconquista, not to mention the fact that it features Nicholas Cage before he became one of the worst leading men of cinema history.

TWIN PEAKS: FIRE WALK WITH ME

David Lynch (1992) Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me may be David Lynch's most disappointing film. Long time lovers of Lynch and Twin Peaks even hated it. Fire Walk With Me explores the life of Laura Palmer leading up to her death. Most Twin Peaks fans would agree this was not necessary. Probably around half the characters from the TV show never make an appearance in Fire Walk With Me. The film also takes a more serious tone than the quirky TV show. For a feature length film, the quality isn't much different than TV. Fire Walk With Me features naughty things like boobies and cracked open skulls. Laura Palmer's Father is not exactly the best role model.

Fire Walk With Me is still "Lynchian." The film has the feel of your typical Lynch film. I assume since Twin Peaks was canceled Lynch decided the only way to get out all his perverse TP fantasies would be to do a film. Big names like Kiefer Sutherland and David Bowie appear. Neither of which should have entered Lynch's Midwestern world.

Still, I do enjoy Fire Walk With Me. It is entertaining enough to get me through the entire film. It is also no doubt better than Lynch's complete self proclaimed failure Dune. The film has grown a little bit on me since my first viewing (which I barely made it through). Laura Palmer scares me. What a crazy bitch.

LOST HIGHWAY

David Lynch (1997)

David Lynch's Lost Highway is one of my favorite efforts from the director of "weird." The film was one of Lynch's first (although he had bewildered people in the past) to really irritate the mainstream audience in its extreme ambiguity and lack of rational linear structure. Lost Highway follows a successful avant-garde Jazz musician and the mysterious circumstances surrounding the death of his wife. While being charged and imprisoned for the murder of his wife, the Jazz musician morphs into a young man for no apparent reason and then is released from jail. Of course, no reason is given for this bodily change. David Lynch makes no lie about his affinity for mystery and things that intrigue. I respect Lynch's obsession with the unconscious and his contempt for intellectualism. Lost Highway is a solidly constructed film to me. Mulholland Dr. and Inland Empire are both films that left me feeling like I just wasted a couple of hours. I have gone back to these various times and have yet to completely respect them (especially Inland Empire). The masterpiece (in its own right) that is Lost Highway did not give Lynch a license to delve beyond the subconscious. In all honesty, I believe the "weirdness" of Inland Empire was a bit contrived at times. Someone needs to take away Lynch's digital camera. Lost Highway was the last film to feature Eraserhead Jack Nance. Shortly after Lost Highway was completed, Nance was beaten up by two Mexicans at a donut shop because he made a joke about their baggy pants (and told them to get a job and haircut). Nance was later found dead in his apartment with a large amount of alcohol in his system. Nance's minor role as a mechanic in Lost Highway was a good way to end an inconsistent career (for the most part only playing minor roles). The character of Mr. Eddy is one of the most hilarious (and that's saying a lot) characters to ever be featured in a Lynch film. Mr. Eddy makes a true contribution to society when he bitch slaps a white collar scumbag for riding his ass. That "cocksucker" got what he deserved. People should take notice to the virtuous philosophies of Mr. Eddy. Wife killer Robert Blake shines as the "mystery man" who has a resemblance to Bela Lugosi's Dracula. Tiny old Italian men are enough to scare any rational individual. The fear that he invokes in Bill Pullman's character gave me much more respect for the killer. Bill Pullman is one of the lamest actors in film history. David Lynch recently mentioned his realization that Lost Highway was inspired by the O.J. Simpson trial. I have my own interpretation of the film, but I have no intention of mentioning it. I find it ugly and obnoxious when I hear fan's of David Lynch express their "solid" interpretations of the Hollywood Auteur's films. I would rather watch the latest Michael Bay flick.

THE STRAIGHT STORY

After recently watching Alexander Payne's obscenely overrated, white-prole-patronizing Midwestern celluloid mess Nebraska (2013), I felt it was about time that I re-watch the David Lynch film that it ripped off, The Straight Story (1999). Easily the 'strangest' and most unconventionally conventional film in Lynch's oeuvre, The Straight Story has the distinction of not only being the director's sole G-rated Disney movie, but also the only film he was not actually involved with penning (although the film was co-written by Lynch's ex-wife/baby mamma/collaborator Mary Sweeney). Indeed, a film that could not be more fittingly titled, The Straight Story is a 'straight story' based on a true story about a straight old man named Alvin Straight who, at the age of 73, rode his John Deere riding lawnmower straight across Iowa and Wisconsin over a six week period in 1994 to make peace with his 80-year-old brother who had just suffered a stroke. While Lynch's films have always been as distinctly American as apple pie, The Straight Story is certainly more sweet than bittersweet and always warm inside, as if cooked to perfection by your long dead grandmother. Undoubtedly, Lynch's most sentimental film since The Elephant Man (1980), albeit in a more genuine and personal way, The Straight Story is a rare mainstream movie that depicts the strong, stoic, steadfast and primitively 'sentimental' America that has rarely been authentically depicted onscreen and is all but dead. Starring Richard Farnsworth (The Grey Fox, Misery) as the lead in a classic role that John Hurt and Gregory Peck probably regret turning down that would earn the star an Academy Award nomination for Best Actor (making Farnsworth the oldest person ever nominated for the award at that time), The Straight Story, not unlike a John Deere tractor, is a slow but strong and steady work that reminds one that not all road movies have to be about hippie stoners going to pick up drugs, morbidly depressed existentialists going nowhere fast in life, or a bunch of naïve teenagers attempting to 'find themselves' (or whatever). The one David Lynch film you can show your grandfather without him thinking you're some sort of crazed degenerate and/or pansy pervert, The Straight Story is just another reminder why the man who directed Eraserhead is the only true auteur working in Hollywood (or at least somewhere around it) who has given a voice to the silent majority.

Alvin Straight (Richard Farnsworth) is a 73-year-old World War II veteran and widow who probably only has a couple years to live and, due to his poor eyesight, he no longer even has a driver's license, which has diminished his sense of independence. The father of seven children (seven more died at birth) whose wife died in 1981 and whose middle-age daughter Rose (Sissy Spacek), who is borderline retarded (but has an amazing memory when it comes to simple dates and facts), now takes care of him, Alvin is essentially just waiting to die in peace, but that all changes when he learns that his estranged big brother Lyle (Harry Dean Stanton) has just had a debilitating stroke. Due to some bad blood between the two, Alvin has not seen his brother in a decade and wants to make peace with him before he dies. On top of ignoring his daughter Rose's advice that he use a walker and give up his vice of alcohol and tobacco, Alvin eventually decides he will test his strength by riding his rather ancient riding lawnmower across a couple to states to a place called 'Mount Zion' where his big bro lives. Needless to say, Rose and Alvin's equally elderly friends think it is a bad idea, but the headstrong old timer does not let negative naysayers get him down. On his first attempt, Alvin fails after his less than trusty mower breaks down, so he hilariously blasts away the piece of archaic yard equipment with his surely trusty shotgun by shooting the gas tank. After buying a reliable green John Deere tractor from a salesman (Everett McGill) who finds the whole trip to Mount Zion on a lawnmower quite dubious, Alvin, who has plenty of gas and Braunschweiger to eat, makes his second attempt, which will ultimately be successful, but not without some detours on the way. One night while cooking wieners, Alvin meets a young hitchhiker female who the old timer deduces is pregnant and has run away from home. Alvin then tells a story about his daughter Rose lost all four of her children after one of them was burnt when a babysitter was watching them, as the state felt such a mentally handicapped woman could not possibly be fit to raise children, even if she had nothing to do with the fact her child was injured. Using a bundle of sticks as a metaphor for the unbreakable force of family (the whole 'United we stand...divided we fall' deal), Alvin, who may not be an intellectual but is certainly wise for his years, seems to leave a deep impression on the naïve hitchhiker.

After being passed by a group of RAGBRAI cyclists, Alvin later finds himself hanging out at a cyclist camp with some young folks where he discusses old age and states that one of the worse part of one's golden years is, "remembering when you was young." After running into a hysterical woman who has just run over and killed a deer with her car and proceeds to cry about her curse-like propensity for hitting the cute animals, Alvin finds himself with dinner and cooks and eats the still slightly warmly road kill. After going down a steep hill on his tractor, Alvin runs into transmission trouble, but luckily he gets help from some rather helpful locals. In the down time, Alvin hooks up with a fellow beer-loving vet and confesses how as a sniper during the Second World War he killed many Germans and even accidentally killed a comrade of Polish extraction named Kotz via friendly fire and how he has had to carry that burden his entire life. Eventually, Alvin has his tractor fixed by two bickering brothers named the 'Olson Twins' (Kevin and John P. Farley, who are the brothers of Chris Farley), who try to overcharge the old man for their work but they drop the price after some intense bartering. Alvin also gives the Olson Twins a lesson on brotherly love, remarking regarding his trip to see his brother, "this trip is a hard swallow... of my pride."

Indeed, as Alvin tells a Priest (John Lordan) he meets that night in a cemetery regarding the bad blood between him and his brother, "Story as old as the Bible. Cain and Abel. Anger, vanity. You mix that together with liquor, and...you've got two brothers who haven't spoken in ten years." When the Priest asks about his 'peculiar' form of transportation, Alvin matter-of-factly states, "Well, you're not the first person to notice that. Padre. My eyes are bad. I can't drive. I don't like someone else drivin' the bus, and I need to get to my brother's." Regarding Alvin's decision to make peace with his brother, the Padre kindly states, "I say, 'Amen' to that, brother." With only a small drive to his brother Lyle's, Alvin ends up breaking down, but luckily it is just because he is out of gas and a farmer on a very large tractor gives him some fuel to finish the trip. Upon arriving at his brother's discernibly dilapidated home in the woods, Alvin calls Lyle's name and his brother eventually walks out very slowly with his hand firmly clasping a cane. Upon sitting next to one another on the porch of the house, Lyle asks, "Did you ride that thing all the way out here to see me?" and Alvin replies, "I did, Lyle," with both men tearing up intensely upon their long awaited reunion as men whose lives have dried up. Undoubtedly, it surely would have meant less to Lyle if his brother merely took a bus, as Alvin's John Deere odyssey was surely an act of atonement for both his brother and his life in general.

Undoubtedly a heartwarming celluloid tale that manages to be sentimental without being too superficial or phony, The Straight Story seems somewhat depressing when one considers the fact that star Richard Farnsworth, who was diagnosed with terminal bone cancer in 1999 and was in much pain during the filming of Lynch's film, committed suicide the same year by shooting himself at his own ranch home. Golden years suicides aside, Farnsworth certainly proved he shared a sort of kindred spirit with the real Alvin Straight as he did not let illness stop him from achieving in what age few people achieve in an entire lifetime. Like a Wim Wenders' flick minus the sometimes plodding pretense and existentialist Europeanness, The Straight Story is the true heart of (old) America in the form of a John Deere and a sort of celluloid eulogy for the so-called 'Greatest Generation' that ever lived. Indeed, while I have no doubt that Alvin Straight's generation makes every subsequent generation seem like a bunch of pampered pansies who do more consuming than producing, it's quite ironic that same generation won a war that would ultimately destroy their way of life forever. Indeed, with the Americanization of the world and the flooding of America itself with innately alien and mostly inassimilable diasporas from the third world who have nothing but contempt for the relatively wholesome sort of people depicted in The Straight Story, it would seem Alvin's killing of krauts and his Polish friend during the Second World War was for nothing but to guarantee that his grandchildren and great-grandchildren would have rather dubious futures where old expressions like, "Oh, for cry eye!" (a favorite saying of one of Mr. Straight's friends) will be deader than road kill and where biracial children will have nothing but scorn for their fair-haired cracker ancestors. A true American 'Heimat' flick with a shockingly refreshing sense of purity and dignity that is nearly impossible to find anywhere nowadays—be it in cinema or otherwise—is as straight as celluloid storytelling comes, as a picture perfect postcard of the most weirdly unweird Lynchian sort.

INLAND EMPIRE

David Lynch (2006) Any fan of the bizarre or down right obscure cinema, knows the name David Lynch. Over decades, he has sealed his place as the master of American mainstream arthouse with his debut film Eraserhead; which is among his best film and if not, one of the most disturbing pieces of independent cinema to grace US soil. Throughout the years, he has expanded in many different genre pieces and themes for film including alcoholism, surrealism, sexual dysfunction, and identity crisis. With his newest film Inland Empire finally released, many fans are left confused due to the sprawling 3 hours of nonsense that seems like every deleted scene from a Lynch film mashed together and given reject characters.

The film pays its homage to his own creation, Mulholland Drive, at the very beginning and continues throughout the runtime. Lynch's muse Laura Dern stars in the film which quite simply, is about a woman in trouble. The reason he never explained this is because i don't even think he knows what this film is about.

Many theories have been unearthed and clues pieced together to form some plot about a woman with an acting curse. Many of the scenes are just completely random and fit in nowhere. The only satisfaction presented in this film is the score, the rabbit scenes, and the tense screen on the poster pictured above. Many of the scenes are disjointed and connected with an amazing soundtrack. The soundtrack is one of the key elements in the deliverence of the story. If it wasn't for the soundtrack, i might have completely despised this film. Over the years, Lynch has accumulated an unnecessarily huge fanbase. With this in mind, the decision to permanently switch to Digital Video isn't that strange at all. With the rise of David Lynch, the "auteur", it seems he realized that he could make an extreme amount of capital off the situation, thus releasing his own brand of coffee beans tagged with the line "It's all in the beans ... and I'm just full of beans." This tagline is either self-mocking or just an attempt to make people fashionable if you gobble up Lynch's beans. Some might get hotheaded and lash out on me by saying "You just didn't get it lol". My friends, i didn't want to get it. The hallucination within another hallucination just got old after 30 minutes. With the beans in tow, it looks now that the reason for the digital video choice is the cost. Lynch can make a film for half the price now, and even more people will buy it. It's an amazing profit, which must account for his fashionable coffee table. Lynch's DVD company ABSURDA seems to have blown his ego huge. For his privately released films, he has a special edition which includes a huge cardboard box for an extra 10 - 20 dollars. If the world allows something such as Dumbland to be sold for the same amount of any other classic film, i don't want to be apart of it. Inland Empire is just a rehash of Loſt Highway, Mulholland Drive, and a plethora of concepts from Lynch's assorted projects, self-boasting his throne of experimentation. It seems the days for Lynch to make a good film are long over. If you look at his films in a broader perspective, his characters are no more contrived than in any Wes Anderson film; the same absurdity, the juvenile pauses to build atmosphere; and the same Twin Peaks characters in a never-ending rerun. Final Words: Inland Empire is the result of the corpse of Dali shitting on film, and no, that is not flattery.

TWIN PEAKS: THE RETURN

David Lynch (2017)

Somewhat recently, I realized a girl that I was considering dating was a dumb bitch and immediately stopped talking to her because she, in her preposterously pretentious 'artiste' glory, had the unmitigated gall to proclaim that David Lynch of all filmmakers was a "hack." While I have my own strong criticisms regarding Lynch and have heard various attacks railed against him ranging from racism to perverted conservative misogyny (indeed, a dumb sapless soy boy named Jeff Johnson even dedicated an entire moronic book to this subject entitled Pervert in the Pulpit: Morality in the Works of David Lynch (2004)), it is nothing but patently absurd to claim that one of the most innately idiosyncratic auteur filmmakers to have ever suffered the grand artistic handicap of working in Hollywood makes something akin to dull and/or derivative celluloid bromide, especially in an aesthetically inverted era when anti-auteurs like Quentin Tarantino and Steven Spielberg—ostensible men with the emotional maturity and aesthetic refinement of bombastic little boys—are regarded by many professionals as some of the greatest filmmakers of all-time. Indeed, Lynch is one of the few cinematic artists and auteur filmmakers in all of cinema history that has managed to do the seemingly impossible by creating films that are both artistically original and genuinely entertaining, which he has indubitably demonstrated once again with his most recent and quite long-awaited 18-episode opus Twin Peaks: The Return (2017). Undoubtedly the perfect swansong to a rather singular and eclectic career, the 'event series' takes place 25 years after the original Twin Peaks was destroyed by the director's social justice warrior writing partner Mark Frost, who essentially completely took over the show after the first season and, with the help of various relatively unknown hack writers, turned it into a pseudo-quirky unintentional self-parody while Lynch was working on his darkly romantic road movie Wild at Heart (1990). Admittedly, I was somewhat dubious of the reboot when I initially heard it was in the works because I found Lynch's last feature Inland Empire (2006) to be quite literally unwatchable and assumed that the auteur was more interested in acting as an international propagandist for the pseudo-esoteric joke Transcendental Meditation (TM®) and pushing dubious projects like signature coffee beans and obscenely overpriced box-sets (e.g. The Lime Green Set) than testing the bounds of his artistic creativity and artistic prowess. In short, I was convinced that Lynch was high on his own supply and I still believe this to a certain extent, yet the latest and arguably greatest Twin Peaks season unquestionably demonstrates that elderly auteur still has artistic integrity and that he has not totally fried his brain on spiritually counterfeit TM® twaddle.

While various film academics have speculated that Lynch's film influences include cinematic works ranging from Luis Buñuel's classic surrealist short Un

TWIN PEAKS: THE RETURN

Chien Andalou (1929) to Robert Aldrich's (anti)Spillane sci-fi-noir Kiss Me Deadly (1955) to Blake Edwards' sexy sociopath thriller Experiment in Terror (1962), I can only assume after watching the new Twin Peaks that he has an intimate infatuation with both Peter Sellers' strangely indelible performance in Hal Ashby's sardonic dramedy Being There (1979) and Jeff Bridge's quite literally out-of-this-world role in John Carpenter's Starman (1984). Indeed, much to the chagrin of an Austrian friend of mine, the series' lead character FBI Special Agent Dale Bartholomew Cooper spends the majority of the film in a meta-autistic Chance-cum-Starman-esque state, but such spastic and unhinged behavior is surely fitting when one considers the undeniable steady cultural and social degeneration of the United States since the original series was released. Portrayed by Lynch's virtual cinematic doppelganger Kyle MacLachlan—an actor that is surely the living embodiment of the archetypal Lynchian hero—Agent Cooper was condemned to the absurdist pandemonium of the 'Black Lodge' at the end of the original series and spent the new couple decades there while an evil double associated with an equally evil swarthy spirited named 'BOB' assumed his identity in the real world and brought malefic misery to his friends and co-workers, including his beloved 'Diane' (who, although an unseen character on the original series, is fittingly depicted by longtime Lynch regular Laura Dern in the reboot). While one would dare that they could read the filmmaker's mind, I think that it is obvious while watching Twin Peaks: The Return that Lynch believes that the world, especially the United States, has only gotten darker, uglier, stupider, and sicker since the brutal quasi-incestuous murder of buxom blonde teen Laura Palmer, hence the crucial need for a reboot. Indeed, forget the feel-good quirk of the lighter aspects of the original series, the new series has more in common with the prequel Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (1992) and Lynch's debut feature Eraserhead (1977). Of course, that does not mean that the new series does not have a number of hyper hilarious scenes that would probably cause the ghost of Buñuel to pop a massive boner. After all, only Lynch could bring hilarity to meth-addled single mothers, teenage drug overdoses, arm wrestling, insufferably dumb obese women, sinisterly stoic yet nonetheless insufferably nerdy gangster accountants, white trash assassins, fast food, highly homicidal bearded bums, braindead mechanics, deadly hit-and-runs involving children, mouthy pussy-peddling negresses, slot machines, gangsters, beef jerky, unclad and overweight headless middle-aged corpses, and cowardly yet extremely treacherous insurance salesmen, among other things.

Aside from Agent Cooper being imprisoned in the Black Lodge for a couple decades and then being violently thrown back into the real world in an annoying incapacitated meta-autistic form, various other iconic Twin Peak characters reveal that they are unwitting victims of an exceedingly evil yet largely inexplicable zeitgeist where youth seems to be largely a curse and older people, who are largely worn out and disillusioned with life, are no more wiser. For example, one-time-baby-diva Audrey Horne, who only briefly appears on the show, is now a fiercely frigid and somewhat overweight hag that is now married to a grotesque quasi-dwarf turd and may or may not be completely unhinged and living out nightmarish fantasies in a loony bin, not to mention the fact she spawned a literal demon seed from an involuntary carnal union with Agent Cooper's devilish double. Additionally, Sheriff Harry S. Truman is so sick that he does not even appear on the show, heartthrob rebel James Hurley is now a pathetic creep that hangs out with lowclass Brits instead of hot ass chicks, Sarah Palmer is an unhinged recluse with deadly paranormal powers, the long-dead military mensch Major Garland Briggs makes a curious reappearance as a recently deceased unclad decapitated corpse, Margaret 'Log Lady' Lanterman is terminally ill, bad boy Bobby Briggs is now a divorced police detective, Shelly Johnson (and her ex-hubby Bobby) are plagued with a self-destructive dope-addled daughter, Jerry Horne has had one-too-many bad acid trips, Johnny Horne is even more retarded, and Mike Nelson is now a banal corporate bully instead of a cool teenage bully, among various other delightfully dejecting examples. Needless to say, the new characters on the show are no less forsaken and/or dysfunctional, though it seems that every urban area depicted outside of Twin Peaks is even more fucked up. Indeed, unlike the original two series, the titular town is only one of a number of regions depicted in what is ultimately a more all-around epic and ambitious TV series that is just too damn good and artistic audacious to be described as a TV series.

Undoubtedly, Lynch has always had very good instincts when it comes to casting characters as Twin Peaks: The Return, which features many intriguing cameo roles from people ranging from perennially gawky goombah hipster favorite Michael Cera to drop-dead-gorgeous guidette Monica Bellucci, surely demonstrates. For example, Lynch does a masterful job at using otherwise loathsome and insufferable actors in fitting roles, most notably semitic social justice warrior comedian Brett Gelman portraying a superlatively slimy Las Vegas casino manager that hilariously gets his seemingly nonexistent balls stomped in by a rather stern but nonetheless fair wop gangster. A uniquely unfunny kosher con-median that clearly demonstrated his hatred of freedom of speech and artistic expression by leading a sickeningly self-righteous hate campaign to get the show Million Dollar Extreme Presents: World Peace (2016)—a pleasantly politically incorrect experimental sketch comedy TV series that was successfully taken off the air due to complaints from various bitchy Hebraic individuals—removed from Adult Swim, gordo Gelman more or less represents everything that is particularly putridly loathsome and insufferable about Hollywood and is thus an immaculate symbol for the sort of enemy of creativity that Lynch has spent his entire career fighting against. In short, only Lynch would have such deep intuition to cast the uniquely unfunny Hebraic hack in a strangely darkly humorous role that he was clearly born to play.

Incidentally, Twin Peaks co-creator Mark Frost—a curious fellow that does not seem to have accomplished anything of notability outside his work with Lynch, who he has attached his name to like a starving maggot on a rancid pig corpse—is of a similarly intolerant neo-pinko pansy stripe as Gelman, as he can be regularly caught ranting and raving on Twitter about half-baked anti-Trump conspiracy theories and imaginary Nazis. For example, when Frost discovered via an ostensibly controversial New York Times article entitled A Voice of Hate in America's Heartland that a mild-mannered Ohioan white nationalist named Tony Hovater had a Twin Peaks tattoo, he demonstrated his emotionally necrotic boomer-esque reactionary bent by declaring on Twitter, “Having now read [sic] the article, f*ck your bemused neutrality, NYT. As for the story's ‘protagonist’: while you're on your way to hell, lose the TWIN PEAKS tattoo, Nazi scum.” Rather humorously, Hovater responded rather stoically by asking “would you be willing to pay for my removals?,” but Frost did not have the testicular fortitude to reply to a big mean nasty nazi. While I do not know much about Hovater aside from the fact that he strangely seems to enjoy Seinfeld—arguably the most hopelessly Hebraic TV show ever created—I have read the article about him and I think it is safe to say that, in terms of sheer eccentricity of character and personality, he is a more apt fit for the Twin Peaks realm than Frost is, as he at least has an overall idiosyncratic essence while the TV writer seemingly seems like the stereotypical spiritually castrated white Hollywood leftist cuck shithead. Needless to say, I can only assume that Frost was responsible for writing a line in the new series where Lynch's character FBI Deputy Director Gordon Cole says in support of David Duchovny's tranny FBI Chief of Staff Denise Bryson in regard to the anti-tranny sentiments of certain fellow agents, “I told all of your colleagues, those clown comics, to fix their hearts or die.” Since Lynch has spent his entire career making apolitical and oftentimes politically incorrect films that various mainstream leftist film reviewers and academics are keen on complaining about, this glaring and completely out-of-place instance of insufferably silly virtue-signaling is undoubtedly an indelible stain on the series. Rather humorously, an article at the implicitly Jewish website The Forward stops just short of accusing the show of containing cryptic anti-Semitic tropes as indicated by the following excerpt, “Ben Horne, played by song-and-dance man Richard Beymer — who in fact played Peter in the film of THE DIARY OF ANNE FRANK” — is the richest man in Twin Peaks, a nefarious, greedy character whose various business interests and relationships make him an on-again, off-again suspect in the murder of Laura Palmer. Ben's flamboyant brother and business partner, played by David Patrick Kelly, is named Jerry, an obvious allusion to the real-life Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, the founders of Ben and Jerry's ice cream.” Of course, characters like the Horne brothers and various others hint that Lynch is, at the very least, subconsciously counter-kosher, which is a somewhat humorous prospect to consider since the auteur once collaborated with Mel Brooks—a mensch that really deserves credit for being one of the most hopelessly and intrinsically Hebraic filmmakers of all-time—on The Elephant Man (1980).

One of the most intriguing aspects of Twin Peaks: The Return is that virtual every single young character is a total fuck-up, doped up, sociopathic, and/or completely irredeemable. For example, during a conversation between local cops in Twin Peaks, the viewer discovers that high school kids with cutesy names like “Little Denny Craig” are dropping like flies during classes via drug overdoses. In short, virtually every young woman needs to spend some time sporting a rusty scold’s bridle and every young man deserves to get the shit kicked out of him at least half-a-dozen times, as there is no way these degenerate youths will live normal balanced lives. Indeed, Bobby Briggs and his ex-ladylove Shelly McCauley Briggs (aka ‘Shelly Johnson’) have a beauteous yet coke-addled and dangerously self-destructive blonde daughter named Becky Burnett (née Briggs) that lives in a shitty dilapidated trailer with her similarly dope-ridden husband Steven Burnett. A physically and emotionally unhinged tweaker and deadbeat philander that deals dope because he is too retarded to even be able to manage a successful job interview for an entry level office position, Steven ultimately seems to leave Becky a widow by the end of the series after seemingly blowing his brains out off-screen in a somewhat ambiguous scene that really underscores the character’s decidedly dark drug-addled delirium. Needless to say, as the virtual literal demon seed of a sinister quasi-supernatural rape, Audrey Horne’s young career criminal son Richard Horne—a virtual modern-day Frank Booth that is depicted randomly grabbing a girl by the throat at a bar and stating to her in a demented fashion, “I’m gonna laugh when I fuck you, bitch”—is the ultimate unhinged piece of (sub)human millennial excrement par excellence. Aside from threatening to rape random girls at bars and beating and robbing his elderly grandmother while his retarded helpless uncle looks on in abject horror, little Richard also manages to kill a little kid in a hit-and-run accident and then proceeds to blame said kid for the incident. In short, like many kids of his mostly worthless generation, Richard—a sassy sicko that was sown in hatred—should have never been born. In fact, the only seemingly half-decent young character in the series is doofus Deputy Andy Brennan and his wife Lucy Brennan’s sole progeny ‘Wally Brando,’ who notably styles himself after Marlon Brando’s insanely iconic character in outlaw biker classic The Wild One (1953) which, incidentally, Lynch’s buddy Monty ‘The Cowboy’ Montgomery co-directed a quasi-remake of entitled The Loveless (1982). Clearly rejecting the degenerate trends of his own zeitgeist but unfortunately lacking the charm, charisma, and beauteous handsomeness of his messiah Marlon, Wally, who is portrayed by goofy hipster guido Michael Cera of all people, is somewhat of a weirdo that spouts prosaic pseudo-metaphysical platitudes but he seems to ultimately have a good heart as indicated by his remark to Sheriff Frank Truman, “As you know, your brother Harry S. Truman is my godfather. I heard he is ill. I came to pay my respects to my godfather and extend my best wishes for his recovery, which I hope will be swift and painless. It's an honor to see you again. You know, my heart is always here with you, and these fine people, my parents, who I love so dearly, and I was in the area and I wanted to pay my respects [...] My family, my friend, I have criss-crossed this great land of ours countless times. I hold the map of it here, in my heart, next to the joyful memories of the carefree days I spent as a young boy, here in your beautiful town of Twin Peaks. From Alexandria, Virginia, to Stockton, California, I think about Lewis, and his friend Clark, the first Caucasians to see this part of the world. Their footsteps have been the highways and byways of my days on the road. My shadow is always with me, sometimes ahead, sometimes behind, sometimes to the left, sometimes to the right, except on cloudy days, or at night [...] My dharma is the road." Of course, judging simply by the character Wally, it seems that Lynch believes that Transcendental Meditation is the only thing that can save contemporary youth from the all-destructive metaphysical hell of (post)modernity. On the other hand, while Wally might be a good guy, he seems to be completely devoid of any sort of originality, which is typical of his generation.

While Twin Peaks: The Return is unequivocally a visceral expression of Lynch's thoughts and especially feelings about the modern world, the series, which is really more like one massive Miltonian art movie, it is also a virtual 'David Lynch's Greatest Hits' in terms of its seemingly unending references to virtually all of the films and themes of the auteur's career, including his pre-Hollywood avant-garde days. Indeed, with its various scenes of grotesque vomiting, the series recalls Lynch's very first film Six Men Getting Sick (1966). In terms of aesthetically pleasing scenes of dark and seemingly endless phantom highways molested by intrusive headlights, it certainly tops Loft Highway (1997). As far as awkward and/or violent concert scenes in seedy bars that are inhabited by idiosyncratically dressed dipsomaniacs and degenerates, the series makes Wild at Heart (1990) seem a tad bit dated. For those that enjoy seeing arcane tools and preternatural evidence being used to solve devilishly Delphic mysteries, the new season of Twin Peaks makes Blue Velvet (1986) seem about as intriguingly enigmatic as Scooby-Doo: The Movie (2002), which is somewhat fitting since it features big goofy bastard Matthew Lillard in a performance that is a virtual antidote to the abject shame that he brought upon himself and stoners everywhere by portraying Shaggy Rogers. In fact, on top of delectably dark black-and-white scenes that bleed a certain Victorian decay like The Elephant Man (1980) and deathly dark Daguerreotype-like images comparable to the filmmaker's piece Premonition Following An Evil Deed for the anthology film Lumière and Company (1995), the series even has a little bit of a Dune (1980) aesthetic in terms of otherworldly sci-fi aesthetics. As far as I am concerned, Twin Peaks is Lynch's answer to Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980) as an inordinately epic auteurist miniseries and arguable magnum opus that manages to virtually immaculately sum up the filmmaker's entire singular career and ultimately reveals that he has mastered his craft. In short, the series is the closest thing to a contemporary cinematic equivalent to Hieronymus Bosch's classic triptych painting The Garden of Earthly Delights and Marcel Proust's seven-volume literary masterpiece In Search of Lost Time (1913–1927) aka À la recherche du temps perdu. Indeed, while Twin Peaks might technically be pop entertainment that is meant for mass consumption, it is unequivocally the refined work of a mature yet nonetheless artistically fresh artist that has gone to great lengths to dive into the darkest abysses of his own soul and expose them for the entire world to see. As for Mr. Frost, he was clearly just riding on Lynch's coattails, as if the sole reason he was hired by the studio was to make sure that the auteur did not create a cinematic work that was too bizarre or inexplicable. Indeed, Frost is probably, at best, a glorified babysitter for America's favorite weirdo wunderkind.

Somewhat ironically, fag boy Frost apparently borrowed the idea for the iconic 'Black Lodge' from British occultist Dion Fortune's book Psychic Self-Defense (1930), which was heavily influenced by the work of Helena Blavatsky. Of course, anyone familiar with Ms. Blavatsky and her goofy esoteric (pseudo)religion Theosophy knows that she not only played a major influence on infamous proto-Nazi occultists like Guido von List and Rudolf von Sebottendorf, but was also a proud 'racist' and 'antisemite' that believed that most nonwhites were accursed 'monads' of the half-beastly untermensch sort. Naturally, it is no surprise that a seasoned ethno-masochistic like Frost would attempt to pass off quasi-Theosophical ideas as a form of ancient American Injun black magic despite the fact that the Black Lodge seems to contain nil Injuns (though, to be fair, the actor that played 'Killer BOB,' Frank Silva, was indeed part-Indian). Needless to say, despite featuring a great noble savage hero like Deputy Chief Hawk, Twin Peaks: The Return was attacked from various white liberal and non-white social justice eunuchs for lacking so-called 'diversity.' Naturally, such pathetic complaints seem patently preposterous when one considers that Lynch is one of the most innately and idiosyncratic white American filmmakers that has ever lived as a man whose very essence screams 'eccentric wasp weirdo' and whose art could have never been created by any so-called person of color. Undoubtedly, one of the things that makes Twin Peaks so great and relatively artistically organic is, not unlike Denis Villeneuve's similarly nostalgia-inciting Blade Runner 2049 (2017), its relative racial homogeneity and lack of phony token 'minority' characters. After all, affirmative action casting has never helped any film or TV show.

Undoubtedly, out of all the various millennial-defecated articles accusing the show of racism, the most pointless and idiotic yet vaguely unintentionally insightful is a piece written by an outstandingly insipid brown beastess named Sezin Koehler with the ludicrously long and equally insipid title 'TWIN PEAKS Is Overwhelmingly White, So Why do Fans of Color Keep Watching It?' where a Chinese-American chick soundly states, "It makes sense to me. I'm from a small town that's kind of old fashioned (no cellular towers, no chain stores...) so I found it to be very realistic. I don't think it would have resonated as deeply with me if it were more diverse. I love to see diversity, especially racial, in the media but I feel like the lack of diversity was intentional in TWIN PEAKS and was necessary to portray a certain environment/atmosphere." After all, no one would ever even dare to want to imagine a Twin Peaks with a negro Agent Cooper with cornrows or a swarthy black-haired and slant-eyed Laura Palmer, just as no one would ever entertain the prospect of a tiny yellow Chinaman portraying Melvin Van Peebles' eponymous bad ass black buck character in Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971) or neurotic kosher comedian Larry David portraying sadistic Aryan SS-Hauptsturmführer Amon Göth in Schindler's List (1993). Additionally, despite its dark underbelly, the titular town in the series seems like an almost fairytale-like utopia compared to most modern-day American towns and cities. Like the quite cozy North Carolina town in Blue Velvet, Lynch clearly loves Twin Peaks and sees it as the gravest of tragedies that such an addictively quaint place has been plagued with a sinister undercurrent. Naturally, the show would be something entirely different were it set in a chocolate-colored Brooklyn ghetto or the fecal-flavored and AIDS-ridden bowels of San Francisco as people from these forsakenly diverse shitholes would not be able to elicit the same degree of empathy. Although just speculation, I have always had the feeling that certain self-loathing white liberals and hipsters enjoy Twin Peaks simply because it provides them with the rare (subconscious) guilty pleasure of racial solidarity as the show's pathological quiriness and Lynch's art fag cred provides them with the perfect cover for such a preternatural indulgence. Of course, the very fact that cultural Marxist film critics would even consider that Twin Peaks has a large non-white audience and that said non-white audience is upset about the show's lack of melanin just goes to show how out-of-touch they are with race and culture. In short, the average non-white fan of the show is clearly deracinated and an outlier and probably the sort of individual that does not much like living among their own racial kinsmen. Undoubtedly, one of the many things that makes Northern Exposure (1990–1995)—a show that clearly reveals its main influence during the fifth episode 'The Russian Flu' of the first season with an overt waterfall dream-sequence homage—glaringly inferior to Twin Peaks is its absurdly arrogant NYC Judaic protagonist and the contemptible way he treats the local yokels. After all, one of the things that makes Agent Cooper so lovable is that, despite their flaws, he still loves the locals and would love nothing more than to become a permanent member of their community.

Although just speculation, I like to think that Lynch was on a somewhat respectable mission to troll his fans when he dreamed up Twin Peaks: The Return, namely due to the fact that Agent Cooper barely appears on the show, at least in his normal perennially jovial "damn fine coffee" form that everyone loves. Indeed, although lead actor Kyle MacLachlan, who undoubtedly gives the greatest performance of his career, appears onscreen more than every other actor, he portrays no less than three (but really four) different 'characters': Agent Cooper, Cooper's evil doppelganger, and a degenerate tulpa created by the doppelganger named Douglas 'Dougie' Jones. While Agent Cooper manages to escape from the Black Lodge at the beginning of the series, he returns to earth in a meta-autistic form (hence, the 'fourth' character) and is only really a preposterously pathetic shell of a man that he once was, though he is certainly more agreeable than the pudgy sheboon-banging tulpa whose life he unintentionally takes over. Cooper-as-Dougie is like a living embodiment of what Aryan pessimistic Arthur Schopenhauer meant when he spoke of 'The Will' (or 'Lower Soul'), which he described in his classic text The World as Will and Representation (1818/19) as, "The will, considered purely in itself, is devoid of knowledge, and is only blind, irresistible urge, as we see it appear in inorganic and vegetable nature and in their laws, and also in the vegetative part of our own life. Through the addition of the world as representation, developed for its service, the will obtains knowledge of its own willing and what it wills, namely that this is nothing but this world, life, precisely as it exists. We have therefore called the phenomenal world the mirror, the objectively, of the will." A chubby and ridiculously cheaply dressed degenerate with a gambling addiction and a fetish for busty yet absurdly brainless pitch black negress prostitutes, Dougie is a sort of sad 'missing link' between Agent Cooper and his evil doppelganger. While Coop is a good man that always tries to do the right thing and the doppelganger is a devilish dickhead of a dude that seems to lack all the positive aspects that make people human and thus completely embraces evil in all its forms, Dougie is a virtual empty void and simply a morally weak and hopelessly self-indulgent fool. For most of the show, Agent Cooper lives as Dougie as if he is a prisoner in his own body in an acting performance from MacLachlan that arguably puts Peter Sellers' character in Being There to abject shame in terms of sheer absurdist retardisms. Undoubtedly, MacLachlan's performance(s) are more adequately comparable to Sellers' legendary multi-role performance in Stanley Kubrick's classic Cold War era satire Dr. Strangelove (1964). Unlike with Sellers' characters in Kubrick's film, the various Coopers depicted in Twin Peaks seem like extreme archetypal representations of Lynch himself. Of course, Cooper's doppelganger can be seen as a representation of both Agent Cooper and Lynch's Jungian 'shadow aspect,' just as Frank Booth was arguably Jeffrey Beaumont's (and Lynch's) in Blue Velvet. Indeed, it is no coincidence that Booth stares into Beaumont's eyes and matter-of-factly declares, "You're like me" during an extremely emotionally pivotal scene in the film. Naturally, it is no surprise that Twin Peaks concludes with Agent Cooper acting like a sort of strange amalgam of himself, his doppelganger, and his tulpa. In the end, Coop seems to have, to his grand abject horror, achieved Jungian 'Individuation' (incidentally, Mexican-American artist Manuel DeLanda, who also experimented with neo-noir as demonstrated by his arguable cinematic magnum opus Raw Nerves: A Lacanian Thriller (1980), also works with the concept of principium individuationis).

While somewhat cryptic, I think the final message of the series can be summed up to some degree with the following aphorism from Oswald Spengler, “The question of whether world peace will ever be possible can only be answered by someone familiar with world history. To be familiar with world history means, however, to know human beings as they have been and always will be. There is a vast difference, which most people will never comprehend, between viewing future history as it will be and viewing it as one might like it to be. Peace is a desire, war is a fact; and history has never paid heed to human desires and ideals.” After all, at the end of Twin Peaks, positively positive do-gooder idealist Agent Cooper, who does not seem to even consider the possible ramifications of his somewhat curious actions, manages to more or less unwittingly destroy himself, history, and everyone he knows just by traveling back in time to the night when Laura Palmer died to prevent her ill-fated demise via incestuous filicide. Also, Agent Cooper’s quest can arguably be simply summarized with Spengler’s words, “Free will is a feeling, not a fact.” Judging by these themes, it is hard to fathom how Lynch could fall for something as painfully deluded and idiotically idealistic as Transcendental Meditation, but I guess the auteur has to have something to believe in and can always dream of being a masterful Yogic Flyer that rivals Baron Vladimir Harkonnen in terms of bouncing around like a bloated beach ball, as one simply cannot stay completely grounded with so much hubris. Still, it is hard to reconcile the conclusion of Twin Peaks with the following ridiculous remark Lynch made during a preposterously shallow interview at beliefnet.com, “As Maharishi teaches, mankind was not made to suffer. Bliss is our nature. Life should be blissful, and blissful doesn’t mean just a small happiness. It’s huge. It is profound. It’s like totality. This atma becomes brahma, totality. It’s there, it’s our potential, it’s our birthright to enjoy enlightenment. You just need to unfold it.” After all, in Twin Peaks, human suffering seems to be one of the greatest, if nothing the greatest, driving force of humanity and something that simply cannot be avoided. Undoubtedly, it is a great irony that Lynch could create psychobabble-babbling charlatan like the character Dr. Lawrence Jacoby while at the same time peddling the most preposterous of would-be-exotic pseudo-religions. While TM® might have provided Lynch with a sort of (pseudo)spiritual safe space as a kind of outlet for his own personal demons, Twin Peaks and most of his other cinematic works reveal that Lynch has more spiritually in common with Calvinism than a post-Hindu corporation-cum-cult (incidentally, Lynch was raised Presbyterian).

Rather hilariously, in the fairly worthwhile documentary David Lynch: The Art Life (2016) co-directed by a curious trio of multicultural bros, Lynch recounts an anecdote about he got stoned on ganja and then pissed off his Jewish ex-roommate, hack musician Peter Wolf (real name Peter Blankfield), by abruptly walking out of a Bob Dylan concert. Indeed, apparently Wolf approached him and bitched like a stereotypical dumb hippie, “nobody walks out on Dylan,” to which Lynch replied, “I walked out on Dylan. Get the fuck out of here!,” thus ending their truly absurd interracial friendship. During the same segment of doc, Lynch also mocks Dylan’s diminutive size, which is surely not the way you are supposed to refer to a kosher commie (pseudo)folk musician turned rock star that has unequivocally achieved god status among the sort of philistines and philo-semites that take mainstream American pop culture history seriously. For this and various other reasons, I can only assume that Lynch is, at the very least, a sort of subconscious antisemite. Of course, Justin Theroux’s rather loathsome character—a literal cuckold that gets righteously told off due to his preposterous (and quite quintessentially Judaic) passive-aggressive attitude by a stoic Nordic cowboy—in Mulholland Drive (2001) absolutely screams stereotypical Hebraic Hollywood hack filmmaker. Likewise, Twin Peaks character Albert Rosenfield is a virtual archetype of the stereotypical hypocritical Jewish leftist type as an arrogant jerk-off that treats nice rural white folks like garbage while proudly proclaiming to be a proud humanist and neo-peacenik of sorts. Naturally, Lynch is covertly conservative in other ways, as he seems to have a less than favorable view of fags as indicated by the sinister sod pimp ‘Ben’ portrayed by Dean Stockwell in Blue Velvet, not to mention the unhinged dykes in Mulholland Drive. Additionally, Lynch clearly was not attempting to appeal to the NAACP when he had Nicholas Cage brutally beat to death a superlatively sleazy negro criminal named Bobby Ray Lemon at the very beginning of Wild at Heart (1990). In fact, just as certain leftist film critics have complained, Lynch is not too big on negro characters in general as demonstrated by the sheer lack of them in his films, but one should not expect anything less from an auteur with a quite preternaturally white aesthetic that will simply just alienate most blacks. After all, filmmakers that cast pointless token negroid characters in films are the lowest and most pathetically phony of cultural cucks and should be treated as such, as real art is never about compromise.

Rather unfortunately, instead of embracing his more politically correct impulses, Lynch—a rather intuitive artist that has never succumbed to the autistic artistic con of abstract intellectualism—has embraced the grotesque absurdist escapism of worshiping a dirty old brown Indian untermensch that had an affinity for debasing his young white female followers, or so one learns while watching the somewhat disturbing documentary David Wants to Fly (2010) directed by nerdy Teutonic documentarian David Sieveking. In the doc, Sieveking—a fanatical Lynch fan that tries in vain to model his life after the maestro—attempts to embrace Transcendental Meditation, only to discover that TM® is an evil all-consuming corporation and that the filmmaker is, rather unfortunately, one of its most active yet mindless propagandists. As his cinematic output, including

Twin Peaks: The Return, certainly demonstrates, Lynch is a conservative at heart and TM® simply seems to be his superlatively misguided attempt to embrace tradition and spirituality in a world where his own race, culture, and religion is being systematically dismantled by kosher culture-distorters, treacherous slave-morality-ridden white ethno-masochists, aberrosexuals, and the various other forms of (sub)human rabble. If any one doubts Lynch's wounded Faustian soul, one just needs to think deeply about the spirit of his art and then be directed towards British philosopher Roger Scruton's remark in the essay Conservatism and the Conservatory: "The real reason people are conservatives is that they are attached to the things that they love, and want to preserve them from abuse and decay. They are attached to their family, their friends, their religion, and their immediate environment. They have made a lifelong distinction between the things that nourish and the things that threaten their security and peace of mind." Additionally, the spirit of Twin Peaks unquestionably has more to do with Teutonic pessimism than the proto-hippie-dippy bullshit of shit-brown charlatan Maharishi Mahesh Yogi as indicated by the following quote from Nietzsche, "And do you know what "the world" is to me? Shall I show it to you in my mirror? This world: a monster of energy, without beginning, without end; a firm, iron magnitude of force that does not grow bigger or smaller, that does not expend itself but only transforms itself; as a whole, of unalterable size, a household without expenses or losses, but likewise without increase or income; enclosed by "nothingness" as by a boundary; not something blurry or wasted, not something endlessly extended, but set in a definite space as a definite force, and not a space that might be "empty" here or there, but rather as force throughout, as a play of forces and waves of forces, at the same time one and many, increasing here and at the same time decreasing there; a sea of forces flowing and rushing together, eternally changing, eternally flooding back, with tremendous years of recurrence, with an ebb and a flood of its forms; out of the simplest forms striving toward the most complex, out of the stillest, most rigid, coldest forms striving toward the hottest, most turbulent, most self-contradictory, and then again returning home to the simple out of this abundance, out of the play of contradictions back to the joy of concord, still affirming itself in this uniformity of its courses and its years, blessing itself as that which must return eternally, as a becoming that knows no satiety, no disgust, no weariness: this, my Dionysian world of the eternally self-creating, the eternally self-destroying, this mystery world of the twofold voluptuous delight, my "beyond good and evil," without goal, unless the joy of the circle is itself a goal; without will, unless a ring feels good will toward itself—do you want a name for this world? A solution for all of its riddles? A light for you, too, you best-concealed, strongest, most intrepid, most midnightly men?—This world is the will to power—and nothing besides! And you yourselves are also this will to power—and nothing besides!" Indeed, Nietzsche's quote might seem like a megalomaniac tirade, but somehow I think that, aside from the 'will to power' bit, it makes for a great esoteric synopsis of the series. Needless to say, Lynch could have learned a great deal more from Savitri Devi's ultra-hip brand on Hinduism than the shallow Dharma that Maharishi gleefully defecated out for his dumb (yet oftentimes rich) white followers.

Indeed, for better or worse, Twin Peaks: The Return—an intricate and multilayered episodic epic set in a titular town that has only further degenerated over the decades to the point where virtually no character seem redeemable—is, despite its many moments of humor, a work of immense hopeless sadness and longing for a time and place that died when Lynch was still a child, if not before. In fact, after watching the series twice, I cannot reconcile the fact that the same man that was the mastermind of the show was also responsible for writing in his rather disappointing book Catching the Big Fish: Meditation, Consciousness, and Creativity (2006), “Negativity is like darkness. So what is darkness? You look at darkness, and you see that it's really nothing: It's the absence of something. You turn on the light, and darkness goes. But sunlight, for instance, doesn't get rid of negativity. It gets rid of darkness, but not negativity. So what light can you turn on that removes negativity the way sunlight removes darkness? It's the light of pure consciousness, the Self—the light of unity. Don't fight the darkness. Don't even worry about the darkness. Turn on the light and the darkness goes. Turn up that light of pure consciousness: Negativity goes. Now you say, 'That sounds so sweet.' It sounds too sweet. But it's a real thing.” Personally, I think it sounds like total bullshit, especially coming from someone like Lynch who manages to make scenarios involving violent rapes and murder quite humorous and a mensch who followed up the birth of his first born child by directing a film where a father brutally murders his mutant baby. As his work unequivocally demonstrates, Lynch is a man that basks and even thrives in both the literal and figurative darkness and no amount of spouting pseudo-metaphysical mumbo jumbo from some insufferably effete brown charlatan is going to change that.

Notably, Arthur Schopenhauer once wrote, “Every parting is a foretaste of death, and every reunion a foretaste of resurrection. That is why even people who were indifferent to one another rejoice so much when they meet again after twenty or thirty years.” Of course, the same can be said of people being reunited with an old show like Twin Peaks, yet I feel that it is only appropriate that the series and Lynch's career have reached their natural conclusion. Indeed, the final moments of the final episode of Twin Peaks: The Return undoubtedly have the bittersweet foretaste of death, but I would not have it any other way. In fact, the event series might even be seen as a sort of esoteric epitaph for America, or at least the true white America that Lynch spent his entire life mourning via his gorgeously grotesque portraits of absurdist Americana. When H.P. Lovecraft complained in a personal letter that New York City had been “completely Semiticized” and thereupon tragically lost to the “national fabric,” he could have been speaking of the contemporary United States, at least in the cultural and spiritual sense. In that regard, D.H. Lawrence was certainly right when he wrote, “My great religion is a belief in the blood, the flesh, as being wiser than the intellect. We can go wrong in our minds. But what our blood feels and believes and says, is always true.” After all, Lynch’s book Catching the Big Fish is terribly written and a testament to his largely irrational and anti-intellectual disposition, but his singular oeuvre reveals a certain Weltschmerz and Sehnsucht in relation to the WASP world that the auteur’s generation—the so-called ‘baby boomer’ bunch that turned their unearned and undeserved gift of unrivaled prosperity and comfort into a racially, culturally, and sexually apocalyptic nightmare—gleefully destroyed. Needless to say, Transcendental Meditation is a symptom of the very sort of degeneracy that Lynch’s films lament in fashion that is iconically American as Norman Rockwell but as jovially venomous as Luis Buñuel. Considering that the United States, or the true Euro-American U.S., is nothing more than a glorified European megacolony, it is only fitting that one of the last, if not the last, great filmmaker is an American. In his somewhat out-of-date but surely worthwhile book David Lynch (Twayne’s Filmmakers Series) (1992), Kenneth C. Kaleta—an obvious Lynch fan that thankfully does not subscribe to any Frankfurt School oriented theories—argues, “Lynch has put his brand on TV. He has stretched again, this time from film to television. He continues that expansion regardless of critical bouquets garnered or awards lost, regardless of cancellation or glorification of the series. Unlike Andy Warhol, who also moved from plastic art into the world of film, Lynch must not falter into creating art not from but simply of his world. Warhol electrified pop art with his Day Glo paintings. Yet Warhol is more celebrated for his lifestyle [...] David Lynch’s artistic creations include Lynch himself. He continues beyond precedent to display, to satirize, and to expand his contemporary aesthetic. Somewhere, of course, a line may be crossed and his balance knocked off center. Here, over the border, the artist wakes up to be merely an icon. This is the quagmire of twentieth-century celebrity. The significance of TWIN PEAKS may be obvious today, but the series’s place in the context of Lynch’s work—and its meaning for art tomorrow—remains open to speculation.” While Lynch has indeed transformed into a sort of somewhat cardboard celebrity art fag and icon, Twin Peaks: The Return reveals that he is an artist of the same caliber as Edgar Allan Poe, who Kaleta rightly compares him to, or as he wrote, “Like Poe’s verse, TWIN PEAKS is poetic—inherently rhythmic. It has a first-person speaker: the straightest, fairest, most literal hero, Dale Cooper. In the televised serial, Agent Cooper even reads impressions into a tape recorder, thus not only making the audience party to his telling, but involving it through his language, his rhythm, and the sound of his voice. As in Poe’s world, no matter the peculiarities of the incidents, the audience is assured by the speaker’s voice. Ironically, neither offers a universal world; rather comfort is found in idiosyncrasies: Cooper is as distinctive a first-person speaker as any found in Poe's poetry." Indeed, containing a truly American lyrical folk poetry worthy of Poe and an entire preternatural mythos comparable to Lovecraft in terms of depth of imagination, Lynch managed to perform something that is nothing short of alchemy by turning a shit medium into boob tube gold. Of course, only Lynch could turn a blue-blond corpse wrapped in plastic into something deeply romantic, so it is only fitting that said corpse literally disappears into thin air at the conclusion of Twin Peaks: The Return, as no other artist—be they cinematic auteur or otherwise—will ever be able to fill his big goofy shoes when he is gone.

David Mamet (1991)

Notably, in early 1944, screenwriter and journalist Ben Hecht—a relatively assimilated American Jew that initially had little interest in his Hebrew roots but later became a rabid Zionist propagandist of sorts as a result of the Third Reich—wrote in his book A Guide for the Bedevilled (1944), “Hollywood, is a town, an industry, an empire of toy-making, invented by Jews, dominated by Jews, and made to flourish like unto the land of Solomon—by Jews, and a few embattled Irishmen. Such is its truth, and if you wish to look for its deep meanings, it is into this truth you must look.” Indeed, unless you are a complete fucking moron or have never seen any movies, you know that Jews dominate and have always dominated Tinseltown, yet, somewhat curiously, Hollywood rarely releases truly Hebraic movies. Sure, there are plenty of crappy kosher comedies where some effeminate asshole Ashkenazi slob like Seth Rogen tries to be funny by mentioning his “Jewfro” in between creepily lusting over some dumb blonde shiksa, but rarely do Hollywood films actually take an intricate approach to the Jewish question or Jewish themes. After all, aside from his Hebraic brand of humor, Woody Allen only represents Judaism so much as he is a walking and talking racial stereotype as the virtual archetype of the classically weak, neurotic, and whiny four-eyed kosher cripple. Somewhat ironically but not surprisingly, the handful of the films that really take an intelligent approach to Judaism focus heavily on the theme of Jewish self-hatred, which seems to be almost as old as Judaism itself as indicated by historical figures ranging from Spanish Grand Inquisitor Tomás de Torquemada to tragic Viennese philosopher Otto Weininger to suicidal American neo-Nazi Daniel Burros. In fact, both Arthur Hiller’s Robert Shaw adaptation The Man in the Glass Booth (1975) and Henry Bean’s The Believer (2001), which was inspired by Burros, feature Jews masquerading as Nazis and delivering rather intricate and articulate speeches regarding the timeless problem of the Jewish peril. While it does not exactly feature Hebrew Hitlerites sporting jackboots, David Mamet’s third feature Homicide (1991) also deals with the theme of the self-loathing Jew in the form of a police hostage negotiator who unwittingly gets involved in a Zionist terrorist conspiracy and ultimately commits an act of Zio-terrorism himself against a neo-Nazi business owner in a desperate attempt to overcome his self-hatred and create a strong Jewish identity, only to be betrayed by his new Jew buddies and virtually destroy his entire life in the process. As a staunch Zionist conservative that more or less regards Jews who consider their favorite Jew to be Anne Frank as treacherous self-loathing scum, Mamet is thankfully no stereotypical xenophiliac Hollywood Jewish liberal faggot and he has no problem portraying blacks as extremely uncouth racists and rapist beasts (e.g. Edmond). In Homicide, Mamet reveals that no one likes kikes, including some kikes like the film’s protagonist.

In his imperative text The Wicked Son: Anti-Semitism, Jewish self-hatred, and the Jews (2006), Mamet makes it quite clear that he believes that the goyim will never fully accept the Jews and that any Jew that seeks to assimilate is dangerously deluded, stating, “Just as (in the view of the Christians) Christianity superseded Judaism; so the contemporary Jew may long to cast off that which he (consciously or unconsciously) understands as an outdated system of allegiance. This confused Jew may aspire to join in that which he understands as a more modern, non-Jewish confraternity, entry into which will more fully integrate him into society at large, thus bringing happiness. He is, here, twice deluded. First, the state of perfect, relaxed integration that he ascribes to the non-Jews, their absence of anomie and anxiety, is a fiction [...] Second, this integration the Jew supposes his Christian brothers enjoy—just beyond the borders of his own unfortunate (spiritual or racial) segregation—should it exist, the Jew would, in fact, be debarred from it because of his race.” Somewhat curiously, in Homicide—a work that Mamet created when he was somewhat less racially radicalized—it is ultimately the fanatical Zionist Jews that most betray the Jew protagonist who is somewhat strangely played by glaring Sicilian-American Joe Mantegna. In fact, it is only when the protagonist comes into contact with other more fanatical treacherous Jews that he becomes treacherous himself and unintentionally kills his Aryan goy best friend/partner in the process. In unintentionally hilarious stereotypical oversensitive Jewish fashion, the protagonist completely loses it after his friend calls him a “kike” during a heated argument and decides to become a Zionist terrorist virtually overnight, thus breaking his oath as a police officer in the process. Quite contrary to Mamet’s unapologetically Zionist political writings, Homicide is a fairly nuanced film that more or less argues that Jews are damned if they do and damned if they don’t when it comes to embracing their race and culture. In fact, while Mamet would probably argue otherwise, the film might be best described as a quasi-nihilistic Jewish film noir where the protagonist is confronted with the nature of evil and discovers that members of his race are just as violent, hateful, and criminally inclined as the neo-Nazis and ghetto negroes that despise them. In short, it is strange to think that the same man that directed Homicide also wrote, “The quiddity of the self-loathing Jew, the opted-out Jew, is his grotesquerie. Both to his people and to the enemies of his people, he is out of step, out of tune, and pathetic—his efforts at assimilation foiling the possibility of contentment with a group to which he actually belongs.”

While the hapless working-class Hebrew protagonist of Homicide is unlikely for many reasons, not least of all because of his nonchalant self-hatred and rather glaring attempts at overcompensating for said self-hatred, he is far from the most unlikable yid in the entire film. In terms of its eclectic collection of repugnant, ugly, arrogant, smug, and/or just downright exceedingly unlikable collection of kosher characters, the film is somewhat ironically more effective in terms of spreading negative Jewish stereotypes than National Socialist classics like octoroon Jew Fritz Hippler's agitprop doc Der Ewige Jude (1940) aka The Eternal Jew and Veit Harlan's lavish melodrama Jud Süß (1940). Certainly you know a character is repugnant when you cannot help but hate him even though his mother was just brutally murdered as in the case in regard to a certain audaciously arrogant and pushy Jewish doctor in the film named Dr. Klein who, in stereotypical Jewish fashion, uses his clout to force the protagonist to take his criminal case, but of course that is exactly the sort of thing that makes a Mamet flick interesting. Undoubtedly, if Homicide was not the product of a Judaic mind, it would be regarded as a quasi-esoteric antisemitism that demonstrates with fairly good reason as to why everyone hates Jews, including many Jews. Featuring a protagonist that is so ignorant of his race and culture that he confuses Yiddish with Hebrew and is not beneath joking about certain negative stereotypes regarding his race, Homicide is also notable in that the 'hero' is a Jewish philistine who is surely more likeable and sympathetic than the rest of the members of his seemingly forsaken race that he encounters in his strange personal odyssey. In short, the film does not exactly make the best case for Judaism or Zionism, but then again it features an even less unflattering portrayal of urban negroes and their striking tendency to commit the most brutal and violent of criminal acts for the most trivial acts (notably, it is ultimately one of these brutal black crimes that leads the protagonist to virtually destroying his entire life after mistaking a coldblooded ghetto murder for an antisemitic conspiracy). Indeed, the only possible conclusion that one can come to after watching the film is that most Jews are too obsessed with their own race and Israel to ever be trusted by American—whether they be black or white—hence the reason as to why the majority of Jews endorse the flooding of the United States with third world rabble, thus weakening their much despised European-American enemy.

In The Wicked Son, Mamet interestingly argued, "Why do some Jews reject their religion and their race? For two reasons: because it is 'too Jewish' and because it is not Jewish enough." As far as the film's protagonist Bobby Gold (Joe Mantegna) is concerned, he seems to be more honest than Mamet on the subject as he rejects Judaism because he associates it with weakness, cowardliness, and effeminacy, which are surely serious sins among cops. As a Jew, Bobby was blessed with the gift of gab and thus he was more or less forced to be the 'The Talking Man' aka 'hostage negotiator' of his police district (although the city is never mentioned, the film was actually filmed in the aesthetically grotesque post-Europid wasteland known as Baltimore). To the slight chagrin of his partner and best friend Tim Sullivan (William H. Macy), Bobby always has to be the first cop to bust in the door when nabbing bad guys because he is desperate to prove himself and demonstrate that he is no stereotypical pussy candy ass Jew coward. Of course, as a self-hating Hebrew that has no problem hearing co-workers regularly throw around racial slurs like 'yid,' Bobby is more masochistic than he is courageous. At the beginning of the film, a bitchy negro named Mr. Patterson (Louis Murray) that works for the city mayor severely internally wounds Bobby by calling him a “little kike,” thus initiating the first step in the protagonist’s rather tragic path of personal transformation of the racially oriented sort that ultimately ends in abject failure. Since the FBI botched busting a negro dope dealer and killer named Robert Randolph (Ving Rhames) in a night raid that resulted in the deaths of two FBI agents, Bobby and his partner Tim have been assigned to locate him since they are already fairly familiar with him. Unfortunately while on the way to grab Randolph’s cousin, Bobby happens upon a murder scene in a black ghetto where an elderly Jewess was mysteriously killed during an armed robbery. According to some ebonics literate negroid children, the old Jewess was murdered because of supposed secret treasure in the basement of her store. When a black officer arrives on the scene, he practically blames the Jewess for getting liquidated since she had no business operating a store in an all-negro ghetto neighborhood. Needless to say, Bobby is more than a little bit irked when the dead Hebrewess’ outstandingly arrogant doctor son Dr. Klein (J.S. Block)—a virtual posterboy for Nazi propaganda as far as grotesque Jewish caricature are concerned who immediately complains of an antisemitic conspiracy in regard to his mother’s death—uses his kosher clout to make him work on his dead mother’s murder case. Indeed, instead of having the honor of busting ghetto arch-criminal Randolph and swaggering around like a big bad hero, Bobby has to suffer the whiny and hysterical paranoia of a family of opulent Jews that he just cannot stomach as they clearly remind him of the negative qualities that he hates in himself, not to mention the fact that they have way more money than he does.

While Bobby manages to coerce Randolph’s proud negress mother into helping the police to catch her son by telling her that they will put him in prison instead of six feet under, his superior—a loudmouthed guido named Lieutenant Senna (Vincent Guastafarro)—makes him take on the lowly job of dealing with the Jews because, as he tells him, “they’re your people.” Needless to say, Bobby is extremely offended when his boss describes the Jews as his people, so he goes on a rant and yells, “I’m his people?! I thought I was your people, Lieu,” but he is ultimately a pushover and begrudgingly takes the dreaded Judaic case. When Bobby is forced to go by the luxurious Klein castle after the Jews get scared as a result of ostensibly hearing a gunshot on their roof, Dr. Klein thoroughly pisses off the protagonist by threatening him by stating in an audaciously arrogant fashion, “Have you got the pride to do that job you were given? Do your job, or else.” Despite himself being connected to a Jewish terrorist conspiracy, dickhead Klein believes there is an antisemitic conspiracy and berates Bobby for supposedly thinking that he is dealing with, “hysterical Jews [...] that are always making it up.” Rather ironically, the conclusion of the film ultimately proves that, for the most part, Dr. Klein is a delusional Hebrew hysteric that could probably find a antisemitism at a Bar Mitzvah. After getting extremely annoyed with the Jews, Bobby goes to a room and vents out his frustration to his partner Tim over the phone, stating in an almost wildly excited fashion, "I'm stuck here with my – my Jews. You should see this fuckin' room [...] Fuckin' bullshit. Bunch of high-strung fuckin' bullshit. They pay so much taxes – Fuck 'em [...] Don't send the old lady work down there and tell me how you're so surprised. Fuck 'em and the taxes they pay. You tell me. Ten more bucks a week they're making', lettin' her [dead Jewess] work down there? Ha! Hey, not my people, baby. Fuck 'em. There's so much antisemitism the last 4,000 years. . . we must be doin' somethin' [to] bring it about." Unbeknownst to Tim, Dr. Klein's daughter Miss Klein (Mamet's wife Rebecca Pidgeon) was in the room and heard the entire conversation. While Bobby immediately attempts to apologize, Miss Klein immediately verbally reams him by passionately declaring, "My grandmother was kill today. She stayed down there because she wanted to stay there. She was a fighter. She wanted to die there. She died there. You're a Jew, and you talk that way in the house of the dead. Do you have any shame? [...] Do you hate yourself that much? Do you belong nowhere?" After swearing to Miss Klein that he will "find her killer" in regard to her dead grandfather, Bobby hears a gunshot and immediately investigates the roof of the building where he finds a torn piece of paper that reads "Grofaz." That same night, Bobby also discovers that the elderly dead Jewess used to be a Zionist terrorist that was involved in gunrunning, among other things. At this point, Bobby begins to speculate that there is indeed some sort of antisemitic conspiracy and soon finds himself engulfed in a sort of quasi-Kafka nightmare of obscene obsession and paranoia that inspires in him an ultimately rather untimely Jewish awakening of sorts.

As a result of being forcibly entrenched in a world of Jews and anti-Jew hatred (aside from the death of the old Jewess, the protagonist discovers anti-Jew flyers around the city that compares Jews to rats), Bobby becomes extremely enamored with the Klein case and begins following every lead he has, including the word "Grofaz," which he soon discovers is an archaic nickname for Adolf Hitler and an acronym for 'Größter Feldherr aller Zeiten' aka 'Greatest War Leader of All Time,' thus leading him to suspect that there is indeed some sort of sinister neo-Nazi plot against the Klein family. Meanwhile, Bobby's relationship with his partner Tim begins to fall apart as a result of his obsession with the Jewish case and his glaring disinterest with the big Randolph case that they were working on together. While Tim gives Bobby wonderful words of advice about the importance of not being too emotionally attached to the case by stating, "Bob, I'm gonna tell you what the old whore said, and this is the truest thing I know. 'When you start cumin' with the customers, it's time to quit,'" he also gets quite emotional about his partner's strange unbecoming behavior and calls him a "dumb kike." When Bobby goes to a Jewish library and an absurdly arrogant Orthodox Jew says to him, "you're say you're a Jew, and you can't read Hebrew. What are you then?," it naturally only compounds his guilty feelings of racial confusion and deracination. While at the library, Bobby asks for information on 'GröFaZ' and 'anti-Semitic acts,' but the two-faced yarmulke-adorned librarian (Mamet stock Jew Steve Goldstein), who is actually a Mossad agent, lies to him and says that they have no such information because he knows that it has been loaned out to a local Zionist terrorist organization that is plotting to attack a local neo-Nazi.

Upon eavesdropping on the lying kippah-sporting librarian, Bobby learns that the information has been loaned out to a group called '212' and soon discovers their address, which he visits. When Bobby dares to ask a couple young joggers about the seemingly empty building at the address, they reveal they are Israeli terrorists by randomly pulling guns on him and threatening to kill him. Luckily, a small group of Jews, who were previously at the Klein home, recognize Bobby and invite him into the building, which is revealed to be the headquarters a secret Zionist paramilitary operation that seems to be inspired by the real-life Jewish Defense League (JDL) founded by assassinated ultra-nationalist rebbe Meir Kahane. Somewhat humorously, the old Zionist terrorists have stereotypically ugly old Jewish guy names like 'Barry,' 'Lev,' and 'Merv.' Impressed by the militancy and supposed masculinity of these militant Zionist Jews, Bobby immediately offers to help, but when the elderly Israeli leader of the group demands that he give the group an ancient document in regard to gunrunning with various local Jewish names and addresses, he refuses since it is police evidence. Bobby found the document in the basement of the store owned by the dead Jewess and it seems to prove that a good percentage of the city's Jewish population is involved in a vast Zionist conspiracy that has lasted for about half a century. When Bobby insists that he cannot do it because he does not want to break his oath as a police officer, the geriatric Zionist leader mocks him by asking him "Where are you loyalties?" and then has him thrown out, but not before melodramatically stating to his compatriots in regard to the protagonist, "He disgusts me." Like a stereotypical overbearing and shrill-sounding Jewish mother, the Israeli terrorist attempts to guilt Bobby into stealing the document by questioning his Jewishness, but the cop just cannot bring himself to break his oath, even though he is willing to now commit terrorist acts. Indeed, it seems that the Zionist geezer's whiny words worked wonders on old Bobby boy, as he has transformed from a self-loathing Jew into a Zionist terrorist in virtually a single day.

While Bobby's meeting with the Zionist terrorists certainly did not go well, he still attempts to help them by hooking up with one of their female members. Indeed, Bobby originally met Chava (Natalija Nogulich)—a vaguely attractive Jewess with a fairly flat affect—at the Klein's house and it does not take long for him to lose his phony tough guy person and pour his entire heart out to her, stating like the stereotypical whiny Jew that he used to hate, "They said I was a pussy all my life. They said I was a pussy because I was a Jew. And the cops – They'd say, 'Send a Jew? Might as well send a broad on a job. Send a broad through the door.' That's what they said. All my goddamn life. And I listened to them. I was the donkey. I was the clown [...] They made me the hostage negotiator 'cause I knew how the bad guys felt." Ultimately, Bobby makes the major mistake of carrying out one of Chava's Zionist terrorist missions out for her by blowing up the model train store of a neo-Nazi named Anderson. Needless to say, when Bobby examines Anderson's shop and sees a swastika flag, a picture of a Nazi soldier shooting a Jewess holding a baby, and books like Martin Luther's anti-Jew classic The Jews and Their Lies, he is more than a little bit angered, but he does not get the gall to blow up the building until he reads a propaganda pamphlet that reads, "It is only common sense to cull the weak. The admixture of Jewish blood into the clean White Race is a crime against humanity against which the greatest plagues of history must pale. The effeminate ideals and weak physical appearance of the Jew proclaim to all his inferiority. To tolerate the presence of the vile sickness in our midst is not justice, IT IS MADNESS." While Bobby has no understanding of Hebrew or the tenets of the Jewish religion, he can certainly identify with the racial element of Judaism, hence his rather melodramatic reaction to the racially-charged propaganda pamphlet. Unfortunately for Bobby, members of the Zionist terrorist group took photos of the protagonist blowing up the store and use said photos to blackmail him into giving them the document they want. On top of everything else, Bobby realizes just after he is blackmailed and beaten by a rather rotund Zio-terrorist goon named Aaron (Jewish magician and sometimes actor Ricky Jay) that he is late for his date with his partner Tim to nab alpha-criminal Robert Randolph.

If his day could not get any worse, Bobby discovers upon arriving at Randolph's rather quaint ghetto hideout that the entire operation has turned into a horrific disaster and that his partner Tim has been shot. Of course, had Bobby been on time to negotiate with Randolph instead of committing terrorist acts for the benefit of treacherous Israeli terrorists, his best friend probably would have not been shot. Totally unafraid of dying at this point in his increasingly lonely and pathetic life, Bobby bravely busts through the building while Randolph is shooting at cops to get to his partner Tim, who randomly states to him, "Do you remember that girl that onetime, Bob?" and then tragically dies in his arms. With his best friend dead, Bobby screams to Randolph, "You shot my partner, you fucking nigger. I'm gonna kill you" and then climbs down to a sort of almost mystical subterranean realm to confront the negro in a crucial climatic scene that auteur Mamet notably described in the Criterion Collection DVD audio commentary as, "The sort of apotheosis. The meeting with the keeper of the secrets [...] He's going deep into the cave to find the Minotaur. To finally find the secrets. And he's finally about to descent into the underworld." In what proves to be a symbolic common occurrence for the protagonist that demonstrates that he is a shitty cop that lacks the marital prowess to fight bad guys, Bobby manages to lose his gun while making his descent and is thus naturally immediately shot when he finally reaches Randolph, who acts rather smug and mocks him for losing his gun. When Randolph asks the protagonist if he wants to beg for his life, Bobby pathetically replies, "It's not worth anything." When Bobby makes the quasi-suicidal mistake of claiming to Randolph that his mother sold him out to the cops, the negro copkiller shoots him again and calls him a "piece of shit," to which the injured protagonist replies while in glaring pain, "I am a piece of shit. I killed my partner, and your mama turned you in." When Bobby proves to Randolph that his mother sold him out by showing him a bogus passport that the police procured for the specific purpose of busting him, the trigger-happy negro outlaw is so stunned that he does not even notice when a couple cops show up and blow him away with a couple bullets. After being shot, Randolph's body lands on Bobby and he states while lying on the wounded Jew, "God. God help me. What did you do to me?" In what ultimately proves to be quite bitter biting irony for the protagonist, Bobby learns in the end that there was never any sort of antisemitic conspiracy and that elderly Jewess Klein was actually killed by the very same young preteen negro boys who proclaimed at the crime scene that she was killed for mythical treasure in her basement. Additionally, the 'grofaz' paper that Bobby found on the Klein's roof was not in reference to Uncle Adolf but a pigeon feed company called 'Grofazt.' On top of everything else, Bobby is kicked off of homicide and is immediately regulated to a stereotypical Jewish position of abstract paper-shuffling. Notably, at the beginning of the film, a deranged dude named Walter B. Wells (Colin Stinton) that committed familicide with his trusty hunting rifle made a somewhat strange offer to Bobby by stating, "Perhaps someday I could tell you the nature of evil. Would you like to know how to - to solve the problem of evil?," but the protagonist declines, stating, "No, man, 'cause if I did, then I'd be out of the job." Of course, by the end of the film, Bobby has encountered various forms of evil, including among his own race, but he is hardly capable of destroying it, especially since he himself pathetically succumbed to it.

While auteur David Mamet decided for whatever reason not to mention to the name of the superlatively shitty quasi-third world east coast city where it was shot, Homicide—a title that perfectly describes said city's most booming trade aside from dope-dealing—does a great job demonstrating that Baltimore is an absolutely forsaken and criminally malignant hellhole where corrupt self-serving spades run the government, perennially unemployed killer colored folks roam the streets at all hours, and corrupt white collar chosenites use their money to manipulate politicians to benefit of their true nation of Israel. Of course, the entire film almost takes a sadistic glee in depicting virtually every great American racial stereotype, including that bourgeois Jews are paranoid supporters of Zionist terror, urban negroes are barbaric brutes that are not beneath committing senseless violent murders during early childhood, and Jews make for crappy cops because they do not have the testicular fortitude or martial prowess to get the job done nor deal with the ruthless teasing of his fellow cops. It should also be noted that the least violent and racially hateful people in the entire film are the 'white' (translation: non-Jewish people of European descent), yet the black and Jewish characters are so belligerent in their racial sensitivity that one would almost assume that Mamet is attempting to say that there is a direct link between racial neuroticism and criminality. Indeed, the only whites that dare to say racially insensitive things are neo-Nazis and they do it via flyers while the negroes characters, who seem to see their anti-whitey hatred as a sort of badge of honor, quite regularly exchange charming racial slurs to complete strangers. In fact, even when the protagonist's friend calls him a "kike," it hardly seems to be for racial reasons. As for the negroes, Mamet makes it more than clear in Homicide that he believes that American negroes—a group that has been exploited as a sort of socio-cultural political weapon by Hollywood, Jewish groups, and politicians for at least a century—has a deep-seated collective hatred for all-things-kosher. In short, Mamet's confirms in a variety of subtle ways that he believes that all the conspiracy theories about Jews are true.

Undoubtedly, after watching Homicide, the only conclusion that the viewer can come to is that it sucks being Jewish, especially when it comes to having to deal with other Jews. Indeed, had the protagonist not had the grand misfortune of interacting with pushy rich extremist Jews, he probably would not have virtually lost his mind, committed a terrorist act, and got his best friend killed. Considering Mamet's own rather extreme Zionist tendencies, it is quite curious that he would write and directed such a strangely Zio-unfriendly film, but as Stuart Klawans noted in his essay Homicide: What Are You, Then?, "That even the hint of a Jewish conspiracy should be conjured in HOMICIDE may disturb some viewers, including, today, perhaps the author himself, who in recent years has issued a number of bluntly worded commentaries accusing virtually all critics of the State of Israel of anti-Semitism (or of self-hatred, if they're Jews), and of having feeble brains haunted by THE PROTOCOLS OF THE ELDERS OF ZION. Rather than address the merits of this position, I will merely suggest that it's a mistake to identify Mamet the artist with Mamet the polemicist." Although just speculation, I can only assume that Mamet, as a famous and politically active Jew, is perfectly aware of the criminal and conspiratorial nature of rich and powerful Jews and that has instilled him with a certain deep and unwavering sense of paranoia that makes him feel the need to be militant about Zionism lest there be some neo-pogroms or even another shoah. After all, people that are not wracked with guilt do not feel the need to go on the defensive, yet Hollywood incessantly defecates out anti-intellectual holocaust agitprop films that are supposed to make the stupid goyim think that the Jews are history's foremost innocent victim despite all the contemporary (and historical) evidence to the contrary. This might also explain why Jews constantly complain about the holocaust and antisemitism in Hollywood films and TV shows yet virtually never actually create truly Judaic themed works, as if they are afraid of gentiles, especially white Christians, truly understanding the intrinsically racially chauvinistic nature of Judaism and what it truly means to be a Jew in a world full of ostensibly stupid gentiles. Hollywood's curious fear of revealing its innate Jewishness certainly disturbed Ben Hecht, who once complained regarding the complete and utter disappearance of Jews from films of the 1930s and 1940s, "The greatest single Jewish phenomenon in our country in the last twenty years has been the almost complete disappearance of the Jew from American fiction, stage, radio, and movies. . . . And for this false oblivion and for this dangerous exile, the movies are the most to blame." Aside from emotionally manipulative holocaust propaganda films featuring good goy protagonist's like Schindler's List (1993), the occasional overt Zionist propaganda film like Otto Preminger's Exodus (1960) and Spielberg's Munich (2005), and the disgusting deluge of semi-cryptically kosher comedies featuring revolting Hebraic hogs like Seth Rogen, Hebrew-owned Hollywood is strangely silent when it comes to addressing its own heritage. As far as films that manage to combine genre conventions with Jewish themes, the only thing I can really compare Homicide to is the fairly mediocre fourth season The X-Files episode "Kaddish," which takes the legend of the Golem from the Kabbalah and transports it to contemporary times in an imaginary antisemitic Brooklyn where a trio of thuggish neo-Nazi proles kill an orthodox Jew for fun after reading one-too-many antisemitic flyers. Needless to say, The X-Files episode is putridly politically correct (in fact, the original antagonists were a Louis Farrakhan-like figure and his negro underlings, but the Fox network were afraid that dindus would get made, so Jewish writer Howard Gordon rewrote the episode to make it more characteristically p.c.). Of course, I doubt any Jew would have the artistic or intellectual integrity to make a film like Homicide nowadays, as it would be politically and financially risky to make a fairly ambiguous intellectual neo-noir that dares to feature a group of shadowy scheming Jewish terrorists whose members are also part of the city's cultural elite. Indeed not unlike the pre-Code Hollywood flick The House of Rothschild (1934), Mamet's film ultimately does more harm to the Judaic cause than good. Homicide hints at many reasons as to why people hate the Jews, but it never really gets to the heart of the issue, which Friedrich Nietzsche probably summed up best when he wrote in his classic text On the Genealogy of Morality (1887) in regard to the decidedly deleterious effect of Jews on the Occident, "Whatever else has been done to damage the powerful and great of this earth seems trivial compared with what the Jews have done, that priestly people who succeeded in avenging themselves on their enemies and oppressors by radically inverting all their values, that is, by an act of the most spiritual vengeance. This was a strategy entirely appropriate to a priestly people in whom vindictiveness had gone most deeply underground. It was the Jew who, with frightening consistency, dared to invert the aristocratic value equations good/noble/powerful/beautiful/happy/favored-of-the-gods and maintain, with the furious hatred of the underprivileged and impotent, that "only the poor, the powerless, are good; only the suffering, sick, and ugly, truly blessed. But you noble and mighty ones of the earth will be, to all eternity, the evil, the cruel, the avaricious, the godless, and thus the cursed and damned!" . . . We know who has fallen heir to this Jewish inversion of values. . . . In reference to the grand and unspeakably disastrous initiative which the Jews have launched by this most radical of all declarations of war, I wish to repeat a statement I made in a different context (BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL), to wit, that it was the Jews who started the slave revolt in morals; a revolt with two millennia of history behind it, which we have lost sight of today simply because it has triumphed so completely." Indeed, only in a slave-morality-ridden bizarro world dreamed up by Jews could homos, cripples, lard asses, dykes, mongrels, untermenschen, and retards be propped up as the height of moral righteousness while white men—the single greatest contributors to culture, civilization, science, and technology—are the most monstrous. Undoubtedly, what makes Homicide and Mamet's greatest works most interesting is that they dare to depict harsh realities as opposed to Hollywood bullshit, but I would expect nothing less from a man that once hilariously wrote, "In my lifetime we Jews, mythologically, have served the cause of soft pornography. The world weeps at our being killed. What fun. I wrote, years ago, that Holocaust films are 'MANDINGO for Jews,' and that the thrill, for the audience, came and comes from a protected indulgence of anti-Semitism: they get to see us killed and to explain to themselves that they feel bad about." Of course, Homicide is ultimately a reminder as to why I am not being paranoid when I sense that someone is attempting to emotionally swindle me anytime I see a Holocaust movie.

BRUTAL RELAX

David Muñoz (2010)

It seems as if it has been so long since I have last enjoyed a short film; one from this decade that is. Brutal Relax was recently selected to play at Sitges Film Festival, courtesy of Eskoria Films. No matter what might be a translation error as it perfectly chimes the tone of the film. The title is such after the discharge of a patient whom appears to have an aggressive condition. Our mute leading man with a frozen grin is being released from what I can only guess is a sanitarium. The doctor gives strict preference as to where Mr. Olivares should vacate to: somewhere relaxing as to avoid any sort of sparking conflict. The warnings towards avoiding stress weigh heavy enough but for us the trip is hardly over. As soon as Mr. Olivares settles on a beach in a pool of mud, scaly lizard zombies (or demons) crawl from the abyss to slaughter and maim the fun-loving citizens of the resort.

I believe that the most accessible facet to Brutal Relax is the facial comparison of Mr. Olivares to French provocateur Gaspar Noe. The second leading trait is the relentless bloodshed that is always excessive but never tiring. Mr. Olivares always gets his man and even goes as far as wielding a child's mutilated corpse as a club to bludgeon the creatures who have imposed upon the malfunction of his cassette player. Apart from the well-done gore effects and violent slapstick, Brutal Relax also is one of the few films in question that alters the undead into something that doesn't involve pharmacy brand face paint and shredded clothing. These lizard-men emit a pustular discharge from their mouth while chowing down on a passer-by's neck. The cast of victims include beautiful women, children, and the occasional bro. The level of depravity hit is almost shocking. What's more is how enjoyable and utterly intoxicating it all is, especially if you're able to reach the off switch for 15 minutes.

Mr. Olivares is the greatest aspect of the film which is an admirable portion of a serving based entirely on bloodshed. His ambiguity opens the door to possible precursors to what could be a tasty franchise of unpredictable vacation massacres. I, for one, would pay to witness Mr. Olivares in a parka defending a small ice-fishing village from mutant demon penguins. Also appealing is the sexless agenda fueling the bulky monster of a man, denying damsels no longer in distress from victory kisses. Brutal Relax is a bona-fide gruesome short that expresses its point clearly with no genre confusion. Finally, gorehounds did it right.

TALES FROM THE CARNAL MORGUE
TALES FROM THE CARNAL MORGUE

David Quitmeyer (2007)

David Quitmeyer has impressed me before with his "goreporn" Slaughter Disc which also manages to be anti-porn at the same time. A remarkable feat for an independent director. So moving on to the collection of his shorts, I had high hopes for a possible trio of disturbing erotica, but what I found was a retarded version of Are You Afraid of the Dark? There are three tales you must go through in order to complete this cinematic torture fest. The first one is perhaps the most ambitious, but due to its own broken promise of being a disturbing erotic horror film, it is very amateur film. MAIL ORDER BRIDE The plot is of a businessman who is broken up and lonely. He uncovers a robotic sex doll that will do anything to please you, the PC-2000 (Personal Concubine.) You show the doll your favorite pornographic videos and it will mimic your favorite fetishes, no matter how taboo or degrading they are. While set up for an interesting premise, the film is dragged into its own grave by horrendous acting, horrendous effects, and an overall horrendous execution. I like my horror films to be at least well constructed. This has no real value of any sorts. Avoid this title. MR. BUTTONS

If there is one genre that never gets old, it is the animated doll/inanimate objects. In this tale, they take that amazing genre, and add a dash of those kids horror novels "Goosebumps" into it. A woman who has some ex-lover storyline and wants revenge. She cuts off a rubber finger and stitches it in the nose. With an incredible twist (sarcasm), it turns out that anything she wishes for, happens in some weird twisted way. This is the best short, but it is far from great. SUSTENANCE This film is reminiscent of most females, perfectly preserved, just with a dash of horror/sci-fi in the mix. A model thinks she is fat, who is played by the lovely Caroline Pierce. She attempts to lose weight by undergoing an experimental procedure which involves them removing some fleshy organ from her naval, and locking her in a room for a while. This boils down to premature acting from Pierce, who should stick to being sinister, rather than her screaming and eating dog food. She doesn't have what it takes to be a scream queen. All in all, this collection of shorts is ultimately passable. His film Slaughter Disc is a vast improvement, so I won't hold this volume of embarrassing shorts against him. Let's face it, the only plausible reason you'd be viewing this, is either for the blood, or the nudity. This film has little of both. Pass this unless you are a die hard fan of Pierce. She almost makes it worth it.

THE SECRET LIFE: JEFFREY DAHMER

David R. Bowen (1993)

When a film begins with a scene of Jeffrey Dahmer driving around in a convertible as if he is some sort of suave gay playboy on the prowl like the fellows in Gregg Araki's The Living End (1992), you know it is going to be a great one. As I soon found out while watching The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer (1993) directed by David R. Bowen and starring Carl Crew (Blood Diner, Ironhorse), not only did the flick prove to be an extremely entertaining effort, but also a notably (but unintentionally) gut-busting one as well, as it puts most genuine horror-comedies to shame with its mundane melodrama and bodacious interracial murder and mayhem. Featuring scenes of devilishly dandy Dahmer calling people "Pigs" (as if he is some sort of horror-film-addicted burnout metalhead), crying like a little girl, teasing a deaf Negro, prank calling his mom, turning Asian boys into zombies, sneering at a prankster priest, and many other wonderful things, The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer is a delectable work of accidental political incorrectness that is not to be missed. Essentially, The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer portrays Dahmer as some sort of ridiculous rebel-with-a-reprehensible-cause that lives in a state of indefinite adolescence and whose belligerent behavior is merely the result of having an estranged mommy and an overbearing daddy. Like angst-driven anti-hero Jim Stark (James Dean) from Nicholas Ray's Rebel Without a Cause (1955), the Jeffrey Dahmer of The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer is an uncommonly likeable anti-social rebel who loathes his family just as much as he disrespects the institution of law and order. Also, like Jim Stark, Dahmer has a special talent for attracting weaker social degenerates. Of course, unlike Stark, Dahmer is totally disingenuous in his charm as he is a master of deceit who will tell any lie and put on any front just to achieve his remarkably aberrant aims. In The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer, daring Dahmer is as compelling as the most seasoned of carny hucksters yet he has the special natural born advantage of having all-American boyish good looks and a superficially laidback disposition, thus being able to easily deceive and manipulate his prospective victims in a rather unsophisticated manner. Throughout The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer, Jeff lures a variety of gay and not-so-gay men to his domestic torture chamber (aka a scarcely furnished efficiency apartment) under the false pretense that he will pay them between $150.00-200.00 in exchange for agreeing to pose nude for a series of Polaroid photographs. Of course, snapping perverted photos is only mere foreplay for dirty Dahmer as he is a more "hands on" kind of guy. Despite physical appearances to the contrary, Dahmer ain't no uptight wasp, but an active endorser of multiculturalism and diversity as he lives in a ghetto and loves ridin' dirty wit his many brothas of different colors.

If any part of The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer does the best job of capturing the film's essence as a whole, it is a scene towards the end of the film featuring our brave homicidal homo hero wearing a She-Devils on Wheels (1968) t-shirt as he murders and snaps photographs of his latest victim. Like the exceedingly gratuitous and pointless films of Herschell Gordon Lewis, The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer is a work that features a wealth of tasteless humor and carnal campiness, except to a deeper, mostly unintentional, and ultimately more preposterous degree. It should also be noted that actor Carl Crew (who also wrote the film's screenplay) previously starred as one of the cannibalistic Tutman brothers in the low-budget horror-comedy Blood Diner (1987); a pseudo-sequel to Herschell Gordon Lewis' 'pioneering' gore flick Blood Feast (1963). Indeed, The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer features a 'blood feast' worthy of a bloodlust-ing Egyptian goddess, but contained within a seedy slum worthy of two thousand crack-addicted maniacs. Dahmer may live in an apartment full of strong and uppity welfare queens that 'get up in his grill' quite regularly, but his lonely apartment is a distinct lunatic microcosm of his own making, adorned with the scant furnishings of a generic mad man, including abstract skeleton paintings on the walls and a lone kitschy skull on a tabletop. To accommodate the imperative needs of his rapidly decomposing company, Dahmer has a large black barrel containing acid that acts as a substitute room if sorts. Anytime Dahmer wants to grab a quick bite to eat, he merely has to open his freezer, which contains a couple decapitated heads of color and other assorted body parts. When having guests over for dinner, Dahmer never forgets to offer them a mixed drink that he creates with the utmost care, as a lack of hospitality would be most unbecoming for a gentleman of Jeffrey Dahmer's outstanding caliber. As the viewer soon learns while watching The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer, one would be at a loss to find a host as attentive and concerned with the welfare of his guests than Jeffrey Dahmer. When not entertaining the company of prospective lovers, Dahmer is sitting in a chair all by his lonesome making pseudo-deranged faces while staring into eternity as if he was Bela Lugosi's pothead grandson. To add to the sensory overload that is The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer, Carl Crew narrates the film with cheesy and mirthfully cliched lines of reflection that are quite typical of ineptly assembled film noir flicks and made-for-television Lifetime channel movies. With sounds and images such as these, it should be easy see why virtually every second of The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer manages to be nothing short of captivating.

When considering the film within the context of the time when it was created, it should come as no surprise that The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer was made under the dubious confines of total secrecy. Initially intended as a theatrical release, the film would be cursed into obscurity as a straight-to-video release. Somewhat fittingly, while in prison, Dahmer was violently bludgeoned to death with a broom handle by a racist black man suffering from a messianic complex only a year or so after the release of The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer. Indubitably, in a audacious display of profoundly bad taste, the film concludes with a memorial list of Dahmer's various victims. It is quite apparent while watching The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer that it was assembled in a hurried manner so as to monopolize on Dahmer's newfound infamy using cinematic conventions that have more in common with satirical horror-comedies like The Undertaker and His Pals (1966) and the works of Herschell Gordon Lewis than what one would expect from a typical true crime docudrama. Thankfully (but unsurprisingly), The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer was not the last film to offend the families of Dahmer's victims. In 2002, the American Jeffrey Dahmer biopic Dahmer starring Jeremy Renner was released. Unlike The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer, Dahmer is overly empathetic towards its necrophiliac/cannibalistic subject and portrays Dahmer as a victim of his authoritarian father's homophobic tyranny. Lady auteur Kathryn Bigelow was so impressed with Renner's performance as Dahmer in Dahmer that she decided to cast him as the lead of her Academy Award nominated and six-time Oscar award winning film The Hurt Locker (2008). Needless to say, Carl Crew's performance as a 'dashing' Jeffrey Dahmer in The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer is less than Oscar worthy, but he does bring a certain exceptional anti-social charisma to the role that may have led some audiences from 1993 to believe that one day, like Charles Manson, the self-loathing homo-cidal serial killer would become a cult hero of sorts for disaffected gay youth. Considering that abnormal Aryan auteur Jörg Buttgerreit always opens his films with serious quotes from popular American serial killers, I think he might want to consider making Jeffrey Dahmer the central subject of a potential third Nekromantik film. Although Jeffrey Dahmer is still mostly regarded as the archetype for all things both evil and degenerate, The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer has, rightfully, gone on to obtain a marginal, but vocal cult following. As someone who had the novel honor of being told as a child that I had a strikingly resemblance to a young Jeffrey Dahmer, a film like The Secret Life: Jeffrey Dahmer holds a special place in my heart.

David Robert Mitchell (2014)

At least in a general sense, I have totally given up on my very early childhood love of horror cinema to the point where I do not in any way pay attention to trends within the genre, though that does not mean that I refuse to check out the latest highly praised and critically acclaimed cinematic effort that the genre has to offer, especially if it is noted for being in anyway idiosyncratic and/or artistically merited as it is not often that such films come along in a place like the United States where cinematic art is considered a monetary serious liability. Indeed, naturally I eventually took the opportunity to watch Tomas Alfredson's Låt den rätte komma in (2008) aka Let the Right One In and Matt Reeves' somewhat pointless yet not all that bad English-language remake Let Me In (2010), Adam Wingard's You're Next (2012) and covertly slasher-conscious genre-bender The Guest (2014), and Jonathan Glazer's Under the Skin (2013), among various other less notable works, when I heard these films were worthy and somewhat original contributions to the seemingly accursed genre, but none of these films quite impressed me as much as the quasi-arthouse-ish supernatural horror flick It Follows (2014) directed by virtual novice filmmaker David Robert Mitchell. Directed by a young auteur whose first and only other feature The Myth of the American Sleepover (2010) was somewhat strangely a coming-of-age post-mumblecore dramedy about the Fremdscham-inducing awkwardness of youthful love and romance, Mitchell's second feature has a number of obvious classic horror influences ranging from John Carpenter's Halloween (1978) to the various Invasion of the Body Snatchers flicks to Sidney J. Furie's The Entity (1982) to Tobe Hooper's Colin Wilson adaptation Life-force (1985), yet it undoubtedly owns its borderline shocking pulchritude and economical filmmaking to influences that, not surprisingly, totally transcend the horror genre, with the (hyper)realist photography of Gregory Crewdson being arguably the most notable and influential. As rare piece of regional Midwestern horror cinema that oftentimes seems like what might happened if the young bastard brood of David Lynch and Debra Hill attempted to make a horror film for lapsed John Hughes fans, it should be no surprise that Mitchell had lead actress Maika Monroe, who notably just got done working on Wingard's The Guest just before the film began production, watch Blue Velvet (1986) in preparation for her role as the lead heroine. A somewhat ambiguously allegorical cinematic tone poem of the sometimes ominous yet always otherworldly sort that offers viewers the quite rare and delightful opportunity to come up with their own various interpretations as to its true meaning, Mitchell's fine little flick tells the spectrophiliac tale of a beautiful young blonde college girl who finds herself contracting a sexually transmitted curse of sorts that involves her being incessantly followed by a slow but persistent and psychologically craven deadly shape-shifting evil spirit that can take the form of both strangers and loved ones and ultimately desires to kill its carnally accursed human prey by fucking them to death. Rather unfortunately, while an individual can rid themselves of the carnal curse by fucking someone else and passing it onto them, the sinister sensual spirit will come back to preying on them if the person that they passed it onto is killed by it.

Set in a somewhat serene and intentionally anachronistic Michigan suburb just outside of Detroit that seems to be 'outside of time' in the sense that, aside from a couple exceptions, no one uses cellphones, virtually all the movies referenced were made in between the 1950s and 1960s, and the characters wearing clothing that looks like it is mostly from the 1970s and 1980s, It Follows is oftentimes interpreted by viewers as a parable about HIV/AIDS and STDs in general, a critique of the effects of the so-called sexual revolution, and a symbolic depiction of a young woman's less than ideal sexual rite of passage, yet auteur Mitchell has been somewhat dismissive of these various interpretations and has mentioned that the film was actually inspired by a real reoccurring nightmare that he had, or as the filmmaker stated in an interview with Digital Spy, "I had it when I was very young, the nightmare. I had it several times and I still remember images from it. I didn't use those images for the film, but the basic idea and the feeling I used. From what I understand, it's an anxiety dream. Whatever I was going through at that time, my parents divorced when I was around that age, so I imagine it was something to do with that." Of course, by Mitchell's own admittance, it seems that the film was at least partly inspired by the quite prominent post-counterculture social plague of divorce, which at least owes some of its popularity to family-negative influences like feminism, the welfare state, and the introduction of the pill and so-called sexual liberation. For those that have been fully red-pillled and do not believe in the lies of Hebraic Hollywood and the innately anti-intellectual emotion-based joke that is mainstream cultural Marxist academia where extremely coddled and/or otherwise mentally defective so-called 'minorities' and white liberal bourgeois weaklings are taught how to be triggered by mere words and ideas, the film can easily be interpreted as an allegory for the death of the European-American middleclass as a result of the various corrosive leftist/cultural Marxist forces, including the counterculture movement, feminism/women's lib, and civil rights/multiculturalism, among various other intersecting post-Marcusian socially engineered metapolitical plagues that have had a decidedly necrotizing effect on the overall social, cultural, spiritual, and moral core of the nation's once great white majority. A film that depicts Detroit as a completely depopulated hellhole and virtually haunted metropolis that is full of eerily dilapidated houses that look like they would be inhabited by the most menacing of both (sub)human and supernatural monsters, the film hints that, like most highly deleterious things that destroy suburban and rural areas like drugs and sexual degeneracy, the titular evil sexual spirit slithered out of the city. It should also be noted that the film goes out of its way to highlight the fact that the characters' parents sheltered them from the city, thereupon underscoring the almost mystically ominous essence of the quite literally dystopian urban wasteland while, at the same time, making light of the fact that suburbanites have a keen naivety when it comes to the real-life horrors of the world and thus make for the perfect victims for a deadly demonic STD from both the literally and figuratively dark side of town.

Featuring a rather naive and less than dainty yet compulsively cute suburban debutante heroine that is trapped at a somewhat purgatorial crossroad between childhood and adulthood that becomes all the more apparent after she lets some handsome hunk penetrate her fairly fresh main vein and subsequently becomes the perennial prey of a sexually deadly specter, the film surely demonstrates that coitus is considered a sort of initiatory act of adulthood that many teenagers and young adults are just too emotionally immature to deal with, especially if you're a dumb tom girl that, like the female protagonist, every boy and man wants to fuck. Featuring a subtly deteriorating suburban realm where all the male characters are either weak and/or manipulative and where the only paternal figures come in the form of the evil specter taking on the appearance of the heroine's father and grandfather, It Follows depicts an exceedingly emasculated society where the archetypical masculine male of American history has become nothing more than both a literal and figurative phantom that strikes great fear into the seemingly sexually conflicted female lead, who does not go by the quite unflattering male nickname 'Jay' for no reason. Indeed, if any contemporary horror film manages to simultaneously critique the decidedly deleterious effects that the sexual revolution, so-called women's lib and feminism, and civil rights/multiculturalism have had on the white American middleclass and how white flight to the suburbs has only turned America's pioneering majority into perturbingly passive sheep that could easily be led to the slaughter, it is indubitably It Follows, even if that was not exactly director Mitchell's conscious intention. Featuring a female protagonist that initially has a sort of deluded, idealistic desire to find true love and romance, the film not coincidentally depicts a mindlessly wanton microcosm where the evil entity ultimately takes advantage of the fact that all sex is loveless and passionless and is usually based on some sort of craven lie or deception. Indeed, as the film makes quite clear, it is rather unlikely that two lovers that have a mutual love and affection for one another could acquire the supernatural sickness.

Of course, while all these oftentimes ambiguous and esoteric themes are quite intriguing and totally atypical of horror cinema in general, what really makes the film work is its overall absolutely outstanding aesthetic package, which features a hyperrealistic arthouse meticulousness comparable to Dutch auteur Alex van Warmerdam's socially scathing arthouse films like De Noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners and especially Borgman (2013), but also a sort of vague neo-retro vibe in the spirit of the more recent cinematic works of Nicolas Winding Refn, Adam Wingard, and Jim Mickle that is underscored by its original synthesizer-driven musical score by Disasterpeace (aka Richard Vreeland). Intentionally shot with wide-angle lenses that give the film an extra expansive Kubrickian feel that makes the viewer feel as if they are completely engulfed in an ever-growing suburban abyss and that ultimately greatly accentuates the film's overall ominously yet beautifully oneiric essence (somewhat fittingly, lead Monroe has described Kubrick's The Shining (1980) as her personal favorite film), It Follows is probably the best and most idiosyncratic suburban horror flick since the original A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984), though it is obvious that the auteur is an actual child of the suburbs who has an innate and highly intimate understanding of the social dynamic of the environment as opposed to a leftist philosophy professor turned pornographer turned filmmaker like Wes Craven who has a dubious fetish for inordinately strong teenage female protagonists. In fact, instead of depicting teens and young adults as worthy rivals to the main monster, Mitchell's film completely breaks with outmoded genre conventions and depicts the would-be-heroes as the hopelessly stupid, naive, and foolish perennial children that they are. In short, there is no question after viewing It Follows that director Mitchell has a somewhat sentimental yet wholly critical view of the film's suburb setting (after all, he is a product of a Michigan suburb) and that he has not only a love of classic American horror movies but also a deep and obsessive respect for cinema as an art form to the point where he has sought to attempt to bring something fresh to both the genre and artistic medium. In other words, unlike the average horror director, Mitchell is not some hackish studio whore that vomits out celluloid products for the monetary benefit of some psychopathic Svengali-like studio head (though, to be fair, due to its unexpected popularity, the film was eventually purchased by The Weinstein Company's subsidiary, RADiUS-TWC, for North American distribution), but a real auteur with a distinct vision that all serious cinephiles should keep their eyes on in the future.

Right from the get-go in the wonderfully erratic and preternaturally stylized opening scene, It Follows announces that it is not your typical haplessly hokey horror turd, but a carefully constructed piece of cinematic art that actually demands that the viewer have a sense of taste and use their brain. Indeed, the film opens with a very long single shot of a petrified young dame wearing nothing but a slip and high-heels named Annie (Bailey Spry) running out of her house as if being chased by something or someone, pretending everything is all nice and dandy when both a negress neighbor and her father ask her if she needs help, running back into her house to get her purse and car keys, and then jumping into her car and abruptly driving away in a frenzied fashion. Ultimately, Annie drives to a secluded beach during twilight where she crouches down on the sand at the edge of the sea and calls her father on her cellphone while in a discernibly petrified state and confesses to him in a manner that makes it seem like she is saying goodbye forever, “I love you [...] I just wanted you and Mom to know how much I love you. Dad, I’m sorry I can be such a shit to you sometimes. I don’t know why I do that. Just know that I love you, OK? I just really love you both.” Considering her words to her father sound like those of a regretful individual that knows they are about to kick the bucket in some horrific way, it is no surprise that Annie is depicted as a lifeless corpse in the next scene. Undoubtedly, what is shocking about this scene is that something or someone has so brutally murdered and mangled Annie that one of her high-heel-adorned legs has been severely broken to the point where it is pointing in the opposite direction in what is ultimately a stunningly macabre early morning beach scene that almost manages to be morbidly erotic. Indeed, Annie’s corpse looks like a virtual surrealist statue, as if auteur Mitchell endured an Alain Robbe-Grillet movie marathon in preparation for this scene. Thankfully, unlike many Robbe-Grillet films, the imagery in It Follows never overwhelms the film’s narrative, as the two seem to perfectly compliment one another.

After poor little Annie is liquidated by some unknown pernicious force that seems to enjoy killing people during the late night in secluded places, the viewer is introduced to cutesy blonde protagonist ‘Jay’ Height (Maika Monroe)—a seemingly overgrown tomboy who refuses to be called by her real female name Jamie despite the fact that she is on the verge of both adulthood and her sexual maturity, or so it initially seems—as she briefly cleans and then relaxes in her family’s cheap above-ground swimming pool. Considering comments made by her busybody adult female neighbors, it seems that Jay comes from a somewhat broken home as her father does not seem to be in the picture and her mother is rarely around (when the viewer is eventually introduced to the mother, we never get to clearly see her face), though the female protagonist has a fairly close relationships with her somewhat less attractive younger sister Kelly (Lili Sepe) and childhood neighbor friends. Since Jay’s neighborhood seems to be a place where absentee adults are the norm, it is only natural that she and her friends have such close bonds that they make up a virtual surrogate family that provides each other with emotional support. Indeed, Jay is friends with an almost insufferably nerdy neighbor boy named Paul (Keir Gilchrist of James Wan’s quite horrendous supernatural horror abortion Dead Silence (2007)) and a dorky eccentric four-eyed girl named Yara (Olivia Luccardi) that plays a childish joke on her friends by farting quite loudly while reading Fyodor Dostoyevsky’s classic The Idiot (1869) on a seemingly futuristic clam-shaped compact e-reader. After her brief dip in the pool that involves gently drowning an ant that she finds crawling on her arm and playfully confronting some little boys that are playing peeping tom, Kelly briefly talks to her sister and friends and then prepares for a movie date with a young handsome fellow named Hugh (Jake Weary) that she seems to be quite infatuated with, even though she does not really seem to know much about him or his true character. While waiting in line to watch Charade (1963) starring

Cary Grant and Audrey Hepburn at a quite quaint antiquated movie theater (the scene was actually shot on location at a historic Japanese style theater in Detroit named Redford Theatre, which is notable for featuring a fully functioning Wurlitzer organ and being the place where Sam Raimi's classic The Evil Dead (1981) premiered), Jay proposes to Hugh that they play a rather juvenile game called "The Trade Game" where he must choose a person in the crowd that he would like to trade places with and then she gets the opportunity to guess who he picked. Despite being a handsome young man that is about to penetrate fresh premium pussy of the barely legal sort, Hugh somewhat strangely reveals that he would like to trade places with a little toddler boy, arguing, "I mean how cool would that be to have your whole life ahead of you." Judging Hugh's somewhat emasculating confession, one assumes that he has either screwed up his life majorly and/or lacks the emotional maturity and self-discipline to fully embrace the fact that he is a grown-up man and should not be fantasizing about being at an age where he is a completely dependent urchin that can getaway with pissing himself and not feel embarrassed. Naturally, things get somewhat bizarre between the young couple when Hugh insists that they leave the theater before the movie even starts after he spots a mysterious girl in a yellow shirt that Jay cannot see. While Jay has the typical jealous female response and demands to know if Hugh saw an ex-girlfriend, the heroine has no idea that she will soon discover that her beau has some seriously sinister sexual baggage that would even scare a pussy-peddling and STD-ridden Detroit crack whore away.

While Jay is noticeably baffled and concerned after being practically dragged out of the theater for seemingly no sensible reason at all by her seemingly bipolar boyfriend, that does not stop her from letting Hugh lacklusterly hump her in the backseat of his car the next night. While Hugh proves to be a pump-and-dump prick who just wanted Jay for her precious young poke-hole, the torment and abuse only just begins after the great sexual deception is revealed. Indeed, after the seemingly sapless sex concludes, Hugh gets out of his car and fiddles with junk in his truck while Jay lies in the back seat and gracefully plays with some weeds while softly confessing to her seemingly apathetic boyfriend, "It's funny. I used to daydream about being old enough to go on dates...Driving around with friends in their cars. I had this image of myself, holding hands with a really cute guy, listening to the radio, driving along some pretty road...Up north maybe...And the trees start to change colors. It was never about going anywhere really...Just having some sort of freedom, I guess. Never old enough, where the hell do we go." After Jay concludes her rather revealing little pseudo-poetic post-coital rant, she is in for quite the shock when Hugh abruptly grabs her from behind and knocks her out cold with a face full of chloroform. When Jay eventually wakes up, she finds herself inside a truly nightmarish ruined parking garage and tied to a wheelchair while wearing nothing but her quite childish little pink panties and matching bra. When Hugh notices that Jay has finally awakened, he absurdly attempts to explain to her that he has intentionally infected her with an evil sexually transmitted curse that involves an evil deadly entity following her until she gives the curse to someone else. Indeed, as Hugh states to his petrified hapless victim while seemingly like he is on the verge of suffering a mental breakdown, "I'm sorry. I'm not going to hurt you. Don't worry. You're not going to believe me, but I need you to remember what I'm saying. This Thing. It's going to follow you. Somebody gave it to me and I passed it to you...Back in the car. It can look like someone you know...Or it could be a stranger in a crowd. Whatever helps it to get close to you. It can look like anyone...But there is only one of it. And sometimes...Sometimes I think it looks like people you love just to hurt you." After explaining to her how he has infected her with the most perniciously deadly of STDs, Hugh then pushes Jay to the edge of the building in the wheelchair where he reveals to her that a completely unclad middle-aged woman of the rather menacing looking sort is walking toward their general direction. Needless to say, the wheelchair-bound heroine can only respond with abject hysteria while watching a completely speechless nude woman in a seemingly trance-like state walking towards her. As Hugh explains, he intentionally bound her to the wheelchair to prove to her that the evil entity is real so that she understands that she is in serious danger and that she should never go into a building with one exist lest she fall prey to death-by-supernatural-rape. Of course, considering the specter will once again go after him if it kills her, Hugh has a vested interest in Jay's survival.

Naturally, Kelly, Paul, and Yara are horrified when they witness Hugh dropping off Jay in the middle of the main street of their neighborhood in nothing but her underwear and then driving away, as it seems like the dubious hunk just brutally date raped and then tossed her out of his car like she was rancid garbage. Notably, before Jay is dropped off, Yara is depicted playing the Victorian card game Old Maid, which involves the players ridding themselves of the cards based on strange characters (the 1940s Whitman Publishing Co. set includes various racial caricatures, including a prostitute-like negress named 'Agonizing Sue' and a pimp-like negro named 'Jazzbo Jackson') and where the loser of the game is the one that retains the titular card. Of course, the Old Maid game somewhat parallels Jay's new supernatural struggle, as the true 'loser' of the very real game that she has been plagued with is the one that is currently accursed with the evil entity and thus she must seek to spread it to someone else if she wants to abscond from the supramundane clutches of the lethally lecherous apparition. Unfortunately, even if Jay gives someone else the curse by deceptively coercing some guy into plunging his pork-sword into her warm and wet black hole, she will still be able to see the entity and she will probably be in danger for the rest of her life. After all, if the entity kills the person that she gave the curse to, it will go after her again in what ultimately seems like a perpetual vicious circle of lethally lecherous vice. Since the only insights that Jay has in regard to the specter are the handful of things Hugh told her during his little post-sex pep talk, the heroine has no idea if it has any serious weaknesses or if it can even be killed. While the police are called and Jay is hospitalized after her truly nightmarish date, Hugh totally disappears and it is subsequently discovered that he was using a fake name and identity when he was dating the protagonist. Indeed, it turns out that Hugh fabricated an elaborate bogus identity just so that he could start a phony relationship with some unwitting young dame and then infect her with the supernatural STD.

As clearly indicated by a scene where she stands in front of a large bathroom mirror while wearing nothing but her underwear and then proceeds to open her panties and stare intensely at her pussy as if something is terribly wrong with it, Jay seems to feel quite dirty, corrupted, and sexually confessed as a result of her recent experiences as the victim of a desperately manipulative bug-spreader that she had genuine feelings for. Needless to say, things only get worse when Jay sees the entity in the form of an elderly woman while sitting in a college class and then proceeds to embarrass herself by running out of the room while an uppity negress professor yells at her (notably, the black teacher is depicted reading American-born British poet T.S. Eliot's poem "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," which naturally shares some themes and commonalities with the film). That night, Jay and Kelly reluctantly allow Paul to sleep over after the haunted heroine describes her horrific encounter with the senile specter. As someone that has a borderline unhealthy infatuation with Jay to the point where he is fully willing to be her doormat, Paul dubiously uses the heroine's hysteria as a means to get close to her. While Jay and Paul discuss how they were both each other's first kiss while watching a cheesy black-and-white sci-fi movie on a TV that looks like it is at least 25 years old, the entity breaks a kitchen window in the house, thus immediately alarming the already quite startled protagonist. After Paul leaves the room to investigate, Jay slowly walks around downstairs and eventually discovers the entity in the form of a semi-topless girl with screwed up teeth that is wearing no shoes and only one sock. On top of the fact that the entity looks the ghost of a sexual assault victim from the 1970s, the specter further petrifies Jay by peeing all over her floor. While only speculation, it seems as if the specter has taken the form of a prostitute that was brutally raped and then left for dead. At this point, Jay runs upstairs and locks herself in her room where she initially refuses to unlock the door when both Kelly and Paul knock and demand to be allowed inside. After she allows Paul and her sister inside, Jay tries to stop them from opening the door when subsequently Yara knocks. Somewhat predictably, when they open the door, both Yara and the entity enter the room, with the former naturally being completely unaware of the presence of the latter. Considering that the specter has taken the form of an extremely tall and lanky young man that somewhat resembles a giant that died of starvation, Jay practically loses her mind as a result of what she sees. With nowhere to run or hide, Jay takes desperate measures and climbs out of her upstairs bedroom window, climbs down her house, gets on a bike, and then makes her way to a local playground, as if it makes her feel safe to revert back to childhood by riding on a swing. Unbeknownst to Jay, her neighbor friend Greg Hannigan (Daniel Zovatto)—a longhaired stoner type that seems like the sort of dude that likes to fuck chicks while high and listen to Led Zeppelin's "Stairway to Heaven"—witnesses her bizarre behavior while he is smoking a joint with a hot chick in his car and becomes considerably concerned, so he decides to ditch his date and go ask the protagonist if she needs help.

After teaming up with rather gregarious stoner Greg, Jay and her friends decide to visit the abandoned dilapidated Detroit house that the fellow-formerly-known-as-Hugh lived at to see if they can find anything there that might lead them to finding the manipulative STD-spreader. Upon entering the falling apart house, which looks like it used to be a rather fine piece of middleclass architecture (in fact, the house is an American Foursquare, which were quite popular in the U.S. from the mid-1890s to late-1930s), Jay and her friends find crushed up beer cans hanging from strings (which was obviously used to alert ersatz-Hugh of the entity's presence), vintage pornographic magazines covered with semen-soaked tissues, and prescription bottles full of various dubious pills, among other things that give the impression that it's former occupant was a dip-somaniacal pill-popping horn-dog slob that epitomizes the average American frat-boy douche. Upon flipping through one of the porno mags like an inquisitive little boy that has just found his dad's secret stash, Paul discovers a photo inside featuring pseudo-Hugh wearing a high school varsity jacket. When Jay sees the pic, she realizes that her defiler is wearing a jacket from a local school named Lawson High, so the gang decides to head to the public educational institution where they ultimately learn that Hugh's real name is Jeff Redmond after looking through an old yearbook. After learning his name, Jay and her friends soon find Jeff's address and then proceed to pay him a surprise visit at his family home where the heroine and her friend's are warmly greeted by his hopelessly bourgeois mommy. While acting like a paranoid meth addict suffering from major drug withdrawal symptoms, Jeff reveals he is a man-whore of sorts by stating in regard to how he originally acquired the carnal curse, "I met a girl at a bar. It was a one night stand. I don't even remember her name. I think that's where it came from." After attempting to coerce Jay to spread the curse to someone else by arguing to her and her friends, "She can do the same thing I did. I mean, it should be easy for her, she's a girl. Any guy would be with you...Just sleep with someone else and tell him to do the same thing. Maybe it'll never come back," the rather startled ex-jock throws them out of his house. While Greg gets slightly aggressive and basically tells him that he and his entity stories are pure bullshit before they leave, there is no question that Jeff is desperately afraid of something, hence why he would go so far as to do something as heinous as infecting a cute blonde with a spectral sexually transmitted curse of the decidedly deadly sort. Of course, what makes Jeff a somewhat intriguing character in that the you cannot bring yourself to completely hate him despite knowing the daftly things he has committed, as his all-consuming fear is very real and he at least attempted to somewhat prepare Jay for the curse, even if it was somewhat to his personal benefit to do so. Also, somewhat interestingly, neither Jay nor any of her friends dare take revenge against Jeff for what he has done, thus underscoring the innate impotency and pathetic passiveness of the modern middleclass. After all, as the film reveals, both Paul and Greg have varying degrees of romantic feelings for Jay, yet neither of them have the testicular fortitude to avenge their precious golden-haired shield-maiden.

Luckily, semi-suave and somewhat heroic lady's man Greg, who is clearly attracted to the protagonist, offers Jay and her friends temporary sanctuary in his remote family lakehouse where he teaches the little lady to shoot a revolver by giving her target practice lessons. Despite being far from home, it is not long before the entity appears in the form of Yara and grabs Jay by the hair while she is sitting on the beach with her friends. When Paul is violently thrown a number of feet by the entity after attacking it with a beachchair upon seeing the inexplicable sight of an unseen evil spirit pulling Jay's hair, he becomes a true believer in predatory curse and realizes that his friend is not just delusional or mentally ill. After very narrowly escaping the entity's grasp, Jay runs away and locks herself inside a boatshed with all of her friends except Greg, who does not witness the strange beach encounter and thus remains skeptical about the curse. While Jay manages to shoot the entity in the head, the seemingly all-powerful specter is only momentarily stunned, thus hinting that it might be immortal and/or completely indestructible. After briefly morphing into the lanky giant that previously invaded the heroine's bedroom and then smashing a window, the entity transforms into a pale rat-like little boy that resembles a rabid terminal cancer patient and then proceeds to enter the shed through the artificial entrance that it has created, so Jay flees the small building, steals Greg's car, and then proceeds to crash said car in a cornfield while driving it in a hyper hysterical state, thus underscoring the heroine's innate incapacity to think or act rationally when attempting to battle her phantom foe. As a result of the crash, Jay breaks her arm and is left temporarily hospitalized, though thankfully the entity leaves her alone during her short hospital stay. Quite fortunately, Greg, who, unlike her other friends, does not seem to really believe in the entity, agrees to risk contracting the curse by fucking Jay in her hospital bed. While Jay likes Greg as a friend, she has a borderline melancholic expression on her face when he humps her in the hospital bed in what proves to be a less than sexy (un)lovemaking scene. Somewhat curiously, Greg reveals to Jay three days after their rather underwhelming roll in the hay that he has yet to see the entity. Of course, as hinted in a brief scene where he is depicted shamelessly flirting with another girl at a table in a cafeteria, it is assumed that Greg has foolishly passed on the curse to some unwitting victim(s). Naturally, as a firm non-believer in the entity, Greg does not think anything of it when his ostensible mother bangs on his door while he is asleep and then appears to him topless with her silicone breast implants hanging out of her robe, thus resulting in the inordinately stoic stoner being killed without even putting up a fight. Indeed, when Greg answers too door and sees the entity in the form of his topless mother, her responds by telling, "What the fuck, Mom?" and thus is completely unprepared when the salacious specter more or less dives pussy-first onto his dick. Somewhat provocatively, the celestial curse adds insult to injury by fucking Greg to death while in the form of his silicone-injected progenitor. While Jay witnesses the entity in the form of Greg breaking into Greg's house and attempts to warn him by unsuccessfully trying to call him and then subsequently running to his house, the heroine find herself completely helpless while witnessing the deadly supernatural rape. After witnessing deadly pseudo-incestuous spectrophilia in the form of the entity riding on Greg's cock, Jay is left completely horrified and emotionally exhausted, so she decides to drive to the lake where she ends up sleeping outside. When she wakes up the next day, she sees a couple young bros that she does not know in a boat in the water, so she curiously decides to swim to them. As demonstrated by her almost deathly facial expression, it does not seem like Jay is simply looking to have some fun in the sun with the boat boys. Whether Jay has decided to spread the curse by the way of an aquatic threesome or foursome is questionable, but she is depicted crying while driving back home, thus hinting that she might be consumed with guilt as a result of having infecting the unwittingly fellows. If Jay did indeed spread the curse to boat boys, they must have put up a poor fight against the entity, as it is not long before the specter begins hunting the heroine again.

As is quite apparent throughout the film as reflected by the character's compulsively cuck-ish behavior and pathetic pouty facial expressions when the heroine shows other males attention, pussy Paul has a precious little crush on Jay, so naturally he eventually offers to fuck her under the dubious pretext of being passed the curse. Indeed, Paul has such an overwhelming thirst for his childhood friend's glorious stinkpot and is such a little pathetic groveling white knight 'good guy' pansy that he is willing to risk a very horrific spectrophiliac death just to bang Jay one single time. Of course, Jay initially turns down Paul's offers, thus causing him to whine with a virtual murmur, "I like you too, you know. Why did you pick Greg?," to which she sadly replies in regard to her dead stoner pal, "I thought he'd be okay. He wasn't scared." Paul even meekly attempts to kiss Jay, but she simply turns her head away as if she offended that such a weak and nerdy bargain bin beta-boy would dare to try to take advantage of her glaring vulnerability with such a feeble and passionless attempt at a kiss. Ultimately, Jay and Paul concoct the childish plan to lure the entity to a large Detroit indoor swimming pool where they plan to electrocute the supernatural spirit by tossing a couple dozen electronic items into the water. While driving away from her house, Jay notices the entity in the form of her naked grandfather standing on the roof of her humble abode, though she neglects to tell her friends what she has just witnessed. Upon arriving in the city and walking down the somewhat foreboding street of Detroit, Yara remarks to Jay and her friends in a scene that underscores the film's somewhat cryptic theme of the tragedy of white flight, "When I was a little girl, my parents wouldn't let me go south of 8 Mile. And I didn't even know what that meant until I got a little older and I started realizing that, that's where the city started and the suburb ended. And I used to think about how shitty and weird that was. I mean, I had to ask permission to go to the state fair with my best friend and her parents, only because it was a few blocks past the border." Jay replies to Yara by simply stating, "My mom said the same thing," thus highlighting the ominous reputation of the city, especially among the white middleclass, which has seemed to have developed an almost mystical view of the great evil that engulf the hopelessly forsaken shitty post-Europid city. As soon as the protagonists climb a fence that is around the pool building, the film morphs into a sort of revisionist 'old dark house' flick. Indeed, aside from the fact that the building resembles a sort of visually oppressive decaying gothic mansion-cum-castle that one might expect to find in a secluded rural region of England, it turns into night and begins raining and storming outside not long after the protagonists enter the increasingly sinister structure.

After plugging vintage lamps, typewriters, TVs, alarm clocks, and various other aesthetically displeasing electronic devices into the outlets in the main room of the indoor pool, Jay gets inside the water and waits for the specter while her similarly petrified friends wait for her signal to plunge the objects into Chlorine-laced aqua. Although Jay never says it explicitly, the entity eventually appears in the form of her father. In fact, Jay is so horrified by this fact that she refuses to tell her sister Kelly that evil spirit has taken the form of their mutual progenitor. After lurking in the entrance hallway of the pool for a couple moments, the entity eventually emerges and begins picking up and throwing the electronic devices at Jay, thus scaring her and her friends that she might be electrocuted. Notably, the uncanny supernatural creature, which is sporting a white wife-beater like some stereotypically abusive guido father, acts in a somewhat atypical fashion in its seemingly consciously emotionally manipulative expressions of violence, as if the entity knows that Jay's father is a violent alcoholic deadbeat and is trying its best to terrorize her by pantomiming her padre's abusive behavior. While Jay attempts to point out where the entity is, Paul tries in vain to shoot the completely invisible target and accidentally hits Yara in the process in what ultimately proves to be ample evidence that the young friends did not put too much thought or preparation into their half-baked plan. When Kelly manages to expose exactly where the specter is standing by tossing a blanket over its head, Paul is finally able to see where it is and then proceeds to put a bullet in its brain, thus causing it to collapse and fall into the pool. Seemingly immune to bullets, it is not long before the entity grabs Jay's leg and begins drowning her while lurking at the bottom of the pool. Luckily, Paul's shooting prowess gets somewhat better and he somehow manages to put a bullet in the brain of the invisible entity while it is underwater, thus enabling Jay to escape from specter's grip. After she finally emerges from the pool, Jay is startled to find a strange blister-like wound around her leg/ankle area where the entity had grabbed her. When Paul asks her to look in the water to see if the entity is dead, Jay slowly crawls to the edge of the pool and, to her great horror, discovers that the water is being consumed by a growing cloud of murky blood. Of course, considering the striking ambiguity of this uniquely unsettling scenario, the viewer is left guessing as to whether or not the creature perished in the pool.

As a sort of award for his borderline heroic efforts (indeed, the viewer senses that she feels obligated to let him have a little taste of her accursed spasm chasm), Jay fucks Paul when they get home that night in what ultimately proves rather lackluster sex between two individuals that have seemingly nil sexual compatibility. Indeed, after their particularly prosaic carnal session, Paul meekly asks Jay, "Do you feel any different?" and she nods no. Seemingly greatly disappointed after finally achieving the seemingly inconceivable by fucking the girl of his dreams, Paul also admits he does not feel any different. The next day, Paul drives by two fat and radically repulsive ghetto skank prostitutes that give off the impression that they are mutant survivors of a nuclear apocalypse. While one of the streetwalkers smirks at Paul when he looks at her, it is never revealed as to whether or not he decided to use her and/or the other girl's sensual services. Of course, patronizing a prostitute would be a great way to get rid of the curse as it could possibly be spread among countless victims in a very short time. Notably, in the penultimate scene of the film, Paul and Jay visit Yara in the hospital where she reads aloud the following line from Dostoyevsky's The Idiot: "But here I should imagine the most terrible part of the whole punishment is, not the bodily pain at all—but the certain knowledge that in an hour—then in ten minutes, then in half a minute, then now—this very instant—your soul must quit your body and that you will no longer be a man—and that this is certain, certain! That's the point—the certainty of it." Considering their recent experiences, one would hope that Jay and her friends now have some understanding of the meaning of Dostoyevsky's words and have accepted that they will one day disappear from this world. In the very last scene, Paul and Jay are depicted holding hands while walking down a sidewalk in their neighborhood in an exceedingly awkward fashion, as if they are trying in vain to resemble a romantic couple. Unbeknownst to the terribly mismatched (un)love birds, they are being followed by someone that may or may not be the entity in a young male form. Additionally, this final scene features many allusions to death, as it is set during the Halloween season as demonstrated by the fact that various pumpkins and fake cobwebs can be seen around the neighborhood, not to mention the fact that a 'Dead End' sign can be seen both in front of and to the right of Jay and Paul (in fact, the former's arm cast is even inscribed with the words, "Here lie the bones of Jay"). As hinted by the fact that they both have sullen expressions of their faces and neither of them look at or talk to one another during the entire scene, it seems like their relationship will not last long, but such is the common fate when a girl stupidly begins a relationship under quite questionable circumstances with a eternally groveling 'good guy' type who would probably gladly devour her turds if he asked her to. Arguably not coincidentally, like all of the curse-spreading coitus sessions in the film, Jay and Paul's extra awkward game of sexual intercourse was not that natural consequence of mutual love and affection but instead the result of a somewhat emotionally abusive deception that will probably eventually lead to an unpleasant outcome for both involved. Indeed, at its most rudimentary level, It Follows certainly reveals that cheap loveless sex always has negative consequences, especially when you are young and dumb and thus unprepared for the full impact of said consequences.

One of the reasons I absolutely hate horror movies that are set in the suburbs so much is that they tend to have a glaring innate artificiality about them that many people seem to mistake as some sort of sophisticated social critique, yet It Follows manages to do the opposite by taking an almost shockingly naturalistic approach to subtlety, eloquently, and sometimes symbolically hinting at many of the very real problems that consume white suburbia, including the dissolution of the nuclear family, the rise of soulless recreational sex and its consequences (i.e. pregnancy/abortion, mental illness, STDs, etc), suicide, self-mutilation, drug addiction, the inversion of genders, and sexual schizophrenia, among various other things that Hollywood would never dare to tackle in any sort of serious and honest fashion, but one should not expect anything else from an anti-Europid industry that is largely dominated by wealthy culture-distorting Hebrews who spent many decades actively promoting the socially corrosive vices that led to these things. Indeed, the film oftentimes feels like it could be directed by one of the actual members of the community it depicts, albeit one with a keenly critical yet empathetic eye. Indeed, instead of containing a quasi-feminist (meta)political agenda and absurdly portraying the lead as some sort of all-competent-ingénue like Nancy Thompson in Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984) and Sidney Prescott in Scream (1996), the lead in Mitchell's film is a typical moronic young woman and she and her friends ultimately hatch the most naively childish Scooby-Doo-esque plan imaginable when they attempt to exterminate the entity at the pool despite having no idea if it has weakness or if it can even be destroyed. Additionally, it is no shock that alpha-wuss Paul accidentally shoots one of his friends when attempting to shoot the specter, as such a scenario is very likely when a pansy nerd with poor motor skills and next to nil gun training attempts to shoot at an invisible target in a closed off room. While the film concludes in refreshing ambiguity, I think it is safe to assume that the silly young heroes failed to liquidate the entity and that their days are numbered. Notably, although he apparently liked the film, Quentin Tarantino singled out It Follows for criticism, stating, "It's one of those movies that's so good you get mad at it for not being great," to which Mitchell later fittingly retorted on twitter, "Hey QT, why don't we get together over a beer and talk about these notes. I have a few of my own for you." Apparently, Tarantino—an autist that seems to be immune to organic cinematic art and lives for playing with obscenely outmoded genre conventions, sort of like a little deranged kid that gets a sick kick out of burning ants—found the film's mythology to be too inconsistent, but clearly he missed the point, as the flick goes out of its way to never construct a clearly defined mythology, hence why the heroes came up with the seemingly random and elaborately impotent and nonsensical plan to kill the entity by electrocuting it in the pool as they, quite unlike the protagonists of similar genre films, have no ancient occult book, all-wise guru, or sagely nun to learn from in regard to how to destroy the monster. Indeed, not unlike Tarantino, it seems these kids' unintentionally borderline Dada-esque plans were the natural result of watching too many stupid horror and sci-fi films.

While sex is nowadays considered more or less as sacred as taking a shit or popping a zit, modern-day generations forget that carnal pleasures used to be a matter of literal life or death for many people as a result of complications during birth and incurable STDs, among other things, not to mention the fact that many individuals believed that they risked eternal hellfire when daring to engage in sinful fornication. Undoubtedly, one of the many reasons that It Follows is so intriguing is that it brings back a certain amount of thrilling danger to sex and is a sort of atavistic remainder of both the spiritual and biological risks of carnal pleasures. Set in a world where the only fathers are weak (e.g. Nicole's bourgeois pussy dad) or violently murderous phantoms (e.g. Jay's father) and the only other adults are zombie-like busybody philistines (Jay and Greg's mothers) or phony affirmative action-based negro authority figures that no one respects (e.g. Jay's professor and the police detective), and all the young heroes are hopelessly naïve man-children and woman-children that surely lack the intellectual, spiritual, moral, and philosophical discipline and rigor to one day lead their communities, It Follows ultimately paints a perturbing portrait of the horribly coddled white middleclass that makes it seem like it is facing a very immediate extinction. Of course, another rather effective ingredient of the film is its intentional use of anachronistic clothing and technology, as it can be seen as symbolizing the increasing monetary and cultural impoverishment of the modern-day middleclass, which no longer enjoys the great prosperity that previous generations did, especially the baby-boomers who, as an arguable result of being the most spoiled and thus weak and deracinated generation in all of human history, are ultimately responsible for the decidedly deleterious social changes that have led to the progressive deterioration of their very own people and culture. Indeed, the characters in the film not only use their parents' beat-up old cars and archaic furniture, but have also been handed down the emotional, economic, cultural, and spiritual impoverishment that their parents created. After all, the popularity of partly mummified kosher commie presidential candidate like Bernie Sanders is largely the result of the surplus of college graduates in their 20s and 30s who still live with their parents and who will probably be spending the rest of their lives attempting to pay off student loans while working unskilled service jobs at left-wing oriented companies like Starbucks and Panera Bread. With their parents and grandparents abandoning Detroit—a city that their ancestors built—so that tribes of niggers could destroy it in more than two generations, only to weaken their race in the process by living in the totally safe and artificial world of the suburbs, these young adults lack even the maturity to safely and responsibly engage in the most basic and primitive adult biological act of sexual intercourse, so it is only wholly fitting that the titular monster of It Follows is a sexually transmitted and requires that the transmitter to commit sexual abuse and non-consensual sex to rid themselves of it. Contemporary Westerners now seem to believe that the sole function of sex is pleasure to the point where it has totally lost any sacred or spiritual essence it once had, hence the rapid decline of white birth rates and the glorification of abortion as a patently pathetic symbol of petty you-go-girl female (pseudo)empowerment, as if paying some Judaic doctor a bunch of shekels to have the child that is growing in your body vacuumed out of your vagina is a glorious and honorable thing that should be commended as an act of great strength and personal sovereignty (in fact, a bunch of dumb feminist bitches recently started a social media campaign entitled 'Shout Your Abortion' where tens of thousands of dumb cunts gloated over the internet about committing softcore legal maternal filicide). Undoubtedly, when you have a generation of people that unconsciously worships at the altar of Puer aeternus, kill its own children out of laziness and/or narcissism/self-absorption, passively allows its cities and neighborhoods to be colonized by barbarian minorities that are absurdly subsidized with mostly white middleclass tax money, and have never thought about the future existence of their people or culture, you have a nightmarish situation where sexuality is arguably the most fundamentally and symbolically dysfunctional element of the equation. Indeed, the real 'IT' that follows the protagonists of Mitchell's film is about have a century of self-inflicted dysfunction and decadence that was either sired or passively accepted by the characters' parents and grandparents.

While I have mostly given up on horror cinema in general, It Follows and the rare European quasi-arthouse film like kraut homo auteur Till Kleinert's Der Samurai (2014) have given me some slight hope that there are still inventive horror auteurs out there that understand nuance, allegory, and archetypes and want to make timeless yet modern cinematic works that tackle the truly horrific aspects of contemporary society as opposed to simply portraying redundant one-dimensional monsters in cheap costumes that have no deeper meaning and instead simply epitomize the redundancy and lack of originality that plagues the genre. In that sense, Mitchell's film has more in common with the great cinematic works of German Expression than contemporary supernatural horror films, as an arcanelly allegorical flick that bleeds the fears and weaknesses of the collective unconscious of white America. Somewhat curiously considering he does not see himself as any sort of horror filmmaker, Mitchell is already talking about possibly doing a sequel, which I somewhat hope is never happens so that the original film remains just as enigmatic and does not suffer the sorry fate of being franchised to death like The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, Halloween, A Nightmare on Elm Street, and Scanners, among various other examples. Indeed, the less we know about the eponymous ST(S)pecker of the film the better, as It Follows is an innately oneiric film with a foreboding dream logic that would be shattered if there was attempt to uncover the intricacies of the film's refreshingly vague and ambiguous mythology. Indeed, Mitchell's sometimes reminded me of Andrei Tarkovsky's The Mirror (1975) in terms of its richly ethereal and narcotizing atmosphere, absolutely unforgettable dream-like visuals, and sometimes seemingly stream-of-consciousness approach to both the imagery and dialogue. Of course, Mitchell does not attempt to be as philosophically or metaphysically deep as Tarkovsky, but instead uses his own organic Michigan suburban sensibility to tell a highly personalized socio-cultural story in a sort of covertly artful and refreshingly unpretentious fashion that demonstrates that he wants to appeal to a large audience while staying true to his evolution as an artist. In terms of its disturbing depiction of a painful youthful sexual awakening and hauntingly symbolic use of an indoor swimming pool that seems to represent adulthood (indeed, heroine Jay finds solace in her small personal above-ground pool, which can be seen as representing her childhood, but finds herself in horrifying experience in the large Detroit indoor pool, which could be seen as symbolizing adulthood), Mitchell's film also deserves seemingly unlikely comparisons with Jerzy Skolimowski's rather underrated feature Deep End (1970). Despite being a horror film that is certainly highly conscious of certain conventions of the genre, It Follows is indubitably a more artistically and emotionally mature cinematic work than Mitchell's previous feature The Myth of the American Sleepover. As his hopelessly gaudy and spasmodic genre-philiac films obnoxiously reveal in their unabashed negrophiliac outbursts, gratuitous displays of soulless violence (yet curiously lack of sexual intimacy aside from the occasional foot fetish scene), and complete and utter lack of morality and spirituality, Cuckantino—a completely racially and culturally deracinated pothead who grew up with a single mother who, not surprisingly, exposed her young son to negro boyfriends—is just too materialistic and emotionally immature to be able to fully embrace a film like Mitchell's where everything is not wrapped up in a neat little package that can be fully digested by his autistic fanboy brain. Also, one cannot forget that, despite its mostly semi-cryptic references to classic horror films, It Follows never basks in the sort of too-cool-for-school pomo posturing that typically wets the panties of autistic fan-boys who seem to see cinema as sort of form of cheap neo-vaudevillian entertainment as opposed to a genuine artistic medium.

As director Mitchell stated himself, "I'm not personally that interested in where 'it' comes from. To me, it's dream logic in the sense that they're in a nightmare, and when you're in a nightmare there's no solving the nightmare. Even if you try to solve it." Personally, I believe Mitchell is being honest in what he says and, despite his dubious support of a big fat mainstream white liberal slob like Michael Moore, I sense that he has a visceral feeling that he cannot fully articulate that there is something not quite right in America and that his instant-classic horror film is unconscious expression of a young and thoughtful white man who, due to a lifetime's worth of brainwashing via the cunning kosher culture-distorters of Hollywood, cannot figure out why the nuclear family has been nuked and his previously quite beautiful hometown has degenerated into a third world dump that looks like it was firebombed. Of course, Mitchell understands that rows upon rows of condemned Detroit houses are infinitely more disturbing and horrifying on the emotional level than some elaborately constructed haunted house on a Hollywood studio set. In terms of sheer atmosphere and commitment to depicting the nuances of modern suburbia and its discontents, Mitchell's sole cinematic excursion in horror seems like a Michelangelo Antonioni flick when compared to so-called classics like The Amityville Horror (1979) and Peter Medak's The Changeling (1980). Indeed, probably the only film that seems to manage to reconcile the cinematic works of Antonioni, Lynch, and John Hughes, It Follows feels like the semi-unconscious reaction of a cerebral cineaste that senses that his beloved community and, in turn, country is on the brink of a racial and cultural apocalypse. Additionally, I could not help but think after watching Mitchell's film that old school horror classics ranging from the Universal Monsters movies of the 1920s through 1950s to classic slasher flicks like Carpenter's Halloween seem like frivolous bullshit when compared to the stranger-than-fiction horrors of real-life. Of course, Mitchell's film also unwittingly demonstrates that the borderline infantile romances and tedious teen angst depicted in Hughes' films were just early signs of a degenerated generation of sexually, emotionally, and psychologically immature individuals who were artificially manufactured by the suburbs. As the great prophetic Teutonic philosopher Oswald Spengler once stated in regard to the tragedy of urbanization, "Long, long ago the country bore the country-town and nourished it with her best blood. Now the giant city sucks the country dry, insatiably and incessantly demanding and devouring fresh streams of men, till it wearies and dies in the midst of an almost uninhabited waste of country.” Of course, there has been a major paradigm shift in the Occident that not even Spengler could foresee. Indeed, with the cities in ruins and colonized by barbarians and its former white inhabitants succumbing to decadence and emasculation as a result of fleeing the places they built and relocating to the sterile and somewhat unnatural realm of suburbia where the best blood is sapped of its vitality and left virtually devoid of the capacity to create great art and culture. Indeed, as the characters of It Follows clearly demonstrate via their hysterical behavior and patently preposterous (non)solutions to serious problems, most suburban folks have no chance of surviving a societal collapse, especially those unfortunate individuals that live just outside the double dark shitty city of Detroit where the real STD-carrying monsters and mutants dwell. After all, as Spengler wrote in the opening passage of his swansong The Hour of Decision (1934), “Is there today a man among the White races who has eyes to see what is going on around him on the face of the globe? To see the immensity of the danger which looms over this mass of peoples?” While Mitchell seems to instinctively sense this threat as hinted in his film’s unflattering depiction of young suburbanites and occasional scene of a naughty negro lurking outside a dilapidated Detroit house, he, like so many white Americans, still lacks the courage and psychological prowess to look at what is right in front of his face, hence the authentically foreboding tone of It Follows where the presence of fear and paranoia is unquestionable but its exact source never fully explained. While Mitchell will unfortunately probably not make a film in the spirit of Rudyard Kipling’s classic poem “The Wrath of the Awakened Saxon” anytime soon, his use of T.S. Eliot is a good start and his first horror feature makes it perfectly clear that he is a young auteur to look out for.

THE UNBORN

David S. Goyer* (2009)

With the releases of Defiance, Miracle at St. Anna, and Valkyrie, it seemed that Hollywood relieved some of that Nazi sensationalism with a cinematic premature ejaculation. Who would have thought that The Unborn would snowball into a relentless Jewish assault on the senses? Certainly not I. From the early trailers, I had hope visible for this feature. After The Haunting of Molly Hartley and before The Uninvited, I was sure that The Unborn would at least be a tolerable horror film, even if it did include all the "scary" scenes in the trailer like most horror films. I first got a hint that this would be a good film when AMC Theaters demanded that the trailer be removed from all copies of Twilight. Being a projectionist, I enjoyed watching the screaming girls from above. I was pained to remove the trailer because of someone that couldn't handle terror while agreeing to view a vampire film. As the film builds up, you can piece together the entirety of the shock scenes by simply plugging the scenes in the trailer with the fitting circumstance and background. The public apparently wasn't ready for The Unborn and I'm glad that this was the demographic decision. "I'm not looking for a Christian exorcism! I'm looking for a Jewish one!" How can one incapacitate an amazing character actor with brutish screen charisma? By making him into a fairy Rabbi of course. Gary Oldman plays the under-used character of Rabbi Something. He is a "non-believer" but upon experiencing his own second-hand demonic hallucination of a comically CGI-canine with an Upside-down (Really?) head, he converts his decision to help the half naked Odette Yustman. That's what kills any cheap thrill this film carries - the special effects. In the beginning - the dream sequence, when the fetus opens its eye to carry a Seed of Chucky-esque eyeball, the crowd laughs. Or wait, the crowd screams, I laugh. That brings me to my second point. Upon closing tonight, the "opening day" for theatrically released films, The Unborn was a hellacious one to monitor and clean. In my personal duty, I act as both Booth Operator and Usher. Well, I usher to help the weak-willed with their petty problems and "broken hands". Tired of the "quotes" yet? I'm not. As I stood outside of the auditorium housing The Unborn, I witnessed beautiful girl after beautiful girl whispering to their boyfriend how "amazing" the film was. Let me tell you, it is none of these - these being of positive praise. Coincidentally, Irony... For my dear SS readers, I have a bit of a confession to perform. I'm rather inebriated. Upon viewing The Unborn and heading home, my writing process involved frustration, self-destruction, and self-loathing. The experience was a troublesome one and I found the film to be increasingly harder to write about. What better way than to consume some alcohol to allow uninhibited thoughts to flow free? There is none, especially if I suffer from a very specific case of writer's block towards this film. This review before you is the chronicling of three days writer's block and a penchant for indescribable amounts of alcohol.”Jumby” wins my nomination for worst fictional name. ever.All religions conform to and become slaves of the ”master religion”. In the end, all artifacts of each religion die horrible, violent deaths save for Gary Oldman. This would be fine had he not symbolized the entire religion of Judaism. I dare any one reader to watch The Unborn and not get tired of the egg-barrage of the Jewish connection with the film. Had it been worked in easily would it have worked? Maybe, but no, we had to be ”raped” with visual images of holocaust clippings, Star of David charms, Evil Nazi experimentation’s, and the Kabbalah mixed with occultism.Many choose to serve as blind cattle for the Shepard; the Shepard being the motion picture for indulgence. Had a film with incredibly Christian themes (See: House (2008) been released under the guise of a pedigree horror film, the fans would revolt with derogatory statements and weak-willed insults. Now if this film’s religious pretenses were set to Judaism, the audience would sit there quietly. After South Park featured an episode featuring Steven Spielberg and George Lucas raping their creation Indiana Jones, the ADL (Anti-defamation league) stepped forward accusing the episode of being ”anti-Semitic” even though a mention of belief is nowhere to be found of heard in that specific episode.What do you see for yourself after death? Depending on ”ethical” choices, it might be heaven, hell, or whatever is in between. For those special horrible people who murdered children and raped women, it’s a free ticket to The Unborn. Congratulations, you’ve just been a human guinea pig in the idea of a point. The Unborn is bad, any way you look about it. Story? Which story? The one about -it- being inter-universal or the one of it being demonic? David S. Goyer is perhaps the worst writer I’ve ever had the immediate displeasure to analyze. Before The Dark Knight fags come rushing in, know that Ledger improvised most and more of his lines allowing for the scintillating hysteria behind his ”final” role.With so many thoughts & emotions drained past the line of exhaustion, The Unborn remains soiled. Had I not expected an earnest film with originality, the blowback might not have severed so many ideas towards horror. The Unborn is the worst film of 2009. Does the biting satire scathe your sensitive skin? No more than what viewing this atrocity would do. Perhaps the worst date movie of all time and the most likely to attract noisy urban monkeys, The Unborn is overall the most avoidable film of all time.

TOURIST TRAP

David Schmoeller (1979)

The last thing I need to see this Halloween season is another superlatively shitty and soulless slasher flick directed by some untalented for-hire horror hack, so naturally I was quite hesitant about watching the cult item Tourist Trap (1979) co-written and directed by David Schmoeller (Puppet Master, Catacombs), whose work Crawlspace (1986) starring Klaus Kinski I just recently watched and was so impressed with how oh so bad it was. After seeing that it was lauded in Stephen King's nonfiction work Danse Macabre (1981) and praised by various reputable horror scholars, I figured I would take the plunge and give Schmoeller's directorial debut a chance, not least of all because I am a fan of creepy and grotesque mannequins, which I first encountered as a young child while visiting a resort town museum that featured a demented looking 1920s laughing female dummy that looked like a rabid crack-addled amazonian drag queen on display. Indeed, from the human-nequins of Steven Arnold's psychedelic surrealist short The Liberation of Mannique Mechanique (1967) to the phantom-like pseudo-human beauties of Umberto Lenzi's brazenly bizarre giallo Spasmo (1974) to the oftentimes cheesy wig adorned dummies of William Lustig's Maniac (1980) starring Joe Spinell to the rotten and corpse-like mannequins of French auteur Patrick Bokanowski's experimental black-and-white avant-garde short The Woman Who Powders Herself (1972) aka La femme qui se poudre, I cannot get enough of morbid manikins. The genesis of Tourist Trap was director Schmoeller's vaguely experimental University of Texas thesis film The Spider Will Kill You (1976), which was funded by a grant from the Directors Guild of America and was an Academy Award Student Film finalist for the student Oscar that ultimately lost to future Hollywood heavyweight Robert Zemeckis' satirical short A Field of Honor (1973). The morbid story of an old blind man that lives in an old theater and falls in love with a murderous mechanical mannequin, The Spider Will Kill You is, at best, a primitive but somewhat worthwhile misbegotten example of what the director's first feature would eventually become. Featuring a score by Italian composer Pino Donaggio (Nicholas Roeg's Don't Look Now, Carrie), sound effects culled from The Time Machine (1960) and Gone with the Wind (1939), and art direction by horror master Robert A. Burns (The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, The Hills Have Eyes, Re-Animator), as well as notable acting performances from super Nordic Übermensch, MLB/NBA sports star turned actor Chuck Connors (Branded, Soylent Green), and McJewess Tanya Roberts (Charlie's Angels, The Beastmaster, That '70s Show) and cinematography by Josef von Sternberg's son Nicholas, Tourist Trap is one of those horror flicks that is done a great disservice by being labeled a slasher movie, as it manages to transcend the totally tasteless tedium of the ghetto subgenre, which probably has largely to do with the fact that executive producer Charles Band gave the director relative creative license over the film. Basically, the film is a vaguely oneiric Chuck Connors dark comedy show featuring the ex-athlete in a somewhat campy leatherface-esque role and including some cool murderous mannequins and some ok looking future starlets that do not bare their unclad bodies nearly enough (as director Schmoeller confessed in an audio commentary track from the DVD release of the film, he was too much of a pansy to get the girls to disrobe, even though it was part of the script). A PG slasher fever dream that actually manages to not suck, Tourist Trap is like the Luminous Procuress (1972) of its schlocky subgenre as a strangely atmospheric slasher flick that attempts to be serious horror art and fails wonderfully. If you ever thought the premise of the fantasy rom-com Mannequin (1987) would work better as a horror flick, Tourist Trap is certainly the film for you.

Somewhat bitchy broad Eileen (Robin Sherwood) and her boyfriend Woody (Keith McDermott) are driving in the desert when their car gets a flat tire, thus causing an annoying detour for them and their three friends, who are driving in a separate car. A true gentleman that does not waste time getting the job done, Woody immediately goes looking for a gas station, but when he finds one, it is completely abandoned. When Woody investigates the back of the vacant gas station/diner, he enters a backroom where a bunch of grotesque mannequins pop out and attack him in a vicious fashion. Needless to say, Woody is killed, albeit in a rather anticlimactic manner after he is impaled in the back with a metal pipe by some mysterious person or entity. Meanwhile, the couple's friends, Becky (Tanya Roberts), Jerry (Jon Van Ness) and Molly (Jocelyn Jones), who drove in a separate car, spot Eileen waiting in the broken down car, so they pick her up and go looking for Woody. When they spot Woody's flat tire lying near a sign for a dubious place called "Slausen's Lost Oasis," they begin heading in that direction with their jeep, not spotting the "Closed to the Public" sign on the way. Of course, as can be predicted, Jerry's jeep soon breaks down, so the three girls go skinny-dipping in a lovely nearby lake with a breathtaking little waterfall that resembles some sort of otherworldly paradise, though the viewer unfortunately does not get to see any of their naughty bits. While frolicking around like philistine fairies in the water, the girls are approached by a large old blond Nordic man carrying a double-barreled shotgun and sporting a cowboy hat named Mr. Slausen (Chuck Connors), who explains how his "Lost Oasis" is truly lost as a result of the government building a huge highway that made his tourist trap obsolete. After explaining how he used to charge $.75 cents a head for people to swim in the lake, Slausen warns the girls to get out of the water by sundown or else they might fall prey to water moccasins.

Since Jerry boy is "not much of a mechanic," rugged man's man Slausen agrees to drive him and the girls back to his home to see if they can fix the jeep. As it turns out, Slausen's home is also a wax museum where he has mechanical mannequins of General Custer and a Confederate Officer that fires blanks from a shotgun to “scare the shit out of kids and Yankee tourists” (apparently, mimes were hired to play the animated mannequins). As Slausen explains, the various dummies were created by his mysterious brother, who apparently lives in the city and works for some prestigious wax museum. Nearby the wax museum is an old plantation-like home that Slausen describes as being the home of his brother Davey who apparently did not get along with the General Custer mannequin. Before Slausen goes to help Jerry with the jeep, he warns the girls not to leave the house due to “trouble with coyotes.” After complaining “something’s funny about that man” and “something’s funny about that house, too,” Eileen opts to not take heed of Slausen’s advice and ventures outside to look for a phone at Davey’s humble abode where she discovers a family of life-like mannequins. Eventually, a faggy looking weirdo in a mannequin mask confronts Eileen, who is soon strangled to death when a scarf that she stole from one of the dummies magically tightens around her throat. As it turns out, the deranged dude in the mannequin mask has telekinetic powers. Meanwhile, pouty blonde Molly and Becky take notice of a rather life-like female mannequin in the wax museum and subsequently discover after flipping through some old photo albums that it is modeled after Slausen’s belated wife. Slausen walks in on the girls while they are talking about this and remarks that he made the mannequin in tribute to his wife because, “I loved her very much. I wanted to keep her memory alive forever. This was the best way I knew how.” Of course, little do the two dimwitted girls realize that Slausen has a much more sinister and sickening relationship with his belated spouse.

With Woody and Eileen missing and Jerry apparently somewhere in town attempting to get his jeep fixed, Molly and Becky decide to venture outside the wax museum when Slausen leaves. Of course, Becky is soon attacked by the deranged drag-queen-like dude in the mannequin mask when she enters Davey’s home. The man in the mask brings Becky to a basement dungeon where Jerry and another girl named Tina (Dawn Jeffory), who is strapped to a table, are imprisoned. As the two explain, the man in the mask is Slausen’s crazy mannequin-making brother and he soon kills Tina via suffocation while covering her face with plaster while attempting to turn her into a mannequin. After killing Tina, Slausen’s bat-shit crazy brother goes on about how his big bro makes him wear masks because he is jealous about handsome he is. When Jerry manages to get free from his bondage, Slausen soon stops him via his telekinetic powers. Meanwhile, Molly continues to walk around outside looking for her friends and is soon attacked by the mad mensch in the mask, but luckily Slausen soon picks her up in his redneck-style pickup truck. As Slausen explains to Molly, the costumed killer is his brother and he wears doll masks because, rather absurdly, “he always wanted to look like me” (why someone would wear a girl’s doll mask to resemble a large old Nordic man is anyone’s guess). When Slausen stops inside the wax museum, he gives Molly a shotgun and tells her to guard outside. Of course, Slausen's unhinged brother eventually arrives and Molly does not waste any time trying to blow him away with the shotgun, but the weapon only fires blanks. After Slausen's brother mocks Molly, she becomes considerably enraged and hits him over the head with the shotgun, thus cracking his mask and revealing that the man is really Slausen and not his brother. Molly runs off and attempts to hide in a pond, but Slausen soon emerges from the water and knocks her unconscious by forcing her head under the water.

Eventually, Jerry and Becky escape from the basement, but soon get separated. Slausen eventually finds Becky and takes her to the museum where she is killed after the telekinesis-inclined cowboy killer animates his mannequins and an Indian chief dummy chucks a dagger into the back of her seemingly empty skull. Afterwards, Slausen brings Molly to his brother's room at the Davey house, forces her to wear a mask grafted from his belated wife's face, and says, "tell me you love me." Indeed, despite looking nothing like his belated brunette wife as a young blonde, Slausen thinks that Miss Molly will make an apt replacement for his dead wifey. After Molly declares her ostensible love for Slausen, the crazed cowboy breaks down and explains that he killed both his wife and brother, stating, "they were whoring behind my back...whoring in my own house...he and she had to die...I had a legal right to that." Slausen then goes on to explain how he created a mannequin in the likeness of his wife because he still loved her and missed her so much. After Slausen's melodramatic breakdown, pansy boy Jerry shows up to save the day and Molly begs him to kill the mad mannequinophile. Unfortunately, on top of being a patent pansy who does not have the testicular fortitude to kill, Jerry does not realize that he has been 'mannequinized' by Slausen, who merely walks up to him and dismembers his body parts. After that, Slausen decides to animate all of his mannequins and does a sort of morbid yet merry 'dance of death' with his mannequin wife, who also comes alive. When Slausen is basking in the glory of his undead dummy wife and morbid mannequin family, Molly picks up an axe and drives it into the cowboy's head, thus killing him almost instantly. In the end, final girl Molly goes completely insane and drives away from "Slausen's Lost Oasis" with all of her mannequinized friends in the passenger seats.

As director David Schmoeller explained in a DVD audio commentary track for Tourist Trap, star Chuck Connors acted a lot like his character in the film in real-life by acting somewhat 'aggressively friendly', or as the filmmaker stated himself, "Chuck Connors tried to give me a hard time. Everybody knew it was my first film and so everybody just wanted to know if I could pull it off and he was always testing me. Not in a mean way, more of just having fun with me. He was 6'6"...he was very tall and he would come up behind me and look straight down and tap me on the shoulder and I'd look up and he'd say, 'you wanna fight?' and I would say 'no.' And he would laugh and go off." Of course, as anyone can tell that has ever heard Schmoeller speak, the director is a rather 'queenish' fellow with a goofy lisp, so big tough guy Connors probably could not resist playing around with him and intimidating him just a little bit. As Schmoeller also explains in the audio commentary, Connors apparently wanted to be a sort of "Boris Karloff of the 70s and 80s." For someone that had literally nil acting experience and just decided to become an actor after his sports career had stagnated, Connors is shockingly charismatic and comically-inclined and certainly gives the most memorable performance in Tourist Trap. Indeed, one must certainly respect an alpha-male who had the gall to wear quasi-drag and run around like a merry maniac. Ultimately, Connor's character is like a non-retarded cowboy leatherface meets a rampantly heterosexual Norman Bates on steroids. In its portrayal of a mad man as depicted by a veteran actor in an against-type role who kidnaps women and brings them to a weirdly whimsical world full of mannequins and props, Tourist Trap is probably best comparable to the rather bizarre little known quasi-avant-garde horror flick The Manipulator (1971) starring Mickey Rooney, who must have been rather desperate at the time to play such an unbecoming and unflattering role.

Aside from being probably the best PG-rated 'slasher' flick ever made, Schmoeller's film is also a curious piece of cinema history. Indeed, aside from the fact that the work was shot by Josef von Sternberg's son Nicholas, filmmaker Ron Underwood (Tremors, City Slickers) acted as the first assistant director, Ben-Hur (1959) director William Wyler's son David acted as the second assistant director (how many assistant directors does a low-budget slasher flick need?!), and horror auteur Ted Nicolaou (TerrorVision, Subspecies franchise) acted as the film editor. Certainly one of the most quirky, idiosyncratic, and underrated films of the dreaded schlock-ridden slasher subgenre, Tourist Trap is also unquestionably the greatest film of Schmoeller's career as a work where his softcore pansy approach to horror filmmaking came in handy and enabled the more unconventional elements of the film (e.g. animated mannequins, retired MLB players) to shine. If you ever wondered what Spanish genre hack Jaume Collet-Serra's 2005 remake of the classic Vincent Price vehicle House of Wax might be like if it did not feature cultural-tinge-inducing high dollar whore Paris Hilton and was not meant to appeal to the most fiercely philistine of tacky teenybopper turds, Schmoeller's film is probably your best bet. While Tourist Rap might not be up there with Messiah of Evil (1973) and Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973) in terms of criminally underrated American cult horror flicks, it is certainly superior to any of the other films routinely pumped out by softcore Semitic smut-peddler Charles Band/Full Moon features and, as far as slasher films are concerned, better than any of the Friday the 13th films, which probably does not say much, but it at least guarantees a more than tolerable way to waste 90 minutes during the upcoming Samhain season.

David Schmoeller (1979)

Whenever kill doll/puppet classics begin their annual name-dropping by rabid horror fans, three always come to surface and I do mean always: Child's Play, Puppet Master, and Tourist Trap. The first of the two films have everything in common, an timely merchandising period and many successful sequels. The lone wolf Tourist Trap has none of these things so what exactly makes it appeal to the general fan of tiny and plastic terrors? I honestly couldn't tell you. After much delay and finally viewing Tourist Trap, I could say that I was briefly excited after watching the trailer. A friend who I've chatted with many a-times sort of introduced me to the wonders of Chuck Connors and I dare say he didn't disappoint me in his role. Tourist Trap as a film, however, did. The trailer promised two things and it failed to deliver one and toyed around with the other; terror and killer marionettes. Saying that Tourist Trap was a horrifying experience at the age of 7 - 13 is like saying that sharks bite hard. There isn't a doubt in my mind that something with the subject matter of Tourist Trap could frighten and potentially warp the malleable minds of our youth but as a piece intended and judged by adults, Tourist Trap consists of could-be atmosphere and tension yet fails to cement any promise of both. In the beginning, one of the stranded gang wanders into a gas station and is promptly assaulted by a psychic malevolent force after being taunted by cackling half-completed mannequins. This is indeed a strong opening for a film whose reputation borders on "loved as a child!!1" to "so bad it's goodd." Much of Tourist Trap's notoriety for cult fame has been linked to it being a descendant of the long-dead Full Moon Pictures - long dead meaning quality-wise. From producer Charles Band comes a film with nothing special just like most of his later works. Full Moon Pictures has become almost a laughing stock of "indie" filmmakers. Had any of the hope for the new Puppet Master film or Demonic Toys sequel vanished, so would most of the fan base that aren't derelict Troma worshipers. That, and the hilarity of the surprising effort Gingerdead Man 2: Passion of the Cruel, save the reputation of Full Moon just enough for my faith to still lie within them to create SOMETHING amusing. Low budget horror bashing aside, Tourist Trap's only creepy aesthetic is the harmonizing female grunts and moans that escape from the past-tortured mannequins. Such a feminine ground and pounding could have been used to much more effect than in this amateur-hour straight-to-cable horror film with a reputation larger than the work put into the film's earnest keepings. This late 70s smörgåsbord of terrible backwoods deliverance from evil film doesn't make the cut. However, Tourist Trap does highlight a killer within a mask that, had given the proper treatment, could have went on to be a legendary icon of horror. With that ghastly ventriloquist mask that was made out of what could only be human flesh, "Davey" was everything that I hated about dummies, mannequins, and anything of the like. If you are looking for something to blame, my bet would be on Goosebumps' staple series "Night of the Living Dummy." Slappy may not have ever harmed anyone but he never needed to. Simply smashing a guitar to cause blame was terrifying enough for me when I was a child. Tourist Trap simply cannot capture any solid form of matter to be considered a "good" horror film. It has the pieces, just none of them fit. It's best to consider this an incomplete portrait of decent to moderately acceptable footage with a brief hint of true terror. It's a shame that this never really took off after its exhilarating introduction. I don't know about you but with this film being as so-so as it shouldn't be, a remake only could go more places than the original.

David Schmoeller (1986)

As a mensch whose father was of Polish extraction (the original family surname was 'Nakszynski') who dubiously claimed in his autobiography that he made the conscious decision to desert the Wehrmacht during the Second World War and who was one of the first Germans to visit Israel (with National Socialist era auteur Veit Harlan's ethno-masochistic son Thomas), Klaus Kinski is probably the least likely German actor to hold any sort of National Socialist sympathies, yet that has not stopped various exploitative hack filmmakers from hiring him to play Nazi mad men. Of course, with his 'blond beast' appearance, piercing blue eyes, and discernibly deranged persona, Kinski is a Hollywood hack's kosher wet dream in terms of being the ultimate archetypal screen Nazi. Perhaps the most patently pathetic example of kraut Kinski's craziness being exploited in a cheap, tasteless, and decidedly dishonest attempt to depict the innate evilness of the Nazis is the actor's unintentionally humorous performance in the absolutely horrendous horror-thriller Crawlspace (1986) directed by horror hack David Schmoeller (Catacombs, Netherworld). Probably best known today as the 'auteur' behind the cult horror classic Tourist Trap (1979) and Puppet Master (1989) where he would demonstrate the best of his meta-mediocre directing talents, Schmoeller—an archetypal left-wing for-hire horror hack who, unlike wine but certainly like many of his genre contemporaries, has only gotten worse with age—originally intended Crawlspace to be an anti-Vietnam War flick but schlockmeister producer Charles Band, who is Jewish (he even named one of his sons 'Zalman'), demanded that he change the film to feature a homicidal Heeb-hating Nazi antihero. Apparently a huge Kinski fan, Schmoeller agreed to change the film if Band could get the German actor to be in the film, which he did, and the rest was history. Of course, as Schmoeller would recollect in his would-be-humorous documentary short Please Kill Mr. Kinski (1999)—a sort of poor man's equivalent to Werner Herzog's (anti)love letter to the actor, Mein liebster Feind - Klaus Kinski (1999) aka My Best Fiend, which was somewhat suspiciously released the same year—Kinski caused so much havoc, pain, and chaos on the set of Crawlspace that one of the Italian producers proposed killing the actor and cashing in on the insurance money. When Kinski died, Schmoeller's negative remarks about him were featured in the actor's obituary, thus acting as a sort of posthumous revenge against the raving screen renegade. A rather rancid celluloid horror turd of the shockingly horrific sort, Crawlspace is a hokey and almost wholly derivative hodgepodge of horror flicks ranging from Michael Powell's masterpiece of voyeuristic horror Peeping Tom (1960) to Willard (1971) and its sequel Ben (1972) to William Lustig's classic slasher flick Maniac (1980) that is only worth viewing to see Kinski get kinky with lipstick, hordes of rats, Russian roulette, and nihilistic post-Auschwitz ramblings about life and death. Indeed, in spite of Mr. Jesus Christ Savior's disruptive behavior on the film's set, Kinski is the only thing about Crawlspace that saves it from being the cinematic equivalent of prostate cancer.

Karl Gunther (Klaus Kinski) is a crazed nihilistic kraut who has a portrait of Friedrich Nietzsche hanging in his office in a spot where a picture of Jesus Christ would normally be and whose Nazi surgeon father used to exterminate Heebs, thus it should be apparent to the Hollywood-lobotomized viewer that he epitomizes all that is truly evil and rotten in this god forsaken world (or something). Indeed, apparently after learning he liked killing people while working as part of the Nazi euthanasia program, Gunther Senior developed a fetish for waſting yids. Like all the evil genius Hitlerite wackjobs featured in Hebraic Hollywood movies that put the propaganda of the real National Socialist propaganda films to shame, Karl is independently wealthy and owns an apartment building which he has rigged with secret passageways (hence, the title 'Crawlspace'), booby traps, and nonsensical torture devices that he likes to play with when not deriving an almost erotic satisfaction from reading his naughty Nazi father's masturbatory journal entries regarding euthanasia and the killing of the chosen amongst god's chosen. At the beginning of the film, one of Gunther's beautiful blonde Aryan babe tenants accidentally walks into a room containing the good doctor's personal pet, a dyke-like chick named Martha White (Sally Brown) who's had a forced glossectomy and is confined to a cage, all courtesy of Herr Doktor, who wanted a permanent companion that would not talk back. Of course, Karl is saddened he has to kill beautiful babe, not to mention the fact that he has to go to the effort to rent out her room to somebody else. Ultimately, Gunther rents the room to a somewhat lesbo-like chick named Lori Bancroft (Talia Balsam) after lying to a rather bitchy prospective male tenant (played by the director in an uncredited cameo role) and telling him that the room is no longer available. Like virtually everyone else in the film aside from Kinski's character, Lori seems to have no personality, thus she does not elicit even the vaguest sympathy from the viewer.

Luckily for Gunther, most of his tenants are dumb sluts with either sexually impotent boy toys or old sugar daddies who are too big of candy asses to properly please their ladies. Of course, while hanging out in the various elaborate crawlspace tunnels he has strategically placed around the building, Gunther becomes accustomed to eavesdropping on his titillating tenants' less than impressive sex lives. Meanwhile, a nauseatingly nerdy and ambiguously Jewish "Nazi Hunter" type named Josef Steiner (Kenneth Robert Shippy) shows up at Gunther's building and accuses him of killing his brother. Steiner also goes on about how he is a "very tenacious" man who spent three entire years of his assumedly rather banal life looking for him and during his research he discovered that the doctor's father was a SS man that was executed for "crimes against humanity" after the Second World War. Apparently, while working as the chief resident at a hospital in Buenos Aires, Argentina, Karl killed 67 people, including Steiner's brother. Luckily, Gunther eventually kills Steiner and, like most of his victims, leaves a poorly drawn swastika on his face. An unhinged Übermensch, Gunther likes to make pseudo-Nietzschean ramblings like, "I'm fascinated by the delicate balance between life and death...good and evil" and "I'm my own god...my own jury...and my own executioner." Of course, as one can expect from such a patently predictably hack horror work, Gunther's executioner is ultimately 'empowered woman' Lori.

Featuring scenes of Klaus Kinski getting off to watching old newsreels of Uncle Adolf like it is pornography, every holocaust and Nazi 'war criminal' cliché imaginable, corpses covered with swastikas, braindead blonde Shiksa sluts, and even a Hebrew lament that is played throughout the film, especially when the Nazi murderer is contemplating the crimes of his SS war criminal father, Crawlspace would be a kosher wet dream, especially for philistine Zionist types like torture-porn hack Eli Roth, but the film is just too god damn awful to appeal to the Semitic sensibilities of Teutonophobes. Indeed, as much as I hate to even reference the site, Rotten Tomatoes has the film at an impressive 0% 'rotten' rating, thus making it probably the only holocaust-themed work with such a pathetically low rating (it should go without saying that, whether good or bad, in the shoah business world, virtually all holocaust films get at least some sort of puffery-ridden praise). Of course, that has not stopped director David Schmoeller from pretending it is a serious film, even going so far as to state of Italian composer Pino Donaggio's Hebrew lament that it was designed to, "remind the viewer of the terrible tragedy of the Holocaust." Judging from Schmoeller's surname, I assumed he was a member of the tribe, but after watching him complain about Kinski in Please Kill Mr. Kinski, I'm convinced he is just some ethno-masochistic queen of a shabbos goy who whored himself out to Semitic smut-peddler Charles Band and who gets off to trashing his racial kinsmen because he got his ass regularly kicked as kid for being an exceedingly effete pansy. Unquestionably, any entertainment value that Crawlspace features is to the credit of Herr Kinski and I do not blame him for being an intolerable egomaniac on the set as a man who has starred in some of the greatest films of the post-WWII era and thus shouldn't have to tolerate American hacks telling him what to do. If you're a big enough Kinski fan (and/or masochist) to endure Crawlspace, make sure to watch Schmoeller's micro doc Please Kill Mr. Kinski right after. As Schmoeller rightly describes in the documentary, Kinski hated directors. Ironically, the last film Kinski starred in, Kinski Paganini (1989), was also his directorial debut. While Kinski Paganini is not a masterpiece, it certainly demonstrates that Kinski was a much more talented filmmaker than Schmoeller ever was. Indeed, as much as I typically hate actors and see them as vain and vapid cattle that should be exploited by good directors, Kinski's talents transcended that of the onscreen whore, even if he was a deranged psycho whose own daughter accused him of molesting her as a child.

PUPPET MASTER

David Schmoeller (1989)

Puppet Master is a very important film for me. For one, it has captured my heart since childhood, always being readily available at our local video store, and for two, it terrified the shit out of me as a child. At an extremely young age, I recall walking into a pitch-black room only to witness Tunneler drilling through a woman's head. Full Moon's project that launched their entire company concerns a group of psychics staying at the Bodega Bay Inn due to recent activity. They then stumble up 5 devilish dolls that are guarding the secret of life. This plot works for many reasons. It takes the normal killer doll technique and throws away the huge back story of possession and focuses more on the fact that "oh shit these dolls are about to kill me" rather than "I wonder where these things come from", but just in case, both are included. Each puppet has its own very iconic traits. We have the skull-faced Blade, who with his fedora, blade and hook, and his bullet eyes, creates a very stylish terror in its own right. Pinhead, whose tiny head and huge arms recall back to Tod Browning's Freaks. Mrs. Leech who vomits leeches onto any rival. Might not seem too freaky, but be warned if you don't like creepy crawlies. Jester, the "leader" of the pack, who is merciless and cruel. Let's not forget Tunneler, the vicious vindicator who drills all competition. Using little squeaks in a first person puppet scene heightens the sense of the Napoleon syndromed dolls. The film would not be complete without Richard Band's masterful soundtrack. The main theme alone carries throughout the entire series, complementing even the horrible films. The fact that all these dolls were once Nazi's adds a certain charm to the mix. Puppet Master is the only low-budget classic horror film that has actually given me something. I return, it has spawned numerous action figure lines, comics, shirts, and many, many sequels. This with a couple others are the only few contenders in the "good" killer inanimate object genre. David Allen does the special effects for this film. Stop motion is fluid and features many amazing scenes. I guess they couldn't afford him anymore due to the lack of effort in the sequels. Andre Toulon has a family of tiny terrors. Personally, I care for each puppet, as they have a soul on screen. You want rape? How about suicide? What about ex-Nazi killer puppets? This film has everything and should be examined as not a schlock-fest, but as an important stepping-stone in horror cinema. Full Moon paved the way for independent companies EDIT: to be successful. Too Full Moon hasn't made a good film in decades.

DAVID WANTS TO FLY

David Sieveking (2010)

Despite the fact that he is the director of a couple of my favorite films, I have been disillusioned with David Lynch for quite some time now, but nothing could prepare me for the sheer and utter disappointment and even repugnance that I felt for him after watching the German documentary David Wants to Fly (2010) directed by young novice filmmaker David Sieveking (Sénégallemann, Vergiss mein nicht aka Forget Me Not). Indeed, although I know that Eraserhead (1977)—a film where the seemingly half-autistic protagonist ultimately brutally murders his mutant infant, among other things—was inspired by Lynch's unhealthy feelings about becoming a father and that he apparently laughed hysterically while directing the bizarre rape scene featuring Isabella Rossellini in Blue Velvet (1986), none of these things quite disturbed me, yet Sieveking's doc made me feel more uneasy about the filmmaker than any of the various interviews I have watched featuring serial killers, war criminals, genocidal maniacs, and guys who get their cocks chopped off (aka trannies). Ultimately, the film depicts how a decidedly dorky kraut film student, the eponymous director, becomes interested in the neo-Hindu Transcendental Meditation™ (TM) movement and its recently deceased 'guru' Maharishi Mahesh Yogi due to his flagrant fan-boy love for David Lynch, only to discover that his filmmaker hero is arguably the foremost propagandist and (anti)intellectual gatekeeper of a powerful cult that was led by a highly hypocritical charlatan who used it as a means to defile rich and famous white woman and to live a life of leisure and luxury by deceptively conning wealthy members out of their wealth by promising them silly pipe dreams like 'world peace' and supernatural powers like the ability to fly. In a somewhat parallel subplot, the doc also depicts the director's doomed love affair with a similarly dorky dame that is related to the exceedingly bitchy Hebraic second wife of Brecht. While Sieveking managed to befriend Lynch and members of the TM community during the early phase of making the film, by the time the film was complete five years later his filmmaker hero, who once blessed him and his future, was threatening to sue him and ruin his career if he released the doc, which is certainly not what one would expect from a mensch that brought the world fairly subversive films like Eraserhead and Blue Velvet. It should be noted that Maharishi first gained fame as the personal guru of popular musicians from obscenely overrated rock bands like the Beatles and the Beach Boys, but even a degenerate wife-beater like John Lennon was eventually able to realize he was a fraud and paid tribute to the brown-skinned master by writing the song "Sexy Sadie" (which was originally titled "Maharishi" until George Harrison got scared and complained) while in India about becoming disillusioned with the leader after he began making sexual advances to Mia Farrow (who seems to be a magnet for sleazy scumbags). Undoubtedly, after watching David Wants to Fly, you will unfortunately think that Lynch is a member of what might be described as a poor man's Church of Scientology, as the auteur acts like Tom Cruise's all-too-happy-go-lucky uncle, albeit somewhat creepier and minus the phony suave charm.

DAVID WANTS TO FLY

As narrated by director David Sieveking at the beginning of David Wants to Fly, the Berlin-based filmmaker has just graduated from film school but he still counts on his parents for rent money and feels pretty lost in life, somberly stating, "I wanted to make dark films like my idol, David Lynch. But I was lacking the darkness. He was my age when he completed his first masterpiece." Indeed, a fan-boy can never become as great as his master, but the young documentarian will ultimately learn that his master is a brainwashed maniac of sorts who now seems more interested in peddling masturbatory second-rate meditation techniques than directing films that challenge his talent as an artist and take him into new aesthetic realms. Sieveking is in a relationship with an aspiring novelist named Marie Pohl and she constantly bitches at her hopelessly passive beau about petty things, even complaining to him "You treat me like a hamster" simply because he lovingly asks her if she is still asleep upon waking up next to her in the morning. Although not referenced in the doc, Ms. Pohl is the daughter of actor Klaus Pohl (Otomo, Hannah Arendt) and Sanda Weigl, who appeared in a couple somewhat recent Rosa von Praunheim docs and whose father is the cousin of kraut commie playwright Bertolt Brecht's Jewish second wife Helene Weigel. Upon looking online about his filmmaker hero, Sieveking discovers that Lynch is going to be giving a talk about Transcendental Meditation and how it has inspired his creativity as an artist, so he and his girlfriend get on a plane and head to Maharishi University of Management (MUM) in Fairfield, Iowa. Notably, at the beginning of the doc, the viewer has no clue that the filmmaker is about to go on a long and strange journey where both his fan-boy worship and unwaveringly love for his girlfriend are going to be tested in a way that shatter his almost childlike faith in both the integrity of an artist and the power of love.

To Sieveking's delight, he gets to conduct a one-on-one interview with Lynch, who immediately begins spewing pseudo-esoteric TM gibberish to him like, "Were all in this suffocating rubber clown suit of negativity. And it's stinky rubber...And why do we still want to be clowns?" Clearly out of touch with the rampant ethno-masochism that many young Germans suffer from nowadays, Lynch even attempts to appeal to Sieveking's seemingly nonexistent 'German-ness' by remarking regarding practicing TM, "It's not like you dive in once and say I'm enlightened. You dive in every, regular as clockwork...regular as clockwork...it's a real German thing...and you just do it and watch things get better." Lynch also manipulatively attempts to use Sieveking's dream of becoming a famous filmmaker to sell TM to him, remarking, "For a filmmaker, you want to get the best teacher you can get...and for studying life and making life better, you want to get the best teacher you can get." Before they part ways, Lynch says to the young filmmaker, “You be a strong proponent and enjoy life and enjoy your filmmaking and you’re going to zoom forward, you’ll see. Wherever you are now, you may be fine, but you’ll just go quickly zooom.” Of course, by ‘proponent,’ Lynch probably means mindless promoter of the TM brand name. “Animated by David’s words,” Sieveking checks out the “Golden Dome” of Maharishi institute where people are hopping around to “increase creativity and intuition,” but they never quite fly, which is the ultimate goal of a so-called ‘yogic flyer.’ After watching a bunch of dorky white boys hopping with their legs crossed in a yogic position and trying but failing to do the same, Sieveking has a TM brain scan done and learns that he is “light years away from being a yogic flyer,” thus he must sink a bunch of cash into learning the basics of the TM technique.

Since he wants to be initiated into TM, Sieveking heads to Hannover, Germany and pays a kraut conman with the nonrefundable gift of “six fresh flowers, sweet fruits, a white handkerchief, and 2,380 Euros in cash” to be initiated into the movement and receive his personal mantra, which is an Indian word in Sanskrit that he can never tell anyone about which he must repeat silently for the rest of his life twice a day for twenty minutes while meditating. Apparently, the entire TM technique can be taught to anyone in about 20 minutes, yet Sieveking was forced to pay some pansy low-level guru-cum-salesman a hefty sum for such a simple lesson in dot-head style pseudo-esotericism. While finding the meditation techniques relaxing, the documentarian soon begins to have his doubts regarding the movement as a whole, narrating, “What have I gotten myself into? Is TM strictly scientific and non-religious as they claim? Yet, while meditating, these questions fade away.” Ultimately, the young filmmaker must admit to himself regarding his new pseudo-spiritual hobby, “When I meditate I feel wonderfully in tune with the worlds, but afterwards I’m still alone in my apartment.” Meanwhile, although she is in NYC, Marie begins sending Sieveking text messages reading, “stop meditating” as if she is jealous of her boyfriend’s new metaphysical hobby. Unfortunately, TM Führer Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, who has been living as somewhat of a recluse for the past couple years, drops dead before Sieveking can have the distinguished honor of meeting him, so the filmmaker decides to head to India to catch his funeral where tens of thousands of people ultimately come to pay tribute to the deceased guru. While at the funeral, Sieveking bumps into Lynch sporting a goofy white Indian robe and discovers that Maharishi left behind several billions of dollars which he has entrusted to his three nephews. When he gets back to Berlin, Sieveking happily declares his “dark days are over” and that it is “time for enlightenment” because he has finally obtained funding for his film and his girlfriend Marie is coming back from NYC, so he “want to surprise her by creating a home she will fall in love with.” While Marie acts like she is happy with the home Sieveking has lovingly crafted for her and tells him he is “sweet,” she ultimately rewards him by leaving him ten days later and heading back to NYC. From there, the young filmmaker must confront his disillusionment with both TM and his romantic relationship as they prove to be things that he cannot count on.

When Sieveking heads to Vlodrop, The Netherlands to the TM world headquarters for first annual meeting since guru's death, he begins to realize that the cult tolerates nil criticism of any sort and many of its leaders are power-hungry vipers who have used the death of Maharishi as a means to destroy comrades and take control by any means necessary. Indeed, when one of the TM leaders expresses dissent regarding the fact that Lebanese neuro-scientist Tony Nader has been named the new Maharishi, his microphone is immediately cut-off and Sieveking is forced by cult members to stop filming the event. While Sieveking is told by representatives of TM that he cannot use any of the footage he shot from the annual meeting in the Netherlands, he decides to rebel and predictably falls out of favor with the image-obsessed cult. Upon doing some research, Sieveking learns that to become a 'Raja'—a high-ranking TM global leader that acts as a representative of their respective nation—the person must make a simple 'donation' of at least one million dollars just to begin training for the distinguished position. Upon talking to Swiss leader Raja Felix, Sieveking comes to realize that TM is just selling imaginary power for an imaginary world government. Despite being one of the highest ranking leaders in the world, Raja Felix confesses that he has never personally seen any of the TM members 'fly,' which is apparently done by certain so-called 'Yogic Flyers' who have reached true 'enlightenment.' When asked if he ever saw Maharishi fly, Raja Felix proclaims that the guru was far too "humble" to act in such an ostentatious way as to demonstrate his actual powers. At this point, Sieveking must admit that TM is probably a "clever business plan" and that "some say that enlightenment is for sale."

When David Lynch comes to Germany to crown a fat kraut capitalist pig named Raja Emanuel as the TM global leader of Krautland, the cult ultimately suffers a major public relations disaster. Indeed, when Raja Emanuel declares during his acceptance speech, "I am a good German. I'm a German who wants to make Germany invincible" and someone in the audience retorts, "That's what Adolf Hitler wanted," he makes a major ass of himself by arrogantly replying, "...but unfortunately he couldn't do it because he didn't have the right technique." Of course, little does Raja Emanuel realize that a certain eccentric Greek-French woman of Greek-Italo-Anglo stock named Savitri Devi had already attempted to synthesize elements of Hinduism and National Socialism. Ultimately, Raja Emanuel is called a "charlatan" and "pathetic pig" by the audience and practically booed off the stage, so Lynch pathetically runs out and tries in vain to save the day, thus making him seem more absurd than one of the characters in his films. TM wants to build a "university on invincibility" at a post-industrial wasteland called Teufelsberg aka 'Devil's Mountain'—an artificial hill near Grunewald Forest that was built with the rubble of post-WWII Berlin, covers a never completed Nazi military-technical college (Wehrtechnische Fakultät) designed by Albert Speer, and was later used by the US National Security Agency (NSA) for spying—but Raja Emanuel and Lynch's pathetic PR stunt made sure that would never happen. As a site with a supposedly dark history involving Nazi bogeymen and American occupiers, Sieveking seems to find the idea of building a TM university at Devil's Mountain to be ridiculous and in poor taste, but personally I think it is quite fitting.

When Sieveking heads to NYC with the dual objective of seeing his girlfriend and watching Lynch give a speech in promotion of TM for young school children, he ultimately finds himself in a rather uncomfortable position that crushes what little hope he has left in regard to his future. On top of the fact that his girlfriend is seeing another guy and is thinking about breaking up with him, Sieveking also discovers that Lynch wants nothing to do with him. After pretending to be part of a Swiss film crew and sneaking into the filmmaker's fancy hotel, Sieveking is told by Lynch's fast-talking representative that he does not want to talk to him, but somehow he eventually lands an interview with Mr. Eraserhead. When Sieveking dares to ask Lynch why TM sells so many expensive 'herbal remedies' and other bogus health products, the filmmaker nonsensically replies "so beautiful" in a creepy and seemingly possessed fashion, stutters for a second as if attempting to think of a bullshit argument, and then proceeds to go on a brainwashed rant about how great it is that such a "business" exists and can offer TM supporters these dubiously priced pieces of hocus pocus. After the nightmarish interview that ultimately proves to be the last he will conduct with his hero, Sieveking's girlfriend gets exceedingly bitchy on a subway ride back and complains, "I think it's a little strange. You are harassing a celebrity for a movie you want to make because you've decided to be obsessed with David Lynch." As revealed later in the doc, Marie's bitchy rant seems to have more to do with the fact that she wants to breakup with her boyfriend than her concern with his fan-boy obsession with Lynch. After narrating, "Her love for me seems to be on holiday," Sieveking and his girlfriend embrace and mutually sob on a beach while a group of fat Americans swim in the water in what ultimately proves to be a unintentionally humorously absurd scene. At this point, the filmmaker must admit defeat and less than proudly proclaims, "After more than a year of meditation, my life is a complete disaster. My girlfriend dumped me, David wants to lynch me, and TM is threatening to sue." Of course, at least now Sieveking can completely devote himself to proving that TM is BS.

With his life in ruins, Sieveking is finally able to dive deep into the stranger-than-fiction con-artistry of TM and its almost sinister hermetic influence on certain sectors of the Western world. After visiting a school where young children are regularly brainwashed with TM and forced to religiously recite the words of the less than great Maharishi, Sieveking visits a so-called 'Maharishi Vedic City' in rural Iowa where about 260 brown Indian TM 'pundits' are housed and quasi-imprisoned behind a large fence, but he is denied entry into the community. Seeming like some sort of scam business where illegal aliens are smuggled into the United States under false circumstances, the seemingly shitty Maharishi Vedic City has a reputation for being under heavy surveillance to the point where various pundits have jumped the fence in an attempt to escape but were immediately apprehended. Upon talking to the Maharishi's ex-'skinboy'—a flagrantly faggy fellow who almost talks exactly like Kenneth Anger and ultimately wasted $100,000 of his own money on the movement—Sieveking is told regarding the guru that, "He was awful and wonderful at the same time" and "He used people and then brushed them off like flies." As demonstrated by the fact that he is depicted fetishistically touching the guru's rotten old sandals, it seems that the ex-skinboy had a sort of homosexual infatuation with Maharishi, who was certainly no homo as reflected by his reputation for using his power and influence to regularly defile beautiful white women. Indeed, Sieveking talks to a former TM manager turned Shamanic teacher named Judith Bourque who confesses that the guru seduced her and told her "don't tell anyone." When Maharishi found new white women to defile, he got tired of Bourque and she ultimately opted to leave the group. According to Bourque, Maharishi told her that if she ever was impregnated by him, she would need to marry another man immediately, thus there are probably tons of half-caste Maharishi bastards roaming around the world that have no clue that their biological father was one of the world's most monetarily successful spiritual pimps. Probably no one else is more self-admittedly pathetic in the documentary than successful Jewish publisher Earl Kaplan, who actually donated the unbelievable sum of $150 million (!) to TM after being told the money would be used to set up a colony of 10,000 Indians who would collectively bring about world peace. Of course, the world peace never came and the village the Maharishi setup was comprised of shoddy shacks with missing roofs, thus it can be assumed that he pocketed most of the money.

After Lynch threatens to sue him if he doesn't allow him to see the final cut of the film, Sieveking decides to head to the Kaplan-funded Brahmaṣṭhan of India aka 'Capital of World Peace' and instead of finding 10,000 Yogic flyers, he discovers a destitute ghost town that is inhabited by eight or so followers. While his pilgrimage to Brahmaṣṭhan is a pathetic disappointment, Sieveking ultimately finds true enlightenment upon meeting a seemingly genuine guru named Swami Swaroopanand who, like the Maharishi, studied under a teacher named Guru Devi. Of course, the business style structure of TM begins to make sense when Swami reveals that Maharishi served as Guru Dev's bookkeeper and personal secretary and that he was never given the right to assign mantras and teach meditation. As Swami states to Sieveking, "A true guru has no expectation from his disciple. He never wants anything from him. It is the disciple who offers his service to the Guru. Gurus don't sell their knowledge. They share it. Guru Dev had a sign at his place: "Donations are not allowed; you can only sacrifice your sins her.” What you have learned from Maharishi, will not bring you spiritual progress. Now you should go to Gangotri in the Himalayas to the source of the river Ganges. Try to find the meditative art of living. That’s it.” Of course, Sieveking, who did not have to pay a single penny for the insightful lesson, follows Swami’s order and takes a pilgrimage to the source of the river Ganges and on the way he befriends a mountain-dwelling monk, meditates, and bathes in icy water as if to cleanse himself of TM’s corrupting influence. In the end, Sieveking heads back to Berlin and sings a song with his (ex)girlfriend Marie, ultimately stating of their relationship, “We get along better than ever since we broke up.”

After watching David Wants to Fly, I can certainly see why Lynch demanded more money from Showtime to do the upcoming Twins Peaks reboot, as he probably needs a steady cash flow to retain his place of prominence in TM. Of course, this would also probably explain why Lynch has also released designer coffee beans and pointless TM non-books like Catching the Big Fish: Meditation, Consciousness, and Creativity (2006) that seem to be written for autistic children that cannot be bothered to read pages that are full of actual text as opposed to tiny paragraphs and contrived quotes from the Upanishads. Despite the fact that he directed all of his greatest films well over three decades ago and has not done anything worthwhile in well over a decade, Lynch knows that he has a ludicrously loyal cult following that, not unlike members of TM, will purchase anything he peddles, not matter how pointless and vapid, as he is now more of a brand name and one-man corporation than a serious artist who lives to create. With that being said, I must say that I respect David Sieveking for having the intellectual integrity and thoughtfulness to take upon the uncomfortable tasking of demystifying and somewhat effortlessly exposing a man that was his greatest hero and influence while, at the same time, still being able to acknowledge that, in the end, he, “is still a guru for me as a filmmaker.” Not surprisingly, it seems that the public relations people at TM hired a cuck filmmaker to counter David Wants to Fly, though the film in question, Beyond the Noise: My Transcendental Meditation Journey (2012) directed Dana Farley, seems somewhat hard to find.

While I felt a sense of extreme Fremdscham while watching the scenes in David Wants to Fly where Sieveking more or less admits he is a cowardly cuckold and cries like a little baby while embracing his treacherous girlfriend who has just confessed to fucking another guy, I have to respect the filmmaker for his unflattering honesty and rather refreshing lack of pretentiousness, which is quite rare nowadays. As revealed in his most recent doc Vergiss mein nicht (2012) aka Forget Me Not, Sieveking’s parents, like so many Germans of their era, were far-leftists that were involved with the 68er-Bewegung student movement who were in a ‘open relationship,’ so that might explain the filmmaker’s acceptance of cuckoldry and initial interest in buffoonery like TM, which was quite popular during the counterculture era. If Werner Herzog were a Berliner instead of a Bavarian who grew up under the rabid materialism of the post-Wirtschaftswunder era instead of the despair and destitution of the Second World War, he would have probably directed a film like David Wants to Fly. Certainly, if you watch Sieveking's doc as a double feature with Herzog's Grizzly Man (2005), it becomes quite clear that Lynch is no less delusional than Timothy 'I got eaten by my best bear friend' Treadwell. Of course, although he may be an insufferable whack-job now, no one can take away from Lynch his singular reputation as the man behind such true cinematic masterpieces as Eraserhead, The Elephant Man, Blue Velvet, Wild at Heart, and The Straight Story, among various other admirable works that demonstrate that there was at least one great American auteur that can be compared to the great European arthouse filmmakers. One can only hope that Lynch will achieve true enlightenment, ditch TM, and get back to being a serious filmmaker who lives to create, but that is probably about as likely as the cult offering broke ass documentarian Sieveking an honorary 'Raja' title. If you're a Lynchite who cannot bear to see the sort of shameless propagandist that your favorite filmmaker has become but still want to see a film that demonstrates how silly it is when Europids sport superlatively silly ancient Indian robes and figuratively (and sometimes literally) suck the cocks of crusty old brown men with goofy Apu accents, checkout the iconoclastic Dutch comedy Jezus is een Palestijn (1999) aka Jesus Is a Palestinian directed by Lodewijk Crjns and bask in the hilarity of post-WWII Occidental xenophilia and cultural cuckoldry. Additionally, Teutonic experimental weirdo Werner Nekes' film Uli-isses (1982) features a brief scene where a Maharishi-esque Hindu guru that looks like he has feces on his face is denounced a "psychic fascist" (notably, in an interview, Sieveking describes Maharishi's hypnotic influence over people being similar to that of Uncle Adolf). Ultimately, David Wants to Fly is a sometimes metaphysically painful and strangely disturbing yet oftentimes ironical and reasonably aesthetically pleasing reminder why it is important to have good taste in both women and charlatans lest you be completely abandoned and left all by your lonesome to perpetually meditate.

THE ARRIVAL

David Twohy (1996) On top of everyone's favorite Sci-Fi films are the repeated contenders - 2001: A Space Odyssey, Alien, Blade Runner, The Terminator, and The War of the Worlds. The Arrival is an ironic title, considering the lack of talk back towards this film. Word of mouth is the big media-throttler in terms of most sleeper hits. Charlie Sheen stars as a paranoid conspiracy theorist who has uncovered the best-kept secret about our environment. Before the term "green" was slapped on films discussing the benefits or controversial theories on nature, The Arrival was waiting steady with a horrifying premise that explores Outer Limits subject favorite of terraforming. Largely making sense, The Arrival settles the fear that the film could en masse by having all the Aliens disguising themselves as (Illegal) Aliens. This species design is remarkable. Reverse knee-caps and rippling brain flaps that shine with promise of Mars Attacks! Martians. The "thesis" of this film is questionable as a remake of Carpenter's media horror classic They Live. Charlie Sheen as Zane Zaminski plays a really effect character set forth in the mix with an extreme situation. Tony T. Johnson plays KiKi, The Arrival's "Short Round." This annoying black youth talks about nothing but how back in his last school, "erryone wuz strapped." The special effects were very nifty for their time. Several revealing alien scenes built tension perfectly as well as the Scorpion scene which lead to the demise of Sheen's almost-noir dame. Quite a fitting ending to such a character. I wished the same fate to the "scientific heroine" of Tremors, but it seems the sacrificed the greater character. David Twohy is a certified Science fiction film director. He brought us The Arrival, and then toned it down a notch with popcorn sizzler Pitch Black and the sequel elongating the myth of Riddick. He knows how to create a moody looming apocalyptic scenario and still entertain with A+ acting and a marvelous script. The Arrival is the best science fiction film you've never heard of, shadowed by the release of Independence Day.

CIAO! MANHATTAN

David Weisman (1973)

During German auteuress Ulrike Ottinger's Sapphic dystopian sci-fi epic Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (1984) aka Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press – a wonderful otherworldly cinematic work where an intensely intrusive international media empire creates, shapes, manipulates, and destroys a star celebrity – the lead protagonist learns via newspaper that “he” (a pomo Dorian Gray played by German model-turned-actress Veruschka von Lehndorff) has died despite that the decidedly dandy fellow is still living. Although a work of absurdist and surrealist science fiction, Ottinger's film proves that sometimes fantastic fiction is grounded in scandalous truths, especially when one considers a foreboding flick like Ciao! Manhattan (1972) directed by John Palmer (husband of Warhol superstar Ivy Nicholson) and David Weisman (Edie: Girl on Fire) and starring youthquaker princess Edie Sedgwick in a pseudo-documentary work that inevitably acts as a virtual cinematic epigraph for the tragic socialite's short, somber life in the fast-lane. Comprised of authentic audio recordings of Sedgwick's memories of the Warhol Factory and NYC and contrived clips from the original aborted script that was started in 1967, Ciao! Manhattan is essentially an interblended, bastardized cinematic work assembled from various ingredients that ultimately is more potent and penetrating than what was originally intended for the film; a discombobulated piece of drug-addled debauchery that is seemingly in stark contrast to what the perturbing project eventually evolved into. Beginning with the posthumous tribute, “Three months after the completion of filming, Edie Sedgwick, who portrays herself in the role of Susan, suddenly died at the age of 28. We dedicate this motion picture to her memory,” it is apparent right from the inception of Ciao! Manhattan that the film is not about a fictional character named “Susan” but a real-life sad little rich girl whose starvation for attention caused her to develop a marvelous persona that would eventually overwhelm and eclipse her true self, thereupon resulting in the most direful of consequences. Incessantly flaunting her unflattering breast implants (which in the movie she ascribes to “eating better” and doing her “exercises”), slurring every single sentence, and looking and ‘acting’ rather sickly for a bodacious blue-blooded 28-year-old, so much so that Edie barely resembles the charming cutesy girl in the Warhol Factory footage that is scattered throughout Ciao! Manhattan. Like a deranged and decisively doomful Russ Meyer film, minus big bona fide boobies, and with aesthetic and structural nods to Conrad Rooks' Chappaqua (1966) and the French New Wave films of Jean-Luc Godard, Ciao! Manhattan is undeniably – for better or worse – a work that is rather reflective of its zeitgeist and the ill-starred superstar it portrays.

Strung-out on speed, stardom, and self-glorification, Susan (Edie Sedgwick) is one sufficiently sad ex-superstar, not least of all due to the fact she needs to use her itty bitty teats as a means to hitch a ride back to her flaky mother's mansion. Although she barely remembers it, Susan is picked up by a Texan hippie-poser-without-pretensions named Butch (played by Wesley Hayes in his first and only film role) – a friendly yet feeble-minded fellow who delights in “drives around looking at things,” has big plans of riding shotgun in a flying-saucer, and is quite suspicious of colorful Californians due to their seemingly shifty and snide ways – while flashing her bogus bosoms late one night while hitchhiking in a most pathetic way to get back to her eccentric yet concerned mother's mansion where she literally ‘camps’ out in a carefully contrived and conspicuously childish world of dual self-worship and self-negating neuroticism. Of course, as a spoiled yet routinely abused little rich girl whose father and brothers couldn't keep their hands off her, aside from the one homosexual brother she absolutely adored who committed suicide in her room as she mentions in Ciao! Manhattan, Susan/Edie is not exactly the most stable of pretty people as proven by her routine stays in mental institutions, addiction to speed and barbiturates, and electroshock therapy sessions. In fact, despite the fact that she is topless and free as a bird or whatever, friendly philistine Butch has a hard time figuring out why he – a rampantly heterosexual and horny hippie of the virile Southwestern stripe – has no desire to bugger the former “it girl”; the gal that every American lass wanted to be and every young American male wanted to be with during the mid-1960s. Of course, Susan/Edie is the not same babe she was during her Factory days as she is clearly out of her mind and positively physically disheveled, sort of like a pretty flower that was run over by a lawnmower, which boy genius Butch even recognizes as proven by his insulting question to her, “Did you really use to look like this?” in regard to pictures from her photo-shoots with weirdo Warhol. As Susan/Edie explains quite matter-of-factly during Ciao! Manhattan, the media made a big deal when she dyed her hair blonde and got a short chic haircut, as if she was trying to be Warhol's doppelganger, which she adamantly denied. As for men in her life, Susan/Edie explains that “It's taken me a longtime to realize it but Paul is the only person I truly ever loved,” even if their mutually destructive relationship revolved around riding around Joe DiMaggio Highway on ample amounts of amphetamine. Paul being Paul America – the star of the early Factory feature-length film My Hustler (1965) – who like Edie, was used, abused, and ultimately disposed of after queen Warhol and his cronies got bored with them. Also like Edie, Paul was considered a fine-looking fool by Warhol, but being the petty and shallow opportunist that he was, used the handsome hunk for his body yet laughed at his brains behind his back in a most catty way. Braindead Butch – a childish fellow who has dreams of flying in a flying-saucer – may not be a trained psychologist, but he has enough empathy to say to himself, “poor chic, she's really wasted,” and indeed Edie is, as anyone watching Ciao! Manhattan can tell that her end is near.

Featuring an unintentionally comical collage of Edie/Susan enduring shock-

treatment juxtaposed with footage of her ill-fated wedding near the conclusion of the film, one would be generous to describe Ciao! Manhattan as an 'art-exploitation' flick of the most low-down and degrading kind, thereupon making Warhol's Poor Little Rich Girl (1965) and Outer and Inner Space (1966) seem like fun flattery pieces by way of comparison. Of course, Ciao! Manhattan is not a total trash piece as it does reveal some of Sedgwick's post-Factory insights, especially in regard to counter-culture movements, of which she states regarding a group of peaceful hippies and the 'revolution of the youth,' that, "They serve like a mockery in way of reality because they think everything is smiles and sweetness and flowers, when there is something bitter to taste. And to pretend there isn't is foolish.." Too bad Edie did not realize this until it was too late. During one of the final scenes of Ciao! Manhattan, the character Butch notices a newspaper with the headline, "Andy's Star of '65, Is Dead at 28," and merely says to himself, "how about that," in a vapid yet reasonably unsurprised manner. Needless to say, Ciao! Manhattan would have been better titled Ciao! Edie as that is what the film is essentially about, but – of course – the directors/producers obviously did not want to make the uniquely underhanded film a total bummer so as to crush a potential at an ample monetary return. Admittedly, you would probably learn more about the laconic life and tumultuous times of Edie Sedgwick by seeing Ciao! Manhattan than by watching George Hickenlooper's somewhat recent biopic Factory Girl (2006) starring Sienna Miller, but you will probably need to take a long shower after watching Palmer and Weisman's da'stardly and distinctively disturbing work of self-prophesied-death-by-way-of-celluloid.

THE LAST HORROR FILM

David Winters (1982)

Personally, I have always felt that the iconic slasher flick Maniac (1980) directed by William Lustig and starring Guido cinematic hero Joe Spinell was more darkly humorous than anything. After all, what is more funny than a wayward wop with malignant mommy issues talking to drag queen-like mannequins?! Naturally, when I discovered horror comedy The Last Horror Film (1982) aka Fanatic—a sort of pseudo-satire of Lustig's slasher flick (the film was purportedly released under the title Maniac 2: Love to Kill on VHS in West Germany) starring Maniac leads Joe Spinell and Caroline Munro—I knew it was a film I had to see and would probably rather enjoy, if only in a novelty 'junk cinema' sort of way. A pseudo-horror-film-within-a-horror-film in the spirit of Michael Powell's Peeping Tom (1960) and Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver (1976) meets John Waters' Serial Mom (1994) and Lucio Fulci's Nightmare Concert (A Cat in the Brain) (1990), The Last Horror Film is a campy quasi-horror-of-personality work about a maniac Guido taxi-driver from NYC who absurdly believes he has what it takes to be the next great auteur of horror cinema and travels all the way to the Cannes Film Festival in France to proposition a popular Screen Queen to star in his would-be-movie, but instead ends up killing a bunch of film producers and other degenerate Hollywood types and makes a cinéma vérité-like snuff flick instead (or so the viewer thinks). Rather bizarrely directed by Anglo-Jew David Winters—a dancer/dance choreographer turned film director/producer who is probably best known for directing the Alice Cooper music concert documentary Welcome to My Nightmare (1975) and the Romeo and Juliet-themed skateboard flick Thrashin' (1986) starring Josh Brolin—The Last Horror Film is certainly a charmingly trashy 1980s celluloid cheese that seems to mock the horror genre and the media hysteria surrounding it rather than paying actual tribute to the much maligned genre. Actually shot guerrilla style without permits at the 1981 Cannes Film Festival where Joe Spinell apparently blew a good portion of the film's budget on booze and other hedonistic pursuits, The Last Horror Film is essentially a cinephile's sloppy wet dream as a work that features shots of billboards from such great films as Andrzej Żuławski's Possession (1981), Ruggero Deodato's Cannibal Holocaust (1980), István Szabó's Mephisto (1981), and John Waters' Polyester (1981), among various others. Featuring star Joe Spinell bickering with his real-life mother Filomena Spagnuolo in his real-life apartment, The Last Horror Film is not only a lovingly loony tribute to the underappreciated Italian-American actor, but the closest thing to a real sequel to Maniac.

As depicted in the opening scene of The Last Horror Film, Vinny Durand (Joe Spinell) is a perversely pathetic loser who masturbates in public movie theaters to tasteless slasher flicks featuring fake blonds with fake tits being butchered by maniacs. While his friends berate him for drooling over horror movie magazines as if they are porno mags and his overbearing mother (Filomena Spagnuolo aka Mary Spinell) believes he should be happy with his undignified job as a taxi driver, Vinny is a proletarian megalomaniac with deranged dreams who rather absurdly believes he will be the next Alfred Hitchcock and he even seems willing to kidnap and kill to achieve his grandiose goals. Having gone so far as writing a screenplay, dumbass Durand firmly believes that international cult film superstar and so-called "Queen of Horror Films" Jana Bates (Caroline Munro) will be the star of his upcoming movie. Unfortunately, being a sub-literate buffoon with no real world experience (let alone experience working in Hollywood), Vinny decides simply flying to the Cannes Film Festival and stalking Ms. Bates will be his best bet. Certainly crazy but not lazy, Vinny takes his tip money from taxi driving, buys a plane ticket, and heads to the Cannes Film Festival where he discovers a virtual heaven on earth of both carnal and cinematic treasures, though the hapless would-be-filmmaker seems incapable of obtaining both. Naturally, Vinny attempts to hookup with Jana Bates, who is at the festival to promote her latest horror excursion Scream, but he is denied access to her every single time. When Vinny attempts to call Bates' manager/ex-husband Bret Bates (Glenn Jacobson) about his script, he is rudely hung up on. When Jana Bates heads to a press conference with her producer Alan Cunningham (Judd Hamilton), she receives anonymous flowers with a strange note reading, "You've made your last horror film." Not long after, Bates goes to see her manager/ex-husband Bret in his hotel room, but instead she is greeted by his bloody corpse, which later vanishes into thin air when the police arrive to investigate.

A stereotypical Hollywood Hebrew named Marty Bernstein (Devon Goldenberg) bumps into Vinny, who begs him to promote his movie, and becomes rather suspicious of the strange fellow after finding out that film director Stanley Kline (director David Winters) and his personal assistant Susan Archer (Susanne Benson) have also received strange threatening notes similar to the one Jana Bates received. Marty goes to the police about Bret Bates' dubious death, but the cops think it is merely a publicity stunt. After receiving a note purportedly from Bret Bates, Marty finds himself axed to death by an ominous figure wearing a black cloak. Of course, Stanley Kline and Susan Archer are subsequently brutally murdered as well and the mysterious killer has filmed all these deaths in a somewhat voyeuristic Peeping Tom-esque fashion. Meanwhile, Vinny begins filming his own horror movie when not acting like a maniac while dressed in drag and schizophrenically talking to his suave imaginary doppelganger. Eventually, Vinny gets the gall to sneak in Jana's hotel room with a bottle of champagne in hand, but startles the little lady while she's in the shower. Vinny asks her to play the lead role in his movie, but Jana belittles him, so the would-be-auteur smashes the champagne bottle and menacingly threatens the Scream Queen. Jana ultimately manages to escape from Vinny's wrath and seeks sanctuary in her producer Alan. Later, Vinny disguises himself as a police officer, heads to the Cannes award ceremony and manages to kidnap Jana by knocking her out with chloroform. With Jana is unconscious in the passenger seat of a rental car, Vinny heads to a castle in the French countryside to film a scene for his horror movie where he plays Dracula and the Scream Queen plays his involuntary victim. In an absurd twist, Bret Bates shows up to the castle with a gun and movie camera and reveals that he is the real killer and has merely used Vinny as the perfect dimwitted fall guy. Jealous over his ex-wife's new life as a very desirable free woman and international super star, Bret had decided to seek revenge. Luckily, Vinny manages to kill Bret in a leatherface-style fashion by beheading him with a chainsaw. In another climatic twist, it is revealed at the conclusion of The Last Horror Film that everything that happened at the Cannes Film Festival was not as it seemed and things conclude on a rather happy note with Vinny having completed and released the trashy horror film he always dreamed of. In the end, Vinny screens his directorial debut for his mother and she asks him afterward if he has, "Got a joint?," and the mother and son proceed to share a nice sized blunt.

As Maniac director William Lustig revealed in the Troma dvd release of The Last Horror Film regarding the production of the film: "He (Luke Walter) and Joe would go shoot scenes for the movie by themselves...It was not a conventionally made horror film... It was a film that was kind of an improv." Indeed, apparently The Last Horror Film was a real-life fantasy flick of sorts for Joe Spinell where he could vacation in Cannes, party with his friends, and make a movie and one certainly gets that feeling while watching the film. The Last Horror Film is by no means a great movie, let alone a masterpiece or 'thee last horror film,' but it is a fun little flick starring an actor who deserved more lead roles in films. Undoubtedly, with its murder scenes shot from the perspective of the viewer, The Last Horror Film clearly influenced the 2012 remake of Maniac directed by Franck Khalifoun and produced by Alexandre Aja. Superlatively stupid satirical schlock featuring Sicilian savage Spinell dressing in drag, talking to his more dapper doppelganger, and acting like a general boorish jackass, The Last Horror Film is certainly a work made for the fans and the fans only. Of course, in its depiction of a time when the Cannes Film Festival actually played masterpieces like Żuławski's Possession, The Last Horror Film unwittingly depicts the end of a zeitgeist when European arthouse cinema began to die and banal Hollywood blockbusters began to rape the minds of the entire world. At least with a film like The Last Horror Film, one knows the film is honest in its innate tastelessness and artlessness.

David Winters (1986)

Out of all the various obsessions I have consumed myself with throughout my life (and there are many), skateboarding was easily the activity that I had the greatest passion for. That being said, I made the effort to hunt down any movie that featured skateboarding in any form. Out of all the skateboard films I spent a lot of time and money locating (which were usually out-of-print VHS tapes before the days of easily downloading rare movies online), Thrashin' was one of the few skateboarding films worth re-watching. Not only does the 1986 film feature vintage skateboarding but it also includes hardcore punk music which used to be one of my favorite genres of music. What better adrenalin rush than trying to escape from a rival skate gang while The Circle Jerks song "Wild in the Streets" is playing as featured in Thrashin'. The other day I decided to revisit the film and I must admit after reviewing it after so many years, I felt a bit of nostalgia, quite the achievement for a bitter young man like myself. Like Penelope Spheeris's Suburbia, Thrashin' is like trashy junk food, something I like to get myself into whenever I want to kickback and not take life so serious, just like your typical American.

Vs.

Thrashin' is essentially a "Romeo and Juliet" love story mixed with elements of The Warriors, set in the 1980s Los Angeles skateboarding world. Cory Webster is the "leader" (which means he is just the best at skateboarding in his group) of the "good guy" skate gang "The Ramp LOCALS!" Essentially, the Ramp Locals look like a bunch hippies that wear neon daisy dukes and probably listen to shitty 1980s cock-rock music. The much cooler gang is the "bad guy" gang "The Daggers," a group of hardcore punk rocker skaters. The leader of the Daggers is Hook, a guy that also happens to be the brother of Chrissy, the love interest of rival gang leader Cory Webster. Hook makes no lie that his biggest priority is his persona and style. When his sister responds critically to a punk style picture of himself that he sent to his mom, Hook states quite ridiculously (and hilariously), "That wild Indian picture happens to be styling. I don't know what you're talking about." It may only be shallow fashion but most skater cliques in real-life dislike other skaters that dress differently as expressed in Thrashin'. Of course, in the 1980s skaters were less divided socially when you consider the various subcultures contained within skateboarding culture nowadays. After all, I doubt many paper-gangsta Wigger skaters existed in the 1980s but there is quite the abundance of them nowadays.

Not only does Thrashin' feature hardcore punk music but also a variety of other classic tunes from the 1980s. I must admit that I quite enjoy the girly romance song "Don't Think Twice" by Canadian singer France Joli that is played when Cory and Chrissy have their first romantic night together. Such songs bring me back to a time when I was more optimistic about love and when misogyny was not a glaring character trait of mine. I was also happy to notice whilst re-watching 'Thrashin' that a song by the underrated and revolutionary music outfit Devo is included in the film during a virginal half-pipe scene as the Ramp Locals skate their newly built ramp. For fans of the Red Hot Chili Peppers fans (I can't say I am one), 'Thrashin' also includes a musical performance by the original lineup of the group, before Israeli guitarist Hillel Slovak overdosed on heroin. Despite the cheese factor of many of the songs featured in the film, 'Thrashin' would not be half the film it is (undeniably losing a lot of the silly charm it resonates) had the creators of the film decided to merely create a generic score.

One of the greatest scenes in 'Thrashin' is a nighttime sk8 joust between rival gang leaders Corey and Hook. Jousting is surely an activity that should make a comeback in the skateboarding world. After all, with most professional (and even amateur) skaters doing tricks down 20+ stairs nowadays, jousting does not seem like such a dangerous activity. To the credit (and one of the very few credits I will give the show) of the MTV series Jackass, the jackasses on the show paid homage to 'Thrashin' with an episode featuring sk8 jousting. It has been 7+ years since I quit skateboarding but 'Thrashin' is the kind of film that makes me want to once again take another trip to the local skate park. The skating in 'Thrashin' is no doubt dated (freestyle skateboarding is even featured in the film, a style of skateboarding that is long extinct) but the film expresses the spirit of fun and camaraderie involved with skating. Of course, by the end of 'Thrashin', the fantastic and unrealistic message of "love conquers all" is emphasized but that is what one expects from a schlocky sk8 flick made in the 1980s. The closest thing to a gang that I ever was in was my old skate crew and fun was always to be had whether in the form of skateboarding or petty crime (vandalism was always entertaining). If there is a 1980s Hollywood skateboard film that captures of zeitgeist of 80s skate culture it is without fail 'Thrashin'.

WETLANDS

David Wnendt (2013)

Among the countless negative and largely Hollywood-propagated stereotypes about Germans ranging from them being born genocidal mass murderers to boorish yet humorless hotheads who don't know how to take a joke, scat fetishism seems to be one of the more unflattering perceptions that the ausländer has regarding the Teutons and the somewhat recent punk-powered German 'coming-of-age' flick Feuchtgebiete (2013) aka Wetlands directed by David Wnendt (Kleine Lichter, Combat Girls) certainly does nothing to contradict this rather unfortunate stereotype. Luckily for Germans, the film is based on a 2008 novel written by a stupid China-doll-like British TV presenter/actress named Charlotte Roche, but unfortunately for the Germans, they are the ones the lapped up the book, which was originally written in German, and made it a spectacular unexpected best-seller in the Fatherland, hence its adaptation into a feature film. The superlatively and pathologically scatological story of a less than hygienic 18 year-old bourgeois-bred punk rock tomboy with a bad case of hemorrhoids who derives fetishistic pleasure from wiping her unkempt unclad cunt on dirty public toilet seats and who is left hospitalized after slicing open her rectum while shaving in a preposterously careless fashion, Wetlands—a work that predictably takes its title from the self-lubricating feminine nether-region—is unquestionably the most overtly grotesque, intentionally and idiotically shocking, and compulsively classless film ever made about a troubled teenage girl that is attempting to find her place in this cold, dark, and unforgiving world. As demonstrated by his previous feature Kriegerin (2011) aka Combat Girls—a film from the American History X (1998) school of filmmaking in regard to its obscenely one-dimensional approach to looking at neo-Nazi skinhead subcultures—director Wnendt seems to have a dubious fondness for crude unladylike teenage chicks with ludicrously outmoded haircuts and horrible taste in men and music and in Wetlands, the filmmaker takes this fetish to ungodly extremes by putting a statuesque Nordic beauty that was given an unbecoming makeover that makes her look like she was run over by a short bus driven by a group of meth-addled Riot grrrls in the most compromised, unflattering, and oftentimes literally crap-covered of situations. Seemingly inspired by Church of Satan founder Anton Szandor LaVey's book The Satanic Witch (1971) aka The Compleat Witch, or What to Do When Virtue Fails, the angst-ridden aberrosexual anti-heroine of Wnendt's proudly wanton film keeps her eponymous genitals dirty and unwashed so that she can subconsciously seduce male (and sometimes female) prey whose cum (or what she lovingly describes as "my sex-souvenir candy") she lets dry on her hand after erotic excursions so that she can lick it off later as a sort of post-sex dessert. A curious combination of gross-out humor and dark (melo)drama that does not quite work and practically begs to be taken seriously as if such a degeneracy-driven work can be taken seriously, Wetland is ultimately like a more juvenile and autistic take on the tragicomic films of Teutonic auteur Oskar Roehler (Agnes and His Brothers, Atomised aka The Elementary Particles), albeit minus the semi-serious social commentary regarding Germany and German history. Indeed, the only thing that Wnendt lets the viewer know about contemporary Germany with his film is that the country is more of a culture toilet now than it was during the Weimar era despite the fact there is no economic depression like during the post-WWI years and that there is no way in hell the decadent bourgeoisie would ever embrace something like National Socialism again. Like an autistic kraut Amélie (2001) sodomized by a cum-crusted The 400 Blows (1959) and directed by the artistically ungifted and culturally retarded bastard progeny of Jörg Buttgereit and Lena Dunham, Wetlands is an admittedly sometimes entertaining sick joke at the expense of all of German cinema history.

Due to the fact that her hyper-neurotic mother is an OCD-ridden 'neat freak' who thinks that human pussies are the most putrid and unsavory things in the world, Wetlands protagonist Helen Memel (Swiss-German actress Carla Juri of Frauke Finsterwalder's Finsterworld (2013)) has developed an acute hatred of personal hygiene to the point where she derives complete ecstasy from rubbing her festering young cuntlet back and forth across dirty public toilet seats, with the protagonist even proudly remarking her preferred potties, "the dirtier the toilet, the better," as if she hopes to catch some hip and trendy STD, or at least vaginitis. In the self-satisfying hope of attracting prospective mates who do not mind mating with a somewhat deranged debutante with extra naughty bits, Helen tries to keep her venerable monosyllable reasonably unclean and unwashed to the point where it smells like "cottage cheese." To make sure her young yet hardly underused snatch smells rotten enough throughout the day, Helen regularly drives her fingers in her gash and then takes a lick as if she is a culinary artist testing out her latest recipe. Aside from her own prick-purse, Helen is also intrigued by other girls' prick-purses and oftentimes uses her sub-homely overweight friend Corinna (Marlen Kruse) as a sordid source of Sapphic sensual splendor. Indeed, aside from sampling Corinna's seemingly pungent cunt secretions, Helen also trades her used tampons with her friend so that the two can become so-called "blood sisters," even when the feminine hygiene product looks so soaked in sanguine fluids that they look teabags used by vampires and surely something that would give someone toxic shock syndrome (in fact, at one point in the film, Corinna gets Helen's tampon stuck in her vag and her friend has to use forceps to pull it out). Although she used to date a death metal drummer who derived sexual pleasure from her defecating on his chest, Corinna has moved up in the romance world and is now dating a dopey half-braindead drug dealer named Michael (Bernardo Arias Porras) who seems like he has been to one too many Phish concerts. As for Helen, she is more of a random erotic encounter kind of girl and prefers not knowing the name of the random guy who's dried up ejaculate she has just licked off her crusty fingers. Luckily for Helen, she will soon meet a somewhat older pansy boy that she can make her own personal bitch.

There are a number of reasons why Helen—an upper-middleclass girl that has never known poverty yet dresses like a homeless gutter punk—is so irreparably screwed up, but the most obvious source of her fetish for bodily fluids (which, aside from cum and pussy juice, also include pus, smegma, blood, menstrual blood, etc.) and virtually anything else that is foul is her emotionally invalid bat-shitty crazy mother (Meret Becker of Margarethe von Trotta's Das Versprechen (1995) aka The Promise), who arrested her daughter's emotional development when she was just a wee little girl and has made her hate her somewhat privileged class background. When Helen was just a little girl, her mother let her fall to the ground and hurt herself instead of catching her as a lesson to, "Trust no one. Not even your parents." Helen certainly took that lesson to heart as she decided to have herself sterilized as soon as she turned 18 so that there would be no way to continue her fucked family female line. As Helen makes quite clear, everyone single woman in her family going back to at least her grand-grandmother was not quite right in the head, so degenerate genetic inheritance is more or less guaranteed in her family with each subsequent generation. Notably, for her seventh birthday, Helen's mother gave her a DVD copy of Polanski's Rosemary's Baby (1968), thus reflecting her warped sense of motherhood. Indeed, Helen's unsanitary and surely self-destructive sexuality is unquestionable symbolic of her decision not to reproduce.

Not long after her little brother Toni (Ludger Bökelmann) was born when she was only 8-years-old, Helen's parents got divorced and ever since then she has attempted to find creative ways to get her parents together even though they hate one another. When Helen suffers a serious anal fissure after shaving her rectum in a rather careless fashion (indeed, while it might seem unlikely that someone like the protagonist would shave in the first place, Helen apparently developed a fetish for shaving after allowing a swarthy towel-head named 'Kanell' to ritualistically shave her snatch), she is hospitalized as an impatient in a proctological ward so she can have her bunghole repaired, so she attempts to use the opportunity as a way to get her parents together, but as the protagonist soon learns, her progenitors have much more important things to do than visit her because she has a mere self-butchered butt-hole. While in the hospital, Helen develops a crush for a blond beta-male nurse with the fitting girly name Robin (Christoph Letkowski) who does not seem to be too grossed out upon seeing the protagonist's protruding swollen asshole as demonstrated by the fact that he takes a picture of it on his cellphone. In fact, Helen finds Robin to be so cute that she masturbates under her sheet while he is rolling her back to her room on a stretcher after surgery. Since Robin is a passive beta bitch who seems close to retarded when it comes to talking to and seducing girls, Helen naturally has to initiate sexual acts with him, which she does by telling salacious stories about having lesbo sex with fat hookers, among other things. After having surgery to have her anal fissure fixed, Helen is told by the doctor that she has to go home as soon as she has her first successful bowel movement, so she pretends to not have defecated for a couple days even though she wakes up one day completely covered in her own liquid feces from head to toe. When the doctor eventually tells Helen that she has to leave, she absurdly decides to drive her newly repaired rectum into a metal post on her bed, thus causing her to sustain a serious injury that requires emergency surgery.

As Wetlands makes quite clear in a series of flashbacks, both of Helen's parents are emotionally negligent self-absorbed buffoons who lack even the most rudimentary parenting skills. While her mother is a whackjob with the nurturing skills of a speed-addicted psychopath who incessantly changes religions like someone changes their wardrobe, Helen's father (Axel Milberg of Tom Tykwer's The International (2009) and von Trotta's Hannah Arendt (2012)) is an annoyingly extroverted engineer who is more interested in his latest much younger whore girlfriend than his own daughter. Helen describes her father's proclivity towards acting like a boorish jackass as being the result of a large ego that he obtained from having both a sizable dong and bank account. As the film eventually reveals, Helen's parents got a divorce after her crazed mother tried to kill herself and little baby brother Toni by sleeping with their heads inside a gas oven, which the protagonist walked in on when she was just 8-years-old. Indeed, Helen might be one cracked cunt but her lack of sanity in sanitary matters pales in comparison to her mother's all-encompassing mental derangement. On top of trying to kill herself and her baby son, Helen's mother also does unhinged things like beat her daughter's pet rat to death by swinging against a wall in a garbage bag, as well as flash her old beaver off in front of a dozen or so dinner guests after getting mad at her husband at a dinner party. Of course, in the end, Helen's parents don't get back together again (any man that would get back with a woman who attempted to kill their child would have to be insane himself) and there is not sort of redemption for the anti-heroine, but she does get herself a new cute cuckold male nurse boyfriend.

Not surprisingly, the source novel written by Charlotte Roche that Wetlands is based on has been described as "cleverly marketed pornography" by its detractors and as "erotic literature" by its fans. While I cannot say that I have read the book and certainly never plan to, I can say that it's authoress seems like a terribly ditzzy dame who, judging by her remarks in interviews, seems to derive great pleasure from writing about what can only be described as highly personalized and fetishized toilet humor. In various old videos of Roche interviewing rock stars, she comes off as hopeless moronic and in one interview with Marilyn Manson it seems as if she would love nothing more than to dine on the would-be-antichrist-superstar's limp dick. Of course, Wetlands seems much like its source writer as an unsophisticated and mundanely morally bankrupt collection of fetishes and pathologies that would gross-out most rampantly heterosexual man and turn-on disgusting dykes and male cucks that get off to being degraded by domineering dames. Indeed, judging by her normal real-life appearance, star Carla Juri really got the ultimate anti-makeover for the film, as if director Wnendt was attempting to make her as unappealingly tomboyish as possible to appeal to a personal fetish of his own (Juri's character certainly does not resemble Roche in any way). Aside from possibly inspiring a couple stupid and impressionable teenage girls to contract an STD or two, Wetlands is ultimately a largely harmless and strangely 'cutesy' film that is not much more than the cinematic equivalent of a book on fart jokes or an early John Waters film, albeit minus the signature queer irony and with better production values. Admittedly, when I finished watching the film, I could not help but think about how banal scat humor can get after being reamed in your face for 105 minutes or so. Indeed, after the first ten minutes or so, Wetlands becomes a sort of tedious game of anti-wit where the film seems to try to incessantly one-up itself in terms of celluloid grotesquery but never quite succeeds, sort of like a junky attempting in vain to regain the majesty of their first high. Undoubtedly one of my favorite scenes in the film was a sort of (anti)homage/spoof of 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) centering around a couple ugly middle-aged pizza delivery guys involved in a circle jerk where they collectively cum on a pizza in a scenario that will certainly cause Kubrick purists to piss their panties. Undoubtedly, seeing Kubrick's reaction to such a scene would probably be more entertaining than the film itself. A sort of aberrant after school special from anti-hygienic punk princess hell, Wetlands not only proves that the German bourgeoisie is more rotten and repugnant than Fassbinder ever thought it was, but is also probably one of only a handful of films that can be used by overprotective mothers to deter their teenage sons from attempting to get into the piss-stained panties of young punk girls. If you ever wondered what kind of film Georges Bataille might have directed had he had a festering lather-maker and the mind of a perversely promiscuous teenage philistine girl who worships her own pussy juice, Wnendt's wantonly retarded wonder work might be for you.

A FIRE IN MY BELLY

David Wojnarowicz (1990)

Lately, I find myself revisiting short films more often than feature-length works. I can say without hesitation that the phantasmagorical occult sinema of Kenneth Anger has swayed most of my more recent cinematic attention. Whether it be a film or an album of music, I find myself most attracted to artistic works that lack filler material. I find that short films generally lack filler material as the filmmaker is often more careful and disciplined when it comes to directing and assembling a film that is less than 10 minutes in length. Over the past couple of years, my taste in cinema has become more refined, resulting in a stricter personal criteria for films that I find to be worthy of artistic praise. Fire in My Belly directed by David Wojnarowicz, despite being around 4 minutes in length (a 20 minute version of the film also exists), is certainly not the kind of ideal short film that I find perfectly palatable, as it lacks fluidity and hypnotic majesty; two rare cinematic attributes that I find imperative when conclusively deciding whether or not a certain flick is an authentic work of art. After reading up on director David Wojnarowicz and watching Fire in My Belly (the filmmaker's most notorious work), it is apparent to me that the postmodern polymath artist (working within many artistic mediums) never fully developed a cohesive and original cinematic/artistic voice.

In 1985, Wojnarowicz successfully sued United Methodist minister Donald Wildmon and The American Family Associate (a conservative Christian organization) for copying and distorting (protected under the New York Artists' Authorship Rights Act) his art. Although dying from AIDS-related complications in the early 1990s, Christians would later have their revenge against Wojnarowicz in 2010 by having his short Fire in My Belly removed from the National Portrait Gallery. The Catholic League and intelligent design advocate John Boehner merely complained to the National Portrait Gallery and the short was ousted. Christians demanded that Fire in My Belly should be removed from the gallery because of a vacuous scene in the short featuring ants walking over a cross. Surprisingly, Mr. Boehner was not as offended to see the gratuitous boner featured in the film. My main problem with Fire in My Belly is that it lacks originality and artistic cohesiveness; undoubtedly a pastiche mess that personifies the cultural bankruptcy of most 'postmodern' art. After watching the short, it was obvious to me that the director was especially influenced by Scorpio Rising, almost making Fire in My Belly in certain parts feel like a gross parody of Anger's sadomasochistic masterpiece. I guess David Wojnarowicz felt that by showing an erect cock for a couple seconds (the male members featured in Scorpio Rising are quickly inter-cut randomly in the film, making them seem like subliminal homo-occult messages), he was making a huge leap in artistic progress.

A FIRE IN MY BELLY

At best, Fire in My Belly is an alright way to waste 4 minutes (do not even bother watching the 20 minute version). At worst, the short is a testament to the lack of evolution in the way of cinematic artistry. You are better off watching the 1929 surrealist masterpiece Un Chien Andalou created by Luis Bunuel and Salvador Dali. After all, David Wojnarowicz seems to have lifted his interest in creepy insects and blasphemous imagery from Un Chien Andalou. It is a sad day when anti-Christian sentiment has become so trendy and hip that it manages to bore the viewer. Fire in My Belly is comparable to the 'scandalous' 1987 Piss Christ photograph (which was partially funded by the United States Government via the National Endowment for Art). To be an artist in the modern world, you do not need talent and skill, only banal iconoclasm and borderline pornography. French decadent poet Arthur Rimbaud (a major influence on David Wojnarowicz) may have been a libertine but he was also a purveyor of beauty, something that Wojnarowicz was never able to accomplish. I am not surprised that Wojnarowicz contracted a fire in his belly, as it was probably the result of consuming too many hot pieces of past art (he could never compete with) over the years. By creating A Fire in My Belly, Wojnarowicz was able to release his confused incendiary influences, creating a postmodern work of visual farts.

POOR PRETTY EDDIE

In terms of superlatively stupid, uniquely ugly, and all around aesthetically and thematically repugnant films, I cannot not think of another cinematic work I saw in recent time that left me with such a feeling of awe-inspiring disgust and intrigue than Poor Pretty Eddie (1973)—the sordid and gritty cinematic story of a supposedly sophisticated light-skinned black woman who ends up in the wrong redneck town—due to its lunatic leftist message, accidentally absurdist plot and pseudo-Southern Gothic surrealism, and needlessly nauseating nonsensicalness. Also known as Black Vengeance, The Girl in The Web, The Victim, Redneck County, Redneck County Rape, and Heartbreak Motel (a cut ‘softcore’ version with a ridiculous ‘happy ending’), Poor Pretty Eddie is one of those sleazy films that lets the viewer know there is no limit in American cinema when it comes to combining cheap titillation with childlike cultural marxist indoctrination. A work vaguely based on the Jean Genet play The Balcony (1957) and starring hagsploitation diva Shelley Winters (who also starred in the 1963 cinematic adaptation of The Balcony), singer-turned-actress Leslie Uggams (Hallelujah, Baby!, Roots TV Miniseries), Slim Pickens (Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb, Blazing Saddles), and Ted Cassidy (Lurch of the 1960s television series The Addams Family), Poor Pretty Eddie is a piss poorly made quasi-Blaxploitation/Redneckploitation flick in the risqué ripoff spirit of race-hustling Hollywood melodramas of the late-1960s/early-1970s like In the Heat of the Night (1967) and Mandingo (1975) that portray white southerners as supremely stupid sadomasochists of the Negro-fetishizing sort and blacks as all-knowing born saints and sophisticates that are inherently superior to their murderous, melanin-deprived counterparts in every way, especially when it comes to morality and sexuality. Of course, being a film that was directed by an undistinguished pornographer named Richard Robinson (Adultery for Fun & Profit, Is There Sex After Marriage) and funded by distinctly debauched Michael “The King of Pornography” Thevis—a smut-peddler, sex shop chain owner, and peep show manufacturer who was later imprisoned and made the FBI’s most-wanted list following a successful prison escape in 1978—Poor Pretty Eddie is not exactly the sort of work that was aspiring for cultivated celluloid artistry, even if the filmmakers behind it made it in an ultimately failed attempt to “go legit.” A piece of particularly peculiar and unpleasantly perverse celluloid trash of the exceedingly exploitative sort, Poor Pretty Eddie still attempts to be artsy fartsy and socio-politically chic in the “new left” fashion, yet fails miserably on both accounts due to its excessive lecherousness effortlessly canceling both of these things out, thus making for an unintentionally hilarious work of low-camp crudeness and Southern fried pseudo-surrealist kitsch that retardedly renders it an idiosyncratically odious celluloid work that manages to be half-way entertaining, even if one gets the urge to stomp in the skulls of the creators of the film while watching it.

New York born popular negress singer Liz Wetherly (real-life actor/singer Leslie Uggams) is a rather intelligent and dignified woman and her prestige and popularity has certainly gone to her horse-hair-adorned head, so out of sheer arrogance, which she will later regret, she makes the mistake of traveling through the South all by her lonesome so as to have a relaxing break from always being in the spotlight. While opening Poor Pretty Eddie with a 'soulful' rendition of "The Star-Spangled Banner" (which was filmed at an actual football game at Atlanta Stadium on November 4, 1973 in a game between the Atlanta Falcons and the Los Angeles Rams), Liz seems totally ignorant to the fact that in certain secluded areas of the dirty Deep South—an area that in many places has yet to recover from the American Civil War—does not take too kindly to colored folks, cultivated or otherwise, but some of them, especially man-whore Elvis Presley-wannabes, do have a perverse proclivity for indulging in chocolate from time to time. After her fancy expensive car breaks down when the radiator overheats in the seemingly haunted forests of some unnamed confederate land (the movie was actually filmed in Athens, Georgia), Liz walks to the nearest lodge and encounters a tastelessly charismatic aspiring musician named Eddie Collins (Michael Christian) who assures her, "Don't worry ma'am, we'll fix you right on up," and has a gentle redneck giant named Keno (Ted Cassidy)—a half-retarded handyman and quasi-slave of sorts whose bites inevitably prove to be bigger than his barks (the fellow rarely ever talks, even when seeing a woman sexually ravaged) that spends all of his free time with his canine companion—tow her car and sets her up in a hotel room. Despite his seductive confederate charm, hillbilly handsomeness and hick hospitality, pretty boy Eddie is given the cold shoulder by Liz, who seems like a lesbian, which depresses him all the more since she is a famous singer, an aspiration the rock n roll redneck also has. The 'cultural king' of his hometown who happens to have his own half-insane sugar mama named Bertha (Shelley Winters)—the matriarch of the area who also owns the local lodge—Eddie does not take kindly to Liz's arrogant airs of cultured coonish superiority, especially after falling in love with the black broad, thus the country hustler inevitably forces himself on the spade singer to the maniacal cheers of the local townspeople who fully support his unofficial miscegenation redneck rape revolution. As his obsessed mature lover Bertha states, "Eddie knows a lot about poontang, don't know nothin' about women." When Liz attempts to tell the local Sheriff Orville (Slim Pickens) about Eddie's repeated acts of racial miscegenation based rape, the officer tells her he cannot blame the boy for committing forced buggery, perversely asking her "Did Eddie bite you on the titties?" and even lays the blame on her for not leaving the town. Meanwhile, gentle giant Keno—a man whose only friends are dogs—begins to become quite agitated by Eddie's sexual pillaging of Liz and things ultimately take a turn for the worst when the rapist would-be-rock-star butchers one of the Keno's dogs and cooks it in some sort of spicy Southern stew, dog collar and all. A follower of proto-wigger Elvis Presley, Eddie will stop at nothing to commit involuntary miscegenation and even marriage with his famous African queen, but morally keen Keno has different plans. Indubitably, one of the most bizarre love triangles ever committed to celluloid, the torrid romantic tale of Ed the sped, lippy lesbo Liz, and hysterical hag Bertha reminds how really repulsive some love stories can be.

Featuring particularly prophetic quotes like, "one of these days the only thing were gonna have around here is high yellow," Poor Pretty Eddie is a pretty perturbing look at race-mixing before it become quite vogue among the lower classes as it is today. Of course, America has always had a dedication and been a foremost player in the upcoming racial apocalypse, especially considering the proliferation of Melungeon people (tri-racial individuals of European, Amerindian, and black extraction) in the South since the mid-1600s before even the inception of slavery. Interestingly, the title name protagonist of Poor Pretty Eddie has the surname "Collins," which is one of the main melungeon families in Tennessee, thus Eddie's proclivity for dark meat and forced entry might not be so strange after all. Either way, Poor Pretty Eddie portrays virtually all Southern men as dimwitted barbarians with a pathological obsession with penetrating pretty pickaninnies and portraying the sole Southern woman as a horny honkey hog who can only get sex by paying for it. With gratuitous dream sequences of cracker Eddie cracking a whip and strikingly stupid scenes of Liz's face morphing into Eddie's in a moronic moment of celluloid mongrelization, Poor Pretty Eddie is the sort of innately idiotic philistine propaganda piece nonsensically equipped with exploitation elements that makes a documentary like The Eternal Jew (1940) directed by Fritz Hippler seem like rather reasonable and objective as few other films feature such crude anti-cracker cardboard stereotypes and nonsensical Negrophilia as the sort of film that Quentin Tarantino probably uses as a regular masturbation aid. A curious Southern Gothic fairytale that is, at best, entertaining for all the wrong reasons, Poor Pretty Eddie is essentially the cinematic equivalent of eating spicy fried chicken and cornbread at a crackhead-infested, inner city Popeye's restaurant, minus the resulting unpleasant bowel movements and possibility of being raped and/or robbed. Of course, as history has proven, it was not white men who would go after black women in the future, but knuckle-dragging Negro men going after white trash women (and the occasional debauched debutante), the lowly blue collar and redneck whose ancestors the creators of Poor Pretty Eddie maliciously attack. Incidentally, Shelley Winters almost died when he private plane almost crashed upon landing when she arrived to shoot Poor Pretty Eddie, which thankfully did not happen as she gives one of the most unflattering depictions of an old slag cougar who even allows her boy toy to rape negroids just so he will stay with her and, if that is not romantic, then I don't know what is.

POOR PRETTY EDDIE

THE VOYEUR

Deborah Shames (1997)

Voyeurism can be a dangerous hobby. Those that seriously take part in this activity can find more excitement in watching than actually doing. I think that it would be safe to say that many cinemaphiles have this unfortunate problem. Italian erotica auteur Tinto Brass's The Voyeur takes one of the most bold and direct looks at voyeurism. Alfred Hitchcock's Rear Window told us that voyeurism could get us caught in the middle of a murder mystery. Tinto Brass's The Voyeur tells us that watching other people have fun can lead to a life of loneliness.

As you would expect from a Tinto Brass film, the women featured in The Voyeur are of the unique beautiful Italian variety. Whether it be the film's protagonist Dodo's wife or a scantily clad short haired nurse, these are women you can't take your eyes off of. Natural beauty is a rarity in today's "body modification" times. I have personally never found women that are "suped up" like cars to be appealing. Don't expect to see fake tits and pierced clits in The Voyeur. These ladies have large natural breasts and grown out muffs to boot. Protagonist Dodo is a French professor that has allowed his intellect to control his life. He is constantly found in "one in a lifetime" type situations and can't seem to "get in on the action." His bedridden father is more able to obtain beautiful women that catch his fancy. Later on in The Voyeur, you will find that Dodo's father is keeping a dark secret. A secret that somehow inspires Dodo to fix his Voyeur obsession so he can get back to being involved in the real thing. The Voyeur features a scene with a woman and a cigar that predates everyone's favorite internationalist president Bill Clinton's slob affair. It is clear that Bill Clinton doesn't have very good taste in women or international bankers. The exotic nurse featured in the cigar scene is one of the most powerful "voyeur" scenes that I have seen to date. Dirty old men shouldn't have the luxury of being involved in such rare encounters. Dodo's wife is a beautiful Aryan Northern Italian blond that the young professor can't seem to satisfy. Her love for Dodo is clear as it is powerfully illustrated throughout The Voyeur. Dodo even finds himself on the receiving end of a midnight film screening fellatio. As you can expect from Tinto Brass, The Voyeur is a film that finds its driving eroticism in the situation of the scene. Of course, beautiful nude women don't hurt.

Declan O'Brien (2009)

Supposing that the director himself has decided to cash in on the upcoming release of Left 4 Dead 2, Wrong Turn 3: Left for Dead will hit DVD shelves worldwide on 10/24 and leave many appreciators of the 2nd Wrong Turn, directed by Joe Lynch, wondering if this inexcusable sequel could muster any of the magic that Henry Rollins' ode to ass kicking did just some years back. To be fair, I'm mainly supporting devil's advocacy on blacklisting this infernal straight-to-video hellspawn. I didn't really give it much chance nor did it deserve such. I could have embraced Wrong Turn 3 the same way most people have and wrote a piece of writing involving one or more of these words- "fun," "entertaining," "slasher," "gory," and/or "enjoyable." Since I'm not a fool nor some fool that appreciates something with a mindless body count or a single scene of (very nice, fake) breasts, I have pulled not a single punch in loathing this film next to the unsavory The Hills Have Eyes 2 or the unforeseeable The Cell 2 and thus, my abusing begins. Wrong Turn 3 lacks a single unimaginative bone in its terrible packaging. I immediately became somewhat excited for this film after seeing the esthetically stunning teaser poster plastered above and journeyed in a vain quest to comfort myself with the idea of Joe Lynch to reprise his director's chair for a final outing. Alas, I was verily disheveled to learn of the director not being Joe Lynch but someone who directed such admonished titles as Cyclops, Rock Monster, and Monster Ark. I'm not one to judge on a skill that seems to require so much anguish and sacrifice, that being a director. But neither of these "films" look to be anything more than a cheap ticket into a hopeful contract with Dimension. Or maybe to be more predictable and down to earth; Syfy. Now, with no Henry Rollins and no Joe Lynch, the Wrong Turn series has nowhere to go but down, right? Yes. Needed more of the above. This desecration to "torture porn," slasher fare starts off with a group of college co-ed med students of some sort vacationing, camping, relaxing out in the woods. Pardon my deteriorating memory. I promise these lapses are for my own good as well as your own. Awkward dialogue is bantered back and forth until two people that couldn't possibly be "together" start to straddle each other and make conversation so amusing that it seems implausible the only high moment in the film is in the first 4 minutes. After a dorky looking guy gets straddled by one of those supermodel types, she inquires "Alex thinks I'm a slut. Do you think I'm a slut?" To which he wisely responds "Yes. But that is what I love about you!" He then begins off on a short-lived tirade on her exquisite breasts which lands an arrow through her bosom and his adulterous hand. Scene. The creative oasis of director Declan O'Brien has just ran dry and so has your capacity for real film making. Unless of course you respond "Dude....awesome."

As long as you're having fun...

Once this scene is soiled, Wrong Turn 3 pulls no stops in setting up what could be deliverable sequences only to tarnish this withering bud of a flower with CGI that one could sincerely call the work of a child. Not only are the special effects unimagined, but the whole backwoods family motif is recycled for what could be some new terrible disease upon horror films with credits going to Cube and bastardized by James Wan and his unmistakably buoyant Saw franchise. No longer are horny teens slaughtered for little or no reason with primitive weapons handled by genetically primitive creatures capable of only murder and mating, but now they cannot even safely venture the woods without fear of getting sliced into three pieces with a makeshift twin vertical guillotine trap. Hypercube seems a much more fitting environment for my precious time as of now. Once I met the two prison inmates that bicker the entirety of the film, the razors were aimed directly at my throat, skipping 3 of the 4 steps of cinematic suicide. The typical skinhead and dirty Mexican accompany most, if not all, of the screen time. While the title role is credited towards Tom Frederic. His role is cut short during the subplot of the escaped prisoners finding bags upon bags of money from a crashed armored truck. To go off subject, How do these "cannibals" have electricity? Once all is said and done, I really began to wonder what the point was to include these characters other than to buff up a script that could have managed to be three pages or less and still have been the same quality as the one presented to a mass audience. Gulp My final (worth noting) gripe with this film is the severe lack of intimidating villains. While the first and second film had at least a minor roster of titular villains, the third entry, and hopefully last, decides to keep a childish "Three fingers," as he is called, and an unidentified Elephant woman who is killed like a little bitch. The film takes an unexpected turn at this point as this group of hardened criminals find it hard to cope with surviving the onslaught of a 5'9, 151 pound inbred monster. I've read reviews calling the characters reaction during this time believable and this assumption is entirely laughable. In the perverse canon of Wrong Turn, Wrong Turn 3 detaches itself completely for what was painstakingly created by a horror fan with an expensive camera. I'm not glorifying Wrong Turn as a pivotal horror film but at least it got the backwoods retard thesis correct. Wrong Turn 3: Left for Dead is one of the worst offenders of Direct-to-DVD lore. Wrong Turn 2: Dead End will go down in history as being "fun," "gory," and "enjoyable," all at the same time, but it's sad to say that Wrong Turn 3 will only be known for wasting a pair of really nice tits in order for an awful movie to continue. Talk about sacrifice in the movie making industry.

MOTHER'S MEAT /& FREUD'S FLESH

Demetri Estdelacropolis (1985)

When I first heard about the film Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh (1984), I instantly asked myself whether or not such a film could live up to its brilliant and brassy title. Clearly, a film entitled Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh must be a work of pretentious trash, and, of course, to my pleasurable discovery, it is; minus overly conceited and painfully pedantic mental masturbation. As someone who enjoys both trash cinema and artistically refined arthouse flicks, I always feel a bit blessed when I discover a rare cinematic breed like Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh; a work of aristocratic artistic degeneracy that follows in the grand out-of-step footsteps of alpha-art-fag Andy Warhol, William S. Burroughs, Paul Morrissey, and John Waters, but stands alone perfectly fine on its own two delightfully dotty celluloid feet. Written, directed, and starring Greek-Canadian junkie Demetri Estdelacropolis at age of 22 years old as a mere student film, Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh gained minor infamy when it was the only Canadian film screened at the 1984 Berlin Film Festival, henceforth presenting the most northern North American nation in an atypically perverse light. More psychosexually disturbing, hilarious, and downright strange than any of fellow Canadian auteur David Cronenberg's films and more personally incriminating than anything ever directed by Winnipeg-Nord Guy Maddin (Tales from the Gimli Hospital, Brand Upon the Brain!) and Arabian-Canadian Karim Hussain (Subconscious Cruelty, The Beautiful Beast), Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh is a work ridiculously riddled with opaque elements of Estdelacropolis's perturbed opium-seduced psyche and peculiar personal fixations. Estdelacropolis plays the cursedly fucked up 'anti-hero' Dimira aka Lucie, a gay porn star who, with every act of male sodomy he engages in, becomes further preoccupied with his equally warped mother Esther; a stocky wretched wench that is like a cross between Edith Massey (Pink Flamingos, Desperate Living) and Shelly Winters à la Curtis Harrington's What's the Matter with Helen? (1971) and Whoever Slew Auntie Roo? (1971). It is apparent in the film that Esther is largely responsible for creating Dimira's self-destructive Jungian "shadow"; the unconscious part of the mind responsible for repressed and destructive instincts. Dimira's Anima, the unconscious feminine psychological qualities of his mind, are also partly uncovered in the film. Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh is essentially an unconventional experiment in psychoanalytic individuation as it is a work that attempts to bring light to (in the noble spirit of Lucifer) the more painful elements of the unconscious and decipher the filmmaker's 'true self'. In fact, director Demetri Estdelacropolis ends the film with the quaint, but fitting tribute "Dedicated to all of our mothers."

Demetri Estdelacropolis' Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh could also be called Oedipus Wrecked and Retarded. As a charming chap tells the ever reluctant protagonist Dimira, "shut up, just accept the fact you're a fag and hate women." As one finds out while watching Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh, this chap is Dimira's psychiatrist and he is soon trading roles and paying his porn star patient for anal physical therapy. Like Dr. Freud, the psychiatrist's theories seems to have more to do with the perversity of his own psyche than that of his patient's. Of course, Dimira has no time for women (aside from the occasional petrifying sexual encounter with a dildo-wielding porn starlet friend), as his obscenely pesky and putrid domineering mother does a spectacular job nagging him into oblivion. Any prospective viewer of Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh needs to be prepared for the fact that mother Esther brings a certain repellent (yet distinctly humorous) quality to the film that might inspire certain spectators to erupt violently during one of the many times when the horrid hag incessantly whines, "Dimira, Dimira, Dimira...." as she unabashedly dreams of bedding her homosexual son. Also, those individuals suffering from an acute case of castration anxiety might want steer totally clear of Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh as the film takes genital mutilation to generous extremes. Naturally, Dimira's man-loving sexual aberrance is explained in quasi-Freudian terms, but in a manner that is more campy than clinical. Dimira, being the son of an exceedingly egging and mind-numbingly neurotic lady lunatic who lusts after her own male progeny, is repelled by all women as he associates them all with mommy dearest. Mother Esther may not be mentally perceptive enough to believe her own son is a flaming queen who buggers boys and plays with phallic sex toys, but she does claim to know how to spot an authentic transsexual by the size of their Adam's apple. Structurally, Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh is a magnificent nonlinear mess that is comprised of eccentric slapdash scenes that mostly revolve around sexual deviancy, humorous 'soul-searching' existential isolationism, and pathetic personal crises. Despite its lack of plot, the film moves along quite fluidly and never wavers in the realm of vulgar artistic pretense, nor pseudo-intellectual banality, but it does feature a wealth of scatological imagery and themes, as well as a sordid buffet of bittersweet food-for-thought. Mother's Meat & Freud's is further accentuated by an exquisite soundtrack by the German New Wave group Trio. In both sight and sound, the film is ultimately a foremost work of avant-garde cinematic debauchery that features a number of quotable lines and ever-present replay value. Unfortunately, for whatever reason, it is nearly impossible to find a copy of Mother's Meat & Freud's on the internet, let alone in dvd form.

After completing Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh, it would take Demetri Estdelacropolis over fifteen more years to complete his second and only other feature Shirley Pimple in the John Wayne Temple of Doom (2000). As somewhat crudely explained in the Canadian documentary In the Belly of the Beast (2001), a work covering the Montreal-based Fantasia Film Festival over two years in 1997, Estdelacropolis never could 'kick the Chinaman all the way out', hence his lack of regenerative artistic productivity over the years. At the conclusion of In the Belly of the Beast, Estdelacropolis appears randomly on the deserted nighttime streets of Montreal looking like a white Rastafarian vagrant in a clear state of opium-induced stupefaction and rambles on somewhat pathetically about his films and fans. Needless to say, in the documentary, Estdelacropolis, both mind and body, barely resembles the fag chic porn star he played in his precariously honest autobiographical flick Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh. Maybe if Estdelacropolis had a lifelong trust fund like fellow homo heroin addict artist William S. Burroughs, he would have had a much more fruitful career, but alas, Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh and Shirley Pimple in the John Wayne Temple of Doom are the audacious auteur filmmaker's only cinematic offerings, yet they suffice. After all, a discordantly intimate and unceremonious film like Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh is infinitely more important to me than the entire filmography of an artistically-compromising 'for hire' Hollywood hack like Christopher Nolan. Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh is probably what Norman Bate's life would have resembled had he been a young adult in the early 1980s, given into his sexual perversity, and been deterred by a grueling drug addiction. What amazes me the most about the film is that it was made nearly thirty years ago, yet it is now artistically vivid and kooky as ever. As a child, I greatly enjoyed quirky 1980s Brat Pack/John Hughes comedies like Weird Science (1985) and Pretty in Pink (1986), but such outdated films do nothing for me nowadays as an older and much more discerning viewer. Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh most certainly fills the void of my youth as it is a stand alone achievement of truly demented, ribald, and idiosyncratic 1980s cinema. One can only hope that Estdelacropolis will get help and go on a methadone maintenance program as the now middle-aged junkie auteur probably has so many new (and much starker and discombobulated) stories to tell.

SHIRLEY PIMPLE IN THE JOHN WAYNE TEMPLE OF DOOM

After 18 years in the making, Greek-Canadian auteur Demetri Estdelacropolis finally completed his conspiracy theory-ridden anti-John Wayne/anti-action camp-masterpiece Shirley Pimple in the John Wayne Temple of Doom (2000); an innately absurdist cinematic meta-essay that was certainly worth the belated wait, even if very few people, including dedicated cinephiles of the cinematically strange, were there to take notice. It came as sort of a revelation to me that Armenian-Canadian auteur Atom Egoyan (Exotica, Chloe) acted as an associate producer for this well-nigh unknown film, but like most cinematic works by the critically acclaimed director of The Sweet Hereafter (1997), Shirley Pimple is an uncompromising piece of celluloid daredevilry that examines the more seedier side of sexuality and human motivation, but from a vehemently tragicomic camp angle that can even be appreciated by the most prudish purveyors of philistinism. Shirley Pimple resembles what Andy Milligan probably would have assembled had he spent a couple semesters in film school, relished in a week-long John Wayne movie marathon while high on marijuana, and attempted to direct a thematically/aesthetically transposed remake of John Milius' unintentionally farcical anti-Soviet action-thriller Red Dawn (1984). Set in the year nineteen hundred and thirty (give or take 30 years), Shirley Pimple is a film about an effervescent little girl on the verge of complete biological womanhood who describes herself as a, "11 year old, surreal serial killer, heroin addict, and B-movie star" with "a selective hearing process; otherwise known as deafness" that physically resembles Shirley Temple, but considers her true doppelganger to be John Wayne; the Hollywood screen legend that has been a contested symbol of indomitable masculinity amongst the American male public for over ½ a century. At 7 years old, Shirley Pimple became the lead attraction of the propaganda film factory The John Wayne Institute for the Preservation of American Ideals – a quasi-Warholian neo-fascist and ameri-centric spreader of the hokey Republican metapolitical doctrine of "John Waynism" that initially exploited and eventually enslaved the little sass by getting her addicted to Cocteau's kick – but as she grew older, the increasingly sadistic sweetheart adopted a counter-revolutionary weltanschauung and established soldierly solidarity with The Psychotic Weaklings; a group of pants-wetting, child molesters and little girls who use real live babies (described by Pimple as, "eating, shitting, sucking machines") as exploding terrorist devices. Needless to say, Shirley Pimple is probably the most conspicuously 'campy' action film ever made and the sort of ostensibly outlandish work that Troma co-dictator Lloyd Kaufman wishes he had made, but lacked the preternatural intellectual aptitude, drug-inspired discipline, and bona fide wacked-out creative obsessiveness to do so. Apparently, penned by 'Marion Morrison' (which, being John Wayne's ironically effeminate real name, is obviously a tongue-in-cheek pseudonym) and featuring many of the 'superstars' (Esther Vargas, Rick Trembles, Estdelacropolis himself, etc.) from his debut feature-length film Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh (1984), Shirley Temple is another (and his only other) auteur-piece from the delightfully deranged director Demetri Estdelacropolis; a procrastinating semi-perfectionist who clearly consumed a wealth of heroin and film history books during the nearly twenty year production of this highly cinema-reflexive and Hollywood-repellant action-packed trash epic that features everything from interminate infanticide to pornographic Uncle Sam-inspired graphic art propaganda.

Right from the beginning of Shirley Pimple, one is blitzkrieged with a charming yet schizophrenic crash course in the history of Hollywood movies. As the viewer learns early on in the film by Ms. Pimple's monotone narration, the real Shirley Temple was dethroned by puberty and John Wayne (most specifically, his performance in John Ford's 1939 film Stagecoach). Although unofficial adversaries as legendary American cultural icons, Shirley Pimple makes the reasonable (if patently offensive) argument that both stars shared the same audience composed of R&R and R&R (Republican, Retarded and Right-Wing, Reactionary). Although John Wayne was seemingly sexless in his preposterous posturing stoicism, bipolar English writer Graham Greene (during his more obscure days as a film reviewer) argued in his 1938 review of John Ford's Wee Willie Winkie (1937) starring Shirley Temple that little lead actress was a sex icon among perverted old men; a claim that would get the author sued for libel by 20th Century Fox and cause him to flee to Mexico so as to escape a prison sentence. Being a butch brat with homicidal tendencies and suffering from heroin withdraw, Shirley Pimple is hardly a sex symbol, but that does not stop her from joining up with The Psychotic Weaklings; a militant anti-Wayne revolutionary group that finds John Wayne's legacy and manhood to be quite dubious, as expressed most humbly by one its leaders' most potent political rants: "despite the fact as a war hero, a soldier's soldier, a cowboy's cowboys, John Wayne was the most repressed closet queen and panty-waisting beta-pussy of them all." Although an active Republican (though a self-described "socialist" during his college years) who influenced many young American males to fight in wars ranging from World War II (starring in 13 films during the war) to Vietnam (even starring in the 1968 film The Green Berets; the only film made in support of the war), Wayne was a draft-dodger (obtaining 3-A status, "deferred for [family] dependency reasons") who never fought in an authentic battle in his entire life with the only real-life live bullet ever shot at him being from his second wife Esperanza Baur; a mentally unstable Mexican actress (undoubtedly another unsavory biographical detail for patriotic Wayne fanatics). With the exception of the highly quotable scene from Alex Cox's cult classic Repo Man (1984) where the character Miller announces that, "John Wayne was a Fag" who "come to the door in a dress", Shirley Pimple is very possibly the only film to characterize the true reality behind Wayne's magnified and mythical legacy. In fact, aside from being the most anti-Wayne flick ever made, Shirley Pimple in the John Wayne Temple of Doom, as given clear evidence in its decisively screwy postmodern title, is a work that wages total war, maliciously mutilates, and ultimately deconstructs the moviemaking magic of Hollywood. Estdelacropolis' incorrigible anti-Hollywood ethos ultimately reaches its climax in Shirley Pimple when John Wayne in zombie-like form is liquidated via 'commie piss' in a western-style showdown scene with Shirley Pimple that perversely echoes the especially eccentric chaffed essence of the satirical suicide of ultra-nationalist true believer General Jack D. Ripper (due to his insistence that his "precious bodily fluids" were tampered with by Reds) in Stanley Kubrick's classic cold war era spoof Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb (1964).

As mentioned early on in Shirley Pimple, the real John Wayne eventually died in an undignified manner after losing a battle with cancer; the same fate his character feared in his final screen role in The Shootist (1976) directed by Don Siegel (Invasion of the Body Snatchers, Dirty Harry). Many believe that Wayne contracted cancer while ill-advisedly playing Mongol leader Genghis Khan in the critical and commercial failure The Conqueror (1956); a work filmed near a Nevada nuclear testing ground that resulted in 91 individuals of a 220 person film crew contracting various forms of the malignant neoplasm disease by 1981, thus one could argue that the Hollywood legend was ultimately a (unconscious) victim of the cold war he so gallantly promoted with his lackluster acting. Shirley Pimple may featuring tons of explosions and senseless brutality but it is as far as one can get from a John Wayne flick; portraying little girls and child molesters as the most menacing and malevolent of coldblooded of killers, henceforth boldly underscoring the strabismic romanticized view of war in classic Hollywood propaganda films, most specifically those starring "The Duke" himself. Shirley Pimple concludes in a manner comparable to Sidney Pollack's satirical "pro- and anti-war" flick Castle Keep (1969) with an extravagant 20+ minute battle between the pugnacious pedos of the Psychotic Weaklings and the wimpy Waynites at the John Wayne Temple of Doom; a militaristic building with a "Joseph Mengele Search and Destroy" wing. Undoubtedly, a much less intimate and personal work than Estdelacropolis' previous effort Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh, Shirley Pimple in the John Wayne Temple of Doom is an equally unhinged and unconventional expression of the auteur filmmaker's particularly warped yet wonderful psyche, thereupon it is a work that demands a cult following that it currently has yet to obtain. After all, the world still has a legion of individuals watching the films of Shirley Temple and John Wayne in a notably onanistic fashion.

NAKED MASSACRE
NAKED MASSACRE

Denis Héroux (1976)

The older I get, the less tolerant I am of exploitation cinema, so it takes a film with a rather bizarre and/or ugly reputation for me to even considering viewing something from that celluloid ghetto. The innately culturally and morally confused West German-Italian-French-Canadian co-production Born For Hell (1976) aka Naked Massacre aka Die Hinrichtung directed by French-Canadian quasi-pornographer/producer Denis Héroux (Virgin Lovers, Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris) was one of those rare innately idiosyncratic exploitation flicks that managed to catch my attention. An international exploitation film set in terrorism-ridden Belfast, Ireland and starring European and Canadian arthouse superstars like Mathieu Carrière (Young Törless, Egon Schiele – Exzess und Bestrafung), Eva Mattes (Stroszek, The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant), Carole Laure (Sweet Movie, Get Out Your Handkerchiefs), Myriam Boyer (Shadow of a Chance, Jonah Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000), Leonora Fani (Percy Is Killed, Nenè) and Christine Boisson (Identification of a Woman, Jenatsch), Naked Massacre is a totally tasteless horror-thriller based on the crimes of sexually confused American serial killer Richard Speck about a misogynist Vietnam vet of the decidedly deranged sort who suffers from impotence and decides to take his erotic frustration out on a house full of nubile young nurses. A curious product of a time when Canada had very liberal tax shelter laws (apparently, investors could write-off as much as 200%) for international co-productions with Europe and Israel, Naked Massacre is probably the finest and most aesthetically contemptible example of what happens when serious and singularly talented arthouse actors are degraded for the sake of a dubious investment. Part of the requirement for Canadian-European co-productions was that stars from the respective nations that funded the film would have to appear in the film, so Naked Massacre features great kraut actors like Mathieu Carrière and Eva Mattes giving unintentionally inept and sometimes hilarious performances due to poor dubbing. Of course, seeing a talent like Carrière portraying a wack-job American woman-killer also makes for a rather absurd experience. Still, with its against-type cast, gratuitous psychosexual ultra-violence, superlatively silly yet nonetheless striking setting, and innately insincere 'anti-terrorist' message, Naked Massacre makes for a welcome exception to the sort of contrived exploitation films typical of the 1970s. Mostly shot in Hamburg and Studio Bundeſtorf (Lower Saxony) in West Germany, Naked Massacre also has a beautifully bizarre atmosphere due to its various scenes shot in apocalyptic Belfast in the age of terrorism and globalization. Simultaneously anti-American yet pro-Israel (the film closes with a news report on a terrorist bombing in the unholy Holy land), Naked Massacre is essentially liberal capitalist trash meant to capitalize on human tragedy and for that reason alone makes the film have a certain crude essence that is much more palatable than the latest 'socially conscious' celluloid con from the likes of mainstream liberal horror icons like George A. Romero, Wes Craven, and Tobe Hooper.

Beginning with the conspicuously contrived introductory warning, "Harbor town in Northern Ireland, where after centuries the religious dispute flamed up again and where – like everywhere nowadays – undeclared wars, bloody terror and blind rage are the cause for pointless deaths of countless innocents. The personal fates are fictitious, merely the analysis of the offender and the acts are based on authentic events," Naked Massacre depicts a war-torn Belfast where buildings, churches, and people are being blown up around the clock in terrorist bombings and brainwashed Irish Catholic grade school children practice executing English soldiers. Morally retarded war vet Cain Adamson (Mathieu Carrière) does not know why he decided to travel to Belfast or why he decided to fight in the Vietnam War (he figures it was either to kill people and/or kill himself), but he is certainly in his element and sure of the fact that, "I only knew one hooker that was a human being...but she killed herself at 18. Nobody knows why." The dead hooker killer Cain is speaking of his sister who, among other things, he apparently had sexual relations with. A bum-like drifter without a cent to his name, Cain sleeps in homeless shelters and begs bartenders for free beer. Upon meeting a young Vietnamese refugee, Cain shows the young man a medal he won and proudly states, "See this...it means I'm a hero...I had to grease a lot of gooks to get this." After questioning Cain's sanity (the war vet proudly proclaims, "The army doctor declared me perfectly normal"), the young gook, who is no more savory than his new American friend, makes the ex-GI the following proposition regarding opening up a whorehouse, "I know a place in London... English people have very special tastes. With your accent and looks we could pick a fortune over there." Of course, Cain is more interested in blood than bucks and declines the yellow man's offer and instead decides to humiliate an over-the-hill prostitute who brags about the fact she turned her son queer after having incestuous relations with him one-too-many times. When the fat old cow of a hooker also accuses Cain of being a pansy cocksucker, he ultimately decides to take his bitter revenge against the fairer sex.

Eventually, Cain finally finds what he has been subconsciously looking for in the form of a house full of international European nurses, including a couple German gals, as well as a pregnant chick and a lipstick lesbian or two (indeed, the film features a couple cheap sub-softcore lesbo scenes). With "Born For Hell" (hence the film's alternate titles) tattooed on his arm that he brags to the nurses he paid a mere $10 bucks for at the age of 14, Cain proceeds to emotionally, physically, and sexually terrorize all the girls in various ways, starting with a chick named Amy (Carole Laure) who resembles his beloved dead sister. When Amy won't put out, Cain gets sexually frustrated and strangles her to death. An ostensible proponent of lesbianism, the mad misogynist forces one nurse to perform cunnilingus on her friend for the mere cultivated pleasure. In what is probably the most equally 'penetrating' and peculiar scene of Naked Massacre, Cain begins to act sweet to one of the surviving nurses, Catherine (Eva Mattes), but she has lost her mind and decides to commit seppuku via driving a large knife into her stomach. In the end, Cain gets away but one of the girls manages to survive that fateful night by hiding under a bed. Supposedly guilt-ridden by his crimes and fearing he might get caught, Cain decides to commit suicide (apparently, he also tried to kill himself while in the army) in a public bathroom stall, but fails and while being stitched up, the doctor notices he has the same "Born For Hell" tattoo that has been reported on the news in regard to an identifiable trait of the mystery man who committed the Belfast nurse massacre.

A mind-numbingly mean-spirited and even misanthropic work, Naked Massacre is certainly worthy of being just as revered as similar exploitation classics like The Last House on the Left (1972), Hitch-Hike (1977), I Spit on Your Grave (1978), and The House on the Edge of the Park (1980), but the film's sometimes pseudo-arthouse essence is probably too off-putting to the average philistine gorehound. It is also doubtful that auteur Denis Héroux cares about the legacy of Naked Massacre as he would go on to be given the prestigious title of 'Officer of the Order of Canada' in 1983, so a proto-torture-porn flick about the nihilistic nurse killing of a sexually warped serial killer like Richard Speck would probably not be the best thing for the filmmaker to list on his resume. Additionally, as a serious actor/director who has worked with Volker Schlöndorff, Harry Kümel, and Paul Morrissey, and who has also dedicated his life to fighting for fathers' rights, it is doubtful that lead Mathieu Carrière looks back on the film fondly. Although it probably does not say much, Naked Massacre is easily the best film ever made about Speck and a somewhat inventive take on the gynophobic killer's crimes. A film that seems like it was directed by a jaded ex-hippie anti-war protestor turned hateful capitalist smut-peddler, Naked Massacre can in no way be taken seriously as an anti-war/anti-terrorism work but instead more resembles a petty agitprop piece assembled by unsophisticated mainstream left-wingers who knows the right ass to kiss (i.e. Zionists, feminists, etc.). That being said, Naked Massacre ultimately makes for a quasi-interesting sub-cult item for proudly Eurocentric cinephiles that demonstrates how a hack director can degrade Fassbinder superstars and French divas to the point where they are virtually indiscernible from the no-name actors featured in worthless slasher franchises like the Friday the 13th and Halloween series.

PROBLEM CHILD

Dennis Dugan (1990)

Films of the past had the blissful opportunity to be taught a lesson in extremely unappropriated humor. I mean sure, we have Apatow making stoner comedies with Seth Rogen mentioning his Jewish ancestry every 20 minutes but a level of crass comedy seen in Problem Child is somewhat of a relic. A jaded doctor tells a bourgeoisie woman that she will never have children by explaining the architectural faults of her fallopian tubes by fumbling with props equating in a visual aid that one would cry over. With Problem Child, John Ritter adopts a child who poses as an angel but he is constantly described as the devil. This child is a thief, arsonist, potential murderer, and a lying little shit. Junior is a hellion at best, one that needs to be described in explicable tortures. I'm not one of a child-abusing nature but this little bastard is one of the most irritating screen characters ever produced from the bowels of comedy. On the other hand, the terrible things that he does that's transformed into comedy? That takes the masterful hand of someone who can make a film right. That brings me to the conclusion that Problem Child is a fluke in Dennis Dugan's career, having seen that he directed You Don't Mess With the Zohan! Then: Paternal terror is a genre that has been mainly dominated by demonic children and possessive ghosts. For instance, my mother cannot watch Poltergeist anymore cause of the violence and horror directed towards children. It's a trend that many adults find themselves conforming to against their own will. Once you have kids, horror's dead to you, save for a few troopers out there who allocate horror, children, and children who love horror in their entertainment diet. Consider this paragraph a shout-out to these folks. Apart from films like The Good Son, Problem Child is one that really fleshes out the ideas of children ruining the parents lives. The imperial authority that John Ritter attempts fallibly over little Junior is eventually scrapped for faulty discipline theories on love and acceptance. This leads to a boost in tantrums thrown out by Junior. Well, not exactly tantrums but a head full of revenge and very eager to dish it out amongst smarmy 7 year old girls who have their heads stuck in bullying, isolating boys with "cooties", and other childish segregation's. The perfect idea of a nuclear family is begrudgingly cast out when Ritter's wife Flo cheats on him with a serial killer in his kitchen and then ventures to elope with him. Unbeknownst to the whore figure, she's being taken for ransom. Yet another woman that cast of security and love for a bit of danger. Rest easy, she gets what she deserves in the end. Now: Problem Child is an excellent 90s comedy that has a similar approach as Beethoven but with a progressing love path near the climax in which two male figures cast out the woman in their lives for a more comforting homely environment. From excellent performances from Gilbert Gottfried and Michael Richards, Problem Child is a principle film of an era when having children say "dick" and "damn" and other words was still considered kosher. This is a comedy that doesn't appear to have gotten stale over the years and even employs a slight misogynistic ending.

YOU DON'T MESS WITH THE ZOHAN

Dennis Dugan (2008) Dennis Dugan and Adam Sandler's new stab at comedy You Don't Mess with the Zohan is not really a movie so much about the Israel/Palestine conflict as it is about the dwindling possibilities of success for both Israeli and Palestinian immigrants in America. It has a mild Zionist agenda, but make no mistake: it has a far more Jewish agenda. In many ways, it can be compared to the similarly ethnic-themed comedy Harold and Kumar Go to White Castle (and perhaps the sequel; I haven't seen it) in that it makes the point of celebrating non-European immigration and promoting anti-WASP sentiments. In some ways, You Don't Mess with the Zohan is remarkable in that it takes this theme so far as to insinuate that corporate gentile businessmen and ignorant gentile rednecks are the ones who are prolonging the hatred in the Middle-East. Whereas pro-immigration Hollywood films typically make a few references here and there to the evilness of whites, the last twenty minutes of this film leave absolutely no question as to its agenda.

Do not think, however, that there are no Zionist undertones to the film. This film is more about promoting the strength of Jewish-Americans rather than Israelis, which is understandable, but Zionism is a definite component to You Don't Mess with the Zohan. Throughout the film, references to terrorism, the Hezbollah, and the Hamas are dropped. All of the inter-ethnic aggression is the responsibility of the Palestinians. Many of the Palestinians are actually played by Jews as well. Even in the final reconciliation scene where the Israeli and Palestinian immigrants put their differences behind them, the Palestinians complain that everyone hates them. An Israeli turns to a Palestinian and says, "Everyone hates us, too." "Why?" the Palestinian asks. "Because they think we're you" the Israeli responds, and the whole crowd has a good laugh. And my stomach turns.

Israeli understanding of the Arab political and cultural climate has a history of being absolutely poor. A former CIA official has described being "appalled by the lack of quality of the [Israeli] political intelligence on the Arab world ... Their tactical military intelligence was first-rate. But they didn't know their enemy. I saw this political intelligence and it was lousy, laughably bad ... It was gossip stuff mostly" (this quote was retrieved from Mearsheimer and Walt's The Israel Lobby). This theme of ignorance is quite prevalent in You Don't Mess with the Zohan. Their ability to poke fun at Israel and its quirks is top-notch. According to Sandler himself, much research went into the character of Zohan, and neoconservative critic John Podhoretz (the son of one of the founding fathers of the neoconservative movement) praises the film's accuracy in its portrayal of the pushtak, the Israeli equivalent of the American guido. However, the understanding of the Palestinians is quite noticeably lacking. I would say that it is rather obvious as to why this is.

Perhaps a little even-handedness would go a long way. After all, since the second intifada, the ratio of Israeli to Palestinian killings has been 4:1 in favor of Palestinian deaths. Terrorism is consistently practiced by the IDF according to almost all human rights organizations and the legal definitions of international law. There is a joke about the 1967 six-day war in this film, but little is mentioned of the fact that Israel ruthlessly stole a huge chunk of land in that war's outcome that is now legally defined as occupied territory according to a 14-1 World Court decision (the only dissenting vote coming from the United States). This film does nothing to shed any light on the situation: it merely regurgitates the same media-brainwashed terrorist stereotypes about Arabs that America is exposed to on a daily basis, and worse, it relies on a purely media-concocted myth that Arab-Israeli animosity is deep-rooted and based on millennia of historical conflict as opposed to Israeli aggression in the last century. And yet it is a movie by progressive Jewish liberals. Well, the progression is not in its handling of the conflict and its pedantic and embarrassing call for peace. The "progressive" elements can be found in its reactionary finger-pointing at white conservatives.

In the last twenty minutes of the film, we learn that evil ignorant rednecks and evil shrewd businessmen have conspired together to gentrify the New York area to really screw over immigrants. Thus, the white man once again becomes the common enemy. In this way, Zohan is similar to Borat in that it implies that the war on terror is the responsibility of ignorant rednecks and that Jews are merely at a loss for why this insanity is occurring (true, most Jews have opposed the war in Iraq, but it is also true that the war was largely due to extensive lobbying from the AIPAC, the JINSA, and the PNAC – all of which are maintained by Zionist Jews). But again, the message of the movie has more to do with immigration than it does terrorism. Leftist Jews have always championed non-European immigration and were largely responsible for the reworking of immigration laws in the 1960s, and the reason is because it is very helpful to Jewish survival.

Since the Jews have always been a diaspora people by choice, the influx of many other non-White ethnic groups in America (including Arabs) results in many more diasporas, allowing Jews to look far less conspicuous by comparison. Anti-semitism has always been much consistently lower in culturally pluralistic societies. The average Jew may not know this, but the top-tier Jewish intellectuals who lobby legislation in this country have this knowledge down pat. For American WASPs, this naïve acceptance of free-flowing immigration, the active ingredient for racial strife, is what is causing America to dwindle downward and degenerate into a third-world cesspool, and more importantly, it changes the sociological climate in such a way that allows for meaningless, asinine wars such as the war on Iraq to occur without serious opposition in the first place. In the minds of those who created Don't Mess with the Zohan, American rural folk are anti-semitic, anti-Arab nut-jobs who are trying to nuke everything in sight.

Meanwhile, back in reality, most rural Americans know nothing of Judaism. To the average American, the Jew is some weird shrimpy guy with a funny voice who likes money – a legendary schoolyard fairy tale about as legitimate as the boogeyman. No rural redneck is ever going to even be able to get the Israeli inside jokes in this movie, nor will he be able to “mess with the Zohan” because he doesn’t even know what the hell “the Zohan” even is.

Adam Sandler was much funnier when he was imitating gentile philistines in slapstick-humor comedy classics like Billy Madison and Happy Gilmore. I could barely finish this film, let alone laugh.

EASY RIDER
EASY RIDER

Dennis Hopper (1969) Easy Rider is one of few American "classics." The film was part of the so-called "Hollywood Renaissance" where stupid Americans proved they could be artistic like the French(New Wave). I will give credit where credit is due. Easy Rider is as artistic as any Hollywood film could get. This is no surprise considering a young drugged Dennis Hopper directed it. The film was shot on 16mm(looks gritty even on DVD) and at points bordering a Cinéma vérité style. A good amount of Easy Rider features the two hippie drug dealers(Peter Fonda and Dennis Hopper) just riding their motorcycles across rural America. Stoner rock of this period(late 60's) is heard throughout.

Music producer/murderer Phil Spector makes an appearance as the drug "connection." Jack Nicholson also comes along for the ride as an alcoholic ACLU lawyer. He's fighting for American freedom of speech and all he gets in return is a broken skull. The majority of other actors featured in Easy Rider are easily forgettable. But there is one comical exception. "Close-minded" redneck Southerners make the ultimate bad guys. They verbally bait and the hippies do nothing. For once a Hollywood film is realistic.

Over the decades, it is no doubt that tons of dope has been smoked while viewing Easy Rider. Pointless awkward stoner talk is heard throughout the film. These scenes almost make Easy Rider effective as an anti-drug film. These flower children never even make it out of the South. Who knows what Dennis Hopper's message was with Easy Rider. His brain was probably fried from all the acid he took during the shooting.The most "experimental" part of Easy Rider is when the hippie duo and two girls drop acid in a graveyard. I didn't know whether to laugh or be disturbed by this scene. Maybe Hollywood shouldn't experiment with trying to be artsy. The acid was obviously bad. Almost as bad as the religious symbolism during the scene. Everyone knows that the best cinematic graveyard scenes are in Jim Van Bebber's Deadbeat at Dawn and My Sweet Satan. All bowl hits should be in tribute to Satan!

Unfortunately Easy Rider hasn't aged very well. Set during the time period when America started to collapse(others call it "progression"), the film is almost stomach turning. Its good to know that Easy Rider at least acknowledged the failure of hippies and their ambition for freedom. Sorry but you will more of a slave to sex, drugs, and rock n roll than any fascist government. Dennis Hopper knows this better than anyone else.The ending of Easy Rider is by far the best part of the film. Excellently executed and impacting, its what makes me decide to go back to Easy Rider every year. Dennis Hopper was uninterested in peace and love. He was more interested in taking tons of drugs and passing out next to a curb.

THE LAST MOVIE

Dennis Hopper (1971)

As biographer Peter L. Winkler wrote in his book Dennis Hopper: The Wild Ride of a Hollywood Rebel (2011): “Universal Studios gives Dennis Hopper creative control over his dream project, The Last Movie. High in the Peruvian Andes, Hopper shoots forty-eight hours of film, spends sixteen drug-fueled months editing it, and creates a career-ending bomb.” Indeed, Hopper’s second European-arthouse-inspired film following the success of his unpredictably successful directorial debut Easy Rider (1969), The Last Movie (1971), is probably the most fittingly, if not unfortunately, titled film of cinema history as a work that essentially caused him to be unofficially blacklisted from Hollywood, thus resulting in his coke-and-Cuba-libre-fueled exile that lasted for about a decade. Originally intended to be Hopper’s first feature as a sort of pet project he co-penned with screenwriter Stewart Stern (who also penned Rebel Without a Cause (1955), which Hopper had a small acting role in), The Last Movie is ultimately a singular case when an unhinged Hollywood actor had the opportunity to direct with total artistic freedom in a primitive foreign land without running water and ultimately become a sort of ‘Messianic auteur,’ with the actor-turned-director once stating regarding the importance of his cinematic crusade: “Man, the movies are coming out of a dark age. I mean, for forty years the uncreative people told the creative people what to do. But now we’re telling them, like forget those big budgets. The only thing you can make with a big budget is a big, impersonal, dishonest movie. The studio is a thing of the past, and they are very smart if they just concentrate on becoming distribution companies for independent producers. We want to make little, personal, honest movies. So we’re all taking small salaries and gambling on a cut of the gross. And we’re going to make groovy movies, man. We’re taking on more freedom and more risk. I think we’re heroes. I want to make movies about us.” And, indeed, Hopper made good on his cinematic mission because after shooting The Last Movie in a small village in Peru with $1 million dollars given to him in good faith from Universal Studios, he stole the master print of the film and headed to Taos, Texas where he worked tirelessly to edit the film while engaging in drug-addled orgies and dangerous behavior like drunken shotgun shooting, thus ultimately creating a celluloid work that was once lovingly described by effortlessly effete film critic Roger Ebert as a, “wasteland of cinematic wreckage.” Featuring disorientating Godardian jump-cuts, a deconstructed non-narrative structure, artsy close-up shots of bumblebees landing on flowers, an outstanding 25-minute wait before the title screen pops up, D. H. Lawrence-esque nods to pre-Christian American Indian paganism and creepy pagan animal masks that would anticipate The Wicker Man (1973), a less than flattering depiction of Peruvians as less-than-noble savages who haul around corpses on the back of their cars and cannot tell the difference between reality and filmic fakery and thus develop a murderous cinematic cult, pretentious 'Missing Scene' inter-titles spliced throughout the film, and an art-added approach to the classic western genre, The Last Movie may be convoluted celluloid mess, but it is an interesting and provocative mess that demonstrates that Dennis Hopper probably could have been developed into one of the greatest American auteur filmmakers of his zeitgeist had he worked in Europe instead of Hollywood.

Kansas (Dennis Hopper) is a Midwest-bred self-stylized 'counter-culture cowboy' who is in the Peruvian Andes working as a 'hired hand'/stuntman on a western film on Billy the Kid that is being directed by none other than Samuel Fuller (Shock Corridor, White Dog). Brainwashed by both counter-culture bullshit and the American dream, Kansas begins to rather enjoy living outside of civilization and becomes obsessed with the native peoples' primitive culture and customs, not to mention the fact that he is in a romantic relationship with an indigenous prostitute named Maria (Stella Garcia). Of course, despite his superficial xenophilia, Kansas dreams of getting rich by building hotels around the Andes. After hanging out at a Catholic church, Kansas befriends a Priest (Cuban-American Tomás Milián, who appeared in Visconti's segment of Boccaccio '70 (1962) and played the lead in Giulio Questi's Gothic spaghetti western Django Kill!... If You Live, Shoot! (1967)), who is rather concerned about the moral effect the movie set might have on the locals. When a dude named Dean (a possible tribute to Hopper's friend Jimmy Dean?) accidentally dies while shooting the last scene of the Billy the Kid film after falling off from a building and smashing through a roof, Kansas decides to quit the movie business and stays in Peru, as he has a superficial idealized view of the country and its 'noble savage' inhabitants. While driving around with Marie, Kansas spots some Peruvian Indians driving around with a bloody and beaten corpse tied to the back of their car and the American cowboy seems somewhat bothered by the fact that his girlfriend couldn't care less at the grizzly sight. One night while hanging with his girlfriend, Kansas is approached by the Priest, who seems rather worried about something. When Kansas asks him, "What the hell is going on down there?" in regard to a number of villagers dancing around flames, the Priest responds in broken English, "Hell...and that's violence and people are killing themselves in the streets. And movies have brought violence here and I don't like it." When Kansas goes to investigate, he finds the natives mimicking the behavior of a film crew, albeit using real violence instead of movie magic, as well as fake bamboo cameras and lights. When Kansas attempts to explain to the 'auteur' (who the Priest calls, 'The Evil One') of the Peruvian pseudo-film that the violence and deaths featured in Hollywood films are fake and simulated, he complains, "but that's not real" and demands states, "Gringo...go back to your horses." Indeed, it seems the Peruvian peasants thought the Hollywood filmmakers were performing 'miracles' by shooting men who seemed totally uninjured by their wounds, thus they have created a sort of psychotic celluloid cult, with their bamboo cameras acting as religious icons and whatnot.

As The Last Movie progresses, Kansas temporarily ignores the violent native film crew and has fun doing stuff like having sex under a waterfall with his Mestizo girlfriend in plan view, which is seen by the Priest and his altar boys. Kansas also hooks up with his eccentric schemer friend Neville Robey (Don Gordon), who is looking to find $5,000 so he can fund a gold-mining operation. While hanging out a restaurant, Kansas and Neville hook up with two rich American chicks, Mrs. Anderson (Julie Adams) and her daughter Miss Anderson (Donna Baccala), who only looks a couple years younger than her high-class tramp mother. Immediately after, Kansas and Neville attend a party hosted by Mrs. Anderson's hubby Harry Anderson (Roy Engel) with about a dozen other people. After Neville fails to scam $5000 out of no bullshit businessman Harry, the party host agrees to pay for an all-expenses paid trip to a whorehouse, but Kansas' girlfriend Marie does not want to go there as she worked there and does not want all her new rich white friends to know she is a sub-proletarian pussy-peddler. Ultimately, Harry pays two Peruvian whores to get it on lesbo style, but the exotic primitive lily-licking fun is cut short when Kansas gets in a fight with Marie's ex-pimp with a shotgun. Rather irked by the ordeal, Kansas beats up his beloved Peruvian Indian princess. The next day, Marie does not complain about the fact that she has a black eye as a result of her beau's brutality, but instead nags Kansas about her deep-seated desire to own Mrs. Anderson's fancy fur-coat, because, as she tells her bohemian boy toy, "Just because we don't have electricity and running water, it don't mean we don't like to have nice things, Gringo." Ultimately, Kansas gets Marie the fur coat, but he is forced to become Mrs. Anderson's whore as payment and performs cunnilingus on the old broad's lady-fur. Due to prostituting himself to Mrs. Anderson, Kansas also manages to get the $5000 to fund Neville's treasure hunt, but the expedition, which is not actually depicted in The Last Movie, is totally unsuccessful because, although they find gold, it is not enough to make a mining operation profitable for prospective investors. Not long after, Kansas is attacked and captured by the Peruvian 'filmmakers', who imprison him in an old school western jail cell, which previously served as a set-piece for the Hollywood western that was shot there. As the 'witch doctor/director' of the non-film tells to his fellow Peruvians while parading the American cowboy around the village, Kansas is, "The best part of the last movie. The dead man!" Indeed, from there, the rest of The Last Movie largely comprises of Kansas attempting to dodge bullets and being brutalized from the crazed coca-chewers. Of course, Kansas' girlfriend Marie also ditches him and joins the murderous festivities with her savage racial kinsmen. In a pothead flashback scene that recalls Easy Rider, Kansas and his pal Neville discuss the gold-mining operation by a bonfire and the latter mentions how he learned everything he needed to know about gold mining by watching The Trea- sure of the Sierra Madre (1948). Needless to say, in a film where a drugged-out counter-culture cowboy degenerate becomes the prime prey of hundreds of innately irrational brown men and women, The Last Movie does not conclude very happily, but as Hopper once stated in an interview, “it doesn’t matter if Kansas dies or not, it’s the film that dies.”

An aesthetically wayward and thematically nihilistic work that was produced and released by a clueless studio run by kosher capitalists who knew nothing about the art of cinema for an undeserving American audience, The Last Movie is a work that anticipates everything from Werner Herzog’s Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972) to Ruggero Deodato’s Cannibal Holocaust (1980) and totally obliterates the silly humanist myth of the ‘noble savage,’ thus making it mandatory viewing for any viewer who thought Dennis Hopper was in spiritual solidarity with the hippies when he made Easy Rider, even if he was a half-crazed counter-culture icon himself. Apparently, it was on the advice of Jewish-Chilean-French auteur Alejandro Jodorowsky that Hopper decided to scrap a more ‘conventional’ edit of The Last Movie than the one that exists today. In fact, as Jodorowsky revealed in a 2008 interview with Bright Lights Film Journal regarding his involvement with the film: “...Dennis Hopper was at one of these private shows, and he liked EL TOPO a lot. And so he invited me to come to Taos. And in Taos, he had four or six editing machines and twelve editors working. At that time, he didn’t know what to do with THE LAST MOVIE. And I saw the material, I thought it was a fantastic story. And I said, “I can help.” I was there for two days, and in two days I edited the picture. I think I made it very good. I liked it. But when he went to show it to Hollywood, they didn’t want it, because by then he was in conflict with them. Later, I think that Dennis Hopper decided that he couldn’t use my edit, because he needed to do it himself. And so he destroyed what I did, and I don’t know what he did with it later [...] I took out everything that was too much like a love story or too much Marxist politics. For me it was one of the greatest pictures I have ever seen. It was so beautiful, so different.” Despite Hopper’s cut of the film scaring the hell out of Universal Pictures, especially president Lew Wasserman, The Last Movie premiered at the Venice Film Festival where it managed to win the grand prize for best film, but that is probably because Europeans are typically more cinema literate than Americans.

A rare piece of experimental Hollywood meta-cinema where a western-within-an-arthouse-film that delightfully degenerates into a celluloid-ritual-within-a-film, The Last Movie simultaneously manages to demystify the western genre and American dream while also demonstrating the hopelessness of the peoples of the decadent and deracinated materialist west living peacefully with the innately spiritual and rooted global south (be it Peru or otherwise). Indeed, although a work that is a little bit rough around the edges and is far from immaculate, The Last Movie is something of a lost flawed masterpiece that has more aesthetic and thematic intricacy in its last 30 minutes or so than Easy Rider has in its entirety. Admittedly, I almost wanted to vomit while hearing Kris Kristofferson (in what was his debut film role) singing the lyrics, "Freedom is just another word for nothing left to lose" from his hit song 'Me and Bobby McGee' and the inclusion of John Buck Wilkin's song 'Only When It Rains' at the end of the film, which proved to be no less than an aesthetically repugnant experience, but that is the price one must pay for coked out Hopper celluloid majesty. Hopper would later play a similar, albeit more degenerate role in the Spanish quasi-giallo Bloodbath (1979) aka Las flores del vicio aka The Sky Is Falling directed by Italian-Canadian auteur Silvio Narizzano. Made at the height of the actor/auteur's cocaine-addled derangement while in exile, Bloodbath stars Hooper as a junky burnout hippie of the Burroughs-parroting over-the-hill sort named 'Gringo' (not coincidentally, the name that all the natives, including his girlfriend, in The Last Movie call him). Indeed, both The Last Movie and Bloodbath act as sort of celluloid exorcisms of the counter-culture zeitgeist and that is certainly something I can appreciate.

OUT OF THE BLUE

Dennis Hopper (1980)

Out of the Blue (1980) is an unofficial sequel of sorts to the hippie road flick Easy Rider (1969). Like Easy Rider, Out of the Blue was directed by and stars Dennis Hopper. Contemporary auteur Harmony Korine (Gummo, Julien Donkey-Boy) has stated that Out of the Blue is one of his top ten favorite films of all time. Out of the Blue Star Linda Manz would go on to play a role in Korine's directorial debut Gummo (1998). I am not lying when I say that Out of the Blue is one of the most depressing American films that I have ever seen. A film that captures the results of drug fueled idiocy and its detrimental effects on the American nuclear family. The subversive invention of "Rock N Roll" threw the teenagers of the United States into a rage of rebellion. Elvis Presley (who is described as the first "Punk" in Out of The Blue) was the first subject utilized by the evil producers in the record industry. Of course, Elvis wasn't the only subversive element utilized by the entertainment industry. Films like The Wild One starring Marlon Brando inspired American teenagers to rebel and practice criminal behavior. In Out of the Blue, an old picture of Dennis Hopper's character can be seen sporting a hat similar to the one Brando wore in The Wild One. Out of the Blue is a film that essentially blames the collapse of the American nuclear family on subversive elements that were being churned out of the entertainment industries deepest and darkest lair. The young girl (played by Linda Manz) is a dedicated punk rocker. She bangs hard on her drum set and takes no shit from anyone. Her mother is a heroin addict who has screwed every man in town. The girl's father was put in jail for crashing a giant freight truck into a school bus full of elementary school children while he was drunk. The young girl knows she's on her own and even goes on her own trip. A trip that results in drug use, seeing her favorite local punk band, and driving around a bunch of groupies that are flashing their tits. Throughout Out of the Blue, Neil Young's haunting song My My, Hey Hey (Out of the Blue) is heard. The song is also a tribute to Elvis and Punk Rock. The song perfectly compliments the overall dramatic and tragic tone of the film. The young girl lets everyone know she is a fan of the pathetic yet charismatic Sid Vicious of the Sex Pistols. During the "explosive" conclusion of Out of the Blue, the young girl's obsession with Mr. Vicious becomes apparent. Nirvana front man Kurt Cobain also decided "it's better to burnout than fade away" as noted on his suicide note. Out of the Blue shows the decades later result of many of the hippie types that were featured in Easy Rider. No one is going to be a success (or even functioning) when they live the life of a drug addict. Dennis Hopper's character in Out of the Blue is a drug addict child killer who decides he wants to offer his daughters virginity to his drinking buddy. An individual so pathetic that death is the only option for ending his miserable existence. Unsurprisingly, Dennis Hopper seems very suiting for the role as his track record has proven over the years. The entertainment industry's subversive attacks on America is not something new and unknown. One thing that the media neglects to mention is the horrible effects "rock and roll" has had on rural America. City fags weren't the only ones to be introduced to the pathetic world of drug addiction. People in rural areas watched the same TV shows and heard the same songs on the radio. I wouldn't be surprised if the producers of the entertainment industry are related to the people pushing drugs in rural America. Dennis Hopper taking a chug from the bottle in Out of the Blue is an unrecognized masterpiece and one of the most important American films ever. Linda Manz and Dennis Hopper give extraordinary performances as realistic (sadly) people. Individuals that you might expect to know if you live in a rural area. The entertainment industry and media is mockingly hateful of people from rural areas for a reason. They condemn that which they destroy.

EQUINOX

Dennis Muren (1970)

Long before I became a pretentious twat and discovered the wonders of European arthouse cinema and the internet made extremely rare films fairly accessible, I could never really predict a great cinematic experience as most of the films I watched were random works that I would catch on cable TV by happenstance during some late ungodly hour when most kids my age were asleep dreaming about touching their teacher's boobs. Admittedly, due to the rather intimate and revelatory nature of some of these late night viewings, I could almost liken them to religious experiences as they completely changed the way I looked at cinema, especially of the horror oriented sort, which was a genre that no one aside from myself seemed to be so obsessed, thereupon giving me all the more delusional impression that I was in my own little hermetic world that only I, and no one else, had access to. Undoubtedly, one of the things that made these experiences even more mystifying was that I would often miss the beginning of these films and never learn the title of these movies, so it would oftentimes be many years before I actually discovered the name of these works so that I could watch them again and recommend them to people. One of the films that certainly had a deep impact on me was Don Coscarelli's Phantasm (1979), which I credit as for priming me at a young age to later appreciate surrealist cinema ranging from classic European arthouse works like Fellini Satyricon (1969) to the aberrant exploitation of Russian auteur Andrey Iskanov (Visions of Suffering, Philosophy of a Knife). Out of all these films, the one took me the longest to discover the title of was the cult horror flick Equinox (1970), which I saw when I was about 10 or 11 but did not learn the name of the film until I was in my 20s when it was somewhat shockingly released as a lavish 2-disc DVD set by the Criterion Collection in 2006.

Arguably the greatest and most epic home-movie ever made, the film was created by a small group of complete amateurs, including future famous Hollywood special effects man Dennis Muren (Star Wars, Terminator 2: Judgment Day), for a mere $6,500 in 1967 and released under the title The Equinox...A Journey Into The Supernatural, only to be picked up by B-movie producer Jack H. Harris (The Blob, Dark Star) in 1970 and go under a sort of 'Hollywoodization' process involving the shooting of new scenes by writer-director Jack Woods, adding of a new villain, and extensive reediting, among other things that somewhat changed the emotional impact of the film. Admittedly, when I re-watched the film for the first time in over a decade in 2006 and then again a couple years after that, it did not nearly have as big of an effect on me as it did when I first saw it as a highly impressionable kid with an unhealthy addiction to all-things-horror, which caused me to speculate that I might have actually seen the 1967 cut before, thus leading to recent my decision to watch that version. While I ultimately discovered the 1970 version was indeed the same film I saw as a kid, I also discovered that I, like a number of fans of the film, actually preferred the original amateur cut as opposed to Harris' curious edit, so my efforts were luckily not in vain. A work with flagrant Lovecraftian overtones, including an evil Necronomicon-like book and a notable performance by 'Cthulhu Mythos' writer Fritz Leiber as a scientist/teacher who dooms himself and some of his students to hell upon doing dubious research in the black arts, Equinox also makes for mandatory viewing for any vaguely serious horror fan in that it is the virtual blueprint for Sam Raimi's classic flick The Evil Dead (1981) as a stop-motion-animation-driven celluloid nightmare about a couple young students who unwittingly find themselves being chased and murdered by pernicious demonic beings upon get their hands on an ancient manuscript that belonged to a dead civilization that found the portal between earth and hell.

It should be noted that my review is mainly going to cover the original 1967 version The Equinox...A Journey Into The Supernatural, which I also found to be at least somewhat more eerie and foreboding due to its unwavering rawness, as if it is an authentic document of four teenagers' rather eventful summer vacation in hell. Aside from being about 15 minutes longer and featuring a somewhat revamped opening title sequence, the 1970 version is notable for the inclusion of a demonic park ranger named 'Asmodeus' that was played by the film's main director Jack Woods (special effects man/producer Dennis Muren and co-writer Mark Thomas McGee are also considered uncredited co-directors). While I found Asmodeus—a character's whose name was apparently taken from a sort of devil/demon-king in some deuterocanonical literature, including the Book of Tobit of the Catholic and Orthodox biblical canon—somewhat intriguing when I originally saw the 1970 cut, I realize now that he was just added to the film to give it a sort of sleazy exploitation vibe, which is especially apparent in a scene where he hypnotizes and more or less rapes one of the female characters. Obviously heavily influenced by French-born auteur Jacques Tourneur's UK cult classic Curse of the Demon (1957) aka Night of the Demon and the singular stop-motion animation special effects of Ray Harryhausen (who, along with George Lucas, would later go on to praise the film), The Equinox...A Journey Into The Supernatural is unbelievably hypnotic and otherworldly cinematic horror in its purest and most unadulterated form as a piece of preternaturally primitive celluloid art created in the pre-Night of the Living Dead (1968) era before the genre-debasing rise of gratuitous nudity and violence and retards in masks. Personally, I consider the film in the spirit of early German Expressionist works like Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) and Hans Werckmeister's Algol: Tragedy of Power (1920) in that sense that the film's visuals demonstrate are certain inordinate romantic obsessiveness.

The Equinox...A Journey Into The Supernatural begins completely abruptly with protagonist David Fielding (Edward Connell) running away from some gigantic cloaked entity (notably, this scene was cut out of the 1970 version) in the woods, running to a highway, and being picked up by a young couple in a convertible, but not before being run over by a car that mysteriously lacks a driver. Flash forward exactly one year and one day later, a sleazy yellow press journalist named Sloan (James Phillips) visits David at a mental hospital where he is heavily sedated and confined to a padded cell. While described by the head doctor as a melancholic, Davey boy clearly has much worse problems. In an attempt to get David to talk to him, the journalist asks him "What's the cross for? To protect from you curse?" and then unwittingly incites him to attack him upon showing him a photo of an old man. The old man is question is a teacher named Dr. Arthur Waterman (Fritz Leiber) and he was ultimately the one responsible for unleashing the evil forces that attacked David and his three less fortunate friends on that fateful day one year and day ago. After his failed attempt to converse with David, Sloan listens to a tape recording of the protagonist's testimony in regard to what happened to him and his friends the day that the latter mysteriously disappeared from the world.

It all started when David's friend Jim Hudson (Frank Bonner) called their mutual friend Eddie to find a date for him for a party. Eddie's such a good friend that he brings by a hot Nordic blonde named Susan Turner (Barbara Hewitt) for David, which Jim seems slightly jealous of since his girlfriend Vicki (Robin Christopher) is not as hot. In a cheesy scene of foreshadowing, David says to his friends after snapping of photo of them, "...in a moment my dear friends, you will gaze upon the faces of the dead," which inspires Susan to sarcastically whine, "That's a nice way to start off the day, calling us the dead." When David makes the ultimately fatal mistake of convincing his friends to stop boy their teacher Dr. Waterman's cabin before heading to Eddie's party, he unwittingly seals the fate of everyone involved. While the characters are on their way to Waterman's quaint home, a giant Cthulhu-like creature with large tentacles crushes the cabin, so when they eventually arrive they are somewhat baffled by the curious sight. Of course, things get even more curious when Vicki wanders on her on and spots a beautiful Gothic castle. Naturally, the foursome reluctantly decides to go checkout the castle in the hope of finding Waterman there and on the way they pass an ominous cave where they heard some sort of unnerving presence inside that sounds hardly human. Although somewhat petrified by the sounds emanating from inside the cave, the friends go inside and are quite startled to happen upon a skeleton and eventually an elderly old fart (fittingly played by Muren's grandfather, who provided most of the funding for the film) of the sinisterly goofy sort who has a proclivity towards laughing in a maniacal fashion. After asking the teens if they are "afraid of the demons and his friends," the unsettlingly goofy geezer accuses them of attempting to steal his book and then absurdly gives them said book, which he has hidden under a bunch of rocks. Of course, little do David and his friends realize that the ancient book will be the source of sinister forces that will soon begin to stalk and kill them.

After having a quaint little chicken-wing picnic, the girls go on a walk and noticed that the castle has inexplicably vanished into thin air. Meanwhile, while David is attempting to read from the book, Dr. Waterman appears out nowhere and snatches it from his hands. When David and Jim chase after Dr. Waterman, he eventually trips while running through a small creek and somehow magically dies in the process. After walking away from the body for a minute or two, David and Jim are more than a little surprised to discover that Waterman's corpse, like the castle, has also completely disappeared without of trace, though a sulfur-like smell pollutes the area. Not long after that, David and Jim discover an 'invisible barrier' to what seems like another dimension, though they opt to not tell their lady friends about it. Needless to say, when a giant apish King Kong-esque chases down the eccentric old man down and murders him by repeatedly slamming his frail old body into the ground as if he were a ragdoll, David and Jim go in hero mode to save their damsels in distress from the extra bestial being. While the monster manages to grab the book, Jim soon murders it by piercing its heart with a large stick. While the friends question if the gorilla-like beast has something to do with Waterman and/or his destroyed cabin, they never consider that it might have something to do with the mysterious occult text they are carrying around, at least not until later. Indeed, after doing some walking on his own so he can find his camera and only finding some ruined film and a recently deserted camp site, Jim goes back to his friends and says, "I think the book has something to do with the forces of darkness." At this point, the foursome finally begins to realize the magnitude of the malevolent menacing that has been stalking them.

Upon looking through the ancient occult grimoire, the friends are baffled as they cannot understand the archaic language and symbols inside, which included Hebrew letters and Star of David symbols (somewhat curiously, in the 1970 version of the film, it is mentioned that the so-called 'Star of David' can be used to battle the monsters). Luckily, the friends eventually find a note left in the book by Dr. Waterman where he calls the book as an "accursed tabloid" and describes how he wants to, "warn the world that the forces of darkness are far from dead." As the note describes, seven months ago Waterman's archeologist colleague found the book while conducting an excavation of an "unknown civilization near the Persian Gulf" and against his friend's advice, the teacher became "blinded by curiosity" and began studying the text in the hope of learning of the secrets of immortality. Ultimately, with the book, Dr. Waterman was able to open a portal near his cabin where he was able to witness the dead journey to hell, which he describes as, "A horrifying sight which only increased my desire for the secrets of the Equinox." Naturally, demons eventually caught wind of what was Dr. Waterman was doing and decided that they not only wanted the book, but also his soul. Ultimately, Mr. Waterman's note warns the reader to not attempt to fight the demons and to destroy the book. Not long after reading Waterman's note, a gigantic green caveman-like creature appears from the invisible barrier, which Jim soon gets trapped in while battling the creature. With his arm outside the barrier, Jim is able to hand the book to David, who gives it to the girls and tells them to run to the car and drive away. In a desperate attempt to rescue his friend, David enters the invisible barrier and discovers a place that resembles the normal world, albeit somewhat distorted with a more hellish tint and the castle they saw before. It does not take David long to find Jim, though it is not really Jim but a demonic doppelganger.

Indeed, David unwittingly leaves his dying friend behind and crosses back to earth via the invisible barrier with the insidious imposter. After he attempts to pull a cross necklace out of his pocket and pseudo-Jim stops him, the protagonist soon questions the doppelganger about his true identity and he arrogantly replies, "Don't you know David, or are you afraid to draw the obvious conclusion?" After crediting Waterman for opening the invisible barrier and explaining how he "found all the answers" but "did not know what to do with them," the demon explains that they were responsible for reanimating the teacher's corpse and sending him back to earth in the hope of getting their book back. Eventually, David gets tired of listening to the demon ramble on, so he starts a fistfight with him and the evil entity eventually takes on his real physical form as a harpy-like red devil with wings. After knocking David out, the demon flies away and chases the girls, ultimately killing Vicki and knocking out Susan. When David regains consciousness, he manages to stun the demon long enough with his crucifix to grab Susan and begin running back to the car. Although somehow losing the cross while running from the hellish harpy, David and Susan manage to cause the demon to burst in flames upon ducking in front of a cross-shaped tombstone that they spot while passing through a graveyard. Unfortunately, not long after that, a 'demonic explosion' occurs that kills Susan and the film comes back to the exact same scene from the very beginning of the film where David is saved by a couple in a convertible after being run over by a driver-less car. At the end of David's recorded testimony, the protagonist reveals that he is supposed to be killed by the demons exactly one year and one day after the events occurred. After listening to the recording, Journalist Sloan complains he can't use David's testimony for a story because "It's a year old" and then tells an attendant at the mental institution to let him know if the protagonist ends up killing himself since it will give him what he needs for a newspaper headline. Upon leaving the nut ward, Sloan unwittingly passes Susan, who is not really Susan but a demonic doppelganger who has come to kill David, who no longer has cross to protect himself with because the reporter accidentally got a hold of it during their scuffle.

Undoubtedly, if I were to somehow open a school of horror filmmaking, I would make The Equinox...A Journey Into The Supernatural (and not the 1970 version) mandatory viewing for all students, as it is unequivocally a film dripping with inspirational energy as a work that could have only be sired by hardcore horror fans with a pure and untainted love for the genre and all its idiosyncrasies. Indeed, as an unrepentant cinephile with reasonably eclectic taste in film, I would have to say that what most of my favorite films have in common—be it Rainer Werner Fassbinder's In a Year with 13 Moons (1978), Adriaan Ditvoorst's De witte waan (1984) aka White Madness, Demetri Estdelacropolis' Mother's Meat & Freud's Flesh (1984), or Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik (1987)—is that they are, quite unlike virtually all Hollywood productions, blatant labors of love created by men that were completely infatuated with the art of cinema. Of course, Equinox is also such a film, but what distinguishes it from most films in general is that it was created with a sort of charming youthful naivety that was inspired by communal readings of Famous Monsters of Filmland (in fact, the editor of the magazine, Forrest J Ackerman, provided his voice for the hospital tape recorder scene), which was to the makers of the micro monster movie what Cahiers du cinéma was to the filmmakers of the French New Wave. Notably, aside from obvious influences of Lovecraft, Harryhausen, and Tourneur, one of the film's most important special effects men, David Allen (Flesh Gordon, Q: The Winged Serpent), was a classically trained pianist and student of Teutonic Romantic literature who attempted to incorporate Richard Wagner's theory of 'gesamtkunstwerk' (aka 'total work of art') into the film. Undoubtedly, with its Gothic castle and cemetery scenes, the film certainly gives off the impression of being a poor man's attempt to recreate a Caspar David Friedrich or Arnold Böcklin painting in 16mm celluloid form. While Equinox certainly deserves its reputation as being 'so-bad-its-good' (in fact, it is only one of a handful of films that I think genuinely deserves this obscenely overused designation), it also screams sincerity and purity of spirit in such a way that makes me simply incapable of thinking of it the same way I do a Troma flick. Indeed, the film may be tasteless teenage trash with embarrassingly bad acting, but it's tasty teenage trash that reminds the viewer why the word 'nostalgia' was coined. While I will probably never watch a single Friday the 13th film ever again, Equinox is somewhat timeless and a work I will never be embarrassed to show any kids that I might have. In fact, I would argue that it is the perfect film to show to a young child that has never seen a horror film.

THE BEASTS
THE BEASTS

Dennis Yu (1980)

When I began watching Dennis Yu's The Beasts, notorious and accomplished CATIII rape/revenge film, I was intrigued by the dual personality of the film. Switching shots between the teen-centric exploits of a brother-sister pair with friends to criminals on the lam known as the Disco Boys, The Beasts carved lo-fi fashion out of film and degraded a cry out of audiences worldwide. Not only featuring horrifying and surreal imagery, The Beasts' graphic rape scene depicts the height of authenticity in rape. Such depravity cannot depend on choreography to insinuate total violation, rather, The Beasts is rough and tough, martyring fondness of the "fairer" sex. Once The Beasts erupts into a full-blast revenge spectacle, the film becomes predominately masculine and turns into a wild game of stalk and kill without a hint of its coy and bashful groovy build-up. Plot in a nutshell; 5 friends decides to take a camping trip just outside a rural village when they catch the attention of a group of malicious delinquents who proceed to torment the group with frightening psychological warfare. The games don't stick to the mental aspect but trip well into full-fledged violence and disregard for mortal coil. These so-called Disco Boys are surely among the most evil and psychopathic characters in cinema, hidden away in a rusted trove of truths.

One of the various highlights of The Beasts is the inclusion of the radically mutated character, Snake. True to his name, Snake is a vile creature whose natural appearance rivals Michael Berryman's visage in grotesque fascination. Apart from the character, snakes are heavily employed throughout The Beasts which aim to jitter and revolt the senses. I couldn't sell this aspect to either parties due to its usage of snakes and also the violent maiming of them. I'm not quite sure of Dennis Yu's intent on this one other than to shock and offend but my hat goes off to him because it works. During one of the final showdowns between Wah and Ling's father and Snake, we find Snake, enraged, surrounded with the slithering serpents and shrieking, grabbing handfuls and whipping and beating them against walls and furnishings. To argue good taste would prove to be an entirely fallible argument but this is what I want when I pick up an 80s CATIII film. There are even several scenes involving the decapitation of wriggling snakes that prove to be too nasty to be staged. One prospect that deserves to be mention is an earlier performance of Kent Chang, resident "Fatso" and Flash Point's Inspector Wong. As The Beasts cites its influences with American exploitation, Kent Chang's character is directly comparable to the introverted and retarded character of Andy in I Spit on Your Grave. Both foster childlike mentalities and in some shred of favor, are innocent. I Spit on Your Grave isn't the only inspiration that can be cited, instead, you can also reference Deliverance and Last House on the Left. During some segments, Last Hut on the Left would be a preferable caption but when the dizzying violence and brief misogyny winds down, The Beasts will remain to stay. After all, The Beasts wrangled together some of the most disgusting and gnarled creatures of instinct I have seen in a CATIII film yet.

There is much fun to be had in The Beasts, either as an excursion in film or a slideshow of general ugliness. The end of The Beasts changes its uniform into a hunt sequence with close-quarters combat from the delirious father and the Disco Boys. Also up for grabs are exaggerated and creative death traps including a scene with a box-like formation that is lined with spikes that falls atop a poor saps head. When I had finished The Beasts for the first time, I was indeed humored and sickened in a way but I didn't feel as if it had struck significance within me. I decided to chat with a friend about the many high points of the film and upon his gushing, I decided to take the reigns once more which lead to an intoxicating experience in molestation and degradation. There is much magic to be found in The Beasts whether you look at the depiction of rape which leaves poor Ling star-fished out atop a rock beneath a waterfall - breathtaking scenery - or you glance at the grim carnage and respect the anger that must have animated Dennis Yu's incendiary vision. For what it is worth, I've been so spoiled off of films generally conceived as "high class" that now that I have tasted the dark side once more, I'm not so sure I want to turn back. The Beasts is prime nihilistic entertainment and a hell of a way to exorcise hormonal frustration -- a work of "soiled sinema" by proxy.

THE PLACE BEYOND THE PINES

Derek Cianfrance (2012)

In Drive (2011) directed by Danish auteur Nicolas Winding Refn (Pusher, Valhalla Rising), handsome Hollywood leading man and heartthrob Ryan Gosling—one of a few mainstream actors halfway worthy of his fame and fortune—played a young hero, a postmodern knight of sorts with immaculate manners and a talent for suavely driving and beating, who savagely slays a gang of psychopathic Jewish gangsters in the seemingly selfless hope of saving the life of his love interest and her mongrel mestizo son, even if he never really gets to spend his life with her or is even properly ‘rewarded’ by the lovely lady by way of her fair-skinned flesh. In the film The Place Beyond the Pines (2012) directed by Derek Cianfrance (Blue Valentine)—a film with a less trusty moral compass—Gosling also plays a fellow who puts his life at risk to save his love interest and a young lad (this time his actual son, but also a racial mongrel of the mestizo sort) via monetary support, but the dilemma is she is a bitchy broad who got knocked up by him and did not even have the courtesy tell him about the boy and now she has a nice Negro boyfriend who she uses for financial support as he is a proud house owner, thus he must edge out the prestigious competition and the only way he can think do it is by becoming an outlaw bank robber of the morally dubious sort. A motorcycle stuntman in a traveling carnival by trade who quits his carny career to be near the woman that will have nothing to do with him and their infant son, Gosling ultimately decides to rob banks with his motorcycling talent to support the family he so desperately wants to keep, but ultimately runs into trouble in an uniquely unreliable trade where death, destruction, and disaster come with the territory. Directed by Derek Cianfrance, who studied under experimental filmmaker Stan Brakhage of all people but seemed to learn nothing and who directed Blue Valentine (2010)—a work also starring Ryan Gosling that I found absolutely intolerable as a sort of brazenly banal emo beta-male melodrama from hipster hell—The Place Beyond the Pines is the ostensibly ‘epic’ story of sinful fathers and the metaphysical inheritance they give to their prodigal sons in a narratively ambitious yet unforgivably uneven cinematic work told in three varying acts. Following in the sub-subversive legacy of Alfred Hitchcock’s Psycho (1960) in killing off what viewers assume is the lead protagonist/anti-hero about 1/3 into the movie, The Place Beyond the Pines is certainly a film that takes ‘risks,’ at least in the context of the convention-plagued and monetary-driven industrial Hollywood studio system, but suffers from a fundamental narrative jaggedness that is quite blatant due to the fact that it is separated into three parts in what seems to be a cable television series on steroids that aspires for greatness but seems totally counterfeit and contrived when compared to the great films of the so-called American New Wave, including those by Martin Scorsese and Francis Ford Coppola, but especially those post-WWII European film movements like Italian Neorealism and Neuer Deutscher Film.

Luke Glanton (Ryan Gosling)—a somewhat dirty yet semi-virtuous fellow with a somewhat muscular body covered with vulgar homemade tattoos who sports faded Metallica t-shirts with holes in them—is a motorcycle stuntman in a traveling circus and during a trip to Altamont, NY he stops by an ex-lover's house, a Hispanic girl named Romina (Gosling's real-life girlfriend Eva Mendes), only to learn that he is the 'baby daddy' of an infant boy named Jason, who magically looks 100% Western European despite the fact his mother looks rather swarthy as some sort of unmentioned Hispanic (her mother is an illegal alien, but it is never mentioned from where). Unfortunately, Romina is now in a serious monogamous relationship with a somewhat upstanding Negro named Kofi (Mahershala Ali), whose house she lives in and who does not like degenerate white boys coming around his house and trying to cause trouble, especially when it comes to his rather absurd and distinctly American tri-racial family. Luke decides to quit his job and move to NY to provide for his wife and son, but it is kind of hard when he can only seem to make minimum wage. While riding around on his motorbike in the woods like a deer galloping along poetically in the forest, Luke runs into a strange and goofy quasi-redneck dude named Robin Van Der Zee (Australian Jew Ben Mendelsohn) who owns a small repair shop and provides the young father a job as a mechanic, but it does not pay the bills. During a conversation about money troubles and his need to support his broken family, Robin, who claims to have successfully robbed four banks in the past, proposes robbing banks to get rich quick, which they both inevitably do as Luke is a man with a very unique special skills set as a stunt motorcyclist without a shred of fear. After a couple successful robberies, Luke gets in a fight with Kofi after dropping a crib off for his son, which results in his arrest after senselessly smashing the black brother in the face with a large wrench. After getting out of jail on bond, Luke proposes to Robin that they commit two robberies at once, but his friend tells him he is it "out" for good, stating quite prophetically, "You know something Luke, if you ride like lightning, your gonna crash like thunder," which he inevitably does. Robin, who seems to have quasi-gay feelings for his friend, pointlessly destroys Luke's bike in a feeble attempt to stop his friend from committing more robberies and being very potentially imprisoned or killed, but he buys another one after putting a gun in his friend's mouth and demanding money for his destroyed bike. Unfortunately, the new motorbike he buys is not as faithful and a tire blows out during a robbery getaway. Attempting to escape on foot and eventually locking himself in the second floor of some random house he invades, Luke is ultimately killed by a rookie cop named Avery Cross (Bradley Cooper), who shoots the outlaw stuntman, who falls to his death from a two-story window. Unfortunately, The Place Beyond the Pines fails to be any more intense than a scene about 1/3 through the movie where Ryan Gosling lies dead in a pool of blood with a perverse smile on his face.

THE PLACE BEYOND THE PINES

Now focusing on small-time police officer Avery Cross, who was shot during his skirmish with Luke and is now regarded as a (false) hero of sorts for getting injured in the line of duty and killing a renegade bank robber, The Place Beyond the Pines precedes to follow the guilty conscious of a somewhat cowardly cop—a relatively small fellow with a law degree who is better at verbally bullshitting than kicking ass—and the corruption of the particular police force he works at. As a man who has a son that is about the same age as Luke's son, Avery has a hard time looking at his kid. Cross' wife and ex-judge father want him to quit the police force and aspire for bigger, less dangerous things, but the rookie cop seems to think he has a future among more crooked, alpha-male cops. While recuperating from his injuries, Avery is brought on a ride-a-long with three fellow cops, including the corrupt crew's nefarious leader Deluca (Ray Liotta in a typically dirty cop role), who search and illegally seize from Romina the bank robbery money Luke gave her for their son Jason's uncertain future. After feeling rather guilty for taking the money from the baby boy whose father he killed and realizing he will never go anywhere as a pussy police officer with a law degree who does not have what it takes to rule the streets, Avery—partly to further his career and ease his guilty conscious—decides to rat out his fellow cops, which enables him to secure a position as an assistant district attorney under rather dubious and even treacherous circumstances, thus proving that when it comes to his actions, whether they be seemingly morally pristine or dirtier than an urban crack whore on a Friday night, he is always looking out for #1. Flash forward fifteen years later in what is the third and final act of The Place Beyond the Pines, Avery Cross is now running for New York State Attorney General, but he is now divorced and his delinquent teenage son AJ (Emory Cohen)—a subliterate high school senior and barbaric bourgeois wigger whose command of the English language is laughable compared to his politician father—is moving in, which ultimately stirs trouble for his father's political campaign and personal life. By rather magical happenstance, AJ, who is now attending a new school in his father's area, runs into and befriends Luke's son Jason (Dane DeHaan) during his first day at high school. While AJ is a self-absorbed wigger druggy delinquent who wishes he was a ballsy black gangsta but comes from a typically Judaic NY background of self-absorbed narcissism and arrogance where he can act like a dumb ass without having to suffer any serious consequences, Jason is a jaded working-class introvert of the white individualistic type, or as his new friend describes him, a "loner stoner." After buying XTC together, Jason and AJ are busted by the cops and while picking him up from the police station, Avery realizes that his son's new friend is the son of the man he killed long ago, thus he threatens his boy never to talk to his new comrade again, which pushes the would-be-negro to hysterical tears. Meanwhile, Jason begins to do research on his father after getting his name from his stepdad Kofi and learns about his father and his grizzly outlaw death. When Jason, who is high on Oxycontin (which he stole from a pharmacy) and alcohol, eventually realizes that AJ is the son of the man who killed the father he never knew, he starts a fight that inevitably results in his hospitalization. After getting out of the hospital, Jason buys a gun from a thuggish ghetto drug dealer and pays a special visit to Cross & Son, but things somehow inexplicably work out in the end in a cop out of a cinematic conclusion clearly meant to appease to the fairytale sentiments of the average philistine American filmgoer.

Beginning as a sort of a vaguely more nihilistic, East Coast rip-off of Drive (2011) directed by Nicolas Winding Refn minus the striking synthesizer-driven soundtrack and concluding in an anti-climatic manner that is no more thrilling or chilling than a number of other segments in a flimsy film that tediously relies on endless tension yet has no great pay-offs, The Place Beyond the Pines is a recklessly assembled work that tries to be everything as a sort of would-be-epic Hollywood pseudo-arthouse flick with a narrative that aspires to be a postmodern Greek tragedy of sorts contained in a world where the American Dream has devolved into a decidedly depressing dystopian nightmare, yet only manages to be a halfway entertaining way to waste 140 minutes and is ultimately nowhere near the monumental masterpiece that director Derek Cianfrance was hoping for. Indeed, one can respect Cianfrance for attempting to pull-off a film where a superstar like Ryan Gosling is killed off only about 1/3 into the movie, but it is quite apparent that The Place Beyond the Pines loses steam after this point and turns into a somewhat mundane lesson in morals and sins of the father as if the director was the first filmmaker in film history to consider that some cops might be more corrupt than cons and that there might, in fact, be no such thing as real 'heroes.' Of course, European films have been covering such themes since the dawn of cinema and post-WWII European cinema is dominated by such patent pessimism and negativity, albeit to a more ambiguous and authentic degree, thus The Place Beyond the Pines will probably only seem like something new and groundbreaking to the sort of uncultivated Hollywood cinephile that claims to love cinema, but has an incapacity for watching films with subtitles and understanding anything aside from the cheap and contrived pseudo-subversive melodramas that the swindlers and carny hucksters of Sunset boulevard have been spinning out since the late-1960s.

Surely the expression of a film school trained director who watched way too many Martin Scorsese, Robert Altman, Francis Ford Coppola, and Paul Thomas Anderson films during his lifetime, The Place Beyond the Pines is the conspicuously contrived creation of a man that knows a lot about post-classical Hollywood (or the so-called "American New Wave"), but not much else, especially life, as if he just came to the realization that America is run by liars from areas like NY who have spoiled children who for some reason wish they were black and "keeping it real" (non-European-run Hollywood itself is largely to blame for the cultural vacancy that is America and the absurd myth of the culture-producing Negro). I doubt many people, including brain-dead Americans high on Tarantino's celluloid turds, will see it as any revelation that the double bastard (both racially and socially) son of a criminal could grow up to be a more honorable individual than the son of a pussy cop with a law degree who cons and connives his way up to being the New York State Attorney General because, as Brad Pitt's character states at the conclusion of Killing Them Softly (2012)—another film that strives for greatness but is just another piece of plastic pomo pretentiousness—"In America you're on your own. America is business," and in business there is no place for morals or culture, especially in an extra-European cultural and racial bastard like the United States of America. Like the completely compromised character Avery Cross that he portrays in The Place Beyond the Pines, director Derek Cianfrance is someone who knows the right thing to do when it comes to his job (i.e. create celluloid art), but is too caught up in the corporate and cosmopolitan system of America (or in this case, Hollywood) to do the right thing, thus his film comes off as a halfhearted attempt at cinematic artistry that reflects no deep sense of real-life learning or aesthetic integrity on the filmmaker's part, but instead comes off as a terribly tedious and intemperate Tinseltown tidal wave of cinematic clichés, half-ass celluloid convention breaking, and a work that ultimately expresses a mundane moral message in 140 minutes that could easily be disseminated in a ten minute short by a more uncompromising auteur. Indeed, it does not say much about a filmmaker whose greatest contributions to cinema are being known for featuring a scene where Hollywood hunk Ryan Gosling submissively performs cunnilingus on Heath Ledger's ex-girlfriend and another where the star lies dead in a pool of his own blood with a seemingly sardonic smirk on his face. I could not help but think Gosling was smiling at the viewer for being tricked into enduring such an elaborately assembled piece of celluloid con-artistry.

Derek Jarman^{o*} (1976)

Even with his first feature-length film Sebastiane (1976), British queer auteur Derek Jarman (Jubilee, The Angelic Conversation), with some minor help from one-time director Paul Humfress, proved to be an aesthetically and thematically revolutionary filmmaker, as not only was the suavely sleazy cinematic work arguably the first British film to feature a positive portrayal of flagrant homosexuality and homoeroticism, but it was also the first film to be shot entirely in Latin (even if some of the dialogue is in ‘vulgar Latin’, which Jarman intentionally utilized, even going to a classics scholar for translation so words like “faggot” couple be properly translated) and the first British film to be released in England with English subtitles. Originally a production designer who worked for Ken Russell, even designing the iconically iconoclastic alpha Nunsploitation flick The Devils (1970), Jarman clearly learned from the best when it came to artful celluloid blasphemy and high-camp, taking the cryptic biblical homoeroticism of Cecil B. DeMille and stripping it bare and making it bloody via Sebastiane, a virtual softcore flick for fans of ‘religious’ Renaissance paintings. Only vaguely based on the life and times of the early Christian saint and martyr Saint Sebastian—a Roman Christian who is said to have been killed by Roman emperor Diocletian that has inspired countless gay artists, ranging from Japanese far-right novelist Yukio Mishima to German high-camp auteur Werner Schroeter—Sebastiane almost seems carelessly cliché in its gayness today in its depiction of what is undoubtedly one of the oldest and most artistically portrayed ‘gay icons.’ A sort of ‘depiction of a depiction’ in its focus on aesthetically readapting Renaissance paintings (subtextual homoerotic portrayals of Sebastian first appeared then) of Saint Sebastian as opposed to staying faithful to the story of the much sensualized and sensationalized saint, Sebastiane is a fiercely fetishistic celluloid fever dream of the superlatively sadomasochistic sort that portrays Christianity as an anti-gay/anti-life vice that prevents a closest queer from getting his fuck on and surviving the torture of a group of very horny soldiers. Beginning with Sebastian’s forced exile after protesting the execution of a Christian by Diocletian, Jarman’s Sebastiane almost completely abandons the traditional tale of the martyrdom of Saint Sebastian and focus on the protagonist’s mentally and physically painful experiences with sexual repression after being sent to a military outpost where he is forced to fight and fuck, but refuses to do both as a frigid Christian who has promised himself to Jesus Christ and subconsciously desires death, hence his eventual martyrdom. A decidedly decadent yet classically inspired sexually morbid depiction of a ‘masochist for the Messiah’ and “Christian faggot” (as one of the Saint’s tormentors describes him), Sebastiane is a strikingly singular yet paradoxically derivative pomo homo ‘tribute’ to the martyrdom of Saint Sebastian that echoes the pastoral Mediterranean nude photos of Baron Wilhelm von Gloeden, the strangely nostalgic biblical atheism of Pier Paolo Pasolini's The Gospel According to Matthew (1964), and the epic ancient Roman raunchiness of Fellini Satyricon (1969), the latter of which Jarman makes a thinly disguised tribute to.

As revealed in the introduction of Sebastiane, "IN THE SUMMER OF THE YEAR 303 THE EMPEROR DIOCLETIAN'S PALACE WAS RAVAGED BY A SERIES OF INEXPLICABLE FIRES. THE AGING EMPEROR BLAMED THE CHRISTIANS AND AS A RESULT UNLEASHED THE LAST GREAT PERSECUTION AGAINST THEM. DURING THE NEXT MONTHS THERE WERE MANY VICTIMS INCLUDING SEVERAL OF THE EMPEROR'S CLOSET FRIENDS." Opening with a phallogocentric pagan jubilee scene (which Jarman hoped would be a "cruel cocktail party where the glitterati met oriental Rome") at elderly pervert Diocletian's humble abode on 'Christmas Day' in celebration of both the birth of the sun and the emperor's 20 years on the throne featuring grotesque 'beings' sporting what appear to be penis piñatas, Sebastiane immediately establishes itself as a high-camp celluloid affair of the unwaveringly debauched sort. After Diocletian's (Robert Medley) 'court clown' (or whatever he is) receives a couple gigantic cumshots to the face after a phallic circle jerk in tribute to the sun, the emperor has a rabid negro kill a blond beast of a Christian and his beloved 'favorite' Sebastiane (Leonardo Treviglio)—the Captain of the Palace Guard—cries out in hostile protest as a proud Christian crusader, thus resulting in his banishment to a desert military outpost populated by Christ-hating cocksuckers of the sexually 'cannibalistic' sort. Almost immediately upon arriving at the meager military camp, Sebastiane is singled out by the Severus (Barney James)—the blond and handsome Captain of the Guard—who does not aim to torture the newcomer simply because he is a Christian, but because he finds him absolutely arousing and will use any torturous method, no matter how deleterious and deadly, to get what he wants. Refusing to both fight and fuck as an involuntary member of the pagan Männerbünde, Sebastiane is beaten mercilessly and incessantly, especially by old school S&M fanatic Severus, whose fanatical obsession with the cowardly Christian falls somewhere in between lurid love and freaky fetishism. While Sebastiane confides in someone that he longs for his super severe tormentor Severus, stating, "I love him. He is beautiful. More beautiful than Adonis," the passive Christian warrior cannot get off his self-cuckolding crutch for Christ, thereupon ultimately leading to his long and drawn out downfall. When Severus finally begs to be embraced by the rather repressed Christian, passionately spouting "Sebastiane, Love me," Sebastiane makes the literally fatal mistake of laughing and replying with "you impotent fool" to his forbidden lover. As punishment for his anti-social behavior among proud sexual deviants with a preposterously proud sort of super masculine sexual prowess, Severus has Sebastiane tied to a stake where every soldier, including the Christian's only friend, Justin (Richard Warwick), is forced to unload arrows into the Christian coward, thus resulting in his death and eventual martyrdom, which he seemed to long for all along as a masochist for the messiah.

Despite being a revolutionary work in terms of 'mainstreaming' explicit gayness in cinema, Sebastiane was accepted, but with marked hostility, by some more anally retentive homo film critics, including Canadian commie cocksucker Thomas Waugh, who wrote regarding the work upon its release, "The film comes across as a second-rate skin flick all dressed in a costume that doesn't fit...In fact, the only thing that distinguishes Sebastiane from the realm of soft core is the honesty of the latter. The film is so clumsy and unpersuasive in its pretensions to seriousness that it would probably work as camp were it not so tedious." Of course, as he would later admit himself, Waugh could have not been more wrong, as Sebastiane is not only conspicuously campy in a cultivated sort of way that would make Jarman famous as an aberrosexual auteur to be reckoned with, but also makes playful references to its influences, including a reference to Cecil B. DeMille ("the chariot races of the famous Cecilli Mille") and Federico Fellini ("a new man from the east...called Philistiini...scoured all the brothels of Rome...and as far as freezing Britain...looking for pretty boys...for his production of Satyricon"). Of course, Sebastiane did not just have an influence on the cultured gay world, as the British goth/post-punk band Sex Gang Children released an EP entitled Sebastiane (1983) featuring cover art of the martyrdom scene from Jarman's film. While I did not mind Brian Eno's anachronistic score for Sebastiane, I personally would not have minded seeing Sex Gang Children's song of the same name featured in the film.

Interestingly, Jarman spoke briefly about making a sequel of sorts to Sebastiane utilizing a more traditional approach to the martyrdom of Saint Sebastiane, but it is doubtful whether such a film would have worked and would have been anything aside from redundant considering what he accomplished with the original film. As Tony Peake revealed in the Jarman bio Derek Jarman: A Biography (2000), Jarman was the involuntary victim of 'sexual torture' while attending the Canford School in Dorset as a young boy, with the traumatic experience the filmmaker faced being described as follows in the book: "The incident in question involved him being cornered by a group of his contemporaries, held down, stripped, then brought to public orgasm by the stroking of a feather duster up and down the length of his legendary 'snake.'" Undoubtedly, the childhood event Jarman 'suffered' that was described by Peake seems to be reenacted at feature-length for Sebastiane; a film that is a virtual collection of case studies in regard to the (sado)masochistic nature of homosexuality, but in a lavish ancient Roman period piece form. It should also be noted that as a child, Jarman, whose mother was ½ Jewish was described as a "wog" by his classmates, so he felt like a 'double minority' of sorts, which can be certainly said of the eponymous outcast protagonist of Sebastiane, who is a gay closeted Christian among pernicious pagan wolves of the sexually virile sort. That being said, one could argue that Sebastiane is one of, if not the most, autobiographical films Jarman ever directed, at least in regard to his formative years. Undoubtedly, aside from possibly the impossible-to-find TV-movie The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian (1984) aka Le martyre de Saint Sébastien—a West German production directed by Czech auteur Petr Weigl (Lady Macbeth von Mzensk, A Village Romeo and Juliet) based on a play by proto-fascist poet-warrior and true Renaissance man Gabriele D'Annunzio that stars Pasolini protegee Franco Citti (Accattone, The Godfather)—Jarman's Sebastiane is and will always be the ultimate and definitive sodomite St. Sebastiane flick.

JUBILEE

Undoubtedly, the greatest anti-punk, punk dystopian fantasy film ever made, Jubilee (1978) directed by British arthouse maestro Derek Jarman (The Angelic Conversation, The Last of England) is a decidedly pessimistic portrayal of Great Britain of the present that also simultaneously acts as a darkly romantic love letter to English high kultur and the monarchy of the past, while using the subculture it less than flatteringly depicts as the antithesis of everything that was once great and noble in the England of long ago. An unrelenting work of magical realism that is notably less homophobic than most of Jarman's film fare, Jubilee follows Queen Elizabeth I (Jenny Runacre) as she is transported to present day England by her royal occultist John Dee (Richard O'Brien) via an ebony-eyed spirit guide in black tights named Ariel (a character from Shakespeare's The Tempest, a work Jarman would subsequently adapt in 1979), only to learn that Queen Elizabeth II was slaughtered in a random senseless mugging, Buckingham Palace has been turned into a degenerate recording studio that is run by an evil Svengali character of the repulsively racially bastardized and megalomaniacal persuasion, the British patriot song "Rule, Britannia!" has been turned upside down as a decadent anarchistic punk song featuring a bombastic burlesque dance and audio samples of Adolf Hitler speeches, violent women-children with orange dyke haircuts murder police in the middle of the street and castrate their cocks, and that the all unholy anti-Christ has captured the heart and soul of once-merry olde England. A rampantly ridiculous realm where nihilism, hedonism, and senseless self-gratification of all sorts have totally replaced art and fantasy and where gender roles have been radically flipped (men lay around with other men in bed while women form violent gangs in the streets), the unhinged UK featured in Jubilee is a place where Moors murderer Myra Hindley is regarded as an artist and a feminist hero, where angelic ballerinas dance gracefully in bombed out streets around a urban bonfire where neo-barbarians burn books, and where law and order have literally been abolished, thus making it a lunatic libertine anarchist's wet dream, yet director Derek Jarman does not portray such deplorable delinquency and debauchery as something to be esteemed, but the inevitable result of a tired and devalitized civilization in decline that has reverted back to a patently preposterous form of postmodern primalism. Featuring a number of popular punk/new wave icons in leading roles, including Adam Ant, Jordan (a protégé of Malcolm "The Sex Pistols" McLaren), Toyah Willcox, Nell Campbell (of The Rocky Horror Picture Show fame), putrid punk rock tranny Wayne/Jayne County, and Hermine Demoriane (a French tightrope walker), as well as cameo performances by The Slits and Siouxsie and the Banshees and a musical score by Brian Eno, Jubilee makes for an incendiary cinematic work that ironically unleashes an intrepid iconoclastic attack on the iconoclast punks themselves, thus making for an exquisitely idiosyncratic work that manages to synthesize the high camp blasphemy of Ken Russell (whose masterpiece The Devils (1970) director Derek Jarman worked as the production designer for) with the poetic elegance of Shakespeare and Michael Powell and farcical counter-counter-cultureness of Paul Morrissey, while also acting as one of the few truly refined 'punk' films.

According to a rather butch and bitchy punkess of the mentally deranged sort who goes by the fitting name "Mad" (Toyah Willcox), "The History of England" goes as follows: "It all began with William the Conqueror who screwed the Anglo-Saxons into the ground...carving the land into theirs and ours. They lived in mansions and ate beef at fat tables...whilst the poor lived in houses, minding the cows on a bowl of porridge—whilst they pushed them around with their arrogant foreign accents. There were two languages in the land, and the seeds of war were sown. At first the two sides coexisted meeting only on the racetrack and the battlefield whilst they fought the rest of the world—who they despised more than each other. Now one day, when there was no one left to fight...it dawned on them that the real enemy was at home...and that they should fight themselves. Having grown greedy on the booty they had looted from the rest of the world...they decided to fight with money. But by now this was made with paper, so it was pretty worthless. So, when they discovered this they took to fighting with guns. The rest of the world sighed a sigh of relief to be rid of them...and got on with their own business...and England slowly sank into the sea." Indeed, while the pre-apocalyptic England featured in Jubilee has yet to literally sink into the sea (as it rightfully should), it is most certainly a seedy and sadistic cesspool of born-again nihilists and amphetamine-addled anarchist prophets whose angst-ridden anger and arrogance is only transcended by their rather wacky need to destroy anything that has yet to be tainted by modernity, both in terms of cities and culture and no one, not even her greatness Queen Elizabeth I and her loyal alchemist John Dee can stop the madness of a nation on the brink of the Armageddon. To her dismay, the sixteenth century "Virgin Queen" comes to witness a recklessly wanton and naively nihilistic punk collective of fierce females (and a couple irrelevant cucks) featuring a number of curious characters, including revisionist historian "Amyl Nitrite" (Jordan), boyish "Bod" (Runacre, who also plays Elizabeth I, in an allegorical dual role), manly mute "Chaos" (Hermine Demorlane), kind-of-cute "Crabs" (Nell Campbell), and fecund-free fuhrer "Mad" (Toyah Willcox), after she is transported to the post-industrial wasteland that is the modern day UK. In a subplot, a passive pretty boy named "Kid" (Adam Ant) wants to make a career as a rock star and Crabs, whose name is probably in tribute to some STD she carries, has the hots for him, so she introduces him to a degenerate dictator of a music producer/media mogul named Borgia Ginz (Jack Birkett), who is also a nihilist philosopher of sorts that wallows in his egomaniacal subversion of the world via malignant mass media. According to Ginz, "This is the generation who grew up and forgot to lead their lives. They were so busy watching my endless movie.” Indubitably a pompous prick of the pseudo-princely sort, Ginz has no delusions that the punk music he actively promotes is of a rather poor aesthetic quality and has an equally sterile, if not sickly subversive, social value, summing up the music movement he leads as having the following purpose, “As long as the music’s loud enough, we won’t hear the world falling part.”

Utilizing actual real rubble from buildings that were never repaired after the London Blitz, as well as a number of real-life London ghettos, Jubilee features a Great Britain that may have officially won the Second World War, but never politically nor economically recovered, thus leading to subsequent generations of disillusioned Brits who have nil respect for nor understanding of their nation’s history and culture, and this youthful nihilism and aimlessness certainly reaches its apex in the artistically vapid form of the punk rock subculture. In Jubilee, hatred merely exists for hatred’s sake and rampant boredom can only be appeased via sadomasochistic group sex and lust murder, hippie-like group homosexuality and violent lesbianism, stealing cars, playing half-naked games of Monopoly, killing trannies (out of shallow jealousy of ‘her’ popularity) and cops, carving ‘bloody’ words into friends’ backs, watching mindless music videos on the telly, polishing lawn gnomes, partaking in duels in apartments, and setting the world aflame via all-out (and all girl) guerrilla terrorism. When the males of the punk collective are murdered coldheartedly by a fascistic policeman who relieves himself by pissing in the street during broad daylight, the less than lady-like punkettes of the group drown their sorrows in alcohol and take to the streets and castrate the cock of a cop that committed the cowardly crime, but they don’t stop there as they maliciously murder another man in blue via Molotov cocktail, shouting the punk rock cliché “NO FUTURE” as they commit the act of ultimately worthless terrorism. In the end, Mr. Big Borgia Ginz is still at the top, and he moves to Dorset, England, which is now a communist dictatorship and apparently “the only safe place to live now,” where he moves into a mansion (he “requisitioned”) that used to be owned by aristocrats, thus symbolizing the death of the aristocracy and high culture, and the reign of mass-man, who the evil record producer chronicles via his artistically vapid music.

In a question Nietzsche answered, Queen Elizabeth rhetorically asks herself: Is God Dead? Indeed, judging by Jubilee, one can certainly assume Derek Jarman thought so, with the new dispiriting spiritual guides of the modern world being metaphysically malevolent media moguls like Borgia Ginz, who has the audacity to admit like a true egomaniacal false messiah of the technocratic age that under his insidious influence masses of automatons, “The media became their only reality and I own their world of flickering shadows. BBC. TUC. ITV. ABC. ATV. MGM. KGB. C of E. You name it. I bought them all...and rearranged the alphabet. Without me...they don’t exist.” Indeed, while satirizing the punk movement as a natural, if not nasty, symptom of a sick society that promotes such a shallow pseudo-culture that was spawned by the very same group of people its members claim to be fighting against, Jubilee, not unlike Paul Morrissey's equally anti-punk/anti-capitalist/anti-communist romp Madame Wang's (1981), out punks the punks, thus proving their way of life and non-philosophy is nothing but banal bunk, so it should be no surprise that director Derek Jarman sired hatred in Britain's bourgeois anarchists, including fashion designer and business woman Vivienne Westwood, who rose to riches and popularity after her clothes began being sold at a boutique owned by Malcolm McLaren (the man who invented and named the punk rock boy band The Sex Pistols in a manner not unlike New Kids on the Block and The Backstreet Boys). Sharing aesthetic attributes with the films of Ken Russell, Paul Morrissey, Ulrike Ottinger, and Slava Tsukerman, but synthesizing it with aesthetic salutes to Shakespeare, English high kultur, and the monarchy, Jubilee brings a certain poetry and prestige to the punk world that it never saw before and would never see again. Indeed, if the punks were right about anything, it is the classic defeatist punk motto (as referenced sardonically in Jubilee, but also many times before and after the film's release): "My generation's the blank generation."

THE TEMPEST

Admittedly, I am not much of a Shakespeare connoisseur, largely because I never bothered to read much of his work in high school or elsewhere, so I certainly have no problem with the fact that British auteur Derek Jarman butchered the all-too-famous English playwright's work with his punk high-camp flick The Tempest (1979). Indeed, while Peter Greenaway's Prospero's Books (1991) featuring John Gielgud (who was ironically originally set to star in Jarman's flick) might be the most idiosyncratic and experimental take on Shakespeare's play The Tempest (1610–11), Jarman's screen adaptation is surely the most aesthetically pleasing, decidedly decadent, and fittingly updated take on the bard's final play. Incidentally, Jarman's The Tempest also happens to be the first feature-length screen adaptation of the Shakespeare play, though Broadway theatre director George Schaefer directed a TV version of the work in 1960 for the television anthology series Hallmark Hall of Fame. Although receiving a number of positive reviews from Shakespearean scholars upon its release, Jarman's The Tempest was despised by a number of prissy Shakespeare purists and was even described in The New York Times by star critic Vincent Canby as being, "funny if it weren't very nearly unbearable. It's a fingernail scratched along a blackboard, sand in spinach, a 33-r.p.m. recording of "Don Giovanni" played at 78 r.p.m. Watching it is like driving a car whose windshield has shattered but not broken. You can barely see through the production to Shakespeare, so you must rely on memory," thus ultimately ruining its chance of receiving popularity in the United States, or so described by Jarman biographer Tony Peake. And, indeed, featuring virginal 14-year-old Miranda being portrayed as a slutty and less than youthful punkette with kinky negro-esque hair by degenerate punk diva Toyah Willcox, a rather youthful yet radically resentful and even sinister Prospero portrayed by Heathcote Williams who gets off to exploiting his servants, real Jungian/Cabbala-inspired magic, a grown Caliban as portrayed by blind gypsy mime Jack Birkett (aka "The Incredible Orlando") suckling on his discernibly grotesque and obese man-like mother Sycorax's breast, super gay dancing Querelle-esque sailors, and high yellow American diva Elisabeth Welch giving a conspicuously campy cabaret-inspired performance singing Cole Porter's "Stormy Weather" in what would ultimately be the singer/actress's final film role, Jarman's The Tempest is Shakespeare as delightfully dreamed up by post-WWII England's foremost arthouse auteur and postmodern Renaissance man. A decidedly debased depiction of Shakespeare's play as adapted by a celluloid alchemist whose cinematic oeuvre is riddled themes regarding the drastic decline of English culture and The British Empire, Jarman's The Tempest is a fiercely phantasmagorical and even Gothic work that delicately deconstructs and reconstructs the original play in a mystifying manner that still manages to pay respectful homage to its source writer.

Living in exile in a shadowy mansion (the film was shot on location at the Stoneleigh Abbey) on a desolate island with his sexually repressed daughter Miranda (Toyah Willcox) after being banished there by his treacherous brother Antonio (Richard Warwick) and the King of Naples Alonso (Peter Bull), the Right Duke of Milan Prospero (Heathcote Williams) conjures a tempest with his slave spirit Ariel (Karl Johnson) that will reunite all of these people in the same home. Creating a storm that wrecks an Italian ship carrying Antonio, Alonso and his son Ferdinand (David Meyer), as well as the King's drunken mariner Stephano (Christopher Biggins) and his friend Trinculo (Peter Turner), on to his island, Prospero is waging a conspiracy against enemies that ultimately sires a number of conspiracies against him. When King Alonso's son Ferdinand reaches the island, he instantly becomes a firewood-chopping slave of Prospero, but the malicious magician's daughter Miranda soon falls in love with the enemy's spawn and vice versa in a quasi-Romero and Juliet-esque fashion. Meanwhile, Prospero's debauched and fish-like slave Caliban (Jake Birkett), whose attempted rape of Miranda is not depicted in Jarman's The Tempest (though one sees Caliban harass the little lady while she is washing her bare bosoms), runs into drunkards Stephano and Trinculo on the beach and enthusiastically joins up in a conspiracy to murder the magician. Although a magician of sorts by trade, Prospero wants reasons to conquer all in the end, but his daughter Miranda simply wants a boy toy in the end. Not unlike savage slave Caliban, sassy supernatural spirit Ariel also wants his freedom, hence his involvement in conjuring the storm that wrecked the Italian ship carrying King Alonso and his eccentric entourage. While Prospero is the great magician, it is ultimately his seemingly dunce-like debutante daughter Miranda who casts the most powerful spell in her love-at-first-sight romance with Ferdinand. In a scenario inspired by a real-life incident involving Jean Cocteau bringing 21 sailors to his friend's 21 birthday, Jarman's The Tempest concludes with a literal golden wedding between Miranda and Ferdinand involving dancing sailors and Elisabeth Welch as a 'golden goddess' (or more liked colored camp diva) symbolically singing "Stormy Weather" in a bittersweet conclusion director Derek Jarman described as follows to the International Herald Tribune, "I don't want to bless the union as Shakespeare did...because the world doesn't see the heterosexual union any more as a solution. Miranda and Ferdinand may go into stormy weather." Indeed, Jarman's The Tempest is not exactly the most 'straight' Shakespeare adaptation.

As Tony Peake explained in his book Derek Jarman: A Biography (2000), "Although Jarman maintained that what had always interested him about The Tempest was that 'no one can pinpoint the meaning', his own reading of the play was fairly unequivocal and deeply pessimistic. Jarman's Prospero is, in the words of Michael O'Pray, 'sinister, intense, secretive and cruel.'" Indeed, Jarman's The Tempest is a film about a lonely and exiled man who will stop at nothing to destroy the lives of his enemies, ultimately leaving the 'anti-hero' more lonely and emotionally defeated in the end, with his daughter becoming a member of his arch nemesis' family. Set in a metaphysically haunted "house of dreams" and "island of the mind" with cabbalistic symbols chalked on the walls and melancholy spirits riding Victorian toy horses, the Prospero of Jarman's The Tempest is not the alter-ego of Shakespeare as typically presumed, but what seems to be a composite of Jarman himself and his hero John Dee, the Renaissance magician who, not unlike the director himself, fell prey to the hostility of lesser minds, especially those with an aversion to artsy fartsyness. While surely not Jarman's greatest, most ambitious, nor most personal work, The Tempest is undoubtedly one of his, if not his most, accessible work as a curiously 'queer' take on Shakespeare that somewhat successfully does the seemingly impossible by bringing new lifeblood and true magic to the somewhat played out play. With his subsequent cinematic effort The Angelic Conversation (1985)—a highly experimental and mystically homoerotic work the director regarded as his best film—Jarman juxtaposed dreamlike slow-motion images of dandy twinks with off-screen narration of 14 Shakespeare sonnets read by Shakespearean actress Judi Dench. A sort of celluloid moving painting drenched in alchemy and esoteric ecstasy, The Angelic Conversation is certainly Jarman at his most cine-magical, but also rather indicative of why the filmmaker chose to depict Shakespeare the way he did in The Tempest as a man who believed in magic, at least in the aesthetic and cinematic sense as demonstrated by his remark, "film is the wedding of light and matter – an alchemical conjunction." Dedicated to the memory of Jarman's mother Elizabeth Evelyn Jarman, The Tempest is a tastefully trying tribute to old school English kultur directed by a man who mourned the past but was surely himself a product of his decadent zeitgeist, hence why the film still seems rather fresh and innovative today, yet also so unequivocally British. Indeed, in its depiction of Prospero as a fallen hero from a fallen family who is blinded by hate and who has lost sight of what is important, Miranda as a loose floozy who screws the first young man she bumps into, and Caliban as a swarthy untermensch who pays back his teacher/caregiver by attempting to defile Prospero's daughter, Jarman's The Tempest features a maniac microcosm depicting the cultural and spiritual malignancy that consumes the Occident, especially post-colonial England, today. Just as Derek Jarman himself would do while slumped over his desk at his cottage in The Garden (1990), The Tempest concludes with Prospero laying lifeless with defeat. Just as his hero Pier Paolo Pasolini died with his Trilogy of life, Derek Jarman brought high-camp and crude comedy to the classics, which is both an aesthetically noble and nefarious act for which he should be respected.

THE ANGELIC CONVERSATION

Derek Jarman^{o*} (1985)

Undoubtedly one of the more interesting (aborted) projects of his filmmaking career, British auteur Derek Jarman described his unrealized film The Angelic Conversation of John Dee, as a “dialogue between Queen Elizabeth I and Dr. John Dee in which Dr. Dee unfolds the mechanics of the universe with the aid of his scrying mirror and the intervention of the Angel Ariel.” While Jarman began working on pre-production for the project in the late 1975/early 1976 while still in the process of editing his first feature-length effort Sebastiane (1976) – the first cinematic work recorded entirely and meticulously in Latin and arguably the first ‘pro-gay’ British film – he failed to get funding for The Angelic Conversation of John Dee and instead began obsessing over an adaptation of William Shakespeare’s eponymous play The Tempest, of which he described as the famous playwright’s, “most personal and internalized comment on his condition” that was used to, “liberate himself from the known limits of man and to attempt a reconciliation.” Although inevitably abandoning The Angelic Conversation of John Dee and later directing The Tempest (1979), Jarman would eventually assemble a similarly titled work The Angelic Conversation (1985) that drew crucial inspirational from both of the previous projects, but composed of a new ‘conversation’ entirely. Originally entitled Psychic Billy’s Angelic Conversation during its embryonic stages, Jarman described the film in his reflective cinematic poem The Last of England (1988) as, “a series of slow-moving sequences through a landscape seen from the windows of an Elizabethan house. Two young men find and lose each other. The Film ends in a garden.” Featuring 14 Shakespeare sonnets narrated by Shakespearean actress Judi Dench (A Midsummer Night’s Dream, A Room with a View) and an original score by English experimental industrial group Coil set to languidly-moving footage of often obfuscated landscapes and handsome young men in sometimes homoerotic, but mostly companion-less, situations, The Angelic Conversation is a scrupulously nuanced non-narrative work that demands active yet reposed contemplation and meditation from the viewer. In an early outline of the film, Jarman himself described his intent with The Angelic Conversation as, “The cinema of noise, a film which does not dictate to the audience, allows the mind to wander and draws its own conclusions,” thus it is a decidedly avant-garde work that is probably only accessible to dedicated cinephiles, post-industrial/neofolk fans, and individuals who enjoy getting lost in European museums.

Aesthetically, The Angelic Conversation resembles what alpha-neofolk group Death In June would have probably envisioned had they had someone direct a feature-length film for their classic album Nada! (1985) as testified by the settings, poses, and outfits used by the band for promo photographs. Of course, Derek Jarman did not find his most vital influence for The Angelic Conversation from the neofolk scene, but in the seemingly unlikely subculture of psychobilly music. After hopelessly swooning over a suave 26-year-old PhD student named Paul Reynolds (Beastmaster, Press Gang) – a man who the director felt epitomized everything that was seductive and amorous about psychobilly – Jarman found one of his most personal influences for The Angelic Conversation. During the filming of The Angelic Conversation, Jarman was also able to capture the subtle romantic gestures of Reynolds and his short-lived lover Philip Williamson as their relationship blossomed and eventually withered away quite organically through the production of the work, hence the title the 'The Angelic Conversation' and the film's opening quote: "Love is too young to know what conscience is. Yet who knows not conscience is born of love." Although a cinematic work about two individuals discoursing through gesture, The Angelic Conversation, like much of Jarman's work, is a film that romanticizes over a forgotten and more cultivated past; juxtaposing images of contemporary post-industrial world via images of burning cars and cold concrete buildings with footage of elegant, aristocratic-like young men adorned with flowers and Elizabethan jewelry. Often described as Jarman's most intimate effort and a work embodying his distinct homophile weltanschauung, The Angelic Conversation is an undeniable auteur-piece about penetrating passions and paralyzing personal obsession, thereupon making the film's 'conversation,' like Jarman's final work Blue (1993), a mostly self-reflective one. Although an innately 'gay' arthouse work, The Angelic Conversation must not be pigeonholed into the marginal realm of queer cinema as it features nil of its more typical (and someone would say terrible) trappings, most specifically nihilistic self-loathing and debauched sexual grotesquery, that are prevalent in works by fellow homo-auteur filmmakers like Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Gregg Araki, and Bruce LaBruce. Akin to the cinematic works of German New Wave auteur Werner Schroeter (Der Tod der Maria Malibran, Der Rosenkönig), who was also known for his 'auteur excess', The Angelic Conversation is a virtual painting-in-motion that takes more aesthetic influence from a classic artistic medium (not unlike the pioneering films of F.W. Murnau) than one it was created within, but then again, Derek Jarman – who got his start in cinema as stage-designer (most notably working on Ken Russell's The Devils) – always considered himself more of a painter than a filmmaker's filmmaker.

Although technically a feature-length film, The Angelic Conversation is essentially a short film that was stretched out to 78-minutes. Out of curiosity, I personally reedited the film at about ten times the speed just to see the result and I must say that sped up, The Angelic Conversation loses a lot of its artistic resonance and soothing properties as Jarman assembled the film so as to give the sensibility of a perpetual dream of ecstasy with a looming tinge of postmodern doom, as validated in his description of the film: "a dream world, a world of magic and ritual, yet there are images there of the burning cars and radar systems, which remind you there is a price to be paid in order to gain this dream in the face of a world of violence.” Indeed, The Angelic Conversation is a welcome piece of poetic escapism for those dissatisfied with modernity and the mechanical, uncouth Hollywood movies that are symbiotic of it. Although not Jarman’s greatest cinematic work (I would go with War Requiem), The Angelic Conversation is quite possibly his purest and most uncompromisingly effort as an auteur filmmaker and as an artist.

CARAVAGGIO

Derek Jarman^{o*} (1986)

Before becoming a filmmaker in his own right, British auteur Derek Jarman (The Last of England, In the Shadow of the Sun) worked as a production designer for English director Ken Russell (Lisztomania, Savage Messiah)—a master of fiercely flamboyant and conspicuously campy biopics of artists—so it should be no surprise that he would also tackle bawdy biographical films with an unwavering lack of respect for historical reality, with Caravaggio (1986) being his greatest tribute to a famous artist. And, indeed, like Russell's exceedingly eccentric biopics, Caravaggio (1986) is a largely fiction-based work that emphasizes celluloid poetry and romanticism, as well as parallels between the past and present, over the documented historical record as a pomo homo work that features intentionally anachronistic scenes, including the appearance of typewriters and calculators despite being set in the 16th and 17th century. A somewhat troubled production that took a number of years to get off the ground (Jarman abandoned more film projects than he would realize) and went through countless screenplay rewrites (apparently, the screenplay was revised no less than 17 times), with Italian screenwriter Suso Cecchi d'Amico—a wonder woman who penned screenplays for such great Guido filmmakers as Franco Zeffirelli, Luchino Visconti, Vittorio de Sica, and Michelangelo Antonioni—eventually coming on and collaborating with auteur Jarman on the screenplay, Caravaggio ultimately turned out to be one of the director's most, if not, 'conventional' and accessible works and in stark contrast to the minimalistic Cocteau/Genet-inspired avant-garde flick the filmmaker originally intended it to be, which is a shame, but is also in the spirit of the film itself. Indeed, despite being arguably Jarman's most linear and least impenetrable works, Caravaggio is naturally drenched in high-camp homoeroticism of the Pasolini-esque sort that is more concerned with Mise-en-scène, tableaux, theatrically melodramatic acting performances, and aesthetic/thematic subversion than providing a docudrama-like depiction of the life and times of the eponymous protagonist. An almost recklessly fictionalized retelling about the somewhat mysterious and undeniably controversial life of Italian Baroque painter Michelangelo Merisi da Caravaggio, Jarman's Caravaggio portrays the artist as more of an anti-hero than hero, depicting him as a belligerent bisexual outlaw of sorts who killed his great love and found his greatest source of inspiration in the criminal and sexual perverted despite being his imperative connection to the Vatican. Starring Jarman's muse Tilda Swinton (The Last of England, Orlando) in her very first screen role, as well as manly man Sean Bean (The Lord of the Rings trilogy, HBO's Game of Thrones) portraying a bastard of a bisexual street fighter, Caravaggio is a perversely potent, if not uneven, reminder that Britain produced much more provocative and timeless works during the 1980s than overrated big budget feel-good filmic filth like pathetically philo-Semitic Chariots of Fire (1981) and the epically banal post-colonial cultural cuckold flick Gandhi (1982).

Opening with old Caravaggio (Nigel Terry) on his deathbed suffering from poisoning while in exile as his deaf-dumb slave-houseboy Jerusaleme (Spencer Leigh)—a chap who was given to the artist when he was just a wee boy by his own family—Caravaggio then cuts to the protagonist when he was a teenage hustler (portrayed by Dexter Fletcher) with an unhealthy obsession with vice and gutter-level criminality. Making a humble living hustling old perverts out of their money and pulling his dagger out on said perverts when need be, Caravaggio was eventually discovered by cocksucking Cardinal Del Monte (Michael Gough) while bedridden at a Catholic hospital. Offended by the fact that teenage Caravaggio's dagger blade has "No Hope, No Fear" engraved on it, Del Monte still decides to act as a mentor of sorts for the young con as he believes the bad boy has artistic talent, not to mention the fact the holy man is an unholy pederast who finds the little lad rather appealing. After his teenage twink years and coming of age under the sexual and artistic nurturing of Del Monte, Caravaggio grows up to be an artist who, despite still living under the roof of the creepy Cardinal, has a naughty knack for painting religious portraits using quasi-drag-adorned gay prostitutes, winos, and other stunning street rabble as models. A brazenly bisexual brawler, gambler, drunkard, and rebel rouser who sleeps with everyone from his retarded houseboy Jerusaleme and a female contortionist named Pipo (Dawn Archibald)—both of whom have acted as models for his paintings—Caravaggio is a rather unlikely person to be a semi-official artist for the Vatican, so naturally his days are more or less numbered. One rather fateful day, a handsome street fighter named Ranuccio (Sean Bean) catches Caravaggio as the artist wants the young man for both a lover and model, but the problem is that the brawling blond beast has a girlfriend named Lena (Tilda Swinton), who also catches the artist's fancy. Naturally, a bizarre baroque love triangle brews with ultimately brutal results. Both Ranuccio and Lena end up bedding Caravaggio and both become rather jealous of each other as a result. After Lena becomes pregnant by an unnamed fellow, she proudly confesses she plans to become the mistress to the wealthy Scipione Borghese (Robbie Coltrane), but not long after, she is murdered via drowning by a dubious party. Wasting no time to paint an exotic subject, Caravaggio paints Lena's exquisite corpse whilst weeping. Not surprisingly, Ranuccio is arrested for the murder, but Caravaggio uses his connection with the Vatican to talk to the Pope (portrayed by Jarman regular, blind Gypsy mime Jack Birkett) and he gets the young street fighter freed not long after. Unfortunately for him, Ranuccio makes the idiotic mistake of confessing to Caravaggio upon his release from prison that he did indeed kill Lena and that he did it so they could be together. More than a tad bit infuriated by the situation, Caravaggio slits Ranuccio's throat after the dullard makes his murder confession. In the end, Caravaggio comes full circle with the eponymous character lying on his deathbed dying as he respectfully refuses the last rites offered by Catholic priests.

Described by John Russell Taylor of Sight & Sound, “By the standards normal in British cinema, Caravaggio is an enterprise of extraordinary daring and resonance, carried out with a single mindedness – and sheer efficiency – which cannot be faulted. By the standard of Bresson or Pasolini, unfortunately, it remains all too suggestive of love amongst the waxworks. The breathe of life is somehow missing,” Caravaggio is indeed far from auteur Derek Jarman’s masterpiece as a work that seems shockingly softcore and even self-censored when compared to the director’s greatest works like Jubilee (1977), The Angelic Conversation (1985), and The Last of England (1988), yet it is still a captivating film nonetheless that, using the lurid life of Caravaggio as a parallel, demonstrates the filmmaker’s own dilemmas as a cinematic artist working in a country where serious celluloid iconoclasm is next to nonexistent. Indeed, it seems that Jarman himself was even disappointed by Caravaggio in retrospect as the director’s biographer Tony Peake wrote in Derek Jarman: A Biography (2000) that, “Watching the film a year later in Rome, he found it ‘too assured’ and could hardly believe it was his,” which is not exactly the way any artist wants to remember his work, especially considering it was the film the auteur spent the most time creating as a cinematic piece that was in pre-production for years. Still, Jarman’s Caravaggio managed to receive the Silver Bear for an ‘outstanding single achievement’ at the 36th Berlin International Film Festival, which is no surprise since the director’s films were typically better received in krautland and the auteur even made a number of threats that he planned to work in Germany as opposed to suffering the sterile censorship of merry olde England. Personally, I found Caravaggio to be Jarman’s least enthralling and provocative work, as the sort of quasi-lackluster flick that I have no intention of ever re-watching, at least any time soon, yet with that being said, the work is—for better or worse—one of the best biopics I have ever seen on a painter. Undoubtedly, in its depiction of maestro Michelangelo Merisi da Caravaggio as a sort of innately incendiary and iconoclastic proto-punk figure who managed to aesthetically assault the Vatican with his decidedly decadent paintings yet still managed to get funded by the Catholic Church, Jarman’s Caravaggio manages to contradict the Pope character’s statement, “Never heard of a revolution made with paint brushes.” Most importantly, Jarman’s Caravaggio successfully manages to make the ancient plight of Caravaggio palatable for today’s viewers, demonstrating that there were always Pasolinis and Jarmans who somehow managed to make a system that was totally against their lifestyles work in their favor, at least to some extent. Indeed, in the end, Jarman’s Caravaggio is more about the perennial spirit of the subversive artist than a factually fateful Caravaggio biopic, which is certainly something I can respect. Like a Werner Schroeter flick made accessible for the masses, it is no surprise that Caravaggio would go on to be Jarman’s most popular work, which is a shame, but at least unlike other avant-garde filmmakers, the director's oeuvre has not been condemned to the celluloid dustbin of history.

THE LAST OF ENGLAND

Derek Jarman^{o*} (1989)

Partially inspired and named after a painting by English Pre-Raphaelite painter Ford Madox Brown, The Last of England (1987) directed by British auteur Derek Jarman (The Garden, Wittgenstein) is an epic non-narrative cinematic poem shot on Super 8 that acts as an aesthetically-enrapturing obituary for traditional English culture and customs. Although his father was born in New Zealand and his mother was ½ Jewish by ancestry, Jarman – with the possible exception of Peter Greenaway – is arguably the most eclectically “English” director from the last couple decades of the twentieth century as testified by the distinctly Anglo-Saxon nature of his films that often tended to delight in Elizabethan, Shakespearean, and Victorian themes and aesthetics while also capturing the troubling and apocalyptic zeitgeist of his foreordained age. That being said, The Last of England – a work featuring themes of English decline that were examined in his early (anti)punk flick Jubilee (1977) and an aesthetic and narrative structure similar to his film The Angelic Conversation (1985) – is undoubtedly the grand culmination of Derek Jarman’s life as an artist and a filmmaker. Originally under the working title The Dead Sea, The Last of England was once described by Jarman as a poetic allegorical work about, “the sinking of the Titanic, the Titanic being Great Britain.” Dissatisfied with the original, more esoteric title The Dead Sea, the lead actress of the work, Tilda Swinton, confessed to Jarman that, “You can’t call it that. It’s the most vibrant film I’ve ever seen.” Indeed, lady Swinton was positively correct in her assertion as The Last of England is one of those rare and ideally idiosyncratic films that – not unlike F.W. Murnau’s Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927), Carl Th. Dreyer’s The Passion of Joan of Arc (1928), Federico Fellini’s 8½ (1963), and David Lynch’s Eraserhead (1977) – seems to do the seemingly impossible by totally transcending the typical constraints of the film medium, at least in a metaphysical sense. Akin to a hallucinatory drug and out-of-body experience, The Last of England was constructed by Jarman in a similar semi-unforeseeable, journey-like fashion. Shot in a random experimental manner with specific scenarios and themes outlined but with nothing resembling a ‘proper’ film script, the artistically-bantam British auteur was not able to fully realize the film until after spending endless time viewing and analyzing the footage he shot, thereafter dividing the work into 15 distinct sections. In fact, the film’s poet, Derek Jarman, guides The Last of England through the comfort of his somber, skull-adorned writing desk. Featuring torrid and sometimes terrifying scenes of junkies getting their kick, terrorists and tyrants turning the streets into urban battlefields, cold executions, marriages formed and irrevocably broken by state persecution, and the tiny Island State in flames, The Last of England is a penetrating and unforgettable work that was meticulously assembled by one of the Queen’s last great artists.

THE LAST OF ENGLAND

Taking its name from Ford Madox Brown painting of a Victorian husband and wife aboard a tightly crowded ship which is headed for a new life abroad, The Last of England is undoubtedly a more pessimistic and misanthropic work than the Pre-Raphaelite artwork that inspired it. While the couple featured in Brown's painting may be physically cramped and wearing frowns of discontent on their faces, they – unlike the eternally damned citizens of Jarman's The Last of England – have a potential future, even if not an ideal one. Featuring unknown non-actor Mark 'Spring' Adley – the debauched son of a British MP and Jarman's onetime-lover – in the starring role, The Last of England is a film that, although decidedly avant-garde in style and sentiment, does offer a certain uncompromising gritty realism of England (and most specifically London) under "Iron Lady" Margaret Thatcher's rule. Although Mr. Spring would have the nonpareil opportunity of starring in what is arguably one of the most masterly and unmitigated English films ever made, he felt that Jarman's brand of filmmaking was completely and utterly "pointless" and instead preferred trashy popular American soap operas like Dallas and Dynasty. Of course, with the exception of narration by Nigel Terry (written by Jarman) and sound-clips from radio news and historical bigwigs like Uncle Adolf Hitler, The Last of England does not feature a single line of dialogue and certainly none of the sort of dastardly Dallas-esque melodramatic verbal quibbling Spring (whose role in the film is entirely voiceless) was keen of. As a real-life unrepentant drug-addict and perennial "wild boy," Spring essentially plays himself in The Last of England. In fact, many of the scenarios featured in the film having a strikingly resemblance to those featured in alpha-Beat writer William S. Burroughs' dystopian/utopian (depending on who is reading it) novel The Wild Boys (1971), which is no revelation when considering the influence the book would have on various British artists/musicians (David Bowie, Duran Duran, Joy Division, etc), including Jarman who included the junky icon in his short film Pirate Tape (1983). In fact, Jarman once remarked that as far as those individuals who inspired his brand of filmmaking, "Anger, Burroughs, Ginsberg, and Rauschenberg were the influences – Andy (Warhol), the court jester." In a film where the lead protagonist shoots dope, masturbates over Baroque artist Caravaggio's painting Profane Love, and feverishly plays the pipes of pan in London's burning post-industrial badlands, it is easy to see that with The Last of England, Derek Jarman both reveled in and transcended his artistic influences, henceforth leading the way for the despair-laden and seemingly ethnosuicidal Super 8 arthouse works of anomalous Aryan auteur Jörg Buttgeret (Nekromantik, Der Todesking) and – to a lesser extent – the experimental homoerotic arthouse-trash works of Bruce LaBruce (No Skin Off My Ass, The Raspberry Reich).

It was not until Derek Jarman finished directing and editing The Last of England that he was able to offer the following semi-ambiguous description of the film: "The poet wakes in a visionary landscape where he encounters personifications of psychic states.” And, indeed, The Last of England is a sui generis cinematic work that, unlike virtually every other film made in the history of cinema, is endowed with a trance-inducing essence that has the aesthetic dynamism to transfer viewers to various seemingly unconscious cerebral states. Needless to say, The Last of England makes for a psychoanalyst’s most sodden yet sensual wet-dream as it is a work that metaphysically expresses what mere literature is incapable of articulating; the raw and self-scathingly scrupulous vivid visual depiction of one artist’s torn, tragic, and tormented soul. Luckily, Jarman also wrote a book of the same name (later retitled Kicking the Pricks) to accompany The Last of England. Unlike the film, The Last of England book is a fairly literal and illuminating work where – in the tradition of Roland Barthes’ Camera Lucida – Jarman discusses everything from his troubled relationship with his father (a Lancaster bomber pilot who suffered from depression due to his involvement with so much death during the Second World War) to the increasing disintegration of traditional English society, kultur, and art. As explained by his friends in the documentary Derek Jarman: Life as Art (2004), Jarman had a disaccording dichotomous perspective on England’s dramatic cultural shifts during the second of the twentieth century. Although a politically-active gay man with AIDS who welcomed the increasingly liberal views in regard to unconventional sexual persuasions, Jarman also felt that these social changes came at the price of the once-glorious traditional English society that he held so sacredly, henceforth making his films, most specifically The Last of England, all the more pertinent and potent today than when they were released decades ago as these cinematic works act as a cultural ‘missing link’ between the traditional ‘land of the Angles’ and the increasingly less English, technocratic multicultural England of today. While although an extremely personal work featuring the virtual dissolution of his childhood and the traditions that came with it (as portrayed in inter-spliced vintage home movie clips), The Last of England also depicts an entire nation of people who are plagued by terrorism, racial discord, substance abuse, nihilistic hedonism, and a deluge of ever escalating moral and culture decay, thus making for a wonderful post-Spenglerian nightmare sprinkled with nostalgia for a people and culture lost long ago.

WAR REQUIEM

Derek Jarman^{o*} (1989)

British Queer auteur Derek Jarman probably never shot a real gun during his relatively short life yet his cinematic masterpiece is assuredly the combat-heavy war epic War Requiem (1989); a BBC-financed film adaptation of English composer Benjamin's Britten's 1963 music piece of the same name. Although centered around a musical requiem (Decca Records required that Jarman not include any audible sound in the film aside from Britten's composition), War Requiem is indubitably first and foremost a visual tour-de-force in a category all of its own. In fact, I would argue that the musical score is the weakest attribute of the film. Unlike most of Jarman's work, War Requiem neglects to feature hordes of nude gay men galloping along gayly but it does include a most intimate and physically and emotionally visceral look at the tragedy of martial masculinity and the bloody brotherhood of war. Unlike most popular anti-war films (i.e. Apocalypse Now, Platoon), War Requiem does the seemingly impossible by completely shying away from romanticizing and glorifying combat. Sure, the film may feature heavenly firebombings and sensual (but not sexual) soldierly camaraderie but the underlying message of, "war is destructive" permeates throughout the entirety of the bewitching brutality that is War Requiem. I am sure that Jarman – as a sensitive homosexual – saw war as the greatest evil as it kills the most beautiful and valiant of men for – at best – the most trivial and cryptic of reasons. Throughout War Requiem, a beauteous blending of real (stock footage) and fictional theatric deaths of young soldiers are successfully dramatized in a most horrifying manner. Ultimately, War Requiem is not only a tribute to the many British soldiers who needlessly bled blood on the earth's soil, but, also, a virtual cinematic epitaph for the countless Europeans who died in battle since the dawn of Christianity.

Aside from being a grand achievement in the realm of both art and filmmaking, War Requiem is a strangely spiritual work about the selfless and Christ-like sacrifice so many forgotten soldiers gave for their fatherland. Unlike many anti-war artists, Jarman peculiarly but pleasantly refrained from portraying the deaths of various soldiers as not being in vain, but, instead, as the inevitable "rite of passage" of every generation. In the end, the real victims of War Requiem are those unfortunate individuals who managed to survive the war. In the beginning of the film, the viewer is introduced to a thoroughly melancholic, wheelchair-bound war veteran (played by British veteran actor Laurence Olivier in his last acting role) whose wartime memories still haunt him at his advanced and exceedingly feeble age. While his loyal comrades died in their prime and are remembered for their gallant acts of soldierly nobility, the old war veteran cannot even relieve his bowels without the assistance of a nurse. Had the old man lived during pagan times, his pathetic status as a crippled and elderly survivor would have most likely brought shame upon him as only the most courageous of fighters had the luxury of entering Valhalla upon the end of their mortal earthly existence. The only female character featured in War Requiem is an angelic nurse (played by Tilda Swinton) who finds herself caring for dying men that she acts as a pseudo-mother of sorts for. Although never setting foot on a battlefield, the nurse still encounters the most tragic and soul-shattering results of war. She is undoubtedly a Virgin Mary figure; the soldiers being the many Sons of the European Apocalypse. Like the war veteran, the nurse holds the burden of having to remember the short and painful deaths of those men that are forever lost to fate.

One of the most interesting and symbolic scenes of War Requiem is when a jolly snowball fight between a Brit and a Kraut (played by a youthful Sean Bean) turns into a deadly game all due to a sheer and petty misunderstanding. During the scene, a German soldier appears from the shadowy entrance of a building and jovially throws a snowball at a British gentleman that is playing a piano outside in a most absurd manner. Of course, a fellow Brit (Wilfred Owen – the film's lead protagonist – played by Nathaniel Parker) sees his comrade frolicking in the snow with the German but mistakes it for real battle. In the end, the previously friendly German and Englishman lay eternally dead for no reason; no doubt symbolic of war in general. Out of good and keen conscience, Derek Jarman also included a scene in War Requiem featuring a couple greedy and revoltingly effeminate, cigar-smoking Winston Churchill-like capitalists in pancake-make-up. While armies of European patriots slaughtered their fellow blood brothers in the belief that they were protecting their respective nations, the hotshot moneymen of these countries effortlessly relax in a state of constant hedonism as they count their endless downpour of shekels that they undeservedly earned from the noble blood of heroic men that they see as nothing more than ignorant peasants. As I mentioned earlier in the review, War Requiem does not feature a word of dialogue yet the entire story of war and its literal and figurative casualties are told in a most lucid and aesthetically-pleasurable manner. Featuring innocent childhood flashbacks, delightful dirges, and real-life and extremely expressive theatrical deaths, War Requiem is nothing short of being one of the most (if not the most) important filmic war poems ever created.

THE GARDEN

Derek Jarman^{o*} (1990)

British arthouse auteur Derek Jarman must have spent a lot of time reflecting on his life and the world he lived in his prized, meticulously cared for personal garden as many gay men seem to do, or at least one would most assume so after watching his celluloid odyssey The Garden (1990) – a highly personal HIV-infected celluloid work that was filmed in the filmmaker’s gloomy yet strangely gorgeous coastal home of Dungeness in Kent, and around his personal garden and the nuclear power plant that surrounded it. Like his previous cinematic experiment in extra-extravagant non-linear filmmaking The Last of England (1988), The Garden would be described by Jarman as “home-movie making really gone sort of slightly grand” and had been a serious project in the filmmaker’s mind since 1987, even if he never bothered with writing a script or any other such bollocks for what would be a particularly personal, if not exceedingly esoteric and metaphysical film. Somewhere between a delightful daydream of the best of what England has to offer in terms of organic scenery and traditional culture, and a nefarious and nauseating nightmare sequence featuring a lynched leather-fag’s attempt at advertising credit cards and the voyeuristic whoring out of Mother Mary via the paparazzi, The Garden is indubitably one of the last magical and majestic works of British cinema of the positively poesy sort, not to mention a politically incorrect portrayal of poofers in jolly olde England, even if the film itself is an attack on the powers that persecute bourgeois gays who refrain from dining in the tearooms and maintain monogamous relationships. The last major film Jarman worked on before AIDS became too debilitating of a disease in its destruction of the filmmaker’s body, The Garden was followed by more minimalistic works including Edward II (1991); a pomo homo take on the supposedly bisexual and murdered monarch, Wittgenstein (1993); an aesthetically and thematically Brechtian take on the Austrian Jewish philosopher of temper tantrums and tautology, and rather sad cinematic swansong Blue (1993); a work featuring a mere blue screen where the director discusses his life and Weltanschauung. While making Blue, Jarman was losing his vision and dying from complications of AIDS, thus it acts in stark aesthetic contrast to the ever so keenly kaleidoscopic and virtually wordless piece of hermetic homophile Christ-worship, The Garden, an exceedingly subversive slice of strangely spiritual sanctified sodomy assembled by an auteur when he was at the height of his powers as a cinematic artist, but also in touch with death. Featuring the artist himself, Derek Jarman, as the heavy sleeper in his own little Anglophile oasis and the filmmaker’s muse Tilda Swinton with a messianic child, as well as a soothing score by post-industrial group COIL, Goth/Darkwave group Miranda Sex Garden, and musician/composer Simon Fisher Turner (who, on top of providing scores for Jarman’s Caravaggio (1986) and The Last of England (1988), also created music for the David Lynch produced film Nadja (1984)), The Garden is the closest thing to a 'poofter Passion of the Christ.'

In Derek Jarman's The Garden, the general atmosphere seems to be somewhere in between paradise and on the eve of the abberosexual apocalypse. Whilst sleeping in a brass bed in a shallow pool of water, he is encircled by topless men and women in white pants who are carrying torches. When not gathering mushrooms in the garden, Mother Madonna (Tilda Swinton at the height of her pulchritude) and her infant son are bombarded by brazen and terrorist-like members of the paparazzi sporting ski masks in balaclavas. Indeed, the thugs of photo journalism even see it fit to physically assault the mother of Christ until she is separated from her forsaken son. Meanwhile, two handsome homo lovers, one with the physical appearance of an Anglo-Saxon Nordic and the other an Atlantic Mediterranean, bask in the beauty of the local beaches and seductive scenery, but things are not so serene as they seem. Among other things, a leather-fag Judas hanging from the rope he committed self-slaughter with and a creepy corporate conman go about promoting credits cards and usury in a sin-saluting fashion. Even more aesthetically abhorrent, a swarthy and Semitic-like broad who seems to have crawled out of a crack in early twentieth century vaudeville hell advertises that one should 'think pink' (a song apparently taken from the Audrey Hepburn vehicle Funny Face (1957)) and sports preposterous all-pink clothing, which the two gay men do too, but will ultimately help lead to their downfall at the hands of less handsome members of the Christian church who arrest, tar and feather, torture, and ultimately kill the seemingly happy-go-lucky and kindhearted dudes into Dorian love. In the more rock-ridden areas of the garden, naked men crawl around like enslaved animals as if they are some sort of fallen fags in homo Hades, not to mention the fact a group of hysterical females in colorful dresses brutalize a cross-dressing shemale while pernicious paparazzi terrorists document the whole event. While laying in bed together in the privacy of their own home, the two male lovers are assaulted by a trio of evil men dressed as Santa Claus who document their gayness as evidence. Soon after, the two sacrificial sodomites are in a sauna from a sort of Greco-Roman pandemonium in a scene that includes an appearance from Jarman regular and all-around creepy cocksucker Jack Birkett. With all the torture and death, The Garden still ends on a rather happy note.

According to Derek Jarman biographer Tony Peake, regarding The Garden, "as the film's maker, Jarman himself would dream his film into being. The garden would be the gardens of both Eden and Gethsemane, while the landscape of Dungeness, with its boats and fishermen, would be a Sea of Galilee. There would be an actual Christ, whose appearance and passion would be mirrored and intercut by that of two gay lovers who, at moments, would share his torments. This enabled Jarman to focus more powerfully and bitterly than in previous versions on the attitudes of the Church to gay men and its role in the AIDS crisis.

THE GARDEN

He hoped to show that, thanks to St. Paul's proscriptions against homosexuality, the Church had lost sight of Christ's original message of love." Personally, I have nil interest in the Church's relationship to gaydom, but Jarman certainly assembled a transcendent cinematic work with The Garden that does not bow down to political correctness; be it of the LGBT police or Christianity variety. In fact, Jarman regarded The Garden as a thoroughly Christian film and apparently likened it to Pier Paolo Pasolini's The Gospel According to Matthew (1964) and, indeed, the film expresses more church learning than the average Pentecostal could take in in two lifetimes. Religious and sociopolitical messages aside, in terms of aesthetics, The Garden stands up with Jarman's most breathtaking works, including The Angelic Conversation (1985), The Last of England (1988), and War Requiem (1989) as a film that follows in a rich tradition of intricate tableaux, high camp, and subversive kitsch, not unlike the works of Sergei Parajanov, Pier Paolo Pasolini, and Werner Schroeter. Undoubtedly, while the average art antagonistic would probably see Jarman as a cinematic anti-Christ of sorts, Jarman was a Christ of celluloid who waged a virtual one-man revolution against the Hebrew hacks of Hollywood and proved he had a 'passion for Christ' as he could do more with a consumer grade Super-8 camera than they could with all the money and technology in the world, with The Garden being the cinematic Book of Revelation of his oeuvre.

WITTGENSTEIN

Out of all the Derek Jarman films I have viewed, none of them have been particularly memorable aside from his first feature Sebastiane, a film so full of blatant heroic homo-eroticism and gay martyrdom, that it is hard to forget, whether one likes it or not. It was not until I saw Derek Jarman's Wittgenstein, one of his last features, did I feel that the director deserves to be remembered as one of England's few notable auteurs. Wittgenstein is a film that gives a short but sweet life summary of Viennese philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein, a man that was born with a kosher silver spoon in his mouth, one he would often times try to regurgitate out, even once comically attempting to become a Soviet proletarian worker.

Wittgenstein does not have a typical film structure nor was the film directed in a typically cinematic way. Director Derek Jarman decided to direct Wittgenstein on a theater stage, in a theatrical manner. What compelled Jarman to direct the film this way, especially a bio-pic, seems rather dubious yet it is surprisingly executed in a successful manner, surely more successful than Jarman's adaption of William Shakespeare's The Tempest. Unfortunately, Wittgenstein is mainly narrated by a child actor that is supposed to be a young Ludwig Wittgenstein, a child that even makes Harry Potter less turdsh by comparison. Of course, Ludwig Wittgenstein was a child prodigy so using a child Ludwig Wittgenstein does make sense, after all Wittgenstein's life seemed to go more downhill (for him, at least) the older he got.

Ludwig Wittgenstein happened to attend the same grade school as Adolf Hitler and the rumor is that a certain repellent Jewish child Hitler mentions in his autobiography Mein Kampf was actually Wittgenstein. Of course, the validity of this claim is questionable to say the least, but if one thing is true, it is that Ludwig Wittgenstein was one of the most famous self-loathing Jews in all of history. Wittgenstein was highly influenced by the brilliant Jewish psychologist/philosopher Otto Weininger, who killed himself shortly after writing his masterwork "Sex and Character" in 1903 at the ripe age of 23, a man that claimed Jewish traits and female traits were one in the same. Weininger also proclaimed that the feminizing of Western civilization was largely responsible for the degeneracy of society as well as the decline of the West. Mommy lover and cokehead Sigmund Freud was not too fond of fellow Viennese Jew Weininger, although he recognized his genius. Wittgenstein however was a fan of both Weininger and Freud, but his interest in Freud largely came from his interesting writings, not his scientific methods, which Wittgenstein felt were scientifically laughable and quackish. In Wittgenstein, proclaims of Freud, "It's dangerous stuff, it takes a Viennese to know another." Ludwig Wittgenstein was surely hard on his fellow Jewish intellectuals, even stating in his brilliant book Culture and Value: "Amongst Jews "genius" is found only in the holy man. Even the greatest of Jewish thinkers in no more than talented. (Myself for instance.) I think there is some truth in my idea that I really only think reproductively."

Not only did Ludwig Wittgenstein attack his own race (or at least $\frac{3}{4}$ of his blood, being only a full-Jew by National Socialist standards), but he also had a lot of negative things to say about his profession as a philosopher. In Derek Jarman's Wittgenstein, Wittgenstein proclaims "Philosophy is a sickness of the mind." In Ludwig Wittgenstein's most well known work (and probably most important) Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus, Wittgenstein states, "Most of the propositions and questions to be found in philosophical works are not false but nonsensical. Most of the propositions and questions of philosophers arise from our failure to understand the logic of our language." In a sense, Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus can be looked at as the most honest work on philosophy ever written (of course, not that I have read all works of philosophy). Whereas Friedrich Nietzsche is often praised for his skill and talent in regards to aesthetics (although having many times contradicted himself philosophically), Ludwig Wittgenstein's form of philosophy seems to have been strictly utilitarian. In Jarman's Wittgenstein, the character of Ludwig Wittgenstein goes into exaggerated self-parody-like rants against both philosophy and language, making the film most interesting as an introduction to the work and life of Wittgenstein.

After seeing the historical-fiction film When Nietzsche Wept on Friedrich Nietzsche not too long ago, an embarrassing flick-able flick indeed, I can easily say that Jarman's Wittgenstein may possibly be the best film ever made about a philosopher, not that that says much. Certainly, Derek Jarman has an immense care for his subject in Wittgenstein, even if he did not attempt to portray the man any where near to his full complexity. As for how the film was constructed, Wittgenstein is surely its own cinematic league, just like the philosopher himself. Just don't expect an in depth analysis of the Wittgenstein's work and theories, but instead an artistic tribute to a man that surely deserves it.

A SORE FOR SIGHTED EYES

Derrick Beckles (2006)

Imagine if you will, a collection of dirty 80's and 90's vignettes, fused into each other flawlessly. Synced to match the theme and beat of various musical performances. TV Carnage has created another goldmine out of stale clips that make us realize how superficial humanity can be at times; A video mixtape for the non-believers. Race relations and political dismay are featured in glowing Technicolor. If i have to applaud one thing, be it accidental or not, It would be for making Negroes look cancerous to our society. The lavish scenes showing rap music's effect on cultures, politics, and even religion can be of a shock. Barbie dolls turned urban called Flava's are just asking us to raise our children to be sluts and have an "attitude" This particular scene switches into a horrendous rap project by the Chicago Bear's very own Mike Ditka."Hail Satan!" Colin Powell presents himself in a crown and dancing amongst a stage, rapping about some odd things. Richard Simmons is the commentator for obesity and the gateway for heaven. Just as Little Nicky demonstrated with a Chicago record; You can pull an amazingly creepy effect from anything. The editing is amazing and grounds many tactics to heighten the comedy in the scenes. In instance, John Ritter cries while watching a retarded Rosie O'Donnell on a bus. Whether you laugh at Garth Brooks cheering on a tumbling retard at a track race or have an affinity for alcoholic robots, This collection can either be treated as a hilarious tour throughout bizzare culture or a dangerous tool aiding a racial Armageddon. And Romero thinks his film has commentary? Don't make me laugh.

Dick Maas (1986)

Out of all the peoples of Europe, the Dutch seem to be the least interested in attracting international audiences with their films despite the fact that most people from the Netherlands speak better English than most Americans and would have no trouble creating films that both yanks and Brits can understand. Of course, Paul Verhoeven successfully made the transition from being a Dutch art-house auteur to a master of reasonably clever Hollywood blockbusters, but he is an exception. If there is a Dutch filmmaker that has tried his damndest to make reasonably Hollywood-esque genre flicks with big stupid car explosions, crude humor, and elaborate chase scenes that are specially tailored to appeal to a mainstream international audience, it is writer, director, producer, and composer Dick Maas (Amsterdammed, Sint aka Saint Nick), whose works have managed to gain respectable cult-followings, including his 'killer elevator' flick De lift (1983) aka The Lift (which the director later remade in English as The Shaft (2001) aka Down starring Naomi Watts) and especially his proudly lowbrow comedy Flodder (1986) aka Welfare Party aka Les Lavigueur déménagent, which managed to spawn two sequels, as well as a fairly long-running spin-off TV series. To be fairly blatant, Flodder is the Dutch equivalent of trash Hollywood kosher comedies featuring Hebraic hogs like Seth Rogen and Jonah Hill, albeit minus the incessant Jew jokes and borderline homoerotic scatological humor. Also, as a work with genuinely politically incorrect humor that savagely satires the lunacy of the Dutch welfare state, Maas' film is a tad bit more sophisticated than the typical neo-vaudevillian swill that is incessantly defecated out of Tinseltown. Indeed, like The Beverly Hillbillies meets National Lampoon's Animal House (1978) with a shade or two of Fast Times at Ridgemont High (1982), this sometimes delightfully despicable piece of socially scathing celluloid trash depicts the hysterical hilarity that ensues when a typically weak and scrawny idealistic liberal social worker coerces the city council of Amsterdam to move a vulgar and antisocial white trash criminal family into the most affluent neighborhood in the city after it emerges that the eponymous lumpenprole family's state-owned house is located next to a toxic waste dump. Although admittedly sometimes annoyingly formulaic and just plain retarded, Flodder offers the viewer the singular celluloid fantasy of seeing both the death of the liberal humanist dream in the form of the ultimate 'tokkie' untermenschen trash dynasty.

Short, swarthy, bald, and weasel-like social worker Jacques "Sjakie" van Kooten (Lou Landré) seems to believe, like commie true believers and other 'useful idiot' types whose idealism tends to be exploited by various sorts of schemers (ranging from authoritarian regimes to welfare queens), that humans are completely malleable and he is on an insanely idealistic mission to prove it by proposing the 'zany' social experiment of moving a poor criminal family into Amsterdam's most prestigious upper-class neighborhood, Zonnedaal, which is inhabited by a number of doctors and high-ranking military officers. Against the better judgement of the Amsterdam city council, Sjakie manages to let the delinquent Flodder family move into the upscale neighborhood after their dilapidated government-owned humble abode is deemed condemned after a toxic waste dump is found nearby. Like virtually all white trash families, the Flodders have no patriarch and are led by a morbidly obese matriarch named Ma Flodder (Nelly Frijda) who has five bastard kids of varying ages that all have different fathers, including Johnny (Maas regular Huub Stapel), brother Kees (René van 't Hof), sister Kees (played by Croatian-Dutch model, singer, and Playboy Playmate Tatjana Šimić aka 'Tatjana'), Toet (Nani Lehnhausen), and Henkie (Horace Cohen). 27-year-old Johnny is the oldest of the tribe and like many backwards proles, he has a fashion sense that is a couple decades behind as demonstrated by his red jacket and blue jeans à la James Dean in Rebel Without a Cause (1955). Kees is a shameless slut with a bad blonde dye job who is buggered at night by her seemingly half-retarded brother with the same name. The youngest preteen brother Henkie also sometimes likes to pimp his sister Kees out to anyone that is willing to pay, so long as they have cold hard cash. Aside from Ma and the kids, a wheelchair-bound mute fellow named 'Grandpa Flodder' (Jan Willem Hees) who is not actually related to the family, suffers from dementia, and has a childlike toy train obsession, as well as a murderously violent black Bouvier des Flandres dog named 'Whisky,' also belongs to the family. The Flodders may not have much in terms of brains, common sense, personal hygiene, material wealth, or fashion sense, but they are hopelessly loyal to one another and can survive anything, including the passive-aggressive wrath of the superlatively 'stiff' Dutch bourgeoisie.

Like many low class individuals, Ma Flodder, like her children, is completely oblivious to her glaring trashiness and self-righteously asks her social worker Sjakie upon seeing her new luxury home, "Is this a good neighborhood? I don't want to lower myself." Luckily, Ma's kids are slightly more perceptive regarding their surroundings and immediately begin hitting on hot twat blonde teen bourgeois babes that live in the neighborhood, thus starting a sort of unofficial civil war between the Flodder brother and local preppie boys that wear really lame baby blue sweaters. In fact, after brother Kees spends a little too long staring at two blondes playing tennis while fantasizing that they are unclad, he suffers a beating from a gang of malicious preppie pansies, so Johnny decides to chase down the posh pricks in his pink convertible in a wild and wacky chase scene that ultimately results in the rich kids crashing their luxury automobile in a swimming pool. When the feisty yet sexually repressed wife of a seemingly impotent authoritarian military officer named Colonel Wim Kruisman (Herbert Flack) causes a minor fender bender with Johnny's car, the untermensch gentleman refuses to take money from the little lady and instead takes her card instead so he can defile her later. Indeed, Johnny and Yolanda Kruisman (played by Dutch supermodel Apollonia van Ravenstein) start a lurid love affair. Meanwhile, sister Kees seduces her car dealer neighbor Ed Neuteboom (Bert André) while her brother takes polaroids. Naturally, Johnny and his brothers use the pictures to blackmail their neighbor Ed into giving them a free sports car. Meanwhile, Colonel Kruisman gives Yolanda a nice punch in the face after he catches his wifey cheating on him, so she packs her bags and moves in with the Flodders. With the 'tokkie' menace rising in the neighborhood, Colonel Kruisman sets up a plan called 'Operation Stanley' to ethnically cleanse the poor degenerates from their high-class hood. Of course, the Flodders will not go down without a fight, or something resembling one.

When Grandpa Flodder is accidentally killed after getting a little too close to one of his beloved railroads, the Flodder family finds themselves rich after finding tons of money hidden in the old man's toy trains, so they end up buying the fancy house they live in. Meanwhile, all the people in the neighborhood have a secret town meeting where they plot to rid themselves of the Flodder scum from their squeaky clean neighborhood, but when Johnny and Yolanda come by and reveal that they are engaged to be married, the bourgeois schemers find themselves in a precarious situation as 'one of their own' has decided to side with the enemy. Not one to make enemies or to hold a grudge, Johnny also invites all the neighbors to attend his engagement party and they all reluctantly decide to attend. Needless to say, the the Flodder family proves to be a bad influence on the mostly puritanical neighbors, who find themselves delighting in a sleazy cocktail of prole-approved sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll. For instance, a group of men including underage teens and effete 60+-year-old men, line up at a door to take turns screwing sister Kees, whose little brother Henkie acts as her pimp and takes money from the horny men at the door. The Flodder hound Whisky also has fun at the party by eating one of the neighbor's cutesy ankle-biters. In the end, virtually every single neighbor gets high, drunk, and/or fucked. As for Colonel Kruisman, he is not too happy about his wife leaving him for a gutter-bred low-life, so he gets good and drunk and decides to destroy the Flodder house with a tank that he has stolen from his military base. While the Colonel blows up the Flodder home and thus ends their hyper hedonistic hick party in the process, the family takes the tragedy in good humor as proud poor people who have learned to live in chaos and destruction.

Unquestionably, I would like to see a remake of Flodder featuring a Moroccan Islamist family moving into an upperclass neighborhood full of idealistic and politically incorrect white liberals who, instead of rejecting their new neighbors like in the original film, attempt to embrace them and ultimately receive a rude awakening that tests their phony humanistic faith. Unfortunately, both the sequels Flodder in Amerika! (1992) aka Flodder Does Manhattan! and Flodder Forever (1995) aka Flodder 3, as well as the long-running Flodder series(1993-1998), are not much more than retarded cliché-ridden recyclings of the raunchy ideas, tropes, jokes, and chase scenes of the original film, thus reflecting 'auteur' Dick Maas' deep-seated desire to sell out as a sort of Dutch John Carpenter, albeit more degenerate and boob-obsessed. Rather curiously, Maas' hit cult comedy was one of the sixteen films added to the prestigious Canon of Dutch Cinema (aka 'Canon van de Nederlandse Film'). Indeed, Flodder was selected as one of the sixteen most monumental Dutch films of all time in a list that includes classic, experimental, avant-garde, and arthouse works, including the ancient silent slapstick short The Misadventure of a French Gentleman Without Pants at the Zandvoort Beach (1905) co-directed by Willy Mullens and Alberts Frères, the celluloid 'city symphony' Regen (1929) aka Rain co-directed by Mannus Franken and commie propagandist Joris Ivens, the Willem Frederik Hermans adaptation Als twee druppels water (1963) aka Like Two Drops of Water directed by Fons Rademakers, Blind Kind (1964) directed by master documentarian Johan van der Keuken, the gorgeously grotesque short Living (1971) directed by Frans Zwartjes, Turks fruit (1973) aka Turkish Delight directed by Paul Verhoeven, and De Noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners directed by Alex van Warmerdam. Artistically speaking, The Northerners (which, incidentally, was produced by Maas) is the alpha and Flodder is the omega in terms of Dutch celluloid comedies, though I can almost see why the latter was included in the Canon of Dutch Cinema as it represents post-WWII Holland at its most obscenely deracinated and Americanized, which is important when attempting to understand the deleterious effects of yank hegemony, as well as the preposterous Dutch welfare state.

JEW-BOY LEVI

Didi Danquart (1999)

During the late-1960s/early-1970s anti-Heimat films—student movement-approved left-wing works that mocked and ridiculed the distinctly Germanic and highly popular Heimatfilm (which spanned roughly from the late-1940s to the early-1970s) of yesteryear—were rather popular with top filmmakers of German New Cinema, with directors including (but certainly not limited to) Rainer Werner Fassbinder (The Niklashausen Journey, Pioneers of Ingolstadt), Werner Herzog (Herz aus Glas aka Heart of Glass), Wim Wenders (The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick), Volker Schlöndorff (Michael Kohlhaas - Der Rebell, The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach), Herbert Achternbusch (Bierkampf, Heilt Hitler! aka Heal Hitler!), Walter Bockmayer (Flammende Herzen aka Flaming Hearts, Geierwally), and Peter Fleischmann (Hunting Scenes from Bavaria, The Hamburg Syndrome) contributing works to the homeland-hating Teutonic anti-genre. Of course, like any genre/subgenre, the anti-Heimatfilm may have died long ago, but every once in a while some nostalgic (or, in some cases, anti-nostalgic) auteur will unearth the conventions of the genre, including a revival of sorts during the late-1980s/early-1990s, with Stefan Ruzowitzky's The Inheritors (1998) aka Die Siebtelbauern and Peter Kern's Haider lebt – 1. April 2021 (2002) being rather contrasting examples of this Germanic cinema phenomenon. Undoubtedly, the Hollywood-esque German-Swiss-Austrian co-production Viehjud Levi (1999) aka Jew-Boy Levi, directed by documentarian turned TV hack Didi Danquart (The Pannwitz Stare, Offset) and adapted from the 1980 Thomas Strittmatter play of the same name, is the most superlatively soulless, aesthetically and thematically superficial, and exceedingly ethnomasochistic contribution to the anti-Heimat film style that I have had the greatly grating mis-experience of suffering. In fact, Jew-Boy Levi is not only a hatred-stirring anti-Heimat film, but also a sort anti-Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984) celluloid polemic that callously contradicts the so-called 'apologetic' tone of Edgar Reitz's film. Indeed, like Reitz's magnum opus Heimat, which was criticized by a number of film critics because it did not wallow on the holocaust, Jew-Boy Levi features an anti-social character named Paul who is the only one in his village that is tired of rural life and has the desire to travel outside the country, but the similarities stop there as Danquart's libelous and mundanely minimalistic lynch mob flick features liberal-sired stereotyped 'archetypes' as opposed to likeable idiosyncratic country characters like its celluloid nemesis. Featuring a wandering Jew with a heart of gold, a psychopathic National Socialist bureaucrat, a lecherous Nazi whore who is willing to betray her man for random man-meat, boorish beer-addled bullies who attack with the proclivities of rabid German Shepherds, and various kraut moral cowards who jump on the Hitlerite bandwagon to appease the greater folk, Jew-Boy Levi is the sort of deluded and ultimately botched philistine wet dream that has been made especially to appeal to the most idiotic of the goyim as a innately insulting work that makes Hollywood agitprop pieces like Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993) and The Boy in the Striped Pajamas (2008) seem super thematically sophisticated by comparison.

Taking the first word of its German title, 'Viehjud', from a derogatory word for a Hebrew in the cattle trade, Jew-Boy Levi features a conspicuously contrived world ostensibly set in the Black Forest region of Germany in 1935 before most Jews were forced to concentrate in concentration camps. Traveling Jew boy Benjamin Levi (Swiss actor Bruno Cathomas) has just come back from a long stay in the Rhineland and has set his semi-Asiatic eyes on a farmer named Andreas Horger's (Georg Olschewski) underage waitress daughter Lisbeth (Caroline Ebner), but so has an antisocial, unemployed bum named Paul Braxmeier (Bernd Michael Lade), who does not make a suitable suitor for the little lass, at least according to the girl's parents. Aside from a couple of joking remarks, none of the sternly Catholic inhabitants of the Black Forest village care about the fact that Levi is a member of god's chosen tribe, but that all changes when a Nazi engineer named Fabian Kohler (Ulrich Noethen), who moonlights as a hack magician, and his crew of Reichsarbeitsdienst brownshirted thugs come to the area to build roads and whatnot for the great Reich. The first sign that things are getting heavy in the hinterland is when Levi's farmer friend Andreas Horger opts for slaughtering a calf instead of selling it to him in what is an allegorical scene alluding to the holocaust (or something). Meanwhile, prick Paul seduces but then rejects engineer Kohler's whore girlfriend/secretary Neuner (Martina Gedeck, who is probably best known for portraying Ulrike Meinhof in The Baader Meinhof Complex (2008)), which puts him on the shit list with the nazi nymphomaniac. On top of that, Paul replaces a rabbit with brown scheiss in Kohler's magic hat (thus embarrassing the humorless Nazi in front of a live peasant audience), which results in him getting a beatdown from some nefarious nazi hoods. When Levi has something stolen from him, he makes the moronic mistake of going to anti-kosher Kohler for help and is told that he is "nothing" and thus his problems mean nothing. A simpleminded man who loves singing Yiddish songs to his beloved pet rabbit, Levi is in for a horrendous shock when he discovers that someone has beheaded his hare and left it in a bloody sack for him to discover. Needless to say, virtually all of the inhabitants of the village turn on Levi, including farmer Horger and his wife Kresenz (lapsed Fassbinder superstar Eva Mattes in a rather unflattering role), who initially encouraged their daughter Lisbeth's romance with the Judaic gentleman due to his wealth. In the end, all the local yokels gang up on Levi and aggressively attempt to get him to sing a Nazi song instead of a Yiddish one, but luckily Lisbeth pulls out a shotgun, thus enabling the Hebrew to make his great escape on his beloved motorcycle. Indeed, while not depicted in the film, one can only assume Levi made his way to America to make his fortune and eventually sue the Germans for reparations after the Second World War for the major marxist crime of micro-aggression.

Featuring swinish kraut hicks getting old retarded men drunk by force-feeding them alcohol, a kindly Hebrew treating his braindead gentile neighbors to lavish gifts, a half-retarded farmer nonsensically remarking to his Jewish friend "Christian Jews are worse than real Jews. If you weren't a Jew, you'd be the worst Christian Jew," 'outsiders' like midgets and kosher country boys portraying the only likeable characters, and nazi villains with less depth than the eponymous dumb blonde villain of Ilsa, She Wolf of the SS (1975), Jew-Boy Levi is ultimately nothing short of an innately insult work, no matter what your intelligence level and/or political persuasion is. In its damning depiction of the German collective as a mindless mass of meek followers who can be easily coerced into hating Jews in a second's time as if so-called anti-Semitism is an intrinsic element of the German character that can be atavistically reawakened at any time, Jew-Boy Levi is the spirit of anti-kraut/anti-Catholic jude-boi Daniel Goldhagen's ahistorical Teutophobic polemic Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust (1996). Aesthetically speaking, Jew-Boy Levi seems like it was directed by an autistic eunuch who would rather direct children's fantasy films than serious German arthouse films. In short, Jew-Boy Levi is probably the worst German film I have ever seen and this is coming from someone who has viewed Good Bye, Lenin! (2003) and one or two of Alois Brummer's low-camp Bavarian blue movies. In its strategically dumbed down depiction of a rural German microcosm, the message of Jew-Boy Levi is 'stupid barbaric krauts betrayed and scapegoated exceedingly generous and morally pristine Jews that they had the distinguished honor of being in the company of.' Undoubtedly, Jew-Boy Levi is symptomatic of why real Heimat films no longer exist in the Fatherland, as it is the repugnant expression of a mentally colonized and culturally-distorted people who have been spiritually cuckolded by ethno-masochistic excrement like Danquart's dauntingly deluded and debasing film. Indeed, maybe director Danquart can learn a thing or two from Veit Harlan about how to execute more subtle cinematic propaganda.

FLAMING EARS

Dietmar Schipek (1992)

Indeed, there might not be a lot of cyber-dyke films floating around in semen-sanitized cinematic cesspools in the world, but one thing you can count on with these curiously and even creepily carnal celluloid works, aside from featuring some of the most aesthetically displeasing leafless and lecherous lesbian ladies, is some of the most wonderfully weird and decisively deranged cinematic scenarios ever captured on celluloid and the Austrian film Flaming Ears (1992) aka Rote Ohren fetzen durch Asche is certainly no exception to this rule. Co-directed by A. Hans Scheirl of Dandy Duß (1998) infamy, as well as fellow cunt-licking compatriots Ursula Puerrer and Dietmar Schipek, all of whom appear in this delightfully depraved dystopian dyke celluloid nachtmahr as some sort of s/he-miss-creation 'character' of sorts, Flaming Ears is a fiercely frenzied and freakish feast for the eyes and ears from the morally adverse and positively perverse perspective of three Sapphic sickos. Shot on surprisingly strikingly Super 8 film stock and blown up to 16mm, it is a film that has an exceedingly erratic and eccentric essence all its own, although Flaming Ears does owe much to German lesbian auteuress Ulrike Ottinger (Madame X: An Absolute Ruler, Freak Orlando) who undoubtedly acted as a spiritual mother of sorts for the film with her uncompromising works of lovingly lewd lezzy libertinism of the actively avant-garde yet equally terribly trashy kind. Described in an interview by co-director Scheirl as being about "female lone warriors, and they try to live their lives as intensely as possible and thus collide with each other somehow. It's a matter of life and death. And love" and her cunning linguist queer compeer Puerrer as "Sheroes, fighters! Surrealistic figures, sex, violence - perpetrators in general. Always women, and they concentrate on themselves and on their greed," Flaming Ears is certainly a crass yet curiously charming celluloid oddity – a sort of lesbian equivalent to William S. Burroughs' seemingly unfilmable novel The Wild Boys: A Book of the Dead (1971) – about lubricous and sometimes lethal lezzy fantasies run amok and a mentally-ravaging romance film for the raging and rampaging rug munchers from hell.

For as long as I can remember, when it came to criminally-inclined, crude, cretinous and otherwise combative women, they tended to be bodacious bulldykes of the ostensibly born-brazen persuasion. If one were to look into the deep unconscious and most wild dreams of these balls-to-the-wall butch ballbusters of the lady-licking variety, it might resemble the Sapphic sadomasochistic surrealism of Flaming Ears, albeit of the austere Austrian aberrosexual Aryaness variety. In fact, co-auteur A. Hans Scheirl described the film as being, "contrary to the psychological cinema, where actors tell stories, we depict inner states with cinematic means." Set in the unforeseeable future in the year 2700 – the "year of the toads" – in the fantastic dystopian dyke city of "Asche"; a realm darker both visually and thematically than either of Joel Schumacher's unabashedly pan-sified, homoerotic Batman flicks, Flaming Ears is the type of intensely intemperate and preposterously wacked-out work of abnormal yet audacious celluloid artistry that could have only been assembled by individuals so depraved, so uninhibited, and so penetratingly perverse that to call the film 'contrived' and or 'weird for weird's sake' would be a display of gross ignorance that would be akin to labeling Tarantino a cinematic artist and Herbert Achternbusch a sentimentalist. Almost as impenetrable as the most esoteric high-camp works of Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Day of the Idiots) and queer junky alpha-Beat writer William S. Burroughs' final trilogy of novels "The Red Night Trilogy," Flaming Ears is a work of exceedingly sordid cinematic artistry that takes no prisoners, sort of in the same spirit as a lustful serial killer amidst a national murdering spree. Essentially, centering around three mentally unstable lesbians with the kind of commanding will power that only people with serious pathologies display, including Valley (Ursula Puerrer); a "fighting diva" of the particularly perverse pyromaniac persuasion who sports a pseudo-cock-and-balls that dangle from her crotch, Spy (Susana Helmayr); a comic book artist and the most 'ladylike' (I use this term extremely loosely) of three, and Nun (A. Hans Scheirl); an Aryan alien with an unhealthy fetish for reptiles, Flaming Ears is not held together by a deeply discernible plot or subplots, aside from lunatic lesbian rivalries that initially sparked with the burning of a comicbook-printing factory, but its original and sometimes aesthetically odious hodgepodge of archaic yet visually arresting stop-motion animation, amateur Nekes-esque special effects, and sickening, senseless, and sardonic scenarios of sexual skankery. Needless to say, if you find the early films of John Waters, Andy Warhol, and Paul Morrissey to be too degrading, stay quite clear of those frisky, feral, and fecund-free Flaming Ears.

With ridiculous lines of dapper diesel dyke romanticism like "the revolution of love is bloody" (surely, a period pun!), "my honey is a scumbag sheer lunacy," and "I just love to fondle the jewels of your fantasies," Flaming Ears is surely a work that is out of this world – both literally and figuratively – but with lines like, "good to have a girlfriend with humor," it is a cinematic work of psychosexual sadism that is not a totally alien affair. Despite every logical signal to the contrary, co-director Ursula Puerrer stated of her character in the film, "I am Volley. As simple as that. And Volley loves precision, ease, aggression, devotion and wit. I live in a special world, and I walk through the so-called world heavily armed." Indeed, I have no doubt that Flaming Ears is a cinematic depiction of Puerrer and the other two lady-lad directors' most flagrant and fiendish female-flesh-fondling fantasies, hence the film's profoundly poles apart persuasion. Like an unholy marriage between Jack Smith's Normal Love (1963), Steven F. Arnold's Luminous Procuress (1971), Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982) and Richard Elfman's Forbidden Zone (1982), except on an even lower budget as directed by Ulrike Ottinger and Monika Treut while intoxicated on a merry mix of mescaline and methamphetamines, Flaming Ears is ultimately only really comparable to co-director A. Hans Scheirl's subsequent and sole solo feature-length cinematic effort Dandy Duſt (1998); an overwhelmingly wacky, morally wretched, and aesthetically insane work that arguably makes her previous work seem tame by comparison. Featuring surreal rollerskating, debauched god's pissing from the sky, raunchy reptile-based gluttony, sexual fetishism for furniture, dashing dyke dancing, prideful displays of penis envy, carpet-munching martyrdom, and vicious displays of lesbo-on-lesbo hate crimes, Flaming Ears makes for a jolly old good time in a dystopian cyber-dyke wasteland. As co-director Dietmar Schipek stated at the end of an interview: "Film is risk and danger. I like to expose myself to danger. The viewer, by the way, as well. Because only under exceptional conditions can you produce unconditional films. Only when utter dedication can be felt, will the film have transformed into reality, and leaving the cinema will become a lasting discovery: 'What is actually happening to oneself?'" I do not know about other people who have watched Flaming Ears, but it brought me to the epiphany that I would never want to live under a futuristic fascist lesbian dictatorship under any circumstances.

PERTH

"Singapore's answer to Taxi Driver" boasts the snarling cover of a DVD copy of Perth that I picked up at Blockbuster for a mere $3.99. Surely this film should be worth the price of an overpriced 40 oz. of your favorite malt liquor? Such as point-of-subject Harry Lee's life designed of squalor, Blockbuster is too feeling the effects of a dissolving structure of which nothing can be done about it. To try as I might to not juxtapose with relative ease of both the video rental market and Harry Lee's pointless aspirations to be a "simple man," Perth isn't so much an "answer to Taxi Driver" as it is a film undoubtedly inspired but during the climax of the film's somber moments, it's nothing more than a kind nod with meticulous moments of glory mixed in conservatively with instances of poor directing. Besides, isn't it a bit too late to have an "answer" to Taxi Driver? Martin Scorsese's break out hit is almost 30 years Perth's senior. In Perth, a chart of disgruntled humanity is slowly chalked out as the camera unabashedly follows a little over a week in the life of ex-security guard Harry Lee. What unfolds next is an arbitrary tour into why he bludgeons his wife silly, why she deserves this cruel treatment, and why this film has been hailed as "Singapore's most violent film." The answers to these questions are both complicated in narrative and fairly mundane. I like to view Perth as a response to whores across the world. It doesn't require culture shock to plainly realize that race doesn't necessarily hamper in any way womenfolk's shortcomings as they are designed to be lyrical tormentors. Lim Kay Tong does an impeccable job at portraying the sneering "misogynist" Harry Lee, a man driven over the edge in part to combat flashbacks and a cheating, gambling wife who I believe deserves every fist planted into her frail, oriental body.

Harry Lee dreams of being a simple man who wishes to immigrate to Perth, Australia. Having recently been laid off, he'll have to escort call girls around for that extra cash. While the build up and eventual connection he makes with forced prostitute Mai recalls heavily of Taxi Driver, the film couldn't have a more separate taste in theme. Mai and Harry Lee aren't so different - after Mai's family got in debt deep, they apparently sent her off to hook off her body to earn their family's keep. It's this recurring theme of gambling and unfaithfulness that sets the tone early for this slowburn of rage cinema. Unlike most films bordering on the same topic of bottled contempt and forays into copious amounts of alcohol, Perth is frightfully slow. So creeping in fact, that you become anxious waiting for the violence to kick in. We're teased at first with spousal abuse but then that teasing becomes petting with a broken bottle jab. If Perth does one thing right, it's keeping your attention without expunging any of the glory so early. When this scene of violence finally explodes into a machete fight, my initial reaction was a resounding "fuck yes." Given the scenes regarding Harry Lee's past combat experience as a commando, I was sure to see some incredible display of career prowess that had might returned to this man with nothing to lose. However, what I received is a scene only comparable to watching a blind man attempt to bust open a pinata. Harry Lee can not wield a machete for the life of him, literally. This scene did feature a couple of satisfying kills but nothing too abrasive for me. Asia Extreme Underground noted that Perth is "Singapore's most violent film" and on that note, I would have to believe this is the only Singaporean film with violence. Perth is a very engaging display of the ole' "descent-into-madness" character drama that every director attempts to make but capturing anarchic behavior that seems fluid and perverse isn't as easy as these directors wish. I happened to enjoy Perth for many reasons and none of these included the feeble finish. As much as I hate to admit it, I think Perth only deserves a single viewing, if you even have the attention-span to watch an Asiatic Harvey Keitel travel around with aviators and bitch about "loyalty."

DOLPH LUNDGREN IS THE KILLING MACHINE

Dolph Lundgren (2010)

Parallel to the release of the super-sized fast food sandwich we know as The Expendables, Dolph Lundgren retitled his courteous family-man/contract killer crime epic from Icarus to Dolph Lundgren is The Killing Machine. While this may look well on paper, this scraps the only semblance of a serious notion towards duplicating A Bittersweet Life in parts and Taken in others, in favor for an expose worshipping this real-life bad-ass. What we get is what we hoped for (we being classic 80s Dolph fans), not much akin to Dark Angel or Universal Soldier, Icarus is the very similar stoic combat-grizzled Soviet who has it out for whoever is wronging him. Owing almost the entire screen time to other films who have done this before and to a better advantage, Icarus never ceases being an anti-intellectual statement and a violent popcorn piece that gives you a merit badge in villainous ways to dispatch your foes. I may never look at a bench press again. Thanks for that, Dolph.

The bizarre thing is that while I do not condone the title switch it does seem to benefit from it, quality wise. Watching this film under the guise of Icarus pro-lapses the tale into comical austerity from which it never recovers being a DTV film for its own sake. However, as Dolph Lundgren is The Killing Machine, some nostalgic protective aura enshrouds the film giving it that root-for-utter-destruction edge that it needs to survive the continuous landslide that is direct to video sales. Under the moniker of both titles, the film still presents the superfluous tale of a father who has never been there for his family . . . because he assassinates "marks." Struggling to juggle his family and work life proves to be too great for Icarus (Dolph) and he finds himself the target of an old comrade for which penance and comradeship is not enough. Mix in random spices of post-KGB Russian conflict and you got yourself a translucent, yet enjoyable film capable of combing the cheese romance from Commando and creating a hybrid with some gruesome key scenes of cheek-ripping and face-crushing Dolph at his elderly physical peak. As the film progresses, the producers, I assume, decide to barrage us with thinly conceived narration from Dolph explaining in pseudo-enlightened prose that he has to redeem himself amongst other contrived soliloquies. Upon hearing that he originally intended for his character to be a villain akin to his excellent role as Gunnar Jensen in The Expendables and that his producers denied his request due to sales, It occurred to me that Dolph is a mere puppet to his financial backings which must be a reason in declined quality. Dolph Lundgren was permitted 18 days to complete principal photography and didn't approve of the producers cut, which is what we are viewing. Had Mr. Lundgren has his way, I'm sure we'd all be enjoying a fastidious ode to what Dolph Lundgren really wants to convey with his villainy; a meditating crime tycoon who indulges in the very savagery that made him so prominent as an 80s action star who achieved critical success with his video rentals.

Icarus has several things on its belt, I'll admit. With the exceptional acting chops of the Stefanie von Pfetten (who is also a smelting pot on the eyes) and Lindsay Maxwell whose supple nipples must be the size of a "baby's fingernail", the film boasts strong female and male performances rounding out with a surprise role of Bo Svenson as the past come back to haunt Dolph. Icarus isn't a great film but its entertainment value is worth its weight in gold. I could find myself re-watching some of the exceptional shoot out scenes and replay some of the iconic deaths of the unfaltering waves of henchmen to my hearts delight. Icarus isn't a film that had to be made but now that it is here I graciously accept this gift for what it is; a film by Dolph Lundgren about Dolph Lundgren. I'm sure many of you can complain about the handcam quality but for what it is worth, Dolph sure is menacing toting a Remington 870 and I hungrily look forward to this brutes reemergence in the video scene. I believe I'm going to coin the term "dolphsterpiece" from here on out.

Dominic Sena (2000)

As far as I am concerned, McJew auteur John Frankenheimer (Birdman of Alcatraz, The Island of Dr. Moreau) reached the height of his artistic prowess as a filmmaker with his psych-out semi-psychedelic flick Seconds (1966), the final chapter in the director's 'Paranoia Trilogy' (following The Manchurian Candidate (1962) and Seven Days in May (1964)). Based on the lesser known 1963 novel of the same name written by David Ely and featuring luscious black-and-white cinematography by Academy Award winning Chinese-American cinematographer James Wong Howe (Hangmen Also Die, Sweet Smell of Success), Seconds is a sort of de-teutonized, Hollywoodized counter-culture taken on Goethe's Faust with an anti-bourgeois leftist twist about a somewhat past middle-aged banker who gets hooked up with a dubious 'word-of-mouth' company that helps him fake his own death and gives him a new identity, including a new face via state-of-the-art plastic surgery. In keeping with the film's theme of 'rebirth,' Seconds quite notably features a number of communist blacklisted actors whose careers had been destroyed in the 1950s in primary roles, including Jeff Corey, Will Geer, and John Randolph, thus demonstrating director Frankenheimer's solidarity with the left and his cold war anti-anti-communist sentiments, which he previously made quite clear with his most popular flick The Manchurian Candidate, but especially with Seven Days in May. Of course, being an idiosyncratic and phantasmagoric dystopian flick of sorts that is equal doses psychological thriller, horror, and science fiction, Seconds may be a work of passive leftist counter-culture agitation, but it is also a patently pessimistic, unwaveringly nightmarish, and even somewhat nihilistic work that offers no answers to the questions it asks, ultimately ending on a rather negative note that is bound to haunt viewers, myself included. In fact, Seconds had such a deleterious effect on Brian Wilson, the manic-depressive schizo master songwriter of the Beach Boys, that he thought the film was talking directly to him (to his credit, the character is named 'Mr. Wilson') and it caused the songwriter to abort his concept album Smile, which went unfinished for almost four decades (though he released various forms of the album in 2004 and 2011). Indeed, as far as films go, Seconds is a high-strung schizophrenic's worst celluloid nightmare as a sort of eerie expressionist piece of pernicious cinematic paranoia that is bound to ruin even the most stoic of optimists' days, yet it is also an aesthetically pleasing and atmospheric work that demands ritualistic re-viewings. Starring masculine old school Hollywood homo heartthrob Rock Hudson in an unconventional lead role where the actor does not appear onscreen until around 40 minutes into the film, Seconds is a rare work from Tinseltown with a degree of artistic merit that is rightfully now regarded as a cult classic.

may be a Harvard graduate who makes a decent living and has done financially well for himself, as well as his wife and grown daughter, but he is a walking corpse of sorts whose soul seems to have died a slow death long ago. Finding next to nil love nor solace in his faithful wife and rarely seeing his married adult daughter, Arthur just walks through life like a nameless and faceless ghost who is rarely noticed by anyone, so after receiving a phone call from a college friend, Charlie Evans (Murray Hamilton), that he thought died long ago regarding a underground corporation that offers the possibility of a 'rebirth' with a new identity, the banker considers his options. Through Charlie, Arthur is hooked up with the word-of-mouth company simply known as "The Company" that offers to provide customers a new life and identity for the measly sum of $30,000, which includes the faking of one's death and plastic surgery. Eventually, Arthur is brought to the secret location of the Company, whose secretary drugs the banker's tea. When Arthur wakes up, a fried-chicken-licking executive of the company, Mr. Ruby (Jeff Corey), shows the banker footage of himself seemingly raping a young nubile girl, which is used as blackmail were the rather reluctant customer to pass on the identity-changing operation. After realizing he might go to jail for rape, as well as talking to the seemingly nice owner of the company, 'The Old Man' (Will Geer), Arthur reluctantly decides to go through with the procedure and wakes up as a very haggard looking yet much more youthful Rock Hudson. Rechristened 'Antiochus 'Tony' Wilson' (Rock Hudson), the lapsed banker, whose death has been staged by the Company in a hotel fire using a cadaver resembling his own body, has now taken on the identity of a successful degenerate artist with a lavish home in Malibu, California and a groveling personal manservant, so life seems to be looking up for the protagonist, or so he hopes. Eventually, 'Tony Wilson' starts a relationship with a somewhat ominous blonde babe named Nora Marcus (Salome Jens), who takes the reborn 'artist' to a neo-pagan bacchanalian grape-stomping/winemaking orgy where the ex-banker loses his 'beatnik virginity' and gets wild and naked, but all good things must come to an end, especially after being reborn as someone you're innately not (have you ever heard of an artistic banker or a true artist that is good with managing money?!).

Unfortunately, things soon get ugly for Arthur-turned-Tony when he hosts a happening party at his new swinging pad and gets so plastered on some fine firewater that he reveals to his guests about his former identity as bourgeois boob Arthur Hamilton. Unbeknownst to Tony, many of his guests/neighbors are also 'reborns' who utilized the secretive services of the Company and they don't take kindly to a newcomer going around revealing such sensitive esoteric information in such a reckless manner. Worst of all, Tony learns that his sensual sweetheart Nora is not a sweetheart at all, but a manipulative wench who has been employed by the company to be his full-time quasi-callgirl girlfriend. Unsurprisingly upset upon learning of these rather regrettable revelations, Tony decides to revisit his former wife (Frances Reid) from his previous life under his new persona (pretending he is a friend of the ostensibly deceased Arthur Hamilton) and discovers from the widow that their marriage failed because he was a soulless and vapid workaholic who put social prestige and material possessions before love and family matters. Determined to start all over again and be reborn for a second time, Arthur-as-Tony asks the Company for a new identity/body, but to do so he must provide them with a new name of an individual he knows that might also want to be reborn. As Tony/Arthur learns, his friend Charlie Evans was required to 'sponsor' a friend to get a new identity, hence why he contacted the banker in the first place. Rather unfortunately for him, Tony/Arthur cannot think of a friend/acquaintance who might want to be 'reborn,' thus leading to his nefarious and nightmarish downfall via Mengele-esque surgery. After failing to provide the name of a potential person to be 'reborn,' Tony/Arthur is awakened by the kindly Old Man who owns the Company who tells him that he is being immediately taken for identity-changing surgery. Unbeknownst to him, Tony/Arthur is then taken to surgery to be euthanized where his corpse will be used to fake a new reborn client's deaths. In the end, Tony/Arthur, who is strapped to a surgery table, suffers a hysterical fit as he realizes he is about to die and is read his last rites by a charlatan priest/rabbi/minister. Luckily for him, before being euthanized, Tony/Arthur seems to fall into a catatonic state.

Although doing poorly on its initial release and hated by European critics when it was originally screened at the Cannes Film Festival (Frankenheimer was even afraid to attend the press conference and had Rock Hudson do it instead), Seconds has rightfully earned its place as a cinematic cult classic. Luckily, some realized the aesthetic majesty of Seconds upon its release, as cinematographer James Wong Howe, who should be credited as largely responsible for the film's foreboding atmospheric and fierce phantasmagorical essence, was nominated for an Academy Award for his work on the film. Indeed, as much as I loathe auteur Frankenheimer political persuasion and sympathy for kosher commies like John Randolph (real name Emanuel Hirsch Cohen), few films capture the particular zeitgeist so potently, perturbingly, and penetratingly than Seconds; a nearly immaculate work that shows the failure of the 'American Dream' to truly bring happiness to its citizens/consumers. A sort of post-industrial take on Mary Shelley's Frankenstein; or, The Modern Prometheus (1818) meets a delicately deconstructed take on Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Faust (1808) meets the Hebraic paranoia of Orson Welles' 1962 cinematic adaptation of Franz Kafka's The Trial (1925) aka Der Prozess, Seconds is essentially modernist Gothic horror in suburbia in the age of the atom bomb and cold war paranoia. Additionally, Seconds is a spiritually pessimistic work of metaphysical sci-fi horror that asks the difficult question: What good is being reborn when the soul is already dead? Directed by a man who may or not be the father of bastard Hollywood hack Michael Bay (Frankenheimer denied it, claiming he took a paternity to prove otherwise when said DNA tests did not then exist), Seconds is a work that makes one question whether or not, quite unlike Europe, cinematographers are the true 'auteurs' in Hollywood as it is hard for me to believe the film would be nearly as effective without James Wong Howe's signature cinematography. The closest thing to a mainstream 1960s Eraserhead, Seconds is the perfect thing to watch all alone while suffering a bout of insomnia. Forget the now somewhat outmoded and less aesthetically prestigious The Manchurian Candidate, Seconds is forever Frankenheimer's most artistically ambitious, strangely beautiful, and most memorable film.

CRAZY LOVE
CRAZY LOVE

Dominique Deruddere (1987)

I'm in love with Crazy Love. It was directed by Flemish director and obvious auteur Dominique Deruddere. It is no doubt he has a personal love for Crazy Love. It was one of the few masterworks of its decade (1987 release). Crazy Love is the kind of film that would most likely turnoff the most pretentious of film lovers before they even consider watching it. It makes the teen angst of a John Hughes film look like a collection of middle school pity parties. Barfly Charles Bukowski's writings are the loose basis for Crazy Love's story.

Masturbation instruction, puss filled zits, and necrophilia inspire feelings of the most forbidden love. The climax is an extremely wet one. In the end, everything still feels lighthearted despite the Crazy Love's progression into a life nihilism and nothingness. What a shame that Crazy Love hasn't gotten the recognition it undeniably deserves.

Protagonist Harry Voss experiences temporary joy through something you generally wipe your ass with. This image and dance (as seen on the film's cover art) stick out boldly. After that, life goes downhill. Harry Voss falls in love with a bottle of liquor and his path in life goes down from there.

Harry Voss swims with the stars with his crazy love. He has finally found his sleeping beauty with her unconditional love. Harry Voss from the beginning was a romantic. Eventually, he became a deity of love.

Don Coscarelli (1979)

Over the years I have seen many horror films, many forgettable and a few unforgettable. Don Coscarelli's Phantasm is easily one of the most memorable horror film experiences of my life. I originally saw the strange and abstract horror film by chance during my preteen years. It was a cinematic experience I have not forgotten. I still consider Phantasm to be one of the greatest and most original American horror films ever made. Very few films in the horror genre have so many memorable and horrifying ingredients. I wouldn't be surprised if Phantasm series creator Don Coscarelli was on an Alejandro Jodorowsky film binge during the developing of Phantasm. It would not be the most pleasant experience to find someone you thought was dead wearing a black cloak and shrunken to dwarf size. It also would not be that fun if that same zombie dwarf was trying to kill you. The master of these putrid dwarfs in Phantasm is an iconic "Tall Man" played by actor Angus Scrimm. The Tall Man also uses flying spheres to drill out the blood and brains of his human victims. The Tall Man is not of this world and desires to have humans shrunken and sent to hell in slavery. The Tall Man is easily one of the more unconventional villains of the horror genre. Phantasm follows a young teen named Mike who is the first to suspect the evils of the Tall Man. I do have to admit that Mike can be somewhat of a turd but he means well. His brother Jody believes Mike to be slightly deranged due to the death of their parents. Jody also happens to be friends with an odd ice cream man named Reggie who loves to jam out on guitar and fight zombie dwarfs. The young men also encounter a whorish woman that likes to fuck and kill in the graveyard. One of the greatest scenes in Phantasm is when Mike accidentally enters the gate to another dimension and sees lines of zombie dwarfs walking to their doom. The sky in this scene is of a hellish red that reminds me of a similar sky in Federico Fellini's Satyricon. This "other dimension" offers a whole new world to the already horrifying setting of Phantasm. The film is truly one that feels like anything can happen at any moment. The Tall Man is a new kind of monster and he couldn't care less about a human's reality. Phantasm has spawned three sequels and there is a fifth film in the works. Sadly, Phantasm creator Don Coscarelli hasn't come close to capturing the power of his first Phantasm and channeling it into his sequels. Nonetheless, the Phantasm sequels are interesting as novelty but for not much more. Phantasm is a horror film that has an eeriness about it that I could only find similarly in the horror works of the German expressionist directors. Phantasm is one of the finer and truly original points of phantasmagoria in horror cinema history.

INCIDENT ON AND OFF A MOUNTAIN ROAD

Don Coscarelli (2005)

Don Coscarelli and Angus Scrimm once again collaborated for Masters of Horror episode Incident On and Off a Mountain Road. The hour long "film" follows a feisty true feminist (not some bitch that complains about the German language being misogynistic). She is a young woman that has learned how to defend herself due to the deranged courtesy of her white nationalist/militia man husband. Later, she decides it is her turn to become barbaric. Incident On and Off a Mountain Road is a film about reversing so-called "gender roles." Angus Scrimm plays the role of a quick talking hillbilly that enjoys the gift of song. The young woman decides that she is not a fan of the hillbillies backward poetic gibberish. It is unclear whether or not the young woman is supposed to be virtuous or not. I suspect she is as we now live in the age of "girl power." I hope girl power doesn't call for the extermination of white males. It can be rest assured that Emma Goldman has secured her flaming spot in hell. The monster of Incident On and Off a Mountain Road is some sort of Aryan super monster. He's dressed for war with boots suitable for stomping heads. He acts as the ultimate test of the young woman's strength. What great Bolshevik propaganda he would have made. Incident On and Off a Mountain Road features flashbacks that ultimately lead to a climatic ending of sorts. This is the only characteristic of the film that provides any evidence that Coscarelli directed it (aside from featuring Angus Scrimm). Incident On and Off a Mountain Road is no Phantasm but it offers fans of the series something new until the fifth film is completed. I still consider the original Phantasm to be one of the greatest and most original American horror films.

ILSA: SHE WOLF OF THE SS

Don Edmonds (1975)

It seems for every serious holocaust film, novel, or memoir there is at least one Stalag fiction novel (otherwise known as ‘holocaust pornography’) or Nazisploitation flick, with the most curious thing about this phenomenon being that Jews are the ones that are largely responsible for this seemingly sexually schizophrenic smut. For example, Auschwitz survivor, Yehiel De-Nur, Dinoor—a man who has written extensively in Hebrew about his time concentrating in concentration camps and who testified at the (in)famous Adolf Eichmann Trial on 7 June 1961, even melodramatically collapsing while on the stand after describing the camp as the “planet of the ashes” and failing to give anymore testimony—was responsible for penning the erotically charged novella House of Dolls (1955) under the penname ‘Ka-Tsetnik 135633’ which was ostensibly based on the author’s sister’s experience as a sex slave in a ‘Joy Division’ (indeed, this is where the British late-1970s/early-1980s post-punk group of the same name derived their name), which was a fictional group of Jewish women in concentration camps during WWII that were forced to sexually service young Aryan soldiers. As is also depicted in the highly worthwhile, if not considerably banally assembled, documentary Stalags (2008) directed by Israeli filmmaker Ari Libsker—a man notorious for agitating his fellow chosenites with docs like Circumcision (2004), which depicts the old kosher cock-cutting ritual as highly harmful—trash pulp novels called ‘Stalag Fiction’ with pseudo-titillating titles like I Was Colonel Schultz’s Private Bitch featuring Jews being sadistically sexually degraded and tortured by female SS guards that were all the rage among Israeli men during the 1950s and early 1960s, but the Eichmann Trial put a stop to all that. Hell, even Otto Preminger’s epic Hollywood zio-agitprop flick Exodus (1960) starring Paul Newman features a scene where an aspiring Irgun terrorist played by Sal Mineo confesses he was anally pillaged by an evil Aryan butcher while he was imprisoned at Auschwitz. Of course, the Nazisploitation exploitation subgenre, which arguably began during WWII and reached its zenith around the mid-1970s with the release of Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS (1976), is easily the most high-profile example of the cultural phenomenon of the fetishization and eroticization of the SS and concentration camps. Although classic Italian art house works like Luchino Visconti’s The Damned (1969), Liliana Cavani’s The Night Porter (1974), and Pier Paolo Pasolini’s Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1976) were the most influential films in terms of popularizing ‘Nazi chic’ imagery and cinematic SS sadomasochism, the American exploitation effort Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS is arguably the most popular and iconic of these films, thus making it all the more curious that it was produced by kosher confederate producer David F. Friedman—a man probably best known for his collaboration with fellow Hebraic smut-peddler Herschell Gordon Lewis, including the proto-splatter flick

ILSA: SHE WOLF OF THE SS

Blood Feast (1963)—under the somewhat psychopathic tongue-in-cheek Teutonic pseudonym ‘Herman Traeger.’ Considering Friedman co-produced and had a small cameo in Lee Frost’s early American Nazisploitation flick Love Camp 7 (1969) co-produced and co-penned by exploitation hack Bob Cresse, it is fairly obvious where the producer got the idea for the film. An all the more dubious reworking of the formulaic women-in-prison film (WiP) exploitation sub genre, albeit set in a concentration camp (somewhat humorously the film was shot on the Los Angeles set of the POW concentration camp TV sitcom series Hogan’s Heroes), Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS, directed by exploitation hack turned Hollywood producer Don Edmonds (Wild Honey, Terror on Tour) is basically a sick joke at the expense of the viewer’s intelligence and morality that goes further than even all the movies of Jerry Bruckheimer, Michael Bay, and Steven Spielberg combined in terms of demonstrating the inexplicable lows that certain Jews are willing to go to earn a couple shekels.

Opening with a sadiſtically patronizing warning from fictional producer Herman Traeger juxtaposed with an Uncle Adolf speech that reads, “The film you are about to see is based upon documented fact. The atrocities shown were conducted as “medical experiments in special concentration camps throughout Hitler’s Third Reich. Although these crimes against humanity are historically accurate, the characters depicted are composites of notorious Nazi personalities; and the events portrayed, have been condensed into one locality for dramatic purposes. Because of its shocking subject matter, this film is restricted to adult audiences only. We dedicate this film with the hope that these heinous crimes will never occur again,” Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS purports to be a docudrama of sorts, but it ultimately makes Spielberg’s Schindler’s List (1993) seem like an objectively directed piece of cinema-vérité. Very, very loosely based on the purported WWII era crimes of female concentration camp guard Ilse ‘The Bitch of Buchenwald’ Koch, who was accused of turning Jews into lampshades and soap and whatnot, and who committed suicide in prison in 1967 while serving a life sentence, Edmonds’ pseudo-erotic celluloid excrement is not interested in the facts, but only offending, shocking, titilating, and furthering post-WWII Allied agitprop in a work that attempts to create a torture-porn-based myth in the form of a fictional, big bosomed blonde female Joseph Mengele who gets a sado-masochistic kick out of devilishly defiling and eventually killing nubile young Jewesses and testing the sexual prowess and stamina of men until she gets tired of them and has them exterminated as well. Starring as the eponymous lead, middle-aged North American Nordic babe Dyanne Thorne (Joseph W. Sarno’s Sin in the Suburbs (1964), The Erotic Adventures of Pinocchio (1971)), who began her career as a nudie cutie in pin-up mags and would eventually earn a Ph.D. in comparative religion, the film owes virtually all of its charm and charisma to its lead actress, who apparently did her fair share of reading up on Ilse Koch to prepare for the role. More of a femi-nazi than a National Socialist true believer, Ilse believes more in the superiority of Aryan womanhood than the Aryan race as demonstrated by her remarks such as, “a well-trained woman can withstand pain longer than a man.” Indeed, as her many cruel psycho-sexual conquests with her many male concubines demonstrate, Ilse’s pussy is more powerful than a panzer tank, but her Wotan-like womanhood is ultimately tested when she meets a prestigious, sexually potent German-American POW who manages to sexually service three fiercely feisty fascist fräuleins at once.

Beginning with double-D Nazi diva Ilsa riding on some swarthy untermensch man’s cock, the anti-heroine seems somewhat sensitive initially, but that all ends after she takes a shower, declares to her subhuman male concubine, “once an prisoner has slept with me, he will never sleep with another woman again,” and proceeds to take her sex slave to a operation room/torture chamber where she has his cock cut off. Needless to say, the castrated prisoner is not exactly satisfied with the fact that he has had “the honor of sleeping with a German woman.” The real fun begins for Ilse when a bunch of female prisoners are brought in for selection, with some being sent to a ‘Joy Division’ and the others being assigned to “help the cause of medical research and therefore save thousands of lives,” with the latter group having their pussies closely shaved by sinisterly Sapphic SS guards in preparation for (anti)erotic experimentation. The same day, a group of male prisoners are shipped in and Ilse becomes smitten with a blond German-born American student named ‘Wolfe’ (Gregory Knoph), who is dismissive of his Aryan origins, stating that it is “something beyond my control.” When Ilse has the men strip and inspects their bodies, she mocks their members, stating, “you call yourself men...I see no manhood between your legs” and calls Wolfe a “bastard German,” adding, “it is clear to see that their blood is tainted.” Upon talking to a Guido named Mario, Wolfe learns that, “once he has served her, that is the end of him as a man” in regard to Ilse’s perverse proclivity towards cutting off her male concubines’ cocks. Of course, Ilsa eventually calls for Wolfe to “satisfy” her and he proclaims to the cunty Kommandant that he will “satisfy you until you beg me to stop.” As he promises, Wolfe annihilates Ilse’s nether-regions and virtually turns her into his groveling sex slave. As Wolfe explains to Mario, he is a “freak of nature” and “sort of human machine” with seeming infinite sexual stamina who learned upon reaching puberty that he could “hold back [...] all night if necessary” as long as he wanted. Convinced that “no man” can perform as Wolfe did that night before, Ilsa has the prisoner engage in a threesome with two tyrannical big titted fräulein guards, which he does with gusto. After proving his meta-SS-worthy sexual stamina, Wolfe is able to make sexual demands of Ilsa.

Meanwhile, Mario meets up with female prisoners, including tough bitch Anna (played by mulatto actor/director Mario Van Peebles’ German mother Maria Marx) and Rosette (Jacqueline Giroux), and begins plotting a prison revolt. Indeed, being forced to endure gigantic electric vibrators, syphilis injections the slow removal of fingernails, and electric volts to the nipples, among various other forms of inhumane treatment, the female prisoners are just dying to escape from the clutches of the crazed kraut cunt commandant, whose lard ass scientist 'Binz' (played by George 'Buck' Flower of John Carpenter's The Fog (1980) and They Live (1988)), enjoys doing extensive research on untermensch genitals. When Ilsa's lard ass goon boss the 'General' (B-movie character actor Richard Kennedy of Farewell, My Lovely (1975) starring Robert Mitchum and The Buddy Holly Story (1978)) and his small blond beast aide Richter (Lance Marshall), who bears an almost disturbingly startling resemblance to Austrian-German actor Oskar Werner, show up at the debauched death camp, the carnally cruel Kommandant must rationalize her insanely inhumane experiments, stating of her choice not to provide anesthesia during surgery, "One does not give caviar to guinea pigs." Luckily, the General thinks of Ilsa of as "some blonde goddess" and looks the other way, although, in a scene echoing the fictional story of Uncle Adolf deriving sexual pleasure from his niece urinating on his face, the SS she-bitch is forced to give her pervert boss a nice warm golden shower. On the day of the planned prison revolt, Wolfe manages to coerce Ilsa into allowing him to tie her up before they commence coitus, but instead of banging the bitch, he shoves a handkerchief in her mouth and proceeds to release all the prisoners in the camp who exterminate all their former tormentors in similarly heinous ways as they were once tortured, even though the German-American hero advises them to face the courts of the Allies. After killing virtually all the Nazi guards, nurses, and scientists, the General's aid Richter shows up in a Panzer tank with an SS brigade and liquidates virtually all of the prisoners, including Mario. Ironically, in a cynical twist ending, it is not one of her many victims (Anna tries but dies from her wounds before she can carry it out), but Richter who kills Ilsa, which he was ordered to do by SS- Reichsführer Heinrich Himmler, who wants no evidence that the death camp or its experiments ever took place. As Richter radios to his boss after carrying his orders out, "General, your orders have been carried out. Camp 9 has ceased to exist. You may tell the Reichsführer that the Allies will find nothing. They will never know." In the end, only Wolfe and Rosette survive.

As one could expect from a relatively successful sadistically salacious flick featuring such an iconic SS blonde beastess as the lead, Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS spawned three innately inferior sequels, including Ilsa, Harem Keeper of the Oil Sheiks (1976) directed and produced by Don Emmonds, Ilsa, the Wicked Warden (1977) directed by Spanish exploitation auteur/pornographer Jess Franco, and Ilsa, The Tigress of Siberia (1977) directed by Jean LaFleur and produced by Roger Corman and Ivan Reitman, with Dyanne Thorne reprising her role as the eponymous lead for all three films. Aside from being directed by the same non-auteur as the original film, Ilsa, Harem Keeper of the Oil Sheiks also wallows in cheap Zionist agitprop as a work where Ilsa, like some real ex-Nazi leaders (i.e. Johann von Leers, Otto Skorzeny), teams up with an 'Islamofascist' dictator. Although amateurishly directed and a total abject insult to both the real National Socialists and their victims, as well as the German language (indeed, most of the characters sound like second-rate extras from Hogan's Heroes), Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS is shockingly effective in that, unlike most Nazisploitation and women-in-prison flicks, the film plays out in a fairly serious and thus brutal fashion that lacks the goofy and low-camp elements that give the viewer temporary relief from all the lowbrow aesthetic savagery. In other words, Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS is an ugly and sadistic film for ugly and sadistic people that reminds the viewer of what true and unadulterated exploitation cinema is all about, as a seriously sick flick that has about as much aesthetic merit as a Mexican drug cartel snuff flick. Undoubtedly, the film even makes Tinto Brass' Salon Kitty (1976) seem like a remake as opposed to a semi-parody of Visconti's The Damned (1969). Somewhat fittingly, director Don Emmonds went on to co-produce True Romance (1993) penned by Quentin Tarantino, who would go on to mainstream Nazisploitation via Inglourious Basterds (2009), thus reflecting how much society has degenerated since the release of Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS. Indeed, when it comes down to it, Ilsa: She Wolf of the SS and its similarly psychopathic celluloid bastard spawn Inglourious Basterds more or less reflect the average Hollywood and public school indoctrinated American filmgoer's historical perspective regarding the Second World War and the Third Reich, thus indicating that Dr. Goebbels could have learned a thing or two from his Hebraic enemies in Hollywood, whose incessant post-WWII depiction of Adolf Hitler as the virtual devil incarnate make the titular Joseph Süß Oppenheimer of Veit Harlan's Jud Süß (1940) seem like an eccentric old uncle by comparison. Of course, then again, it is probably more appealing to have a big breasted blonde SS she-bitch like Ilsa as a representative of the more unsavory elements of one's race and people than a swarthy rat-like schemer like Jud Süß.

Don Jones (1973)

Schoolgirls in Chains, or commonly known as any of the following: Girls in Chains, Abducted, or Let's Play Dead, is a 70s washout hippie excursion in exploitation and raw film stock. Starring Gary Kent of modest cult fame, Schoolgirls in Chains was adorned with the misleading title for providing verbal titillation, what, with the visual implication of jailbait in bondage, whose ears aren't ringing? The fact of the matter is that Schoolgirls in Chains has reached this low pinnacle of fame due to its parasitic behavior towards already-contrived cinema mechanisms. Such as Hitchcock's Psycho, a strong plot key of mother-ventriloquism was lifted and grafted to this schlocky film all aboard with nudity and Straw Dogs-esque "rape" in which the recipient isn't as unwilling as she might claim. With this and the bungled brother, John, whose mental deficiency doesn't inhibit his potential to select exquisite feminine figures, Schoolgirls in Chains proves to be a quite intoxicating experience in drab film-making. Surely with such lovely ladies on board, the entire production of this burnout can't be neglected, even if the narrative skips around frequently.

Calling out the misleading title for a reason, Schoolgirls in Chains does feature one student, well, at least that's referenced as such, but the near absence of chains is glaring. What instead happens is the abduction of several women throughout the run time. Schoolgirls in Chains surprised me with such. I figured that the introductory bombshell would be the pivotal character in the film, the seductress to these men's perversions. Would you imagine my shock when our heroine's backside is loaded with buckshot in non-typical meta-horror fashion. Her gorgeous, lifeless body slung on a fence, just mere feet from a road with passing automobiles. Frank is the chieftain of the household. Both he and John are victimized by "Mother's" cruel intentions. In a flashback scene referenced in Adam Sandler's The Waterboy, Frank's mother goads his fiancée with tales of how he still wets the bed. She then proceeds to alert the lady that the reason why her and Frank haven't slept together is because of the incestuous affair going on between the two. Such a shame this wasn't highlighted with a steamy vignette of motherly love. That would have driven the effect of the finale out of the park instead of on dusty VHS shelves.

Once the female student is introduced, we get a full taste of the victims below in the shed/cellar and the games John enjoys playing with his real dolls, his sex toys, if you will. Rough cuts of leapfrog, hide and seek, and the knife-power-play of doctor are all at John's service. His character is perhaps the most humorous of all included. While Frank's fate was disguised well as vengeance was anticipated, the power of malice is really captured in John's brain-dead antics. It's these films of motherly discretion towards the evils of women that really causes waves through the male psyche - as was the case with the recently viewed Deranged. Once the student's teacher notices his extra-credited scholar of after-school lust is missing, he follows up on a lead which winds him up at this house of degradation. Meanwhile, Frank is bedding down a piteous woman in his mother's sun room. This scene turns from violation to an obsessive love quickly. After being dumped back in her dungeon, the sickly victim adjacent to the lover expresses her distaste for promiscuity - "Did you enjoy that? . . . Looked like you did." While Schoolgirls in Chains isn't groundbreaking or fashionable in any regard, it's still an exemplary piece of midnight cinema with a generous amount of nudity. Asides from the dated atmosphere, I can sense the effects of drug usage on the director Donald M. Jones' taste buds. What self-respecting director in the era of free love didn't binge on psychedelics? Especially ones that mastermind such smut as this.

Don Levy (1967)

After a number of months of procrastinating, I finally got around to seeing an ostensible holy grail of epic arthouse cinema, Herostratus (1967) directed by Australian auteur Don Levy (Time Is, The Belt and Suspenders Man), but rather unfortunately, at least as far as I am concerned, the seemingly sacred cinematic affair did not live up to its rather rich reputation as a lost masterpiece of experimental filmmaking, though I cannot say I was left bored to tears by its certainly sordid and psychodramatic celluloid storytelling. On top of being nearly impossible to see for over four decades due to being hidden away in studio vaults after being only screened a sparse number of times upon its initial release, Herostratus has the delightful distinction of featuring Helen Mirren in her first screen role as a satirical goddess of flesh-flaunting advertising, but the oftentimes seedy and salacious yet audaciously artfully stylized cinematic work also has more sinister secrets in its bleak back story. Centering around a young and restless Londoner suffering from an ample amount of angst and existential crisis in post-WWII Britain who, in the supposedly divine, self-immolating spirit of the Vietnamese Thích Quảng Đức Buddhist monks, decides to commit suicide as an impotent form of political protest (or so he says), but not without giving himself immortality by broadcasting his self-slaughter for the whole world to see, Herostratus would prove to be a piece of life reflecting art and art reflecting life as both the star of the film, Michael Gothard (Curtis Harrington's Whoever Slew Auntie Roo?, Ken Russell's The Devils, Tobe Hooper's Lifeforce) as well as director Don Levy would commit self-slaughter in subsequent decades after the subversive socio-politically conscious cinematic work's release, thus adding an acutely accursed character to this curious celluloid feast. More of a torrid meta-physical 'trip' than Performance (1970) co-directed by Donald Cammell (who would also commit suicide after a lingering, lifelong obsession with death) and Nicholas Roeg, Herostratus may very well be the starkest and most striking yet curiously cryptic cinematic depiction of Swinging London ever made directed by a seemingly unlikely individual who earned a PhD in Theoretical Chemical Physics before becoming one of the most artistically ambitious yet transitory film directors of his zeitgeist. Filmed over the course of a five-year period on an unbelievably low budget ($25,000.00) with help from the BFI Experimental Film Fund for what was only supposed to be a mere avant-garde short, Herostratus ended up being an uniquely uncompromising, innately inauspicious, and feverishly foreboding 142-minute cinematic epic of the exceedingly eccentric that expresses the empty emotions of an era engulfed in end times flavored self-worship and superfluous stardom, malicious materialism, and needless narcissism.

Taking its name from the ancient arsonist who, seeking a sort of immortal notoriety via senseless destruction of beauty, burned down the Temple of Artemis at Ephesus in ancient Greece, Herostratus follows a scrupulously spasmodic and determinedly destitute 23-year-old poet/virgin named Max (Michael Gothard) who decides making a sardonic media spectacle out of his own self-obliteration will be the way to obtain some sort of postmortem fame and possibly even spark a national revolution. As someone who adamantly believes that no matter how hard a person works in life, they still end up, “a decomposing lump of flesh in the ground,” it seems rather odd that mad Max is interested in posthumous fame of any sort, especially when he will not be around to enjoy it, but I guess giving up one’s life is a small price to pay for those that no longer have the energy to push on. In the timeless tradition of Goethe’s Faust, Max makes a deranged and dubious deal with an exceedingly effete and unflatteringly plump, fat cat media advertising devil named Farson (Peter Stephens) to become a ‘marketed martyr’ of the postmodern age, thereupon romanticizing suicide in a Cobain-esque fashion. Taken somewhat seriously for what seems to be the first time in his markedly miserable life, Max is treated like a seminal Superstar where he participates in prime time TV interviews and photo sessions, but more importantly, the would-be-famous fellow finally loses his virginity and falls in love for the first time. Farson’s young and gorgeous assistant Clio (Gabriella Licudi) is apparently ordered by her rather roly-poly bastard of a boss to give Max the time of life, so naturally the clever yet oversensitive blond boy, whose curious claim that he will stoically commit self-slaughter for adoring audiences seemed decisively doubtful from the start, second thinks suicide because, after all, he’s “scared of heights” and gets “dizzy.” Farson and his advertising goon Pointer (Antony Paul) – a psychopathic poindexter who treats the perturbed poet like the latest innovative product from a prominent clean supplies company – do not like Max’s reasons for wanting to kill himself because, “they’re far too personal...negative,” so they decide to give him, “something positive, something altruistic and idealistic that the public will look up to and they’ll respect,” to commit Anglo-Saxon seppuku to or so the loyal Television viewers of London are told. When the big day comes, Max is more than a tad bit reluctant to jump off the roof for televised audiences, even after Farson reveals that Clio does not really love him but was only ordered to fuck him, so things go absurdly askew when an initially antagonistic yet ultimately altruistic man attempts to save the suicidal star’s life, thus resulting in a struggle between the two and the wrong man falling to his death from the roof. With more reasons than ever before to commit suicide, miserable Max, now on the brink of total emotional breakdown, scampers back to the proletarian ghetto from whence he came, once again failing in the game of life, but this time at the expense of an innocent individual who dared to care in a technocratic dystopia of deluded dreams and industrial decay.

Although he never goes through with the deadly deed, it is quite apparent from the start of Herostratus that Max is on the verge of some sort of mental malfunction and potential self-destruction as a sad and sorry sod who lives in squalor and cannot even convince a sexually ambiguous Asian girl (the heterodox character, who literally battle cries for warfare, being most likely an allegorical representation of the West's meddlesome involvement in the Vietnam war) to abide his dandy and devilish charms. Featuring a schizophrenic celluloid storm of inter-spliced black-and-white stock-footage of Nazi concentration camps, the apocalyptic atomic bombing of Hiroshima, bloody communist revolutions, and false promises from President Truman regarding the United Nations, Herostratus depicts a failed post-WWII Britain full of growing urban decay and perverse poverty where the guiding philosophy among the collective populous is personal gain at any cost, including self-abasement. As Max explains to Clio during their wild night of romance in regard to his grand objective in committing suicide, "In a day's time, I'll be on top of the building. In the heart of London. High, high building. People down below in the street, busy street. Scurrying crowds of people. Someone will notice me up on the roof. See me standing there ready to jump. Then they'll all begin to notice. Suddenly the street gets slower and slower, and they all stop and they're all look up. "Don't jump, don't jump!" That's what they're all thinking. They're forgetting themselves for a minute and they care about me. They care that I'd just throw my life away down into the street. Then I'll jump." Of course, things do not work out exactly as planned, although a man does attempt to stop him, but nothing changes for the better in dreary London, not for Max nor anyone else, thereupon leading the viewer, myself included, to rationalize that Herostratus is a cinematic work of patent pessimism and daunting despair. Naturally, it should no surprise that many film critics believe that Herostratus had an imperative influence on Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange (1971). As Farson told him before his disastrous day of suicide, Max is, "The monumental flop of all time" and a "futile nothing" whose sincerity, freedom, and hope has never gotten him anywhere, especially in a society that puts a particular premium on material gain and superficial social prestige over merit and creativity. After all, every society gets the art it deserves or at least Don Levy certainly seemed to think so, but, unfortunately, only a few individuals, including British auteur Richard Lester (A Hard Day's Night, Superman II), took notice of Herostratus; a heated, heretical, and hermetic celluloid indictment of a spiritless capitalist system fundamentally grounded on perverse plutocratic principles that inevitably sire social alienation and collective mental illness, hence the skyrocketing popularity of antidepressant drugs in the contemporary Occidental world.

Featuring experimental cinematic still shots of macabre melting bodies inspired by Irish-born British figurative painter Francis Bacon, footage of Beat poet Allen Ginsberg from Peter Whitehead's documentary Wholly Communion (1965), and an idiosyncratic and oftentimes entrancing editing style inspired by the Soviet montage theories of Jewish Bolshevik filmmakers Sergei Eisenstein and Lev Kuleshov, Herostratus is a hysterical yet hypnotic hodgepodge of high degenerate art of its time. Needless to say, pedophilic poofers Ginsberg's megalomaniacal performance poetry has aged less gracefully than the beat, Beat poet's physical appearance would over the next couple of decades. Of course, many segments of Herosstratus, including various random appearances by director Don Levy's wife Ines as a phantasmagoric lady of death in black leather with a matching umbrella who haunts Max's mind, as well as a psychedelic burlesque show mixed with a bloody bovine being brutally slaughtered, are scenes that work just as well today as they probably did upon the film's initial release. Describing the film himself as, "an intricate network of emotional references," Don Levy surely assembled an epically erratic and unsettling celluloid experience (or 'trip') as opposed to a standard linear film, even if a discernible and rather simple story lies in between. A rare arthouse artifact from Britain, Herosstratus is certainly worth seeing, but falls somewhat short of being a neglected 'lost masterpiece.' Still, the fact that the film is relatively unknown and even less seen (despite being available for the first time ever in home entertainment format via BFI's beautiful restoration of the film on DVD/Blu-ray), on top of the fact that both the director and star would later commit suicide, is evidence enough that Herosstratus' major and most potent theme – that we live in a society that does violence against the individual, especially the 'sensitive' and once-sacred artist type – has only become more relevant as the decades pass.

THE BEGUILED

Don Siegel (1971)

In The Beguiled, Clint Eastwood has not only his strangest film but his most gynophobic film as well, to speak arbitrarily. Filmed in 1971, the same year director Don Siegel would clasp Eastwood in for another role, one 'slightly' more iconic (Dirty Harry), The Beguiled is set in the South during the end of the Civil War and features Eastwood as a wounded Yankee discovered by an in subordinate little girl, disappearing off her "prim-and-proper" school grounds and into the forest. Lucky for him, the little girl played hooky to secure some mushrooms (what awful foreshadowing) because if it hadn't been for her, Eastwood's character McBee would have been left to die in that tree. Upon acting as crutch to his near-lifeless body back to the grounds, the girl brings him home to the strictly Southern bevy of bells. They are then sent into moral disarray as they weigh their options of either turning him over to Confederate hands or harboring a fugitive, albeit a handsome one, which leads into the sinister seduction and manipulation from the hands of Eastwood's. This also portends to future games of puppetry as Eastwood allegedly insisted that darling Sondra Locke get her tubes tied. A sad fate indeed as her daughters and daughter's daughters would have been done wonders for gene pools, with the right male instrumentation, of course.

From here on out, The Beguiled slowly turns its head to reveal its noxious intent. The increasing jealousy and rivalries between the ladies ruminates and stews until The Beguiled cannot possibly contain such scorned women and instead of a suggested and respected output, the women unleash their spite and malice onto a victimized soldier. Now, before I go any further, I'd like to discuss what appears to be a large and inconclusive difference between the film adaptation and the source material Ala Thomas Cullinan's novel - originally titled A Painted Devil. On one of many of the novel's illustrations of The Beguiled it reads "A helpless man-- Eight haunted women!" when, in fact, The Beguiled's cinema companion sympathizes with the repressed maidens of the estate and demonizes McBee as being a manipulator, "el seductor", and a callous male guilty of wartime savagery. Don Siegel makes for an interesting case to distort the original path sent down by the bygone succubi. In his own words, the film was to show "the basic desire of women to castrate men" but in his error to properly emulate the intended and initial game of female psychological warfare, Siegel himself near castrated the film by villainizing the victim. Regardless of the fact, although McBee regresses into a beastly nature after pampering the ladies fears with lies, The Beguiled still has the subversive matter-of-fact as to the inclinations of the deceitful women, all clawing for a piece of Yankee charm and sexual hospitality.

Demonstrated clearly is the wavering willpower of Eastwood's character McBee. Like most self-respecting males, only so much temptation can be endured before male virtues break and buckle. Mirroring the events of Misery, The Beguiled is essentially a hostage scenario. These conditions McBee is subjected to are the precursor for his eventual and eventful outburst in temporary violence. McBee begins the seduction of one female - a courteous friendship. This becomes an obstacle in the path of other women's intentions and desires which soon after almost results in capture from the enemy forces. The Beguiled also marks a reflexive turn for Clint as the duration of the film is him chasing or fending off advances from females - quite a typical turn for one of the more charismatic and stoic actors of the twentieth century. Blending with McBee's pursuit of happiness are the pasts and traumas from several of the other girls. Mainly the sordid relationship between the headmistress, her absent brother, and the Negress slave-maid who recounts a particular night of botched sexual assault. It's not McBee's fault, the hen nest thrown into disarray - the pieces and mechanics of feminine deceit were there all along. The poor soldier only acted as a catalyst to a cat fight. The Beguiled then stumbles into a surrealism based in reality when something very dear is snatched from him, taken on what could be considered good judgment had the embers of betrayal hadn't been stirred.

The Beguiled is a special sort of sinema, really. It holsters crude sentiments towards women but pockets them quickly before anyone notices. Elaborate fantasies are at play with the young soldier playing pawn. Diabolical pre-teens potent with hormones lash out after preemptive feelings of rejection with a nonexistent promise guiding them. I doubt the original premise, rather, the prime objective of the novel, could have been duplicated if headed by one of the Western world's biggest stars while retaining the marquee value or the career in which Clint so dutifully balanced. So for this I appreciate The Beguiled, regardless of its off-the-beaten-path way of being rewritten. Clint Eastwood plays a certain kind of devil, one that is quick to be crucified by women for means of survival by seduction but these misguided firecrackers refuse to address the real issue here -- escape. The Beguiled doesn't bare a happy ending nor a real ending at all. In essence, it is just a continuation of strict regiment, a simple toss towards reform. The Beguiled isn't just important. It is really an eye-opener. The peculiar way in which it is filmed will leave you assuming McBee is just a monster, man at his most primitive. Perhaps even thirsty for vengeance but you couldn't be farther from the truth. He stood, he coped, he understood. Most importantly, he was grateful. And look where McBee wound up. The Beguiled stands adamant with a lesson to be learned. I just hope you weren't blind enough to miss it.

WHITE OF THE EYE
WHITE OF THE EYE

Donald Cammell (1987)

While most fans of his work would ultimately agree that his directorial debut Performance (1970) – a counter-culture cult classic he co-directed with British auteur Nicholas Roeg (The Man Who Fell to Earth, Track 29) – was the greatest film of the ill-fated Scottish filmmaker's career, painter-turned-filmmaker Donald Cammell (Demon Seed, Wild Side) would still manage to direct one of the most aesthetically artful and underrated serial killers flicks ever made, White of the Eye (1987), before he committed suicide by shooting himself in the head in 1996. Based on the the virtually unknown novel Mrs. White (1987) written by conservative mystery novelists Andrew and Laurence Klavan (but released under transsexualized pen name "Margaret Tracy") and co-penned by the director's young Asian wife China Kong (daughter of Chinese actress Anita Loo), who also appears in the film in a small role and who the filmmaker started a romantic relationship with when she was still jail bait (they got married when she was 18 and he was already 44!), White of the Eye follows a suave and strapping family man who also happens to moonlight as a psychopathic killer with an unquenchable thirst for murdering beautiful women in a rather ritualistic fashion in an aesthetically and thematically subversive cinematic work featuring magnificent murder scenes that could be described as a totally transcendental form of celluloid high art. As someone who began his career as a society portrait painter, Cammell lends a certain refinement to the kaleidoscopic kill scenes, thus making for a rare cinematic work where a curious combination of beautiful broads, buckets of blood, and barbaric brutality make for a singularly breathtaking cinematic experience of the luxurious libertine sort that will make more than a marginal portion of viewers ashamed at themselves for basking in the bloodlustful show. In fact, White of the Eye wantonly yet wondrously wallows in moral dubiousness, so much so that wife of the malevolent anti-hero refuses to turn in her man after learning that he is a murderously misogynistic, coldblooded killer, which upset certain female audience members at a 1988 UCLA screening due to what they saw as implausible and totally unthinkable, thus director Cammell responded with the following explanation, "I thought it would be more interesting to have her deeply in love and, when she realized he was a psychopath, forced to decide whether to abandon him, or hang on in there and confront him with it and continue to love him, even up to the point where it degenerates in bestiality." Indeed, aside from being an uncommonly sexual and succulently stylized serial killer flick, White of the Eye is a morbidly dark romance full of psychosexual passion and perversity that portrays the killer as an executioner of both love and life as an aberrant, ultra-masculine Don Juan figure who never ceases to charm, even up until the erotically-charged, explosive ending and a work described by director Donald Cammell as an, "artistic study of man's need to destroy."

Paul White (David Keith) may seem like a dumb hick upon a superficial glance, but he is really a cultivated country boy who loves the music of Mahler just as much as he loves murdering wild beasts and resplendent mistresses and whose murder scenes are described by an art connoisseur of a police detective as being like, "post-cubist Picasso." A respected sound expert who installs hi-fi stereo systems in the mansions of wealthy patrons in the Arizona desert, Paul has the perfect modus operandi for slaughtering opulent women in their own homes, but, rather unfortunately, he owns a rare pair of truck tires that ultimately link him to a crime scene where the same tread marks as his own are found by police in the dirt driveway of a mutilated woman's home. The genetic son (inherited "taints" are a secondary theme of the film) of a criminal embezzler, Paul began his life as a juvenile delinquent with a rap sheet a mile long, but over the years he became both more intellectual yet viciously visceral, henceforth making an art of killing. Unfortunately for him, Paul managed to fall in love with a New York City chick named Joan (Cathy Moriarty) who he did not have the desire to exterminate when looking into the white of her eyes, thus he eventually married her and they had a daughter. Paul met Joan when she and her then-boyfriend Mike DeSantos (Alan Rosenberg) were travelling through Arizona and both of the NYC natives become intrigued by the strikingly stoic, red-blooded redneck. Naturally, considering Mike is a cosmopolitan beta-male who postures himself as an urban bad boy, Joan falls head over heels in love with true blue bad ass Paul – a macho psychopath with a devilish charm who literally has gorgeous women begging to bone him. Although Paul has most of the townspeople from his Arizona hometown vouching for his personal integrity and professionalism, the suave serial killer has a black policeman named Detective Charles Mendoza (Art Evans) on his back who is a dilettante art critic who can detect his bloody artistic signature, not to mention trouble from his wife's ex-boyfriend Mike and a wealthy and wanton mistress who is looking for a booty call. Detective Mendoza brings both Paul and Joan in for questioning, but the killer has an alibi in the form of supposedly spending an erotic evening with his mistress, thus causing his wife to learn about his extramarital infidelity in the process.

Like any great method actor caught in a serious shitstorm, Mike begs for forgiveness from Joan, but she inevitably finds the souvenir body parts of his victims hidden under their bathtub. Not unsurprisingly, Paul loses his cool and reveals his nihilistic philosophy and anti-woman Weltanschauung after being revealed to be a lurid ladykiller, proclaiming to his petrified wife, "This is scientific fact. You see, the female of the species is the main reason that evolution is turned inside out." In a state of megalomaniacal messianic fever, Paul also proclaims to be the "chosen" one who has been sent to put the fairer sex "out of their misery." Blinded by love, Joan blames herself for Paul's insanity, stating, "I must have made you feel all alone" and she even makes the mistake of neglecting to report her pathologically homicidal husband's sinister crimes to the police. Not long after, Paul becomes totally berserk and covers his face with red paint that makes him look like some sort of unhinged Apache samurai and decides he must kill his wife and daughter. The mother and daughter escape, but Paul eventually finds Joan in an abandoned quarry, but ex-boyfriend Mike rescues her and takes the serial killer hostage, thus resulting in a final showdown between the two diametrically opposed men: one being a deracinated and decadent city boy who would perish if he had to spend a month surviving on his instincts in the woods and the other being a primal warrior with a wolfish lust for blood who is trapped in the wrong millenium. In the end, Joan seems more perturbed by the fact she never truly understood Mike than the fact he was a bestial manhunter who killed countless women and attempted to kill her and their daughter.

Indeed, like serial killer anti-hero Mike, White of the Eye director Donald Cammell was a sexually promiscuous man who had a proclivity for charming and cheating on countless women and eventually going out in a blaze of glory by his own hand. In fact, despite the fact that his biographers said there is no evidence to support it, apparently Mr. Cammell, like one of Paul's victims, watched himself die after he requested his wife China put a mirror up to his face during his final moments of life after putting a bullet in his brain. And, of course, one cannot forget during the final moments of White of the Eye, Paul boasts to his weaker adversary that, "I did something with my life. I left my mark," and I am sure Cammell felt the same way after directing one of the most aesthetically subversive and morally ambiguous serial killer films ever made that is in the philosophical spirit of thinkers as diverse as Robert Ardrey, Georges Bataille, and Aleister Crowley (whose lap Cammell sat on as a little boy as he was a friend of his father), even if he only managed to direct a mere four feature-length cinematic works during his near four decades as a filmmaker. As someone who was apparently enamored with Apache Indian legends, Cammell offered the following meaning for the title of the film, which was taken from a Southern Athabaskan phrase, and, in turn, his intended effective he hoped the work would have on the filmgoers, "the phrase "white of the eye" described those who look too closely into the eye of violence and how being a witness leaves a mark upon the viewer." Unfortunately, Donald Cammell, an apparently arrogant 'artiste' who self-destructively destroyed more film projects than actually fulfilling them during his relatively short life, would never and will probably never get his due as a fierce and formidable auteur, but as Robert Cettl wrote in his book Serial Killer Cinema (2003) regarding White of the Eye, "Like The Stepfather, it was a genuinely disturbing thriller that was considered to have been unfairly overlooked in the wake of such 'safe' thrillers as Fatal Attraction and Jagged Edge." Of course, as a work that portrays a rural rebel as a cultivated and sophisticated killer as opposed to a half-retarded coward that resents city folk and makes them 'squeal like a pig' while getting bugged in the bum, as well as a film that portrays all women as more desiring of virile and violent European-American apha-males as opposed to scrawny and sarcastic NYC Semite-like beta-males any day of the week, White of the Eye does not exactly feature the sort of propagandistic conventions that tend to be utilized by Hollywood, thus it was naturally shunned by lesser men. Undoubtedly, after watching White of the Eye, one gets the feeling that Hannibal Lecter was hardly a real man.

WILD SIDE
WILD SIDE

Admittedly, the first time I saw Scottish libertine auteur Donald Cammell's cinematic swansong Wild Side (1996), I could see why the film drove him to commit suicide, as I felt it was an ugly film about ugly people doing ugly things with the aesthetic, thematic, and erotic potency of the sort of second rate Abel Ferrara flick and certainly not a film worthy of being held in such high esteem as the director's previous films Performance (1970), White of the Eye (1987), or even Demon Seed (1977), but I recently decided to give the work a second look as I have come to appreciate the ill-fated filmmaker's work all the more as the years have past and a film depicting Christopher Walken as a sexually degenerate money launderer surely cannot be half bad, yet, I am sad to say my opinion has hardly changed. According to Cammell's young wife China Kong, who wrote the short story the film was based on, as well as co-writing the script, just as she did for his previous feature White of the Eye, the reason she and her damned director husband decided to tackle Wild Side (originally titled "The Grey Area") was because they, "wanted to understand financial people. One of Donald's best friends [Ben Jacober] was a banker for Rothschilds, so he was familiar with this mentality to an extent. It was a bit of a send up, to tell you the truth, of financial people, of our understanding of them." Indeed, if one thing is sure about the 'financial people' of Wild Side, aside from the fact they are parasitic perverts of the strikingly soulless sort whose sexual degeneracy is only transcended by their love of cash, it is they are totally incapable of sustaining any semblance of a normal romantic relationship, which, not unsurprisingly, can also be said of director Donald Cammell – a pathological philanderer of the first order who was apparently known to charm both women and even men into his bed. Probably more importantly, Cammell directed Wild Side as a 'gift' to his young wife China (who was 26 years younger than her husband), but, ultimately, the director felt he failed thus contributing to his somewhat predictable suicide. Of course, it was when Cammell was fired from Wild Side (after a cut of the film had already been sent to Cannes) and taken over by producers and edited into a piece of totally tasteless second rate celluloid erotica (which originally aired on HBO in 1995 with the director being credited as "Franklin Brauner") that he was thrown off the deep end and put a bullet in his brain on 24 April 1996. Apparently, the producers of Wild Side felt Cammell and his editor Frank Mazzola's original cut was too "arty" and Hebraic producer Elie Cohn, like a true smut-peddler, concluded the flash-cuts featured in the film were, "fucking up a perfectly fine lesbian scene." In tribute to Cammell and to fulfill his original cinematic wet dream, Mazzola and the director's widow China released a posthumous "director's cut" of Wild Side that was critically revered, but, personally, I think it is a bit a of puffery to describe the film as anything remotely worthy of being described a masterpiece, unless the idea of Christopher Walken buggering a buff brown bohunk pleases you. Make no mistake about it, Wild Side is a work of would-be-high-class trash where one is supposed to believe that Sapphic miscegenation makes for the most of truest of loves and that sex and power are one in the same.

In Wild Side, sex, money, and power are indistinguishable from one another and those with money are doing the fucking and those without it are getting fucked. Towards the conclusion of the film, hotshot money launderer Bruno Buckingham (Christopher Walken) – a repugnant yet unintentionally humorous creep who incessantly sports silk pajamas as some sort of Guido-like Hugh Hefner, except with long black hair and a more honest sense of sleaziness – goes to sodomize his brutish underling and denies he is a homosexual stating, “This is not about sex, it’s about power,” as if he is some sort of pussy-deprived prison inmate who is desperate to stick his dick in a warm hole and needs an argument to rationalize his latent homo side. And, indeed, batshit crazy Bruno loves to demonstrate his power by buying high-dollar callgirls, thus leading him to a fateful meeting with Sapphic seductress Alex Lee (played by then-unknown, pre-dyke Anne Heche) – a loan officer in Foreign Accounts at a Long Beach bank who moonlights as a pricey prostitute under the pseudonym Johanna so she can pay her mortgage. Bruno takes an instant liking to Alex’s saucy attitude upon their first ‘date,’ but suspects she might be an “FBI slut” of some sort, so he orders his chauffeur Tony (Steven Bauer of Scarface (1983)), who is really a FBI agent looking to bust his ‘boss’ and bust a load in his boss’ whores, to drive her back to her hotel and try to screw her (apparently Feds only screw the ‘big dicks’ and not the ‘little dicks’), which she declines to do. Being a conspiring cop with seemingly unlimited resources, Tony finds Alex’s address and surprises her when she gets home and rampantly rapes her from behind in a most domineering fashion, but makes the seemingly idiotic mistake of mentioning, aside from being a devout Catholic with immense guilt who is looking to save his soul, his true profession as a federal agent in the process. Not long after, Alex starts a sexual relationship with Bruno’s ex-wife/girlfriend Virginia (Joan Chen of David Lynch’s Twin Peaks (1990-1991) and Lust, Caution (2007) directed by Ang Lee) – a bisexual Chinese woman (modeled after Cammell’s wife China, who made out with potential lead actress during screen tests for Wild Side) who was raised in a convent – thus ushering in a cryptic-Ménage à trios. Alex is ordered by Tony (who can bust her as a prostitute) to expect an Asian woman (Virginia) to open an account at her bank job because Bruno is using her as a way to recover $169 million dollars (a special number that makes for an all time low in the filmmaker’s ‘symbolism’) he has in an inaccessible account and wants to use the new dummy account setup by his ex-wife to somehow transfer it to a foreign account. Indeed, Alex bumps into Virginia at the bank, but before they know it, they passionately embrace and the frigid loan officer realizes she is really a lipstick lesbian and falls in love with the yellow woman, hence her disgust with dicks of both the literal and figurative sort. Bruno continues to bugger Alex and also uses her as his 'protégé' in getting back his $169 million, but things go awry when she admits to Virginia that she is a prostitute who is also banging her ex-husband, thus resulting in the East Asian erotomaniac's failed attempt at suicide via drug overdose. Bruno later catches Tony trying to rape Alex, so he tries to rape the rapist, but Virginia shows up after awakening from her suicide-inspired slumber and aborts the homoerotic anal invasion. Alex and Virginia make up and plot an escape overseas with the money and live a luxurious life as lesbian lovers, but Bruno and Tony have different plans.

Frankly, it is hard for me to think of another film with such an unsympathetic cast of characters as Wild Side – one of only a handful of films where I was rooting for the grizzly and ungodly deaths of all the characters in the film via AIDS or drive-by shooting. Aesthetically and thematically speaking, Wild Side is indisputably Donald Cammell's most artistically vapid work and features next to nil of the references to art, culture, and philosophy that his previous films are famous for as a work that, in terms of artistic integrity and genuine eroticism, does not even compare to the masterpieces of the Golden Age of Porn, like Through the Looking Glass (1976) and The Opening of Misty Beethoven (1976). Almost entirely set in shadowy and darkened rooms, Wild Side has a strikingly superficial set-up that resembles the sort of direct-to-DVD neo-noir flicks that no one has ever seen, so it should be no surprise few know of Cammell's cinematic swansong today. Admittedly, Christopher Walken gives a top-notch performance in Wild Side that seems to be a perverse parody of the sleazy and psychopathic gangster roles he is best known for, but it is hard to overlook his aesthetically-degrading dirty old man wardrobe and repulsive midlife crisis cool guy haircut. To her credit, Anna Heche is quite convincing as a conspiring cunt-licker of a cunt and Joan Chen is not half bad either as a chinky 'cunning linguist,' but that does not change the fact that I found Wild Side about as interesting as a filler episode of The Sopranos (1999–2007) or Boardwalk Empire (2010–present). Of course, I can respect Cammell for attempting to portray banksters as debauched as possible, but I sincerely doubt any member of the Rothschild family can 'assert' himself like Mr. Walken, even when he has a retarded 12-year-old boy grunge haircut, but I don't find it far-fetched that money launderer's kosher cocks gets hard for cash and buying high dollar goy gals.

Indeed, it is nothing short of a shame that Cammell killed himself for Wild Side – a film that would have never reached the level of cinematic greatness he had hoped for, no matter how many jaded jump-cuts and fetishistic flashback sequences editor Frank Mazzola added to the film as you cannot polish a turd, especially one aspiring to be extra-erotic. But then again, if my wife was a woman whose idea for a film was about a mixed-race lesbian couple who kick two alpha-males' asses and whatnot, I would probably have more problems than getting the final cut for an over-stylized softcore flick with sub-witty dialogue and would-be-wild-and-wanton imagery. If one learns anything from Wild Side, it is that banking turns Jews and wasps into cosmopolitan cuckolds of Chinese femme fatales. Banker or not, it seems director Donald Cammell fell under the same spell for salacious and Sapphic soy sauce and it seems to have affected his judgment as a filmmaker because who can say with a straight face that the self-slaughtering Scotsman gave his greatest 'performance' with Wild Side!?

SAVAGE VENGEANCE
SAVAGE VENGEANCE

Donald Farmer (1993) Exploitation is the art of exploiting something. Common sense, right? Many classic exploitation films have paved the way for bigger and better things, slowly nulling away at the censors and the MPAA so the rating systems aren't as harsh. Back in the 70's, if a film like Hostel were to come out, hysteria would ensue. I thank films like I Spit on Your Grave, Ms. 45, and Cannibal Holocaust. Not Savage Vengeance. Savage Vengeance (AKA I Will Dance on Your Grave) is a loose sequel of sorts, to the Meir Zarchi film I SPIT ON YOUR GRAVE, also starring Camille Keaton, only credited as Vickie Kehl. I guess even she knew what she had gotten herself into. These films are a marvel due to the explicit matter at stake and the exposure of extreme sexual deviance and violence. We have none of this throughout the film except for the non-climactic ending. A decent chainsaw-to-head scene is all we are treated to for bearing this horrid picture. Normally i tend to stay away from storyline events in hopes of you witnessing the film for yourself, but in order to spare you readers, i will discuss the beginning. We have the dashing Mrs. Keaton parking her car in an abandoned wooded glen. She goes near a waterfall, lays on a rock, reads a magazine, and falls asleep. We then see another car pull up. OH NO! The evil white men are here with their leather jackets and 80's hair. They know she is there for some odd reason, and sneak up on her in a scene reminiscent to children's board game "Don't Wake Daddy!". After the guys hold her down and rape her full clothed?!, they run away leaving her scarred for 4 years until she gets raped again. That's right. She gets raped with clothes fully intact. Even Torched did the revenge scenes amazingly better. The acting is among some of the most heinous acting ever committed to film. Low budget is not an excuse for low quality. This might be one of the worst films i have ever seen. Need i mention the directors incompetence to spell the title from during the opening credits?

LET ME DIE A WOMAN

Doris Wishman (1977)

Admittedly, I have not dug particularly deep into the exceedingly seedy, sleazy, and shitty sexploitation works of jaded Jewess 'auteur' Doris Wishman (Gentlemen Prefer Nature Girls, Bad Girls Go to Hell), but Let Me Die a Woman (1977) aka Strange/Her—a quasi/pseudo-documentary about trannies, transsexuality, and sex-change operations—is the only film she directed that I was actually able to finish without giving up due to sheer and utter boredom. Advertised as “A Hygiene Film” with the less than titillating tagline “It’s about real people...,” Let Me Die a Woman is an X-rated exploitation film terribly disguised as a serious medical documentary narrated by a purported real doctor of medicine and featuring interviews with real transvestites, but also featuring sensationally contrived ‘docudrama’ pseudo-porn scenes of so-called chicks with tiny tits and flaccid pricks engaging in amazingly banal ‘erotic’ scenes with ostensibly heterosexual men. Directed by a wanton and artistically whimsical woman who was also responsible for marvelously mediocre hardcore porn flicks like Satan Was a Lady (1975) and Come With Me, My Love (1976) starring the supremely grotesque lesbo Jewess porn star Annie Sprinkle, Let Me Die a Woman goes so far as even featuring a cameo from Hebraic porn star Harry Reems of Deep Throat (1972) and The Devil in Miss Jones (1973) infamy, thus making no bones about discrediting its own moral and scientific integrity as a film that was meant for selling tickets to perverted scopophiles and not as a sincere “how-to” guide on the phenomenon of transsexuality and those rather unfortunate and seemingly biologically schizophrenic souls who are so dearly convinced they have the mind and soul of a woman that they become willing eunuchs and guarantee that they will never have a chance to receive a sexual orgasm ever again in their lives. Narrated and guided by a supremely shady Judaic fellow named Dr. Leo Wollman, a man described in the documentary as a “MD, PhD...doctor, surgeon, psychologist, minister, medical writer...A man uniquely qualified to help us understand this phenomenon,” Let Me Die a Woman features not only the unclad bodies of chicks with boobs and balls that are perversely prodded by the heeb Herr Döktor in question, but actual bloody and relatively brutal footage of penises being butchered and inverted during ‘sexual reassignment’ surgery. While describing Let Me Die a Woman as a disturbing piece of lowbrow ‘aesthetic terrorism’ would be too generous of a description for this bottom-of-the-barrel piece of accidentally eccentric exploitation cinema, director Doris Wishman certainly deserves backhanded credit for having the macabre gall to exploit some of the most deleteriously disturbed and self-destructive individuals that make up humanity.

“Imagine if you can what it is like to be a woman imprisoned in the body of a man...or a man trapped in the body of a woman,” or so says the narrator of

LET ME DIE A WOMAN

Let Me Die a Woman regarding the transsexual, a person, to once again quote the film, that must have had something along the lines of a “monstrous, biological joke played on him or her.” Our guide for the documentary is Dr. Leo Wollman (apparently a real doctor whose practice was in an urban ghetto), a supposed Renaissance man in regard to the postmodern tranny condition, and he has a special sensitivity towards speaking in detail about and exaggeratedly prodding his poor patient’s genitals in a most dubious manner. Despite the rather repulsive quack doc being the main narrator of the degenerate doc, a Puerto Rican ‘chick’ named Leslie who had her dick cut off is the true star power of Let Me Die a Woman. Indeed, Leslie is a real male-to-female transvestite who has natural looking breasts and had he/r penis cut off and surgically reconstructed into a vagina of sorts. Undoubtedly, Leslie is an extremely flamboyant individual who looks like she could be an extra from Paul Morrissey’s Mixed Blood (1984) and has an eccentric and intemperate Latina diva tranny essence not unlike John Leguizamo’s character “Ruby” from Danny Leiner’s Time Expired (1992), thus providing a bit of comic relief in an inane piece of pseudo-science. Of course, what is most sensational about Let Me Die a Woman, aside from its real footage of cock-chopping sex-changes being performed, is the various exploitative sex and gore scenes based on ‘true’ stories, including cock-to-cock spooning between man and transwoman and an extremely absurd, Milligan-esque dramatization of a desperate military man turned carpenter stoically dismembering his own dick via chisel in desperation in a scene that looks like an outtake from the classic rape and revenge flick I Spit on Your Grave (1978). In making his argument for the importance of sex reassignment surgery, Wollman matter-of-factly states, “some transsexuals live their entire lives as men. They are ineffective sexually, socially, and are usually failures in all of their undertakings because they are so very insecure.” In terms of ‘hard science,’ one learns while watching Let Me Die a Woman that during a male-to-female sex change, the testicles are thrown away and the penis of the patient is simply inverted/turned inside out, thus acting as a pseudo-vaginal canal. Of course, as degenerate doc Wollman explains in regard to the man-made vagina, “one disappointing feature is the absence of lubricating fluid, because the glands that produce this fluid cannot be transplanted,” so naturally it is quite some time before a man-turned-woman can try their new genitals out after surgery. Wollman explains one rather disgusting story of a desperate dude who got a sex-change in Casablanca and was eager to use ‘her’ new beaver and did so too soon, thus she needed surgery to fix the damage done. When Leslie had sex for the first time as a new woman with a German fellow, she was lucky that her boy toy assumed he was the lucky one to pop her cherry due to the blood that came out of her designer vagina and never suspected that she was really born a he. In the end, the feisty faux-female Leslie, whose crudely charming character could not have been contrived by a filmmaker as innately talentless as Doris Wishman, seems like the only believable person in Let Me Die a Woman.

In German New Cinema master auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder's highly personal (he made it after the suicide of his boyfriend Armin Meier) avant-garde masterpiece In a Year of 13 Moons (1978), one is exposed to a desperately perturbed protagonist named Erwin/Elvira Weishaupt who, although once a married man and father that was never even an active homosexual nor interested in becoming a woman, decided to get his penis cut off in Casablanca after randomly falling in love with a rich yet sadistic Jewish businessman/holocaust survivor. In the end, Elvira's sex-change does nothing to change her would-be-lover's mind and s/he ultimately commits suicide as a person who failed to find happiness both as a male and female, thus acting in stark contrast to the false hope that Let Me Die a Woman haphazardly attempts to offer in regard to sex-changes. According to one 2010 study, 41% of American transsexuals have attempted suicide, thus In a Year of 13 Moons does not seem all that extreme in its depiction of a butcher who had their genitals butchered in the hope of changing their lives and inevitably committed self-slaughter as a last resort after realizing what a drastic mistake s/he made regarding the sex-change. The reality is that no person born a man can ever truly be an authentic woman as males and females are innately genetically different in that men have one X and one Y chromosome and females merely have two X chromosomes and no Y chromosomes. While Let Me Die a Woman pretends, quite transparently, to be seemingly sympathetic to its mixed-up subjects, as gay far-leftist film critic Thomas Waugh wrote in a 1978 review of the film with regard the star Leslie, "a young Puerto Rican woman...tells an engaging story of growing up in biological "prison" within a large, poor family and a macho culture. But an offhand remark that if she had any children she wouldn't want them to be gay suddenly explodes a mass of contradictions that the film is trying to avoid." Indeed, if anything is learned while watching Let Me Die a Woman, it is that being a transsexual makes for a miserable existence, so much so that it pushes some to destroying their ability to experience sexual pleasure and sexually reproduce. That being said, if Doris Wishman should be remembered for anything, it is for being the sleaziest and most parasitical female filmmaker who has ever lived and with Let Me Die a Woman being her odious magnum opus.

Doug Robertson (1991)

If you have noticed the multiple attempts at restoring that 80s vibe to horror films recently, raise your hand. I for one, am getting tired of this chain reaction trend. The only film that captured the vibe in both retro and contemporary portions was Ryan Nicholson's Gutterballs. In the early 90s, DIY film makers in a college town of Kentucky decided to create a horror movie which double served as a nice throwback to rental titles and a satire of the classic slasher film. The result is the much abhorred Hauntedween, which is strictly a film you will love or loathe. A group of fraternity brothers find out their debt is due and their brotherhood is about to be foreclosed. Years ago, a very creepy child named Eddie beheaded a little girl and escaped with his mother into the woods. After they target Eddie's old house for a Halloween haunted house fundraiser, Eddie comes back with murder and mayhem planned for this very special night of ghouls & beasts. Things mix fluently into a hybrid of PCU, The Last House on Dead End Street, and Carpenter's Halloween. The result is horrifying micro budget with a cast of real southerners. If you can handle this type of film, the payoff is wealthy and generous. Older Eddie is mainly seen from the back until minutes before the credits roll. His bulky figure and Brock Samson mullet are setting fire to every no-no in the world of fashion and he couldn't care less. As a villain, stating that his character was under-developed would be a horrible play on words. You know nothing of his character, nor what sparked his murderous rage. The opening scene of the younger Eddie reminds me heavily of Bad Ronald, a film that no doubt lent some inspiration. But as far as satire's go, this film strikes the slasher genre where it hurts; inadvertently or not. Many locals of the college actually participated in the film. As bad as the acting is, what's grand is the fact that these are real students wearing real attire. The real treat is the hilarious character who is a mix of Crispin Glover and Tim Blake Nelson on Ritalin. It's a sad view of the educational system, fiction or not. I like to believe that Hauntedween is a big "fuck you" to the rural backdrop of Kentucky. That gives the film a lot more to go off of other than the obvious sensationalism of violence shown as Eddie murders kids in front of a cheering crowd as they believe what they're witnessing a performance. How many other film can you witness a 6'4 man hitting someones head clean off with a Louisville Slugger? Hauntedween will no doubt go down in history as "that one atrocious film by those rednecks", but I can pull more out of the film than just what people choose to see. That, and the fact that this film had a very effective "scare" scene that made my heart skip a beat (Cleverly waited for my defense's to go down to ambush). What you're getting is a horror gem in every sense of the word. A true horror film with every ounce of independent spirit. Welcome to the House of Horrors!

C.H.U.D.
C.H.U.D.

Douglas Cheek (1984)

You go into C.H.U.D. knowing it's a bad movie and you accept it. You brace for impact and let the experience soak into your pores. One problem - There's not enough to actually guarantee entry into your skin or pupils. C.H.U.D. (Cannibalistic. Humanoid. Underground. Dwellers.) is a disappointing film, really. It has the structure of being a true cult classic but doesn't meet you halfway and leaves you stranded with protruding budget factors.

C.H.U.D. has had the immense pleasure of being referred to on every pop culture force from The Simpsons to The Critic to Tom Green. The influence of the early eco-horror film is widespread and I really don't know why. It's not that it's a bad film, it just lacks anything that separates it from the bulk. The stars of the film are the mutants and we don't have enough of them. With a small budget, on screen groups of C.H.U.D. are hard to come by. Near the end we get a group of 3 or so in the same shot. It was a godsend but didn't save the film. This "B" movie features Home Alone alumni Daniel Stern as a greasy scam artist turned humanitarian and some photographer who was meant to be the main character but didn't present enough presence to differentiate him from other secondary characters. The C.H.U.D. are displayed with perfection. Slimy and wide eyed mutated creatures from beneath New York's streets makes for a great story to be told. It's quite enchanting that the C.H.U.D. look like Piccolo. Well, more so than the albino vampire that is Piccolo in the new Dragonball live action film. C.H.U.D. is a bad film but in it's defense I will admit to enjoying the film greatly for its monster mash charm and is a great film to compliment the Halloween festivities. The incredibly slow pacing and cyanide laden dialogue makes the film turn for the worst but it rebounded slightly by mayhem thanks to an early John Goodman cameo and a great political conspiracy sub-plot. A worthy 80s monster cheese that doesn't touch the luridness of Street Trash.

THE DEADLY SPAWN

Douglas McKeown (1983)

After reexamining the classic Lovecraftian stop-motion-animation-driven horror flick Equinox (1970), I got the impulse to watch some more low-budget homemade horror with primitive special effects, and after referencing Stephen Thrower's NIGHTMARE USA: The Untold Story of the Exploitation Independents (2007), I figured that I would check out The Deadly Spawn (1983) directed by one-time auteur turned 'queer' writer Douglas McKeown. Ostensibly a rip-off or Ridley Scott's Alien (1979) as indicated by its marvelously moronic alternate titles like Return of the Aliens: The Deadly Spawn, Return of the Alien's Deadly Spawn, and The Alien's Deadly Spawn, McKeown's film, which apparently cost only about $27,000 to make, is really a fan-boy fantasy come to life and I mean that in the best possible way, as it is more or less an all-amateur production where genuine love and nostalgia for the horror genre was really what got the film made. Indeed, much like the kid character Charles in the film, director McKeown spent his childhood years experimenting with horror make-up and attempting to scare his neighbors with his crude creations, which certainly will not surprise anyone that watches The Deadly Spawn, as the film is a virtual filmic love letter to the horror and sci-fi films of yesteryear, albeit dripping with the sort of blood and guts that were beginning to dominate genre films at the time it was released. Notably, the one thing that the film does have in common with Alien is that the eponymous extraterrestrials have a certain glaring phallic quality to them that is even more flagrant than Scott's work, which is curious considering that the director is a wide-receiver on the pink team and almost certainly had no fear of big giant cocks, but then again McKeown had trouble with the man behind the curious looking monsters, special effects man and associate producer John Dods, who managed to get him fired at the end of production after bitching to swindler producer Ted A. Bohus. Featuring a cast of strikingly sapless suburbanites that all seem to suffer from some sort of mental illness on the autism spectrum, The Deadly Spawn also makes for an interesting work in that it unwittingly exposes how supremely socially retarded what one might describe as the 'Star Wars generation' was. Indeed, I was more perturbed by the characters and their defective behavior than by the giant teathed cocks and sperms from outerspace. Featuring a revoltingly pedantic balding teenage science dork that seems like a castrated middle-aged community college professor as the would-be main protagonist and a prepubescent boy as the only character with any sense or testicular fortitude, The Deadly Spawn is, aside from the special effects, most potent as a piece of suburban impotence. Indeed, even for a horror film, McKeown's work is loaded with a number of socially and physically inept spastics who cannot seem to be able to wipe their own asses without suffering some sort of major trauma.

THE DEADLY SPAWN

It all happens when a meteor falls to earth in suburban New Jersey and two hapless teenage dorks camping out in the woods are killed when a mysterious life form emerges from the rock. From there, the aliens invade the basement of married couple Sam (James Brewster) and Barb (Elissa Neil), who have two sons, including a seemingly autistic horror and sci-fi obsessed preteen named Charles (Charles George Hildebrandt) and a preposterously pedantic high school science major named Pete (Tom DeFranco). Also temporarily residing at the house are homely lady Aunt Millie (Ethel Michelson) and her psychoanalyst husband Uncle Herb (John Schmerling), who seems to have an obsession with little Charles' all-consuming horror fetish. The morning after the meteor landing, Sam and Barb wake up early so they can get ready for vacation. Since it is raining outside, Sam decides to check the basement for flooding and is soon swallowed up by some unseen creature. Naturally, Barb eventually goes down in the basement to look for her hubby and is soon perturbed to see blood on the ceiling light. Of course, Barb is in for a big surprise when she feels her husband's hand on her back and turns around, only to discover her spouse's dismembered limb in the mouth of a large semi-phallic-like creature with long sharp pointy teeth that immediately rips her face off and kills her. While Aunt Millie hears the screams of Barb, she assumes it is from some horror film that little Charles is watching. With a note left behind by Barb about leaving for vacation, Aunt Millie does not expect there to be two thoroughly dismembered corpses and an alien monster in the basement.

As ironically announced by a DJ on a radio in the kitchen while most of the family is downstairs during the morning, "It looks like it is going to be a bad day." Before leaving to go wherever, Uncle Herb decides to interview Charles about his horror and sci-fi fetishism. While Herb seems to find Charles' obsession to be somewhat dubious, the boy's undying love of all-things-spooky will ultimately provide him with the courage to take on the aliens while his sterilely materialistic older brother Pete acts like a pathetically petrified pansy that almost gets him and his friends killed. After Aunt Millie heads to her mother Bunny's (Judith Mayes) house for a luncheon with her similarly uptight and anally retentive old friends, an electrician comes by the home to fix a malfunctioning circuit breaker in the basement, so Charles decides to put on a cheap Dracula cape and mask and go scare the poor prole worker, only to discover sperm/tadpole-like creatures swimming around the flooded floor. After following around the extraterrestrial sperms for a bit, Charles discovers that they are dining on the electrician's corpse. Eventually, Charles discovers the 'mother spawn,' which has three heads and has presumably given birth to the little sperms, which have invaded every corner and crevice of the basement. Undoubtedly thoroughly desensitized due to his religious viewings of monster movies, Charles stares in disbelief and soon realizes that the aliens respond to sound, thus he wisely remains calm and silent even though he witnesses the out-of-this-world beast gorge on his decapitated mommy's head.

When aspiring scientist dork Pete's would-be-girlfriend Ellen (Jean Tafler) and best friend Frankie (Richard Lee Porter) come by his house with the dried up corpse of one of the sperm monsters, they decide to dissect it because it seems like no creature they have ever seen before. While Ellen and Frankie believe the shriveled tadpole-like corpse might be of extraterrestrial origin, Peter finds their theory to be absurdly preposterous and bitches, "I give up on you," adding, "Look...all I know is that a creepy feeling is not scientific. Monsters from outer-space is pure ignorance." Meanwhile, during Bunny's luncheon, one of the sperms manages to crawl into a food processor and gets grinded up in a vegetable that the old ladies unwittingly eat. Not long after eating the vegetable meal with a 'mystery sauce' that causes all the women make a face of abject disgust, all of the ladies are soon attacked by the sperm creatures in a seemingly unintentionally hilarious piece of quasi-splatter slapstick. When Pete and his pals attempt to get Uncle Herb's advice regarding the dissected sperm, they find his mutilated and partly dismembered corpse sitting in the living room, with two of the creatures even popping out the psychoanalyst's stomach in an Alien-esque fashion. Before they know it, the three-headed mother spawn charges the nerdy teens, so Charles heroically rises to the occasion by turning a radio on which the creature soon attempts to eat and ultimately suffers a serious burn from.

After their friend Kathy (Karen Tighe) abruptly arrives in a particularly bad case of bad timing after they attempt to warn her to leave from an upstairs window, the teens get slit up in different rooms after they are charged by the monster spawn. In a rare scenario of genre convention breaking, the mother spawn charges Ellen while she is hiding in Pete's room, bites her head off, and then knocks her decapitated corpse out of a window. When Pete witnesses the death of his quasi-girlfriend and discovers her headless corpse lying in his lawn, he breaks down and heads to the attic where Frankie and Karen are hanging out. Since he has clearly lost his rather fragile autistic scientific mind, Pete absurdly attempts to open the attic door while the more sensible Frankie tries to stop. Clearly the only sane, rational, and practical person in the house, Charles concocts the idea to fill a prop monster mask with explosive flash powder which he attaches to a metal pole and frayed electrical cord that he will use as a fuse to cause to explode after inciting the monster spawn to bite it.

After creating the explosive prop head, preteen hero Charles heads up to the attic to save his pussy big brother Pete and his two friends while they do nothing to help except cry like hysterical women. After yelling at the teens to stop crying like bitches so the monster stops focusing on them, Charles makes noise to get the mother spawn to get his attention and then gets it to bite the prop head. After having some trouble attempting to plug the electrical cord that is hooked to the prop head into an outlet and almost being eaten by the parasitic alien monster, Charles finally succeeds and causes the creature to explode into seemingly thousands of pieces. In a seeming homage to George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead (1968), various town residents are depicted collectively killing the monster sperms as the alien outbreak is now national news. When Aunt Millie gets home, she finds various cops and paramedics carrying corpses out of the house. Although he was left more or less physically unscathed by the aliens, Pete is hauled away in an ambulance while kid hero Charles stays behind. The film ultimately concludes with a twist ending where a policeman patrolling the area witnesses a virtually mountain-sized monster come alive after confidently telling a comrade via radio that he believes that all of the aliens have been wiped out.

A sort of poor man's take on The Blob as seemingly watched by a fiercely fanatical fan-boy who got off to all the blood and gore of William Lustig's classic slasher flick Maniac (1980) starring Joe Spinell, The Deadly Spawn certainly literally and figuratively bleeds passion for the oftentimes critically maligned genre it belongs to, thus making it mandatory viewing for any marginally serious horror fan. A pseudo-sequel of sorts was released about a decade later entitled Metamorphosis: The Alien Factor (1990) aka The Deadly Spawn 2: The Metamorphosis, but it should be avoided at all costs as it lacks the passion and fan-boy integrity of the original film. While director Douglas McKeown never directed another film, he did bizarrely direct and co-write two silent film style 'plantation' scenes for the independent negress bull-dyke flick The Watermelon Woman (1996), though Sapphic spade director Cheryl Dunye cheated him out of a directing credit (which is ironic since the eponymous 'Watermelon Woman' in the film has did not receive credit for her work). It should also be noted that McKeown's envisioned 'director's cut' of The Deadly Spawn was apparently much more intricate than the film that exists today, but after John Dods got him fired, the special effects man and producer Ted A. Bohus excised, among other things, a more developed romantic subplot between Pete and Ellen. Apparently, Dods was obsessed with showing off his special effects work and hated the way McKeown was directing the film, so he successfully conspired to have the director fired from the film. While the 'phallogocentric' special effects are certainly iconic in their own primitive sort of way, most of the potency of the film comes from McKeown's preternatural characterization of the characters, playful tongue-in-cheek humor, glaring horror/sci-fi fanboyism (the film features references to James Whale's Frankenstein (1931), King Kong (1933), The Beast from 20,000 Fathoms (1953), The Mole People (1956), It! The Terror from Beyond Space (1958), and Tales from the Crypt (1972), among tons of other films). While not exactly as good or enthralling as Equinox (1970) or Sam Raimi's The Evil Dead (1981), The Deadly Spawn is certainly a classic of its time that brings great shame to similar no-budget 'homemade horror' works like Robert Scott's The Video Dead (1987) and J.R. Bookwalter's The Dead Next Door (1989). Indeed, I certainly cannot think of another horror flick that makes such a marvelous mockery of suburbia and its autism-inducing effects on its populous and especially its youth.

ALL THAT HEAVEN ALLOWS

Douglas Sirk (1955)

While it has become somewhat paradoxically trendy, especially in America and the rest of the declining West, for people to proclaim they do not care what other people think about them and to project an image of anti-conformity and uncompromising individualism, I can honestly say I could care less what most people think of me to the point of a reckless fault and hold no allegiance to anything or anyone and never well. I cannot help it, I was born that way, so it is quite incomprehensible to me that someone would throwaway a great love or passion merely because their family, clique, and/or social group does not approve of it and it almost makes me feel almost borderline murderously misanthropic to think of such a scenario. I have always found the mindless conformity of the so-called fairer sex to be especially annoying to the point where I have to somewhat agree with Otto Weininger when he wrote that women are completely devoid of true individuality, hence why they are willing to mutilate their bodies, starve themselves, or even abort their own unborn children just to fit in and dodge some petty social stigma that would not bother any man with an ounce of personal integrity. Indeed, it is no coincidence that many of the worst and most murderous authoritarian regimes were able to gain power as a result of the strong support they received from women. After all, how else would a double-bastard mulatto and glorified hustler pimp politician rise to the presidency in the United States if it were not for the masses of unthinking women who wet their panties and swooned over him. Unquestionably, one of the more tragic everyday examples of deleterious female conformity is when a woman denies herself the one man she truly loves so as not to rile up the equilibrium of her static social class, community, and/or jealous family, as if it is solely these group's decision as to who a woman can or cannot fuck while in her bedroom. Of course, such scenarios have been the central themes of countless films ranging from Franco Zeffirelli's 1968 Romeo and Juliet adaptation to Tim Burton's Edward Scissorhands (1990), but the master of such sickening everyday scenarios was New German Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder who dreamed up such daring tragic romances as that of a fellow known simply as 'The Rich Jew' starting a love affair with a German prostitute with a gay pimp for a husband whose drag queen cabaret singer daddy is an ex-SS man who may have gassed her lover's parents in a concentration camp via his controversial banned play The Garbage, the City, and Death. Of course, like any filmmaker, Fassbinder had his influences, with Danish-German auteur Douglas Sirk (Magnificent Obsession, A Time to Love and a Time to Die) being one of his most important and overt teachers. In fact, Fassbinder's award-winning classic work Angst essen Seele auf (1974) aka Ali: Fear Eats the Soul is more or less an all the more subversive updated West German reworking and homage to Sirk's lusciously kaleidoscopic Hollywood Technicolor melodramas Imitation of Life (1959) and especially All That Heaven Allows (1955). As an unrepentant Fassbinder fiend, I naturally had to get around to seeing All That Heaven Allows, which I watched for the second time just the other day. In our decidedly decadent post-Sex and the City zeitgeist of MILF mania where older women see it as some sort of status symbol to get with a younger man, Sirk's film about a suburban New England widow who faces scorn from her college-brainwashed adult children and country club friends after she becomes engaged to her much younger and less socially conscious gardener, but the May-September romance All That Heaven Allows is still strikingly penetrating in its merciless depiction of the pettiness of people, especially of the soulless and sterile suburban sort, in the face of a very special love they dare not officially acknowledge, let alone sanctify.

Cary Scott (Ronald Reagan's first wife, Jane Wyman) lives a banal and barren existence as a widowed mother of two idiotically idealistic college students, with the daughter being an aspiring social worker who is brainwashed by Hebraic twaddle imported from the intellectual ghettos of Europe like Freud and the son being a sort of majorly materialistic softcore psychopath and novice workaholic. Everyone in Cary's life, including her ostensibly 'modern' children, think they know how she should live her life and waste no time telling her what they think she should do with it, even though they clearly do not understand her at even the most fundamental level. For example, her social worker daughter Kay (Gloria Talbott), who is surely a 'liberal' of her time that stylizes herself as an 'enlightened progressive' type and 'independent woman' who believes she is some sort of beacon of rationality, thinks she should marry some intolerable old fart named Harvey (Conrad Nagel), who later proves he is a crypto-sleazebag after he manhandles Cary while giving her a big nasty unwelcomed kiss and then makes her the sleazy and less than subtle offer, "why don't we meet in New York? I know a place." As Kay states herself, "I like Harvey...He's pleasant, amusing, and he acts his age," as if she fears the idea of her mother having a passionate love affair or even sex. In short, Cary's would-be well meaning children and friends have no clue what is right for her or what makes her happy, as they are only concerned with how her personal relationships affect their own shallow lives and social standings. While Cary's husband was a successful businessman and pillar of the community who was beloved by all the automatons that lurk at the local country club, Cary is a more sensitive and introverted person who would rather disappear into a crowd than be noticed and she pretty much lives the underwhelming existence of a non-person, which she is fine with. Since she keeps a relatively low-profile, Cary is oftentimes the object of gossipy speculation, with one country club cunt remarking in regard to her, "I can never decide whether Howard's wife is a saint or just not very bright," thus reflecting her dubious position in the community. Indeed, Cary seems like she has been relegated to a sort of suburban purgatory of no return until she meets a tall, dark, and handsome gardener named Ron Kirby (Rock Hudson), who has taken over his recently deceased father's gardening business. Cary immediately becomes smitten with Ron's charm, confidence, intelligence, and naturalistic yet poetic outlook on life. When Ron states regarding Koelreuteria trees that according to Chinese legend, "They say it can only thrive near a home where there's love," Cary replies that it is a "beautiful legend" and practically creams her panties. Undoubtedly, Ron has a sort of entrancing power over Cary and he will inspire her to do things she never thought imaginable. Unfortunately for Cary, her kids and friends have very different expectations for her.

When Ron invites Cary to his rural home under the pretense of seeing his much prized silver spruce trees, she at first says no because she instinctively knows it would be a 'subversive' act in the eyes of her friends, but she immediately has second thoughts and goes with him. Ron lives in a secluded country home that is largely a greenhouse and remarks to Cary upon showing it to her, "I can see that a woman might not like it, but it does very well for me," to which she symbolically replies, "If one likes to live in a glass house." Indeed, while Ron is not afraid to live in a 'glass house' as an innately individualistic man who can be himself in front of anyone at any time without feeling an inkling of shame or guilt, no matter who they are, Cary hides in the shadows of her suburban prison while hoping no one notices her. Of course, before she knows it, Ron is kissing her and from there, Cary is introduced to her new young lover's Thoreau-esque life of simple anti-materialistic living and tree-hugging. When Cary is brought to Ron's friends the Anderson's remote nursery, she is initially bewildered by the experience and even becomes so paranoid that she suspects her beau's pal Mick (Charles Drake) is laughing at her, but her fears are soon calmed by the accepting and hardly judgmental nature of these proud anti-conformist folks. Mick met Ron during the Korean War and because of him, he went from being a materialistic advertising agent who had a rocky relationship with his wife Alida (Virginia Grey) and who devoted his life to "keeping up with the Joneses," to becoming a rabid anti-materialistic proto-hippie who calls Thoreau's Walden his bible and lives by the personal philosophy, "To thine own self be true." When Cary asks Alida if Walden is also Ron's bible, she replies, "I don't think Ron ever read it, he lives it. You see, Ron's security comes from inside himself and nothing can ever take it away. Ron absolutely refuses to let unimportant things become important." Unfortunately, Cary is exactly the sort of person who allows unimportant things to become important to her, as she lives in a suburban fantasy world of cowardly conformist artificiality and because of this, her romance with Ron will be the subject of unwavering hatred, scorn, and ridicule.

When Ron proclaims his love to Cary and asks her to marry him, she initially thinks the idea is crazy and hysterically complains "can't you see it's impossible?", but she naturally soon gives in. As Ron tells her, "this is the only thing that matters" and "You're running away from something important because you're afraid," but of course Cary will soon forget his words when she faces a deluge of venomous antagonism from her spoiled and self-centered brat kids, fair-weather friends, nosy neighbors, and compulsively callous country club comrades. Indeed, when Cary lets her kids know that she is engaged, they are quite excited as they assume she plans to marry seemingly benign old fart Harvey and her son Ned (William Reynolds) even remarks "Don't worry, Mother. We're all for it," but when she reveals it is actually Ron who she plans to spend the rest of her largely misspent life with, they both turn into irrational animals of the incessantly bickering and bitchy sort. While they both reluctantly agree to meet Ron, things soon turn ugly quick when he arrives and refuses to bend the knees while being interrogated by his beloved's bratty spawn. Using what she describes as a "detached" approach to questioning her mother's less than auspicious engagement, Cary's daughter Kay attempts to talk Ron out of the marriage by stating, "You don't know Mother as we know her. She's really much more conventional... than you seem to think she is. She has the innate desire for group approval, which most women have." Ultimately, both children contrive totally bullshit excuses to get away from Ron only minutes after meeting him. When Cary brings her dashing beau to a party comprised of all her country club friends held at her best friend Sara's home, it is ultimately an abject disaster that results in some superlatively self-righteous busybody bitch having the gall to call Ron "positively murderous" after he grabs and threatens Harvey for groping his beloved fiancée. When Kay gets home that night after the nightmarish party, her nasty little Mad Men-esque son confronts her, accusing her of being a whore by hatefully stating, "I think all you see is a good-looking set of muscles," and even tells her that he will never ever visit her again if she gets married to Ron because he would be too "ashamed." Even daughter Kay, who sees herself as some sort of freethinking progressive type, hatefully attacks Cary by remarking, "you love him so much you're willing to ruin all of our lives?" while sobbing hysterically. Needless to say, the suburbanites of All That Heavens Allows provide more than enough reasons as to why the commies might be right when they call for the extermination of the bourgeoisie.

Of course, feeling depressed and isolated after all her friends and family gang up on her with the utmost malice, Cary goes to Ron and tells him that she wants to postpone the marriage so that everyone in her community can get "used to" their unconventional relationship and he replies by somewhat sarcastically remarking, "you mean we'll invited to all the cocktail parties?," thus reflecting his disapproval of her willingness to sacrifice their love just because a bunch of fake ass wine-sniffers disapprove of it. Unconsciously projecting her own feelings onto Ron, Cary accuses him of forcing her to choose between him and her kids. Of course, Cary chooses her kids and leaves her lover behind to drown in a poisonous cocktail of misery and loneliness. Despite breaking off her engagement with Ron, Cary's kids show her no gratitude and even fail to show up at her home over the weekend after promising to. Of course, Cary is still hopelessly in love with Ron and when she bumps into him while she is Christmas tree shopping, she finds it nearly impossible to obfuscate her undying love for him. As for Ron, he is so hopelessly distraught by the situation that he even loses his seemingly unconquerable confidence and becomes a grumpy and pathetic pessimist, with his friend Mick even telling him that, "you're no good to me, yourself, or anyone" and recommending that he get back in contact with Cary, arguing it is up to him to make things right because, "She doesn't want to make up her own mind. No girl does. She wants you to make it up for her." Meanwhile, on Christmas, Cary learns that both of her grown children are moving away, as her daughter is getting married and her son is planning to travel around the world for his job and hopes to sell the family home, thus causing her to come to the natural realization, "The whole thing's been so pointless" in regard to dumping Ron for the sake of her unreliable children and phoney friends. Undoubtedly, Cary's lonely life reaches its pathetic peak in terms of phoniness and artificiality when her children give her a television set for Xmas that will ostensibly allow her to have "life's parade" at her fingertips. When Cary goes to her physician Dr. Dan Hennessy (Hayden Rorke) because of terrible headaches that she has been routinely suffering, the doc tells her that she is suffering from no diagnosable illness and that her pain is psychosomatic and the direct result of her lovelorn longing for Ron. A truly 'good' doctor in the most fullest sense of the word, Dr. Hennessy tells Cary that her headaches are a good sign that their relationship is salvageable and encourages her to go back to Ron, which she immediately does, but upon arriving at her estranged beau's home, she cannot find him, though he spots her, so she leaves heartbroken. Tragically, while attempting in vain to gesture to Cary from the top of a snowy mountain near his home, Ron accidentally slips off a cliff and sustains a borderline life-threatening injury (notably, Sirk originally intended to conclude the film with Ron falling off the cliff, thus leaving it up to the viewer to decide whether he survived or not). Luckily, Ron's friend Mick's wife immediately notifies Cary about the accident and takes her to see her bedridden beloved. When Cary arrives at her great love's humble abode she lets him know that she's staying for good. Of course, due to Cary's hysterical, negligent, nonsensical, and even treacherous actions, her romantic bond with Ron will be forever tainted, not to mention the fact she has destroyed her lover's mind and body in the process, ultimately transforming him from a proud and strong yet calm and easygoing man who is more or less the living embodiment of the Thoreauvian Weltanschauung into an lovelorn mess with the confidence of a male East Asian porn star in the middle of an all-black gang bang.

In his 1971 essay Imitation of life: On the Films of Douglas Sirk, Sirk's Bavarian spiritual son Rainer Werner Fassbinder wrote regarding All That Heaven Allows and its ironic and seemingly tacked-on happy ending, "...later Jane goes back to Rock, because she keeps having headaches, which happens to all of us if we don't fuck often enough. But when she's back, it isn't a happy ending, even though they're together, the two of them. A person who creates so many problems in love won't be able to be happy later on. That's what he makes films about, Douglas Sirk. Human beings can't be alone, but they can't be together either." Of course, Fassbinder would take what Sirk did in his work to greater and more provocative extremes in Ali: Fear Eats the Soul by demonstrating that proles and ugly people are all the more petty and pernicious in their rejection of couples that contradict their unwritten rules of conformity. Notably, homo heeb auteur Todd Haynes would pay tribute to both Sirk and Fassbinder's films with his relatively mainstream effort Far from Heaven (2002) starring Julianne Moore, though it is unquestionably inferior in every way to the two works that it so liberally 'borrows' from. Unquestionably, one of Sirk's greatest achievements with All That Heaven Allows was managing to concoct an almost decadently aesthetically 'pretty' and 'glittery' work that somehow manages to inspire hatred, misanthropy, and even misogyny in anyone with blood pumping in their veins, especially in regard to those many individuals who have had to deal with petty and oftentimes jealous self-righteous outsiders meddling with their relationships, as if it is actually their business or something. Of course, one must also respect Sirk for directing a film that ruthlessly criticizes the very same demographic of people it was made for, as he was a sort of master of superlatively scathing passive-aggressive celluloid sadism. Indeed, despite being originally peddled as a cheap soapish sort of melodrama, All That Heaven Allows could have only been assembled by the sort of highly cultivated and dignified sort of fellow who can make the age-old expression "fuck you" seem like an exceedingly elegant term of endearment. Notably, Fassbinder also wrote in his essay on his mentor, "Sirk has said that film is blood, tears, violence, hate, death, and love. And Sirk has made films, films with blood, with tears, with violence, hate, films with death and films with life. Sirk has said you can't make films about something, you can only make films with something, with people, with light, with flowers, with mirrors, with blood, with all these crazy things that make it worthwhile. Sirk has also said that lighting and camera angles constitute the philosophy of the director. And Sirk has made the most tender ones I know, films by a man who loves human beings and doesn't despise them as we do." While I can agree with most of Fassbinder's sentiments, I think that, as All That Heaven Allows exquisitely demonstrates, Sirk indubitably had hatred in his heart for a specific breed of people, but certainly the right people. Indeed, the sort of people that see it fit to despoil someone's love and happiness because something about their relationship takes them out of their oh-so precious comfort zone. As a work that loves to hate those that hate those who love unconditionally, All That Heaven Allows unequivocally demonstrates that some hatred is healthy, for one justifiably hates that which threatens something they love.

A TIME TO LOVE AND A TIME TO DIE

Ironically, despite being remembered as a master of melodrama, Danish-German auteur Douglas Sirk's most personal cinematic work was probably a war film, which, as his asinine WWII era agitprop piece Hitler's Madman (1943)—a completely fictionalized account of the assassination of SS-Obergruppenführer Reinhard Heyrich (incidentally, fellow recent anti-Nazi emigre Fritz Lang also directed a cheap agitprop piece based on the incident the same year entitled Hangmen Also Die! (1943))—demonstrates, it was not exactly a genre he had a special talent for. Indeed, while A Time to Love and a Time to Die (1958)—a work based on the 1954 novel of the same name (the original German title is Zeit zu leben und Zeit zu sterben) by first class frog-kraut pacifist pansy and distinguished traitor Erich Maria Remarque—might be a war film full of exploding buildings and brutalized Aryan corpses, it is also a malignantly melancholy melodrama full of despair, pessimism, hopelessness, and even a smidgen of nihilism that concludes on a decidedly dejecting note that not only speaks volumes about the filmmaker's thoughts on the Second World War and humanity in general, but also the tragic death of his sole progeny. The filmmaker's penultimate work before directing the racially-charged hit Imitation of Life (1959) starring Lana Turner, retiring from filmmaking altogether, and relocating to Switzerland, the film was a rather personal work for Sirk because, like the protagonist in the film, his estranged Nazi actor son Klaus Detlef Sierck (1925-1944) died a pointless lonely death towards the end of Second World War on the Eastern Front while serving in the German Wehrmacht. Although he directed a couple films in Germany during the Third Reich period, including the huge UFA box-office hit La Habanera (1937) starring exotic Swedish diva Zarah Leander, Sirk (whose real name was Hans Detlef Sierck before anglicizing it upon moving to the U.S.) was a well known hardcore leftist with a Jewish wife who directed works by philo-Semitic kraut commie playwright Bertolt Brecht for the stage. After marrying Jewess Hilde Jary, Sirk's first wife refused to allow him to see their son Klaus and when the auteur decided to flee from Uncle Adolf's Reich in 1937 and eventually move to the United States where he began directing anti-Nazi propaganda films during the early 1940s, it guaranteed that he would never be able to see or contact his son again. Ironically, son Klaus become a Nazi child actor who starred in over a dozen films before his tragic untimely death, including three works by Veit 'Jew Süß' Harlan who, as the unrivaled master of high-camp National Socialist melodramas, was a sort of unofficial artistic nemesis to the elder Sirk. Notably, Nazi Minister of Propaganda Joseph Goebbels was indirectly responsible for the youngrt Sirk's death, as he took an irrational dislike to the boy, made the baseless accusation he was a homosexual (even sending him before the Gestapo to answer for imaginary aberrosexual crimes), cut many of his scenes from Harlan's Frederick the Great war epic Der große König (1942) aka The Great King, forbade the boy from acting in anymore films, and sent him to the Eastern Front where he would ultimately die. After the Second World War, Sirk, who had no clue his son had perished in the Slavic lands like so many other German boys his age, came back to Germany to look for Klaus, only to learn what no father should have to discover. Later, in an interview with John Halliday, Sirk would reveal his hope that his son was at least able to find love before he died, with A Time to Love and a Time to Die being "one possible" scenario that might have happened to Klaus Detlef Sierck.

Made at a time when the last thing that the happy stupid American victors wanted to see was a film depicting the incomparable suffering that all Germans—both good and bad, as well as young and old—experienced during the Second World War, A Time to Love and a Time to Die is certainly not a work that exonerates Germany for National Socialism, hence why it has been somewhat rightfully dubbed All Quiet on the Eastern Front, but it does make the Normandy Invasion and other oftentimes cinematically depicted events that yanks cry about seem totally petty and insignificant by comparison as far as human tragedies are concerned. Set during a virtual Aryan apocalypse of scorched earth chaos when entire families were crushed and burned alive in a split second via Allied bombing raids and where fallen countesses pawned their pussies to any boorish beer-chugging bastard who had an extra crumb to spare, A Time to Love and a Time to Die is a father's first and final attempt at mourning a prodigal son who, like so many of his generation, was cheated out of a full and potentially artistically prolific life after unwittingly making a Faustian pact with a movement that promised a Teutonic utopia but ultimately delivered a hellstorm of the apocalyptic sort. The totally tragic tale of a young German soldier who has the priceless opportunity to escape the savagery of the Eastern Front for three weeks after being furloughed and experiencing all extremes of the emotional spectrum after going back to his bombed out hometown where he ultimately falls in love and gets married, only to be killed by a swarthy untermensch Soviet partisan after sparing the ingrateful man's life just moments after learning via letter from his loving wife that he will become a father, this uniquely dejecting war movie attempts to comprehend the completely incomprehensible while at the same time damning the German people for allowing the Nazis to takeover and for supporting a war effort that not only resulted in the deaths of 7-10 million German soldiers and civilians (yep, you probably didn't know that more krauts than kikes died in WWII), the total destruction of every major city/town and countless irreplaceable ancient landmarks/buildings/sculptures, and the complete eradication of some of the greatest ancient Teutonic bloodlines, but also secured the end of Germany's once prestigious reputation as one of the greatest producer culture-bearers in human history. Indeed, it is no coincidence that the heebies in Hollywood and the media use any chance they can get to bring up the holocaust or perpetuate some obscenely outmoded WWII era stereotype, as if they are still waging an agitprop war with Herr Doktor Goebbels.

As an inter-tile reads at the beginning of A Time to Love and a Time to Die, it is the “Russian-German Front 1944” and a German soldier named Immerman (Jock Mahoney) remarks that it “looks like spring is coming” because frozen German corpses are starting to thaw out of the once-rock-hard snow. A rather effeminate novice soldier named Hirschland (Jim Hutton) who is having a hard time adjusting to the war remarks regarding the freshly thawed out corpse of a German officer that “he looks like he is crying,” but as a comrade tells him, “his eyeballs were frozen.” When Hirschland is forced to take part in the execution of a group of Soviet partisans, which include hysterical middle-aged Ruski women and elderly geezers, he cannot live with himself, so he blows his brains out and the head German officer has his less than honorable death officially recorded as a “Death by Accident.” Before Hirschland commits suicide, a comrade named Ernst Graeber (played by John Gavin of Stanley Kubrick’s Spartacus (1960) and Hitchcock’s Psycho (1960), who, as a dark-haired McLatino of half-Mexican extraction, probably does not fit the Aryan ideal) berates him and his “big baby eyes” for acting like a whiny little wimp and not partaking in vodka-chugging with the rest of his comrades. Luckily for him, Herr Graeber, who has seen action everywhere from North Africa to Paris and has not had a single vacation from battle in over two years, has been furloughed and has the opportunity to spend three weeks hanging around his hometown where he plans to, “get deloused, take a hot bath, sleep in a clean bed, and forget for three weeks that there is a war.” Of course, Little does Graeber realize that during those three weeks he will fall in love, get married, and develop a progressive hatred for all things Nazi and all things war.

Upon arriving in the quaint town where he was born and raised, Ernst’s initial rather enthusiastic nostalgia is completely destroyed when he discovers that his entire neighborhood, including his family home, has been reduced to rubble as a result of Allied bombing raids, with his parents being nowhere in sight. It does not take long for Ernst to realize that the Nazi bureaucracy machine will be of no help in his seemingly hopeless search for his family. Ernst also learns that the local citizenry is not exactly supportive of his and his comrades service, as an eccentric old fart complains to him, “six raids, six raids since you damn front-line soldiers have been running away out there” and then more or less blames him for the death of his wife and kids via a bombing raid. During his search for his family, Ernst befriends a typically boorish kraut soldier named Hermann Boettcher (Don DeFore) who is rather sad about the fact that his 200-lb “solid muscle” blonde beastess of a wife is missing. Upon speaking with Boettcher, Ernst gets the idea to visit his mother’s physician Dr. Kruse, as he figures that he would probably know whether or not his parents are still alive, but when he arrives at the doctor’s house, the only person he discovers is the doc’s insufferably bitchy young daughter Elizabeth Kruse (Swiss actress Liselotte Pulver of Billy Wilder's One, Two, Three (1961) and Kurt Hoffman's The Haunted Castle (1960) aka Das Spukschloß im Spessart), who is perennially pissed off over the fact that the Gestapo took her daddy away and that her family home has been turned into a virtual boardinghouse for exceedingly bitchy busybody housewives whose husbands are Nazi party members. Despite the fact that she is an impenetrable bitch with a gigantic chip on her delicate shoulder, Ernst becomes almost immediately enamored with Elizabeth's entire being and unlike many soldiers, he is interested in more than just a wartime fling. Although Elizabeth acts like an inhospitable cunt and tries to kick Ernst out of her home ASAP, a bombing raid temporarily forces her to seek safety with the gentlemanly soldat at a local bomb shelter. When Ernst later walks Elizabeth back to her home and attempts to give her a care package full of food that was given to him by the army when he was furloughed, she flips out and less than subtly accuses him of attempting to ply her into giving up her pussy. At this point, Ernst has had enough of Elizabeth's brazen bitchiness and incessant ingratitude, so he stoically states to her, "I'm sorry, fighting is not my idea of fun, not even with you" and leaves. On his way back while walking through the rubble-ridden streets, Ernst is approached by a super Aryan-looking lady of the night who he baffles by handing the care package to for free and walking off without getting a piece of feisty Fräulein pussy in return. Of course, little does Ernst realize that he turned on Elizabeth with his random display of hotheadedness, as she likes a real mensch who can rightfully put her in her place.

The next day while walking down the street, a Hermann Göring-esque Nazi leader in a fancy convertible yells to the protagonist, "Ernst...don't you recognize your friends anymore?" in a most unintentionally ironic fashion. The National Socialist fat cat is Oscar Binding (Thayer David of Dark Shadows (1966-1971) and Rocky (1976)) and his days as a pre-Third Reich era Hitler Youth member have certainly paid off, as he is the humble son of a milkman who went on to become the Nazi 'District Leader' of his town and he invites Ernst, who is a former classmate of his, to come by his lavish multistory home for some cognac so he can show off his hedonistic life of luxury that includes, among other things, expensive bath salts, looted art, countless taxidermy animal head mounts, and an unlimited supply of starving women who will do just about anything for a mere bread crumb. Indeed, Binding makes sure to brag to Ernst about the fact that the day before a "beautiful creature from the old aristocracy with long hair and a superb figure" came by his humble abode begging from him to free her hubby from a concentration camp. Of course, Binding is not greedy and even offers Ernst a literal orgy a women if that is what his heart desires, but the protagonist is not even interested in one woman, let alone a brothel full. While hanging out with his old comrade, Ernst is also somewhat perturbed to discover that one of his favorite teachers, Professor Pohlmann (source writer Erich Maria Remarque in a supporting role in what would be the first and last time he acted in a film), had a temporary internment at a local concentration camp as a result of Herr Binding's insistence at getting back at the educator for giving him a hard time in the past when he was a student for being a Hitlerite. More of an opportunist than a sadist, Binding eventually freed Pohlmann, who now lives in a bombed out church where Ernst intends to later pay him a visit, but it is not until later that he will have a good reason to. While Binding offers Ernst the opportunity to stay at his luxurious home for as long as he wants and partake in practically any form of hedonism, the grunt soldier turns him down, but he does take him up on his offer for a warm bath involving expensive bath salts, a bottle of wine, and a search mission for his parents. While the bath salts prove to be beneficial, the bottle of wine and search mission prove to be totally worthless.

After talking her into going on a romantic walk with him after she becomes noticeably aroused by the lilac bath salt scent on his freshly bathed body, Ernst finally manages to get Elizabeth to shed her seemingly indomitable frigidness and the two kiss passionately under a half-burned tree that prematurely bloomed as a result of the heat of a nearby fire making the perennial plant think it was already spring time. Of course, as a result of their nation being both literally and figuratively in flames, Ernst and Elizabeth's love affair will also prematurely bloom into something quite beautiful but ultimately doomed. From there, Ernst concocts a plan for an intricate romantic evening at a fancy underground restaurant called 'New Germania' involving fine wine and French food, but first he must borrow an officer's uniform from a wisecracking gentleman named Reuter (played by McJew Keenan Wynn of Kubrick's Dr. Strangelove (1964) and Sergio Leone's Once Upon a Time in the West (1968)), who is such a refined and cultivated cosmopolitan 'man of the world' that he has been hospitalized as a result of the "rich man's disease" aka gout, thus he has had the distinguished luxury of sitting the Second World War out. While their romantic evening gets cut short after 'New Germania' gets caught up in a bombing raid that spoils their dinner and results in a woman getting burned alive after her fancy dress catches on fire, Ernst and Elizabeth have a hell of a time, as they love one another and thus can have fun doing anything, no matter how dangerous or tragic, so long as they are together. Of course, Ernst soon proposes to Elizabeth and while she initially hesitates and launches one of her signature bitch-fests, she ultimately says yes. Of course, not long after being married, problems arise. For one, Ernst intercepts a summons from his new bride from the Gestapo and suspects it might be bad news since Elizabeth's father was arrested for talking shit about the war effort. Luckily, Ernst also receives a letter from his parents telling him that they're still alive. Needless to say, Ernst is in for quite a scare when a bombing raid completely demolishes the factory where his wife works. On top of that, upon looking for his beloved at their home, Ernst finds the building burning down, though he manages to save a small plant and a portrait of Elizabeth's father before the place completely burns down. Naturally, Ernst is rather relieved when Elizabeth eventually shows up outside of their burned down home, though he does not have the heart to tell her that she has received a summons from the Gestapo. Ultimately, the two decide to seek sanctuary in a bombed out museum next to Professor Pohlmann's ruined hideout and they have an almost magical storybook time living among ruined statues, with Elizabeth remarking that it has always been her dream ever since she was a little girl to live in such a romantic fashion.

Upon receiving advice from Professor Pohlmann and his Jewish fugitive friend Joseph (German actor Charles Régnier of Fred Haines' 1974 Hermann Hesse adaptation Steppenwolf and Ingmar Bergman's The Serpent's Egg (1977)), Ernst decides to go to the Gestapo on his wife's behalf in the hope of sparing her any potential punishment she might face as a result of her ostensible traitor father's actions. Before going to the Gestapo, Ernst decides to go by his friend Binding's place as a last resort to ask him for help, but he becomes so disturbed by his friend's company, which include a drunken The Night Porter-esque blonde Nazi whore sporting nothing but an SS officer's hat and a silk robe, as well as a concentration camp commander named 'Heini' (Austrian actor Kurt Meisel)—an overly pernicious-looking baldheaded piano virtuoso whose musical talents apparently once "made the fuhrer cry"—who brags about burning Jews, that he leaves without even bothering to ask for help. When Ernst finally gathers the courage to head to Nazi headquarters, he is ultimately in for a bittersweet relief when a Gestapo Lieutenant played by none other than Klaus Kinski (notably, virtually all the evil Nazis in the film have blond hair and blue eyes, while the 'good guys', like the protagonist, have semi-swarthy appearances) simply has him sign the release for a small wooden box containing his wife's father's cremated ashes. After discovering that Dr. Kruse's official recorded cause of death is a heart attack, which was written on the death certificate of virtually all people that were euthanized by Nazi doctors, Ernst comes to the unsettling realization that Elizabeth's father was murdered. While Elizabeth is saddened to hear bad news of her father's untimely demise, she seems more perturbed by the fact that Ernst has to go back to the Eastern Front. Although Ernst attempts to have his furlough extended for a single day, the Nazi in charge literally laughs in his face and thus the ultimately foredoomed protagonist is forced to take the next train out of town back to the Eastern Front where a fairly certain death waits him. Upon joining up with his largely decimated army battalion, Ernst becomes so enraged when one of his comrades goes to liquidate three dirty elderly Soviet partisans that he shoots him dead and then makes the ultimately fatal mistake of setting the triad of crusty old commie farts free. After reading a letter from Elizabeth revealing that she is pregnant and that he will become a father, Ernst is ironically shot dead by one of the partisans he set free, thus revealing that pacifism and hollow idealism kills during times of total war, especially when you're decidedly dehumanized semi-Asiatic enemy is drunk on revenge after suffering over half a decade of murder and misery.

Undoubtedly, director Douglas Sirk was probably not the only one who was feeling a tad bit guilty as a result of his (in)action after fleeing the Third Reich, as A Time to Love and a Time to Die star/source writer Erich Maria Remarque's sister Elfriede Scholz was arrested by the Gestapo in 1943 and beheaded via guillotine not long after the novelist fled to the United States, with infamous Nazi judge Roland Freisler—a show trial maestro who, upon becoming president of the People's Court, was responsible for approximately 90% of all proceedings concluding with sentences of death or life imprisonment—somewhat sinisterly stating to her during her trial, “Your brother is unfortunately beyond our reach—you, however, will not escape us.” To add insult to injury, Remarque's other sister Erna was forced to cover the cost of Scholz's prosecution, imprisonment and execution. While both Remarque's novel and Sirk's film were probably at least partially inspired by each creator's respective post-WWII guilt, German auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder noticed an important difference between the two creations, writing in his 1971 essay Imitation of life: On the Films of Douglas Sirk regarding A Time to Love and a Time to Die, “You can't make a film about war. How wars come about—that would be important, and what effect they have on people or leave behind. This isn't a pacifist film, either, because you never for a minute say to yourself, without this gruesome war everything would be so beautiful or whatever. Remarque's novel, A TIME TO LIVE AND A TIME TO DIE, is pacifist. Remarque says that without war this would be an eternal love; Sirk says that without war there wouldn't be any love here.” Indeed, aside from the fact that Remarque was, like virtually all pacifists, a delusional idealist and true blue coward who did not want to accept the fact that people are naturally aggressive and tend to kill one another under the right set of circumstances, he seemed to conveniently overlook the fact that people seem not to fuck around during quite deadly serious times (i.e. during total war) where the next day or hour could very possibly be their last. Indeed, with all the superlatively stupid, petty, and pathetic problems that people concern themselves with nowadays, there would be almost something quite liberating about the virtual hell-on-earth depicted in Sirk's film and sometimes I even think that the best thing that could happen to America is if a war came along that inspired people to set their priorities straight and cleansed them of all the worthless bullshit in their lives. As an admirer of Remarque's literary nemesis Ernst Jünger and someone who thinks that the Hollywood agitprop piece All Quiet on the Western Front (1930) directed by kraut-hating Hebrew Lewis Milestone (born Leib Milstein) and produced by his kosher comrade Carl Laemmle, Jr. is one of the most obscenely overrated and maliciously manipulative so-called ‘anti-war’ films ever made, I was honestly surprised I mostly enjoyed A Time to Love and a Time to Die, even if it glaringly tainted by obnoxiously phony pseudo-German accents, classically contrived Hollywood studio sets, mediocre melodrama, and second-rate acting performances from the lead actors. Although an uneven work that suffers from many of the banalities and conspicuous crappy contrivances typical of Hollywood WWII films from its era, Sirk's film is important because it not only uncovers the intentionally deeply buried suffering of the Teutons during the Second World War as mercilessly inflicted by the Allies, but also because it features the filmmaker at his most conflicted, haunted, and forlorn in a rare cinematic work from the perspective of a German father who faced the most terrible and irrevocable of losses; the death of his long lost son. As to whether or not Sirk regretted giving up his sole son and heir for kosher cunt, one can only guess.

THE TAINT
THE TAINT

Drew Bolduc (2011)

Not since what seems to be eons ago has such a voice of trash echoed throughout underground cinema as Drew Bolduc and co-director Dan Nelson's The Taint has. Written, directed, and starring Drew Bolduc, this vile testament in multitasking is as shocking and repulsive as modern cinema, even archaic exploitation, comes. The plot revolves around a dystopian backdrop in which the water supply of a town, possibly the world, becomes tainted with a mutated penis enlargement formula. Phil O'Ginney awakes from a nightmare in the woods only to have a psycho with goggles sprinting towards him. Armed with an enormous scythe and a severed phallus, this maniac chases Phil until he runs into Misandra (Clever), a desensitized park ranger who alerts him that most, if not all, males are stricken with "the taint" which turns them into sex-raving beasts victim to their own instincts. These instincts of course include misogyny, the male's great past-time. Who else to pass judgment on women than their favorite prey? As displayed prominently in all marketing materials, killing women is the only thing on these males minds.

With an aggressive 80s pastiche about it, The Taint is one of the few films whose aesthetic (or anti-aesthetic) is digested even before the start of the film. The title font rings of an old-school skateboarding design, an image so fierce that I can practically taste the Powell boards underneath The Taint's wretched breath. Whatever you want to call this, new-age trash with punk glamor, this genre undiscovered is a formidable force. Finally I can enjoy shock for shock sake and The Taint stands as one of the few true comedies of the splatter market. Long have I scowled in the direction of Troma for producing unfunny situations of cocks, lesbians, and deplorable (and shoddy) effects work. The Taint not only effortlessly delivers what Troma promises but does it with such zeal you can forgive the somewhat sloppy and confusing narrative amidst flashbacks. What might be the biggest surprise of The Taint is how well done and audibly orgasmic the soundtrack is. Coursing through the chip-tune veins of The Taint's score is hints of punk and garage rock, junk to the ear. This marks the first soundtrack I can listen to without imagery to accompany since Mike Patton's take on Nevelandine & Taylor's chaotic Crank 2.

Following the fetishistic norm of hardcore dystopia, The Taint reintroduces an apocalyptic sensibility involving a rape-centered society. It's strange encountering this again so soon after viewing The Afterman. The epoch of subtlety has dawned. This is proven with the delightfully comic dialogue exchanged between Phil and a surviving camaraderie of frat-esque closet homosexuals whose leader is obsessed with the male figure. When one of the goons catches sight of Misandra, he bellows loudly of gang rape. With something as bold and artless as this, one cannot shake mention of reminiscing Zedd/Kern. Bringing Gen-X'rs into a style past brings a delightful platter to the table, one that can be compared as the comic hipdom of Scott Pilgrim vs. the World blended violently with the anarchic libidinous nature of several of Richard Kern's Manhattan Love Suicides. Normally, I would be hesitant towards the ingredients that makes up the popularity of The Taint. From a non-Troma enthusiast, take it as this. Troma's exhibition of frequent nudity and grotesquely cheap special effects marked a new era in horror - a desexualized kind. Troma stands as the only film company that can successfully kill my sex drive and to their demographic, serves as a large redundancy and inhibitor of clash-trash quality. Not only does The Taint handle carefully the contents within, but surpasses near every film in the catalog of Troma.

The biggest selling point of The Taint is the endless seam of misogyny available. Many scenes encounter various infected men as they bolt down the street with large objects with the sole hunger to smash women's heads in. Misandra's previous love life is divulged with one of the most hilarious scenes to be found in The Taint. Her relationship with her boyfriend is explained in a cinematic exposition during a picnic. After lustfully swapping saliva, words of true infatuation are exchanged as quoted below.

Woman - "We're so in love."

Man - "Fuck anybody who's not in love like we are!"

Woman - "Must be fags!"

Man - "Total fucking queers."

This imitation of retro 50s chivalry is a charm in parallel to the cock-spewing anarchic graduating class of cum-loud that is The Taint. For a meal consisting of gratuitous gore and ejaculate, The Taint is as repulsive as sleaze comes and is the first crack at cockagenda documented. I've never seen a film as abrasive and immature as Drew Bolduc and Dan Nelson's The Taint and I hope for the best in their future endeavors - as long as the hatred for women withstands.

MOON

Duncan Jones (2009)

Following Sam Rockwell's over-the-top hilarious cameo in the holy grail of television, Stella, I became incredibly interested in his upcoming science fiction project known as Moon. Upon Moon's release, this Twilight sensation really hit the fan and the shit. was. everywhere. When one would inquire about Moon, some scantily clad obese chick somewhere would ask "New Moon?" as if to insult my intelligence further. Hopefully this pandemic of glam vampires will end but I don't foresee that happening so I figured I'd rather write down my thoughts instead of fishing for a handful of opinions as I'm sure most of the local townsfolk would surely call this film "boring." Like many deep space films before this, Moon encompasses the idea of solitary madness as explored in that Resident Evil-in-space film titled Pandorum. Pandorum is a fictional breakdown of the mind in space. Not to call this entirely fictional, in fact, I'm sure if we (humans) did more long term experiments in space, we too could adopt the usage of Pandorum. So apart from the terrible film references, How does Moon hold up? Moon is a film that relates to its own symphony of infinite quiet. Clint Mansell, best known for his work on Requiem for a Dream, collaborated with his own experiences of a resonating orchestra within personal hollow white walls to create a repetitive theme to the dreary, melancholy status of isolation and loneliness unheard. Suffice to say, Sacrifice from the score to Moon is simply the best film theme to be produced in a long time. My own fears leeches and sapped so much from me than I could handle just while viewing the trailer, Some credit goes to Sam Rockwell as well for providing the perfect visage of Sam Bell. No one else could have near pulled off what he has accomplished. Paired with both this and Bronson, which has a review coming soon, this year in festivals and "independent" cinema seems to be the most promising I've experienced yet. The only complaint with Moon yet is simple and most simpletons seem to share this in common with each other; It's too "boring." With a film set in space circulating the plot around a single man working in a solitary lunar station for 3 years with very little outside contact to civilization, I wouldn't expect a science fiction masterpiece to be anything but. Moon is something of a stand still staple in filmmaking. For the budget being what it is and the welcome absence of computer-generated imagery, the practical model effects are simply outstanding. The lunar landscape looks anything but artificial and the open claustrophobia of a bleak surface is present with a resounding "Yes!" What really stands out as special in Moon is the composition and pacing of this accelerating mystery. While the film's internal makeup is frequently bouncing around, the set pieces and pivotal plot stay almost frozen, so to speak. As to say, Moon is a tidy film that takes place in a very short time with not much happening other than a dual mono-character portrait that is active within its own steadily paced storytelling. Moon is a film that is as ambiguous as its purported ending, but an ending can only mean a beginning as well. With many positive aesthetics and the stark and heavenly-white set design of this specific lunar base, Moon fashions itself a polished film that suffocates you with many emotions and its phobia inducing fits of madness. Along with Rockwell's incredible performance that marks him as one of the most incredibly underused actors, Kevin Spacey wows as the robotic helper Gerty whose simple vocal demeanor goes a long way for him just be utilized as a voice actor with an expressible monotone pitch. His wide variety of on screen "emoticons" really sets the mood for each and every scene he appears in, although not meaning to give a robot gender. With my subsequent viewing of Moon, I feel as if all science fiction up to this (excluding several) have lacked the real mechanics of what composes a space classic. Moon has all those and more, with an intriguing beginning, mysterious middle, and tragic end. I could find some aspects of faulty presentation, I'm sure, but I'm too busy enjoying what I experienced during Moon, especially what I'm experiencing after. This is a film that will stick with you no matter if you loved it or loathed it. Personally, I find Moon to have what science fiction has been missing all along - misadventure and despair.

WR: MYSTERIES OF THE ORGANISM
WR: MYSTERIES OF THE ORGANISM

Dušan Makavejev (1971)

Out of all the messianic psychoanalysts with godlike complexes, Freudian-Marxist Wilhelm Reich – a funny fellow who genuinely believed “not a single neurotic individual possesses orgasmic potency,” that National Socialism was the result of sexual repression (as if Joseph Goebbels was not a big enough man whore), and that “orgone” (aka orgasm) energy was a ‘cosmic energy’ which uneducated laymen described as ‘God’ – takes the kosher cake for being the biggest crackpot of the pseudo-scientific psychoanalytic movement, so it is no surprise that, unlike Sigmund Freud and C.G. Jung, the salacious soul-doctor is relatively unknown today and rarely acknowledged in academia, which is at least in part due to the embarrassingly dogmatic nature of his sex-obsessed ideas and his perverse and ultimately pathetic personal life. By the 1930s, Reich had become a bad joke of sorts among his fellow psychoanalysts, not least of all due to his ‘hands on’ approach with nude patients (a number of whom become submissive sex partners and would perform illegal abortions with at least one ending in the individual’s death, all at the good doctor’s command) so, on top of wanting to escape from the Hebrew-hostile National Socialists, the quaint quack moved to the United States in 1939 and was eventually convicted of mail fraud in 1956 for illegally shipping ‘orgone accumulators’ and related schizoid literature after the U.S. Food and Drug Administration obtained an injunction against the interstate shipment of such dubious pseudo-scientific materials, thus he was imprisoned and died shamefully of a heart attack not long after. In Serbian auteur filmmaker Dušan Makavejev’s (Man is Not a Bird, Montenegro) Reichian film W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism (1971) aka W.R. - Misterije organizma – a delightfully deranged dichotomous cinematic work that is half documentary and half sardonic/surrealist fantasy flick – a naively noble but ultimately laughable attempt is made to rehabilitate Wilhelm Reich and his work and satirize the ‘impure communism’ of corrupt comrade Joseph Stalin in an exceedingly eccentric and sexually excessive manner that makes for an undeniably enthralling aesthetic and thematic experience, even if you’re the sort of individual who concurs with the sentiment, “Better Dead Than Red.” Banned in Makavejev’s homeland of what was then Yugoslavia for its apparently blasphemous portrayal of bolshevism and sexuality, and inevitably resulting in the director’s exile from the country for nearly two decades, W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism is a startlingly subversive cinematic work more in the spirit of unhinged anti-Occidental anarchism than an intellectually competent cry for so-called ‘pure communism’ – the argument made by all Marxist fanboys when one mentions that some 100+ million people died during the twentieth century due to Marxist regimes – thus making it a movie that makes the unintentional argument that artists do not always make for great political minds or at least that is what one can only conclude after someone makes the more than dubious argument that, "Only Revolution Ends War!"

Beginning with the quote, "This film is, in part, a personal response to the life and teachings of Dr. Wilhelm Reich (1897-1957)...Studying orgasmic reflex, as Sigmund Freud's first assistant, Reich discovered life energy, revealing the deep roots of fear of freedom, fear of truth, and fear of love in contemporary humans. All his life, Reich fought against pornography in sex and politics. He believed in work-democracy, in an organic society based on liberated work and love," W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism sets up a sentimental idealist tone that is ultimately at odds with the satirically titillating and sometimes tragicomic absurdism that shines throughout the work, at least as far as the fictional fantasy component of the film is concerned. Featuring narration of what sounds like the words of a wanton witch doctor with the pseudo-scientific psychobabble of a quote, "Cancer is the hysteria of cells condemned to death. Cancer and fascism are closely related. Fascism is the frenzy of sexual cripples. The swastika owes its magnetism to being a symbol of two bodies locked in genital embrace. It all stems from a longing from love...", W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism establishes early on that Reich – a man whose own daughter argued that his lifelong obsession with sex was the result of being molested as a child – stressed sex over science and sex over love. Reich oddly believed that communism and 'free love' were intrinsically compatible and Makavejev's W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism makes the patently absurd argument that communism failed in Eastern Europe because the Soviets abandoned this perverse Trotskyite principle of psychological enslavement via sexual obsession (a strategy also used by Hollywood). Featuring cameos from counter-culture figures ranging from hideous Hebrew Tuli Kupferberg as a psychotic soldier who parades around his gun as a pseudo-phallic device while antagonistically annoying Wall Street businessmen in a scene that attempts to argue that 'sexual frustration and violence' are interconnected, as well as Warhol Superstar/tranny Jackie Curtis as an example of Reich's ideas on aberrant sexuality, W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism makes it clear that atheistic left-wing Ashkenazis and cynical, sexually ambiguous drug addicts should be the real heroes of Bolshevism and not heroic war heroes who did their own fair of orgone energy transferring raping German girls at the conclusion (and for some time afterward) of the Second World War.

Undoubtedly, the fictional narrative-driven segment of W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism has aged the most gracefully, because otherwise this determinedly degenerate démodé celluloid work would be nothing more than an inanely idealistic left-wing equivalent to a Mondo Cane documentary without it, hence why the director's subsequent effort, Sweet Movie (1974) – a more narrative-based and comedic work – has aged more gracefully. The strikingly sardonic segment of W.R. Mysteries of the Organism focuses on a young and beautiful Yugoslavian madam of Marxism named Milena (Milena Dravić) who falls from Bolshevik grace after becoming enamored with a nefarious and narcissistic Stalinist ice skater named Vladimir Ilyich (Ivica Vidović) whose personal fame has led him to feel superior to the people of the workers' revolution. Hopelessly tainted by Western capitalism as a corrupt Superstar and cult of personality in the spirit of Stalin (old Soviet propaganda films about the 'man of steel' are inter-spliced in the film) who is not a lover of the people, but merely a man possessed by sacrilegious self-love that reaches its zenith when he decapitates the star-crossed woman who loves him via the blade of his ice skate. Indeed, once Milena had to do more for 'love' than merely spread her legs and spout manic Marxist dribble, the commie dream went down the drain faster than comrade Trotsky did after having a ice-pick driven through the back of his head, or as her decapitated head states quit eloquently, "Cosmic rays streamed through our coupled bodies. We pulsed to the vibrations of the universe. But he couldn't bear it. He had to go one step further. Vladimir is a man of noble impetuosity...a man of great ambition...and immense energy. He's romantic, ascetic, a genuine Red Fascist. Comrades...even now I'm not ashamed of my communist past."

Indeed, what better way for a committed commie to discredit a piece of unflattering history than by describing it as 'Red Fascism,' or an individual like Uncle Joe as a 'Red Fascist' as such is the case in W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism; a quite kooky and obscenely outlandish anti-Stalinist communist propaganda flick of the peculiar 'Red Reichian' persuasion that, due to its rather absurd 'objective' and 'message,' one must respect auteur Dušan Makavejev for his sheer audacity because had he made this film only a couple decades before, he would surely have ended up in a Gulag for being one of those "rootless cosmopolitan" types. As one of the female narrators states early on in W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism, Reich's Maine-based research center 'Orgonon' did not exactly have the best reputation as apparently, "Rumor called it a secret Jewish organization that was masturbating patients in Orgone accumulators, experimenting on children kept in cages, and plotting to introduce work-democracy." Of course, as the historical record shows, all these rumors, including rampant sexual abuse at the so-called Orgonomic Infant Research Center (OIRC) that was even vouched for by Reich's unfortunate son Peter's autobiography Book of Dreams (1973), were more or less true and in many cases far worse than the rumors would lead one to believe. By the end of his life, Reich's mental health had declined so far that UFOs were waging war against the planet earth and mankind and he personally was engaged in a "full-scale interplanetary battle" with these evil extraterrestrials via his trusty 'Cloudbuster' (an 'invention' Reich said could cause rain by manipulating 'orgasmic energy' in the atmosphere). Of course, W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism – with its experiments in 'cock casting' (a mold is made of a porn director/producer named Jim 'Debbie Does Dallas' Buckley's erect penis to 'prove' the artist's sexual contact with a famous man), candid talks with tragic tranny Warhol Superstars like Jack Curtis (who died of a heroin overdose at the age of 38), underground magazine editors for Screw magazine 'working in the nude,'

a hack artist named Betty Dodson whose only aesthetic inspiration is masturbation and who sincerely believed, “When it comes to sex, all women are gay,” and uniquely ugly ‘performance artist’ Tuli Kupferberg of the foully farcical hippie degenerate band The Fugs running around in neo-Vaudevillian manner as if he knows what it means to be a soldier as a passive wilted flower child – does not exactly make for the most logical, nor politically or scientifically sound argument for a ‘free love’ boner-based Bolshevik revolution. After all, people who spend their times fucking all day don’t tend to get much work done and those sexually repressive communist dictatorships of the past sure had their fair share of genocidal famines, so I doubt a group of ‘dumpster-diving’ hippies would be much better.

SWEET MOVIE

Very possibly the most visually and thematically subversive and politically iconoclastic and esoteric “avant-garde black comedy” ever made, Sweet Movie (1974) directed by Serbian auteur Dušan Makavejev (Montenegro, The Coca-Cola Kid) is undoubtedly one of those rare aberrant arthouse films that appeals to both patently pretentious cinephiles of the extreme left who regard Marxist auteur Jean-Luc Godard as their cinematic savior, as well as depraved and socio-politically unconscious exploitation film burnouts who regard Ruggero Deodato’s Cannibal Holocaust (1980) as their ‘Citizen Kane’ and Jap scat as their closest thing to spirituality, and are just looking to feel even the slightest bit of activity in their irrevocably intemperate and innately impure souls, thus making this self-described sugar-coated piece of sordid Serb-concocted cinema an ideally idiosyncratic celluloid feast, albeit one that might cause you to ‘do the technicolor yawn.’ The first film Makavejev directed after being exiled from his now-defunct multicultural nation of Yugoslavia for his similarly cinematically seditious work W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism (1971) – a film about the lurid and loony link between Marxism and subversive sexuality featuring pro-incest/anti-fascist Jewish Marxist/psychoanalyst Wilhelm Reich as its central subject – Sweet Movie is a Canadian production that was partially funded by the National Film Board of Canada and is a part ‘anti-communist, communist’ cinematic manifesto and part rabid renegade attack against anti-revolutionary sexual repression of Western capitalism and its cuckold cousin, contemporary communism. Sweet Movie is indubitably a cinematic work with a metaphysical message most directly directed to the populous of Makavejev’s homeland and other Soviet satellite states, yet is so aesthetically audacious, sickly salacious, and cleverly crafted that one need not be a downtrodden Slav slave of the degenerate commie dystopia realm to enjoy it. A marvelously mad piece of classic yet morally corrupted celluloid montage centering on two stories about two different but inevitably equally warped women – a virginal model with a glowing golden pussy who is despoiled by a diverse collection of capitalist pigs around the materialistic globalized Occidental world and a female pedophile ship captain with a sick obsession with sex, candy, and communism – Sweet Movie is a delightful and deranged piece of dichotomous cinema that reminds the viewer how the two big business c’s (capitalism and communism) have literally and figuratively fucked the world to the point where the other two big biological c’s (cocks and cunts) have been so perverted, misused, and abused that everyone seems to have forgotten to use them in the traditional way by uniting them. In short, Sweet Movie is probably the only film ever made that can be simultaneously appreciated by fetishistic scat fiends, fascist libertines, cosmopolitan commies into coprophilia and racial cuckoldry, and stoic fans of cinema and/or twentieth century world history.

Miss Monde 1984/Miss Canada (Carole Laure) seems like a lucky gal, at least upon her initial appearance in Sweet Movie as a 'sweet' lady who has a radiant rosebud and a holy hymen that is still intact, thus allowing her to beat a wild Negress, Miss Congo (a woman who wears bananas as a skirt) and a barbarous and butch Miss Yugoslavia in a super satirical "most virgin" contest – a patently perverse pageant of pussy parading that is symbolic of the sexually impotent and fiercely fetishistic capitalist West's absurd obsession with the preposterous 'virginal whore' archetype – where each contestant's cunt is meticulously examined in a sterile, sexless Annie Sprinkle-sideshow-style 'Public Cervix Announcement' by Dr. Mittlefinger; a, "brilliant master of deep insights and even deeper insights." As a prize, Miss Monde, a virginal yet more than willing sacrifice to capitalism, is married to a mad megalomaniac and milk industry tycoon with a masochistic mommy complex named Mr. Kapital (John Vernon) – a man with a golden cock who does not know the difference between Karl Marx and Vladimir Lenin, but respects the man all the same for starting the Russian Revolution of 1917 – but on the night of the ritualistic deflowering, the undefiled beauty queen is repelled by her new husband's nasty affinity for wacky 'water sports,' thus leading to the premature severing of the relationship between the two ill-fated lovebirds that almost gets the beautiful bride killed via drowning by her bastard ex-beau's puritanical mother. Meanwhile, commie captain Anna Planeta (Anna Prucnal) sails her degenerate boat filled with candy and featuring a jigaboo-like Karl Marx figurehead around the dams of Amsterdam as she attempts to recruit young men and little boys for her sexually subversive sugarite/Trotskyite revolution. In a display of anachronistic absurdity, Planeta manages to attract a sugar-sex-obsessed sadomasochistic sailor (Pierre Clémenti) from the failed Battleship Potemkin of 1905 who proceeds to mount the captain into orgasmic oblivion, but Miss Monde is not as lucky. Taken away by her ex-husband's monstrously muscular Mandingo bodyguard (played by real-life bodybuilder Roy Callender) and carried up a gigantic milk bottle advertisement by the bodacious black buck in a sardonic scene in anti-tribute to King Kong (1933) that will probably prove to be totally traumatizing for contemporary white liberals, Miss Monde verbally assaults her kindly kidnapper by spouting nonsensical/contradictory slurs like, "Hitler, Dirty Jew" and "fascist pig" (he prefers being called a "Neanderthal"), so he sexually degrades her and ships her in a red suitcase that eventually lands in the Eiffel Tower, where she is his masterfully handled by a flamboyant Mexican singer/actor named 'El Macho' (Sami Frey; a boy toy of Brigitte Bardot during the 1960s) who has no problem asserting his manhood despite his questionably queer Cockette-esque persona. Unfortunately, a couple of prudish Italian catholic nuns see Miss Monde mounted via her meat-curtain by the mighty Mexican with mascara, thus sparking a stake of sensual shock that eventually leads her to ending up at Viennese Aktionist Otto Muehl's hysterical sex commune where the accursed beauty witnesses infantile shit-eating and vile fetishistic projectile vomiting, but she manages to develop a particular fondness for one of the member's flaccid members. Planeta also falls in love; first with the hitchhiking sailor and then with a couple little boys, but ends up killing them all in the end, thus leading to another failed commie revolution, albeit this time of the pinko pussy sort, where mania for Marx merely leads to physical and intellectual masturbation and eventually mindless murder and mayhem. Like all idealistic political revolutions rooted in impossible dreams far away from real-life, Planeta lured them in with starry-eyed sweet talk (this time with literal candy and a cushy and charismatic comrade cunt), but as the great gay Sturmabteilung (SA) brownshirt leader Ernst Röhm – a wildly wanton man who literally wallowed in the scatological colors he once wore – once self-prophetically stated not long before he himself was sacrificed under the dubious pretense of being a treacherous sodomite during the 1934 Night of the Long Knives (Hitler's political purge), "All revolutions devour their own children." Miss Monde on the other hand, eventually turns into literal salacious sweetness as a model whose bare-skinned body is covered in liquid chocolate for a smutty and sensual yet sweet and sugary advertisement, thereupon marking the triumph of capitalism over the individual via sexual subjugation, displacement, and abstraction; the wretched root of the phenomenon of aberrant fetishism that seems to have become the norm in the Western world.

If one learns anything of value from Sweet Movie, it is that postmodern utopian boat bolshevism, as well as its less avant-garde blends, turns women into fetishistic and fratricidal killers of men and boys and that the sort of sanitized 'sexual freedom' offered by capitalism results in foul fetishism, including (but surely not limited to) urolagnia (a perverse pleasure for piss), emetophilia (sexual arousal via vomiting), paraphilic infantilism (grown men who get off to retrogressing to a baby state), scatophilia (a sexual fondness for feces), aquaphilia (wanton for water), exhibitionism, vampirism, wet and messy fetish (WAM) aka splashing, miscegenation, and pedophilia, which has only spread all the more in the increasingly globalized, technocratic world with the fall of the Soviet Union and the homogenizing of the third world via Americanization/Hollywoodization since the release of Makavejev's film almost four decades ago. Convicted pedophile Otto Muehl – who oddly received the Iron Cross for bravery in fighting in the National Socialist army during the Second World War before his decided degeneration and dedication to Aktionism, and who disliked Sweet Movie, stating, "It was all prescribed" – and his primitive commune of shit-eating, infantile man-babies and fetishistic regurgitators symbolize the height of human devolution via a mostly materialistic weltanschauung comprised of communism, anti-nationalism and ethno-masochism, and the soulless and superficial capitalistic promise of 'sexual liberation.' Interestingly, close-ups of Judeo-Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky's (real name Lev Davidovich Bronshtein) ugly rat-like mug is featured throughout Sweet Movie, especially during boat scenes of Planeta and her patriots of pomo pinko perversity. On top of being a stern proponent of the worldwide 'permanent revolution,' Trotsky was also a Freudian who advocated the sexualization of children at a young age so as to make them early lifelong slaves of their own sensuality, hence why aristocratic English writer Aldous Huxley (who was certainly 'in the know' when it came to world affairs) included a sexually promiscuous girl named 'Polly Trotsky' in his popular dystopian sci-fi novel Brave New World (1931) as the novelist saw the future as a bleak one where humans had the sexual discipline of chimpanzees and could not think past their own impulsive needs for personal gratification at the cost of intelligence, knowledge, and kultur, among other things, thus making Anna Planeta the sugary Trotskyite of Makavejev's bodacious bent world of internationalized wantonness and askew erotic instincts propelled by innately anti-organic sociopolitical systems of cultural chaos. Indeed, at best, the cinematic beauty of Sweet Movie is unwaveringly bittersweet, but I guess one cannot ask for better in a world where groups of grown men find sexual solace in swimming in their own shit and retrogressing into an infantile state, a subculture of severely sick sodomites known as 'Bugchasers' actively pursue being buggered ('bareback' style) by 'Giftgivers' (aka HIV-positive poofs) so as to oftentimes become, like far-left French philosopher Michel Foucault, sadomasochistic spreaders of the diseases themselves as a potential 'poz-cock' killer, and post-menopausal women known as 'cougars' devote their lives to sexually preying on young men that could be their grandsons.

THE COCA-COLA KID
THE COCA-COLA KID

Dušan Makavejev (1985)

Undoubtedly, it is a sad irony of Australian cinema that, despite New Australian Cinema (Australian New Wave) movement—unquestionably the country-cum-continent's greatest era of cinema—being of a relatively 'nationalistic' persuasion (especially in comparison to the largely left-leaning movements in Europe during the 1960s-1980s), a number of the greatest Aussie films were directed by complete outsiders, including early masterpieces like Brit Nicolas Roeg's Walkabout (1971) and Bulgarian-Canadian Ted Kotcheff's Wake in Fright (1971) aka Outback. While not exactly as highly revered as Roeg and Kotcheff's films, The Coca-Cola Kid (1985) directed by Serbian renegade auteur Dušan Makavejev (Man Is Not a Bird, Montenegro) is another Australian film that was directed by a foreign auteur that I sincerely believe is one of the greatest and most re-watchable Aussie films ever made. Indeed, while it might be the director's most overtly commercial and accessible film, as well as a cinematic work that only demonstrates the most glaringly superficial understanding of Australia and Australian culture to the point of grotesque parody, Makavejev's marvelous little movie is indubitably a dirty gem of absurdist (romantic)comedy that deserves the somewhat ludicrously lofty reputation that Crocodile Dundee (1986) maintains, not least of all because super sassy and sensual Aussie-guidette Greta Scacchi gives what is arguably one of the most erotically eccentric performances in all of cinema history. Seemingly too patently preternatural for everyday lemming filmgoers and not artsy fartsy or overtly politically-charged enough for the typical insufferable art fag cinephile that suffers from moist panties while watching Jeanne Dielman, 23 Commerce Quay, 1080 Brussels (1975), The Coca-Cola Kid is undoubtedly a film that demands serious critical reevaluation. Undoubtedly, if the film were not directed by the one-and-only Dušan Makavejev, it would probably be less harshly viewed, but such is the sorry fate of a mensch that makes a masterful avant-garde doc about a subject as unworthy as deranged kosher quack Wilhelm Reich.

Admittedly, as a fan of the filmmaker's previous more politically and carnally charged arthouse flicks, I was originally somewhat hesitant about watching a mainstream Hollywood Makavejev movie starring goofy male bimbo Eric Roberts, so naturally I was thoroughly delighted to find that the actor's male bimboness was put to perfect use in the form of an outstandingly arrogant and lovably narcissistic hotshot ex-marine Coca-Cola marketing executive who rather ridiculously sees utilizing predatory advertising for unhealthy soda products as some sort of noble metaphysical quest of the quasi-patriotic sort. Based on short stories in The Americans, Baby: A Discontinuous Narrative of Stories and Fragments (1972) and The Electrical Experience: A Discontinuous Narrative (1974) by bisexual Aussie writer Frank Moorhouse, who also wrote the film's screenplay, The Coca-Cola Kid was once described by Janet Maslin as “a corporate satire,” but that would be selling it too short and making it seem like something that would mostly appeal to limp-wristed leftist twats, pedantic film and sociology professors, and self-loathing bourgeois hipsters. Indeed, unlike many real commie filmmakers, anti-communist communist Makavejev assembled a sassy, sensual, and humorously surreal slapstick satire that would also appeal to true blue lumpenproles instead of simply pseudo-intellectual reds that frequent Starbucks. Virulently mocking The Coca-Cola Company in a ironical fashion where one might assume it is Coke-porn piece were the film silent due to its many exceedingly aesthetically pleasing shots of Coke logos, signs, and even the beverage itself, one can only assume the bigwigs at the soda corporation had no clue what sort of film they were dealing with when they opted to not sue the distributor Cinecom Pictures into oblivion (notably, the film begins with a long disclaimer noting that the Coca-Cola Company had no involvement in the film, which almost seems improbable considering all the eclectic Coke swag that pleasantly pollutes the film). In a sometimes heavyhanded yet nonetheless effective way, Makavejev demonstrates the blood-colored parallels between Coca-Cola and communist movements in a playfully satirical fashion where the viewer feels thirsty for both Coke and nicely tanned goombah gal skin at the end. Of course, not unlike pinko propaganda, Coke advertisements practically promise an otherworldly utopia, but both communism and soda oftentimes lead to poor health and a premature death.

While legendary American auteur Robert Altman failed big time with O.C. and Stiggs (1987) in his somewhat valiant attempt to create a decent goofy teenage comedy aimed at the mindless masses, Makavejev demonstrated with The Coca-Cola Kid—a cinematic work that apparently languished in pre-production for about a decade—that he is completely capable of making a film that appeals to both hardened cinephiles and normal people that consider movies to be nothing more than the aesthetic equivalent of cheap sugary soda. Indeed, while I would not go so far as to say that the film is superior to his classics like W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism (1971) and Sweet Movie (1974), it is certainly more re-watchable and addicting. While indubitably one of the great Australian films of the 1980s, it somewhat makes a mockery of Australia in its seemingly superficial and stereotypical depiction of the Outback. In fact, as Neil Rattigan noted in his book Images of Australia: 100 Films of the New Australian Cinema (1991) regarding the film, “There seems little doubt that some of the conspicuous appearances of obvious Australian cultural symbols (kangaroos, didgeridoos, ‘Waltzing Matilda’) in THE COCA-COLA KID are a direct consequence of the director’s unfamiliarity with Australia or the effect of its novelty. THE COCA-COLA KID does not achieve quite the mirror of amazement that Roeg’s WALKABOUT reflects, but its narrative is structured around a two-way clash of cultures, one internal to Australian and one external.” Undoubtedly, when it comes down to it, Makavejev's film ultimately says more about the United States (and the viruses known as 'Americanism' and 'globalization') than the Down Under, but of course that is one of its many charming little novelties from a filmmaker that is the master of charming (and sometimes not-so-charming) little novelties.

The eponymous quasi-protagonist of The Coca-Cola Kid is a straightshooting troubleshooter American neo-cowboy with the Germanic surname Becker (Eric Roberts in one of his greatest and most underrated roles) who somewhat absurdly has a "MBA in Business and Theology from Harvard Business School" and believes "Money is god's muscle." Undoubtedly, as a young and handsome Anglo-Saxon go-getter with a mindless devotion to puritanism that suffers from serious sexual hangups, has nil interest in other cultures, and has a profound arrogance towards and intolerance of any beliefs or customs that are not his own, Becker is surely symbolic of Makavejev's view of America as a whole. As The Coca-Cola Company's foremost "First rate point-of-sale man," Becker is sent to the corporation headquarters in Australia to troubleshoot seemingly imaginary problems in the Outback. A man with a misguided mission that seems to have missed his true calling as a Southern Baptist preacher or wealthy televangelist, Becker immediately baffles the employees of the Australian Coke headquarters, including the head boss Frank Hunter (Max Gillies), who receives a somewhat curious fax from the company in regard to the protagonist reading, "Listen to him. Don't get angry. Don't get scared either . . . And do not be surprised." While most of the other Coke employees are either disturbed or annoyed by Becker's absurdly aggressive and quasi-metaphysical approach to advertising, dirty blonde secretary Terri (Greta Scacchi of Robert Altman's The Player (1992) in arguably the sexiest role of her career)—a divorced single mother who humorously pays her ex-husband alimony each month for their daughter—clearly wants to fuck his brains out as demonstrated by the fact that she is constantly ogling him while her delectable legs are conspicuously spread wide open in front of him. In fact, Terri soon becomes so frustrated by Becker's blatant disregard for her rather inviting sensual gestures that she nonchalantly accuses him of being a closet homo, stating, "Maybe you're just not interested in women." Of course, poor idiosyncratic alpha-male weirdo Becker—a proud ex-marine that seems to have nil interest in premium grade pussy—does not even seem to be aware that Terri is accusing him of being a poofster, as he has his head so far up on his own ass that he cannot be bothered to even acknowledge the fairly overtly aggressive flirting of such a supremely sexy slut single mother. As the viewer soon realizes, one of Becker's greatest charms is his sort of closest shyness when it comes to exceptionally gorgeous women that want to sit on his babyface and grid their clits into in his flesh.

Since Becker has been brought to Australia to troubleshoot and he is quite good at his job, it does not take long for him to realize that there is a rural Outback town named Anderson Valley where not a single person drinks Coca-Cola because they are virtually enslaved by the owner of a local brew. Indeed, Anderson Valley is more or less a soft dictatorship run by a tastelessly charming old fart named T. George McDowell (Bill Kerr of Peter Weir's Gallipoli (1981)), who started his own soda company in 1924 and refuses to sell out to anyone as he has too much pride to submit to the competition, even if said competition could effortlessly crush his absurdly outmoded operation into oblivion. Unbeknownst to Becker, T. George McDowell is Terri's estranged daughter. Indeed, in terms of employment, Terri is figuratively sleeping with the enemy (and, of course, later she literally sleeps with the enemy), which makes sense when one considers her seemingly schizophrenic pedigree and bizarre family history. While her father owns his own rival soda company, Terri's mother was a Coca-Cola model who opted to eventually kill herself because she could not bear her hotheaded hubby T. George's obsession with his work, namely his fetish for ice. Undoubtedly, Terri is, at the very least, partly attracted to Becker because he reminds her of her cutthroat capitalist father in terms of hardheadedness and alpha-male tenaciousness. While Becker does not realize it until towards the end of the film, it is ultimately up to him to break Terri's family's curse. Indeed, only if Becker stops being such an unhinged workaholic will he have what it takes to be Terri's lover lest her end up a perennially lonely, bitter, and disgruntled old man like T. George.

As if on some sort of important one-man military mission, Becker gets into Marine Corps mode and heads to Anderson Valley in a rented Jeep to spy on T. George McDowell's quite literally antiquated soda operation and see if he can buy the old man out. Rather humorously, Becker almost beats up a butch babe pilot named Juliana (Kris McQuade) when she dares to scare him by flying her plane too close to his Jeep. Luckily, Becker's heart melts when he finds a wounded kangaroo named 'Duncan' and Juliana's elderly aunt Mrs. Haversham (Colleen Clifford) sitting inside the plane and helps carry them to his Jeep. In fact, Juliana even soon forgets that Becker was about to attack her and compliments him while he is carrying her elderly aunt by stating, "You're pretty strong for someone so cute." Needless to say, as a man on a mission with seemingly nil interest in the opposite sex, Becker is hardly enticed by Juliana's flirting and thus continues his journey to Anderson Valley where he is met with rejection upon rejection after attempting to get in contact with the great enigmatic T. George McDowell. When Becker dares to spy on and take photos of the old man's lavish, if rather archaic, soda plantation-cum-factory, T. George slyly attempts to shoot him with a shotgun. Upon escaping the plantation and heading back to the local hotel where he is staying, Becker becomes exceedingly enraged when he discovers that T. George has got him kicked out of his room, so he is forced to sleep outside on the edge of a dangerous cliff where he is greeted the next day by a boorish police constable on a camel who politely serves him tea but then passive-aggressively states to him, "Far away from home? I can't understand people who can't stay home. Looking for trouble, taking risks they don't need." When the constable whips out a pistol, Becker opts to beat his ass, hogtie him, and then attach his bound body to the end of his Jeep, which he subsequently drives to T. George McDowell's plantation. Rather impressed that Becker has brutally beaten and tortured his best law man, T. George warmly invites the protagonist to see his vintage soda operation, stating, "I like a tenacious man. Come. I'll show you the plant." Despite being a rather primitive soda operation that uses ice instead of refrigerators to cool its products, Becker is quite impressed with T. George's factory and the two rivals get along rather swimmingly, which is really no great surprise as they are more or less kindred spirits. In fact, T. George even gets rather personal and tells Becker about his dead Coca-Cola model wife, though he eventually gets upset and angrily states regarding his belated beloved, "She never understood . . . ice. She bore me a child and soon afterwards kill herself . . . and I've never forgiven her."

While T. George ultimately refuses to submit and sell his company, Becker still cannot help but have great respect for the stubborn old man and states to his boss when he gets back to Coca-Cola headquarters, "You know, Frank, he's got a real class operation up there though. It's like stepping back into the goddamn 1920s." As for Frank, he is shocked that Becker was even able to get T. George "flushed out" and congratulates the protagonist on his singular accomplishment. After only talking for a couple minutes, T. George unexpectedly arrives at the office with an entourage of glaringly homely young female singers and proposes to Becker a merger with his company and Coca-Cola called 'McCoke.' A master of old school showmanship, T. George even has a skywriter write 'McCoke' in the sky to impress Becker and his comrades. Meanwhile, Terri completely infuriates Becker by hiding inside a soda cooler inside the protagonist's office because, as she meekly states, "I'm hiding from my past" and does not want to be seen by her estranged father T. George. When Becker finally pulls her out of the fridge, Terri tries in vain to explain herself, but he cuts her off, calls her a "half-wit," and demands that she quit her job voluntarily lest she be officially fired and left with a tarnished employment record. Despite firing her, Terri leaves Becker a specially wrapped present from her daughter 'DMZ' (Rebecca Smart) made for him that contains various special presents, including a homemade card, seashells, and a copy of The Americans, Baby by Frank Moorhouse featuring Scacchi naked on the cover and draped in an American flag. A couple days before, DMZ—a little girl who proudly describes the origin of her nickname being as follows, "That's what my parents call me. It means demilitarized zone. When they throw things at each other . . . I'm off-limits"—met Becker at the office and was impressed when he told her, "You can call me the Coca-Cola Kid." Despite the fact that Becker had to beat up her father Kim (Chris Hayward) for causing a huge scene and physically assaulting both him and Terri in the Coca-Cola office, DMZ seems to want the protagonist to be her new daddy.

Unlike with her mom and most other women, Becker also seems to rather like DMZ, thus underscoring the protagonist's rather childlike mentality.

Despite the fact he fired her hot little ass in a rather rude and heartless fashion, Terri does not stop in her bold quest to bone Becker, who categorically refuses to even have a simple drink with her, even after she takes the effort to chase him down and spy on him. Indeed, when Becker hires a band, including an elderly aboriginal man named 'Mr. Joe' (Steve Dodd of Fred Schepisi's The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith (1978)), to create a Coca-Cola sing with a supposed authentic "Australian sound," Terri lurks around the recording studio and admires the protagonist as he dictates over the insufferably hokey hired hack musicians. Unbeknownst to Becker, Terri is friends with some of the band members and manages to convince them into having the protagonist attend a hip drug-fueled party at her apartment. To play a somewhat sick trick against her would-be-beau, Terri even coerces one of her gay male friends into dressing in drag and kissing Becker, who seems incapable of spotting a tranny, including one that clearly resembles a gawky man. Ultimately, Becker is so hopelessly embarrassed after being caught kissing a man that he sobs like a little girl and has to be consoled by Terri's daughter, who he complains to in a hilariously vulnerable fashion, "This is so embarrassing. I'm so embarrassed." In a rare moment where he reveals that he may indeed have some interest in Terri, Becker states to DMZ, "She's a dangerous woman, your mother" and she replies, "She's an unhappy woman." When Becker attempts to break up a fight between Terri and her ex-husband Kim, he soon is knocked out cold after the former breaks a bottle over his head. Somewhat strangely, Becker spends the rest of the night getting drunk on the street with Kim, who states of his ex Terri that, "She is an incurable star-fucker" and "The woman we're both in love with." Needless to say, Becker denies he is in love with Terri, but that does not stop Kim from attempting to persuade the romantically hapless protagonist to hookup with her. Indeed, Kim clearly still loves Terri, but he seems to realize that Becker is simply the better and more attractive man.

In a somewhat quirky attempt to buyout T. George since the Coca-Cola Company is clearly not interested in the old man's idea of a merger, Becker has about a dozen or so Coke trucks driven to his factory by drivers sporting extra tacky Santa Claus outfits. Unbeknownst to all parties involved, one of the Santas is Terri dressed in drag. Indeed, big titty Terri dons Santa drag in a desperate attempt to both seduce Becker and prevent him and T. George from killing each other. Needless to say, T. George takes the new Coca-Cola fleet as a major insult to his giant ego and demands that the trucks be immediately removed from his factory, thus sparking a short but sweet brawl between the employees of the rival companies that involves sweaty rednecks fighting dudes in Santa costumes. After subsequently having Becker as the quest of honor at a rather festive rotary dance, T. George decides to go out in a literal blaze out glory instead of simply fading away by submitting to Coke and losing his antiquated soda empire, so he conspires to blow up himself and the protagonist inside his factory during a late night meeting. Luckily, instead of meeting up with T. George that night and being unwittingly blown up in an old fart's factory, Becker is finally seduced by Terri, who proves in more ways than one that sometimes love does conquer all. Indeed, in what proves to be a truly festive unexpected present that he eventually personally unwraps, Becker comes back to his hotel room to find Terri lying on his bed in a Santa outfit. While Becker initially plays hard-to-get in his sort of passive-aggressive male bimbo way and attempts to throw her out, he finds himself being unable to argue with Terri when she states, "If we got sex out of the way, we could relax," so the two passionately fuck while pillow feathers cover their flesh in what is indubitably a truly iconic Makavejevic fuck scene. Rather curiously, it is only when Terri is dressed in drag in a Coca-Cola-colored Santa outfit that Becker finally becomes aroused enough to bone her, but luckily the protagonist is not scared away by her delectable dago curves. Needless to say, T. George gets the surprise of a lifetime when he arrives at Becker's hotel room to yell at the protagonist for not keeping his appointment from the night before and unexpectedly discovers his estranged daughter, who he has not seen in over seven years, completely naked in the room. While T. George naturally accuses Becker of hitting him "below the belt," Terri comes to his defense and states, "Leave him alone, Dad. I came of my own accord . . . to save you from him. Or him from you. I don't know which anymore."

When T. George succumbs to a pathetic pity-party and complains, "The child owes no natural affection to the parent," Terri retorts, "I've always loved you . . . in spite of everything," though she subsequently leaves Anderson Valley for good, thus giving her daddy all the reasoning he needs to go ahead with his big plans in regarding to blowing himself up. When T. George actually goes through with his big explosive plans and commits suicide by blowing himself up in his own factory, Becker becomes so disillusioned with his job and even his own entire Weltanschauung that he immediately quits his prestigious position at Coca-Cola and decides to dedicate his life to Terri and her daughter DMZ. Indeed, without looking back, Becker makes the biggest mistake of his life by hooking up with a mentally unstable single mother of the quasi-nymphomaniacal and sometimes quite physically violent sort. Luckily, a mentally deranged hotel bellboy believes Becker is some sort of secret agent and gives him $50,000, so the protagonist has a nice gift to give to his new family. While The Coca-Cola Kid concludes on an absurdly happy note, auteur Makavejev demonstrates his wonderfully warped sense of humor by ending the film with a completely random apocalyptic intertitle that reads, "A week later . . . while cherries blossomed in Japan the next World War began." Indeed, as far as a jovial cultural pessimistic like Makavejev is concerned, even if you fix your life for the better and rid yourself of all your negative and/or otherwise repellent personality traits and devout yourself to selfless love, you still might be killed in some sort of nuclear apocalypse. Needless to say, we can only assume that Makavejev is not a fan of Ronnie Reagan or Ronald McDonald.

Notably, in an interview with Cahiers du Cinéma, frog literary theorist, philosopher, and alpha-semiotician Roland Barthes—a man that hardly be described as a cinephile, even though he sometimes wrote about the artistic medium—somewhat strangely argued, “What I ask myself now is if there aren’t arts which are more or less reactionary by their very natures and techniques. I believe that of literature; I don’t believe a literature of the left would be possible. A problematic literature, yes—that is, a literature of suspended meaning: an art which provokes responses but doesn’t supply them. I think literature is that in the best of cases. As for cinema, I have the impression that, in this respect, it’s very close to literature, and because of its structure and material, it’s a lot better prepared than theatre is for a certain responsibility for forms that I’ve called the technique of suspended meaning. I think cinema has trouble supplying clear meanings and that, in its present state, this shouldn’t be done. The best films (for me) are those that suspend meaning the most . . . an extremely difficult operation, requiring at once great technique and total intellectual honesty. For that means disentangling oneself from all the parasite meanings.” While Barthes generally makes me want to barf and represents pretty much everything I loathe about French intellectuals, his somewhat preternatural theory of cinema certainly applies to the films of Makavejev, including his most mainstream effort The Coca-Cola Kid which, although expressing certain strong political and metapolitical sentiments, is largely meaningless, but of course that is one of the things that makes it so great as a piece of oftentimes unpredictable absurdist rom-com of the rather anarchic and iconoclastic sort. Indeed, cinema history’s greatest (and only) anti-Coke absurdist romantic-comedy, Makavejev’s exercise in sardonic Aussie slapstick surrealism is pure frolicsome iconoclasm that manages to mock both Coca-Cola and Lenin, as well as nationalism and internationalism, with outstanding eccentric ease. Indeed, one must certainly salute a filmmaker with the talent to offend both Reaganites and Trotskyites alike while employing a hodgepodge of aesthetic waste from both old school commies and contemporary corporations.

Despite being innately anti-Coca-Cola in terms of sentiment, The Coca-Cola Kid manages to depict the soda itself in a strangely sexy fashion in multiple scenes, as if the sugary bubbly liquid was the magical vaginal fluids of an immaculately beautiful Greek goddess like Aphrodite or Eros. In that sense, the film is like Makavejev’s previous cinematic works in that it breaks down and deconstructs aesthetic meaning in an oftentimes tongue-in-cheek, if not just plain shamelessly anarchistic, fashion. Undoubtedly, the filmmaker’s singularly provocative philosophy towards manipulating politically-charged cinematic aesthetics is made quite clear in a December 2000 interview with Ray Privett where he stated, “I am very fond of TRIUMPH OF THE WILL. It is one of my favorite films of all time. In THE FALL OF BERLIN I was absolutely surprised to discover that Mikhail Chiaureli, the director, who was one of Stalin's favorite directors, was directly inspired by two sequences of TRIUMPH OF THE WILL. This was one of Stalin's top films, about the victory over Germany, but still he gets inspiration from TRIUMPH OF THE WILL, though it is never credited. And this inspiration is not ironic, it is used for heroic, pathetic portions of the film. It's unbelievable. One example is of Stalin coming down from the sky, which is right out of the beginning of TRIUMPH OF THE WILL, when Hitler comes down out of the sky. And the other part is this fantastic meeting in Nuremberg where people say where they're from. But this type of public performance in TRIUMPH OF THE WILL was itself stolen by the Nazis from the Communist street theatre." When Privett then proposed that Makavejev stole from yet, at the same time, made fun of Stalin, Chiaureli, Hitler, Riefenstahl, and the early 'Russian' communists, the auteur retorted, "You can say that, but you can also say I was inspired by and paid homage to them. They were the best propagandists of their own (horrible) countries. Being in movies, we are all in the same country – the country of movies. You can say it was Russian or German, but in movies it is all the same country. It's a country of dreams. So I was treating them as uncles and aunts I was borrowing from. Perhaps they were uncles and aunts who I didn't particularly like. But they still let me borrow the car." Indeed, in a rather bizarre fashion, Makavejev undoubtedly pays winking homage to the Coca-Cola aesthetic in The Coca-Cola Kid, but that is one of the reasons he is a great filmmaker as an auteur that is, relatively speaking, aesthetically apolitical, even when attempting to make some sort of political statement.

Quite notably, in his celluloid swansong, the autobiographical documentary Rupa u dusi (1994) aka Hole in the Soul, auteur Makavejev demonstrates his happy-go-lucky contempt for Coca-Cola by hanging out with a large dapperly dressed pig in a movie theater and asking someone if the animal enjoys the rather popular tooth-decaying soft drink. Of course, as a (ex)Yugoslavian Serb that has lived all around the world, Makavejev is no stereotypical feeble-brained white liberal bourgeois philistine and his distaste for Coca-Cola is quite cultivated, as he did much in-depth research on the company in preparation for the film. In fact, Makavejev was not just trying to be quirky when he opted to make the film's protagonist a sort of Evangelical salesman as indicated when he stated to art critic Alan G. Artner, "I did incredible research on Coca-Cola and discovered a kind of religious background. Coca-Cola started in the South, after the Civil War, in a time of depression and nervousity. It was a soothing drink, calming people down. They really wanted mankind to be happy. They also had this great democratic idea that kings and presidents and proletarians all drank the same thing. Strangely enough, this gets in touch with some of the dreams of Lenin, you know, a society in which everybody is satisfied." Indeed, while The Coca- Cola Kid can be simply viewed as a “light comedy” (which was Makavejev’s self-admitted intention), it is also a shockingly subtextual work where the deep bizarre truths it reveals are ironically hidden inside the most absurdly humorous and improbable of scenarios. Of course, one of the great truths that the film also reveals is that Greta Scacchi is unequivocally one of the most effortlessly sexy and sensual bitches of cinema history. Indeed, one single ass, beaver, or tit shot of Scacchi is undoubtedly more sexually potent than a thousand fuck flicks.

Dwight H. Little (2010)

Based on the hit Playstation series of the same name, Tekken is a wild attempt at bringing a video game classic to the medium of film with partial success. Taking the babbling insecurity of the Japanese and adapting it to a tale most appreciated by the West is an achievement in itself. Like Speed Racer before it, the idea is taken out of context and reshaped by its copyright holders into something best fit for a motion picture and similarly to that of Speed Racer, the climax is composed of vignettes including flashbacks and inordinate scenes of inspiring power surges through anger and rage, which condone the use of frustration to achieve anything you wish. Cinema separate from the source material, Tekken is a labor of love towards the characters and approaches the fickle topic of costume design quite seriously, staying true to the video game which is more than most can say about their tripe products of capitalist consummation. Gifted by the power of creative ideals and an adoration (must be) of Escape from New York and Blade Runner, Alan B. McElroy wrote the screenplay for Tekken and also brought us both the stories of retro-revival love-it-or-hate-it Wrong Turn and Halloween 4 which stands as one of the best horror sequels. Taking a departure from the atypical tournament tear film which was done with poor results in Mortal Kombat and DOA: Dead or Alive, Tekken charges head on into a dystopian landscape in which each continent is owned by a single mega-corporation and provides fighters in a worldwide tournament known as Iron Fist. Jin Kazama makes his small living acting as a runner for stolen goods; items to be used against the post-dictatorship of Tekken. Several propaganda style posters emblazoned with Heihachi's face litter the post-apocalyptic streets. Remarkably, Cary-Hiroyuki Tagawa still makes a living playing the same villainous character (Shang-Tsung and Heihachi) and doesn't seem to be slowing down. The storyline of Tekken is cleverly articulated and proves to be quite charming in the beginning as it goes as far as to provide growth upon children's fiction into a neo-realist nightmare of a populated purgatory provided by the government we put our trust in. Excluding the budget, the approach to Tekken is taken very sternly. As Jin returns to a trader with smuggled goods to be used in the uprising, he is given "real" currency which he uses to buy goods from a seedy Negro archetyped as a "drug dealer." Instead of offering crack cocaine or "purrp," he sells Jin a little baggy of ground coffee in a nice stab at the future of what we could consider luxuries. After this, he decides to also purchase a bar of chocolate and an orange; gifts for his mother and girlfriend. This scene is very important in establishing the very bleak atmosphere and is later used as a crutch for the film once the tournament begins. Nice fight scenes aside, the dialogue is as balderdash as they could possibly get and I found myself groaning aloud during scenes of Jin and Christie. While being endearingly retarded, this romantic entanglement of fighters is best left to nerdy, sweaty fan-fiction. Taking liberties with the past involvement of Kazuya and Jin's mother, the filmmakers take one more step towards dominant independence while suggesting the Jin's mother was a victim of rape, which tickles my fancy and imagination. Tekken suffers gruelingly from many problems but considering the status of the game and the lack of intellectuals who might play the game, it just seems impossible to enjoy something for what it is. While Internet trolls goad on and on about the pristine quality and enjoyment of Super Mario Bros. or the passe-indulgent Double Dragon, these critical gnats cannot enjoy something that dares to differ from a video game based on sexless Japanese musclemen who grapple and kick into the depths of forever. Tekken is a capital surprise. Presumptions are made but these defenseless expectations have a chance to be smashed right through if you can switch your cynicism off and enjoy a film that boasts wonderful albeit short martial arts action and a nice hopeless atmosphere for the outside inhabitants of this multiverse. Tekken isn't an excellent film; it doesn't bring anything new to the table but reasonably associates particular interests of the demographic and embraces it. Based on a tournament fighting game whose roster of would-be champions includes bears, cyborg queers, baby dinosaurs, and Satan, I find the negative attitude based around this film to be compulsive and irrational. Given the fact that I might be able to find it within my ice cold interior to view this film again, it definitely deserves a view from anyone who has ever played the game. Tekken's ambition is also its downfall. The fight scenes are too short, too many subplots and character mentions are cemented into the film's lore but make no sense otherwise, Heihachi is crippled from sacrifices that had to be made based on his hair's eccentricity, and most importantly, it just isn't strong enough to exist alongside bonafide entertainment. That being said, I found Tekken to be a wholly enjoying experience and would recommend it to fans of the game. Also, Eddy Gordo is portrayed by "that Capoeira guy" from Tony Jaa's The Protector which acquires the film bonus points for stellar casting.

SUSPECT ZERO

E. Elias Merhige (2004)

Suspect Zero is a film that follows a serial killer who kills serial killers (played by Sir. Ben Kingsley). The director, E. Elias Merhige, is most respected for his experimental film Begotten. Begotten looks like a German expressionist film from hell. Suspect Zero is at best an "average" serial killer film. Suspect Zero is a good example of what a director has to sacrifice when trying to make a living. The film has a very contrived and calculated structure. In the beginning of Suspect Zero, we start to question things (just as the film's cop protagonist). As the film progresses, the questions start getting answered. When Suspect Zero is over, all questions are answered and wrapped up neatly into a nice little package. Begotten is a film full of risks and unconstrained (or so it seems) experimentation. E. Elias Merhige claims that the film was inspired by a real life near death experience involving a car accident. The first fifteen minutes of Begotten are amazing (unfortunately). As the film progresses, things get a bit boring and blurred together. Begotten does, however, some other interesting scenes. The film just lacks a certain flowing cohesion (yes, even experimental films somehow have to come together). Begotten I once had a discussion with a "punk" feminist girl on Begotten and she described it as a film that looked like, "it was made by a bunch of loser goth kids to be spooky." I would go that far as I feel the film has merit (even with its flaws). The feminist girl's opinions aren't to be trusted as she makes her income taking cheap nude pictures (a sign of her belief in female "equality?"). Begotten is a film that should be seen by at least any half serious fan of underground and experimental cinema. Now E. Elias Merhige has hit the mainstream (or scratched the surface) with Shadow of the Vampire (Nicholas Cage produced this due to his love for Begotten) and Suspect Zero. Shadow of the Vampire was interesting in a novelty (especially for fans of Nosferatu and F.W. Murnau) sort of way but was nothing groundbreaking. Suspect Zero is a whole other story. I am kind of bored with serial killer films. The whole trend of the charismatic serial killer has been getting old. Suspect Zero features a serial killer (named O'Ryan) who becomes a killer due to the empathy he feels from the victims of other killers. O'Ryan was part of an FBI experiment (project Icarus) to create super telepathic abilities (originally a Soviet technique). He is able to see the deaths of serial killer victims and has lived a life of individualist pain. This "moral" serial killer is a somewhat refreshing look at the beat to death sub-genre. Director E. Elias Merhige attempts to make the formulaic Suspect Zero experimental in the way of image effects. Many scenes are shot in a distressed look (echoing back to Begotten), fire like oranges, and other emotion driven image tampering. These experimental techniques give Suspect Zero an almost music video like feel (but don't most conventional films?). It feels as if Merhige is trying as desperately and hard as possible to let a little of his artistry show.

Merhige is a victim of having to support himself. He is not going to make any money directing another Begotten. The bills start to add up. If you listen to the audio commentary for Suspect Zero you will notice the embarrassingly pathetic attempts of Merhige to legitimize Suspect Zero as a serious artistic film. It is a quite depressing experience (I could only bare a couple minutes of his “confessionals”). Merhige seems an unsuccessful and lower budget version of David Fincher. I don't think he will be making a “comeback.”

Suspect Zero held my interest enough to get through it (I have actually seen it a couple times). E. Elias Merhige is a another victim of American economic reality. The United States does not promote the progression of the arts and culture (a threat to economic interests). We have Rob Zombie to tell us what slasher films we need to know trivia for, and Wes Craven for producing terrible remakes of his best films. Cinematic innovation and experimentation are anti-American.

DIN OF CELESTIAL BIRDS
DIN OF CELESTIAL BIRDS

E. Elias Merhige (2006)

E. Elias Merhige's film Begotten (1991) is quite possibly the most important experimental horror work of its time. The spectacularly abrasive and ambitious celluloid nachtmahr was inspired by a near death experience Merhige had at the age of 19 years old, thus the director acutely invested his entire petrified soul into the bewitching, yet glaringly blasphemous film. Begotten was intended to be the first film in an unofficial trilogy by Merhige, but the director would not create a second chapter in the series until 2006 due to his marginally successful career in Hollywood. Popular goofball actor Nicholas Cage was a fan of Begotten and would go on to produce Merhige's first commercial film Shadow of the Vampire (2000); a historical fictional work chronicling the production of German master director F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror (1922) with an enticing twist: Max Schreck is a real bloodsucking vampire. Naturally, I enjoyed Shadow of the Vampire as Murnau is one of my favorite directors yet the film lacked the auteur flare of Merhige's previous film. In 2004, Merhige would go on to direct another commercial work – Suspect Zero – an embarrassingly subpar serial killer flick starring Aaron Eckart and Ben Kingsley that was partially produced by Hollywood crackpot actor Tom Cruise. On top of being an artistic failure, Suspect Zero neglected to earn back half of its original $27 million dollar production costs at the box offices. Merhige would also go on to direct music videos for bands like Marilyn Manson, Danzig, and Interpol. In 2006, E. Elias Merhige finally released the second film in his trilogy – Din of Celestial Birds – a 14 minute short that was created in a similar aesthetic vein to that of Begotten.

Upon learning that E. Elias Merhige finally released Din of Celestial Birds (2006), I was fairly reluctant to see the film. After all, it took the filmmaker 15 years to finally direct another film for his experimental trilogy. After watching Suspect Zero, I pretty much lost hope in Merhige's seriousness and artist prowess as a director. Experimental auteur filmmakers like David Lynch and David Cronenberg had entered the mainstream, yet still managed to direct groundbreaking works, but I can't say the same thing about Mr. Merhige. According to Merhige, Din of Celestial Birds is an abstract work dealing with the concept of evolution and the birth of consciousness, yet the only thing I got out of the film was a couple interesting images, but I remained starved for the purported philosophical food for thought. Thus I am sad to the report that Din of Celestial Birds was more disappointing than I originally expected it to be. In fact, the short feels and looks like Merhige was merely attempting to rip-off his younger self in a feeble and ultimately failed attempt to recreate the otherworldly spiritual nature of Begotten. I personally think it is quite tragic that Merhige has consistently failed to top a film that he made during his early dilettante years. Unlike the wonderfully gritty and grotesque work Begotten, Din of Celestial Birds is an overly polished film directed by a formerly ambitious auteur who matured for the worst. Although I suspect that some fans of Begotten might find Din of Celestial Birds to be an interesting work, they could never honestly admit that it captures an inkling of the metaphysical horror that permeates throughout the original film. Had I saw Din of Celestial Birds not knowing that it was directed by E. Elias Merhige, I would have thought the director was someone with pretensions geared towards being the next David Lynch, as the spiritless short has the inorganic feel of a self-indulgent and unoriginal student film. Whereas viewing Begotten has been a magical life changing experience for many, Din of Celestial Birds is the kind of film you would soon forget immediately after viewing. Mother earth may have committed suicide in Begotten, but she must have fallen asleep in Din of Celestial Birds. Despite being totally discouraged by Din of Celestial Birds, I will always hold some respect for Begotten; a wonderful pagan nightmare without rivals.

E. Elias Merhige once mentioned that cinema is the most meaningful artistic medium of modern times. Although I find Merhige's statement to be somewhat valid, nothing will supersede the irreplaceable and distinctly intimate nature of literature. It should be noted that Merhige has openly admitted that his films are somewhat inspired by occult literature he has read over the years. Knowing that Merhige considers cinema to be the most intrinsically valuable art form of the present era, one would think that he would be more focused on directing revolutionary cinematic works than creating overpriced disposable Hollywood products. Unfortunately, I doubt Merhige will ever break his reputation as a "one hit wonder" auteur who sold his once splendidly austere soul to the businessmen of Sunset Boulevard. During the production of Din of Celestial Birds, Merhige had help from Q6, a seemingly unthinking collective of philosophers and artists. The short opens with the titles "hello and welcome ... do not be afraid ... be comforted ... remember ... our origin..." and then precedes to show the birth of matter from nothingness. Despite the obscenely pretentious scenario portrayed in Din of Celestial Birds, the film adds up to nothing (as advertised!). By reading the film's plot, one knows that E. Elias Merhige – a former student of the occult – is now a proactive nihilist whose spirituality has worn to nil; no doubt the hefty price most people have to pay to work in Hollywood.. Although Begotten is a sadistically sacrilegious work, the film still features a dark spirituality that is quite alluring. I guess after working in Hollywood for so long, Merhige only believes in matter as a matter-of-fact and in Din of Celestial Birds it eminently shows. I just hope E. Elias Merhige decides to do something more original and compelling for the final film in his unofficial trilogy, but that seems like a rather dubious and forlorn dream.

DER FAN
DER FAN

Eckhart Schmidt (1982)

If any film deserves the distinguished title ‘arthouse horror,’ it is German auteur Eckhart Schmidt’s Der Fan (1982) aka Trance; a slow-burning yet titillating thriller set in a Neue Deutsche Welle tableau about a cute yet distinctly deranged teenager girl with an unhealthy crush for a relatively unimpressive new wave singer. Undoubtedly, Schmidt’s greatest and most immaculate cinematic achievement (his underrated 1985 flick Loft is not far behind), Der Fan is a film where the fine-line between obsession and psychosis is transcended, thus resulting in something much more terrifying than mere teenage tenderness with the most surprisingly of results. Starring Luxembourgian television presenter and actress Désirée Nosbusch (Good Morning, Babylon, A Wopbaloobop a Lopbamboom) aka Désirée Becker of the Eurovision Song Contest 1984 in an ironic yet charmingly fitting role as anti-heroess Simone; a girl who pesters the mailman everyday in the hope that she has received a response from her beloved rockstar “R”, Der Fan is a film about a lonely and equally loony girl whose day-to-day life revolves around the public media happenings of a man she has never actually met, but that doesn’t stop her from attempting to make him her eternally bonded beau. Notable for its long and extended scenes of Nosbusch’s naked and nubile body in exceedingly compromised positions, Der Fan portrays Simone, a girl whose looks are completely and utterly misleading, like a pug pup with an acute case of rabies. Nosbusch must not have realized the severity of the role because long after signing a contract agreeing to star in Der Fan au naturel, she attempted to stop the release of the film, thus resulting in an excessive trial and a scandal in the German press, which she inevitably lost. Admittedly, Nosbusch’s infamous garmentless scenes are what Der Fan is probably best known for, but it would be totally misleading to describe the film as a sexploitation or skin flick. Featuring a highly complementary, if somewhat dated, kraut New Wave soundtrack by the German synth-based group Rheingold – a group fronted by German musician Bobo Steiger (who also happens to play “R”), Der Fan – with the considerably different and notably popular porn flick New Wave Hookers (1985) is probably the most scandalous and salacious yet thoroughly entrancing film ever made centering around a post-punk/new wave backdrop.

Featuring mostly improvised and wordless acting, Der Fan works as a film because – through her monotone voice and body language – one can truly believe that Simone is a patently pathological and pathetic pervert with a foreboding inwardness that is on the brink of bursting out at the most slightest disappointment. Thus, I think it would be fair to describe Der Fan as the Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970) of punk rock cinema. Vaguely resembling a poor man’s Ian Curtis had the tragic and suicidal Joy Division vocalist lacked his distinct introverted and haunted charm, Simone’s fantasy boyfriend “R” is quite different from the romantic, media conception she has of him. Tall, dark, and only slightly handsome, but also a famous teenage heartthrob with a wealth of lackluster carnal experience, “R” is surely out of Simone’s league, but that does not stop her from attempting to jump his rickety rockstar bones. After failing to receive a single response from one of her many letters, Simone – who is nervous, neurotic, and suicidal – decides to hitchhike to a TV show that “R” is being taped for at a nearby studio. Estranged from her parents and all but friendless, the character of Simone makes for a fresh and ideally idiosyncratic example of alienation in post-WWII and post-nationalistic Germany. Noxious obsession aside, “R,” like most musicians, is hardly the sort of individual that the masses should celebrate and emulate, let alone swoon over, thereupon making Simone’s perceptibly perverse puppy love seem all the more pitiful and downright perturbing. Naturally, when “R” does not live up to Simone’s inane and imaginary ideal of him, her entirely self-invented internal world is irrevocably shattered resulting in the most heinous of consequences. Like a Michael Haneke film cleverly disguised as a German John Hughes-esque Brat Pack clone, Der Fan is a work that manages to catch the excessive escapism and narcissism of the 1980s without seeming like an accidental self-parody like so many similar works (e.g. St. Elmo’s Fire, Less Than Zero) seem to be.

Unlike most of Eckhart Schmidt’s fictional feature films, Der Fan is a rather realistic work with a genuinely disquieting and ominous atmosphere, at least during the final 1/3 of the film. Initially seeming like a wholesome and light-hearted new wavish melodrama, Der Fan takes a turn for the wonderfully worse, as if the lead cutesy girl goes from being a mousey debutante to Jeffrey Dahmer’s kraut cousin; this film reminds the viewer how even a small punk rock flick can stir a bodacious blitzkrieg of emotions if fastidiously and adroitly executed. Like Allan Moyle’s Times Square (1980) meets Gerald Kargl’s Angst (1983), but with a ferocious feminine flare, Der Fan is a work that has a particular propensity for sparking fear in both arrogant, oversexed male musicians and virginal teenage beta-males alike as the film brings new meaning to the popular and innately preposterous feminist phrase: I am women, hear me roar! Featuring a random artwork from the 1936 Summer Olympics – the legendary National Socialist Olympiad – and footage of rock fans that resembles entranced crowds from the Nuremberg Rally captured in Leni Riefenstahl’s propaganda masterpiece Triumph of the Will (1936), Der Fan is a work that highlights the Dionysian, neopagan nature of the rock concert and the sort of collective hypnosis and implicit irrationalism that such sexualized sensationalism stirs, especially in the already mentally imbalanced, thus making the death-by-Arno-Brekeresque-statue-to-the-head scene featured in the film seem all the more strikingly symbolic. In his later work Loft (1985), Eckhart Schmidt would also accent the deadly serious nature of artists and art patrons, but to the point of a playful parody, henceforth making the film a lot less threatening than his previous work Der Fan. In Germany, kultur has always been considered one of the more important attributes of a nation, thereupon making Der Fan all the more interesting of a film, as although many pseudo-cultural ingredients were imported to the Fatherland, Kraftwerk – the father's of the krautrock electronic music scene depicted in Schmidt's work – are of thoroughly and uniquely Teutonic origin. That being said, Simone could not be more diametrically opposed to Das Model of Kraftwerk's hit song, but then again, that is what makes her so startlingly alluring, if unmitigatedly disconcerting.

THE GOLD OF LOVE

Maybe it is because I am one of the few cinephiles that loves those oh-so rare films that blend both lowbrow trash and highbrow celluloid sophistication for a rather curious cinematic blend, but the more films I see by Eckhart Schmidt (Jet Generation - Wie Mädchen heute Männer lieben, Alpha City), the more I feel that the director is one of the most underappreciated, misunderstood, and original Teutonic filmmakers of his zeitgeist. Instead of making dry and dreary far-left films criticizing so-called “ordinary fascism” and the kraut bourgeoisie like many of the filmmakers associated with German New Cinema, Schmidt directed poetic neo-romantic works featuring a healthy serving of sensational sex and violence, among other things, with Der Fan (1982) aka Trance—a decidedly dark, distinctly disturbing, and even demented work starring one-time Eurovision presenter Désirée Nosbusch as a crazed music fan who stalks and eventually maliciously murders her favorite musician, who fronts a Kraftwerk-esque electronic group—being his most successful work to date (somewhat unsurprisingly, Japanese ‘celebrity cannibal’ Issei Sagawa is a fan of the film). Featuring part of the same cast and crew as Der Fan, the director’s next feature, Das Gold der Liebe (1983) aka The Gold of Love, would also focus on a cutesy fangirl who develops an unhealthy obsession with her favorite musicians. Described by Schmidt in 1997 as follows, “The film was made only at night in about 10 days. A part of the team was the same as on DER FAN and they were taken to the limit, because the Viennese nights were loaded: From actors on drugs to shooting permits that could only be realised with pressure,” The Gold of Love is undoubtedly a more aesthetically ambitious, eccentric, and esoteric work than its much more popular cinematic predecessor, as a pathologically phantasmagoric and hyperphysical work driven by a quite spellbinding dream-logic where nothing is as it seems. Indeed, comparable to the more inaccessible and anti-linear works of German Expressionism like Geheimnisse einer Seele (1926) aka Secrets of a Soul directed by Georg Wilhelm Pabst, Schmidt’s film is unquestionably somewhat in the spirit of Arthur Schnitzler’s 1926 novella Traumnovelle aka Dream Story, albeit set in a deathly degenerate Vienna where a corrosive cocktail of Neue Deutsche Welle, heroin, sexual depravity, and all-around insanity rule the streets. Undoubtedly, one of the most strangely charming aspects of the film is that the somnambulist-like teenage lead (played by Alexandra Curtis, who is the daughter of Austrian diva Christine Kaufmann and Hollywood Hebrew Tony Curtis) is obsessed with the German electropunk/NDW group D.A.F. (Deutsch Amerikanische Freundschaft) and finds a guardian angel in the form of a member of the Austrian New Wave group Blümchen Blau (who, like D.A.F., also contributed music to the film’s rather notable soundtrack). Indeed, The Gold of Love is probably the world’s first and last surrealist Neue Deutsche Welle horror flick (Austrian auteur Niki Liš's 1982 cult flick Malaria is also NDW-driven but it does not feature horror elements) and it's a rather remarkable one at that. Apparently, when the film was released, Schmidt stated something along the lines that no film critic would be able to analyze it and indeed, The Gold of Love is loaded with all sorts of religious and cultural symbolism, as a modernist metaphysical horror flick with a darkly romantic spirit that is best approached as one would approach their own dreams—on the subconscious level.

After opening with footage of D.A.F. performing to the strangely soothing sounds of industrial noise, The Gold of Love then cuts to a scene of the film's 16-year-old protagonist Patricia (Alexandra Curtis, who previously starred in the excellent Austrian film Die Ausgesperrten (1982) aka The Excluded directed by Franz Novotny) being awakened from her slumber after hearing someone chanting her name. After looking at the moon, Patricia, who is a somnambulist-like state, becomes convinced that the members of D.A.F., Gabriel "Gabi" Delgado-López and Robert Görl, have supernaturally summoned her to come to Vienna to see them. Indeed, Patricia walks all the way to Vienna by her lonesome, but when she gets to the venue where the band is playing, she is denied entry because she has no money, so tears of blood (!) begin to run down her face as if she is the Virgin Mary of NDW. While Patricia talks to an unknown girl (Marie Colbin) via an outdoor speaker who agrees to sneak her into the concert, the teen ultimately stumbles on a gruesome yet strangely aesthetically pleasing ritualistic murder (the chick repeatedly stabs another chick in the stomach as if raping her abdomen) that is being executed by the same curious chick who agreed to help see D.A.F. perform. Indeed, the killer 'Princess of the Night' (indeed, this is the name of Colbin's character as listed in the credits) is the member of a nasty little nocturnal gang led by a tall and lanky leather-jacket-adorned psychopathic Aryan degenerate named 'Ernsti' (Hermann Strobel), who completely controls the Viennese underworld and lives by the curious little motto "corpse to corpse," as if his job is to exterminate the entire population of the city. Naturally, since Patricia witnessed the murder, Ernsti and his 'gal goons' (indeed, aside from the 'Queen of the Night,' the gang's second-in-command is another quasi-dyke-like chick with dark hair) want the teenager dead because she witnessed the grisly murder and they know where to look for her since she made a big deal about meeting Gabi and Robert of D.A.F., who apparently enjoy hanging around the more sleazy joints in Vienna when not jumping around on stage like spastic stormtroopers.

When Patricia arrives at a Neue Deutsche Welle club while searching for the mysterious 'gold of love,' she happens upon Gabi and Robert's black leather combat boots, as well as a number of eccentric and super sensual characters, including a couple having bestial sex in plain view, a completely nude blonde chick with a big bushy bush sitting cross-legged in a chair, and a couple pale white corpses with golden blond hair. When the seemingly hypnotized teenager leaves the club, she spots a glowing white car (indeed, this is another insistence where the film takes a somewhat subtle supernatural approach) containing the two mysterious fellows behind D.A.F.. After failing to meet Gabi and Robert, Patricia enters a bar and spots an overweight mensch fiddling with two handguns who ultimately blows his brains out just as the teenager is running out of ominous taproom. When Patricia goes to a second bar, she meets a seemingly supernatural prophet/wiseman/Christ-like figured named 'Heller' (played by Viennese Jew André Heller, who previously read a long monologue in Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's 1977 magnum opus Hitler: A Film from Germany), who tells the teen dream: "I know what you are looking for but maybe you'll find something else entirely." While talking to Heller, Patricia passes out and the 'Queen of the Night' soon shows up and throws a dagger at the Semitic Sage's back yet, quite miraculously, he survives and manages to save the protagonist from being fatally penetrated by the mad Queen's knife. Indeed, the Queen of the Nacht ultimately proves to be no match for Heller and Patricia's god-like will power.

As the film progresses in a fantastically foreboding fashion, Patricia encounters another prophet/sage (Andrea Wurstbauer) of sorts at a hair salon, who gives the young girl a somewhat sinister yet sensual head massage and states, "They won't look for you here. They know I'm crazy and that I'm looking for a different victim every night [...] Don't disappoint me...all I'm looking for is the gold of love." The mystic Hairdresser also repeats what Heller said by warning Patricia that, "Maybe you'll find something else." When Patricia goes to another bar (indeed, it seems like the only things that exist in Vienna are sleazy bars and equally sleazy music venues), homicidal heroin Führer Ernsti shows up and tells the teen dream that she will not live to see the next day while pressing a gun into her gut, but luckily a virtuous female bartender named Raphaela (played by star Curtis' sister Allegra Curtis), who is completely fed up with all the heroin and homicide that the gang has plagued the city with, helps the teen escape, at least temporarily. After being grabbed by a faceless corpse-like being while hiding amongst the shadows of the maleficent metropolis, Patricia is caught by the pernicious Princess of the Night, who injects potentially deadly street junk into the little lady's arm. After falling in and out of consciousness at a concert, Patricia once again spots Gabi and Robert's phosphorescent automobile, but she is in for quite the surprise when she looks inside the car and sees that her two favorite musicians are lifeless skeletons. On top of experiencing the disappointment of a lifetime upon learning that the two dudes behind D.A.F. are nothing but bones, Patricia is immediately shot in the gut by Ernsti, but somehow she does not die. After being shot, Patricia enters a nefarious nightmare of the surreal 'sex and death' oriented sort where she encounters, among other things, a woman stabbing herself in the vag, thus resulting in a bloody mess that puts the most moribund of miscarriages to shame. After the deranging dream-sequence, Patricia goes to see the Austrian New Wave group Blümchen Blau perform. Throughout the film, the singer of the band, Jakob Mundl, acted as a sort of goofy 'Guardian Angel' for Patricia. After finishing their set, the Guardian Angel kisses Patricia and she instantly faints (as she does quite often throughout the film), so he and the rest of his band carry her away so that she may sleep in safety. Ultimately, The Gold of Love ends as it began with Patricia awaking in her room after feeling the power of moonlight, albeit this time she does not waste her time wandering the streets of vice-ridden Vienna, as she seems to have realized that musicians are not gods. Indeed, it was all a dream and like Bergman's Persona (1966) and Federico Fellini's And the Ship Sails On (1983), the film concludes in a metacinematic fashion by revealing the film crew, including auteur Eckhart Schmidt coaching star Alexandra Curtis.

Undoubtedly, out of all the films I can think of, the expressionistic American film noir flick Dementia (1955) aka Daughter of Horror directed by John Parker is the only cinematic work that comes even close to The Gold of Love in terms of its literally and figuratively dark essence and singularly oneiric and ominous atmosphere. Of course, Schmidt's film is much more malevolent and disconcerting in its essence, but unlike Dementia, it ultimately seems to have a 'happy' ending and even a positive message, which is rather rare for a Schmidt flick. Undoubtedly, a major clue to the hermetic celluloid puzzle that is The Gold of Love is the remark, "you'll find something else," which is made by two of the Sages that the protagonist encounters during her otherworldly odyssey. Indeed, in the end, Patricia does not find the "gold of love" aka (D.A.F.), but she does learn that her musician heroes are nothing but 'empty skeletons' (or 'fool's gold') and not the great holy grail that she risked her life, limb, and soul to search for. Indeed, set in a murder, suicide, and heroin plagued Vienna where D.A.F. flyers cover virtually every single wall and building, the film ultimately (and possibly unwittingly) demonstrates that musicians are not the virtual gods that the media has promoted them as, but modern day 'Golden Calves' and false prophets who are the foremost spreaders of spiritual syphilis and all-around cultural degeneracy, hence why sex, death, and drugs are innate qualities of the NDW scene featured in the film. Of course, the protagonist of Schmidt's previous film Der Fan did not come to this revelation until it was too late, so she lost what little was left of her already unhinged mind as a result, thereupon resulting in coldblooded murder of the most macabre sort. Interestingly but not surprisingly, The Gold of Love was not the last film Schmidt made where he dealt with the unhealthy phenomenon of teens obsessing over dopey dope-addled musicians, as he followed the work up with the comedy Wie treu ist Nik? (1986), which is from the perspective of the musicians as opposed to the fans like the two previous films. Indeed, while Schmidt has spent much of his career writing on and directing films about post-counter-culture music trends (his first feature, Jet Generation - Wie Mädchen heute Männer lieben, is a sort of kraut equivalent to Michelangelo Antonioni's Blow-Up (1966)), his works do not romanticize these trends, with The Gold of Love demonstrating that Neue Deutsche Welle was no different than the modern cultural trends that preceded it, even if it did have better music (I must admit that I love D.A.F.'s hit song "Der Mussolini"). Featuring everything from a whacked out woman shoving a knife up her naughty bits to a young murderess kidnapping a teen girl and injecting street smack into her arm, The Gold of Love is assuredly Schmidt's darkest and most demented film yet, rather ironically, it also seems to be his least nihilistic, but then again, maybe the auteur had a thing for star Alexandra Curtis and did not want to see her meet an appalling end (indeed, while Curtis is not exactly the cutest girl in the world, she certainly beats her ugly American half-sister Jamie Lee Curtis). Undoubtedly, the film is also the director's most accomplished example of his greatest talent as a filmmaker; combining high kultur with ridiculously sleazy trash. The only other film that I know of that manages to seamlessly mesh quasi-punk performances with surreal and foreboding metaphysical horror is the Hungarian film The Dog's Night Song (1983) aka Kutya éji dala directed by Gábor Bódy. Indeed, The Gold of Love is like the The Blood of a Poet (1930) aka Le Sang d'un Poète of the Neue Deutsche Welle scene, albeit directed by a rampantly heterosexual kraut as opposed to a faggy frog. Of course, one also must not forget that Schmidt's work is probably the only film ever made that makes you want to, "tanz den Mussolini" during the middle of a dark and sinister night.

ALPHA CITY

Eckhart Schmidt (1985)

Aside from possibly the killer and kitschy, kraftwerk-esque teen 'horror' flick Der Fan (1982) aka The Fan aka Trance, Alpha City (1985) aka ALPHACITY - ABGERECHNET WIRD NACHTS is undoubtedly anti-Neuer Deutscher Film/anti-intellectual German auteur Eckhart Schmidt's most popular and commercially successful work. Although set in seedy and synthesizer-driven Berlin of some ostensible near-future, Schmidt himself has described Alpha City as being not a "Berlin movie," as even Berliners had no idea where the film was set when it first premiered. In fact, very little about Alpha City is distinctly "German" aside from the musical score because despite being a 100% Teutonic production and its rather passionate romanticism, as the film was shot without sound and later dubbed in both English and German during post-production. A film about two men who fall in love with the same woman, one American and the other German, Alpha City also goes against expectations in that the American character (Al Corley, who being quite a popular New Wave musician in Europe at that time, also contributed to a good portion of the film's musical score) looks totally Nordic and German, while the Berlin woman (Isabelle Willer) and her crazy kraut male lover (Claude-Oliver Rudolph) look totally Mediterranean as if they were the stars of some c-grade giallo flick from the same era. A traditional and no bullshit kind of guy, Schmidt created a very literal title for "Alpha City" as it is about two very different types of Alpha males who agree that the kraut metropolis is not big enough for the both of them, so the two duel it out with one another until one (or possibly both) of them is dead. As Hans Schifferle, the editor of the popular German newspaper Süddeutsche Zeitung, wrote in his article Cinema of Passion: A Portrait of Eckhart Schmidt, "Alexander Kluge once gave us a wonderful characterization of Schmidt's film themes: referring to his wild love films, Kluge said that desire might be called a refined cannibalism. But Schmidt does not only have one theme: above all, he has a specific way of looking at the world, entering into the finest details. His style, with its tendency toward the extreme and an attractive desire for speculation, is characterized by a preference for ritual, style and ceremony over crude, theatrical "psychologizing". He attempts to discover the secret from the surface, to recognize the truth in a moment." Indeed, while Alpha City might be a convention-driven neo-noirish postmodern "Western" minus the cowboys and Indians and set in a New Wave, semi-futuristic sort of dystopian Deutschland, Schmidt does not share a trait typical of his Hollywood influences of pandering to his audience by opting for including a contrived optimism with a neatly packaged happy ending. Indeed, Alpha City could be described as a neo-romantic work, but one where cold-blooded killers, prostitutes, and mentally defective piano players are hopelessly trying to consummate love in a wildly wanton world of innate destruction, moral corruption, and all-around cultural chaos.

Opening with footage of ghetto anarchist and piano player Frank (Claude-Oliver Rudolph) – a tall, dark, and handsome man with grotesque scars all over his chest – performing cunnilingus on a relatively bitchy prostitute named Raphaela (Isabelle Willer), Alpha City immediately establishes a mood of lechery over love and the female overpowering the male. A woman that makes her living peddling her flesh to perverts of the mostly posh and powerful sort a number of times a night, Raphaela does not seem like the sort of woman who is looking for a permanent beau, but Frank is about to try and change that or at least die trying. Described as a ‘man-eater’ by those that know her, Raphaela does not even bother to consummate coitus with Frank after her lily is lovingly licked until she reaches orgasm via the man that loves her. Despite (and probably because of) her lack of carnal reciprocation, Frank decides to follow Raphaela’s every ass-shaking move around the city and when he sees her in another man’s car, the perturbed proletarian piano player smashes it to pieces. After demanding that Raphaela get out of the car, an American gang leader (Al Corley, who aside from being a New Wave musician, is probably best known as the first actor to play Steven Carrington on the 1980s soap opera Dynasty) and his goons show up to see what all the commotion is about, thus ushering in the beginning of a brutal and bizarre love triangle that will end in belligerent and brazen bloodshed and bereavement. A lover and a fighter, Frank the tank manages to beat up and strike fear in virtually every high dollar John that has a ‘date’ with ravishing Raphaela, but one man, the American; a stoic yet bloodthirsty blond beast who has no problem murdering a couple dozen people in a night for mere monetary gain, manages to impress and undress the flesh-peddling femme fatale and, naturally, penetrates both her body and soul. Frank, on the other hand, tells her himself, “I said I love you...I’d kill for you,” and indeed he would, but he also has no problem smacking Raphaela around when she runs her mouth too much, which she seems to rather enjoy, so it seems the American is dead wrong when he tells her she is, “not a masochist.” As someone who admits, “I haven’t seen daylight in over two years,” Raphaela might be a bit delirious in her belief that she loves two men; one being a dilettante piano player who plays debauched clubs and illegal gambling halls and knows how to hit a woman and another who is a suave, albeit psychopathic, fellow who makes who makes a killing literally killing. Although enemies, there is a certain amount of respect between Frank and the American, as both seem to acknowledge one another’s “alpha” status in a world of banal beta bitches, but as they both agree, “There’s not enough room for the two of us...there’s just no room,” thus a duel ensues at the fiery finale of Alpha City – one of only a handful of “New Romanticiſt” themed films with actual balls – where the two angst-addled anti-heroes and outlaws of love symbolically battle it out at the Berlin Olympiastadion; the site of the 1936 National Socialist Summer Olympics in a scene that Schmidt described as being shot from the

"Führer perspective" (where Uncle Adolf sat and enjoyed the show).

As prostitute Raphaela states while standing on the roof of a Mercedes-Benz building, which was also featured prominently in an iconic scene from the West German cult classic Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981) directed by Uli Edel, with her freaky boy toy Frank, "Sometimes, I have this feeling that everybody down there, that all of them are working for me," and, indeed, in a certain sense she is right. At the mere shake of her ass or accentuation of her 'naughty bits,' Raphaela can put any man under her spell, including two intrinsically individualistic Alpha types who answer to no one but themselves, at least until a certain saucy and sensual lady enters their lives and changes it forever. Indeed, Alpha City – a seductive yet savage cinematic work directed by a proudly untamed auteur who once famously admitted, "I would rather film a naked girl than a discussion of problems" – is the sort of film both estrogen-deprived feminists and testosterone-deprived "pick-up artists" love to hate as it exaggerates the true source of 'women's power' to the point of being quite preposterous yet positively penetrating, hence one of the film's greatest appeals: its unwavering celebration of outmoded archetypes. A modern day Western/film noir hybrid for those that cannot stomach mute cowboys seeming to suffer from constipation and maniac midget gangsters with Yiddish NYC accents, as well as those who prefer synthpop over cockrock, Alpha City is no movie masterpiece, but it tells a rather timeless tale in a stylish, new dark romanticist sort of way. While his other hit cult films Der Fan (1982) and Loft (1985) are rather original in their shocking pseudo-arthouse aberrancy, Alpha City borrows aesthetic ingredients from both of these films, but tries to tell a rather conventional, albeit completely corrupted, cinematic love story that concludes in a less than comforting manner that reminds one why Hollywood is run by odious and ostentatious optimism-peddlers as opposed to actual humanbeings. Of course, with unintentionally hilarious one-liners like, "I've always wanted to shoot the piano player" and "I didn't murder him. I just helped him to commit suicide," among countless other curious quotes, Alpha City proves that America was not the only place where rampant materialism sired absurdist melodramatics in movies, but unlike eternal juvenile John Hughes, Eckhart Schmidt had no problem admitting he had testicles and tireless Teutonic ones at that!

LOFT

Aside from possibly his charmingly callous hero-worship-gone-homicidal cult flick Der Fan (1982) and his superficially-stylized Americanized action-romance-drama flick Alpha City (1985), German auteur Eckhart Schmidt is a relatively forgotten, if somewhat deservedly so, filmmaker who has many more cinematic misses than hits, but he has created a couple works that deserve critical reevaluation and even a serious cult following, most specifically his rather bizarre and thoroughly engrossing cross-genre pseudo-arthouse work Loft (1985). Like a merry mongrel mix between the visual and audio aesthetic of Slava Tsukerman's iconic new wave sci-fi flick Liquid Sky (1982) and the visceral and psychotically playful brutality of Wes Craven's popular exploitation flick The Last House on the Left (1972) and its Italian-clone The House on the Edge of the Park (1980) directed by Ruggero Deodato (Cannibal Holocaust), Loft is a curious cinematic work that is every bit as idiosyncratic, entertaining, and controversial (at least for its time) as it sounds, but it is also packed with ostentatious artistic pretensions and a glaring (non)socio-political message that has not aged gracefully, although these sometimes repelling cinematic flaws do add a secondary and wholly unintentional layer of character to the film that make it all the more noteworthy. Despite its blemishes, Loft is easily the most enthralling and unintentionally uproarious 'horror' film that I had the random pleasure of viewing this summer. Also, like Tsukerman's Liquid Sky, Loft features a primitive and unhealthily addictive electronic score created by the director that further accentuates agitating ambiance of the film. If the Baader-Meinhof Group were anarchic punks with more of a proclivity towards creating gigantic sinister cock paintings, gently raping bourgeois bitches, and reciting pretentious poetry than being suicidal media whores, they might resemble the villainous art collective featured in Loft; a sensational and sassy celluloid shock piece that has the prestigious distinction of provoking much controversy in supposedly "artistically free" Germany upon its original release.

Set sometime in the not-so-distant future, Loft begins with narration from an unnamed individual about a neurotic and nihilistic era where – much like our present post-postmodern world – the Occident is on the break of total civil war and hedonism makes for a totally chic weltanschauung. At first, we are introduced to a bourgeois couple as they visit an avant-garde art exhibition located in a loft in some post-industrial wasteland. Raoul (Andreas Sportelli), a rich, cocky, and awfully pompous PBF (pretty boy fag) in his early-20s, lets his muse Raphaela (Rebecca Winter), a Mediterranean-like bitch with an emotional twitch, know that he is only attending the seemingly amateur art show so he can finally unbury the fleshly, earthly pleasure that is between her legs. Little do the two banal bougies realize that Furio (Karl-Heinz von Liebezeit), the lead 'curator' and Führer of the art collective – a debauched and nasty Nordic sadist who looks like he just walked off the set of William Friedkin's Cruising (1980) – is watching the couple's every move and he doesn't take kindly to their apathy towards his would-be-audacious art. With topless girls chained to poles and phallogocentric paintings adorning the walls, furious Furio has indeed set up quite the spectacle for his inhospitable guests and they repay him by frantically fornicating in a darkened room away from the art. After the art exhibition, Furio and his collective imprison the couple in the loft and treat them accordingly. In defense of his impassioned brutality, Furio vehemently states, "You attended our exhibition, but not one of you paid any attention to our pictures. We are our pictures, and they strike back when they're insulted." To be fair, before her boyfriend starting putting his hands up her dress, Raphaela seemed somewhat intrigued by the art, but she doesn't feel the full force of Furio's creative fury until he is forcibly plundering her panties while Raoul watches on defenselessly while imprisoned in a nearby bathroom. For the rest of Loft, the film resembles a cross between kitsch performance art à la Viennese Actionism-meets-New Romanticism and the puckish malice of the local yokels in Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974). Ending somewhat abruptly in a quasi-supernatural and inexplicably phantasmagoric fashion, Loft always thrills even after all of the kills.

Undoubtedly, Loft is my favorite effort from the anti-arthouse auteur Eckhart Schmidt who once had the audacity to state, "I would rather film a naked girl than a discussion of problems," in a country where kultur and artistic prudishness have always reigned. Indeed, Loft may not compare with a R.W. Fassbinder nor Werner Schroeter film in terms of artistic refinement, but it is indubitably one of the greatest and most innovative dystopian rape-revenge flicks ever made and thus worthy of being mentioned in the same breath as Mark L. Lester's Class of 1984 (1982), Liquid Sky (1982), and even James Cameron's The Terminator (1984). In short, Loft is pulp cinema at its best; terribly trashy, morally ambiguous, infinitely quotable, succulently stylized, and – above all us – wickedly and utterly entertaining, but with a peculiar tinge of artistic merit. That being said, it is interesting to note that Eckhart Schmidt seems to mock the artistic sternness and fanaticism of the villains of Loft, as if he made the film in part as a celluloid anti-love letter to Fassbinder and the rest of the overly genteel auteur filmmakers of the German New Wave. If Loft makes any sort of political message, it is an 'apolitical' one expressing Schmidt's staunch disdain for all things politics, be it socio-political, realpolitik, or otherwise. In the end, the upper-class is still at the top, and the anarchist artists and their art have literally faded into history, henceforth acting as Schmidt's final political statement on the futility of filmmakers and other artists in their vainglorious attempts to change the world. Needless to say, Schmidt went on to direct films about voluptuous, bare-breasted mermaids (Undine) and softcore skinflicks (Motel Girls), but Loft provides copious, if crude and cryptic, evidence that the German auteur has more than just beautiful brunettes with marvelous mammary glands on his mind.

E.T.A. HOFFMANN'S DER SANDMANN

Ever since I first discovered his Neue Deutsche Welle themed arthouse-horror masterpiece Der Fan (1982) aka Trance about a decade ago or so, I have been deeply intrigued by the oeuvre of Teutonic auteur Eckhart Schmidt (Jet Generation - Wie Mädchen heute Männer lieben, Alpha City), who I have developed a strange sense of respect for due to his proudly subversive anti-intellectualism, unwaveringly rampant heterosexuality (sometimes, I think that he only directs films so that he can talk cute girls into taking off their clothes), and seeming loathing of arthouse cinema. Indeed, unlike many German filmmakers of his zeitgeist, Schmidt seemed most interested in entertaining and titillating, albeit in a distinctly artful fashion, than making films in solidarity with far-left terrorists and phallophobic feminists. Once described by German auteur Alexander Kluge as featuring a sort of "refined cannibalism," Schmidt's films reminded krauts that there are still some German men that are willing to do anything for women, including die, even in a spiritually castrated post-feminist age when most German filmmakers, especially those that belonged to German New Cinema, were more interested in promoting quasi-communist political causes. In fact, Schmidt once bravely confessed, "I would rather film a naked girl than a discussion of problems," with the countless tender tits and bare bushes in virtually all of his works proving this. For his feature E.T.A. Hoffmann's Der Sandmann (1993) aka The Sandman—a work loosely based on the highly influential 1816 E. T. A. Hoffmann Gothic short story of the same name—the auteur took his obsession with unclad woman to ungodly extremes in a work about a mentally haunted mensch with such an unhealthy obsession with a mysterious young lady that he tries in vain to overlook the fact that she is a manmade robot. Indeed, a sort of arthouse fantasy-horror-romance flick of the orgasmically oneiric, neo-romantic, and even quasi-Lynchian variety, Der Sandmann certainly is, at least in my opinion, a lost cult classic of German cinema. Directed by an unconventional kraut auteur who seems to be responsible for some of the least German, German flicks ever made starring oftentimes foreign and/or seemingly intentionally swarthy actors and actresses (indeed, in Schmidt's Alpha City, the Aryan protagonist looks like a wop metalhead and the American antagonist looks almost like archetypically Teutonic Übermensch), Der Sandmann is probably Schmidt's most innately Teutonic cinematic work to date as a modernist neo-romanticist work based on a classic romantic work written by one of the Fatherland's greatest Mythopoeic writers. Like Luchino Visconti's Death in Venice (1971) meets James B. Harris' Some Call It Loving (1973) aka Dream Castle meets Blade Runner (1982), Schmidt's flick is an exceedingly ethereal, darkly romantic, deliriously dreamlike, and obscenely obsessive adult Gothic fairytale about a troubled young man suffering from a decidedly debilitating and even deranging case of post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of seeing his father die as a child who revisits his childhood hometown in Italy with his girlfriend and finds himself falling dangerously in love with the daughter of a man who he blames for his father's dubious death some two decades before. A sort of Last Year at Marienbad (1961) for Douglas Sirk fans (on top of directing two documentaries on Sirk, Schmidt made his film Das Wunder (1985) in the melodramatic spirit of his filmic father figure) and/or people who cannot stand the mental masturbation of Alain Robbe-Grillet, Der Sandmann is an undeniably flawed flick that reminds one that some films, no matter how convoluted and nonsensical they are, have an idiosyncratic narcotizing affect that makes all its weaknesses seem irrelevant and totally forgivable on retrospect.

Daniel (half Irish/half Italian actor Lorenzo Flaherty) is driving to the ancient Italian resort town that he grew up in with his beautiful girlfriend Clara (Sabrina Paravicini) and he should be rather happy, but he is plagued by a childhood flashback from twenty years ago when he witnessed his father's death in a fire during a unexplained industrial accident. Indeed, Daniel is so consumed by bad memories that he almost completely collapses upon checking into a hotel at a quaint Italian village with his girlfriend as a result of these literally hellish flashbacks. Of course, Daniel only gets all the more worse when he bumps into a wealthy old Guido scientist named Coppola (played by German veteran actor Erik Schumann, who started working during the Nazi era and went on to star in Fassbinder flicks like Lili Marleen (1981) and Veronika Voss (1982)), who the disturbed young man blames for the death of his father. Of course, a series of problems arise for Daniel one night when he not only bumps into Coppola, but also spots his nemesis' exceedingly strange and slender yet equally sensual daughter Olimpia (Stella Vordemann), who likes to show her oftentimes scantily clad statuesque body outside around her father's estate, as if she is a living statue of great aesthetic majesty that the scientist cannot help but flaunt to his neighbors. Needless to say, Clara becomes instantly jealous of Olimpia, but she is also worried about Daniel's fanatical hatred of old man Coppola and believes her boyfriend is more or less borderline schizophrenic. When Daniel takes Clara to visit his father's grave for the first time in his entire life, he tells his girlfriend that he believes Coppola killed his father and fled, but she does not believe him, as he has no evidence to back his claims aside from a faulty childhood memory. After Daniel breaks into Coppola's home a couple times and attempts to swoon the virtual walking-and-talking orgasm (indeed, due to her singular exotic and erotic essence, she is like sex incarnate), Olimpia, Clara is, somewhat inexplicably, invited to a party at the elderly Goombah's home. Upon being 'formally' introduced to Olimpia, Daniel confesses to the young lady that he has a feeling that a "new life" begins today, as if the young debutante has stolen his soul. After the party, Clara naturally berates Daniel for debasing her by slobbering over Olimpia in front of everyone else at the reception and obsessing over Coppola, stating, "If he's a murderer then I'm the Virgin Mary." Indeed, while Clara might not be the Virgin Mary, Olimpia is certainly the next best thing, as a virginal beauty that seems like a living and breathing Arno Breker statue, albeit with a fire-crotch.

Needless to say, after taking all she can in terms of being ignored by her lovelorn lunatic boyfriend, Clara runs away, heads to Venice and leaves her unfaithful boy toy a letter saying he can join her if he wants, but of course, Daniel has too much unhealthy love for Olimpia and fanatical hatred for Coppola to leave just now. Degenerating more and more into a depraved megalomaniac of sorts who runs around from place-to-place rambling nonsense, Daniel begins taunting and making death threats to Coppola, but the scientist remains rather calm, at least considering the circumstances. Of course, this does not stop the exceedingly arrogant antihero from routinely bedding Coppola's delectable daughter. When Coppola's elderly associate Spalanzini (John Karlsen) offers Daniel a brand new red BMW to leave the Italian town and reunite with his girlfriend, the meta-lovestruck young man throws the keys to the car in a river and sarcastically asks the old man, "do you happen to have a spare key?" After a while, Daniel manages to get Olimpia out of her father's firm and seemingly incestuous grip, but he soon discovers that things are not as magic as he had hoped they would be. On top of the fact that Olimpia is rather evasive when it comes to questions regarding her childhood and background in general, Daniel soon learns that she bleeds white fluid and has wires and tubes in her rather petite body. Indeed, Olimpia is an anatomically-correct cyborg that was invented by Coppola, yet she somehow developed real human emotions over time, including love, yet Daniel finds this all to be rather dubious and begins questioning the integrity of his erotic robotic lover. While Daniel complains that Coppola is an evil Sandman who threatened "to scratch out my eye if I couldn't restrain my curiosity" when he was a child, Olimpia ensures her new boyfriend that he is a great and loving man who brought her life. Obsessed with the fact that she is a robot who cannot feel pain, Daniel begins to doubt Olimpia's love and becomes increasingly obsessed with playing with the various parts and wires inside her body, as if he has developed a foul fetish for masturbating machinery. Needless to say, one day, Daniel goes too far in terms of fiddling with his robo-babe's wanton wires and ultimately disembowels her, thereupon resulting in her malfunction and subsequent death. Desperate to revive his amorous automaton, Daniel goes to his perennial enemy Coppola for help and learns that his lady love is gone forever, as the Guido scientist attempted to make a second robot and failed. Indeed, Coppola also reveals to Daniel that he is actually his father and that the real Coppola was the one that died in the tragic fire that took place two decades ago. As Daniel's father explains, "I couldn't bear what I'd done to you and your mother. That's why I fled. Only your mother knew the truth...And that truth killed her. Forgive me. Daniel. Please. Forgive me. Forgive me everything."

In the end, pseudo-Coppola/Daniel's father drops dead and Daniel somehow regains his sanity and goes to Venice to reunite with his girlfriend Clara.

For those that found the love affair between Rick Deckard and 'replicant' Rachael in Blade Runner to be somehow strangely romantic, Der Sandmann takes the whole mensch-cyborg romance deal to much more unhinged extremes in a work that is more or less an allegory for the intangibility of an immaculate lover/love affair, as a film featuring a man that believes he has fallen in love with the perfect woman, only to learn that she is not even a real woman/human, but the dubious creation of his worst enemy, who ultimately turns out to be his father. Needless to say, despite the film's full title 'E.T.A. Hoffmanns Der Sandmann,' Schmidt's phantasmagorical piece of celluloid is only superficially reminiscent of Hoffmann's short story (which Freud once heavily analyzed in his 1919 essay The Uncanny aka Das Unheimliche) and, quite unlike the source material, the film features a semi-happy ending. While depicting a man that is clearly half-crazed (like with Hoffmann's story, the character of Coppola is a sort of metaphor for antihero Daniel's dark side), Schmidt's film is a sort of wild and whimsical wake-up call to all men regarding the fact that there is no such thing as a completely perfect woman and that if a woman seems too good to be true, it is probably because she is. While a somewhat kitschy work, Der Sandmann wallows in pure passion and unbridled romance, as a strikingly charming celluloid work that transcends both dream and reality, as well as the usually fine line between high and low art. As Hans Schifferle wrote in a brief article about the auteur, Schmidt is a filmmaker that "does not see movies and art, spectacle and poetry, classical music and rock 'n' roll as opposites, but as two sides of the same coin" and nowhere is this more clear than in Der Sandmann, which offers a sort of semi-Hollywoodized take on classic Teutonic kultur. Indeed, as a man who once described his early feature Männer sind zum Lieben da (1970) aka Atlantis as "Kleist's Penthesilea as a romantic comedy" and who in 1989 directed an adaptation of Richard Wagner's 1876 four cycle opera Der Ring des Nibelungen aka The Ring of the Nibelung on video, Schmidt is not a filmmaker who is afraid to add a little bit of trash to class and vice versa, with Der Sandmann being quite arguably his most successful attempt at cinematically melding classical art with kitsch (indeed, the film's score, which features Vivaldi and Chopin, as well as industrial electronic music, perfectly demonstrates this). Arguably the greatest filmmaker ever associated with the 'New Munich Group' (which also included Klaus Lemke, Rudolf Thome, Max Zihlmann, and Peter Nestler and various other filmmakers that were not associated with German New Cinema), Schmidt ultimately demonstrated that the catastrophic Second World War did not totally destroy the romantic essence of the German collective as one might suspect, as while Der Sandmann may not be the cinematic equivalent of one of Wagner's operas, it certainly touches the soul in a beautifully bittersweet fashion that reminds one why life is worth living as a fetishistic fever dream that depicts a wickedly warped mis-romance that is almost as patently pathetic as Friedrich Nietzsche's failed love affair with Lou Andreas-Salomé.

SUNSET MOTEL

Eckhart Schmidt (2003)

Undoubtedly, one of the most depressing things for a cinephile to witness is the decline in quality of one of their favorite director's work with age. Indeed, even the great master auteur filmmakers like Fritz Lang, Federico Fellini, Alfred Hitchcock, and Ingmar Bergman had a noticeable enfeeblement in terms of their artistic prowess as they got older. Of course, somewhat less artistically inclined directors seem even more susceptible to artistic decrepitude, with German cult auteur Eckhart Schmidt (Der Fan aka Trance, Alpha City) being a prime example of 'auteur senility.' While Schmidt was easily one of the greatest, if not most hated and critically reviled, kraut cult filmmakers of the 1980s, by the 1990s his work began to rapidly decline, with E.T.A. Hoffmann's Der Sandmann (1993) aka The Sandman being his last truly 'great,' artistically ambitious, and notable work. Indeed, while Schmidt's first documentary, Douglas Sirk: Über Stars (1980), was made at time when he was still in his prime, nowadays the only thing he really does is direct cheapo featurette documentaries about various Hollywood filmmakers and historical figures, including Otto Preminger, Jerry Lewis, Federico Fellini, Marilyn Monroe, Tony Curtis (whose daughter Alexandra Curtis starred in the German filmmaker's underrated macabre surrealist masterpiece Das Gold der Liebe (1983) aka The Gold of Love), and his buddy Uli Edel, among countless others. Indeed, like wonderful weirdo David Lynch (whose work seems to have influenced Schmidt), the indubitably underrated Der Fan director has completely embraced the radically repellant and glaringly artless medium of digital video, hence his peculiar proclivity towards directing about half a dozen micro docs each year since the late-1990s. In 2003, he directed his last 'official' feature, Sunset Motel, and announced that he no longer has any intention of directing feature films, so now he only directs documentaries and takes sub-erotic photos of marginally attractive American chicks, which is no surprise considering he is the same mensch who once stated in 1968 during the same year he announced his arrival in the cinema world with his salacious debut feature, Jet Generation - Wie Mädchen heute Männer lieben (1968), that, "I would rather film a naked girl than a discussion of problems." Admittedly, when I first saw screenshots from Sunset Motel, I was disappointed and even a tad bit shocked, as the digital video aesthetic surely resembles that of third rate pornography, yet Schmidt must be an alchemist of sorts as he somehow almost managed to turn digital diarrhea into moody and broody cinematic gold. Dubiously dedicated to suicidal Guido commie poet/novelist Cesare Pavese and featuring cameo appearances from popular American novelists Hubert Selby Jr. (Last Exit to Brooklyn, Requiem for a Dream) and Janet Fitch (White Oleander, Paint It Black), Sunset Motel is a dark and disconcerting romance set in iconic sunny Sunset Boulevard in Hollywood about a young and relatively innocent waitress who falls hopelessly in love with an impenetrable and nauseatingly narcissistic novelist who ultimately makes his lover want to end her short life due to his sadistic mind games. Indeed, like Schmidt's greatest works, this minimalistic little movie that wallows in love for classic Hollywood is a ruthless work that reminds the viewer of the close link between true love and death.

Raoul (played by producer Sean Costello, who produced the repugnant sentimentalist black power flick Night Catches Us (2010)) is a seemingly half-autistic novelist who keeps avoiding a cute blonde named Laura (Joanna Canton of the Convent (2000) and countless horrendous TV shows) who works at a café in Sunset Plaza and lives in the Saharan Motel on Sunset Boulevard. After Laura spots Raoul voyeuristically gazing at her while swimming in a pool, she finally gets the novelist to verbally communicate with her, though he soon attempts to get out of the situation by stuttering, "I think I made a...mistake," like the ball-less coward that he is. While Raoul is an innate introvert and seemingly half-autistic, he is also rather arrogant, and his future love interest Laura will ultimately be a tragic victim of a rather fragile ego. Despite being a supposed writer, Raoul does not have much to say, so Laura does all the talking by describing her love for Chinese food and how she would love to see a colorized version of her favorite romantic comedy, Roman Holiday (1953) starring Gregory Peck and Audrey Hepburn. As she explains, Laura loves the film because she fantasizes about being a, "princess for a day," as it would be a stark contrast to her current life as a barely-getting-by wage-slave. Laura also absurdly describes Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather (1972) as an "Italian movie." Of course, Laura and Raoul's mostly one-sided conversation inevitably leads to passionate sex, though even intimate coitus is not enough to save the novelist from his social retardation. Indeed, after making seemingly passionate love, Laura says, "I wanna see you again" and Raoul merely says "sure" and leaves abruptly, as if he is scared his new lover might have cooties or something. After bumping into a random chick who describes how happy she is because she is three months pregnant with her husband's child, Laura begins contemplating her dubious future with Raoul, who she soon spots walking around with some random Latina, thus demonstrating that he is probably not a very faithful mensch.

When the two quasi-lovers have sex for a second time, Raoul leaves immediately afterwards in a ridiculously rude fashion, thereupon causing Laura to cry hysterically. As a sort of patently paranoid passive-aggressive pansy lunatic, Raoul begins accusing Laura of being a loose slut after she confesses she was not a virgin before they met, thus causing the little lady to once again break down in tears. Indeed, while Laura has had sex in the past, it was only with her former fiancé. While a total prick, Raoul more or less eventually realizes that he is treating Laura unfairly, so he goes to his elderly ex-junky buddy Hubert Selby Jr. for advice. Ultimately, gutter sage Selby tells the novelist that "taking joy in somebody's else's success" brings happiness and that he must be accepting of change if he ever wants to be truly content with what life has to offer. Although Selby's words initially have a positive effect on Raoul, the sickeningly self-centered man soon disappoints Laura in a variety of ways. After describing how her greatest fantasy is to live on a boat with Raoul and travel around the world whilst having tons of sex on said boat, Laura manages to talk her 'boyfriend' into visiting Zuma Beach with her, as one of her favorite movies, From Here to Eternity (1953) starring Burt Lancaster and Deborah Kerr, was shot there. Upon arriving at the beach, Raoul vehemently refuses to join Laura for some fun in the sun because he claims that he, "has to write." Internally wounded, Laura assumes her non-relationship with Raoul is over and goes on a date with another man. When Laura gets back from her date, she finds a very angry Raoul waiting for her on the same bed in which the two have spent their most magical moments together. Of course, paranoid wack job Raoul accuses Laura of cheating on him and even goes so far as to accuse her of using him as a "sex machine." When Laura attempts to tell Raoul that she loves him, the nasty novelist hatefully states like a true blue asshole, "I'm leaving and I'm never, ever, ever coming back here ever." Of course, Raoul later comes back, but Laura is nowhere to be found. When Raoul asks a young Mexican hotel clerk where the girl in Room 228 is, he states with a rather flat affect, "She doesn't live here anymore. She's dead. She committed suicide."

A minimalistic motel room melodrama of the rather understated sort, Sunset Motel is almost anti-Schmidtian in its essence as it emphasizes nuanced Sirkian drama over gratuitous sex and violence. Indeed, while the director's cult hit Die Story (1984) features a rather bloody and gratuitous suicide scene of a completely naked man and woman with slit wrists laying in a bathtub full of their own blood, Sunset Motel does not even depict the protagonist's self-slaughter at all, as if Schmidt had too much respect for the character to depict her in such an undignified position. Indeed, in terms of dramaturgy, the film is shockingly effective, as Laura seems like a wounded angel that is practically begging to be saved by her manipulative boyfriend Raoul, who will ultimately inspire violent thoughts in any heterosexual red-blooded American male. While I would have preferred for Schmidt to have ended his long and rather uneven filmmaking career by doing another Richard Wagner or E.T.A. Hoffmanns adaptation (indeed, aside from directing Der Sandmann, he shot a uniquely kitschy adaptation of Wagner's 1876 four cycle opera Der Ring des Nibelungen aka The Ring of the Nibelung on video), Sunset Motel is a work that, for better or worse, has a special place in the filmmaker's oeuvre. Certainly, Sunset Motel features the sort of wicked "refined cannibalism" that German New Cinema father figure Alexander Kluge spoke of when describing the wild love themes that have become a signature of the director's work. While Schmidt claimed that Sunset Motel would be his last feature, he has directed a number of trashy 'erotic' flicks since then under the pseudonym "Raoul Sternberg" (derived from the names of two of his favorite directors, Raoul Walsh and Josef von Sternberg). I watched the trailer for one of these films, Hollywood Fling - Diary of a Serial Killer (2010), and I can certainly see why Schmidt chose to use a pseudonym for this work, as it seems like an aesthetically abhorrent abomination as a no-budget piece of horror-porn digital defecation featuring gangster rap music and bestial black chicks with decidedly disgusting fake tits. While Sunset Motel is not quite up to par with Schmidt's extremely addictive idiosyncratic cult hits from the 1980s like Der Fan, The Gold of Love, Die Story, Loft, and Alpha City, it is surely the director's most valiant attempt at a true modernist melodrama that painfully demonstrates why love kills. With that being said, it seems only natural that Schmidt would conclude his feature filmmaking career with a film where the leading lady kills herself.

Ed Puduk (2007)

Ever received a film that you held off watching cause it looked down-right bland? I did that for about a week and boy, did I make a mistake. Slayer is a low-budget unconventional Vampire action film. My first attempt at watching this film was dead at night. I remember waking up for a brief second only to catch an amazing special effect of a guy launching a knife into a vampire's head. Too bad I blacked out again. (Before) (After) (Compliments to my fabulous artwork) Ed Puduk (Director/Writer/Producer/Actor) has only made a few mistakes when making this film. The main problem is of the most crippling caliber - the generic name which has been handed to a Casper Van Dien film. This might explain why the iMDB rating is so low. People on those forums never seem to think anyways. First off, being filmed on his college campus, the cinematography was fucking beautiful. I mean, stark colors and even an animated flashback. This film surprised the hell out of me. Eric Carlson is a college student who witnesses a vampire slaying and hides. After a series of events, he is grappled into a web of vampire slayers hiding in a cabin and decides to stay and take the "red pill." You might be thinking what I was thinking - Wanted with vampires. This might be true. The slacker-chic turning a hardcore leaf seems to be the latest craze. Slayer is a dramatic effort with scenes of kick ass action scenes and memorable characters. Though, at times, I secretly believed this film was a marketing campaign for Nintendo products. The characters ranged from the "loser" to the "long haired goth vampire" but they managed to mix up them pretty well, creating the mute bad ass with a deep love and a homosexual Andy Samberg named Link. (How convenient, The Legend of Zelda was Rose's favorite game) Not only did these characters grace the screen well, but they also left in fashion. The death toll is high and chaotic. I was shocked at several deaths. An encore for keeping me on my toes. Sound effects were brilliant but some were mismatched. I wasn't too fond of the slicing effects. While I rag on films for using the "schink" effect, It's become a staple for sword fight effects to me. Remember that scene in Irreversible? The fire extinguisher one? Yeah, well the entire film features brutally animated bat-to-face and sledgehammer-to-face scenes. The violence is spectacular and a paralyzed art form. Violence now-a-days is over-sickening glamorized garbage. Puduk creates antagonists that cry and breathe. I felt bad for these sick creatures. Slayer is worth more of your time than you think. It's worth more of my time. I regret not watching this film immediately, but it all works out. A heterodox vampire film that not only changes the natural viewpoint of the vampyric myth, but also changes the way we view low-budget action films. If Puduk could make this on an independent basis, than it just shows how much modern DIY film makers are slacking. Calm down, Puduk. You're making the kids look bad.

Eddy Saller (1968)

Long before he became the decidedly dignified and dapper royal Teutonic queen of character acting, gay German actor Udo Kier (Suspiria, Melancholia) played a number of roles as rampantly heterosexual men in various European exploitation and horror flicks, including his daring debut performance in the feature-length Austrian/French/West German co-production Shameless (1968) aka Schamlos; a gritty yet sleekly stylized and aesthetically and thematically subversive black-and-white celluloid work about a young yet brutal career criminal who literally ran away from the circus as a teenager to become a star gang leader who will use any method of intimidation, no matter how savage and sadistic, for mere monetary gain. Directed by Eddy Saller (Torment of the Flesh, Liebe durch die Autotür) – a filmmaker who made a couple idiosyncratic exploitation films between the 1960s and early 1980s before working in a less prestigious filmmaking profession as a gaffer on big budget films like The NeverEnding Story (1984) directed by Wolfgang Petersen and Stalingrad (1993) directed by Joseph Vilsmaier – Shameless is a rare work of its zeitgeist that, unlike the popular völkisch and colorful Heimatfilme of that time, managed to depict the less delightful side of post-Nazi Austria. Similar to Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg's portrayal of late-period Swinging London in the cult classic Performance (1970), Shameless quite shamelessly presents the positively putrid potpourri of sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll that permeated throughout metropolitan Austria (although featuring German license plates and whatnot, apparently it was actually filmed in Vienna) around the same time, including aesthetically abhorrent Viennese Aktionist action art, exotic strippers and prostitutes, speed-addicted homosexual gangsters, and a celebration of all things unhinged and anarchic in the urban Austrian bohemian underworld. Originally a male hustler by the dubious nickname "Dodo" who oftentimes dressed in drag and even was pimped out by his inseparable friend-in-sin Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Udo Kier certainly made for a curious choice for a callous yet charismatic violent crime-inclined gangster in Shameless, yet he still managed to deliver a dashing and distinguished performance in what is a rare exploitation flick of the late-1960s that actually goes beyond senseless and soulless celluloid excrement.

Alexander Pohlmann (Udo Kier) is a young man with a pretty pokerface who is always on the move and always making a move, at least ever since he retired from being a knife-thrower and trick-shot artist at his family's circus at the youthful age of 15-years-old and went to the big city to try his loony libertine lot at murdering men twice his size and swindling small businesses for protection money in a most swinish manner. Needless to say, life as a mod-like street Viking is not an easy one as Pohlmann learns as he tries to kill his enemies before they kill him. Of course, Pohlmann is a professional at what he does and he never thinks twice about ruining a man's life, as long as it comes at the right price. His life is also full of sexy and 'saucy chicks,' but things change when Pohlmann gets romantically involved with a conspiring stripper and seductress named Annabella (Marina Paal); the flesh-flaunting femme fatale daughter of an extremely wealthy Sicilian tropical fruit dealer named Guido Romanelli (Vladimir Medar) who is "hot like an emptied MP" and "extra class" in bed, which the high-ranking hoodlum assumes is due to her exotic Mediterranean roots. An extremely popular girl among rich hotshots of the underworld, especially in the bedroom, Annabella apparently claims to be only in love with the youthful but powerful Pohlmann, which the gangster finds most suspicious but believes could be quite fruitful for him in the long run, but when the diva of degeneracy is found maliciously murdered under dubious circumstances, things take a turn for the worst in the wayward criminal world. Grieving and enraged by his daughter's premature death at the hands of a calculating and cold-hearted killer, Romanelli approaches Pohlmann about catching the murderer, forcing him to confess, and eventually murdering him and making it look like a suicide, which the gangster agrees to do, but for a hefty monetary sum. Romanelli believes his daughter was killed by a funny fellow named Michael Hohenberg (Louis Soldan) and Pohlmann and his gangster compatriots put the man under judicious examining via criminal-run underground court style à la Fritz Lang's M (1931), but being a drug-addicted homosexual with no love for the ladies, the extremely effete defendant seems hardly like the real culprit. A powerful criminal named Richard Kowalski (Rolf Eden) – a malevolent man so obsessed with Annabella that he had her watched 24/7 by his hired goons and even brutally beat her at one time during an argument – seems more like the real transgressor as a malefic man motivated by insane jealousy and uncontrollable rage. When it is finally revealed that Annabella started producing secret porn films of the many men she sold her voluptuous body to as an uniquely underhanded way to blackmail them, the true killer is finally revealed in an extra-climatic conclusion that is as superlatively surprising as it is salaciously shocking. Needless to say, a lot has changed in Germany/Austria since Uncle Adolf and his SA and SS boys rid the city of vice and human vermin only a couple decades before.

A merry yet macabre mix between a Germanic 'Whodunnit?' Giallo of sorts and a delectably debauched depiction of counter-culture and underground organized crime groups of that time, Shameless is a short but sweet and unabashedly exploitative (even if it does have a cautionary message tacked on at the beginning) yet expertly crafted exploitation work that owes just as much to German Expressionism and American b-grade film noir as it does to Italian Neorealism in terms of thematic and aesthetic influences. Indeed, I would be lying if I did not admit that this film had me on the edge of my seat throughout, which I certainly cannot say about lifeless arthouse gangster flicks like Jean-Luc Godard's Breathless (1960) aka À bout de souffle and Band of Outsiders (1964) aka Bande à part; emotionally feeble and socio-politically passé works that would unfortunately have an imperative influence on filmmakers of German New Cinema. It seems that Shameless director Eddy Saller, especially in regard to his directorial debut Die Geißel des Fleisches (1965) aka Torment of the Flesh, was a forerunner for anti-intellectual German auteur filmmakers like Klaus Lemke (48 Hours to Acapulco, Rocker) and Eckhart Schmidt (Der Fan, Alpha City) who focused on directing gritty, exciting, lecherous, and action-packed cinema that rejected the anti-climatic theories of kraut commie Bertolt Brecht. In the wildly wanton world of Shameless, morality is dead and so is god and country in an apocalyptic era where aberrant Vienna Aktionism, imported American rock 'n' roll, and completely corrupt criminal politicians hold sway. For fans of Udo Kier, Shameless is also a rare treat, especially considering he is the only actor who has had a career so varied as appearing in Paul Morrissey's Blood for Dracula (1974), R.W. Fassbinder's The Third Generation (1979), Gábor Bódy's Nárcisz és Psyché (1980), Gus van Sant's My Own Private Idaho (1991), Ace Ventura: Pet Detective (1994), Christoph Schlingensief's United Trash (1996) aka The Slit, Barb Wire (1996) starring Pamela Anderson, Michael Bay's Armageddon (1998), and Werner Herzog's My Son, My Son, What Have Ye Done (2009), among over 200+ films, yet never before has the actor seemed so barbarous, brazen, and butch in a star role, which is a major achievement for a man who started out as a flesh-peddling drag queen, but then again, never before has an actor (Aryan or otherwise) been so suave and shameless.

BLACK COBRA

Edoardo Margheriti (1989)

From Director Stelvio Massi comes an Italian action film with a title hellbent on getting some of the fame directed towards Stallone's Cobra. It's nice to see an action film starring a black man who isn't thrown in for comedic value. It is also nice that the man is Fred Williamson. Throughout action film history, heroic blacks were mostly known to grace blaxploitation films, rarely a more accessible series. Black Cobra is of this sort, placing a tough womanizing cop who is in charge of protecting a photographer who witnessed a murder. The key is that she took a picture of the villain. Let me start off by saying that this antagonist role is gut-bustingly hilarious. He is the leader of a crazy gang of motorcyclists trying to mix the genres of Bikesploitation and Blaxploitation. Whenever he has a evil plan, the camera pans into his shaded face, cracking a crooked grin with a perfect view of his gold tooth. This alone makes it worth the sad price of $1 at your local Wal-Mart. After witnessing the film, I immediately questioned whether or not I enjoyed Black Cobra. After thinking about the horrible one-liners, Williamson's passive sternness, and the armies of bumbling cops in this film, I realized how much fun I had with this film. If you look at Black Cobra from a cinephile perspective, you might be disgusted, but damn if this movie isn't funny as hell. Fred Williamson is one of the greatest actors out there, ranging from playing a good role as Boss Nigger to playing a comical cop with a cigar in Black Cobra. Black Cobra is one of those Italian-looking action films that exploded from the 70s. While a cynic might spite the film for it's non-serious view of cinematography, It can't be that bad due to the immense replay value that will have you hitting the play button over and over again. Due to the below cheap price for this collection, Black Cobra is a must for any action fans, and even blaxploitation. Black Cobra is a genre-twist for the most, plus we get to see The Hammer woo some white ladies in a different scenario.

FLESH: THE TRUTH ABOUT 9/11

Edouard Salier (2005)

Edouard Salier's short film entitled FLESH is a horrible, pompous short film with little to no direction at all. It seems he is one of those pretentious "indie" film directors who tries to associate hard orgy sex with art. This short has nothing but CG and special effects. A brash attempt to offend. His plan is to offend voraciously but to no avail. What we have here is a glistening CG skyline of New York City. Skyscrapers and the Chrysler Building are illuminated from the sun. We then see an ecstasy-driven lesbian sex scene silhouetted onto the buildings. All of them are covered with hard sex of all genders. As we are distracted by this absurdity, we have a plane crash into one of the towers. The middle explodes with red pixel spikes protruding out. The women continue to fuck even as they crash to the ground. We have a scene that is made to look like a first person view. Some hapless helper on the ground running with a camera screaming vulgarities, praying to god or something. The second tower falls. The film was only slightly garbage by this point. The director decides he wants a fleet of airplanes to explode into every building to make a point which is unapparent. During some of the explosions, he decides to show "shocking" footage in a quick edit scene. This is including Arnold elected for governor, Charlie Manson, and the Ku Klux Klan. This move buried the film. Several groans escaped from my chest. From all the rubble, one giant jagged tower emerges, it might symbolize how America "came together" after 9/11. After this erect foundation stands proud, we see a plane coming in the distance. This film works zero percent and has no point. I can imagine some crazy Spaniard/Frenchie running around NY screaming about how Arnold and sexy writhing women did 9/11. This is not high art. This film is in comparison to the bag of trash in your car. Dispose of immediately.

Edward D. Wood Jr. (1954)

If master Neuer Deutscher Film auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder can be credited for directing anything remotely resembling a sexploitation flick in the rather ridiculous spirit of self-proclaimed boob-man Russ Meyer (Faster, Pussycat! Kill! Kill!, Mudhoney), it is surely his rarely-seen and indefinitely banned TV-movie Jail Bait (1973) aka Wildwechsel aka Wild Game aka Wild Game Crossing; a strikingly sleazy yet simultaneously sophisticated cumming-of-age flick about statutory rape, the disintegration of traditional German lower middle-class morals, and the problems associated with parricide. Based on a work written by German Brechtian communist playwright and all-around Renaissance man Franz Xaver Kroetz – an author best known for his socially conscious melodramatic portrayals of rural Bavaria – Fassbinder’s Jail Bait ultimately proved to be too ‘pornographic’ and probably too morally and politically ambiguous for the man who penned the play it was based on. In fact, Kroetz was so outraged by Fassbinder’s Jail Bait that he took serious legal action, thereupon causing an injunction to be enforced, resulting in scene cuts and an extremely limited release of the film, hence its virtual total unavailability today. Fassbinder and Kroetz publicly argued over Jail Bait with the letters from each being published in the 1970s in various mainstream German newspapers. In his first open letter to cavalier kraut Kroetz, Fassbinder wrote: “it is a pity that you cannot be altogether honest. Why are you embarrassed to admit that you refused my offer to work with you on a script that would be acceptable to both of us?...Everything that is in the film is also in the play...Maybe this now embarrasses you. But it need not, because your play isn’t that bad, honestly.” In the same letter, Fassbinder would also go on to state that Jail Bait is, “the first time you have been understood,” meaning that as a loyal communist who writes in supposed tribute/admiration/defense of the “ordinary people” aka proletariat, the filmmaker has made the pretentious playwright’s work more palatable to less literate and politically astute audiences who rather enjoy their ‘bread and circuses’ to ‘socially redeeming’ swill. And indeed, featuring sex, death, and rock ‘n’ roll, Jail Bait is undoubtedly a work that can be digested and enjoyed by the proudest of philistine peasants, but that does not make the film even less intricate than his previous no even subsequent efforts. Starring Eva Mattes as a 14-year-old floozy schoolgirl and Harry Baer as a 19-year-old chicken factory worker who makes the moronic mistake of deflowering a feisty and finagling femme fatale of the uncommonly fulsome and underage sort, Jail Bait is a smutty yet seasoned cinematic tale about young love gone awry and then some.

Hanni Schneider (Eva Mattes) may be a high school girl who still sleeps with dolls and comes from a rather wholesome, if authoritarian, family, but when she is offered a ride on the motorcycle of a charming James Dean-wannabe named

Franz Bermeier (Harry Baer) – a young man that sports a terribly teased pompadour hairdo and sports tight studded jeans and equally small fitting t-shirt who has clearly bought into the shallow, nihilistic rebellion of Hollywood à la The Wild One (1953) and Rebel Without a Cause (1955) and pseudo-erotic negrophiliac renegade rockabilly of American icon Elvis Presley – she cannot help herself and before she knows it she is literally rolling around naked in the hay with her carboncopy rebel-with-a-single-cause: the ravaging of tempting teenage girls. Of course, before he even realizes it, Franz has fallen to prey to the teenage temptress' carnal charms and he soon believes the he is madly in love with the homely dame, henceforth eventually leading to his disregardfully decided damnation as a result of his fleshy metaphysical enslavement to the dastardly dame. Unbeknownst to Franz, horny Hanni has a fascist father named Erwin Schneider (Jörg von Liebenfels; presumably of no relation to the Austrian proto-nazi völkisch theorist of a similar name) with unhealthy and even quasi-incestuous feelings for his sole progeny, which results in the young man's arrest for supposed statutory rape. Being a possessive and pestering parent with a perverse proclivity towards prying into his daughter's sex life, Erwin declares that he wishes that Hanni's boy toy Franz was castrated, condemned to death, and hanged as he nostalgically reminisces on the glory days of the Third Reich. Essentially, Erwin is a living relic who dreams of an aggressive authoritarian regime where all forms of social subversion and moral decay are stomped out with a mighty iron fist, which he – as a virtually impotent lower middle-class man of limited education and political impotence – is unable to do. Being 'daddy's little (deranged) girl,' Hanni is quite inexorable and extreme when it comes to her egomaniacal wicked wants and nefarious needs, especially in romantic matters. After discovering that she is pregnant, Hanni conspires to have her father killed because, to quote the lethal lady, "he has to go because we need room," and she ingenuously recruits her ex-jailbird boyfriend Franz – who has already been to prison once because of erratic father Erwin – to do it. A rather gross gal that wishes she was a true blue Swiss miss (despite her chubby, swarthy, and semi-Mongolian appearance), who would be lucky to play a nude extra in an Andy Milligan flick; and whose understanding of the world around her is no more sophisticated than that of a 7-year-old, Hanni will not stop at anything, even if that means murdering her only father in the Fatherland.

Probably unwittingly, Fassbinder himself revealed why Franz Xaver Kroetz was probably offended by Jail Bait when he stated in an interview regarding his less than condemning portrayal of Hanni's father Erwin, "I think I'm one of the few directors in Germany who has a positive relation to his characters...in some cases, like the girl's father in JAILBAIT when he talks about the war, I'm indulgent almost to the point of irresponsibility." Indeed, it was probably not the gratuitous nudity and negligent behavior of the anti-hero "Bonnie and Clyde" couple of Jail Bait that proved to be most irksome for Kroetz, but the fact that the misogynistic and fascist father – a man that fawns over his daughter and has mostly merry memories of the Third Reich – is ultimately the only true voice of reason and responsibility in the film. Like many of the German director's previous but especially subsequent films (i.e. Fox and His Friends, Mother Küsters Goes to Heaven, I Only Want You to Love Me, In a Year of Thirteen Moons, etc.), Fassbinder utilized Jail Bait as a way to analyze and depict why certain members of the inerudite working-class carry out the decisively extreme and desperate actions that they do. Unable to communicate their emotions to one another, both Hanni and her equally extemporaneous father Erwin merely act on emotion without taking a second thought as to the radical repercussions of their actions, thereupon leading to the literal (and in Hanni's figurative) end of their lives. As for Franz, his greatest crime, even as a murderer, was an act of perverse passion by a misguided and moronic young man brainwashed by Hollywood movies and American rock 'n' roll to think his belligerent behavior was that of a virtuous underdog just defending his love. Unfortunately for Franz, he has found a kindred spirit in Charles Starkweather. Although by no means Fassbinder's greatest work, Jail Bait is also far from being the accursed auteur filmmaker's worst film, thus making it mandatory-viewing for fans of the German New Wave master, as well as unhealthy junkies of teen rebel flick. Not only does Fassbinder deconstruct the juvenile subgenre with his postmodern teenage outlaw film, but he added a post-war German twist with which the apparently celebrated playwright Franz Xaver Kroetz could not contend.

KEN PARK

Edward Lachman (2002)

Larry Clark is a pervert and probably a pedophile. He makes no effort in trying to hide his obsession with preteen and teenage sex acts, and is notorious for taking many of his young actresses to bed. Larry Clark's film Ken Park is probably the photographer turned film director's most perverted and graphic film. The film follows a group of young degenerate skaters as they discover the pleasures of group sex and displeasures of incest. With Ken Park, decided sexual taboos were out of the question. Scenes featuring teenage skater boys performing cunnilingus on their girlfriend's middle aged mother gives an accurate look at why Larry Clark is a filmmaker.

One could call Ken Park pornography as I am sure the film would get many people excited. On the other hand, Ken Park features some of the most sexually disturbing scenes ever featured in a somewhat mainstream (although it has never had a wide release) film. A film featuring dope smoking, suicide, and fake tits is typical of American cinema. Ken Park, however, is much different than films of similar subject matter. Ken Park doesn't feature gratuitous scenes just as a quick way for the filmmaker and producers to make a quick buck. Ken Park features scenes like a scrawny Italian American teenager's auto erotic asphyxiation because Larry Clark wanted to fulfill a pervert fantasy of his through film making. Larry Clark's debut film Kids is still his best. Whereas Kids follows a group of broke ass teens from the inner city, Ken Park features middle class skaters from the suburbs. Larry Clark also recently directed another skater film Wasup Rockers which follows a group of young teenage Latino skaters as they face "discrimination" of sorts. One could say that Larry Clark is the only filmmaker to tackle the many different skateboarding subcultures in America. It is about time a filmmaker focused on skateboarders and their subversive culture(s). Not since the days of Eurotrash erotica and exploitation cinema, has a film blurred the line between pornography and "art." I wouldn't exactly call Ken Park art, but it is certainly worth recognition. The reality is Larry Clark has captured a world of sexual perversity as the norm. So called "sexual liberation" has resulted in a world of "everything goes" where everyone is looking for the next big kick. The last sex scene in Ken Park features a sensual threesome amongst three teenagers. To Larry Clark, teenage sex is the most aesthetically appealing situation to be caught on film.

STARSHIP TROOPERS 3: MARAUDER
STARSHIP TROOPERS 3: MARAUDER

Edward Neumeier (2008)

How exactly does one recover a film from the bowels of hell in the form of a second sequel to the classic cult film Starship Troopers. The original, being created from a book by a master of science fiction, was directed by Paul Verhoeven - a director who has had his share of arthouse and campy cult films. This time around, they attempted to re-create the feeling of the original with the satirical infomercials and bringing back the only good role Casper Van Dien had; Johnny Rico. Johnny Rico finds himself facing some terrorist charges after some plushie bugs attacked a secure base and he punched a general. While being court-martialed, he finds himself being pulled from his execution in order to take a mech team to a bug planet featuring a couple twists here and there while displaying horrific CGI and props. I mean, look at these fucking "weapons." They handle as if they were made from styrofoam. One thing movie studios don't realize. CGI isn't the only option here. Films like T2: Judgment Day wowed audiences with its view of a post-apocalyptic landscape. In this film, they took the low-carb route to creating bugs and planets. They could have used old-fashioned effects wizardry, but stuck with the hellacious more expensive routine and in the end, slaughters what was good about the film, and trust me, it needs everything it can get. Johnny Rico's character seems too forced and lost everything that was fun about him. It's understandable though. The fresh out of school rebel teen "sticking it to his parents" signs up for Mobile Infantry and gets in a ragtag squadron of flunkies who decide to squash bugs and have good times. This Johnny Rico is a combat-bred machine who sucks at doing that as well. Supporting cast is a group of females who are not ordained priests but that doesn't stop them from forcing religion down your throat. The females have several roles in the film, ranging from the sniveling rat to the virginal christian, and to the "bad ass heroine." Almost makes me sick; Thank god there was two seconds of female nudity or I would have been pissed. What starts off as moderately entertaining turns into mindless drivel as soon as it hits its peak. I loved the twist, and I loved the "final boss" of the film. The effects were definitely amazing there. That might have been the reason for the all-around shitty production. They blew their budget on a Lovecraftian bug monster that shines with influences of his Cthulhu mythos. When the shit really hits the fan is about an hour and half in, the film stops on a dime and starts pursuing some bastard mission to convert every viewing audience member into a follower of God. A group of descending mechs highlights a halo over the Virgin Mary-esque female on the evil bug planet. Led by Rico, the messianic robot suits fry all of the planets inhabitants. After all, they were only living on their home planet. Starship Troopers 3: Marauder is vastly superior to the middleman. With a bit o' blood and PG-13 tits, this might entertain the simple-minded fans of the original, or the commentary directed towards the Middle Eastern war might suit the intellectual, but none the less, the religious propaganda will piss you off.

A moderate war-in-space film.

Edward Zwick* (2008)

It's Holocaust and Nazi season at the movies during these cold winter months. Of course it's great timing for films about the suffering of God's chosen as the Jewish state of Israel has just gotten done "pounding" the virtually helpless Palestinians that are stuck in Gaza. Valkyrie taught us (like Schindler's List) that sacrificing oneself to the aid of the Jewish people is the most noblest and virtuous of deeds (even if it ends in failure). Edward Zwick's film Defiance teaches us that a gang of neurotic Jews will not relent in beating to death a random blonde haired German soldier if he were to cross their most chosen of paths.

Defiance follows the Bielski brothers, a group of Jewish partisans that helped save the lives of Jews and kill Germans (and their pesky collaborators). The reality of what the Bielski brothers did was simply survive and avoid fighting at all costs. Defiance director Edward Zwick wanted to add a little Zionist spirit by portraying the Bielski brothers as Nazi hunting Jews. The Bielski's also aided the Soviet partisans and are said to have participated in the Naliboki massacre. This massacre involved mass killing of the people in the Polish town Nalibok. Of course, "survivors" of the Bielski group firmly deny this. Defiance portrays the Bielski brothers as heroes for stealing and looting from the Slavic people of Belarus. In the film, members of the Soviet army even call the Bielski brothers "Jewish bandits." Well, I guess these Jewish bandits are doing their thieving for a good kosher cause. Daniel Craig stars in Defiance as Tuvia Bielski, the leader of the group. Daniel Craig is a gentile in real-life and his character has a certain Aryan sensibility about him that may be misleading to film going audiences. When Tuvia kills a man in Defiance, he does it with meaning. Whether it be the collaborators that killed his father or a mutinying kinsman, Tuvia kills in a profound manner. This is certainly not like the cowardly murdering nonsense carried about well equipped and U.S. backed Israelis in Gaza. The real Bielski Partisans Typically, all the gentiles in Defiance are portrayed as evil Jew killers and traitors of the Jews. The only man to truly help the Jewish people is lynched and has a sign attached to him that says "Jew Lover." Even the Soviet partisan leader friend of Zus Bielski stabs him in the back by retreating. Essentially, the one time friend of Zus has left the Bielski partisans like sheep for slaughter by inhuman Aryan butchers. Defiance does not try to hide its portrayal of gentiles as those that lack proper "human" morals. The partisans speak of this gentile animal behavior throughout the film. However, to be fair, there is a lot of fighting and bickering between the Jewish Bielski partisans. One of the Bielski brothers, Aron, does not have much of a role in Defiance. His character is simply a scared child who has been shocked by the incomprehensible horrors of gentile savagery. Aron's lack of "character" and stability in Defiance might be for a reason. The real-life Aron Bielski, now in his eighties, and going by the name Aron Bell, was recently arrested on grand theft of swindling a 93-year-old woman, a Catholic survivor of the Holocaust. One has to wonder how Aron went from a savior of the Jews to an elderly white collar criminal. Nonetheless, Aron Bielski is a Holocaust hero. Mugshot of Aron "Bell" Bielski. Defiance seemed to borrow a little material from the Soviet cinematic masterpiece Come and See (1985) directed by Elem Klimov. The film is set in Belraus and follows a young boy who joins a group of Soviet partisans and sees the horror of the Nazi SS and their allies. Come and See is one of those rare truly horrifying films that does not give in to petty sentimentalism as Defiance does. I won't go into similarities between the two films as it is tedious, but those that have seen both films will probably be disgusted by the "borrowing" Defiance director Edward Zwick has so freely taken advantage of. Come and See, although a Soviet propaganda film, is a film about human suffering and horrors. Defiance is a film about moral superiority and heroic fantasies. Defiance does not do much to separate it itself from films similar to it. It features a few exciting action sequences and people getting killed. Actors Daniel Craig and Lieke Martens (who play the two main Bielski brothers) are the only interesting acting performances. I also liked this little Jewish intellectual character who accidentally blows himself up during a heroic act. It was like a bad joke on Edward Zwick's Part.

TERRORAMA!
TERRORAMA!

Edwin Brienen (2001)

Undoubtedly, Dutch auteur filmmaker Edwin Brienen (Viva Europa!, Revision - Apocalypse II) has come a long way since the release of his first feature-length film Terrorama! (2001) – a sensory deranging digital diarrhea explosion of raunchy rape, unsentimental sacrilege, nasty nihilism, sick sex, and philosophical terrorism – because although the film won “Best film” at the Melbourne Underground Film Festival and earned actress Esther Eva Verkaaik “best leading actress” at the Toronto Independent Film Festival, the film also cemented the director’s reputation as an erratic enfant terrible; a title he still retains and seems to wallow in today. Unlike most filmmakers, Brienen – who studied philosophy and psychology (two forms of study that are probably infinitely more important for a serious filmmaker than actual film studies) before working as a radio host at the ripe of 22 years old, as well as an underground television actor/director, including collaborating on the shows Buch, Burgers & Buitenlui and Hoe Hoort het Eigenlijk? with Theo van Gogh (great-grandson son of art dealer Theo van Gogh, the brother of artist Vincent van Gogh) – went all the way with his first feature, showing that his childhood viewings of Andy Warhol and John Waters certainly paid-off in the long run in his development into a libertine artist. A rare filmmaker that is equally inspired by the work of Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Claude Chabrol, alongside aberrant auteur filmmakers like Alberto Cavallone (Man, Woman and Beast, Blue Movie) and revolutionary pornographers like Gerard Damiano (Deep Throat, Splendor in the Ass), Terrorama! certainly reveals its director’s eclectic influences, but it is also transcends its subversive but oftentimes outmoded cinematic predecessors, thereupon painting an innately scathing and unprepossessing portrait of postmodern Netherlands, as well as Europe as a whole. Centering around a sextet of sick, sexually perverted and seemingly psychopathic nihilists from the Netherlands who have the bright and bold idea of kidnapping a well-known TV host RAF-style in the shallow hope of eradicating what little is left of the Occident’s traditional social norms and morals, Terrorama!, as an aberrant arthouse piece, is ironically a work of aesthetic terrorism itself, not only in its obscene and ominous objective to visually and audibly offend, but also to ‘philosophically enlighten’ the viewer. In other words, Terrorama! – for better or for worse – makes the films of Pier Paolo Pasolini and Herbert Achternbusch seem overly sentimental and subdued by comparison.

Although often described as ‘the Dutch Fassbinder’, not least of all due to the prolific amount of films he has directed in such a short period of time, but unlike his kraut filmic hero, Edwin Brienen’s films, especially Terrorama!, rarely feature sympathetic or even remotely redeemable characters. While Fassbinder’s films generally feature characters that are trying to achieve some tangible, honest, or remotely respectable goal like maintaining their sanity or surviving a hapless love affair, Brienen's are carefully constructed characters who are horribly hopeless and determinedly desolate degenerates of the hate-mongering and sexually depraved kind whose activities inevitably and quite more honestly (in comparison to Fassbinder's) lead to some sort of self-annihilating transcendence, which is interesting when considering that Theo van Gogh – who was brutally assassinated by a Dutch-Moroccan Islamist due to his penetratingly provocative films and writings criticizing Islam – appears in Terrorama! reciting passages from the Koran while a curious couple bestially fucks in a car right behind him, hence why the scene was cut from the British release of film by the UK-based company Salvation Group after holding back the release for a number of years. Beginning with a performance of the sardonically titled song "Hitler Was A Speedfreak" by the swastika-draped band Johnny Cohen & The New Age Nazis – a sort of punk rock equivalent to Motörhead – Terrorama! establishes itself as a shamelessly and stoically subversive work right from the get go as the sort of sophisticated scat piece, not unlike the films of German auteur Christoph Schlingensiefel (The German Chainsaw-Massacre, United Trash), that would have more sensitive viewers walking out of the movie theater within mere minutes.

Just in time for the holiday season, I felt a daunting dose of the Christmas spirit when I discovered that Terrorama! features the Dutch equivalent of Santa Clause, Saint Nicholas (Sinterklaas), raping a bodacious babe doggy style as his Negro servant "Black Peter" (known as "Zwarte Piet" in the Netherlands) – played by a naked and pale honkey, aside from his blackface, nappy wig, and red lipstick – jovially jerks-off while in a state of absolute ecstasy in a significantly swinish scene of XXXmas joy. Needless to say, aside from being innately and unwaveringly politically incorrect, Terrorama! also features a variety of surreal pornographic imagery of the unsimulated sort. Personally, my favorite scene is where a slavish Jesus Christ, who drags a cross like a hobo carrying his raggedy bundle, is rejected by a handsome SS man that he hugs and embraces with pure love, thus inspiring him to subsequently masturbate and plant his spoiled seed into the grass. As for the film's loose, but discernible plot, which involves six activist-nihilist psychopaths kidnapping and torturing a popular TV personality Gerard van Dongen (Michel van Dousselaere), one must admit and accept that Terrorama! is a work where the sum of parts are less important than the individual segments themselves. As the character Edwin (naturally, played by Edwin Brienen himself) emphatically pontificates in a patently unpopular political manner during one of the film's various candid pseudo-documentarian interviews, the group's credo to political philosophy is that: "Idealism is to be thrown overboard, it only causes disappointment. Otherwise you could goddamn join the Maoists, the communists, the neo-marxists...the whole fucking lot...self-interest, that's what matters." Indeed, in their homo-sado-masochistic need to rape men in the throat, sexually and physically degrade melancholy women (Brienen's leading lady Eva Dorrepaal has one hell of a time), gay-bash and throat-stomp euro-wigger misogynists, shoot-up heroin in between shooting spunk into their female compatriots' junk, and engaging in all-around deranged hedonistic debauchery, the tainted terrorists of Terrorama! must have taken the philosophies of Anton LaVey much too seriously.

Consumed with equal doses of nihilism and narcissism that are generated by a deep-seated resentment and a will-to-perverse-power, the curiously cruel Cyprian terrorists of Terrorama! are most confident in their objective to rule over others as especially underscored by character Edwin's remark that, "People who are stupid or inferior and use violence, are not dangerous...They are harmless because you can eliminate them quickly. But as soon as violence meets intellect, society is warned!" In a sense, the film feels like a maniac manifesto for Nietzschean active-nihilism as one certainly gets the feeling that director Edwin Brienen – a student of philosophy and psychology himself – spent a lot of time dwelling on the intrinsically irrational ideas he depicts in Terrorama!, thus this mind-wrecking work certainly oftentimes feels like a therapeutic artistic execution of the filmmaker's more dangerous and impractical fantasies. I don't know about other people that have seen the film, but I doubt the characters featured in Terrorama! would fair well while incarcerated with Moroccan and Somalian philistines whose inborn Weltanschauung is to break, fuck, and kill. Ultimately, one never learns the actual outcome of the rebel rejects' criminal actions and the film concludes with one of the bat-shit beserk beauties stating the obvious with the closing remark: "nihilism is my middle name." Indeed, much like Brienen's subsequent works, Terrorama! is a striking and maniacal mélange of high and low art and a diabolically thoughtful work that argues for visceral action and self-indulgence over soulless novelty intellectualism of the Utopian humanistic sort, thereupon bringing more meaning than just plain superficial sensationalism to the fact that the terrorists adorn their humble hideout with a National Socialist swastika and Schutzstaffel flags. Although by no means racial chauvinists nor even racially conscious, these characters do reject – much like the National Socialists that preceded them – slave morality-driven liberalism and naïve calls for peace and progress and instead delight in Dionysian derangements of the mind and body. That being said, maybe it is high time that the whole of the Occidental peoples heed these thoughtful words from Terrorama!: "Lick and smell the vaginal juices that smell of death."

BERLIN NIGHTS: THE GRAND DELUSIONS

Edwin Bienen (2003)

Originally entitled and better known in Europa as Lebenspornografie (2003) aka Life Pornography, Dutch enfant terrible auteur Edwin Bienen (Last Performance, Revision - Apocalypse II) recently retitled the work Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions for its first time American release, thereupon sparking my interest in re-watching the film after my initial viewing of the subversive cinematic effort about a year ago. Undoubtedly, one of the most interesting and prolific, if not oftentimes derivative, auteur filmmakers working today in both the Netherlands and the European continent as a whole, Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions makes for one of his most ambitious, audacious, and arresting early cinematic efforts. While the original title of the film is certainly more provocative and seductive, if not partially misleading, Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions makes for a more straightforward and quite literal description. The film follows a troupe of decidedly demoralized Amsterdam-based actors/artists as they move to Berlin, Germany to star in an erotic show and simultaneously attempt to reboot their fading careers and find love in a forsaken quest of a fool's paradise. The second feature-length work following Terrorama! (2001) directed by Edwin Bienen – dubbed “the Dutch Fassinder” due to his direction of 14 feature films in a mere decade, as well his intrinsic and imperative influence by the German New Wave König – Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions, like the director's previous work, is almost nauseatingly nihilistic and unpleasantly pornographic; featuring patent aesthetic and thematic extremes that the audacious auteur cracks up to making sure he would not bore the audience. If the Last Performance (2006) was Bienen's cinematic equivalent to Fassbinder's In a Year of Thirteen Moons (1978), Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions is the Dutch auteur filmmaker's version of his film hero's semi-autobiographical flick Beware of a Holy Whore (1971) a work that similarly follows a bunch of perverted actors as they plummet into their particular personal purgatory while the degeneration of their art parallels this daunting deluge into oblivion. If it says anything, Edwin Bienen claims, like all of his films, he has yet to watch Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions since its initial release, which one can only speculate that his cinematic works are artistic rituals of sorts where the damned director exorcises his demons in uncommonly delightful yet demoniacal celluloid form.

Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions most specifically centers around emotionally ravaged Romy (named after German actress Romy Schneider; one of Bienen's favorite actresses) played by Eva Dorrepaal (Bienen's equivalent to Fassbinder's Dietrich-like diva “Ingrid Caven”), a down-and-out actress who would be happy to get a role in a Tampax commercial. Beginning with the confrontational and decidedly butch character Claire (played by Esther Eva Verkaaik) opening the film, denigrating the audience for two minutes or so with her vehement and venomous verbal spew and with repellant images of sardonic scatology and putrid pornography, including an appearance from French "GG Allin" and noted noise musician Jean-Louis Coştes who also contributed to the soundtrack (with the majority of the striking synth-driven score being composed by Le Syndicat Eleçtronique) for Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions and is probably best known in the film world for his infamous head-crushing appearance in Gaspar Noé's Irréversible (2002), one knows what they are in store for before the title "Lebenspornografie" even appears. Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions also features a scrawny and sentimental leather-fag named Jim (played by Onno Meijer who has since died of a heart attack); a heartbroken homo who cannot get over the fact that he broke up with the love of his life because he was HIV positive. Undoubtedly, the most deplorable character is Berlin night club owner Thorwald (Peter Post) and his wanton wife; a hideous husband and wife duo whose dual propensity to annoy the audience is next to none. The Virgin Mary (played by celebrated "Dutch diva" Marjol Flore) also makes an appearance, but she is no match for the film's lost souls, who are so consumed with strife, self-loathing, and hedonistic self-destruction and who are always naughty and never nice. Needless to say, Edwin Brienen was not lying when he once stated that he was trying to positively provoke the audience with his first films, as Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions is essentially a work of anarchic aesthetic terrorism disguised as a loony libertine melodrama, not that hysterical and haunting histrionics doesn't help to guide this coarsely carnal cinematic work. During the beginning of the film, cunt Claire states, "Art is a statement. It's important that art provokes. And that's necessary," which is a sentiment with which I basically agree, but if a film's sole objective is to provoke, it is not much more provocative than a crackhead screaming at the top of his lungs while exposing his shriveled, crab-ridden genitals on a busy freeway. Luckily, Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions is not just notable for its distinct debasing essence, as Brienen is even able to making fisting and sexual violence an aesthetically pleasing experience.

Featuring a cameo that was originally intended for In a Year of Thirteen Moons star Volker Spengler from fellow Fassbinder alumnus Peter Kern as a cocaine-dealing humungous homo named Valencia who claims to have sliced his mother from her "neck to cunt" and has a dick-less tranny boyfriend named Schulz who had his cock cut-off because he kept getting sick from shoving his knob up other men's anuses, as well as a gay-bashing sodomite neo-nazi (Andreas Scharfenberg) who gets off to beating the shit out of fellow gays, Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions is surely a work that is not for the faint of heart nor the prissy and politically correct. In fact, I would not recommend the film to anyone who is not looking to have their night ruined, as Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions is, at best, less than a merry mix of misery and misanthropy, but a suavely stylish piece of melancholy and moroseness nonetheless. As Dutch director Edwin Bienen explained in the audio commentary for the American release of Berlin Nights: The Grand Delusions – like the characters in the film (Bienen himself actually plays a cocaine-snorting fellow named Loete) – was facing a spat of bitter romance that also inspired him to move to Berlin in real-life, thus the grating debauchery depicted in the film, as I suspected, was grounded in sordid and smiting truths. Due to a scene where a character states, to paraphrase, “Jews create their own Adolf Hitler,” Bienen faced unfounded criticism from a certain Dutch Jewish watchdog group. Indeed, Hebraic hypersensitivity aside, Edwin Bienen is one of the few truly groundbreaking and authentically controversial filmmakers working in Europe today, which says a lot for a continent that has no problem depicted unsimulated sex in movies. Aside from uninhibited and unhinged imagery, Bienen brings up ideas and themes that are rarely examined in modern cinema as a whole; whether it be the terror of gay nazis or the sadomasochism of sick sodomites, Bienen knows no limits, thereupon putting him in good company with his ill-fated hero Fassbinder.

WHY ULLI WANTED TO KILL HIMSELF ON CHRISTMAS EVE

Edwin Bienen (2005)

From my personal experience as the proud grandson of a Flying Dutchman, the Dutch reign supreme when it comes to hyper negativity, cynicism, airs of superiority, and pathological Teutophobia. In other words, the Dutch people (aka 'lazy Germans') are proud assholes who derive a deluded sense of superiority from the fact that they are pathologically 'liberal' (i.e. decadent and lazy) and adamantly support degenerate and ethno-masochistic social causes. Indeed, Dutch auteur filmmaker Edwin Bienen (Terrorama, Revision - Apocalypse II) is certainly a dude who makes nihilistic and oftentimes nasty films, but what makes him different from the average Cheese-Eater is that he seems to have a rather nice relationship with the perennial enemy nation of Germany (aka the land of the boorish "Moffen")—the Germanic brother country that occupied the Netherlands during the Second World War and stole all its cheese while the natives starved and froze to death—and has made a number culturally pessimistic Nietzschean melodramas there. Indeed, being described as the "Dutch Fassbinder" might be akin to being described as the "Dutch Hitler" for some Dutch people, but Bienen seems to wear the distinguished Teutonic title with pride. Recently, I was quite happy to receive a Christmas present from Bienen and his Berlin-based production company Ultra Vista in the form of the Dutch filmmaker's (anti)Christmas cult movie Warum Ulli sich am Weihnachtsabend umbringen wollte (2005) aka Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve, which was recently fittingly re-released for the Holiday season. Sort of the Xmas film that Fassbinder never made, albeit more brazenly naughty and nihilistic, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve is certainly the 'Satan's Brew of Christmas movies.' Made following the shooting of Bienen's In a Year with 13 Moons-esque film Last Performance (2006), Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve was not only inspired by Fassbinder's maniac melodramas but also by the Bavarian auteur filmmaker's singularly prolific work ethic. Spurred by a whimsical idea Bienen had to complete an entire film (including shooting, editing, post-production, etc.) in a mere three to four weeks, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve was shot in less than two weeks and was already in Germany theaters two months after pre-production began. The only real Christmas movie that I watched on this past Christmas day, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve certainly got me in the "Bah! Humbug!" spirit as a tastelessly and even terrifyingly tragicomic work about a pathetic loser who wants more than anything just for a single person to spend Christmas with him, but lacks the personality and social clique to attract even the most repugnant of Americanized Aryan degenerates, including his bitchy bull-dyke sister and obnoxiously extroverted transvestite father. Featuring clips from Frank Capra's It's a Wonderful Life (1946) dubbed in German and elderly folks drinking themselves to death as they suffer yet another miserable and melancholy Yuletide, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve is probably the only Xmas film ever made that has the potential to both drive people towards and steer people away from the perennial gift of suicide.

Ulli (Marin Caktas) is an unremarkable fellow with a dead-end job as an exceedingly emasculated office slave who is rather determined to find someone special to spend Christmas with, but the problem is that he has about as much swag as an elderly old man's wrinkled scrotum, not to mention the fact that he still worships his long gone ex-girlfriend Nicki (Eva Dorrepaal). In fact, despite being well into his mid-30s, Ulli has only had one girlfriend in his entire sad life and his dubious relationship with Nicki only lasted a mere 6 months, thus he has about as much experience with women as the average high school boy. Rather autistically, Ulli makes his first pathetic attempt at wooing a woman to spend Christmas with him by approaching his cute next door neighbor, who he does not actually know, with a would-be-thoughtful Xmas gift. Naturally, the girl blows him off like he is a creepy salesman and rejects his retarded gift, which is a vintage copy of J. D. Salinger's absurdly overrated teen angst novel The Catcher in the Rye (1951). After his failed attempt at seducing his neighbor, Ulli goes to hang out with his British best friend Elton (Tomas Spencer). Rather annoyed by his feeble friend's moody and broody bitch boy behavior, Elton verbally berates Ulli into oblivion, ultimately insulting him for his love of the rather repellant romantic-comedy Bridget Jones's Diary (2001) and eventually tells him to "fuck off outta here." Despite kicking him out of his apartment, Elton later makes up with Ulli and the two bros-without-hoes naively attempt to buy hard drugs from a degenerate swarthy drug dealer named Heino (René Ifrah), who has a rather bizarre fetish for so-called 'Latin music' and big booty bitches like Shakira. Of course, when Heino's slutty and slightly unhinged girlfriend physically dominates and attempts to molest Ulli, the two friends unfortunately leave drug-free.

Desperate for both love and affection, Ulli makes the moronic mistake of visiting his bull-dyke beastess sister Bettina (Nicole Ohliger) and her dude-like Dutch dyke girlfriend Karin (Esther Eva Verkaaik). Sister Bettina immediately attempts to throw Ulli out, but Karin makes him stay as she seems strangely turned-on by his company. After going on a painfully plodding and pretentious spiel about the purported homoeroticism of Leonardo da Vinci's The Last Supper, Karin begins to get horny and starts feeling up the sexless office worker, which rather irks Bettina and results in a brutal battle between the two bull-dykes that concludes in rough lesbo sex. After getting in the Christmas spirit by eating an archaic-looking aluminum-bound TV dinner, Ulli goes to visit his man-mommy Evelyn (Ades Zabel) and her decidedly despicable Euro-wigger boyfriend Olaf (Niels Bormann). After Olaf—a fellow who is in a relationship with a less than homely transman—accuses Ulli of being a cocksucker, Evelyn reveals to her son that she has a tumor and will die of cancer in the next couple months, thus further compounding the offbeat office worker's undying depression and disillusionment with the holiday season. Feeling more desperate than ever, Ulli decides to take a strange stranger named Cat (Malah Helman) hostage with a toy prop gun, which initially proves to be successful but the hapless hopeless romantic ultimately gets more than he bargained for. Indeed, Cat is a cute but somewhat creepy gal who attempts to get Ulli to strangle her as the two awkwardly make misbegotten love in a bathtub, but the sensitive gentleman naturally refuses to do so, so the little lady leaves her kidnapper with the unflattering remark, "I really feel sorry for you" as if he is the most pathetic pussy in the world. After going to a church sermon and receiving no solace after asking the stoic reverend why not a single one of the seven billion or so people that inhabit the earth is willing to spend Christmas with him, Ulli contemplates suicide but naturally pussies out. In the end, Ulli spends Christmas in a retirement home inhabited by mostly senile and somber elderly folks and gets drunk with a resentful old fart that has no interest in speaking with him. Indeed, it is not a wonderful life after all, at least for postmodern untermensch Ulli.

Undoubtedly, in its malignant anti-merry melancholy, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve might have been better titled Why Didn't Ulli Kill Himself on Christmas Eve? as the patently pathetic protagonist's self-slaughter would have given him the gift-that-keeps-on-giving; eternal peace. In terms of pathetic male protagonists, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve ultimately puts the accursed cuckolds of Fassbinder's Why Does Herr R. Run Amok? (1970), The Merchant of Four Seasons (1972), and The Stationmaster's Wife (1977) to abject shame. Of course, protagonist Ulli was not the only deplorable character featured in the film, as Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve does not feature a single likeable nor redeemable character. Indeed, featuring loony lesbian erotomaniacs, bastard 'best friends,' swarthy Shakira-saluting dope dealers, pompous charlatan preachers, erratic elderly old farts, sadistic Sapphic sisters, masochistic kidnap victims, and Euro-Trash wiggers, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve is certainly an insanely iconoclastic anti-It's a Wonderful Life of sorts where everyone is naughty and no one plays nice. A sleazily sardonic piece of celluloid coal in your much cherished vintage Christmas stocking, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve is the perfect cinematic Xmas feast for both anti-Santa-ists and subversive cinemaphiles alike. Indeed, I doubt auteur Edwin Brien got any presents in his shoes from Sinterklaas this year after deciding to re-release Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve; arguably the most antagonistic yet hilarious anti-Christ-Mass ever made. A Christmas flick for those individuals who prefer Krampus over Santa Claus, Why Ulli Wanted to Kill Himself on Christmas Eve reminds the viewer that for every person that loves the holiday season, there are two or three other people who have hit rock bottom and cannot wait for the new year to begin and for the Christmas tree to be thrown in the dumpster.

EDWIN BRIENEN'S HYSTERIA
EDWIN BRIENEN'S HYSTERIA

Edwin Brien (2006)

Taking a drastically different approach to his 5th feature-length film Edwin Brien's Hysteria (2006) – the first film in the director's "Apocalypse Trilogy" (the second being Revision - Apocalypse II and the third remains to be seen, although some believe that his most recent work Exploitation is the final chapter) – a soundly singular and striking silent film directed by Dutch auteur Edwin Brien that does not feature a single shot of full-color footage, but a variety of one-colored tinted scenes, the most prominent of which being blue for a rather interesting reason. In part inspired by the infamous Italian flick Blue Movie (1978) directed by absurdist auteur Alberto Cavallone (Maldoror, Blow Job), Hysteria – like the artfully sleazy scatological wop shocker it pays tribute to – follows a lonely woman in a horrified and ambiguously delusional lady named Lara (Brien's always nude regular Eva Dorrepaal) – the sort of unstable woman that a depraved psychoanalyst would love to get their hands on – in a state of hysterics who has taken sanctuary in the worst possible residency imaginable after a forced encounter with an unwanted date with a ravenous and rampaging rapist. Quite conceivably the world's most unlucky girl in the world, not unlike the deranged anti-heroess of Abel Ferrara's Ms. 45 (1981), Lara soon realizes the gorgeous Gothic castle that she decided to shelter in is full of coxcomb lunatics, quirky sadomasochists, aberrant aristocrats, and – the worst of all, at least for already severely sexually abused and misused Lara – rapists. More meticulously stylized and 'anti-erotically' extreme than even the uncut version of Cavallone's erratic exercise in naughty and mostly nonsensical nihilism, Blue Movie – a virtual arthouse flick for serial killers and coprophilia junkies – Hysteria is more than a tribute to an obscure sub-cult classic, as the film also pays equal tribute to the silent era, most specifically German expressionism, as if Satanic German National Socialist Renaissance man Hanns Heinz Ewers (writer of such horror classics filmed for the silverscreen as The Student of Prague and Alraune) and Deathrock pioneer Rozz Williams (co-writer/co-director of the S/M serial killer short Pig (1999)) came back from hell and collaborated on an unclassifiable low-budget horror utilizing both archaic and state-of-the-art filmmaking techniques. Indeed, Edwin Brien's Hysteria is probably the only film ever made that features violent leather-fag fisting (an oddly memorable scene for my girlfriend who later dreamed of shadow people fist-fucking each other in dark corridors of the most unholy and hole-y of dimensions) and a scene of German expressionist opera performed by a Gothic transvestite dyke in a Victorian suit all in one film.

Literally a "Blue Movie," especially in regard to the various phantasmagorical rape scenes performed by a positively perverse perpetrator that wears what seems to be a Ronald Regan mask, Brien's Hysteria manages to pay tribute to Cavallone's improvised masterpiece of the atmospherically aberrant in a relatively subtle and discreet way, so much that despite being a huge fan of the Italian film, I did not initially recognize the influence in the defiant Dutchman's film. Also featuring classical music by Johann Sebastian Bach – a favorite of the scat-sanctifying anti-hero of Blue Movie – Hysteria utilizes the same music but under more fitting circumstances, mainly during scenes of the debauched blueblood degenerates partaking in morbidly amusing games of the rich and flagitious, including reanimating dead friends in coffins, encouraging one said dead friend to beat a naked girl with a mallet like the impotent cadaver-like grandfather from The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), and forcing the same untimely guest to eat shit out of a dog bowl while absurdly wearing a plastic bag over her head. Hysteria also features an eclectic but consistently haunting score composed by Hanno Hinkelbein (Null Records/Aeox) and IO that features everything from industrial noise compositions to ambient neo-classical tracks, so there is no mistake that the film is a modern flick that is not merely a pomo puff piece like the sort you would expect from tired old guys like Guy Maddin and Brothers Quay as Edwin Brienens realizes he lives in the present and not some glorified and intangible past. Wallowing in wantonness, but of the determinedly anti-erotic and scatological sadistic sort, Hysteria will be a grueling challenge for the majority of modern philistine horror whores because instead of offering cheap titillation and thoughtless terrorization, Brienens makes the viewer pay for experience by testing the strength of their psyche and capacity to endure somewhat impenetrable art unlike with the latest Eli Roth and Rob Zombie flick – fanboy masturbation pieces that fail to even achieve a potent burst of postmodern ejaculation – thus I think it is safe to say that it is one of the Dutch auteur filmmaker's most ambitious efforts.

Dedicated to Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh (1-900, Submission) – with whom Edwin Brienens collaborated on various TV series before becoming a filmmaker in his own right, and who was brutally assassinated by an Islamist terrorist (although one might draw a different conclusion after watching van Gogh's final conspiracy-themed work 06/05 aka May 6th) – Hysteria has, to some people's confusion, been described by the director himself as a "political horror" work that covers such topics as mind manipulation and false reality. Indeed, upon superficial glance, one would be at a loss to find anything remotely "political" about Hysteria, but Brienens executes these themes in a most unpreachy (and literally unspoken) manner that is disseminated through striking symbolism and avant-garde action in an expressionistic horror setting. Citing the Austrian tragicomic thriller Die Totale Therapie (1996) aka Total Therapy directed by Christian Frosch – a film that shows how a bunch of mentally and emotionally feeble individuals fair (i.e. they go insane and kill one another) after their brainwashing savior therapist is murdered – as one of his top ten favorite films, it seems Brienens employed a similar technique, albeit to a more cryptic degree, of utilizing the power of psychological terror and influence as a tool for control; be it by a political party, mainstream media, or the leader of an acropolis full of degenerates as is the case in Hysteria. The fact that the (various) phantom rapist(s) in the film wear a variety of masks, including (political) pig, Arab towelhead, and American president illustrate the sort of illusive boogeymen that one sees every day just by turning on their television. All realpolitik propaganda aside, the greatest strength of Hysteria is the magnificent collection of art-exploitation imagery contained within the film, especially for a work that was produced using the innately distasteful and aesthetically sterile format of digital video, as many scenes resemble moving paintings as if directed by German New Wave dandy Werner Schroeter had he had a special proclivity for German expressionism and old school slasher and gorno flicks instead of androgynous women and Mediterranean men. Indeed, the dapper lesbo operetta, especially reminded me of a scene from Schroeter's Eika Katappa (1969) and Der Tod der Maria Malibran (1972), but seeing as Brien is "the Dutch Fassbinder" and both Neuer Deutscher Film auteur filmmakers (Schroeter and Fassbinder) were friends/collaborators, this is no surprise. That being said, the only thing that is a surprise is that both a film like Hysteria and a director like Edwin Brien exist contemporarily as I surely cannot think of another filmmaker that pushes both arthouse melodrama and pornographic S&M splatter films to such a degree that fecal-flinging fist-fucking begins to seem like an expression of high-camp charm.

Edwin Brien (2006)

Edwin Brien's Last Performance (2006) is quite possibly the first consciously LaVeyan melodrama ever to be made. Auteur Edwin Brien has been described as the 'Dutch Fassbinder', but such a label is merely generous for a filmmaker who – although produces seemingly 'original' films at an unseen speed – lacks the overall artistic talent and integrity of the much greater and more eclectic German filmmaker. Instead, I would describe Brien's work as a mix between that of his fellow countrymen Tom Six, Christoph Maria Schlingensief (minus the humor), and Fassbinder-kitsch. Although Brien does not deserve to lick Fassbinder's thoroughly decayed, gaping asshole, his films do provide the viewer with a window into the passive nihilism and cultural bankruptcy of hyper-hedonistic, postmodern Europa through a cheap and broken multicultural window. Brien's work Last Performance is somewhat different from most of his previous works in that it was filmed in the English language and that it takes place in the typically debauched New York, New York theater world. Borrowing somewhat ineptly from the philosophies of Arthur Schopenhauer, Friedrich Nietzsche, and Church of Satan founder Anton LaVey, Last Performance is an excessively pessimistic yet superficial work that barely scratches the surfaces of the relatively deep barrel of ideas from which it borrows from. What makes Last Performance somewhat interesting is that these philosophies are contained within a megalomaniac microcosm inspired by the real narcissistic (and sometimes tragic) lives of famous NYC-based but mostly unrelated artists like Andy Warhol, Klaus Nomi, Yoko Ono, Lydia Lunch, and various others.

Last Performance opens with the haunting opera track "Dido und Aeneas: Dido's Lament" as performed by otherworldly countertenor Klaus Nomi. Considering that out-of-this-world-alien-Aryan Nomi died nearly a quarter of a century before the production of Last Performance, a pudgy imposter unfortunately takes his place and sports the iconic wardrobe and lip-syncs the somewhat prophetic song of the late New Wave German opera singer. Admittedly, the opening song and scene sets the tone for what will follow in the film: decadent and depressing scenarios mixed with recycled ideas and art. In the film, a self-loathing alpha-homo named Tom starts a clearly dubious sexual relationship with an aspiring European Starlet named Julia, thus throwing his overly effeminate butt-buddy Cooper into an erratic crying game of the most self-torturing kind. Due to its barely controversial themes and NYC setting, Last Performance is strangely reminiscent of William Friedkin's much tamer film The Boys in the Band (1970); a somewhat revolutionary work that boldly (for that era) yet fairly measures the pros and cons of cosmopolitan gay-dom in everyone's favorite metropolitan city. The cover of the Last Performance dvd should feature the tagline, "to bugger or not to bugger", as such words quite aptly summarizes the overall feel and postmodern spiel (s) contained within the film. In a sense, the film reminded me of some of the more banal existential eroticism writings written by the thoroughly bored and imprisoned Marquis de Sade had he been more passive and lived in contemporary times, as only an exceedingly privileged individual could find such complaints and needless and manufactured drama as the characters of Last Performance. The only character that counterbalances the white pseudo-aristocracy of boredom in the film is an anti-social Negro in exaggeratedly effeminate neo-pimp garb who enjoys the pioneering “unemotional” (as he describes it) Teutonic-electronics of Kraftwerk and the beautiful words of German genius Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Indeed, Last Performance is essentially a melodramatic sideshow of pointless decadence where pleasure can only be found in the realm of sexual humiliation and self-degradation. After all, how many other films feature a Queenish queer dressing up in drag in a vain and pathetic attempt to lure back his cheating dilettante-heterosexual boyfriend. That being said, the greatest achievement of Last Performance is most likely its proclivity towards embarrassing viewers with its exceedingly shameless and emotionally-ravaging characters.

When it comes to the overall mise-en-scène, set-design, shot composition, and music, Last Performance is surprisingly a distinct and mostly pleasurable experience for the eyes and ears. Had the acting performances, writing, and dialogue matched the integrity of the audio/visual aesthetics featured in the film, Last Performance could have been a minor masterpiece of sorts. Instead, Last Performance is a marginally exciting adventure through a mostly adventure-less and soulless world of miserable self-worship and contrived carnality. To its credit, Last Performance concludes with a quasi-Satanic ritualistic play of sorts, hence the title of the film, but that does not save the film from being an often sterile and mostly impotent journey through the limp-wristed left-hand path of the NYC theater dramarama netherworld. If Last Performance left any notable impression on me, it is that Edwin Brienen, being a young and highly productive filmmaker, is a ‘work-in-progress’ who quite possibly has the embryonic makings to be a great filmmaker in upcoming years. The greatest tragedy of Last Performance is not the one featured in its storyline, but that a film that had the potential to be somewhat great only ended up being somewhat engrossing and less than thought provoking. With the glaring lack of genuine auteur filmmakers in the 21st century, one can only hope that Edwin Brienen will develop into a director that is worthy of being mentioned in the same sentence as the truly great arthouse auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Of course, after seeing a pretentious and pseudo-provocative photograph of would-be bad boy Brienen receiving a (probably bogus) blowjob while wearing (like fellow hack Hollander Tom Six) a cowboy hat on the front-page of his personal website, I do have some serious and legitimate doubts about the barely flying Dutchman’s future artistic potential and integrity as a serious martial auteur to be reckoned with.

REVISION - APOCALYPSE II

Edwin Brienen (2009)

The second chapter in his “Apocalypse Trilogy” (the first being Edwin Brienen’s Hysteria (2006)), delightfully dastardly Dutch auteur Edwin Brienen’s (Terrorama, Viva Europa!) nihilistic melodrama/horror flick Revision - Apocalypse II (2009) is a work that – given its seemingly Satanic philosophy (in the past, Brienen has displayed an interest in atheistic LaVeyean/Nietzschean thought) and perturbing prophetic albeit ambiguous ‘message’ – begins quite sardonically with a quote from Revelation 22:13 that reads: “I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end.” Inspired by a startling dream he had of a giant Jesus icon on a mountain top shooting lasers out of his eyes like in some Japanese monster movie that turned people into mindless lemmings, his obsession with post-911 conspiracy theories, fear-mongering in the mainstream media, and sleazy grind-core flicks, Brienen eventually came up with the idea for a quasi-futuristic, yet conspicuously modern film where a melancholy ex-model named Traci (played by Brienen superstar Eva Dorrepaal of Lebenspornografie and Last Performance infamy) – a disillusioned lapsed Christian who has reluctantly embraced nihilism – decides to surrender herself to the ‘ultimate act of evil’ at her deranged hubby’s advice so as to fill her tormented spiritual void. Never alone wherever she may be, the model is haunted by beefy, beer-belly-flaunting and (unintentionally) hilarious inner-demon named Vince DeStructo (played by German-born rapper Jacob Dove Basker) who breaks out into thrashy screamo/punk songs (taken from the Dutch group The House of DeStructo’s second album “Everything Must be Destroyed”) and who acts as a sort of Jungian ‘shadow’; the dark, unconscious, instinctive, and irrational hidden self. Relatively equal parts dystopian postmodern nightmare, menacing melodrama, nihilistic and atmospheric The Last House on Dead End Street (1977) inspired exploitation flick, and misanthropic musical, Revision - Apocalypse II is Edwin Brienen at his best as an aesthetically and thematically eclectic cinematic work that is nothing short of singular and unclassifiable.

Patently pessimistic Traci is one decidedly dispirited lady, but she is not so deluded as to delight in her despair like a masochist, thus she is willing to go to a number of extremes to shed or at least lessen her wicked woes. Miss misanthropic sees so little hope for the world, that she states while confiding in a friend, “Back then there was Hitler, nowadays it’s even worse. We have the New World Order...It’s all about control...I sometimes wonder what these monsters want now. They already control the earth. Now they want complete control of the collective mind. That what is called god.” Indeed, with terrorists everywhere as sort of pomo movie stars and forced chip implantation used on law abiding citizens, Traci knows better than anyone else that fear truly eats the soul, so to strike back at god and country, and to have a little taste of power for herself, she decides that murdering and mutilating people will make for a great change of pace. Unfortunately for her, torture and terror do not seem to be Traci's cup of tea, at least when it comes to acting as a sort of personal therapy, thereupon leading her to lose the little bit of semblance of sanity and self-control that she had left. For Traci, friends and fuck-buddies come and go, but her inner-demon – the heavy and hysterical hirsute fellow that heatedly howls while not far from her side – is forever. Featuring an extended cameo/music performance from The Horrorist (aka Oliver Chesler; probably best known in the film world for being the idealistic young punk from the Depeche Mode documentary 101 (1989) co-directed D.A. Pennebaker), on top of the various raging, ridiculous, and oftentimes retarded lip-synched inner-demon Vince DeStructo, Revision - Apocalypse II is a strikingly schizophrenic salmagundi of sight and sound that – whether a conscious decision on director Brienens part or not – underscores, to the extent of sardonic parody, the soulless, multimedia pseudo-existence modern life in American and Western Europe has degenerated into with Traci – a beautiful yet childless woman who is well past her prime and has nothing of intrinsic value in her life – acting as an archetype for modern female discontent and dejection.

Coming from The Netherlands – one of the most degenerate liberal democracies in the world – Brienens films are superlatively symbiotic of Occidental decline. The main difference between him and other filmmakers is that he recognizes it and to some extent even embraces it, if not in a totally unsentimental and nihilistic sort of manner that is bound to repel more sensitive viewers. Of course, Revision - Apocalypse II is not without flaws, most specifically in regard to the rather superficial dealing with conspiracy theories and themes of technocratic authoritarianism, but then again one does not watch an Edwin Brienens for a lesson in New World Order Terrorism 101. Indeed, one watches a film by “the Dutch Fassbinder” so they can experience a bit of aesthetically cinematic terrorism of the infectiously titillating and delightfully degrading form. With that in mind, I think it is safe to say that, like South African auteur Aryan Kaganof, Brienens is one of the few truly uncompromising filmmaker working today during a time where the 'auteur filmmaker' – the last true dictators - are virtually nonexistent. Additionally, like his hero Fassbinder, Brienens is not just interested in pleasing pretentious arthouse crowds, but also making his work more 'accessible' to wider audiences; however, this is not done to the detriment of his artistic vision as there is not a single work directed by the iconoclastic Dutchman that leaves the viewer with the sense of 'closure' that the typical Hollywood and even so-called 'independent' films do. Although Revision - Apocalypse II is not the sort of film that would appeal to a Quentin Tarantino or Christopher Nolan fanboy, it is certainly the rare brand of idiosyncratic cinema that would appeal to the more discerning arthouse and horror fans alike, which one cannot say about most films. That being said, with 'art cinema' dying as a whole in the Occident, at least we have films like Revision - Apocalypse II where it will perish in flames rather than with an unnoticed whimper. In other words, Viva La Apocalypse!!!

REVISION - APOCALYPSE II

NAVEL AND A-BOMB

Eikoh Hosoe (1960)

As someone who likes to indulge in the literary works of Japanese novelist Yukio Mishima, I was somewhat disappointed by Paul Schrader's bio-pic Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985). Although the film is a piece of cinematic art in its own right, I feel that it fails to capture the true essence of Yukio Mishima. When it comes to the authentic Mishima in visual form, I believe that Japanese photographer Eikoh Hosoe did the best job portraying the tragic master of pen and sword with his relatively small set of photographs featured in his book Ba-ra-kei: Ordeal by Roses (1961–1962). Although many people believe that Mishima was a perverted megalomaniac, the candid carnal snapshots featured in the book Ba-ra-kei: Ordeal by Rose reveal that he was quite the multifaceted character who could be humorous and humble while still maintaining his militant and melodramatic persona. Before his legendary photo shoot with Mishima, Eikoh Hosoe directed the atomic 1960 Japanese arthouse short film Navel and A-Bomb (Heso to genbaku); a work that manages to meld eccentric homoeroticism and nuclear doom and gloom in a distinctly exquisite manner. Hosoe was given the first name "Toshihio" at birth but later changed it to "Eikoh" to symbolize the new post-samurai Japan that he was living in. Had I never had the blessed opportunity to devour Hosoe's delightfully deranged and thoroughly decadent artistic works, I would think his name change was purely the act of a pretentious Jap art fag on the rag. At the very least, Navel and A-Bomb is a stark yet erotic expression of an artist whose internal suffering is only matched by the atomic explosion featured in the film. Unlike Yukio Mishima, Hosoe was able to accept that Japan would no longer be the land of Samurais but, instead, an economic and technological powerhouse with a western capitalist taint that can never be undone. That being said, I think it is only fitting that Hosoe captured the most iconic photographs of Yukio Mishima; the last famous Japanese figure to commit Seppuku.

For many viewers, Navel and A-Bomb will be a brief yet undesirable exercise in cinematic torture (a metaphorical "ordeal by roses", if you will), but, for the already initiated, the film acts as a therapeutic mini-vacation through the ashy beaches of the Land of the Rising Sun. Indeed, Navel and A-Bomb features plenty of bare belly buttons of all ages and sizes and an exploding atomic bomb, but they are used in a symbolic nature that reflects the zeitgeist of post-World War II Japan. Upon turning an invisible knob over a dejected younger's x-marked navel, an atomic bomb explodes in a blazing blind fury that brings near darkness to the relatively tiny island country. While the grown men featured in Navel and A-Bomb move around absurdly with a combination of playful pantomimes and seemingly possessed hysterics, the young boys remain fairly immobile; barely even able to crawl and stand on the beach that their elders seem quite comfortable with. Like European children of the same era, these post-WWII Japanese youths are lost in their homeland and remain detached from their own ancient culture. One only has to watch modern Japanese cinema to realize that there is a serious spiritual and psychological crisis that is weighing down on the westernized citizens of Japan and the country's economical prosperity is merely a poor and wholly materialistic substitute that can never fill the irreparable void of organic kultur. Navel and A-Bomb also features one of the most excruciating performances from a live (or barely alive) chicken that it makes the furious dancing fowl scene at the conclusion of Werner Herzog's Stroszek (1977) seem like a concert encore from Rock-a-Doodle. When it comes to Japanese cinema, I wouldn't exactly call myself a diehard fanatic, thus, for me, Navel and A-Bomb is nothing short of a hidden cinematic gem.

THE HOLY LAND

Eitan Gorlin (2001)

Despite the fact that Hollywood is almost exclusively owned and run by Hebrews, especially of the “Israel First” Zionist persuasion, one rarely sees any films depicting the true face of the Jewish Holy Land and the trouble the nation faces in a 24/7 war zone where one hates thy neighbor, so I was rather intrigued when I discovered an independent Israeli film about a young and virginal orthodox rabbinical student who breaks off his pathological study of the Torah and Talmud and parties with Russian prostitutes, Jewish-American bar owners, and terrorists of the Judaic and Palestinian sort. Directed by controversial (especially to kosher folks) Jewish American auteur Eitan Gorlin, an American Orthodox Jew who was educated at a Zionist Yeshiva school in Israel, The Holy Land (2001) is the sort of rare film – be it from Hollywood or otherwise – that takes some low blows at the circumcised cock of little Israel in its candid portrayal of wack-job Jewish American terrorists who blow up buses full of Palestinian women and children, Jew-on-Jew hatred between religious and atheistic Israelites, rampant Islam hating, the fascist terrorism of the Israel Defense Forces (IDF), the proliferation of Yankee Yid ‘settlers’ of the AK-47 stroking sort, Arab traitors who have sold their souls to genocidal enemies, and the literal sex slavery of Eastern European Slavic women by slave-trading Semites of the psychopathic pornographer persuasion. Despite its rather incriminating and incendiary depiction of Israel, The Holy Land is in the fairly palatable form of a semi-formulaic coming-of-age tale that features a synthesized mix of melodrama, comedy, sub-eroticism, a tinge of thriller, and sociopolitical commentary and that is not much harder to follow than a piece of Michael Bay’s gratuitous explosion excrement, thus making it an ideal film to watch for those many American individuals who have yet to realize that the Hebrew nation is not a towelhead land, but the true source of America’s woes in the Middle East. Inspired by director Gorlin’s experiences while living in Israel during the early to mid-’90s during the first intifada as someone who served in the Israeli army, The Holy Land is a postmodern parable of sorts that takes its central plotline from an abstruse segment from the “Bava Batra” (aka “The Last Gate”) of the Talmud that is often ignored or intentionally misinterpreted by Rabbis because it more or less recommends that Jews test their faith by “going under cover” in civilian goy clothes and fornicating with a prostitute (even better if she is a gentile), thereupon getting sin out of their system so they can attend to practicing archaic rituals like wailing spastically in front of a wall. Of course, as the protagonist of The Holy Land learns through terribly tempting trial and error, Slavic shiksa girls are typically hotter and have more fun than frigid Israeli girls, evil kraut Hermann Hesse novels make for much more entertaining reading than the Talmud, and taking bong hits of marijuana gets you just as high, even if it is not kosher.

THE HOLY LAND

Opening with authentic stock footage of unholy hell in the Holy Land with footage of Third World style guerrilla warfare between Palestinians with off-screen narration from a Russian girl speaking in broken English regarding a warning her mother gave her about going to Israel as a virtual slave and how after her less than delightful experience in the desert dystopia that she concluded, "I hope the Jews and Arabs kill each other until nobody left," The Holy War immediately establishes a feeling of nihilistic hatred, but then cuts to a highly contrasting scene of the protagonist sucking from his mother's teat as a wee babe. Flash forward twenty years later to 2000 and we see the Hebraic hero Mendy (Oren Rehany) is now interested in women's bosoms for entirely different reasons as he masturbates to porn magazines in his Orthodox parents' bathroom and ejaculates quite crudely in the bathtub as the sort of eccentric and erotically disadvantaged character you would expect to see in a Todd Solondz (who, incidentally, had plans to be a Rabbi as a child but ended up being the even sicker spiritual son of Woody Allen) film. On top of spilling his Semitic seed in the place where his entire family bathes themselves, Mendy proves to be quite the heretical Hebrew because he prefers reading kraut writer Hermann Hesse's wholly unkosher novel Siddhartha (1922) and is reprimanded by his rabbi because he believes, "the Torah is the truth. This book isn't the truth." A rather strange Rebbe who fondles the shoulders and hands of his Talmud-scholars-in-training (in the audio commentary for the DVD, director Gorlin hints that he is a homosexual pederast), the teacher recommends, citing an obscure passage from the Talmud, that Mendy should leave Jerusalem and go to a Tel Aviv goy town incognito and make love to a gentile flesh-peddler so he can get his lustful desire out of his system as he believes that the boy's religious doubts will be settled and that he will be able to focus on the Torah and holiness.

Of course, things don't go quite as planned when Mendy falls in love at first sight with a goyish Russian prostitute named Sasha (played by Israeli actress Tchelet Semel with a somewhat unbelievable Russian accent) who gives him a handjob that lasts no more than a single second. Mendy also befriends a strangely buff and bodacious alpha male Jew from America named Mike (Saul Stein) who is a longtime friend and fuckbuddy of Sasha and used to have an adventurous job as a war photographer, but now owns a somewhat seedy bar that is patronized by strange characters, including self-loathing Arabs, anti-Arab Jewish professors, and killer kosher Kahaneite terrorists/settlers who are in a holy war with impoverished Palestinians who dare to occupy land that they hope to make part of greater Israel. Mendy essentially abandons Orthodox Judaism as a prodigal son of sorts and takes a job at Mike's bar. When not attempting to vie for the innately unlovable and sexually demoralized Sasha's affection, Mendy hangs out with an Arab Judas and charismatic conman named Razi (Albert Illooz), as well as an unsavory psychopath that calls himself "The Exterminator" (Arie Moskuna) who carries around an AK47 at all times and takes pride in killing Palestinians. In trouble of losing his bar, Mike gets involved with a smuggling scheme and terrorism, thereupon including Mendy and Sasha by proxy. Not just a simple streetwalker, Sasha is a sex slave that is owned by a grotesque Israeli who forces her to star in fetishistic porn flicks and is quite desperate to get out of her direful situation, thus she offers to marry Mendy because he has an American passport and she wants her freedom in the ostensible land of the free. Looking for more of a romantic relationship as opposed to mere bought buggery, perennial virgin Mendy tries to turn Sasha straight, but seeing as his lecherous lady love can only get wet for bad boys (as she states herself) and with all of his friends involved in a pernicious terrorist plot, things might be too late for the lapsed Orthodox Jewish boy to make a real mensch out of himself.

During the last 30 minutes of The Holy Land, terrorist settler "Exterminator" yells to Mendy's Rabbi – who gives the boy an ultimatum that if he does not come back to Orthodox Judaism, he will tell his parents about his sinful way – that he, "can't stand that sniveling, stuck-in-the-ghetto diaspora Judaism either," in a scene that sums up one of the major themes of the film: religious Orthodox Judaism versus quasi-fascistic and atheistic secular Zionism. Considering America has the largest Jewish population in the world (despite making up only about 2.2% of the U.S. population as of 2008), the fair majority of which being secular Zionists, it should be no surprise that The Holy Land was rejected by no less than three Jewish film festivals, of which director Eitan Gorlin stated in an interview for www.salon.com regarding American Jewry's campaign to hide the unflattering truths regarding exploitation and militarism in Israel, "There's a real desire among a lot of people to control images and messages and the story of Israel. People are used to propaganda: 'You're either with us or against us.'" I like to think the film has ambiguity. Some Jewish film festivals are more a celebration of our culture. They just don't want to go there." With Jews that are more dedicated to eating bacon cheeseburgers and marrying goy gals as people who blasphemously founded a nation before their messiah came out of cultural and political reasons as opposed to religious ones, The Holy Land is quite oddly a religious work about a people who have abandoned their God. With ex-Israelis like Jazz musician Gilad Atzmon writing such scathing things about his people as, "We must begin to take the accusation that the Jewish people are trying to control the world very seriously" and "American Jewry makes any debate on whether the 'Protocols of the Elders of Zion' are an authentic document or rather a forged irrelevant. American Jews do control the world, by proxy. So far they are doing pretty well for themselves at least," and films like Gorlin's The Holy Land, one can only wonder if it will be the Jews themselves who will commence the pogroms against their own people once again. For a group who relatively recently founded their first nation in thousands of years as a direct result of Auschwitz and who oftentimes proclaim to be the world's foremost victims, it is rather strange that a Jew would call himself "Exterminator"

THE HOLY LAND

(Gorlin based this character off of a real person) and make a sport of gunning down feral Palestinian children for pelting rocks. Personally, as an unrighteous gentile, I could not always tell the difference between an Israeli and Palestinian, at least in the context of The Holy Land, aside from the fact that one group uses the United States as a vassal of unconscious Shabbos Goys, while the other lives in a city-sized concentration camp provided by their Semitic brethren. That being said, I doubt anyone, aside from Americans Jews, would care if the Israelis and Palestinians wiped out each other out overnight as fantasized about by the resentful Russian girl at the beginning of The Holy Land. After all, when a simple Yeshiva student cannot even complain in peace without being scammed by Slavic sex slaves, driven to substance abuse by Jewish jock philistines, and coerced into terrorism by a physically foul fellow that looks like he could be Rick Moranis' pedophile uncle, there is truly trouble in the Holy Land.

LATIN BOYS GO TO HELL

Ela Troyano (1997)

Somewhat ironically, despite his bitching about racism in various interviews, Nick Zedd only seemed to be able to ‘recruit’ white filmmakers for his Cinema of Transgression movement, unless you count more obscure figures like deracinated Europid Mexican Manuel DeLanda (Incontinence: A Diarrhetic Flow of Mismatches, Raw Nerves: A Lacanian Thriller) and Hawaii-born Japanese-American Jon Moritsugu (Terminal USA, Mod Fuck Explosion). In fact, Zedd had such a bad falling out with Cuban carpet-muncher filmmaker Ela Troyano (The Bubble People, Once Upon a Time in the Bronx) after collaborating with her on the ‘lost’ shelved flick Totem of the Depraved (1983)—a supposed parody of/tribute to Andy Warhol’s anti-classic My Hustler (1965)—that he spread the false rumor that she had died and even wrote a bullshit obituary for her in his zine The Underground Film Bulletin as a bitchy way to prove that she was ‘dead’ to him and the entire Cinema of Transgression scene. In fact, in an interview featured in the book Deathtripping: The Extreme Underground (2008) by Jack Sargeant, Zedd hatefully describes the Havana-born lesbo filmmaker as, “an incompetent Cuban filmmaker who had worked with me and Jack Smith.” Naturally, Troyano completely distanced herself from Zedd and the Cinema of Transgression movement and, as Sargeant states in Deathtripping, “She began working as a part of the ‘thriving radical dyke performances at WOW and began a decade long collaboration with [my] real-life sister Carmelita Tropicana.” Indeed, Troyano must come from a fairly sexually dysfunctional Cuban family as her sister Tropicana is also a lily-licking dyke and played the eponymous role in her farcically Sapphic 27-minute camp short Carmelita Tropicana: Your Kunst Is Your Waffin (1994). Undoubtedly, the American-German-Japanese-Spanish feature Latin Boys Go to Hell (1997) is easily Troyano’s most popular, ambitious, and rewarding film and is notable for being a rare American Latino homo horror-crime-melodrama that was curiously directed by a Cuban clit-hopper with a special affinity for gallows humor. Based on a novel by gay Latino screenwriter André Salas (Fucking Different New York, Eulogy for a Vampire) and produced by homocore auteur Bruce LaBruce’s Teutonic porn producer Jürgen Brüning (Hustler White, The Raspberry Reich), Troyano’s film feels like what might happen if a Latinized nancy-boy Douglas Sirk attempted to direct a genre-confused (anti)romance with an ostensibly linear narrative that pays aesthetic tribute to Kenneth Anger, James Bidgood’s Pink Narcissus (1971), Jean Genet’s Un chant d’amour (1950) aka A Song of Love, the Kuchar Brothers, Jack Smith, Andy Warhol, and Werner Schroeter, among various other kitschy and/or high-camp queer influences. Of course, Latin Boys Go to Hell was also clearly influenced by the early cinematic works unhinged histrionic Hispanic cinema of Spanish auteur Pedro Almodóvar. Needless to say, the Hispanic ho-mos of Troyano's flick are infinitely more hyper hysterical and morally depraved than the kraut cocksuckers of a gay-themed Fassbinder feature like Fox and His Friends (1975), thus hinting that the lesbo auteuress has mixed feelings about male sexual inverts, though it is quite apparent that she has nothing but the deepest respect for the masters of gay underground cinema.

If Latin Boys Go to Hell has anything resembling a protagonist, it is a seemingly autistic latent homosexual Hispanic teen named Justin (Irwin Ossa) who becomes particularly irked when his stereotypical single Latina mother informs him that his estranged cousin Angel (John Bryant of Abel Ferrara's 'R Xmas (2001) and Alain Zaloum's David & Fatima (2008)) will be moving in with them in their cramped ghetto apartment. An inordinately introverted closest queen who could not be any less Hispanic in terms of his essence as a fairly quiet and mundane dork who largely lives inward, Justin spends most of his free time watching a mythical trashy Spanish-language soap opera entitled Dos Vidas aka Two Lives and helping a pretentious white photographer named Monica Westphal (Anne Iobst of Troyano's Carmelita Tropicana and Benjamin P. Speth's Dresden (1999)) take homoerotic photos of unclad Latino boys posing with fake plastic skulls over their cocks. While a lecherous beefcake model named Carlos (Montreal-born gay mainstream fashion photographer Mike Ruiz in a role that apparently bored him so much that it inspired him to quit acting before his acting career had even really began) has the cheap skull over his dick, Monica encourages him to skull-fuck it, stating, "Why don't you think of one of your favorite stars giving you a blowjob?" While hanging out at a sleazy Latino club that is frequented by homo-haters that like to dance, sexually depraved model Carlos attempts to bugger Justin in the ass by following him into a bathroom, slowly approaching him from behind while he is taking a leak at a urinal, and perversely stating in a quite bestial fashion, "I wanna fuck that little ass," but the protagonist is a hopeless romantic who, due to his almost idiotically idealistic view of love as a result of watching countless tasteless soap operas, is waiting for the right kind of man to sweep him off of his fairy feet. Of course, little does Justin realize that he will ultimately be forsaken with the seemingly inexplicable pain of falling in love with his own heterosexual cousin Angel when he moves in with him.

When his cousin Angel finally arrives, Justin's creepy infatuation with him is quite apparent, as he almost seems afraid to talk to him and incessantly stares at him in an unnerving fashion that makes the protagonist seem like he might become a sort of Hispanic Jeffrey Dahmer. In no time, Angel becomes Monica's favorite model and, in what appears to be a tribute to Werner Schroeter's Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King, he poses naked sprawled on a bed of red roses even though he is not actually gay like the rest of the photographer's models. Of course, since his cousin Justin is a jealous little pansy who has always dreamed of being a gay model yet lacks the photogenic physique and charm, Angel has to hide the fact he is a model from his cousin. When Justin takes his cousin to a Mexican themed dance night at a local club, he becomes quite dejected when Angel begins flirting with a pretty fag hag chick named Andrea (Jennifer Lee Simard) who is hopelessly in love with her gay best friend Braulio (Alexis Artilles). Indeed, while Angel is chatting up Andrea, Carlos—a psychopathic sexual predator who attempts to fuck any man that passes his gay gaze and who complains regarding condoms, “I hate using that shit. It makes it hard to cum”—approaches Justin and tries to coerce him into coming home with him, even though he started a fight with him only a couple days before and is already the boyfriend of Braulio, who has fallen hopelessly in love with the deleteriously sexually promiscuous model. Ultimately, Justin goes back home with Carlos and has his man-cunt deflowered in a campy montage where a piñata hilariously explodes at the same exact moment that the latter reaches sexual climax. After having his rectum reamed, Justin acts all dejected and forlorn, which agitates bestial bone-smuggler Carlos who, unlike the overly passive protagonist, does not like to sentimentalize sex and romance. When Carlos says to Justin, “Oh, come off it. You wanted to get fucked and you did. What’s the matter...you can’t deal with the fact you like dick?,” the protagonist reveals just the sort of old fashioned fruitcake romantic he is by naively replying, “I just thought sex was supposed to be between people who cared about each other.”

When loverboy Braulio discovers that his muscular beau Carlos has not been faithful with him and has fucked a dorky wimp like protagonist Justin, all hell breaks loose in the hermetic Hispanic homo underworld. Indeed, when Braulio dares to bitch out his bastard of a boyfriend about his lecherous behavior, Carlos gleefully brags about it and dumps the heartbroken Hispanic, who becomes exceedingly hotheaded and self-righteously declares to his (ex)lover, “You bastard...I wouldn’t touch your filthy dick even if you paid me.” Somewhat curiously, Carlos is not only shot and killed by a masked assailant sporting a goofy Halloween mask shortly after he breaks up with Braulio, but also has his dick dismembered and shoved in his mouth. Notably, Carlos’ obscenely over-the-top pseudo-tragic death is foreshadowed in a scene where he pricks his finger on a red rose while admiring himself in a mirror in a Narcissus-esque fashion. Needless to say, a fat middle-aged negress and her son (who is absurdly carrying a copy of exceedingly effete Truman Capote’s classic true crime nonfiction novel In Cold Blood (1966)) are more than a little shocked upon finding the bloody corpse of a Hispanic homo with a cock in his mouth in a scene that seems to channel dirty Dahmer. When Andrea remarks to Braulio that he does not seem particularly melancholy about the fact that his lover was murdered and castrated, he strangely responds, “You were right about him all along. He’s a fucking bastard. Forgive me if I’m not all broken up about his death. As far as I’m concerned, he got what was coming to him.” Indeed, at this point in the film, it is quite apparent that Braulio is Carlos’ killer and the next person on his murder list is Justin, who he naturally blames for the dissolution of his lurid love affair even though the protagonist did not want to be anally pillaged by the dead model in the first place. At a photo exhibition with the eponymous title 'Latin Boys Go To Hell' featuring a collection of Monica's gay Yatō-esque Latino photos that was apparently named in tribute to some assumed cocksucker named Carlos Antonio Perez (1973-1997) who probably died of AIDS, Justin and Angel have a showdown of sorts with unhinged homo Braulio where lesbo actress/writer/director Guinevere Turner appears out of nowhere as an Grim Reaper-like apparition of sorts. Before Braulio begins unloading bullets on the lead and his cousin, Justin informs Angel that he is in love with him. Of course, Angel is not an incestuous fag, but he shows great empathy for Justin and attempts to let him down easy by stating, "You're a great guy...a good looking guy and all [...] I just can't go in that direction. If I did, you'd be the first person I'd think of." In the end, Latin Boys Go to Hell concludes on a sardonically ironical note that makes a mockery out of kitschy pseudo-poetic love. As hinted at in various shots where Catholic iconography is juxtaposed with images of drag queens and dumb blondes like Pamela Anderson (including a shot of the infamously horrendous dystopian Casablanca reworking Barb Wire (1996)), the film seems to blame Catholicism for the gay Hispanic community's undying infatuation with love and falling in love, with protagonist Justin even attempting to sacrifice himself for love in the end.

With its superficially straightforward storyline, Latin Boys Go to Hell features what might be described as an abortive narrative, horrendously wooden acting, and particularly preposterous displays of pseudo-pathos, among various other glaring flaws that are quite comparable to the worst of Plan 9 from Outer Space (1959), yet that is ultimately one of the main reasons why the film is worth watching. Indeed, the film is nothing if not a virtual treasure trove of depraved campy humor and various semi-subtle queer cinephile references. In fact, many of the indoor scenes featured in the film feel like direct tributes to Kenneth Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964) where the eponymous character played by Bruce Byron sits on his bed while watching a TV and reading comics. If I did not know better, I would assume that Latin Boys Go to Hell was made for the sole purpose of paying homage to both Scorpio Rising and Pink Narcissus while mocking the Roman Catholic tinged romantic histrionics of lethally lecherous Hispanic homos. Of course, considering how Teutonic Sapphic auteurs Ulrike Ottinger would portray leather-fags as Gestapo-esque killers in a number of her films, including her allegorical dystopian epic Freak Orlando (1981), Troyano would not be the first to make an unflattering farce of fags and fag culture (in fact, until relatively recently with the AIDS crisis and growth of "LGBTQ" collective power groups, fags and dykes belonged to totally separate and oftentimes opposing subcultures, which makes sense since each group is only interested in members of their own sex). While sometimes having the particularly putrid Club Kids vibe of 1990s quasi-gaysploitation flick like Shampoo Horns (1998) directed by Spanish auteur Manuel Toledano (1974–2007) and starring Hispanic-homo-killer Michael Alig (who is probably best known as the titular subject of Fenton Bailey and Randy Barbato's Party Monster: The Shockumentary (1998) and the directors' follow-up 2003 feature film Party Monster starring Macaulay Culkin), Troyano's film thankfully owes more to the great queer camp directors of yesteryear. Personally, I could not tolerate more than a couple minutes of Troyano's fairly brief dyke-feßt Carmelita Tropicana: Your Kunst Is Your Waffen and I find it somewhat ironic that the rug-munching auteur's greatest film is about homicidal homos, but then again, lesbian-themed cinema has never been particularly interesting and I can not imagine a group of clam-smackers pulling off a camp routine. If one thing is for sure, it is that Latin Boys Go to Hell is more aesthetically pleasing than anything that Troyano's rival Zedd—a man that has fucked pre-op trannies and gave head to another man while in drag in Richard Kern's King of Sex (1986)—has ever directed.

MONDO LUX: THE VISUAL UNIVERSE OF WERNER SCHROETER

Elfi Mikesch (2011)

I typically try to refrain from reviewing documentaries as I see it to be a redundant task for the most part, yet every once and a while I come across a certain doc that needs to be seen and that certainly applies to Mondo Lux - Die Bildwelten des Werner Schroeter (2011) aka Mondo Lux: The Visual Universe of Werner Schroeter, a strikingly intimate and rather revealing document of the life, artistic works, and remaining days of the notoriously private German New Cinema auteur and dandy Renaissance man Werner Schroeter (Eika Katappa, Malina), arguably the last great 'artiste' of truly decadent (in the positive sense!) Teutonic kultur. Directed by Schroeter's longtime cinematographer/collaborator Elfi Mikesch (Seduction: The Cruel Woman, Fieber), who shot such Schroeter arthouse masterpieces as Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King and Two (2002) aka Deux, Mondo Lux is easily the greatest introduction to the superlatively secret life and kitschy high-camp films of the insanely idiosyncratic auteur, who died from cancer at the age of 65 on 12 April 2010 before the documentary was released, so it should be no surprise that the film has the slightly ominous feel of a living obituary. A theatrically melancholy man who wore all black his entire life and was most obsessed, at least cinematically speaking, with love and death and the link between the two, Schroeter discusses in Mondo Lux the many lovers and family members in his morbidly melodramatic life who succumbed to death at a premature age, typically under tragic conditions, including suicide and complications related to AIDS. Of course, like a Schroeter film, Mondo Lux is not all about melancholia and weltschmerz, but is also quite tragicomic and features a number of frolicsome anecdotes from his friends/collaborators, including actresses/divas Isabelle Huppert and Ingrid Caven, as well as Germanic filmmakers Wim Wenders, Rosa von Praunheim and Peter Kern, among various others. Easily the most preternatural and least tamable director of German New Cinema, Schroeter's was also one of the most, if not the most, esoterically influential, inspiring the aesthetics of filmmakers including (but certainly not limited to), Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, Daniel Schmid, Walter Bockmayer, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, and Ulrike Ottinger, yet virtually all of his films are impossible to find in the United States and a number of his films have yet to be released in any home media format anywhere. An art-addled and effortlessly effete aesthetician whose films are virtual living museums of decadent European art history, Schroeter also moonlighted as a documentarian, opera director, and photographer and all of these subjects are covered in Mondo Lux, a virtual Schroeter-for-Dummies guide in celluloid form, but also a must-see for serious 'Schroeter survivors' who are more than familiar with his work. Despite Schroeter's reputation for the sadder side of life and that the document follows him as his body becomes weaker and discernibly emaciated from cancer, Mondo Lux—in its depiction of the filmmaker working relentlessly on various projects in a frantic attempt to escape death—is ultimately an inspiring work that makes one want to live life to the fullest, or at least die trying, which the dandyist director of German New Cinema did with a sense of dignity that is actually quite shocking, especially for a man that seemed to worship death.

As demonstrated by his various references to great artists/musicians/poets/writers, including Franz Schubert, Heinrich Heine, Robert Schumann, William Shakespeare, and Arnold Schoenberg, among various others, Werner Schroeter is a man that lives and breathes for art, but his choice of medium was cinema, which gave him the opportunity to take an eclectic approach to art and creating delightfully decadent cinematic works like no other filmmaker before that, ultimately achieving the “Gesamtkunstwerk” in celluloid form, albeit in a conspicuously kitschy fashion that proved both “high” and “low” art can be seamlessly synthesized. Filmmaker Wim Wenders—a fellow with a more than flat affect that I would have never suspected had an affinity for a film like Eika Katappa (1969)—describes Schroeter as follows, “I’ve known him since 1967 in Munich. We were all sitting together, 20 students at the film academy, and Werner was one of those twenty. By far the greatest eccentric there. The only dandy in the group. He didn’t stick it out very long.” Indeed, while Schroeter became one of the most original and influential filmmakers of German New Cinema, he couldn’t care less, stating, “I have no intention whatsoever of playing a leading part [in the New German Cinema], and submit to the expectations of producing Kulturscheisse [literally, Cultureshit], even if it may be true that I carry around with me and into my films the past of this Kulturscheisse,” thus demonstrating the audacious auteur filmmaker’s innate individualism that would ultimately cause him monetary troubles (many of Schroeter’s films cost him more money than they made in theaters) as he never had an interest in appealing to mainstream audiences, be it German or otherwise. As semi-snidely Schroeter explains in a speech featured in Mondo Lux regarding the lack of respect he received in Germany for creating aesthetically audacious and largely apolitical works, “here I was seen as the crazy enfant terrible. The singing, jumping art cunt or whatever. People thought little of my intelligence. Whereas in France I was seen as an equal partner,” hence the filmmaker’s decision to make a good percentage of his films outside of his homeland, including two Pasolini inspired “Italian eros” works, including Nel regno di Napoli (1978) aka The Kingdom of Naples and Palermo oder Wolfsburg (1980), as well as two French co-productions with French actress Isabelle Huppert, including Malina (1991) and Deux (2002) aka Two, among a number of other cross-cultural European cinematic works. In regard to Palermo Oder Wolfsburg, Schroeter states in Mondo Lux that the work is, “An accidental encounter between Italy’s South and what I don’t like about Germany, such as Wolfsburg. And VW,” thus hinting at his hatred for not only industrialization and capitalism, but also the Third Reich, the latter of which he would lampoon in his underrated film Der Bomberpilot (1970), the closest thing the auteur ever made to a Nazisploitation flick.

Of course, more than anything, it was Schroeter's muse Magdalena Montezuma (Willow Springs, Freak Orlando), who died tragically at the mere age of 41 in 1984 from cancer of the womb, that his filmmaking changed forever and arguably for the worse, but luckily the two collaborated on one last work, Der Rosenkönig (1986) aka The Rose King, while the actress was literally dying, which, at least in my opinion, turned out to be the director's celluloid magnum opus. Discovering Greek-American soprano diva Maria Callas at age 13 shortly after his Polish grandmother committed suicide was an aesthetic 'revelation' of sorts for Schroeter and he paid tribute to her with not only his first 8mm film Maria Callas Porträt (1968), but also throughout his entire career via her songs and essence haunting a number of his films. On top of his Polish grandmother, baroness Elsa von Rotjov, committing suicide when he was only 13, Schroeter's first lover Siegfried committed suicide when he was 13 or 14 and the boy was 16, not to mention that two of his other boyfriends died under tragic circumstances, one of which died from AIDS. One of Schroeter's lovers that did survive is Berlin-based filmmaker Rosa von Praunheim (Army of Lovers or Revolt of the Perverts, A Virus Knows no Morals), who is featured throughout Mondo Lux reminiscing with his lunatic lover over the good old days, including how the Berlin buggerer used to emotionally brutalize his beau. Of course, von Praunheim was not the first person to attack Schroeter as the filmmaker discusses in Mondo Lux how he was regularly beaten up as a child, even having urine dumped on his head. More than anyone, Isabelle Huppert, who did a photo shoot with the dandy auteur before he died, drives home the fact that Schroeter approached all artistic mediums the same way, with a uniquely uncanny creative energy, which is quite apparent to anyone that has seen his films. As for Schroeter himself, he described the driving force behind his films as follows, "Of course humor, farce was a mode of expression I really enjoyed. I wanted to express myself with people I lived with. And that's what interested me. My films at the time are by-products of my love affairs," and, indeed, judging by virtually any of his tragicomedic films, it is easy to see that the keenly cosmopolitan kraut with a Mediterranean soul was perennially lovelorn.

Not long before he himself also died of cancer on 21 August 2010, German auteur Christoph Schlingensief (Egomania – Island without Hope, The German Chainsaw-Massacre) wrote in his blog that he hoped that Werner Schroeter's films would reach a larger audience and make their way into film school curriculum, which, although would be great, is rather unlikely as his cinematic works only seem all the more hermetic and impenetrable as the decades have passed and as the great Teutonic philosopher Oswald Spengler once stated, "One day the last portrait of Rembrandt and the last bar of Mozart will have ceased to be — though possibly a colored canvas and a sheet of notes will remain — because the last eye and the last ear accessible to their message will have gone,” which is even more true when it comes to man who directed Malina (1991), a macabre, if not sometimes merry, mindfuck of a movie about a man named Malina. Prophesied in 1977 by his butt buddy R.W. Fassbinder as likely to “assume a place in film history similar to that of Novalis, Lautréamont, and Louis-Ferdinand Céline in literature,” Schroeter, as the title of Mondo Lux: The Visual Universe of Werner Schroeter makes quite clear, not only created his own cinematic language and universe, but proved that cinema could be aristocratic, even if it features drag kings and queens, as well urolagnia among lesbo mental patients as surreally scatologically depicted in Day of the Idiots (1981) aka Tag der Idioten. As Mondo Lux director Elfi Mikesch stated in an interview with filmmaker Frieder Schlaich (Paul Bowles – Halbmond, Otomo) regarding the death of Schroeter and the importance of his films, “I just have to get used to the fact that this will never happen again. That’s why his films have become so important. They are what remains. All these waste products survive. There’s a lot to learn and experience from them. Every time I watch one, and I watched many recently, I discover something new, and surprising new threads in his oeuvre. Whether it be body language, the relation between language and music and how that relates the spoken word, to physical action or the representation of vision. The way he presents speech and music. That is incomparable, it raises your consciousness.” While still alive, Schroeter was no less complimentary of Mikesch, writing of their seemingly immaculate creative partnership that began in 1986 with Der Rosenkönig, “From the beginning on, we had a specific communication code and very deep trust. While Elfi’s poetry is different from mine, it is equally multi faceted. Elfi gives the content of many images a structure, and she derives poetry from it. In my case, the poetry originates from the void, in Elfi’s from motion and condensation. This overlap enables us to collaborate,” thus it should be no surprise that he entrusted her to direct Mondo Lux, a documentary that, at least in my quasi-humble opinion, is easily the greatest tribute from one filmmaker to another as the last testament of a truly avant-garde auteur that never got his dues in terms of his importance and prestige as one of cinema’s few true artists and innovators.

EAST OF EDEN

Elia Kazan (1955)

James Dean is most famous for his role as Jim Stark in Rebel Without a Cause. Although a brilliant and legendary performance, Dean's role as Cal in East of Eden is his greatest. James Dean may only have three major film roles to his credit, but his brilliance as a natural method actor has confirmed his legacy as one of the greatest American actors to grace the silver screen. James Dean was a very conflicted and volatile individual in real-life, and his role as Cal in East of Eden best fits the character of the real young man. In East of Eden, Cal and Aron are as different as brothers could be. Cal is criminally minded and constantly in trouble whereas Aron is a deeply idealistic Christian. Aron takes after his good Christian father, who makes his living running his own ranch with his boys. The father cannot understand why Cal acts the way he does and why he constantly acts bad. The missing link is the two boys' mother who the father claimed has died. Cal finds out that his mother is alive and that she happens to run a whorehouse. It becomes apparent why Cal is "bad." Although "Bad," Cal is a much more interesting and complex individual than his pansy Christian brother. Like the real-life James Dean, Cal is damaged goods and a born survivor (or maybe not). Brother Aron shows his true weakness and false worldview when he finds out who his Mother really is. Being the good Christian he is, he smashes his face through a train window while making his way to get killed by Germans in the war. When Cal finds out his mother is still alive and who she is, things start to make more sense for him. East of Eden is set on the eve of America's entry into the first World War. Due to the lies of media moguls with alien interests, America got involved in the war to kill evil Huns (despite America's largest ethnic group being of German descent). You can be sure that the sons of the war agitators didn't lay a foot on European soil, and sat the war out. They did, however, illegally receive a piece of land in Palestine from the British Empire via The Balfour Declaration of 1917 for getting the U.S. involved in the war. This land theft and "behind the scenes" deal still affects the world today with American's dying in the middle east once again for alien interests. Surprisingly, in East of Eden, Hollywood acknowledged the vicious slander brought upon Germans for no rational reason at all. East of Eden takes a look at how opposites attract and produce conflicting children. The dichotomy of good and evil becomes an in-depth brotherly character study with the film. Like always, evil is much stronger and interesting than good as the charismatic Cal demonstrates. When the family is finally destroyed, Cal is the only one left standing. Due to his denial of Christianity and its anti-human rules, Cal is able to handle finding out his mother is a madam at a whorehouse. Cal is not a sheep in the herd, but a wolf on the prowl.

HUMAN ANIMALS

Eligio Herrero (1983)

After being rather disappointed by the French cult flick Themroc (1973)—a satirical work that is essentially silent (aside from grunts, gibberish, and typical urban noise) about a proletarian building painter/laborer who has a sort of atavistic awakening and decides to become an urban caveman of sorts that takes his sister as a sexual mate and engages in cannibalism—I decided it was time I re-watched a somewhat similarly themed, dialogue-less, yet all but totally unknown dystopian Spanish sub-cult flick entitled Animales racionales (1983) aka Human Animals aka Die letzte Stunde which would be the second of only two films directed by filmmaker/screenwriter Eligio Herrero. On top of being an all the more enthralling and aesthetically pleasing experience than Themroc, Human Animals is an all the more absurd work featuring, among other things, post-apocalyptic bestiality, ridiculously endless nudity and dirt-covered naughty bits, and an agreeable social message that does not reek of outmoded far-left cynicism. Shot on the breathtaking Lanzarote, Canary Islands, Spain, Human Animals is a delightful dystopian quasi-sci-fi flick with a setting in organic paradise that follows the quirky and kinky adventures of two men, one woman, and a very horny Alsatian Wolf Dog who seem to be the sole survivors of a nuclear apocalypse of sorts. A satirically wanton low-camp yet marginally artful work with virtually nil pretensions and that wallows in unrelenting entertainment value, Human Animals portrays ‘survival of the fittest’ in semi-scatological slapstick and delightfully dialogue-less form what happens when humans are left without culture, technology, and morals and revert to a feral-like state where fighting, fucking, and food are the most important concerns and petty human inventions like civility, self-control (especially of the sexual sort), and language are dropped by the wayside for something much more pure, lively, and lecherous. Sort of like the Spanish equivalent to Flemish auteur Rob Van Eyck’s debauched dystopian sci-fi flick The Afterman (1985), albeit less nihilistic and culturally cynical, Human Animals is sort of like the Gilligan’s Island of post-apocalyptic films, except where the stranded islanders do things like people would do in real-life like have sex and fight to the death for the sole woman.

Human Animals begins with fire-tinted stock footage of various nuclear detonations, thus letting the viewer know that humanity has finally achieved its ultimate goal—wiping itself out and a good portion of the world with it. After the mushroom clouds fade away, the viewer is introduced to the three characters who are unconscious and laying on their backs in a desert in a rather random way, as if placed there by God himself to repopulate the earth after humanity obliterated itself via nuclear holocaust. The three nameless individuals include a blonde and beautiful Nordic woman (Carole Kirkham, who would go on to play “Eva” in a film called I Love Hitler (1984)), a handsome blond Nordic man (Geir Indvard), and a darkhaired and swarthy Mediterranean man (José Yepes, the only actor to star in more than just a handful of movies). Upon waking up, the blond Aryan man looks at a picture in his wallet of his assumed sister with the writing "To my dear brother" on it, but the image soon evaporates for whatever reason as if it is the final remnant of human technology, just as the characters in the Human Animals clothes and civility will disappear as the film progresses. Not long after killing a bunch of little killer crabs and eating their remains, the Mediterranean man starts tearing off the blonde woman's dress and wastes no time in sexually defiling her. In fact, the Mediterranean man featured in Human Animals matches the character traits of his sub-race as described by National Socialist eugenicist/racial theory Hans F. K. Günther, who wrote in his work The Racial Elements of European History (1927) that, "The Mediterranean man is very strongly swayed by the sexual life, at least he is not so continent as the Nordic (who need not therefore feel the sexual urge any less," as well as, "A disposition to cruelty and animal torture, a not unfrequent inclination to Sadism may perhaps stand in relation to the stronger sexuality." When the post-apocalyptic threesome happens upon an abandoned lighthouse-like building, the Mediterranean man decides it is a good idea to destroy all the plates and other manmade items he finds in the seemingly ominous building. From then on, the rest of Human Animals seems like it could have been depicting prehistory as the increasingly hostile homo sapiens get further in touch with their carnal and visceral sides.

Meanwhile, a German shepherd (played by "Larry" the dog) joins the humans, albeit from a distance. After killing, gutting, cooking and eating some furry animals by a fire, including jackrabbits, Mediterranean man gives the blonde babe some of the good old in-and-out, which upsets the blond Aryan man, who is a much more stoic yet sensitive individual while his swarthy nemesis is a sort of trickster and cheat. Discovering the Aryan man upset all by his lonesome in the woods, the Aryan woman gives him a sensual blowjob, thus stirring a bizarre beachside love triangle. Eventually, the promiscuous trio builds a primitive house where they all sleep together and begin to wear archaic loincloths and tribesman-like bandanas, which holds back their newly grown Conan-esque hairdos. Of course, problems arise when the Alsatian Wolf Dog decides he wants a piece of Aryaness ass. Before they know it, the debauched dog has raped and conquered the woman and the two men are forced to abandon their home and stay outside weeping with each other like two feeble fags. After visualizing zany zoophilia in his mind of his beloved blonde and the rapist canine, the Aryan man decides enough is enough and decides to burn the house down where the woman and dog are sleeping with each other, thus forcing the canine out for a final fight to the death. Rivals turn into temporary friends when Aryan man and Mediterranean man adopt the strategy of 'the enemy of my enemy is my friend' and team up in maliciously murdering man's best friend. Of course, all alliances come to a bitter, bloody, and brutal end after Nordic and Mediterranean naturally decide to fight to the death for the grand prize of the golden haired beauty who, being the lone woman on a deserted island, is more than worth her weight in gold. In the end, Nordic displays a triumph of the will after he smashes Mediterranean man's brains in with a rock and secures the blond beauty for himself, thus securing the natural order of things, which is certainly never depicted in contemporary slave-morality-driven Hollywood flicks. Indeed, "Might is Right" is certainly the name of the game in Human Animals.

A pop-Darwinian tale of sub-biblical proportions that, despite featuring dog-on-woman actions and caveman-like violence, ultimately features a good message, Human Animals is a timeless celluloid tale that is nothing short of uniquely unforgettable and not just because it features a chick copulating with a canine. If John Waters had a heterosexual European brother bred on Nietzsche who had never read a book or watched a movie created after the 1950s, it might resemble Human Animals, which is essentially a postmodern silent film with a totally traditional, albeit sometimes trash, sensibility. Borrowing from many of the conventions utilized in Italian survivalist caveman exploitation films like Alberto Cavallone's Conqueror of the World (1983) aka I padroni del mondo and Ironmaster (1983) aka La guerra del ferro: Ironmaster directed by Umberto Lenzi about prehistoric blond Aryan savages that tried capitalize off of the success of Quest for Fire (1981) aka Guerre du feu directed by Jean-Jacques Annaud, albeit set in a post-apocalyptic deserted island instead of prehistoric setting, Human Animals is a rare 'exploitation' work in that it brings crude charm and simple yet important morals to an eclectically merit-less B movie style. In fact, I found Human Animals so effective that it made me think that a nuclear apocalypse might not be so bad as it would possibly force what is left of humanity to sort itself out and adopt a more natural mode of living. Of course, with its lack of dialogue, vague arthouse essence, and somewhat working moral compass, Human Animals is not the sort of work that will appeal to the average jaded gorehound nor Jess Franco fanatic as its nonstop nudity and sexual debauchery is far too radically ridiculous to arouse the sort of one-track mind individual who mindlessly wallows in mere boobs and blood. Given "A totally disgusting three stars" out of four by no one less than pseudo-redneck film critic Joe Bob Briggs, Human Animals is indubitably one of the most patently peculiar post-apocalyptic flicks ever made, as if directed by an avant-garde auteur from some distant porno planet.

A QUIET PLACE IN THE COUNTRY
A QUIET PLACE IN THE COUNTRY

Elio Petri (1968)

Although I have never thought of Nordic Italian Stallion Franco “Django” Nero as a seemingly schizophrenic and angst-ridden art fag who creates vulgar abstract paintings of the childlike finger-paint sort, he once played one in the unsurprisingly underrated, avant-garde proto-giallo Italian-French horror production A Quiet Place in the Country (1968) aka Un tranquillo posto di campagna aka Un coin tranquille à la champagne directed by Guido commie auteur Elio Petri (The 10th Victim, Property Is No Longer a Theft)—a filmmaker whose mind was apparently as plagued by anguish and existential crisis as the characters he cinematically portrayed. Winner of the Silver Bear award at the 19th Berlin International Film Festival, A Quiet Place in the Country is now all but allocated to the celluloid dustbin of history, which is generally a positive thing when it comes to far-left commie, psychoanalytic/psychedelic mumbo jumbo from the late-1960s, yet Petri’s film, not unlike similarly underrated works like Death Laid an Egg (1968) aka La morte ha fatto l’uovo directed by Giulio Questi, has enough aesthetic integrity and intriguing thematic complexity to warrant reconsideration today as an avant-garde psychosexual horror-thriller that poses enough questions about the crisis of the Western soul to be more than relevant for today’s viewers, even if the majority of spectators will have too much trouble digesting such a decidedly discombobulating and deranging cinematic work that poses many important questions but has no real answers, thus not falling prey to the phoney sort of hope that is oftentimes espoused by lying leftist idealists. A potent albeit peculiar piece of quasi-supernatural surrealism about a psychologically and psychosexually perturbed painter who finds nil solace in his artistic success nor lavish lifestyle, so he moves out of the soulless city into the nice and peaceful country in a desperate attempt to cure his all-consuming weltschmerz, A Quiet Place in the Country is indubitably a work that has much in common with such masterpieces as Michael Powell’s Peeping Tom (1960), Ingmar Bergman’s Hour of the Wolf (1968), and Paul Verhoeven’s The Fourth Man (1983) in its unsettling and perversely penetrating portrayal of a mentally unhinged artist on the brink of mental dissolution. Of course, the major difference between all these other films in terms of storyline is that the protagonist of A Quiet Place in the Country is obsessed with the beautiful ghost of a slutty 17-year-old countess who met a rather grizzly fate during the Second World War that may or may not exist. Told from the perspective of an exceedingly unreliable painter at war with his own mind and art, A Quiet Place in the Country is assuredly one of the greatest and most complicated cinematic stories of a haunted artist.

Leonardo Ferri (Franco Nero) has a lot of problems but virtually all of them are the product of his haunted and afflicted mind that cannot conform to the ways of technocratic modernism, as he is a rather successful degenerate painter whose art resembles what might happen if a rainbow were to barf on a piece of canvas. During the first couple minutes of A Quiet Place in the Country, Leonardo, in a surrealist pop-art scenario that is later revealed to be a dream, sits somberly and half-naked in a chair that he is tied to in a striking scene of cinematic sadomasochism. His wife/manager Flavia (Nero's real-life, two-time wife Vanessa Redgrave) greets him when she gets home with all the worthless gadgets and knickknacks she picked up at the store, including a waterproof TV, a transistor fridge, an erotic electric magnet and other seemingly pointless and worthless gimmick items made to appeal to the Faustian need to conquer nature, which now has reached a ridiculous and patently pointless level where instead of dominating continents and peoples as was done in the past, Western man can only try in vain to dominate his own domestic laziness and unquenchable thirst for material possessions, which only further feeds his feeling of worthless. During the same dream, Leonardo also dreams that his now-naked wife is murdering in a bathtub via a number of Norman Bates-esque butcher knife stabs to the chest. While he finds his wife's incessant nagging about his need to be at art shows to display and promote his work to be rather annoying, Leonardo is all the more disturbed and plagued by popular symptoms of the modern world, including charity/altruism (a supposed representative from the "Artist for Orphans Associations" tries to swindle him), consumerism (all the items that make his already pointlessly complicated life all the more unbearable), pornography (he becomes more interested in porn magazines than his real flesh and blood wife), poverty porn (an obsession with looking at everything grotesque the Third World has to offer), and guerilla warfare (with seems to inspire the painter's need to rebel against his bourgeoisie background and the director's seeming leftist xenophilia). When it comes down to it, Leonardo—who is certainly no da Vinci—hates reality as explained in delusional quasi-commie statements like, "canvases and paints should be free for everybody. One hour a day," but, of course, Leonardo's dream of an intangible Marxist Utopia is the least of his problems as his innate disdain for reality begins to take a homicidal form inspired by his fanatical fetishism for a voluptuous femme fatale phantasm of the supernatural S&M variety.

One day while driving around in a rather scenic rural area, Leonardo is greeted by his doppelgänger at the gate of a classy country home, a seemingly ancient Venetian villa, which he immediately jumps out of his car to investigate, but not without bringing his trusty "Playgirl" and "Super Sex" magazines like any reasonable porn addict would. To Leonardo's credit, his wife ruins any moment of sexual passion for him as she always answers the phone anytime they are about to sexually embrace because, after all, it "might be important" and she would not want to jeopardize her financial security for a potential business deal. Of course, Leonardo eventually explores the giant yet somewhat dilapidated villa that caught his fancy and runs into its particularly peculiar caretaker, a swarthy and slightly overweight 50-something-year-old named Attilio Bressan (Georges Géret). When Leonardo says he is “looking for a quiet place in the country,” Attilio responds “only death is quieter than this,” which ultimately turns out to be quite the understatement. Unable to churn out a mere painting during a three month period, Leonardo is finally able to convince his wife Flavia, who probably believes it will be good in the long run for her bank account, to buy the Venetian villa where the painter immediately gets to work as hired workers, including a ravishing young housekeeper named Egle (Rita Calderoni), begin restoring his homestead. During Leonardo’s first night in the home, some unknown entity destroys all of the artist’s paintings and art supplies, of which he initially accuses Egle and her little brother who she seems to have an incestuous relationship with as they are shown embracing in bed, but something sensual and supernatural seems to be responsible for the disturbances. The next day, Leonardo learns about the mysterious “little countess” named Wanda (Gabiella Grimaldi), a royal nymphomaniac described as being “really a beautiful creature and a slut” by local townspeople who was randomly shot to death in 1944 by a British fighter pilot. Soon thereafter, Leonardo can no longer focus on his art and becomes involved in metaphysical necrophilia of sorts, spending all his time questioning local country folk about Wanda and her effect on the town and even visiting her elderly and senile mother, who tries to get in the painter’s pants. Leonardo eventually learns that every man in town shared carnal knowledge with Wanda, including Attilio, who killed a German corporal after walking in on her in the act with the unlucky Teuton. Attilio, who is a serious alcoholic that always carries a glass of the good stuff with him wherever he goes, blames himself for Wanda’s death because she helped him bury the dead kraut in a field, at which point in time she was shot down by the British fighter pilot in a scenario of absurdly tragic poetic justice. Apparently, wanton Wanda felt no sense of sympathy for the kraut that she inadvertently caused to be murdered due to her intemperate lecherousness. One dark and ominous night, Leonardo holds a séance with Attilio and his wife, but also every pompous person he knows in the art world, which results in Flavia’s seemingly supernatural strangulation and inspires the painter to finish what she started. In the end, Leonardo gets the peace and quiet he was always searching for, albeit against his own will in a mental institution where his pathological porn addiction takes on preposterous extremes, but considering the painter’s psychotic persuasion, one can never be sure if anything that goes on is a depiction of reality or his own macabre mental derangement.

Decades after completing A Quiet Place in the Country, director Elio Petri would state of the film, “The reason why I defend A Quiet Place in the Country is because it is the portrait of an artist, of a middle-class intellectual and of his division. He was a middle-class artist who, as far as his expressive means were concerned, tried to upset forms and formulas and who found himself prisoner of a serial production system. Thence his escape towards the ghosts of romantic culture.” Indeed, although directed by a quasi-Marxist auteur who stuck it to the middle-class and the innately materialistic and mundane lives they lead, A Quiet Place in the Country transcends Frankfurt school psychobabble and is no piece of needless novelty intellectualism of the Trotskyite sort, but a serious, albeit aesthetically and thematically schizophrenic look at the crisis of the Western soul in a manner that works more effectively in the medium of abstract cinema form than in writing. Petrio even went so far as to admit regarding A Quiet Place in the Country, “The film was a criticism of the intellectual, indeed from the inside. In short, we were on the threshold of ’68 and this is my last film before Investigation; that is before making films I could feel were useful to some cause,” so it is rather unfortunate that he did not realize that the political persuasion he subscribed to as a quasi-communist was just as deluded and materialistic, and thus unsatisfying to the soul as the bourgeois modernism he negatively portrays in the film. As protagonist Leonardo states in the film, “I’m forced to follow the rules of the market. I have to abide by them. I can’t change them,” thereupon admitting to a passive feeling of unshakable impotency in the face of a shallow modernism and as C.G. Jung once wrote regarding human nature in his work Psychology and Alchemy (1952), “People will do anything, no matter how absurd, in order to avoid facing their own souls. They will practice Indian yoga and all its exercises, observe a strict regimen of diet, learn the literature of the whole world - all because they cannot get on with themselves and have not the slightest faith that anything useful could ever come out of their own souls. Thus the soul has gradually been turned into a Nazareth from which nothing good can come,” and such is the fate that ultimately leads to Leonardo, who has a delusional obsession with an intangible entity—a banshee nympho bitch of the decadent aristocrat sort—from suffering a complete mental break in the tradition of Friedrich Nietzsche; a man that was never able to overcome the nihilism that inevitably took over his body and soul.

Featuring what is probably the most decidedly discordant and intentionally atrocious score Italian maestro composer Ennio Morricone ever created, A Quiet Place in the Country is a potent piece of conscious aesthetic decadence with a soul, if not a rather “haunted” one in the fullest sense of the word. A rare and uncompromisingly idiosyncratic piece of psychological and psychosexual horror that combines sardonic black humor, supernatural surrealism, a curious combination of pop-art, art deco, and Gothic imagery, and a darkly romantic grotesque aestheticism, A Quiet Place in the Country is certainly a work of its time that will probably just plain agitate most modern viewers due to its erratic editing and music, and ambiguous brand of storytelling, but for those that understand and appreciate the film, it surely makes for one of the most absurdly underrated horror films—be it Italian or otherwise—ever made. Like a psychedelic surrealist take on Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s Martha (1974), albeit with the protagonist and director as the masochist and woman as sadist as opposed to the opposite scenario as featured the German New Cinema auteur's Sirkian melodrama, A Quiet Place in the Country lets the viewer know there is no escape from modernity, even in a place where gangsters, pimps, prostitutes, and Marxists are scarce, but the film does confirm that rural areas make for more scenic and spiritual living, though it might drive one to spiritual necrophilia with a romantic past that is long deceased, which still beats parallel parking and living amongst the assorted 'mystery meat' that populate corrupt cosmopolitan cities.

DOG DAYS

Ellie Lee (2001)

The first film I ever saw directed by Austrian auteur Ulrich Seidl (Import/Export, Paradise trilogy) was Hundstage (2001) aka Dog Days and as far as I am concerned, it is the filmmaker's greatest and most 'touching' work to date. Quite ironically, like Harmony Korine's Gummo (1997), I first saw Dog Days after renting it at Blockbuster of all places and was quite shocked that a subtitle-allergic family-oriented mainstream rental store would carry such a graphic anti-fantasy work. I also recall watching Dog Days for the first time and having my then-girlfriend's redneck/Melungeon family members randomly walk in and laugh at how the characters in the film were so "white trash." Indeed, it certainly says something when a group of uncultured, sub-literate American yokels goes so far as describing Austrians—their innate racial and cultural superiors—as 'white trash,' but of course that is one of the greatest appeals of a Ulrich Seidl film where the Aryan rabble rises to the top for all the world to see like strangely beautiful yet nonetheless sickening celluloid pond scum. Undoubtedly, in his obsession for unhinged realism, Seidl is certainly the Viennese equivalent to heeb hipster Harmony Korine, but unlike the Judaic jokester, who gets a real kick out of exploiting the most unprivileged of goys, the Austrian auteur approaches his subjects from a more 'empathetic' insider's perspective that attempts to understand the seemingly inexplicable. Like Short Cuts (1993) directed by Robert Altman, except with real Teutonic testicular fortitude and minus the somewhat contrived literary qualities, Dog Days depicts an eclectic collection of eccentric characters who sometimes randomly cross paths during the hottest days of the summer. Although the director's previous work Models (1999) was technically a 'fictional' film, Dog Days was Seidl's first serious attempt at creating a semi-mainstream feature, or as the auteur stated of the work in his official statement: "DOG DAYS marks an end as well as a beginning in my work. Dog Days is a so-called real feature film with a real script, real stories and real actors. And still, a lot is different. There was a script, but no written dialogue; there were actors, but many more non-actors; and my way of working was documentary." A strangely delightfully and shockingly humorous putrid portrait of Viennese domestic grotesquery in the Americanized post-Hitlerite age, Dog Days is a vehemently visceral work that engulfs you in the same dark suburban environment that sired incestuous rapist maniac Josef Fritzl. Taking its title from the most scorching time of summer (July 24–August 23, with the name 'Dog Days' deriving from Canicula/Orion's Dog, the constellation most present in the sky at this time), Dog Days also acts as a nice Schluchtenscheisser cultural counterpoint to Spike Lee's race-hustling summer scorcher Do the Right Thing (1989), albeit minus the outmoded jungle music and senseless 'slave rebellion' message.

An Austrian Aryan wigger with the ridiculous cringe-worthy name Mario

DOG DAYS

(René Wanko) is hanging out at a hip rave club and is royally pissed like a drag queen on the rag when he jealously witnesses a couple of young fellow Aryan men eyeing up his blonde Barbie girlfriend Klaudia (Franziska Weiß) dancing on a stage, so he makes a scene and leaves abruptly, smacking some strangers and his bitch before leaving rather abruptly in a fit of rage. The next day, an old widowed man who seems to suffer from OCD named Mr. Walter (Erich Finsches), who lives with his large guard dog and truly slavish and equally rotund and elderly housekeeper (who gives him rather repulsive stripteases, one of which he commends her by hilariously stating, "Well done, just like in the orient.") meticulously trims his hedges and does other pointless yard work to ostensibly fill the bottomless void that is his post-marriage non-life. Meanwhile, on the other side of town, a discernibly homely 30-something-year-old hitchhiker named Anna (Maria Hofstätter) with Asperger syndrome (notably, the pediatrician who the mental disorder was named after, Hans Asperger, was Austrian) verbally bombards people in their cars and proceeds to read off 'top ten' lists (i.e. ten most common deaths, ten best plasma TV models, etc.) and unwittingly insult her victims about their weight and dubious sexual habits. Not faraway, a divorced wife (Claudia Martini) is engaged in a rather repulsive group orgy with other rather repulsive 40+-year-old individuals and after concluding her session of group carnal knowledge, she heads to the roadside memorial site of her dead child, where she runs into her ex-husband Theodorakis (Victor Rathbone), who does not even acknowledge her presence. In fact, Theodorakis and his ex-wife still live in the same house together where they pretend the other does not exist. Desperate for work, an alarm system man named Hruby (Alfred Mrva) tries in vain to help discover who is responsible for scratching the fancy cars of a group of bitchy bourgeois folks who threaten his employment if he does not solve who is responsible for the petty crimes. Meanwhile, a used-up post-menopausal teacher (Christine Jirku), who is a Egon Schiele fan as demonstrated by her framed reproduction paintings on the wall, takes off her panties and bends over to wait for her sorry slob of a lapsed hippie lover Wicherl (played by real-life pornographer/sex club owner Victor Hennemann), but when he arrives, he shows up with his young ironically named younger friend 'Lucky' (Georg Friedrich) and proceeds to force her to get drunk and smacks her around for her lack of enthusiasm. Wicherl demands his girlfriend to do the following, "Sing, you dumb idiot. Come on, let's have a little more feeling, asshole. Like the Negro bitches...with baskets on their heads...of bananas, oranges, pineapples...La Cucaracha..." but she fails to do it to his liking, so he smacks her around some more and his friend Lucky proceeds to pour a bottle of beer over her less than pretty little head. In the end, Mario tells his girlfriend Klaudia she is a slut and smacks her around a bit, alarm system man Hruby solves his car-vandalizer problem by taking advantage of aspy-Fräulein hitchhiker Anna and delivering her to his sadistic customers (who beat and rape her for ostensibly scratching their automobiles), Lucky pulls a gun on Wicherl and humiliates him (forcing him to put a lit candle in his rectum and sing the Austrian national anthem at gunpoint) to avenge the teacher's honor (but she absurdly apologizes to Wicherl in the end and they make up), and someone poisons old, widowed Walter's dog. Quite fittingly, Dog Days closes with Mr. Walter—a man who threatens to call the cops on his neighbors for talking outside and whose typical highlight of the day is verbally reaming defensive grocery store clerks—stating, “People are so cruel.”

In one particularly heartwarming scene of Dog Days where Nordic white Negro ‘Lucky’ forces his friend Wicherl to sing the Austrian national anthem, the viewer pays witness to auteur Ulrich Seidl's wonderfully wicked apocalyptic sense of humor while seeing a Aryan untermensch with a bulging beer gut sing “Native home of many great sons...A people with a gift for beauty” at gunpoint in a scene that seems more at home in a Tennessee trailer park or Detroit crackhouse than in the capital of Austria. As far as beauty is concerned, Dog Days makes the physically warped yet wanton nude portraits of Egon Schiele seem like Arno Breker statues by comparison and the fact the film takes an inately realist approach only makes it seem all the more uniquely unhinged in its superlatively scathing (anti)humanism. While contemporary Austria is not exactly known for the most uplifting films, Dog Days takes things to a new level because, unlike the too-cool-for-school nihilism of Franz Novotny (Die Ausgesperren aka The Excluded, Exit... nur keine Panik) and pedantic arthouse shockers of Michael Haneke (Funny Games, The White Ribbon), Seidl is only interested in the hard and ugly truth and not mere masturbatory intellectual abstractions, hence the director's undying affinity for the documentary format and aesthetic. Indeed, not unlike a good many Germanic/European artists nowadays, one gets the sense that Seidl hates his people while watching Dog Days and the fact he contributed a segment to the far-left omnibus doc State of the Nation: Austria in Six Chapters (2002) only goes to show this, yet there is also a certain understanding and insight into his people in the work that, unlike Korine with Gummo, the filmmaker also accepts the fact he is a member of this race that he so gleefully aesthetically besmirches. Featuring weak women that are attracted to physically and emotionally brutal bullies, a middle-class that is so madly materialistic that they go so far as raping and beating mentally ill women as revenge for their precious property being tarnished, an upper-middleclass couple so unwaveringly cold that they live in the same house for assumed monetary reasons yet do not even recognize one another and think it is ok to have other sexual partners out in the open under the same roof, young men that are so insecure that they dress like they are black and beat up their girlfriends due to the totally unwarranted belief that they are cheating on them, educated post-menopausal women that are so lonely that they are willing to take endless abuse for lard asses, and an old man with a complete and utter lack of empathy for anything aside from his beastly guard dog, Dog Days ultimately portrays a patently perturbed people suffering from an emotional glacial period that no summer sun nor even nuclear apocalypse will melt.

Dog Days is the sort of film that Hollywood pseudo-arthouse works like American Beauty (1999) directed by Sam Mendes and The Weather Man (2005) directed by Gore Verbinski wish they were, but which lack the subtle naturalistic nuances, visceral aesthetic integrity, and unwaveringly unflattering honesty to transcend the phony dream factory that is the fanciful culture-distorting and emotion-contriving empty shell of Tinseltown. Rather ironically, while a distinctly Viennese regional work, Dog Days is almost just as much an indictment of America and its non-kultur as it is an assault on Uncle Adolf's Fatherland. Indeed, featuring a collection of mostly overweight, cheap, materialistic, and security-obsessed wack-jobs in a city with a McDonalds on every corner, Dog Days depicts a culturally degraded nation that has traded in their long and rich kultur for true 'creature comforts' that come with being a spiritually colonized people. Although Josef Fritzl tried to blame his insidious behavior on his 'nazi upbringing,' his actions more so demonstrate the sort of obscenely arrogant, soulless, self-absorbed do-whatever-the-hell-I-want attitude that has become synonymous with being American. And while Dog Days makes Austria seem like a country with a Prader-Willi syndrome and Asperger epidemic, in reality America is easily the fattest and most anti-depressant prescribed nation in the world, but of course you would not know that from watching Hollywood films. I know that Seidl would probably like to blame Austria's problems on the imaginary thing some call 'everyday fascism,' but whether the director wants to admit it or not, Dog Days ultimately portrays a spoiled and emotionally sour people who thrive on the perennial void that is materialism and have no sense of identity nor national culture and who might as well be German-speaking Americans. Featuring the apocalyptic cynicism of Cioran, the sweetly sardonic misanthropy of Paul Morrissey, the anti-bourgeois absurdity of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, the avant-garde Austrian angst of Peter Handke, and the scathing Germanic 'social realism' of John Cook and Uwe Schrader, Dog Days demonstrates with its mostly minimalistic yet visually keen scenarios and static yet nonetheless strangely striking tableaux that Austrian society has gone to the dogs and the dogs have become rabid. That being said, I can only guess what Ulrich Seidl thinks should be done to rabid dogs.

THE BLACK ROOM

Elly Kenner (1982)

While I used to feel differently as a child, I would have to say that, overall, the 1980s were a fairly shitty decade for American horror flicks, especially in regard to the exploitation world. Indeed, although the decade produced such classics as Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984), Sam Raimi's The Evil Dead (1981) and The Evil Dead II (1987), Dan O'Bannon's The Return of the Living Dead (1985), Clive Barker's Hellraiser (1987), and Joel Schumacher's sole worthwhile effort The Lost Boys (1987), the 1980s lacked the grittiness, sleaziness, seriousness, and true horror of brutal 1970s works like Wes Craven's The Last House on the Left (1972), Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), Jonas Middleton's hardcore art-horror-porn flick Through the Looking Glass (1976), Roger Watkins' The Last House on Dead End Street (1977), Phantasm (1979), the singularly sick oeuvre and misanthropic oeuvre of gutter auteur Andy Milligan, and countless other truly crude and vicious grind-house/exploitation works, which was partly the result of the rise of Reaganism and Hollywood co-opting conventions of the genre as a result of the monetary success of certain low-budget works turning them from rich and milky blood into stale water. Needless to say, I am fully willing to sample and embrace any 1980s horror flick that has teeth and bites and relies on schlocky vaudevillian one-liners, dimwitted dames with double silicone sacks, the first ever token negro and Asian characters, goofy 80s clothing like spandex and legwarmers, and shitty hair metal with masturbatory guitar solos. About two years ago I discovered such a work that does not have any of those cliché things (aside from an Asian, though she seems to be of the 'exotic' half-caste sort), but for whatever reason, I did not get around to seeing it until recently. Indeed, The Black Room (1983) aka Invasion of Terror: The Black Room written and co-directed by Norman Thaddeus Vane (Frightmare, Club Life) and Elly Kenner (who, despite his rather gay name, is not a woman) is a film you might call a 'lost gem' if you think Jörg Buttgerit's necrophile classic NEKRomantik (1987) is an art film and you have a nasty obsession with Guido artsploitation auteur Alberto Cavallone. In other words, The Black Room is a celluloid oddity that falls somewhere in between cinematic art and morally retarded sleaze, thus making for a work that will only be appreciated by a few.

A truly 'modernist' vampire flick with nil supernatural elements that was co-directed by an American Jew and an Israeli with no directing experience and shot at the Hollywood Hills home of the Mafia's 'literary representative' on a meager budget of $40,000 (including post-production costs) in 1981 over the course of "roughly ten fifteen-hour days" (indeed, it took two years before the film was released), the film should be a totally worthless piece of contrived and formulaic horror dribble that was meant to capitalize off of the stupidity of Americans, yet it is a fairly striking, singular, and stylish piece of elegant exploitation cinema that is like a west coast 'goth chic' take on George A. Romero's Martin (1976). More or less sharing directing duties in a similar fashion to how Donald Cammell and Nicholas Roeg worked together on Performance (1970), with Vane, who is the real 'auteur' of the film, being in charge of the actors and Kenner, who was just trying to make a quick buck (according to Vane, Kenner's then wife stated of his collaborator, "As soon as Norman signs the contracts I'm going to fuck him"), directed the camera, The Black Room—a literally and figuratively titled work that borrows its name from a darkened room like a bathhouse where people, especially gay men, go for sex—also benefits from the fact that it was shot by Robert Harmon, who would go on to be the director of the classic road-horror-thriller hybrid The Hitcher (1986) starring Rutger Hauer. The slightly sleazy but almost always stylish, oftentimes erotic, sometimes darkly humorous, and vaguely allegorical story of a suburban family man who is cruelly cock-blocked by his prepubescent children, so he runs a lavish 'black room' in a mansion owned by a quasi-incestuous brother and sister who kill the young girls their tenant brings because the brother suffers from a rare blood disease and needs constant blood transplants, the film is so unconventionally entertaining that it makes you wonder how auteur Vane is the same man who worked as a second unit director for porn-horror spoof Dracula Sucks (1979) starring Jamie Gillis.

At the beginning of The Black Room, a couple is having sex in the 'black room'—a dark and vaguely baroque room illuminated by an unforgettable glowing luminescent table and gothic candles and adorned with antique pillows, rugs, furniture, and various knickknacks—when the owners of the house, Guido-like 'blood junky' Jason (Stephen Knight, who was featured in the horrendous horror flick Necromancy (1972) starring Orson Welles as the leader of a witches coven) and his S&M-obsessed Asian sister(?) Bridget (semi-Europid-like Filipino-American Cassandra Gava of John Milius' 1982 hit Conan the Barbarian), slowly walk in and pull a creepy and craven form of coitus interruptus where they knock their two victims out with a needle. Of course, the victims never wake up, as Jason takes them to his makeshift blood opium den where he uses a device similar to an embalming machine to rob his prey of their vital fluid so he can shoot the liquid up his arm, which he does in such a fierce fashion that the tube explodes and squirts blood everywhere. After sucking the corpses dry (one of which is played by the film's executive producer Doug Cronin, an ex-professional football player), Jason puts them outside. Meanwhile in suburbia, Hebraic preppie Larry (Jimmy Stathis of the c-grade 1982 slasher Hospital Massacre) is trying to bone his wife Robin (TV actress Clara Perryman in her sole film role), but one of his kids soon puts a stop to that after waking up from a nightmare and calling for mommy and daddy. Larry reacts to this rather extremely by deciding to rent out a room where he can bring young and impressionable coeds, as well as more upscale hookers. Indeed, when Larry sees an ad in a newspaper reading "Hollywood Hills—Live Your Fantasy” for a room in a mansion in the Hollywood Hills for a mere $200, he cannot turn it down, but of course the price proves to be too good to be true, as the landlords plan to use their tenant as the unwitting procurer of their victims.

With his new secret pleasure-dome in the Hollywood Hills and overflow of sex with anonymous women, Larry becomes much happier with life and his sex life with his wife reaches an all-time high as well. In fact, Larry even goes so far as telling his wife Robin about the ‘black room,’ though he claims it is nothing more than a fantasy. When Larry stops by his hideout to drop off the month’s rent and cannot find Jason, he ends up finally talking to Bridget, who develops an instant infatuation with the not-so-tall, dark, and less than handsome tenant. Needless to say, Larry is quite excited to learn that Bridget is Jason’s sister and not his wife as he had once suspected. Disappointed that his latest sexual conquest has not arrived (the siblings most likely killed her), Larry takes up Bridget’s offer to join her in picking flowers where she reveals that her brother has bad blood, stating, “It’s a very rare blood disease [...] the medical term is Thalassaemia. It affects mostly Mediterranean types. Your red blood cells are different, so he has to constantly replenish his blood every 60 days. Then once a month. Now, twice weekly.” After picking flowers like a bunch of blueblood pansies, Bridget—a sadomasochist and exhibitionist who has various nude and fetishistic pictures of herself, which were taken by her own brother (!) adorning the walls of her home—covers her unclad body in psychedelic paint and engages in some unintentionally humorous sexual roleplaying where one plays a bull and the matador while big bro Jason snaps photos. Upon taking a break from pretending to be an amorous bull, Bridget states, “This is our moment of truth, Larry. Only, this time, you’re the bull and I’m the matador. See, the most beautiful thing in the world is to be killed by someone that you love.” Needless to say, Larry does not understand that Bridget is serious. When not killing and stealing the blood of his tenant’s concubines, Jason takes tons of Robert Mapplethorpe-esque S&M photos because, as he fiendishly states, “for every person, photography is my way of holding on to a little bit of their soul.”

Of course, all hell breaks loose when Robin finds the old newspaper advertisement and keys for her husband Larry’s black room, though she opts not to confront her spouse initially and instead decides to do some investigating. After arriving at the Hollywood Hills mansion, Robin discovers that all the people from Larry’s ‘black room’ stories are real, as she talks to Jason who coerces her into doing the same exact thing her husband is doing. When Robin asks Jason why he wants to help, he sinisterly remarks that it is “because the irony of it all appeals to me. The idea of you bringing in an unlimited supply of new people...fresh blood.” When Larry arrives at the dark room with a college student named Lisa (Charlie Young of Cheech & Chong’s Nice Dreams) and her boyfriend Terry (mainstream Hollywood actor Christopher Young of Thelma & Louise (1991) and Happy Gilmore (1996) in a pre-fame role) who is there to watch his girlfriend being boned because he just wants to “watch” and “take notes” for his psychology class, Robin watches her husband screwing the young girl via a two-way mirror that Jason has installed. When Robin breaks down and cries after catching her unwitting hubby in the act, Jason pretentiously states, “After we know the truth, comes sadness. All truth is terrifying, especially about ourselves and the people we love. Jealousy is your sickness...mine is need.” Deciding to get her revenge and have fun doing it, Robin opts not only to sleep with someone in the black room, but also to sleep with college kid Terry, whose girlfriend Lisa Larry slept with.

THE BLACK ROOM

Needless to say, Larry is in for quite a surprise when he sees his wife screwing tall dork Terry. When Larry later confronts Robin about her extramarital excursion, she states, “I had to feel what you had with all the others” and confesses that Terry was a better lay than him. Lisa also proudly proclaims, “I feel like a different woman” and “I realized I lost all my jealousy” and refuses to go to the black room after Larry makes her an ultimatum: “me or the room.” After getting in a heated argument with Larry, Robin storms out of their home and heads to the Hollywood Hills, not realizing that Jason and Bridget have killed Lisa and Terry and plan to kill her next. After leaving his kids with a teenage babysitter (scream queen Linnea Quigley of The Return of the Living Dead (1985) and Night of the Demons (1988)), Larry heads to the black room to get his wife, but not soon after he gets there he finds himself being knocked out and bound and tied. Meanwhile, Bridget attempts to coerce Jason into not killing Larry, stating, “Look Jason, you’re not my lover, you’re my brother...you’re my partner, you’re not my father. Oh, God...I just want someone to be close to...to sleep with,” but her brother simply replies, “No one can come between us and live.” To make matters worse, Bridget calls babysitter Millie and asks her to bring the kids to the Hollywood Hills. Luckily, Larry manages to free himself and Robin after seemingly choking Jason to death with his handcuffs shortly after Millie and the kids arrive. Eventually, Robin manages to stab Bridget in the throat with a wire while the tragically deranged semi-Asiatic she-bitch prowls the house. Somewhat inexplicably, as Larry and his family manage to escape after suffering temporary car trouble, Jason and Bridget somehow manage to rise from the dead. While driving away, Robin asks Larry, “Do you think that people like that ever really die? Somehow, I have a feeling that they go on living forever.”

As revealed in Stephen Thrower’s mandatory exploitation cinema text NIGHT-MARE USA: The Untold Story of the Exploitation Independents (2007), auteur Norman Thaddeus Vane had tons of trouble on the shoot, especially in regard to his novice Israeli co-director Elly Kenner (who he stated of, “We didn’t get along very well, obviously”), as well as the film’s producer Aaron C. Butler (who has no other film credits), who he unlovingly described as follows: “Aaron Butler, the producer, was a big red-headed Irishman of Jewish descent. He wore a Star of David around his neck, drank like a fish, cursed everybody and was totally obnoxious.” Despite the trouble he had on the production with his fellow Israelites, Vane is somewhat proud of the film as demonstrated by his fitting remark, “It was the only vampire film ever made where the people were real and really did have a blood disorder and their need for blood was real and not based on some mythical vampire legend.” While Vane went on to direct one or two more entertaining films, including the sleazy yet cheesy night club flick Club Life (1986) starring Tony Curtis, Kenner not surprisingly disappeared from the exploitation world and began directing and producing wholly Hebraic Israeli works like the 6-part film series Esoterica Jerusalem (1992), Visions of the Holy Land (1996), and the kosher family-comedy Mi Ha’ Abba? (1997). Like The Image (1975) of quasi-slasher exploitation, albeit with more testicular fortitude than Radley Metzger’s work due to its artistic pretenses and pseudo-aristocratic setting, The Black Room is ultimately a masterful work of failed cinematic art. Like Metzger, Vane certainly had the Hebraic talent for parroting European art house cinema.

With its subversive approach to vampire film genre conventions, modernist neo-Gothic aestheticism and foreboding essence, darkly debauched blueblood decadence, erotically-charged semi-surrealism, relative abstractness, and emphasis on style, tone, and atmosphere over substance, Vane’s flick is the work that Tony Scott’s The Hunger (1983) wishes it was, which is rather unfortunate considering The Black Room has never ‘officially’ been released on DVD (a bootleg DVD of the original VHS exists) and is dying to be restored (the VHS print is ultra-dark, so you sometimes cannot even see what is going on in the dark room). Featuring a seemingly Asperger-plagued pseudo-philosopher dandy Guido that sports Saturday Night Fever-esque popped collar button-up shirts with a murderous addiction to blood, a sadomasochistic nymphomaniac who seems just as obsessed with sex as having her picture taken, and a married couple that nearly succumbs to something much worse than a divorce after becoming enthralled with regular extramarital excursions, The Black Room is also an audacious, if somewhat amateurish, allegory regarding the metaphysical affliction known as addiction. Indeed, I surely found the film more effective, erotic, and even elegant than Darren Aronofsky’s junky-exploitation film on steroids, Requiem for a Dream (2000). Although inaccurately writing that the film is “Unique in the male-dominated blood horror universe in that it was directed by a woman, Elly Kenner” (what is up with Jewish men with female-sounding names?!), Bill Landis and Michelle Clifford were certainly right when they wrote in their work Sleazoid Express: A Mind-Twisting Tour Through the Grindhouse Cinema of Times Square (2002): “THE BLACK ROOM also reversed the rules of the Italian giallos, where people allow sexual psychopaths into their homes. Here, the ugly Americans go out naively and fall into destruction’s hands.” Indeed, the film certainly has a vague anti-American feel about it which is all the more highlighted by its almost European essence, as a work that would make for the perfect double-feature with Alberto Cavallone's all the more demented and bizarre effort Blue Movie (1978), especially considering both works have a relatively singular claustrophobic yet otherworldly feel to them. Indeed, it might be because I am a little bit biased, but The Black Room is easily the most artful and original Hebraic-directed horror/exploitation flick that I have ever seen, which makes it all the more fitting that the villain is a swarthy yet opulent bloodthirsty fellow with various aberrant sexual fetishes and pathologies.

INGLORIOUS BASTARDS

Enzo G. Castellari (1978)

This title might sound familiar due to the recently announced Quentin Tarantino remake under the watchful eyes of the Weinsteins. How appropriate for them to produce a film about killing as many Nazi's as you can in the allotted time -a German Whack-a-Mole, if you will. The original (Which was based off of The Dirty Dozen) was just recently given the DVD release it has always deserved from Severin Films. A group of criminals are being escorted from an Allied prison camp when they wind up being replacements for a team hired to blend in and sabotage a train deep inside Nazi controlled France. Inglorious Bastards is one of those films that are amazingly shot. Enzo G. Castellari formed a busy picture. Instead of the action or focus sticking on one central character, you can trail off and appreciate a full-motion scenery or read someones personality while the camera is on a character you don't entirely favor. Inglorious Bastards is a spaghetti war film, but don't let the title fool you. These guys may be inglorious, but they get the job done, although things get done rather messy with a smoldering horizon behind their turned backs. This group of anti-heroes is one you can love. Robert Yeagar (Bo Svenson) is the leader of the roughnecks who bares any uncanny resemblance to Daniel Craig of Bond fame. Fred Canfield (Fred Williamson; A personal favorite) is the cigar-swindling black hammerhead shark who steals the show and warrants a re-edit for the blaxploitation loving crowd. Due to the insane success of Williamson's other blaxploitation pictures, the original film was chopped & screwed to make a film called G.I. Bro. The footage was edited to make it appear as if Williamson was the main character. If there was ever a film that was "most American" that came from another country, Inglorious Bastards would take the cake. Fred's sly grin cracked open with a cigar, calling the German language "Mumbo jumbo" and the tag line "If you're a Kraut, He'll take you out!" this film makes sure no essence of German pride is retained after this. With the news of Tarantino turning the characters into Jewish Americans, I find myself doubting this film even more than before. The only way I'll appreciate it is with a cameo or role going to Fred Williamson. Inglorious Bastards is a film that ironically captures all the glory of classic action films. There's no rules on their playground of destruction. It's kill or be killed and that's the way they like it. This film has it all - nude Fräulein's, a ridiculous body count, black humor, and great all-around chemistry from the characters. This is a violent EuroCult period piece not to be missed.

GREAT WHITE

Enzo G. Castellari (1981)

But I'd rather call this film The Last Shark. Be as it may, Cover art for the tentatively titled The Last Shark is a rare image to capture. I had once acquired its gracious presence but it is forever lost to the insatiable and slutty appetite of my external hard drive. You say rip-off, I say classic. With these words forms the most concrete and audacious form of plagiarism barely on the cusp of being a worldwide horror hit. Great White opens with the clever formula of a town on the ocean being terrorized by a record size Great White. This Great White also happens to be retarded as it strays from all natural instinct and chooses to attack some insignificant beach outlet. Deaths pile up and obnoxiously hairy people get aggravated. Such with my knowledge of Vic Morrow, I witness him mercilessly hunt the shark, but WAIT! He's actually a doppelganger and Vic Morrow is the character who I'd last expect him to play; the Scottish "Quint". These brilliant tidbits of fanboy fanaticism create a debacle of daring handiwork. To mock the occasionally roaring shark in Jaws, This shark roars brazenly whenever it makes its repeated "head-slightly-above-water" appearance. Little quirks like these make for an absolutely fucking hilarious film experience. Scenes of exaggerated violence flow freely and without a camera shy director, this film is propelled to an instant cult hit. Victims in this film enter a new realm of embarrassment as they complete absolutely ridiculous survival tactics as shifting weights and jumping in the water. The shark is a magnet and the actors or characters in a Shinya Tsukamoto film, or at least that's the way it's filmed. There is no mercy for any characters. Even the mayor is devoured within an hour in a Deep Blue Sea moment that is perfectly preserved on film. Enzo G. Castellari has created many hits among horror/cult fans but is sometimes left behind in his own dust cloud. With The Last Shark, he strikes underwater gold. Despite Spielberg using a portion of his Jew gold to ban the film on the spot despite letting Bruno Mattei's Cruel Jaws off the hook (No pun intended). It appears that Mr. Steven is jealous of the infamous Nazi sensationalist hit Inglorious Bastards and decided to retaliate on the film maker. God only knows that Spielberg is the only director allowed to create the false serenity concerning "the Holocaust". Despite the controversy blowing this film up to be some scam, Great White manages to provide its own buoyancy throughout film history. It's a copycat film taking the steam of a film that consists of a serious plot, then adds some comedic elements (Unprecedented or not) and creates a slapstick spin-off of horror that equates into a epidemic of fun. This film does drag a bit from the start but picks up natural speed from the waves of violence. You can watch the full film here.

URSULA

Enzo Milioni (1978)

If there is an avant-garde film that comes anywhere close to depicting the unhinged psychosexual nightmare the was the abusive childhood of uniquely inarticulate white trash serial killer Henry Lee Lucas—the genetically challenged fiend that inspired the eponymous lead of John McNaughton's cult classic Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer (1986)—it is indubitably the ominously oneiric experimental horror short Ursula (1961) directed by little known subversive avant-garde auteur Lloyd Michael Williams (Line of Apogee, Two Images for a Computer Piece). Indeed, not unlike many serial killers and criminals in general, Lucas was abused by a single mother during his childhood and, like the poor little boy depicted in Williams' film, he was forced to wear a dress (in fact, Lucas' mother was a sexually savage prostitute that made her little boy watch while she was being sensually serviced by various strange men). Also like Lucas, the cross-dressing little boy in the film ultimately brutally murders his mother with a knife in what one might describe as an aberrant act of patently perverse poetic justice of the anti-Oedipal sort. Of course, judging by his later rather subhuman adult appearance, Lucas was probably never a pretty blond boy that could easily pass for a girl like the poor little eponymous lad in Williams' film, but I digress. While Curtis Harrington (Games, What's the Matter with Helen?) began as an avant-garde filmmaker and became a master of the covertly queer hagsploitation subgenre, Mr. Williams, who is all but completely unknown today, should be credited for directing what is the first (and probably last) experimental Grande Dame Guignol film. Indeed, it is almost incomprehensible to think that anyone, especially an American, would direct an experimental horror film in the early 1960s featuring a little dude in drag that concludes with said little dude brutally butchering his bitch of a mother with the same exact knife that she just used to slaughter her sexually confused son's new pet frog. To be fair, Ursula is a fairly subtle and hardly graphic film, thus its particular brand of psychosexual perversity might be lost on many contemporary viewers who expect to see buckets of blood and guts. Of course, as a man that previously directed an experimental surrealist adaptation of Lewis Carroll's 1871 poem Jabberwocky entitled Jabberwock (1959), Williams—an auteur that is even pretty much completely unknown among cinephiles and avant-garde film fetishists—was no ordinary filmmaker, but I guess one should not expect anything less in a country where art cinema is hardly respected and horror cinema is mostly considered titillating teenage trash.

While I am hesitant to go as far describing Ursula as a lost masterpiece, I certainly see it as a sort of important missing link of American avant-garde horror cinema that has yet to get its due as work featuring certain sexually subversive themes that predates works ranging from Frank Perry's post-psycho-biddy classic Mommie Dearest (1981) to classic sexually schizophrenic slasher trash like Sleepaway Camp (1983). Indeed, despite the fact that he was one of the co-founders of The Film-Makers' Cooperative aka The New American Cinema Group along with Jonas Mekas, collaborated with pioneering female animator and filmmaker Mary Ellen Bute on her film The Boy Who Saw Through (1956) starring a very young Christopher Walken, and has worked with important queer cinema figures ranging from Warhol superstar Taylor Mead to raging kraut queen Rosa von Praunheim, American avant-garde authority P. Adams Sitney did not even make a single reference to Williams or any of his films in his supposedly comprehensive text Visionary Film: The American Avant-Garde, 1943-2000, but then again he also forgot about important proto-counterculture auteur Peter Emmanuel Goldman (Echoes of Silence, Wheel of Ashes), among various other negligent omissions. Aside from James Sibley Watson and Melville Webber's quasi-Expressionist Poe adaptation The Fall of the House of Usher (1928), Harrington's 1942 amateur teenage reworking of the same Poe story and Fragment of Seeking (1946), and a couple other examples, American experimental horror cinema is all but nonexistent, with Williams indubitably being it's most criminally unsung auteur. Aside from Ursula, Williams also demonstrated a knack for the forebodingly cinematically phantasmagoric with esoteric cinematic poems like Opus#5 (1961) and Two Images for a Computer Piece (1969), with the latter featuring a notable original musical score by Vladimir 'father of electronic music' Ussachevsky. While I have not been able to track down his later longer cinematic works like Line of Apogee (1968) and Rainbow's Children (1975), Ursula seems to be his darkest and most daring yet, at the same time, most accessible and revolutionary film as a genuinely haunting homo oneiric celluloid nightmare made at a time when being a homo was more or less illegal and thus something to be petrified of, or so one would assume after watching the somewhat surprisingly unsettling short.

Based on the vaguely autobiographical short story Miss Gentilbelle by writer and sometimes screenwriter Charles Beaumont—a man probably best known for penning many episodes of the original The Twilight Zone TV series whose tragic death at the premature age of 38 as a result of “a mysterious brain disease” seems like something that he might have penned himself—Ursula is pure celluloid Americana in the greatest and most fullest sense as a piece of organic yank horror that can only be compared to a handful of other cinematic works like Richard Blackburn's criminally underrated Lovecraftian vampire lesbo flick Lemora: A Child's Tale of the Supernatural (1973) and Don Coscarelli's classic surrealist horror piece Phantasm (1979) in terms of contributing to a truly authentic and artful American horror film mythology that is completely outside the alien influence of the culture-distorters of Hollywood. Notably, Armenian-American NYU film professor Haig Manoogian, who acted as a mentor to a young Martin Scorsese and even produced his first feature Who's That Knock- ing at My Door (1967), is credited as an ‘advisor’ on Williams’ film. In fact, despite earning Williams the Bronze Medallion at the 1961 Cannes Film Festival (incidentally, he previously won the Silver Medallion for his short Jabberwock in 1959), Ursula is actually a student film, hence the completely unknown actors and composer. In my less than humble opinion, the film’s low budget and sometimes amateurish production values (including glaringly dubbed voices) ultimately work to its advantage, as Ursula, which feels like it is set in antiquated Anglophile realm that is equal parts Southern Gothic and Victorian Gothic, seems like the creation of a decidedly damaged young man that was less interested in trying to make a film to entertain people than to provide himself with therapeutic emotional release by documenting the decay of his own mind in a most visceral manner. Indeed, I do not know much about Williams but just by watching his fairly idiosyncratic horror short, which was notably made at a time when wholesome TV swill like The Andy Griffith Show was extremely popular, I would assume that that he had a sadistically bitchy mother who stunted his manhood and ultimately turned him into a woman-hating homo.

Undoubtedly, the central theme of Ursula is how damaged and broken things can never be fixed, especially when it comes to the mind. Indeed, at the very beginning of the film, tragic she-boy protagonist ‘Ursula’ (Calvin Waters, who has no other film credits aside from being the producer of an aborted reality TV show about an eponymous gay negro fashion designer entitled Living Life with Dwight Eubanks (2009))—a poor little lad who has been forced to live as a girl—accidentally tears a brand new dress he is wearing after falling from a tree upon being called to come inside by his supposed mother (Dorothea Griffin), henceforth leading to horrific consequence for the protagonist where he must learn a lesson about the impossibility mending. Naturally as a crazed cunt that wants to brainwash her son into becoming a girl, Ursula’s mother—a woman that is clearly too old to be his biological progenitor—is extra irked when he dares to do such a boyish thing as tearing his clothing whilst playing outside. After bitching to him like a sexually repressed witch on the rag, “Oh, you ungrateful child! Look at yourself – destroying your finery. Such a pity. It can never be replaced,” Ursula’s mother declares in a calmer yet all the more sadistic fashion, “Let’s play a little game about mending things, shall we?” and then demands that he go fetch his beloved pet parakeet. Although just a young and vulnerable child, Ursula realizes that his malevolent mommy has seriously unsavory intentions with his pet as he apologizes in advance to his bird by stating “I’m sorry little bird. I’m sorry” as if he already knows what will happen to it. Needless to say, Ursula’s mother slaughters the bird and even makes the boy protagonist hand her the knife that she uses to kill it with. In a scene that demonstrates Ursula’s seething hatred for his mother, Ursula thinks to himself “I hate you” while staring at her immediately after she kills parakeet. After killing the bird, Ursula’s sadistic mother hands the boy the bird’s dismembered body parts and states in a fashion that makes her sound like an old spinster school teacher who has devoted her life to gaining pleasure from covertly browbeating small and impressionable school children, "Take her in your hand. Do not forget her wings. Now then, shall we mend the tiny bird? Shall we put her together again? Glue her pretty little wing back?" to which he sadly replies, "No. Nothing can be mended." Of course, the emotional and psychological damage that Ursula's mother has done to him also cannot be mended as the fittingly creepy conclusion of the film ultimately demonstrates.

After suffering the trauma of witnessing the senseless slaughter of his most beloved pet by a wicked woman that is supposed to love and protect him, Ursula naturally suffers from severe nightmares that night involving swarms of screeching birds, sinister large gnomes, an ominously luminous moon, swinging gothic chandeliers, a desolate beach, and his mother calling his name and laughing in a maniacal fashion. In fact, Ursula's nightmare is so long, consuming, and intricately horrendous that he has to be physically awakened by his mother, who yells in his face while attempting to force him out of bed, "You have missed lunch. You were told to be downstairs prominently at 12:30 and instead I find you resting, like a lady of great leisure." After his rather rude maternal awakening, Ursula hangs out by a creek near his house where he discovers a frog that he makes his new but hardly improved pet. As demonstrated by his remark, "Ugly frog. Let's play a little game, shall we? Mommy will teach you how," Ursula fully realizes he will not have his new green buddy for long as he plans to sacrifice him to accomplish his own matricidal fantasies.

When Ursula shows off his new pet his mother, she predictably hatefully shouts in his face while grabbing him by the collar, "Really, you have surpassed yourself in wickedness" and then grabs a large dagger-like knife from a dilapidated cabinet with a broken glass window. When the gender-challenged boy protagonist reveals that he named the frog "Ursula," his mother remarks in a bitchy bourgeois fashion while brandishing the knife in a somewhat sensual manner, "Really?! ... But how very appropriate," thus underscoring her sick and seemingly insatiable sense of sadistic glee. While his mother is admiring the poor frog that she has just so senselessly slaughtered, Ursula quietly goes to the cabinet and grabs the knife that was just used to slaughter his green friend. Just as his mother drops the dead frog on the floor that she just killed while maintaining a facial expression of abject disgust, Ursula says "mother" and then kills her off-screen by brutally stabbing her to death (the only thing the viewer hears is her echoing scream which, as one reviewer already noted, anticipates the scene in George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead (1968) where Mrs. Cooper is stabbed in the cellar by her zombie daughter). In the end after the rather climatic scene of Schadenfreude inducing matricide, Ursula, who is now all alone and psychosis-ridden, rocks back and forth with his hands wrapped around legs while in a fetal position as he repeats to himself his dead mommy's words: "Wicked girl. Bad girl punished. Must be punished. Bad girl...punished. Must be punished." As the disturbing final scene reveals, the titular boy transvestite's mind cannot be mended. In that sense, Ursula almost feels like a kaleidoscopic avant-garde prequel to Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) where one learns how Norman Bates developed his mommy issues, cross-dressing tendencies, and fetish for carving up crazy cunts with knives. Thankfully, unlike later films featuring sexually deranged cross-dressing killers like Russ Meyer's Beyond the Valley of the Dolls (1970) and Paul Bartel's Private Parts (1972), Williams' film never succumbs to trashy campy humor or cheap sexual innuendos.

Undoubtedly Ursula is a film that cannot be fully appreciated unless one considers its particular historical context. Indeed, the film was made at a time when most America gays were still in the closest and thus queer filmmakers oftentimes sought more esoteric means to express themselves, hence why there is probably so few great fag experimental filmmakers nowadays. Additionally, considering the taboo nature of cocksucking at that time, it should be no surprise that many of the queer experimental filmmakers of the 1950s and early 1960s made films about internally tortured, troubled, and/or otherwise mentally unsound individuals as the early films of both Gregory J. Markopoulos and Kenneth Anger clearly reveal. Notably, in the handful of reviews that I found on Williams' film, about half of the reviewers did not even realize that the titular character was a boy, thus underscoring the film's quixotically queer essence. Certainly, it is dubious as to whether such a hermetically homosexual film where fagdom is a source of painful fear and loathing would be made nowadays, especially considering both the mainstream media and public schools are absurdly attempting to brainwash kids into thinking that trannys are normal and getting your dick chopped off is a normal medical procedure. Indeed, one could argue that Ursula is packed with the perturbed pathos of generations upon generations of raging closet queens. Incidentally, although the source story, Miss Gentilbelle is somewhat autobiographical in the sense that the author's mother used to punish him by making him wear a dress and even threatened to kill his pets, Beaumont was a rampantly heterosexual man and he even once wrote a short story entitled The Crooked Man that was published in Playboy in 1955 about a morally and sexually inverted dystopian world where heterosexuals are a minority that are actively persecuted by homos. Considering the rampant homo-approved language policing of the American public by the mainstream media and government institutions, bullying of bakeries and other private businesses and groups that do not comply with the softcore authoritarian aberrosexual agenda, and defiling of the American legal system via gay marriage and other patent absurdities that make a mockery of law and Western Civilization, it seems that Beaumont's story is not so far-fetched as the pink NKVD, like their Zionist compatriots, hold a preposterous amount of power in the United States, but I digress. Of course, if Ursula demonstrates anything about homos and their place in a supposedly homophobic Western society, it is that gay artists created more nuanced and enigmatic works before being gay become something to be ostensibly proud of.

As largely the result of being included as one of the films in the Other Cinema DVD compilation Experiments in Terror (2003) alongside vaguely similarly themed experimental horror shorts ranging from Peter Tscherkassky's The Entity (1982) revamping Outer Space (1999) to Damon Packard's ridiculously spasmodic avant-splatter piece Dawn of an Evil Millennium (1988), Ursula is undoubtedly Williams' easiest to find film. Notably, Miss Gentilbelle was later adapted by Alfred Hitchcock Presents director Robert Stevens under the titled 'Miss Belle' in 1968 for the Hammer Films TV show Journey to the Unknown. Additionally, a Hebrewess hack named Tara Miele, who recently created a stupidly sentimental and distinctly disingenuous anti-Trump agitprop PSA entitled Meet a Muslim (2016) for a rather dubious quasi-commie Jewish-Muslim propaganda outfit, directed a patently pointless version of the story entitled Miss Gentilbelle (2000). Needless to say, Williams' version is the greatest adaptation of Beaumont's story as the sort of film that makes the viewer fantasize about what the auteur could have done with the material of a horror literary maestro like H.P. Lovecraft had he had the budget and means to make an actual feature-length film with professional actors and a decent composer. Indeed, Ursula is the rare sort of cinematic work that makes me long for an organic American experimental horror cinema that unfortunately does not really exist, as it feels like a filmic tease from a movement that died in its infancy. While I have watched the film a number of times, it leaves me hungry for more ever single time in that sense that it is rather apparent that the Williams had the capacity to create so much more. I almost must confess that every time I watch Ursula, I am reminded about virtually every single serial killer that I have ever read about it. After all, it could be argued that the eponymous little boy is just as much the monster of the film as his loathsome mother, as he completely transcends her transgressions and graduates on to matricidal murder before he even reaches puberty. In that sense, the film is like a sort of anti-nostalgic coming-of-age film for serial killers as Henry Lee Lucas, Richard Chase, Gary Ridgway, Edmund Kemper, Bobbie Joe Long, and countless other real-life serial killers experienced childhoods involving maternal abuse similar to that of Ursula. Arguably more importantly, Ursula is, in terms of brutality and aesthetics, the closest thing to a fag filmic equivalent to a Brothers Grimm fairytale. Indeed, forget Larry Yust's Shirley Jackson adaptation The Lottery (1969)—a 20-minute horror short that is well known for scaring generations of American school children who were forced to watch it in their English classes—Williams' short should be mandatory viewing in public schools lest the United States be condemned with another generation of deluded fatherless youth who believe that cross-dressing is the height of cultivation.

VACANCY 2: THE FIRST CUT

Eric Bross (2008)

Let's go over the finalizing details of 2008 and the reincarnation of the DVD studio within early 2009. Let's take our first breath. The Lost Boys 2: The Tribe, Rest Stop 2, Vacancy 2: The First Cut, Pulse 2: Afterlife, Pulse 3: Invasion, Feast II: Sloppy Seconds, Joy Ride 2, Reeker 2, Without A Paddle: Nature Calling, Anaconda III, Alone in the Dark II, Boogeyman 2, Starship Troopers 3: Marauder, The Eye 3, and many others. This list is representative of Hollywood taking a steep clique change. Where as remaking J-horror was the only function they had acquired from experience, alas, they now know how to milk a family for all it's worth.

Allow me to tell you a secret. I've never seen Vacancy, nor do I plan on giving it a chance. On the topic of the Hollywood myth of snuff material, 8mm was raw, coarse, and a damn fine film for that matter. I don't need a Luke Wilson vessel for a shady-business type deal. Besides, what kind of snuff film is one with little-to-no sexual activity. If I wanted to watch people being murdered without intercourse or fetishist values, I could open up a new tab in the wonderful browser of Firefox. 3 words in a search engine could get me my fix of boring sensationalism. With only one character of the predated sequel (paradox?), Vacancy 2: The First Cut doesn't do much for the viewer who hasn't seen the original. The character of Smith is the only returning character which means that most of the villains are mere fodder. The idea of a snuff film is tossed around within the origin, but the whole scheme is so laughably conceived that it's incredibly hard to believe. "So wait. You're telling me people buy videos of people getting murdered? Well hot damn! Why didn't we think of this sooner?" Vacancy 2: The First Cut attempts to establish an "Argyle" character shortly within but falls short of steam. For being apart of the Straight to Video DVD sequels that are squelching & soulless, Vacancy 2: The First Cut is an alright horror film. Well, not even really a horror film. The idea is suspense in itself. Devoid of strengths and lacking weaknesses, this prequel to Vacancy simply exists. At times it's enjoyable and acknowledgeable but at other times, the film is tedious, stuffed with clichés, and lacks nudity and violence. And we all know if all else fails, these "stocking stuffers" do strengthen a film.

PINK ULYSSES

Eric De Kuyper (1990)

Apparently influenced by the similarly titled and homoerotically themed arthouse work Pink Narcissus (1971) directed by James Bidgood, Pink Ulysses (1990) is a potent yet unwaveringly pretentious piece of esoteric pomo homo celluloid that radically reworks Homer's epic poem the Odyssey in a campy, carnal, and even comical fashion that trades in cinematic action-adventure conventions for a sort of arcane celluloid aphrodisiac. Directed by Belgian auteur Eric De Kuyper (Naughty Boys, A Strange Love Affair) who described his contemporary cross-European heritage as follows on his official website, "I was born in Brussels. So I speak and write English with a French accent; Dutch with a French accent; and German with French and Dutch accents!," Pink Ulysses, although a Belgian-Dutch co-production, features dialogue in German, French, Italian, and English, yet one does not need a serious understanding of any of these languages to appreciate the work as it is virtually a modern silent film featuring a number of exquisite tableaux in the camp dandy spirit of Werner Schroeter, albeit more butch, with some aesthetic and thematic ingredients from Kenneth Anger, Carmelo Bene, and Luchino Visconti thrown in for good measure. In fact, even if one understands all of the scantily spoken languages in De Kuyper's postmodern tragicomedy, there is no guarantee that one will be able to follow the film as it is an audacious yet oftentimes cinematically archaic arthouse flick of the sometimes pornographic sort that mixes kaleidoscopic images of Odysseus' return home after twenty years of exile in Troy with seemingly pointless modern day black-and-white footage of a funny self-fondling fellow who seems to live the life of a lonely male 'housewife' doing such daring and heroic things like ironing shirts, masturbating in front of mirrors, treating homely naked women like cheap furniture from IKEA, and other activities that would have probably inspired our hero Odysseus to commit suicide out of sheer boredom. Director De Kuyper, who also wrote the 'original' screenplay, described the film as follows: "Homer tells us how Ulysses' wife Penelope used to weave Laertes' shroud. The work she did by day she unravelled by night. That process was not dissimilar to the creation and production of Pink Ulysses. Gradually images (collected here and there, also from film classics) and well and lesser known music created a texture of sight and sound, resulting in a variation on Ulysses." Featuring excerpts from classic silent films like Battleship Potemkin (1925), most specifically the most seemingly homoerotic scenes (apparently, Sergei M. Eisenstein was more on the pink team than the red one), Pink Ulysses is essentially an acutely arcane and fiercely fetishized homophile molestation of both Occidental history and cinema history, yet it will mainly appeal to arthouse fans of any stripe, including those with nil interest in terribly tanned 1950s beefcake pinups, hence why De Kuyper's film was well received at the 1990 Rotterdam Film Festival and virtually everywhere else it was screened and is not known outside the world of European arthouse cinema.

If Jean Cocteau ingeniously used the ruins of post-WWII Paris as the perfect setting for updating the classic Greek myth of Orpheus with his masterpiece Orpheus (1950) aka Orphée, Eric De Kuyper somehow thought it would be wise to turn the Homer's Greek hero Odysseus into a 1950s-style crypto-homo muscle mag hunk that is lacking in both wit and heroism, at least in any realistic and genuinely masculine sort of way, with Pink Ulysses, a suavely stylized epic without much action, but tons of man meat and muscles. Of course, the Odysseus of Pink Ulysses is far more interesting than the flagrant fairy that makes up the contemporary black-and-white portion of the film. Opening the film ironing his shirt in a rather erratic and seemingly nonsensical fashion, the prissy 'modern man,' who never puts his shirt on again for the remainder of the film, enjoys masturbating and gazing in the mirror, which is indubitably an expression of his narcissism and loneliness, and when an unclad automaton of a woman shows up at his door, he clearly does not know what to do with her as a less than manly mensch who prefers to spill his seed instead of spreading it in the vaginal realm. If anything is for sure, Odysseus and his journey offer the contemporary character not only an elaborate romantic fantasy of the marvelously masturbatory sort, but also a striking dichotomy for the viewer of a majestic mythic past and the prosaic present, where domestic chores like ironing make for a stupendously banal way for one to spend one's day. Of course, Odysseus, who need not worry about wearing shirts and electricity, has so much free time that he can spend a scenic and sensual seven years with a beauteous babe named Circe, who looks good enough to be his wife but is all the more spellbindingly seductive. Despite his propensity for attracting striking statuesque women, the orgasmic (indeed, he always has a smile on his face as if someone is continuously smoking his pole) Odysseus of Pink Ulysses has a seemingly endless proclivity towards softcore exhibitionism, especially around other men, who have nothing on his brawn and biceps. If Odysseus of Pink Ulysses is cunning, it is only in the most philistine hustler-like sort of way, simply using his Breker-esque physique to lure in his pretty prey. Naturally, as everyone knows, many male suitors attempt to claim Odysseus' wife Penelope by trying their ultimately inferior skill at the great king's bow, but the great king and his son Telemachos inevitably kill them all in the end, thus immaculately handling family matters with gusto. Like Alberto Cavallone's Le salamandre (1969) and Federico Fellini's And the Ship Sails On (1983), the director and his crew are revealed at the conclusion of Pink Ulysses, henceforth demystifying the movie myths and slapping the viewer across the face with the banality of reality.

In regard to his take on Odysseus' twenty years of epic limbo, director Eric De Kuyper offered the following hint regarding his rather idiosyncratic and inventive celluloid puzzle: "Perhaps Penelope began to love her son more than her diſtant, absent husband? And poſſibly Ulyſſes began to love the ‘ideal Penelope’ he recognized in magical Circe more than his wife, who would be waiting for him in Ithaca? Perhaps... and the imagination lingers on... How this materializes in a film, a fabric, is Pink Ulyſſes’ ſecret. An exploration, an adventurous wandering.” Indeed, Odysſeus’ odysſey materializes in a rather claſſically camp, anti-reality ſort of manner that, whether the intention of the director or not, demonſtrates how really absurd the Greek tragedy truly is. Why Odysſeus, who is on what amounts to a permanent vacation full of captivating ſcenery and otherworldly ſensuality, even bothers to go back to his wife and ſon in Pink Ulyſſes is anyone’s guess, but it is quite obvious that director Eric De Kuyper was looking to make a piece of aeſthetically antagoniſtic body worſhip that ſpends juſt as much as time fawning over the ultra-maſculine male phyſique as it does obſcuring its meſſage. An arthouse anti-epic that, in terms of action, only features vintage ſilent footage of men wreſtling men and other crypto-homo ſcenes from film hiſtory, Pink Ulyſſes is maſculinity painted pink by a man who is obviously not a fan of Spartacus (1960) and David Lean’s Lawrence of Arabia (1962), but has clearly ſcoured every curious crevice of cinema hiſtory to ſhow that homos have always ſat in the director’s chair. Featuring excerpts from The Fall of Troy (1911) directed by Giovanni Paſtrone, Strike (1925) and Battleship Potemkin (1925) directed by Sergei M. Eiſenſtein, and the Cocteau penned work Love Eternal (1943) aka L’éternel retour directed by Jean Delannoy, Pink Ulyſſes is eſſentially a celluloid love letter to queer film hiſtory that goes to great pains to make ſure that Steven Spielberg and even Sam Peckinpah fans find the whole experience to be completely and utterly impenetrable. While Pink Ulyſſes does feature an authentic pulſating cock buſting a load, the film does not feature any ſcenes of real gay romance, thus following in the cinematically orphic footſteps of the homo auteur filmmakers that came before. Of course, like Pink Narciſſus, Pink Ulyſſes is not a ‘fags only’ flick, but an exquisite, if not flawed, cinematic work that reminds all viewers that, in their need to conceal and obſcure their ſexuality, queer filmmakers found creative and allegorical ways to expreſs themſelves, which certainly beats the ſlavish cult of victimhood and lack of originality that plague moſt mainſtream (and ſo not ſo mainſtream) gay films today. Indeed, I doubt anyone would care about their films today if maſter sodomite auteur filmmakers like Pier Paolo Paſolini, Curtis Harrington, Rainer Werner Faſsbinder, Jean Cocteau, and Kenneth Anger made propaɡanda works promoting gay marriage and queers adopting children. Pure, claſſic, and cultivated camp, Pink Ulyſſes is evidence that Nordics can ſtill make worthwhile arthouse films if they try.

MALÉFICES PORNO

Eric De Winter (1978)

The French have a fine reputation for freaky fucking, xenophilia, miscegenation, and colonialism, so it is only natural that some fucked up frog would eventually direct a ridiculously racially-charged porn flick featuring a monstrous mandingo negro partaking in Eurupid flesh in a bestial fashion, but I never thought I would discover a work as wantonly whacked out as Maléfices porno (1978) aka Maléfices pornographiques aka Cavern Bondage directed by one-time-auteur Eric De Winter. Indeed, the film was deemed so degenerate in frogland upon its initial release that it was banned for two years, with the censor board writing regarding the work on 8 February 1977: "This film poses a problem of unusual severity. Outside images heavily and specifically sexual, developed in the most squalid conditions - the film climbs quickly to a level that exceeds the simple ranking on the list of pornography within the meaning of Articles 11 and 12 of the Law of the 30 December 1975. More problematic, in fact, are sequences of cruelty and sadism - tortures; scenes of blood; sexual abuse - racism - a long scene where a black man is obligingly reduced to a sexual object - terror finally - the vision of the bride diving naked and unconscious in a sulfuric acid bath. Despite the poor achievement of the direction that mutes the effect, the Control Commission has considered that this dishonorable film was not only injurious to the human person, but a danger to the mental and psychological integrity of an important part of the audience, even adult. It has accordingly concluded, unanimously, that the threshold of a total ban was reached." Indeed, I can certainly see how some spineless and spiritually castrated government bureaucrats in post-colonial France might be worried by a film featuring whites babes torturing the genitals of a King Kong-like negro who later rapes an impotent white degenerate. Originally mad with the intention of appealing to the American S&M crowd, Maléfices porno, which was apparently shot in a cave north of Paris, was then revamped by auteur De Winter to appeal to the distinct tastes of fur-lickers. As a result of the pansy politically correct censors, the film was severely butchered and only exists today as a 57-minute cut, which was recently rereleased on DVD as a limited run of 300 copies by Serious Publishing. A phantasmagorical and somewhat psychedelic porn flick about a sexually impotent and unhappily middle-aged frog fellow of the rather physically repulsive sort who fantasies about inflicting brute carnal force on virginal white chicks and a beefy buck negro, Maléfices porno could be seen as an unconscious allegory for the degraded place of Frenchmen in the post-colonial/post-feminist age. Probably the most conspicuously exploitative racially-charged 'horror' flick since Ouanga (1936) aka The Love Wanga, Maléfices porno is a seriously perverse reminder why (sado)masochism and miscegenation go hand-in-hand.

An impotent frog cuckold (Gilbert Servien) who skinny arms yet a big gut attempts in vain to masturbate while his wanton wife (Laurence Jarry) gets involved in a less than titillating threesome with some dorky dude with a glaring bald spot and another woman. That night while lying in bed with his oversexed spouse, the supposedly horny yet ultimately sexually hapless Husband attempts to get his lover to screw him, but she complains, “You know that you can’t,” and confirms his lack of sexual virility by taking a peep at his perennially flaccid member. Before turning the lights off and going to bed, the Husband reads a trashy pulp novel on voodoo, which assumedly sends his mind into the gutter because when he falls asleep, he dreams of being a depraved sexual dictator with a limp dick who seems to have stolen his wardrobe from Coffin Joe. Taking place inside a poorly furnished cave covered in debris, Maléfices porno depicts in debasing detail what happens when an impotent frog fantasies about being a real man. At his command, the Husband has his Wife bring in two young women—a blonde and brunette—whose assholes he probes and pokes with his fingers in a rather raunchy fashion. When the less than well hung Husband gets bored with the girls, he has them cut-up with a blood-splattering buzzsaw. To liven things up a bit for him and his equally lethally lecherous lady love, the Husband brings out a gigantic buff negro named ‘L’Hercule’ aka Hercules (played by Manu Pluton, who previously appeared in Jacques Scandelari’s 1973 artsploitation masterpiece Beyond Love and Evil and later starred a “murdered Arab” in The French Connection II) and states of him while probably putting the bound black beast on display, “Look, look at this beautiful monster I’ve bought in Barbès.” A platinum blonde slave in a angelic white robe is also brought out so that the Wife can eat out her pussy. After chowing down on her Sapphic slave’s mighty meat curtain, the Wife begins torturing big black Hercules by waving her tits in his face while he is in bondage. Needless to say, the giant jigaboo is hungry for white pussy, but he will also develop a distinct taste for hatefully penetrating middle-aged French manholes.

After cutting off his exceedingly gay yellow thong with a dagger, the Wife begins stroking and sucking the gigantic jigaboo’s burnt black snake, but of course, she pulls her despoiled mouth away before the negro slave can spill his dark seeds. Of course, the Wife eventually rides the black buck, though she finishes him off by jerking him off, for she surely wanted to avoid being impregnated with untermensch seed. After humping Hercules, the Wife forces the platinum blond to pissing in her hubby’s mouth. Like a demented prison dyke, the Wife also forces the brutalized blonde to munch on her meaty main vein and her impotent slave-driving Husband gets so jealous that he drives a butcher knife into the poor girl’s stomach. After diddling his Donkey Kong dong with a whip, the Wife begins driving pins into Hercules’ ebony skinflute while sadistically stating, “What’s up, cute boy? I’m going to put your big dick inside you up to your belly. You’re going to like that.” Needless to say, when Hercules manages to escape from his bondage, he goes berserk and savagely sodomizes the Husband, who takes it like a little bitch. When the Husband wakes up screaming from his debauched dreamed turned exceedingly emasculating nightmare, he decides his wanton wife must die, stating to himself, "What joy when this bitch is going to dissolve in a fat broth! It's her fault if I can't raise mast again. It's her fault only. It's her fault if I can only have sex in blood. In blood and death. Yes, it's her fault. That bitch! She's heavy but soon she'll weigh nothing." As he drops his unconscious wife into bathtub full of what looks like a curious cocktail of vomit and diarrhea but what really is sulfuric acid, the Husband says, "So long...bitch...So long," and proceeds to laugh manically.

Maybe it is because I am mostly into vanilla sex, but it is rather hard for me to imagine someone deriving sexual satisfaction from Maléfices porno, which is nothing short of aberrant aesthetic torture of the patently pathetic sort. Indeed, the only people that the film might arouse are white cuckold horror fans that fantasize about their girlfriends being buggered by belligerent black beasts, or ruined white sluts with a perverse predilection towards dark meat. Of course, unlike when the film was first released, cuckold porn is apparently rather big nowadays, thus demonstrating that the French are truly the 'progressive' perverts that they have always been stereotyped as. Indeed, the only thing I could think about while watching Maléfices porno is that the French seem to have never gotten over the unfortunate fact that they were defeated and exterminated by negro slaves during the so-called Haitian Revolution, which was partly metaphysically influenced by voodoo. Of course, voodoo does not make an appearance in (non)auteur Eric De Winter's fuck film for nothing. Aside from being uniquely ugly and absurdly amateurish vintage celluloid smut, De Winter's film features a seemingly accidental quasi-psychoanalytic depiction of the post-colonial French male mindset. Indeed, one could argue that the antihero's anal pillaging by a negro sex slave is an aberrant allegorical representation of the Haitian Revolution, though that would probably be giving De Winter too much credit. Of course, as they say, once you go black you never go back, especially after having your rectum ripped by the schlong of a crazed colored King Kong. It should be noted that during the Haitian slave revolt, it was not uncommon for black 'revolutionaries' to rape white women on top of the corpses of their husband and children, which certainly makes De Winter's film seem rather weak by comparison. While I cannot say I got much out of the film aside from a couple giggles, Maléfices porno did make me realize that Jean Rollin is more of an artist than I originally gave him credit for, as De Winter's would-be-wanton-but-mostly-rotten fuck flick certainly makes The Rape of the Vampire (1968) aka Le viol du vampire seem like a lavish Bressonian arthouse masterpiece.

LA FEMME 100 TETES
LA FEMME 100 TETES

Eric Duvivier (1968)

The importance and purpose of special effects have changed drastically since the early pioneering days of cinema. What was once the trade of film magicians has been contemporarily morphed and bastardized into a mongrelized gimmick used by the cunning businessmen and carny hucksters of Hollywood who use special effects as a tool to degrade and ultimately hypnotize the viewer through their meaningless collages of retarded and irrelevant shadowplays that have no meaning aside from the obvious (in other words; what you see is what you get and nothing more). Instead of Georges Méliès – a true special effects Cinemagician – the modern world has James Cameron – a soulless big-budget schlock manufacturer whose depth of vision is shallower than that of the amount of urine contained in the recently deceased filmmaker Leonard Castle's deathbed bedpan. Additionally, there is no modern filmmakers that comes even close to the groundbreaking cinema poetry of trans-medium artists like Jean Cocteau and Man Ray; men whose pioneering special effects techniques were invented not just to wow the viewer, but to provide their adventurous audiences with motion-picture poetry. The other night, I had the grand scopophilic pleasure of viewing the neglected and rarely seen 1968 short La femme 100 têtes directed by French auteur Eric Duvivier; a film based on a collage book of the same name published in 1929 by German Dadaist/Surrealist artist Max Ernst. Despite never having the opportunity to view the book La femme 100 têtes, it was quite unmistakable to me that the 1968 film was based on the German surrealist's work, as the short is full of the same grotesque yet acutely attractive eroticism and splendid derangement as Ernst's paintings. Essentially, La femme 100 têtes is a cinematic collage of moving pictures and paintings, as if artistic works by Max Ernst came alive in a similar vein to that of the fantastic horror comedy Waxwork (1988), except with refined artistry and timeless imagery.

Max Ernst's original 1929 book La femme 100 têtes is an abstract work about a woman living among ghosts and ants with an allegory for Immaculate Conception, but Duvivier's 1968 adaption seems to enter into darker yet more humorous realms of appended ambiguity. For some, La femme 100 têtes will be a most horrific nightmare, but for others (myself included), the short will be a splendid fantasy for dreamers of the day. Max Ernst was a master at turning seemingly aberrant and malformed subject matter into works of awe-inspiring beauty and intrigue. In the short La femme 100 têtes, director Eric Duvivier somehow achieved what seemed to be impossible; transferring the essence of Max Ernst's work onto the silver screen. Of course, La femme 100 têtes seems to be influenced by other artists aside Herr Ernst, as the short echoes back to Jean Cocteau's surrealist masterpiece The Blood of a Poet (1930) and the early collaborations between Luis Buñuel and Salvador Dalí (An Andalusian Dog and

The Gold Age). What is most striking about La femme 100 têtes is the film's apocalyptic portrayal of various voluptuous and mostly topless buxom beauties. Throughout the short, various men can be seen killing each other whilst a female Venus figure stands on and views from the distance in a most sinister manner. The tantalizing and hypnotizing breasts of these women are the equivalent of an anti-Golden Fleece, as they weaken and cripple a man's martial prowess and nobility to the loathsome level where he can no longer be concerned with anything else. The portrayal of women as wicked sinners in La femme 100 têtes is similar to how Polish symbolist writer Stanisław Przybyszewski characterized the sinful Christian churches and clergy in his excellent work The Synagogue of Satan (1897) view of the fairer sex. Przybyszewski – who was one of the earliest students of German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche's work – stated that historically, Christian churches and leaders in Europe – who hypocritically enjoyed sexually torturing and murdering so called heretics – turned all that was natural (most importantly; man's lust and eroticism) into the most unholy tool of the devil himself. Max Ernst – who was brought up in a Catholic middle-class family in Cologne, Germany – was certainly haunted by anti-sex religious tales that he learned as a child, no doubt falling prey to the perverse church teachings that glorified the anti-human, abstracted, and altogether inorganic. Whether you're religious or not; you will indubitably find La femme 100 têtes to be an utmost compelling spiritual experience, as the film is a virtual tribute to purgatory where one's lust and demons haunt the viewer well after the film concludes.

In my humble opinion, the Dada/Surrealist artists were the last great movement of artists in the Occident. Although they tended to capture the ugliness of man/woman and life like their degenerate hack successors, many of them also had well developed skill/technique, religious beliefs (mostly of an occult nature) and the ability to capture the height of idiosyncratic grace. Unfortunately, such dignified artists are far and few between nowadays. When I found out that untermensch "artist" Andreas Serrano's Piss-Christ photograph was finally destroyed (after being vandalized various times beforehand) on May 17, 2011, I couldn't help but to wickedly snicker. After all, Dada artists like Max Ernst had more talent and expression in their actual piss than a poor modern blasphemous artist like Serrano has in his entire body of work. When compared to a film like La femme 100 têtes, Piss-Christ seems like nothing more than the polluted and recycled urine that it was engulfed in, as Serrano's work is glaring evidence in regards to the total and (unfortunate) bankruptcy of modern art. Whereas Piss-Christ is quite stupid and disposable (thankfully, it was disposed) that was literally made from the rancid urine of a posturing pseudo-artist, La femme 100 têtes is a delightfully intriguing and inquisitive work that provokes thought in Christians, Satanists, and nonbelievers alike. If you're one of those oh-so rare discerning cinephiles that is looking for a totally distinct and equally liberating film, La femme 100 têtes offers such a delectable and monumental cinematic

It is apparent that the director of the film, Eric Duvivier, is one of those tenuous and anomalous filmmakers who rightfully approaches cinema as a serious artistic medium, for La femme 100 têtes is a work that features the godly level of experimentation explored by such master auteur filmmaker's as F.W. Murnau, Carl Th. Dreyer, and Kenneth Anger. Despite being shot in black-and-white, the short is more colorful than an unending rollercoaster of rainbows on fire. To call Duvivier a winsome cine-maniac auteur would be a terrible and misleading understatement, as every single shot contained within the film has more going on in both theme and visuals than the entirety of your typical Hollywood lackluster blockbuster, for the La femme 100 têtes is a pleasant cock-and-ball-buster where the mise-en-scène is comprised of otherworldly seasons of ferocious felicity, thus throwing the viewer into a Dadaist abyss of evil eros and Luciferian female dictatorship. During one scene in the film, a gluttonous slob obliviously carries on eating as the building he is housed in collapses before his food-obsessed eyes. Personally, I like to see that scene as a metaphor (although this was obviously not the director's intent) for brilliant films like La femme 100 têtes, as while art is collapsing and disappearing from the modern Occidental world, the general public stays magnetized to the soulless and equally irrelevant works of platitude and dribble that are tiresomely released by the malignant Tinseltown monster. Facts may tend to be stranger than fiction, but the phantasmagorical world of La femme 100 têtes is more magical than the wildest of real human dreams. If the world as we now it really is on the short road to Armageddon as many people seem to think, La femme 100 têtes is a rapturous filmic prophecy to that somewhat likely scenario. In the age of Kali Yuga, Max Ernst is certainly one of the greatest saints, thus, by creating La femme 100 têtes; Eric Duvivier proved he is one of the German Dadaist artist most studious and proficient monk disciples.

TWEEK CITY

Eric G. Johnson (2005)

Tweek City is the kind of film that i can get used to. A film which gives you very little expectations except for the lead actor. A film that takes a formula and adds it's own quips to it. An intelligent, yet haunting film documenting the personal decay of a sad soul. Giuseppe Andrews plays Bill, a man who refuses to sleep due to his reoccurring nightmares. For this reason, he takes speed nearly everyday, living from his speed tweek and walking the streets at night. Soon, accidents begin occurring, and his frightful past begins to catch up to him, in a hellish way. Tweek City is a film that lives within itself. It doesn't stray onto unfamiliar turf, but provides for an entirely new cinematic experience. It manages to provoke necessary thoughts and shock and horrify you, while still giving you that much needed laugh. I'd be lying if i said i thought this film would be good without Andrews, but therein lies the myth. Tweek City feels chock full of Andrew's own work, almost as if this part was wrote for him. The films own view of the modern Jew was also quite hilarious. I wonder if Andrews really thinks of them as low as he admits in his film. Tweek City features a droning, pulsing score that echo's his own sanity being shaken to the core. Paranoia and lust accompany this mans journey to find bliss. The film's very own ending even surpasses the brilliance of The Believer's own. Sexual confusion is at foot and plays a prominent role in his inability to connect with any person. Maybe this explains why Giuseppe is a recluse. The only thing that frustrated me, was the optical blurring. It was a bit unnecessary. It takes it's low budget indie theme and propels it to places where few have wandered; a wasteland of personal films bent on the destruction of your own emotions. Tweek City is highly recommended viewing material, especially for any fans of Giuseppe Andrews. Deus Ex Machina's have never been so insightful.

Eric M. Nilsson (1968)

Bernardo Bertolucci's pro-Marxist epic 1900 is quite the disappointment. Despite being a fan of Bertolucci and his perverse commie films, 1900 could quite possibly be the biggest failure of the Italian director's long and for the most part successful career. The film stars two international (not Italian) heavyweights Robert De Niro and Gerard Depardieu. These two actors play childhood friends who later become enemies due to their obvious class differences.

Bertolucci seemed to only have two focuses when directing 1900 that ultimately destroyed this mess of an "Epic." First, Bertolucci focuses on the sexual differences between the "honorable" proletarian and the "cowardly" capitalist. The proletarian (poor worker) seems born to screw as shown by Bertolucci's emphasis on a young worker's sexuality (that borders on child pornography). The capitalist child is sexually inferior and shows great admiration for his proletarian friend's sexual potency. Like many communist fetishists, Bertolucci seems most interested in analyzing the sexual differences between both social classes. The second focus of 1900 ties in with the first focus. The proletarian is portrayed as honorable, strong, and stoic. As you can expect, the capitalist is portrayed as cowardly, weak, depressed, and self-loathing.

Many of the actors featured in 1900 lack chemistry with one another. I assume that Bernardo Bertolucci casted De Niro and Depardieu due to their international statuses. I just see it as sacrilegious of Bertolucci to not cast real Italians in the lead roles. The two leaders aren't really believable as "best friends" from different classes. The closest they seem to get is when De Niro touches Depardieu's genitals as they both attempt to share a lady.

I found Donald Sutherland's role as Atilla the sadistic Italian fascist to be the most powerful performance. This blue eyed and blond haired devil finds enjoyment in breaking a child's skull open against a wall. Atilla is portrayed in a way that would even make Steven Spielberg's caricatures of "Nazis" look tame. For some insane reason, Bernardo Bertolucci (like most Marxist and Marxist sympathizers) believes communists to be heroes. The facts have proven that the number of people Marxists have killed make fascists look tame in comparison. Bertolucci's Freudian projection (portraying fascists as killers and proletarians as peaceful) of sorts is obvious as his sexual perversity. I am sure Bertolucci has dreams of raping young fascists with his "revolutionary" hero Leon Trotsky.

In one of the proletarians most honorable moments, they cover Atilla in horse feces. These dirty poor proletarians have no problem rubbing a wild animal's rectum in hope of filling their hands with shit to be thrown to a mean ol' fascist. Bernardo Bertolucci has made it clear that fecal felons are the most honorable of antifascist heroes. As you can expect, Atilla takes revenge in the form of bullets and proletarian death.

The moral of 1900: do not make a five hour epic focusing on just two personal obsessions. Anyone that has seen a film by Bernardo Bertolucci knows that the director loves bizarre sexual situations and poor communists. Devoting an epic to those two things just isn't going to work. It took me a couple of weeks to finish 1900 and it felt like I watched a television mini-series that went on way longer than it should have.

KIDNAPPED

Eric Mitchell (1978)

Out of all the film remakes I have ever seen, Kidnapped (1978) directed by French-born No Wave auteur Eric Mitchell (The Way it Is or Eurydice in the Avenues, A Matter of Facts) has to be the most patently pointless and uniquely unbelievable, as a work that is not much more than an equally static Super-8 color reworking of Andy Warhol's black-and-white S&M-oriented Anthony Burgess adaptation Vinyl (1965) starring pretentious drug-addled homo poets Gerard Malanga and Ondine and all-too-tragic heiress Edie Sedgwick in one of her very first underground film roles (although oftentimes credited as her first film role, the emotionally damaged Factory diva previously appeared in the Ronald Tavel penned Warhol feature Horse (1965)). While Warhol's adaptation is at least notable for predating Stanley Kubrick's 1971 film as an adaptation of Burgess' dystopian novella A Clockwork Orange (1962) and somehow even managed to earn an entry in the popular film reference book 1001 Movies You Must See Before You Die (2003) due to its somewhat revolutionary meta-barebones approach to filmmaking, Mitchell's debut feature is only really notable for demonstrating how much various No Wave filmmakers merely copied off the absurdly amateurish Factory brand of filmmaking. Indeed, as described in the classic text Midnight Movies (1983) co-written by rare fellow Hollywood-hating Hebrews J. Hoberman and Jonathan Rosenbaum, "Mitchell's first film, KIDNAPPED, consisted of fifteen unedited super-eight rolls spiced end to end in a poverty-row rehash of the Warhol Factory's assembly-line method. (The film was even blandly billed as "A 1960s underground movie happening today.") A few jittery extroverts stimulated by drugs, Mitchell's on-screen direction, the cue sheets bluntly taped to the wall, and the new-wave music blaring from a plastic phonograph on the floor jostle each other and the ever-panning camera within the cramped, harshly lit confines of the filmmaker's barren Lower East Side living room. When not trading insults, the cast vaguely pretends to have abducted a wealthy industrialist (Mudd Club owner Steve Mass) and are half-heartedly beginning to torture Mass as the camera runs out of film in midsentence." Like Vinyl, Kidnapped is the sad and pathetic yet nonetheless sometimes engaging result of a considerably lazy and technically inept artist merely placing his decidedly dopey dope fiend friends in front of a camera and getting them to reveal how superlatively stupid and passively nihilistic they are, among other things. In short, Mitchell's film is a shockingly grating and preposterously prosaic 62-minute celluloid endurance test that ultimately rewards the viewer with nothing aside from the opportunity to mock neo-bohemians and obnoxious art fags from the rotten Big Apple.

Like the pre-Morrissey Warhol films, Mitchell's proudly lackluster Super-8 abortion is mostly comprised of a couple high-as-a-kite hipster dullards posturing for the camera like mind-numbingly obnoxious narcissistic toddlers and mumbling about absolutely nothing of value while trying in vain to seem glamorous, sophisticated, and covertly chic, thereupon making for an occasionally unintentionally marginally entertaining sad joke at the expense of the hopelessly inept filmmaker and especially the would-be-superstars, who are so hopelessly bored with life that they cannot even bother to fuck or be passively fucked, especially the male 'characters.' Somewhat interestingly, Kidnapped was shot by No Wave filmmaker turned painter James Nares (Rome 78', No Japs at My Funeral), who also came from the Warhol/Morrissey school of filmmaking and stated of his work as the sort of 'anti-cinematographer' in the documentary Blank City (2010) directed by Celine Danhier, "Eric asked me to shoot his film KIDNAPPED. It had a beautiful structure. It was just like rolls of Super-8 and we shot one roll, shot the next, and then shot the next and cut them together and that was the movie." Nares would also go on to shoot degenerate avant-garde jazz saxophonist John Lurie's No Wave anti-sci-fi flick Men in Orbit (1979), which features both the director and Mitchell tripping on acid while pretending to be astronauts in outerspace in a work that was actually shot in the former's dilapidated apartment. Indubitably, Mitchell's homemade anti-anti-terrorist feature is even more amateurish seeming than Nares describes it, as a sort of post-Warholian celluloid wart that is hidden somewhere on the ass of NYC underground filmmaking and thankfully will only be remembered by those individuals masochistic enough to wade neck-deep through a sea of celluloid shit. Of course, as a work where some East Asian hipster bitch who seems terribly sexually repressed accuses a bunch of No Wave figures, including of auteur Mitchell, of being closeted fags, Kidnapped is not a total waste of life, especially if you like it when sickeningly self-conscious posturing scenester fags attempt to create 'ironic' art and unwittingly create something that makes a total mockery of them and their rather remarkably rotten work.

The first film in a loose trilogy preceding Red Italy (1978) and Underground U.S.A. (1980), Kidnapped was described by Mitchell himself as being highly derivative, or as the auteur once stated himself, "My first approach was to make a comment on what was around me at the time. That's why I made KIDNAPPED. I began by trying to figure out a definite style. The style was a rip-off, but I was very interested in making the reference. I liked it a lot at the time; I was completely nuts about it." While fundamentally being more or less the same in terms of style, structure, and amateurishness, Mitchell's film is slightly different from Warhol's Vinyl in that it was shot on color Super-8 film as opposed to black-and-white 16mm, as well as inspired by the half-cracked kraut rock star revolutionaries of the Baader-Meinhof Gang as opposed to being adapted from a Burgess novel. A work that was shot in one day and was never edited, Mitchell described the film in Blank City as, "It was like punks-on-speed and terrorists-on-valium," yet it would probably better be described as poofs-with-hissy-fits and hopelessly horny fag hags on PMS. In other words, Kidnapped features a couple posturing hipsters incessantly babbling about things they know nothing about like sex and revolutionary politics, yet ultimately saying nothing, at least nothing of any intrinsic value, thus making the work a perfect example of a true landmark 'No Wave' flick, as a playfully plodding piece of pseudo-arthouse 'high schlock' with no production values, no real actors, no plot/script/storyline, and of course no discernible point.

Like an aesthetically autistic punk take on Alfred Hitchcock's Rope (1948) in terms of giving the illusion of being much longer than it actually is due to seemingly being all shot in one take in a claustrophobic apartment inhabited by morally retarded young hipsters sporting mostly goofy clothes, Kidnapped begins with horrendous pan shots of the flat juxtaposed with a grating art-punk-jazz song that gives the viewer a good idea of the antisocial essence of the film. For a good portion of the film, especially during the beginning, the character's heads are cut out of the frame in a fairly annoying way that makes it seem like cinematographer James Nares fell asleep at the camera. At the beginning of the film, Chinese-American cunt Anya Phillips (who was the one-time girlfriend of No Wave saxophonist James Chance) says to No Wave diva Patti Astor (of Amos Poe's The Foreigner (1978) and Anders Grafstrom's The Long Island Four (1980)), "You know, you should come by my flat sometime. We can talk about politics or something." Since Astor does not seem too interested in dyking out with a cunt chink as demonstrated by her remark "I am a one-man woman," Phillips complains, "What do you think I'm going to do, jump on a big dildo?" and continues to bitch in an insufferable fashion. Eventually, Astor gets annoyed and complains to Phillips that she does not want to go to her "slimy apartment" or have her sticking her face in her "twat." Indeed, as she bitches, Astor does not feel like a "cheap dyke" and will certainly not allow a slant-eyed Chinese carpet-muncher to dine on her gristle-gripper. When auteur Eric Mitchell also attempts to hit on Astor by saying patently preposterous things to her like, "I think you're really gorgeous...I think you're really beautiful...I think you're really magnificent...I think you're magnificent [...] You're so fabulous," she is less than impressed. In a pathetic attempt to use his dubious reputation as a novice filmmaker, Mitchell also attempts to swoon Astor into bed by proclaiming, "Every inch of your body stinks of celluloid" and "It really reeks of celluloid," but she puts him in his pathetic place by retorting, "I don't give a shit about your image because I don't have an image."

When flagrant fag Gordon Stevenson (who directed the somewhat unconventional No Wave flick Ecstatic Stigmatic (1980) before dying of AIDS not long after) goes on a clichéd quasi-commie rant where he self-righteously declares that rich people are uncultivated pigs that cannot dress and like sporting vulgar blue jeans, Phillips becomes extremely agitated and hatefully states to him, "I think that's a bunch of reactionary crap. I mean, I have never seen anybody so reactionary as you. You know, people like you should be shot dead...Run over and shot dead. Anyway, as far as I'm concerned." After Stevenson retorts, "Just frustrated, just really frustrated," Phillips accuses him of being a hypocrite and states, "If you don't like these rich pigs, just blow them off. Nobody is going to stop you...You're just too scared, too scared to do anything." After her prosaic pseudo-political rant, Phillips gets somewhat flirty with Stevenson and gives him a backhanded compliment of sorts when she declares, "In some ways, you're kind of cute...But you're probably just another fag and I'm sick of hanging around fags." Since Monsieur Mitchell does not like cunt chicks accusing his homeboys of being homos, he defends Stevenson by telling Phillips that she is an "asshole" and "phony," among other childish things that make him seem like a toddler suffering from an intolerable case of the terrible twos. At this point, Phillips completely loses her cool, states to both men, "You're all fags. Every one of you," and recommends that they both get out of the closet because, as she less than eloquently states, "It couldn't hurt...that much."

Totally oblivious to the fact that Phillips is just acting like a bitch because she is in dire need of some dick and maybe a little cunt, Mitchell goes on a girly man rant while smoking a fat joint where he verbally vomits on her, "You really think you're some kind of revolutionary, huh? I'll tell you, you're really a phony one, a phony revolutionary because I haven't seen you do anything yet. You haven't done shit. Alls you've done is talked about it...You haven't done anything yet [...] Have you put any bombs anywhere? Have you kidnapped anybody?" After Mitchell gets down verbally reaming Philips, Stevenson goes on a similarly aimless rant where he thankfully decries the "liberal humanist lie." Out of nowhere, everyone eventually begins dancing to the Rolling Stones cover of "Satisfaction" by Devo that is playing on a record player in the room and Mitchell eventually gets in a girly fight with a wuss in a leather-jacket in the process. After the dance, Stevenson begins hitting on Mitchell and apologizes to him in regard to an assumed botch sex session by stating, "I couldn't get it up for you [...] I couldn't get it up for anyone at the moment, sorry." Seeming to have the sexual habits of a psychopath, Mitchell replies to Stevenson, "I can do the same job myself. Anyway, I think it's a lot better afterwards...because you don't have any hassle. See, I don't like sex very much at all. I don't like anything that much." When Astor attempts to sleep with sod Stevenson and even offers him $30, he rudely begins laughing and replies, "There's just something about you I don't like. Too fucking bourgeois or something." In a rather valiant attempt to prove Phillips wrong in regard to her claims that they are nothing but whiny armchair revolutionaries, the raging revolutionary queers kidnap a young businessman (played by real-life business man Steve Mass, who owned the Mudd Club) and spend the last ten minutes of the film 'torturing' him in a lackluster fashion while he is blindfolded and tied to a chair. Since the victim is "capitalist swine" and all, Mitchell forces him to oink like a pig. In the end, the victim softly states "kill me,” so Phillips fulfills his wish by shooting him in the head, though naturally the gun fails to make a ‘bang’ sound.

Without a doubt, Kidnapped is one of the most absurdly amateurish and incredibly pointless and meandering films that I have ever seen and I say that as someone who is somewhat familiar with both Troma and the so-called Mumblecore movement, yet I’d watch it any day over the latest Michael Bay or Steven Spielberg blockbuster because it at least has some character, charm, and a sense of humor, not to mention the fact that it mocks the dilettante guerilla politics of far-left terrorists, namely rock star commies like Andreas Baader and Gudrun Ensslin. In that sense, Mitchell’s film anticipates the self-critical left-wing art-porn flicks of Canadian cocksucker Bruce LaBruce, especially The Raspberry Reich (2004) aka The Revolution Is My Boyfriend. Somewhat curiously, aside from Warhol’s Vinyl, Kidnapped seems to most resemble the classic homo hardcore porn flick Boy ‘Napped (1975) aka Boy-napped! starring Jamie Gillis and mustached dick-stabber/disco singer/AIDS victim Wade Nichols (aka Dennis Posa) and directed by German-American exploitation auteur turned gay pornographer David E. Durston (The Love Statue, I Drink Your Blood). Indeed, if Mitchell’s film featured a sex scene or two, it might be considered a classic porn chic era fuck flick as opposed to a forgotten No Wave classic. Despite the minimalistic art-trash aesthetic of Kidnapped, Mitchell has more cultivated cinematic influences than one might assume, or as he stated in the doc Blank City, “I really liked Warhol for the concept, Fassbinder for the ensemble of actors, Pasolini for his integrity, and Melville for his hat and sunglasses.” Speaking of Fassbinder, compared to films where the New German Cinema alpha-auteur satirizes the senseless behavior of self-stylized commie revolutionaries like Die Niklashauser Fahrt (1970) aka The Niklashausen Journey, Mutter Küsters Fahrt zum Himmel (1975) aka Mother Küsters’ Trip to Heaven and Die dritte Generation (1979) aka The Third Generation, Kidnapped seems like a botched attempt at a hipster philistine circle jerk. For better or worse, Mitchell’s film would have a somewhat notable influence on both No Wave cinema and the Cinema of Transgression movement, especially the oeuvre of husband-wife team Beth B and Scott B (Black Box, Vortex). Somewhat surprisingly, Mitchell eventually became a remarkably more cultivated filmmaker as demonstrated by his ‘magnum opus’ Underground U.S.A. (1980), which demonstrates eclectic influences ranging from Josef von Sternberg to Billy Wilder’s Sunset Boulevard (1950) to Paul Morrissey’s Heat (1972). Additionally, Mitchell’s feature The Way it Is or Eurydice in the Avenues (1985)—a work where a chick portraying Eurydice in an adaptation of Jean Cocteau’s Orphée (1950) aka Orpheus is found dead in Tompkins Square Park and where the East Village is portrayed as a sort of Cocteauian underworld—is notable for featuring both Steve Buscemi and Vincent Gallo in early pre-fame acting roles. While indubitably Mitchell’s most eclectically mediocre work, I personally somewhat appreciate Kidnapped to some marginal degree because it demonstrates that NYC art fags are just as stupid, lazy, and dirty as ghetto crackheads.

UNDERGROUND U.S.A.

Eric Mitchell (1980)

If American 'No Wave' actor-writer-director Eric Mitchell (The Way It is) is remembered for anything, it is probably his role as the lead pseudo-blond European secret agent Max Menace in Amos Poe's excruciating exercise in punk rock puffery The Foreigner (1978) – a film that has aged about as gracefully as Lady Gaga's latest pair of underwear, as a cinematic work that aspired to be on a level with the best of European arthouse but ultimately has as much artistic merit as a kosher kraut slapstick flick like The Roaring Fifties (1983) aka Die wilden Fünfziger directed by Peter Zadek. Admittedly, Mitchell's own films (or at least one of them) are slightly more interesting than anything Poe has ever done with his satire of the posh and prissy NYC art scene, Underground U.S.A. (1980), being what some believe is his 'unsung masterpiece,' even if the film owes its entire aesthetic package to Andy Warhol and Paul Morrissey yet makes a feeble attempt to lampoon the Factory films it owes its rather lethargic proto-hipster lifeblood to. As Mitchell stated in an interview for the book Destroy All Movies!!! The Complete Guide to Punks on Film (2010), "I came into the scene through Amos Poe. I was acting in his movies, and also going to acting school at the Lee Strasberg Institute. After I was in Unmade Beds and The Foreigner, I felt like I could make my own movie." And, indeed, Mr. Mitchell made his first movie, Kidnapped (1978) – an equally unwatchable, innately incoherent, and blatantly unedited Super-8 remake of Andy Warhol's Vinyl (1965), an aggressively apathetic adaptation of Anthony Burgess' dystopian novella A Clockwork Orange (1962) that Stanley Kubrick would later adapt into a masterpiece, thus proving the incompetency of the rotten Big Apple's 'arthouse' auteur filmmakers. Like with Vinyl, I had the rare and less than delightful opportunity to view Kidnapped and, indeed, if anything is good about the film, it is its title as the relentlessly redundant work made me feel sadistically shanghaied for the 62 minutes or so that I subjected myself to such masochistic movie viewing. Luckily, with his second film, Mitchell ambitiously (relatively speaking, of course) decided to make a film with more than a handful of long and aimless indoor shots and thus it would be a slightly more enthralling film, although it took me no less than 3 or 4 times to get through Underground U.S.A. – a sleep-inducing spoof about the pretentious poof-infested NYC art scene of the late-1970s/early-1980s starring the seemingly damaged director himself as the bisexual hustler anti-hero Victor in a film that probably is the cinematic equivalent of what it felt like to die from AIDS while surrounded by a bunch of positively pompous fashion victims during the early epidemic that inspired kraut queer auteur Rosa von Praunheim to make a documentary in the city in the late-1980s. Undoubtedly, the essence of Underground U.S.A. can be summed up with a cold cock of a character's line from the film: "I hate emotion." If you ever felt like senselessly suffering the shallow and soulless insincerity of New York's finest art fags, fag hags, and hysterical homos in drag in a would-be-wild-and-wanton world of aesthetic and emotional sterility, Underground U.S.A. is most certainly the film for you.

At least as far as Underground U.S.A. protagonist Victor – an ill-fated foreigner (indeed, it seems that Eric Mitchell loves playing Europeans) who rather reluctantly came to America long ago, only to sell his cock on the city block – is concerned, the life of a sexually-flexible NYC hustler is not life at all, but he is more than willing to 'upgrade' his sad situation, even if it means sleeping with rather repellent and, in some cases, borderline brain-dead people. After dancing like a restless retard in what seems to be a homo hoedown with some random shit-stabber in a gutter, Victor is confronted by a woman who screams, "If only I'd known you were a fag like the rest of them. God, what a waste." When Victor comes home, he suffers similar verbal abuse from his ex-drag-queen, flamer of a roommate (played by Warhol tranny Jackie Curtis, star of Paul Morrissey's Flesh (1968) and Women in Revolt (1971)), an intrinsically insufferable queen-like queer who styles himself like James Dean's Jim Stark from Rebel Without a Cause (1955) and even has a portrait of the too-young-to-die Hollywood rebel icon on his apartment wall. Needless to say, Vic's (no)dick of a roommate kicks him out after he tells the miserable man-woman that he was "more fun" when he was "a drag queen" and the hustler hits the streets and looks for someone else to hustle, eventually meeting a beautiful and flirtatious philistine broad with bleach blonde hair and a New Romanticist-like fashion sense named Vickie ('no wave' diva Patti Astor, star of various Amos Poe films and The Long Island Four (1980) starring Klaus Nomi), who used to be a popular movie star, but is now only left with a hungry sense of narcissism that is poorly fed, thus the down-and-out dick-peddler makes for a temporary fix. While Victor assumes Vickie is rich and his ticket to a free lunch and luxury, she is merely a fallen art princess who pops pills at the bequest of her creepy and conspiring cocksucker friends, including a new wave queer named Kenneth (portrayed by real-life art critic René Ricard, the man who helped Jean-Michel Basquiat gain fame), who finds the hustler's motives quite dubious, especially when he is forced to allow the dirty boy to borrow his expensive cock-sucker clothing. After suffering a number of grueling encounters with exceedingly abhorrent and obnoxious art fags who freely admit that "even bad art makes good money" and speak callous gossip amongst one another, especially about pathological pill-popper Vickie, Victor finally loses his cool and admits to himself regarding his current arrangement with the fallen actress, "And now I was stuck with her. I thought she was loaded, but then I find out she has no money. That woman is completely insane. To tell the truth, I'd like to get out of here as soon as possible. This scene is pretty boring and getting older all the time. I wonder what she is going to do next. I am really stuck between Kenneth, the chauffeur, and her. This whole setup is a mess." In the end, the leading lady takes one too many pills and Victor rather impotently admits to a barmaid (played by John Water Superstar Cookie Mueller) as to why he is no fun to be around, "I don't know...I never have any fun in the sun," in what is indubitably the truest line in the seemingly endless entirety that is Underground U.S.A. – a completely cynical yet hyper hypocritical and futile attempt at satirizing a scene that the film itself seems to be a virtual broken mirror of.

While, not unlike Paul Morrissey's Heat (1972), Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Veronika Voss (1982), and Hustler White (1996) directed by Bruce LaBruce and Rick Castro, Underground U.S.A. was an attempt to create a sardonic parody and radical update of the film noir classic Sunset Boulevard (1950) directed by Billy Wilder, albeit mixed with artless pretensions of mundane minimalism that put the Mumblecore movement to shame, with director Eric Mitchell proving yet again one more reason as to why New York City has yet to produce a single film movement that is worthy of being named in the same sentence with its European counterparts. While Mitchell admitted the following in an interview regarding Underground U.S.A. that, "it was like a ricochet, a bounced comment on the Warhol scene and the No Wave scene. We thought we were the coolest people in the world, and we took it upon ourselves to behave the way we thought Nico or whoever would," the filmmaker seems to have missed the quite blatant and incendiary irony of Paul Morrissey's anti-liberal comedies that more than aptly tore apart the gaping asshole of the asinine 'art scene' they were shat out of. What made Morrissey's films infinitely more humorous and culturally relevant in comparison to, say Underground U.S.A., and the rest of the nauseating 'no wave' films is that the Factory auteur was a true 'counter-revolutionary' as a self-described "right-winger" who cinematically spit and pissed on the so-called sexual revolution and the culturally vacant counter-culture movements it sired, with Mitchell's subculture being the most superficial extreme of such 'no culture' insipidity. Indeed, when your only frame of reference is the very dead-end pseudo-subculture you hope to spoof as was Eric Mitchell's, it can only have self-incriminating and unintentionally self-mocking consequences as is the case with Underground U.S.A. – a film made with the intent of being legendary and a piece of 'cult' cinema as a sort of NYC equivalent to the early films of Jean-Luc Godard or Rainer Werner Fassbinder, but it was ultimately, quite rightfully, condemned to the celluloid garbage heap of history. Indeed, if you're looking for the film Underground U.S.A. strived to be, but is that and much more, Slava Tsukerman's Liquid Sky (1982) has both the fashion sense and attitude, but also space aliens fiending for heroin and jaded Jewesses lusting after Aryan UFO hunters, which is more than any cinephile could ever ask for, especially considering the curious context. Indeed, Underground U.S.A. ain't associated with the 'Blank Generation' for nothing.

WILD MUSSELS

Out of all the white countries in the world, I would have to assume that the Netherlands has the smallest rowdy red-blooded redneck population and the fact that a small proletarian village in Bergen op Zoom could produce a filmmaker as idiosyncratic and cultivated as Adriaan Ditvoorst (Paranoia, De Witte Waan aka White Madness) seems to be proof of that. Indeed, I am willing to bet that the average Dutch lumpenprole is more cultured and well read than the average American college-educated bourgeois professional, though judging by the film Wilde mossels (2000) aka Wild Mussels directed by Erik de Bruyn (Nadine, J. Kessels), it seems that at least one area of the Netherlands, Zeeland (or 'Zealand' in English)—the westernmost province of the country which is comprised of a group of islands (hence its name, which translates to 'Sealand') that thrives on a largely tourist economy (apparently, the dreaded krauts love vacationing there)—seems to have a less than cultivated peasant population that would fit in well in the American rural Deep South. Undoubtedly, with its adrenalin-packed combination of lowbrow humor, danger-loving longhaired dudes on motorcycles, lecherous domineering women with ridiculous haircuts, incessant dope-smoking and dipsomania, crappy radio rock music, and even Confederate flags, De Bruyn's film is probably the only Dutch film ever made that would appeal to fans of the hit American redneck soap opera Sons of Anarchy, yet it is a relatively fun flick as a sort Dutch tragicomic mix between Federico Fellini's I Vitelloni (1953) and Dennis Hopper's Easy Rider (1969) about a young Zealand-bred motorbike-riding bastard who feels trapped in an ostensible paradise and dreams of moving to Dublin after meeting a smooth-talking burnt-out Irish dude with a glaringly goofy mullet.

A sort of Dutch (anti)Heimat flick featuring magic realist elements and a soundtrack viewers will either love or love to hate (I fall into the latter group) that includes songs by Nashville Pussy (who actually appear in the film), Woody Guthrie, Hank Williams, Green Lizard, Deftones, and the director himself, Wild Mussels is indubitably one of the least pretentious and most accessible 'art-house' works that I have ever seen as a film that anyone who has grown up in a small and isolated rural area, especially of the seaside sort, can relate to, at least to some extent. As someone that both grew up in a small rural area and later moved to a seaside town, I found that De Bruyn's debut offered, in a somewhat unintentional way, a strange bit of slight déjà vu for me from a past life (indeed, during my early adult years, most of my pals were beer-chugging rockers-cum-motorcyclists that dreamed of getting out of town and making something out of their lives but ultimately never did), and although the film may be plagued by a tidal wave of moronic haircuts, a spastic symphony of retard rock, and a couple 'false notes,' its 'metalhead melancholia' ultimately rings true. Directed by a fellow who somewhat made his debut in the Dutch cinema world by appearing in Eric De Kuyper's porno homo experimental celluloid odyssey Pink Ulysses (1990), Wild Mussels is a perpetually blue-tinted lumpenprole celluloid poem that, although fairly accessible, concludes on a senselessly tragic note that is more in tune with the absurdity of real-life than the putridly positive fantasy realm of unhollywood. Starring reasonably talented leading man Fedja van Huêt of contemporary Dutch classics like Mike van Diem's Karakter (1997) aka Character and Martin Koolhoven's AmnesiA (2001) in an almost unrecognizable role as the deleteriously free-spirited yet perennially dejected lead character, de Bruyn's work is arguably the best 'post-teen rebel' flick ever made as a vulgarly beautiful fever dream about a male threesome that seem to have forgotten they graduated from angst-ridden adolescence about a decade ago and must confront the future or stay trapped in a static seaside nightmare of perennial proletarian monotony.

One gets a pretty good idea what kind of loser antihero Leen (Fedja van Huêt) is during the opening scene of the film where he shares a fat joint with his comrade Jacob (Frederik Brom) and attempts to be 'deep' by discussing an 'alien superbrain,' only for his friend to demystify his fantasies with reality. Leen fantasizes a lot because he has a humdrum job working as a boat mechanic that he is only able to find solace from via smoking, drinking, partying, reckless motorbiking, and other dangerous behavior that hints the antihero has some sort of deep dark death wish. Despite being a hard worker, Leen is living in a state of perpetual adolescence that seems partly the result of the fact that he is a bastard who never knew his professional motorbike father, who he oftentimes thinks about and talks about with his seemingly deceased daddy's Belgian friend Wannes (Josse De Pauw of Dominique Deruddere's Crazy Love (1987)), who he sees as a sort of pseudo-father figure. Leen also has a curious relationship with his lecherous mother Noortje (Will van Kralingen), who clearly has incestuous feelings for her son as he apparently resembles his father in both appearance and character. Due to the fact she once abandoned him when he was a child, Leen somewhat resents his whorish mommy, who has no problem flirting with her son the same way she flirts with other men to get what she wants. Noortje is married to an old bald fart that Leen works for named Rinus (Hans Veerman) that she clearly does not love and describes simply as a, "just a roof over my head." While Leen has a questionable relationship with his mommy, he has no problem attracting beautiful women as demonstrated by the fact that he manages to sweet talk a naughty nurse named Janine (Angelique de Bruijne) into taking off her panties in public and giving them to him so he can inhale her feminine secretions. Unfortunately, it seems that Leen has a hard time maintaining anything resembling a romantic relationship as demonstrated by the fact that he has random sex with fat chicks where he fantasizes about Janine and even his mommy. Of course, Leen spends most of his time with his two main pals Jacob and Daan (Frank Lammers), who also share his love of motorbiking but completely lack his smooth style and daredevil talents. Like his father before him, Leen plans to attend the Bikers Ball in Ostend, but his plans eventually go sour when he bends the frame of his bike after jumping over an entire canal with it.

Ultimately, Leen has an epiphany of sorts after meeting an Irishman that calls himself 'Nowhere Man' (Martin Dunne) after beating two of his friends in an amateur motorcycle race. After causing his two competitors to bite his dust, Leen spots Nowhere Man standing on the side of the road with a broken down car. Using his mechanic talents, Leen fixes the strange mullet-adorned Irish man's car and is repaid with, "A great can of black piss from the Celtic angels." After drinking a beer with the Irishman, Leen finds himself magically transported to an exotic Dublin bar featuring beautiful ginger girls who freely flash their neon red beavers, as well as negro bartenders that sport t-shirts reading 'Zion.' Ultimately, Nowhere Man gives Leen a red cassette tape with his phone number and tells him to come to Ireland, stating, "go into any Celtic pub and you will find me." Needless to say, Leen instantly begins planning to move to Dublin and soon gets it into his head that his love interest Janine will go with him even though the two are not an actual couple, but when he asks her, she flips out and smacks him in a hysterical fashion. Leen also comes up with a moronic idea to rob a local bank, but the heist fails miserably after one of the protagonist's friends accidentally gets shot in the thigh. When Leen's stepfather accidentally drowns in a freak accident at work, Leen's dream of relocating to Dublin comes crashing down as he is forced to takeover the old man's job, thus making him feel all the more trapped in Zeeland, especially considering he now feels obligated to support his widowed mother, who more or less demands that the protagonist stay by blackmailing him with emotions. Meanwhile, Daan goes behind Leen's back and begins dating Janine, thus causing the two lads to get into a bloody fist fight where the friends ultimately make up in the end. When Leen comes by his mother's home one day and she describes how she is planning to move to the city with a pompous business man named Bert (Freak Smink), the protagonist, who has more or less dedicated his life to taking care of his wanton progenitor, loses it and decides to leave Zeeland for good.

After ritualistically burning down his makeshift houseboat home, Leen begins heading out of Zeeland on his motorbike, but at the last minute he decides to make the ultimately fatal mistake of seeing his friends Daan and Jacob play an underground show, especially considering it is the latter's birthday. Naturally, Leen gets good and wasted during the concert to the point where he pours beer on his head while in the moshpit. After the show, a rather inebriated Leen tells his comrades he is leaving while playing Russian Roulette with a gun he stole from Wannes, stating like a true braggart, "Celtic angels, great babes, girls with red pussies, barrels of whisky. You can fly there! All at once, heaven and hell. I'm gonna make it. A garage and bar in one. You can do anything, if you only dare. Just like the Irish, they're just like the wild ones. I'm gonna make it over there. A garage and bar. And I'll call it...the Celtic Car Company." Rather tragicomically, right after stating, "Dublin...Greatest city in the world, here I come," Leen accidentally kills himself after pulling the trigger during his rather haphazard game of Russian Roulette. At Leen's funeral, Jacob reads a poem that his friend gave him the night he unwittingly offered himself that ironically reads, "My oh my, tell me why all hard work, and then you die. A spade of sand and you're done...but I, I'm gone." In the end, Jacob, who is not a native Zealander like Leen and Daan, is the only one that manages to leave the island. As Daan mockingly stated to Jacob when he lacked the testicular fortitude to play Russian Roulette with him and fellow Zealander Leen, "outsiders stay outsiders," hence why said outsider was the only character in the film to realize his dream of getting away from the Dutch redneck island.

I have to admit that I found Wild Mussels to be a fairly bizarre work in the sense it straddles an inexplicable median between proudly lowbrow beer-chugging bromance buffoonery and transcendental magical realist celluloid art of the existentially intriguing sort. I think the rather preternatural aesthetic essence of the film can be best summed up in a scene where the antihero's quasi-incestuous whore of a mother stands in front of a mirror and German Symbolist/Jugendstil (aka Art Nouveau) painter Franz von Stuck's classic painting The Sin (1893) aka Die Sünde—a work depicting the embodiment of evil featuring a topless femme fatale with a large serpent wrapped around her body lurking amongst the shadows in a sinister yet seductive fashion—can be seen reflected behind her in a scene that ultimately reveals the character is a sort of figurative of 'Eve' whose behavior inevitably leads to her sole son's rather pathetic demise. Surely, Wild Mussels is the relatively contemporary equivalent to Paul Verhoeven's nihilistic cult classic Spetters (1980), which also depicts the seemingly accursed lives of a group of lumpenprole motorcyclists who lead senselessly self-destructive lives, though I would have to say that, for better or worse, Erik de Bruyn's work has a more singular and readily recognizable aesthetic that, at least visually speaking, cannot really be compared to any other films. Indeed, with its incessantly ocean blue tint and solacing magic realist scenes of the protagonist drinking beer underwater and hanging out at otherworldly Dublin bars with lecherous mick chicks who have no problem flashing their red beavers to random strangers, Wild Mussels is literally and figuratively dripping with an undeniably potent atmosphere that gives the impression that Zeeland has an ethereal essence, even if the film portrays the area as a sort of perennially draining metaphysical prison of sorts that no true local can escape from.

As someone that grew up in a small rural area where most of the people never seemed to manage to move away despite the fact that it seems like they spent most of their time complaining about how much they hated living there and fantasizing about moving away, I found that, despite its incessant fantasy scenes of magical realism, Wild Mussels ultimately rings true in terms of expressing the general mood of feeling like you're both physically and spiritually trapped in the seemingly forsaken hometown of your youth. Notably, when I moved away to college and came back to visit every once in a while, it was quite apparent that my old friends were degenerating by the second by having sex with homely and oftentimes fat chicks, recklessly indulging in hard drugs and cheap booze, and listening to shitty radio rock which altogether collectively became their regular lifestyle while their intellectual curiosity all but evaporated. In fact, I even had a friend who managed to shoot himself in the head like the protagonist of de Bruyn's film but he managed to survive since it only grazed his skull. Of course, when everything is said and done, Wild Mussels will always hold a special place in my heart because it demonstrates that even the Dutch can be pothead rednecks with death wishes who listen to superlatively shitty music like the Deftones. In that sense, despite being a fairly idiosyncratic Dutch regional work, de Bruyn's film ultimately says more about the white rural American majority than any Hebraic Hollywood film ever could.

ISLAND OF LOST SOULS

Erle C. Kenton (1932)

Admittedly, I have always been somewhat disappointed by old school Hollywood monster films. Whether it be Tod Browning's Dracula (1931) starring Bela Lugosi or Creature from the Black Lagoon (1954) directed by Jack Arnold, I have been consistently letdown by the seemingly overblown reputation of early Hollywood horror flicks, especially when comparing them to the great phantasmagorical cinematic works of German expressionism. One thing that stands out glaringly regarding Hollywood monster movies is the atrociously recherché and inorganic nature of these mostly one-dimensional works, but I guess American audiences were fairly easy to convince during (and after) that era. The other day I took a somewhat hesitant chance on the early biopunk flick Island of Lost Souls (1933) directed by Erle C. Kenton, the first cinematic adaptation of H.G. Well's novel The Island of Doctor Moreau (1896). I can veraciously admit that Island of Lost Souls is the only early American monster flick that not only exceeded my expectations, but also resonated in my mind a number of days thereafter. Although obviously shot mostly on the restricting confines of a studio set, Island of Lost Souls manages to conjure up the eerie atmosphere of a genuine isolated island microcosm that mentally-feeble man-made monsters call home. Dr. Moreau (played royally by a charmingly sinister Charles Laughton) is the undisputed and self-appointed dictator of this island as he satanically created its inhabitants by somehow hybridizing man and animal via vivisection. Of course, things change when a critical quasi-humanist named Edward Parker (played by Richard Arlen) finds himself stranded on Moreau's own morbid maniac version of Gilligan's Island. Island of Lost Souls is thematically reminiscent of German horror writer Hanns Heinz Ewers' short story Mamoloi, a colonial weird tale featuring an exotic Haitian lady who sacrifices herself for her foreign Aryan lover, as the film features a forbid love affair between the film's protagonist Edward Parker and an exotic panther-woman. Naturally, being a vintage Hollywood production, Island of Lost Souls is full of wooden acting and absurdly contrived melodrama, but like most horror films, one can look past these somewhat irritating, consequential flaws.

In our modern and increasingly globalized and homogenized world, one does not always know what to expect when traveling to various parts of the world. With somewhat hostile Turks inhabiting large pockets (many times virtual 'no go zones' for indigenous Teutons) of Berlin, Germany and the nearly complete third-worldization of American cities with hostile and mostly unassimilable immigrants from every underdeveloped nation in the world, one would think that a shadow-hand is consciously speeding up a worldwide civil war and virtual cultural apocalypse of sorts. In Island of Doctor Moreau, a science fiction scenario of master versus untermensch is suspensefully played out in a closed-off and mostly uncharted cosmos of the dysgenically damned. One could even argue that the film is an (unintentional) metaphor for the bloody and genocidal history (slave revolution of 1804) of Haiti when it was still part of the French colony Saint-Domingue. During Island of Lost Souls, the exceedingly pompous and obscenely self-confident Dr. Moreau even has the gall to state, "Do you know what it means to feel like God?" (an infamous quote that UK censors found to be most contemptible) in regard to his self-righteous campaign to subvert nature and create subservient hideous beings that are neither men nor animals, but poor creatures who suffer the unideal fate of being somewhere schizophrenically in between. Inevitably, Dr. Moreau's Mephistophelian display of cruelty and pathological narcissism, as well as his incontestable sense of entitlement, leads to his most unpleasant downfall at the peculiar man-paws of his creations/ex-slaves as he arrogantly never considers that his total control over his army of mongrel mammals will one day wane when these half-thinking monstrosities finally realize that freedom and, even destruction of 'society' as it stands, can become a reality. Island of Lost Souls is essentially the fictional horror film equivalent of Harvard-educated eugenicist Lothrop Stoddard's prophetic work The Revolt Against Civilization: The Menace of the Under-man (1922). Stoddard predicted that, like the manimals in Island of Lost Souls, former Western colonies throughout the world would be overthrown and conquered in bloody revolts led by newly confident indigenous populations who were cognizant of the white man's curtailing power in the world. Personally, I found Island of Lost Souls symbolic of what one can expect for the future of the Occidental world, only the conclusion of the film is notably less frightening than the very potential dystopian destiny that might occur as a result of never-ending mass revolts spreading like rabid locusts in formerly civilized lands.

One aspect of Island of Lost Souls that I found especially captivating is the strikingly realistic appearances of the various manimals, as many of the actors that played these miserable creatures are authentically deformed, apish, and carrying the grand misfortune of owning exaggeratedly sloped foreheads that were quite typical of prehistoric man. I am sure that pioneering Italian criminologist Cesare Lombroso would have approved of the casting for Island of Lost Souls. I do not think it would be an exaggeration to say that today, one can visit any major American city and see certain human-beings that looks as artlessly atavistic, mongrelized, and grotesque as the tragic monster-men of Island of Lost Souls. In fact, American horror author H.P. Lovecraft experienced a similar real-life personal horror scenario during his brief migration to New York City during the early 20th century. Lovecraft described new immigrants to NYC as, "The organic things -Italo-Semitic-Mongoloid- inhabiting that awful cesspool could not by any stretch of the imagination be call'd human." In fact, such 'horrifying' privy encounters would influence the iconic sub-humanoid monsters Lovecraft would dream up for his Weird Tales and lead to his (somewhat arguable) reputation as America's greatest writer of horror literature. One could only imagine Lovecraft's reaction were he to visit the increasingly degenerate city today. Like all great science fiction works, Island of Lost Souls is a film that manages to combine a pessimistic premonition of the future with fantasy elements that somewhat cryptically manage to chill one's soul.

STEEL AND LACE

Ernest D. Farino (1991)

You'll notice something undeniably special about Mom and Pop video stores of the grand ole' VHS heydays. Following the popularity surge of the Digital Video Disc, most of these tiresome spoof titles offering up soft-core B-movie fun were sold at bargain prices leaving a certain collector foaming at the mouth. An opportunity to purchase various Lamberto Bava titles seems too good to be true. Like many of these titles before it, few or none of these have the hopes of seeing an official DVD release. Steel and Lace is one of the misjudged. While not being a great film by any means, it feels like a real movie should but with an inspired touch of science fiction and comedic properties. After being ferociously raped off screen by a gang of affluent males with their bright careers ahead of them, Clare Wren's denied justice on part of alibi's from the culprits. After taking her life on the very same day, her brother Bruce Davison, a NASA scientist whose specialties revolve around artificial intelligence, decides to recreate her body into a cybernetic android for the sole purpose of TV-YA titillation and murderous revenge. I know what you're thinking and yes, I said the same thing. "Am I in exploitation heaven?" and you won't be disappointed. While the effort does feel like a Lifetime rape/revenge movie aided by the influence of psychedelics, Steel and Lace does have quality kills, over acting zealously on a project as B influenced as this, and some young and coming TV talent as Bruce Davison and David Naughton. The dialogue is tripe and causal Law and Order drivel. Detective talk seems to bother me these days. You'd think that instead of physical training, they'd be forced into taking a personality test as seen in most restaurant businesses. Most, wait no, all of the memorable lines are blurted out by the forensic detective. He goes off on a verbal rampage describing the ingenuity behind the murders. His comments are most funny on arguing over the alleged "strangled while being decapitated" murder. Gaily Morton as Clare Wren delivers a promising role as the crying, infantile woman who'd been desecrated. She later switches roles to play a cold and curious killing machine. Later, you'll see her "CPU" when Bruce Davison inserts her visual memory into his hardware. The android effects could be easily realized as an important piece of science fiction fan lore. Steel and Lace is a very entertaining film that leads up as a B-movie unkempt with trashy moments and an incredibly small budget. Director Ernest D. Farino will later move on to directing Moonbeam's select Josh Kirby episodes. It's only justice to see someone of oblivious childish trash-exploitation that will grace the screens of networks like TNT one day. The absolute surprise this film is holding back on is the moving and powerful ending. An amateur director looks past his restrictions and delivers a stunning point-of-view from a free fall by sacrificing a camera. If you're scoping for VHS treasures that won't be magnificently realized on a higher format, look no further. I doubt we'll see Steel

STEEL AND LACE

SURVIVING THE GAME

Ernest R. Dickerson (1994)

I'd been meaning to see Surviving the Game for some time. I am a fan of the classic story and film The Most Dangerous Game. It sounded like a contemporary renewal of the timeless classic but what I got was more or less Ice T slinging Ebonics faster than the survival tactics he gratuitously attempts to display. After all, I was only expecting a decent film but shame on me. Surviving the Game may have been a bare victory but no one reaps the rewards. Ice T plays Mason; a belligerent ignorant waste of a human life. In reality, he is a rapper turned actor. One of the first if I do say so myself. In this time, these rappers had a broad range of acting jobs, not just a crime/gangster film to which they are limited to in this modern age. The downfall of quality for sure. The plot of this film has been disguised, along with Hard Target's, to show sympathy towards homeless people. The truth is far from. This is a film that undoubtedly ends up degrading black people and their "street smart cred". Ice T spends his time being an ignorant bastard who likes to pretend he has something smart to say. He isn't very good at the English language, not even with one-liners. He finds a hot ticket to get dough and takes it. This winds him up with a German tycoon (Rutger Hauer) with his black assistant, a Jew and his son, a sociopathic psychiatrist (Gary Busey) and an emotional random. They fine dine while commenting on the scruffy look and attitude of the ignorant guest. What Ice T doesn't know is that he is actually on the menu. Cue the "Get the fuck out of here. 10 minute head start" scene and that's where the film actually ends. The rest is just filler. Throughout the course of this film, these self proclaimed hunters are constantly making folly's and undermining the Negro star. Eventually he uses cigarettes, his Timberlands, and the other tools of his Urban survival guide to make his way to freedom. In this film you will witness Ice T saying "Fuck" every 2 minutes. The promise of action is what really lures us in and this film has none. The high point of the film is Gary Busey and he is dispatched quick. Rutger Hauer never was given the chance to make this into a real cinematic treat and we go home unfulfilled. By the end of the film, Ice T is muddy and grimy, soiled with nature's excrement similar to the scene in Predator. Only this time, it forms a natural Blackface with Ice T's bloody lips. Such elements like these just give this film a sour flavor. It's times like these that makes me appreciate absurdities in cinema. I just wish that I could respect this film more. Ernest Dickerson is a no-talent hack that only really excels in directing story lines that were already preconceived, ala Television drama's. Surviving the Game is a game you won't want to survive after Busey is written out of the script.

TALES FROM THE CRYPT: DEMON KNIGHT
TALES FROM THE CRYPT: DEMON KNIGHT

Ernest R. Dickerson (1995)

Tales from the Crypt: Demon Knight is an early prelude to what could be called a Tales from the Crypt: Motion picture saga, including Bordello of Blood. Demon Knight carries the same deadpan delights and satire directed towards the industry with a monster mash theme. Constant puns are used such as Screampay and Hell-O to accentuate a fluid horror theme within the cinema dimension. All this thanks to the ever-so eccentric Crypt Keeper, one of America's most beloved horror icons. Demon Knight opens as a informal music advertisement. I counted 2 popular "rock" songs playing during the short opening credits. The silliness fades away soon after, allowing you to absorb the scenarios and ultimately, Billy Zane's amazing performance - as always. William "Die Hard 2" Sadler is on the run from a mysterious figure played by Billy Zane. Billy Zane plays a whimsical elder demon on a quest to retrieve a relic containing the blood of the late Christ. The very portrait of this film is painted by the maniacal Billy Zane. As what any horror fan should say, the presence of Billy Zane is enough to make even the most worthless film enjoyable. He had performances in The Mad, Titanic, Zoolander, and Invincible. Because of his acting, he made Titanic almost bearable, he turned The Mad into a sleeper classic, he performed comedic surgery on Zoolander and created a joke that wasn't entirely a eunuch, and he created a martial arts image that didn't revolve around bad ass Asiatics with Invincible. I'm a true fan of this mans work and his starring role in Demon Knight is no exception. Billy Zane would have been a sufficient Timothy Olyphant replacement in Live Free or Die Hard. I've seen some pretty pathetic attempts at horror/comedy. For instance, take New Zealand's Black Sheep. For being hailed as an uproarious horror classic, the film was quite tame. The only smirk was heavily in debt to a tidal wave of CGI sheep. Tales from the Crypt, devoid of the Hammer roots, is horror meets undead stand-up and it works so well. Jada Pinkett-Smith co-stars as a bad bimbo bitch who avidly supports women's rights and the emancipation proclamation. Another recognizable part in this film is Thomas Haden Church as the douche bag that ruins the overall plan and trusts the villain, only to meet a much-wanted fate. I didn't expect to enjoy Demon Knight as much as I did. In fact, I wasn't sure what to expect. I hadn't seen this film since I had rented it as a child. 1995 was a great year indeed, but I don't remember much of the neo-pulp cinema movement that occurred then. While many comic book and video game adaptations were taking place, each provided ample entertainment and never fully dissatisfied the audience, until the millennium snuck up and left every fan boy in a seated fury. Demon Knight is recommended viewing for any fan of 90s cinema. You will leave the experience having enjoyed a buffet of over-the-top gore and plenty of laughs.

RHEINGOLD

Ernst Wild (1978)

For obvious reasons relating to wartime guilt, the cultural colonization of their nation by the U.S.A. and its allies, and the virtual worldwide demonization of their history and culture, a good percentage of the West German filmmakers of the post-WWII era had a rather contentious relationship with their national identity and culture, as if it was something to be ashamed of or apologetic about. Indeed, from the malignantly melancholy melodramas and Hollywood genre obsessions of Rainer Werner Fassbinder to the celluloid existential crises of Wim Wenders to the oftentimes sterile and annoyingly contrived leftwing literary adaptations of Volker Schlöndorff to the populist Marxist cheerleading and hagiographic feminist bitch biopics of Margarethe von Trotta to the insufferably banal commie docs of half-Hindu Harun Farocki to the pathologically pedantic intellectual cinematic experiments of Alexander Kluge to the absurdly aesthetically decadent high-camp escapism of Werner Schroeter, the filmmakers of the New German Cinema movement that lasted from the late-1960s to early-1980s seemed more interested in negating and/or condemning their ancestral cultural than actually building upon it. In fact, even Hans-Jürgen Syberberg—a staunch Wagnerite and the most consciously Teutonic and conservative of Germans filmmakers from his era—succumbed to some of the cultural decadence of his zeitgeist as reflected in his utilization of the techniques of kraut commie Brecht and the aesthetic excesses of Queen Schroeter. Undoubtedly, the contempt, loathing, and/or fear that many of these filmmakers had for their nation and culture is probably most apparent in regard to the relative popularity of the ‘anti-Heimat’ films, which were socially scathing cinematic works that cynically mocked the once popular ‘Heimatfilm’ subgenre of the late-1940s through 1970s. Oftentimes viewed by leftists as a continuation of the films of the Third Reich and the proto-Nazi mountain/‘Bergfilme’ films of the 1920s through early 1930s, the Heimat films were shamelessly wholesome and sentimental movies set in rural settings that emphasized the value and importance of love, friendship, family, and country living, thus it should be no surprise that such cinematic works were considered to be loathsome by a degenerate generation of politically radicalized filmmakers who blamed their parents and grandparents for the legacy of Uncle Adolf. Needless to say, any filmmaker that dared to display any sort of affinity for the kraut countryside and a distinctly Germanic way of life was bound to be ostracized, or at least such was more or less the case for underrated Swiss German auteur Niklaus Schilling (Der Westen leuchtet aka The Lite Trap, Die Vertreibung aus dem Paradies aka The Expulsion from Paradise), who just passed away in early May 2016 at the age of 72 as a nearly completely forgotten filmmaker whose films are even somewhat hard to come by in Germany.

While Edgar Reitz undoubtedly brought new and much needed life to the genre with his singularly epic 'post-Heimatfilm' Heimat trilogy, Schilling dared to declare from the very beginning that he loved the land, soil, and people, or as he stated in his controversial 1977 essay, "Cinema, Melodrama, and the World of Emotion" in regard to what he believed constituted true Teutonic cinema, "One can say that the special qualities of German film are its countryside, its regions, the soil, and perhaps its people in general. And likewise its myths. A 'German world of feelings' if you will, which can be an almost ideal cinematic subject. In this sense, the German films of the thirties, forties, and fifties have more to do with cinema than the films of the sixties and seventies. And our surroundings have lost nothing of their mythologies at all; and these are of interest to me." Indeed, like fellow Swiss auteur Daniel Schmid—a staunch and vocal anti-leftist whose debut feature Heute nacht oder nie (1972) aka Tonight or Never satirized the German 68er-Bewegung student movement and whose Lauren Hutton vehicle Hécate (1982) is an adaptation of a novel by frog fascist Paul Morand—Schilling was a true rebel auteur that never debased himself to the level of virtue signaling, robotic left-wing political sermonizing, or adapting the mostly disposable novels of trendy quasi-commie writers like Heinrich Böll and Günter Grass. In fact, Schilling seemed to reject adapting popular novels altogether as demonstrated by his remark, "Once again we find among us a particularly fatal tendency not to trust the power of the filmic medium, but rather to construct films from the most classical literary sources possible in order to escape the danger of having to work with images and in that way to tell our own stories." In one of his greatest films, Rheingold (1978) aka Rhinegold, the underrated auteur would prove that you do not even need much of a storyline or plot, let alone a lame and ethno-masochistic Marxist-Freudian subtext, to sire a completely captivating, hypnotic, and haunting piece of true Teutonic celluloid poetry of the strangely tragically transcendental sort. As subtly and hauntingly melancholic as it is elegantly erotic, Schilling's film is ultimately a great and quintessentially Germanic example of the artistic medium of cinema being utilized in a fashion that no other medium can.

If there is anything that most of the filmmakers of the New German Cinema collectively had in common, it was their seemingly complete and utter ignorance and/or disdain for classic ancient German myths, legends, and fairytales, which are important because they are an insightful reflection of the Aryan 'Volksgeist' (aka "Spirit of the People") and oftentimes tell more about the character of a people than mere historical facts can. Unquestionably the genius of Schilling's Rheingold is that it manages to create a seemingly seamless unholy marriage between both myth and machine as well as ancestral Heimat and cosmopolitan industrialization in a rather unique cinematic work that hints at this in its very title, which naturally has multiple meanings. Deriving its name from both the Trans-Europe Express (TEE) train of the same name that operated between Hoek van Holland (near Rotterdam) and Geneva, Switzerland from 1928 to 1987 and the Richard Wagner opera Das Rheingold (1869) that it was named after, Schilling's sort of decidedly dark Heimat-film-on-tracks depicts the final hours of a both physically and spiritually fatally wounded beautiful woman who has decided to let herself die after being stabbed by her jealous diplomat husband upon discovering that she is carrying on a lurid love affair with an old school mate. Indeed, largely devoid of a contrived plot and traditional character development, Rheingold depicts the fairly slow but fitting death of a near middle-aged blonde beauty that seems to have finally realized that she has wasted her life by marrying a man that she did not love simply because he was wealthy and successful. Seeming to take subtle inspiration from Wagner's Wolfram von Eschenbach adaptation Parsifal (1882) and the character King of the Grail Knights Amfortas' perennial wound, the heroine portrayed by Schilling regular Elke Haltaufderheide ultimately succumbs to an injury that seems to be merely an extension of an internal wound that has long troubled her seemingly forsaken soul, hence her decidedly deleterious extramarital excesses. A sort of cultivated dark romance for cynical crypto-traditionalists and anti-modernists that is big on atmosphere and low on filler and pointless chattering, Schilling's virtual Ragnarök-of-the-heart ultimately reminds the viewer that sometimes love conquers all in a most tragically inconvenient fashion, especially if you're a woman with archaic instincts that compel you to marry a man simply because he is a good provider and later discover that no amount of material wealth compares to the feeling of being with a man who can turn your pussy into a virtual raging waterfall with a mere provocative glance.

Undoubtedly, like many modern day Western woman, Rheingold heroine Elisabeth has denied herself love, affection, and sexual satisfaction for greed and material security, which ultimately led to an ever growing wound in her soul, or to quote Carl Jung in regard to his interpretation of the Parsifal myth and the tendency of people to ignore one aspect of their (sub)conscious for the benefit of another, "The breakdown of the harmonious cooperation of psychic forces in instinctive life is like an ever open and never healing wound, a veritable Amfortas' wound, because the differentiation of one function among several inevitably leads to the hypertrophy of the one and the neglect and atrophy of the others." As depicted in flashbacks, the film's exceedingly elegant heroine lived a stagnant married life of loveless sexual repression until one day when she randomly bumped into a grade school sweetheart named Wolfgang by happenstance while riding on a train that he works on. Of course, as a professionally emasculated man that makes a living as a lowly waiter on a train, the heroine's true love can hardly provide her with the lavish lifestyle and quality of life that she is used to and thus the female protagonist even ends up having to pay the hotel bill when they are on their extramarital weekend getaways, thereupon causing an internal conflict in her soul that she eventually resolves in the most senselessly of tragic fashions. Not unlike Germany as a whole, the forlorn female protagonist is torn by her natural instincts and the demands of an industrialized modern society that is—for better or worse—constantly evolving at a rate that surely eclipses both emotional and social evolution, or as German philosopher wrote in his fairly brief book Man and Technology: A Contribution to a Philosophy of Life (1931) regarding the precarious nature of technology and its relation to man, “The unique fact about human technics, on the contrary, is that it is independent of the life of the human genus. It is the one instance in all the history of life in which the individual frees himself from the compulsion of the genus. One has to mediate long upon this thought if one is to grasp its immense implications. Technics in man’s life is conscious, arbitrary, alterable, personal, inventive. It is learned and improved. Man has become the creator of his tactics of living—that is his grandeur and his doom. And the inner form of this creativeness we call culture—to be cultured, to cultivate, to suffer from culture. The man’s creations are the expression of this being in personal form.” It should be noted that the most eccentric and socially retarded character in the entire film is an inventor. Indeed, the cultural schizophrenia of modern technologically advanced Germany is probably best symbolically underscored in a scenario were a kindly old grandfather tells his granddaughter the German myth of Lorelei as they pass the River Rhine steep slate rock of the same name whilst riding in a state-of-the-art first-class-only Trans Europ Express train that was named after a Wagner play that, according to George Bernard Shaw in his book The Perfect Wagnerite (1898), is a critique of industrial society.

Not unlike with the locomotive and young loony Vietnam War vet portrayed by Dennis Hopper in Henry Jaglom’s Tracks (1977), the titular train in Rheingold oftentimes feels like a metaphor for the mental racing and overall disintegration of the heroine, who recalls via vivid flashbacks the good and bad of her fairly tragic life as a woman that married the wrong man and eventually fell in love with another. Seemingly following in the footsteps of his Swiss compatriot Daniel’s Schmid’s underrated masterpiece La Paloma (1974) where Ingrid Caven’s character slowly wastes away in aesthetically decadent von Sternbergesque style while married to a pathetic wealthy man she loathes and longing for the unreliable yet sexually potent man that she secretly loves, Schilling’s film features the ultimate female suicide in terms of the preposterously passive yet undeniably fitting way in which the heroine dies. In fact, although she never says it outright, it almost seems as if the heroine believes that the fatal stab wound that she received from her hapless husband is the single one thing of true value that he did for, thus highlighting the sort of hopelessly lovelorn pandemonium that plagues the character. A blonde barren beauty whose biological clock seems to be more or less busted, the female protagonist probably realizes that she has no real future and will be forced to live the rest of her days as a childless creature in perpetual physical decay who will never feel the sense of security of knowing that she will die a happy old woman with children and grandchildren sitting beside her bed. After all, women tend to marry men that they do not love so that they will have a good provider for their children, yet the film's heroine has not even taken advantage of that important maternal benefit. A truly Teutonic piece of cinema that engulfs the viewer in the most darkly romantic corners of the German soul, the film even dares to make references to National Socialist era cinema. Indeed, the heroine's mother is portrayed by Alice Treff, who previously appeared in the Nazi era rail transport romcom Ein Zug fährt ab (1942) directed by Johannes Meyer and starring Ferdinand 'Jud Süß' Marian. Undoubtedly, by comparing Rheingold with its predecessor Ein Zug fährt ab, one gets a pretty good idea as to how forsaken the German soul has become since the Second World War. A sort of modernistic equivalent to Kristina Söderbaum's characters in her husband Veit Harlan's Nazi era films like Opfergang (1944), the heroine ultimately commits a sort of quasi-nihilistic form of sacrifice where nothing is gained and everyone loses.

Heroine Elisabeth Drossbach (Elke Haltaufderheide of Schilling's Nachtschatten (1972) aka Nightshade and Fassbinder's Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980)) is like a wilted rose as woman that, although still quite beautiful and elegant, is long past her physical prime and who radiates a distinctly feminine brand of Weltschmerz. Married to a small and considerably unattractive workaholic German diplomat named Karl-Heinz Drossbach (Gunther Malzacher of Franz Seitz's Abelard (1977)) who she not only does not love but who also refuses to sexually satisfy her (as depicted in flashback scenes, the heroine was oftentimes forced to masturbate before starting an extramarital affair), Elisabeth did not think twice about initiating a hot and steamy love affair with an old friend from her childhood named Wolfgang Friedrichs (Rüdiger Kirschstein of Volker Schlöndorff's Coup de grâce (1976)) after randomly bumping into him on the Rheingold train. As Elisabeth confesses to Wolfgang upon initially bumping into him, she even thought of him earlier that morning even though they have not seen each other in what seems to be decades. Needless to say, Wolfgang is impressed with Elisabeth's quite glowing pulchritude and he even seems to sense that she is desperate to jump onto his cock. Rather unfortunately, Wolfgang is hardly a wealthy man as he works as a lowly waiter on the train, thus Elisabeth seems a little bit hesitant about leaving her banal yet powerful and successful hubby for a guy that hands little girls cans of soda for a living. In fact, as the viewer soon learns while watching the film, Elisabeth plans to move to New York City with her husband for his job and she is only riding the Rheingold one more last time just so that she can say a proper farewell to Wolfgang, who naturally wants her to divorce her husband. Quite unfortunately, cuckold Karl-Heinz decides to randomly show up on the train to confront Elisabeth and her lover, thus leading to totally tragic consequences for all involved.

Before boarding the Rheingold, Elisabeth says goodbye to her mother who gives her a present for her husband that will inevitably lead to her daughter's death. The present is a gold envelope opener with Karl-Heinz's initials engraved on it and it acts as a sort of Wagnerian symbol for their loveless marriage, so it is only natural that Elisabeth is ultimately fatally wounded with it. Indeed, after Karl-Heinz catches Elisabeth flirting with Wolfgang in one of the train cars, a certain foreboding unease hits the air as the kraut cuckold is confronted face-to-face with the shamelessly audacious lies and flagrant extramarital indiscretions of his wife and the striking arrogance of her lover. After Karl-Heinz accuses Wolfgang of sleeping with his wife, the lowly waiter mocks the diplomat by proposing they head to a round table in Geneva to negotiate a contract detailing sharing the use of Elisabeth's spunkpot based on different regions of the world. While Karl-Heinz is undoubtedly a terribly boring fellow who seems to care about his work more than his wife's cunt, Wolfgang is an arrogant asshole of sorts who seems to derive a certain sadistic pleasure from the fact that he is banging a much more successful man's wanton wife. After the unhappily married couple finally goes to their own private train car, Elisabeth gives Karl-Heinz the present from her mother and he less than sincerely remarks, "I'm pleased." Of course, Elisabeth tries in vain to get her husband to ignore the fact that he just caught hanging out with her lover by pretending to be happy to see him, but she does not realize that there is not much you can do to the calm murderous jealousy of a scorned husband, even if you are a highly manipulative woman that knows the power of feminine touch. When Elisabeth almost immediately begins ignoring him after giving him the present by daring to begin reading some trashy tabloid magazine, Wolfgang becomes visibly agitated and begins eyeing his nice and shiny new golden envelope opener, which seems to be practically begging him to pick it up and use it as it shimmers glowingly in the sunlight. When the train drives under a bridge and the train car briefly becomes dark, Wolfgang ceases the opportunity to grab the envelope opener and then brutally stabs his wife in the stomach in what seems to be a desperate attempt to avenge his cuckold status. After the single stabbing, Karl-Heinz exits the train car in a swift fashion and gets off the train at the next stop without anyone noticing his murderous behavior. From there, Elisabeth passively awaits death while recalling the most poignant moments of her life, especially in relation to her homicidal husband and lifelong love obsession Wolfgang. As becomes quite clear to the viewer as they watch the film, Elisabeth is a woman with strong and insatiable erotic desires and even when she is dying, she cannot help but fondly reminisce about being sexually serviced by Wolfgang in both exotic and less than exotic settings that range from scenic country fields to a post-industrial wasteland near an aesthetically monstrous Bayer factory.

One thing that really distinguishes Rheingold from many German films of its era is that virtually all the characters look strikingly Aryan in appearance, especially the women and children, thus confirming that Schilling was a true rebel of his era and not a slave to political correctness like so many contemporary German filmmakers (indeed, although just speculation on my part, but I am pretty confident that contemporary mainstream German actors like Daniel Brühl, Franka Potente, and Moritz Bleibtreu probably owe at least part of their popularity due to their somewhat racially ambiguous phenotypes). Not long after she is stabbed, Elisabeth is joined by a young blonde girl and her grandfather, who somewhat resembles literary Übermensch Ernst Jünger and who seems to have a great understanding of German mythology and folklore, including the Rhine folk story of Lorelei, which obsessed a number of German artists throughout history ranging from tragic Romantic composer Robert Schumann to German-Jewish poet Heinrich Heine to Surrealist painter Edgar Ende. While there are various versions of the Lorelei myth that attempt to explain its strange perennial murmuring, the most famous is probably the story of a lovelorn young maiden who drowns herself in the River Rhine and is condemned to the horrendous fate of becoming a siren that unwittingly lures nearby men with her singing and beauty and ultimately causes them to crash onto the rocks. Undoubtedly, Elisabeth is a Lorelei of sorts as an accursed stunning beauty who caught the attention of a rich and powerful man that would ultimately not return his love and compel him to attempt murder. Notably, Elisabeth opts to exit the train car before the grandfather finishes telling the Lorelei story, as if she cannot bear to acknowledge that ancient folklore relates to her own tragic story.

Not long after stabbing his wifey and exiting the train, Karl-Heinz's conscience catches up with him and he decides to chase the Rheingold via taxi in the hope of saving Elisabeth from a very probable death. Meanwhile, spends her last dying day switching from train car to train car. While in one of these cars, the bleeding heroine encounters an eccentric astrologist who offers her candy and declares after examining her astrological signs, "Your talent lies in handling your imagination. This is how you should cope with your dangers [...] You are, so to speak, courted in a way. You are able to be happy, but time and again you compromise your happiness by passionate emotions." While Elisabeth daydreams and responds to virtually nothing he says, the astrologist adds, "You have an extraordinary power of attraction and special artistic talent. Your relationships are mostly fateful. This also means that you're emotionally... well." Before exiting the car to return to her own, Elisabeth reveals that she was listening after all by stating to the astrologist, "What you say is true. You applied a lot of effort." When Elisabeth gets back to her car, the little blonde girl notices that she is hemorrhaging but says nothing, as if she has an intuitive understanding that the heroine wants to die. While Wolfgang gives Elisabeth painkillers and attempts to coerce her into visiting a hospital in Freiburg im Breisgau, she refuses to, henceforth more or less confirming that she wants to die. Although he clearly enjoys fucking her and rubbing it in her cuckold husband's face, Wolfgang does not seem to truly love Elisabeth in the same fashion that she loves him, hence why the heroine probably ultimately chooses death over a divorce. While Wolfgang seems sincere when he states to her, "We've always been in love, even in school. You sat in front of me, with your long golden hair. And your kisses that I imagined," he does not seem to be as serious as Elisabeth, hence why he probably fails to save her in the end.

While looking deathly ill while lying in her train car, Elisabeth becomes acquainted with an eccentric inventor named Herbert Soskamp who claims to have "75 registered patents" and who proudly boasts he is leaving Germany for good for Switzerland because he believes that the Fatherland robbed him of both his wealth and dignity. In fact, the inventor is on the train illegally because he does not even have enough money to buy a ticket, so naturally he is quite grateful when Elisabeth ends up paying for him after a pesky ticket-taker catches him train-hopping. Despite her help, the inventor unwittingly manages to say things that would probably offend Elisabeth like how his sister randomly married a French man despite only having known him for a couple weeks because she was 34 and thus afraid she would be "left on the shelf." Indeed, as far as the viewer can surmise, it seems that Elisabeth—a considerably introverted woman that seems completely immune to confessing, let alone expressing, her emotions—married for similarly dubious reasons. When Karl-Heinz finally manages to catch up with the train and enter Elisabeth's car, he meekly remarks to the heroine, "I only want to see how you are. I am sorry," but she wants nothing to do with him and declares while refusing to even look him in the face, "I want you to leave this compartment. I don't know this man." When Karl-Heinz complains to his wife, "I don't understand you," inventor Herbert gets agitated and attempts to protect Elisabeth by stating, "You heard it! The lady doesn't want to be disturbed." Of course, Karl-Heinz predictably exits the train car like a defeated little bitch, but then he gets angry, hunts down Wolfgang and sarcastically remarks, "My wife needs coffee again," and then initiates a fairly pathetic beta-male brawl while his spouse spends her last moments in the company of an eccentric stranger. Meanwhile, while succumbing to her wound, Elisabeth remembers a magical moment when she and Wolfgang shared a dreamlike moment on a rowboat together. After nostalgically recalling her magical romantic rendezvous with Wolfgang in what the viewer assumes was the happiest moment of her entire life, Elisabeth finally croaks and then collapses onto the floor. Somewhat absurdly, the inventor is arrested for the murder while Karl-Heinz manages to get away via train, though he is clearly ridden with guilt and will probably live the rest of his pathetic life in abject misery. When Wolfgang sees Elisabeth's corpse being hauled away on a stretcher at the next train station, he is too afraid to even approach her body and merely looks on from a distance. Just as Elisabeth probably expected, both men ultimately failed her in the end, thereupon arguably justifying her decision to embrace death.

I used to know a young man and woman that were very much in love with one another in a way like no other couple, as they were two very 'idiosyncratic' individuals that, despite being out of step with the rest of humanity, somehow managed to find each other. Unfortunately, these two lovers struggled with their relationship from almost the very beginning due to largely external reasons that were beyond their control, as if the entire world was rallying against them in a sort of quasi-Shakespearean fashion. Of course, these lovers also had their own respective inner demons that made for a rather corrosive combo, as if their love was only rivaled by their combined mutual internal chaos. When the two eventually broke up after a long relationship where the love and sexual attraction never seemed to wane but the dysfunction and lack of trust only grew, the man never seemed to recover and began walking the world if he was a forsaken soul that was so detached from his surroundings that he did not even realize he was condemned to a figurative hell. Although the dynamic of the bizarre love triangle depicted in the film is quite different, I think Rheingold manages to successfully communicate a sense of hopeless and perennial lovesickness that is somewhat similar to what the young man I knew felt as a result of being in a desperately hopeless situation with a woman he probably still feels is his one true soul mate. Notably, in the handful of English language reviews I could find on Schilling's film, the reviewers describe it as "pointless" and a "journey to nowhere," but clearly they are missing the point as it is a positively poetic flick that is more about penetrating the viewer with almost intolerably overwhelming pangs of hopeless heartbreak and romantic desperation than telling a linear story with an easy-to-follow plot, not to mention the fact that it is a fairly enigmatic piece of cinema that derives much of its power from what it does not reveal to the viewer. Indeed, a transcendental Gothic tone poem made in an age when both love and spirituality oftentimes seem like an abject impossibility, Rheingold is indubitably one of the most forebodingly darkly romantic films that I have ever seen and I say that as someone that is typically incapable of empathizing with lovelorn heroines.

Unlike leftist crypto-agitprop pieces like Peter Fleischmann's Hunting Scenes from Bavaria (1969) aka Jagdscenen aus Niederbayern and Volker Schlöndorff's The Sudden Wealth of the Poor People of Kombach (1971) aka Der plötzliche Reichtum der armen Leute von Kombach, Rheingold is a true anti-Heimat flick in the sense that, instead of merely mocking or satirizing the genre in a decidedly disrespectful manner, it inverts virtually all of the conventions of the genre to present a tragic Teutonic world where the Volksgeist has become schizophrenic, Liebesverzicht reigns, and the only thing that still exists of the old Germany is abandoned castles and ancient rocks that are more of interest to tourists than locals. Indeed, instead of taking place in a small village where virtually everyone has known each other their entire lives, the film is set in a cosmopolitan piece of locomotive transportation full of strangers who have very little in common aside from having the luxury of having enough money to ride first-class. It should also be noted that the people who have known each other the longest, heroine

Elisabeth and her lover Wolfgang, find themselves in an irreconcilable situation that concludes with their eternal separation as opposed to their desired unity. Featuring brief and subtle moments of sentimental love in a seemingly spiritually accursed realm consumed by malignant melancholia, the film is the work of a true romantic who longs for love despite knowing it is virtual fantasy from a bygone era when men and women were still able to complement one another like a key in a lock. Certainly the most tragic aspect of the film's heroine is that, upon discovering real love after being married to a man she loathes, she cannot go on living as she probably cannot fathom being devoid of what she probably sees as being one of only a handful of things that makes life truly worth living. Another tragic element of the film is that, as hinted in flashback scenes from their childhood, the heroine and her beau would have probably gotten married at a young age had they lived in a different era, but pernicious social plagues like globalization, feminism, and urbanization, among things, probably got in the way at some point in their lives. Indeed, as depicted in the old school Heimat films, it was fairly normal in previous generations for people to marry individuals from the same village that they had known their entire lives, but of course absurd social phenomena like movie stars have resulted in people, especially women, in developing delusional standards for men. While the viewer never gets her complete story, one can only assume that heroine Elisabeth grew up with ridiculous standards for men after watching one too many Clark Gable and Gary Cooper flicks and thus prolonged marriage until it was too late while waiting in vain for an imaginary immaculate white knight to sweep her off her feet, thus causing her to settle for a man she did not love out of desperation at a time when her fertility was dubious at best. Of course, being a barren woman approaching middle-age that decided hypergamy was more important than love, respect, sexual attraction, and emotional compatibility, the heroine epitomizes the tragic creature that is the decidedly deracinated modern Occidental woman, who is too concerned with her personal comfort and social prestige to concern herself with the important ingredients that typically lead to happy and successful marriages. After all, it is no coincidence that marriages are at an all-time low in the Western world and that the majority of marriages end in divorce, as modern women, who have been brainwashed by feminism and stupid stories from childhood about how they deserve all deserve a white knight, expect too much from men yet give virtually nothing in return. Naturally, this also probably explains why that, despite having the highest standard of living in human history, unhappiness is at an all-time high among Western woman. Sadly, most women will probably never discover the true source of their general dissatisfaction with life, as it would require them to pull their heads out of their asses and confront the fact that everything they have been brainwashed with during their entire lives via Hollywood in is a sad little lie.

Featuring an elegant yet sometimes ominous and vaguely Wagnerian electronic score by Eberhard Schöner (Traumstadt aka Dream City, Ansichten eines Clowns aka The Clown), a mostly immaculate cast of authentically Aryan actors and actress, various references to true Teutonic folklore, and no ethno-masochistic allusions to the Nazi era or lame Adorno-approved leftist critiques, Rheingold was not surprisingly booed at its German premiere as it was probably considered too overtly Germanic and apolitical for the mostly New Left oriented kraut cinephiles of that time who probably did not want to be reminded that they have a cultural tradition that is worth preserving. Despite its pathetic debut, Fassbinder listed it as one of the 'Most Beautiful' films in all of New German Cinema in his 1981 'Hitlist of German Films.' Notably, Fassbinder's also placed Schilling at #8 in his list of 'The Ten Most Important Directors in the New German Cinema,' on top of listing the director's feature Die Vertreibung aus dem Paradies (1976) aka The Expulsion from Paradise as one of 'The Best' films of the entire era. Despite seeming to have little in common as filmmakers aside from their appreciation for melodrama and strong and oftentimes amorous divas, Schilling and Fassbinder apparently shared a somewhat similar view of German cinema in the context of German cinema history, or to quote Thomas Elsaesser in New German Cinema: A History (1989), "It is true that allusionism is part of a complex process whereby film-making assures itself of its own history, and the New German Cinema progressively did just that. This is evident when one considers the case of Fassbinder: the early gangster films, the 1950s Hollywood melodramas, his reworking of the UFA-Stil in LILI MARLEEN (1980) and VERONIKA VOSS (1982). It is also evident in his pastiches of so many other historic styles [...] The career of Niklaus Schilling could serve as an example of a film-maker trying to inscribe himself in a tradition, via allusionism, of the German cinema's own commercial history." Of course, history has less kind to Schilling, but then again he was not a savagely sadistic megalomaniacal queer that somehow managed to create forty feature length films, two television film series, four video productions, twenty-four stage plays and four radio plays, among various other artistic accomplishments, during a career spanning less than fifteen years before dying of a drug overdose before he even reached middle-age.

Despite the fact that he was revered by easily the most important German filmmaker of his generation, not one of Schilling's films is available in the United States and it was only last week not too long after the filmmaker's that I finally got to see one of his films. While I could certainly find flaws in the film if I wanted to, I have no reservations about saying that Rheingold is, at the very least, a relatively timeless minor masterpiece and 'lost classic' of sorts that eclipse even Alfred Hitchcock's Strangers on a Train (1951) in terms of my favorite rail transport flicks. I also must confess that Schilling's film makes the train scenes in Wim Wenders' Falsche Bewegung (1975) aka Wrong Move and Der amerikanische Freund (1977) aka The American Friend seem sterile and insufferably cosmopolitan by comparison. I hate to get sentimental, but the film really affected me in the sense that it is a rare cinematic work with a female heroine that I felt like I truly understood on a visceral level and I say that as someone that typically has no problem writing off the majority of lovesick leading ladies. A rare piece of New German Cinema era Germanic fatalism where a foredoomed beauty sacrifices herself for love after coming to terms with the abject hopeless of her lot in life, Rheingold is brutally beautiful and subtly erotic cinematic poetry that gives a hint of what German cinema might be like in general if the film industry was no full of deracinated dorks, ethno-masochists, nihilists, feminists, and other forms of materialistic rabble who have nothing to say.

Undoubtedly, English auteur Ken Russell might as well have been describing German cinema of the 1970s when he complained in Altered States: The Autobiography of Ken Russell (1991) regarding the degenerate and uniquely un-English state of English cinema, "We do live on a magic island, without doubt, but so far as British films are concerned there is precious little evidence of this. By and large, contemporary film-makers seem to revel in squalor, glorify ignorance and extol violence. There is another kind of life outside of this which many people in this country would like to celebrate, if only they were given the opportunity and not made to feel guilty about it. It is nothing to do with religion; it is to do with the spirit of the land in which we live, that elusive quality touched on by the music of VW [Ralph Vaughan Williams] and his contemporaries such as Arnold Bax, Frank Bridge and John Ireland: music expressing the majesty of nature, forgotten rituals, pagan goddesses and ancient heroes. All these scores are unashamedly romantic and shamefully neglected; and desperately outmoded according to the new barbarians whose mission is to tramp our heritage underfoot. Still, I agree that ours is not an age of heroes, though in his Seventh Symphony VW remembers some very gallant gentlemen who battled against tremendous odds to reach the South Pole and failed." Of course, post-WWII Deutschland is anything but heroic, yet a film like Rheingold reminds the viewer of the singular glory and deep dark roots of Teutonic mythology and kultur, thus making it mandatory viewing for anyone who wants to indulge in true Teutonic culture. As for the true power and importance of the melodramatic pathos of the film, Schilling probably said it best when he wrote, "Melodrama—what a strange concept: another cubbyhole in which one places scenes with crying men, childless, rich women, passionate love-hatreds, and setting suns. It also is used as disapproving and disdainful response to a precisely choreographed attack on the world of emotions, something a cinematic film can do if it takes itself seriously. It take it seriously and no doubt use these forms taken from the melodrama, because these forms likewise contain something that is specifically cinematic: an optical narrative structure which does not explain and edify—a way of dealing with emotions." Considering that the titular train ended operation on May 30, 1987 after over 59 years of service, Rheingold can and should be seen by contemporary German filmmakers who dare to attempt to be the heirs of the greats like F.W. Murnau and even Schilling as a new fresh source of Teutonic mythology that can be utilized as inspiration for their own films.

A WALK INTO THE SEA: DANNY WILLIAMS AND THE WARHOL FACTORY
A WALK INTO THE SEA: DANNY WILLIAMS AND THE WARHOL FACTORY

Eſther Robiſon* (2007)

Unfortunately, Andy Warhol may be the moſt popular American artiſt of the laſt century. As far as art goes, Warhol's greateſt talent as an artiſt was being a con-Artiſt. Every once in a while, Warhol would 'discover' an artiſt with legitimate talent and exploit their creativity by advertising it as his own. For the documentary A Walk into the Sea: Danny Williams and the Warhol Factory, filmmaker Eſther Robiſon ſought out to discover the mystery ſurrounding her uncle's mysterious assumed ſuicide into the ſea, hence the title of the film. What Robiſon discovered with her inquiries from various Warhol factory characters was a degenerate club of no talent nihilists that got off by ſcrewing each, both literally and figuratively. Danny Williams was both a lover of Warhol's as well as a filmmaker with a niche for creating extravagant lighting setups. In A Walk into the Sea, Ms. Robiſon discovers that many members of Warhol's entourage have a hard time remembering Williams, let alone giving him credit for ſhooting some of the moſt aethetically appealing footage (including what is assumed to be the firſt recorded images of The Velvet Underground playing live) ever ſhot at the factory. As deſcribed in A Walk into the Sea, Warhol was the laegeſt ſhareholder at the Warhol factory but also the ſmalleſt contributor, making millions of dollars off the work of other more artiſtically inclined individuals.

At the beginning of A Walk into the Sea, Danny Williams is deſcribed as very nice, ſociable guy, apparently too nice for his own good. Whereas Williams was ſolely motivated to create art, other more favored members of the Warhol factory were only intereſted in pleaſing Andy and not creating. John Cale (of The Velvet Underground) ſays of the Warhol factory, "Everybody was afraid of being left out ſo they created a part for themſelves." As with any artiſt with a true paſſion to create, Danny muſt have felt eſpecially trapped working with Warhol, a famous art fae whoſe already eſtablished celebrity would intimidate moſt novice artiſts. In fact, in A Walk into the Sea it is revealed that Williams greatly hated the glaring fact that the majority of the Warhol factory people were not doing anything but ſtanding in his way from doing ſomething he had a dire paſſion for. According to the various former Warhol factory members featured in A Walk into the Sea, the main reaſon Danny was favored by Warhol was due to their ſexual relationship, ſomething the pomo homo artiſte tried to keep hush, hush. Apparently, Andy Warhol was known for getting people to fall in love with him (Edie Sedgwick being one of them), never reciprocating it back to them, ſomething that would deſtate Danny Williams. One former friend of Danny's in A Walk into the Sea claims that Warhol psychologically tortured Williams, using him for his electrical ſkills at Velvet Underground ſhows and various other imperative Warhol productions that furthered helped eſtablish the artistic infamy of the hack soup can painter.

Unsurprisingly, Danny Williams' greatest rival at the Warhol factory was fellow filmmaker Paul Morrissey. Although I am a fan of Morrissey's cinematic trash-art, it is quite apparent to me that he is an intolerable man of self-worship as he arrogantly flaunts in A Walk into the Sea. In the documentary, Paul Morrissey pathetically attempts to completely discredit all the work that Danny Williams contributed to the Warhol factory. According to John Cale, after completing a show for his band The Velvet Underground, he heard a bunch of noise and discovered that Danny Williams was brawling with Paul Morrissey, apparently a common occurrence between the two battling filmmakers. Supposedly, Morrissey purposely hid electrical material that Williams needed to use for his strobe-driven light shows (in which Morrissey claims never existed despite how famous they are). It is quite obvious after watching A Walk into the Sea that Danny Williams was a much better filmmaker than Morrissey, successfully experimenting with lights and time (the footage is featured throughout the documentary) before his rival ever unskillfully documented junky little Joe shooting up in his Trash trilogy. The rivalry between Morrissey and Williams is a great example of the desire for power being more important than artistic integrity when it comes to gaining cinematic notoriety. After all, look at the army of no talent hack propagandists that work in Hollywood.

One former acquaintance of Danny Williams describes him as a circuitry wizard due to his enchanting electrical talents. It is also acknowledged in A Walk into the Sea that Williams was one of the first people to experiment with strobe lighting effects in the flashy fashion he did, something that has become the norm at concerts and night clubs nowadays. Legendary documentary filmmaker Albert Maysles also credits Danny Williams for jumpstarting his (and his brother David's) career. Williams edited together a documentary film for the Maysles brothers that impressed some financiers so much that they were given the opportunity to document the first tour that The Beatles ever did in The United States. Of course, most of the Warhol factory members have no problem writing off Danny Williams as a nobody that never deserved to breathe the same air that was in the general region of their isolated ivory towers. Paul Morrissey feels that Danny's death was the result of a methamphetamine addiction that corroded his mind as he was apparently not a depressive/suicidal individual but I find that theory to be far too simplistic, especially when you consider Morrissey's role in ousting the promising filmmaker from Warhol's favor. When Danny originally went missing, his mother attempted to call individuals associated with the Warhol factory and they were all offended by her inquiries, showing complete apathy towards their former associate's assumed death. According to Paul Morrissey, Andy Warhol did not even show a sign of mourning when his former lover died. A lot of people that befriended Andy Warhol ended up dying tragically, so what better way for him to go out than during a routine gallbladder surgery.

A WALK INTO THE SEA: DANNY WILLIAMS AND THE WARHOL FACTORY

Danny Williams was certainly a man that showed a great deal of potential as an artistic auteur filmmaker. Albert Maysles said it best regarding Danny's suicide in A Walk into the Sea when he states, "It is a poetic, beautiful image walking out to sea but I rather have him come back swimming."

CAN GO THROUGH SKIN

Esther Rots (2009)

Certainly, you will not find a more screwed up and neurotic group of people nowadays than young white women, especially those from decadent Western European countries like the Netherlands, which prides itself on being the most progressively degenerate nation in the world as a place where the government is willing to pay for mentally ill men to chop their cocks off and pretend to be women and fund terrorists like Theo van Gogh's assassin Mohammed Bouyeri via welfare to sit around all day and plot the destruction of the Occident. Of course, you can watch various arthouse films from the Netherlands and tell there is something seriously wrong with the people there, but there are very few cinematic works that attempt to depict the sort of psychosis that many modern women seem to be plagued with there as demonstrated by their lack of interest in producing children and xenophilic fetish for Arabs, negroes, and everybody else except actual Dutchmen. In his debut Golden-Calf-winning feature Kyodai Makes the Big Time (1992)—a work that is like Straub on steroids and with a soul meets the less abstract son of Frans Zwartjes—South African auteur Aryan Kaganof demonstrated that young Dutchmen are sexual sadists and their female partners are reluctant masochists who long for emotion but also have an undying craving for being pounded mercilessly with a rock hard cock. Of course, as the assumed result of the further effeminization of Dutchmen over the past two decades or so, it seems that Dutch women are getting even more neurotic as the result of being pounded by less and less hard cocks. In the more recent arthouse work Kan door huid heen (2009) aka Can Go Through Skin directed by Esther Rots, one bears witness to one of the most damning depictions of contemporary Dutch womanhood in the form of an uniquely unsympathetic young lady that also happens to be a sexual assault victim who moves from urban Amsterdam apartment to a rotting shack without proper plumbing in redneck Zeeland as a way to get over the fact that a towelhead pizza delivery boy beat her up and sexually defiled her. As Rots' film specifically demonstrates, the great thing about female filmmakers is that, if they are not feminists pretending to project some sort of contrived pseudo-morality, they tend to unwittingly reveal the sheer and utter lack of morality that women have. Indeed, Can Go Through Skin is nothing short of a male's worst nightmare as a work featuring a young woman that epitomizes everything that is repellant, irritating, and contemptible about the members of the so-called fairer sex. Featuring horrible lesbo-like girly music, spastic editing, incessant annoying close-ups, masturbatory handheld camera movements, tons of improvised acting, and a distinctly unattractive lead actress whose attitude and personality seem to make her appear infinitely uglier than she actually is, Can Go Through Skin is certainly a film that I never want to watch again yet I am glad I did as it is a rare work that unequivocally demonstrates that something is not quite with modern western woman.

Intemperate redhead Marieke (Rifka Lodeizen) is suffering a mental meltdown because her handsome blond boyfriend just broke up with her and one can only assume that it was her fault as clearly indicated by her innately irrational behavior and hysteria, so she begins drink red wine and nonsensically decides to begin trolling for a rebound dick by calling every single ex-boyfriend she knows, but they all unsurprisingly turn her down as if they already know she is bad news. Meanwhile, Marieke decides to order a pizza and when the 'Pizzaman' (Chris Borowski)—a swarthy and scrawny rat-like fellow of the archetypically Arab sort—comes and delivers the pizza she does not even bother to shut her door and lock it after he leaves, thereupon resulting an easily preventable tragedy that will change the protagonist forever. Needless to say, while eating her pepperoni pizza and getting ready to take a bath, Pizzaman appears out of nowhere and begins choking her and ripping her clothes off. Luckily, Marieke's friend Siska (Elisabeth van Nimwegen) shows up and attacks the seemingly physically weak untermensch delivery boy, but the protagonist also suffers the embarrassment of having to run outside completely naked in the streets of Amsterdam. On a whim, Marieke ultimately makes the impulsive decision to buy a dilapidated cottage in rural island region of Zeeland that she and her ex-boyfriend had previously talked about buying despite the fact that she is a totally helpless cosmopolitan woman that knows nothing about plumbing, carpentry, or anything else that will be necessary to fix the virtually falling down house. Obviously, Marieke has bought the house for psychological reasons as it affords her a feeling of safety and escapism from the big bad multicultural sewer of a society that robbed her of her innocence and dignity (or whatever). Marieke also decides to attend the trial of her attacker Pizzaman, who is clearly a savage sadist of sorts that smirks at her in a sinister fashion in the courtroom and who ultimately gets off with a slap on the wrist since he is a poor non-white third world subhuman and all, which naturally infuriates the protagonist to the point where she begins chopping up stuff with an axe while yelling "fucking assholes" and "fucking lawyers."

Upon moving into her new pastoral shithole in Zeeland, Marieke begins living a hermetic paranoia-ridden existence full of internet chatrooms, fetishistic torture and murder fantasies, and uniquely unsanitary living. When a rather fat and unattractive middle-aged neighbor who looks like someone from a West Virginia trailerpark named John Maan (Wim Opbrouck) begins coming by Marieke's home and helping her fix up the place, the clearly mentally perturbed protagonist becomes increasingly angered and paranoid as she misguidedly sees the kindly and rather altruistic fellow as a menacing intruder with dubious motives. One day when she comes home and finds John working on her roof, Marieke becomes exceedingly enraged like a super cunt from hell and screams "what the fuck are you doing?!" and "bugger off." When John comes by during weekend to fix her shower as he promised he would, Marieke decides to act like a scared child by hiding in bizarre cramped places to pretend that she is not home. Meanwhile, while rummaging around her house, Marieke finds such thing as a seemingly authentic original photograph of Aryan aristocrat and failed Hitler assassin Claus von Stauffenberg (?!), as well as a loaded rifle that she attempts to use as an empowering pseudo-phallic of sorts. Indeed, with the gun, mad Marieke does really bad Travis Bickle impersonations and fantasizes about shooting her attacker 'Pizzaman' while he begs for mercy. In fact, Marieke fantasies about keeping Pizzaman as her slave and letting him rot away in her attic. At one point, Marieke decides to collect all her used tampons, which she uses as teabags to make Pizzaman a nice warm large cup of menstrual tea that a vampire might enjoy (indubitably, with his superlatively swarthy appearance, Pizzaman looks ghoulish enough to be a bloodsucker of sorts). When Marieke bumps into a neighbor outside carrying a trash bag full of apparently ill kittens, she becomes rather defensive over the kitty cats and demands that the man give them to her in a somewhat rude fashion. The kitties seem to be covered in feces, thus the fit perfectly in Marieke's filth and garbage-ridden home. Of course, since she can barely take care of herself, Marieke is fairly negligent with the animals. When one of the cats randomly drops dead while, Marieke is not the least bit shaken and she apathetically puts the dead kitty in a plastic bag and takes a bath right next to the dead feline. As for the rest of the kitties, Marieke uses them for target practice while fantasizing about killing Pizzaman. Undoubtedly, in terms of rape victims, you won't find a more deplorable one than miss Marieke, who seems to use the trauma she has suffered as an excuse to carry out every single sick fantasy she has ever had and the more the days pass, the more depraved and despicable her behavior gets.

Ultimately, through the internet, Marieke begins living a second life after 'befriending' a middle-aged fellow that goes by the user name 'Herfst' (Roel Goudsmit) in a chatroom who feels rather guilty over the fact that his lover was raped by a cabdriver and he was unable to stop it, thus he has developed a sort of vigilante attitude against rapists that he slowly but surely converts the protagonist to. While providing Marieke with support for the trauma she he has suffered, he also guilt-trips her into getting involved in vigilante violence by telling her that if she does not kill Pizzaman man and he ends up attacking someone else that it will be her fault because she failed to stop more attacks. Upon meeting up with Herfst and some other unmentioned people, including a couple more young women, Marieke gets involved with setting and murdering rapists, which is never actually depicted in the film in great detail so as to emphasize that it is a highly secretive of the protagonist's life that even she does not want to think of. Meanwhile, Marieke comes by John's house with a bunch of egg foo young and allows him to fuck her after having one too many drinks, though she sneaks out in the middle of the night as if she is ashamed of her actions and scared of intimacy. It should be mention that Marieke's ex-boyfriend is a rather handsome blond Nordic man with an Adonis-like figure, so the fact that the protagonist would allow herself to be defiled by a big pig like John just goes to show how much her self-esteem as plummeted since her traumatic encounter with pernicious prick Pizzaman. To her great dissatisfaction, Marieke's one-night stand with John results in her pregnancy and she initially plans to abort the baby, even rationalizing her decision by pretending to talk to the fetus, stating to it things like, "I think I'd come to hate you and hurt you" and that she'd be "bad mother." Indeed, there is no doubt that Marieke would be a cruel and horrendous mother as demonstrated by the fact that she murdered a litter of kittens and even refuses to let free a bird that she finds stuck in a net, thus guaranteeing the creatures slow and painful death. For some reason, Marieke decides to keep the baby and John naturally becomes the perfect supportive cuckold husband, sweetly stating to her pregnant stomach, "Dear little man or woman, I don't care, as long as it's one of the two. Hey, sweetheart. Come on, baby, give us a kick."

By day, Marieke is pampered and comforted as a soon-to-be-mother by her fat ass beau John, but at night she becomes an ostensibly powerful anti-rapist vigilante who goes around with her comrades. While Marieke initially seems empowered by her schizophrenic lifestyle, as she is able to feel simultaneously strong and tough yet protected and tender as a girl who is warmly protected by a caring man who has no clue about her secret double life as a vicious vigilante, she cannot keep up the act forever. Indeed, one day while shopping for groceries, Marieke sees a couple cops and her plaguing paranoia gets the best of her to the point where she runs home, deletes all the files her computer to hide evidence, starts smashing her laptop whilst cursing at it, and calls up Herfst and begs him to destroy all his evidence, thus indicating that the vigilante must have made the moronic mistake of filming their murders. Naturally, John tries to calm her down and comfort her, but Marieke just acts all the more hysterical and violent and begins hitting him like a rabid animal, so he forces her to take a cold shower while she complains "I'm drowning," thus making it seem as if she is suffering from schizophrenia. After her cold and luckily emotionally incapacitating shower, Marieke seems to enter an almost catatonic state and John carries her to bed where she lays lifelessly as if her soul has left her body. The film concludes with the inter-title, "for my little Siska February 3-7, 2008," thus reflecting that Marieke had a baby girl that she named after her best friend, but it died a couple days after birth. Assumedly, Marieke deranged behavior probably led to her baby's death.

Admittedly, when it comes to most female filmmakers, I usually think of someone trying in vain to do a man's job and failing terribly at it, but I must admit that Can Go Through Skin is a piece of pure and unadulterated feminine cinema that no male, no matter how queer or effeminate, could have ever directed as it depicts Dutch womankind in such a unflattering, repugnant, morally retarded, and just plain decidedly disgusting fashion that no man could have been able to tolerate working with such material. One must also consider that the film was largely improvised and thus the product of hours upon hours of fairly organic deranged dame behavior. Apparently, during most of the shooting of the film, only a total of five people, including the entire cast and crew, were around in a small claustrophobic setting, so it must have been a nightmarish experience for any males involved. In a way, Can Go Through Skin is like the ultimate horror film for heterosexual males, as it forces the viewer to get beyond uncomfortably intimate with an uniquely unhinged chick who suffers from the worst sort of hormonal hysteria and lack of self-control. Indeed, Ms. Esther Rots' film is a rather rare kind of work in that it is the cinematic nightmares of both rabid feminazi dykes and rampantly heterosexual male chauvinists, which is certainly not small accomplishment. Arguably, the biggest taboo the film breaks is that it demonstrates female rape victims can be deranged cunts whose traumatic experiences make them all the more cunt. The only other film that I can think of that depicts a rape victim in a similarly unflattering light is the German arthouse 'rape epic' Der freie Wille (2006) aka The Free Will which, on top of depicting a sexual predator in an uncommonly sympathetic sort of way, features a middle-aged bourgeois blonde rape victim going berserk upon meeting her rapist's girlfriend and beating the girl up and violently shoving a toilet brush into her vagina as if it is her god given right as a sexual assault victim to commit such an act. Of course, in a 'feminized' (translation: lesbianized) world that encourages young women to live in big cities around 'diverse' people, be 'strong' and 'independent,' and forgo getting married and having children, Can Go Through Skin is far from a politically correct 'pussy power' flick as it demonstrates how weak and vulnerable young women really are, especially when living in close proximity to swarthy untermenschen who see nothing wrong with rape because it is part of their 'culture' and they think Dutch women are easy whores anyway (indeed, this is the common assumption among Turks and Moroccans in the Netherlands). Interestingly, the female lead of Rots' film even admits she used to be naive about city life before she was sexually assaulted, confessing to her lard ass lover, "The city is so aggressive. You don't realize it at first. But once you notice it, you see it all the time." Ironically, after her traumatic experience, the protagonist (or more like 'anti-heroine') of the film eventually takes on a somewhat traditional female role by getting pregnant and having a protective male lover do all her work for her, but she ultimately fails at this as she is already far too tainted by modernity and a lifetime of feminist brainwashing to live the life of a simple humble housewife.

Interestingly, in her official 'director's statement,' Rots wrote: "Another question I was trying to come to grips with is: 'How do you deal with a legal system protecting the rights of offenders, instead of the victims? Along with the instinctive, all-consuming feelings of vengeance from which there is no relief?'" While seeming rather random initially, I think Rots included the scene where the protagonist of Can Go Through Skin finds a photograph of failed German resistance movement figure Claus von Stauffenberg to demonstrate that there are certain circumstances in life where one must break the law and take actions into their own hands, like when a towelhead rapes you and the loony left-wing Dutch legal system does not make the rapist serve any jail time because it would be ostensibly 'racist' or something. Indubitably, it was uncommonly bold of Rots to portray the rapist of her film as an Arab, as one of the biggest taboos in the Netherlands and the rest of contemporary degenerate Western Europe is to recognize that virtually all rapes and violent crimes in these countries are committed by third world illegal aliens and so-called 'asylum seekers,' especially of the Islamic Arab and negro sort, and that the conspicuously corrupt legal systems in these countries are pathetically lenient with these people and even try to cover up their crimes, like the Paki-led underage white sex slavery rings in Oxford, England. Sadly, Can Go Through Skin ultimately demonstrates that, since the death of Theo van Gogh, it seems that at least one female Dutch filmmaker has more testicular fortitude than most of the Dutch male filmmakers combined, as it is a work that, whether intentional or not, completely demystifies the bullshit liberal multicultural feminist cosmopolitan dream that the Dutch seem so particularly proud and fond of. Notably, Can Go Through Skin was nominated seven times for the Golden Calf—the Dutch equivalent of an Oscar—and ultimately won three of the awards, including the coveted Special Jury Prize, with the jury's reason being: "In a time of deepening professionalism, air tight scripts and firm rules, the jury is pleased to see that it is possible to make a film outside of the trodden paths. Because of their courage and willingness to follow the experiment, both in ways of narrative as well as ways of working, with a special end result, the jury gives the Golden Calf for the Special Jury Award to the team of CAN GO THROUGH SKIN." Of course, the jury forgot to praise Rots and her crew for making a film that dares to contradict the feminist, multicultural, globalist narrative and ultimately exposes a hidden unfortunate truth about life in Amsterdam for young Dutch women.

UGLY, DIRTY AND BAD

Ettore Scola (1976)

Undoubtedly, the Italians are not only the greatest cinematic exploiters, but also the greatest self-exploiters and if any film demonstrates this, there is probably no better example of this than the delightfully degenerate, great tragicomic Guido-sploitation Ugly, Dirty and Bad (1976) aka Brutti, sporchi e cattivi aka Down and Dirty directed by Ettore Scola (A Special Day, What Time Is It?). Set in a sub-medieval maggot-infested micro-Third World shantytown in inner city Rome, Ugly, Dirty and Bad is the superbly sordid and sleazy yet hysterically hilarious tale of a magnificently miserly slumlord of the pathologically criminally-inclined sort who has four generations of his own family living under his rickety rat-infested roof as if they are the prisoners of a death camp run by Goombah hobos. Co-written by Sergio Citti (Ostia, Bawdy Tales)—the sole filmmaker protégé of Pier Paolo Pasolini who himself came from the slums of Rome as proud members of the sub-proletariat (Citti taught Pasolini ‘rare’ Roman dialects) and featuring actors like Ettore Garofolo of Pasolini’s Mamma Roma (1962)—Ugly, Dirty and Bad is like a slapstick poverty porn of the absurdly anti-erotic sort, featuring incestuous heterosexual trannies, father-in-law rapists, poverty-ridden playboy models, and a family that may not agree on much aside from the fine points of familicide. Starring Nino Manfredi—one of the most prominent actors of the “commedia all’italiana” (Italian-style comedy) genre—in the lead role as a pathetically greedy, one-eyed patriarch who is willing to kill his entire family to keep his well ‘earned’ insurance money he obtained in a quicklime accident that cost him the hefty price of half his vision, Ugly, Dirty and Bad is a radical remainder that the fall of the Roman Empire was not exactly the best thing for what would become the racially despoiled Italian non-race. Apparently, originally envisioned as a documentary, Ugly, Dirty and Bad is nihilistic Italian neo-neorealism from a deranged dagowop netherworld where people are willing to do anything and everything to hold on to what little they have in regard to a life, like maggots on a corpse, except less dignified. Probably the best unintentional cinematic arguments for the merits of Cosa Nostra, Ugly, Dirty and Bad is, indeed, ‘ugly, dirty and bad’ but it is also brilliantly cynical and masterfully misanthropic in an almost tragicomedically transcendental sort of way. If you ever thought about what it would be like to see a motley crew of ghetto Machiavellians without teeth fighting tooth and nail for mere self-preservation, you can do no better than Ugly, Dirty and Bad, a film that even trumps Werner Schroeter’s Nel regno di Napoli (1978) aka Neapolitanische Geschichten aka The Kingdom of Naples—a work apparently hated by many Italians upon its release due to its unflattering portrayal of poor garlic-deprived Guidos—in its all-encompassing cultural pessimism and aesthetic and thematic grotesquery, albeit done from a mercilessly mirthful angle. A celluloid contradition of the age old Italian saying “Africa begins south of Rome,” Ugly, Dirty and Bad is a uniquely ugly remainder that even the greatest and most illustrious civilizations can degenerate to the level of slime-ridden savages not much different than those found in the Congo or Brazil.

Before the white trash Irish-American Gallagher family of Showtime’s Shameless (2011–presents), there was the miserable Mazzatella family of Ettore Scola’s masterpiece of merry meek misery Ugly, Dirty and Bad. The patently perverse patriarch and ‘Duce’ of the family, Giacinto Mazzatella (Nino Manfredi), is a man without any serious plans, aside from hiding his well earned insurance money from members of his family, not working, and getting so retardedly drunk that he forgets where he hides said money. Four generations living under one dilapidated roof in a shitty shack in a negro-inspired shantytown on the poverty-ridden borderlands of Rome, the world of Ugly, Dirty and Bad is a pleasantly perturbing place where ideas of prostitution start before puberty for young girls, debauched trannies screw their cuckold brother’s wives, fathers shoot their sons over baseless accusations revolving around money, and mothers take pride in the fact that their daughters are featured in porno magazines. With seemingly 20+ people living under one roof and every single one of them poorer than prole piss, Giacinto makes sure to sleep with a loaded shotgun, which he is more than willing to use as demonstrated by the fact that he nonsensically shoots one of his sons after misplacing his money and accusing his entire family of stealing it. As someone who literally stabs his wife Matilde (Linda Moretti) after an argument, rapes his daughter in law, and denigrates his transvestite son Nando (Franco Merli) with remarks like “homo, tranny, faggot...get fucked in the ass,” Giacinto makes for the ultimate archetypical anti-family man. After a short stay in prison for shooting his progeny, Giacinto’s life takes a dramatic change for the better when he meets and instantly falls in love with a young yet morbidly obese prostitute with monstrous bosoms named Iside (Maria Luisa Santella) and does not think twice about taking his new lecherous lady love home and having her sleep in the same bed with his wife Matilde. Naturally, considering Giacinto gives Iside ‘love’ and ‘respect’, treats her to lavish gifts and fine wine, and screws her in front of his entire family, his wife Matilde seeks revenge and enlists the help of a local voodoo master who drives pins in the heart of a voodoo doll representing Giacinto, but that pseudo-magical mumbo jumbo proves unfruitful in killing the sub-proletarian philanderer. Eventually, the entire family agrees to kill patriarch Giacinto by poisoning his macaroni, but like all ‘white’ trash, he survives the ordeal and pays his family back by setting fire to his home at night while everyone is sleeping inside, yet, rather unfortunately, they, also being human garbage, all survive. Determined to rid himself of his family and profit in the process, Giacinto sells the family shack to a Neapolitan immigrant family but the tenacious termite-like tribe fights back and the humble home collapses as a result. In the end, the family that hates each other stays together as Giacinto builds his degenerate dynasty and new shack and lives haplessly-ever-after with his piggy prostitute girlfriend, wife Matilde, and four generations of degenerates.

Notably, the family shack featured in Ugly, Dirty and Bad has a peculiar statue of Charlie Chaplin, which is quite ironic considering, instead of pumping up and pleading for the proletariat like the silent commie film star did in his films, Ettore Scola portrays them as acutely accursed criminals and scumsuckers of the innately irredeemable sort. Rather paradoxically, the untermensch cretins of Ugly, Dirty and Bad ultimately somehow come out looking more likeable, at least in my opinion, to any of the cinematic tramps Chaplin ever created as Scola's film is celluloid scatology with a sensitively sordid soul, thereupon making it a cinematic work that could have only been sired in post-WWII Italy. Indeed, without question, no other nation of people is better at cinematically polishing a turd and making it pleasantly palatable than the Italians and I doubt there is a better example of this than Ugly, Dirty and Bad, a film that makes meatball misery, misanthropy, and meagerness seem merry and magical, which is something no Bolshevik agitprop flick has ever been able to accomplish. And I am not the only one to see it this way as director Ettore Scola earned himself the "Prix de la mise en scène" (Best Director Award) at the 1976 Cannes Film Festival for directing Ugly, Dirty and Bad, a work that makes for perfect company with the films of Pier Paolo Pasolini and his protégé Sergio Citti. As someone who has always had a softspot for Italians and Italian-Americans with a lack of self-control, erratic emotions, and a propensity for petty criminality, I find that Ugly, Dirty and Bad is like the Citizen Kane of Guido-sploitation flicks and a work that makes classic American family comedies like National Lampoon's Vacation (1983) and A Christmas Story (1983) seem like prissy bourgeois bullshit by comparison. A fiercely and foully farcical celluloid family affair for the entire family, Ugly, Dirty and Bad is guaranteed to make even the most perverted and poverty-stricken of pedigrees feel better about their troubled family matters as Scola's film personifies the wise phrase, "if you can't feed them, don't breed them" like no other.

NOSFERATU: A SYMPHONY OF HORROR

F. W. Murnau° (1922)

Despite being less than two decades shy of a century old, F.W. Murnau's Nosferatu is still the greatest vampire film ever made. Count Orlock is also the most grotesque and eerie vampire to be captured on celluloid. Actor Max Schreck's performance as the vampire goes far behind method acting. I have no problem suspending reality and seeing the vampire as authentic. E. Elias Merhige's Shadow of the Vampire was even mildly entertaining in its fictional portrayal of Max Schreck as a real vampire. My first introduction to Nosferatu was in early elementary school. An episode of Nickelodeon's Are You Afraid of The Dark? featured Count Orlock coming to life and infiltrating a movie theater. I decided then that he was the greatest vampire ever. I have seen my fair share of vampire films and not one of them can compare to the radiating trance that Count Orlock omits in Nosferatu. Francis Ford Coppala's Dracula is quite a blasphemous adaptation. I thought that guy was supposed to be one the best directors ever (another Hollywood fantasy)? Nosferatu features a real Slovakian castle in ruins (in place of Romania). F.W. Murnau was one of the first directors (especially in regards to German expressionist cinema) to use real sets for shooting. This also furthers Nosferatu's realistic feel. In contemporary cinema, we would expect the castle to be a CGI effect that destroys any type of human sense that such a gothic set should conjure up. The years have not been too kind to Nosferatu. Like all films of the silent era, Nosferatu features the decay of celluloid (Murnau's six original films have been lost forever). The deterioration and scratches Nosferatu has acquired over the years thankfully at least add to the films character. I can only imagine the truly dark scares Nosferatu caused when it was first released in 1922. Also take in consideration the live orchestra that would accompany the film. F.W. Murnau was one of the foremost innovators of cinema. Nosferatu, The Last Laugh, Faust, and Sunrise are testaments to Murnau's monumental contribution to the art of cinema. I would even say that he was even a superior director to fellow German expressionist director Fritz Lang. May F.W. Murnau's dark soul rest in piece.

SUNRISE: A SONG OF TWO HUMANS

F. W. Murnau° (1927) Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans is German auteur F.W. Murnau's silent masterpiece. The film was Murnau's first American production and it shows. Sunrise has more in common with German expressionist films than it does with American films of that time period (the film was released in 1927). Sunrise was also the only film to receive the Unique and Artistic Production at the first ever Oscar ceremony in 1929. Americans were quite baffled by the film's artistry as American cinema had primarily been used as a business appealing to the working class. This has been true even before the start of the Hollywood studios (American films were first screened in traveling vaudeville acts in the early 1900s).

Sunrise has some of the most beautiful scenes ever committed to celluloid. When I first saw the early swamp scene I was pulled into a world that engulfed all of my emotions. Much like Herk Harvey's Carnival of Souls, Sunrise put me in a trance from beginning to end. These are the only two films to effect me in this very particular way. Both directors meticulously constructed lucid dreams on film. This is amazing considering Sunrise's fairly straightforward plot. F.W. Murnau, being one of the early pioneers of film, was more influenced by paintings than his own medium. This is quite obvious and prevalent when viewing Murnau's lexicon of films (Nosferatu, Faust, The Last Laugh, etc).

The utilization of sound in Sunrise is also quite effective in adding to its dream-like feel. It was also one of the first films with a soundtrack of music and sound effects recorded in then-new Fox Movietone sound-on-film system. Quite an abstract way to derive emotion through sound and image collaboration. The horns in the score also become startling. Not something I expect from a film of any particular era.

Sunrise's story also is quite touching. I am not one for romance films, but Murnau knew how to get it done right. Writer Carl Mayer's dichotomy between country and city is something I truly appreciated. The mistress from the city represents everything immoral and corrupt of the manmade prison. The wife represents the essence of beauty and nature. The husband realizes the error of his way in being seduced into something that seems to offer progression and happiness, but in reality destroys the human soul. So quickly did the husband forget his fundamental reason for living, but so soon he remembered.

F.W. Murnau died in an automobile accident in Santa Barbara, California on March 11, 1931. According to pioneering filmmaker/gossip sleaze bag Kenneth Anger, the crash was a result of Murnau giving a blowjob to his fourteen-year old Filipino valet driver Garcia Stevenson while he was driving. Murnau had potential in future projects and his death was a serious blow to film innovation and history.

Fabrice Du Welz (2005)

For whatever reason, Belgium—the country responsible for the infamous scat-covered apocalyptic arthouse flick Vase de Noces (1974) aka Wedding Trough aka The Pig Fucking Movie and underrated aberrant-garde filmmakers like Roland Lethem (La Fée sanguinaire aka The Bloodthirsty Fairy, The Red Cunt aka Le sexe enrage) is king when it comes to the most warped European arthouse flicks, yet very few of these works get seen anywhere outside of Europe, with a work like the Flemish production Ex Drummer (2007) directed by Koen Mortier being a rather rare exception. Of course, decidedly demented Belgian horror flicks like Johan Vandewoestijne's Lucker the Necrophagous (1986) are not exactly cherished among American horror fans either. Luckily one Belgium horror flick that certainly deserves praise for its artful perversity, Calvaire (2004) aka The Ordeal directed by Fabrice Du Welz (Vinyan, Cold 45), actually managed to rise out of the ghetto that is the European independent horror underground and become a cult hit of sorts that people either seem to love or love to hate. Technically a Belgian-French-Luxembourgian co-production, Calvaire is not only artsploitation cinema at its most atmospheric and ethereal, but—whether intentional or not on the director's part—an aberrant allegory for the racial and cultural senility of Belgium and the death of the west in general. Described by many of its detractors as a 'derivative' work (what film isn't?), director Du Welz has referenced films ranging from Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960) André Delvaux's Un soir, un train (1968) aka One Night... A Train, thus demonstrating the filmmaker's curious combination of Hollywood horror and European arthouse influences. A sort of curious combination of Claude Chabrol, Harry Kümel, Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), pre-junky Harmony Korine, and a little bit of The Pig Fucking Movie thrown in for good measure, Calvaire is a uniquely unsettling and semi-surreal tale of a young traveling entertainer who makes the timeless mistake of heading down south and ultimately becoming the involuntary quasi-tranny sex object of a bitter and equally demented old innkeeper who seems to be pretty lenient when it comes to finding someone to replace his wife. The story of a seemingly arrogant hack singer who somehow manages to have everyone he comes into contact with—be they male or female and/or young or old—fall in love with him, Calvaire is ultimately one of the most bizarre tales about a Christ-like figure, especially since said character is sodomized by a pig-porking redneck.

Marc Stevens (Laurent Lucas) is a uniquely untalented traveling man-diva who lives in his vintage van and who makes a somewhat unrespectable living singing generic ballads in peculiar venues like old folk homes. After giving a Christmas performance at a nursing home, Marc is approached in his makeshift dressing room by one of the old folks, a certain Madame Langhoff (Gigi Coursigny), who puts the singer's hand on her crotch in a determinedly desperate attempt to seduce him, but he pushes her away in abject disgust. When Marc leaves the retirement home, he is approached and embraced by a younger woman that works there, Mademoiselle Vicky (played by French porn star Brigitte Lahaie), but he also turns her away in decided disgust. From there, Marc makes his way south to perform for some Christmas special, but his van craps out on the way and he finds himself stuck in the swampy hick-inhabited area of Hautes Fagnes in Liège. While stranded in the rain, Marcus is 'rescued' by a seemingly half-retarded and haunted chap named Boris (Jean-Luc Couchard), who is quite obsessed with locating his missing dog. Boris drops Marc off at a seemingly abandoned inn owned by an old chap named Bartel (Jackie Berroyer), who is still pissed off by the fact that his wife Gloria left him long ago. Bartel claims to be a retired standup comedian and to prove his generosity to a fellow performer, he not only offers to provide Marc with free room and board for two days, but also offers to tow and repair the singer's van. Despite Bartel's unwavering generosity, Marc acts like a queenish bitch and refuses to be open with the innkeeper and listen to his personal struggles, as if he cannot be bothered to acknowledge that other people exist and have feelings. The next day, Bartel begins becoming particularly possessive over Marc, especially after the singer decides to go for a walk, aggressively warning him to stay away from a local village because, "those people are not like you and me. They're not artists." On his stroll, Marc witnesses, among other things, a teenage boy penetrating a pig while his all-male family looks on in amorous awe, remarking how "so tender" the scenario is. Meanwhile, Bartel finds some amateur porn portraits (which were given to the singer by Mademoiselle Vicky in an envelope before he left the old folks home) in Marc's van and since he is a man who has not had a real living and breathing woman in some time, it really gets the innkeeper's bitter blood pumping. That night, Bartel works himself into a frenzy and raves to Marc about how his wife Gloria abandoned him many years ago. Little does Marc realize that he will inevitably have to act as a transsexual stand-in for Gloria.

The next day, Marc discovers that Bartel has discovered his porn photos and when he goes to confront the innkeeper, he finds that the pissed old man is destroying his van like a wild berserker. In no time, Bartel blows up the van and knocks Marc unconscious with the van's battery. When Marc finally awakes from his temporary slumber, he finds himself tied to a chair and wearing a rather aesthetically distasteful sundress typical of a woman in her late-40s/early-50s. From there on, Bartel, who has totally lost what little was left of his wife-warped mind, addresses Marc as his beloved Gloria and asks why 'she' has come back to him after all these years. To ostensibly "protect him from the villagers," Bartel brutally shaves half of Bartel's hair off in a rather painful fashion. The next day, Marc manages to escape while Bartel is looking for a Christmas tree, but he is soon caught in rabbit snare trap. Dullard boy Boris finds Marc but mistakes him for his dog and sits down and pets the singer, but notifies Bartel. Bartel picks up Marc and throws him in the back of his truck, which is witnessed by some villagers, but they do not lift a finger to help him. As far as Marc's punishment for running away, Bartel verbally berates the singer and crucifies him as if he is Christ. Like any working-class fellow pissed off at his wife, Bartel goes to the local bar to drown his tears in alcohol, but he makes the mistake of telling the pussy-deprived villagers that his 'wife' has returned. To celebrate Christmas, Boris comes by with the raped pig (which he believes is his dog) and Marc gives a loving and teary-eyed speech about love and the holiday in between beating the cross-dressing singer to a bloody pulp, but the Christmas joy is cut short when someone shoots inside the inn. In no time, the villagers invade the inn, kill Boris and Bartel, and one even sodomizes Marc thinking that he is really Bartel's wife. Due to the rowdy jealousy-driven behavior among the horndog hick villagers, Marc manages to escape from the inn and into the woods, but the mob follows him. Marc runs all night and into the next day, spotting a crucified Christ on the way. One of the village elders manages to chase down Marc, but falls into some quicksand before killing the amateur singer. Instead of taking the man's gun and killing him like he should, Marc, taking on the role Bartel's wife, comforts the crazy fellow and tells him that he loves him as he sinks into the sand.

Rather curiously, Calvaire director Fabrice Du Welz has gone on the record confessing that there are only two characters in the film, Marc and Bartel, and that all the other people in the film are merely a variation of Bartel. Indeed, what makes Calvaire rise above the sewer level that is typical of most horror movies is that it is open-ended and begs for interpretation, which cannot be said of most contemporary films, be it horror or otherwise. On top of that, Calvaire, not unlike Ex Drummer, has a distinctly 'anti-Heimat' quality that is not simply anti-white 'lynch mob' propaganda like in Hollywood films like In the Heat of the Night (1967) or Deliverance (1972) and liberal horror trash like The Hills Have Eyes (1977), but shows a serious concern for the culture, and, in turn, racial degeneration of Belgium. Undoubtedly, 'protagonist' Marc is a sort of archetype for the modern narcissistic and exceedingly effete European male who only cares about himself and it is only when he is tortured, humiliated, and sodomized that he is able gain enough sensitivity and humility to open up to another person, which he finally manages to do at the end of Calvaire. Of course, Bartel and all the other, mostly older, characters represent an old and senile Europe that has lost touch with everything it once was, which is represented by Bartel's lost wife Gloria, who never makes an appearance in the film, as well as Boris' lost dog. In Marc's committed ambition to become a rock star, he is undoubtedly chasing one of the most idiotic and juvenile dreams that post-WWII Western society now deems holy and godlike. In his previous and even more grotesque yet darkly humorous short Quand on est amoureux, c'est merveilleux (1999) aka A Wonderful Love, auteur Fabrice Du Welz tackles necrophilia and one could argue that Calvaire is about a sort of 'spiritual corpse-copulating' as a work about a lonely lunatic of an innkeeper that is so in love with the past that he no longer lives in the present and thus has lost complete touch with reality. Ultimately, Calvaire attempts to put both the viewer and the protagonist in the shoes of the metaphysical necrophile. While Marc finally comes to understand his torturers through his 'ordeal' and becomes Christ-like for his sacrifice, it is dubious whether the viewer does or not. Far from the Psycho/Deliverance/The Texas Chain Saw Massacre rip-off that certain undiscerning (and, typically, unsophisticated) viewers claim it to be, Calvaire takes the formulas, conventions, and themes of the American horror flicks it pays rather open homage to and raises them to level of serious celluloid art.

Fabrice Du Welz (2014)

I have been in a couple relationships with relatively 'normal' women, but whether it came to their aesthetic interests or sexuality, I found them to be hopelessly banal. Indeed, I can only imagine how boring in bed the average bourgeois-bred yet hopelessly negrified feminist-brainwashed MTV-loving twat is nowadays, but of course, as far as atypical ladies are concerned, 'idiosyncrasies' always come with their own set of 'preternatural' problems that can oftentimes drive one crazy, at least from my experience, but then again to be with such a woman, one must be at least partially crazy themselves. When two whackjobs get together, they oftentimes create what one might describe as 'mad love,' which is somewhat of a long celebrated tradition of cinema history as demonstrated by popular works like Arthur Penn's Bonnie and Clyde (1967), Leonard Kastle's The Honeymoon Killers (1969), Terrence Malick's Badlands (1973), David Lynch's Wild at Heart (1990), Dominic Sena's Kalifornia (1993), Tony Scott's True Romance (1993), and Oliver Stone's Natural Born Killers (1994), among countless other films that give ostensibly normal people a little whiff of what it is like to be in a fiery romance. Of course, many of these films are inspired by true stories about killer couples, including The Honeymoon Killers, which is based on the so-called 'The Lonely Hearts Killers' who killed upwards of 20 different women between 1947 and 1949 and were subsequently executed via electric-chair on March 8, 1951, but not before publicly professing their love for one another one last time. Indeed, Hawaii-born Spaniard Raymond Fernandez and his borderline obese WASP lover Martha Beck were a true odd couple that pretended to be brother and sister despite the obvious racial and cultural differences and lured unsuspecting desperate women via lonely hearts ads and then killed them for their money. The killer couple's story not only inspired Kastle's film, but at least three other cinematic works, including Profundo Carmesí (1996) aka Deep Crimson directed by Mexican Israelite and Luis Buñuel protégé Arturo Ripstein, Lonely Hearts (2006) directed by some TV hack and starring John Travolta and Salma Hayek, and most recently Alléluia (2014) aka Hallelujah directed by Belgian Walloon auteur Fabrice Du Welz. While I just discovered and watched Du Welz's film, which seems to have come literally out of nowhere, I can say without the slightest hesitation that it is not only the most brutal and artful of the Lonely Hearts Killers flicks, but I have to admit that it is easily the greatest, which is no surprise considering the mad mensch that helmed it. While Du Welz has described Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) as his favorite film in various interviews, he also has been influenced by the great magical realist filmmakers of his homeland like André Delvaux (The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short, Belle), hence the originality of his ominously otherworldly yet darkly hilarious debut feature Calvaire (2004) aka The Ordeal, which features an exquisite homage to Un soir, un train (1968) aka One Night... A Train. After facing a nightmarish experience working on the mainstream multicultural French action-thriller Colt 45 (2014) starring a bunch of swarthy towelheads in a production that the director has described as “the worst experience of my life,” and “A terrible nightmare...[I] almost killed myself,” Du Welz decided to go back to his arthouse horror roots and assemble Alléluia. Inspired by how Ripstein was able to transport the ‘The Lonely Hearts Killers’ story to Mexico for Deep Crimson, Du Welz hooked up with Man Bites Dog (1992) co-writer Vincent Tavie and quickly assembled Alléluia with Calvaire star Laurent Lucas and Pedro Almodóvar regular Lola Dueñas as the two charismatic leads, henceforth creating one of the most decidedly deranged and debasing yet curiously comical and brutally beautiful celluloid romances ever sired on gritty 16mm celluloid.

Although from Spain, single divorced mother Gloria (Lola Dueñas) looks more like a Mestizo from Mexico and she has a job worse than a sweatshop janitor. Indeed, Gloria ‘prepares’ corpses for a living and at the beginning of Alléluia she spends a little too much time washing the shriveled cock of an elderly corpse. Luckily, Gloria’s decided desensitization to the dead will come in handy in the near future after she meets the mysterious man that will sweep her off her feet and pleasure her like no other person has ever done before. After being more or less forced by her trashy friend Madeleine (Stéphane Bissot), Gloria reluctantly agrees to go on a date with a dude that describes himself as “almost six-foot-six” on a dating site. The dude in question is Michel (Laurent Lucas) and he is a self-stylized ‘Satanist’ of sorts (notably, real-life Lonely Hearts Killer Raymond Fernandez believed that voodoo and black magic techniques that he learned from a cellmate in prison made him irresistible to women) and he does a silly ritual involving burning Gloria’s photo and creepily stating, “Let Gloria succumb to my charms. Let it be.” When Michel meets Gloria at a restaurant for their big date, he thoroughly impresses her with his conspicuously contrived pick-up lines, pseudo-cultivation, and bogus alpha-male persona, so naturally the two end up fucking right after the date. In fact, Michel also ends up spending the night at Gloria’s apartment and acts if he is her hubby, even reluctantly eating breakfast in the morning with her bastard daughter Monique. When Gloria is abruptly called into work, Michel agrees to watch Monique, though he actually ends up spending most of his time snooping through his new lover’s stuff and finding incriminating things like photo albums where she scratched her ex-husband’s face out in every single picture. Michel also seems to derive sexual satisfaction from deeply inhaling the dubious odor permeating from Gloria’s used shoes (later in the film, Michel fiercely pleasures himself while Gloria’s foot is lodged in his mouth in a seemingly uncomfortable fashion). Michel claims to be in the shoe business and when Gloria gets back from work he tricks her into giving him money that he claims he needs to use to pay a merchandise distributor. Naturally, naive little woman-child Gloria is more than happy to give Michel the quick cash even though she is not exactly rich herself and has a child to feed, stating to her new beau regarding her somewhat creepily enthusiastic act of charity, "If you don't help the people you love, you don't really love them." Of course, after Michel gets the money, he leaves without so much as giving Gloria a kiss despite all she's done for him.

Before leaving her apartment, Michel gives Gloria his phone number, but when she calls he never picks, thus causing her to suffer lovelorn lunacy of sorts where she suffers bouts of hysterically crying and eventually begins going to every single club and bar in town looking for her MIA boy toy and asking random strangers if they have seen him. Of course, Gloria eventually spots Michel at a club not just dancing with one, but four different women, including a negress. Ultimately, Gloria decides to wait outside the club in her car and surprise Michel when he parts way with his slutty-looking company. Needless to say, when Gloria surprises Michel by appearing out of nowhere and confronting him, the only thing he can say is, "Let me explain..." and then proceeds to grasp his head as if faking an injury for sympathy while crying, "Oh my head" in an unintentionally humorous fashion. Of course, Gloria falls for his patently pathetic behavior and nurses Michel back to health at his apartment, which is covered with photographs of various lonely women he plans to seduce and milk for cash. Apparently, Michel genuinely has something wrong with his noggin as a result of being hit in the head with a beam at construction site when he was sixteen in a freak accident that has plagued him with permanent bouts of migraines that seem to be especially induced by stress, which Gloria will soon be the main source of. Although he has lied for most of the film, Michel realizes he has been caught and decides to reveal everything to Gloria about himself and his degenerate second rate Don Juan ways, stating, "My mom lived in a small apartment. When a man came, I had to sleep in the bedroom closet. When Mum didn't have a man, she took me into her bed. I had to take their place. Until one guy threw me out. Then I wandered around. Not long. Just long enough to realize I had a gift. The skill Mum taught me, giving pleasure. Except, as you see, now I take something in return." After that, Michel confesses he does not really own a shoe store and then tries to coerce Gloria into going back home, as if he genuinely cares about her feelings and does not want to let her down with his debauching ways. Instead of doing the sensible thing and leaving Michel for good, Gloria pleads to her man, "I wanna stay with you. You keep doing what you do...And I'll help you. Being with you...living for you...relieving your migraines. Be mine, Michel. Want to?" Naturally, Michel cannot turn down her offer and the two become partners in both crime and romance. Indeed, Gloria even abandons her daughter by giving her to her friend Madeleine to watch, stating, "I've never felt so good in my life" and telling her progeny, "I'm going to do something important." Indeed, like many single mothers, Gloria decides to put her own needs

In a scheme to get enough money to realize his dream of opening his own store, Michel marries a less than attractive and somewhat overweight post-menopausal woman named Marguerite (Édith Le Merdy) and moves in her large home with Gloria, who pretends to be his sister even though she is clearly Spanish. Of course, Gloria instantly becomes jealous of Marguerite and when she walks in on her lover receiving an aggressive blowjob from his new wife in a wine cellar, she goes berserk, jumps on the poor woman like a wild animal, and chokes her to death with relative ease within less than a minute. Indeed, despite initially seeming like Michel will be responsible for masterminding the murders, it soon becomes fairly clear that Gloria is actually the crazier of the two. Of course, Michel is mad but not because his new wife is dead but because Gloria killed her before she could get money from her so he could start his own legitimate business. As Michel tells Gloria, "I'm working. I have to fuck them" and then proceeds to fuck her on his belated wifey's dinner table. In a bizarre and totally unforgettable piece of musical neo-magical-realism, Gloria sings the following lyrics before proceeding to stoically dismember Marguerite's naked corpse with a saw, "Be careful, my love. They no longer have dreams. They're empty and alone. They live in darkness. I found you. You brought me back to life, so beware my life...Be careful, my love, be careful." Although Michel's feelings seem much more complicated as if he has an incapacity for love, Gloria truly believes that she and her crypto-gigolo boyfriend share a special and totally singular love that everyone is jealous of and that no one would understand.

In a true demonstration of 'the banality of evil,' Michel takes Gloria to a screening of John Huston's The African Queen (1951) and proceeds to describe his "absolute respect" for Humphrey Bogart because he had no pain in his eyes during the film despite the fact he was apparently suffering from cancer while shooting the work in glorious hot and mosquito-ridden nations like Uganda and the Congo. While watching the film, Michel impersonates a scene where Bogart childishly mocks a hippo, which brings Gloria great happiness as if she has reverted to an infantile state. Since Gloria oftentimes acts like a child and throws literally murderous temper tantrums, Michel decides to use his Bogart impression anytime he needs to calm his lunatic lover. In an assumed tribute to Satan endowing the former with supernatural seduction powers, Michel and Gloria dance naked around a fire while in a seemingly possessed state of mad erotic ecstasy. Agreeing to no longer fuck his victims so as not to upset Gloria and cause her to botch another job by killing a woman for giving her beau a mere blowjob, Michel next targets a devout and nearly elderly Catholic woman named Solange (Hélène Noguerra). Assumedly partly inspired by the setting of his favorite Bogart flick, Michel pretends to be a priest and tells a phony sob story about how Gloria started a Catholic mission in the Congo that was eventually attacked by rebels who killed all the men and raped all the women. Michel also claims that he started a 'Catholic non-profit organization' called 'Aid Africa' to raise aid for an imaginary fellow named 'Father Samuel' who refused to leave the ravaged negro village. During the entire comical charade, Gloria pretends to sob hysterically but eventually bursts out laughing while listening to Michel's borderline pornographic descriptions of the Afro-atrocities. Solange is clearly aroused by the story and states, "All that misfortune is fascinating" and then proceeds to compliment Michel by remarking that he is "very down to earth for a man of god," thus hinting that she might have some sort of faint sexual attraction to him. In fact, Michel is so down to earth that he manages to eventually defile devout Catholic Solange, but Gloria walks in on the unholy act and beats the holy woman to death with a shoe. Before being beaten to death with footwear, Solange demonstrates how her religion has effected her sexuality by stating, "I forbid you to cum" while engaged in heated carnal knowledge with Michel.

After having a fake loving wedding ceremony by themselves in a barn, Michel hooks up with a relatively beautiful and wealthy single mother named Gabriella (Anne-Marie Loop) who has a young daughter named Eve that is about the same age as Gloria's daughter. Since Gabriella's husband died when Eve was only three months old, she is quite serious about finding a new surrogate father for her child, who seems to rather like Michel as he plays with her and helps her with her French lessons. Of course, Gloria is exceedingly jealous of not only Gabriella and her glaringly superior pulchritude, but the fact that Michel treats Eve as if she were his real daughter even though he treated her own daughter Monique like a pestilence. Indeed, Michel seems like a relatively normal family man with Gabriella and Eve and, to the intense chagrin of Gloria, he even seems to bask in this new masculine role. Meanwhile, Gloria acts increasingly childish, even drawing hateful grotesque caricatures of Gabriella with "bitch" written next to it, which Eve eventually accidentally finds after the careless murderess leaves it outside. When Gloria attempts to give Eve a poorly assembled toy animal she has made out of hay and the little girl's mother demands that she say thank you, she throws an elaborate temper tantrum, screams, "I don't want a present from her! I don't want her to exist!" and then asks her mother if she is blind in regard to the dubious nature of her female house-guest. Meanwhile, to make sure she does not go into one of her homicidal rages, Michel begins drugging Gloria while he has sex with Gabriella. Unfortunately, Gabriella lets the cat out of the bag when she informs Gloria, who she thinks is Michel's sister, that she is pregnant and wants to abort the baby. Of course, Gloria goes completely ballistic, begins strangling Eve and then locks her in a room, and then demands Michel kill Gabriella, absurdly stating, "You can fuck here, you can kill here." After some hesitation and a botched half-hearted attack where he merely cuts her arm, Michel murders Gabriella at Gloria's command by hacking her in the neck with an axe. Obviously slightly less crazed and more morally sound than his beloved she-bitch, Michel tackles Gloria when she attempts to kill Eve, thus the little girl luckily manages to escape relatively unscathed. In the end, Gloria realizes that Michel was drugging her and decides to have her revenge. In the final fever-dream-like scene of the film, Michel and Gloria go to the movies and it is insinuated that the police have come to arrest the former as a result of the latter calling them, thus proving that Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned.

Part artsploitation romance, part magical realist musical, part postmodern anti-Heimat film, part (anti)Catholic satire, and part nihilistic horror-comedy, Alléluia, not unlike the director Fabrice Du Welz's previous works Calvaire and Vinyan, is a work that rather refreshingly defies all genre categorization, which is all the more amazing when one considers that it is based on a true crime story that already inspired three other films. Apparently, Du Welz considers Calvaire and Alléluia to be the first two chapters of a proposed loose trilogy set in South Belgian area of Ardenne and starring Laurent Lucas that he hopes to complete sometime soon. Indubitably, he is probably the foremost auteur 'Heimat horror' in the world, which is something he seems to accept and embrace as demonstrated by remarks he has made in interviews about his homeland like, "Belgium is a dark, surreal, schizophrenic, absurd place to live. CALVAIRE is a very Belgian film." Luckily, it seems Du Welz seems to have learned his lesson in regard to the true horrors of commercial filmmaking, as he stated in an interview with www.film4.com regarding his totally shockingly horrendous tastelessly xenophiliac mainstream frog action-thriller Colt 45 that, "...it was a disaster because it was a very bad production. They wanted me to deliver a strict commercial movie, and I'd like to do that, but I suppose I'm not the right guy for that job." Unfortunately, as the oeuvre of his filmic father figure André Delvaux demonstrates, Walloon filmmakers oftentimes have to rely on the French for getting their films produced, hence the country's lack of Dutch-language films despite the fact that the Flemish are the majority population of the culturally schizophrenic nation.

Undoubtedly in its own weird fucked up and fiercely fiendish way, Alléluia is a rather romantic film that proves that, no matter how unhinged you might, there is always someone out there for you, even if such a union can lead to migraines, misanthropy, murder or worse. While I seriously doubt it was Du Welz's intention, the film also features a serious indictment of womanhood that reflects the sort of warped thinking, hyper hysteria, and moral retardation that only women, as well as some fags and effeminate men, seem to have the capacity for. While Michel seem rampantly heterosexual due to his mastery of pleasuring bitches and whatnot, he actually looks at sex the way as women do as a sort of tool and means to an end, though he also gets a narcissistic kick out of seducing women as well as if sex to him is just another form of masturbation. Like many male heterosexual degenerates, antihero Michel's mental pathologies are the direct result of women and not any sort of male influence, as he is the forsaken bastard son of a wanton whore who made him both watch her fuck men in a closest and forced him to pleasure her when no other man was around. As Alléluia also demonstrates, few things are more deleterious to a child than a desperate single mother who is willing to go to a variety of absurdly debasing extremes to keep a man around. Also, it is no coincidence that Michel becomes the most well adjusted and happy when he takes on the natural position of a substitute father and husband, which is arguably what most angered jealous bitch Gloria, who seems to thrive in a world of chaos, death, and destruction and could never in her wildest dreams live such a life of domestic normalcy. Of course, I probably should not be reading too much into any of this, as Du Welz has demonstrated in various interviews that he is an anti-intellectual of sorts who, unlike most contemporary European art fag arthouse auteur filmmakers, thankfully takes a more visceral approach to filmmaking that comes me from the gut than the oftentimes soulless intellect. Indeed, Du Welz might have a dark soul of sorts but at least, unlike many of his contemporaries, he actually has a soul.

Federico Fellini (1969)

Toby Dammit is a segment featured in the three tales of the macabre by Edgar Allan Poe film Spirits of Dead. I have singled out the segment Toby Dammit because it stands out as the best short film on the feature and is worthy of exclusive mention. The short was directed by master maestro and supposed former circus clown (probably one of his many lies) Italian director Federico Fellini. Toby Dammit is about an alcoholic former Shakespearian actor who is losing his career. For this short, Federico Fellini once again directs the film in a dream-like surrealism that slightly resembles a nightmare. Some people in the film are merely cutout and models, while most are living. These artificial individuals makes film a disconnected quality of what odd dreams are made of. Toby Dammit is essentially a nihilist with nothing left to live for. He agrees to do an Italian film in return for a Ferrari that is a signed death wish. Upon entering Italy, Mr. Dammit is bombarded by the paparazzi (the origin of this name is from a photographer in Fellini's La Dolce Vita) and he becomes immediately annoyed. Toby throws a bag of luggage at one of the paparazzi and is instantly denounced by the photographing scumbags. At the airport, Toby also first comes in contact with a little girl with a ball. As Toby rides up an escalator, is as if he's finally trying to escape a hell that has been reserved for him. His trip in Italy will soon tell. The little girl Toby Dammit encounters is very pale, blond haired, and has fairer than fair skin. She smiles in a way that slightly hides her face as if she has something to hide. This girl and her ball look as if they should be on display as priceless porcelain that could be shattered at any minute. On an Italian talk show Toby Dammit is asked if he believes in god and he replies "no." When asked if he believes in Satan, Toby enthusiastically (for once) replies "yes." Toby claims that Satan to him is a little girl. What individual would proclaim a little girl to be Satan and why? Toby Dammit is a suffering individual whose inner demons go deeper than merely being an alcoholic. Toby Dammit attends an Italian award show that looks as if it is shot in a wet, cold cave in hell. Although beautiful women surround Toby and guests show their gratitude, Toby continues to drink himself into a pathetic state. A woman pronounces her love to Toby and he seems like he couldn't care less. Upon reading Shakespeare, Toby tells the audience he could have been a great actor and admits his contempt for all at the show. He immediately runs out of the award show and gets in his Ferrari. The life of luxury and hedonism is not appealing to Toby. It seems as if only the fast and dangerous can revive the bitter soul of this almost lost cause of a man. Toby Dammit takes his Ferrari and speeds down small roads of an Italian town. He immediately encounters odd wood cutouts of human beings and artificial sheep. Dammit looks as if none of these things bother him as he is eager to get where he is going. He finally encounters a real human being who looks slightly retarded and deranged who does not respond to Toby's verbal inquiry. Toby drives faster and faster until he reaches a fallen bridge. This single mad-man car ride is easily more entertaining than any action film car chase I have had the displeasure of watching. Toby knows what he has to do as he sees the little girl with the ball on the other side. Toby Dammit is one of Federico Fellini's most overlooked films and as good as his greatest of films. Federico Fellini was a master of mise en scène and Toby Dammit demonstrates the director's ability to make every detail of a shot purposeful. Whether the actors in the film are human or merely cutouts, they are genuinely colorful and many times alluring. How many horror films can say that?

I CLOWNS

Federico Fellini (1970)

About 7 years ago, I managed to find a VHS copy of Federico Fellini's TV movie I

Clowns at a Mom and Pop video store. At the time, I had already viewed most of Fellini's greatest works and felt that watching I Clowns would grant me one step closer to finishing the Italian maestros entire filmography. Aside from remembering that it disturbed my girlfriend at the time, I pretty much forgot all about I Clowns and wrote it off as Fellini's most forgettable work. The other day, I was quite grateful to receive a digitally remastered DVD edition of the film from RAROVVIDEO. I figured that by watching the new release of I Clowns in a remastered form, I would finally be able to properly assess the cinematic merit of the film in context with Federico Fellini's large and extravagant collection of cinematic works. After opening the box to the handsomely packaged new release of I Clowns, I immediately inserted the disc into my DVD player, and to my surprise, became ecstatically engaged in the carnivalesque cinematic bliss of I Clowns. I must admit that it has been sometime since I watched a film by Federico Fellini, but after watching I Clowns for a couple minutes I soon remembered why I, as well as a good portion of film critics, consider the legendary Italian director to be one of the greatest filmmakers to have ever lived. Whether featuring a circus of extra peculiar looking clowns or a voluptuous blonde bombshell dancing in a water fountain - with his knack for dreaming up a combination of spectacular surrealism and a baroque aesthetic - Federico Fellini's films provide the viewer with a metaphysical experience that champions any live circus or local high-class strip club. In I Clowns, Federico Fellini personally takes the viewer on a pseudo-cinéma vérité journey into the lives, times, and fantastic activities of an eclectic group of circus clowns that gave the director some of his most notable childhood memories.

Although the legacy of Italian Fascist leader Benito Mussolini has faded into obscurity in Italy, the artistic legacy of Federico Fellini is here to stay. In Rimini, Italy, an airport named after Fellini reminds the world that the Italian filmmaker is one of few artists that gave his patrons the opportunity to cinematically fly. In I Clowns, Fellini pays tribute to performance artists that inspired his love of the fantastic; everyday circus clowns. The subjects range from a farcical fascist clown to legendary silent clown Charlie Chaplin's daughter Alice. Stylistically, I Clowns resembles Fellini's Roma (1972), as both films take the viewer on an abstract autobiographical journey, colorfully illuminating the events and people that truly touched the Italian maestro's majestic life. I Clowns also features Swedish beauty Anita Ekberg, the lovely lady whose iconic appearance in Federico Fellini's La Dolce Vita is often considered one of the greatest moments of cinema history. Many film critics have criticized the Italian director for being too "self-indulgent", yet with the wonderful life and fantastic dreamlike portraits Fellini gives for these highly personal events, I have never found the director's cinematic "narcissism" to be worthy of harsh criticism. After all, watching a film by Federico Fellini is probably the second best thing to actually taking a trip to Italy. Fellini's love for the people and places that consumed his charmed life are more than apparent in his films. One scene in I Clowns that I found to be especially reflective of Fellini's empathetic character occurs when the filmmaker watches stock footage of his favorite childhood clowns at a museum. Upon viewing the footage, Fellini is immediately taken aback by the fact that the film stock is deteriorating, thus seeing famous clowns from yesterday symbolically fading from memory before his weary eyes.

"The Clown was always the caricature of a well-established, ordered, peaceful society. But today all is temporary, disordered, grotesque. Who can still laugh at clowns? Hippies, politicians, the man in the street, all the world plays the clown, now." -Federico Fellini

Even though the stock footage of clowns featured in the Italian museum has deteriorated from history, Fellini has guaranteed the immortality of their legacy with I Clowns. Like many of Fellini's other films, I Clowns ends on an extremely high note with a spectacular clown pageant. Despite taking a behind-the-scenes look at clowns, I Clowns manages to retain the mysticism of its subjects. Federico Fellini once considered being a ringmaster during his early years of adulthood, yet in a way, the Italian auteur fulfilled this desire when he decided to direct performers (including clowns) in the form of filmmaking. I Clowns is Federico Fellini's most literal cinematic circus, an extravagant collection of clown vignettes which grant the viewer a household circus without the atrocious smell of elephant feces. From his greatest masterpieces (I Vitellini, 8 1/2, Amarcord, etc) to his less notable works (City of Women, Intervista, etc), Fellini stands out as an auteur in the truest sense; a cinematic author who has graciously shared his most intimate autobiographical moments, ranging from teenage group masturbation (Amarcord) to the most revealing moments of self-doubt. Although I Circus is certainly one of Fellini's minor works, any true fan of the Italian filmmaker will find the film to be a memorable experience that involves the viewer from beginning to end. Federico Fellini is known for being a notorious liar, yet the fictional elements of his cinematic autobiography give a truthful account of his jestful soul just the same.

AND THE SHIP SAILS ON

Federico Fellini (1983)

In my opinion, And the Ship Sails On was maestro Federico Fellini's last great masterpiece. Sadly, the legendary flamboyant auteur's later films are, for the most part, a disappointment. And the Ship Sails On captures the last bit of Fellini's magic before his death less than a decade later. The film stands alone in style to all of Fellini's other films. No surprise when considering Federico Fellini went from directing Italian Neo-Realist films to surrealist magic shows. And the Ship Sails On follows a narrating Italian journalist on a cruise during the eve of World War I. The ship is filled with pretentious aristocrats, bourgeois snobs, and a smelly depressed Rhinoceros. And the Ship Sails On acts as a satirical commentary of the old European aristocracy. Federico Fellini makes no lie of his distaste for their royal dehumanization. The bourgeois in And the Ship Sails On live a meaningless life of unimportant conflict and contrived melodrama. Maybe Fellini thought World War I and the destruction of the European aristocracy was a good thing. The set design of And the Ship Sails On is intentionally artificial looking, reflecting the personalities of the individuals featured in the film. During the film's conclusion, Fellini even goes as far as showing himself directing the film and revealing the lavish indoor studio set. The Rhino featured in And the Ship Sails On has an indescribable aesthetic appeal that made me more caring of his life than the majority of characters featured in the film. An amazing shot of the Italian journalist and the Rhino in a small boat further confirm Fellini's eye outrageous and heartwarming(yep) situations.

The Europeans are on a cruise to mourn the death of a famous Italian opera singer. Their sentiments are obviously for show as Fellini purposely points out. Serbian refugee eventually board the ship resulting in disgust from the pretentious bourgeois. I wonder if Fellini puts blame on the Austro-Hungry aristocracy for the Serbian assassination of Archduke Franz Ferdinand. Fellini was always a man capable of making the most bland of souls full of wonder. And the Ship Sails On is a film that has yet to acquire the praise that his earlier masterpieces received. The postwar (of both wars) European film industry, in my opinion, produced the greatest film directors the world has ever known. The world will never see another Federico Fellini, F.W. Murnau, or Ingmar Bergman. Thankfully their films still exist for viewing today.

RENT BOYS

Fenton Bailey (2000)

Veteran kraut queer filmmaker Rosa von Praunheim may have directed over 50 films (counting short and feature-length works) before he turned 50-years-old, but he seems to be a much better documentarian than an idiosyncratic auteur of flamboyant fictional films. With his first breakthrough work being the filmic fag-on-fag bashing docudrama/militant movie manifesto It Is Not the Homosexual Who Is Perverse, But the Society in Which He Lives (1971) aka Nicht der Homosexuelle ist pervers, sondern die Situation, in der er lebt, as well as his peculiar poofter propensity for candidly covering gay-related topics that even the most AIDS-ridden of homos would not touch with a latex-covered stick, like in Men, Heroes and Gay Nazis (2005) aka Männer, Helden, schwule Nazis – an innately incendiary and iconoclastic documentary work chronicling the history of homo Hitlerites and their contemporary cock-sucking equivalents – Praunheim has proven time and time again that he is a seedy soldat of cinéma vérité sodomite history and his rather recent work Rent Boys (2011) aka Die Jungs vom Bahnhof Zoo is no less brazen and authentically awe-inspiring. A documentary covering the history of male hustling in West Berlin's busiest transportation center, Bahnhof Zoo train station – the superlatively slimy and sickening setting of Christiane F. – Wir Kinder vom Bahnhof Zoo (1981) directed by Uli Edel – Rent Boys is another explicit and equally inexplicable documentary work from von Praunheim that undoubtedly works more against the queer cause he has dedicated his life to than it does to further fagdom in the public's eye, but it is an important work all the same. Beginning with vintage news footage from 1965 at Bahnhof Zoo of a nerdy newscaster that looks like he could have been one of the real-life public sex offenders of Tearoom (1962/2007) presented by William E. Jones, Rent Boys soon reveals that the Berlin transport station has been a hotspot for homos and hustlers for nearly half a century. Flash forward to the present and the public prevalence of bought buggery at the Bahnhof Zoo has far from waned as even the German government has now stepped in to provide free sexual contraceptives and HIV tests to the hustlers, even to illegal aliens of the Turkish, Kurdish, gypsy, Romanian, etc. persuasion. Indeed, if anything has dramatically changed over the past couple decades regarding the dick-peddling boys of West Berlin, it is the complexion of their skin and the language they speak. Needless to say, if Uncle Adolf were alive, it would be hard to tell what he would be more infuriated by regarding Bahnhof Zoo; the number of Aryan boys pawning their asses or the number of unhinged untermensch taking over the trade and selling at a discount price.

The first central subject featured in Rent Boys is an indigenous German fellow named Daniel – a blockheaded 28-year-old man-boy that bears a striking to kraut queer filmmaker Michael Stock; the writer/director/actor of the nihilistic new queer cinema flick Prinz in Hölleland (1993) aka Prince in Hell – who got into gay-for-pay prostitution after realizing it was much easier to peddle his prick than it was to steal a car or rob a house. Like many of the hustlers featured in Rent Boys, Daniel is a self-professed heterosexual man who came from a broken home where his idiosyncratically insane mother forced him to literally eat the skidmarks out of his underwear as a young child as punishment, thus he naturally hit the streets and the rest is history. A man who lives a double life, Danny boy never let the mother of his child know that he lets old men blow him for a couple bucks on a routine basis. The next fellow featured in the documentary is a nauseatingly brain-damaged ex-hustler of pure gypsy blood with a permanently disgruntled face and narcotic-haze that goes by the name Nazif (“Miro”), who is best known for writing a book about the sometimes highs but mostly lows of the hustler life. Like many Romani children, Nazif was taught by his parents to steal and beg for money from foreigners, but by happenstance, he was approached in his youth by a prominent Berlin pedophile with the more than apt name “Kids Carsten” (apparently, a well known pedo in the Fatherland) who talked the boy into selling his body to him at the mere age of 12, thus ushering in his long career as a popular street queer. Now on methadone and barely mobile, Nazif has had an ostensibly hellish life that includes prison sentences, but while in jail he learned to write and wrote his hit autobiography on sold sodomy, thus he is doing relatively well when compared to his family members, who are more than a bit hostile to their son’s trade. When Nazif’s father learned of his prodigal son’s poofster profession, he forced his son to strip naked, poured lighter fluid on his body, and literally lit his ass on fire. Another gypsy from Romania named Romica came to Berlin and found he was able to support an entire family by going gay-for-pay, even if his wife did not like it at first (he is filmed in the documentary sitting next to his wife and baby son while he talks openly about his faux-fag flesh-peddling). Originally, Berlin just had German and some Turkish/Arab hustlers, but with the fall of communism in Eastern Europe, the eastward gates opened and gypsy and Slav rent boys began to flood the streets with on sale semen, thus further validating the fact that poverty and prostitution go hand-in-hand as depicted throughout Rent Boys. Ionel is another gypsy who came to Berlin thinking he would be stealing, begging, and/or playing music to earn an income but he became a dollar-an-inch man instead, thereupon earning a ton of bread, which enabled him to support his family and buy hip clothes, but he also faced violence from violent Romanians (Romani and Romanians have a perennial hatred of one another), which almost resulted in death when one stabbed him in the face and chest. Like most of his callboy compatriots, none of Ionel’s friends and family know about his dick-peddling profession as nowhere else in the world is it more dedicatedly decadent and anti-family than the EU, thus foreign people from more ‘traditional’ backgrounds, no matter how poor and defeated, tend to shun such behavior. Undoubtedly, the most tragic and plainly pathetic individual featured in Rent Boys is an exceedingly effete German fellow named Daniel René, who was routinely anally raped starting at age 8 or 9 by a janitor at a commie Eastern Berlin school. Over time, René became a virtual sex slave in a large pedophile ring (which was not busted until over a decade later) and was pimped out at Zoo Station (only getting a 30% cut of the money he earned and giving the rest to his sodomite slave master), but when he became an actual adult at age 18, the poor boy was thrown away by his daftly homo handlers as they found him to be far too old for their preteen/teen tastes. Out of everything, René was left most broken by the fact that he was eventually rejected by the pernicious pedos as virtually his whole life revolved around these infantile sexual inverts, thus he felt alone and abandoned. Indeed, there is not a single male hustler featured in Rent Boys that does not have warped idea of friends and family.

Needless to say, the life of a hustler is no life at all, and the same can certainly be said of the Johns that patronize them. Surely, one of the most interesting aspects of Rent Boys is interviews conducted with high-profile Johns, the most famous being Austrian actor/director Peter Kern, but a neo-leather-fag who wears a gimp mask is not far behind. The first artist/trick interviewed is a German photographer named "Master Patrick," a flagrant fag photographer who claims to have an archive of over 100,000 candid photos of nude men (many of whom are hustlers) and who always wear a trademark leather S&M mask, thus never revealing his true identity, at least in the physical sense. Master P lives in the same neighborhood as the gigolos he buys sex from and his daily life seems to be the dream of a smutty queer romance novel, thus acting in stark contrast to the perennially lonely Peter Kern. A man who has starred in around a hundred films, including works directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, Daniel Schmid, Walter Bockmayer, Christoph Schlingensiefel, Werner Schroeter, and Ulrike Ottinger, a director of films starring none other than Helmut Berger, and a popular cult figure in his homeland of Austria, Kern is not a fellow that one would assume was eternally unloved and plagued by loneliness but as he states himself in Rent Boys, "Who wants to sleep with a monster like me? I was always... Whether I weighed 140 pounds or, like now, 350, I was always the fatso." As should not be a surprise to anyone who has seen his films, Kern rather bluntly confesses, "I made Gossenkind ["Gutter Child"], a film in which a father is married and has a son, but he has a penchant for boys. Good, the one he likes is 15, so he's really a youth. The tabloid press wrote: "Peter Kern, Child Molester." As soon as you touch the subject, you get pigeonholed. I can't say I'm into children, but I can say I'm into youths between 16 and 22 years of age." As an unmistakably morbidly obese man whose bulging belly extends a couple feet below his crotch level as if he were a gigantic human beanbag, Kern quite valiantly, yet vulnerably and pathetically, admits, "I'm so lonely, so alone. I long for a relationship. When someone just rests his head on my shoulder, I'm in seventh heaven. I want the moment to last forever. Just his head and quiet conversation... That's not offered to me; I have to buy it. I have to pay someone to rest his head there. For another hour, 50 or 100 euros more... For me, it's not about fucking anymore; I've had that." Judging by Peter Kern's rather recent film Blutsfreundschaft (2008) aka Initiation, it seems like Kern would like nothing more than to take in a derelict neo-nazi skinhead boy from a broken home and convert him to 'spiritual sodomy' and vapid LGBT politics.

Ultimately, Rent Boys is a work that proves that in any consumerist capitalist society where people put commerce over community and flesh over family, everything has a price, including one's personal dignity and sexuality. The fact that someone would be so decidedly desperate as to ritualistically pawn their body to a papa poof for a small monetary profit yet still claim to be heterosexual is the height of senseless self-degradation and desensitization in a city suffering from a malignant sickness of the soul akin to spiritual syphilis. Another interesting and insightful element of Rent Boys that I am surprised that Rosa von Praunheim decided to include is the sad and sordid personal story of pedo-ring victim Daniel René as it indisputably proves that, indeed, there are certain groups of homosexual pedophiles and pederasts who aggressively and criminally seek to 'recruit' and create members of the poisonous 'preteen-penetrating tribe,' thus proving that some segment of the gay male population may not have been born homosexuals but were reared into it via ravaging of the rectum at an early age by a pedophilic sex predator as depicted in Gregg Araki's Mysterious Skin (2004). Undoubtedly, if one learns anything from Rent Boys, it is that the life of a hustler is not nearly as 'romantic' as homophile auteur filmmakers like Gus van Sant (Mala Noche, My Own Private Idaho) and Bruce LaBruce (Super 8 ½, Hustler White) would lead one to believe. A mutually pathetic transaction between two equally pitiable people – one so desperate for money that, as a straight man, they will let a horny homo blow them for a couple bucks, and the other so sexually and/or romantically desperate that they have to buy it from shady street people that are oftentimes criminals (and have killed Johns and vice versa) – the realm of renting boys as depicted in Rosa von Praunheim's Rent Boys is not only that of a very real yet semi-secret Sodom, but also an age-old part of human history that no one wants to recognize, not even many of the participants themselves.

PARTY MONSTER

With the recent release of the King of the Club Kids, Michael Alig, after serving 17 years in prison after being convicted of 1st degree manslaughter in 1997 for killing his Latin drug dealer Andre "Angel" Melendez, injecting his corpse with Drano, dismembering his body, and throwing it in the Hudson River, among others, I felt that there was no better time to re-watch the film that influenced the campy cocksucker's parole officers to deny him parole in 2006. Indeed, a film about the rise and fall of the NYC Club Kid scene, Party Monster (2003), which is based on Alig's best f(r)riend and fellow alpha-Club Kid James St. James' 1999 memoir Disco Bloodbath: A Fabulous but True Tale of Murder in Clubland (which was later changed to 'Party Monster' in 2003), depicts a group of talentless fag and fag hag narcissists led by the ultimate alpha-fag narcissist Alig that adopted Andy Warhol's Factory lifestyle (in fact, as St. James once stated, "I think Michael's big break was when Warhol died...") of imaginary self-centered superstars and hedonism to ungodly extremes of excess that would ultimately lead to murder. Co-directed by subversive queer producers-cum-auteurs Randy Barbato and Fenton Bailey (they would subsequently direct the documentary Hidden Fuhrer: Debating the Enigma of Hitler's Sexuality (2004) which takes a look at the evidence as to whether or not big H was gay), who previously directed the documentary Party Monster: The Shockumentary (1998), which the film is also largely based on, Party Monster, despite its seemingly exploitative and vulgarly campy essence, is a debauched docudrama that is quite faithful to the facts right down to little details regarding the curious case of Michael Alig and his Club Kid cohorts, as a work that never degenerates into hagiography (knowing Hollywood's homophilia nowadays, one can expect that if Gus Vant Sant had directed the film, it would have portrayed Alig as a misunderstood hero of sorts). Admittedly, when Party Monster was first released over a decade ago, it was sort of a dream come true for me because, like many kids my age growing up during the early-1990s, I would often joke about Macaulay Culkin being gay and having been molested by Michael Jackson, so for him to make a very unexpected comeback as a hysterical homicidal homo seemed like pure kismet. Directed by two men actually connected to the Club Kid scene and starring a number of the original Club Kids wearing the same the repulsively flamboyant costumes that they wore during their prime as coke, cock, and ecstasy addled drug children, Party Monster depicts the height of Reaganite degeneracy (indeed, in the Shocukumentary doc, Alig and his friends confess they were all part of that materialistic mentality) where trust fund degenerates delighted in their own degeneracy and demanded that the entire world worship them for it despite the fact they lacked any sort of talent or trade. An unflattering, if not reasonably objective, portrayal of the bastard son of an eccentric

PARTY MONSTER

German immigrant woman from a small town in Indiana with an unhealthy obsession with horror movies who learned how to con and charm people as a child by peddling candy at inflated prices and who, naturally feeling misunderstood, inevitably came to NYC to become rich and famous, which he almost did but also developed multiple drug addictions and homicidal tendencies, Party Monster is ultimately a damning depiction of the American dream gone awry set in arguably the most spiritually sick city in the world.

When Michael Alig (Macaulay Culkin) was 10 years old, his Sunday teacher taught him how to French kiss, “among other things,” and around the same time he taught himself how to be a parasitic capitalist by buying candy in bulk and selling it to his co-students at a 200% markup rate, thus the so-called ‘King of the Party Kids’ learned everything he needed to know about being a psychopathic poof conman while he was still just a wee lad. When he became an adult, Alig left his remote hometown in Indiana and headed to New York City to seek fame and fortune and soon realized he was practically made for the shitty city. After enough pestering and flattering, Alig convinces an underground socialite/trust fund transient by the name of James St. James (Seth Green) to teach him the “rules of fabulousness” in terms of gaining a reputation in the underground. After begging a one-eyed nightclub owner named Peter Gatien (played by Dylan McDermott in easily his most interesting film role ever) to host his parties at his nightclub, Alig soon becomes the uncontested Führer of the Club Kids. While St. James is Alig’s arch nemesis as both queens are determined to one-up one another in terms of popularity and reputation, Peter acts as a sort of father figure to the bastard Club Kid. On top of setting up parties in tribute to Herschell Gordon Lewis’ pioneering splatter flick Blood Feast (1963), Alig also pioneers a number of illegal parties in places ranging from an 18-wheeler truck driven by a tripping tranny (played by Marilyn Manson in drag) to a trashy fried chicken fast food joint. On top of conning people into giving him money for parties, Alig is so slick that he even manages to convert an ostensibly heterosexual fellow named Keoki (Wilmer Valderrama) into a homo and even transforms him into a ‘Superstar DJ’ in the process. Unfortunately, Keoki soon develops a coke problem and Alig gets back at his boyfriend by using all his white powder, which he shares with their cat (or ‘lovechild’), thus ushering in the beginning of the King of the Club Kid’s life-destroying addiction to drugs. Indeed, on top of keeping his slavishly hedonistic Club Kids under control, including his German-born mother Elke (played by Diana Scarwid of Mommie Dearest (1981)), by feeding them drugs and alcohol, especially ecstasy, Alig also invents his own childish droog-like language (using invented words like ‘skrod’, ‘skrink’, ‘Skrinkle’, ‘Skroddle’, etc.), which he actually convinces his followers to use.

With the growing popularity of the Club Kids, Alig and his low-camp comrades are featured on talk shows (although John Stamos portrays the talk show host in the film, Alig and his friends went on the Geraldo Rivera show, as well as the Jane Whitney Show where they found solidarity with GG Allin of all people!) and even do national tours to recruit members, as if the Club Kids are like some degenerate sodomite SS. During one of these performances, Alig, who is dressed like a campy Hitler with an Uncle Adolf mustache and a really gay lederhosen outfit, espouses his wanton psychopathic Weltanschauung to audience members, declaring, "Greetings, citizens. We are living in the age where the pursuit of all values other than money, success, fame and glamour, has either been discredited or destroyed. Money, success, fame, glamour." One of the people to see Alig and his human accessories on TV is a gay Latino named Andre "Angel" Melendez (Wilson Cruz of My So-Called Life fame), who comes to NYC and becomes a top drug dealer among the Club Kids. While Alig has no problem devouring Angel's drugs, he hates the Hispanic homo as he sees him as a dimwitted fraud and shameless copycat. Alig also starts a pseudo-romance with a hot fag hag named Gitsie (Chloë Sevigny) and spends a lot of time with a dapper hat maker turned drug dealer with a rather flat affect named Robert "Freez" Riggs (Justin Hagan). Eventually, Alig and Angel get in a fight over a longstanding drug debt and Freez ends up bashing the winged Latino in the head with a hammer. From there, Alig and Freez smother Angel with a pillow, pour Drano down his throat (although, according to the real-life Michael Alig, they also injected his veins with the cleaner), cut off his limbs, put his dismembered corpse in a cardboard box, and threw it into the Hudson River. Ever the braggart, Alig even goes so far as boasting of the murder and since the cops want to bust his boss Peter Gattien, he stays out of prison for a period of time, even going on a "Second Honeymoon" to drug rehab with Gitsie (indeed, Alig overdoses), but Angel's body eventually turns up. In the end, Alig's rival James St. James becomes quasi-famous for writing the "Great American Novel" aka Disco Bloodbath (the book the film is based on) while the King of the Club Kids is denied fame due to his imprisonment, though he brags, "You know, prison isn't all that different from a night club...everything's for free and I don't have to get out of bed in the morning. And I can get all the drugs and sex I want."

In Party Monster: The Shockumentary, the real-life Michael Alig is so flagrantly arrogant and confident that he will get away with his sick criminality that he gives the following superlatively shallow excuse as to why he killed Angel, "he was a...he was a copycat...he was one of those copycats we hate so much and so we killed [...] I killed Angel and... That's the kind of thing that gets me in trouble" (keep in mind that this interview was filmed 3 months before Alig was arrested). Indeed, as far as I can tell from seeing him speak in interviews and documentaries, the real Alig makes Macaulay Culkin's portrayal in Party Monster seem at least somewhat more empathetic and likeable by comparison. As far as I am concerned, the only good thing that ever came out of the whole Club Kid pseudo-kultur was the movie Party Monster, which is the modern day equivalent to a midnight movie and a true instant cult classic if there ever was one, as a highly quotable work with seemingly infinite replay value. Aside from appearing in Party Monster: The Shockumentary, Alig and his cracked out cocksucking Club Kid comrades also appeared in the obscure 'gaysploitation' flick Shampoo Horns (1998) directed by Spanish auteur Manuel Toledano. Additionally, Alig is also the main subject of the upcoming documentary Glory Daze: The Life and Times of Michael Alig (2015) directed by Spanish actor-turned-director Ramon Fernandez (indeed, it seems the Spanish have a special affinity for Alig for whatever reason). Incidentally, the trailer for Glory Daze mentions nothing about the fact that Alig is a killer. Upon being released from jail on May, 5 2014 after serving 17 years behind bars, Alig was also the subject of a 'public letter' written by gay wop journalist Michael Mušto which declared, "You not only killed Angel, you basically murdered nightlife." Additionally, Mušto had the gall to dictate to the King of the Club Kids that he should do the following, "Charity work—any charity work—would be a good way to take you out of yourself and to give back to the world in a way that might bring some gratification. Starring in reality shows or throwing parties (if anyone would let you) might sound appealing, but going down those hollow paths won't lead to anything substantive. Those kinds of résumé entries were for the old Michael Alig. The new one needs to catch up with technology, adapt to our city's more privileged populace and come up with something digital that will be creative, constructive and conciliatory. Use your imagination while quelling your baser instincts." Of course, as a man who used to date a neo-nazi skinhead, loved the word "spic" (not to mention the fact he killed one), routinely pissed in people's drinks (and would coerce other people into drinking piss and vomit), and wrote libelous articles claiming his friends were involved in the less than flattering trade of enslaving 12-year-old boys and forcing them into white sex slavery, Alig would certainly look like a pathetic phony were he to attempt to turn over a new leaf and become another Hollywood humanist hack, especially with an innately incriminating biopic like Party Monster in existence that has immortalized his moral insanity, drug addiction, and scatological sadism. Like a contemporary Paul Morrissey flick minus the moral compass, Party Monster is not just an endlessly fun and entertaining film that is as addictive as coke yet shot on the price of crack, but also an epitaph for an entire degenerate generation of excess who thought that they were pure gold, but were more akin to excrement, thus making Michael Alig an aberrant alchemist of sorts. As for Macaulay Culkin, he should have won an Oscar for his performance in a truly singular role where he singlehandedly destroyed his reputation as a loveable childhood actor forever.

VIVA LA MUERTE

Fernando Arrabal (1971)

Viva La Muerte is a prime example of degenerate art. Fernadol Arrabal may just be another commie art fag bent on subversion (blowing kisses to Bunuel). Poor boy Fando lost his communist father due to his mother's big mouth. She doesn't want her nut bag husband fighting for the reds in the Spanish civil war. In typical communist schizophrenic fashion, Arrabal portrays communists as fighters of freedom and peace. Proletarians who have fought against the evils of nationalism and religion. Communists always forget that they have much more blood on their hands than any fascist government ever did. Viva La Muerte plays out like a disturbed and schizophrenic children's film. The film features Fando's fathers head being defecated on, animal slaughtering, incest, and other typical surrealist bullshit. Degenerate communist artists like Fernado Arrabal both entertain me and make me want to murder them. They offer insight into their off balance minds via fucked up films and then expect people to take them seriously politically. Most surrealists shouldn't even be allowed to have a driver's license (let alone promote politics). Fernadol Arrabal's real father was a victim of fascist persecutions (or something). Father Arrabal escaped from prison and eventually disappeared. Viva La Muerte seems like Arrabal's attempt to articulate his feelings on the subject (with the fantasy that his Dad was revolutionary). My belief is that all commies get what they deserve. Honestly, Viva La Muerte is one of the better surrealist films that I have seen recently. It is solidly constructed and offers the viewer something to think about. I didn't feel like Arrabal was contriving too much like a lot of surrealists. I have many times questioned whether I like or hate Alejandro Jodorowsky. Fando Y Lis is too good to denounce that scumbag. Viva La Muerte is a beautiful film in it's own right. Degeneracy is an American virtue. Films like Viva La Muerte make me realize things could be worse. I feel for poor Fando (or maybe Arrabal?). The surrealist film is an excellent way for wackjobs to exorcise their demons.

I WILL WALK LIKE A CRAZY HORSE

Fernando Arrabal (1973)

I Will Walk Like A Crazy Horse is a French surrealist black comedy with recurring themes of dysfunction and suspense. The plot is a bit wayward at first, but soon begins to mold into a formulaic storyline thanks to the help of flashbacks and dream like realities. The film itself is thrust into it's own perfections as you encounter truly original surrealism mixed with blessed blasphemy. The opening scene itself is of a child messiah in a manger wearing a crown of thorns. He is promptly silenced and victim to genital mutilation. We meet Aden Ray, who is a wanted man who disappeared into the desert. He then encounters a nameless hermit who lives in the desert. They promptly become friends and encounter many disturbing adventures. Along the way, the past begins to crush Ray's sanity slowly resulting in epic religious hallucinations. IWWLACH is a marvel in avant-garde cinema. It's stunning portrayal of insanity masked by a suit and tie is of a memorable sort. Misogynistic thoughts occur within Ray and many questions arise about this unknown man. The bond they share can almost be deemed homo erotic at the root. Why does Ray want for this man to be happy at his own expense? Will it par chance fill the void in his life? The film speaks its soft metaphors and is plentiful with sexually distressed imagery. One scene that sticks out to me is his penis being used as a candle. Many very taboo themes such as hermaphrodites, nude children, and bleeding messiahs are abundant. This is obviously an outlet for director Fernando Arrabal to unleash his sexual repression and personal demons. It speaks boldly with its anti-capitalist mindset. Watching "Marvel" cry when seeing the abuse of nature in our society is a sorrowful moment. IWWLACH is a deeply affecting film, which speaks of religious turbulence and the absurdity of real beauty. It is an audacious addition to any surrealist fan and should be highly regarded for its Island Of Death feel and similar Jodorowsky experience. Sexual confusion is the name of the game.

TO BE TWENTY

Fernando Di Leo (1978)

As far as I am concerned, hippies would have been better off in concentration camps where they were forced to 'concentrate' and do hard labor or die as opposed to comfy communes comprised of needless and heedless hedonism, hence why many of them grew up to be quasi-psychopathic yuppie materialists and have helped degenerate the Occident into the collectivist commune of chaos it is today where Third World whores shit out brownish babies without care and the more irresponsible someone is (i.e. producer of bastard babies, unemployed, addicted to crack, etc.), the more they are rewarded by the government. Anyway, while I will probably never get to see my dream of seeing unhip hippie bastards being herded into cattle cars and being shipped off to life-changing concentration camps with motivational signs at the front gate that state "Arbeit macht frei" ("work makes [you] free"), I did manage to track down a rather idiosyncratic Italian flick directed by Dago gangster film Duce auteur Fernando Di Leo (Milano calibre 9 aka Caliber 9, Il poliziotto è marcio aka Shoot First, Die Later) entitled Avere vent'anni (1978) aka To Be Twenty about two gorgeous yet gullible and gall-ridden Guido gals who hitch a ride to Rome in the hope of finding the ultimate utopia full of peace, love, and penetrating penises at a hippie commune, but instead find themselves in store for a rather rude awakening full of impotent men, repressed lesbian feminist ideology, prostitution, bad drugs and bad sex, and ultimately a dystopian nightmare full of rape and coldblooded murder. A satire of the hippie/counter-culture movement, sexual liberation, feminist, and other repellant ingredients of the late-1960s worthy of cultural cringe disguised as a European "sex comedy" quite typical of its time, To Be Twenty is the rare sort of unclassifiable quasi-exploitation flick with a marvelously malicious moral compass that will leave those beta-man viewers expecting a giddy 'masturbation aid' feeling like they have been slapped in the face and kicked in their little blue balls. Released theatrically in the United States in a soulless and superficial soft-core edited "sex comedy" edition minus the stomach-churning ending, To Be Twenty must be seen in its uncompromising "director's cut" version to be truly effective and unforgettable, lest ye turn into a dirty, drug-addled tranny hippie homo. In the totally torrid yet trying tradition of Looking for Mr. Goodbar (1977)—certainly one of the most underrated films of its era—To Be Twenty is a vicious yet vivacious reminder that leftist idealism and sexual liberation do not exactly cleanse the soul, but they might lead you to becoming a raped and mutilated corpse, like the girls in Fernando Di Leo's film, that not even an acid-addled abberosexual hippie bastard of the erotically-challenged sort could love.

Opening with the quote, "I was 20. No one can ever tell me it was the best time of our lives" from French communist philosopher Paul Nizan—a man whose life was cut short after some Aryan Übermensch killed his proto-hippie ass at the Battle of Dunkirk during the Second World War—To Be Twenty sets a ‘fun and sexy’ tone that seems to be out-of-sync with the frog thinker’s less than nostalgic remark, but as the film unfolds, the lives of the two female anti-heroes only seem to get worse or less wonderfully wild. During the beginning of the film, after someone turns on some music, a bunch of hippie deadbeats, wake up from their stoned slumber on the beach, including naked men and women, but also beautiful strangers Lia (Gloria Guida) and Tina (Lilli Carati), who lack boy toys. After both agree that they are “young, hot, and pissed off,” Aryan blonde Lia and classic dark-haired/skinned Mediterranean Tina, who probably read Hermann Hesse’s Siddhartha (1922) as she has an absurd red dot imprinted on her forehead, decide to hitchhike to Rome on a wanton whim, even though they don’t know anything about one another. While lady Lia, who has lesbian proclivities, grew up an unloved orphan raised by nuns and worked as a janitor at a Catholic boarding school and was forced to masturbate an old Sapphic Spinster at the mere age of 16, Tina is a bourgeois bitch who ran away from home because of her parents’ “attempt to make me be a good housekeeper. Next to virginity, it’s what my parents care about most.” Indeed, while Lia seems to be mostly a lesbian lily-licker, Tina makes no lie of her unquenchable hunger for cock, so she becomes naturally quite disappointed when she gets to the beatnik commune and not a single wimpy hippie hunk can get his willy up due to sexual impotency caused by incessant drug consumption. On their way to Rome, Lia and Tina are offended by a wealthy woman “preaching morality in a sports car” who tells the girls regarding their salacious hitchhiking, “That’s no excuse to act like whores, whores have more tact, funny no guy’s picked you up!” On their way to the commune, the girls steal from grocery stores and even offer a nerdy middle-aged shopkeeper a blowjob for a mere pack of Marlboro Red cigarettes, but he turns it down. When the girls get to the commune—“That place full of queers, whores and druggies” as a local woman calls it—Lia and Tina are disappointed to learn they only find expensive “rent” and sexual “impotency” and that “you can’t screw when you want.” The fat fuck commune leader Nazariota (Vittorio Caprioli) informs the girls that free-love-based communes are no longer free as they need to pay for electricity, water, gas, and solid waste removal, thus the girls end up prostituting themselves to dirty old men of the vehement vulgarian sort. On top of the lack of hot love and less than prestigious pussy-peddling, an exceedingly annoying communist filmmaker shows up at the commune and goes off on an innately idiotic rant about leftist psychobabble and promotes the radical lezzy feminist terrorist Valerie Solanas—the S.C.U.M. bitch with the unquenchable itch for killing men, including her failed attempt at assassinating alpha-art fag Andy Warhol—which rather annoys the half-braindead hippies, even if they have no clue what all the commie cunt commotion is all about. After the commune is raided by the cops, Lia and Tina are forced to leave and on the way back to their hometowns they make their way to a raunchy roadhouse where they meet some real macho men who don't take kindly to cock-teasing, romantic rebuffs, nor kicks in the testicles thus the two hippie girls ultimately meet a grizzly and superlatively shocking end due to their crude counter-culture cuntiness when in the company of true gentlemen of the macho wop sort.

TO BE TWENTY

Indubitably one of the most, if not most, standout and unconventional films among Fernando Di Leo's cinematic oeuvre, To Be Twenty starts out as a sassy "sexy comedy" with socio-politically astute satirical undertones and concludes in a chillingly cynical manner as if Stanley Kubrick's more unhinged anti-liberal Italian cousin directed an aberrant after-school special. Indeed, like Di Leo's subsequent work Madness (1980) aka Vacanze per un massacre, To Be Twenty has no heroes and even victims are the hysterical harbingers of their own deleterious demises. While the two protagonists, especially Tina, of To Be Twenty throw themselves at virtually every man they see in the movie, especially limp dick hippies high on who knows what, when the enfant terrible twosome are finally offered sex by real macho men—the sort of completely corrupt criminals typical of a Fernando Di Leo flick—they totally cop out and attempt to escape, even complaining to the gentlemen of interest, "A woman can't even dance, what an awful world we live in," so when the guys decide not to take no for an answer in their quest for "free love" by women who claim they are sexually liberated, it has truly brutal consequences, thus discrediting the idea of "free love" in the first place. When it comes down to it, the two girls of To Be Twenty, especially tyrannical Tina—a woman who even admits of herself "I'm such a Bitch" while trying to quasi-rape a drugged out dude—is nothing but a spoiled brat who does not realize how good she really has it in her life and that her complaints against her parents are petty at best and preposterous at worse. While the two gals by no means deserve the dastardly defilement and deaths that come to them, the leader of the group that gang rapes and brutalizes them has a point when he states, "These sluts were leading us on back there. So now we have a right to enjoy them. You know what their moves meant? That they despise men! So now we'll show them..."

Had the girls of To Be Twenty been more interested in their studies or at least working instead of flashing their naughty bits in front of every man that passed their gaze, they would have surely avoided the sad and surly tragic end that awaited them. Of course, the children of a time when breaking down every tradition and moral of society was in vogue as promoted by idiotic popular musicians and neo-Marxist academics of the so-called "new left," it is doubtful that the girls of To Be Twenty would have bought into an intrinsically inane and inutile Weltanschauung of infantile wantonness and retarded 'revolutionary' change had they been born before the Second World War, but such was the fate of the superlatively spoiled post-WWII generation, especially the self-absorbed Baby Boomers who, not surprisingly and quite symbolically, were the first generation brought up on television. Of course, with mainstream Western media now trying to depict illiterate ghetto black rappers as virtual warrior-philosopher heroes and treating race-mixing and sexual perversion as “progressive” and “cool,” the sort of stark and tragic consequences that appear at the conclusion of To Be Twenty have probably only become all the more common and unavoidable since the release of the film. In a society that has elevated such humanoid garbage as Snoop Dogg—an ex-con/pimp/drug dealer who was once charged with murder—and Kim Kardashian—a mongrel mud-shark who gained her initial fame from a sex tape—one can only wonder what a modernized remake of To Be Twenty might be like, if it would even be made at all as Fernando Di Leo’s fine flick is not the least bit politically correct. That being said, if I could compile a collection of films for angst-ridden middle-class youths with a fetish for far-left politics and sexually-repressed feminists to watch as mandatory-viewing at some sort of rehabilitation camp for leftist loonies and MTV victims, To Be Twenty would be at the top of the list as I cannot think of another film that so relentlessly turns degenerate youthful dreams into an unsettling nightmare. After all, a stupid girl would be better off watching To Be Twenty and learning something about certain ‘principled men’ than making the mistake of going to the wrong side of town and running into a fellow like Tyree or Tyrone, who does not take no for answer.

COLD LIGHT OF DAY

Fhiona-Louise (1989)

If infamous serial killer and necrophile Dennis Nilsen is the “British Jeffrey Dahmer” as he has been dubbed by the mainstream media, Cold Light of Day (1989) is the Brit Dahmer (2002), at least as far as cinematically empathizing with a corpse-copulating serial killer is concerned. Indeed, like the uneven but not uninteresting Dahmer biopic starring a rather then-unknown Jeremy Renner, Cold Light of Day dares to wallow in the messed up mind and perennial loneliness of a gay lunatic lustkiller. The very first and ultimately last film directed by mysterious female auteur Fhiona-Louise—a woman whose only other credentials include starring in two short obscure films, Metropolis Apocalypse (1988) and Sleepwalker (1993), directed by British actor and entrepreneur Jon Jacobs (a man whose greatest claim to fame is mortgaging his house in 2005 to buy a virtual asteroid for $100,000, the most expensive ‘virtual item’ ever sold at that time)—Cold Light of Day is the sort of malignantly melancholy and superlatively stark and grating celluloid work that could have only been directed by a dangerously introverted individual who has entered the darkness and cannot manage to find their way back. And, indeed, auteur Fhiona-Louise would never make another film after her debut as she apparently committed suicide not long after creating her debut feature at the tender age of 21, thus making it all the more morbidly eerie that Cold Light of Day concludes with the following tribute from the director: “For those too sensitive for this world.” Undoubtedly, one would expect the auteur was uncommonly sensitive and empathetic if she managed to possess any understanding for a necrophiliac sodomite serial killer like Dennis Nilsen who, between late-1978 and early-1983, killed no less than 15 men and boys whose bodies he molested and mutilated before he either burned or flushed pieces of their putrefied flesh down the toilet. The son of an alcoholic Norwegian father and a pious Scottish Catholic mother, Nilsen would lose his father to divorce when he was only four-years old and would go on to describe his early childhood as being a “female dominated world,” so when the killer’s beloved grandfather and sole father-figure died of a heart attack when he was just shy of being six-years old, it had totally traumatic consequences that forever changed the way he viewed the world, especially in regard to death. Forced by his pathologically Catholic mother to see the corpse of his grandfather, Nilsen had what he would later describe in his autobiography as “my first encounter with the fact and mystery of ‘Death,’” which would ultimately become the biggest obsession of his pathetic life as a man one might describe as God’s loneliest nancy boy necrophile.

Dennis Nilsen (played by Bob Flag, who has played in diverse roles ranging from Werner Nekes’ kraut avant-garde flick Uliisses (1982) to Calendar Girls (2003) starring Helen Mirren) leads a rather unremarkable life as a soldier (he worked in the catering unit of the army, which is where he gained the expertise to butcher bodies) turned cop turned civil servant, but after making the major mistake of flushing the remains of his gay male victims down the toilet and causing the drain in his apartment building to block, he is arrested for multiple murders of the rather grizzly blood-guts-limbs-organs-bones-ridden sort. Told in a series of oftentimes ominous and macabre yet realistic melodramatic flashbacks that are mostly set in the pernicious poof protagonist's dilapidated apartment, Nilsen meekly describes to a prick police inspector named Simmons (Geoffrey Greenhill) how he became a flesh-fucking fag serial killer. Always willing to help a neighbor, Nilsen is such a nice fellow that he helps an elderly war veteran, who "had a little accident" (i.e. he pissed himself), with cleaning up his soiled "old soldier" body. When Nilsen begins a relationship with a young bum hustler named Joe (Martin Byrne-Quinn), his lonely loser life seems to be looking up, but as one can expect from such dubious romances, the good times do not last long. On top of giving blow jobs to other men in sleazy tearooms, bitch boy Joe starts heated arguments with the seemingly meek and cuckoldish Nilsen. When Nilsen accuses his swarthy boy toy of being an "ungrateful bitch," Joe retorts with, "God, you sound so fucking camp, you do." Needless to say, Nilsen kills Joe by strangling him until he is unconscious and then proceeds to drown him in a bathtub. Although gay, Nilsen tries to 'straighten' himself out and goes to a prostitute, but he ends up embarrassing himself terribly after ejaculating literally a second or two after the busty streetwalker touches his genitals. As a loyal civil servant at a jobcentre, Nilsen has access to various down-and-out young men and since his impulse to kill has become uncontrollable ever since wasting his lover Joe, he uses this position to recruit prospective victims, which include teenage runaways, hustlers, junkies, and bums. Indeed, like his kindred spirit Dahmer, Nilsen the murderous man-loving menace preys on people that society will not notice being missing, let alone miss. With the "beautiful" (how Nilsen describes them) bodies piling up, Nilsen must get creative with hiding the remains of his victims. On top of burning and cooking body parts, Nilsen hides limbs under his apartment floorboards and hides other parts in his furniture, but he develops a special affinity for flushing rotten flesh down the toilet. Of course, Nilsen's warped world comes tumbling down after his busybody neighbor calls a drain-cleaning company when the dismembered parts of young men end up clogging the apartment building's drains. When an employee from the drain-cleaning company smells something a little more fetid that does not simply reek of simple shit, he calls the cops and Nilsen does not even bother to put up a fight, wasting no time in confessing his dastardly deeds. At the conclusion of Cold Light of Day, Nilsen confesses to Inspector Simmons regarding why he committed the crimes: "I did it for me... Purely selfishly... I worshipped the act of death...over and over, it was like killing myself. It's as simple as that. I hated the decay and dissection...there's no pleasure in that...but I did enjoy the

açt. And to kill myself, I'd experience it just once...by killing others, it allowed me to feel it again and again.”

Apparently, the real-life Dennis Nilsen would go on to describe the day he got arrested as ‘The Day Hope Came.’ Personally, I doubt there ever was hope for a repugnant yet pitiful person like Nilsen and the suffocating starkness of Cold Light of Day makes that quite clear. Indeed, to call Cold Light of Day an ‘enjoyable’ film would be nothing short of absurd, but it is certainly an exceedingly effective work that is the virtual celluloid equivalent of being stuck in solitary confinement with Nilsen in a nutward. On top of the fact that lead Bob Flag bares a strikingly resemblance to Nilsen and radiates a certain perturbing patheticness that cannot be merely contrived, Cold Light of Day takes an almost quasi-cinéma-vérité approach that, aesthetically speaking, falls somewhere in between the stylized realism of films by John Cassavetes, Alan Clarke, and Vincent Gallo, albeit with the atmospheric brutality of Jörg Buttgerit. In terms of its patently pathetic and lethally lonely ‘anti-hero,’ Cold Light of Day recalls Kurt Raab’s role as the cannibalistic German serial killer Fritz Haarmann in Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe (1973) aka The Tenderness of Wolves produced by Rainer Werner Fassbinder and directed by Ulli Lommel. While Cold Light of Day is probably a work that will bore jaded gorehounds looking to get a cheap thrill from senseless buckets of blood and guts, as well as arthouse-inclined cinephiles who feel too cultivated and dignified to accept an obscure no-budget serial killer flick from the UK, Cold Light of Day is certainly a grimy unsung classic of sorts that dares to take a reasonably objective look at the miserable misspent life of a man who loved death so much that he literally made love with it. Ultimately, the only real recognition that the film received is winning the UCCA Venticittà Award at 47th Venice International Film Festival held in 1990. Somewhat surprisingly, Cold Light of Day is not the only artful and worthwhile film about Nilsen, as Dead Dreams of Monochrome Men (1989)—a synthesizer-driven black-and-white avant-garde flick created by members of the controversial DV8 Theater Group that uses aggressive ballet as a means to interpret the killer’s loneliness and depravity—is also worth checking out. A film directed by a suicidal artist who dared to look into the abyss and somehow found something human in the monster looking back at her, Cold Light of Day is celluloid desperation in its most decidedly deranged, dreary, and death-deifying form. Needless to say, the film is also infinitely superior to the 2012 Bruce Willis and Sigourney Weaver film of the same name.

IN THE REALM OF THE SENSES

Florence Dauman (2003)

Unlike many modern-day white men around my age, I have never really suffered from strange fetishistic plague of 'yellow fever' or even considered dating an Asian girl, let alone marrying and/or having children with one (after all, the last thing that world needs is more deranged hapa spawn). Indeed, aside from a Slavic-looking green-eyed ¼ Japanese girl when I was in middle school, I have never really found myself fantasizing about defiling the largely curveless bodies of oriental chicks, so naturally I have never wanted to actively seek out Asian pornography of any sort, hence my initial disinterest in seeing the Franco-Japanese flick L'Empire des sens (1976) aka In the Realm of the Senses directed by Nagisa Ōshima (Night and Fog in Japan, Death by Hanging). Of course, considering it is a fairly (in)famous film and I am a huge fan of the director's preternaturally homoerotic (anti)war flick Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence (1983) starring David Bowie, it was only a matter of time before I watched erotically wayward flick. Needless to say, as someone with a huge fetish for dames with large shapely derrieres, hourglass figures, and (to a somewhat lesser extent) large tits, I initially did not expect to find anything even remotely erotic about Ōshima's film, yet upon watching it I somehow found myself enamored with female lead Eiko Matsuda's petite yet surprisingly curvy physique. In short, Matsuda is like a Japanese Venus, but arguably the most erotic thing about In the Realm of the Senses—a film best known for featuring tons of unsimulated sex and an unconventionally climatic castration scene—is the hot, heavy, and slightly homicidal 'mad love' romance that is unequivocally the main focus of the film. Notable for gaining Ōshima internal acclaim in the cinema world and more or less transforming him from a Japanese filmmaker to a relatively cosmopolitan one (though his work would ultimately suffer as a result), the film is loosely based on the real-life story of Japanese Geisha-cum-prostitute Sada Abe and the huge scandal that she caused in Japan during the 1930s when she erotically asphyxiated her lover, Kichizo Ishida, chopped off his penis and testicles, and then carried them around with her in her kimono as if they were sacred good charms. Like one big long, erratic, and deleteriously intoxicating coital session that concludes with a such an enrapturing transcendental orgasmic climax that the inordinately virile male protagonist loses both his life and genitals in a sickening scenario that somehow seems logical in the end in the context of the lovers' lurid and insanely intense romance, In the Realm of the Senses is a film that is, above all us, about a totally raw and visceral chemistry based sexual love affair that is so dangerously potent and explosive that it can only end in death due to the ever increasing intensity of the crazed couple's singular carnal majesty. Indeed, although a rather fittingly titled film since the debauched duo lives in a totally intoxicating and solely sensual-based hermetic demimonde, I still think it might be better renamed 'La petite mort.'

Undoubtedly, one of the aspects of Ôshima's film that I found most intriguing and, to some extent, relatable is the fact that the two leads seem to lie together in bed for eternity, as if they would love nothing more than to completely cut themselves off from the rest of humanity and spend the rest of their days in a perpetual state of heightened carnality, hence the film's almost autistically literal title. Indeed, out of all the girls I have been with, only one did I never eventually get sexually bored of, even though some of my previous lovers were gifted with comparable pulchritude. In fact, as the years passed, our sexual chemistry and mutual attraction only seemed to grow while our relationship became more 'complicated' in other ways. Even to this day years later, an hour cannot pass with me being reminded of her touch, smell, and sensual warmth. Surely, what makes In the Realm of the Senses so delightfully darkly romantic is that the couple, which lives for perpetual mutual copulation, chooses death while they are at the height of their otherworldly erotic compatibility instead of allowing themselves to be broken up by society or something else (like the heroine's mental illness!), as if they can subconsciously sense that Japan will be eventually fire-bombed and nuked in dubious Allied air raids. While I sincerely expected the film to be pretentious artsy fartsy Jap pornography of the rather revolting sort disguised as a 'mature' arthouse flick, it proved to be, at least in my opinion, one of the few films ever made in cinema history where the sex scenes are an innate and imperative ingredient to the point where it would completely fall apart at the seams were it not so delicately explicit. Indeed, instead of watching two sex fiends fucking to simply fuck, Ôshima's shockingly mirthful celluloid orgasm treats the viewers to two strangely sympathetic weirdoes making love to one another simply because they are so hopelessly in love and see virtually everything else in life as completely pointless. In short, even the most inordinately artful of porn flicks like Lasse Braun's Body Love (1978), Cecil Howard's Neon Nights (1981), and Stephen Sayadian's Café Flesh (1982) seem like tasteless fucks flicks when compared to the exquisite eros of Ôshima's arguable cinematic magnum opus. Bataillean in an oftentimes surprisingly humorous egg-in-a-pussy sort of fashion and almost pathologically politically incorrect in an oftentimes sado-masochistic fashion, In the Realm of the Senses also somehow manages to be almost just as absurdly comical as it is erotically cultivated and decadently romantic. In fact, the film is almost savagely sadistic in its humor as a uniquely unforgettable flick that features small children teasing an elderly bum by pocking his exposed shriveled prick with a flag stick, an insanely unmotherly heroine that sexually abuses a wee toddler by aggressively squeezing his genitals to the point where the little lad screams in pain, and a male protagonist that has no qualms about randomly molesting, raping, or sympathy-fucking Geisha gals of all ages and sizes while in the company of his beloved, among other things. Somewhat ironically, while I have always found the sort of absurdly sordid sexual fetishism depicted in Japanese cinema to be nothing short of insufferably ridiculous, if not downright sexually autistic, In the Realm of the Senses—a film that is certainly beyond vanilla as far as sexuality is concerned—proved to be an almost shockingly accessible film for me. Indeed, the flick might have been directed by a leftist degenerate of sorts and produced by a dubious Hebraic frog, but it certainly has something archaically universal about it in the way in manages to succeed where most pornography fails in its depiction of organic sexual obsession. It is also a rare film that demonstrates what it means for a man to find a cunt that feels and smells as natural and imperative as his own cock and vice versa.

Unlike many more conventional cinephiles that seem incessant on looking solely to the Criterion Collection (incidentally, they were responsible for releasing In the Realm of the Senses on DVD/Blu-ray in the United States) for what they regard is notable cinema, I have rather mixed feelings about Japanese cinema in general and hardly have a hard-on for Akira Kurosawa, who is more or less the Jap John Ford and certainly the most Americanized of the great Japanese filmmakers. Naturally, I was immediately interested in Ôshima when I discovered that he largely hated Japanese cinema and even much of his own cinematic works, so it is only natural that his most well known film, In the Realm of the Senses, has never been released in its complete and uncensored form in his own native country. In fact, the film—a rare Franco-Jap production—only managed to bypass Japan's anti-pornography laws by having the undeveloped footage shipped to frogland where the film was processed and edited (not surprisingly, the film was produced by French-Polish-Hebrew Anatole Dauman, who also produced some of Polish erotic maestro Walerian Borowczyk's classic films). Notably, at the very end of his rather polemical and borderline anti-Jap BFI documentary 100 Years of Japanese Cinema (1995), Ôshima concludes the film by more or less expressing his longing for dissolution of an organically Japanese national cinema and identity, even stating with not even the slightest hint of irony, "The first hundred years of Japanese cinema have been the period of its youth. It will certainly stay young for the next hundred years. And in these hundred years, the Japanese film will free itself from the spell of Japanese-ness, and will come abloom as pure cinema." Of course, the great irony is that In the Realm of the Senses—a quasi-pornographic period piece featuring bisexual Geisha orgies and archaic Jap folk music—is hopelessly Japanese in terms of its aesthetic essence and bizarre fetishism. After all, only in Japan does a woman become a famous celebrity after chopping off her beau's balls and bald-headed bandit. Certainly, when I think of Japanese cinema, my mind always comes to Ôshima and Shûji Terayama before the relatively tame samurai cinema of Kurosawa and Masaki Kobayashi. As a lifelong leftist extremist of sorts that was born to an ancient aristocratic family with notable samurai ancestors, Ôshima is certainly a degenerate of sorts, albeit a distinctly Japanese one that tested the bounds of cinematic civility and artistic expression. Certainly, if there ever was a sort of Jap Pasolini, it was Ōshima.

For better or worse, In the Realm of the Senses features one of the most believably depraved and sexually insatiable yet somehow compulsively cute and eccentrically erotic divas of cinema history and I say that as someone that has never had a fondness for yellow flesh. Indeed, Sada Abe (Eiko Matsuda)—an unhappily married ex-prostitute turned domestic ‘servant girl’ that works at a hotel who was forced to peddle her pussy after her businessman hubby lost all of his money—is immediately revealed to be an unhinged bitch in the very first scene of the film where she stares into space with great unhinged fury, as if she is about to explode at any second for the most trivial of reasons. While she might be a pervert of sorts that could fuck all day if she had the right cock inside her, Sada is rampantly heterosexual as demonstrated by the fact that she rebuffs an aggressively Sapphic coworker that begins randomly fondling her tits. In fact, after the lesbo coworker realizes she is not into the ancient art of carpet-munching, she takes Sada to a peephole so that they can spy on their boss Kichizō Ishida (Tatsuya Fuji) while he fucks his wanton wife. It seems that Sada likes what she sees, as she soon starts a hot and heavy romance with hyper hedonistic sex-master Kichizō. Indeed, one day after Sada attempts to stab one of her coworkers for calling her a “whore,” Kichizō physically manhandles her, suggestively states, “Why hold that knife when you could be holding something else?,” and then forces his fingers inside her assumedly less than wet cunt. Shortly after warning her, “I like the sway of your hips. I bet you’ve broken many a man’s heart. I will pierce you through,” Kichizō more or less rapes Sada but she really likes it and soon transforms from a passive lover into a highly aggressive one as a result of her complete and utter obsession with her employer’s seemingly eternally erect member. As the two soon realize, it is virtually love-at-first-fuck as the two become almost permanently attached at the cock and cunt to the point where they completely forget about all the other people and concerns in their respective lives.

Undoubtedly, both Kichizō and Sada are eccentric social misfits of sorts and it does not take long before they get lost in their own hermetic demimonde of hyper horniness. Of course, the lovers are nothing if not happily imprisoned in their own two-person pandemonium of pleasure and it is ultimately only death that can separate the two. As a rather emotionally erratic woman that seems to suffer from Post-coital tristesse (PCT) and is prone to violent outbursts and emotion breakdowns when she is not having her meat curtain rammed with her beau’s seemingly permanently erect blue-veined custard chucker, Sada quite literally lives to fuck and only wants to fuck to the point where even her lover begins to get a little too physically tired from all the juice-draining orgasms. Luckily for Sada, Kichizō has the sexual prowess of a virtual samurai army and is always down for dipping his Don Cypriano into Sada’s seemingly perennially wet passion pipe, even when he is literally falling asleep. While initially a seemingly happily married man that enjoys giving his wifey what she most desires, it does not take long for Kichizō to abandon his needy wife and completely devote himself to his mistress Sada. Indeed, Sada is an unrepentant bitch of the grotesquely jealous sort and even bitches to Kichizō during one of the first time they have sex, “you’re going to make love to your wife later, aren’t you? What a slut, having sex every morning [...] I won’t let you go until you’ve cum.” When Kichizō’s wife attempts to ‘mark her territory’ by intentionally fucking her hubby in front of the heroine, Sada becomes so enraged that she instantly fantasizes about violently murdering the broad. Luckily, Sada has more creative ways to demonstrate her love for Kichizō, including dipping her food in his sexual juices and vice versa. Unfortunately for Kichizō, Sada would prefer killing them than to allow him to be in the general proximity of another woman’s cleft of flesh.

Kichizō may be married to an oversexed sextop, but that does not stop him from marrying Sada in a sort of mock wedding attended by half-a-dozen seemingly sexually demented Geisha girls and some goofy old fart that resembles an anorexic mummy. In fact, the wedding ceremony is so special that the newlyweds fuck in front of the guests, which ultimately turns the Geisha girls on so much that they collectively strip a virginal member of the group named ‘Kosome’ and deflower her with a somewhat quaint bird-shaped dildo. Not surprisingly, the wedding eventually evolves into a full-blown orgy that concludes with a sea of lifeless naked bodies lying on the floor. Despite their incessantly professed love for one another in a decidedly fleshy form, Sada temporarily leaves Kichizō to visit her hometown for the sole purpose of peddling her puss to her former school principle. An extremely elderly and unattractive man that she apparently deeply respects due to his prestigious reputation, Sada demands that the principle slap her, twist her nipple and pull her hair, which ultimately arouses the heroine so much that she gets horny enough to ride his ancient cock. Before leaving Kichizō for her fancy date with the principle, Sada forces him to trade kimonos in what is indubitably a silly yet nonetheless potent symbolic display of their mutual undying love and affection for one another. Although she is not beneath selling her cash for gash to dirty old men, Sada soon becomes so irrationally jealous that she whips out a knife and threatens to cut off Kichizō’s cock in a somewhat foreshadowing scene that underscores the heroine’s deep-seated unhinged sadism and how it seems irreparably intertwined with her sexuality.

Indeed, Sada seems especially obsessed with the sadistic act of cutting off Kichizō’s cock while it is inside her cunt, at least until she realizes that she has a special fondness for the savage art of ‘breath control play,’ which ultimately leads her to getting the opportunity to castrate his creamstick and love-spuds. Indeed, the beginning of the end of the couple’s hot and heavy romance occurs when Sada comes more in touch with her growing sadistic side and realizes that she receives especially potent orgasms while strangling Kichizō while he is inside her.

After abandoning his wife and trapping himself in an increasingly deleterious yet completely intoxicating psychosexual affair that blurs the line between heaven and hell, Kichizō almost seems to welcome his demise as he has unquestionably reached the greatest heights in the realm of the senses, with death during sex being the next sensible route for the romance to take. When the pain involved with erotic asphyxiation proves to be too much for poor Kichizō, he tells Sada, “If you strangle me . . . don’t stop midway. It’s too painful afterward.” Somewhat curiously, Sada seems more interested in the potency of her orgasms than the survival of the man that gives her said orgasms. After Kichizō succumbs to asphyxiophilic excess, Sada quasi-ritualistically dismembers her lover’s cock and balls and then writes “SADA AND KICHI TOGETHER FOREVER” on his chest with his own blood. Notably, the film concludes with a shot of Sada lying next to Kichizō’s dismembered body juxtaposed with auteur Ōshima himself narrating in a somewhat monotone fashion, “For the next four days, Sada carried his severed organ from one Tokyo inn to another. She was still smiling radiantly when she was arrested. The story shocked all of Japan. The sympathy of the public made her strangely popular. These events took place in 1936.”

Undoubtedly, I think the best way one can argue for the legitimacy and absolute imperativeness of the unsimulated sex scenes featured in In the Realm of the Senses is to compare it to Ōshima’s subsequent film Empire of Passion (1978), which features a similar ‘mad love’ orientated romance sans the sexually explicit imagery. The second film in a fairly respectable diptych that was created when Ōshima was surely at the height of his artistic powers, Empire of Passion is a quasi-horror flick that also stars Tatsuya Fuji as a ‘sexual outlaw’ of sorts, yet it is not as nearly immaculate and ultimately lacks the fluid pacing of the director’s previous effort. Additionally, Ōshima’s penultimate feature Max, Mon Amour (1986)—a goofy comedy about a loony love affair between Charlotte Rampling and a chimp that was penned by Luis Buñuel’s later era screenwriter Jean-Claude Carrière—seems like a retarded pseudo-Buñuelian joke compared to the eloquent erotic excesses that the auteur achieved in the past. Indeed, somewhat ironically, only in the relatively sexless film Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence (1980)—a work that elegantly depicts the homoerotic tensions between an uptight Japanese POW camp commander and a Hakuin POW played by an extra gay David Bowie—does Ōshima come anywhere near to depicting a love story as potently idiosyncratic as he did with In the Realm of the Senses. Personally, I find most pornography to be completely phony and extremely alienating and anyone that has ever read about the behind-the-scenes degeneracy that goes into producing fuck flicks will realize that there is nothing even remotely sexy about it, yet I never got that sense while watching Ōshima’s film. In short, it took me nil effort to suspend my disbelief and accept that the two people on screen are consumed with completely organic l’amour fou.

I have noticed that a number of film critics have praised Ōshima for his sort of far-leftist iconoclasm and active destruction of traditional Japanese mores and taboos, yet I certainly did not read In the Realm of the Senses as some sort of fierce feminist statement as some (e.g. Jonathan Rosebaum) have, namely because the heroine is a violent and sadistic hypersexual whore that does not think twice about strangling to death her beloved just so that she can achieve the ultimate orgasm. Additionally, the male protagonist—a fairly weak and lazy would-be-Don-Juan that lives off women and lets them constantly push him around—is not exactly a hero. After all, pleasure is a weakness, yet it seems to be the only thing that the male protagonist is capable of striving for, hence his idiotically tragic yet somehow strangely touching downfall. In a rather notable symbolic scene towards the end of the film, the horny hero is depicted walking in the opposite direction with his head down while a line of soldiers march stoically down the street as they are celebrated by young adoring Jap chicks in a scenario that really underscores the character's hopeless alienation from Japanese society and overall fantasy-like existence. While this scene seems to be Ôshima's attempt at mocking the supposedly dehumanizing Jap war-machine and how it ostensibly alienates hedonistic people like the protagonist, it is ultimately said protagonist that seem rather ridiculous in the end, but then again I must confess that I still found their raunchy romance to be singularly touching. Indeed, one of the greatest accomplishments of Ôshima's film is that it successfully manages to depict true love between two preternatural lunatics that have somehow managed to find each other in a world that rejects them. Of course, Ôshima, not unlike Pier Paolo Pasolini, was no mindless leftist ideologue, or as Donald Richie (Dead Youth, Five Philosophical Fables), himself a director of subversive Japanese avant-garde erotica, noted in his essay In the Realm of the Senses: Some Notes on Oshima and Pornography in regard to the filmmaker, "All of Ôshima's films are criticisms of society and the political assumptions that form it. He is interested in reform but rejects the social agendas that often accompany it. He sometimes castigates the left as well as the right, and always assumes that it is the individual and his or her needs that must be politically addressed."

In the dark and depraved eyes of literary degenerate Georges Bataille, who clearly influenced the film (e.g. egg in pussy), the male hero Kichizô of In the Realm of the Senses is the mostly erotically bravest of men as revealed in the frog novelist's words, "It takes an iron nerve to perceive the connection between the promise of life implicit in eroticism and the sensuous aspect of death." After all, the male protagonist not only sees this connection but fully embraces it to the point of self-obliteration, thus bringing new meaning to the French phrase 'La petite mort.' Of course, what makes the character's death truly disturbing, at least for Japanese people of the 1970s, is that the couple rejects the traditional Japanese 'Shinjû' and instead demonstrates a sort of deracinated romantic nihilism that Ôshima seems privy to. While probably not the director's intent, Kichizô is, in many ways, certainly symbolic of the death of true Japanese masculinity, thus it is only fitting that the film is set right before Japan suffered the most emotionally, spiritually, and physically brutal defeat of their entire history. As contemporary Japanese society and culture certainly demonstrates, WWII more or less resulted in the spiritual castration of the country. While maybe an unrivaled Übermensch in the bedroom in terms of sheer sexuality virility, Kichizō symbolizes Nietzsche's 'last man' as a sort of anti-prophet that anticipates Japan's post-samurai crypto-dystopia where frigid women give orders, testicular fortitude has been replaced with technology, and people in general no longer seem interested in establishing a legacy by having children. Certainly, it is no coincidence that the heroine Sada eventually completely castrates Kichizō after threatening to do so at various points, as if the only value her lover had was his cock, hence why she kept it as a special souvenir. While Kichizō might be a dai-sensei of sensuality, he basically lacks virtually every other quality that any sane woman looks for in a prospective lover. Of course, as a disgraced pussy-peddler that is not beneath sexually abusing children, Sada is no exactly good wife material. As a completely cosmopolitan man descended from a respected samurai family that sympathized with Korean invaders, worshiped female power, actively sought to uproot organic Japanese culture and law, and directed what is arguably the least intrinsically Japanese film ever made (Max, Mon Amour) by a native Japanese filmmaker, Ōshima was the ultimate degenerate and a sort of contra Mishima as an artist that virtually made a career out of mocking and exploiting his own race and culture. After all, Yukio Mishima was certainly no puritan, yet he managed to find a way to seamlessly interweave the degeneracy of Occidental modernity with traditional Japanese aesthetics. Whereas Mishima infamously ended his life when he was at the height of both his artistic and physical powers, Ōshima degenerated into a sort of novelty 'Uncle Wong' that merely faded away after only managing to direct one more feature over an almost three decade period before his death in early 2013. Of course, the greatest irony of Ōshima's legacy is that he will be best remembered as a weirdo Jap filmmaker that made weirdo Jap films and not as some highly successful cosmopolitan artist that was able to transcend both his race and culture. Surely, the auteur led the way for distinctly degenerate Japanese artist and chef like Mao Sugiyama, who underwent elective genital-removal surgery, cooked his dismembered cock and balls, and then served them to about half-a-dozen people at $250-a-plate during what can only be described as a carnally cannibalistic dinner party. As In the Realm of the Senses—a film that features a brief scene of non-cannibalistic culinary carnality—certainly demonstrates, only a Japanese filmmaker could make a rather rapturously erotic film where the characters spend the entire time fucking on a floor.

THE ASSAULT

Fons Rademakers (1986)

Undoubtedly, every modern western nation has its overrated token Judaic literary figure as it would be considered nothing short of antisemitism for white Europeans and Americans to not put at least one Semitic scribbler, especially if they are a proud shoah survivor like Eli Wiesel, on a grand pedestal, even if they are not even remotely worthy of such a honor. In the Netherlands, Harry Mulisch—a fellow who, along with his Jewish mother, managed to remain rather unscathed during the Nazi occupation because his Austrian gentile banker father worked for a kraut bank that dealt with confiscated Jewish assets—is undoubtedly considered the most famous post-WWII Jewish writer and unlike that obscenely overrated weasel Wiesel, he is somewhat deserving of his great fame. Aside from his novels, Mulisch is also famous for his rather flagrant arrogance which bordered on megalomania as reflected in statements like, “I don’t just remember it; I am World War II.” Possibly as a result of his bizarre situation as a Dutch Jew who was not persecuted during the Second World War and because his Aryan father collaborated with the Nazis and was thus later imprisoned as a Nazi collaborator, Mulisch took a more intricate view of the Nazi occupation and its aftermath as personified in his best-selling novel De Aanslag (1982) aka The Assault which, unlike most Dutch novels, was translated into more than 30 languages and spawned a hit film adaptation that was just as successful as the book, even if it is not as famous as it probably should be in the United States where reading subtitles is certainly not the norm. Indeed, the film is notable for being the first Dutch film to win the Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film in 1986 and was directed by Fons Rademakers (Mira, Because of the Cats aka The Rape) who incidentally was also the very first Dutch filmmaker to be nominated for an Academy Award via his work Dorp aan de rivier (1958) aka The Village by the River in 1959.

Although distributed by the kosher kitsch kings at Cannon Films who mostly churned out senseless action-packed schlock and proudly anti-artistic celluloid swell featuring big tits and big guns, The Assault (1986) aka De Aanslag is a classic epic war-drama with a quasi-arthouse style and 140+ minute running time that is probably the only Nazi occupation work of its kind that is worthy of being compared to Paul Verhoeven’s Soldaat van Oranje (1977) aka Soldier of Orange which, incidentally, was also penned by prolific Dutch screenwriter Gerard Soeteman (Turks fruit aka Turkish Delight, Spetters). A film that spans over four paradigm-shifting decades, beginning at the end of World War II and concluding in the 1980s, The Assault is also probably the closest thing to a Dutch equivalent to Edgar Reitz’s magnum opus Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany (1984) in terms of its subtly melancholic depiction of the serious social changes of a Germanic nation over the course of a number of decades, with the Second World War ultimately being the most obvious catalyst for these mostly deleterious transformations. A carefully crafted political-thriller in a slowburning yet sometimes action-packed Greek tragedy form, Rademakers' film tells the story of a barely likeable Dutch doctor who unravels the unpredictable fact and curious circumstances that led to the deaths of his entire family at the hands of the Gestapo after a Dutch Nazi collaborator is killed outside of his family home by members of the resistance. A work about the irony of fate where there are no clear-cut heroes and where supposed good guys' actions are just as deleterious and deadly as supposed bad guys', The Assault is a film that might sometimes feel like an unintentionally hokey Hollywood film in its occasionally contrived direction and crappy pseudo-classical music, but ultimately features relatively complex philosophical themes that expose Steven Spielberg for the reductionist Zionist agitpropagandist that he is, as Schindler's List (1993), Saving Private Ryan (1998), and Munich (2005) seem like insults to the human experience and history when compared to Rademakers' film, which does something rather rare for its (sub)genre in that it depicts the consequences of war from all different perspectives. Indeed, The Assault is probably the only film you will ever see where an elderly resistance fighter is still consumed with hatred for his ex-enemies despite the war ending about four decades before and the son of a Nazi is depicted as the most mentally, emotionally, and economically forsaken of all the characters. Of course, unlike the United States, the Netherlands, like most of Europe, only faced pain and misery as a result of the Second World War.

As narrated at the beginning of The Assault, "It's January 1945. Almost all of Europe is liberated...celebrating, eating, drinking and making love. But here in Haarlem it's still war. And winter. The winter of starvation." Indeed, elderly men are dropping like flies via starvation as a result of the Hungerwinter ('Hunger Winter') famine, but 12-year-old protagonist Anton Steenwijk (played by Marc van Uchelen, who eventually became a filmmaker but later committed suicide in 2013 at the age of 42) seems totally unaffected by the misery of World War II and is even friendly with a much hated classmate named Fake Ploeg whose father is a Dutch Nazi collaborator and is purportedly responsible for the death and torture of various members of the shadowy Dutch resistance. When Nazi Fake Ploeg Sr. is killed in Anton's neighborhood and the neighbors, a semi-sexy nurse named Karin Korteweg (Ina van der Molen) and her widowed father, inexplicably move the corpse in front of the protagonist's family home, the Gestapo ultimately burns down the protagonist's house, kill his entire family and 19 other people as a reprisal for the assassination. Indeed, when the Gestapo showed up at the Steenwijk home and noticed that Anton's father had a copy of a book by Dutch Sephardic Jewish philosopher Spinoza sitting out, the Nazi in charge felt they had their culprits, especially considering the protagonist's 17-year-old brother Peter (Casper de Boer) was caught attempting to move Ploeg's corpse and run away with the dead Nazi's gun. After being separated from his parents and watching his house being burned down by Nazis with blowtorches, Anton is put in a prison cell with a young female Dutch resistance fighter (Monique van de Ven) who refuses to tell the boy her name but gives him the advice, "...one thing you should never forget for the rest of your life. Don't forget that the Krauts set your house on fire. Who did it, did it...And not someone else." When Anton reveals to the woman what happened to him and his family, she begins to cry and remarks, "You know, if the resistance hadn't done it...that Ploeg would have killed a lot of other people." Although their interaction is brief and the protagonist only manages to see the resistance fighter's large sensual lips, Anton will remember the encounter with the "communist whore" (as she is described by a Nazi officer) for the rest of his life.

Ultimately, Anton (Derek de Lint) is driven to Amsterdam the next day by some German soldiers and goes to live with his uncle after learning his parents and brother have been executed. Flash forward to 1952 and Anton is a medical student that, "doesn't meddle with politics, no more than he does with his past," but that changes when he goes back to his hometown in Haarlem for the first time since his parents were killed, "because a friend passed his Master's degree in dental surgery." While walking around his old neighborhood, Anton is spotted by his old neighbor Mrs. Beumer (Elly Weller) who reveals to him that his belated mother attacked SD men and that both his parents were "killed like animals." When Mrs. Beumer reveals that a monument has been erected to his parents and the rest of the people from Haarlem were killed by the Germans, Anton visits it by himself and seems quite melancholy, but he subsequently buries the past and does not revisit it again until 1956 when he has a chance encounter with his old childhood 'friend' Fake Ploeg Jr. at a violent communist riot in Amsterdam. Like his belated Nazi father, Fake is a staunch anticommunist and seems quite resentful that Anton is now a doctor. As Fake explains, his mother was put in a concentration camp for NSB members/Nazi collaborators simply because she was the widow of a Nazi, so he was forced to go to trade school instead of college and now works at an appliance shop doing "repairs and the like." Fake clearly suffers from a persecution complex and rants regarding his need to battle communist scum in Amsterdam, "My father is right. Everything they say about communists now, he was already saying in the war...And it's those damn communists who killed him." Needless to say, Anton is not impressed and when he suggests that Fake's father was responsible for the murder of his parents, the discernibly angst-ridden anticommunist goes berserk, throws a rock at the mirror, and runs out of the protagonist's apartment, though he briefly comes back to tell him that he will always remember that he was the only person in Haarlem to be nice to him when he was a kid and everyone in town hated him because he was the son of a Nazi collaborator. Undoubtedly, out of all the people in the entire film, Fake is clearly the one that was mostly deeply affected by the aftermath of the war, though virtually every single character wears the internal scars of the singularly catastrophic event.

Although he spends a good portion of his early adult years having short month-long relationships as if he has intimacy problems and lacks the capacity to devote himself to a single woman as a result of his tragic experiences during childhood, Anton decides to get married after meeting a Dutch girl while on a trip in East London named Saskia de Graaff (also played by Monique van de Ven) that has the same exact lips as the mysterious resistance fighter he met when he was 12-years-old. While at a funeral for his father-in-law's resistance fighter friend, Anton overhears an old fat man named Cor Takes (John Kraaykamp) aka 'Gijs' discussing his role in assassinating Fake Ploeg. After introducing himself to Gijs, the elderly resistance fighter justifies killing Ploeg by stating, "He'd use a whip with a wire to flay the skin off your face. He'd push your bare bottom against the hot stove. He'd put a garden hose in your ass so that you would puke your own shit. He had to be taken care of." Surely, Anton becomes somewhat annoyed with Gijs because he realizes that if he had not killed Ploeg, his family would have never been executed by the Gestapo. While talking together, Anton is startled to learn that Gijs was the lover of the sensual-lipped female resistance fighter he met when he was a kid. Gijs also reveals to Anton that the female resistance fighter's name was Truus Coester and she was executed by the Gestapo at some sand dunes near Amsterdam.

After learning about the true identity of resistance fighter Truus Coester, Anton starts a strange and somewhat reluctant relationship with Gijs that ultimately makes him become obsessed with the death of his parents and the mysterious circumstances revolving around the death of Fake, like why his neighbor Karin and her father moved the Nazi's corpse in front of his family home. Although having a young daughter with her named Sandra, Anton divorces Saskia and eventually marries another woman named Elisabeth (Mies de Heer) with whom he has a son named Peter in tribute to his dead brother. While at an anti-nuclear protest that he is blackmailed into joining by his dentist friend Gerrit-Jan (Kees Coolen), Anton bumps into his ex-neighbor Karin and he does not waste any time asking her why she and her father moved Ploeg's body in front of his family's house, thereupon resulting in their deaths. After explaining that her father was so consumed with guilt as a result of being indirectly responsible for his family's death that he moved to New Zealand and eventually committed suicide, Karin explains that they decided to drop Ploeg's body in front of his house instead of their neighbors the Aarts because the latter family was hiding Jews in their home and they did not want the Nazis to find them. After discovering that his family's demise was the accidental circumstance of protecting a hidden Jewish family, Anton seems to come to terms with the past and can finally move on with the future.

Ironically, despite the resentment that many Dutch people still hold for the Germans as a result of the Second World War, the Netherlands is home to what is probably the only monument dedicated to a German Wehrmacht soldier in the entire world. The monument was made in tribute to a German soldier named Private Karl-Heinz Rösch who was blown up at the mere age of 18 just moments after saving the lives of two small Dutch children at a farm in the small southern Netherlands village of Goirle during an Allied attack on October 6, 1944. In a somewhat strange way, I think The Assault expresses the same message as the Rösch monument as it completely demystifies the official narrative regarding 'good' and 'evil' during the Second World War, as both works of art demonstrate the impact of individual acts during wartime. Indeed, while the protagonist of the film is told by various people to never forget that 'the krauts' were responsible for torching his family home and killing his parents, the character also encounters nice German soldiers and realizes that some members of the resistance were just as much of murderous thugs as the most merciless members of the Gestapo. While the protagonist's parents were indeed executed by the krauts, their deaths were the direct result of a series of misunderstandings and unfortunate circumstances that are especially common during times of war when one small slip can result in death. As source writer Harry Mulisch, who was a lifelong left-winger, stated of his own father's stranger-than-fiction circumstances as a man who ultimately paid a major price for protecting his Jewish son and wife, "It's a terrible paradox of the war. My father took great risks to save my mother and was later condemned as a collaborator." While I think the conclusion was somewhat preposterous and some of the scenes were hopelessly contrived, The Assault is an engulfing work that acts as a sort of antidote to the mundanely dichotomous black-and-white morality of virtually all Hollywood WWII films. While the protagonist seems to think otherwise when he learns of the true circumstances leading up to his family's death, his kinfolk ultimately died pointless deaths which, although quite typical of war, seems to be a concept that most Americans do not want to accept as reflected by the fact that they call virtually anyone that dies in a pointless Zionist war a 'hero.' Apparently, during his Oscar acceptance speech, director Fons Rademakers naively attempted to convince American audiences to get over their seemingly undying fear of reading subtitles and embrace films from other countries. For better or worse, The Assault is indubitably one of the most 'accessible' Dutch films ever made, even if it forces the viewer to slightly look beyond good and evil as far as morality is concerned, thus making it the perfect introductory work for novices of cinema from the Netherlands.

To be quite frank, I hate the Christmas season and cannot remember the last time I couldn't wait for god's ½ Jewish double-bastard son's pseudo-birthday to be over with. As is typical, last year's Christmas was an especially deplorable and less than merry day for me, but I did enjoy doing one thing on Christ's big day and that was watching the arthouse hardcore porn flick Nightdreams (1981) aka Night Dreams aka Nightdreams #1 directed by music video/television director Francis Delia (Freeway, Long Day Journey) under the curious pseudonym 'F.X. Pope' and co-written by Jerry Stahl aka "Herbert W. Day" (who would go on to pen garbage like Bad Boys II (2003) directed by Michael Bay) and Austrian-American auteur-pornographer Stephen Sayadian aka 'Rinse Dream' (Café Flesh, Party Doll A Go- Go!), who some people, like myself, would argue is the real 'auteur' of the film. Indeed, today I thought I would get into the anti-Christmas spirit by re-watching a film that would give both Santa Claus and Satan a hard-on and/or a heart attack. Described by Playboy Magazine as, "The first avant-garde adult film...Fellini meets Eraserhead," and by Velvet Magazine as, "The Citizen Kane of adult films," Nightdreams is undoubtedly and unequivocally one of the greatest fuck flicks ever made and a rare aberrant quasi-artistic porn flick that goes beyond being a miserable masturbation aid. In fact, with its hardcore absurdist hodgepodge of pussy-licking monster dolls, saxophone-blowing toasted Wonder Bread, deviant droog-like bathroom rapists, cutesy cunnilingus-inclined cowgirls, plastic-like pussies, debauched dildo-wielding demons, frail fetuses popping out of penises, and salacious towelhead sheiks, you would have to be a sick and demented degenerate to get-off to a film like Nightdreams (in fact, co-writer Sayadian has noted in interviews that it was a failure as a porn flick but a big success as a Midnight Movie); a phantasmagoric piece of porno pandemonium of the sexually surreal sort that seems like the sort of nightmares a victim of child molestation might suffer, especially if said child molestation victim has a sick sense of humor. On top of being brazenly bawdy and beautifully bizarre, Nightdreams is both intentionally and unintentionally hilarious in its unhinged and exceedingly eccentric erotic charm, sort of like a bad 1950s sci-fi movie on expressionistic avant-garde steroids, yet all the more wildly wicked and warped. A rare porn flick shot on 35mm film stock featuring music by spaghetti-western-influenced New Wave group Wall of Voodoo, Nightdreams is probably the only porn flick that manages to reconcile the avant-garde hardcore sleaziness of Fred Halsted's Sextool (1975) with the fiercely fantastic New Romantic aesthetic absurdity of Slava Tsukerman's culturally cynical sci-fi cult classic Liquid Sky (1982). Featuring porn diva Dorothy LeMay (Trashi, Stalag 69) playing the role of a hysterical housewife named Mrs. Van Houten (a name in tribute to one of the ladies of the Manson Family, no less!) who becomes the hyper horny guinea pig patient of salacious scientists and undergoes experimental shock treatment that induces erotic, albeit oftentimes nefarious and nightmarish, dreams of the decidedly debasing sort, Nightdreams is totally tasteless yet tasty trash-art-porn from sort of fiercely fetishistic forbidden dimension.

Accordingly to her less than sexually virile husband, Mrs. Van Houten (Dorothy LeMay) has never had a single orgasm in her entire sad and erotically-deprived booboisie life, but with the somewhat shocking shock treatment help of two psychiatrists, one male beta (Andy Nichols) and one female alpha (Jennifer West), she manages to have a number of naughty nightmarish dreams that deliver an ominous and otherworldly sort of orgasmic pleasure that ultimately arouses more than the just attention of the two initially frigid soul-doctors. While Mrs. Van Houten is asleep, the two decidedly decadent and oftentimes quarrelling docs send her a series of super sensational electric shocks that stimulate both her mind and body, thereupon turning the little lady into a nasty nymphomaniac of nightmares who will fuck anything anywhere, including a jerking jack-in-the-box with a human cock, two cute cunt-licking cowgirls with big udders, musical negro Cream of Wheat boxes, mask-adorned droog-like rapists, and other wanton and wild weirdos. Too blatant to be mere aesthetic theft, the bathroom rape scene with the deranged droog dude seems to be a rather reluctant homage to Dressed to Kill (1980) directed by Brian De Palma, a man who thrives on cinematic homages and who has made a major monetary killing off of meta-Hitchcockian celluloid killings. On top of titillating toys and cuming on cowgirls, Mrs. Van Houten also travels to horndog Hades where a lesbian-loving Lucifer has a demoness lick the mental patient's lily and later finishes her off with a daunting demonic strap-on dildo. Of course, Lucifer is no mere vainglorious voyeur but a virile victor of vice who also does his damndest to sexually violate Mrs. Van Houten during a literally hot and steamy pseudo-sinister Satanic threesome in hell. Of course, you cannot have hell without heaven, so Mrs. Van Houten makes her next nightmarish nympho stop in hedonistic heaven where French composer Erik Satie's minimalistic masterpiece "Gymnopédies" plays angelically as the mentally perturbed protagonist ostensibly gets on god's dick. In the end, Nightdreams concludes with a fitting twist that puts into question who is really the doctor and who is really the patient.

Not surprisingly considering its popularity, Nightdreams was followed by two sequels, Nightdreams II (1989) and Nightdreams 3 (1991), but being shot-on-video, these two would-be-weird-and-wacky porno turds lack the aberrant artsy and phantasmagoric cine-magic that the original film is quite rightfully (in)famous for. Indeed, while Nightdreams co-writer Stephen Sayadian failed in his attempt to direct worthy sequels to the original film, he was responsible for directing the positively potent post-apocalyptic porn flick Café Flesh (1982), which has the grand distinction of being the first porn flick to completely crossover and become a Midnight Movie classic as a work that played in repertory theaters across the United States and Europe throughout most of the 1980s. Additionally, Sayadian is also responsible for the non-pornographic yet erotically-charged avant-garde flick Dr. Caligari (1989), which is a severely sardonic and fetish-fueled tribute/quasi-sequel to the German expressionist masterpiece The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920) aka Das Cabinet des Dr. Caligari directed by Robert Wiene. While I can state without hesitation that Dr. Caligari is easily the most aesthetically and thematically complex, as well as snidely sardonic, of Sayadian's films, Nightdreams is unequivocally the darkest and most memorable of the film projects he worked on. Interestingly, in a somewhat recent interview with twitchfilm.com, Sayadian stated he was compensated for his work on Nightdreams in the following peculiar manner: "I got $60,000 to make Nightdreams, and the entire film was paid in change. There used to be these peep shows everywhere. People would put quarters or dollars and they could see a show behind a glass wall, and it would go on for as long as they kept the money in. The people that financed that paid the budget of the film in coins. They didn't want to convert it to bills. I made Nightdreams with $60,000 in quarters." A rather humble arthouse pornographer if there ever was one, Sayadian also stated in the same interview regarding the root of his aesthetic prowess: "Everything I had ever done, in terms of filmmaking, my hands were always tied by the budget. The budget always came first. People always ask, how did you come up with this or that? And I always have the same terrible answer: I had no money; it was all I could do! I never shot a film on location. Not one location. And that was because you go where your strength is. I'm a good production designer, good art director, good enough for low budget, so you do that." Indeed, considering the history behind the making of The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari and a number of other German expressionist films, it seems Sayadian was influenced by more than just the aesthetic and 'twist' ending of Wiene's masterpiece, as the work was made under similarly 'unwasteful' circumstances (the sets for The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari cost less than $800 and the leading actors were paid $30 a day).

A sort of heterosexual celluloid equivalent to Michael Zen's Falconhead Part II: The Maneaters (1984), albeit more humorous and satirical in persuasion, not to mention more aesthetically eclectic, Nightdreams is essentially a rare piece of porn specially tailored for the more discerning cinephile. Originally conceived to be a modern filmic equivalent to an "old vaudeville review," Nightdreams—which was originally made under the work title "I Know You're Watching Me"—ultimately evolved into a perturbing yet perversely pleasurable purgatory of potent preternatural petite vignettes that Werner Schroeter might have directed had he been a heterosexual horror fan with a sickly sardonic sense of humor and a foul fetish for jagged and otherwise bizarrely shaped dildos. As Sayadian also noted during his interview with twitchfilm.com, "I came from hard porn, but was trying to inject an artistic film sensibility into it. But at the same time I was doing that, downtown in New York and in the L.A. scene, these people from the art world were putting porn into their images – people like Nick Zedd, Lydia Lunch, this transgression stuff – but if you look at that stuff today, I think we won out. I think our porn to art approach holds up much better.” And, indeed, I have to concur with Sayadian, as there seems to be more artsy in a single cum shot featured in Nightdreams than in all of Kern’s ‘poor man’s art-porn’ flicks combined, not to mention the fact that no one—and I mean no one—wants to see an ugly gutter-feminist bitch like Lydia Lunch naked. Indeed, while porn star Dorothy LeMay might not exactly be the most gorgeous gal in the world, her ‘penetrating performance’ in Nightdreams is as good as they cum in regard to pornography, especially considering the innately idiosyncratic and aesthetically/thematically iconoclastic nature of the film. Indeed, as I hoped it would, re-watching Nightdreams certainly got me into the nihilistically nostalgic, anti-Christmas spirit.

THE GODFATHER

Francis Ford Coppola (1972)

The Godfather is the Don of all Sicilian-American guinea (a word quite often used in the film) mafia films. Francis Ford Coppola did an excellent job as an artisan directing a film about undesirable yet respectable members of his Mediterranean race. The Godfather is after all a master craftsman piece if not a work of art. A film that retains its power with each viewing. The editors of the film also deserve to be noted as the baptizing montage during the end of the film is one of the greatest of American cinema. The Godfather is a true teamwork project and not an auteur piece.

A young Al Pacino shines in the film starring as Michael Corleone, a war hero and college student turned master exterminator. Marlon Brando proves that he could dominate a film that he is not featured in very much. He also proved that he could use his method acting schools to play a top crime leader of a group he shares no blood with. Brando came out of the film as the actor making the most cash with his role as Don Vito. Few actors can claim they have such a varied and successful career with films like A Streetcar Named Desire, On The Waterfront, Last Tango in Paris, and The Godfather. Francis Ford Coppola knew that Brando was worth the extra money for his irreplaceable acting abilities. Robert Duvall does an excellent job as Tom Hagen, the stoic adopted son of Don Vito. Being not of Sicilian blood (but "Kraut" and "Mick" blood), Hagen was the lawyer and consigliere. The Coen Brothers made the Italian mafia look like a bunch of moronic buffoons in Miller's Crossing. I guess Francis Ford Coppola figured they would need a Mc-Aryan to be the "brains" of the Sicilian mafia family. Sicily is not known for its scholars. Tom Hagen is the man that demonstrates "self-control" and rationality in The Godfather.

Federico Fellini's favorite composer Nina Rota lent his music making to The Godfather. A film such as The Godfather wouldn't be complete without the emotionally engulfing sounds of Nina Rota. Martin Scorsese decided pop songs would be the best choices for his mafia flicks. Maybe Coppola has a little more class (or maybe not)? Francis Ford Coppola certainly did his time at film school when he decided to hire both Marlon Brando and Nina Rota. Now most American's have heard a score from the composer that created musical works which brilliantly complimented the fantastic visual works of the legendary Federico Fellini. It is no lie that The Godfather is one of the top ten best American films ever made. American film has always been a business, and with business comes the desire to create marketable products. The Godfather combines violence, a memorable score, competent directing, Eisenstein inspired editing montages, and good storytelling for a film that Hollywood can be proud. Francis Ford Coppola also owes his Sicilian ancestors and relatives a little credit for their film influence. I have always been more a fan of Italian cinema than Italian-America cinema. The Godfather is something the Italian-American community can be proud of.

APOCALYPSE NOW

Francis Ford Coppola (1979)

Francis Ford Coppola is without doubt one of the most overrated directors of all time. More of an artisan than an artist, Coppola is one of the most studied directors in film schools because of his "technical" achievements in film. Apocalypse Now is the Italian American directors greatest film. At best the film is a dark odyssey of a man coming to terms with himself while searching for another man. At worst, Coppola spent way too much time, effort, and money on a film that is NOT the best war film ever made. The Godfather series has influenced many morons to idealize the world of organized crime. With Apocalypse Now, Coppola has also convinced us that "war is bad." A crazy surfer Lt. Colonel Bill Kilgore likes to kill gooks and have his soldiers surf rad waves at the same type. Coppola really shows us the absurdity of war in a fairly obvious manner. I personally thought Lt. Kilgore was a pretty cool dude. Apocalypse Now also shows how poor black kids from the intercity died in the jungles of Vietnam for whitey. I wonder if there is a film about the Vietnam war that doesn't bring this up. The liberal rule for war filmmaking is killing fascists = good and killing communists = bad. The Vietnam war was bad because America had Negroes and poor whites kill third world communists. World War II was good because Americans killed Europeans. Francis Ford Coppola even alludes to Nazism when Kilgore blasts Richard Wagner as he goes in for the kill on a village of backwards gooks. Francis Ford Coppola is a deeply philosophical man not to be questioned. I have never thought of Martin Sheen as a tough soldier. Hell, I never thought of Mr. Sheen as even a man. His role as Captain Willard in Apocalypse Now makes about as much sense as his son Emilio Estevez playing a punk in Repo Man. Hollywood really likes to have men of weak physique playing the roles of heroic men for obvious reasons. I would have even preferred an overweight and aged Brando as Captain Willard. At least Brando looks like he went outside as a child. Rumor has it that Francis Ford Coppola enjoyed himself with young teenage male prostitutes in Cambodia during the filming of Apocalypse Now. He had his convicted child molester friend Victor Salva (director of Powder and Jeepers Creepers) with him during the shooting of Apocalypse Now so it would be no surprise. For all the time spent on the making of Apocalypse Now, the result is less than "epic." The film slightly horrified me as a child but now I see it as mild entertainment. I give credit to Coppola for spicing up the film with some tunes by The Doors and a small role by Dennis Hopper as an eccentric American photographer. I take away credit from Coppola for re-releasing Apocalypse Now in it's "Redux" form. Coppola can't possibly think that the "redux" version is a superior cut. The original film cutout the "new footage" for a reason. Then again, Francis Ford Coppola isn't much different from his fellow "film school generation" of film directors such as Steven Spielberg and George Lucas. Americans should leave it to the Europeans and Russians for war films.

RUMBLE FISH

Francis Ford Coppola (1983)

Rumble Fish was Francis Ford Coppola's big attempt at being artsy fartsy. The film was shot in black-and-white and has a spacey feeling which Coppola intentionally employed. With Rumble Fish, Coppola even dabbles in surrealism, dream sequences, and "heavenly" camera angles. From beginning to end, Rumble Fish feels as if you're floating in and out of the film. Although flawed, Rumble Fish is one of Coppola's greatest artistic achievements.

Matt Dillon stars in Rumble Fish as a young gang leader named Rusty James who can't live up to his legendary brother's reputation. Rusty James is a male bimbo that just can't help but incriminate himself as an incompetent moron and impulsive fuck up. His brother, The Motorcycle Boy (played by a calm and collected Mickey Rourke) demands respect merely by making his presence known. Rusty James claims that he will one day be like Motorcycle Boy but fails to even come close to understanding his own brother in even the most general way. At best, Rusty James can only admire his brother and he knows this. Rumble Fish follows in the footsteps of East of Eden, another film that takes a look at two brothers that don't seem to share any of the same blood. But unlike East of Eden, both brothers featured in Rumble Fish are involved in crimes as for them it is the norm. This is not strange as years pass in the United States crime and gangs become more glamorous as result of America's leaders being subversive culture distorter's. The pairs of brothers in East of Eden and Rumble Fish also share something very importantly in common in that their mother has abandoned their family. Also in both films, each brother responded to this maternal disappearance in a completely different way thus resulting in opposing personalities. Rumble Fish is a fine update of "different brothers of the same mother (and broken father)." Rumble Fish suffers from an annoying soundtrack of goofy sound effects that get in the way of the film's important dialogue. The Police drummer Stewart Copeland had a new invention at that time called a "Musync" which never should have been invented. Thankfully, this little contraption hasn't been utilized in films often. The unfortunate problem with "experiments" is they often result in unexpected failure. Stewart Copeland failed. Rumble Fish features a variety of new (for that time) and old actors. One of my favorite performances, although limited in scenes, is by the legendary Dennis Hopper. Hopper plays the drunken and mentally unstable father of the brothers featured in Rumble Fish. Father Hopper realizes the great tragic quality that is Motorcycle Boy as he takes after his mother. Rusty James seems to take after no one and Daddy knows this. Rusty James is the black sheep of the family that only wants to fit in. His brother and father know it's a lost cause. Rumble Fish is one of the more complex Hollywood "family affairs" that deserves viewing.

Franco Brocani (1970)

After reading various warnings to avoid the film like the experimental LSD-ridden celluloid plague, I decided it was about time I get around to seeing the lost psychedelic-drug-inspired Gudio avant-garde epic Necropolis (1970) directed by obscure Italian auteur Franco Brocani (Clodia – Fragmenta, Schifanosaurus Rex). Starring Italian avant-garde auteur Carmelo Bene (Our Lady of the Turks, Capricci) as a very authentically drunk leather-jacket-adorned Kenneth Anger fan, Warhol Superstar Viva (Bike Boy, Lonesome Cowboys) as a repressed housewife who shoves coke cans up her pussy, and French junky arthouse superstar Pierre Clémenti as a rather gay and naked Attila the Hun, as well as gigantic penises, a dandy-like melancholy Frankenstein monster, a human-size King Kong, Satan himself, and a number of other famous cinema/literary/historical fantastic figures in less than fantastic yet highly stylized settings, Necropolis—a hippie fantasy-horror work with an international cast featuring dialogue in Italian, English, German, and French—is a sort of postmodern psychedelic psychobabble fest where the various actors, whose chemical-fueled inebriation is certainly not in question, deliver mostly mundane and madly meandering monologues about a bunch of unintentionally corny and even sometimes funny crackpot counter-culture subjects. A sometimes strangely charming celluloid endurance test that will only be of interest to diehard cinephiles, wannabe-hippies and people who think they are more intelligent while they are high, Necropolis in many way epitomizes everything that was wrong and degenerate about the late-1960s/early-1970s as a convoluted work of counter-culture craziness and drug-addled debauchery masquerading as cultivated celluloid art of the highly intellectual and transcendental sort. Yet for all of its nauseating nonsensicalness, pseudo-philosophical meanderings, and inane and uninventive iconoclasm, I somewhat enjoyed Necropolis, even laughing out loud a number of times at the film's vivacious vulgarity. Starring Viva as a brazenly bitchy and sexually repressed housewife who rather regrets her marriage to a pussy of a poet, Necropolis features many great and highly memorable quotes from the Warhol superstar like, "Bring me a Coca Cola so I can fuck myself," "I knew he'd always end up in bed with a boy," and "If it weren't for vibrators, I'd be in a sorry state," among countless others. Like an early Warhol production on steroids meets Kenneth Anger and Carmelo Bene as directed by someone who knows a thing or two about set-design, shot composition, and general filmmaking techniques, Necropolis apparently purports to be a distinctly deep 'statement about life' and, judging the film, it must be a life less than worthy of living. A collection of petite vignettes featuring distinctly stylized yet mostly minimalistic tableaux, Necropolis is a playful celluloid counter-culture pandemonium of pretentiousness, perversion, and bawdy blasphemy that reminds the viewer that not all things 'beatnik retrograde' are totally worthless, if not always retarded.

Before viewing Necropolis, I decided to watch an experimental black-and-white dystopian sci-fi short entitled Segnale da un pianeta in via di estinzione (1972) aka Signal from a Planet on the Way to Extinction directed by auteur Franco Brocani. Indeed, if I learned anything about Brocani as a filmmaker whilst watching his rather lecherous and loony science fiction short, it is that he is a cultural pessimist of the far-left who, despite bemoaning the spiritual and moral degeneration of the left, is certainly a byproduct of said degeneration and Necropolis certainly confirms this, albeit in a rather confused, campy, and chaotic manner that makes one wonder whether or not the filmmaker fried his brain on too much mescaline, cocaine, and LSD. As mumbled by the effete Frankenstein monster in the film, Brocani seems to believe that in some form or another that "The universe is in my head" and Necropolis must be seen as a celluloid expression of the auteur's unhinged universe of eccentrically eroticized film references, hippie hysterics, anti-bourgeois baloney, and decidedly demented anti-capitalist/anti-fascist diatribes. Featuring no real beginning nor end, let alone a linear storyline, Necropolis is a discernibly discombobulated nightmare from a warped wop mind that wanted to concoct a work as intimate and idiosyncratic as a masterpiece like David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977) would prove to be, but was too high on LSD and cinema history to discern between celluloid genius and total trash art, thus ultimately siring something somewhere in between. Opening with an off-screen narrator stating, "You look upwards, because you want to exalt yourselves. You want to exalt yourselves. I look downwards, because I am exalted," Necropolis immediately gives the viewer the feel that the film was directed by a proud narcissist who believes he and only he knows the truth. Of course, what the 'truth' is is rather dubious, but it seems director Brocani is a proud proponent of individualism as demonstrated by a character's remark, "Everyone must live according to his own PERSONAL law." Of course, all the characters of Necropolis have innately different life philosophies.

Indeed, Necropolis is certainly a celluloid work inhabited by diacritic, if not demented and damaged, individualistic characters of counter-culture who play by their own warped tune, which is a large part of the film's appeal today. For one, one once again gets to see famed frog fag Pierre Clémenti, in the role of Attila the Hun, riding a horse naked in a scene that anticipates his mostly unclad performance in Philippe Garrel's The Inner Scar (1972) aka La cicatrice intérieure. One also gets to see absurdist Italian auteur Carmelo Bene, who is as drunk as a Sicilian skunk, bickering with Viva about Satan and magic. When Viva asks him, "What about the devil?", Bene hilariously responds "Anger, Kenneth Anger," but the Warhol superstar rejects the art of cinema being a true reflection of life, stating, "It's not in films you find magic, it's in life...It's not in Kenneth Anger's films. It's in real life." Of course, Bene is not the main victim of Viva's lapsed bourgeois bitchiness, as she saves most of her hatred for her filmic husband Louis Waldon, who she previously had unsimulated sex with the year before in Warhol's Blue Movie (1969). Unfortunately, it seems their romance has fizzled since the Warhol flick as Viva spends the entire scene berating her onscreen husband, describing him as an impotent pansy of sorts, ultimately declaring of her ostensibly homosexual hubby, "I knew he'd always end up in bed with a boy." Other standout quotes from Viva to her sad cuckold of a spouse include, "If it weren't for vibrators, I'd be in a sorry state" and "If I wanted a purring pussy, I would have married a girl." Of course, as a superlatively spoiled yet miserable woman who less than proudly admits, "I always get everything but what I want," it seems nothing will satisfy Viva, impotent hubby or not. Undoubtedly, one of the most standout scenes in Necropolis is of Paul Jabara of Hair fame, who was a pioneering member of the disco 'culture' and who died of complications relating to AIDS in 1992, giving a monologue next to a gigantic six-foot-tall phallus, but not before his decapitated head is somehow magically reattached to his emasculated body. In what is easily the most technically innovative scene, Jabara delivers a monologue to 'himself' in the same scene as he is dressed in drag as 'Countess Viva Bathory' (indeed, the swarthy hippie-like homo somehow pulls off pretending to be a spoiled blonde NYC debutante). Not surprisingly, Necropolis concludes just as abruptly and nonsensically as it begins.

With a Wilde-esque Nordic dandy Frankenstein monster (as depicted by Spaghetti Western/giallo star Bruno Corazzari, who worked with Lucio Fulci, among various others) in a green velvet two-piece suit (with 'black power' sound clips being played in the background) suffering from major melancholy, a rather impotent and naked Attila the Hun as depicted by Clémenti riding a horse on a phantasmagoric pop-art set, Louis Waldon as an angst-ridden American tourist looking for the (apparently missing) Mona Lisa, Viva giving what is arguably one of her greatest and most vivacious (and tolerable) screen performances, mad Mesoamerica Aztec/Tenochtitlan ruler Moctezuma II as a mellow hippie-like blue-eyed lover of birds, and French-Jewish-Dominican-American hipster Tina Aumont (Modesty Blaise, Fellini's Casanova) as a mostly mute and childlike cradler of babydolls, Necropolis is certainly a majorly mixed-up cinematic work with some sometimes palatable counter-culture meat on it that surely becomes more interesting on subsequent viewings, at least for those cinephiles stoic enough to brave through the entire film. Of course, Necropolis will be totally inaccessible and intolerable for most filmgoers, especially those unfamiliar with the counter-culture characters featured in the film, thus it will undoubtedly stay in the celluloid dustbin of history where it has essentially been since its original release over four decades ago. Featuring a sort of half-coherent dialectic between the cine-magic of Kenneth Anger/Jean Cocteau versus the gritty realism of Andy Warhol/Paul Morrissey, Necropolis is ultimately like a celluloid/LSD-addled counter-culture cinematic psychosis created at a time when experimental film was at its height, so the fact that Pierre Clémenti, Viva, and Carmelo Bene star in it make it an all the more worthwhile endeavor for adventurous cinephiles. A sort of Guido Chelsea Girls from cinema history hell, Necropolis is a zany and artistically overzealous product of its deluded zeitgeist that reminds the viewer that hipsters may have always sucked, but at least in the past they were somewhat more original and genuine in their degeneracy and longing for revolution.

THE LAST HOUSE ON THE BEACH
THE LAST HOUSE ON THE BEACH

Franco Prosperi (1978)

Sprouting from the ashes of Wes Craven's godforsaken hit The Last House on the Left was a slew of ripoffs and cash-ins in an attempt to snag some of the profit for themselves. Any man with a camera and a cast of a couple women willing to take their shirts off can make one of these films. It's that easy. The Last House on the Beach is directed by the man behind Mondo Cane and its direct sequel as well as the notorious Africa Addio and Goodbye Uncle Tom. The formulaic plot stays stand still; not fearing any backlash for fitting the cookie cutter mold of every one of these films and features a band of criminals taking refuge in a house under the supervision of a virgin's den. This time, they twist the turns wider and sharper when they make these women religious and includes a nun. Part nunsplotation - part rape/vengeance, all evil. The plot works within itself really well and produces a very calming atmosphere when it wants the illusion to be present. The killers allow the females to play on the beach and sleep in peace which creates this false sanctity. These perpetrators can play nice and flip flop your emotions as you question your doubts and doubt your questions. One scene in particular is when Walter finds a tube of lipstick. As he raises the compound out of the tube, this harmony escapes his eyes. It seems to be the soul of a sexually confused man. That is, until he dons a powdered face and lipstick in an incredibly eerie scene where he rapes a young teenager. I'm pretty desensitized to rape in film so this didn't really shock me at all or present anything new. That is, until a virgin was raped to death with a large stick. The Last House on the Beach is superior to the bland film that is The Last House on the Left. There might be a House on the edge of the park or on Dead End Street or any other diagonal direction, but it still proves a challenge to create a film that surpasses its own limitations on this battlefield of exploitation. I personally felt this film could have been a bit more graphic though. Shout-out to the fine folks at Severin Films for the rarest EuroTrash.

Franco Rubartelli (1971)

Long before every homely ho and hussy in America was going to Mardi Gras festivals and having their terrible tits airbrushed, and Hollywood actresses like Rebecca Romijn-Stamos got pseudo-naked in the form of wearing nothing but makeup and minor prosthetics in films like X-Men (2000) and its sequels, Prussian countess and prototypical supermodel “Veruschka” (aka Vera Gräfin von Lehndorff-Steinort aka Veruschka von Lehndorff)—a rare statuesque model/actress of intelligence and artistic talent who actually did all her own creative work during her fashion shoots (she once quipped she wanted to be more than “just an attractive coat stand”), including her makeup and hair, as well as having involvement in the editorial process of said photo shoots—had completely revolutionized and monopolized nude body art/body paint of the seemingly quasi-pagan sort (she often camouflaged herself in natural settings, taking the form of rocks, trees, etc.) with iconic photos being featured everywhere from Vogue to Playboy Magazine. The first international superstar who since the 1960s onwards appeared on over 800 magazine covers, Veruschka did not always live the sweet life, even if she was born with a silver spoon in her mouth, as her father Heinrich Ahasverus Graf von Lehndorff-Steinort was a member of the July 20 plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler who was sentenced to death by the Volksgerichtshof (“People’s Court”) and executed via hanging on 4 September 1944 for his role in conspiracy, thus forcing the young countess and the rest of her family to live in labor camps for the rest of the war, and ultimately leaving the Prussian blueblood family homeless. In the patently personal psychedelic arthouse film Veruschka (1971) aka Veruschka - poesia di una donna aka Veruschka: Poetry of a Woman—a morbidly melancholy yet keenly kaleidoscopic cinematic work penned by the damaged diva herself—one is not only exposed to a rather physically vulnerable Veruschka who is incessantly unclad aside from body painting in a variety of atmospheric nature settings (a couple of the scenes were apparently shot in Kenya during a photo shoot with Peter Beard), but also to the tragic heart and soul of the naughty Nordic countess, who is visited by a prepubescent child doppelganger that acts as a sort of striking symbol of her tragic childhood, a childhood that she seemingly never recovered from. Despite being considering one of the most gorgeous women in the world, Veruschka was a victim of bullying as a teen due to the fact she was 6’1” at the mere age of 14 and would eventually sprout to a towering 6’4” (though some report she is actually 6’3”) and this internal woundedness and paradoxical need to be seen yet hidden is quite apparent in many of her portraits, but especially the film Veruschka, a quasi-esoteric allegorical biography of surreal sadness and stunning self-loathing. Featuring the telling Susan Sontag quote, “...the desire to hide, to be camouflaged, to escape human appearance, to be an animal, an object, not a person, the desire to punish the self, to dissolve the self into the world, to be striped naked, to petrify the body, to become only matter..." (Fragments of an Aesthetic of Melancholy) on her present official website (<http://www.veruschka.net/>), Veruschka could have practically used the quote from the lesbian Jewess as a sort of philosophical synopsis of the film Veruschka, a film directed by Italian photographer Franco Rubartelli, who was also the longtime lover of the damaged diva. Featuring an iconic score by Italian maestro Ennio Morricone that is now better remembered than the actual film despite sounding like the sort of music featured in a vintage Summer's Eve douche commercial, Veruschka is cinematic female exquisiteness in its most existentially lugubrious yet sensually surreal form.

Tall Aryaness Veruschka is on a road trip with her middle-aged Italian agent/boyfriend (Luigi Pistilli) across the rural Italian countryside and despite the stunning scenery and being with a man that ostensibly loves her and vice versa, she cannot seem to shake her all-consuming melancholy and existential misery. At the beginning of their road trip, Veruschka asks her boyfriend, "how do you think this journey of ours might end?," which is a question she will ultimately regret asking by the film's strangely tragic yet ethereal conclusion. Early on in the film, Veruschka has an eerie premonition of her future when, after seeing and waving to a young boy on his motorcycle with his father, she later passes the boy and his father laying dead on the highway after a tragic car wreck. On the way, the lovers pick up a Christ-like hitchhiker and Veruschka's boyfriend dubiously remarks, "maybe it's our chance to have a threesome" as if he is some sort of active cuckold who enjoys seeing swarthy hippie types hump his hot girlfriend. The hitchhiker admits to Veruschka that he does not like her boyfriend because "he's someone who knows too well what he wants" as he is a Guido beatnik of sorts who believes in "being one" with the "Sun God" and "Mother Earth," among other things. Not surprisingly, the two lovers soon part ways with the hitchhiker and Veruschka begins to regret going on the road trip with her boyfriend, inevitably coming to the conclusion that their lackluster relationship has fallen apart. Meanwhile, Veruschka, who is constantly dreaming and daydreaming (hence, the semi-surreal essence of the film), less than fondly reminisces about how her proud aristocratic German mother, who looks like a grumpy Guido diva with terminal cancer, warns her about leaving home, telling her, "You'll be like a tree taken away from the forest. Your roots will be crying....Poor girl. Your body will be dismembered and torn into pieces," but, quite naturally, she did the opposite, seeking her fortune and fame around the world.

As he tends to do throughout the entire film, Veruschka boyfriend's berates her because he does not "get her" and her wild and oftentimes whimsical idiosyncrasies. More than anyone else, Veruschka dreams of her prepubescent child self as if trying to get in touch with a part of her self she lost long ago. Veruschka also recalls the "fond banalities" of a once-great love affair she had with a young and handsome Aryan man named Michael, who makes the viewer wonder why she would be now dating a super swarthy and equally arrogant high-italian twice her age, as if she only started to date him to further her career, thus throwing her into complete and utter misery in the process. Of course, it is later revealed that Veruschka ran away with her present boyfriend to get away from her mother and ex-boyfriend Michael. Veruschka displays her Aryan arrogance in a scene when she should proudly proclaim regarding her home, "In this house there are German things which a foreigner could never understand!" thus expressing the supermodel's own disillusionment with her Prussian aristocratic ancestry. Veruschka's boyfriend also sees things in an exceedingly delusional manner, proudly proclaiming he saved his trophy lady love from suicide and various vices. Indeed, as revealed in a psychedelic psychosexual flashback, Veruschka got involved with some acidhead hippies and hallucinated that she was making love to herself. Being a supermodel, Veruschka also discusses the minor misery of her trade, which includes painful reproductions of her face by doctors, later morbidly stating regarding three statue replicas of her head, "Its' me...guillotined three times" as if fantasizing about her own death, which she does quite often. After sadly discussing how she denied herself a baby, Veruschka explains how she 'killed' a bunch of baby dolls on the beach, only to feel remorse and recollect all the doll parts she had previously dismembered, eventually symbolically burying them, in the sand, realizing that she has 'buried herself' in the process as a supermodel whose career came at the spiritually hefty price of her individuality and personal dignity. In a paradoxically hopeful yet completely hopeless attempt to 'fix' herself and figuratively 'pick up' the pieces of her childhood, Veruschka goes on to repair and rebuild a number of grotesque baby dolls that resembled those drawn by degenerate German surrealist artist Hans Bellmer and those that would later be fetishized by German arthouse-splatter auteur Marian Dora (Cannibal, The Angels' Melancholy aka Melancholie der Engel). In the end, Veruschka inadvertently (or not) causes her and her boyfriend's death in a car accident after attempting to let a bird go free she has in a cage and the film concludes with Veruschka's child doppelganger prancing around happily and with the quote, "FREE...Letting her go forever into her imaginary world from which she would never return again. And I hope, I hope..." which will assuredly haunt most viewers (myself included!)

Indeed, in the end, Veruschka was finally "FREE" as her and her photographer boyfriend, director Franco Rubartelli, broke up in 1971 shortly after Veruschka was released, which is not a surprise since the boyfriend character in the film is a constant source of misery for the superstar protagonist who, among other things, complains of her mature Mediterranean man's impotency and bourgeois attitude toward life. Interestingly and rather fittingly considering the morose essence of Veruschka, the actor who played Veruschka's boyfriend, Luigi Pistilli (The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, Twitch of the Death Nerve), committed suicide in 1996 via hanging after a show of Terence Rattigan's Tosca that he starred in had been critically panned, thus throwing the actor into a deleterious depression, which was further compounded by his bad public breakup with Italian singer/actress Milva. If nothing else aside from being one of the most aesthetically pleasing pieces of post-WWII female Prussian aristocratic angst ever made, Veruschka also deconstructs and ultimately exterminates any preconceptions one might have about a gorgeous international superstar as the film portrays Veruschka, who quite notably penned the script (making her, at least in my opinion, the true 'auteur' of the film), as a super suicidal chick in abject misery who longs for nothing more than the freedom of childhood, namely her own childhood before her father was executed by Uncle Adolf in a botched assassination attempt that could have totally changed the course of history.

Undoubtedly, it would be a bit of stretch to describe Veruschka as an endlessly engrossing film because it is far too dispiriting and artsy fartsy to appeal to the layman filmgoer, yet it is ultimately important due to its singular depiction of the sad soul of a superstar, even if it somewhat paradoxically mystifies her in the process. Aesthetically, Veruschka seems to have gone on to influence works ranging from the forgotten cult flick Garden of Death (1974) aka The Gardener starring Warhol superstar Joe Dallesandro (who could easily be mistaken for Veruschka's shorter brother) as a man who turns into a tree and The Guardian (1990) directed by William Friedkin in its depiction of a human morphing into trees and whatnot. It should also be noted that Veruschka (1971) is not the only film called and starring Veruschka, as a German documentary entitled Veruschka - Die Inszenierung (m)eines Körpers (2005) aka Veruschka: A Life for the Camera co-directed by Paul Morrissey (Blood For Dracula, Forty Deuce) and Bernd Böhm was somewhat recently released about the now-elderly superstar's life. An unpretentious woman who had the gall to besmirch her own untouchable legacy of beauty by getting involved in unflattering drag king yet fiercely frolicsome antics, including dressing as commie chink Chairman Mao for a photo shoot based on a concept by Salvador Dalí and even portraying Oscar Wilde's iconic literary anti-hero Dorian Gray in mischling Ulrike Ottinger's dangerously dandy dystopian sci-fi epic Dorian Gray im Spiegel der Boulevardpresse (1984) aka Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press, Veruschka is not only one of the most famous supermodels to live, but also one of the most strikingly strange, thus Veruschka is mandatory viewing for anyone interested in digging into her hermetic heart or who wants to see probably the most anti-erotic film ever made featuring an incessantly nude international supermodel.

SEE THE SEA

François Ozon° (1997)

Unless it is cine-magician Jean Cocteau, frog fag filmmakers are not exactly my thing and that especially includes François Ozon (Criminal Lovers, 8 Women), as the man even managed to defile the work of the great Bavarian celluloid queen Rainer Werner Fassbinder with his aesthetically impotent four act chamber piece Water Drops on Burning Rocks (2000) aka Gouttes d'eau sur pierres brûlantes. Based on the play Tropfen auf heiße Steine, which Fassbinder wrote when he was only 19-years-old, Water Drops on Burning Rocks—a work that depicts a troubled bizarre 'love' triangle between a naïve 20-year-old boy, a psychopathic 50-year-old businessman, and the 20-year-old boy's beautiful yet terribly dumb blonde girlfriend—is a Frenchized celluloid abortion that pays both aesthetic and melodramatic insult to its Teutonic source writer. Of course, as a man who likes to give credit where credit is due, I cannot totally write-off Ozon as a filmmaker, as he has directed one or two cinematic works that I have come to appreciate, with his 52-minute short See the Sea (1997) aka Regarde la mer being worthy of praise for being a particularly nasty, nihilistic, mean-spirited, perniciously perverse, and uniquely unsettling film that makes one question whether or not the fairy filmmaker has some sort of deep-seated hatred for the fairer sex; or at the very least, there seems to be something innately cruel about a film director that seems to identify with wicked women as many of his films, including his hit Swimming Pool (2003) starring Charlotte Rampling and Ludivine Sagnier, readily demonstrate. Indeed, by comparison, See the Sea makes Swimming Pool seem like frivolous celluloid child's play in its daunting depiction of a foreboding relationship between two very different yet strangely complimentary women. Starring auteur/writer/actress Marina de Van (Don't Look Back, Dark Touch), who disturbed viewers with her disconcerting depiction of a pathological self-mutilator (played by de Van) in her aberrantly allegorical first feature In My Skin (2002) aka Dans ma peau, as one of the creepiest cold bitches in French cinema history, Ozon's medium-length film is a decidedly dark and slow-burning thriller set in a sunny and scenic beachside setting that manages to reconcile the work of Alfred Hitchcock with Michelangelo Antonioni in a film that dares to find beauty in human ugliness and vice versa. Indeed, if there exists a film that can induce a miscarriage in expecting mothers, it is this aesthetically nefarious piece of celluloid gynophobia.

Sasha Noyer (played by Sasha Hails, who is probably best known as a writer on the long-running BBC TV series Casualty) is a young British mother with a 10-month-old baby named Sioffra (played by Hails' real-life daughter Samantha) and she is currently living all by herself (aside from the baby, of course) in a beachside house owned by her husband Paul (played by Paul Raoux, who also acted as the assistant director of the film) located on an island named Île d'Yeu off the western coast of France. Husband Paul is away on business in Paris and Sasha does not know when to expect him back, so she is rather lonely and has both sex and friendship on her whimsical little mind. When a discernibly antisocial and creepily cold drifter named Tatiana (Marina de Van) shows up at Sasha's doorstep and states, "I'm looking for a place to crash on the island," the mother initially says, "Sorry, this isn't a hotel," but she eventually gives in due to her undying loneliness and rather extroverted character, which demands constant attention, even if it is of the potentially dangerous sort. While Tatiana initially camps in the yard and promises to keep to herself, Sasha is just too social and extroverted to leave the dirty drifter in the lurch, so she offers her dinner and some fancy wine. While eating, Tatiana, who gorges on her food like a rabid pig in heat, reveals that she used to work as a nanny, but she has trouble staying in the same place for too long and prefers to travel alone. When Sasha asks Tatiana if she gets scared while traveling alone, the deranged drifter proudly replies that she is the one that does "the scaring." Of course, Sasha is too hopelessly naive to get the hint that the stranger might be of a somewhat unsavory and even unhinged character. That night, Sasha, who clearly has an untamable sex drive, masturbates by grinding her naughty bits on a chair, as if she is a little girl who has just discovered her sexuality. The next day, Tatiana takes a bath while smoking a cigarette and rubbing her genitals with a soap bar in a seemingly uncomfortable fashion. After her rather grotesque bath, Tatiana takes Sasha's toothbrush and rubs it in her feces (which she leaves in the toilet for the young mother to find). Indeed, at this point of See the Sea, it is quite apparent that the drifter is a sinister little psychopath with a scat fetish.

When Sasha, the baby, and Tatiana go to the beach, the latter notices a couple of homos having sex in the woods nearby, which seems to turn on the young mother. After Tatiana opts to leave after complaining of being bored by the sun and surf, negligent mother Sasha decides to leave baby Sioffra all by her lonesome on the beach so she can get in on some of the hot homo action going on in the woods. Indeed, Sasha somehow manages to get a young cocksucker to perform cunnilingus on her in a rather aggressive fashion. Meanwhile, Tatiana plays in an ancient and ruined graveyard where she admires the tombstone of a little boy and even reaches inside a broken crypt to see if she can touch a corpse, thereupon demonstrating her morbid character. That night, Tatiana asks Sasha about her birthing experience in what is easily the most awkward part of this unsettling little short. After Sasha describes how giving birth was "great" and how she opted against an epidural because, "It was my first. I wanted to really experience the pain...know how it felt," Tatiana then asks the young mother if her vagina ever tore and describes how, "Some [women] shit out the pussy after" giving birth. When Sasha kindly tells Tatiana to stop asking questions about birth as it might prevent her from ever wanting to have a baby of her own, the drifter states in a matter-of-fact fashion, "I already had one." When Sasha asks where the baby is, Tatiana says, "It is dead." After Sasha apologizes for asking, her curious guest sickly replies, "That's okay. I had it aborted." Luckily for Sasha, a phone call from her husband Paul breaks the tension of the absurdly awkward conversation. Indeed, Paul is supposed to arrive at the house the next morning at 10am and Sasha invites Tatiana to stay, as she is convinced her husband will have no problem with her company, but the deranged drifter has much different plans in mind. That night, a tear trickles down Tatiana's face as she stares at Sasha and baby Sioffra while they are sleeping together in bed. Tatiana then proceeds to strip off all her clothes, and assumedly joins the mother and baby daughter in bed. The next day, Paul arrives, but he cannot find Sasha or the baby. Eventually, Paul notices a red tent in his yard, which he opens up, only to find his wife's Sasha's naked and somewhat bloody corpse. A rather gruesome scenario, the unclad dead body is tied up with bondage and has a plastic bag wrapped around its head. Meanwhile, Tatiana is on a ship heading to Ireland (the boat has an Irish flag). Of course, Tatiana is carrying baby Sioffra, who is naturally crying, in her arms.

While Tatiana is easily one of the most innately despicable and disgusting female characters in film history, protagonist Sasha is not exactly deserving of the 'mother of the year' award, as a routinely negligent first-time mommy who leaves her baby by itself on a beach so she can have sex with a strange sodomite who probably has a STD or two (she also leaves the baby unintended in a bathtub), not to mention the fact that she allows her baby to be watched by a blatantly deranged psycho bitch that looks like a feral hobo who barely survived a Muslim gang rape. Indeed, a genuinely shocking and stomach-turning work that makes an early Roman Polanski shocker like Repulsion (1965) seem like a soft-core bourgeois melodrama by comparison in terms of its nihilistic depiction of feminine ferociousness, See the Sea is an ominous celluloid assault against the viewer that may be predictable in its nuanced utilization of suspense, yet still manages to chill the viewer in the end. Undoubtedly, the two main characters of the film represent two archetypical, albeit unflattering, extremes of femininity, with Sasha being a well meaning, if not scatterbrained and negligent, mother who genuinely loves and adores her child (even if she is not fit to raise her), and Tatiana being a cold, calculating, and callous cunt of the deleteriously jealous sort who does not even have a drop of the nurturing qualities that one needs to be a mother, hence why she aborted her own child. Indeed, forget Polanski's Rosemary's Baby (1968), See the Sea has to be the most macabre maternal horror movie ever made, as a work that not only features a mother being murdered and her baby stolen, but also features spine-tingling Sapphic undertones, as if lesbians are the most sinister and sadistic of women, yet at the same time, it almost seems as if the director felt the mother deserved to die due to her ultimately fatal naivete. For a French film, See the Sea is also deceptively simple, as one can more or less tell where the film will conclude right from the get go, yet this does not detract from the work's pathologically perverse potency, as a nearly immaculately assembled sunny horror story that seems to have been directed by a morally dubious man with an acute hatred for women and maternity, for one can only speculate what would inspire someone to make such a majorly malevolent little movie. Undoubtedly, in its scenic Hitchcockian sexual sadism and unflattering depiction of depraved cocksuckers cruising a beach, See the Sea seems to have had a major thematic and aesthetic influence on the French thriller Stranger by the Lake (2013) aka L'inconnu du lac, thus demonstrating auteur François Ozon's imperative influence on contemporary French cinema. A wickedly whacked reworking of Wuthering Heights meets Knife in the Water (indeed, yet another Polanski reference!) with a formulaic, if not fiercely foreboding, structure that dares to mix serenity with scatology, Ozon's sicko short is like the celluloid equivalent of contracting a painful STD on vacation, as a film that will never leave your mind, no matter how much you wish it would. Indeed, if you're looking for a strong antidote to the hobo feminism of Agnès Varda's Vagabond (1985) aka Sans toit ni loi, See the Sea is certainly worth your time and anguish.

SEE THE SEA

WATER DROPS ON BURNING ROCKS

François Ozon (2000)

While it is indisputable that German New Cinema alpha-auteur Rainer Werner Fassbinder was influenced early on by French filmmakers, including pedantic commie Jean-Luc Godard and 'mainstreamer' Claude Chabrol, it is nothing short of pure cultural and cinematic blasphemy for a froggy filmmaker to cinematically adapt his aberrant Aryan work, yet frog fag filmmaker François Ozon (Sitcom, Swimming Pool) did just that with his theatric melodrama Gouttes d'eau sur pierres brûlantes (2000) aka Water Drops on Burning Rocks. Based on Tropfen auf heiße Steine—the first play ever written by Fassbinder when he was merely 19-years-old yet still featuring many of the signature qualities of the forsaken filmmaker's work—Water Drops on Burning Rocks is a theatrically stylized and pedantically paced work divided into four separate acts that follows the rise and fall of a 20-year-old bisexual German boy's romantic relationship with a 50-year-old professional of the seemingly psychopathic and sadomasochistic sort. Rather absurdly and aesthetically repugnant in a culturally arrogant manner that is not unbecoming for Hollywood filmmakers but less typical of froggy bastards, Water Drops on Burning Rocks, despite being a work featuring ostensibly kraut characters in Deutschland, was shot in the French language with an all fur-licker cast, thus making for a celluloid work that was artistically doomed for Fassbinder fanatics and Germanophiles alike before Queen Ozon shot a single frame of film. Still, with theatrical structure and thematic similarities with The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1972), the merrily macabre master-slave dynamics and camera angles of Martha (1974), colorful postcard-like opening credits similar to Mother Küsters' Trip to Heaven (1975), the homo middle-class malevolence of Fox and His Friends (1975), bourgeois S&M imagery and characters typical of Despair (1978), and featuring a post-op tranny suffering from emotional trauma like In a Year of 13 Moons (1978), among various other countless references to the films of the master of Teutonic melodramatics, Water Drops on Burning Rocks is indubitably a postmodern celluloid tribute to Fassbinder directed by a man with a fiercely fanatical understanding of the filmmaker whose work he adapted, which is rather interesting considering the relatively well known visceral hatred between Germans and the French that goes back centuries. Based on a play by Fassbinder that the filmmaker refused to ever adapt in any form—be it theater or film—due to its autobiographical depiction of his painful real-life relationship with a nefarious gay geezer, Water Drops on Burning Rocks is essentially the tragicomic story of a super suave middle-aged sexual sadist who builds up and breaks down a son figure of the sexual sort in an uncompromisingly cynical, anti-romantic, and misanthropic melodrama celluloid work with an ultra-unhappy ending in almost certain tribute to In a Year of 13 Moons, as well as the Teutonic filmmaker's own tragic life and death.

WATER DROPS ON BURNING ROCKS

20-year-old red-haired twink fairy Franz (Malik Zidi) has a beautiful buxom blonde fiancée named Anna (Ludivine Sagnier) who he does not seem too interested in and certainly does not love, but that all changes forever one day when the seemingly confident yet easily corruptible German lad meets and decides to go to the quaint home of a charismatic kraut freckle-puncher named Léopold (Bernard Giraudeau), who looks like the suave Svengali anti-love child of Christopher Walken, Joseph Mengele, and Dirk Bogarde. While Léopold initially seems to be a mature and passionate lover with a profound understanding of people and romantic relationships, he is really an anally retentive psychopath who knows how to make people fall hopelessly in love with him and after becoming totally dependent on him, treats them like nauseating nuisances who he derives grand pleasure from by verbally and sexually abusing them. After spending a mere night with the elder man discussing failed romances and sexual fantasies, and eventually engaging in anti-agist sodomy, Franz moves in with Léopold and becomes his little bitch boy via emotional and monetary servitude. After six months of living with Léopold, Franz is now a virtually live-in housewife and archetypal fairy who prances around in lederhosen and tends to his menacing mature man's demanding requests of the banal yet eccentric bourgeois sort, including making sure to keep vinyl records in their sleeves and not playing music too loud. Lecherous lunatic Léopold also admits to Franz that he believes he drove an elderly pensioner/war veteran to suicide after screwing the poor man out of his inheritance, so the boy comforts him by trading roles with his lover doing S&M, thus becoming the 'top' for first time in their relationship.

After months of fighting in a uniquely unhealthy and one-sided relationship with Léopold that solely revolves around sick sex, Franz agrees to meet up with his ex-fiancée Anna, who admits she still loves him despite the fact he dumped her for a man old enough to be her father. While Franz admits that he is still madly and masochistically in love with a callous old cocksucker, he ends up playing the same "man in the overcoat" roleplaying game with Anna that he does with Léopold, but it is quite clear that a woman makes for a rather unworthy substitute in a game of sexual sadism. Anna eventually convinces Franz to move out of Léopold's apartment and it begins to seem like the two will get married and have two kids (ludicrously named Léopold and Franz). When Léopold shows up and Franz tells him he is leaving for good, he merely laughs at the young mensch and orders him to get coffee. Léopold's ex-girlfriend/boyfriend Véra (Anna Levine)—a male-to-female transvestite who had their dick cut off in Casablanca for the sadist—also shows up and things start getting rather deranged and debauched. Léopold orders both Anna and Véra, who no longer seem interested in leaving, into the bedroom for group sex and they both abide, which infuriates Franz, who fantasizes about murdering his psychopathic boy toy. Franz and Véra both agree they are "Léopold's creature" (aka slave in a sadomasochistic relationship). Seeing how Léopold inspired Véra to happily mutilate his/her own genitals, only to be dumped in the end, Franz does commit suicide because, after all, as he states himself, “Maybe I’ll go to heaven, since I’m so young.” Undoubtedly, a lifetime with Léopold cannot be good for one’s soul, but as the psychopath tells his slaves, “you need me” and as masochists, they certainly do.

Master or slave, there is not a single likeable or respectable character featured in Water Drops on Burning Rocks, especially in regard to the slaves, who welcome their positively perverse and pernicious persecution, but such is the Fassbinderian realm as demonstrated in countless cinematic works by the German auteur, including Martha (1974) and Fox and His Friends (1975), but also in François Ozon’s relatively faithful, if not flagrantly Francofied, adaptation of the great German auteur filmmaker’s innately incriminating first play. It seems that François Ozon took Fassbinder’s quote regarding a major theme in his film Fox and His Friends, “I am more convinced than ever the love is the best, most insidious, most effective instrument of social repression,” to such an extreme that it borders on the point of parody in Water Drops on Burning Rocks, a virtual fan-boy fag flick of the both Fassbinder-esque and Sirkian fashion. Additionally, to the film’s aesthetic detriment, Ozon attempted to recreate yet slightly sterilely modernize the mostly outmoded, 1970s-like set designs and wardrobes featured in various classic Fassbinder flicks as if to be ironic to the point of aggressively agitating audiences members with Water Drops on Burning Rocks, an excessive exercise in pomo platitudes. Indeed, while Water Drops on Burning Rocks is probably only second to the ‘drag king’ Fassbinder biopic A Man Like Eva (1984) aka Ein Mann wie EVA starring Eva Mattes in terms of depicting the German filmmaker’s misanthropic melodramatic essence and complete and utter contempt for the kraut bourgeois, it can hardly be described as a good film, let alone a great one as some people seem to think. Of course, only Fassbinder can do Fassbinder and anything else is going to be, at best, second rate and, at the very least, marginally superficial. Featuring a poof of a protagonist who commits suicide after intentionally overdosing on drugs in a manner not unlike how Fassbinder himself died, Water Drops on Burning Rocks is a curiously culturally mongrelized self-love letter from one poof filmmaker to another, but a kraut cocksucker is always more masculine than a heterosexual frog, hence why the German auteur filmmaker’s works are all the more powerful and visceral than hysterical homo Ozon, a half-mensch whose superficially saucy Franco-camp works I could never quite stomach. A gut-churning Ménage à Quatre plagued by aesthetic puffery and mundane melodrama of the would-be-wild-and-wanton sort with comedic undertones that could only make those who sniff antiquated wine laugh, Water Drops on Burning Rocks is the artistically disastrous poofed out product of a French flamer princess attempting to be a debauched Bavarian king.

BELLE

François Truffaut (1972)

If there is one theme that seems to tie together all the works of the great Belgian master auteur André Delvaux (The Man Who Had His Hair Cut Short, Rendez-vous à Bray), it is that virtually all of the male protagonists of his films are weak intellectuals of the mentally feeble, sexually underwhelmed, pathologically passive and/or cuckolded sort. While I think Delvaux is indubitably one of the greatest and most underrated post-WWII auteur filmmakers as a man whose lesser works are even still at least minor masterpieces, I have to admit that I oftentimes get the urge to slap the shit out of the prosaic pansy ass protagonists of his films, especially the mustached Walloon wuss lead of the director's fourth feature Belle (1973) who epitomizes virtually everything that is insufferable about intellectuals and academics. Indeed, the film might feature the most radically repugnant of all Delvaux's male protagonists, as the character is a passively incestuous cuckolded coward and hopelessly banal beta-bitch whose much shorter coworker openly flirts with his wife in front of him and who has deep and undying erotic feelings for his debutante daughter. A pedantic romantic at heart of the failed poet sort that works as a literary professor and archivist who gives talks on outmoded 16th-century poets that only he seems to understand, the protagonist ultimately has an unexpected yet rather timely reawakening of the heart and soul upon randomly finding an eponymous feral-like foreign blonde babe roaming around the High Fens moors in East Belgian on the German border. Of course, as one can expect from a Delvaux flick, one never knows whether or not Belle is a fetishistic figment of the protagonist's imagination or a living and breathing real-life forest femme fatale. Clearly inspired by reading too much ancient frog poetry and perpetually worsening midlife crisis, the poindexter protagonist eventually becomes insanely jealous and obsessed with murdering his wood nymph mistress' longhaired injun-like (boy)friend. A work that Delvaux described as being heavily inspired by Gérard de Nerval—one of the most essentially Romantic, albeit suicidal, of French poets who was once described by frog decadent poet Charles Baudelaire as having “delivered his soul in the darkest street that he could find”—Belle is the seamlessly oneiric tale of a middle-aged intellectual fool's one last desperate attempt at chasing romance, passion, and life itself. Delvaux's only film not adapted from a contemporary novel but based on an original script, the film successfully achieved the director's self-described goal by creating a cinematic narrative that features an, “...alternation of reality and dream, one flowing into the other with no end.” Indeed, by the end of the film, it is impossible for the viewer to separate fact from but fantasy, but it is ultimately irrelevant as the protagonist's patently perturbed and pornographically romantic psyche is what Belle is really about, as a work that poetically depicts the pathetic and deleterious extremes that most men, even those of the highly intelligent, seemingly level-headed, and relatively successful sort, will go for premium pussy of the ostensibly 'mysterious' sort. A work about a classicist who resents receiving the intellectually revolting gift of structuralist twaddle by the likes of Gérard Genette and Roland Barthes from his much hated future son-in-law, Delvaux's film also creates a dichotomy between classic and modernist Occidental culture as a work that features immaculately woven hodgepodge of aesthetic influences ranging from Pieter Bruegel the Elder and Caspar David Friedrich to Paul Delvaux and René Magritte. Undoubtedly, if Delvaux was a master at something that few, if any, other filmmakers were capable, it was homogenizing the aesthetically ancient with hopelessly contemporary as Belle quite exquisitely demonstrates, though I have to assume the filmmaker had more respect and appreciation for the former as a man with an old soul who could not help but feel the taint of modernity.

At the beginning of Belle, less than happily married middle-aged protagonist Mathieu Grégoire (Swiss actor Jean-Luc Bideau of Alain Tanner's Jonah Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000 (1976) and François Girard's The Red Violin (1998) aka Le violon rouge) receives a warm reception after giving a speech about Polish-French poet Guillaume Apollinaire where he describes how Dostoyevsky came to the Spa in Liège in Wallonia with the intention of gambling instead of writing. After the speech, some elderly old fart asks Mathieu when he plans to publish his work and the protagonist has to remind the seemingly mentally feeble fellow that it was not written by him but Apollinaire. While it is obvious that Mathieu would prefer being a real poet of distinction instead of reading and writing on the works of others, it is nearly impossible to make a living writing poetry in Belgium, or as a minor character insightfully states later in the film, "In Belgium, you can only publish poetry at your own expense or in magazines." Instead, Mathieu is a literary professor turned museum archivist who spends a good portion of his time working with an annoying and ambiguously gay turd of a borderline midget co-worker named Victor (Roger Coggio) who incessantly flirts with the protagonist's wife Jeanne (Danièle Delorme) right in front of his face. Of course, since Mathieu is more sexually attracted to his adult daughter Marie (Stéphane Excoffier of Jos Stelling's De wisselwachter (1986) aka The Pointsman) than his wife, he does not seem to mind too much. Probably due to his unsavory sexual attraction to her, Mathieu finds it nearly impossible to communicate with his daughter Marie in a civil fashion and instead mocks her for looking supposedly 'common' because she wears brown stockings instead of white ones. Although Mathieu is naturally unable to act on his sexual desire for his daughter, he will soon meet a strange foreign woman in the moors of High Fens located in the most uninhabited area of his province of Liège that will give him a much needed outlet for his incestuous urges.

At the beginning of the film after giving his Apollinaire reading, Mathieu goes outside the building where he gave the lecture and stares at his prized white

BELLE

Volvo while in a seemingly possessed state. Just because he feels like “driving around,” Mathieu heads to High Fens and almost crashes his car after an animal unexpectedly jumps out in front of his car. Upon investigating, Mathieu finds large drops of blood on the ground but cannot find the animal, so he decides to travel back to the very same location the next day where he hears an animal whimpering. Eventually, Mathieu spots a wounded German Shepherd that leads him to a ruined old cabin where he is quite startled to see a beautiful young foreign woman named Belle (Romanian actress Adriana Bogdan, who also appeared in Delvaux’s second feature Un soir, un train (1968) aka One Night... A Train) who does not speak French. Mathieu attempts to chase Belle and inform her that her dog needs to be put down, but before he can do it the delectable little dame kills the canine with a shotgun, immediately tosses the weapon in a bush as if she is repulsed with herself, and then begins sobbing hysterically. Assumedly inspired by his encounter with Belle, Mathieu goes home and, although neglecting to tell them of his strange encounter with the lady in the forest, proudly informs his wife and coworker Victor that his next big reading will be on French poetess Louise Labé, passionately stating, “The Beautiful Rope Maker...lover of ice and fire...Sixteenth-century sonnets. ‘I live, I die, I burn and I drown.’” When Victor expresses his concern that Labé may be too obscure for most people, the protagonist stoically, if not somewhat nonsensically, replies, “Physical love is their bread and butter.” That night after accusing his wife of carrying on an affair with Victor, Mathieu has an ominously orgasmic dream where he takes his naked daughter to a train station and shamelessly makes out with her in front of some stranger onlookers. During the dream, Mathieu also tells his daughter how Belle “lost her dog,” thus establishing a link between the protagonist’s progeny and the wild woman in the woods. Indeed, Mathieu may have created Belle in his own mind as an outlet for his seemingly unquenchable incestuous libido.

Of course, Mathieu soon goes back to the moors and is disheartened to find Belle in a bedridden state in the attic of the terribly dilapidated cabin, but he wisely uses the opportunity to show the strange beauty his affection for her by nursing her back to health and she ultimately repays him with some passionate carnal action. Mathieu also loves Belle’s company because, as he states, “I can tell you everything because you understand nothing and say nothing.” As a lovely looking lady the more or less lets him do what he wants with her, never complains, and listens to whatever he has to say, Belle is a figurative (and potentially literal) dream-girl, but of course, like all women, she eventually expects something from the protagonist. While Mathieu’s sex life seems to have improved seemingly infinitely since starting his fairytale-like affair with Belle (at the beginning of the film, Mathieu’s wife looks bored to death while he performs cunnilingus on her), his home life takes a turn for the worst after the protagonist learns that his beloved daughter is engaged to be married to a yuppie-like four-eyed dork of the physically frail and obscenely gawky sort. Of course, Mathieu is also beyond displeased when he returns to Belle and find a young American-Indian-like fellow covered in animals furs that is simply known as the 'stranger' (Valerio Popesco) in her company. It does not take long before Mathieu begins getting murderously jealous of the stranger and when the Indian-like wildman borrows his Volvo without asking and subsequently brings him back the a bottle of wine as a "present," the protagonist smashes said bottle of wine against the wall and calls the fellow a "base creature." As a result of the stranger 'borrowing' his car, Mathieu is late for his reading on Louise Labé and perplexes his friends and family when he does the speech while his shoes and pants are obviously covered in dry mud. To make matters worse, young college students begin heckling Mathieu while he is giving his reading, but that does not stop him from stating regarding Labé in an impassioned and almost pornographic fashion, "New without love' could have been her motto...But also 'never without pain.' Because in the 16th-century there are few more moving words: I live, I die, I burn and drown. I quake with cold and perish with heat. My life so hard and yet so sweet. At once I shrivel and I." Naturally, the reading concludes abruptly when Mathieu thinks he sees the stranger in the audience and becomes both angered and startled and thus loses his track of thought, so Victor interrupts and starts taking questions from audience members that results in a college student mocking the protagonist for "speaking on a subject that doesn't interest us." Of course after making a fool of himself, Mathieu decides to chase down the stranger and does not waste any time attacking him and knocking him down a set of stairs in front of a hundred or so people. Unfortunately for Mathieu, the man he attacks is not the stranger but a fellow from an area called Robertville with a similar fur coat and haircut who decides to press charges against the protagonist. Ultimately, Mathieu later opts to get involved in something a little more criminally oriented than a public brawl. Indeed, regularly banging a backwoods blonde bombshell has given Mathieu a serious sense of testicular fortitude that he has probably never felt before in his entire life.

After the nightmarish aborted reading from hell, Mathieu's future son-in-law gives him books by Genette and Barthes, but the protagonist hilariously scares him away by looking at him with sheer and utter contempt as if he is the world's most slimiest asshole. Undoubtedly, Mathieu seems resentful towards the young man not only because he plans to marry his beloved daughter and take her permanently away from him, but also due to his dubious literary tastes. To prove to Mathieu that he is not a queer, Victor takes the protagonist to his home to show him what he describes as his "collection." Somewhat strangely, the "collection" that Victor speaks of his a bunch of different brushes he has locked away, with the character creepily stating while fondling a black brush in a fetishistic fashion, "Coarse, dark hair. For the hollow in the hips and the curve of the buttocks." Ultimately, Mathieu, who is into real sex and not frivolous fetishistic bullshit of the sexually dysfunctional sort, becomes so exceedingly enraged by Victor's considerably curious behavior that he smashes every single mirror in his coworker's room, thus putting their already dubious friendship in jeopardy. When Mathieu finally gets the gall to kill the stranger and heads to the moors with a shotgun, Belle does the job just before he gets the chance just like she did with the German Shepherd before. After killing the stranger, Belle yells "VOLVO" and the two proceed to load the corpse into the car and drive it to a pond where they dispose of it. Later that night, Mathieu warmly embraces his wife, tells her that he loves her more than ever before, and then strangely states, "Life is passing me by. It has no purpose."

Needless to say, Mathieu is equally saddened and angered after seeing his daughter off at a train station after she is married, especially since she demands money from him and does not even say a proper goodbye. When Mathieu goes to see Belle later that day, she also demands money as well, thus establishing a clear link not only just between the protagonist's daughter and the potentially imaginary chick from the woods, but also the female species as a whole. When Mathieu's boss Marcel asks him to drive to Robertville to answer some question in regards to the young man he attacked after his botched Labé reading while two police detectives curiously follow them in a separate car, the protagonist fears the worst and meekly confesses to killing the stranger. When Mathieu shows the police detectives the pond where he sunk the stranger's corpse, he is delighted to discover that the only carcass they find is that of the German Shepherd. Of course, Mathieu goes looking for Belle again and in the process someone steals money out of his car glove compartment that he planned to use to start a new life with his mistress, thus leading the protagonist to conclude that he was setup by his ladylover and the stranger right from the beginning. After all, Belle strangely insisted on shooting the stranger and his corpse was not recovered from the pond, thus indicating that he might actually still be alive and only faked death. That night while lying in bed, Mathieu obsessively states to himself, "She couldn't do it. She didn't trick me. She killed him for me, together with me. We carried him together. Drowned him together. In one of the pools at Pont Noir. A pool at Pont Noir." To confirm whether or not Belle betrayed him, Mathieu goes looking for the stranger's corpse again on a snowy day and is quite delighted to see the fellow's hand and fur coat under the ice in the pond. As Mathieu states in a delusional fashion with a half-crazed smirk on his face while staring at the stranger's hand under the ice, "She really did it for me. It's all true. She didn't deceive me. As long as she comes back." Of course, it is not only rather dubious as to whether Belle will come back, but also if she ever even really existed in the first place.

Undoubtedly, after watching Belle, I could not help but obsess over how so superlatively stupid some men, especially those on the brink of a midlife crisis, act when it comes to the fairer sex. Of course, the fact that Delvaux's film features surreal fantasy elements only highlights the absurdity of the fact that a stuffy middle-aged dork who is about as charming and handsome as a high school principal actually thinks that an exotic young blonde beauty would have ever genuinely fall in love with him and is not just using him for her own ends. Naturally, the film also underscores the seeming worthlessness of poetry and all the culture and education in the world when confronted with both visceral lust and pure love, as the protagonist is willing to throw away everything that he has ever worked for in his entire life for some hot chick that he just met in the woods who does not even speak the same language. Indeed, protagonist Mathieu is one of the most intelligent and respected men in his small province, yet his actions completely defy the most fundamental aspects of common sense, thus reflecting the Achilles heel of the male gender that so many members of the so-called fairer sex have counted on exploiting since the very beginning of time. Certainly there are few things more cold, calculating, and craven than beautiful (and oftentimes not-so-beautiful) women, as western woman owes her special status in the world not through being persecuted by a largely imaginary patriarchy, but by learning from virtual birth how to manipulate men to their life's advantage. While western society tells us that women are looking for love, it is really men who suffer from the weakness of being hopeless romantics who are oftentimes so blinded by the prospective of love that they will not even notice they are about to fall off a figurative cliff that is only a couple feet away from them. Although he may have been a tad bit biased since he was supposedly a 'sexual invert' (aka fag), Viennese philosopher Otto Weininger was certainly on to something when he recommended that men should have as little to do with women as possible, but then again, it is hard to refrain from one of the most imperative ingredients that make life worth living, not to mention the fact it has resulted in many creative works of art like Delvaux's Belle. To go back to Weininger, he once wrote, "The deepest, the intelligible, part of the nature of man is that part which does not take refuge in causality, but which chooses in freedom the good or the bad," which certainly can be said of the protagonist of Delvaux's film. Indeed, for better or worse, the lead character of Belle finally becomes a real man at middle-age, which certainly cannot be said of a good number of western males nowadays.

IT'S A WONDERFUL LIFE

Frank Capra (1946)

It's a Wonderful Life is a Hollywood classic that actually deserves to be watched by every American family during the Holiday season each year. As much as I feel that most Hollywood "classics" are usually overrated and contrived studio products, It's a Wonderful Life deserves the special recognition it has. As much as James Stewart has always annoyed me to an extent, his performance in It's a Wonderful Life is one of his greatest (if not his best). It's a Wonderful Life is also an essential film to watch this Christmas with the economic crisis that has been plaguing this country and has already resulted in suicides. Henry F. Potter is the kind of villain that most Americans can feel good about hating this time of the year. Recently, a real life Potter was exposed by the name of Bernard L. Madoff. Madoff, a Zionist "philanthropist," is easily as despicable as the banker fiend Potter. Just as Christmas never truly leaves us every year, neither do the coldhearted swindlers. One can also expect Madoff to get off fairly leniently just as Henry F. Potter. Sadly, the George Bailey's of the world seem to become less and less. It's a Wonderful Life debuted in theaters in 1946 and a lot has changed since then. America had just won its hand in the second World War and things looked good. However, the "small man" still had a hand with the banks and his community. Bankers like Henry F. Potter did not have the majority of people completely financially tied down as virtual serfs. The world of "Potterville" is one of degenerate Jazz, loose women, and disgruntled souls as George Bailey finds out. Drive around most American towns or cities nowadays and you will see that degeneracy has become the norm. It's a Wonderful Life director Frank Capra was not lying with his portrayal of how bankers like communities and people to be when under their miser wrath of usury. It's a Wonderful Life is a film that needs to be seen in its original black and white format. Aside from the color version horribly done, the black and white format better compliments the film's depiction of an American past. The majority of America has now been enslaved by having to say "Happy Holiday" instead of the classic "Merry Christmas." Christmas has become just another capitalist Holiday that people like Bernard L. Madoff exploit for financial gain. Thankfully, It's a Wonderful Life is still a celebrated film that gives the audiences a celebration of more "hopeful" times.

THE MIST

Frank Darabont (2007)

Who would have ever thought, one of the greater monster films of the generation would be based off of a Stephen King story? Many of his adaptations to the screen can be deemed as utter trash, save 1408, Maximum Overdrive, and Graveyard Shift. Frank Darabont (The director of The Shawshank Redemption and The Green Mile) makes another great King adaptation. Maybe he should be the permanent Stephen King adapter. The one aspect that can shine light on this film amongst the many monster films that have arrived is the realist concept for it. Horror fans, and religious nuts trapped in a supermarket, realize that the thick mist that has blanketed the town has a more menacing creature(s) living in it. One religious nut goes as far to denounce every god except the god of the Israelites. Many wicked beasts being called an Old Testament god might be a little too nutty for my taste. Thomas Jane was a bit disappointing in his role as The Punisher, so I never got a proper first impression from the man. Thomas Jane is now cinema's Henry Rollins. The film spouts all excellent performances. I don't think there is a single sore thumb amongst the cast. Despite the cast, the cinematography is amazing and there isn't much of a soundtrack to be found. Again, this only compliments the realist factor. The creatures seem Harryhausen inspired, and feature many era inspirations. Despite it being CGI, they manage to look faithful to the film and not seeming to be of a different layer. I haven't seen such a great monster design since the "epic three"; The Host, Cloverfield, and Deep Rising. I promise Lovecraft inspired creatures that bring tears to your eyes with their own majestic beauty. I haven't been so inspired since Jurassic Park. The story seems to be largely inspired by Dean Koontz's novel Phantom. I wouldn't ask for a better inspiration. The book manages to play on claustrophobia, the unknown, and the feeling of being completely alone better than any novel or film. The fear of lunacy and alienation echo for an eternity on screen. The characters keep in mind the basic survival techniques. When you think about it, the film/book seems to be inspired by another Koontz novel "The Servants of Twilight"; a novel about a religious group who believes a woman's child is the anti-Christ. It's hard to watch this film and not despise the core of humanity. When I watch these films, misanthropy flows through my veins and the nature of religion on society disgusts me. The Mist does its job at making religious nut jobs look more insane than they are given credit in the media "News Articles such as a woman who puts her baby in a microwave because God told her to". The film picks up strong and carries through, delivering the most ball busting ending ever filmed. The fact that the director had enough guts to make something that could get him black-listed later stands out to be a monumental achievement. Overall, The Mist is an incredible achievement in mainstream horror cinema. It manages to provide something original with a washed up genre.

BASKET CASE

Frank Henenlotter (1982)

Basket Case is a low-budget film about questionable brotherly love. Duane and his brother Belial were born Siamese twins so they were extra close as brothers. The brother's father was quite an insensitive man and wanted Belial cut off then thrown away like a cancer infected wart. Belial was probably not loved by his father because he looks like a large tumor with two arms and a few hideous facial features. Duane, on the other hand, is anatomically correct but lacks in the mental health department.

After killing a doctor that helped separate them, Duane carries Belial to degenerate New York City in a basket. The basket in the film is probably the only thing that doesn't look filthy so Belial keeps a fairly clean home. For some irrational reason, a young blonde hits on Duane very assertively and he can't help but to give in. Belial, on the other hand loses his cool and wrecks their apartment. The sounds that come from Belial sound similar to that of a homeless freestyle rapper raping a freshly groomed kitten on the lower eastside. The folly artist from Basket Case sure does deserve acknowledgment. A middle aged mulatto woman that looks like a prostitute (and probably is) also takes an interest in Duane. The two drink a few beers together and talk about family matters. Later, Belial tries to molest the woman and she goes into hysterics. I can only assume that those types of shrieks and screams are commonplace in degenerate cities where the animals roam wild. A killer tumor like Belial certainly fits in.

Basket Case features enough ridiculous gore and killing to keep perverted horror fans happy. Belial even kills and rapes Duane's blonde girlfriend. Although supposed to be dead, you can see the blonde actress clearly breathing in the film. Basket Case director Frank Henenlotter deserves to be commended for his keen eye. But I doubt this director has flaming bloody eyes as Belial when he's looking to rape a real live girl. In the end, jealousy ruins the Siamese twin brothers extra close relationship. Thankfully, a couple of cheap prostitutes get to enjoy a cool sight, courtesy of the brothers last gripping moments on earth.

Most trash films are just trash. That also includes all the trash films that are often noted as "good" trash. Basket Case is one of the few pieces of "good" trash. Although I don't know the directors true intentions, Basket Case is a wacked out film that will touch a nerve at some point for everyone. Whether it be Belial engaging in Negro panty sniffing or nude footage of Duane running down the street, this film delivers.

BRAIN DAMAGE

Frank Henenlotter (1988)

I am fairly convinced that the Drug Abuse Resistance Education (D.A.R.E.) program and anti-drug PSAs are designed to get kids interested in using and abusing drugs, as they are so preposterously patronizing and agitating to the juvenile mind that they could only inspire any self-respecting kid with a natural aversion to authority to want to smoke a joint, pop a benzo, snort an oxy, and/or huff some glue in protest against such patently pathetic propaganda campaigns. On the other hand, ostensibly anti-drug flicks like Danny Boyle's Trainspotting (1996), Darren Aronofsky's Requiem for a Dream (2000), Jonas Åkerlund's Spun (2002) romanticize the addict lifestyle in a nauseatingly naïve way, as if such a non-existence is constantly exciting and full of magical wonder and intrigue, even when suffering from major withdraw as reflected in the unintentionally absurd dream-sequences in these rather retarded works, hence why so many diluted dope addicts love these dumb ass films, as it makes them suffer the delusional that they are part of some super secret arcane world that can only be adequately understood and appreciated by the truly initiated. Indeed, I certainly can only think of a handful of films that might dissuade someone from trying junk, like the decidedly dejecting and equally degenerate Finish doc Reindeerspotting: Escape from Santaland (2010) directed by Joonas Neuvonen (who, ironically, is currently surviving jail-time for drug trafficking), but probably the most bizarre and counter-intuitively effective anti-dope flick I know of is the nice and nasty little 'neo-exploitation' flick Brain Damage (1988) directed by self-described "exploitation" auteur Frank Henenlotter (Basket Case Trilogy, Frankenhooker). A sort of absurdist anti-drug allegory in a bawdy and ballsy 'body horror-comedy' package, Henenlotter's darkly comedic piece of highly conscious low-camp kitsch depicts the strangely hypnotic homicidal hilarity and excess-ridden eccentricity that ensues when a young and rather dumb dude begins a mutually dependent relationship with a parasitic phallic-like creature named 'Aylmer' that gives him a truly transcendental high via a direct injection of meta-narcotizing blue fluid into his brain in return for procuring the pathologically sassy micro-monster a steady supply of fresh human grey matter. Unquestionably the most wonderfully and wickedly warped take on the deleterious effects of dope on human brain chemistry since Slava Tsukerman's stylishly sleazy sci-fi cult classic Liquid Sky (1982), Brain Damage is easily the most fun can have while dealing with anti-drug themes, which might say much considering the banality of the topic, but then again the film's greatest appeal is that it is a Henenlotter flick, thus guaranteeing the sort of feverishly fucked filmic facetiousness that will only be appreciated by the truly initiated and/or criminally insane.

Brain Damage begins unpredictably enough with the introduction of two over-educated married old farts named Morris (Theo Barnes) and Martha Ackerman (Lucille Saint-Peter) that live a semi-hermit-like existence in a crummy NYC slum apartment that is strangely decorated with primitive tribal art and exotic warrior masks, thus hinting they might be cultural anthropologists and certainly xenophiles. For whatever reason, the old odd couple also have a dozen or so fresh brains sitting on their kitchen table as if they are being prepared to be fed to some sort of large bloodthirsty beast that eats ten times more than a large adult male. The brains are for something or someone named 'Aylmer' (voiced by old school horror host John Zacherle aka 'Zacherley') and when the mysterious creature disappears from the eccentric elderly couple's bathtub, Morris and Martha suffer a major histrionic freakout to the point where they rudely barge into the apartment of an uppity negress (Beverly Bonner, who played the scary black tenant in Basket Case) to check her bathtub for their missing little friend, which they fail to find. Ultimately, Aylmer makes his way to the apartment of handsome yet hapless protagonist Brian (soap opera actor Rick Hearst) while Morris and Martha are lying on their apartment floor and foaming at the mouth as if suffering from a seizure as a result of super hellish drug withdraw. Indeed, the Ackermans are elderly junkies and their choice of drug is the venomous blue juices of Aylmer, who is a repugnant yet strangely charming and eloquently spoken creature with goofy beady blue eyes that looks somewhere in between a dried up donkey turd and a burnt crisp STD-ridden black cock. Aylmer survives and thrives off of a steady diet of raw brains, but he is tired of animal grey matter, so he decided to escape from the Ackerman stronghold and he ultimately wisely chose dullard boy Brian—a proud yet seemingly unlikely fan of punk, thrash metal, and goth music as demonstrated by The Cramps, Slayer, and Bauhaus posters hanging on his wall—as his new host. After blowing off a date with his girlfriend Barbara (Jennifer Lowry) and brother Mike (Gordon MacDonald) due to feeling more than a little bit under the weather as a result of his body being invaded by a penis-like parasite, Brian goes back to sleep and later awakes to find a large blood stain on his pillow. After going back to asleep again, Brian awakes to a bright light in the form of an entrancing glowing eyeball on his ceiling, as well as a deluge of translucent blue fluid engulfing his entire room and eventually his body in what will ultimately give the protagonist a heavenly otherworldly high that he will never again be able to top, though he surely will try as he is now the servant of a hostile, albeit good-humored, entity that lives to kill.

After unwittingly getting high for the first time on the hardest and most natural 'psychedelic painkiller' in the world, Brian soon discovers grotesque foot-long creature Aylmer popping out of his body in a fashion that seems to mock Ridley Scott's Alien (1979). Ultimately, Aylmer makes a Faustian pact with Brian, calmly assuring him in a most devilish fashion like some sort of charlatan cult leader that, "This is the start of your new life Brian...a life without worry, pain, or loneliness... a life instead full with colors, music, and euphoria... a life of light and pleasure” and “I am you, Brian... I am all you’ll ever need.” Aylmer gets Brian high by directly injecting his brain with his blue juices via a needle-like tentacle he has located inside of his mouth. The blue juice gets Brian so high that Aylmer is able to suck the brains out of human victims while in his presence without him even remembering the brutal murders ever occurred. Indeed, Aylmer’s first victim is an authoritarian Nordic-like negro security guard at a junkyard and while Brian hallucinates seeing glowing kaleidoscopic totaled cars while high as a kite in outer space, Aylmer drains the brain of the spade victim. At first, Brian and Aylmer’s symbiotic relationship seems perfect, at least as far as they are concerned, but after the former discovers that he has a giant bloodstain on his underwear that is clearly not his own, he begins to realize something fishy is going on. Unbeknownst to Brian, he wandered into a punk club called “Hell” while he was high and met a big bosomed slut who tried to give him a blowjob after grabbing his cock and excitedly stating, “feels like you got a real monster in there,” but instead of receiving a meaty member in her mouth, the sensual slut fellated a ‘real monster’ that sucked her brains out. Eventually, old man Morris Ackerman catches up with Brian and tells him he is a total moron for feeding Aylmer human brains, as it has made the creature too strong and has enabled him to easily gain the upper hand over the protagonist. After Morris reveals during a hysterical rant that ‘Aylmer’ is an old English name for “the all inspiring famous one” and that he paid for the ancient creature with “money and blood,” Brian decides to confront his phallic-like pal and learns that he has indeed been the unwitting accomplice in a series of grisly murders. Eventually deciding like so many drug addicts that “I have to be in control,” Brian decides to take Aylmer to a seedy apartment where he will try in vain to control the cock monster and withdraw from dope, not realizing that his brain chemistry has changed drastically as a result of his recreational drug use. Needless to say, as Aylmer tells him he would, Brian begins begging the creature for his blue fluid after going through a truly haunting cold turkey withdrawal where he hallucinates seeing his ear fall off and buckets of blood pouring out of his head. Ultimately, Brian is forced to procure victims for Aylmer before the creature will agree to soothe his raging withdrawal symptoms. While Brian finds Aylmer a nice big buff naked guide (as perfectly personified by Joseph Gonzalez, who later played the meathead pimp in Henenlotter’s 1990 feature Frankenhooker) in a humorously awkward homoerotic scene where the viewer almost expects the protagonist to be brutally anally pillaged, the turd-like brain-eater opts to eat a defecating high yellow negro horror fan who was minding his own business while reading a horror magazine while on the crapper.

While Brian was busy getting high and acting as a slavish accomplice to various murders, his brother Mike was ‘comforting’ his girlfriend Barbara by catering to her insecurities and vulnerabilities while putting up the false front of being a 'nice guy' who has selflessly come to the aid of a lovelorn lady in need. Indeed, after Brian decides to go back to his apartment, he overhears his brother boning Barbara, but he is far too high and disoriented to give a damn. After hallucinating that he has black rectum-like orifices on his stomach and he has eaten Barbara's brains during an imaginary borderline incestuous quasi-threesome with her and Mike, Brian catches his brother and girlfriend naked in bed together, but instead of getting mad he altruistically attempts to warn them to stay away from him so that he does not accidentally kill them during one of his deadly dope-addled stupors. Not listening to reason, Barbara, who does not seem the least bit guilty about the fact that she has just cheated on her boyfriend with his brother, follows Brian to a subway in the hope that she will be able to salvage their broken relationship. In a sadistically farcical scene of bittersweet anti-romance, Brian kills his girlfriend after she states, "I don't want to lose you" and gives him a kiss that naturally result in her brains and inwards being drained out. Although Brian does not seem to be too upset over the fact that he has just played an unconscious role in murdering his beloved girlfriend via literal brain drain, he is gracious enough to lie her corpse down on a couple subway seats in an exceedingly delicate fashion as if he is putting a sleeping baby in it's crib. When Brian gets back to his apartment building, old man Morris confronts him with a German luger while his wife Martha wife pulls Aylmer off of the protagonist's back. Of course, Aylmer soon drains the brains of the two elderly old farts, though, unbeknownst to the penis-like parasite, Morris does not die. While Aylmer is attaching to Brian's brain to reward him for all the delectable cerebral cuisines that he procured him that night, Morris randomly emerges and pulls the parasite off of the protagonist's brain just before it properly injects it's host's grey matter with the blue fluid. After Morris ends up strangling Aylmer to death in a fit of rage before succumbing from his brain injuries, Brian begins suffering a serious reaction as a result of his botched high that results in his head mutating in a warped fashion and blue juice squirting from his mouth and nostrils. Like many disillusioned drug addicts who have thrown in the towel on life and given up on their fight against addiction, Brian decides to commit suicide by blowing his brains out with Morris' luger, but instead of dying, a heavenly light begins beaming from the area of his head that he had blown off in a shockingly ambiguous transcendental ending that seems to be Henenlotter's own equivalent to the conclusion of Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968).

In its grotesquely exaggerated depiction of both the physical and metaphysical hell that is full-blown drug addiction, Brain Damage ultimately manages to contain more truths than any of the obscenely overrated pseudo-artsy (anti)drug dramas like Requiem for a Dream and The Basketball Diaries ever could. Indeed, anyone that watches Henenlotter's film and still finds themselves fantasizing about using drugs might as well quite while they're still ahead and take a lethal injection of junk, as there is surely no hope for them. I certainly cannot think of another film where the dope-addled protagonist is so far gone in his junk-addled somnambulist stupor that he mindlessly listens without even the most minute worry or hint of jealousy while his scheming brother passionately penetrates his girlfriend, among countless other similarly disturbing, albeit oftentimes humorous, examples. Of course, while Brain Damage features a preternaturally potent anti-drug subtext that it is certainly singular in terms of the mostly mindless (sub)genre(s) it belongs to, that does not mean the film is not pleasantly plagued with the sort of mirthfully unhinged moral retardation and superlative sleaziness that one expects for any genuinely worthwhile exploitation auteur. Unquestionably, it certainly takes a certain degree of uncompromising cultural cynicism mixed with rampant moral bankruptcy to sire a darkly comedic body horror parable about the particularly pernicious effects of narcotic addiction in a work that would surely be much appreciated by the more discerning pothead. For fans of Henenlotter's distinctly debasing oeuvre, Brain Damage is notable for feature a tongue-in-cheek cameo from Duane Bradley and his basket-bound mutant twin brother of Basket Case fame during a subway scene near the end of the film. Rather humorously, Duane gets creeped out by the discernibly deranged parasite-possessed protagonist and runs away with his basket. While I am not sure I would describe Brain Damage as director's crowning achievement as so many Henenlotter groupies seem to do, I do have to admit that it is unequivocally a masterful miscreation of a movie in relation to the particular dark, slimy, and scum-ridden cinematic ghetto that it belongs to. Indeed, what other movie features a lecherous lady of the night giving a sloppy deep-throat blowjob to a phallic-like brain-devouring parasite. If you ever get the urge to shoot junk or smoke rocks, just watch Brain Damage and remember the wisecracking cock-turd with teeth named Aylmer and you might be brought back to your senses, or at least cause you to crack a twisted smile that might make people think you're some sort of scheming pervert.

Although his almost accidentally 'avant-garde' black comedy horror flick Basket Case (1982) will always be my favorite film by probably the only true cinematic heir of classic 42nd Street Grindhouse exploitation flicks from the 1960s and 1970s, Frank Henenlotter (Brain Damage, Bad Biology) probably was most successful with his malformed marriage between bodacious 'body horror' and putrid postmodern slapstick and lunatic low-camp with his consciously and exceedingly exploitative and semitically eccentric anti-tribute to both James Whale's Frankenstein (1931) and Bride of Frankenstein (1935), Frankenhooker (1990). While Whale's films are cultivated works of high-camp Gothic eloquence, Henenlotter's Frankenhooker – a seedy and equally satirical work that manages to cinematically synthesize the cultural cynicism, misanthropic trashiness, and absurdist bodily dismemberment of Andy Milligan (The Body Beneath, Fleshpot on 42nd Street), the urban grittiness and social alienation of Abel Ferrara (Ms. 45, Fear City), and the Yiddish vaudevillian slapstick of the Marx Brothers (Duck Soup, A Night at the Opera) – is the sort of aberrant apocalyptic (albeit hardly serious) cinematic work of racial, moral, and cultural chaos that brings credence to American horror master H.P. Lovecraft's words regarding New York City: "The organic things -Italo-Semitico-Mongoloid- inhabiting that awful cesspool could not by any stretch of the imagination be call'd human. They were monstrous and nebulous adumbrations of the pithecanthropoid and amoebal; vaguely moulded from some stinking viscous slime of earth's corruption, and slithering and oozing in and on the filthy streets or in and out of windows and doorways in a fashion suggestive of nothing but infesting worms or deep-sea unnamabilities. They -or the degenerate gelatinous fermentation of which they were composed- seem'd to ooze, seep and trickle thro' the gaping cracks in the horrible houses... and I thought of some avenue of Cyclopean and unwholesome vats, crammed to the vomiting-point with gangrenous vileness, and about to burst and inundate the world in one leprous cataclysm of semi-fluid rottenness." Indeed, with its Hispanic bohunk pimps with multicultural army of female fleshpeddling crack whores, physically grotesque and morbidly obese Der Stürmer-esque caricatures of Jewish Johns and crackheads, race/gender-hustling 'special interest' groups entitled H.O.O.K.E.R. (Hold Onto Our Knowledge of Equal Rights), nefarious Negro pimps who tell people to 'Do the Right Thing' (undeniably an attack on Spike Lee's irrationality-inspiring 1989 film of the same name), near-elderly, crusty-cunt strippers, post-industrial urban decay and sickening 'street trash' (it is no coincidence that the star of Henenlotter's film made his debut in the 1987 horror/black comedy Street Trash), Unabomber paranoia and acute autism of the lead protagonist, and the most nasally nauseating accents in human history, the unwavering degeneracy and proletarian decadence of the NYC featured in Frankenhooker pales in terms of its all-around horrifying persuasion than the one Lovecraft wrote about during the early Twentieth Century. Needless to say, if there was any worse era for one to be resembled after being run over with a remote control tractor with the body parts of drug-addicted hookers and reanimated via crack by a quack doctor, it is the zany zeitgeist featured in Frankenhooker.

Having a beautiful, albeit big-boned, fiancée (former Penthouse Pet Patty Mullen in an absurd fat suit), neurotic novice mad scientist Jeffrey Frank (James Lorinz) has everything a nefarious nerd from New Jersey could ever dream of, so when his girlfriend is gutted and grinded up in a freak lawnmower accident, he gets right to work reassembling and reanimating her postmortem body in a maniacal manner that would put emotionally vacant psychopath Herbert West of Re-Animator (1985) to shame. A crackpot genius of refined taste, Jeffrey engages in trepanning via an electronic drill whenever he needs some intellectual inspiration to literally penetrate his brain. One night after a couple moments of insightful and orgasmic trepanning, jaded Jeff takes a trip to the more sleazy side of NYC's sidewalks to see if any of the voluptuous crack-addicted prostitutes will make for good limbs for his female Frankenstein bride project, but instead he discovers the wild wonders of crack rocks, which will prove to be the missing ingredient to put his finishing touches on his reanimating and electrifying elixir. Jeffrey makes the rather wise decision of buying the marvelous miracle drug in a slimy bathroom with Star of David graffiti drawn on doors of the bathroom stalls from a drug-dealing macho meathead of a pimp named Zorro (Joseph Gonzalez); a muscleman misogynist who makes all of his girls wear "Z" trademark emblem (which he also sports like a retarded rapper on a gold chain) on their arms, which were carved in. Jeffrey also makes a business arrangement of sorts with Zorro, in which he sets up a huge hotel 'party' for the next night with Zorro's entire crew of crack whores, so he has a large selection of body parts to pick from for his dead fiancée. Needless to say, being a nervous nerd, Jeffrey chickens out like a true cuckold during his big night with the girls, but one of the predatory prostitutes discovers the mini would-be-mad-scientist's stash of crack-laced reanimation potion, thus inspiring all the girls to smoke the rocks while ignoring their gentle John's warnings. By happenstance, Jeffrey manages to get all the bodies parts, albeit mismatched, but beautiful biological material nonetheless when the girls' bodies explode after smoking the demented doc's special blend. Jeffrey manages to bring his fiancée back to life, but little did he suspect that she would be a severely slutty and salacious 'Frankenhooker' (also played by Patty Mullen) whose sexual magnetism makes men explode in more ways than one. Apparently, Jeffrey did not take in consideration that all personalities of the dead hookers whose dismembered bodies he used for his Miss Modern Prometheus would be blended in with his lady loves, thus resulting in a severely schizo she-bitch held together with stitches who has sexual itches she must scratch, but not without a monetary and ultimately murderous return. When Zorro discovers his trademark “Z” logo on the undead prostitute’s arm, he begins to investigate, thus ending in a final showdown between Jeffrey and his beloved Frankenhoker and the Latin pimp.

Concluding with a castrating surprise ending that would make any fan of ‘body horror’ feel like a born-again eunuch, Frankenhoker is a curiously crude yet clever low-camp classic of black comedy horror in an easily digestible, if not deleterious, form that – in its sardonic treatment of societal ills – is the squalid celluloid equivalent of dismembered Sour Patch kids candy laced with Adderall with a pinch of passé punk aesthetic asininity. If one could argue that aberrant-garde auteur Frank Henenlotter has a distinctive talent as a filmmaker, its is taking the 42nd Street celluloid exploitation trash of yesteryear in making it more palatable to more discerning audiences by adding a biting bit of debasing irony, as well as pumping up the volume on aesthetic and thematic vulgarity, yet at the same time refraining from totally mindlessly wallowing filth for an intolerable period of time like his fiendish filmic forefathers did. If you ever dreamed of seeing Elvira as the flesh-peddling bimbo bride of Frankenstein, but with same sort of sassy and ‘sexy’ attitude that Ms. Peterson is known and loved for (albeit to a less refined but more topless degree), Frankenhoker is indubitably your next best bet as a bodacious and even morally belligerent work of black comedy body horror that makes the unhinged world of crack-addicted hookers and whores of the typical Zionist American politician’s wet dream for anti-Anglo American into a semite-unsafe iconoclastic nightmare where hookers literally bust balls and dismember bodies, especially of obese hook-nosed fellows, everywhere between their gated New Jersey homes in suburbia and the cultural chaos they help stir up in cesspools of NYC that, “by any stretch of the imagination be call’d human.”

BAD BIOLOGY

Finally, a twist on fated star-crossed lovers for the avant-punk film fan. As undoubtedly indebted to the likes of Tsukamoto and Cronenberg as other aspiring body-horror provisioner's, Bad Biology takes and bakes its own cake with genetic genital terrors that conform the word "mutant" is something normal by comparison to its own ill deeds. It's no wonder this film is directed by Frank Henenlotter (Basket Case, Brain Damage, and Frankenhooker.) Only a brief excursion into his cerebral workings could produce such a tasteless comedy birthed from slime and decadence. After witnessing dismal contenders for both horror/comedy and "vagina dentata" features, Bad Biology vacuum seals itself and all seven clits in a league of its own. Womanhood is tough business. Hormones arise early causing multiple orgasms at the dinner table. Totally lame and inconvenient, eh? Then there's that business with bearing mutant feti shortly after sex. Wait, what? Allow me to relay origins. Jennifer is a photographer vouching feminist ideals and was plagued with seven clitorises upon birth. The inner workings are fleshy piston-like tumors that seem crazy enough to be a wacky treat from Japan. Worst of all, they increase sexual metabolism to the point that she blabbers lines as "I need a dick like a junkie needs a fix." Then we meet Batz. He's in possession of a drug-addicted sentient monster cock. Knowing what you know now, Where else could this story take you other than a malformed version of pleasurable hell? Bad Biology is essentially a genetic conundrum of biological anomalies related to a grotesque tale that flows freely and insecurely, creating a strand of almost-pornographic images relative to the sick thoughts harvesting in everyones mind. Frank Henenlotter weaves an urban approach to body horror; a move never done before with such a pseudo-Cronenberg approach. By casting Jedi Mind Tricks and Wu-Tang affiliates, Henenlotter has sealed a fan with mAQ (shameless 3rd person approach.) Even the world of art isn't given immunity from the scornful and cynical eye of Bad Biology. Soon a caricature of feminist "expression" is created painstakingly only to be ritualistically lampooned on camera. In a photo shoot of rappers kissing women with vagina masks, all the sensible ones find the blurring of sexuality and art to be completely divided and the result to be crude pornography. The assertion is true and the teaser for the upcoming The Ugly Truth displays just as much "oppression" on the female kind as this graphic display of gender bending does but less contrived. Only Jennifer could see what she called art. When revealed to her representative, his reply more or less bordered the equal result of calling her retarded - "Vagina faces. Are you serious?" If there ever was a rainstorm in a day of feminist art, this would be the Hurricane Katrina. As it is, Bad Biology is an uncommonly crafted vision of sexuality transgressed normal comprehension - or whatever normal really is. For the benefit of us, the viewers, the effect is cleverly realized with concise pleasure traps and gadgets. An anti-communal picture, Bad Biology might scare away a crowd with rapid, audacious glimpses of a mutant species of humanity; one natural and the other unnatural. For females, I can see where it would be easy to be offended. With all the infant abandonment and ridicule braved by the slutty Jennifer, I'd be pretty down on spirits too. The reaction on the male spectrum had me rooting Batz to "whip it out" every few seconds and rape a certain whorish teenage girl talking about how much she craves cock. Sorry to say but watching a feminist trash a baby scene after scene identifies the very concern of politically incorrect anecdotes [loosely.] Then again, there is that art student who painted with abortions (or something.) This experiment is what the second half of Hollow Man aspired to be - sexually speaking of course. This one comes highly recommended. Could pass as a contemporary John Waters directed Science fiction epic.

SCOUNDRELS

Frank Oz (1988)

Undoubtedly, Ron Jeremy is an archetype for discernibly decadent and superlatively sleazy porn star swine, with virtually his entire reputation riding on the fact that he is a fat swarthy slob who gets to fuck quasi-hot chicks, which is something of a dream that the majority of American males dream as lard asses themselves. Of course, while always a repugnant pig with a less than handsome appearance, Jeremy was not always a chunky turd who resembled a sort of slimy and scuzzy Super Mario, with his against-type role as a bourgeois psychiatrist in the cult blue movie Scoundrels (1982) directed by 'great' auteur-pornographer Cecil Howard (Snake Eyes, The Last X-rated Movie) and written by the director's longtime collaborator Anne Wolff (Foxtrot, Firestorm). Carefully crafted by the man responsible for the phantasmagoric surrealist porn masterpiece Neon Nights (1981), Scoundrels is certainly a cream of the cum crop work in terms of both a porn work and a Cecil Howard flick as a dark yet sardonic botched celluloid wet dream marinated in internal misery, middle class misanthropy, and hatred, albeit executed in a rather humorous, if not unintentionally, fashion that laughs in the face of intricate extramarital affairs and ruined upper-middle class lives. A playfully perverse psychosexual psychodrama that seems like it was specially tailored for the most wayward of quack psychoanalysts, Scoundrels tells the semi-surreal tale of psychiatrist who finds himself dually cuckolded by both his wife, who is carrying on an affair with his best friend, and his degenerate daughter, who is screwing said best friend's nephew and has just started a curious career as a high-class call girl. The very first film to win both 'Best Film' and 'Best Director' at the very first AVN Awards in 1984, Scoundrels is best appreciated today as a whacked-out pseudo-artistic cult film with both intentional and unintentional frolicsome humor and a strikingly mean-spirited ending that is bound to ruin any porn addict's orgasm. Indeed, featuring Ron Jeremy being fingered in the kosher cornhole by a high-class call girl and Robert 'Cannibal Holocaust' Kerman defiling an underage gal that reminds him of his daughter, Scoundrels is an unhinged Freudian nightmare starring a cast of sicko Semites that seem like archetypical perverted Hebrews taken out of National Socialist propagandist Julius Streicher's naughty Nazi tabloid Der Stürmer.

Beginning with a surreal dream-sequence of psychotherapist Simon (Ron Jeremy) wearing white pancake makeup as a French mime who stares blankly next to his equally mannequin-like wife Linda (Lisa Be) and daughter Francie (Tigr), Scoundrels immediately establishes a feeling of foreboding unease in the viewer. Indeed, Simon is a successful doctor with a prosperous family that lives in relative comfort, but he is also on the verge of suffering a midlife crisis, which is only further compounded by the fact that he believes his old lady Linda is carrying on a lurid love affair with his best friend Harper (George Payne), not to mention the fact that his little girl Francie has become a little whore who, while pretending to study for exams, is having bisexual orgies with her equally debauched friends Cheryl (Marilyn Gee aka Marissa Constantine) and Jack (Sean Elliot). On top of that, Jack is Harper's nephew and like his equally swarthy uncle, he is also carrying on an affair with Simon's wanton wife Linda. While rather disconcerted and depressed about the fact that his wife is probably cheating on him, Simon is carrying on an affair with his secretary Vivian (Copper Penny), but Harper also manages to get in her panties as well after the psychiatrist become increasingly impotent and withdrawn. Of course, the most degenerate sexual deviants of Scoundrels are Simon's patients, especially a sleazy photographer named Mr. Wallace (Robert Kerman aka 'R. Bolla') who managed to deflower an underage teen bimbo named Emerald (Tiffany Clark) during a less than fruitful photo shoot. While proclaiming how he feels guilty about popping the cherry of a teen that was "so innocent," Wallace reveals the true nature of his mind when he confesses to Simon, "Geez Doc, I feel awfully guilty," yet proceeds to laugh in a sinister fashion that puts to shame the eponymous race defiler of Veit Harlan's infamous National Socialist melodrama Jew Süss (1940). Undoubtedly, Simon's most depraved patient is a bisexual bitch named Mrs. Katz (Anna Turner), who attempts to seek revenge against her unloving businessman hubby (Ron Hudd) by seducing his secretary Mary Lou (Sharon Mitchell). To get his obsessive-compulsive mind over the fact that his best friend is screwing virtually every single important woman in his life, Simon routinely visits a convenience store to buy cigarettes from the hot store clerk 'Rainbow' (Ariel) and frequents a health club with a built-in whorehouse where he patrons a less than pretty prostitute named 'Kitten' (Tammy Lamb). Meanwhile, daughter Francie becomes a prostitute at the same bordello that her father frequents and sexually services a marine in the service named Frank (David Ambrose) who, after having his man-cherry popped, declares to his bought-lover, "I'd like my $50 dollars back now. It's just not right! I'd like to marry you. I don't want anyone else touching you." Presumably the result of his progressive emasculation, Simon rather enjoys it when Kitten penetrates his rectum with her rubber-glove-adorned fingers. In the end, Simon seems to have the last laugh when he throws a pie in the face of a prying cop, but fate ultimately has the last laugh as the psychiatrist and his new teen lover Rainbow, who was hiding in the backseat of the car when the police officer pulled him over, get in a disastrous car wreck, with the viewer never knowing whether the doctor and/or teen dream were found DOA. Either way, Scoundrels is certainly a porn flick that concludes with an explosive climax.

Personally, I cannot fathom how or why a porn flick like Scoundrels ever got made because, aside from not featuring a single character that rises above the level of being average-looking (indeed, most of the 'performers' are downright homely, if not repulsive), Scoundrels features an innately nihilistic storyline with an innately unhappy ending that must have let down a large amount of lumpenproles who were expecting a movie they could jerk off too while seeing it in theaters when it was first released in the early-1980s. Indeed, many of the performers featured in the film were no less degenerate in real-life, as lady-lickers Sharon Mitchell and Tigr's heroin-fueled lesbian relationship would later be depicted in all of its unlovely glory in the documentary Kamikaze Hearts (1986). As one reviewer noted regarding the film, Scoundrels has Bergman-esque pretensions in its downright strange attempt to mix sullen melodrama with what is ultimately anti-erotic pornography. Of course, Scoundrels stands out more nowadays due to its aesthetic and thematic idiosyncrasy as opposed to its ostensible arthouse cred. Not surprisingly, it seems that star Ron Jeremy had no clue about what sort of blue movie he starred in as he would compare Scoundrel director Cecil Howard to Hollywood hack James Cameron (Titanic, Avatar) in a somewhat recent interview with hotmovies.com, as if being compared to a soulless non-auteur who makes bombastic blockbusters is a good thing. Of course, Jeremy did know enough to realize that Howard was more than just your average talentless pornographer, stating of Scoundrels, "It's great. Abstract, esoteric, avant-garde. Scoundrels is really a very, very classy, well-made movie. Everything Cecil Howard ever did was classy." Indeed, I never thought I would ever torture myself by watching a film featuring Jeremy, but when I discovered Scoundrels, I would not allow my innate revulsion for the porn star to stop me from watching what is indubitably one of the greatest and most singular, if not unintentionally eccentric and exceedingly anti-erotic, porn flicks ever made. For anyone that ever wondered what Woody Allen's life might have been like had he been a quasi-heterosexual psychiatrist as opposed to a patently perverted Bergman-wannabe with a flare for Judaic comedy, check out Scoundrels and wallow in the wild and crazy bourgeois life of a cuckolded Hebraic head-shrink.

DAVID AND LISA

Frank Perry (1962)

David and Lisa is a touching film about two mentally ill individuals that connect in a mental institution. Although intellectually brilliant, David Clemens suffers from a very severe and debilitating version of obsessive compulsive disorder. He can't stand being touched and has an obsession with trying to control time as he believes time will kill him. David meets his love interest Lisa Brandt upon his entry into the "mental treatment center." Lisa is even worse off than David as she suffers from a split personality disorder and can only speak in rhymes. One could say that David and Lisa is one of the most unconventional love stories ever made. The main psychiatrist of the mental treatment center is Dr. Swinford, a very patient and understanding man who wants to break David's social fears. He listens to everything David says which fairly often annoys David. David is a very irrationally defensive yet highly intelligent individual. Although intelligent, David lacks the common sense to see the errors of his ways. Dr. Swinford, through various calm methods, starts to enlighten David about his troubles through various calm methods. For Lisa, fixing her mental illnesses seems next to impossible. David decides it's up to him to figure out her "case" as it interests him. David has a reoccurring dream in which he cuts off people's heads with the hand of a giant clock that he controls. It is up to David to destroy people in time so that they don't destroy him. To David, time is the uncontrollable destroyer and he's trying to figure out how to stop it. He despises all watches and is highly irritated by Dr. Swinford's broken wall clock. To David's surprise, time begins to solve the things that interfered with his life before. Lisa also happens to be a person that he gradually opens up to. David and Lisa is a film that was released in the United States in 1962. I found the film to be very unordinary and serious for it's time. The film certainly makes One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest seem a little silly. David and Lisa was released over a decade before One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, yet takes a look at mental illness in a much more serious and dare I say realistic manner. The relationship between David and Lisa is a nice change in the way of cinematic love stories. How many other films have dared to portray a realistic relationship between two less than mentally stable individuals?

LADYBUG LADYBUG

Frank Perry (1963)

I honestly don't know where to begin on this film. I should have prepped some witty explanatory opening paragraph highlighting my experience getting a hold of this film, but to be honest, It was a blind grab from a public tracker. Yes, I downloaded it; Sue me. So, Upon reading the Wikipedia article, I glanced accidentally at a massive spoiler. Instantly, my stomach churned. That single sentence horrified me into a state of manic petrification. Regardless of the entire film being ruined by one Wikipedia editor's inability to spell or complete sentences, I dredged slowly through this long yet calculated film and found myself astonished. Frank Perry is an Academy Award winner whose films I haven't heard of. After watching this film, I must seek out his other films. In a time shattered by the Cold War, more specifically the Cuban Missile Crisis, a rural elementary school's normal day is interrupted by an ear-shattering alarm warning of a nuclear attack in approximately one hour. Not knowing if it's a drill or the real thing, the principal and the teachers begin to evacuate the students while someone continues to try to reach the outside world. Normally, these apocalyptic films bother me in a sense and never leave me feeling uneasy. Only two films have made me feel wary of the end of days and those are Cloverfield and Ladybug Ladybug. What A Nightmare on Elm Street did for children's songs was long accomplished before by this very film. Having a title of a popular nursery rhyme was an intelligent move for the film. Giving that the children are of such a young age, the only real comfort they feel is leeches from games and songs. Speaking of children, the acting really shone for me. My personality traits create much hatred for children, including children in film. Jennifer Lopez's Enough drove me bonkers during the scene in which the "bad man" tried to harm the girl power group. This experience caused the little girl to shrill for minutes at a time. I expected the same from this but was surprised to find children questioning God's inability to save them or the effects of war. Watching such small and fragile minds expanding with the grief that religion might be dead and the government doesn't care is a sight to behold. A war-torn melodrama that presents a cast populated with many New York based Broadway actors and a handful of children. I doubt there is any way that this film could be received as horrible, let alone not amazing. Ladybug Ladybug amazed me, thrilled me, shocked me, provided me with the most calculated angles and lighting effects in recent memory, and actually left me breathless.

TAXI ZUM KLO

Frank Ripploh (1981)

Post-WW2 Germany has produced a wealth of homosexual auteur filmmakers, but – for better or worse – none quite compare to Frank Ripploh aka Peggy von Schnottgenberg (Miko - aus der Gosse zu den Sternen, Taxi nach Kairo); the Berlin schoolteacher-turned-filmmaker who felt no shame in simultaneously grading papers in tearoom toilets while sucking cock through a less than glorious glory-hole. Ironically, recommended to me by my beautiful girlfriend, Taxi zum Klo (1981) aka Taxi to the Toilet (or “Taxi to the John”, etc.) directed by and starring Mr. Ripploh in an embarrassingly semi-autobiographical role in a work that is not exactly the sort of homophile arthouse film one would expect from a master kraut-queer auteur like R.W. Fassbinder (Fox and His Friends, Querelle) and Werner Schroeter (Malina, This Night), but it does offer a spiked comical cocktail of ridiculously raunchy candid carnality of the debauched public educator sort. Relatively conventional and somewhat amateurish in narrative structure in part due to the shoestring budget it was shot on, Taxi zum Klo is a wild work of ‘camp realism’ that derives most of its entertainment value from its goofy and often gross domestic gay zaniness. An eccentric elementary school teacher by day and a public pervert by night, Ripploh – who is hardly a prancing queen – does a swell job living a double life, at least in the beginning. Seemingly like some sort of laidback, hippie sociology professor in both appearance and character, Ripploh’s general lack of outward effete gayness makes him all the more interesting of a character, especially when sharing slobber and semen with other homely homo men and being tested (positive) for STDs in a most crude and compromised manner. After all, I doubt many filmmakers would direct themselves while will passively receiving a metal medical phallic probe in the fag end. Unflinchingly charming, comical, and capricious from beginning to end, Taxi zum Klo is a film that – despite its intensely intimate and often downright revolting subject matter – would probably appeal to most viewers, even those that feel a bit overwrought by the image of a swarthy man’s asshole being penetrated by a peculiar fellow in leather chaps.

Like many controversial films, especially the sort featuring real-life (homo) sex, Taxi zum Klo was banned in Britain upon its initial release, which should no surprise to those that have already watched this penis-prominent cinematic work. Opening with backboard collage containing some of Ripploh’s most penetrating personal obsessions, including artwork by Salvador Dalí and Tom of Finland, a photo of queer German New Wave auteur Rosa von Praunheim (Neurosia: 50 Years of Perversity, The Einstein of Sex) and a family member in a Hitler Youth outfit, and homocentric pins with cutesy quips like “No More Heteros,” one immediately gets more than a clear idea as to the director’s personal proclivities and wacky Weltanschauung. Similar in theme to a lot of gay films of the 1970s/1980s from Europe and America – like William Friedkin's The Boys in the Band (1970), Wolfgang Petersen's Die Konsequenz (1977) aka The Consequence, Ron Peck's Nighthawks (1978) and Bill Sherwood's Parting Glances (1986), Taxi zum Klo is a film that ultimately portrays the unfulfilling and self-destructive nature of homosexual subcultures during that era as vividly portrayed in Larry Kramer's gay-community-inflaming novel Faggots (1978) and von Praunheim's documentary Positive (1990), yet unlike many of the characters featured in similarly related works, Frank Ripploh does demand pity from the audience but only shits and giggles, thus managing to retain whatever is left of his personal dignity. Always maintaining a reasonably positive attitude, even when learning that genital warts are invading his putrid poop-chute, Ripploh merely expects the viewer to laugh at his and his butt-buddies rather grotesque bare-skinned bodies and abject personal failures in life. After meeting the man of his dreams – a movie theater attendant with a creepy mustache typical of the loony leather boys featured in Friedkin's Cruising (1980) – Ripploh's life begins to pick up momentum, but due to his wandering wienerschnitzel and jokester wisecracking, he soon learns that it is much easier and far more sexually fulfilling to blow random twink and bears in public restrooms. Although initially contemplating a pseudo-marriage featuring an urbane lifestyle of leisure and male-on-male monogamy with the possible addition of an adopted 'mongoloid child' (his own words) after beginning a steamy relationship with his new boi toy, Ripploh inevitably realizes that such bourgeois lifestyle changes could impede on his secret life of lecherous latrine lovemaking; a nature high of the thoroughly bestial sort that, that like most addictions and compulsions – once initiated into – one can never divert from partaking in.

Described by The Village Voice as, "the first masterpiece about the mainstream of male gay life," Taxi zum Klo – like most cinematic works of its kind – features a far from a flattering portrayal of homosexual lifestyles, especially when compared to a movie as relatively tame as Ang Lee's Brokeback Mountain (2005), yet it does ultimately humanize its protagonist because it reveals him to be a flawed individual with a thirst for vice, and dreams and hopes that, despite the repellant nature of his public sexual relations, most people can relate to. In spite of directing a sequel to the film entitled Taxi Nach Kairo (1987) – a work that is virtually impossible to obtain a copy of, even in Germany – Frank Ripploh would never direct another film as influential and critically revered as Taxi zum Klo, although he would be immortalized in the pages of queer cinema history by playing the role of a drunken legionnaire (with fellow German filmmakers Wolf Gremm and Robert van Ackeren also playing this symbolic role) in Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Querelle (1982); the arguable 'Citizen Kane of gay cinema' and the only fiercely homoerotic film to have received a large degree of success at that time upon its initial release (selling 100,000 tickets in the first three weeks). Although Taxi zum Klo seems comparatively insignificant when compared to a film as artistically refined and iconic as Querelle, it does feature a certain artistic scrupulousness and integrity that most films – whether gay-themed or not – ultimately lack, hence why it has remained a favorite among fans after over three decades. Featuring excerpts from Christian and His Stamp Collector Friend (???) – an impossible-to-find anti-pedophile PSA with unfathomably distressingly pedophilic imagery – Taxi zum Klo is a film that will indubitably have you second guessing your child's seemingly normal elementary school teacher.

DEAD FURY

Frank Sudol (2008)

FSudol is a name that should be known for his amount of hard work. He broke animated horror boundaries down with his 2006 film City of Rott, which was released by Unearthed Films. Although the style and effects were a horror fans wet dream, the film suffered horrible pacing and should have rather been a short film. His new film Dead Fury, fixes his errors and presents an ultimate homage to 80's horror films. The annoying grandfather character in City Of Rott is back, this time with Jenn, Max, and Jake; a group of friends gone hunting. After a less than intelligent hiker finds a spell book and resurrects a body-jumping demonic zombie spirit, the group must fight for survival in the woods. The film gives it's jokes and credit to The Evil Dead, The Hills Have Eyes, and Tod Browning's Freaks. Dead Fury is a vast improvement over his last. In this outing, he provides a great story that is still fresh, provides scenery that is pure cartoonish eye candy, then paints the walls red with demon gore. FSudol is a man that i can appreciate. He does almost every job on this film, from the voices, to the production, editing, music, sound effects, and the writing. His work is all a one man job. If his credit stands familiar, you should know that he did animation work on the musical South Park: Bigger, Longer, and Uncut. If there is a weapon that you fancy, chances are, is that one of these characters use it to gut a demon. We have scythes, shovels, buzz saws, shotguns, and meat tenderizers. There is really nothing holding back this film except for the repetition of the same vulgarities over and over again; "Stupid Bastard." It is impossible to not watch this film, and have a bloody good time. Dead Fury is a gory romp; a cabaret of carnage to be exact. To outdo it's own visuals in City of Rott is an achievement worthy of boasting, and FSudol has done just that. If the sight of gloopy intestines mixed with arterial spray and constant vulgarity excites you, you found your new favorite film. This is the new Braindead in terms of no-holds-barred bloodshed.

MODELS

Frank Tashlin (1955)

When the kraut electronic group Kraftwerk wrote their hit single “Das Model” they probably did not have the radically repugnant pseudo-blonde bimbos of the Austrian film Models (1999) directed by Viennese auteur Ulrich Seidl (Dog Days aka Hundstage, Import/Export) in mind. Probably most notable for being Seidl’s only film that is not dominated by an Aryan freak show of ugly, obese, elderly, and/or severely mentally ill protagonists, Models depicts in a minimalistic yet meticulous manner the supreme superficiality and stupidity, soulless greed, childish narcissism, and mindless hedonism (especially where coke and cocks are concerned!) that seems to go hand-in-hand with being a model whose great talent is striking a conspicuously contrived pose for some perverted photographer. Indeed, despite the film’s sometimes almost home-movie-like aesthetic, Seidl himself has stated that Models is the most difficult film he has ever directed, writing in a ‘director’s statement’ featured on his official website regarding the production: “Directing has probably never been as difficult for me as with this film. First of all: because models aren’t used to others being interested in them as people. Secondly: because models are used to being treated badly. Thirdly: I was dealing with people who are used to money being their sole professional motivation. But money can’t be the basis of a productive collaboration for a film as I understand it.” After watching the film, I must tip my hat to Seidl for having to deal with these innately intolerable ladies for long enough to complete a feature film, as watching these airheaded Aryanesses for a mere two hours is surely something akin to metaphysical torture. I do not know if the myth that blondes are dumb was started when American Jewish businesswoman Ruth Handler invented the Barbie doll (which was ripped off a slightly less trashy German doll called the ‘Bild Lilli’ doll) or when Marilyn Monroe whored her way up Hollywood by becoming the most prized Shiksa in Tinseltown, but the gorgeous and, in some cases, would-be-gorgeous broads of Models totally transcend any sort of traditional negative blonde stereotypes and they are not even natural blondes. A piece of socially scathing “staged reality” set in a pathetic realm of demented post-MTV Austrian domestication full of vaginal douches, tarot cards, and lines of cocaine and populated by pretty yet plastic people whose personalities are just as phony as their lips and tits, Models is just another one of Seidl’s uniquely unflattering examples of how American hegemony has perverted Germanic kultur, namely ideal beauty.

Vivian (Viviane Bartsch) enjoys saying “I love you” to herself in the mirror, vomiting up her food in the toilet, routinely douching her overworked vag, laying completely unclad in a tanning bed while talking about men’s members (apparently, her first boyfriend’s penis felt like “cold pizza”), accusing her long-term boyfriend Werner (Werner Hotzy) of cheating on her, and pathologically ruining her hair with various ugly perms, dye jobs, and pseudo-chic haircuts. Hyper hedonist Lisa (Lisa Grossmann) has fake duck-lips that make her look like an albino tranny Negro and she likes American negroes, preposterous plastic surgery, cocaine, vodka, tasers, large and obnoxious wigger coats, dancing in sleazy night clubs while high/stoned/horny, and screwing in slimy public restrooms. Tanja (Tanja Petrovsky) is slightly less degenerate and spends her time dabbling with tarots cards and other mystically minded mumbo jumbo, while Elvyra (Elvyra Geyer) does not really stick out amongst her 'friends.' Of course, what all these girls have most in common is their deluded dreams to become the next top magazine-cover-adorning glamour girls and despite putting poisonous drugs in their bodies, these lecherous ladies spend a good portion of their time beautifying themselves with a variety of wacky methods that seem to have nil results. Admittedly, these girls do not fuck around when it comes to ostensibly improving their looks and getting modeling gigs, as if tragic Guido porn star Moana Pozzi defecated in their brains. Vivian tells her boyfriend the sex is no longer good because she believes he no longer loves her and assumes he is cheating on her since he is always late. Ever the self-centered and sex starved girl, Vivian sees her boyfriend's assumed sexual affairs as a great blessing, as it gives her the justification to go out and cheat herself, which she does with gusto, though her fuck buddies always mock and consider her a lame lay. In terms of men, the girls believe "Austrians are the worst" but also that "Spanish guys are animals...Proletarians to the max." Despite their ostensibly high standards in men, Lisa begs for sex from lil American negroes and Vivian has no problem shaking her naughty bits in the face of an old and sleazy photographer named Peter Baumann, who she later screws, in a patently pathetic and groveling attempt to further her career. Undoubtedly, the unintentionally comical downward spiral that is vice-ridden Vivian's life reaches an all time low in the last scene of Models when, after screwing a random dork of a dude with the rather fitting name Gernot Assinger, the rather dignified dude states, "Well...Doing it with you and all wasn't as great...as you promised it would be" and proceeds to laugh at the lanky lady nonstop for about 3 minutes as if he is stoned on the model's hair dye. Indeed, if one learns anything while watching Seidl's Models, it is that models are much dumber than they look and seem to be part of some sort of postmodern tribe from Monroe-ite hell.

Despite its long scenes, mostly still and static camera work, and intentionally repetitive scenes (many of the same exact shots/camera angles are repeated throughout the film), Models is arguably auteur Ulrich Seidl's most accessible and least nuanced work as a sort of putridly pretty piece of anti-reality-TV that allows the kind of girls you would expect to find on MTV hang themselves with their own obscenely morally retarded words and discernibly degenerate deeds. As someone who has seen my fair share of Germanic films, what I found most shocking about Models is that, despite the fact they speak Austrian German, the 'anti-heroines' of the film are totally indistinguishable from the sort of insipid attention-addicted fake blondes you can find at any American sorority or sports bar. It would be easy and stereotypical to call the shallow chicks of Models 'Eurotrash' as some less creative reviewers have described them, but more than anything, these fallen Fräuleins are indubitably victims of a Hollywood lobotomy and American (non)culture hegemony. Certainly, if these women were brought up with the Bund Deutscher Mädel (BDM) as opposed to Snoop Dogg, Baywatch, Hebraic feminism and Barbie, they might have been caring mothers as opposed to careless whores. After all, I doubt any girl grows up dreaming of singing a song with a title like "Shave that Pussy" while high on coke and hunting for jigaboo meat when they become grown women. What I found most ironic about Models is that, while the model's grandmothers probably associated blonde hair with purity and intelligence, the girls of Seidl's film, who are clearly not natural blondes to begin with, seem to believe their hair color is some sort of hot slut trump card and a license to act intentionally stupid and vapid 24/7, as if that is a turn-on or something (when, in reality, it is essentially an anti-Aryan Judaic myth that was invented by films like Billy Wilder's The Seven Year Itch (1955), which was not coincidentally but quite ironically directed by a Viennese Jew who once interviewed Arthur Schnitzler, Alfred Adler, and Sigmund Freud all on the same day during his pre-director days as a reporter). Of course, a lot has changed since The Seven Year Itch was released over half-a-century ago, as the German-speaking world now has progressive Jews like Daniel Cohn-Bendit who, in his book The Great Bazaar (1975) aka Der grosse Basar, brags about his various erotic excursions with Aryan five year-old children during his days as a kosher commie 'anti-fascist' kindergarten teacher. Naturally, one can only assume what happened to the girls of Models when they were children, but it is certainly without question that they were exposed to some sort of progressive learning, even if not of the Cohn-Bendit pedo sort. Neither straight narrative film nor authentic documentary, Models is a metaphysical affliction in celluloid form, with Seidl being the soul-doctor. Of course, Seidl merely diagnoses the problem as there is no cure for the models' affliction, at least in a world where Steven Spielberg is the international Minister of Propaganda, a weak and effeminate mulatto ex-drug addict is the supposed leader of the most powerful and culturally corrosive country in the world, and where all moral and values of the Occident have been totally inverted to appease the (non)ethics (what Nietzsche called the 'slave morality') of Europa's perennial enemy. Indeed, if you have ever wondered why something like the holocaust could happen, just consider the fact that the largely Hebrew-run democratic Weimar Republic Germany of post-WWI was only slightly less decadent than the globalized post-nationalist Occident of today, with Germany now being a country where the government has legalized prostitution and actively endorses borderline incestuous pedophilia between fathers and daughters (in 2007, Two 40-page booklets entitled "Love,

MODELS

Body and Playing Doctor” were released by the German Federal Health Education Center (Bundeszentrale für gesundheitliche Aufklärung - BZgA) purporting that Fathers “do not devote enough attention to the clitoris and vagina of their daughters”, not to mention the fact that the German far-left has promoted the sexualization/molestation of children since the late-1960s) and that sells clit stimulator sex toys in vending machines. That being said, I would not be surprised if the roads to Auschwitz 2.0 were paved by silicone tits, Spring Breakers dvds, Kanye West cds, rainbow flags, Cohn-Bendit sleaze polemics, and McDonald’s Happy Meals. As for my only complaint regarding Models, I really wish Seidl incorporated the Kraftwerk song “Das Model” into the film.

Frank van Geloven (1995)

Unless you count the grotesque avant-garde works of Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Pentimento), Paul Verhoeven's Catholic-tinged genre-hybrid arthouse work The Fourth Man (1983) aka De vierde man, and/or South African auteur Aryan Kaganof's experimental quasi-documentary Ten Monologues from the Lives of the Serial Killers (1994), there are not really that many notable Dutch horror flicks. Personally, I have never really found classic Dutch horror films like Dick Maas' De Lift (1983) and Amsterdamned (1988), and Rudolf van den Berg's The Johnsons (1993) to be particularly interesting, not to mention the fact that all of these films are cross-genre works and surely not examples of pure unadulterated horror cinema. While not exactly an unsung masterpiece and only vaguely artsy fartsy, the delightfully debasing 60-minute flick Necrophobia (1995) co-directed by Frank van Geloven and Edwin Visser is a rare notable example of where Dutch filmmakers who clearly love the horror genre managed to assemble something strikingly sick and memorably aesthetically aberrant. Indeed, the closest thing to a Dutch Nekromantik, albeit with shades of both classic and not-so-classic works like The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974), The Toolbox Murders (1978), The Evil Dead (1981), Lucker the Necrophagous (1985), and Cemetery Man (1994) aka Dellamorte Dellamore, van Geloven and Visser's so-called "psychological horror" film is delightfully depraved celluloid trash with marginal class that reminded me why I am and will always be a horror fan, even if I think about 99% of what the genre has to offer is worthless and innately inane garbage. Although somewhat amateurish and featuring mostly sterile student film style acting performances and not exactly the most attractive of Dutch actors, Necrophobia also features striking editing, genuine shocks, demented dream-sequences, sister-on-sister car chases and soricide, pale female corpses sporting strap-on dildos and—arguably most importantly—necrophilia. Of course, like many Dutch films, the work also features dark dry humor, nihilistic undertones, and a certain biting cynicism that one can usually expect from cinematic works from the small Germanic lowland country. Like Jörg Buttgerit's Nekromantik 2 (1991), Necrophobia is notable for featuring an unhinged female necrophile, albeit one who will fuck both male and female corpses so long as a strap-on dildo is mounted on said corpse before she mounts it. Also, like Nekromantik 2, the film features a weak, goofy, and gawky male protagonist who finds himself the unwitting prey of a nasty brunette Nordic babe with a fiercely foul fetish for newly rotting flesh. A micro horror flick made for horror fans by horror fans, especially those with a special taste for corpse-fucking art, Necrophobia is another great example as to why cadaver-humping and dark humor go together like peas and carrots, as well as piss and shit.

NECROPHOBIA

Like many Dutchmen, Mark Embrechts (Martijn Oversteegen) is a rather blunt and leisurely fellow who begins Necrophobia by remarking via off-screen narration regarding his loathing of running and his love of his wife and dog: “They say running is good for your physical condition. That’s nonsense. The only effect it has on me is that I’m sweating like a pig. The ones having fun are Boris and Rebecca, he always does when I run around. Anyone who wants to keep such a beautiful girls has to stay fit.” Unfortunately for Mark, his life is going to be turned upside down when his wife Rebecca (Grietje Besteman) is tragically killed after she is run over by a less than prole-like pansy wimp driving a large truck that he clearly was not meant to drive. Mark is so traumatized by his wife’s death that he has his friend watch his dog Boris for him while he attempts in vain to grieve. As Mark contemplates to himself while at his wife’s funeral, “Sometimes life grabs you by the balls...and all you can do is swallow and continue. But I’m not ready to swallow yet.” At the funeral, Mark also notices two attractive young women, and one of them, a seemingly mentally perturbed chick named Colette (Gerry Verhoeven), will soon become the widower’s rebound lover, though it will ultimately have gruesome consequences. Meanwhile, a cloaked individual digs up Mark’s wife Rebecca’s freshly buried corpse, brings it back to a fog-filled torture chamber adorned with corpses in various states of decay hanging from meat-hooks, straps a strap-on dildo on the cold cadaver’s pussy, and begins riding the pseudo-phallus on the corpse. Of course, Mark will soon get very personal with the defiler of his beloved wife’s corpse.

Not taking the senseless unexpected death of his wifey very well, Mark contemplates suicide and even attempts to slit his wrist with a seemingly dull bread knife, but he pussies out the last second. Of course, Mark is somewhat cheered up when he bumps into cemetery girl Colette at the local graveyard where his wife was recently buried, as the young lady asks him out on a date, which he naturally obliges, though he naturally has mixed feelings about the situation as he still loves his belated spouse. That night, a seemingly hysterical young woman wearing a horrid wig named Martha Morbeck—the other young woman that the widower spotted at his spouse’s funeral—comes by Mark’s home to warn him to stay away from Colette by making the seemingly far-fetched claim that she will put him and his wife’s life in danger, even if the latter is already dead. After Mark rudely kicks her out of his humble abode, Martha hits the road and is soon involved in a car chase with Colette, who ultimately shoots her in the shoulder before running her off the road. Martha eventually wakes up in the necrophile’s torture chamber and is soon killed by a chainsaw-wielding Colette, who is also sporting a featureless white mask. Indeed, Colette is the necrophile, though it is not initially apparent why she prefers fucking female corpses with strap-ons as opposed to male corpses with real rotten cocks. When Mark finally goes to Colette’s house for a dinner date, he asks his new love interest about Martha. Colette reveals that Martha is, in fact, her sister and that she fell in love with the same man as her, thus resulting in a bitter rivalry between the two siblings. Indeed, Colette was married to a man named David that died from a heart attack the previous year and Martha has apparently attempted to wage a “crusade” against her ever since. When Mark and Colette have sex, the latter has a traumatic flashback regarding how her husband died of a heart attack while they were having bondage-based sex and she was unable to escape from the rotting corpse of her dead beau because she was tied up. Indeed, Colette had a truly transcendent carnal session with her belated boy toy, which ultimately caused her to develop a softspot for rotting flesh.

Needless to say, Mark leaves shortly after the rather awkward sex session, but not long after he gets back to his home, Colette abruptly arrives, hits him over the head with a mallet, and brings him back to her corpse-fucking torture chamber, where the somewhat pathetic protagonist wakes up naked with a large strap-on dildo attached to his seemingly brittle body. While Colette soon attempts to kill Mark with a chainsaw, the widower manages to disable her weapon and she is soon shot dead by her curiously crazed psychiatrist Dr. Bernhardt (Rutger Weemhoff). As Dr. Bernhardt reveals to Mark, he is the one who got Colette hooked on corpse-fucking in the first place. Indeed, on top of suffering the distinct trauma of her husband dying on top of her during S&M-fueled sex, Colette was trapped under her postmortem hubby’s corpse for a week before anyone found her, thus leading to posttraumatic stress of the rather perturbing meta-perversion-inflicting sort. As it turns out, it was Dr. Bernhardt’s idea to get Colette to “re-live” the experience of necrophilia and he even helped her dig up the corpses. Naturally, Mark must die since he knows of Dr. Bernhardt’s dubious relationship with Colette regarding grave-robbing and corpse-based carnality. While Mark manages to kill Dr. Bernhardt by stabbing him in the throat with a meat-hook, the doctor manages to shoot him in the stomach and genitals with a sawed-off shotgun just before he drops dead. As he dies, Mark thinks to himself, “Sometimes life grabs you by the balls. Literally. Thank god it’s over.” In a twist ending, it is revealed that Colette has survived the gunshot wound and she wants to fuck Mark, who says to himself while dying, “over my dead body.”

Undoubtedly, what sets Necrophobia apart from similarly themed American films is that, aside from featuring corpse-fucking, it is undying in its relentless cynicism, pessimism, and misanthropy to the point where the protagonist is killed and even has his balls blown off. Indeed, even the death of the lead’s wife is depicted in a totally unnervingly nihilistic fashion, as the woman is depicted twitching spasmodically as she succumbs to her fatal injuries. Of course, gore-hounds will also probably be sad to know that, unlike Buttgerit’s Nekromantik films, the necrophilia scenes in the film are not depicted in graphic detail, but are more implied than anything. Indeed, while the American influence on the film is blatantly obvious to the point of almost seeming like parody, van Geloven and Visser’s work is decidedly Dutch in character, as it spares no one’s feelings, never wallows in sentimentality, and prides itself on being pathologically pessimistic and absurdly anti-romantic. Somewhat notably, the two directors of the flick would collaborate on one more film together—the somewhat popular Dutch-Belgian coproduction Slaughter Night (2006) aka S18n8—before Visser himself became a corpse after he died unexpectedly of a heart attack on August 26, 2012 while in Crete, Greece. While not exactly a masterpiece of arthouse cinema, Necrophobia is certainly an underrated and overlooked masterpiece of Dutch horror, which may not say much considering the sorry state of the genre in the Netherlands, but considering it is the same tiny nation that produced cinematician Frans Zwartjes—a master of the aesthetically grotesque and macabre—it also says a lot. Also, while not the greatest film that the totally taboo sub-genre has to offer, Necrophobia will certainly appeal to necro-cinephiles who enjoy similarly themed works like Joe D'Amato's Beyond the Darkness (1979) aka Buio Omega, Buttgereit's Nekromantik series, Nacho Cerdà's Aftermath (1994), and Philippe Barassat's Le nécrophile (2004). Of course, I would not recommend the film to the necrophobic.

DEATH MAY BE YOUR SANTA CLAUS

Frankie Dymon (1969)

It is not often that black power types make films, let alone highly experimental British avant-garde ones, so I was naturally quite surprised when I discovered the once 'lost' Afro-Anglo agitprop piece Death May Be Your Santa Claus (1969) directed by black Brit Frankie Dymon Jr., who has the distinction of being probably the only member of the British Black Panther Party. Among cinephiles, Dymon is probably best remembered, if remembered at all, for being one of the Black Panther militants that appeared in celluloid Marxist pseudo-messiah Jean-Luc Godard's Rolling-Stones-doc-cum-Marxist-agitprop-experiment One Plus One (1968) aka Sympathy for the Devil. Assumed lost for a number of decades, a print of Dymon's X-rated 36-minute micro-feature was rediscovered somewhat recently and since then has been routinely screened as part of the 'Black World' initiative by the British Film Institute (BFI). Additionally, the film was included as an extra feature on the BFI Flipside Blu-ray/DVD combo release of Michael Sarne's Joanna (1968), which also deals with themes of black-male-on-white-female miscegenation in late-1960s London. A curious piece of celluloid negro nihilism of the pseudo-existentialist sort in an idiosyncratic quasi-Godardian style that director Dymon himself once labeled "Afro-Saxon" (which is certainly an apt, if not seemingly oxymoronic description), Death May Be Your Santa Claus would probably be best described as an Afrocentric artsploitation flick featuring ultra-violence, including cock-chomping cannibalism, and quasi-pornography that deals with the somewhat hypocritical dilemma that some black power brothas have regarding their love and obsession with white women. After all, you usually do not see even the most boneheaded of Uncle Adolf fetishizing neo-Nazi skinheads running after black or mestizo broads, yet it always seems that non-white racial nationalists, especially of the negroid sort, cannot get enough of honky whores. Indeed, it is not uncommon for certain black power and/or far-leftist types associated with groups like the Black Hebrew Israelites, Black Panthers (early leader Eldridge Cleaver was a serial rapist who considered his routine raping of white women to be a "an insurrectionary act"), and Symbionese Liberation Army (the leader of which, Donald DeFreeze, apparently routinely raped heiress Patty Hearst after kidnapping her) to lust over the white cave wench, thus inadvertently revealing their inferiority complex and pathological resentment towards the white man and obsession with defiling and appropriating the white man's most sacred counterpart, the white woman. Conceived over a six month period and shot in a mere ten days, the project initially intimidated director Dymon, who later reflected that his execution of the film was quite easy, stating in Volume 1, Number 11 of the British sexploitation magazine Cinema X that it was, "easier than I thought. Films are, basically, just pictures. Nothing new to Africans. We tell all stories in pictures." Featuring a score by the British proto-progressive rock group Second Hand (whose song 'Death May Be Your Santa Claus' the film is named after, with the band even releasing a full-length album of the same name in 1971), who appear in the film, and packed with tons of wonderfully politically incorrect imagery of the racially, sexually, and politically-charged sort, Death May Be Your Santa Claus will ultimately probably be better appreciated by libertine cinephiles and eccentric exploitation fans than modern day black power advocates who, like most contemporary viewers, will probably find the material to be somewhat inexplicable.

Opening with an iconoclastic title screen featuring a black dagger with a savage-looking negro head featuring a nose ring as a handle that has split through the flag of Great Britain, Death May Be Your Santa Claus then introduces protagonist Raymond Parker (ex-photographer/ex-model Ken Gajadhar), who is a college student, black power advocate, and Marxist lecturer of the exceedingly egocentric sort who lectures to a bunch of white students that, to the chagrin of white men and black women, the black man and white women desire each other most, and then makes the following nonsensical, convoluted statement, "The power that stands on privilege - and goes with women, pot, champagne and bridge - broke. And democracy regained her reign, which also goes with women, pot, and screwing. Therefore, if you want things to stay as they are, things will have to change - won't they? You see, the French Revolution, begun in 1789, did not end in 1830, but gained true victory in May 1968..." Probably due to the fact that he does not bother with his studies and spends more time agitating, Raymond is kicked out of the school by an old authoritarian WASP, who states, "Look... You know I have to do this" and complains about "bloody academics" when the belligerent black neo-bolshevik buck leaves his office. As Raymond narrates, juxtaposed with a scene of him walking away from the university in a decidedly defiant fashion, "In a convention, there must be two things. I, for one, must be the soul. They tell me that all things that have been done in the world must first come after evil has been done. My name is Raymond and that is the slave mark I must forever lose to be true to my own cause." What he means is anyone's guess, but it probably involves his dilemma regarding his embarrassing and seemingly paradoxical addiction to cracker chicks and his need to stay true to his pure jigaboo blood and spirit. Of course, as a black man that speaks more eloquently and literately than the average white Brit, was born and raised in a nation that colonized his ancestors, and worships a racist anti-black white man like Che Guevara, Ray suffers from a number of internal conflicts and is plagued by contradiction, as a man that seems to suffer from racial schizophrenia and attempts to compensate for it by espousing a sort of faith-based black liberationist theology.

Aside from his academic career being more or less over, Raymond has problems in the area of love and friendship, or as he narrates after waking up and reading a copy of the book Castro: A Political Biography (1969) by The New York Times comsymp writer Herbert L. Matthews regarding he and his white friend's recent addiction to miscegenation: "Can a man realize the very dimensions of his life? Do I know what precise amount of horror is involved mine? Oh yes...it was at this point that my whole world crumpled from under my feet. I fell in love with a white girl and my best friend married a black woman." From there a beauteous scene of Raymond's friend and his black wife walking in a sunny London park erupts into a completely random bloody and ultra-violent castration scene of two longhaired white dorks and a seemingly half-retarded King Kong-esque negro, who was pushed into a pond only seconds before by his two heinous honky comrades (!), assaulting another longhaired white dork and ripping apart and cannibalizing his cock in a moment of savage sadomasochistic ecstasy that can be interpreted as an allegorical representation of miscegenation and multicultural 'castrating' and thus destroying the white race. Meanwhile, Raymond dreams of defiling his tall blondhaired and blue-eyed white beauty (white South African model Donnah Dolce) in between scenes of prog-rock band Second Hand performing in their underwear in an abandoned house along with sardonic surrealist scenes of two walking and talking caricatures, a stereotypically dressed Maoist Chinaman and the Catholic Pope. In one particularly hilarious scene, a swarthy commie rebel sporting a Che Guevara costume steals a mulatto baby from its homeless mother, who also has a white baby, and hands it to the Pope, as if it is the Catholic Church's job to find the negroes whose nations had been plunged into starvation by Marxist rebels.

Unquestionably, one of the most potent scenes of Death May Be Your Santa Claus involves seemingly authentic footage of a black power revolutionary heckling a bunch of poor, dirty, and largely toothless white Brits by remarking that they are "not prepared to accept the fact that there are many stupid and ignorant whites all over the world." Unwittingly demonstrating that virtually all communist theory and propaganda has been invented by far-leftist Jews who hate Europe and everything it represents and have no real interest in 'liberating' the colored people of the world but are instead using them as pawns in their war against the Occident, the black heckler also reads the following absurdist agit-prop screed compiled from writings by Judaics that were kicked out of Germany to the angry white lumpenproles: "Bruno Springer tells of the African strain even in the Germans...Professor Einstein says all modern people are the conglomeration of so many ethnic mixtures that no pure race remains with exception of the negroid, who are rapidly declining...many of Europe's most famous men, past and present, are of mixed marriages. Racial fusion tends to come before the development of any high state of culture. One cannot find any records anywhere to find that a pure race, on its own initiative, has ever developed a high culture with the exception of the negroid stock." Meanwhile, the Chinaman continues to contemplate revolutionary theory while the Pope takes a priestly poop in the

In a twist ending, it is revealed that Raymond's beloved is not a blonde Nordic nymph but a black as coal soul sister named Georgina (Jamaican-born model Merdelle Jordine). Indeed, all the sex scenes between Raymond and the Aryan beauty were just fantasies of the protagonist, who fell in love with the (non)white girl after merely talking to her on the phone and assuming by her voice that she was white. In the end, both the protagonist and the black, who are both wearing red, walk in the same direction, while the white girl, who is wearing blue, heads in the other direction, thus assumedly signifying that Raymond is finally headed in the right direction in his life, as he has finally decided to chase members of his own race. What auteur Frankie Dymon Jr.'s intention was with Death May Be Your Santa Claus is hard to say, but I do not think it would be a stretch to say that it is ultimately an anti-miscegenation piece directed by a conflicted negro who is ashamed of the fact that he prefers white devil dames to African queens. Unquestionably, Dymon's film is the kind of no bullshit work that gets under the rather thin skin of white liberals because, aside from featuring some white dork getting his dong devoured by a rapid negro Donkey Kong, it offers no sentimental messages of hope or racial reconciliation, but instead goes a much more nihilistic route that makes racial harmony seem like the silly and ultimately intangible pipe dream of idiotically idealistic whites and blacks who love miscegenation and think they somehow have the right to tell everyone else how to live just because they have a malignant case of jungle fever. In fact, Dymon went so far as to compare white woman to sensual spy Mata Hair in a scene where footage of the protagonist having sex with his white love interest is juxtaposed with a photo of the (in)famous Frisian femme fatale. While certainly original and intriguing, if not obscenely outmoded like a rotten overdosed hippie inside a broken down Volkswagen bus, Dymon's film was nothing all that new as demonstrated by Sarne's Joanna. Additionally, compared to Italian erotica maestro Tinto Brass' pre-porn avant-garde feature nEROSubianco (1969) aka Attraction—a part collage/part agitprop piece about a white woman who swoons over a black buck after her cuckold Guido hubby drops her off at Hyde Park that premiered at the 1968 Cannes Film Festival (thus technically predating Dymon's work)—almost makes Death May Be Your Santa Claus seem somewhat tame by comparison. Still, compared to Melvin Van Peebles' undeniably entertaining yet exceedingly technically inept black power epic Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971), Dymon's Afro-Saxon artsploitation short seems like a highly intricate and nuanced work of a seasoned master who had the potential to be the next Ousmane Sembène or a black and rampantly heterosexual Lindsay Anderson. Like Van Peebles' Black Panther-approved film and the underrated black arthouse vampire flick Ganja & Hess (1973) directed by Bill Gunn, Death May Be Your Santa Claus is not some silly Blaxploitation movie directed by some monetary-motivated Hebrew, but an authentic work of Afro-cinema that makes a serious and wholehearted attempt to speak to and for blacks living in the white world. Why Dymon never directed another film is a mystery to me, especially considering the relative artistic bankruptcy of British cinema during the the late-1960s in comparison to other European nations like Germany and Italy. I don't know about other people, but I am fully supportive of Garveyites, schizophrenic Black Israelites, and black power bros of every stripe attempting to make avant-garde films full of pure unadulterated race-hate and blood mysticism.

LIVING

Frans Zwartjes (1971)

If there is any filmmaker whose works seem to be hopelessly haunted spirit of Faustian man, it is Dutch Renaissance man Frans Zwartjes (Behind Your Walls, Pentimento) who, despite being easily the most original and idiosyncratic auteurs that has ever lived, is rarely discussed by avant-garde and experimental cinema historians, not to mention the fact that none of his films have ever been released on VHS or DVD outside of the Netherlands. Of course, as an inately visceral and intuitive auteur who does not feel the need to intellectualize his work or compare himself to other filmmakers, Zwartjes never subscribed to trendy film theories and never kissed the ass of Jonas Mekas or his associates, hence why he might allude or annoy certain film historians (notably, as the auteur once humorously stated himself, “My own motor system determined the film style”). While once rightly described by Sapphic Jewess Susan Sontag as “the most important experimental filmmaker of his time,” Zwartjes only seems to be known nowadays by deathrock/darkwave fans and the occasional eccentric cinephile. I must admit that I have a very personal attachment to Zwartjes’ films, as I find them to be totally singular pieces of carefully cultivated celluloid with inordinately abstract cinematic realms of the highly emotionally sort that immediately felt like déjà vu to me the first time I experienced them, at least on the metaphysical level, as they tapped into something wholly primal that I did not feel the need to intellectualize or dissect but instead simply embraced without question. In that sense, Zwartjes is one of those filmmakers that people will either truly love or love to hate, as those that don’t initially ‘get it’ never will. Indeed, if I died and my corpse was reanimated and condemned to a personal perennial purgatory of the nightmarishly claustrophobic sort that was inhabited by the rotting and mangled zombified corpses of a couple of insufferably lecherous ladies that I rather regretted fucking, it might begin to describe what a film like Zwartjes’ classic short Visual Training (1969) means to me on a spiritual level. Despite the fact that Zwartjes—a musician (and one-time violaiist in the Dutch National Opera), violin maker, draughtsman, painter, sculptor, and virtual lifelong professor who is somewhat ironically against the idea of teaching art, especially artistic technique—seems to outright reject all forms of artistic tradition, the splendidly unearthly outdoor scenes in his classic black-and-white short Anamnesis (1969) feel like the all the more eerie and haunting post-apocalyptic equivalent to a Pieter Bruegel the Elder painting. In short, as far as I am concerned, Zwartjes is to non-linear/non-narrative experimental filmmaking what tragic auteur Adriaan Ditvoorst (De blinde Fotograaf aka The Blind Photographer, De Witte waan aka White Madness) is to narrative arthouse filmmaking, as a true cultural heir to Dutch masters like Bruegel and Vincent van Gogh, as a man’s whose work seems to embody the darkest and most forlorn and macabre corners of the seemingly now forsaken Netherlander Volksgeist. The eldest son of an intelligent and cultivated rebel nun who grew to abandon and hate the Catholic Church and a boorish and uneducated working-class pugilist that died when he was only 9 years old, Zwartjes had a less than ideal childhood that involved nearly starving to death during the Second World War, on top of the fact that he came into contact with much internal suffering during his early adult years as a male nurse in a mental hospital, hence his particularly preternatural mastery of apocalyptic cinematic misery and melancholia. Indeed, I do not believe it is an exaggeration to say that Zwartjes' films manage to say more about the human condition with a single shot, camera angle, or edit than Tarantino or Spielberg films do in their entirety, but I digress. Likewise, quite unlike the preposterously pedantic and largely emotionally vacant intellectual experiments of pathologically masturbatory avant-garde filmmakers like George Landow (aka Owen Land), Paul Sharits, Hollis Frampton, and Tony Conrad, Zwartjes' films are dripping with grim understated soulfulness, angst, pathos, carnality, Sehnsucht, and Weltschmerz, among other things.

While his early black-and-white experiments like Birds (1968), Anamnesis (1969), and Visual Training (1969) will always be the Zwartjes films that I appreciate the most since I saw them first and find them to be the rawest and most relatable, I think I have to concur with the Dutch auteur himself that his greatest and most immaculate work is the 14-minute color short Living (1971). Indubitably one of the most idiosyncratically atmospheric and consistently foreboding cinematic works ever made, the film was the final entry in the filmmaker's 'Home Sweet Home' series where Zwartjes utilized his brand new and freshly painted home in the Hague to assemble refreshingly apolitical anti-bourgeois celluloid nightmares that were more subversive than any of the films that were being assembled by the countless counterculture, anarchist, and commie filmmakers that were fairly vogue in Europe at that time. A true 100% auteur piece in the most literal sense as a work where the auteur was responsible for every single aspect of the filmmaking process, including hand-processing his own film prints, Living was both filmed by and stars Zwartjes and his wife and muse Trix Zwartjes, who appeared in virtually every one of her hubby's films. Indeed, more or less unwittingly inventing the selfie many decades before it became a routine habit among self-absorbed teenage girls on Facebook, Zwartjes filmed almost the entire film while holding the camera in front of his and his wife's faces. While one would assume that Zwartjes' literally in-your-face virtuoso handheld camera work would lend a certain realist cinéma-vérité quality to the film, that could not be further from the truth, as Living—a somewhat wickedly ironically titled film—is essentially an experimental dystopian sci-fi flick where it seems like a drone security camera is flying around and recording the deathly dull domestic (non)habits of a scientifically reanimated zombie couple that seems to be too dead to fuck. Sporting white pancake make-up and their Sunday's best and expressing nil discernible emotions aside from anxiety and dread, Frans and Trix look like a recently deceased middle-aged couple whose corpses were buried at the eponymous supernatural burial ground of Pet Semetary (1989), only to be regrettably reanimated as spiritually comatose undead automatons that lack even the energy to kill. Of course, considering that it is a Zwartjes film, Living certainly has a darkly erotic undercurrent to the point where Trix's tits and pussy seem to have more life and character than the singularly hapless protagonists. In that regard, the film sometimes feel like what heaven might be like for a voyeuristic necrophiliac serial killer. Additionally, in terms of tone and atmosphere, one might describe Living as the closest thing to an abstract avant-garde equivalent to Don Coscarelli's classic cult horror flick Phantasm (1979).

As Zwartjes once confessed in an interview with homo auteur Mike Hoolboom (Frank's Cock, Letters from Home)—a Canadian who is, incidentally, the son of a Dutchman and Dutch-Indonesian mother—in regard to his seemingly erotomaniacal mindset at the time he made the film, “I was a bit overexposed sexually back then. I had an extreme interest in sex. It made me scream with irritation that what you always saw in films was a man and a woman together – commotion – one, two, up you got. That was not eroticism, that was gymnastics. At the point that they actually made it into bed, a blanket was pulled over the action. Everything went black and a while later you heard teeth being brushed. What I wanted was solely to film under the sheets, in a manner of speaking. Trix, my wife, had a really astonishingly beautiful body. She was a student at the academy. I am one of those teachers who married a student. Scandalous behaviour, I agree. I filmed her a lot.” While Miss Trix admittedly has a nice pair of jumbo jugs, to be aroused by the film is nothing short of borderline necrophilia, as the little lady resembles a well endowed corpse that is just about to break down and rot. Needless to say, a decomposing cuntkin cannot be too delicious smelling. If you find the mainstream leftist anti-capitalist symbolism of George A. Romero's Dawn of the Dead (1978) to be a tad bit too heavy-handed, Living makes for a most refreshing alternative as Zwartjes offers no easy answers as to why he and his wife resemble undead funeral attendants, but I think it is safe to say the auteur is not a fan of the post-WWII Dutch bourgeois lifestyle and sees it as something that is innately sick, sterile, and unsettling; or so the film potently suggests in a highly expressive yet sometimes esoteric fashion. Of course, while Zwartjes criticizes the bourgeoisie, he also somewhat ironically acknowledges that he part of it (after all, the film was shot in actual home). Notably, in his imperative book Modern Man in Search of a Soul (1933)—a collection of essays that largely focuses on the lost and deracinated spiritual void that is Faustian man—Carl Jung wrote, “A psycho-neurosis must be understood as the suffering of a human being who has not discovered what life means for him. But all creativeness in the realm of the spirit as well as every psychic advance of man arises from a state of mental suffering, and it is spiritual stagnation, psychic sterility, which causes this state.” Keeping Jung’s quote in mind, I see Living as a sort of unconscious spiritual ritual from an intrinsically irreligious man who believes in nothing aside from artistic expression and the majesty of large mammary glands. While Jung noted, “The modern man has lost all the metaphysical certainties of his medieval brother, and set up in their place the ideal of material security, general welfare and humaneness,” Zwartjes is not only metaphysically moribund, but also sees material security as a sort of form of sterile decay, or so one assumes while watching Living where domestic life is the most perniciously plastic forms of existential purgatory.

After beginning with a rather aesthetically pleasing opening credits sequence that includes the title of the film in the flag of the Netherlands colors of blue-white-red, Living cuts to a somewhat ominous and unsettlingly cockeyed low-angle shot of Frans and Trix hovering over the camera while a ceiling window that seems like a sort of gateway to hell disguised an intangible entrance to heaven can be seen behind them. From there, the married couple slowly makes their way down a flight of stairs in an extremely careful, calculated, and almost conspiratorial manner while Frans licks his fingers in a preposterously dainty fashion like some pretentious French wine-sniffing faggot who is afraid of his own asshole. Frans also incessantly plays with a revoltingly flamboyantly colored silk handkerchief that matches his equally ridiculous tie. Needless to say, being an audaciously anally retentive member of the bourgeois undead, Frans does not dare open a door without the help of his trusty hanky. Needless to say, it does not take long for the viewer to realize that Zwartjes believes that a sanitized existence is also a spiritually sterile existence that defies all that is natural and organic.

In a seemingly allegorical scene that seems to insinuate that the bourgeois are more or less large children that love fiddling with toys and playing house, Frans and especially Trix fiddle with miniature furniture, which they have placed on top of a sort of homemade blueprint of their home that is fittingly titled “Living.” At one point, Trix strangely steps on the blueprint, as if she thinks that she can somehow enter the image, even though said image is merely a poorly drawn model of the house that she is already standing inside. As the film progresses, Trix rests her head on Frans’ shoulder, but he remains completely indifferent to her loving gestures, as if he is totally immune to love and sensuality, among other things. Indeed, the closest thing to actual emotion that Frans expresses is irrational anxiety as indicated by his seemingly obsessive-compulsive tendency to place his handkerchief on his lips and even in his mouth. Arguably, the climax of the film involves Trix doing a sort of grotesquely lackluster (non)striptease where she is more or less sterilely molested by the ever invasive camera, which seems like it is on the brink of entering her womb like what happens to hardcore diva Catharine Burgess in pseudonymous pornographic auteur Jonas Middleton’s classic art-horror porn flick Through the Looking Glass (1976). Aside from the camera entering inside her skirt to the point where it is practically presses against her pantyhose-covered pussy, the well endowed undead dame flashes her tits multiple times in a quite frantic fashion that is made all the more bizarre and even unnerving in that the rather spasmodic scene is in hyper fast-motion. Judging simply by this sort of 'titty terrorism' scene in comparison to the rest of the film, I would have to assume that, aside from creating art, the only thing that makes Zwartjes feel truly alive is big tits and creamy cunts with rather fleshy labias (notably, the auteur would get some extra close-up shots of Trix's timeless twat in Pentimento). In the end, Living fittingly comes full circle, with the protagonists proceeding to go back up the stairs where they stand in exactly the same position on the second floor of the house that they were standing at during beginning of the film.

Rather revealing, at the very end of the documentary De Grote tovenaer (2005) aka The Great Magician directed by Ruud Monster, Zwartjes softly states in regard to the supposed innate similarity between artists and mental patients, "There's a term by Wilhelm Reich, an American psychiatrist... He thought that artists and... lost, confused people, patients, if you will... He invented a term for these disorders: Emotional plague. That really struck a chord with me. My stay in the psychiatric hospital, too. It convinced me... that those people all have emotional plague. Something you have no perception of, and no power over. And no idea that you have it." While Zwartjes clearly misinterpreted what sexually abusive quack, card-carrying commie, and all-around degenerate wack-job Wilhelm Reich, who was actually an Austrian Jew, meant when he used the phrase "Emotional Plague" (which was really a defamatory slur disguised as a scientific label that the psychoanalyst invented as a weapon so that he could accuse people, especially German gentiles, of suffering from collective psychosis if they supported nationalism/tradition or rejected the sort of degeneracy he was peddling), I think the filmmaker's remark reveals a lot about both his rather pessimistic mindset and empathy for the mentally afflicted, but also, arguably more notably, it seems to reveal that he felt that he himself was spiritually sick. Had Zwartjes read Jung instead of the innately materialistic Judaic psychoanalysts like Freud, Reich, and Adler, he probably would have better understood the metaphysical affliction that was plaguing him and Occidental man in general. As Jung once wrote, "It seems to me, that, side by side with the decline of religious life, the neuroses grow noticeably more frequent [...] everywhere the mental state of European man shows an alarming lack of balance. We are living undeniably in a period of the greatest restlessness, nervous tension, confusion and disorientation of outlook." Of course, Zwartjes' Living is practically marinated in "restlessness, nervous tension, confusion and disorientation of outlook," among other more inexplicable ailments and afflictions that are arguably best communicated in cinematic form.

liche Wissenschaft (1882) aka The Gay Science, “God is dead. God remains dead. And we have killed him,” he was not speaking literally or attempting to sound like some too-cool-for-school proto-hipster iconoclast, but foretelling that the loss in belief in Christianity and Christian morals among Europeans would lead to a sort of dangerously corrosive nihilist plague because they would be left with an intrinsically debilitating void, or to once again quote the Teutonic philosopher, “When one gives up the Christian faith, one pulls the right to Christian morality out from under one’s feet. This morality is by no means self-evident... By breaking one main concept out of Christianity, the faith in God, one breaks the whole: nothing necessary remains in one’s hands.” As demonstrated by the fact that Western Europeans openly welcome hordes of millions of highly hostile Arab Muslim rabble into their nations, it is quite clear that they believe in nothing aside from their own petty, pathetic, and highly self-destructive post-Christian moral posturing. In fact, Jung, who was a sort of reluctant Nietzschean of sorts, noted that the progressive ethno-masochistic ‘tolerance’ of modern European man was a sign of collective mental illness and pathological defeatism, or as he wrote well over half a century before Europe begin transforming into Eurabia, “The revolution in our conscious outlook, brought about by the catastrophic results of the World War, shows itself in our inner life by the shattering of our faith in ourselves and our own worth. We used to regard foreigners—the other side—as political and moral reprobates; but the modern man is forced to recognize that he is politically and morally just like anyone else.” Naturally, as the son of an errant nun, it is no surprise that Zwartjes would succumb to this sort of nihilism, though he would take it to an all the more extreme degree in his firm rejection of artistic tradition and cultural inheritance. Indeed, as a professor, Zwartjes taught an anti-tradition art class that he invented entitled “Non-Applied Design” because he “thought the only thing they did there was re-designing.” South African auteur Aryan Kaganof also once told me a humorous anecdote about how he took a film course with Zwartjes and on the first day of class he stated to the students, “If you really wanted to know how to make films you would be out there with a camera making films, not listening to some old guy like me who thinks he knows it all.” Of course, the great irony with Zwartjes is that his rejection of cinematic tradition is one of his greatest strengths, as it has led him to becoming one of the most insanely inventive and idiosyncratic filmmakers that has ever lived. Indeed, cinephiles love to talk about how they can easily recognize a Hitchcock, Roeg, or Tarantino film just by watching a scene or two, but Zwartjes is surely one of the only filmmakers whose cinematic works can be identified by a single frame.

While Zwartjes is the sort of rare totally transcendental filmmaker whose films could never be adequately analyzed, especially not with intellectual bankrupt theories that are inspired by Frankfurt School style cultural Marxist bullshit, I firmly believe that his cinematic works, especially Living, reflect the deepest and darkest expression of the forsaken post-Christian Faustian man. Of course, as both an irreligious artist and proud sensualist that rejects tradition, Zwartjes is an extreme example of the eponymous 'modern man' that Jung spoke of Modern Man in Search of a Soul. As Jung noted in the final chapter of his book, "I have found that modern man has an ineradicable aversion for traditional opinions and inherited truths. He is a Bolshevist for whom all the spiritual standards and forms of the past have lost their validity, and who therefore wants to experiment in the world of the spirit as the Bolshevist experiments with economics." Undoubtedly, what makes Zwartjes an interesting and truly notable case is that, unlike the Bolsheviks and their all the more degenerate disciples, he has 'succeeded' in his experiments and has sired his own cinematic language and universe that was not inspired by any sort of cinematic tradition. Indeed, the only thing cinematically that Zwartjes was ever influenced by was the subversive spirit of the experimental American filmmakers of the 1960s, or as the auteur stated to Hoolboom, "What made a huge impression on me was the New American Cinema. The municipal theatre in Eindhoven presented a new American film program in the early 1960s. For the first time I was able to see films by Bruce Connor, by Markopolous, by that fatso... Peter Kubelka and by Andy Warhol. I thought: Jesus Christ, what's going on! In THE SHOPPER by Warhol, the camera is first pointed at the ceiling and then sinks downwards, but you can feel that it was not done by hand. The bolt at the top of the tripod wasn't screwed tight. The camera sinks down by itself, splendidly. While the camera keeps on shooting, you can meanwhile hear someone talking. The protagonist just keeps on going. The crazy thing is that I started to be irritated by the film after a little while and I went out to get a drink. I must have gone back and forth ten times and each time that I opened the door to have another look, I thought, damn it all, it's awfully good! Those screenings had a big influence on me." Of course, judging by his films, it is nearly impossible to see how he was influenced by the non-directed cinematic abortions of weirdo Warhol. It should also be noted that, although he does not subscribe to Catholicism or Calvinism, Zwartjes has been influenced by philosophia perennis, including the Hindu Vedanta and the writings of Medieval Teutonic mystic Meister Eckhart, hence the strangely spiritual and otherworldly nature of his films. Indeed, forget Hitchcock, if any filmmaker has codified his own religion of celluloid voyeurism with its own special set of esoteric rites and rituals, it is Zwartjes.

As the literal "father of Dutch experimental film" and a longtime film professor, Zwartjes has naturally influenced many filmmakers, including such unexpected individuals as music documentarian Frank Scheffer (John Cage: From Zero, Conducting Mahler), yet none of his artistic heirs have even come close to expanding on or even adequately mimicking his singular cinematic techniques. Undoubtedly, the most 'successful' of his students is Paul de Nooijer, who co-directed Moving Stills (1972) with Zwartjes, yet his films ultimately seem hopelessly contrived, shallow, goofy, and just plain weak by comparison. Indeed, de Nooijer's short films like Say Goodbye (1975), Review (1976), and At One View (1989) have an unmistakable Zwartjes-esque vibe to them to the point where the characters in these cinematic works seem like they could be the neighbors or relatives of the protagonists of Living, but unfortunately these admittedly oftentimes quite eccentric flicks lack the teeth and visceral obsessiveness that pervades the director's master's films. In fact, when de Nooijer eventually cultivated his own signature aesthetic that did not seem like it was altogether influenced by Zwartjes, his films began resembling hyper hokey and kitschy 1980s MTV music videos as reflected in intolerably silly and zany cinematic works like N.E.W.S. (1984) and Stop the Greenhouse Effect (1992). While de Nooijer would do things to distance himself from Zwartjes' style like incorporate various forms of primitive animation, even his more recent works like Loſt in America (2005) co-directed by his son Menno de Nooijer radiate aspects of the Zwartjesian universe. Not surprisingly, Living is obviously the Zwartjes film that has most influenced de Nooijer.

While most cinephiles and cineastes would probably think I was absolutely insane for admitting this, I cannot deny that Zwartjes' mere 14-minute short Living is more important to me than the entire oeuvres of legendary directors like John Ford, Alfred Hitchcock, and David Lean, but then again I have always had more of an affinity for poets than artisans. Like Danish master auteur Carl Th. Dreyer and fellow Dutchman Ditvoorſt with narrative filmmaker, Zwartjes is a rare exception in film history in that he reinvented cinema in terms of both technique and concept. In that sense, Zwartjes' films are not only brutal for novices in terms of imagery, but also in overall technique, as watching one of his films is like being introduced to cinema for the first time. A filmmaker that thankfully never fell into the Structuralist ghetto or ever subscribed to esoteric commie theories that epitomize the obscenely outmoded and virtually now wholly worthless and equally forgotten intellectual masturbation pieces of asininely arcane excremental avant-gardists like Laura Mulvey and her equally banal bitch-boy Peter Wollen, Zwartjes ultimately also managed to beat the Vienna Aktionist filmmakers like Kurt Kren and Otto Muehl at their own gorgeously grotesque game while at the same time managing to make avant-garde cinematic works that are as entertaining and timeless as those of Kenneth Anger. Of course, unlike his rather crude Lowland Countries contemporaries like Belgian artsploitation agitator Roland Lethem (La fée sanguinaire, The Bloodthirsty Fairy, Le sexe enrage aka The Red Cunt) and underground necrophilia enthusiast turned mainstream casting director Patrick Hella (Les sables, La tête froide), Zwartjes refined his craft like an old master as opposed to merely throwing something sadistically silly and vaguely artsy fartsy together that mostly relies on sheer cheap shock value (though, admittedly, Lethem and Hella's proudly obnoxious shorts are refreshingly humorous and anarchistic). Notably, as clearly indicated by the impassioned flirting he does while directing his wife Trix and artist Moniek Toebosch at his house in the Hague in the doc Frans Zwartjes, Filmmaker (1971) directed by René Coelho, Zwartjes also knew how to have a lot of fun on his film sets, even if his oftentimes unnervingly foreboding and claustrophobic cinematic works sometimes hint otherwise. Not surprisingly, Zwartjes' one-time student Aryan Kaganof—undoubtedly one of the most subversive filmmakers of the modern age—would pay tribute to Living and a number of the master's other films with his 20-minute flick Mother's Day (2014). While Zwartjes' influence on Kaganof was more in terms of spirit than aesthetics, the South African auteur's masterful Bataille adaptation The Dead Man 2: Return of the Dead Man (1994) certainly has some Zwartjesian moments that recall Pentimento.

A nearly no budget film that features nil special effects or plot and is set in an almost completely empty all-white house that seems like the all the more nightmarish (anti)bourgeois equivalent to the otherworldly neoclassical style pod room featured at the conclusion of Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968), Living unequivocally proves that creativity, inventiveness, and genuine artistic talent always trump big budgets and lavish. Undoubtedly, when I think about Zwartjes and his films, I cannot help but be reminded of the Edgar Allan Poe quote, "Men have called me mad; but the question is not yet settled, whether madness is or is not the loftiest intelligence—whether much that is glorious—whether all that is profound—does not spring from disease of thought—from moods of mind exalted at the expense of the general intellect." Indeed, while watching Living, it feels like I have paid witness to some great metaphysical insight regarding modernity that simply cannot be communicated via writing or in any other art form. Notably, as Zwartjes confessed to Hoolboom in regard to the personal importance of cinema in comparison to the various other artistic mediums that he has worked within, "According to Trix, I've never been as clear about myself as I am in my films. But I didn't see that at all when I was making them. I didn't interpret those films. Others did, but what they said was often beside the point." Undoubtedly, when I watch Living, I see Zwartjes embodying Faustian man as an eerily elderly and decidedly decrepit sexless undead bourgeois corpse who is too apathetic to even bother to acknowledge that his voluptuous and aggressively lecherous yet nonetheless equally cadaverous wife is flashing her big bosoms and pussy at him. As far as I am concerned, Zwartjes' film represents the ugly and pathetic extreme of contemporary European man, who is too internally sick and passive to even defend his nation and women from his perennial enemies, or to once again go back to Jung's quote, "We used to regard foreigners—the other side—as political and moral reprobates; but the modern man is forced to recognize that he is politically and morally just like anyone else." Of course, only a Dutchman of the almost self-destructively individualistic sort could have directed a film like Living where the condemned corpses of Calvinism haplessly wander around a house they no longer recognize in a land that they feel wholly spiritually dispossessed from. Surely, if I were given the opportunity to bury one single film in a time capsule as evidence of what led to some sort of catastrophic Occident apocalypse, it would be Zwartjes' magnum opus, which ultimately makes the truly hellish depiction of mid-sixteenth century Holland depicted in Pieter Bruegel the Elder's masterful panorama painting The Triumph of Death (1562) seem like an exceeding exciting time to live by comparison. Quite fittingly, Living is one of the sixteen films that was included in the 'canon of Dutch cinema' (aka Canon van de Nederlandse film), thus putting alongside other similarly important cinematic works like Johan van der Keuken's Blind Kind (1964), Adriaan Ditvoorst's Ik kom wat later naar Madra (1965) aka That Way to Madra, Paul Verhoeven's Turks Fruit (1964) aka Turkish Delight, and Alex van Warmerdam's De Noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners. Somewhat unfortunately but not surprisingly, one of Joris Ivens' films was also included in the canon. Of course, as a result of Ivens and his dubious legacy, film academics and historians tend to associate Dutch cinema with internationally oriented communist agitprop instead of the true celluloid gold of Ditvoorst and Zwartjes. As far as I am concerned, until the average semi-serious cinephile has the image of Trix Zwartjes' tits burned into their brain, Dutch cinema will not have been given its just due.

IT'S ME

Frans Zwartjes (1976)

Thanks to the thoughtful gratitude of a Dutch comrade and SS reader, I was finally able to wallow in the strangely entrancing pulchritude of the first feature-length film of one of my favorite filmmakers. Indeed, It's Me (1976) directed by the great Dutch renaissance man Frans Zwartjes (Visual Training, Behind Your Walls) is, not unlike most of the auteur's films, an innately idiosyncratic piece of avant-garde cinema where the grotesque somehow becomes strikingly gorgeous. Unlike many of the director's better known films like Anamnesis (1969) and Living (1971) where the characters oftentimes resemble reanimated corpses and deathrock fans and the settings resemble some unspeakable sort of post-Christian pandemonium, the film is somewhat documentary-like in its essence and its clearly set in a contemporary setting, though the emotions and behavior expressed by the female lead are unequivocally grotesque and oftentimes unnerving. A non-narrative one-woman show starring Dutch diva Willeke van Ammelrooy—a woman with a long and eclectic career who has starred in everything from Swinging Amsterdam exploitation trash like Pim de la Parra's Frank en Eva (1973) to fantastique arthouse classics like Harry Kümel's De komst van Joachim Stiller (1976) aka The Arrival of Joachim Stiller to Oscar winning feminist insipidity like Marleen Gorris' singularly misandric carpet-muncher movie Antonia's Line (1995) to big budget Hollywood kitsch like the Sandra Bullock vehicle The Lake House (2006)—It's Me is a sort of haunting yet strangely darkly humorous psychodramatic portrait of an insufferably self-absorbed actress whose vulgar displays of vanity and self-absorption is only transcended by her waning sanity and pathetic loneliness. In short, the film depicts Western womankind at its worst.

While I have yet to have the honor of seeing everyone of Zwartjes' films, I can only assume that the 68-minute feature is the auteur's most overtly Warholian effort as a lo-fi document packed with impassioned improvisation where the actress and her onscreen persona are completely blurred (thankfully, van Ammelrooy is classier than Warhol superstar Viva). In fact, Warhol is one of the few filmmakers that Zwartjes has described as an influence, or as he once stated in an interview with experimental queer filmmaker Mike Hoolboom, "What made a huge impression on me was the New American Cinema. The municipal theatre in Eindhoven presented a new American film program in the early 1960s. For the first time I was able to see films by Bruce Connor, by Markopolous, by that fatso... Peter Kubelka and by Andy Warhol. I thought: Jesus Christ, what's going on! In THE SHOPPER by Warhol, the camera is first pointed at the ceiling and then sinks downwards, but you can feel that it was not done by hand. The bolt at the top of the tripod wasn't screwed tight. The camera sinks down by itself, splendidly. While the camera keeps on shooting, you can meanwhile hear someone talking. The protagonist just keeps on going. The crazy thing is that I started to be irritated by the film after a little while and I went out to get a drink. I must have gone back and forth ten times and each time that I opened the door to have another look, I thought, damn it all, it's awfully good! Those screenings had a big influence on me." Of course, It's Me is not plagued by the sort of grating technical ineptness that is typical of a Warhol film. Indeed, with a number of seemingly immaculately framed soft-focus shots, Zwartjes's film certainly has an ethereal essence despite its relatively humdrum one-room setting.

Of course, what really makes Zwartjes' films quite different from Warhol and his collaborator Paul Morrissey's cinematic works is that it is a virtually immaculately directed and edited piece of unconsciously high class celluloid art that was created by a man that developed his own preternatural filmic language, but I guess one should not expect anything less from a filmmaker that once boldly stated, "My own motor system determined the film style. It never occurred to me to wonder: can this shot follow on after this one? If you start wondering about that you should be looking for another job straight away." If one thing is for sure about It's Me, it is that Zwartjes is absolutely obsessed with every inch of female lead van Ammelrooy's silky skinned body as the camera compliments the actress' every curve and crevice. Indeed, in no other films does a woman's body, movements, and facial expressions tell the entire story, or lack thereof. Likewise, in no other film does a woman's most pathetic and banal moments become so striking. A film that could be retitled 'The Dejecting Domestic Habits of A Chainsmoking Dutch Dime Store Diva,' It's Me—a film that focuses on the terribly dull daily habits of an actress that no one seems interested in hiring—takes a surprisingly aesthetically entrancing approach to demystifying the allure and intrigue of the sort of ravishing statuesque woman that most men would give one of their testicles to fuck.

Considering that it is the only one of his full-lengths films that has been officially released on DVD, I have always wrongly assumed that Pentimento (1979)—an avant-garde dystopian flick full of fine female flesh and East Asian scientist that perform curious experiments on said fine female flesh—was Zwartjes' first feature. Needless to say, it was a pleasant surprise for me to discover It's Me, which does for Willeke van Ammelrooy what Philippe Garrel's Les hautes solitudes (1974) did for tragic American actress Jean Seberg in terms of giving an oftentimes exploited and seemingly damaged diva the opportunity to flex her acting chops and express herself in a rather raw and vulnerable fashion that some people, especially those looking for a mere masturbation aid, would probably find to be a tad bit off-putting and even unsettling. Indeed, while the film might feature a brief beaver shot or two, the heroine, who oftentimes seems like she is only the brink of a total mental breakdown, is hardly depicted in an erotic fashion, at least in any conventional sense (notably, van Ammelrooy first gained fame for her debut role as the eponymous wanton woman in Fons Rademakers' classic Stijn Streuvels adaptation Mira (1971)). While Zwartjes was apparently disappointed with the results of his first feature, leading lady van Ammelrooy would regard it as one of the greatest artistic successes of her rather long and eclectic acting career despite the fact that she portrays a less than likeable lady of the considerably loony sort. Aside from Zwartjes himself, Mat van Hensbergen, who also shot Adriaan Ditvoorst's criminally underrated epic satire De mantel der Liefde (1978) aka The Mantle of Love and would later curiously act as a camera operator on Hollywood trash like Cheech and Chong: Still Smokin' (1983), acted as the film's cinematographer. A bizarrely captivating cinematic work where Zwartjes seems to have traded in the visually grotesque of his earlier films for the emotionally grotesque as personified by a pretty vapid beauty that seems to suffer from a strangely neurotic form of self-worship, It's Me might be about only one woman but it ultimately works as a subtle critique of modern Occidental women in general as van Ammelrooy's character suffers from an exaggerated form of the sort of insufferable psychosis that is all too prevalent among members of the so-called fairer sex in Hollywoodized post-WWII Europe where a sort of wholly corrosive and vulgar Coca-Cola pseudo-culture reigns. Indeed, incessantly unconsciously brainwashing herself with magazines featuring female nudes that she constantly compares herself with, the nameless the heroine—an actress that has turned her apartment into a virtual shrine and fantasy realm of her own making—is a fully willing victim of female tabloid trash and seems to live solely to triumph over and/or win the respect of other women, or so the viewer can only assume by her bizarre behavior.

As Jean-Luc Godard attempted to communicate in both overt and covert ways in his semi-autobiographical eight feature Une femme mariée (1964) aka A Married Woman in regard to the sort of metaphysical affliction that plagues many modern Western women (notably, the filmmaker was convinced that his then-wife Anna Karina was incapable of loving him due to being debased by pop culture), the contemporary European female is incapable of true love and monogamy because she has been brainwashed by magazines and cultural trends that have informed her that the ideal 'liberated' woman is a self-worshipping and self-glorifying hedonistic whore of the culturally retarded sort who is only interested in her own quest for pleasure and shallow reputation among other vainglorious women that live to model their largely worthless lives after the fantasy worlds created by the homo advertisers of Madison Avenue. Notably, in regard to a montage from his film featuring an assortment of advertisements juxtaposed with a song sung by Sylvie Vartan, Godard stated, "If I have shown . . . the place that magazine advertisements occupy in the life of this woman, it's because certain forms of advertising are going so far as to become people's own thoughts. The models that are proposed to people are becoming identical with the people themselves. Even their sex life is not their own, it's already displayed on the walls. People's existence is no more than the reflection of what they see, their freedom is a prefabricated thought."Undoubtedly, the heroine in Zwartjes' film is the unintentionally humorous extreme in regard to the dark and depressing phenomenon that Godard describes, as her entire existence seems predicated on something she saw on television or in a movie, even when she is all by her lonesome (in fact, one assumes she does not have a social life because the fantasies contained within magazines and movies have acted as a sort of sick psychological substitute). Of course, quite thankfully, Zwartjes' film is a mostly visceral experience and does not succumb to the sort of calculated pedantic intellectual methods that are quite typical of Godard's films. Like a minimalistic avant-garde Dutch mutation of Roman Polanski's Repulsion (1965) sans the schizophrenic horrors, murder, and sexual repression, It's Me is indubitably a somewhat ironically titled work in that the heroine seems to have no true organic identity or personality of her own, but instead seems to exist solely to attempt to live up to the counterfeit glamour and shallow sexual appeal of her favorite unclad print starlet while she wastes away in her apartment in a bizarre yet banal hermetic ritual of movie and media induced self-transformation. Whether or not her character is based on herself, her younger self, and/or other actresses she encountered during her career, it is quite clear that van Ammelrooy is all too familiar with the internally damaged dame she portrays to the point where one has trouble separating the actress from the character. Indeed, for better or worse, It's Me is Willeke van Ammelrooy completely raw and uncensored.

After a sort of 'Gothic chic' glamour shot of van Ammelrooy, the film abruptly cuts to a shot of her foam-covered hand in a bathtub in a scene where it becomes immediately apparent that she lives for pleasure, especially the smaller pleasures in life. As demonstrated by the fact that she slowly sprawls out her limbs in the bathtub like a sleeping dog stretching in the sunlight, the heroine is a master when it comes to basking in her bourgeois domestic luxury. Notably, the viewer does not even see van Ammelrooy's face for the first time until well into the 6 minute mark after her phone rings and she exits the tub in a rather relaxed fashion. Not surprisingly considering the context of the scene, the viewer has the distinguished pleasure to see van Ammelrooy's bosoms and beaver at virtually the same time we first see her face, but such brazen physical nakedness is nothing compared to the erratic emotions and strange psychological quirks that she will ultimately expose in Zwartjes' extra claustrophobic chamber piece. As for her phone call, the heroine says things like "Oh yes!!!" and "fine" like a phony porn star during what is clearly a patently pointless and painfully generic conversation. While most of the film is in English, it is oftentimes inaudible because Zwartjes opted to layer secondary audio tracks over the dialogue, thus giving the viewer the impression that the protagonist is scatterbrained bimbo that suffers from cognitive dissonance, among other things. After her fairly brief phone call, van Ammelrooy strips off her clothes and gets in the bathtub again so that she can drain the water, though she takes the opportunity to smoke a joint as she waits for the water to go down the drain. After she is all nice and clean, the heroine is ready to spend the rest of the film roaming around her small yet rather striking apartment like a histrionic harpy that is high on an inflated and wholly delusional sense self-esteem and a dubious cocktail of drugs.

As a result of a clearly fruitful collaboration between Zwartjes, his beautiful wife Trix Zwartjes, and a chick named Floor Peters that seems to have no other film credits to her name, the slightly flamboyant production design in It's Me is absolutely alluring and quite fitting as the heroine's apartment looks like that sort of flat Werner Schroeter might have put together had he worked as a production designer on a color sequel to David Lynch's Eraserhead. Naturally, as someone that seems to spend all day inside where she is free to smoke while lounging around naked, van Ammelrooy seems to love her little lair as it probably the only place in the entire world where she is able to truly be herself and sharpen her acting talents without seeming like a total fool. Indeed, acting and resembling a slightly more tolerable and feminine Katharine Hepburn, the heroine says to an imaginary audience in an extra exaggerated melodramatic fashion things like, "You don't want to understand" and "Oh, it's a wonderful feeling...those people around me." When she is not practicing acting, van Ammelrooy looks at magazines full of nude female models and then uses a portable mirror to compare her tits, pussy, and other body parts to those of said nude models. While it is dubious as to whether she is a dyke or even a passive part-time lily-licker, there is no question that van Ammelrooy lives in a personal estrogen-marinated pandemonium full of fiercely unflattering feminine psychological idiosyncrasies and bare and busty unclad female bodies where no masculine presence can be found. After all, one would expect that van Ammelrooy would receive at least one visit from a sensually potent male suitor of some sort, but the heroine seems more interested in closely examining her own boobs and smoking blunts than smoking a fuckpole or being vaginally pillaged by some young hunk. Indeed, in the hysterically feminine world of It's Me, men are not even part of the equation, which is unfortunate considering that the heroine seems like she could at least be temporarily relieved of her internal turmoil if some kind young man were to make her feel like a real woman by sexually ravage her.

While only mere speculation, I can only assume that the heroine's single greatest obsession is trying on new clothes and shoes, which she does countless times during the film. Indeed, when van Ammelrooy straps on a pair of fancy high-heels, she does it in such a sensual and sensitive fashion that one can only assume the sort of delicacy that she puts into diddling herself. In contrast, when the heroine brushes her hair, she does so in a sinister fashion to the point where it seems like she might explode into a seething rage of irrational violence. In another scene, the heroine demonstrates her physical elegance by performing a little ballet routine while smoking a joint and fiddling with a large feathered fan in a fairly dark room that is lit by nothing but a small static TV screen. Of course, van Ammelrooy spends a little bit of time watching some Zwartjes-esque black-and-white footage of herself on a tiny TV screen during a fleeting metacinematic moment that seems to be a nod to the director's previous black-and-white shorts. After opting to play with her hair and making it quite curly, the heroine hatefully stares into the camera and then subsequently has a mental breakdown of sorts where she kicks things around her apartment and eventually sheds tears of anger and frustration. In fact, van Ammelrooy eventually mentally deteriorates to such a troubling degree that she begins pacing back and forth in her flat while mumbling incoherent mumbo jumbo. As to why the heroine acts the bizarre way that she does, she gives a hint when she states to her phantom audience, "ME. . . I'm not tired. I'm not lazy, too. I just do my profession. This is me. I'm only an actress" and then coughs and complains in a less than believable fashion, "I'm dying." Towards the end of the film, the heroine picks up her obviously much prized gold-colored phone and spouts what can only be described as a garbled mess, though it seems somewhat doubtful that there is someone on the other line. When van Ammelrooy eventually gets off the phone, she sheds a tear as if she cannot bear the fact that no one is calling or interested in her. In the end in what is undoubtedly a fittingly unnervingly beautiful conclusion to an unnervingly beautiful film, the heroine stares directly at the viewer with a smirk on her face that grows from a goofy smile to maniacal laughing.

If It's Me seems to be about anything, it about female narcissism, delusion, and self-deception, which of course seems to be especially prevalent in attractive actresses who have assuredly infected the rest of Occidental women with their perverse prima donna propensities. Undoubtedly van Ammelrooy's character seems like a sort of Dutch porn star Norma Desmond, albeit without the wealth and prestige that she would need to keep spectators and servants around to pay witness to her megalomaniacal displays of infantile vanity and nostalgic self-worship. Indeed, in many ways, one could argue that It's Me is one of the most misogynistic films ever made (incidentally, Zwartjes' later feature Pentimento was viciously attacked by feminists, who once raided a screening of the film and destroyed a print) as it paints an unsettling portrait of the so-called fairer sex, but I seriously doubt that it was the director's intention as Zwartjes has never been a filmmaker with any strong intellectual or socio-political pretenses, even if one could argue that his cinematic works say more about their particular zeitgeist than most Dutch films from the same era. More than anything, I could not help but be reminded of the ideas of anti-feminist Jewess Esther Vilar in her revolutionary text The Manipulated Man (1971) in regard to women and how they only seem to be concerned with what other members of their sex think. After all, throughout the film, van Ammelrooy is either comparing herself to other women or attempting to look like other women by trying on various outfits, thus providing credence to Vilar's words, "Yes, only women exist in a woman's world."

It's Me

The women she meets at church, at parent-teacher meetings, or in the supermarket; the women with whom she chats over the garden fence; the women at parties or window-shopping in the more fashionable streets; those she apparently never seems to notice – these women are the measure of her success or failure. Women's standards correspond to those in other women's heads, not to those in the heads of men; it is their judgment that really counts, not that of men [...] Men really have no idea in what kind of world women live in; their hymns of praise miss all the vital points." Indeed, the genius of It's Me is that, although it only features one single character who rarely speaks, it is quite apparent that her superlatively superficial mind is almost solely focused on the styles, mannerisms, make-up, and hairdos of other women as if she is totally devoid of both an independent mind and distinct personality. Of course, the heroine's truest self is ultimately revealed during her rather unflattering moments of neurotic rage.

It has been my personal experience that the more a woman changes her appearance in a dramatic fashion and 'reinvents' herself, the more mentally unstable she is. I have also noticed that when women are at a low point in their lives and 'feel' ugly, especially when they have dumped or have been dumped by a boyfriend, they tend to get a ridiculously unbecoming hairdo that matches their melancholy or general mental instability. Of course, it is quite revealing that the uniquely unhinged female of It's Me incessantly tries in vain to find a look that she will be content with, as her behavior demonstrates a perpetual state of internal chaos that no shitty dye or perm job could help alleviate. Notably, the heroine seems the most relaxed and mentally sound when she is naked, as if she feels completely free and not plagued by psychological and cosmetic baggage. On the other hand, as Vilar noted in regard to women and their natural naked state, "Woman regards her natural self merely as the raw material of a woman. Not the raw material but the end result has to be judged. Unmade-up, without curls and bracelets and necklaces, women are not yet really present. This explains why they do not mind running around in curlers or with cold cream on their faces. It is not 'they' at that stage – they are still occupied with the process of becoming 'them.' They succeed with this sort of make-believe all the more easily because they are not hampered by any kind of intelligence." Judging by Vilar's admittedly rough but nonetheless reasonable remark, one can only assume that the great self-loathing Hebrew Otto Weininger was not too far off when he described women as being innately soulless and lacking true individuality, for their main concern is superficial appearances and maintaining a perennial aesthetic masquerade lest men discover that they are nowhere as intriguing or enigmatic as they would have you believe.

I think it is quite fitting that a film entitled It's Me ultimately demystifies female beauty and presents it as an absurd charade, as the viewer ultimately sees what is arguably post-WWII Holland's most famous diva at her most literally and figuratively naked. Indeed, while a good number of men like to put pussy on a pedestal, especially premium grade pussy, and see dames as Delphic creatures that can never be truly understood, most women are thoroughly less intriguing than the extravagant costumes and make-up they wear, or as Vilar noted in regard to the major con that is femininity, "This femininity, synthetic in origin, consists of two different components: emphasis on secondary sexual characteristics and distancing herself by means of masks [...] The first component serves to make her desirable to man, the second to make her mysterious to him. She herself thus creates the equivocal, unknown 'opposite sex,' making it easier for him to accept his enslavement. Thanks to the wide range of possible transformations each woman can offer a man – and a 'real' woman varies her looks just a little every day – she keeps him in a state of constant bewilderment. While he is still trying to find yesterday's woman in today's, she gains time to achieve her own ends. She will maneuver the man into an untenable position, all the time skillfully distracting his attention from the stench of a rotting mind beneath the pleasing mask." Of course, it could be argued that the deathly pale corpse-like women featured in Zwartjes' classic shorts like Visual Training are a symbolic depiction of womankind in its unmasked state and It's Me is simply the auteur's first realist work.

Aside from possibly effeminate dope-addled frog Philippe Garrel (Le reveleateur, La cicatrice intérieure aka The Inner Scar), no other heterosexual cinematic auteur has demonstrated a deeper obsession for womankind in their natural habitat than Zwartjes, which is arguably most apparent in It's Me where the viewer is forced to confront a less than mentally sound diva without both her literal and figurative make-up, thus making for a fairly singular cinematic experience that is just as grueling as it is rewarding. Undoubtedly the film will prove to be a strangely unsettling experience for any heterosexual man that has ever had to deal with the incessant indecisiveness, irrationality, and self-obsession of a beautiful broad who believes her physical appearance and, in turn, mental well-being and personal comfort are above all other concerns in the world. Of course, as Zwartjes' film hints during the scenes where the lead attempts to act like a Golden Age Hollywood diva, the art of cinema has only compounded these particular forms of female psychosis as virtually all women now find themselves comparing themselves to the greatest beauties of the silver screen.

Somewhat ironically, despite lacking the pancake make-up and eerie undead eroticism that is associated with the female figures in the director's earlier films, the all-too-female heroine portrayed by van Ammelrooy is easily the most inately grotesque, repugnant, and insufferable woman that I have ever encountered in a Zwartjes flick. Indeed, while the viewer is exposed to van Ammelrooy's naughty seductive stares and provocative physical gestures, It's Me is ultimately about as erotic as watching a raving afro-adorned negress receive electroshock therapy, even though Zwartjes still manages to showcase the heroine's pulchritude. Notably, despite depicting the largely ugly and painful emotions of a delectable dame in a tiny apartment, it is also indubitably one of Zwartjes' most beautiful films. Aside from the strikingly tableaux and agonizingly alluring lead, the film certainly benefits from its original electronic musical score by Zwartjes and Lodewijk de Boer (who created music for a number of Zwartjes' films and who later directed van Ammelrooy in his sole feature The Family (1973), which anticipates the ambient sounds of contemporary underground Danish musical projects associated with like record labels like Posh Isolation and Janushoved, including Internazionale, Croatian Amor, and Rosen & Spydde, among various others. While I must stop short of describing It's Me as a lost masterpiece, it is, like most of Zwartjes' oeuvre, certainly ripe for rediscovery among serious cinephiles that appreciate filmmakers that test the bounds of the entire artistic medium of cinema. Certainly, one also cannot ignore a film that more or less subtly affirms Weininger's wise timeless words: "A man's real nature is never altered by education: woman, on the other hand, by external influences, can be taught to suppress her most characteristic self, the real value she sets on sexuality. Woman can appear everything and deny everything, but in reality she is never anything. Women have neither this nor that characteristic; their peculiarity consists in having no characteristics at all; the complexity and terrible mystery about women come to this; it is this which makes them above and beyond man's understanding – man, who always wants to get to the heart of things. . ."

THE GREAT MAGICIAN

Frans Zwartjes (2006)

Dutch Renaissance man Frans Zwartjes has had a less than ideal life; his father died when he was 9 years old, his mother was an ex-nun turned mental health worker, and he (voluntarily) lived in a mental institution for a weighty and artistically influential period of time. Luckily for Zwartjes, he did not mind seeing mental invalids relieve themselves in public before his very weary, sparkling starstruck eyes, but, instead, found an atypical sort of solace in it. In fact, such seemingly flustering scenarios would inspire his exceedingly grotesque short films that, even to this day, have no contemporaries in regard to their genuinely odiousness and narcotizing proto-death-rock aesthetic. Unlike the modern trend of firmly embracing the cult of victimhood, Zwartjes became an eclectic, highly productive, and profoundly expressionistic artist with a keen talent for playing and building string instruments (especially the violin), painting human portraits whose warped human physiques make those created by Egon Schiele seem like that of the Adonis-like figures concocted by Arno Breker by comparison, and directing some of the most aberrant yet strangely pulchritudinous short films ever made. In the documentary De grote Tovenaar (2006) aka The Great Magician directed by Ruud Monster, Frans Zwartjes, the creator of some of the most audacious surrealist cinematic works ever created, is ironically revealed to be a modest man who tells the story of his life and audacious art at a vocal pitch that is not much louder than a humble and saintly whisper. Had someone not known anything about Zwartjes nor his art, one could easily mistake the subversive artist for a Calvinist pastor and not a man committed to total depravity. Of course, had Zwartjes' Dutch Calvinist ancestors seen his art, he would have surely been burnt at the stake. Modernly, Zwartjes is considered an anti-Christ among estrogen-deprived feminists, indubitably a notable honor of sorts, as they find his cinematic depictions of those members of the fairer sex involved in erotic 'water sports' to be most reprehensible.

I do not think it would be an exaggeration to say that Frans Zwartjes is organically following in a grand and incomparable legacy of morbid and grueling Dutch art. Following in the tradition of demonological works painted by early Dutch Renaissance painters Hieronymus Bosch and Pieter Bruegel (Brueghel) the Elder, the short films of Frans Zwartjes are stark religious works for the mostly materialistic post-WWII era. As he explains in The Great Magician, Zwartjes has devoured many highly inspirational esoteric religious texts, including the Sanskrit Rig Veda and Vedanta, related works of Indian mystical literature, and texts written by German Christian mystic Meister Eckhart. Combined with his very personal experience with seemingly possessed mental patients, Zwartjes films reflect the penetrating spirit of a deeply religious (if pessimistic) man whose post-Christian and post-traditional sentiments bleed deeply (both literally and figuratively) through his uncompromising art. Oddly enough, Zwartjes also credits traditional opera for giving him the emotional development and confidence he needed as an artist. As a man who is known for creating films that are exaggeratedly visceral and portrays the body in a state of endless, cadaver-like decay, it is somewhat queer that Frans Zwartjes has also cites something so common and ordinary as the nude and natural human body as one of his greatest influences. As he explains quite vividly and unabashedly in The Great Magician, Mr. Zwartjes would often frequent nude beaches and gaze at the stripped bodies of both men and women of all ages for artistic encouragement, henceforth, developing an especially keen partialness for mother nature's most rosy flesh flower; the female vagina. In fact, it is quite apparent in the documentary that Zwartjes is most jubilant when he discusses in fanatical detail his distinct love for the mystique behind the naturally fragrant female meat-curtain. Of course, like his cinematic portrayal of every other body part, Zwartjes' various onscreen scenes of the penis flytrap are comparable to a cold, wet axe-wound on a mobile cadaver lurking menacingly in a dark, uncharted subterranean netherworld. Needless to say, the 'Great Magician' of The Great Magician is a renegade regal neo-Gothic artist who sees the world through a unique personal lens that have accredited him with ability to be an unintentional and unofficial prophetic apocalyptic priest of sorts. Like all religious works, the films of Frans Zwartjes strike fear and bewilderment into the uninitiated, but bring consolation to the enlightened proselyte.

If any filmmaker can capture what modern man looks like on the inside, it is indubitably Frans Zwartjes. As expressed so sharply in his films, the soulless man of contemporary times is a grotesque, Zombie-like being who obsesses over every and any perversion, so long as it does not have any practical utilitarian purpose and actually result in the reproduction of progeny. In the eyes of Zwartjes, the modern man is also a preposterous pig who incessantly consumes without even the slightest inkling of self-control. In Zwartjes' short Visual Training (1969), a debauched and decaying man and a couple ghoulish gals find themselves preparing a woman's voluptuous (if disgusting) buttocks with ungodly seasonings and ingredients, as if she is the main course in a cannibalistic buffet. These seemingly pernicious and ill-disposed individuals in the film later stare into the camera in a most menacing way, thus throwing the voyeuristic viewer out of their comfort zone in a strangely alluring way. If all of the characters in Frans Zwartjes' films have anything have in common, it is their irrevocable loss of soul and ever ambient presence of tragedy, as if these individuals have accepted their everlasting interment in Hades and have met a similar fate to Dorian Gray. During the conclusion of The Great Magician, Frans Zwartjes mentions how orgone-obsessed psychoanalyst Wilhelm Reich once described artists as suffering from an, "Emotional plague." Zwartjes goes on to humbly acknowledge that he noticed this same internal affliction in the mental patients he worked with during his early adult years, thus expressing his quaint solidarity with the mentally and metaphysically challenged.

Despite the aura of aesthetic perfection that permeates quite consistently throughout all of his work, Zwartjes nonchalantly confesses in The Great Magician that many of his films were made with comfortable ease and through accidental artistic success. For example, Zwartjes claims that his first color film Living (1971) was shot with a mere two rolls of film and that not a second of the footage went unused. To edit Living, Zwartjes simply developed and attached both rolls of film and fidgeted with the speed of various scenes. Like all of his films, Living features Zwartjes' signature discordant editing style that is bound to bring emotional disharmony and transcendental discombobulation to the soul of even the most stoic and seasoned of cinephiles. As a film professor, Frans Zwartjes expects nothing short of authenticity and artistic ingenuity from his novice film students. Unlike most American film schools, Zwartjes feels that learning the technical 'trade school' aspects of filmmaking is not enough and that one must have something truly exceptional to communicate. As he explains in The Great Magician, Zwartjes' idiosyncratic brand of filmmaking is fundamentally intuitive, script-less, and uniquely uncontrived; a personal quasi-dilletante style of unteachable cinematic creation that he recommends aspiring filmmakers to stay clear of as it naturally repels prospective financiers. In short, Frans Zwartjes is a perfectly pigheaded auteur whose abominable will-to-create has empowered him to be one of the greatest filmmakers of his time and one of the most splendidly morose and malcontent movie mavericks to have ever lived. Indeed, Frans Zwartjes, like the original cinemagician Georges Méliès (who was himself of 1/2 Dutch ancestry), is a great black magician of celluloid whose mastery of craft will never be upstaged nor plenteously plagiarized. The Great Magician is a good as documentaries get in dissecting an individual auteur film director and his works, but one must acknowledge that Frans Zwartjes' honest, unpretentious attitude and lack of ambiguity (as is usually typical of artists of all stripes) are largely responsible for the clarity and comprehensiveness of this fine filmmaker portrait. On top of featuring candid interviews with Zwartjes, The Great Magician also features lengthy excerpts from all of the auteur filmmaker's films, which give further lucidity to his personal story. For staunch patrons of cultivated cinema and/or the films of Frans Zwartjes, The Great Magician is a must-see affair, as it is a documentary work that somewhat objectively attempts to deconstruct a filmmaker whose personal and artistic integrity and spirituality still manage to triumph over the confinement of mere academic analysis, thus, the cinemagician still remains elusive despite his story being more than sufficiently told.

DIE AUSGESPERRTEN
DIE AUSGESPERRTEN

Franz Novotny (1982)

As far as made-for-television films are concerned, you probably won't find a greater, more biting, and sickly sardonic one than the fairly obscure Austrian TV-movie Die Ausgesperrten (1982) aka The Excluded directed by Franz Novotny and based on the novel of the same written by the terribly pessimistic and nihilistic Nobel Prize winner Elfride Jelinek (The Piano Teacher, Luft). Also co-writing the screenplay and starring as one of the film's characters in her sole acting role to date, there is no doubt Jelinek certainly gave her 'seal of approval' to the makers of Die Ausgesperrten, but while the book mainly focuses on the characters' contemplative thoughts, the film merely captures their everyday words and deeds. As an Austrian of ½ Jewish ancestry and lifelong committed feminist and card-carrying communist, Jelinek is internationally notorious for her anti-Nazi and anti-bourgeois themes as they act as a crucial and innate quality of her work and the film Die Ausgesperrten is no exception. Following two seemingly well-mannered yet unsavory and sadistic siblings and their 'recruited' friends (two of whom are ironically named after pacifistic anti-Nazi resistance 'fighters' Sophia and Hans Scholl of the Weißerose fame) as they frantically and regretfully 'come-of-age' in late 1950s Vienna, Die Ausgesperrten is a cinematic work that unsentimentally dwells on Austria's National Socialist past and the irreparable affects it had on the post-WWII generation. Having a crippled and thoroughly sadomasochistic ex-SS officer as a father and a servile mother that ignores his blatantly abusive behavior against the entire family, the Lenfant terrible teens of Die Ausgesperrten take reactionary revenge against society by stealing, vandalizing, and even killing around the cosmopolitan city they call home. Curiously, Elfride Jelinek's real-life father was a Czech Jew who remained unscathed during the Nazi era due to his talents as a chemist, so one can only speculate whether or not he acted as an inspiration for the distinctly debauched father in Die Ausgesperrten. With a strikingly swarthy, Semite-like appearance on the level of aesthetic absurdity, it is quite perverse yet devilishly ribald to watch the father as he fondly reminisces over brutally raping countless Jewesses as a SS man as if he were the vaudevillian equivalent of Amon Goeth. In fact, throughout the entirety of Die Ausgesperrten, there is not a single character that would have made for the ideal Aryan poster boy, which was almost certainly a conscious decision made by the makers of the film. They may hate the Nazis and their parents, but the siblings of Die Ausgesperrten – being dedicated nihilists with violent anarchic proclivities – are certainly their father's kids as especially testified by the film's singularly brutal and marvelously macabre ending.

Being a doomed generation, at least in the metaphysical sense, the kinky kids of Die Ausgesperrten get their demagoguery kicks by engaging in loveless fucking in high school bathrooms, running over fellow teenagers with cars, brutally beating bourgeois gentlemen, and dreaming of America in a less than romantic fashion. Austria may not have a glorious future but it has an infamous past that acts as a foreboding reminder of the characters unpleasant birthright as a defeated people with a bloodstained history. Beginning during the year 1942, the turning point of the Second World War, with a scene of unimpressed SS officers looking bored to death as they view an anti-Semitic play featuring the father "Otto" playing a Rabbi and wearing a XXXL prosthetic hook-nose, Die Ausgesperrten immediately sets the tone for what is one of the most snidely comical and mirthfully misanthropic films ever made. Jumping ahead to the year 1959 in Vienna, Otto is now missing a leg, most of his hair, and his dignity, but at least he still has his dark sense of humor, which he passes on to his two cultured yet curiously callous children Peter (Paulus Manker) and Anna (Ursula Knobloch). In part, the behavior of the two turbulent teens somewhat resembles that of 12-year-old protagonist Antoine Doinel from François Truffaut's The 400 Blows (1959) had the boy gone on to mature into a machinating maniac with an antipathy for all things relating to love and family. Forget the amazingly aberrant Aryan children of Village of the Damned (1960), the conniving kids of Die Ausgesperrten are the real children of the damned. Somewhat attempting to wear a mask of sanity among the general public (in between assaulting/vulgarizing/burglarizing them), arrogant anti-hero Peter has no qualms about announcing to his compatriots that "crime is pure will," as if he is a Nietzschean of the anarchic-libertine Georges Bataille variety. In the public arena, Anna is a bit more forward than her brother, proclaiming to her priggish teacher (played by Jelinek herself in an ostensibly ironic and humorous role) that, "The human has to give himself to those extreme actions commonly considered crimes or choose death." Indeed, as the days pass and their father becomes all the more bestial in his sexual torture of the mother, the teens further embrace their pigheaded philosophy of active apostasy, of which the older Nazi generation has no understanding. In one particularly telling scene, a victim of the torrid teens calls them, "Goddamn surrealists!" as if he is on the brink of spewing a Nazi diatribe about the connection between Communism/Judaism and degenerate art. It is only at the end of the film that anti-hero Peter interrogates his mother about his father Otto's behavior that he finally transcends nihilism and takes serious and decisive action in regard to his family's certainly uncertain fate.

Predating and ultimately anticipating the thematically brutal and nihilistic and aesthetically grim films of Austrian auteur filmmaker's Michael Haneke (who later directed an adaptation of Jelinek's The Piano Teacher), Gerald Kargl (Angst), and Paulus Manker (who incidentally plays the lead "Peter"), Die Ausgesperrten, despite its ridiculously obscure and neglected status even in its own nation of origin, is assuredly one of the most important works of post-WWII Austrian (and German-speaking) cinema. Not unsurprisingly, Paulus Manker would prove to be just as competent as a director as an actor with Weiningers

Nacht (1990) aka Weininger's Last Night, a film about one of Vienna's most important and tragic intellectual figures, and The Moor's Head (1995) aka Der Kopf des Mohren, a work quite comparable to Die Ausgesperrten that follows the slow but steady and shocking disintegration of an Austrian middle-class family. Although similar in theme to a lot of Michael Haneke's films, Die Ausgesperrten – with its furiously farcical tone – is ultimately more palatable yet demanding than most of the Austrian filmmaker's cinematic works. That being said, I do not think it would be an exaggeration to state that it is quite improbable that the films of Haneke and Manker would exist, at least in their present form, without the crucial influence of Die Ausgesperrten; a work that is quite arguably the greatest TV-movie ever made, at least in the German-speaking world. Undoubtedly, Die Ausgesperrten did for Austrian cinema what the cinematic works of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Wim Wenders, and Volker Schlöndorff did for German cinema; giving a voice to 'The Third Generation'; the Hitlerite era's unwanted, discontented, and ill-fated progeny. Although considerably less well known and critically revered, Die Ausgesperrten is most assuredly Austria's 'Rebel Without a Cause', but unlike the spoiled American youth of James Dean's generation, Hitler's spiritual grandchildren have something to be truly embittered and unruly about.

ABELARD THE CASTRATION

Franz Seitz (1977)

Abelard the Castration is an extremely rare '77 Germanic art piece about the discovery of the corpses of infamous early lovers Abelard and Héloïse and more importantly, castration. This piece in particular has been deemed as simple sleaze but there lies a greater destiny for this film. It is indeed a shame that this is a piece that may be outside the confines of arthouse cinema for eternity. Two art students and part-time lovers experience life at its finest. Interwoven with this timeline is footage of their court case leading to the horrible impending realization of what they were charged for. They share themselves, men, and artistic experiences. I can imagine this lifestyle to be simplistic and very relaxing while not having to worry about presentation or accommodation. These "Art dykes" discover the bodies of the infamous lovers and proceed with caution as the idea of love becomes increasingly familiar. During an extremely graphic (and real) scene of watching a horse get castrated, these "liberal left wing lesbians" become entranced with a veterinarian doctor whom they share exotic bedroom adventures. Sharing is caring in this film that predates Dead Ringers. Many aesthetics are shared and common ground is marked. If this weren't such a bitch to get a hold of, I'd imagine Cronenberg being partially inspired. The film takes a brutal and extremist turn when the duo finds him in bed with another woman. Passions over heat and these feeble women eye a set of surgical tools. In a fit of blind rage, they proceed to castrate the knocked out man while security rushes to save the poor bloke. Not exactly shown but implied, this is a very real scene of a manhood being destroyed. The women, covered in his blood, realize what they've done and run away shrieking. Abelard the Castration isn't a stunning film. The production assets set the film back a couple of notches. I blame the director for not finding a point of interest during his filming. The camera just seems to trail around until finally setting on one of the scorned leads. I'm very grateful for the basic knowledge of the German language that I'd acquired from my schoolings. Had I not known the basics, the lack of subtitles might have destroyed any chances of me enjoying this film. Abelard the Castration is what I'd expect it to be; cunning, ruthless, and Germany's answer for Audition, albeit a lot more brutal.

Franziska Buch (2001)

Long before pedantic proto-hipster Jim Jarmusch (Down by Law, Only Lovers Left Alive), whose second feature film Stranger Than Paradise (1984) was partly funded by the West German TV channel ZDF, was copying auteur filmmakers of the French New Wave and creating 'offbeat' crime and neo-noir flicks featuring degenerate jazz soundtracks and goofy lackluster characters, Teutonic filmmakers like Klaus Lemke (48 Stunden bis Acapulco aka 48 Hours to Acapulco, Rocker), Rudolf Thome (Rote Sonne aka Red Sun, Der Philosoph aka The Philosopher), Volker Schlöndorff (A Degree of Murder aka Mord und Totschlag) and Rainer Werner Fassbinder (Liebe ist kälter als der Tod aka Lover is Colder than Death, Gods of the Plague aka Götter der Pest), among countless others, were making stripped down and statically directed counter-culture crime flicks that inspired naïve teenagers to listen to outmoded Negro music and idealize anarchic gangsters. Indeed, somehow some of these now mostly forgotten films managed to reconcile the films of Humphrey Bogart and Raoul Walsh with the primitive celluloid (anti)counter-culture experiments of Andy Warhol/Paul Morrissey, thus making for curious cinematic works with mixed results that have aged less than gracefully over the decades but sometimes make for semi-interesting novelties nonetheless, with Detektive (1969) aka Detectives directed by Rudolf Thome being an excellent example of this sort of 'neo-detektivfilm.' Starring model and counter-culture sex icon Uschi Obermaier—the one-time sexual partner of Jimi Hendrix, Mick Jagger, and Kommune 1 founder/all-around hippie charlatan Rainer Langhans—Detektive, which was auteur Thome's first attempt at directing a feature film, is a quasi-absurdist and less than hard-boiled crime anti-thriller that reminds one why hippies should probably never mess with a masculine film genre. Also starring actor-turned-director Ulli Lommel (Die Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe aka The Tenderness of Wolves, Cocaine Cowboys) and co-shot by cinematographer-turned-director Niklaus Schilling (Nachtshatten aka Nightshade, Rhinegold aka Rheingold), Detektive is essentially a primitive work from the early days of German New Cinema when most Teutonic filmmakers of that time unfortunately had an acute case of Francophilia coupled with cultural-masochism and it certainly shows in Thome's cinematic debut, even if I found it infinitely more interesting than Jean-Luc Godard's À bout de souffle (1960) aka Breathless. A German flick where virtually every character has a swarthy complexion and scrawny and/or pathetic physique, not to mention chicks that look like they were imported from the Slavic East and characters with American-like names, Detektive is, at least aesthetically speaking, as anti-Teutonic as films come. In other words, Detektive would have probably been less appealing to Leni Riefenstahl than Joey Goebbels and would have F.W. Murnau wishing he was on some Polynesian island somewhere.

Sebastian West (Ulli Lommel) and Andy Schubert (Marquard Bohm) are Munich-based private detectives that own a company with the nice generic name 'West and Schubert,' as if they are psychopathic lawyers who hide their immorality with an intentionally banal exterior. When Herr Schubert goes to spy on a chick named Annabella Quant (Iris Berben) after being hired by her supposed husband Busse (Peter Moland, who would later co-direct Haytabo (1971) with Ulli Lommel), he learns the job is pretty much a dead-end with no real payoff. On top of not really being Busse's wife, Annabella falls in love at first sight with Schubert and the two 'hook up.' Naturally, Busse goes to the West and Schubert flips out, attempting to shoot the detectives, but they beat him and make him their little bitch. Among other things, Busse is a broke middle-aged trust fund brat with a rather repellant bald-spot who is in trouble for embezzlement and has nil money to pay the detectives, so they keep him around as a sort of cuckolded slave, at least until they can no longer tolerate his moronic behavior and meek demeanor. West and Schubert 'share' a pretty personal assistant named Micky (Uschi Obermaier) who they, among other things, enjoy taking naps with when they should be working. Although a rather anarchistic detective agency already, the company eventually begins to fall apart when they can no longer pay their bills and have their furniture taken away, so West declares, "The time has come for everyone to think of themselves," but fate has other plans for the men. Eventually, the detectives are assigned to take on a case for a certain old rich dude named Krueger (Walter Rilla), who is concerned that his much younger ex-girlfriend named Christa (Elke Haltaufderheide, who would later become the filmic diva of Niklaus Schilling) who is in cahoots with a swarthy ghoul of a man named Reininger (Dieter Busch) who claims to be a pharmaceutical salesman by trade. Apparently, if Krueger drops dead, Christa plans to cash in 100,000DM via insurance policy and apparently Reininger wants a piece of the pie. Detective West goes by Christa's home and charms her, ultimately hiding a small recording device in one of her houseplants. And, indeed, the recording device reveals that Christa and her man Reininger are conspiring to get rid of Krueger via poisoning. Meanwhile, it is revealed that Krueger wants Christa's little blond boy Florian (Florian Obermaier) as a replacement for his own deceased son. While Krueger's plan seem dubious, Sebastian is confident he is on his side, remarking, "Krueger trusts me. He loves me. Yesterday he cooked for me. I reminded him of his son, clear case." In the end, a number of plot twists are revealed, including that both West and Schubert's assistant Annabella and Christa's co-conspirator Reininger had been hired by Krueger, who tried to setup his ex-babe so he could take custody of Florian. When Christa is confronted about her intentions to poison Krueger, she defends herself by absurdly stating, "I was hoping – maybe it was silly – that he would marry me once he saw that I could have poisoned him, and didn't." Despite thwarting his own poisoning, Krueger ironically gets poisoned in the end and thus Christa gets to both keep her son and cash in on the old man's life insurance policy. On top of that, Schubert asks Christa to marry him and everyone lives happily after, or not as demonstrated by one of the character's closing remark, "Life is one of the toughest."

While tinkering around with film noir conventions like a true dilettante, auteur Rudolf Thome ultimately assembled a nihilistic black comedy of the decidedly dry yet quasi-deranged sort disguised as a sterile gumshoe flick with Detektive, a work quite like Fassbinder's first feature Lover is Colder than Death in terms of its deconstruction and radical reconstruction of old school American genre conventions. In my opinion, Fassbinder could have never had assembled his scatological slapstick comedy Satansbraten (1976) aka Satan's Brew, which also stars Ulli Lommel as a detective, had it not been for Detektive paving the way for such suavely played sardonic celluloid absurdity. Thome would follow up Detektive with the similarly toned yet all the more delightfully demented cult classic Rote Sonne (1970) aka Red Sun—a dystopian anti-sci-fi flick that also starred Marquard Bohm and Uschi Obermaier about a commune of crazed hippie feminist chicks that collectively murder men simply because they have pricks—but the filmmaker never again achieved the success and cult status that he earned with his second feature, though unlike many of his cinematic compatriots (who are either dead or gave up on filmmaking altogether long ago), he still continues to direct films to this day. Apparently, the first cut of Detektive was much different than what was officially released as Thome revealed in a small autobiography he wrote featured at moanafilm.de: "When I finished shooting Detektive (Detectives), I promised Hellman [producer Carol Hellman] that I would complete the initial editing in two weeks. I hired two cutters, rented two editing rooms, and did two people's work. After two weeks the first cut was finished and the film was about 150 minutes long. Hellman saw it and thought that the film was a catastrophe. He demanded that I agree (I had a clause in the contract granting me the sole right to make artistic decisions) to postdubbing (it had been made with original sound), that it be shortened to ninety minutes, and that I add three sex scenes at points in the film where this was possible. For two months we didn't speak and finally when I realized that the film would not be released unless I gave in, I said I would accept point one and point two of his conditions." While I enjoyed Detektive more than I suspected I would, a 150-minute cut of the film seems like it would be a rather grueling experience, even with all of Ulli Lommel's charm and all. As Thome's very first feature, Detektive is unequivocally a formative work, but a rather audacious one nonetheless that demonstrates the filmmaker could have evolved into a much greater talent had not so many of his dream film projects fallen through. A counter-culture anti-noir with cheeky eroticism and humor that somehow manages not to totally suck, Detektive probably deserves to be a minor cult classic of sorts, but since German film companies do not seem interested in releasing their films outside the Fatherland, let alone with English subtitles, it is pretty much a given that Thome's flick is headed for perennial obscurity, which is a shame since it is more provocative and intriguing than virtually any frog Nouvelle Vague film noir flick I have ever seen.

NEITHER THE SEA NOR THE SAND

Fred Burnley (1972)

While horror cinema can sometimes be rather romantic in a somewhat sleazy sort of way (especially if vampires are involved), genuine horror-romance hybrids featuring an equal amount of attributes from both genres are exceedingly rare for obvious reasons, as Jane Austen fan-girls could care less about body counts and no die hard gorehound wants to consider the idea that zombies can be lovelorn. While classic Gothic flicks like Alfred Hitchcock's Daphne du Maurier adaptation Rebecca (1940) and Jacques Tourneur's Val Lewton-produced classic Cat People (1942) mixed horror and romance to a certain degree, they did it in a somewhat traditional quasi-Victorian fashion and not in a modern way that would appeal to most post-Night of the Living Dead horror fans. While probably not featuring enough blood and guts to give 'torture porn' fetishists a hard-on or wet their gashes, the largely unknown British flick Neither the Sea Nor the Sand (1972) aka The Exorcism of Hugh directed by film editor turned one-time feature film director Fred Burnley is a rare horror-romance hybrid that manages to have more or less equal doses of both genres. Based on the somewhat more popular 1969 novel of the same name by English author, playwright, stage actor, and popular newscaster Gordon Honeycombe (who incidentally portrayed a newscaster in the classic British horror flick The Medusa Touch (1978) starring Richard Burton), Burnley's film is a work I discovered upon reading about it in the book House of Psychotic Women: An Autobiographical Topography of Female Neurosis in Horror and Exploitation Films (2012) by Canadian horror/cult film cineaste Kier-La Janisse. While I certainly do not agree with Janisse on everything in regard to horror and exploitation, I can usually trust her opinion on films about truly hysterical women who have become sad forsaken slaves to 'mad love' and she was certainly right in her praise of Neither the Sea Nor the Sand, which depicts the level of desperation a woman reaches after she falls in love for the first time after being unhappily married and must choose between a lovelorn life without her beau or the possibility of an eternity in hell with her one true love. Indeed, the film is about a doomed love affair between a woman who comes to the remote British Isle of Jersey during wintertime to think about whether or not she should divorce her husband and soon meets and falls in love with a sensitive islander, only for said sensitive islander to soon tragically drop dead during a vacation in Scotland yet for his corpse to reanimate and continue to 'haunt' his beloved, who is in complete denial of her beloved's death even though he cannot talk and his body is beginning to rot. Undoubtedly a somewhat slow and uneven work that could have easily been made better with a different musical score (horrendous Hebraic composer Nachum Heiman is probably best remembered, if at all, for his work on the Israeli cult flick An American Hippie in Israel (1972) aka Ha-Trempišt) and by editing out about 20 minutes or so, Burnley's film is still certainly a singularly haunting one-of-a-kind work that is like a somewhat superior quasi-supernatural horror equivalent to the somewhat botched Yukio Mishima adaptation The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea (1976) starring Sarah Miles and Kris Kristofferson sans annoying children meets John Carpenter's The Fog (1980) except less violent and set at daytime. Of course, the film is also much more genuinely romantic than My Boyfriend's Back (1993) as far as zombie romances are concerned and features a sort of impending metaphysical doom and gloom that is in stark contrast to its solacing beach scenes. Indeed, probably the most offensive thing about Neither the Sea Nor the Sand is that it really features some beautiful and breathtaking scenes that truly challenge the viewer's expectations in regard to the horror genre, which alone is reason enough to see it.

Anna Robinson (played by Susan Hampshire, who is probably best known for playing no less than five different characters in Harry Kümel's Jean Ray adaptation Malpertuis (1971) aka The Legend of Doom House) is stuck in a loveless marriage with a banal guy and she somewhat resents her husband because she hates being a housewife and feeling like a 'kept woman' and an 'object,' so she has come to the Isle of Jersey of the Bailiwick of Jersey to decide whether or not she should get a divorce. Luckily for her (or so it seems at first), Anna soon meets a tall, dark, and marginally handsome lighthouse-keeper named Hugh Dabernon (hack actor Michael Petrovitch of Tales That Witness Madness (1973) and Brian Trenchard-Smith's Turkey Shoot (1982) aka Escape 2000) while roaming the rocks near a lighthouse and she more or less instantly falls in love with him and his strangely charismatic ways, so she naturally does not have to think hard about whether or not she should divorce her dolt hubby. Upon first meeting Hugh outside the lighthouse he works at, Anna remarks to him, "It's very lonely here" and he matter-of-factly replies, "Like the edge of the world," which is probably the best way to describe how the two's love affair feels as they, like most couples that are genuinely in love, act like they are the only two people in the world. Hugh also sets the tone for what will happen later in the film by remarking regarding his rocky hometown, "Perhaps there's a road hidden under the water...lined with drowned souls," adding, "Before they built the lighthouse, this was a graveyard for ships." In the end, the area will also be the graveyard for the two foredoomed lovers.

As Hugh remarks to Anna regarding he and his older brother George Dabernon (Frank Finlay of Clive Donner's Dickens adaptation A Christmas Carol (1984) and Tobe Hooper's Colin Wilson adaptation Lifeforce (1985)), "We're all that's left of centuries of Dabernon lives." Indeed, Hugh comes from an ancient clan that has inhabited Jersey Island since the beginning of recorded history, thus lending a sort of vague mystical Lovecraftian feel to the film that certainly adds to its already foreboding atmosphere. Since George is obviously a closest queen and latent homo who clearly will never have kids of his home, it is ultimately up to Hugh as to whether the Dabernon family name will live on, but unfortunately fate has different plans for him and his genetic line will ultimately reach the same sad end as Lovecraft himself, as a man whose family name will die with him. Before he even kicks the bucket, Hugh acts somewhat eerie and morbid, as he has a sort of moody broody essence about him and says strange quasi-esoteric things to the protagonist like, "The past is another country...someone once said. We're a part of the past, Anna. Some part of us is always there," while the two are standing inside an ancient tomb. Of course, it is quite obvious that one of the reasons that Anna is so attracted to Hugh is because he, unlike her bourgeois husband, has a mystifying quality about him that she cannot quite pinpoint. As Anna complains regarding her husband, "What he really wanted was a wife, not a person. Just someone to be there...so old fashioned," yet she is certainly willing to be "old fashioned" with Hugh and live the life of a conventional housewife, even when her loverboy becomes a smelly rotten corpse. Hugh's parents died when he was young, so his camp-as-the-queen brother George raised him and is thus quite overprotective with him, as if he is a bitchy old mother who would love nothing more than to carry her son's testicles around in her purse. Indeed, when Hugh brings Anna back to the family house, his big bro acts quite bitchy as if he is on the rag and has run out of tampons. When George walks in on Anna and Hugh naked in the bed the next morning, he becomes exceedingly enraged and acts all the more bitchy and complains to his brother, "it's disgusting...in mother's bed" and "I don't want to find her here when I get back," as if he has incestuous feelings for his brother and wants to keep him for himself. As Hugh jokes to Anna regarding George while arguably hinting that his big bro is a homo, "He's never seen a naked woman in his entire life."

While they have only been together for a couple days, Anna soon tells Hugh, "I want to be with you always" and adds regarding her estranged husband, "He couldn't believe that in one week I could meet someone and everything would change." Upon meeting up at a loud and crowded restaurant, Hugh yells to Anna in a brief scene of comic relief, "I want to make love to you in Scotland," so the two soon take a honeymoon-like vacation to an idyllic coastal area of the country that does not look all that different from Jersey. When Hugh does boyish things like run in and out of a cave that ocean waves are constantly crashing into, Anna gets irrationally worried and bitches "I don't like it here" as if she can foresee that something terrible is about to happen to her lover. Naturally, when Anna runs down the coast in a giddy fashion while yelling childish things like "yay!" while her beau is chasing her from behind and eventually turns around to see Hugh lying on the beach as if he is dying, she completely panics and goes looking for help. Ultimately, Anna finds an old Scottish couple named Mr. and Mrs. MacKay (David Garth and Betty Duncan) who call a grouchy old physician named Dr. Irving (Jack Lambert of the Hammer horror flick Dracula: Prince of Darkness (1966) starring Christopher Lee) to come to Hugh's aid, but their efforts ultimately prove to be in vain. When Dr. Irving takes a look at Hugh and informs Anna that he has died of a heart attack, she cries so hysterically while screaming things like "It can't happen... It can't happen... He can't die. He can't die... He can't die... You can't die" and "You can't die. You said you'd never leave me. HE SAID HE'D NEVER LEAVE ME!" that the somewhat insensitive doctor has to shake her while yelling in her face, "Stop it! Stop it, you hear!" to calm her down. Upon learning that Hugh has died, Mr. MacKay somewhat humorously remarks, "He was a fine big fellow. Strange, him dying like that" and his wife superstitiously replies, "It's the Lord's judgment, that's what it is." After having a nightmare while sleeping at the MacKay's home, Anna gets her big wish when Hugh comes back to her in the middle of the night, though he does not seem like his normal aphorism-spouting self. Indeed, the next day Anna brags to the MacKays that there was a mistake and that Hugh is alive, or so she thinks.

Although Hugh does not say a single word the entire time and maintains a creepy sort of flat affect as if he is lacking a soul, Anna does not consider that there is something not quite right about her beau until a day later when they return to the Isle of Jersey and she demands that he speak and say "I love you" but he does nothing. Instead, Hugh is somehow eventually able to non-verbally 'transmit' "I love you" to Anna, as if he is a sort of ghost that has lost control of his decaying body. When George gets back to the house, he can instantly tell that his brother Hugh is a walking corpse and proceeds to berate Anna for causing his little bro's undead state, stating to her, "If it weren't for you, this would have never happened. He's possessed, isn't it? Possessed by you! You're a witch... trafficking with the devil. You have conjured an evil spirit into his dead body." Of course, Anna is in serious denial and remarks to George regarding Hugh's dubious condition, "My love for him has given him life." To demonstrate that Hugh is nothing but a rotting corpse, he sets his brother's hand on fire, which does not even cause the lighthouse-keeper to flinch. Ultimately, George comes up with the curious idea to have his brother get an exorcism (obviously, the film's alternate title The Exorcism of Hugh was later created to cash in on William Friedkin's The Exorcist (1973), which was actually released a year after Burnley's film), but while driving to the exorcist undead Hugh grabs the steering wheel and causes his big bro to drive off of a cliff and die when his van explodes and bursts into flames upon hitting the ground. When police come by the house to tell Hugh that his brother has died in a horrible accident, Anna tells the cop that he is dead and hands him a death certificate that was given to her by Dr. Irving. While Anna pretends that things are normal at first by making her lover extravagant meals that he does not touch and by ignoring the fact that he is a creepy fratricidal zombie with cold dead eyes that moves around like a somnambulist, the protagonist can only deny reality for so long before she begins losing her mind. As the days pass, Hugh's body begins to rot and his eyes turn black and Anna finally begins to accept reality and eventually cries to her zombie lover, "Please stop loving me, just please let me go. I don't want to die," but he will not go away, at least at first. After a fight where Anna beats in Hugh's postmortem pretty boy face with a candleholder and rips open the rotting flesh on his cheek and forehead, the lovelorn zombie finally gets a clue and decides to leave for good. While Hugh's slow-witted yet well-meaning coworker Collie (Michael Craze) comes by and brings Anna flowers after sensing that something might be wrong with her, the suicidally lovesick protagonist cannot get over her lover or the possibility of living life without him and follows him the sea where they are assumedly united in eternity via death in what is indubitably a genuinely darkly romantic ending. Indeed, while Anna might be somewhat of a birdbrained twat of a character, her devotion and commitment to her lover is strangely admirable and heartwarming in the end.

Interestingly, not unlike the character Hugh in Neither the Sea Nor the Sand, director Fred Burnley would die suddenly in a somewhat absurd fashion a couple years after the film's release in 1975 at the premature age of 41 and would never direct another film again. Even worse than suffering a heart attack despite being young and healthy like the character Hugh in the film, Burnley died of lung complications from exposure to bat feces (!) of all things while filming the documentary Alexander von Humboldt - 1799 for David Attenborough's 1975 series The Explorers. Starting out as an assistant director on the popular black comedy The Ladykillers (1955) starring Alec Guinness and Peter Sellers, Burnley basically mainly worked as an editor and BBC hack for most of his filmmaking career and never really got to try out his real talent on anything of significance aside from Neither the Sea Nor the Sand, which was both a commercial and critical failure, hence why he probably did not direct another feature during those three years before his untimely death in 1975. Considering the fact that it was only released once on VHS in the UK and nowhere else, the film was actually fairly hard to find until relatively recently after it received a DVD release in both the UK and the United States. Featuring an uniquely unsettling and almost otherworldly use of the sea comparable to Matt Cimber's The Witch Who Came from the Sea (1976) starring Millie 'Anne Frank' Perkins and unconventional approach to the undead somewhat comparable to Bob Clark's Deathdream (1974) aka Dead of Night, Neither the Sea Nor the Sand ultimately manages to capture the best and worst of 1970s horror cinema as a sort of morbid yet romantic soap opera-ish melodrama where all the characters sport aesthetically vulgar post-hippie haircuts and wardrobes. Indeed, it is certainly the sort of horror film you might have expected from Douglas Sirk had he been apolitical and somewhat less talented. Ultimately, in its depiction of a woman living with the reanimated corpse of her dead lover, Neither the Sea Nor the Sand is a sort of allegory for the irrevocable pain that one feels upon losing a lover for whatever reason, thereupon making for a rare horror flick that will certainly bore the shit out of teenage zombie film fans yet at the same time can be appreciated by people that loathe horror so long as they have ever experienced heartbreak. Somewhat strangely, the film also resembles the François Ozon flick Sous le sable (2000) aka Under the Sand starring Charlotte Rampling so much that I have to assume that the screenwriters of the French flick had to have seen Burnley's work and felt it would be a good movie to quasi-plagiarize due to its relative obscurity. While not exactly up there with Leslie Megahey's Sheridan Le Fanu adaptation Schalcken the Painter (1979) in terms of artistic merit and emotional impact as a work of idiosyncratic British Gothic horror, Neither the Sea Nor the Sand is certainly infinitely more intriguing, enthralling, and inventive than probably 95% of both zombie flicks and horror films in general that have been released over the past decade or so.

NIGHT OF THE CREEPS

Fred Dekker (1986)

Night of the Creeps is a fan boy flick at the corniest of degrees. The film takes a postmodern approach to various cult films from a number of decades. Night of the Creeps makes reference of everything from Plan 9 From Outerspace to The Monster Squad (another film from Night of the Creeps writer/director Fred Dekker). The cold war era sci-fi film, slasher film, zombie film, and even 1950's Hollywood teenage rebellion are all parodied. All of these elements are combined with the teenage angst "underdog" film so widely popular in the 1980s. The film follows two neurotic (a love shy boy Chris and a cripple C.G.) butt buddies who just can't seem to land a girl (C.G. isn't even trying). A group of Aryan frat Nazis act as the evil and dumb villains. In an act of belligerent courage the crippled C.G. says to the frat Gestapo, "why don't you get off our case and practice goose stepping or something." This scene is to demonstrate to the viewer that anyone with physical strength and blonde hair is a potential Nazi. Later you see the frat leader wearing a wife beater with a German eagle to confirm his Aryan ethnocentrism.

Sieg Heil Mein Führer!

Determined Nazi Hunters from the school of Simon Wiesenthal Chris eventually gets to legitimize his desire for a holocaust of Aryans. All of the frat boys turn into zombies Bill Hinzman style and Chris decides it's time to unload some bullets. When he blows the heads off of the zombie frat leaders he adds the strategically placed one liner, "don't take it personally" with sadistic fan boy wit. The pathetic hatred fantasy involved in these scenes almost legitimizes Fritz Hippler's The Eternal Jew as a serious film. Night of the Creeps is what would happen if the history of American horror had sex with John Hughes and produced the ideal mongrel child. The film is one that offers much replay value and movie quoting potential. I have gotten fed up with these film "qualities." I guess that is what happens when you are introduced to the world of international horror (among other films). On the other hand, I would be lying if I didn't admit that Night of the Creeps is a masterpiece of it's silly kind. I still believe that Fred Dekker's greatest contribution to film is coming up with the story for House. A bizarre horror comedy involving the Vietnam war (and other serious issues) is a pretty bold and innovative idea. Night of the Creeps further confirms Fred Dekker's knack for creative and genre abstracting writing. I just hope that Night of the Creeps has not inspired anyone to write "Go, Monster Squad!" in a public bathroom.

STEPPEWOLF

Fred Haines (1974)

Out of all the literary adaptations of world famous novels, onetime auteur Fred Haines' Steppenwolf (1974)—an American-Swiss-UK-French-Italian co-production based on Teutonic novelist Hermann Hesse's classic 1928 novel of the same name—is certainly one of the most rarely seen and unbelievably underrated, which was apparently the result of piss poor marketing and the disastrous accidental production of a series of eighty discolored prints on the film's initial release. Going through a troubled pre-production history with Michelangelo Antonioni, John Frankenheimer, and even popular 'tough guy' actor James Coburn being looked at as potential directors, as well as Billy Wilder graduates turned Grumpy Old Men Walter Matthau and Jack Lemmon and degenerate 'LSD guru' Timothy Leary (who was a fugitive on the run from prison at the time who ultimately lost his chance at the role by dropping two 'Sunshine tabs' on the film's rich industrialist financier Peter Sprague, who had a bad trip and later declared Leary to be a "perverter of mankind") being considered for audaciously anti-heroic eponymous lead, it is actually a miracle that the film ever even got made, not least of all since Herr Hesse curiously included a clause in his will prohibiting the sale of film rights to his work. Of course, considering the totally Teutonic idiosyncrasies of Hesse's work, I can kind of see why he didn't want it to be ever cinematically adapted, especially in the culture-distorting realm of Hollywood. While Haines penned the script and directed the film, co-producer Melvin Fishman—a Hebraic acidhead who never worked on another film—is said to be the real 'auteur' of Steppenwolf and it was apparently his persistence and befriending of the Hesse family that got the film made in the first place. Fittingly shot in Basle, Switzerland which is the hometown of LSD, as well as the actual place where Hesse wrote the novel, the film is a decidedly delectable aesthetic disaster that utilized multiple visual moving picture formats (film, Slavic animation, archaic video, etc.) and combines the degeneracy of the Weimar era with the decadence of the counterculture era (notably, Hesse himself was a member of the German Wandervogel, which inspired the California American hippies, thus the connection is rather sound), as well as combined Nietzschean existentialist despair with a dope-addled hippie take on Jungian psychology, thus making for one eclectically eccentric and ludicrously labyrinthine work that resonates in one's mind long after the 'madman'-based madness has ended. Indeed, in a certain sense, the titular protagonist's personal motto "For Madmen Only" is also true for the film.

Undoubtedly Steppenwolf is probably the only film that features degenerate jazz music, dream-sequence-based appearances from Mozart and Goethe, and a legendary Bergman actor snorting coke. Luckily, instead of getting less than humorous kraut-hating Hebrew Matthau to play a kraut (the Jewish actor famously made a big deal about having to shoot in Germany for Stanley Donen's Charade (1963) because he had a visceral hatred of Germans), Bergman protégé Max von Sydow (The Seventh Seal, The Exorcist)—an archetypal Hallstatt Nordic from an aristocratic Swedish background—ultimately got to play the brazenly bitter “wolf of the Steppes.” While I see von Sydow as a fairly straight fellow who would hardly have a weakness for opium and a straight-razor-based suicide fetish, no other actor was better suited for the role as a mensch that looks like a less gawky and more handsome and Nordic version of Hesse, not to mention the fact that he gives an absolutely amazing performance in the film. Based on a novel that was written by Hesse during a midlife crisis of sorts when the writer's second marriage to singer Ruth Wenger began to fall apart and he was suffering from regular bouts of suicide ideation and despair while living in complete isolation in Basle, Steppenwolf is a compulsively culturally pessimistic work that ultimately offers a glimmer of hope in the end in regard to a rather vicious, intolerably cynical, and socially alienated middle-aged ‘madman’ who is in a sort of self-imposed internal exile and who can only manage to get through the day by calming his nerves with at least a daily dose of opium and by remembering that he can always follow in the footsteps of nineteenth-century Austrian novelist Adalbert Stifter via “a fatal accident while shaving.” Despite its heavy and dejecting themes, the film ultimately ends on a positive inspirational note that reminds artists and intellectuals to not take life too seriously and that there is nothing wrong with a little involvement with recreational drug use, criminally-inclined philistine friends, and loose bisexual ladies. Starring compulsively cute French dirty blonde actress Dominique Sanda (Novecento aka 1900, Beyond Good and Evil) as the protagonist's Jungian ‘anima’ (feminine inner personality in a male's unconscious) and frog bohemian dandy Pierre Clémenti as a mystifying saxophonist of the rather anti-intellectual and sexually adventurous drug-driven sort, Steppenwolf is most certainly one of the most hopelessly ambitious literary adaptations ever made, as well as a seemingly forsaken cult film without a cult.

Protagonist Harry ‘Steppenwolf’ Haller (Max von Sydow) begins the film describing how pathetic his day was, as the only thing he managed to accomplish was about an hour or two of writing and two hours of laying in a hot bath after taking opium. While the opium haze bath makes Haller reconsider his urge to commit the unpardonable sin of suicide because it soothes his pain, the “contentment” he receives as a result of taking the solacing drug fills him with a sense of loathing. When Harry takes a stroll that night in the hope of finding a “road to pleasure” (though he will settle for a “road to pain”), he is laughed at by a lecherous lady of the night after he is almost hit by a car, which he subsequently throws a rock at in a fit of rage. Somewhat mysteriously, Haller eventually finds a ‘Magic Theater’ with a sign reading “Entrance not for Everyone” and before his very eyes, the sign transforms to read “For Madmen Only”, which is the protagonist's own personal motto. By the next morning, the entrance to the Magic Theater has inexplicably disappeared and all that remains is a brick wall. The next day, Harry finds a goofy vendor from the Magic Theater who sells him a booklet with the title "Tractate on the Steppenwolf" and then magically disappears into thin air. As Harry soon learns as depicted in an idiosyncratic quasi-psychedelic animated montage created by Czech artist Jaroslav Bradac (who later went on to appear as himself in Stephen Dwoskin's Outside In (1981)), the beige-colored booklet contains the protagonist's personal history and Weltanschauung. As depicted in the sometimes humorously quasi-pornographic animated montage, Harry has always had a bit of wolf inside of him (or, "a beast...with only a thin veneer of the human") and he only grew into all the more of a rough and tough figuratively bestial blond beast when he realized as a child that polite bourgeois society was trying to tame him. As the narrator described regarding Harry, "He was secretly and resistantly attracted to the bourgeois world," yet at the same time considers himself a sort of elite member of the bourgeoisie, or as narrated, "The vital force of the bourgeoisie resides in its outsiders, artists and intellectuals, like Harry, who develop far beyond the level possible to the bourgeois. Knowing the bliss of meditation, no less than the gloomy joys of hatred and self-loathing, he is nevertheless captive to the bourgeoisie and cannot escape it, unless suffering has made his spirit tough and elastic enough, he finds a way of reconciliation and an escape into humor." Luckily, despite its dark themes, Steppenwolf certainly has its fair share of absurdist humor.

Ultimately, Harry realizes how hopelessly alienated he is from society as a whole when he visits an intellectual friend's house and offends his comrade's wife by stating regarding her much prized Goethe bust, "I hope that Goethe didn't really look like this...this conceited air of nobility...the great man ogling the distinguished company. His venerable bombast is bad enough, but to portray him like this." Harry's friend's wife is so hurt by his remark that she cries hysterically, grasps the bust like it is a child, and runs away. Though Harry apologizes to his friend for insulting his wife, he also defends his rather rude behavior by proudly stating that he "always speaks his mind," adding, "Goethe did too, at least during his better moments." That night Harry has a phantasmagoric nightmare where he travels back in time and meets Goethe, who tells him he should have been a schoolmaster instead of a writer and accuses him of being more "stuffy" than the very bourgeois people that he hates. Goethe does not particularly like Harry's attitude because the pretentious protagonist criticizes the positive and optimistic nature of some of his work. Indeed, Harry seems to be more of a Heinrich von Kleist or Arthur Schopenhauer kind of guy. To contradict Harry's remarks regarding the lack of sincerity in regard to hopeful art, Goethe brings up Mozart's Die Zauberflöte (1791) aka The Magic Flute. Unbeknownst to Harry, he will also soon meet Mozart, who will ultimately act as a source of inspiration for the perturbed protagonist.

STEPHENWOLF

Feeling rather desperate and becoming increasingly obsessed by the idea of slitting his own throat with a straight razor to the point where he carries around the blade with him wherever he goes, Harry becomes desperate and decides to seek some relief from his metaphysical affliction by wandering aimlessly, so he eventually wanders into a dance hall where he meets an exceedingly beautiful blonde about half his age named Hermine (Dominique Sanda) who immediately mocks his melancholic demeanor and pathological tendency towards self-pity, even handing him a straight razor and stating, "You can do it here if you like." Needless to say, Harry immediately becomes enamored with the provocative young dame and her flirtatious tenacity to ruthlessly mock him and agrees to do anything she says. When Harry meets Hermine the next day, he offends her by giving her flowers, so she calls him an "idiot" and tells him to never give her a gift ever again. Somewhat strangely, Hermine morphs into Harry's childhood friend Hermann after he asks her what her name is and she responds by asking him what he thinks it is. Indeed, like in Hesse's novel, it is never clear if Hermine really exists as a real person, though she is most certainly the protagonist's anima. Ultimately, Hermine forces hopeless introvert Harry to engage in extroverted 'bourgeois' behavior like dancing and drinking. Hermine also introduces the protagonist to a charismatic bisexual hedonist saxophonist and supposed 'exotic demi-god of love' named Pablo (Pierre Clémenti in his first acting role after spending 17 months in jail due to a dubious drug charge), who supplies the protagonist the energy he needs to stay up and party all-night by giving him a line of cocaine to snort. At Hermine's insistence, brazenly bitter bloke Harry also manages to bang a hot Mediterranean babe named Maria (Carla Romanelli), who is also carrying on an affair with playboy Pablo and Hermine. In exchange for all her help, Hermine curiously makes Harry promise that he will kill her as soon as he falls in love with her. With nothing left to lose, Harry is happy to oblige all of her requests, no matter how contrary they are to his true character. As a proud anti-intellectual who plays degenerate jazz and does not think twice about stealing fancy expensive cars and driving them around right in front of cops, Pablo is the literal complete opposite of Harry yet they both get along famously, thus revealing that what the protagonist needed most was to get away from himself and to live life as an active participant as opposed to a passive critic.

As Steppenwolf progresses, Harry goes from being a malignantly moody and broody uptight suicidal cynic to transforming into a cocaine-addled and car-stealing middle-aged party animal who has no problem sharing the same girl with his new half-pooof comrade Pablo. Eventually, Harry attends a large Traumnovelle-esque fin-de-siècle-themed masquerade ball where Goethe hands him a coin-like object reading, "Magic Theater tonight...for madmen only...Hermine is in hell." When Harry eventually does find Hermine, he finds her dressed in drag just like him in the same suit, thus reaffirming that she is indeed his anima. After Hermine asks him, "are you ready to go to hell to find me?," Harry follows her and Pablo into the metaphysical kaleidoscopic hell known as 'Magic Theater.' From the last thirty minutes or so of Steppenwolf, Harry goes on a nightmarish yet aesthetically alluring phantasmagorical psychedelic 'trip' where he fights in WWII as a member of the Wehrmacht with a childhood schoolmate named Gustav (Niels-Peter Rudolph), is 'tamed' by a caged Steppenwolf and subsequently bites into a cute little bunny rabbit like a rabid animal while blood gushes from his mouth, has a philosophical conversation with Mozart as personified by Pablo who introduces him to a perennially sleeping Richard Wagner, and eventually murders Hermine by stabbing her with a butcher knife in a somewhat psycho-sexual fashion. In the end, Harry is given a show trial and is supposed to be summarily executed for corrupting Magic Theater with "so-called reality." Luckily, Mozart informs Harry that all is not lost and that he has virtually infinite chances to start a new beginning in his life. As Pablo tells Harry upon first bringing him inside the Magic Theater, "To conquer time and reality, you must extinguish the superfluous reflections you call your personality. All it takes is a hearty laugh." Indeed, ultimately the key to happiness for Harry is hanging out with hyper-hedonistic philistines, doing hard drugs and delectable dames, listening to non-symphonic negro music, and not taking life too seriously.

Whether looked at as a metaphysical werewolf flick, surrealist satire of the oh-so-seriousness of early 20th-century German intellectuals, Jungian 'head' movie, existentialist celluloid trip, post-holocaust critique of pre-Nazi Germany, half-baked counterculture comedy, and/or actively nihilistic Nietzschean fable, Steppenwolf certainly makes for an intriguing, if not flagrantly flawed, overly ambitious, and sometimes aesthetically outmoded, piece of absurdly undervalued cinema history that proves that even some of the most bizarre novels can be more than adequately adapted for the silver screen. As someone who read Hesse's source novel about half a decade ago, I think it is as good as literary adaptations get (ironically, Michelangelo Antonioni apparently turned down directing the film despite being offered a large sum of money because he felt the novel was unfilmable). Of course, as the man that penned the Academy Award nominated script for the James Joyce adaptation Ulysses (1967) directed by Joseph Strick, it only seems fitting that Fred Haines cinematically adapted Hesse's supposed unfilmable novel. Personally, I think Steppenwolf star Max von Sydow's buddy Ingmar Bergman would have been the most appropriate person to adapt the novel. After all, Bergman's masterpiece Vargtimmen (1968) aka Hour of the Wolf starring von Sydow shares a lot in common with Hesse's novel in terms of themes and dark surrealist imagery and thus the two films make for an excellent double feature. Still, surely Haines' Steppenwolf is the greatest of the Hesse adaptations, as a work that puts Avon heir Conrad Rooks' Siddhartha (1972) to shame in terms of ambitiousness and faithfulness to its source material. In terms of works attempting to depict the post-WWI German mood and psyche in a quasi-philosophical way, Steppenwolf is certainly more intriguing than Ingmar Bergman's Das Schlangenei (1977) aka The Serpent's Egg, though it is not quite up there with Rainer Werner Fassbinder's mammoth magnum opus and true cinematic 'Gesamtkunstwerk' Berlin Alexanderplatz (1980), which will probably remain the final word on the subject, at least in cinematic terms. Notably, as revealed in the article Jung Hearts Run Free written by Jenny Fabian, who was there to witness the turbulent production of the film, Steppenwolf producer Melvin Fishman was apparently so burnt out after spending over seven years trying to get the work created that he suffered a fatal heart attack two years after it was released, hence his curious one-credit filmography. As also revealed in Fabian's article, self-described "drug fans" Fishman and Haines were given a large gift-wrapped supply of Ritalin by a Basle-based pharmaceutical company that were big "film fans," so the two were both on a steady diet of drugs during that entire production, so the former's premature death was not just induced by the film's commercial and critical failure. Despite being far from an immaculate masterpiece, Steppenwolf is unequivocally a contagious labor of love encompassing multiple important and somewhat overlapping twentieth-century cultural zeitgeists that, at the very least, deserves recognition as a lost and criminally neglected cult classic that proves that if there is a will there's a way when it comes to adapting esoteric highly personalized novels. As a patent pessimist myself, I also consider it to be a strangely inspirational work, though I don't exactly share the film's message regarding hard drugs, which only give a person a superficial sense of transcendence. Indeed, if Nietzsche, who was himself a longtime opium addict that spent a lot of his time writing and hiding in his room like Harry Haller, was a filmmaker during the 1970s and decided to direct an inspirational work after having an epiphany while tripping on acid, I'm sure it would somewhat resemble Steppenwolf.

LA PLAYS ITSELF

Fred Halsted (1972)

I know about as much about gay porn as I do about black scholars, but I can state without hesitation that Fred Halsted (Sextool, A Night at Halsted's)—an ultra-masculine leather-fag who once advocated a form of fierce fag fascism and once directed a homo hardcore flick with an all punk soundtrack—is easily the greatest queer pornographer who has ever lived, with his debut feature LA Plays Itself (1972) being his celluloid magnum opus. A virtual blue-collar Kenneth Anger with a muscular physique, working-class ethic (he once worked as a gardener for Vincent Price!), and a brutal and predatory sexuality, accidental arthouse auteur Fred Halsted would express all of these things and more in LA Plays Itself, a naughty and no-nonsense piece of gritty celluloid nature worship and severe sexual sadism that is known to repel even the most unrepentant of sodomites, especially of the sack-less sissy sort. Described by none other than literary outlaw himself, Mr. William S. Burroughs, as follows, “This film breaks all the stereotypes! I recommend it for all audiences!” LA Plays Itself is certainly like no other porn flick made before or after it and it is certainly not for the faint of heart or those that subscribe to the modern politically correct LGBT lunacy that pervades throughout mainstream American society. Beginning as a sort of celestial Californian völkisch flick of a lonely hiker spotting and blowing a naked hippie blond boy and concluding as a homoerotic horror nightmare where a naïve young pretty boy is bound and takes a large fist to the rectum, LA Plays Itself is ultimately an aberrant arthouse shocker, so it makes it all the more strange that auteur Fred Halsted described the film as an, “autobiographical homosexual story.” A man that was routinely anally raped by his own stepfather while a mere adolescent and who would apparently later be raped again as a muscle-bound macho man adult, Fred Halsted was the real deal in terms of the sort of sadomasochistic leather-fags depicted in William Friedkin’s sodomite slasher thriller Cruising (1980). Indeed, LA Plays Itself even left alpha-surrealist Salvador Dalí thunderstruck, apparently stating regarding the fiercely fetishistic flick that it was “new information for me,” but it also left politically active leftist fag poofs irrevocably disgusted, which is indubitably a good thing when it comes to art. As Fred Halsted described for the San Francisco publication Kalendar regarding an East Coast screening, “In New York City, I invited all the gay liberationists, writers and other artists. I thought, ‘Jesus, here I’ve made this great gay liberation film, L.A. Plays Itself. They can’t help but love it.’ I was there and I was happy and then the curtain went down and they started to boo and hiss and stomp their feet. I thought, ‘my god, is this a gay, liberated audience?’” Indeed, probably the only gay porn flick that will strike fear and disgust in both homos and heteros, as well as males and females, LA Plays Itself is the seemingly magical, if not blatantly somewhat amateurishly assembled, result of an audacious novice artist who has no pretensions about going all the way, fist in ass and all.

The Los Angeles featured in LA Plays Itself is quite different from the largely Mexican metropolis that exists today. Opening with a shot of a sign for the city limits of Los Angeles, boasting a population figure of a mere 2,535,700 (as opposed to 3,792,621 in 2010) lost souls, LA Plays Itself soon scans the seemingly exotic forests of the the Los Angeles area that seem in stark contrast to the polluted and festering concrete jungle one typically imagines. Off-screen narration of an East Coaster proclaiming that “Lost Angeles Stinks” appears, but homo hero Fred Halsted comes to the city’s rescue and bashes New Yorkers, which is no doubt a noble sentiment on his part. After a number of scenic and soothing Buttgerit-esque arthouse shots of butterflies, salamanders, spider webs, and pretty plants set to the sounds of Japanese koto music, a naked Aryan hippie man (Rick Coates) with blond hair bathing in the sound is approached by a hunk hiker (Jim Frost) and the men engage in oral and anal sex when not prancing along gayly in a stream. The sex scenes begin to take a quasi-psychedelic form when butt-darting is superimposed over pink flowers and caves and boulders over buggery, thus symbolizing the peaceful pansies the mainstream gays have always attempted to project to mainstream society. Of course, the ugly reality of urbanization unfolds when a bulky bulldozer rolls by some flowers and aesthetically displeasing power-lines are revealed over a car-infested freeway. While Fred Halsted found his greatest source of solace in nature and the wild, even once admitting the happiest period of his life was when he was a gardener for Vincent Price, the filmmaker developed his fame/infamy in the urban S&M netherworld and LA Plays Itself is no different as the second part of the film reveals how a boyish Texan becomes the bitch boi of a strikingly sadistic sodomite with an unhealthy fixation with rope and forceful fists in ass-holes. After driving by billboards for cinematic cult classic Performance (1970) co-directed by Nicholas Roeg and Donald Cammell—an assumed favorite of Halsted’s—a porn theater for three erotic flicks, including 101, Acts of Love, and Infrasexum, one is introduced to the “New Kid in Town”(played by the director’s real-life boyfriend/torturer Joey Vale). Apparently, a debauched dramatization of his autobiographical affair with Vale, Fred Halsted offers to show the new kid “the ropes” of L.A. and soon he is quite literally tying him up with them and bounding him in unpleasant positions au naturel. Forcing the new kid to climb steps naked while being brutally whipped, Halsted rules the roost with an iron-fist to the point where he is quite literally fisting him full force. The tortured Texan also licks Halsted’s dirty black boots like a common dog obeying its egomaniacal master. In the end, a Texan is dead, which is a small price to pay in Halsted’s wicked and wanton world where one is bound for pleasure. Whether its peaceful twink engaging in sodomite splendor in the grass or lunatic leather-fags engaging in lethal lechery, LA plays for keeps.

In an interview with a bleeding heart homo fellow named Mikhail Itkin who saw it fit to constantly contradict the interviewee, Fred Halsted stated quite stoically, "What Nazism is saying, though, is: you're Aryan, you're white, you're better. Gay supremacy is very similar to that. So I think it's a new kind of fascism—which I wholeheartedly endorse...I really do think we're superior and that thesis is fascistic. I don't believe in equality, and I think it has been proven that at times when you have a great renaissance in culture and the arts, it's always gay people who are leading the whole thing. We are now starting such a renaissance again." Indeed, the second half of LA Plays Itself features such ultra-masculine martial prowess, butch body worship, and a master morality philosophy as an expression of a sort of quasi-fag fascism of the aesthetic sort and is a far cry from the mainstream fairy faggot shit that now comprises mainstream 'gay culture.' Indeed, while Halsted was 'gay married' (i.e. in a long-term yet sexually promiscuous relationship) to Joey Vale, it is highly doubtful he would have promoted the sort of bourgeois-buggers-adopting-babies bullshit and effeminate homosexualization of mainstream society by slave-morality-driven celebrities who collect Negro and Asian children from around the world. An unclassifiable piece of potent idiosyncratic filmmaking, LA Plays Itself offers daunting dichotomies between soft hippie homos versus sadistic sodomites, man versus machine, the organic jungle versus the urban jungle, and sexual tenderness versus erotic torture that let's the world know that not all pansies are pink! A hypnotic horror flick for homosexuals and heterosexuals alike, LA Plays Itself is probably not going to get anyone off unless they are quick shooters and/or masochists who love botched orgasms, but it does make for a mesmerizing masterpiece of the cinematically macabre sort. While a film like Brokeback Mountain (2005) projects the message that manly men who love men are just misunderstood romantics who are unable to reciprocate their love because of an unjust and so-called 'heteronormative' society, I think LA Plays Itself offers the hard truth when it comes to alpha-fag musclemen. After all, there is no peace, equality or understanding in taking a huge clenched fist in the pooper, no matter how much poof puffery is shoved in one's face by the mainstream media.

THE SEX GARAGE
THE SEX GARAGE

Fred Halsted (1972)

I recently discovered the gritty erotic art house works of Fred Halsted; a director whose fetish for motorcycles and automobiles seems to be greater than even that of crowleyite auteur Kenneth Anger. In fact, Halsted's 34-minute short The Sex Garage (1972) is fairly similar to Anger's Scorpio Rising (1964), as both films are experimental tributes to the hypnotic sexual magnetism of motorcycles. Although made nearly a decade after Scorpio Rising, The Sex Garage has a grittier aesthetic and a more vintage look. Also, unlike Scorpio Rising, The Sex Garage seems to lack any type of socio-political subtext. In fact, if The Sex Garage did not contain such a dreamy atmosphere of illuminant sexual surrealism, it would be nothing more than forgettable smut that would have probably disappeared from the radar of obsessive cinephiles decades ago. It may sound a bit odd, but The Sex Garage seems like the kind of porn film that Roger Watkins (who, did in fact, make porno films) would have made. Like Watkins' lost (but now found, although out-of-print again) low-budget masterpiece Last House on Dead End Street, The Sex Garage has a fairly distinct atmosphere that seems like it could have developed by mere chance as a wonderful artistic accident (not to insult either filmmaker). Also, like Watkins' horror film, The Sex Garage has the earmarks of a work that was directed by someone who had developed a somewhat morally-confused psychosis due to heavy drug use (Watkins once admitted he spent most of the budget for Last House on Dead End Street on speed), as both films are so distinctly perverted, yet consistency powerful in their entirety. It is rumored that director Fred Halsted was once Vincent Price's gardener (which wouldn't surprise me). Judging by Price's dubious sexuality, I am sure the iconic classic horror star would have enjoyed employing Halsted – a gay porn filmmaker and performer – as his gardener. With The Sex Garage, Halsted proved he was an eclectic pervert, as this film is a bisexual mix of straight sex, gay sex, and the unthinkable.....mechaphilia.

Despite seeming quite tame by today's pornographic standards, The Sex Garage was such a controversial work upon its initial release that a New York City showing of the film was raided by police. Apparently, the liberal cosmopolitan citizens of NYC were quite terrified to see a man fornicate with his beloved motorcycle. Undeterred by the public's snide reaction to the motorcycle-sex scene, Halsted kept it intact in subsequent versions of The Sex Garage released on video, but a controversial fisting scene was cut from later prints of the film. The Sex Garage was released as a supporting work for Halsted's film LA Plays Itself (1972, 51 minutes), thus many consider the 34 minute short to be a third act of the larger work. Despite not appearing in The Sex Garage, Fred Halsted stars in LA Plays Itself as a sexual performer, social commentator, and hypocritically brutal sexual torturer. LA Plays Itself also features Halsted's lifelong boyfriend Joey Vale (who also directed a couple porn flicks). When Vale died in 1986 at the premature age of 36, Halsted – unable to cope with the loss of his life partner – committed suicide in 1989 via sleep pills, even leaving a confessional suicide note behind that stated, "I had a good life...I've had looks, a body, money, success and artistic triumphs. I've had the love of my life. I see no reason to go on." During the 1980s, the quality of Halsted's erotic works plummeted to an unwatchable level, so it seems that the Reagan years were not very kind to the libertine auteur. During his prime, Halsted dressed in a fetishistic leather-clad manner similar to that of the outlaw rebel bikers featured in the Marlon Brando vehicle The Wild One (1953), therefore his works seems to be primarily an erotic extension of the controversial Hollywood films that he saw as a young man. Hollywood would not fully recognize Halsted's brand of fetishism until the release of William Friedkin's Cruising (1980); a homoerotic S&M quasi-slasher flick that is probably the most underrated work ever created by the man who directed the totally overrated Hollywood horror blockbuster The Exorcist. Unfortunately for Halsted, he would never reach the homo-prestige of Robert Mapplethorpe; a renowned photographer (who also focused on fetishistic homoerotic themes) that died of aids during the same year as the art house pornographer committed suicide.

Cinematic sex mechanic Fred Halsted during his prime

For those individuals interested in films that blur the line between porn and art, The Sex Garage is certainly one of the greatest American films belonging to this highly sensational category. Unlike most of Fred Halsted's work, The Sex Garage is accessible to people of various sexual persuasions (except lesbians). Despite featuring some queer material, the short is also a true expression of male sexual masculinity, as The Sex Garage manages to lucidly express the parallels between the organic power of male potency and the contrived energy of man-made horsepower; a theme Kenneth Anger also explored in Scorpio Rising and Kustom Kar Kommandos, albeit in a less blatant and more metaphysical manner. Halsted received some recognition as an artist when the Museum of Modern Art in mid-Manhattan, NYC screened his works and even collected some of his film prints for their permanent collection. Over the past decade or so, posthumous screenings of Fred Halsted's films have been cropping up throughout the United States, thus one can assume that the deceased filmmaker will only acquire more recognition as the years pass. After all, we live in a time where sexual perversion is one of the most glaring attributes of the Occidental world, so it is no stretch of the imagination to say that the films of Fred Halsted are artistically symbiotic of our sexually unrestrained times. Like the surrealist auteur works of Jean Cocteau and Kenneth Anger, The Sex Garage is an incandescent cinematic poem. If you only see one film by Fred Halsted, make it The Sex Garage; a visually and musically (featuring pleasurable noise) ambient work that audaciously celebrates the unnatural unity of man and machine.

Fred Halsted (1975)

While an innocent young man, avant-garde pornographer Fred Halsted (Nighthawk in Leather, A Night at Halsted's) was routinely raped and abused by his stepfather and these rather traumatic experiences would not only deeply affect his personal life as a staunch sadomasochistic sodomite who highhandedly popularized fisting and lunatic leather-faggotry, among other things, but also his surreally sleazy and aberrantly artful celluloid works, the most idiosyncratic, esoteric, and sexually subversive of which being Sextool (1975), the concluding film in the proudly debauched director's L.A. Trilogy. With his experimental 'arthouse' porn flick LA Plays Itself (1972) and its companion work The Sex Garage (1972)—the only two hardcore flicks belonging to the permanent Film Collection of the Museum of Modern Art—Halsted became a sort of underground darling of the art and cinema world, inspiring alpha-surrealist Salvador Dalí to describe his work as “new information for me” and prompting junky literary outlaw William S. Burroughs to state that the films, “break all the stereotypes.” With his growing popularity, Halsted hoped to follow up LA Plays Itself and The Sex Garage with a more ‘sexually eclectic’ and ‘professional’ work, thus siring Sextool, which, while featuring the signature fisting and carnal violence of his previous efforts, also included Asian trannies, campy cabaret shows, and perverts riding motorcycles into degenerate sex fiend parties, thus ironically making it ultimately the ill-fated filmmaker's most blatantly bizarre, hallucinatory, and artful work and surely not something that would have captivated the everyday pervert. Described in a review from the Hollywood Reporter as a, “cruel, terrorizing film...the kind of film one can imagine Nazi concentration camp commanders commission for their jaded amusement,” Sextool is a sinisterly carnal celluloid nightmare featuring sailors being raped with boners, boots, and bananas, Gestapo-like cops in leather sodomizing young hustlers with nightsticks, negroes in black Cadillacs getting their fuck on with a white hippie cuck, and an oriental tranny smoking herb through a gigantic penis pipe. Deciding to shoot on mainstream movie grade 35mm film as opposed to gritty 16mm like his previous works, Sextool proved to be a rather expensive project for Halsted and he was only able to shoot the most imperative ‘action’ scenes and hardly any transitional scenes nor character development, thus the film has a foreboding nonlinear oneiric ‘structure’ that essentially amounts to a number of potent climaxes with little to no masturbation in between. Due to its hardcore imagery, Sextool was never played in mainstream theaters and only a few porn theaters were equipped with 35mm projectors to screen the film, thus the work had marginal theatrical distribution at best. While Halsted released a limited quantity of Super-8 prints and videos upon its initial release, Sextool has been out-of-print ever since, with only the Museum of Modern Art owning an original 35mm print of the film.

SEXTOOL

Indisputably a commercial failure upon its release, Sextool is also arguably Halsted's celluloid magnum opus, or at least that was what I was able to discern after getting a hold of a horrendous quality bootleg copy of the film that looks like it was unearthed from homo hell.

Opening with a scene of Fred Halsted, who resembles Richard Gere except less queer, 'welcoming' the viewer as he walks around in an industrial wasteland while carrying a bottle of beer, which he naturally smashes, and sporting his signature leather-jacket to the ominous sounds of synthesizer-driven ambient noise, Sextool immediately establishes the tone for a sensually sinister and tyrannical work where (anti)erotic violence reigns with excessive savage force. Next cutting to a scene of a wisecracking and somewhat creepy Asian transsexual named 'Gloria' (Charmaine Lee Anderson, a one-time Empress of Hawaii in the Court of Many Rivers of Louis XIV, an American drag ball association) whose would-be-alpha-male boyfriend Jeff (Gus Harvey) tells her, "I fuck you so hard and deep you shouldn't even be able to walk. You just think of a new position and...well...you're the mother of creation," one immediately gets the idea that the meta-raunchy world of Sextool is a place of lecherous lost souls with no values and busted moral compasses who live to fuck and get fucked. Meanwhile, driving down the street is a Cadillac limousine containing some sexually intemperate spade soul brothers forcing a white hippie slave to give them head and a debauched driver who enjoys jerking-off while wearing leather gloves. Gloria and Jeff go to a sex party where the yellow transman gives 'her' lover the following warning, "You must be very careful around here Jeff...You never know who you might meet or what they might make you do" and proceeds to laugh maniacally. Upon arriving at the sexual outlaw get-together, Gloria points out two ultramacho leather-fags and the scene then cuts to the two lecherous leather-men violently gang raping a young boyish blond sailor (Tim Rhodes) who they not only anally and orally deflower, but also shove their fists, boots, and bananas up his rectum as if their bodies are a single working 'machine' or sextool), which is further accentuated by the film's fiercely foreboding proto-industrial score. Next Gloria spots a corrupt cocksucking cop, who rides into the party on a motorcycle and the scene cuts to a startlingly sordid sequence of the poof-penetrating policeman in a martial leather uniform nefariously using his nightstick to torture and inevitably 'assert' his power in a young man's rectum, among other things. Next, Gloria spots a rather dapper dick-downing dandy, who moonlights as a cross-dressing cabaret dancer that seems to have come straight out of Steven Arnold's Luminous Procuress (1971) and, to quote the gossiping yellow tranny, "pays her audience to cum." The clown-like cabaret dancer goes by the stage name "La Belle Eccentrique" and wears a somewhat ghoulish camp costume that includes pansy pancake makeup, a top hat, a suit jacket, and fish nets, and who gives a dildo-flinging performance to a homely hustler wearing a shirt that says "Rent-A-Kid Make-An-Officer" who, before he knows it, is using poppers,

Meanwhile, at the party, a couple of jealous and conniving trannies gossip and one remarks about Gloria's biological maleness and her ostensibly heterosexual boyfriend, "Do you think he knows," which a friend responds, "About her or himself? They're both ladies!" in what is the closest thing to campy comic relief in Sextool, a film where bodies are weapons of wanton destruction. After smoking some weed through a large phallic pipe, Gloria sits in front of a fire and talks nostalgically of her mother's promiscuous behavior during Pearl Harbor, "The bombs was going down, and she was still out cruising, picking up the sailors, bringing them home, conquering them. That's my mother. She was so beautiful" and how, "I used to pick up those lipsticks, eyebrow pencils, padded bras, put on her nightgown, and just prance and dance. She never knew. I love my mother so much," thus demonstrating the transman's source for inevitably becoming a chink-chick-with-a-dick. At the party, Gloria also spots Fred Halsted and his real-life lover Joey Vale, the former of whom she insults by stating, "He thinks he's a boxer, but his idea of a workout is a bottle of beer in one hand and wearing a pair of gloves" and the scene then cuts to the director practicing boxing with his boyish blond bitch boy toy. After punching a punching bag a number of times like a true proletarian pugilist, Halsted 'takes off his gloves' and forces Ms. Vale to not only lick the blood off his knuckles, but also drink his piss. Wasting no time, Halsted proceeds to strip and beat Vale, using a large leather belt (with a nice large chain attached to the end) to get the job done properly and whip his tiny twink bitch back into shape. In the end, Gloria leaves the party for San Diego and her boyfriend Jeff, apparently a married man, is recruited into fagdom by pervert host Randy because in Fred Halsted's homo heaven and hell, perversity reigns, especially of the master and slave sort. In the end, it is revealed that deranged tranny Gloria setup Jeff to be emasculated and used him like a true tool, or 'Sextool.'

Utilizing a variety of eccentrically ethereal sound effects in an apparent tribute to Robert Altman (That Cold Day in the Park, Short Cuts)—a filmmaker both director Fred Halsted and producer Taylor Brown credited as their favorite filmmaker—Sextool is essentially a hypnotic hardcore porno flick of the flagrantly foreboding fashion with next to nil plot but featuring nihilistic sexual nightmares galore. Directed by a man who promoted a sort of fierce fag-scism and militant homo-supremacy of the renegade quasi-Röhm-esque variety, once going so far as proudly stating in an interview, "What Nazism is saying, though, is: you're Aryan, you're white, you're better. Gay supremacy is very similar to that. So I think it's a new kind of fascism—which I wholeheartedly endorse...I really do think we're superior and that thesis is fascist. I don't believe in equality, and I think it has been proven that at times when you have a great renaissance in culture and the arts, it's always gay people who are leading the whole thing. We are now starting such a renaissance again," Sextool is ultimately Fred Halsted's most inventive, sexually and socially iconoclastic, and thematically and aesthetically terroristic film and a virtual manifesto for his whacked-out Weltanschauung of sexual crime and punishment. Anti-bourgeois to its rather hard core, Sextool is totally at odds with the kind of equality-mongering insanity of today's mainstream LGBT community as the work that not only rejects becoming part of straight society, but seeks to destroy it without mercy one sick fuck at a time. Certainly a work that will more appeal to arthouse and cult cinema inclined cinephiles and cineastes as opposed to uncultivated cocksuckers looking for a quick and easy masturbation aid, Sextool is like a hardcore hodgepodge of the degenerate dreaminess of Jean Genet's Cocteau-esque Un Chant d'Amour (1950) aka A Song of Love, the sadomasochistic sailor fetishism of Kenneth Anger's Fireworks (1947) and Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Querelle (1982), the anti-bourgeois horror-like horrific sexual perversity of Alberto Cavallone's Blue Movie (1978) and Blow Job (1980), and the gritty S&M arthouse exploitation of Jacques Scandolari's Beyond Love and Evil (1971) and New York City Inferno (1978) for what ultimately adds up to a strikingly singular work of celluloid sensual savagery that violently fist-fucks the soul without remorse.

Advertised with the rather literal tagline, "USE/ABUSE/EVERYONE/EVERYTHING," Sextool is a work so unwaveringly subversive and cinematically unhinged that it inspired Divine of Pink Flamingos (1972) feces-eating infamy to state, "I WOULD EAT THIS FILM!!," though I am surprised the fist-focused work was not too 'butch' for the tragic drag queen. In regard to his own thoughts regarding his influence as a filmmaker and more-than-vocal proponent of fist-fucking, Fred Halsted stated in a posthumously released interview entitled "A Rather Late Yet Interesting Interview with a Dead Porno Artist" in Butt Magazine, "I think I've been extremely influential in terms of breaking faggots out of the swish era. My films present faggots in the macho era, and maybe it's too overdone, but the whole style changed. I think that it had an enormous influence on the style and fashion of gay America, and I think that's good. At one time for several years I was the dominant thinker in America in terms of breaking this softness, and I think it's succeeded," yet Halsted is rather forgotten today, even among leather-fags and it seems only the most audacious of cinephiles have kept his legacy going. With characters stating such sexually cannibalistic things as, "Let's cruise the meatrack. I'll tell you how everybody's hung, slice, and degrade" and a rape victim "more... more... more sir... more..." while being fist-fucked into oblivion by his tormentor, Sextool, arguably more importantly than anything, is the visceral artistic expression of a sexually abused boy turned sexually sadistic man whose suicide at the mere age of 47 proved he was a fucked fellow seeking self-obliteration who instinctively saw sex as a form of destruction as opposed to reproduction, which one could easily argue is the true psyche of the homosexual and sexual fetishist in general. Unfortunately, with Halsted's suicide came the orphaning of Sextool as he owned the rights to the film and it is rather doubtful the work will ever be released again in any form, thus making it one of the most sought after and impossible-to-find hardcore works of porn history. Even if you have to travel to semen-drenched Sodom to find a copy of Sextool, it will surely be worth the effort because even with all the subversive homoeroticism and boots literally in peoples' asses, one will soon forget they are watching a gay porn film and begin to start thinking they have entered a post-apocalyptic hell that only Halsted could have pleasantly plagued the world with.

A NIGHT AT HALSTED'S
A NIGHT AT HALSTED'S

Fred Halsted (1982)

Long before homocore pioneer Bruce LaBruce made films about queer punk hairdressers swooning over skinheads in No Skin Off My Ass (1993) and young twink neo-nazis jerking off onto old school editions of Mein Kampf in Skin Flick / Skin Gang (1999), militant sadomasochistic sodomite auteur Fred Halsted (The Sex Garage, Sextool) was making hardcore arthouse blue movies featuring leather-punks being anally and orally punked with punk rock/new wave soundtracks. Described by some as Halsted's crowning achievement as an aesthetically and genetically endowed pornographer, A Night at Halsted's (1982) sticks out from virtually every other porn flick ever made in that it features a soundtrack including songs by Devo, The Sex Pistols, The Circle Jerks, The Dead Kennedys, David Bowie, X, and The Adolescents, among various others, set to footage of leather-fags pumping each other full of twinkie cream in a Querelle-esque cocksucker club. As Halsted's biographer William E. Jones wrote in Halsted Plays Himself (2011), "Fred Halsted continued to direct during the 1980s, but the terms of his involvement in the porn industry had changed, and most of his feature films and videos from that period have little to recommend beyond the obvious attractions. The best of the lot is A Night at Halsted's (1981), shot at the sex club Fred owned..." Starring hardcore homo Halsted—a self-described proponent of "gay supremacism" who once proudly stated in an interview that "Gay supremacy is fascistic! What's the difference between gay supremacy and Nazism?"—during his more 'mature' years as a pernicious pleasure-seeking predator on the prowl who is looking to penetrate passive young men and force them to literally lick his boot in the same manner as he depicted a decade earlier in his first feature-length film LA Plays Itself (1972), A Night at Halsted's is eroticized self-worship at its most superlatively sleazy, cum-covered, preposterously punk rock, and ludicrously leather-bound. Unfortunately, like most porn flicks (excluding Halsted's early films), A Night at Halsted's can be rather redundant for those not looking to get off to cocks get blown through gloryholes as man-on-man manhole action is clearly the main attraction, yet the film still manages to transcend the typical 1980s skin flick with its almost unintentionally surreal combination of cock-chomping visuals and penetrating powerchord sounds. Needless to say, seeing Fred Halsted in full leather-fag apparel stalking young men at his cum-covered club to Gary Numan's "I Die: You Die" makes for an innately idiosyncratic and iconic scenario as if the viewer is witness some sort of seedy spiritual rites of some secret society of synthesizer Sodom.

Opening with Fred Halsted entering his club like a highly decorated general making his way onto the battlefield, A Night at Halsted's lets the viewer know immediately that one is about to witness the warped and recklessly wanton real-life fantasies of its star/director. Before stealing some tricks from some young twinks, Halsted talks to the cashier of the club, who is played by the director's real-life long-term boyfriend Joey Vale. About a half a decade after A Night at Halsted's was released, Vale died of AIDS and Halsted decided to follow his loverboy by committing suicide in 1989, writing in his suicide note, "I had a good life...I've had looks, a body, money, success and artistic triumphs. I've had the love of my life. I see no reason to go on." The reality of both Halsted and Vale's deaths make A Night at Halsted's an all the more interesting watch as a charismatically crude celluloid work depicting sexual, cultural, and aesthetic nihilism, where each gushing cumshot reflects a closer step to an early death. Made during the pre-condom days when gay cancer had yet to scare ultra-masculine homos from abandoning their lurid leather uniforms, A Night at Halsted's is a deranged dream before it blew up into a real-life nightmare. A Night at Halsted's concludes where it begins with Mr. Halsted discussing the finer points of S&M fetishism with his tragic lover Joey Vale, who also worked as the fluffer on the film, thus making the film a sort of fucked family affair. Advertised in newspapers as "A Private Men's Club" featuring LEVI-LEATHER-PUNK, such an advertisement certainly fails to express the sensual sadism of Halsted's, a pervert's palace where young bucks can have the distinguished honor of licking an old arthouse pornographer's legendary boots.

Filmed at what Fred Halsted himself dubbed as his own "stand up fuck club," A Night at Halsted's is a debauched documentary more than anything, albeit a highly subjective one clearly used as an outlet for the star/director to showcase his personal 'pride and joy' one more time. Featuring the trailer of an eighteen-wheeler that was designed as a reconstruction of the trucks of New York's Meatpacking district, a translucent Plexiglas wall with a rather large goryhole, metal bunk beds without mattresses meant to deliver maximum discomfort for the sadomasochistically inclined, and seemingly endless dark hallways meant for running into a potential victim/victimizer, Halsted's club only lasted a year after it opened because, as William E. Jones wrote, "Fred himself admitted that Los Angeles did not have enough perverts to support the sort of business he envisioned." On top of being a sickeningly visceral appearance akin to spiritual syphilis with a strangely complimentary punk soundtrack that makes the whole experience easier to swallow, A Night at Halsted's is a highly humorous piece of leather lunacy, not least of all because the film's 'other star' J.W. King looks like a pseudo-fascistic, fecal felon retard in his captain cocksucker police hat and his symbolic need to fiercely fuck clones as a nihilistic narcissist who probably feels that downing the dick of his doppelganger is the next best thing to screwing himself. Seeing Halsted take on a twink-in-training, Greg Dale, a fellow that dons a dog collar and ebony jockstrap, also makes for an unintentionally satirical piece of frolicsome fetishism, as if the director was trying to reinvent S&M leather-faggery, but ultimately just ended up intentionally parodying it. Of course, it is not until Mr. Halsted—a man who made a name for himself in LA Plays Itself by having his lover lick his leather skull-crushing boots—has Vale ‘cleanup’ his faithful boots that he can go on his merry way and say his salacious goodbyes, thus concluding A Night at Halsted's. While lacking the Scorpio Rising-esque aberrant arthouse essence of The Sex Garage (1972) and LA Plays Itself (1972) and the esoteric and eccentric 35mm eroticism of Sextool (1975), A Night at Halsted's was still a rather decent way for an unhappy unhinged pornographer to conclude his then-already-stagnating pornography career. For those that think that diseased cocks and gigantic gloryholes cannot be funny, A Night at Halsted's is a reminder why semen-covered pleather has more slapstick value than a dozen Friedberg and Seltzer flicks. Of course, what else can one expect from a film with the would-be-titillating tagline, “How Long Can You Stay Up?”

VERHÄNGNIS

Fred Kelemen (1994)

Although more active nowadays as a cinematographer who has shot various important contemporary European arthouse works, most notably the last two films of Hungarian auteur Béla Tarr and his wife Ágnes Hranitzky, including The Man from London (2007) aka A londoni férfi and The Turin Horse (2011) aka A torinói ló, Fred Kelemen—a Berlin-born fellow of half-hun/half-Hungarian descent who has an exceedingly effete essence about him—is also an ‘auteur’ filmmaker who, due to the relative unavailability of most of his work and the puffery-plagued praise that he has received from important far-left-wing intellectual gatekeepers like degenerate Jewess Susan ‘White People Are Cancer’ Sontag, has gone on to gain a sort of ‘mythical’ status among a certain group of cinephiles that like plodding arthouse works, especially of the Eastern European sort, were nothing really happens. Kelemen has been compared to everyone from Werner Herzog to Alexander Sokurov and is known for mainly making fairly long and monotonous quasi-realist films of the ultra-gritty and largely dialogue-less kind that lack anything resembling a plot, feature obnoxiously over-extended and static scenes in dark rooms and alleyways, and contain mostly poor, unattractive, and desperate Slavic foreigners living in Aryan urban gutters that oftentimes lurk around the seediest of bars. The film that made a name for Kelemen is the 80-minute feature Verhängnis (1994) aka Fate, which is actually a student film that the director made as his graduation project at the German Film & TV Academy in Berlin, yet it ultimately got great praise from Sontag (who gave the film an honorable mention in her largely pessimistic essay ‘The Decay of Cinema’) and various other important critics and even went on to have an American premiere in 1996 at the Anthology Film Archives in New York. In fact, a German friend of mine who attended the same Berlin school at the same time as the filmmaker told me that Kelemen was considered a superstar there and the poster for Verhängnis was even hung on the wall of the institution in tribute to his legacy. What interested me about the film aside from its fairly short length in comparison to the director’s other works (for example, Kelemen’s subsequent feature Frost (1997) is a whopping 270-minutes) is that it was shot on shitty Hi-8 video (the preferred format of skateboard videos during the 1990s) and transferred to 16mm film in a manner to make it look as shitty as possible, thereupon giving it a unique ultra ‘lo-fi’ aesthetic essence that underscores the decidedly degrading and destitute tone of the work.

When interviewed for WKCR-FM on March 4th, 1996 following his film’s screening at the Anthology Film Archives, Kelemen stated regarding his goal with Verhängnis, “I wanted to show that a human being is not pure, that people are not units. To create impure pictures relates more to the truth about human beings,” adding, “...I think it can be very interesting to move away from the idea of pureness and technical perfection. Pureness is a myth, and the ideology of pureness has created much pain in the world. I think there are no pure feelings and no pure people and no pure races.” Aside from the patently pretentious and clichéd pseudo-humanistic nature of his remarks, I find it rather pathetic and ethno-masochistic on Kelemen’s part to ‘apologize in advance’ for his Teutonic background by alluding to National Socialism, thus leading me to conclude that the director is, at best a pussy, and, at worst, a lying sack of shit who makes ‘poverty porn’ disguised as humanist poetry to appeal to the vain and patronizing lumpenprole fetishism of trendy left-wing bourgeois filmgoers, critics, and academics who somehow think it is enlightening to watch poor and uneducated dipsomaniacs act in a ridiculously self-destructive fashion so that they can get the masochistic thrill of feeling guilty for being ‘privileged.’ Still, while Kelemen does not really say anything particularly profound, new, or insightful with Verhängnis, the film does feature an undeniably potent foreboding atmosphere, pleasantly grating aesthetic, and ultimately unwittingly reveals the cultural and moral decay that accompanies contemporary social phenomena like multiculturalism and globalization (with deracinated half-Magyar director Kelemen himself being a direct living and breathing product of these things). Undoubtedly, the film proves why Kelemen has had a more fruitful career as a cinematographer than an auteur, as he is great at setting up and capturing bold images, especially in dark and somberly lit post-industrial hellholes, but does not have a strong enough personal vision to become a great auteur. Indeed, like the downloadable portraits of himself that Kelemen posted on his personal website, Verhängnis is certainly stylish but ultimately lacks character.

If Rainer Werner Fassbinder demonstrated in his classic Sirkian work Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) aka Angst essen Seele auf that Arabs prefer hanging around their own little ghetto microcosms while living abroad in Krautland, Kelemen more or less demonstrates that Russians and other Slavs do the same in Verhängnis, which is set in a Slavified Berlin ghetto where vodka and sex seem like the only things that make life worth living. Of course, as the film ultimately demonstrates, vodka and sex can surely make for a deleterious and sometimes even deadly combo, especially after a poor fellow has busted his ass all day after a hard day of drinking and attempting to scam money, only to come home to find his girlfriend fucking another dude. After a pretentious quote from the Dalai Lama and gritty slow-motion opening montage vaguely in the style of the concluding post-rape scene in Larry Clark’s Kids (1995) featuring various middle-aged to elderly hobo-like Slavs lurking around Berlin as if the city is one big giant third world loony bin, the film cuts to a nighttime shot of a somewhat young Russian illegal alien named Valery (Valerij Fedorenko) playing his accordion while sitting on some stairs outside of some undisclosed building. Eventually, a fat, stocky, and swarthy fellow walks up to Valery, compliments his accordion playing, and invites him to come back to his apartment to play for him for money. Unfortunately for Valery, he unwitting ends up going to the apartment of a seasoned untermensch sadist who gets a craven kick out of taunting the monetarily disadvantaged, especially if they are Russian. Indeed, while the fellow pulls out a fresh bill for Valery as if he is going to give it to him in exchange for his musical services, he takes it away when the street musician goes to grab it. On top of that, the fellow gets extremely agitated while Valery is playing and makes him stop and play a different song. Ultimately, the man 'pays' Valery for his performance with an entire mug of cheap vodka that he more or less forces the musician to drink and then proceeds to throw him out of his apartment in a rather violent fashion, as if he is throwing away a piece of rancid garbage. Surely, the way Valery is abused makes it quite clear that Verhängnis is partly an homage to Herzog's Stroszek, which also centers around an oftentimes abused and belittled Berlin-based street musician of the alcohol-addled sort who plays his accordion in the streets. Unfortunately, also like the eponymous character of Herzog's film, Valery has a whorish girlfriend whose lecherous behavior gets him in trouble.

After being thoroughly degraded by a considerably ugly and mean-spirited little turd of a swarthy sadist, Valery becomes terribly upset and while in a seemingly possessed state decides to wander towards a brightly beaming light in a large water fountain in a marginally transcendental scene where it seems as if the character has just entered the gates of hell. While standing in the fountain with his feet and parts of his legs immersed in water, Valery cries like a wounded animal and thrashes at the water in a scene that transitions to a photo of a small pile of dead corpses, including a baby, as if to hint that the character suffers from PTSD as a result of experiencing the horrors of war when he still lived in his native communist homeland. After playing in the water fountain, Valery heads to a seedy local bar where he gets even drunker and eventually plays a game of pool for cash with some fellow immigrants. While Valery wins the game, he has to pull a knife out upon collecting his rightfully earned award from the pool table, as his competitors are sore losers and begin approaching as if planning to attack him in a vicious fashion. While Valery makes it out of the bar unscathed, he has to watch behind his shoulder while running down a sidewalk to make sure that he is not being chased by the losers of the pool game. Before heading back to his girlfriend's (and possibly his) apartment, Valery decides to take a brief rest by sitting on the sidewalk, not realizing that he will eventually walk into a nightmarish situation that every man dreads that he will ultimately never return from, at least emotionally.

When Valery arrives at the front door of his girlfriend's apartment, he decides to eavesdrop for a little bit and then eventually demands that he be allowed to come inside, but his little lady refuses to allow him inside as if she is hiding something from him, which she most certainly is. After a little bit of yelling back and forth between him and his ladylove Ljuba (played by German actress Sanja

Spengler, who later had a small role in Oskar Roehler's Die Unberührbare (2000 aka No Place to Go), Valery becomes fed up and swiftly kicks open the door of the apartment, only to find his girlfriend completely naked with the exception of a robe and a naked man that she has clearly just engaged in carnal pleasure with. Needless to say, Valery is infuriated and begins grabbing Ljuba by her hair and smacking her around while her shocked secret lover begins slowly putting on his clothes so he can make his escape, but the gutter accordionist notices what he is doing and pulls a gun on him before the fellow can leave. Rather absurdly, Ljuba attempts to grab Valery's gun while he has it pointed at her fuckbuddy, thus causing it to go off and instantly kill the poor young stranger after a single bullet penetrates his gut. To figuratively rub her actions in her face, Valery pulls out the money he has earned for her, literally rubs the money in her face, and then abruptly leaves. Of course, the entire situation leaves Ljuba completely broken and she literally pisses herself while staring at the lifeless corpse of her lover. While still wearing nothing but a robe, Ljuba leaves her apartment and runs into the night where her bad luck ultimately gets much worse.

Clearly not a wise decision maker, Ljuba decides to go to a seedy bar so that she can drown her misery in cheap vodka. While things start off innocently enough when a seemingly nice young man sits beside her at a table and begins talking to her after she ends up choking on her first glass of vodka, Ljuba finds things getting a little bit heated when a swarthy Arab-like guy makes her dance with him and in the process notices she is completely naked under her robe. When Ljuba's dance partner gets a little excited after seeing her supple breasts and bushy beaver, she is angered and pushes him, so he pushes her back and knocks her flat on her face in front of everyone in the bar. Things seem to calm down after a slutty and slightly beautiful blonde barmaid helps Ljuba get up and the grateful character repays the woman by giving her a passionate erotically-charged kiss, but the violent dickhead of a dancer's equally swarthy friend soon decides to sit at the quasi-protagonist's table and it does not take long for him to get under the table and begin molesting her by rubbing his face on her bare pussy while groping her breasts. Needless to say, Ljuba's experience at the bar ends in brutal gang-rape. The next morning, Ljuba wakes up in a field with her robe open and proceeds to start the new day by smoking a post-rape cigarette in a blue-tinted scene that screams 'nuclear winter.' After staring into space while standing near a ruined old factory, Ljuba begins walking and is soon joined by her boyfriend Valery of all people in a scenario that is most certainly a curiously unlikely instance of seemingly fated happenstance. While Ljuba and her murderous boy toy begin walking together and eventually go out of frame, a bulldozer appears out of nowhere and begins following their direction as if to hint that all of humanity and the ugly vulgar post-industrial world it has created should be wiped out from the face of this earth (of course, I doubt this was Kelemen's intent).

When asked by a fellow named Ryan Deussing during a 1996 interview with WKCR-FM about the fact that the lead characters in Verhängnis are immigrants and if he was “thinking about Germany or about politics” when he developed the film, director Fred Kelemen responded with a transparent ‘bleeding heart’ by preposterously stating, “I think everyone should find a way to live that is not cynical, especially people who make something for an audience. You have to be very aware of what you’re doing, and I try not to make films that are ‘against’ what is happening around me. I try to show everything, but not out of cynicism—that’s important to me and to why I made this film. And sure they’re aliens, but in a sense we are all aliens—we find ourselves in a world we don’t understand. We are alienated from ourselves, as well, because we fight the world and we fight each other and we fight our own desires. We all want love, we just don’t understand how to get it.” Of course in its depiction of a man being taunted for being Russian and later taking out all of his pent up rage on a stranger, the preposterous message of the film is that you should not be racist to someone as it might lead to murder, which is certainly the moronic sort of excuse that leftist and cultural marxist types use to explain why the majority of crimes in Germany and the rest of Europe are committed by foreigners (though, of course, it is mainly Turks and other Arabs that commit these crimes and not Russians). Indeed, aside from the film featuring a quite cynical depiction of how Russian immigrants act and respond to situations, Verhängnis seems to almost romanticize a world of ghetto poverty where rape and murder are as commonplace as taking a shit or turning on a light switch. In its depiction of a woman seeing her lover murdered and being gang-raped in what seems to be the span of a couple hours or so, Kelemen’s film is a work that, despite its hyper-gritty realism, features an extremely rather unlikely sequence of events that are about as plausible as those featured in the average Hollywood blockbuster thriller.

Notably, Kelemen’s collaborator Béla Tarr once stated regarding what makes a true auteur filmmaker, “If you are a real filmmaker you have to have your own style, your own language. Which is depending on your cultural background, your history, and your budget of course, and a lot of things what you already have. Because as I see, what I think, filmmaking is a kind of reaction to the world—you’re just telling people how you see the world, from your point of view of course. But, you know, that’s the reason why I do not listen for the other circumstances, what the other people are doing—because it’s impossible to follow someone, impossible to say OK this is a trend, or what we would like to keep it or—it’s definitely fake, wrong way. You have to be yourself, you have to tell everything from your side and you do have to have your own language; and if you have your own language you don’t care about the world and anything really and that’s what I feel, what I learned during these 34 years.” While Kelemen has somewhat of his own style, his works hardly seem like the product of a man who has his “own language” and doesn’t “care about the world and anything really,” as his message regarding the troubles that foreigners face in Germany is just as reductionist-oriented and hysterical as the sort of verbal vomit regurgitated by liberal arts college sociology professors and leftist special interest groups. Indeed, aside from Verhängnis depicting Russians as barbaric ‘white niggers’ in a manner that will certainly appeal to mainstream left-wing film critics and academics, the film features nothing new as far as the history of post-WWII German cinema is concerned. Aside from being aesthetically similar to the gritty realist works of past German filmmakers like Uwe Frießner (Das Ende des Regenbogens aka The End of the Rainbow, Der Drücker) and Uwe Schrader (Kanakerbraut aka White Trash, Sierra Leone), Kelemen’s films are so much like the German era works of relatively forgotten Iranian auteur Sohrab Shahid Saless (Reifezeit aka Time of Maturity, Utopia) in terms of style, content, themes, and general essence that some would probably accuse him of aesthetic plagiarism. Indeed, Saless made long, plotless, and poorly lit 3+ hour-long films about foreigners living in squalor in Berlin before Kelemen’s balls even dropped.

As for works that were shot on archaic video and transferred to film, John Wintergate’s bizarre horror-comedy Boardinghouse (1982), which was shot on Betacam and blown up to 35mm, was released well over a decade before Verhängnis, though one must admit that Kelemen’s work has a rather raw and strangely solacing look to it that demonstrates the director’s talent as a cinematographer. Indeed, Kelemen’s work with Tarr proves that he contributes more to the cinema world as a cinematographer than as a director. After all, Dutch cinematographer Jan de Bont shot some of the greatest arthouse works of post-WWII Dutch cinema, including Adriaan Ditvoorst’s Ik kom wat later naar Madra (1965) aka That Way to Madra and De blinde Fotograaf aka The Blind Photographer (1973), as well as Paul Verhoeven’s Turkish Delight (1973) aka Turks fruit and The 4th Man (1983) aka De vierde man, yet the Hollywood blockbusters he directed upon becoming a filmmaker like Twister (1996) and Lara Croft Tomb Raider: The Cradle of Life (2003) are pure and unadulterated celluloid shit that seem like they were assembled by the all the more Asperger-plagued brother of Michael Bay. While I certainly will not complain if Kelemen continues to direct films, I think he has a better chance at becoming the next Robby Müller than the next Tarkovsky or Fassbinder like some film critics seem to believe. To Kelemen’s credit, he admitted in a February 25, 2014 interview with YNET Israel, “There’s no difference for me whether I’m shooting a film as a director or only as a cinematographer,” which is certainly not something any serious auteur filmmaker would say. Undoubtedly, Verhängnis is certainly more interesting than most of the films that have been produced in Germany since the death of Fassbinder/New German Cinema, but of course that says more about the sorry state of contemporary kraut cinema than it does about Kelemen’s talent as a filmmaker.

AUGUST UNDERGROUND TRILOGY

Fred Vogel* (2001)

When you search for “The most disgusting movie”, chances are the name August Underground has come into play more than once. That is how I found out about this trilogy of depravity, sadism, and punishment. The series is so notorious because it takes a simple serial killer sketchboard and transforms it into something so realistic, and so extreme, that it is almost incomprehensible.

Imagine walking down a road, to the nearest 7-Eleven. You stumble upon a VHS tape that isn't labeled. Your curiosity gets the best of you and you decide to take it home. You are walking down the street with this tape. As you enter your apartment, you set the tape on your coffee table and take care of some odd jobs. When you finally get a chance, you sit down and pop it in. Static graces the screen with a strangely illuminated presence. You watch as an almost amateur home video pops up onto the screen. You sit amused while watching two normal guys just drink and chat. They then walk into the house and open the basement door. You don't realize that every step they take, is a step closer to the real hell. This is just the first step in the exploits of these unnamed killers. Every action seems to go unnoticed by the general public. This film angers, disgusts, horrifies, and condemns you to join the ranks of fellow SICKO's. All three of these films link up in an almost perfect way. August Underground is the considered to be the birth of these killers. We do not know if they have killed before, nor do we think about it as we watch through their eyes. In the first AU, we are subjected to two killers. Well, one actually. The cameraman never physically kills someone, but he nevertheless torments and imposes it upon him or her. This film is almost too real. From the camerawork to the static, this film will shock you when you watch it. These films have the best special effects thanks to Jerami Cruise, FX Artist for Toe Tag Pictures. The only scene I really had a problem with was the blowjob scene. When he started punching her, I was laughing at how bad it looked. You get the feeling of hopelessness head on. What Fred Vogel created is the most realistic and seedy film on serial killers ever filmed. He doesn't try to glamorize serial killers like most other movies. He shows what it is, gritty, horrifying, and unpleasant. At the end of the film, it doesn't have credits, it just cuts off. You sit on your couch and just think about what you just subjected yourself to. This film rips your metaphorical jugular out and shits on it. If you want the real deal screw CSI, get August Underground. The second of the films is entitled August Underground Mordum. This one takes what you thought to be the worst, most prolific serial killer movie, and vomits all over you. This one is more focused on sexual extremes as a whole. They take everything you thought was hardcore and blew your expectations away. The only real problem with Mordum is that it seems so uninvolved with everything. It's too over the top, one might say. They take Fred Vogel's character and introduce 2 new killers,

AUGUST UNDERGROUND TRILOGY

Crusty and Maggot. They are brothers and sisters and they fuck around. While this just not only confuses the hell out of everyone, it also makes the film seem less realistic in a sense but for every disadvantage there is an advantage. In this film, there is the most graphic castration scene that has ever been committed to celluloid. There are scenes that are so brutal and unmerciful that its amazing that this film isn't all over the news. This film thrives at its core on the sheer brutality that it portrays. There is a scene involving a little girl and a bathtub, which is beyond offensive and degrading. The whole argument over Mordum is which version is better. The co-star Maggot released this film cut and extended the way he wanted it to be looked upon. It is simply dubbed "The Maggot Cut". Copies can still be found on eBay occasionally. Near the horrifying climax of this film, our favorite killers meet up with Killjoy, Member of Necrophagia, and discover he has some "skeletons" in his closet also. After the release of Mordum, Toe Tag Pictures garnered some credibility as being the new face of horror. To quote Fred Vogel himself, "The future of horror is bright fucking red". That quote has stuck with me ever since my initial viewing because the man is right. Horror is going downhill fast. They make film like they see it, not so people of a younger age can watch it. These films can be personally described as a "No holds barred descent into hell on earth". When this film got released, it exploded all over forums. Fans and newcomers were amazed and confounded. No way in hell could he ever top the original but he did. August Underground Penance was the most amazing film I have ever seen. When the name was released, I immediately went to a dictionary and looked it up. It has to do with atonement for sins. The name and theme could not be anymore perfect. When it was released and I got my copy. I sat down and was just fucking amazed. The only thing that I hated about these films was that the characters seemed so invincible. They would kill, they would laugh, and they would fuck. It seemed like it would never stop or never feel for their actions but in Penance all that changed. The emotions from the killers just amazed me so much. I cried in this film. It is so brutally beautiful. There is so much to this film that isn't even noticed right away. This movie had been under speculation from fans and critics alike because there appeared to be no way they could top Mordum but they ultimately did. A great trilogy which is severely overrated at times, but still a classic in underground horror. These films should be viewed but take heed to the warnings you read on the internet.

THE REDSIN TOWER

Fred Vogel* (2006)

"Butchery and carnage will reign upon the holy"

I do not remember their being anyone considered "Holy" in this film. The newest film from TOETAG Pictures, creators of such nasties as August Underground and August Underground Mordum, is the mother of all over hyped cinema. This film started screening about a year ago in horror conventions around the globe. Many reviews brought back amazing results, one even going as far as to say it "re-invents the slasher genre". You can imagine the average consumer being throttled for this film, but all hopes were shattered when the DVD release date was delayed in hopes of finding a company to release this film on DVD. Fans waited and waited and finally, they just released it themselves. I pre-ordered my copy without a second glance. The film has a simple and... familiar plot. Mitch loves Kim. Kim loves Mitch. Kim wants more. Kim breaks up with Mitch. Mitch is pissed. He wants revenge. Kim wants drugs and alcohol and cheap sex. Mitch wants vengeance. Kim wants to party at a sleazy tower with all her "gothic" friends. Madness ensues. Now the acting, is a very mixed bag. We got Mitch, played by Perry Tiberio, who in all aspects is and can be a great actor. He needs some work on his sniffing though. Then we have Kim, who i am going to be a nice guy and say that her acting is horrid. I cannot imagine anyone thinking the acting in this film is better than any of the other Vogel productions. The stoner guy was a good actor too. The cast seems very cliched and annoying. I dont view any of these characters as real people. We got the stud football jock, a Fat Joe look alike, Gothic sex fiend, and the stoner and company. I only sympathized for maybe 3 characters out of the entire running time. One cool thing about this film though, is how they managed to mix a slasher film with supernatural climaxes. You never really know who to trust or who will get out in the end. The gore, which TOETAG is so famous for, is hardly there. We got a face slashed, maggot afterbirth, intestines, and etc. It looks good, but it could have used higher quantity. Another thing that got me was how the film is titled "THE REDSIN TOWER" but there is only 1 floor. One floor that houses a flying lizard plant which reminded me of Full Moon pictures bad attempts at animatronics. The lighting in this film varies from too dark to see anything, but it is a tower, and really beautiful shots involving lots of cunning uses of shadows. "The future of horror is BRIGHT FUCKING RED" If they make any more films like this, it seems the future of horror is pretty fucking bland. Overall, this movie is just another notch in my mind of movies i have seen. Nothing too special, and it has all been seen before. All this coming from a TOETAG Pictures fan. On a brighter note, i did get a really cool patch with the DVD.

THE REDSIN TOWER
THE REDSIN TOWER

Fred Vogel* (2006)

Toe Tag Pictures has obtained a loyal following over the past couple of years. This following was in response to their debut August Underground and later sequels. These “videos” provide the viewer with homemade style snuff fun. It is obvious that creator Fred Vogel figured an easy way to get around having a large budget and effort put into his film would be to go for cheap brutality and realistic looking torture. Mr. Vogel has been praised for his efforts and creating “original” terror. I don’t think I agree with that when taking into account the countless other films using the same mock reality technique. Cannibal Holocaust and The Blair Witch Project are two earlier films that provide the viewer with a more intimate look at fear. Aside from the three August Underground films, Toe Tag Pictures has also managed to produce the feature The Redsin Tower. Going into the film I didn’t know what to expect. The August Underground films give no insight into the artistic capabilities and creativity that Toe Tag Pictures might have (aside from special effects). I was entertained by their pseudo snuff films but that kind of stuff gets old fairly fast. With The Redsin Tower I could finally make up my mind on Toe Tag Pictures and their future in “underground” horror. The Toe Tag Pictures team makes an introduction before The Redsin Tower mentioning how they had many distributors offering the team a DVD release. I can assume that was probably only Brain Damage Films as The Redsin Tower is an even weaker effort than most the films they distribute. The Redsin Tower was a group effort by the Toe Tag Pictures team which has given me zero faith in any further project they produce. I still think that their best contribution to film was the special effects they did for Murder-Set-Pieces. Many Toe Tag fans have responded negatively to Murder-Set-Pieces as they have probably realized that Toe Tag Pictures should stick to special effects and give up on “filmmaking.” The Redsin Tower is not an easily digested film. This is not because the film is deep or contains various subtexts that require further viewings to appreciate. It’s because it’s a dragging, banal, horribly written, and amateurishly directed shit-fest. Fred Vogel’s character in the film is a metaphor for the whole film. He plays a fat, loser stoner rasta that looks like he should have been at a sublime concert in 1993. I doubt Mr. Vogel would ever overdose on heroin. After he takes a bong hit he’s too busy with his Taco Bell and Snowballs. The Redsin Tower’s cover art looks like it was directly lifted from Dario Argento’s Suspiria. This is no doubt theft on the part of Toe Tag Pictures. It is also no surprise. They also “borrow” heavily from Sam Raimi’s Evil Dead when one of the many forgettable actresses becomes possessed and becomes “ghoulish.” Raimi did it much better 25 years ago. Keep in mind that this entire scene near the end of The Redsin Tower is by far the most interesting part of the film.

Fred Vogel must be a huge Dario Argento fan

The Redsin Tower plot seemed like it came out of the lyrics of a My Chemical Romance song. Is the Toe Tag Pictures a group of hopeless dark natured romantics? I assume they just wish they were. Toe Tag Pictures offers their fans cheap nudity and gore just as their mainstream Hollywood counterparts do. The only difference is that Hollywood horror films offer a more polished look with more silicone. I am against Toe Tag pictures representing the "underground." They couldn't lick the blood off of directors like Jörg Buttgerreit, Jim Van Bebber, or Shinya Tsukamoto's legendary film reels.

Fred Vogel* (2010)

For the first 6 years, ToeTag Pictures, now respectively ToeTag Inc., had been slowly establishing themselves as a dominating force in a genre practically unclaimed and never-to-be-taken-seriously: faux-snuff. What ToeTag did for found footage still represents a turning point in the way I perceive and anticipate violence, regardless of the attitudes of the crew. With a steady drum-roll, The Redsin Tower was finally released with incredible praise. Following August Underground Penance, The Redsin Tower was ToeTag's breaking free from the shackles, as to say, making a real film. My dreadful experience with such was highlighted in a review some years back and I completely lost faith in the ToeTag crew to produce anything that can't be redeemed by a bucket of blood, no matter how realistic or gritty said bucket might be. With my unsightly hair standing on end, I received a copy of ToeTag's latest film, Sella Turcica, and began to slowly digest the images vacuumed onto my screen. It's surely sad to say that the only thing ToeTag ever did correctly was film themselves being assholes with corn syrup.

The magic that ToeTag achieved in Murder-Set-Pieces is surely not reflected behind the camera. Sella Turcica, which is a depression in the skull having to do with the pituitary gland, is Fred Vogel's image of a "drama," a film so wrapped up inside its ghastly narcissism that it refuses to wield its horror badge until the final ten minutes. The plot revolves around a family's homecoming preparation to a returning soldier and son, Sgt. something-or-another. Bound to a wheelchair, the demise of his ability to walk is a mystery to both the family and the somber fellow whose handicap is his own. Greeting him is his mother, Camille Keaton (Rape "victim"), and his brother, sister, and sister-in-law. Oh, and also the Negro DJ/rapper who is sleeping with the young sister. This wacky cast of can't-be actors play thespian comedy as they bumble about tripping over lines and passing expressions which are better suited for ventriloquist dummies. The worst offender is I Spit on Your Grave's Camille Keaton, whose acting ability reveals itself to be limited exclusively to being chased, raped, repeat. Translating the synopsis while filtering out the bullshit is simply a favor I cannot bless the Pittsburgh based "filmmakers."

It's become glaringly obvious that the fans of ToeTag concentrate their behavior into a "cult" of sorts, almost like Juggalos but nowhere near the severity of brainwashing. As this hivemind would have it, no negative connotations may surround any film in the independent oeuvre of ToeTag, lest you be flamed with verbal threats of Fulci-worthy torture. Did I mention that the dog in the film is named Fulci? I wonder whose fandom has been plastered upon us. Sella Turcica is a film that has received incredible word-of-mouth and will sell at least several thousand copies, a dubious honor considering the film would better serve as a practical effects demo reel. The commendations from such high-profile horror sites should have been my warning to tread away as these are the same fans who claimed The Redsin Tower to be the horror marvel of 2006. It's not an unknown fact that Sella Turcica is a remake of Deathdream, regardless of what anyone tells you. The same war-horror story is traced with alterations but retains the same heart, but not quite as I'm sure Deathdream is the far superior film.

If you favor derivative familial functions than Sella Turcica might be your cup of tea, but if you're expecting a tale of tempestuous horror worthy of the Hitchcock inspired poster artwork you'll be sorely disappointed. Only in the finale does something of an event unfold. Suddenly the Sgt. stands up, spitting up blood and tissue matter all over his shirt and begins to smash, claw, bite, and break his family members in a vegetated fashion, as saying the twitchy movements and snarls of the undead son are the only bright aspects of the entire production. When this somewhat rousing scene of retribution is unleashed upon the annoying kinfolk, it's as if the stars aligned and a bit of light had shed upon the land. Had Fred Vogel decided to make a dedicated zombie film, perhaps I'd have kinder hostilities to spout but alas, he's settled for documenting interracial relationships while shoving the alternative lifestyles of his actors down your throat. Yes, we get it. You like tattoos and piercings as well as your fans. I only wish he'd audition people other than fans for his productions. When the calling for Toe Tag is finally answered, what we get is rotten and expired. Not to say the film wasn't dead the first utterance that escaped Camille Keaton's mouth.

Otomo
Otomo

Frieder Schlaich (1999)

A number of German New Cinema auteur filmmakers made great, if not ludicrously left-wing, films about German-foreigner relations, including Rainer Werner Fassbinder with Katzelmacher (1969) aka Cock Artist and Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974) aka Angst essen Seele auf, Werner Schroeter with Palermo oder Wolfsburg (1980), Helma Sanders-Brahms with Shirin's Hochzeit (1976) aka Shirin's Wedding, and Alexander Kluge with Vermischte Nachrichten (1986) aka Miscellaneous News, so—at least cinematically speaking—the Teutons are not exactly new to tackling contemporary social issues like multiculturalism and the (mostly imaginary) reality of race hate, yet if one were to judge by the rather recent kraut melodrama Otomo (1999), it would seem that the contemporary filmmakers of the Fatherland have begun to drastically degenerate in their thinking and artistic prowess or lack thereof, as if the vital lifeblood had been drained from their hearts, minds, and souls. After all, Fassbinder hated his countrymen, especially the bourgeois and was a pathological partaker in homo miscegenation yet he realized that, at least if we were to judge by his work Ali: Fear Eats the Soul, that racially mixed romantic relationships are doomed to failure and that a master-slave relationship is the natural order in any sort of so-called 'multicultural' society, no matter how much "tolerance" is thrown down one's throat. Additionally, Fassbinder's friend Werner Schroeter demonstrated in Palermo oder Wolfsburg that, typically, the foreigner would always be a perennial untermensch in Deutschland, bound to serfdom, subjugation, exploitation, and a sort of mentally crippling culture shock that leads to violent and irrational criminality and the same rabid race hate that leftists, rather idealistically, believe they can exterminate. In Otomo directed by German director/producer Frieder Schlaich—co-owner of Filmgalerie 451 and producer of films by kraut greats like Christoph Schlingensiefel and Werner Schroeter—one gets a more cultural Marxist friendly message on the need for Aryans everywhere to be more sensitive and sexually inviting when dealing with the Ausländer because, after all, a lack of cultural sensitivity can result in a multicultural pile of dead Aryans and dead Negroes if a simple misunderstanding occurs due to the sort of 'lost in translation' communication that occurs in culturally schizophrenic multicultural societies. Loosely based on a true story (virtually all the details and drama of the film were invented in a calculated and propagandistic manner) about a so-called "asylum-seeker" (aka illegal alien) named Frederic Otomo who was shot death after stabbing two cops and injuring three others during one terribly tragic day in Stuttgart in 1989, Otomo is one of those fundamentally formulaic, modern ethno-masochistic and slave-morality-driven cinematic works that attempts to inspire Stockholm syndrome in more weak-minded and emotionally-inclined white viewers, while further instilling a sense of guilt and moral superiority in the sort of wily and wimpy white liberal scum that promote and create such fabricated celluloid feces. Borrowing gritty realistic aesthetic techniques from German lone wolf auteur Roland Klick (Supermarkt, White Star)—who director Frieder Schlaich once made a documentary about—Otomo is the cuckold kraut equivalent to Crash (2004) directed by Paul Haggis, minus the 'passion,' as the sort of patently pointless and socially pernicious cinematic work that accuses everyone, except the noble non-white viewer of course, of being a crypto-racist with the capacity for indirectly killing a good bible-reading and seashell-collecting Negro man.

Sensitive yet stoic illegal alien Otomo (played by Ivorian actor Isaac de Bankolé of Jim Jarmusch's Night on Earth (1991) and The Limits Of Control (2009)) lives a rather pathetic and destitute life in Stuttgart, Germany as a jobless wanderer who is on an aimless journey to find meager employment, but it seems not a single kind kraut soul exists to help him as all good, groveling white people should. When Otomo is denied employment at a dilapidated temporary employment agency because he has neither an ID nor a proper pair of working shoes (he wears a pair of vintage slippers with holes in them that one of the Germans mockingly calls "Jungle Stompers"), he makes the unwitting mistake of riding in a subway train and is eventually hassled by an ostensibly 'racist' prick of a ticket-collector for not having the right ticket. After the ticket-collector attempts to cite Otomo and stop him from leaving the train, the agitated black man makes the genius decision to headbutt the anally retentive kraut and runs away like a rebel slave on a confederate plantation. Naturally, the ticked off ticket-collector, who now has a broken nose for technically doing his job (even if he is an asshole about it), reports Otomo to the police, thus leading to a super Schwarze mensch-hunt against the angry African. A young and married Nordic cop named Heinz (Hanno Friedrich) and his goofy rapping beta-male partner Rolf (Barnaby Metschurat) hope to be the ones to catch Otomo as they hope to receive job promotions. Meanwhile, a corrupt truck driver offers to smuggle Otomo to the Netherlands if he can come up with the cash, so he hassles a young 46-year-old grandmother named Gisela (ex-Fassbinder SuperStar Eva Mattes in a terribly degrading role) and her toddler granddaughter for money in a quasi-threatening manner that makes little sense, but luckily she is a sexually desperate xenophile who is in a weekly African dance class and finds the angry African's aggressiveness to be rather arousing, so she makes the wise decision to take the fugitive back to her daughter's apartment. Unfortunately, Gisela's daughter Simone (Lara Kugler) shows up to find her blonde baby daughter dancing with a strange black man and the police eventually close in on Otomo. Although Gisela, like a true white sugar mama, gets Otomo the money, the truck driver has already left for the Netherlands, thus leaving the hapless African stuck in Stuttgart under the racially-charged radar a bunch of evil Teutonic devils whose Nazi grandparents supported Uncle Adolf. When Heinz, Rolf, and three other policemen finally reach Otomo and try reason with him, he merely stares blankly as a tear falls down his face, only to stab all of the cops when they, rather gently, attempt to take him into custody, thus leaving three men dead, three men injured, and at least one woman widowed; all because a scared foreigner who was illegally in the country in the first place did not want to go to jail. To top things off, while Otomo's funeral is only attended by Gisela and an obese hotel clerk with a grotesque case of heterochromia who looks like he could be Austrian actor Peter Kern's slightly more slim brother, the fallen policemen are given festive public funerals, thus clearly illustrating the innate 'racism' of Deutschland! (or something).

Otomo is surely the sort of film that could have only been made in contemporary Europe as a pathetic piece of minimalistic 'realist' propaganda ridden with poverty porn, groveling ethno-masochistic xenophilia, naive 'noble savage' worship, innate anti-nationalist sentiment, aesthetic dreariness and deadness, hokey hip hop beats, and a general artistic and philosophical impotence. If it were not for the film's patently politically correct, Negro-martyring message, Otomo would be regarded as just another banal, soulless, and forgotten contemporary German film, if acknowledged at all. Ironically, director Frieder Schlaich included a scene of 'unconscious racism' (at least as far as limp-wristed leftists are concerned) in Otomo in an unintentionally hilarious allusion to Frankenstein (1931) directed by James Whale where the black protagonist—standing in for the creature—plays with flowers with a little blonde girl next to a lake. Indeed, it seems Schlaich was guilty of the same pathetic and futile 'finger-pointing' that he condemns the everyday German of in his absolutely odious work Otomo—a virtual 'how-to' guide in being a cultural commie kraut without cock, balls, and a sense for artistry and logic. The essential message of Otomo is that in every 'asylum seeker' is a misunderstood man who can potentially discuss the bible for hours, lovingly dances with little Aryan girls, be a 'noble savage' and 'exotic primitive' for sexually desperate German grandmothers who are fed up with impotent Aryan men to enjoy, and a morally-endowed man who rightfully puts anally retentive, authoritarian civil workers in their place by headbutting them like an animal, even if he is a coldblooded murderer who kills out of the juvenile fear that he might have to spend the night in one of the many majority non-German jails. Indeed, after watching Otomo, I have come to the natural conclusion that director Frieder Schlaich does not even deserve to lick the post-mortem assholes of kraut cinematic greats like Schlingensiefel and Schroeter, so it baffles me that such a horrendous hack ever had the opportunity of working them. Featuring homely German New Cinema diva Eva Mattes in the decidedly degrading role of a mindless mudshark of a grandmother that is described by her own daughter as being a dreaded "old hippie," Otomo is a perfect example of the slow and steady decline that is German and European cinema in general by casting a woman who starred in works by greats like Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Werner Herzog as a rather retarded and reprehensible woman who would risk the life of her granddaughter just so she can be manhandled by a muscular Mandingo. Winning such coveted and wonderfully titled prizes as the particularly prestigious “Diversity in Spirit Award,” Otomo is undoubtedly indisputable proof that contemporary German filmmakers no longer have Faustian souls, but some of them, like Frieder Schlaich, wish they had Negro ones, even if they have the artistic swag of an eunuch with autism.

Fritz Lang (1931)

M is Fritz Lang's best film. Lang has admitted this in multiple interviews and even in Jean-Luc Godard's Contempt (which I think is Godard's best film). M was also Lang's second to last early German film (The Testament of Dr. Mabuse being the last) before fleeing Nazi minister of Propaganda's Josef Goebbels offer to direct films for the Reich (keep in mind Lang's Mother was Jewish). Most of Lang's later films (especially American) would have much smaller budgets (especially in comparison to films like Metropolis). Despite being released over 75 years ago, M is still the best film dealing with a child murderer/molester. Peter Lorre does an excellent job portraying the killer Hans Beckert. His pathetic and gentle nature fit the profile of a real life child killer. Lorre's froglike eyes give off the intensity of an uncontrollable murderer. I believe Killer Hans when he says he can't control his behavior. His mannerisms are uncontrollably suspicious to say the least. Nazi propagandist Fritz Hippler utilized Lorre's end speech for his failed propaganda film The Eternal Jew. The reason for this was that it confirmed Jewish "degenerate art" and mental illness. It was also used as evidence that Jews were prone to criminal behavior and showed no desire to take responsibility for their crimes. Peter Lorre is probably most famous for his role in American propaganda film Casablanca. Quite interesting that Lorre played a part in both sides of wartime propaganda (whether he agreed to or not). One of the most telling scenes of M is when the child murderer Hans takes refuge in the shadows of a clustered room. He is a scared and pathetic individual. You almost even feel sorry for the killer. However, his horrible acts are unforgivable. Director Fritz Lang ultimately seems to blame the parents of the children as expressed in the M's conclusion. I really hope Lang wasn't an apologist for criminals of the worst type. M has a feeling like no other. The film is set in a shadowy city that feels undeniably claustrophobic. As M progresses, you feel that the capture of Hans is inevitable. He has nowhere to hide. The networking used by the citizens (most being criminals themselves) hunting the murderer makes for an intense capture. When the murderer is finally caught excitement reaches its climax. Fritz Lang is my second favorite German expressionist director (F.W. Murnau being my favorite). His varying range of cinematic achievements confirm Lang as being one of the most interesting and innovative directors in film history. Peter Lorre's voice would later be the inspiration for Ren Höek of the now classic The Ren and Stimpy Show. Fritz Lang's M is without doubt one of the greatest films ever made. David Fincher and his film Se7en need to take notice!

SCARLET STREET

Fritz Lang (1945)

Scarlet Street is a gloomy film noir directed by Fritz Lang during a time when the director had a lot of anger. German Jewish film critic Lotte Eisner claimed that Lang's American films reflected his contempt for what was going on in Europe before and during the second world war. Fritz Lang, born in Vienna, Austria, was a ½ Jew and felt his homeland had betrayed him. That didn't stop Nazi minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels from offering (according to Lang himself) Lang to become the head of the German film studio UFA. Instead of taking the offer, Lang ran off to France and then eventually settled in America. Lang's wife Thea von Harbor (who co-wrote many of Lang's scripts such as Metropolis and M) decided to join the Nazi party. Scarlet Street follows a low ranking banker and amateur painter by the name of Christopher Cross. Cross, played by the legendary film noir star Edward G. Robinson, is a pathetic individual with limited self-confidence. His life changes when he meets a cunning prostitute with the fitting name 'Kitty' who is also called 'Lazy Legs.' Of course, Kitty cons Cross into thinking she likes the small and pathetic man. Kitty's boyfriend Johnny is the mastermind of this scheme. Soon Kitty has an apartment to stay in. The rent is free, courtesy of stolen bank money from Mr. Cross. Kitty also steals Cross's painting and signs her name on them to the recommendation of Johnny. Kitty loves Johnny and seems to love him even more when he smacks her. Johnny doesn't show much genuine emotion towards Kitty, only enough to convince her to commit dirty deeds for him. When Christopher Cross finally figures out he is being played, the repercussions are unexpected and violent to say the very least. Upon proposing marriage to Kitty, Cross receives a heartbreaking response. Kitty says to Cross, "I wanted to laugh in your face ever since the moment I met you. You're old, ugly, and I'm sick of you. Sick! Sick! Sick!" After hearing this Cross bursts into anger and finally "sticks it" to Kitty with an ice pick. I guess all that sequel repression had to be dealt with somehow. This scene is possibly one of the most brutal scenes for it's time period and echoes back to Fritz Lang's days in Germany when he was making films like M. Johnny is a quick talking blond beast that lacks the character that goes with his looks. Chris Cross, on the other hand, is a little Jew who we assume has a big heart. In the end, Cross is double crossed by the woman he loves (like Lang was by his wife Thea von Harbor) and her Aryan boy toy. With Scarlet Street, was Fritz Lang taking his revenge on Germany with cinema? Christopher Cross, like Fritz Lang, was an artist that lost his temper and the results were ugly. Although a masterpiece of film noir cinema, it is almost hard to believe that Lang was the same man that directed Metropolis and Woman in the Moon. Lang went from somewhat of an optimist to a moral nihilist.

Frouke Fokkema (1990)

During the late 1960s through early 1980s, various auteur filmmakers associated with New German Cinema created cinematic works oftentimes described as 'anti-Heimat' films that mocked and ridiculed the traditional Heimatfilm—a popular subgenre from the late 1940s through about the early 1970s that took a sentimental approach to simple rural living and traditionalist values—because they were brainwashed by the 68er-Bewegung German student and then-trendy 'New Left' ideologies and associated such films with the National Socialist proclivities of their parents and grandparents generation. The Lowland Countries like Belgium and the Netherlands had their own types of random anti-Heimat films as reflected in works like Fons Rademakers' Mira (1971) and Alex van Warmerdam flicks like De Noorderlingen (1992) aka The Northerners and Kleine Teun (1998) aka Little Tony, but probably none of these works are as cold, ugly, and tragic as the little known work Kracht (1990) aka Vigour aka Vigor directed by flagrant feminist filmmaker Frouke Fokkema (Wildgroei aka It Will Never Be Spring, De omweg aka The Detour). While I have never seen any of her other works, I did see Martin Koolhoven's darkly comedic cult flick Suzy Q (1999), which Fokkema penned and which presents a pathetic yet perturbing portrait of a 1960s Dutch working-class family that involves incest, violent misogyny, suicide, and mindless Mick Jagger worship, among other things. Unlike Suzy Q, Kracht is rarely humorous and is even sometimes downright oppressive in its 'stoic' depiction of raw and unadulterated human ugliness. Indeed, one thing that is especially notable about Fokkema's film is that it features a sort of cold emotional detachment that women typically seem to excel at. As one can expect from a film directed by a feminist that depicts an unlikely love affair between a widowed farmer from rural bumfuck and sensitive female artist type from the big city, Fokkema's directorial debut portrays Dutch peasants as close-minded and lynch-mob-inclined barbarians of the genetically degenerate sort who loathe modern art and lack even the slightest inkling of literacy and cultivation, yet somehow it is still a rather potent cinematic work of the emotionally brutalizing sort that demonstrates that its director seems to have a lot of pent up hatred which she has used to obscure assumed heartbreak and whatnot. In its depiction of a beautiful young blonde painter who lives in the shadow of her lover's dead wife and tries in vain to get her widowed farmer beau to get over his deceased spouse, Kracht is like the Dutch anti-Heimat equivalent to Hitchcock's classic Rebecca (1940) sans the Victorian Gothic elegance meets John Boorman's Deliverance (1972), albeit somewhat darker and drearier than the other two films. Set in a dysgenic rural hellhole in southeastern Holland where the locals speak a dialect of the somewhat obscure Franconian language of Limburgish, Fokkema's film makes no attempts to conceal its hatred for the simple folk that it portrays as reflected in the fact that various characters are retarded and/or crippled, especially women and child, not to mention the fact that virtually all of them are unlikeable, if not downright creepy in a sinister redneck sort of way. Indeed, Kracht is indubitably a neo-liberal feminist's worst nightmare, but that does not mean it will not appeal to people that find rednecks to be less repellant than Gloria Steinem fangirls.

Kracht begins with a funeral march for the wife of recently widowed quasi-protagonist Bert (Theu Boermans), who is a farmer that looks and even acts like the slightly less attractive brother of Swiss actor Bruno Ganz. Bert's wife Marie-Louise's corpse is being driven around by two goofy brothers, Jeu (Khalidoun Elmecky) and Jo (Bert Geurkink), who resemble the ghostly gangsters from the Israeli cult flick An American Hippie in Israel (1972) aka Ha-Trempiist directed by Amos Sefer. In a clear demonstration of what auteuress Fokkema thinks of the local peasants, one of the two brothers remarks regarding Limburg, "The more the land becomes hilly, the more people sided with the Germans. My father used to say that." While Bert's wife died of brain cancer, most of the locals believe she worked herself to death and now that she is gone, the protagonist has no clue what to do with his life as he and his beloved have spent virtually the entire lives running their farm business and now he feels that he has lost his way. Before he watches her body being cremated, Bert takes the wedding band off his wife's corpse in a symbolic gesture reflecting the fact that he cannot let her go. Bert's seemingly half-retarded prepubescent son Thomas (Dave van Dinther) is in denial that his mother is dead as indicated in his bizarre remark, "My mother isn't dead. She always be my mother. And I'll survive you all. Then you'll be in jars. There'll be ten jars on the mantelpiece." Of course, the jars Thomas is in reference to the fact that his mother was cremated and her ashes were placed in a vase. When Bert begins mourning, less than empathetic neighbors scream rather cavalier things from outside his house things like, "Go to work. Your animals are starving. Self-pity. Cut it out." When Bert's butcher brother starts a fist fight with him, a neighbor woman remarks, "They're killing each other. They've been doing it for twenty years." Undoubtedly, if Bert is a cryptically melancholy man, his butcher brother is as hard and stoic as a rock. After two months of mopping around, the local Catholic priest visits Bert and, after some arguing, convinces him to go to an agriculture fair in a city 200 kilometers away. Unbeknownst to Bert, he will meet a beautiful young woman in the city that will fall deeply in love with him, but he will be to emotionally ill-equipped to accept her love and will ultimately destroy her.

While Bert roams around a large crowd at the agriculture convention in the city, a ravishing young blonde babe named Roos Rozemond (Anneke Blok) randomly begins taking photographs of him because she is attracted to his melancholic essence. Bert eventually notices Roos and decides to follow her to a table and asks her if he can sit next to her. Upon sitting at the table, Bert tells Roos that he feels like a stranger in the city since he is a country boy and she responds by half-jokingly stating, "I'm always a stranger in this city and I live here." Indeed, Roos is a rather lonely and somewhat sad young lady and she is attracted to Bert because she could sense a similar feeling of impenetrable loneliness in him. Ultimately, Roos insists on finding Bert a "good hotel" and agrees to meet him later that night for a dinner date. Roos is an artist who, somewhat ironically considering what happens to her later in the film, paints large canvasses of mutilated pigs in a sort of quasi-expressionist style that Bert will ultimately have a hard time appreciating. When Roos and Bert eat dinner with one another later that night, the latter becomes fairly annoyed when the former's ex-boyfriend Sjors (Rik Launspach) randomly shows up, so he forces his date to leave abruptly with him and they head back to his hotel. When Roos comes back to Bert's hotel room and gets rather sensual with him, the less than sexually experienced farmer awkwardly remark, "I'm a simple man. I have to get used to it." When Roos asks Bert if he thinks she's a prostitute while sitting on his lap in a provocative fashion, he replies, "Yes. You look a bit like those women you have to pay." When Roos jokes that he can tip her if she wants after they have sex, he somewhat absurdly replies in a hopelessly honest fashion, "Good, money speaks more clearly than love. But it's confusing with you. You may mean more than just money." Although they have just met, Roos even goes so far as proclaiming her love for Bert, who opens up enough to reveal that his wife is dead and that he has, "A 9-year-old son. A real asshole." Ultimately, Bert has too much anxiety about having sex with Roos, so when she falls asleep, he writes her a note with his phone number and abruptly leaves the hotel. Naturally, since she believes that she is in love, Roos wastes no time in calling Bert, not realizing her new beau comes from a backwards hellhole of a small-town where everyone is proudly ignorant, perennially stubborn, and not privy to sensitive artistic types like herself.

Upon arriving at Bert's isolated town via train, Roos is chauffeured by the brothers Jeu and Jo, who shock the young lady by remarking that her beau's wife only died recently and was purportedly "worked to death." Roos almost seems petrified upon entering Bert's seemingly foreboding town due the lack of people and complains, "Are you sure this is it? I don't see anyone," to which Jeu and Jo somewhat creepily reply, "They see you." Indeed, the villagers certainly see her and it does not take them long to treat her like the local 'bête noire' because she is a beautiful and free-spirited outsider who threatens their absurdly outmoded way of life. Needless to say, Roos is somewhat disheartened when Bert seems less happy to see her as she is to see him. When Roos has dinner with Bert's family, she is disturbed by the fact that her lover has an invalid sister that cannot talk and is more or less vegetable. Undoubtedly, the vegetable farmgirl seems to be symbolic of what the director thinks like life is life for a woman in such a small village. Bert's butcher brother also makes quite the impression on Roos by discussing “artificial insemination” and how America has the “best semen” when it comes to farm animals. When one of Bert’s relatives remarks that Roos reminds him of the sort of models that are featured on local pornographic post-cards, the protagonist loses his cool and abruptly leaves the dinner with his lady friend. Instead of talking to her and asking her what she likes, Bert spends most of his time with Roos morbidly talking about his dead wife, thereupon making it quite clear that he is incapable of moving on and starting a life with a new woman. While Bert compliments Roos because she “can listen” and, unlike his relatives, actually cares how he feels, he is completely incapable of listening back and ultimately treats the hopelessly kind city girl in a rather emotionally and romantically negligent fashion that will ultimately break her. When the two love birds finally have sex for the first time, Bert gets a little too excited and ejaculates before he even manages to penetrate Roos. Of course, the two eventually begin to share a healthy sexual relationship that involves literally rolling around in the hay, but shared carnal knowledge is not enough to sustain their dubious romance.

Quite unlike the average western woman, Roos makes the most valiant and uncomfortable attempts to fit in with Bert’s family, including acting as a mother to his mentally feeble misfit son Thomas, who is such an unlikeable young man that he states regarding his own grandmother that she is a “Stupid woman” and brag, “Sometimes I hit her, because she’s so stupid.” Roos even paints a large almost life-size painting of her lover and his brothers and Bert later repays her priceless gesture of love and affection by unwittingly insulting her by attempting to buy her a cheap piece of folk art at a local fair while mocking the sort of modern art she does by describing it as “not really practical.” On top of everything else, Roos is quite unhappy with the fact that Bert’s deceased wife Marie-Louise’s ashes are sitting in plain view in a vase in the living room, as if the dead woman is haunting her beyond the grave. Indeed, at one point in the film, Roos stares in a forlorn fashion at the vase while Bert is banging her in a bestial fashion on the family couch. In what is arguably Roos’ most pathetic attempt at impressing Bert, she begins wearing his dead wife’s rather homely clothes, but it only angers and annoys the widowed farmer, who clearly does not see the young lady as a serious replacement for his deceased spouse. When Roos reveals she is pregnant, Bert becomes so infuriated that he slaps her hard enough to knock her on his ass and then accuses her of seducing him. Clearly deeply hurt by Bert’s belligerent behavior, Roos picks up the vase containing Marie-Louise’s ashes and hurls it at a wall. In a scene that seems like an unintentional parody of shitty Hollywood slasher films, Bert and his brothers slowly chase after Roos through a dirt field in a fashion not unlike Jason Voorhees and Michael Myers when they are stalking one of their victims. When Roos goes to the local priest for help, he dismisses her relationship with Bert and describes it as nothing more than a “one-night stand” and then tells her that it will be best for everyone involved if she goes back to the city. While Roos calls her ex-boyfriend Sjors to pick her up, she also attempts to make one last ditch effort to get back with Bert, but he refuses to listen to her and simply coldly tells her, "It's no good. It's over." Ultimately, Roos decides to kill herself in a rather melodramatic fashion by hanging herself in Bert's barn, but the rope eventually breaks and a pack of pigs begin gorging on her corpse after it hits the ground. When Bert finds Roos' bloody and mangled corpse, he cries, "Oh girl...This can't be...My god" and then yells to his butcher brother when he shows up, "slaughter the animals" and "get lost. She was the only one that listened to me." Of course, had Bert actually listened to Roos once or twice and treated her like she was actually important to him, she probably would not have killed herself and the two might have even had a happy life together if they moved somewhere else where disapproving relatives were not lurking around every corner.

Undoubtedly, Kracht certainly demonstrates that director Frouke Fokkema has the sort of spiteful hatred of peasants that both self-righteous bourgeois white liberals and hormonally imbalanced feminists seem capable of, thus leading me to conclude that she would probably suffer a nervous breakdown if she was somehow forced to take a tour of the American Deep South. At the same time, Fokkema seems to fetishize the backwards farmer in the film, as if she would love nothing more than to be savagely ploughed by the one-eyed stag of a misogynistic redneck in the back of a cow-turd-infested barn. Ultimately, Kracht makes for a great double feature with the Dutch flick De Poolse bruid (1998) aka The Polish Bride directed by Algerian auteur Karim Traïdia, as both films offer very different depictions of Dutch farmers and their love affairs with virtual opposites. While Traïdia's film is tender and portrays the Groningen countryside as having a sort of magical and mystifying beauty, Fokkema's film portrays the Limburg countryside as an almost pernicious and certainly oppressive place with an eerie and deathly atmosphere that is likely to kill anyone if they dare to stay there long enough. Indeed, while ostensibly a dark romance flick, Kracht is really a work of Gothic anti-Heimat horror where the hick-hating auteuress seemed to manage to channel all her fears and hatred into the film, thus making for an undeniably potent piece of perturbing celluloid that, despite its cliché depiction of poor and ignorant peasants, still manages to succeed in most of its aesthetic ambitions. Indeed, sort of like the Dutch feminist equivalent to Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974) in its depiction of a monstrous hillbilly family that oppresses an outsider, albeit where said outsider falls in love with the monster and ultimately pays for it with her life, Kracht is the one film that has managed to convince me that there is such a thing as Dutch rednecks and they are indubitably more unnerving than the ones you find in hokey American Hebrew-produced horror films because they actually seem realistic and not like grotesque caricatures created by pencil-neck pansies who have never met a real redneck in their entire lives. Unlike many of the German anti-Heimat films of the late-1960s and 1970s, which seem outmoded due to their transparent post-68er-Bewegung political messages, Fokkema's film has aged quite gracelessly as the passing time has only made the film's already moribund aesthetic tone only seem all the more decayed and rotten. Indeed, had Belgian Baron André Delvaux been a somewhat less cultivated lovelorn Dutch feminist with a cunt instead of a cock instead of an eclectically cultured Walloon magical realist, he might have directed something like Kracht.

NÁRCISZ ÉS PSYCHÉ
NÁRCISZ ÉS PSYCHÉ

Gábor Bódy (1980)

If someone were to take up the ambitious yet seemingly futile task of synthesizing the major ideas of Karl Marx's The Communist Manifesto (1848) and Oswald Spengler's two-volume tome The Decline of the West (1918-1923) and attempt to direct a highly experimental cinematic epic about the fall of the European aristocracy in the form of a libertine love story vaguely in the spirit of Gone with the Wind (1939), it might resemble Nárcisz és Psyché (1980) aka Narcissus and Psyche directed by Hungarian auteur Gábor Bódy (Amerikai Anzix aka American Postcard, Kutya éji dala aka The Dog's Night Song) and starring German heartthrob Udo Kier (Blood for Dracula, My Own Private Idaho) in what is probably the single greatest performance of his career as an actor; a sentiment he apparently shares despite having appeared in over 200+ films. The single largest-scale Hungarian production of its era, Narcissus and Psyche was released in three versions; an original 210 minute two part cut, a 136 minute cut for international distribution and a 270 minute three part epic made for television, the last of which I was luckily able to view. Described by director Bódy as, "a story of present times, and even though the characters are wearing costumes from the past, the epoch they are a witness to exists outside the limits of history," Narcissus and Psyche is a forlorn fantasy film and quasi-psychedelic period piece of sorts that simultaneously chronicles the tragedy of an exceedingly passionate yet perversely plagued love affair that was 'never meant to be' between two lovers who never age and the dramatically changing sociopolitical climate of Europe, most specifically the Hapsburg Empire/Hungary over a 130 year period, thus concluding during the rise of National Socialism. Based on a collection of poetry entitled Psyché (1972) written by Hungarian poet Sándor Weöres but also centering on biographical anecdotes from the author's life, as well as an almost entirely fictional account of the 'romantic' relationship between German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche and Russian-born psychoanalyst Lou Andreas-Salomé (male protagonist "Narcissus" being based on Nietzsche and female protagonist "Psyche" based on Andreas-Salomé), Narcissus and Psyche also makes for a dolorous tribute to great European cultural producers and wordsmiths of the late-nineteenth/early-twentieth century or as auteur Gábor Bódy stated, "I tried to make this story a myth, a myth of antagonism born of our European culture, according to which men and women can only find their physical and intellectual liberty at the expense of others. And in spite of 35 years of socialism, my generation is still living in this antagonism." A most morose yet magical cinematic saga of sordid sensuality, spiritual and somatic sickness, social strife, syphilis, and striking surrealism about the perfectly contradictory odd couple – a downright debauched mixed blood countess and a (would be) morally noble, poetic genius of a peasant – Narcissus and Psyche is one of those rare aesthetically astonishing works one cannot believe even exist upon seeing it and may very well be the most underrated and under seen film epic ever made, or at the very least, the one that every single one of the millions of female Udo Kier have always dreamed of, but will never see.

Born in the year 1795 to a mother who was a gypsy girl's bastard child turned countess (after having been adopted by a count) and a Hungarian nobleman, countess Psyche aka Erzsébet Mária Lónyay (played by Patricia Adriani), came from a family whose nobility was recognized by the Habsburg Monarchy, but not their rank. When Psyche was only three years old, her mother started a relationship with the famous gypsy violinist János Bihari and decided to run away to a Romani settlement, taking her daughter with her where she would spend the rest of her childhood, thus missing out on the advantages of being an aristocrat. After her mother died, Psyche was raised by the violinist's poor relatives and other kindhearted local yokels, which would lead her to meeting her one true love "Narcissus" aka László Tóth Ungvárnémeti (played by Udo Kier with bleached blond hair); the inordinately intelligent yet increasingly megalomaniacal poet son of a pastor. As it becomes quite apparent from the beginning of Narcissus and Psyche, Psyche – whose maternal ancestral origins were the product of bestial lust as opposed to love – is an accursed wanton wild child who does what she wants whenever she wants, including maliciously offending the manners of the patently pretentious and anally retentive aristocrats of her class, including randomly sitting on a lad's lap and forcing him to partake in coitus with her, but not before he states to her quite disparagingly, "I am a swordsman, horseman, I do not want a vampire to drain my strength," in a feeble attempt to deny her carnal charms. A patently perverse yet pure of spirit poetess of both wayward words and actions, Psyche is especially perturbed by the fact that perennial narcissist Narcissus – a classicist poet and walking anachronism who tries to uphold noble ideas from antiquity who believes, "only in the aesthetic and historic authority of the Greek-Latin gods," and wants to do something great and noteworthy with his life to compensate up for his humble beginnings – will not have intimate sex with the carnal countess because of his supposed love and respect for her, or so he says. One gets the feeling that Narcissus thinks to himself, "Tis Pity She's a Whore," but ironically, the physical and eventual psychological ruin from a literal whore; a fleshpeddler who reminded him of Psyche.

When Narcissus receives a bad case of the "French disease" (syphilis) from a prostitute (many believe that Nietzsche's descent into madness was the result of receiving the same STD from a hooker), Psyche's man's cock is semi-permanently blocked, at least until they can find a cure, which the perverted poetess (Narcissus is annoyed by the "sensual" and "soiled" nature of her poems) will gladly pay for. Of course, Psyche has physical problems of her own because she was raped by her own brother-in-law and impregnated, which the quasi-incestuous rapist was quite agitated by, so he punched the expecting mother of his pesky would-be-progeny in the stomach, thereupon inducing a miscarriage and internal bleeding that does not cease until Narcissus brings his true love to a seemingly sinister doctor who keeps creepy deformed fetuses in formaldehyde sitting out for all his patients to see. Always the opportunist looking to advance his place in society, Narcissus converts from Calvinism to Catholicism so he can receive a scholarship from the Archbishop of Eger to study in Budapest where he trades professions, going from a poet to a scientist, thus pushing his poetess further away. Out of desperation, Psyche hooks up with a wealthy and eccentric nobleman/freemason named Maximilian Freiherr von Zedlitz (György Cserhalmi) – a man modeled after German philosopher Immanuel Kant – who wants to marry her and reminds her of the father she has much contempt for, so naturally the lascivious lady goes back to being sexually promiscuous with some political revolutionaries and even becomes pregnant with one of their babies (the father being unknown), but the baby is eventually disposed of by her uncle so as not to ruin the family's already wavering reputation.

As Narcissus' syphilis worsens, so does his megalomania, which is only all the more compounded when he is forced to sell his poetic masterpiece "Narcissist" – a classical and highly reflective work – which, to his utter and devastating dismay is eventually adapted into a superlatively sleazy, sexually degenerate, and curiously campy Vaudevillian play (performed at a place where Teutonic Neuer Deutscher Film 'diva of death' Ingrid Caven does a performance similar to her solos in Daniel Schmid's 1974 high-camp masterpiece La Paloma). Unable to sire children due to the rotting of his reproductive system via syphilis, Narcissus accepts his life of loneliness and Psyche decides to marry and have children with the mundane yet reliable and respectable Maximilian Freiherr von Zedlitz. Destitute and dying from the STD that ultimately severed any hope of a marriage and kids with his beloved, Narcissus requests that Psyche make love to him before he perishes into eternity, which she obliges, thus ending an unfulfilled love affair that was doomed due to circumstance and human stupidity. Of her man, Psyche confesses, "My great love...was terribly egoistic. Just as egoistic as the hero of his poetic tragedy, Narcissus, who was ill of mortals...self-loving...No one else could have written it...but him." In a positively plodding and mostly miserable marriage with a fellow that is jealous of a dead man, Psyche dies in a questionable manner that is no less of a travesty than that of her dear Narcissus; the king of narcissists who like virtually all people suffering from his vehemently vainglorious mental affliction, had a deep-seated self-loathing that made him unable to get close to others, including the lady he loved for over a century, yet could never consummate with, hence, his deleterious need to tell her, "Your being a whore doesn't matter...because you were born a whore." Although they never aged a single day over the course of over a century, once the possibility of fulfilling their love for one another is extinguished, they finally succumb to metaphysical heartbreak and eventual death.

A keenly kaleidoscopic depiction of a generally colorless period(s) in history, at least cinematically speaking, Narcissus and Psyche is a film that manages to do the seemingly impossible by bringing idiosyncratic poetry and intrigue to a culturally and socially declining period in history as a sort of Slavic Victorian gothic epic that makes Stanley Kubrick's Barry Lyndon (1975) seem like a soullessly constructed work of epic banality, and I say that as a fan of both cinematic works. A film featuring literal flying pigs, Narcissus and Psyche is a work that makes it seem like anything is possible, at least when it comes to the now seemingly dying art of cinema and the civilization that created it. A work depicting the literal fall of empires (more specifically, The Habsburg Monarchy) and the decided death of a civilization, Narcissus and Psyche makes it quite clear by the end that money is now king. On top of temporarily moving to the United States to get away from the havoc and horrors of the Great War, Psyche comes to the realization that her aristocratic roots are worth nil when a rich America, which inherited much more money than any nobleman she knows, sees it as an absurd proposition for him to be a title of nobility as it no longer has any value, thus also accentuating the absurdity of Narcissus' needless and heedless campaign for superficial greatness. As modern America has proven, you can be a crack-addicted illiterate felon or an overweight and barbaric meathead idiot, but if you can bastardize the English language to a simple beat without melody or tackle people hard enough, you can be a famous millionaire. That being said, I think it is safe to say that class and kultur died on the battlefields of both World Wars with directors like Gábor Bódy being the last remnants of a once-great kultur before technocratic postmodernism and globalization reared their ugly universalizing and homogenizing heads. Oddly, after about five years of completing Narcissus and Psyche, director Gábor Bódy died under dubious circumstances in what the authorities of his homeland Hungary, then a Soviet satellite, said was a suicide, but, despite pleas from his wife that he was murdered, no official investigation was conducted, thus making him a victim of communist criminality. Although Narcissus and Psyche hints at the fact National Socialism – a political ideology motivated by the need to eradicate cultural decay, cosmopolitanism, and societal degeneration – put the final nail in the coffin of Occidental civilization, Uncle Adolf surely was not responsible for the grim cultural ethnic graveyard that is contemporary Eastern Europe; a place that both ironically sired yet slayed Gábor Bódy, one of its great cinematic artists.

THE LAST HOUSE IN THE WOODS
THE LAST HOUSE IN THE WOODS

Gabriele Albanesi (2006)

The Last House in the Woods is a contemporary Giallo film which unlike its predecessors, is graphically and artfully violent and bloody. The film captures the sadism that was manufactured by early Italians and manages to add some American elements, such as the incredibly over-played Plaid-wearing deformed rednecks. Due to the title, you can tell this film is trying to cash in to the 70's exploitation boom. It's only a matter of time till they run out of possible combinations. The story follows a sweet girl with her ex-boyfriend. He wants to get back with her so he decides to drive through the woods. While parked, sadistic would-be rapists attack her, but she is saved by a flashy Italian named Antonio (Go figure.) She and her lover are taken back to his house where she uncovers they might not be in the clear just yet. The Last House in the Woods captures the fabled anti-hero theme very well towards the end, and provides manageable twists, guaranteeing you the blood and the suspense. Amazing energy and charisma comes from the family, as they provide a comfortable atmosphere for the lead characters and you, only to rip it away a second later. The Madness is captured fluidly by director Albanesi on film. One might notice the special effects work of guru Sergio Stivaletti as he slaves away to create a hellbound atmosphere of limbs. For a feature debut, Gabriele Albanesi does a great job implementing himself in the Italian horror genre. The film itself takes nods from early Argento and just adds more violence. This as you know, can never be a bad thing. Relative to early Giallo, this film uses a rustic synth score that echoes the grand era. I never really fully appreciated Casio keyboards. The only thing really that doesn't belong in this film is the "reason" for the bloodshed. The Last House in the Woods is an uncompromising film that delivers its promise; to shock, offend, and spin a web with a nihilistic atmosphere. Thank god, Giallo is reborn.

SEVEN POUNDS

Gabriele Muccino (2008)

Seven Pounds has been released theatrically long enough so that I feel comfortable divulging certain aspects of the film, both appreciated and loathed, that could be deemed as "spoiling" to the experience that is Seven Pounds. A unanimous amount of movie goers have been terminally stricken with a case of the sub-viral marketing that Seven Pounds has launched. Perplexing trailers with very little plot line were revealed over the course of months. Advertising for this film was frustrating cause I didn't know what was going on and let's face it, This is no Cloverfield advert. Italian director Gabriele Muccino, widely known for his other Will Smith collective The Pursuit of Happyness, attempts to recreate the feeling of a Shakespearean tragedy with this enigma of a film. Reviews have generally been mixed towards this film which only made me want to experience this on my own. Critics are generally someone you cannot trust. Just ask Ben Lyons about that one time he called I Am Legend "Greatest movie ever made". As filmdom goes, the term "sleeper" is applied to films that are critically received negatively for false reasons, or just no received at all. In this case, Seven Pounds is a sleeper drama hit that will score well with adults. My curiosity has been piqued, so what next? During the time I spent absorbing Seven Pounds, I found many admirable assets and fewer facets worth nit-picking over. Regarding Will Smith's career? It's been a variety of over-the-top performances in many summer blockbusters. In fact, juxtaposing Will Smith and blockbuster would be a conundrum had he not starred in the most profitable of the bunch. Fresh Prince to Bad Boys, ID4 to Wild Wild West. Smith has been our charming star of most of the ridiculous action films with a racial twist. I can't think of a single genre that the Prince hasn't marked with his irrevocable humor. With such blatant unapologetic propaganda, it's hard not to be swayed by his onscreen swagger. Seven Pounds is one of his most surprising performances to date. Quick switch from a tragedy to outlandish moments of depression; It's hard to take this film seriously 100% of the time. I even forgot that what I was watching had the sole intent of making me cry. One of the few weaknesses that plagues this film is that Seven Pounds is doomed to be considered just and only good. The character of Ben Thomas is invasive to a degree such seen in Pay It Forward. Valiantly although recklessly charging in the midst of peoples problems for a Shakespearean version of redemption. The cost is flesh and there lies the theme. The key camera angles through fences, windows, and other outlets provide more of a "flesh" to the themes of invasion. Seven Pounds is a homely experience with many personal feeling strewn about. Seven Pounds is a story that quite literally unfolds. Literally as metaphorically as it can be. During Seven Pounds, you will undoubtedly attempt to unravel the plot and piece the premature puzzle together, Try as you might but you will not foresee the final scenario until it is too late. Seven Pounds brings to flesh the idea of the rules of a theatrical tragedy, but with shameful CGI jellyfish. I wouldn't call this "most depressing" but with a gifted script with flips, twists, and turns, Seven Pounds accelerates past its prime and into a sub genre of film that caters to those looking for an emotional ride. With sacrificial aesthetics and an adequate cast (I despise Rosario Dawson), Seven Pounds is indeed about birth. Cinematic or organic; you decide. What a joyous time to be a crippling depressive.

ELECTRIC DRAGON 80000V

Gakuryu Ishii (2001)

Electric Dragon 80000V is a fun Japanese cyberpunkish film that I have been enjoying more with each subsequent viewing. The film follows a reptile investigator named Dragon Eye Morrison who has an unhealthy obsession with both lizards and guitars. It seems that Electric Dragon 80000V director Sogo Ishii has an odd and “lost in translation” obsession with American rock group The Doors and Jim Morrison. Whatever Ishii’s interpretation of The Doors meant, he was able to make an entertaining and unique film filled of obsession with electricity, guitar solos, lizards, and respectable archenemies. Dragon Eye Morrison does some heavy shredding on guitar producing an unrelenting storm of electric guitar noise. Morrison plays live performances for himself in his apartment and on public bridges in the middle of the day in a city. He had a little accident with some power lines as a kid and now unleashes his electricity in the form of Japanese punk noise. Dragon Eye Morrison is also known to do some ass kicking as the reptilian part of his brain loves violence. Only a deranged former TV repairman named Thunderbolt Buddha is any match. The antagonist relationship between Dragon Eye Morrison and his mysterious enemy Thunderbolt Buddha borders on the homoerotic. Thunderbolt Buddha seems to have an envious respect for Morrison that results in confrontation. Thunderbolt Buddha cuts up Morrison’s precious sleek guitar and kills his homeless lizards. Angry as a Hiroshima atom bomb victim, Morrison speeds over to Buddha like a wave of chaotic electricity. Upon meeting Dragon Eye Morrison he says, “Why did you make me mad?!” Thunderbolt Buddha simply and ingeniously responds to Morrison with, “I wanted to see you angry.” Naturally, the two supernatural dudes battle it out. When the battle finally ends, only Morrison is left standing in front of Buddha’s mask which has “see you around” written on it. That is what I call gentleman’s fight. I was given a DVD copy of Electric Dragon 80000V by a very dear lady. She also happened to watch the film with me and was immediately offended by it. She could not believe that a Japanese man could act like he was so cool while he was strumming his guitar. To say the least, she had a complete and utter desire to beat up Dragon Eye Morrison. In all honesty, upon first watching Electric Dragon 80000V it can be too unintentionally funny. It doesn’t take long however to realize that the film is beautifully shot, sleekly edited, original, and full of life. That’s a lot more than I can say than about the majority of recent films I have seen.

THE RAID: REDEMPTION

Gareth Evans (2011)

Quite assuredly, red-band clips or trailers from most necessarily violent action films are always followed with a rush of excitement for said title. This method of delivery involves making an almost whispered promise of at least one especially outstanding scene, the one in which is in question as the video streams or graces the cinema screen. It would be quite the disappointment if that preemptive, in this case, single scene was the only of its kind in quality, whether it be in suspense, bloodshed, or gratuitous feral generosity. It would be of similar character to show the final fight of Flash Point or even The Man from Nowhere, to a pair of virgin eyes for the sake of absorbing salivation for your own esteem's gain, which, admittedly, I am guilty of. Thus was the curse I carried for months after watching a red-band clip from The Raid: Redemption. I feared an all-too real terror of this scene spoiling a key moment that I had built myself up for, so you can imagine the feeling of dread when, during my temporary stay at the cinema while viewing The Raid: Redemption, this scene in particular popped up. But alas, the scene continued without a hitch or hiccup! Gareth Evan's masterful global marketing team knew and approached the limitations of exposure with a certain bravado lost upon most action films and their combined run at arousing attention. It was as if a heavy burden was lifted off of my shoulders and I could open up to The Raid: Redemption. I could let it tell me, without hesitation, all of its little secrets and worry me with all of its woe. You see, for me and most everyone I know who has bore witness to its third world grandeur, The Raid: Redemption marks the graduation of this new blend of international action film. One in which encroaches upon the formula of simple and similarly structured action pieces such as Ong-Bak or The Protector, save for the sparsely seen Indonesian fighting style of Pencak Silat. The two aforementioned Tony Jaa vehicles were met with massive appraisal but were also maligned for their doe-eyed absence of thought, whereas The Raid: Redemption wrestles from this stranglehold with a candle of ease that holds steadfast without a flicker or chance of dimming.

It's become so that I find it difficult to sit and review, in-thought, a post-Raid: Redemption-esque film without finding myself victim of that classic compare/contrast to the next best thing, which is obviously being The Raid. For in its wake, left screaming an army of "boorish males", comes an expectation that might be nigh to match - an obsessive exercise in ceaseless savagery, each minute being more daring than the last and each fight sequence becoming more stylized, choreographed, and calculated. Since the shriek of this Indo-wizardry was heard worldwide, you can be certain that these highly-marketable future Eastern exercises of sweat-soaked exertion won't end with The Raid: Redemption and for that matter, any of its sequels. Many attempts will be made upon their title of champion and these challengers' motives will fall victim to cynical ratings as cinophiles use the schematics of The Raid: Redemption as an impromptu grade-book, cursing while X-ing in heavy red permanent ink, not even bothering to wonder where, or why, it all went so wrong for them. These "substitutes" will only increase in numbers while the action film of our heritages fate relies on the likes of A Good Day to Die Hard and The Expendables and their promised sequels (or should I say squeals, drastic to stay afloat these are, with mild results). The problem falls on Hollywood and their hasty decisions to brand Western audiences as ignorant to the beauty and eccentricity found in foreign styles of fighting. Hollywood will continue to pump out action remakes of popular foreign films with a soulless nod to an alien and titular fighting style. Their repayment plan? To replace a key diversified system of offense with sub-advanced grappling maneuvers merged with hyper-edited body blows. You might as well refer to the Bourne handbook for how I imagine The Raid remake turning out, but I digress. Known in its homeland as Serbuan Maut and then internationally as The Raid, the evolution of title didn't quite stop there. Overseas in the American market, The Raid later had "Redemption" tacked on to its title to allow copyright to resume naturally as well as opening up options for a sequel, or in this case, two. Released at Sundance with an alternate score from Mike Shinoda of Linkin Park "fame" and the unfortunately named Joseph Trapanese, this exclusive composition for The Raid served as an occasionally unruly love letter to a film that needed no such grabs for attention, especially from a post-applied promise of being faithful to the images.

Unfortunately, the faithfulness to the original artistic vision wasn't all in check, as the Western theatrical run felt the need to doll itself up beyond the limitations of an American adrenal-pop soundtrack considering intelligence. Things proved all and good until the simplicity of the electronic score, that followed alongside with the hurried sense of survival, ran out and gave room to the scene-chewing appetite of a mid-chaos dubstep routine which, far dependent on your opinion of the (awful) genre, is most unfitting for a frenetic cinematic scenario, especially if it wants to be taken seriously. But in regards to the U.S. release of The Raid: Redemption, this was close to its only sin. The Raid: Redemption, if to be remembered by a single act, had one thing going for it and that is apart from the luxurious and fruitful sequences of violence, away from the viciousness of tenant to tenant, and far from the incredible death scenes that will leave your nails clawing at plush. No, what The Raid: Redemption has is an incredible sense of utter helplessness and defeat, a feeling that could not be anticipated from watching the trailer alone. Now, mind you, a trailer that boasted the tagline of "20 Elite Cops - 30 Floors of Hell" refused to give way to the actual gravity of the situation which is a merit to be thankful of. Imagine my surprise when this micro-army of skilled officers were scattered, slaughtered, and slain. The Raid: Redemption, no matter what you may read from genre-waving bannermen, applies well within me as the cinematic equivalent of an old classic arcade-style beat em' up - in particular, Streets of Rage (although a rendition that meets the concrete isolation of Die Hard). You have for potential evidence a small band of aggressive law-abiding citizens battling wave after wave of weapon-wielding rapists, junkies, murderers, and other related fallen ilk. Each character combats his own specific mini-boss, of sorts. The floors of the building can be taken, literally, as levels, and as an added bonus you are also given the architectural despondency of the Silent Hill multiverse. It is no coincidence that the core demographic suited for The Raid: Redemption are 18-32 year old fans (gender not applied as my fiancée was quoted as dubbing the film "a masterpiece") of ferocious competition. Much to their surprise too, is that it is gift-wrapped in a package anonymously sent to "Fanboy". No return address either, hmm.

If you have it within you to embrace such nonchalant acts of treachery, murder, and extreme violence then open your ears, eyes, arms, and tendons to this assault on the senses. The Raid: Redemption can easily be followed and the events can even transpire/unfold to the dull senses of a quasi-intellectual cinema-goer. The Raid is that certain sort of film that you can view once and rely on later as a perfectly competent sound and space filler as you multitask on whatever in-house errand(s) lie on your plate, and in which by some magical method of multimedia memory, The Raid: Redemption can be mentally visualized as well as synchronized alongside the groans and moans of both pools of victims - good and bad. For exceptional physical feats, look no further. You will notice the actions of those depicted on-screen, no matter the side you choose, attempt to disguise themselves as falling under their own category of exceptional heroism but that is never the case in The Raid. Even the rookie SWAT lead, Rama, has an agenda for entering the building and only when their original plan becomes so, for lack of a better word, fucked, does he step up to the plate to ensure the safety of himself and the scattered survivors. Welsh born director Gareth Evans would obviously follow up the enormous critical success of The Raid so in his future we can assuredly see two more sequels to the Indonesian debut and as I mentioned before, at least one American remake. When asked about his plans for The Raid: Redemption's sequel, now tagged with the subtitle "Retaliation", Evans could only comment about his hopeful inclusion of car chases - "I want to bring car chase elements to it as well. So we have like a cool fight scene where you go inside a car, fighting against four people as it's speeding along a one-way." Now, I'm all for diversity but the greatest appeal of The Raid was its horrific seclusion - a terrible event sealed off from outside communications or contact. If these men are even remotely allocated to another life-or-death situation, then what is keeping them from turning the wheel. I'm not sure how it could possibly work out without some method of escape but my brows stay curiously and cautiously raised. This beast was meant to be leashed. If you slaver for intense bodily nihilism then look no further. The Raid: Redemption reigns king of overkill - a rare film event in which officers of the law die like dogs while the villains perish under much more honorable circumstances, and that is more bravery than I ever could have expected from such a piece.

JACK BE NIMBLE
JACK BE NIMBLE

Garth Maxwell (1993)

Once upon a time and before becoming one of the most hideous pseudo-Aryan platinum blonde chicks-with-dicks working in Hollywood, Alexis Arquette (born Robert Arquette), the lesser known sibling of the famous Arquette acting family (including Rosanna, David, Patricia, and Richmond), played the role of the male adolescent anti-hero Jack in the gravely underrated New Zealand neo-fairy-tale horror flick Jack Be Nimble (1993) directed by Garth Maxwell. More demented and cunning than a schizophrenic tranny on uncut crack, Jack nimbly hypnotizes personal enemies with his artfully crafted motor-powered candlestick and has them unintentionally commit suicide through a variety of intricate, highly intimate, and ruthlessly befitting ways. Jack has very privy reasons for becoming a sly metaphysical mass murderer, but the true root of his irrevocable psychosis is the direct consequence of being separated from his little sister Dora when he was a wee lad. After his obese father became an unrepentant philanderer, and, thereafter, his mother turned into an emotionally unstable drunk with nil mothering skills, Jack and his sis were put up for adoption and given to two very different families. While Dora was raised somewhat ideally with a good, bourgeois upbringing, poor Jack was cursed to live in the less than luxurious rural land of wild cow-turds with a hostile pack of sadistic Kiwis hellbillies who don't take kindly to the lonely boy's proclivity towards impulsive hypersensitivity and playing with furry kitty cats. Although Jack grows up to be a talented murderer and dilettante inventor with an unorthodox intellect, his sister Dora becomes a creature of feminine empathy and intuition as she develops crucial extra-sensory abilities that allow her to know when her bothersome brother is in immediate danger. Despite their deracinated coming-of-age, Jack and Dora remain two peculiar peas in a pod during their vexatious separation. Upon reuniting after many years of emotionally severe severance, siblings Jack and Nora face fierce vulnerability from various outsiders, ranging from jealous boyfriends to split-personalities, but most specifically from a dyke-like brigade of ex-stepsisters. Due to a childhood's worth of cataclysmic abuse, Jack becomes his own worst enemy; burning every bridge and annihilating all beings that have the misfortune of carelessly crossing his capricious path.

Director Garth Maxwell has cited various influences, both personal and aesthetic, that went into the creation of Jack Be Nimble. On a more diacritic and arcane level, Maxwell and Jack Be Nimble co-writer Rex Pilgrim have stated their personal familial and social isolation as gay men played an imperative role in assembling the psychologically damaged and confounded character Jack and his affinity for ritualistic revenge. In fact, the screenwriting duo would once again collaborate on the gay dramarama When Love Comes Along (1998); a mostly mediocre and artistically sterile work that bares no resemblance to its older sibling Jack Be Nimble. Despite the innate (albeit cryptic) gayness of some of the more personal themes that plague anti-hero Jack in Jack Be Nimble, the film itself lacks any sort of overt mention of homosexuality. While Dora enjoys engaging in verbal and physical intercourse with an older gentlemen, Jack's only source of sexual ecstasy seems to be through brute violence, which one could argue is a symbolic metaphor for sodomy. As far as cinematic inspirations go, Maxwell has (somewhat unsurprisingly) named David Cronenberg, Dario Argento, and David Lynch as filmmakers who had influenced the look and atmosphere of Jack Be Nimble. For the scenes of Jack growing up in rural Hades, Maxwell attempted to channel the ethereal aesthetic potency of the late nineteenth-century Symbolist art movement, most specifically, the work of Swiss painter Arnold Böcklin. Despite its many influences, Jack Be Nimble hardly seems like a hack-kitsch derivative work as the film, much like Federico Fellini's La Strada (1954), has a timeless quality that transcends both age and passing trend, thus guaranteeing its staying power as a truly ominous and caustic, yet bewitching piece of cinema. Upon first viewing Jack Be Nimble, my always discerning eyes failed to notice any blatant influences as I was immediately taken aback by the film's savage yet startlingly sentimental story and unmerciful yet aesthetically-titillating acid-washed imagery. Like any great modern fairy tale, Jack Be Nimble tells an archaic story in a wholly neoteric and sophisticated way. Being a work of apt cinema, Jack Be Nimble is most successful in depicting the story through its use of exceedingly expressive imagery, keen shot composition, seamless editing (in one clever match-cut, a bucket of pig's blood dissolves into a birthday cake), and overall dynamic mise-en-scène, as opposed to the often platitudinous realm of sheer words. In fact, the greatest weakness of Jack Be Nimble is its sometimes unconvincing and poorly synched dialogue, which sometimes resembles the poor overdubbing of a Lucio Fulci film. Of course, like most great films, the actions and images featured in Jack Be Nimble are more vehement than patently restrictive words.

Jack is quite quick when it comes to stomping on the throats of bloated waitresses who happen to be two times his size, but such erratic and unbecoming behavior ultimately leads to his demise, hence the tragedy of the story and his character. Ultimately, Jack's greatest talents are merely a clever and intricate survivalist response to his undying and overwhelming pain. After all, had it not been for the barbaric backwoods childrearing techniques of his abominable adopted parents, Jack would have never went to the trouble of fashioning a marvelous machine of hypnotic destruction. While the ending of Jack Be Nimble may be less than ideal to the typical Hollywoodized automaton, the film does provide an optimistic view of family matters and the primordial power of genetics. Although being a work that is indubitably too dark and risqué for toddlers, and too mystical for the seasoned cynic, Jack Be Nimble is a truly strange tale that tends to leave most viewers divided, but never blasé. Undoubtedly, the presence of pre-tranny

JACK BE NIMBLE

Alexis Arquette also adds a curious ingredient to Jack Be Nimble that few other films can boast. Surprisingly, what I found most odd about Arquette's appearance in the film was not the atypical 'leading male' role s/he plays, but the quality and plausibility of his/her performance. In fact, Arquette's exceptional performance in Jack Be Nimble may be one of the best abstract arguments against sexual reassignment surgery. After all, who can say anything positive (and with a straight face) about any of "her" subsequent performances? The creators of Jack Be Nimble described the film, somewhat sneeringly, as the, "queereſt little grenade." Indeed, the film is most certainly preternatural and esoterically homosexual, as well as overly emotionally explosive, but it is also devilishly delightful and crudely charming work of de facto cult/horror cinema.

MASTERS OF THE UNIVERSE

Gary Goddard (1987)

Accompanying most, if not all, of Cannon films is the entrance into the realm of cheesy epic entertainment and alike most of the occupying modicum is the adaptation of Masters of the Universe starring the promising and chiseled Dolph Lundgren. With such a spectacle to tell and such little time, Masters of the Universe starts off with the immediate alluded never ending battle between He-Man (Not entitled Prince Adam in the film) and the prosthetically-plump Skeletor. After briefly highlighting key characters that are for and against Eternia, the film jumps into obstacle mode and thrusts you into a race against time to rejuvenate the Sorceress who looks strikingly like Meryl Streep but aged 20+ years. When it comes down to the marrow, Masters of the Universe is yet another original tale that gets forced into a snug spot of city fetishism. City fetishism: The ineptitude to create pure and concentrated filmic energy with respect to marketed property. So, instead of pouting - they thrust unsure characters into a contemporary social structure and rake in the profits as we witness awkward turnabouts. This very legacy of impotent films spans from The Lost World: Jurassic Park to Jason Takes Manhattan to even pseudo-Tarzan territory with the sadistic George of the Jungle. This normal fable of eccentric character in an unfamiliar environment is obvious to the fact of fiction but when they pluck eccentricities out of their well-suited environments and place them in commonly used urban areas e.g. New York, things tend to get a little sloppy. Take Jason Takes Manhattan for a pathetic example. Sure the idea and tag line gave us a clever marketing scheme and imposable images that are branded forever with the icon of Voorhees but take the product in consideration. Half the film was spent on a boat and the lack of style was impudent upon my visceral fantasies of Jason slashing pesky degenerates. As autopsied, city fetishism is exactly what had happened to Masters of the Universe but the kicker is that the final product is a film that doesn't feature as many bourgeois individuals as you'd like to anticipate. The curing agent is rather quasi-faithful material that is big on explosions and Lundgren holding plasma rifles with one arm as parodied in Tropic Thunder with Ben Stiller's character as he compromises accuracy for theatrics. This decision wasn't the stake in a grave but rather a driving force to jettison familiarity to the tale of Eternia. Masters of the Universe is immensely entertaining due to the fact that it transforms into a Right Said Fred video by finale that is equally met with light tricks, sweaty muscled men, and primitive ass chaps. Easily one of the most homosexual action films since Commando or the early draft of Starbeast. So when you have lost faith in mankind, know that you can turn to He-Man to passively assure your survival aided with Dolph's suave brick voice that he uses to woo the metaphorical panties off of Kevin's piece of pie, Julie. Armed with "lazer" weapons and swords that look as if they are made of aluminum, He-Man finds his quest nearing completion when he decides to enter battle with a Skeletor-turned-Midas godlike manifestation of what Galactus should have looked like in the second Fantastic Four film. If you can forgive the "mortality" beset upon the film in dire attempt to connect with a mortal audience, it's rather easy to become immersed into the fantastical swords & magic realm of Masters of the Universe. If this isn't enough reassurance, the logo of Cannon films should be enough to coerce you into favoring this film and weeping for the regrettably one-note career of Dolph Lundgren, who really put a soul into every character portrayed, even when the script offers the original material up for sex trafficking. For a final note let's be honest with each other. Can you actually think of anything more hilariously contrived than Lundgren bellowing "I have the powwwer!?" I can't.

NO MORE SOULS: ONE LAST SLICE OF SENSATION

Gary J. Tunncliffe (2005)

Hellraiser is one of many horror film franchises that start off with a great start then just bog down into un-entertainable mush. This is a short film shot on high def for around a couple thousand dollars. Keep in mind it is only 5 minutes long. Seems a bit pricey for only 5 minutes eh? Well, the plotline follows the leader of the cenobites named "Pinhead". Quite an iconic figure he is. Well this time, he is old and is not Douglas Bradley. Trust me, I was moaning too. Mankind has gone extinct leaving no more souls to torture, no more pleasure, and the fear that his followers will turn on him. What's an immortal being to do? Well, he decides to open the puzzle box himself. We know what happens now. Only problem is, is the execution of the scene. Instead of getting the chain-gang, we merely have a Caesar-esque stabbing that is no worthy of the often-beautiful slayings in the Hellraiser series. The acting is little to none. Just a monotone monologue from Pinhead (Which is all we need) and the set designs were decent. The lighting tended to be annoying and the Chatterer looked disgraceful and didn't "chatter". All in all, it is worthy of being a contender for the true Hellraiser films. No More Souls should be treated as a sequel to Hellbound and you should ignore all the other entries. It is the only one worth the Clive Barker seal of approval. This is a fan film worthy of seeing and is available as an easter egg on the DVD of Deader. The Hellraiser mythos has only gone downhill lately. I'm waiting for those talented Frenchies to re-imagine it already.

Gary Sherman (1988)

First off, let's admit one thing. The only reason any of us would pay attention to Poltergeist III is for A) Heather O'Rourke or B) Heather O'Rourke's following death due to complications of Crohn's disease. This completely unnecessary sequel could be deemed as a complication of her possible procedure which would have saved her life. For this, I blame the film industry for wasting time and dependency on something that will never be respected by anyone who doesn't have a fixation on Heather O'Rourke's premature starlet status. Poltergeist III is known for the tragic death of the series lead and the over-extensive use of "Carol Annnee!" Note her overly chubby cheeks as this is a symptom of Crohn's disease. How exciting! We get to watch a little girl die progressively as we pass slowly from boredom. Heather O'Rourke and Zelda Rubinstein return in the Poltergeist trilogy's finale. What should have been a film to consciously consider the losses and graciously back step with pride and dignity intact soon disintegrated as the film progressively got worse with no end in sight. The beginning opens up with an air of adequacy as we mentally piece together and try to come to grip the terror that Carol Anne has had to live with. I haven't pitied a child since Child's Play's Andy Barclay erupted with the "woe is me" face. What started out bleak soon spiraled out of control as this kid should have accepted suicide way earlier than Child's Play 3. The very same rules apply to Carol Anne. It's apparent that no matter what, no matter how resistant the box office is, Carol Anne will never be freed of Kane's wrath. Not even stomach cancer can stop this onslaught of feudal franchise persistence. The final blow to a legacy that should have ended after the debut film was the passing of Heather O'Rourke and what a sacrifice it was. After Carol Anne settles in with her aunt and family in a tower that consists of over 100 floors, her peace is soon shattered by visions of the horrifying spectre that has been following her over the course of three films including this dreadful sequel. Soon this film sells into a Generation-Xer with a cast of rebellious youth who become involved in the malevolent workings of a spirit that reveals his greatest fetish to be cracking mirrors. Somehow I remember the Poltergeist being more exciting and destructive, even designed by a certain H.R. Giger. It would appear that Kane has turned a new leaf as a pacifist taking cues from Angus Scrimm all the while conforming to an Amish subculture. Perhaps Mennonite? Poltergeist III should have at least settled as a passable crack in a pillar of horror but instead stands as one of the most depressing and dismal attempts at resuscitating something that is past dead. From the half-assed performances from everyone involved save for the cherubic Heather O'Rourke, it's easy to blame the "Poltergeist Curse" for the lack of compassion put into a sequel of another sequel. It's only when you retitling a title that you begin to notice the chain of unoriginality. Poltergeist III stands testament to a prose of carelessness only aided by a key acting performance of a dead child actress and a couple scenes that stand out with generic aesthetics but a theme nonetheless. I give credit for a cunning idea of obscuring the view with the "entrance" to the other side. You know, that really bright flood light. Poltergeist III remains in recent memory only due to Heather O'Rourke's untimely departing from our world into the very world she feared in three horror installments. The only reason one should view this film is to "appreciate" her screen presence or to stare into her face and realize that in between takes she was most likely projectile vomiting and slowly deteriorating into the very monster she was running from. BEAUTY AND THE BEAST

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST

Gary Trousdale (1991)

Jean Cocteau's Beauty and the Beast is a brilliant exercise in the balance of realism and fantasy. Cocteau once again employed his simple yet very effective special effects to invoke a world of dreamlike detachment. The beast lives in a world of magnificent enchantment. His dark home features a variety of live human (and human parts) statues that give complete servitude to him and his recent acquirement Belle. Belle lives a life of wonderful slavery with the beast. She cannot look in the Beast's eyes but is free to wander the halls of his luxurious castle and take advantage of its magical appliances. Jean Cocteau's lover Jean Marais plays the role of both the beast and Belle's human love interest Avenant. Cocteau added a subplot to the French fairy tale involving Belle's male suitor (Avenant) who decides with the conspiring help of Belle's sisters, to kill the beast and steal his riches. Cocteau's version of the fairy tale would heavily inspire the Disney animated version of the film. Beauty and the Beast is the most linear in structure of Jean Cocteau's films. This can be obviously attributed to the fact that Cocteau adapted the film from a French fairy tale. Of course, Cocteau creates a film that is just as spectacular as his other masterpieces. Cocteau's auteur signatures are immediately identifiable when the Beast's castle is first shown. Cocteau's surrealist dream worlds are ones of inviting atmosphere and perfection. It can be only assumed that his opium addiction influenced his knack for atmospheric sedation. Beauty and the Beast was filmed soon after the American liberation of France. This caused for various problems during the film's production as explained in Jean Cocteau's diary of the film. It is amazing that a director could create (with the help of others of course) such a beautiful film under such harsh conditions. The average Hollywood director would have a yeast infection if they received regular coffee when asking for decaf. The universal themes of fairy tales are losing their power with each generation as the human race heads for another dark age. Jean Cocteau's Beauty and the Beast perfectly updates (still relevant today) the fairy tale for the times of conspiracy and deception. You won't find any truth in Hollywood unless you skin the beast that operates it alive. Contemporary directors need to spend more time studying directors like Jean Cocteau, Carl Th. Dreyer, F.W. Murnau, and Ingmar Bergman. The only thing you will learn from the likes of Quentin Tarantino, Brian De Palma, Robert Rodriguez, and George Lucas is trivial diarrhea hidden beneath the corroded skin of generic stylization.

I STAND ALONE

Gaspar Noé (1998)

Gaspar Noé's 1998 film I Stand Alone (Seul Contre Tous) is a visceral mind-fuck of a movie. This film doesn't use trippy visuals or any kind of fancy storyline to grab your attention. Truth be told, it doesn't want your attention. Noé even gives you 20 seconds to leave the film. Is this a brutal and depraved film? Yes. Is it disturbing and morally fucked? Does this make it a bad film? No, it doesn't, but that seems to be the majority of opinion. The plot is very one-minded, just as the attitude of its character is. Phillipe Nahon (Best known for High Tension) plays The Butcher, whose anger and aggression knows no bounds. In a very informative opening scene, we see stills of his family as he explains his father's death at the hands of "Evil Nazis" and how he was an orphan. We view his love for butchery (Which fits his personality best) and we see that he opens up his own shop. He meets his lover, a beautiful co-worker and has a steamy session in a hotel. 9 months later, Cynthia is born. This proves to be too much to handle, as the Butcher gets left with Cynthia. Fast forward a couple of years, Cynthia gets her first period and on the way to the shop, she almost gets raped. Poor Poor Butcher. When she comes in with bloody underwear, his head screams Rape. He grabs his butcher knife, finds the kid, and stabs him in the face. He lived, and the Butcher was sent to jail while Cynthia was institutionalized. Upon his release, he meets a bar owner, knocks her up as well, and decides to move and forget about his daughter. What happens from here on out it's best to watch on your own. Spoilers are a very sensitive topic on film, and I wouldn't want to weaken this film's power. This film is a bold and audacious character study which delves deeper into the mind of a madman than let's say "Henry: Portrait Of A Serial Killer". Director Gaspar Noé somehow brings art to the most violent situations. Expect many wonderful shots and amazing angles. That seems to be Noé's specialty. Example: Irreversible. There are many different kinds of love and this film proves it. The soundtrack features classical symphonies that give you a false sense of security and make you feel most uncomfortable. This man's morals are out of whack, from calling a bar-keeper's son a "Nigger Faggot" to threatening to kill his unborn fetus, the Butcher is not a man to be reckoned with. Phillipe Nahon delivers a ground-breaking performance. The Butcher is one of the more fucked up characters I have seen. He is a racist, trashy, and hostile being and his very life disgusts me but hey, to each his own. With wonderful narration and insanity-driven monologues, I Stand Alone is a force to be seen but the film does come with a gratuitous warning. This film is not for the faint of heart.

Gaspar Noé (1998)

Sodomites is a seven minute long short film directed by Gaspar Noé to promote condom wearing during sexual acts. As the title implies, the short features a spectators show of sodomy. A group of S & M biker types watch as a muscular man in a wolf mask delivers a series of anal blows to an anticipating leather clad vamp. The two sodomites are cheered on by their excited audience and comrades. Some of these individuals are so excited that they begin pleasuring themselves. This even includes an old man with a disgusting chode. After the orgasmic conclusion of the forbidden sex act, the groups leader has a woman inspect the condom for semen. When the condom is found out to have worked, the group of vicious perverts cheers. During the sex act, a PCP fueled editing montage occurs showing a variety of sexual deviants satisfying their own needs. This sequence is typical of Gaspar Noé as he seems obsessed with trying to make his audience sick with his films (by way of both aesthetic and technique). The difference with Sodomites is that he seems to be doing it for comedic purposes. I couldn't help to think about Gaspar Noé laughing behind the camera. Apparently Sodomites was funded by the socialist French government. No wonder France is falling apart and resembling a third world country. Noé has always had a niche for exposing the underbelly of France. The French government funded Sodomites brings the degeneracy of France wide out in the open.

IRREVERSIBLE

Gaspar Noé (2002)

Irréversible is a film that might put off some audiences. I personally think it's brilliant and a contemporary masterpiece. The film utilizes a nonlinear narrative format allowing the viewer to discover what led up to the films disturbing and brutal opening scenes. Irreversible was written and directed by Argentina-born French director Gaspar Noé.

During one of the early scenes in the film, a mans face is crushed at a gay bar with what looks like a fire extinguisher. The scene is essentially one continuous and unrelenting shot that forces the viewer to be engulfed in the violence. I don't think that it would be an exaggeration to say that this scene is one of the most intense scenes ever committed to celluloid. Unlike most films featuring violence, Irreversible doesn't allow the viewer to feel safe or comfortable.

The film also features a rape scene that lasts almost 10 minutes. Nothing about this scene is entertaining or erotic. The rapist is a gay psycho pimp that is obviously under the influence of drugs. During the rape he lets the audience know his hatred for beautiful women and women in general. Although the pimp is really only in this scene, his actions and words are some of the most telling characters seen throughout the film. It would be interesting to know what director Gaspar Noé's motivation behind this character was.

Irreversible also utilizes an editing technique to give the feeling that each scene is one single shot. Alfred Hitchcock used a similar technique in his film Rope, loosely based on real life child murderers Leopold and Loeb. A 2001: A Space Odyssey poster is also seen in the room of the male protagonist in Irreversible. It can be assumed that director Gaspar Noé is most certainly inspired by film-makers of the past. Most films that deal with France tend to give it a romanticized feel. I find that to be ridiculous and a film like Irreversible shatters that stereotype. The film shows the dark side of France with subversive subcultures, extreme violence, brutal rape, and not so aesthetically pleasing sets. Irreversible introduces a new look at France just as François Truffaut's film did decades before. It is rare to find nowadays directors that are brave enough to bring up issues that are not often the most desirable to think about.

In a time when the majority of films released are just made to get a quick buck, Irreversible offers the viewer something new both in artistry and social commentary. It also looks at the inevitability of time and its consequences in which I believe are done in a more intelligent way than Christopher Nolan's Memento. Time can change everything as unfolded in Irreversible.

DeStricTed is a compilation of seven short films by seven different directors expressing their views on sexuality and pornography. As can be expected, some are interesting and some are complete shit. Directors generally use short films as an opportunity to experiment with the film medium. Many of these directors are already virtual pornographers so the DeStricTed project is fitting to their backgrounds. Balkan Erotic Epic directed by Marina Abramovic This short features Slavs from the Balkans playing with their tits, fucking a grassy field (actually having sex with the ground), and flashing their muffs to mother nature. The short plays out as something you might expect to see on the history channel if they included graphic sex history. Apparently women from the Balkans used to cover their hands with their female secretions and put it on their children's face. What loving mothers. Sync directed by Marco Brambilla I am sure mind control Soviet propagandist Dziga Vertov would be proud of this porn scene montage. This short films is merely a collection of sex footage edited together in a coke-heads format. Nothing very interesting here. Brambilla probably came up with the idea for the film after watching the latest McDonald's commercial. Hoist directed by Matthew Barney Some weird fuck greases his dick while being suspended in some type of industrial machine. This short had me disgusted after I actually noticed what was going on. Hoist starts out ambiguous in a close-up shot of a dirty body and an erecting object (guess what it is?). An interesting short that acts as a horrible nightmare (despite it being intended to be so or not). Impaled directed by Larry Clark Larry Clark does what he likes best when interviewing young men about sex and pornography. The interviewed, for the most part, seem fairly brain dead. Clark also has porn stars give confessionals on sex and how they got into the sinful porn industry. Eventually an Emo looking fellow has the opportunity to pick out a porn star to screw and he goes for anal with a 40 year old. Larry Clark once again confirms that he is an old pervert that has yet to become conscious of his porn directing ambitions (yet happened landed there). We Fuck Alone directed by Gaspar Noé We Fuck Alone takes a look at two very different individuals in their own privacy masturbating to the same porno. The short is filmed with a strobe effect that you would expect from Noé. A cutesy teenage girl is the first to be featured masturbating. She makes sure that her teddy bear is close by her naked body. The second person to fuck alone is a weird fuck with a blow up doll and a devil lock haircut. A worthy effort from Noé. House Call directed by Richard Prince A doctor starts screwing his patient in this short. Featuring ambient noise and super shitty video quality, House Call is porn for art fags. Aside from auditory and visual dissonance, the short is fairly typical of a porn. A sometimes interesting effort, but nothing new. Death Valley directed by Sam Taylor-Wood They saved the worst for last with this pointless jerk off fest. A lone man takes a walk into Death Valley and starts masturbating. He seems to be having some mental problems in the process. What a lonely fellow. Director Sam Taylor-Wood put no thought into this short that should have been aborted. DeStricted offers a few alluring shorts. It would have been interesting to have seen John Waters and Jörg Buttgerit contribute a film to the compilation. Half of the directors involved in DeStricted have no right calling themselves artists. Anyone can captivate an audience with sex (especially when it's unconventional).

ENTER THE VOID

Gaspar Noé (2009)

Without question, Enter the Void (2009) is Argentinean auteur Gaspar Noé's most technically and aesthetically accomplished work to date, but I would never call it anywhere near his greatest film. Indeed, compared to the froggy pre-apocalyptic Euro-decay of Noé's previous works, Carne (1991), I Stand Alone (1998), and Irréversible (2002), Enter the Void seems like the epic celluloid wet dream of a decadent and unthinking recreational psychedelic drug user (which Noé is!) who can no longer be bothered with the uncomfortable true troubles of the world because he is far too comfortable and has finally received enough success to do whatever the hell he wants. Undoubtedly, Enter the Void was a 'dream' for Noé and the filmmaker's equivalent to Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968)—a work that the director has credited as not only influencing him to be a film director at the mere age of 7, but would also make a somewhat strange 'appearance' in poster form in a hot and steamy sex scene between Monica Bellucci and Vincent Cassel in Irréversible. Additionally, Noé has cited the films of cine-magician Kenneth Anger, especially Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954), as being a major aesthetic influence for Enter the Void, but arguably most interestingly, the filmmaker has credited the scientific drawings of German Romantic biologist/philosopher/physician/artist Ernst Haeckel as influencing the neo-psychedelic organic patterns featured throughout the film. In terms of less obvious aesthetic influences, Noé has named the experimental films of 'spiritual auteur' Jordan Belson (Bop-Scotch, Phenomena) and the found-footage flicks of Austrian auteur Peter Tscherkassky (Instructions for a Light & Sound Machine, Happy-End). Thematically speaking, Enter the Void is like a totally transgressive 'Idiot's Guide to the Tibetan Book of the Dead' as directed by a contemporary jet-set drug addict who decided to "Turn on, tune in, drop out" while on an overextended exodus in Tokyo, Japan. The hyper hallucinatory, hypnotic, and aesthetically hysterical celluloid scumbag saga of a superlatively scrawny American drug dealer/addict living in Tokyo who is nonsensically killed after his cowardly cuckold of a friend rats him out to the police, only to comeback as a floating spirit as prophesized in the Tibetan Book of the Dead and watch over his friends/family, Enter the Void is a strikingly spiritually degenerate fantasy flick that will probably prove to be a 'religious' experience for ravers and other nocturnal narcotic-fueled rabble, but will seem rather retarded, at least thematically speaking, to most other viewers. Still, despite its decidedly decadent themes and morally and spiritually dubious message, Enter the Void is nothing short of a visually spectacular experience from a filmmaker that seems to be 'finding himself' (or whatever).

Oscar (played by non-actor/aspiring filmmaker Nathaniel Brown)—a rather questionable fellow who gets off to sniffing his little sister's panties and is jealous of said sister's pimp-like boyfriend—is a gawky and scrawny young American male of the modern emasculated sort who lives in Tokyo and supports himself by selling drugs in a notoriously dangerous and stupid place to sell drugs. Unfortunately, Oscar is a bad salesman and enjoys smoking his own product, which is DMT. Oscar's well meaning artist/neo-beatnik guru friend Alex (Cyril Roy) wants him to quit dealing dope and lets him borrow the Tibetan Book of the Dead as inspiration. At the beginning of Enter the Void, Alex tells Oscar how when a person dies their spirit wanders among the living and experiences nightmares until it can be reincarnated. After Oscar's cowardly British friend Victor (Olly Alexander) rats him out to the cops after discovering his friend had been fucking his MILF mom, the DMT dealer is shot to death by Jap cops in a bathroom stall after failingly attempting to flush his dope down the toilet (and idiotically telling the cops he has a gun!) at a happening bar called 'The Void,' thus beginning his post-life as a wandering spirit in kaleidoscopic cotton-candy-colored Tokyo. After dropping dead on a urine-drenched floor after taking a bullet to the chest, Oscar gazes at his corpse as he floats above in spirit form and his short yet somewhat tragic life proceeds to be viscerally yet surreally depicted in semi-chronological order. When they were just little children, Oscar and his sister Linda were in a rather violent and traumatizing car accident that claimed their seemingly loving parents, thus sending both siblings to different foster homes where they would grow up to become, more or less, self-destructive individuals with corrosive (and even incestuous) tendencies. After coming of age, Oscar relocated to Tokyo and eventually saved enough money via selling drugs so that his sister Linda (perennial celluloid whore Paz de la Huerta) could also move to Japland, but when she arrived she became a stripper and, in turn, the paid slut of a manipulative Jap with a wop name named Mario (Masato Tanno). To cope with the stress of his sister Linda, who he has a quasi-incestuous relationship with, being a paid slut, Oscar ultimately became a more destructive drug user and began to use DMT, which inevitably led to more self-destructive behavior, including screwing his British friend Victor's mom. Of course, when Victor, who is a closet queen, found out that his best friend defiled his beloved mother, he conspired to get Oscar arrested by the cops (he was arrested on a possession charge, so by setting up Oscar, Victor thought he would be able to knock out two birds with one stone) but, of course, never expected it would result in the death of his friend.

From there, the rest of Enter the Void essentially focuses on the somewhat immediate aftermath of Oscar's death and how his sister Linda and friends, Alex and Victor, deal with it. Naturally, lecherous Linda falls into a most melancholy state and indulges in large doses of drugs and sex, including miscegenation-based orgies and lesbianism. Linda also gets pregnant and aborts her ½ Jap baby, which Oscar witnesses in a rather gross way from above the operating table. When Linda and her 'boyfriend' Mario go to see Oscar's body, they are both disgusted and the corpse is eventually 'scorched' via cremation. Meanwhile, Victor bitches his mom out like a true bitch for sharing carnal knowledge with Oscar (assumedly, Victor wanted Oscar all for himself). When Victor attempts to apologize to Linda for his unwitting part in Oscar's death, she treats him like the bitch he is and tells him to kill himself, but instead he gives communal blowjobs to middle-aged Japanese businessmen like a true racial cuckold. Eventually, Linda drops her truly mean man Mario and, to Oscar's postmortem delight, gets with Alex, who has been living like a bum and eating out of garbage cans for the majority of Enter the Void. In the end, Oscar's spirit floats between rooms at a fancy kaleidoscopic hotel called "Love Hotel" where he witnesses his friend Alex passionately making love to his sister Linda, Victor blowing a Jap businessman while another Jap businessman waits for his turn, his pedophile drug dealer Bruno (non-actor and 'Save The Children' activist Ed Spear in his first and sole film role) smoking crack while watching a young boy having sex with a young girl, and various strangers engaging in various forms of fucking and sucking. In the final scene, Alex seems to be reborn via his sister Linda's vagina (thus making him the son of his sis/friend Alex), but auteur Gaspar Noé has denied this interpretation, claiming it is merely a flashback of the protagonist's original birth in the form of a false memory.

Featuring quotes from drug-addled artist-guru Alex like "Smoking. It reminds me of sucking on my mother's nipples. Best thing in my life," and "It's funny you know... DMT only lasts for six minutes but it really seems like eternity. It is the same chemical your brain receives when you die...It is a little bit like dying would be the ultimate trip," Enter the Void is certainly a celluloid drug epic made by a drug connoisseur for drug connoisseurs and that is exactly why I could not completely get into the film, even upon subsequent viewings and as a rather unrepentant Gaspar Noé fan. Indeed, while I firmly respect Gaspar Noé for his uniquely uncompromising libertine brand of filmmaking and all around aesthetic terrorism, it is impossible for me to truly respect a film that wallows in deluded DMT fetishism and pseudo-Orientalist hogwash of the would-be-metaphysical sort. Additionally, Enter the Void confirmed to me that Noé's career-spanning interest in incest is more than just an interest and has gotten rather old, and that he did not choose to include such sordid themes in Carne and I Stand Alone simply because he has an unflattering view of French proletarians. Indeed, 160 minutes of incestuous and perverted sexuality, psychedelic drug use, fucked up families, and warped Asiatic romanticism for death is not exactly my ideal sort of epic cinema and compared to I Stand Alone and Irréversible, Enter the Void seems like philistine escapism created for contemporary bourgeois would-be-beatniks who have the time and money to wash on such modernist post-counter-culture inanities. Still, Enter the Void is easily the greatest film set in Japan and directed by a white man since Paul Schrader's Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985) and an aesthetically noble, if not thematically negligent, attempt by Noé to direct his very own 'celluloid trip' equivalent to 2001: A Space Odyssey. Featuring a totally unsympathetic protagonist who does not even deserve the sort of empathy typically afforded to iconic cinematic antiheroes like Travis Bickle and Alex DeLarge, Enter the Void is certainly a film that is exceedingly emblematic of our spiritually and morally repugnant, vain and valueless, emotionally-dead and death-worshipping, and spectacle-obsessed zeitgeist, thus one must admit it has a more than fitting title. Packed with otherworldly images of abortions and aborted fetuses, sadistic sodomite drug dealers doping underage Jap boys, violent car crashes involving prepubescent children, starving artists eating trash out of garbage cans, Yank-on-Jap miscegenation of both the hetero and homo sort, dreamlike DMT derangement, a fiery cremation of a young drug addict, a crazy bitch dumping her brother's ashes down the sink, countless babies sucking on tender teats, and a spirit ostensibly being reborn via his sister's overworked snatch, Enter the Void is human ugliness in its most pleasantly digestible form and for that reason alone makes it worth viewing, even if the film seems like grandiose grade school diletantism when compared to its infinitely more thematically complex father film 2001: A Space Odyssey.

LOVE

Gaspar Noé (2015)

From various sources, including personal friends and real-life stories I have ever read, I have always heard that if you want to destroy a loving relationship, just get involved in a threesome and things will eventually fall apart from there. Judging simply by his latest feature Love (2015), it seems that even a drug-addled hedonist like French-based Argentinean auteur Gaspar Noé (I Stand Alone, Enter the Void) believes this to be true, though admittedly the film deals with much more issues than that, as an explicitly erotic melodrama depicting the remarkably destructive failed romance of two young and dumb degenerates of the emotionally erratic sort who like to fight and fuck. The director's most sexually explicit yet least violent work to date as a 3-D flick jam-packed with tons of highly stylized unsimulated sex scenes, Noé's 135-minute epic erotic tragic romance has naturally been described by many people in the press as a "3-D porno," but that would certainly be selling it somewhat short, especially if you're a cinephile and/or have ever loved someone that you wish you could get back. Of course, as demonstrated by his quasi-campy government-funded safe sex PSA Sodomites (1998) and his onanistic segment "We Fuck Alone" from the erotic anthology film DeStricted (2006) reveal, Noé is no stranger to working with pornographic content, so it is pretty much seemed inevitable that he would eventually direct a full-on feature-length fuck-fest featuring ethereal ejaculations and phantasmagoric fellating. Indubitably Noé's least thematically and aesthetically ambitious yet most overtly erotic work to date, the auteur actually came up with the idea for the film about 17 years ago and originally planned to make it in the early 2000s with Monica Bellucci and Vincent Cassel in the lead roles but apparently the then-married couple were not too smitten with exposing their sex life to the public or doing decidedly debasing things like getting involved in a threesome with a tranny, so they went ahead and thankfully collaborated on the superior film Irréversible (2002) instead. Featuring a novice actor as the male lead and two non-actresses with nil acting experience as the female leads, Love is ultimately a valiant attempt by an auteur to make a realistic depiction of a failed romance from a distinctly sexual perspective (or what the would-be-filmmaker protagonist of the film describes as, "sentimental sexuality"). Even more shamelessly self-indulgent than Noé's previous feature Enter the Void (2009) as an obviously autobiographical work that makes incessant references to the director's personal life and favorite films in both overt and hermetic fashions, the fuck-filled flick was largely improvised, especially sexually speaking (apparently, Noé would simply setup a scene and let the actors go from there), and was shot from a mere seven-page script. Not unlike his previous works, especially the short Carne (1991) and its feature-length sequel I Stand Alone (1998), Love also reveals Noé's somewhat humorous contempt and loathing for his adopted nation of France, especially the nation's capital Paris, which is depicted as a virtual gigantic bordello that is inhabited by intemperate sex-obsessed hedonists, jaded swingers, drug addicts, and pretentious pussy-obsessed art fags who are too weak and psychologically broken to maintain healthy romances that involve trust and commitment. Starring boyish up-and-coming American actor Karl Glusman—a Bronx-born bro with a Irish-Catholic mother and German-Jewish father who somewhat resembles a Melungeon (or a octoroon or mustefino)—in lead role as a character named after Noé's mom who feels imprisoned to a woman he does not love but unfortunately knocked up that spends most of the film recollecting his bittersweet relationship with his all-time great love after her despondent mother randomly leaves him a worrisome voicemail because she has gone missing, the carefully constructed piece of quasi-artsy-fartsy erotica might be dripping with buckets of steaming cum and cunt juice but it is hardly sexually stimulating as a malignantly melancholic melodrama that depicts the disintegration of a hot and heavy romance between two sad and pathetic virtual adult children who would certainly not be doing the world a favor by reproducing with one another.

After recently watching Hebraic hipster Henry Jaglom's helically structured debut feature A Safe Place (1971) featuring Orson Welles as a nonsensical Yiddish magician, I have to say I am somewhat less impressed with Noé's unconventional narrative structures, especially in regard to Love, which oftentimes seem like a less successful take on the editing of Irréversible. Still, the film's non-linear narrative is more seamlessly woven and sensible than the sort of conspicuously contrived masturbatory storytelling that one associates with a Tarantino flick. Essentially, Noé's latest feature unfolds in a somewhat predictable fashion where the viewer comes to realize how the protagonist ended up in his current pathetic plight as a result of the dissolution of his self-destructive romance with a woman that he is more or less addicted to and still cannot get over, even though she humiliated him in a variety of ways, including coercing him into taking part in a traumatizing threesome with a deep-voiced silicone-ridden tranny and cheating on him with an old fart with a cheap grey toupee (who is humorously portrayed by Noé himself in a cock-flashing performance). Produced by Vincent Maraval, who also produced the white-girl-exploiting towelhead hack Abdellatif Kechiche's epically overrated Sapphic pseudo-arthouse turd Blue Is the Warmest Colour (2013), Love comes very much from the same school of over-extended 'auteurist erotica,' but luckily it at least transcends mere titillation and communicates an important message about the absurdity of love and romance and how people that are oftentimes sexually perfect one another also makes for the most toxic of couples. Also, thankfully the film features real women with real bushy beavers as opposed to the completely bald baby gashes that are quite typical of both porn stars and western women nowadays. Indeed, were it not for the fact that the protagonist is an annoyingly whiny and scrawny stoner asshole of the radically repellent sort whose oftentimes enraging presence ultimately gets in the way of fine female flesh, the film might be somewhat arousing it parts. A film that predictably proposes that monogamy is unnatural, undesirable, and imprisoning (even though auteur Noé is married to French-Bosnian arthouse filmmaker Lucile Hadžihalilović), Love is also probably Noé's most innately immature and imbecilic work as a film that unintentionally demonstrates that when you're raised by far-left-wing parents, you will probably never fully grow up as you have been indoctrinated with a skewed pseudo-morality that teaches that mindless self-indulgence and promiscuity are virtues that are practiced by ostensibly enlightened and progressive individuals. In other words, the film certainly seems like it could have been directed by a LSD-addled fratboy who decided that his lecherous life would make for poignant cinematic art. On the other hand, Noé is hardly sympathetic towards the swingers, dopers, and whores that the film depicts, thus hinting that he is not as morally bankrupt as he seems (indeed, sometimes the film seems like it was directed by a sort of reformed libertine who seems to sense certain things are degenerate, yet is too hopelessly debauched to fully realize and articulate why).

Opening with a scene of what Noé once described as "A sweet double hand job" of protagonist Murphy (Karl Glusman) getting his rump-splitter stroked by his (ex)girlfriend Elektra (Swiss model Aomi Muyock, who Noé met at a party) while he thumbs her clit in an awkward position in a dark shadowy room to the less than erotic sounds of Erik Satie's "Gnossienne No. 3," Love immediately comes off as a pretentious fuck flick, but luckily when the lovelorn lead character begins to mumble moronic shit to himself about how much he hates his current life it becomes quite obvious that the film was not directed by someone who thinks of himself as the cinematic heir of Robert Bresson. Like director Noé, Murphy is a foreigner living in Paris whose all-time favorite film is Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) and who has no problem mocking his adopted nation and its people (in fact, at one point the protagonist humorously describes the attendants of a Parisian art gallery party as, "Bourgeois French fucks...with their heads so far up their asses."). Murphy was once an aspiring filmmaker that came to Paris to study film, but after accidentally getting a proudly pro-life oriented underage blonde fuck-buddy named Omi (played by Danish painter's assistant Klara Kristin, who Noé randomly discovered dancing at a night club) pregnant after the condom broke during sex and becoming the father of a baby boy named Gaspar, his life has been total hell as he absolutely loathes his baby-momma, who he fears will turn his son gay, and seems to no longer have any aspirations of becoming some sort of great auteur. While Murphy's apartment used to be covered in an eclectic assortment of vintage film posters ranging from Pier Paolo Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975) to Armand Weston's Sadean porn chic era roughie The Defiance of Good (1975) to D.W. Griffith's classic silent era KKK masterpiece The Birth of a Nation (1915), his flat was completely taken over and redecorated by odious twat Omi to the point where only one small corner of a room still contains items from his previous life. At the very beginning of the film, Murphy begins to endure an emotionally debilitating tidal wave of bittersweet nostalgia when he is rudely awakened by a voicemail message notice on his cellphone that was left by his ex-girlfriend Electra's mother Nora (Isabelle Nicouf), who he has not heard from in over two years. The last time Murphy talked to Nora, she yelled at him, "You should be ashamed" and "You destroyed my daughter, my only daughter," so he quite rightly realizes that it is "not a good sign" if she is trying to get in contact with him after two years. When Murphy listens to the voicemail, he hears Nora state in a clearly upset fashion, "I'm sorry to bother you on the first of January but I haven't had news from my daughter in the past two months...and I'm worried...and I know that she was in a suicidal mood. If you can call me, that would be nice. I am very, very worried. Thank you." As the viewer obviously suspects right from the get-go, Love does not have a happy ending.

It has been two years since Murphy foolishly irreparably destroyed his relationship with Electra by recklessly fucking Omi behind her back and getting the bitchy Lolita-like blonde. Murphy probably thought it was OK to cheat on Electra with Omi because the three previously engaged in an intense weed-fueled threesome, but he never suspected that one lousy and seemingly inconsequential fuck session would ultimately destroy both his entire life and relationship. Since she is firmly against abortion because she was herself the product of promiscuity and was thus always resented and looked at as a bad accident by her apparently unloving mother, Omi refused to get an abortion and Murphy suspects that she intentionally got pregnant, even at one point in the film thinking to himself regarding the current state of his miserable life, "I'm sick of this bitch. Go take care of the baby...and leave me alone, please. She tricked me...I know she did. Living with a woman is like sharing a bed with the CIA – nothing's secret. This used to be my apartment. I used to be happy here. It doesn't feel like my place anymore...Always looking over my shoulder now." After receiving the voicemail from Nora, Murphy cannot help but obsessively recollecting the pure passion and ecstasy of his hot and heavy romance with Electra who, quite unlike Omi, was a woman that he truly loved and adored, even if he treated her like shit from time to time and vice versa. In fact, as he incessantly states throughout the film, Murphy still loves Electra and literally prays to god that she will come back to him. As depicted in a flashback scene, Electra once handed him opium and told him, "If something bad happens in your life and I'm not there, it will protect you," so Murphy decides it is a good time to get high on the drug while recalling his sometimes good, equally bad, and at times downright ugly relationship with the one all-time true love of his life. As Murphy's story ultimately reveals, it is always better to suffer pain and heartbreak with someone you love than to endure a sterile and boring existence with someone you don't.

LOVE

As one can expect from a Noé flick, Love more or less depicts the story of Murphy's relationship with Electra in reverse order, beginning with the beyond bitter breakup as provoked when the lead confessed to his lover that he got another woman pregnant and concluding at the very beginning of their romance when everything seemed magical and immaculate. Like with many intense relationships, Murphy and Electra almost immediately fucked and declared their love for one another not long after meeting on happenstance in a scenic Paris park. While the two made a vow to one another to never let anyone get between them, both of them would eventually break that vow in a number of ways to the point where they eventually even encouraged one another's debauchery, thereupon inevitably destroying their relationship entirely. As depicted in flashbacks, aside from their brief ménage à trios with Omi (who was notably only 15-going-on-16 at the time of their initial threesome), Murphy and Electra also engaged in group sex at a swingers club and even engaged in a threesome with a creepy deep-voiced tranny in a sickening scenario that the protagonist naturally rather regretted to the point where he proclaims that he wishes he could erase it from his mind. Notably, Electra convinced Murphy to get in the three-way tryst with the tranny by absurdly arguing, "It would be a good compromise. Some boobs, some cocks." The sexual dysfunction in their doomed relationship began when Murphy foolishly decided to follow an overtly slutty girl into a bathroom under the pretense of snorting some lines of cocaine, only for the lecherous little lady to whip out a condom instead of coke and then sit on his cock in an all too effortless fashion, as if it was something she had done many times before. Unbeknownst to Murphy, Electra had already cheated on him with her opulent yet borderline physically grotesque gallery owner ex-boyfriend 'Noé' (Gaspar Noé). Indeed, since she is an aspiring painter, Electra thought it would be good for her career to ride the cock of her ex-beau, who originally dumped because, as she states, "He was old, but he wanted younger." Needless to say, when Murphy gets extremely drunk at one of Noé's gallery showings, he decides to confront his nemesis and ultimately breaks a bottle over his head, thereupon messing up the art dealer's preposterous wig in the process. Being a rich pussy who does not have the testicular fortitude to fight back and instead resolves his problems like a welfare queen who considers the government her sugar-daddy, vengeful Noé triumphantly declares to Murphy, "You piece of shit! I'm going to feed you to the cops" and has him arrested. Somewhat humorously, while being questioned about his supposed crimes by a smug four-eyed cop, Murphy justifies his actions by proudly stating, "I'm proud of what I did [...] Fucking France. 1918 was the last time you guys won a war. Since then what have you done? Nothing. Sitting on your asses eating. I'm an American. I'm an American. We fight for what we believe in." Somewhat inexplicably, despite his somewhat rude behavior, Murphy befriends the cop and while the two are sharing a beer at a bar, the policeman reveals that he is just as degenerate as the average stereotypical French bourgeois pussy by stating, “You’re in France, forget about your American feeling of possession. Of ownership. Of war, of violence. Try to think differently. In the United States...in the ‘60s, you were different. People were loving each other. What’s wrong with going in a club and fucking all the women? Because you know you’ll fuck other women in your life. But you’ll fuck other women behind her back.” Ultimately, Murphy makes the moronic mistake of following the cop’s misguided advice and takes Electra to a swingers club where they engage in lame group sex that only further divides the two lovers. Indeed, for whatever reason, it seems that Murphy and Electra believe that the best way to repair their irreparably broken relationship is by engaging in as much group sex as possible, thus reflecting their badly busted moral compasses and innate incapacity for logical reasoning and personal reflection.

Aside from the fact that the two lovers cannot seem to keep their genitals in their underwear for more than a couple minutes, Murphy and Electra’s romance is further compounded by a vicious cycle of substance abuse that eventually begins to reach self-obliterating proportions. Indeed, after Murphy reveals to Electra that he got Omi pregnant, she reacts hysterically by hooking up with the protagonist’s revoltingly swarthy cocaine-peddling buddy Julio (Juan Saavedra), who takes full advantage of the female protagonist’s glaring vulnerabilities. In fact, Murphy even goes so far as to describe Electra as a “junky,” though he is totally willing to overlook that fact if she somehow comes back to him as clearly indicated at one point in the film where he thinks to himself, “It’s true she was a junky. I would forgive everything. I would always love her...if she would forgive me. Please Electra, come back to me. Come back. Come back. Come back. I want to be in your arms. I want you to hug me. To hold me. Please hug me. Please hold me.” Despite the fact he once stated to her during a fight, “You will never, ever be a good mother. Ever! You’ll never be able to mother a child because you are a venomous cunt,” Murphy’s biggest regret seems to be never having a child with Electra, or as he thinks to himself while on the brink of crying, “She said we could do anything together. But there’s one thing we never did. We never made a baby.” In fact, Murphy curiously named his son Gaspar after the child he originally planned to have with Electra, who wanted to have no less than seven child number because she absurdly felt it was a lucky number (notably, when asked in an interview with uproxx.com about what he felt was the most emotional scene in his film, Noé remarked regarding Murphy’s decision to name his son Gaspar, “...the fact that the guy is mad enough at the girl that they considered having a baby of a particular name and then just two months later he’s giving the same name to someone else, with another girl, I thought that was very cruel. I was shocked by the idea that someone can promise the moon to someone and then be setting the moon to someone else just a few months later. Because the guy pretends he’s sentimental but the guy is not as sentimental as he thinks he is.”). At the very end of the film while sobbing in a bathtub, Murphy reaches rock bottom in terms of heartbreak, succumbs to melancholic madness, and dreams of a pregnant Elektra appearing to him. Of course, given the fact that she has suicidal tendencies and once told Murphy that she is more afraid of pain than death and “rather commit suicide” than face it, Elektra is probably already dead and the protagonist knows it. Unlike her previous boyfriends, Murphy was the first man that Elektra truly loved and she even told the protagonist at one point in their relationship that if they ever broke up, she “would probably have to disappear,” which is a promise that she ultimately fulfilled. At the very end of the film while Murphy is all by his lonesome sobbing in a bathtub, his toddler son Gaspar wanders into the bathroom, which only makes the protagonist all the more upset. While embracing his son and crying even more hysterically, Murphy moans, “Gaspar, I’m so sorry. Life is not easy. Someday you’ll understand. Please forgive me. I am lost.” In the end, Elektra and Murphy are depicted embracing in the bathtub, with the former remarking, “Please. Don’t leave me” and the protagonist, “I promise...I will love you until the end.” Of course, the viewer does not doubt that, at least in his own way, Murphy will always love Elektra, even if her body is no more.

Undoubtedly, with its various overly conscious scenes where you can practically imagine auteur Gaspar Noé winking at you, Love becomes downright cringe-worthy and Fremdsham-inducing at various points, especially during a scene where the protagonist declares, “You know what my biggest dream in life is? My biggest dream is to make a movie that truly depicts sentimental sexuality.” In another scene of auterist meta-masturbation, Noé makes it even more apparent that the film is autobiographical when the protagonist declares while more or less pseudo-poetically describing the film’s synopsis, “I want to make movies out of blood, sperm and tears. This is like the essence of life. I think movies should contain that. They should be made of that.” Indeed, in that sense, Love is like Noé’s own strangely sappy semen-soaked equivalent to Woody Allen’s Annie Hall (1977) as a shamelessly self-reflexive cinematic work that takes a ‘pornographic’ approach to lovelorn nostalgia. Despite undoubtedly being the director’s most overtly sexually explicit work, the film is also somewhat ironically Noé’s most innately ‘softcore’ and least subversive effort to date, as if he made it as sort of masturbatory experiment in cinematic technique to get some practice in preparation for beginning a more ambitious and highly personalized auteur-driven phase in his career. Certainly one of the most annoying aspects of the film is that it attempts to depict so-called “sentimental sexuality,” yet the characters are far too soulless, immature, and just plain stupid for the viewer to feel even the slightest inkling of empathy for them, even if you’re able to superficially sympathize with certain aspects of their plight, henceforth hinting that Noé is too debauched and emotionally stunted to ever become a great auteur filmmaker. After all, impregnating random underage teenage sluts, getting involved in threesomes with shemales, and hanging out with wealthy ex-lovers are not very intelligent gambles to make in a relationship if you believe that you have found your soul mate. It seems that even Noé's far-left-wing mother has a more practical view of his talents as a filmmaker as demonstrated in an interview with Dazed Digital where the director stated, "When she was still alive, my mother came with me to Cannes and she enjoyed it [IRREVERSIBLE]. And two years ago, I told her I was going to do a movie that was very sexual (with LOVE). She said, 'No, you're better at violence. You should do another violent movie.' I said, 'No, mum, I want to do a movie about love.' So that's what I did."

A work that is surely pathologically cinephiliac, albeit thankfully not in an obnoxious Tarantino-esque sort of fashion, Love pays tribute to various films and filmmakers in a number of ways that makes it quite clear that genuinely Noé loves cinema. Indeed, aside from the fact that the film's protagonist's apartment is covered with vintage posters for films ranging from Fritz Lang's M (1931) to Michael Powell's Peeping Tom (1960) to Paul Morrissey's Flesh for Frankenstein (1973), the flick also features excerpts from John Carpenter's musical score for Assault on Precinct 13 (1976) and Bobby Beausoleil's score for Kenneth Anger's Lucifer Rising (1972), thus underscoring the fact that the director is not exactly a fan of romance flicks, let alone great master auteurs like Ingmar Bergman and Michelangelo Antonioni, who certainly understood a couple things about the precarious state of love in the post-WWII Occident. Of course, what most of the films Noé pays tribute to have in common is that they take a look at the darker side of sexuality, which is somewhat ironic considering Love is quite sexually banal, even if it features the novelty of a 3-D cumshot gloriously exploding on the screen. Notably, in his official Director's Note, which he signed 'Gaspar Julio Noé Murphy' (which is a combination of four of the characters names), the filmmaker stated, "Of all my films, this one is closest to what I have been able to know of existence, and also the most melancholic. And it gives me a lot of pleasure to be able to share this short tunnel of joys and ecstasies, accidents and mistakes." Additionally, in an interview with Vulture.com, the filmmaker described Love as "my first first-degree movie" and "the closest thing I know to life, and the most personal." Undoubtedly, there is no doubt in my mind that Noé was telling the truth when he described it as his most innately intimate and personal film, thus confirming my suspicion that, not unlike his hero Kubrick, his talents lie in the technical aspects of filmmaking and not in being a highly personal 'auteur.' Surely it is somewhat strange and ironic that Noé—a man whose parents fled from Argentina to France in the 1960s because, as the director stated in an interview with Dazed Digital, "they didn't want to end up in a torture camp"—is at his greatest when making 'fascistoid' films featuring Aryan butchers stabbing swarthy Arabs like in Carne (1991) and a man literally bashing in the brains of a sick sadistic faggot that tried to rape his friend like in Irréversible (hilariously, Hebraic film critic David Edelstein once wrote, "IRREVERSIBLE might be the most homophobic movie ever made"). Surely, no one would dare to describe Love as 'fascistic' or 'homophobic.' In my opinion, Noé's previous films, especially his first two features, are more patently potent than his latest effort because they are visceral and unadulterated expressions of the sort of the natural instincts that his commie parents probably attempted to suppress whereas Love just depicts various forms of soulless debauchery that he and/or his friends have engaged in. Of course, the last thing that Europa (and especially France) needs is more expressions of senseless celluloid sensuality featuring sexually intemperate emotional cripples.

Despite being somewhat like the cinematic equivalent of a sometimes redundant 135-minute fuck session that concludes with a badly botched orgasm where a weak wad of cum drizzles out of your urethra like liquid emerging from a half-clogged eyedropper, Love does feature some simple truths about love and relationships as reflected in its depiction of unflattering irrational behavior and simple remarks from the hapless protagonist like, "Sex when you're in love is the best thing." Indeed, while you can certainly enjoy sex with people who you could care less about, nothing beats the truly transcendental highs of being in a relationship with someone that you both love and are completely sexually compatible with, but of course when things get bad, the lows are equally intense, hence why the protagonist of the film thinks to himself at one point, "How can something so wonderful...bring such great pain? Maybe it's better to never love at all." While I would much rather re-watch Love over its sort of cuck-certified pseudo-intellectual American equivalent Before Sunrise (1995) directed by Richard Linklater, I cannot help but feel that Noé's film is a hastily cinematic work that had the potential to be great but is just too damn superficial and pointlessly long, as a film padded with plodding pornography and pointless dialogue, among other things. Undoubtedly, if I am feeling in the mood to watch an idiosyncratic art-porn epic, I would much rather re-watch Curt McDowell's 160-minute piece of mirthfully macabre Gothic melodramatic sexual dysfunction Thundercrack! (1975). As the cinematic works of auteur pornographers like Radley Metzger (The Image, The Opening of Mišty Beethoven) and Lasse Braun (Body Love, French Blue) surely demonstrate, sensitively stylized artful pornography is nothing new, but of course Noé is well aware of this as demonstrated by his quoting of porn chic era works like the Mitchell Brothers' Behind the Green Door (1972) and Weston's The Defiance of Good (on top of that, he is proud collector of literary erotica). Additionally, the nihilistic hardcore flicks of Roger Watkins like Her Name Was Lisa (1980), Corruption (1983), and Midnight Heat (1983) make Love like child's play in terms of sheer darkness and grittiness. As someone that believes that, in rare cases, certain forms of pornography can be culturally redeeming and artistically merited in a sort of viscerally transgressive fashion, I have to admit that Noé's film left me somewhat cold and less than impressed and I say that as someone that was genuinely excited about seeing it. Still, in our degenerate post-counterculture age of soulless sex and mindless promiscuity, Love is somewhat important as a cinematic work that essentially tells a timeless tale as a sort of modern equivalent to classic ancient myths like Tristan and Isolde and Orpheus and Eurydice where it is demonstrated that love and sexual compatibility are not always enough to sustain a healthy relationship. Indeed, Noé's film might be shallow in certain senses, but it holds more intrinsic truths than both Lars von Trier's *Nymph()*maniac (2013) and Blue Is the Warmest Colour combined. Also, unlike von Trier, Noé at least has the gall to show off his own erect cock in the film (when asked in an interview with Vulture.com about this, the auteur humorously replied, "When you make a movie, it's like playing a game. It's kind of funny to show your dick to everybody in the country."). While one could argue that flashing his blue-veined custard chucker is symbolic evidence of Noé's propensity towards long-winded artistic masturbation, it is certainly better to be a shameless onanist than a passive and clinical voyeur like von Trier and especially Kechiche. Although largely a one-note wonder of cinematic wantonness, Love unequivocally demonstrates that Noé completely empathizes with poor lovelorn losers who have an undying craving for a warm cunt that they were quite familiar with at one point in their life, which is a sentiment that any hot-blooded male can identify with. Indeed, I can undoubtedly think of at least one certain otherworldly hole that I would love to jump into right now.

Although Gaspar Noé would probably never admit it, if there is anything that ties all of his films together thematically, it is how they, quite glaringly, depict the pre-apocalyptic decline of the Occident, especially the auteur's adopted homeland of France. In fact, I would argue that Noé is probably the most perfect choice to direct an adaptation of Jean Raspail's classic racial dystopian novel The Camp of the Saints (1973)—a surprisingly darkly humorous and even salacious and scatological yet decidedly dejectingly prophetic work that depicts the destruction of Western Civilization via hostile invading third world hordes that are encouraged by ethno-masochistic traitors, nihilists, and resentment-ridden miscegenation victims—but we don't live in a perfect world and thus just have to be satisfied with the auteur's undeniably debasing yet nonetheless delectable works like his latest frenetically fucked dance-hall-horror feature Climax (2018) starring an ostensibly eclectic cast of mostly melanin-privileged non-actors of various shades (mostly dark!). Indeed, the film virtually (if not possibly unintentionally) depicts a sort of raunchy racial apocalypse of sorts in a sort of degenerate dance microcosm where sex and drugs lead to irrational race-hate, brutal murder, death of a child, and even grisly suicide, among other uniquely unsavory things that one has come to expect from a Noé flick. By no means Noé's greatest feature (in fact, out of all the director's previous works, his last feature Love (2015) is probably the only one that is clearly inferior), the just-over-90-minutes-feature has somewhat ironically received the best reviews of the auteur's careers, as if the terminally 'woke' mainstream film critics missed the glaringly subversive racial subtext (or, even worse and not improbably, they enjoyed seeing a black-majority dance troupe commit quite literally savage hate crimes against mostly innocent whites, including a hot pregnant chick at the hands of a barbaric baldheaded black beastess). In short, as the film's title hints, Climax is an allegorical depiction of the French racial climate where all the vices of modern-day frogland—which range from gay pederastic miscegenation to Sapphic promiscuity to (sometimes involuntary) collective drug binges—act as a sort of convergence of social catastrophes that ultimately light the flame of genocidal race hate. Of course, considering this is a Noé flick, this ugly and dejecting material provides for endlessly enthralling and even sometime darkly hilarious material, as if the auteur was attempting to provide indelibly bittersweet therapeutic entertainment with plenty of raw and raunchy razzmatazz for Occidental Armageddon in the form of a quite literal (neo)Danse Macabre on bad psychedelic dope.

Not without good (and quite obvious) reason, 'dance horror' is an almost nonexistent sub-genre with only a handful of entries that include works ranging from Fulci's tastefully tacky Murder-Rock: Dancing Death (1984) aka Slash-dance to Peter Del Monte's undeservedly obscure Etoile (1989) aka Ballet (as well as Aronofsky's obscenely overrated rip-off Black Swan (2010)) to Tobe Hooper's somehow watchable dystopian Masters of Horror entry Dance of the Dead (2005) to, of course, Dario Argento's Suspiria (1977) and Luca Guadagnino's 2018 remake. Of course, the above mentioned films range from insipid mindless trash to phantasmagorical gothic arthouse-horror, yet none of these cinematic works come even close to Climax in terms of seemingly perfectly interweaving dance with narrative and ultra-violence with pathos. A mere five-pages of script stretched out to 97-minutes of perversely pulsating orgasmic audio-visual potency, the film also manages to feel like a virtual filmic dance-of-drug-addled-death, as if the viewer is transported to the the realm of savage sensuality, senseless sadism and spiked sangria that positively pollutes the miserably multicultural blood-sweat-semen-and-urine-drenched dance floor. Additionally, while the film was shot in a mere 15-days, it takes the Rope (1948) route in terms of giving the impression that it was shot in a single night via one-take (apparently, the film was apparently actually inspired by the single-shot German film Victoria (2015) directed by Sebastian Schipper). As one can be expected from Noé's first feature to actually receive a mere R-rating, it is also his least explicit and arguably most accessible, though it is certainly not his worst and its rather curious racial politics are arguably more subversive than any of the more graphic scenarios from the auteur's arguable magnum opus Irréversible (2002) like the 10-minute long take rape of Monica Bellucci or the S&M sod getting his skull literally crushed with a fire extinguisher. In that sense, Noé makes fellow New French Extremity auteur Bruno Dumont—a pedantic (yet undeniably talented) intellectual that cannot help but constantly depict contrived 'white racism' in his films, as if that is some serious problem in the conspicuously cucked continent of Europa—seem like a timid little bitch boy that, despite his ambitious experimental approach to the cinematic form, strangely subscribes to an insufferably banal and ball-less basic bitch narrative when it comes to race, thereupon unfortunately irreparably tainting his entire oeuvre. Instead, the film has more in common with the first three features of Dumont's underrated cinéma du corps superior Philippe Grandrieux, especially the beautifully brutal dance-and-synth-heavy La Vie nouvelle (2002) aka A New Life.

Undoubtedly, one of the most refreshing things about Noé is that, despite being an arthouse auteur of sorts, he is an inordinately unpretentious filmmaker that has no qualms about exposing his greatest cinematic influences. In fact, as his various films demonstrate, the auteur loves boasting about his personal cinematic favorites and Climax—an experimental exercise in both cinematic form and excess that only Noé could have conjured—is certainly no different in that regard. Indeed, at the beginning of the film, there is a shot of a vintage TV that is flanked by various vintage VHS tapes, including copies of Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou (1929), Kenneth Anger's Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome (1954), Lucio Fulci's Zombi 2 (1979) aka Zombie, Fassbinder's Fox and His Friends (1975) and Querelle (1982), David Lynch's Eraserhead (1977), Pasolini's Salò, or the 120 Days of Sodom (1975), Jean Eustache's The Mother and The Whore (1973), Argento's Suspiria (1977), Christiane F. (1981), Jan Kounen's Vibroboy (1994), and Gerald Kargl's Angst (1983). Noé also apparently intended to include VHS tapes for crucial influences like John Guillermin's The Towering Inferno (1974)—a film he credits as having an imperative influence on Climax—and Cronenberg's Shivers (1975), but he unfortunately did not have copies of these cinematic artifacts. Additionally, the TV is also surrounded by various vintage paperback books, including works ranging from Oscar Wilde's prison 'letter' De Profundis (1905) to Georges Bataille's classic (anti)erotic novella Story of the Eye (1928) aka L'histoire de l'œil to Carlos Castaneda's pseudo-anthropological best-seller The Teachings of Don Juan: A Yaqui Way of Knowledge (1968) to Patty Hearst's memoir Every Secret Thing (1982). Naturally, the auteur's collection also includes some film books, including Lotte H. Eisner's classic text Murnau (1973) and Luis Buñuel's short but sweet cinematic memoir My Last Sigh (1982), among others. Undoubtedly an eclectic mensch, Noé also displays works by French Enlightenment philosopher Denis Diderot, gay (ex)Surrealist artist Pierre Molinier, French film critic and sometimes filmmaker/Jean Rollin associate Jean-Pierre Bouyxou, Swiss-German writer Fritz Zorn (of the decided downer of an autobiography Mars (1977)), Russian anarchist Mikhail Bakunin and, sadly, Freud. Personally, I was glad to see Noé's collection of works by Teutonic philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche and his all-the-more-cynical virtual spiritual protégé E.M. Cioran. Aside from Nietzsche's classic Beyond Good and Evil (1886) and the study Nietzsche (1925) by Austrian Jew Stefan Zweig, Noé curiously displays a copy of the literary forgery My Sister and I (1951). Purported to be written in 1889 or early 1890 during Nietzsche's stay in a nut-house in the Thuringian city of Jena, the largely asinine apocryphal text, which reads like an unhinged parody's of the philosopher's writing, probably intrigues the auteur because it alludes to incest and other forms of degeneracy (apparently, David George Plotkin—the son of a rabbi—confessed to ghostwriting the book, which includes a number of obvious factual inaccuracies, including the Teutonic philosopher's unrequited love Lou Andreas-Salomé being described as a "Jewess"). Undoubtedly, in terms of its various imperative cinematic, literary, and philosophical references, Climax can be seen as Noé's most overtly fan-boyish work which, in this case, is not a bad thing as he at least has respectable taste that does not involve the fetishization of superheroes or cartoon characters.

It is especially fitting that Noé included a copy of Cioran's The Trouble With Being Born (1973) as the Romanian philosopher once described Paris as an "apocalyptic garage," which is a pretty good way to describe the setting of Climax (of course, "apocalyptic school turned dance hall" is even more fitting for modern-day France considering the intellectual and racial deterioration of the country).

The film is actually set in abandoned school that resembles some sort of snuff film factory in the largely culturally banal year of 1996 (and very loosely based on true events from that time). Opening with a clearly ironical title that reads “A Proudly French Film” juxtaposed with a French flag that covers the entire screen, the film is so innately and undeniably un-French that the so-called racial minorities are the majority and classic frog stereotypes like elegant romance and intellectual sophistication are completely nonexistent. Indeed, on top of only a couple of the character being actual white indigenous frogs, the majority are negroes who ultimately demonstrate many of the same grotesque negative racial stereotypes as their Afro-American counterparts (rather humorously, many of these black characters express the desire to travel to the United States as if compelled by some atavistic collective unconscious yearning). For example, every single interracial attack involves a negro irrationally brutally assaulting and/or stabbing a white, including an incestuous black brother that brutally beats a white dancer for virtually no reason and then, in a moment of insane (yet all-too-common) irony, accuses him of “racism” and brands his forehead with a poorly drawn swastika. In short, whether by (possibly subconscious) intent or accident, the film unequivocally reveals the true contemporary racial climate of the Occident where indigenous whites are victimized while so-called minorities absurdly play the victim. Indeed, as belated French right-wing theorist Guillaume Faye noted in his penetratingly incisively theoretical swansong Ethnic Apocalypse (2019), “Out of sheer resentment, frustrated self-victimization, a decidedly vengeful and vindictive mentality and racism too, many of their members abhor France and long to destroy it from within.” Undoubtedly, the abandoned school setting of Climax certainly acts as a microcosm of France, so I don’t think Noé could have missed the grating irony when he opted to open intro to said setting with a large fancy title reading, “A Proudly French Film,” but then again Noé is a drug-addled dude and he might just be depravedly clueless enough to believe such an outstandingly absurd statement. On the other hand, the film also includes a inter-title reading “living is a collective impossibility” after the racial chaos erupts and I doubt that is a coincidence. In short, the film demonstrates that diversity is a disease that metastasizes like a cancer until it breaks down the organic national body.

While I did not realize until after watching it for a second time, Climax manages to do the seemingly impossible by being a great film despite not having a single sympathetic or likeable character as if it is set in the real world where most people are not much more than uninteresting meat puppets looking to get fucked by other seemingly uninteresting meat puppets. Indeed, while I would typically like to root for the lone white dude David (Romain Guillermic)—a fairly stereotypical-looking swarthy frog that would be easy to forget in terms of appearance were it not for his curious skinhead-esque wardrobe, which includes a bomber jacket and Dr. Martens boots—I found him to be a fairly sleazy, low-class, and loathsome piece of rotten frog excrement and he almost deserves the nonsensical beating from the colored gentleman. Initially, kraut cunt 'Psyché' (Thea Carla Schøtt)—a slightly chubby blonde with a butch dyke hairdo and blank stare that hints at drug-induced psychosis/sociopathy—seems fairly reasonable as she explains how “I don't want to end up like Christiane F” and doesn't want to succumb the same incessant acid-dropping that has apparently consumed her Berlin buddies, but by the end of the film it becomes fairly clear that she is a completely crazed carpet-muncher that senselessly unleashed the LSD nightmare on the unwitting members of her violently 'vibrant' dance troupe. Indeed, as her compatriots are fighting, killing, being sexually reckless, and committing suicide and other forms of self-harm, Psyché manages to spend the entire night dancing her tiny dead cold heart out, though she does piss on the floor at one point in an arguably symbolic scenario that underscores her value and contributions to French society. On top of assumedly spiking the sangria with LSD, Psyché is a total cunt to her pseudo-blonde mystery meat girlfriend Ivana (Sharleen Temple), who rightly tells her “you're so fucking fake” as she is a character that is completely devoid of organic personality and her recklessly venomous spiking of the sangria is in complete contradiction to her interview confession that she left Berlin to escape drug debauchery. Meanwhile, David watches the Sapphic cat fight and rightly remarks to his negro pal 'Omar' (Adrien Sissoko), “Dyke stuff never works. They need cock. Both of them together, fuck it.” In the end, Psyché drops LSD into eye while her girlfriend Ivana cheats on her with arguable lead Selva (played by Sofia Boutella, who is the only real actor in the film). Needless to say, this film does not do much to help the cause of lesbianism, or so-called 'alternative lifestyles' in general, but that is what one has come to expect from a great post-sanity amoralist like Monsieur Noé.

While Hollywood and the grotesque globohomo elites love portraying n-egresses as glamorous 'queens' and other patent absurdities as arguably most insufferably exemplified in Theodore Melfi's tedious historical revisionist turd Hidden Figures (2016), Climax actually dares to depict a black woman as a brutal beastess of the most primitively evil form via a deathly dark dame named 'Dom' (Mounia Nassangar) who reveals certain sadistic self-control issues that involve attempting to kill unborn white babies. Indeed, in what is one of the more shocking scenes of the film, Dom—a baldheaded brute that might as well have a dick (and surely has a monstrously large clit)—brutally assaults a white chick named 'Lou' (Souheila Yacoub) in form of a couple kicks to her pregnant stomach. Unwillingly to believe that Lou didn't drink the spiked sangria because she is pregnant, Dom not only attempts to give her a virtual abortion via kick-to-stomach, but also gets her negro friends to encourage the scared white girl to kill herself in one of the film's more disturbing scenes that is likely to infuriate any sane racially conscious cracker. Unable able to handle the racial hostility from Dom and her pack of predatory LSD-addled darkie dancers, Lou turns a knife on herself after initially attempting to fend off her attackers and eventually concludes the film in a bloody hysterical state crawling out of the building into the snow as if being brutally birthed from the fiery cunt of jungle juice hell into the relative safety of cold lonely white death. Of course, not all the interracial encounters are violent, as a fag negro DJ named 'Daddy' (Kiddy Smile)—a large yet goofy and (seemingly) harmless 'black bear' type—reveals a sort of depraved tenderness by deflowering a young gay boy of dubious racial ancestry name 'Riley' (Lakdhar Dridi) that was hoping to have his boy-pussy popped by straight white boy David. As for all the bizarre racial hostilities, they probably could have mostly been avoided were it not for the superlatively sleazy scheming of disgustingly degenerate white Aryan woman Psyché who would have been better suited for her parents' generation as a member of the Baader–Meinhof Gang. Either way, Climax is a film with a cast of apocalyptically cringey characters that inspire absolute aposematism and really underscore the sad (anti)humanist joke that is so-called multiculturalism. As the film (seemingly unintentionally) demonstrates, H.P. Lovecraft was certainly right when he wrote, "Race prejudice is a gift of nature, intended to preserve in purity the various divisions of mankind which the ages have evolved." After all, not a single character in the film would be in the shitty situation they find themselves in were it not for the existence of a Kalgarian Europa; or, anti-Imperium par excellence!

Apparently, I am not the only one that noticed the film's rather savage racial (sub)text, as a dumb twat that writes neo-commie claptrap for Yahoo Movies UK bitched in regard to the film, "Noe has said he wanted to show the regression of human nature, and CLIMAX does that, but in doing so he's made black people look like the most violent and primitive race, and that's the hardest thing about this movie to watch. It feels like an ugly step backwards when in recent years we've seen a cinematic movement to show the beauty of black culture which has served to ameliorate a faux image forced upon its people." Of course, as this racially dubious lobotomized little lady fails to realize, all crime stats (not to mention good old-fashioned common sense) demonstrates that the film is completely accurate in terms of depicting the color of crime and race hate on the street level, especially in France where Africans and Arabs mostly excel in extralegal excesses and good visceral ultra-violence, among other things that the French media and culture elite do their darnedest to cover up (in fact, in the French Republic, it is even illegal to perform census in regard to racial and religious background). Surely, it is hard to imagine that average white French woman brutalizing the pregnant belly of a bulbous black beauty, but I digress. Needless to say, the French have certainly forgotten the hard lessons of the so-called Haitian Revolution (aka 'colonial Caribbean frog genocide'). Had Noé gone the Hollywood-esque Bizarro World route and depicted an anti-reality dance floor of the damned where black scientists were preyed on by pretty-faced white boys in the same vein as kosher-certified crap like The Purge franchise, he would no longer be an artist and instead a spiritual eunuch-cum-whore that worships lies over truth like so many Tinseltown hacks. Needless to say, when Noé recently confessed that he hated the unintentionally absurd Afrocentric Marvel abortion Black Panther (2018)—a movie based on a comic book superhero that, not coincidentally, was sired from completely kosher, as opposed to colored, minds—and had to “escape the cinema after 20 Minutes” partly due to it being plagued with R&B music, all the usual suspects accused him of racism, thereupon confirming that Hollywood has finally indoctrinated enough mentally feeble automatons that aesthetic taste is now completely irrelevant and even denying liking big budget celluloid shit can cause you to be seen as a virtual thought criminal among the moronic mainstream.

Not long after first seeing Climax for the first time, I had the grand unexpected pleasure of wallowing in Marcel Carné’s coldly romantic masterpiece Port of Shadows (1938) aka Le quai des brumes. Despite featuring a number of dark elements, including art fag suicide, sexual exploitation, and a decidedly dejecting (yet nonetheless quite fitting) ending where a beautiful fresh young love affair is swiftly annihilated after the male lover is coldly gunned down like a rabid dog in the streets, Carné’s film contains a certain hope and romance that Noé’s nihilistic danse macabre is completely devoid of, thus underscoring the complete and utter spiritual degeneration of France as a whole. Indeed, had a fire broken out and every single character burned alive while screaming in great agony, it would still be impossible to care for the lost souls and miscreants of Climax—a film that is only orgasmic in the same way as a Viagra-driven moneyshot in a cheap contemporary fuck flick is. In short, Noé has his finger on the pulse of frogland, but there seems to be no heartbeat.

Notably, in his penetratingly incisively theoretical swansong Ethnic Apocalypse, Guillaume Faye argues, “Just like a baby viper that breaks its egg shell, the coming racial civil war is only in its humble beginnings [...] The responsibility for this ethno-racial civil war, which has already been kindled, will be borne by our political, intellectual and mediatic elites and a statal apparatus that have conjointly been tolerating and enabling this colonizing immigrational flooding for a period of forty years. But remember—he who sows the wind shall reap the whirlwind.” Far from deserving to reap some sort of whirlwind, Noé, quite unlike any other modern-day French-language filmmaker, has consistently created films that are viscerally symptomatic of an innately sick and increasingly racially anarchic society that act as cinematic canary in a coal mine of sorts for a dystopian future that arguably can be seen as a sort of Haitian Revolution 2.0, albeit Islamic and more morbidly multiculti. I just hope that the auteur, not unlike his family emigrating from their native Argentina to France in 1976, manages to flee frogland before it is too late lest he experience something à la The Camp of the Saints that make the scenarios in Climax seem like good-humored child’s play. Rather unfortunately, not unlike the characters in Noé’s film, it seems there are very few places to run as globalization, reverse colonialism, and anarcho-tyranny has already engulfed most of the West.

In one of his most impossibly poetic aphoristic scribbles, Friedrich Nietzsche—a painfully introverted mad man that was probably too shy and timid to dance—declared in regard to the seemingly otherworldly quality of dance, “What a host of things can be accomplished by the state of intoxication which is called by the name of love, and which is something else besides love!—And yet everybody has his own experience of this matter. The muscular strength of a girl suddenly increases as soon as a man comes into her presence: there are instruments with which this can be measured. In the case of a still closer relationship of the sexes, as, for instance, in dancing and in other amusements which society gatherings entail, this power increases to such an extent as to make real feats of strength possible: at last one no longer trusts either one’s eyes, or one’s watch! Here at all events we must reckon with the fact that dancing itself, like every form of rapid movement, involves a kind of intoxication of the whole nervous, muscular, and visceral system. We must therefore reckon in this case with the collective effects of a double intoxication.—And how clever it is to be a little off your head at times! There are some realities which we cannot admit even to ourselves: especially when we are women and have all sorts of feminine ‘pudeurs.’ . . . Those young creatures dancing over there are obviously beyond all reality: they are dancing only with a host of tangible ideals: what is more, they even see ideals sitting around them, their mothers! . . . An opportunity for quoting FAUST. They look incomparably fairer, do these pretty creatures, when they have lost their head a little; and how well they know it too, they are even more delightful because they know it! Lastly, it is their finery which inspires them: their finery is their third little intoxication. They believe in their dressmaker as in their God: and who would destroy this faith in them? Blessed is this faith! And self-admiration is healthy! Self-admiration can protect one even from cold! Has a beautiful woman, who knew she was well-dressed, ever caught cold? Never yet on this earth! I even supposed a case in which she has scarcely a rag on her.”

Of course, in Climax a dancer crawls in the cold as she bleeds out and a darkie danseur even freezes to death, which is quite fitting as Noé’s nasty little celluloid dance number feels like the sardonically vengeful ghost of Cioran ruthlessly raping his one-time-hero Nietzsche’s inordinately elegant words, though these characters would be caught by what might be charitably described as a ‘triple intoxication’ and it is hardly of the relatively wholesome sort Nietzsche alludes to. Undoubtedly a film with a deceptively simple title that inspires many meanings, Climax—an oftentimes uncomfortably captivating cinematic work that is certainly not the Nietzschean ideal of Dionysian yet Dionysian nonetheless—depicts the last gasp of the Occident in a maniac microcosm where Mother Africa quite literally delivers a blow to a pregnant France (carrying, rather fittingly, a literal bastard) and where there is not white man to provide the white women the appropriate dance 'intoxication' (in that sense, the degenerate ghetto dance numbers are quite apt as they allegorically express the aesthetically and culturally debauched state of France as a whole). After all, as Noé once said himself, "all history is written in sperm and blood." In the end, it will not just be France and its indigenous white population that are swallowed up by the multiculti nightmare, but eventually everyone and everything just like virtually every single character in the film. Until then, one can only hope that Noé continues to devour drugs and and remember that, "one must still have chaos in oneself to be able to give birth to a dancing star."

PRIDE AND GLORY

Gavin O'Connor (2008)

Pride and Glory had fallen into a miniature release date pothole. Its release was originally planned to be March but was later pushed back to October 2008. It might have been worth the wait depending on how critical you are towards cop drama's. It isn't a film that breaks barriers down or exceeds its own limitations but nestles snugly into what it calls a home within the universe of corrupt cops. If you want a cast perfectly executed within each others own acting abilities, go elsewhere. Jon Voight is still playing the same character he did in National Treasure. Edward Norton serves as that detective who accidentally killed someone or something and is pushing his pension as a desk jockey. This isn't elaborated a bit as to why he's so "tortured" but most of this film is just go-with-it material. He originally was planned as star power but I guess several of his fuses are blown. It's ironic that Norton can play the most bewildered archetypes on the screen but cannot play a cop - the easiest role to portray. Colin Farrell's performance is the best in the film and is only tampered with by his "family man" side which nulls out most of the previous depravity him and his precinct have spent building up. Sporting a blazing accent with the city gestures and true to life cop look, he is easily the most believable character. A scene to look out for - Colin Farrell threatening to torture a minority's baby with a scalding hot iron. True cinematic menace rarely seen in a Hollywood film, and this is yet another reason why this film excels in some departments. Scribe Joe Carnahan writes the dull script for Pride and Glory. You may know this man from the explosive Narc and Smokin' Aces. It's a damn shame that he didn't put forth more effort into the film which could have been the Training Day of 2008. The film cleverly separates the extreme brutality towards minorities with inane "family" dialogue that challenges any attention span. This is definitely a chore to sit through a runtime of two hours and thirteen minutes. Pride and Glory wishes to set itself up as the next crime drama to depict extreme violence with a staggering dramatic edge, forcing tears to be shed and relationships to be challenged. While the film debuts a horrifying and gripping end, it's not enough to save most of us from the incredibly challenging scenes. The end justifies the means as minorities "get back" at the horrible racists by way of baseball bats which is the epilogue of a race riot. Names are rarely introduced which leads to massive confusion and names such as Eddie, Sandy, Kimmy, Ray, and Pa are tossed around like a football, which brings round to the false patriotic contexts the title provokes within your imagination. Pride and Glory would love to entertain you, but first you must suffer through never-ending "developmental" scenes.

Gelsen Gas (1969)

Aside from Alejandro Jodorowsky (Fando y Lis, El Topo), Raphael Corkidi (Angels and Cherubs, Pafnucio Santo), and Juan López Moctezuma (Alucarda, The Mansion of Madness), Gelsen Gas (née Angel Sánchez Gas) was another subversive, if not lesser known, auteur with a special knack for surrealism who helped to revolutionize Mexican cinema, yet he ultimately only directed one film, Anticlimax (imdb gives the year 1973 but apparently it was made in 1969), during his entire filmmaking career thus making him sort of an enigma of cine Mexicano. Although Gas never directed another film, he did produce and star in the documentary short Robarte el arte (1972) directed by Juan José Gurrola, which documents a journey where he, the director, and Brazilian pianist Arnaldo Cohen went to Documenta 5 in Kassel, Germany to steal a work of art. Undoubtedly, Gas' act of theft gives you a good idea of his mentality as a renegade filmmaker from south of the border, with his fittingly titled work Anticlimax reflecting the auteur's revolutionary and even criminal essence as an artist. Written by Luis Urias (who appeared in Jodorowsky's Fando y Lis and did art design for The Holy Mountain), shot by auteur/cinematographer Rafael Corkidi, and featuring a charming, if not all too brief, cameo from Jodorowsky, Gas' film is undoubtedly a dream collaboration created by the best Mexican filmmakers of the time and it is certainly as brazenly bizarre as it sounds. Directed by an iconoclastic poet Renaissance man of sorts who has worked in virtually every single artistic medium (he is best known for his paintings, including his tribute to Belgian surrealist artist René François Ghislain Magritte, 'Homenaje a Magritte' (1969), and his self-portrait 'Autogelsen' (1971)) and is even an inventor of some distinction (he invented the 'Hemifrontis', which is a radiator made out of volcanic rock, among various other things), Anticlimax—a black-and-white work that is virtually silent aside from some surrealist poetry spoken by an off-screen narrator—has more aesthetically in common with the early cinematic experiments of Luis Buñuel (whose influence on Mexican counter-culture is probably greater than anyone else) and Dada artists like Hans Richter, Man Ray, and Marcel Duchamp than the films associated with Jodorowsky and the Panic Movement yet the film is distinctly Mexican in character as a sort of esoteric absurdist response to modernity, including the rise of the Mexican middleclass and importation of American materialism. A multi-medium film by a multi-medium artist, Anticlimax features Gas' abstract sculptures, paintings, and poetry as encountered by a vassal-like protagonist who tries in vain to bring meaning to a life without meaning as a servile individual who is unwittingly imprisoned in an increasingly technocratic world of industrialization, urbanization, overpopulation, militarization, and crappy brainwashing TV shows. The closest thing to a 'Mexican Eraserhead' (of course, being set in a third world, things are not quite post-industrial yet); the film utilizes cinematic haikus to express disillusionment with the political, cultural, and sexual repression of that time. Indeed, starting production about a year after the Tlatelolco massacre (aka 'The Night of Tlatelolco') when the military killed upwards of hundreds of students protesting the 1968 Olympics and released just a year before American and European rock music was outlawed in Mexico due to its purported degenerative powers, Anticlimax is also a 'left-wing' work that somehow manages not to be repugnant or preachy as it is far too wacky and idiosyncratic to back any sort of concrete political cause and is thus best looked at as containing a singularly wayward Weltanschauung that transcends traditional political philosophies which is semi-esoterically disseminated by the Gas Man via symbols, sounds, and editing rhythm.

Beginning with sinister laughter off-screen and an image of a muscular man in a speedo juxtaposed with the narrated words "Gelsen Gas...because I'm alive," Anticlimax immediately expresses a sense of third world dime-store psychedelia when the title floats across the screen as if it were inside a lava lamp, but that soon ends in the next scene where a man digs up old film canisters in the middle of a desert. Indeed, Señor Gas has unearthed a film for you from the bottom of his subconscious that is as nihilistic as it is strangely goofy. The protagonist of the film is a young middleclass man named Gonino who seems to be fairly vacant when it comes to a personality, but he has the drive to make it as an architect, inventor, and mass consumer. At the beginning of the film, Gonino leaves his apartment and asks a chubby cop (as aquatic bubble noise is played in the background, with strange sounds being quite prominent in the film, which is further accentuated by songs by French avant-garde composer Pierre Henry) for directions, but the officer points him in the wrong direction and he runs into a pack of pesky Mestizo schoolchildren exercising who somehow morph into a flock geese. After going back to the cop and getting the right directions this time, Gonino ends up in a building packed with automaton-like workers and grotesque sculptures where he is given a job. The protagonist is hired by a man sitting at a translucent floating desk and surrounded by jagged sculpture who tells the new employee that his benefit package is as follows: "4500 to start with. Two weeks off in August. 3 courses in the processing area. Information verification and speed reading. Meals in the cafeteria: carb controlled." After leaving his new job site, Gonino takes a public bus and stares at the voluptuous thighs of a naughty nurse while a bloated Mestizo boy salivates while looking inside the skirt of an obese woman who is trying in vain to cover up her nasty bits. Late-1960s Mexico must have turned into modern day America overnight, as Gonino ends up going to a food stand where he dishes out $3 a hotdog, which he opts for cutting up into small pieces instead of eating. While playing with his wieners, the film's (non)hero also catches sight of three Mexican military officers speaking German (of course, this is a cliché allusion to fascism). After spotting a sign that reads "Check Your Weight," one of the officers gets up and weighs himself on a fancy scale and being a fat ass, he probably does not like what he sees. After getting done grinding his Frankfurter into what looks like vomit, Gonino is picked up by his friend (whose car has an anatomically correct bull decal on the back, with cock and balls and all) and heads to a hip party (shot at Mexican artist/artisan Feliciano Béjar's real house) where a little girl pops out of a fridge, various people ballroom dance, a woman attempts to perform fellatio on a painting (the place is covered with a number of modernist works of art), a poet writes poetry, a flamboyant fellow performs ballet, and a fur-coat-sporting Alejandro Jodorowsky sits with a hot chick on a couch.

After the party, all the fun ends and Gonino must accept his new life as another cog in a corporation machine. After having a salacious dream of a busty babe's ass being repeatedly flogged, Gonino wakes up and begins working on some architecture blueprints. After the protagonist goes to work at a hellish construction site, an off-screen narrator reads the following roughly translated words: "I have collected words, words. Useless sounds from dogs as our souls are kicked. Useless accusations against those who operate our happiness in mechanical calculators. In public they reveal our innermost secrets, in magnetophones, in filters where the secret noises of love is taped. We rip out each other's eyes, just because, because it's dark. In this world, petrified like fish eyes, we neither come nor go. We're only sustaining the disease of the universe." From there, an image of a black African baby suckling on his mother's nipple is shot with a shotgun, with a bullet going directly through the eye of the impoverished negro child. Back at his new job at the factory, Gonino begins designing white roses, which are magically mass produced with mechanical machinery. Gonino has been assigned to work with a guy named Gonzalo, who stresses the need for the flowers to be absolutely perfect, as if they can somehow do a better job than Mother Nature when creating roses. From there, we see a series of intentionally redundant scenes of Gonino doing the same things over and over again (i.e. walking to work, working, walking home, watching TV). Gonino's new salary has certainly turned him into a good little mass consumer as he throws hundreds upon hundreds of cans of food in a shopping cart while in a grocery store and purchases everyone of them. Indeed, the protagonist's overabundance of food seems to be making him a little bit crazy as he nihilistically opens hundreds of cans of food just to play with the contents, as if he is an inquisitive child. At the office, Gonino ends up developing a fetish for paper airplanes, especially during the most busy moments of the work day. For about the final 1/3 of the film, Anticlimax is comprised of a variety of spacey dream-sequences that begin with the introduction of a beautiful babe frolicking around ancient ruins that are covered with creepy baby dolls in weird poses. Gonino meets this little lady later that night and they carry a gigantic crucifix together to a curious church where Jesus Christ is on display in a jail cell. The next day, the two lovebirds travel to an amusement park where they 'ride' inanimate rides and the girl matter-of-factly remarks that, "everything is mechanical." After briefly going to an art museum, Gonino goes by himself to a patent office where he gets a strange and seemingly worthless invention patented by a secretary wearing a classic wedding dress. Gonino and his girlfriend end up getting married at a fancy Catholic church and an archetypical Mexican 'Lucha libre' wrestler in the tradition of El Santo (who was also a popular film actor and folk icon) sporting a cape and mask wraps a noose around both of their necks in a rather symbolic scene. From there, the newlywed couple has sex and eats forbidden fruit in a seemingly magical forest where wayward mirrors cover the trees. Eventually, the lovers get lost in a room full of mirrors and without gravity where they crawl up the walls and ceiling. Towards the conclusion of the film, a number of people led by a man pushing a friend in a wheelchair attempt to walk on water but merely sink. The people in the water eventually salute Gonino and his wife as they embrace. In the end, it is revealed that Gonino's story was merely a film played in a movie theater, thus Anticlimax ends quite anticlimactically as advertised.

While black-and-white and featuring none of the fiercely flamboyant pageantry typical of Jodorowsky and Corkidi's films from the same era, Anticlimax is certainly just as important and innovative as auteur Gelsen Gas' cinematic compatriot's work. Indeed, while Corkidi's oeuvre focuses on Mexico's dark history, Gas' film is a work that wallows mostly in the contemporary, even if it does feature references to the pagan past and the stranglehold of Catholicism, as it includes important iconic scenes from three different city centers that reflect the modernization of the third world nation: Celanese Corporation tower on Avenida Revolución (in Tijuana, Baja California, México), Ruta de la Amistad (a monument featuring 22 large sculptures created just before the 1968 Summer Olympics to serve as permanent markers of the event in the landscape of Mexico City), and new Periferico highway (which is featured prominently in a scene where Gonino's friend picks him up). The film is also notable for being one of only a handful of totally independent Mexican films shot on 35mm film stock. Ultimately, Anticlimax seems like the relatively successful cinematic experiment of an (anti)modernist Mexican artist that was fed a steady diet of Buñuel flicks, Dadaist art, and silent comedies by Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton who considered making a psychedelic film but was far too cynical and sardonic to make a work about such banalities as drugs and free love, so he opted for making a wicked and whimsical work that not only slaughters every sacred cow of modernity, but also deconstructs cinema as an artistic medium as a highly reflexive piece of celluloid that begins with film reels being unearthed from a desert and concludes revealing that the entire film is a fabrication that has been projected in a movie theater. A trying celluloid trip that might prove to be a rather bad one for less enterprising filmgoers, Anticlimax is playfully pernicious cinematic poetry with bite that does not betray the viewer in terms of constantly bombarding them with a variety of images and gestures that demonstrate a decided disdain for the modern world and all its abstract mechanical intricacies. Set in a technocratic 'fasco-capitalist' dystopia where dieting is dictated by employers and even fast food restaurants, Xerox copies are considered just as authentic as originals, flowers are manufactured as opposed to naturally grown, consumerism has become the new state religion, and—arguably, most interestingly—cinema is more captivating than real-life, Anticlimax is ultimately a ruthless revolution in cinematic form that spares no prisoners and proves that a relatively unknown Mexican filmmaker understood over four decades ago that the entire world, including the third world, would be devoured by American hegemony, spiritual degeneration, and inflated hotdog prices.

Geoffrey Wright (1992)

Romper Stomper is a great film because it lacks the in your face moral preaching often found in films of this nature. The film is like an update of Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange with a bizarre Neo-Nazi love triangle attached to it. I much rather prefer a film that shows skinheads committing acts of violence for fun than having some impotent mentor enlightening the world that having hate in your heart is bad. I have always loved A Clockwork Orange because it attacks both sides of the political spectrum. Romper Stomper doesn't even really attempt to go into politics (unless you count beating up Vietnamese as being political).

Russell Crowe (before he became a gladiator and schizo) stars as the vicious and sociopath Hando. His right hand man is Davey, a Neo-Nazi skinhead with a soft and loving side. The actor who played Hando, Daniel Pollock, committed suicide by throwing himself in front of a train before the theatrical release of Romper Stomper. He was also a heroin addict and romantically involved with co-star Jacqueline McKenzie. His break-up with McKenzie sparked his unfortunate death. Romper Stomper features pulsating Oi! style skinhead music with naughty racial slurs. Apparently you have to kick someone if he's yellow. Recently Australia publicly apologized for the wrongs done against the indigenous aborigines people. One might expect more racial tensions and Romper Stomper style skinheads on that glorified island. A Hitler's youth knife saves the day in Romper Stomper during the film's climatic conclusion. A young and budding skinhead takes a bullet in the same area of his head where Charles Manson has his immortal swastika. Romper Stomper has enough brutal violence to satisfy the most sadistic of film fans. The film surpasses the curb stomping action found in the heavily edited American History X. The original American History X intended to feature Giuseppe Andrews (as a surfer skinhead) harassing a homeless black woman. I much prefer to see that than Edward Norton taking unwelcome darts in a cold shower. Romper Stomper is a powerful and brutal film. A film that will stir you up with emotions that contact the most archaic of human instincts. Romper Stomper may not be most complex film (nor should it be), but it grabs you in its beginning and destroys you by its end. Few films have that kind of power. May Daniel Pollock rest in peace.

SUKKUBUS – DEN TEUFEL IM LEIB

Georg Tressler (1989)

As someone who is quite fond of the Teutonic mysticism of the mostly forgotten and often stigmatized German Mountain (bergfilme) of the 1920s and 1930s, I am always interested in seeing contemporary takes on the mostly forgotten film genre. Obsessive Scandinavian-Canadian auteur Guy Maddin (Tales from the Gimli Hospital, My Winnipeg) was somewhat artistically prosperous in his noble attempt at paying tribute to the Mountain film – albeit in a most absurdly and sardonically satiric fashion – with his work Careful (1992); a film that managed to bring oedipal incest and a kaleidoscope of charismatic colors to the typically morally pristine and black-and-white genre. The modern German movie North Face (2008) directed by Philipp Stölzl (Baby, Young Goethe in Love) was also an interesting contemporary take on the Mountain film, notwithstanding the blatant and clichéd ethno-masochistic message tacked on at the conclusion. Undoubtedly, one of the most outlandish, original, and sensational post-WW2 takes on the Mountain film is Sukkubus – den Teufel im Leib (1989) aka Sucubus – Devil in the Flesh directed by Georg Tressler; a Vienna-born auteur who previously assembled works ranging from Nicholas Ray-inspired teenage drama flicks (Teenage Wolfpack) to episodes for Walt Disney's Wonderful World of Color (The Magnificent Rebel) to trashy yet tempting science-fiction sex comedies (2069: A Sex Odyssey). With his last major film (the director would end his filmmaking career in the undignified realm of TV-movies) Sukkubus – unlike with many of his previous Hollywood-inspired films – Tressler got more in tune with his Germanic roots by deriving it on the myth of the "Sennentuntschi"; a tale about a doll that morphs into an evil and vengeful female demon that was traditionally told throughout the German-speaking Alps (from Bavaria to Switzerland), but was most popular on the Swiss side of the mountain, which also happens to be the setting of the film. Set in the early 19th century on a remote slope high up on the Swiss Alps, Sukkubus opens with the following 'fairly tale' introduction, "A Swiss legend tells of three herdsmen who let themselves in for the powers of evil and were punished gruesomely for their outrage." Such generalized and less than detailed words offer a frank but (thankfully) understated hint as to the oddly eccentric and equally exploitative yet classically atmospheric (at least in the German Mountain sense) essence of Sukkubus; probably the world's only German Mountain-Horror hybrid and one of Germany's few decent post-WWII horror films.

Admittedly, my initial interest in Sukkubus came from the fact that German absurdist auteur Christoph Schlingensiefel (Terror 2000, Mutters Maske) acted as the assistant director for the film. Indeed, although the Sukkubus seems like it could have only been sporadically directed by Schlingensiefel, it does feature some sprinklings of exquisite exploitation, sneering sexual perversity, and a risqué roast
